> With such material excised, the court shall then direct delivery of such statement, transcription, or record to the defendant for his use. If, pursuant to such procedure, any portion of such statements, transcriptions, or records is withheld from the defendant, and the trial is continued to an adjudication of the guilt of the defendant, the entire text of such statements, transcriptions, and records shall be preserved by the United States and, in the event the defendant shall appeal, shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge.

Therefore, the answer to the Senator's question is that the entire record—the excised portion, as well as the portion delivered to the defendant—will be preserved and will go to the appellate court.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator from Wyoming, who himself is a distinguished trial lawyer. I ask him to put himself in the position of counsel for a defendant who wishes to argue that certain testimony to which he has been refused access is relevant, and that the ruling of the trial judge was erroneous, and that—on the appeal—the appellate court should reverse the ruling of the trial judge. How can he make that argument if he does not have access to the testimony?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the answer is to be found in the decision in the Jencks case. The Senator from Pennsylvania will remember that the issue there was that the motion of the defense for the production of the papers was overruled by the trial court, and that overruling was sustained by the appellate court. But the Supreme Court challenged the holding of the appellate court, which explained the matter, which holding was that a sufficient foundation must be laid, but that it was not laid in that case.

The substance of the decision was that the testimony of the witnesses Ford and Matusow, namely, that they had made reports to the FBI, was a sufficient foundation. They had so testified in the court. If they had not so testified in the court, then undoubtedly, under the court of appeals proceeding, the defense would have had to lay a foundation. And it is my judgment that in the case to which the Senator from Pennsylvania refers, the defense would have to show a foundation for that belief, because otherwise the defense could simply make an allegation.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from Wyoming for the explanation. But my problem is somewhat different, namely, how is the appellate court going to get the benefit of the arguments on both sides as to whether the testimony which the lower court had excised and had not made accessible to the defendant, should have been made accessible to the defendant, and whether the ruling of the lower court was correct.

Of course, the court will hold that the statement shall be preserved and shall go forward to the appellate court, for its consideration. But the ordinary appellate court—as I am sure the Senator from Wyoming will agree—likes to hear arguments on both sides of such a question. But if the evidence forwarded to the court is never made available to counsel for the defendant, counsel for the defendant will never be able to argue to the appellate court that the ruling of the lower court was erroneous. I think that is something we should consider.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The issue the Senator from Pennsylvania is raising now does not relate to the procedure which should be followed in cases such as the Jencks case. The Senator from Pennsylvania is discussing the question of the propriety of the executive orders which classify documents.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think so. I say in all candor to the Senator from Wyoming that this point did not occur to me until this afternoon, or else I would have previously discussed it in detail with the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me turn to the case of Roviaro v. United States (353 U. S. 53), and I shall quote from page 62 of the opinion of the Supreme Court. The Roviaro case is referred to in the opinion in the Jencks case, and also in the concurring opinion:

> No fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors.

In the decision in the Jencks case the Court said—and now I shall quote from the majority opinion:

> It is unquestionably true that the protection of vital national interests may militate against public disclosure of documents in the Government's possession. This has been recognized in decisions of this Court in civil causes where the Court has considered the statutory authority conferred upon the departments of Government to adopt regulations "not inconsistent with law, for * * * use * * * of the records, papers * * * appertaining to his department. The Attorney General has adopted regulations pursuant to this authority declaring all Justice Department records confidential, and that no disclosure, including disclosure in response to subpena, may be made without his permission.

He was authorized to do so.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Wyoming please read the next sentence?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

I read:

> But this Court has noticed, in United States v. Reynolds (345 U. S. 1), the hold> ings of the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit that, in criminal causes" * * * the Government can invoke its evidentiary privilege only at the price of letting the defendant go free. The rationale of the criminal cases is that, since the Government which prosecutes an accused also has the duty to see that justice is done, it is unconscionable to allow it to undertake prosecution and then invoke its governmental privileges to deprive the accused of anything which might be material to his defense.

Mr. CLARK. That is what concerns me.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Then I shall read the last portion of the quotation in the Jencks case, from Judge Learned Hand, in the case of United States against Andolschek. He said:

> The Government must choose; either it must leave the transactions in the obscurity from which a trial will draw them, or it must expose them fully.

Mr. CLARK. It is just that which concerns me.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I read further:

> Nor does it seem to us possible to draw any line between documents whose contents bears directly upon the criminal transactions, and those which may be only indirectly relevant. Not only would such a distinction be extremely difficult to apply in practice, but the same reasons which forbid suppression in one case, forbid it in the other, though not, perhaps, quite so imperatively.

I say without any hesitation that if there is a case where the national security is involved, and where a defendant is accused of subversive activity, and where there are classified documents which are exhibited to the court, the court shall not exhibit them to any defendant who may ask for them. That is why the amendment—of which, I am glad to say, the Senator approves—provides for the submission to the trial court.

Mr. CLARK. My question goes not only to the question of privilege, but also to the question of relevancy or, as the Senator from New York has said, to the question of whether the matter relates to the trial and whether it will be exhibited not only to the court, but also for the benefit of the defendant. That matter gives me—as I have said—a great deal of concern. In view of the excerpts which have been read from the Jencks case decision, I wonder whether it also gives concern to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The answer is to apply the rule which was mentioned in one of the cases in the appellate court which handled the Jencks case, namely, that in order to obtain such material, the defense must lay a foundation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will yield briefly to me——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Here is where we have this head-on collision between what the Senator from Pennsylvania wants to be the right of a defendant in all cases to obtain classified documents and the opinion expressed approvingly in the Jencks case decision by the majority.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. First let me read this——

Mr. CLARK. I am not talking about classified documents. I am talking about relevancy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I read further:

> The necessary essentials of a foundation—

That is what the court is talking about—> emphasized in that opinion—

The reference is to the opinion in the case of Gordon v. United States (344 U. S. 414)— > and present here, are that "the demand was for production of * * * specific documents and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government on the chance that something impeaching might turn up. Nor was this a demand for statements taken from persons or informants not offered as witnesses.

There they have finished the quotation from the case of Gordon versus United States.

At that point the majority of the court state:

> We reaffirm and reemphasize these essentials.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Missouri. Let me say that I am delighted to see him here, and to see him looking so well.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the courtesy and the kind remarks of the distinguished Senator from Wyoming.

I must, in the first place, plead considerable ignorance, but, in the second place, I want to commend the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, one of the greatest lawyers in this body, for having taken steps to ameliorate something I have thought was a bit harsh in terms of a piece of legislation emanating from this body as it affects defendants. What disturbs me is this, and I ask only for information. We know that in the hands of the Government there may be an enormous body of hearsay testimony in the so-called raw files.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. The distinguished Senator from Wyoming himself has seen raw files. I, too, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, have seen raw files. We have taken it on ourselves as a matter of honor not to repeat the hearsay gathered from raw files about any person mentioned in them. We know, however, that everything is subject to abuse.

The question I should like to ask my distinguished friend, learned lawyer that he is, for whom I have the greatest respect and affection, having worked with him for many years upon many controversial matters, is this: To what extent, under the terms of the Senator's amendment, may the Government use, by way of innuendo, what may have been said by this, that, or the person and still recorded in the raw files? I was once a district attorney myself, and we used to pull out what we called the pink card, or police report, and we used such documents. If a character witness, for example, took the stand, we would ask the question, "Have you ever heard it said that thus-and-so did thus-and-so?" If a witness takes the stand, may I say to my distinguished friend, everything then is admissible, including hearsay.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an observation?

Mr. HENNINGS. I shall be very glad to yield for the observation. I may be most deficient in my understanding.

Mr. CLARK. I point out to the Senator the amendment deals only with witnesses for the Government, so character witnesses would not be involved.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is what I wanted to inquire about, and I thank the Senator for his contribution. That was the question which disturbed me, and I thank the distinguished Senator for the information.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am grateful to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes, I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have listened to the questions put by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and he, in a substantial degree at least, suggests that there ought to be added certain language.

> If, pursuant to such procedure, any portion of such statements, transcriptions, or records is withheld from the defendant, and the trial is continued to an adjudication of the guilt of the defendant, the entire text of such statements, transcriptions, and records shall be preserved by the United States and, in the event the defendant shall appeal, shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge.

The Senator from Pennsylvania argues that the lawyer for the defendant, unless he is permitted to see those concealed records, is not in a position to present the cause of the defendant to the appellate court. In effect, he says that there should be added to that paragraph the following language:

> And made available to counsel for the accused to enable such counsel to prepare his arguments on the issue involved.

My question is, How is the counsel for the defendant enabled to prepare the argument establishing that the concealed records do contain evidence relative to the subject upon which the direct examination was conducted?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The attorney for the defendant, and the defendant himself, must be credited with having some knowledge of the alleged crime, and must be assumed to know whether or not there is any possibility that there are hidden or secret files; but there comes a time, in the interpretation of the power of the executive to maintain the privilege of interoffice documents and matters affecting the national security, in conspiracy cases and the like, when it seems to me, it would be utterly at variance with the public interest and the national defense to run the risk of allowing such exclusionary material to be subjected to examination by a defense attorney without a foundation having been laid.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. It troubles me, too, but I submit this assumption to the Senator from Ohio and to other Senators who have argued on the point. Suppose one is sitting as a judge, and the defendant comes into court for discovery, under rules of criminal procedure, with a list of 20 items. The Senator and I have seen a judge strike perhaps 10 of those items on the ground that they represent merely a fishing expedition, and it is so shown merely by the identification of the material. For instance, in a mail fraud case which relates to a mail fraud in stock A, the demand may be made for all correspondence on stock B, C, and D, in which case the court will say, "We are not going to let you go on a fishing expedition of the defendant's business. That item is not proper."

What the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming does is require the court to examine the raw material to determine what will represent merely a fishing expedition and does not relate to the subject, and what does. It seems to me at that point there would be some measure of justice under the constitutional provision of due process. The party would produce that which does relate to the issues, and would not have to produce that which does not relate to the issue. The argument that the defendant should have a right to argue that everything relates is answered, it seems to me, by doing the best we can in the interests of justice, under the due-process doctrine.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to point out to the Senator from New York that what is done, in effect, is to change the rule in the Jencks case. I read from page 14 of that decision:

> The Government can invoke its evidentiary privileges only at the price of letting the defendant go free. The rationale of the criminal cases is that, since the Government which prosecutes an accused also has the duty to see that justice is done, it is unconscionable to allow it to undertake prosecution and then invoke its governmental privileges to deprive the accused of anything which might be material to his defense.

That, I think, is what this part of the Senator's amendment does. We should have caught the defect long before this. I have committed myself to support the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming. I intend to keep my commitment, but I hope when the bill passes—and I hope it does—the House has the bill before it for consideration, the House will give serious thought to this provision, which does not assure due process of law.

Mr. JAVITS. I could not agree more with the desire and the hope that, in a more deliberate way, the matter will be taken care of in the other body. We are not raising the question of privilege. I agree that the matter should not be decided on the question of privilege. The Jencks case holds only that if the Government pleads privilege, it cannot proceed in that way. That is the price of pleading privilege.

I am arguing a totally different concept, a concept which entitled the judge in any case to deny to a defendant even the right to look at material which has no relationship, in the judge's view, to the case, which represents a "fishing expedition", so he strikes the item.

I point out again, only to cast all of the light we can upon the subject, and with great deference to the judgment of my colleague, the use of the juxtaposed word "relate" as distinguished from "relevant and material."

I should like to invite attention to some excerpts. The majority opinion cites with approval the decision of Judge Learned Hand in United States against Andolschek. After citing that, with approval—and that decision holds that the Government must choose either to leave the transactions in the obscurity from which a trial will draw them, or it must expose them fully—the Supreme Court then says this, which again I read only to throw light on the subject:

> We hold that the criminal action must be dismissed when the Government, on the ground of privilege, elects not to comply with an order to produce for the accused's inspection and for admission in evidence, relevant statements or reports in its possession of Government witnesses touching the subject matter of their testimony at the trial.

Again I point out the use of the words "touching the subject matter" and, in the other context I read, the use of the word "relate."

It seems to me that does entitle us in good conscience to adopt this provision, within the concept I have discussed, and I thoroughly join in the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania, in stating we hope the matter will be even more carefully examined in the other body.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I add to what the Senator from New York has said, by referring to page 10 of the majority opinion in the Jencks case? This is in addition to what I have already read, a little bit earlier.

After quoting from the court of appeals, Gordon v. United States (344 U. S. 414), the Supreme Court said:

> We reaffirm and reemphasize these essentials.

Then continuing with the quotation:

> For production purposes, it need only appear that the evidence is relevant, competent, and outside of any exclusionary rule.

That is the ruling of the Supreme Court.

I think we do not wish in this amendment and in this proposed legislation to seek to overrule that decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, before we leave this subject, I think we have perhaps yet another little item which can be of help to us. Will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. JAVITS. From Webster's International Dictionary I take the definition of the word relevant:

> Of a nature to afford evidence tending to prove or to disprove the matters in issue.

And the definition of the word "relate":

> To stand in some relation; to have relationship; to pertain.

I submit that there is a real difference, which we believe the courts could follow. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. MORSE addressed the Chair.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. This was the issue I raised when I first had a discussion with the Senator. As I said then, the chief problem which has troubled me about the Senator's amendment is the question of excision.

> The practice of producing Government documents to the trial judge for his determination of relevancy and materiality, without hearing the accused, is disapproved. Relevancy and materiality for the purposes of production and inspection, with a view to use on cross-examination, are established when the reports are shown to relate to the testimony of the witness.

I think the Court was rather unclear in its own holding on this subject. It seems to me there are two ways we can look at this holding. First, if the Court meant that any statement made by the witness relative to the facts about which he testified at the trial had to be produced in court and made available to the defendant, then we could wipe out the whole idea of privilege. Of course in such a case any statement in which the witness' name appeared, or in which he had said anything—even if only a small portion—would have to be turned over to the defendant for examination. I cannot believe the decision means that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I agree with the Senator.

Many of us, of course—and myself, at times—have felt a little bit insecure about the rule of executive privilege, but it was first announced by George Washington, the first President. It has not been challenged by legislation all through the years. This is not the time for us to seek to invade that field, as I see it now.

Mr. COOPER. As I have said, this point has troubled me. If the court excises portions of the statement, then the defendant could very well argue, "Well, if I could have seen that part of the statement I have facts with which I could have demonstrated its relevancy, and I have been denied that opportunity because the Court has excised part of the statement." That is the core of the problem.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator not agree that if the defendant could say, "I have facts which would show this is relevant," then he should present those facts to the court? That is what we call laying a foundation.

Mr. COOPER. I think if the amendment means as due process, it has to be made clear in the legislative history that the court has no power at all to pass upon relevancy and materiality, and that any statement which has any probative value on the facts at issue in the case has to be turned over to the defendant in order for him to determine whether he wants to argue that it should be admissible. If the court can be given power it is because there is a question of balancing two constitutional positions. One is the constitutional right of the Executive, by reason of the separation of powers, to withhold documents. The second is the constitutional right of the defendant to have due process. Someone has to pass upon, and balance those two rights. And it seems to me it can only be the court.

I do not have the case at hand, but there is a case in which this problem is discussed. I shall try to find it. I may call it to the attention of the able Senator in a few minutes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very happy to hear it.

Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a letter dated August 22, 1957, addressed to the Honorable JAMES O. EASTLAND, chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, the United States Senate, by William P. Rogers, Acting Attorney General.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 22, 1957.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: On Wednesday, August 20, Senator O'MAHONEY, chairman of the Subcommittee on Improvements in the Federal Criminal Code of the Committee on the Judiciary, and Assistant Attorney General Olney of the Criminal Division of the Department of Justice discussed over the telephone certain changes in language in S. 2377, which changes I understand originated with Senator CLARK. Having seen these proposed changes in writing and having discussed them with Senator O'MAHONEY and Mr. Olney separately, it seems quite apparent that there has not been a complete understanding of the position of the Department of Justice. The purpose of this letter is to make the position of the Department unmistakably clear.

While the Department has consistently expressed a preference for the language of S. 2377 as originally reported by the committee, the Department in a spirit of compromise would not object, as requested by Senator O'MAHONEY over the telephone today, to the bill with the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, which was read to me by the Senator over the telephone, and a copy of which is attached hereto. However, the Department prefers the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate in Report 981.

The changes in the language of S. 2377 proposed by Senator CLARK and which were the subject of the telephone conversation between Senator O'MAHONEY and Assistant Attorney General Olney are completely unacceptable to the Department of Justice. They are the same reasons which caused the subcommittee and the Department to reject the amendments offered by Senator CLARK on August 16, 1957.

1. The proposed change in the language of section (a) implies that prior statements of Government witnesses can be secured by the defendant in a criminal case through discovery proceedings under the present Federal rules of criminal proceedure. The implication in the suggested language would be bound to cause confusion and might result in a broad and highly undesirable extension of the right of discovery in criminal cases which is not at all intended by the subcommittee or the Congress.

2. The introduction of the word "records" into the language of section (b) might well be construed to include reports and files generally, and, if so, would authorize the very rummaging through Government investigative files that the legislation is intended to prevent. It would appear from the context and from the position being taken by Senators CLARK and MORSE that the use of the word "records" as proposed is intended to include the Government's internal working papers, including memorandums, notes, files, and even grand-jury testimony, all of which can in a sense be denominated as records. The forced delivery of such materials would inevitably reveal the details of investigative techniques employed by Federal law enforcement agencies, disclose information supplied to the Federal Government in confidence, and reveal the identity of informants and complainants.

The Department and the Federal Bureau of Investigation strongly urge that the Senate act favorably upon the bill as reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM P. ROGERS,
Acting Attorney General.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand a copy of this letter has also been sent to me, and is in my office. I do not have it at hand. I think probably every member of the Committee on the Judiciary has received a copy of this letter.

Since I have put the entire text of the letter into the RECORD, perhaps it will be necessary for me now to refer only to the disagreement which the Attorney General has expressed with respect to the amendment D, which I propose to offer. This appears on page 2:

> The proposed change in the language of section (a) implies that prior statements—

In order that the change to which I refer may be clear, let me say that it appears on page 2, beginning in line 3. We have inserted the new language in paragraph (a), as follows:

> If provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

This section was written by the Attorney General first, and it reads as follows:

> In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report of a Government witness or prospective Government witness (other than the defendant) made to an agent of the Government which is in the possession of the United States shall be the subject of subpena, or inspection, except as provided in paragraph (b) of this section.

The Attorney General objects to the insertion which we have made of the phrase "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure."

Returning to Mr. Rogers' letter, he states:

> 1. The proposed change in the language of section (a) implies that prior statements of Government witnesses can be secured by the defendant in a criminal case through discovery proceedings under the present Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. The implication in the suggested language would be bound to cause confusion and might result in a broad and highly undesirable extension of the right of discovery in criminal cases which is not at all intended by the subcommittee or the Congress.

I point out that the argument is all based upon the assertion that this implies that prior statements of Government witnesses can be secured. I think there is no such implication in the language at all. The language merely says:

> If provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

We inserted that language because we felt that it was not proper action for the Senate at this time, and in this bill, to undertake to rewrite the Rules of Criminal Procedure. To make clear that this is not an implication that there are such possibilities as the Acting Attorney General fears, the word "if" was used, instead of "as." The word "as" was used in line 4 on page 2, in reference to the provisions of paragraph (b). The language is:

> Except, if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, or as a provided in paragraph (b) of this section.

I want the RECORD to show that in reading this language I have stressed the word "if" and the word "as," because, in inserting the word "if" instead of the word "as" with respect to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure the object was to say, "If it is there, we are not changing it. If it is not there, no matter." So I do not give much weight to the argument of the Acting Attorney General.

> The introduction of the word "records" into the language of section (b) might well be construed to include reports and files generally, and if so, would authorize the very rummaging through Government investigative files that the legislation is intended to prevent.

Let me emphasize here that the Acting Attorney General says "might well be construed." That is mere speculation. Then he says that if the words were so construed, they would "authorize the very rummaging through Government investigative files that the legislation is intended to prevent."

There is no basis whatsoever for this interpretation of the language which is before us, because, as I have already pointed out, we are talking about records, and a particular kind of records—the records which are mentioned in the decision itself, the records which are made by the Government agents of the oral statements of Government witnesses.

But in every instance the word "records," like the word "transcriptions" or the words "written statements signed or approved by the witnesses" are qualified by the phrase—and it appears for the first time in line 13, on page 2 of the amendment:

> Relating to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified.

This phrase makes it absolutely clear that we are dealing only with records which relate to the testimony of the witness. We are not dealing with reports and files of the Government which may contain irrelevant matters.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MORSE. I am glad the Senator has stressed the point he has just made, because I think there has been great misapprehension as to what the Senator's substitute amendment seeks to encompass. What this language of the substitute amendment really does, in my judgment, is to make perfectly clear what I think the Jencks case decision obviously intended. I think the Senator's language is encompassed, so far as the legal meaning is concerned, in the Jencks decision. But at least the Senator's language removes any doubt as to the rights of the respective parties. I am at a loss to understand why the Acting Attorney General has expressed the great concern which he has expressed over the language the Senator proposes. I want the Senator to know that I highly endorse that part of his amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator from Oregon. His comment reminds me of the fact that in the civil rights bill which came over from the House, and which the Senate passed, after some modification and sent back to the House, there was in part I a provision for criminal punishment of reporters who released executive hearings.

Some of the newspaper editors immediately jumped to the conclusion that the House language referred to newspaper reporters, and that this provision would be an invasion of the free press. Of course, what the drafter meant—and that was the Attorney General, of course, because the Attorney General drafted the original civil rights bill—was the stenographic reporters who were taking the records of the new Civil Rights Commission hearings.

That is the sort of misunderstanding which frequently arises when words are used. The reason we are using the word "records" is that in the draft of the amendment immediately preceding draft "D" the word was "recordings" and not "records." In the modern world of television and radio the word "recordings" has a specialized meaning, namely, tape recordings. It is well known to everyone who has any experience with making tape recordings that it is perfectly easy to excise statements from a tape recording and paste the tape together again, with the excised material abandoned, thereby creating a complete misconception of the statements made when the tape was run in the first place, for distribution to those who might read the recordings. So we felt that in the interest of accuracy we should use the well-known word "records" instead of "recordings."

With the definition, which is placed throughout the bill, that oral statements must deal with the subject matter as to which the witness has testified, I am of the opinion that the Acting Attorney General is expressing exaggerated and unnecessary fears. If this bill should be defeated now, on the eve of the adjournment of this session, and if this amendment were not adopted merely because we are in the closing days of the session, it would be impossible to obtain approval in the House. Then the Department of Justice, the FBI, and all Government agents and Government agencies would be in a far worse position than if the amendment as now presented were adopted.

It is for that reason that I am very happy to be able to say that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], and other Senators who have listened patiently to this protracted discussion, have expressed their support of the amendment which is now before us.

So, Mr. President, having covered this subject as carefully as was possible in the time at our disposal, I offer my amendment designated "8-22-57-D" as a substitute for the bill as reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). The committee amendments have not yet been disposed of; and until disposition is made of them, the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming is not in order.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The committee amendments are really to a former draft, which has been corrected, so these amendments are no longer committee amendments. This is the committee amendment which is being offered as a substitute for the amendments contained in the bill as reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). The committee amendments are still pending, and therefore they must be disposed of in some manner.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I call the attention of the Presiding Officer to Report No. 981. The amendment reads:

> To strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following.

Then there is shown the amendment for which I am now offering the substitute on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee report is not effective. If the Senator so proposes, he may withdraw the committee amendments by unanimous consent or by direction of the committee.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I believe I am doing it on behalf of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very glad to withdraw the amendments shown in Report 981.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry—and I should like to have the attention of my distinguished friend from Wyoming. I assume the purpose is to ask unanimous consent to withdraw the committee amendments and then to submit substitute D, which is presently pending.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is the exact procedure which I discussed with the able Senator from Illinois earlier in the evening.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Certainly I shall not object, but when the substitute is before the Senate, I shall have two amendments to offer to it. I wish now to make sure that the amendments will not be in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Without objection, the committee amendments are withdrawn. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is identified as 8-22-57-D, and is offered as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming desire the amendment to be read in full, or stated briefly?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the clerk will read the beginning of amendment D, that will be sufficient, because the text of the amendment has already been printed at length in the RECORD, and has been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the beginning of the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the amendment identified as 8-22-57-D.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That amendment is dated August 22, 1957. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute——

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. COOPER rose.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Kentucky wish me to yield to him?

Mr. COOPER. I was going to offer my amendment to the substitute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield the floor at this point. I wanted to make sure that my amendment is now the pending question.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

During the course of Mr. O'MAHONEY's speech,

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me for a brief statement of not to exceed 4 minutes, with the understanding that he not lose the floor?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator yields with that understanding.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. President, I have just returned from a meeting of the leaders of the House and Senate. For the information of my colleagues, I should like to report certain agreements which have been reached in the House on the civil-rights bill.

After due consideration, a compromise has been worked out. It is considered by the House leaders as a workable method of insuring action in the other body, possibly on Tuesday.

The terms of the agreement can be simply stated. The distinction between civil and criminal contempt in the Senate bill would be left intact. The judge would have the right, in criminal contempt cases, to proceed with or without a jury. But if a conviction after a trial without a jury resulted in a sentence greater than a $300 fine or 45 days' imprisonment, the accused would have the absolute right to a new trial with a jury.

Federal judges, in my opinion, will not lightly deny the right to jury trial in criminal contempt cases.

I am pleased that this bill will pass. It is a great step forward in an important and delicate field. The compromise will permit judges to try minor criminal contempts without juries, but will confer an absolute right to jury trial where the penalties imposed are more severe. This seems to be an appropriate middle ground.

Judged on its results—making possible the passage of the first civil-rights bill in 82 years—the compromise is good. Judged on its merits, I am sure it will produce many strong differences of opinion.

I preferred the Senate bill. I am sure that it was reasonable, enforcible, and constitutionally sound.

I hope the compromise will be equally sound.

It was the price of getting a bill this year. I do not think that price was too great.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, the new section, part V, as agreed upon today, and which I believe will be acted upon by the other body early next week, and which I hope may be passed by the Senate before the conclusion of next week.

There being no objection, the proposed part V was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PART V—TO PROVIDE TRIAL BY JURY FOR PROCEEDINGS TO PUNISH CRIMINAL CONTEMPTS OF COURT ARISING OUT OF CIVIL RIGHTS CASES AND TO AMEND THE JUDICIAL CODE RELATING TO FEDERAL JURY QUALIFICATIONS

SEC. 151. In all cases of criminal contempt arising under the provisions of this act, the accused, upon conviction shall be punished by fine or imprisonment or both: Provided, however, That in case the accused is a natural person the fine to be paid shall not exceed the sum of $1,000, nor shall imprisonment exceed the term of six months: Provided, further, That in any such proceeding for criminal contempt, at the discretion of the judge, the accused may be tried with or without a jury: Provided further, however, That in the event such proceeding for criminal contempt be tried before a judge without a jury and the sentence of the court upon conviction is a fine in excess of the $300 or imprisonment in excess of forty-five days, the accused in said proceeding, upon demand therefor, shall be entitled to a trial de novo before a jury, which shall conform as near as may be to the practice in other criminal cases.

This section shall not apply to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to interfere directly with the administration of justice nor to the misbehavior, misconduct, or disobedience of any officer of the court in respect to the writs, orders, or process of the court.

Nor shall anything herein or in any other provision of law be construed to deprive courts of their power, by civil contempt proceedings, without a jury, to secure compliance with or to prevent obstruction of, as distinguished from punishment for violations of, any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the court in accordance with the prevailing usages of law and equity, including the power of detention.

SEC. 152. Section 1861, title 28, of the United States Code is hereby amended to read as follows:

"§ 1861. Qualifications of Federal jurors

"Any citizen of the United States who has attained the age of twenty-one years and who has resided for a period of one year within the judicial district, is competent to serve as a grand or petit juror unless:

"(1) He has been convicted in a State or Federal court of record of a crime punishable by imprisonment for more than 1 year and his civil rights have not been restored by pardon or amnesty.

"(2) He is unable to read, write, speak, and understand the English language.

"(3) He is incapable, by reason of mental or physical infirmities to render efficient jury service."

POSSIBILITY OF SINE DIE ADJOURNMENT BY END OF NEXT WEEK

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, it is hoped we shall be able to report the mutual security bill from the Appropriations Committee on Monday next. That bill will of necessity go to conference. I hope we may have a conference report and final action on the civil-rights bill, permitting a sine die adjournment by the end of the week.

I thank the Senator from Wyoming for yielding.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I say to the majority leader I learned with a great deal of interest that the leadership of the House, which I take to mean the leadership on both sides——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Has come to an agreement upon this matter, and that the Senator expects that the compromise will be accepted by the House not later than Tuesday.

That is another illustration of the need for prompt action on the measure now before this body. If we do not act on this measure tonight, it stands in great danger of being destroyed and of having the confusion which has followed the Jencks case and the playing of great havoc upon the prosecution of racketeers and law violators throughout the land.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so that I may ask the majority leader a question on the statement he has just made?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the majority leader inform us whether this compromise relates particularly to the question which has been so much debated, as to the applicability of the jury trial amendment to other statutes, and that it has now been settled, and it is now confined to the civil rights bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Nothing has been settled, but it is the belief of the majority leader that when the House acts, the matter will be settled and will be confined to the bill. I hope that the section involving the press, on which the Senator has spoken to me privately, and has spoken publicly on the floor, will also be taken care of in the same amendment.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me, so that I may ask the majority leader a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. When the majority leader speaks of a compromise, who worked out the compromise? Who took part in it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The four leaders—the majority leader of the Senate, the minority leader of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, and the minority leader of the House—met today and agreed that the four of us would support the proposal which I have briefly outlined. I could enumerate all the persons who have been in on the conversations, which included many Senators on both sides of the aisle, but I have no doubt that each individual Senator will express his own viewpoint when the matter reaches here. Suffice it to say now I think the bill will be brought to the floor of the House on Tuesday, if the expectations of the leadership are carried out, and shortly thereafter we will have the matter up in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. So I understand the majority leader to say the compromise was finally reached between the minority leader and the majority leader of the Senate, and then the party leaders in the House; is that correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is my understanding all four of the individuals the majority leader has named have agreed to support the proposal.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is, when they met in conference, that is what they finally reached as a compromise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We conferred with many Senators on both sides of the aisle, and I am sure the leadership in the House conferred with Members on both sides of that body, but the problem was to reach a compromise on a bill that could go to the floor of the House. We have reached an agreement. It is my understanding there is a sufficient number of Republicans and Democrats on the Rules Committee who will vote to send the bill to the floor of the House. The leadership publicly announced earlier in the day that they expected some action on the measure on Tuesday next. It is our expectation that, if the House acts on Tuesday, or Wednesday, or whatever day it may act, we will bring the matter to the Senate once it gets here.

I wanted all Members to have as much advance notice as possible. Any absent Members should be notified this matter may reach us at any time from Tuesday on, so they can expect to be here if they desire to be recorded or make statements.

I thank the Senator from Wyoming for his usual courtesy in permitting me to make the brief statement.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Texas understands, of course, that I hope the bill now before the Senate will be acted upon by the Congress before adjournment. I really feel that I should make a demand that that action be taken, because if it is not taken, great damage will be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming the expression of a wish from him is sufficient to be a demand on the Senator from Texas. When the Senator from Wyoming told me earlier in the day he was prepared to bring up this measure, within a matter of minutes the majority leader made a motion to proceed to its consideration. The majority leader is prepared to keep the Senate in session tonight until 9 or 9:30, in the hope that we can get a vote on the bill. If that is not possible, the bill will be the first order of business on Monday next. The Senator from Wyoming will have the full and complete support of the majority leader in an attempt to get this bill through the Senate and in an attempt to get it enacted into law.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Wyoming for his many acts of helpfulness and courtesy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. May I ask the Senator from Texas to use his good offices, if the premises permit, to induce the conference committee to limit the trial-by-jury provision to the particular subject involved in the bill, not only because I believe it is right but also because it will, in a measure, approve the amendment which the Senator from Ohio offered 40 minutes before the bill was adopted, and which was shouted down by a voice vote.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I should like to say to my friend, the Senator from Ohio, I am not so sure that there is any political mileage in this bill for either party, but there is one thing I am sure of. This is a great victory for the Senator from Ohio, because although he was not present in the conference, the principles he advocated in this body, which were shouted down, were adopted in the final analysis. I believe it is a great tribute to his persuasive powers.

When the measure comes back from the House, although there will be many things in it with which many Senators will not agree, I think most Senators will agree that the proposal advanced by the Senator from Ohio has been accepted by the Members of the House, and in all probability will be accepted by the Members of the Senate.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My esteem for the Senator from Texas has always been extremely high, but never so high as it is tonight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield further.

ORDER FOR CALL OF THE CALENDAR ON MONDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, following the completion of the morning business, there be a call of the unobjected to measures on the calendar, from the beginning, which I anticipate will take only a few minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator to repeat his request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I ask unanimous consent that there be a call of the calendar on Monday, following the completion of the morning business.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Provided consideration of the bill now pending shall be completed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. After the morning business I should like to have a call of the calendar. That will take only a few minutes, then we will be able to resume consideration of the Senator's bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the request of the Senator from Texas is agreed to, and it is so ordered.

THE TENNESSEE CONTEMPT TRIAL—ADDRESS BY W. E. MICHAEL

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able address delivered by Hon. W. E. Michael, an attorney of Sweetwater, Tennessee, before the Civitan Club of Knoxville, Tenn., on August 16, 1957.

Mr. Michael is an author on legal subjects, and has recently written a book entitled The Age of Error, which clearly points up the lack of Constitutional basis of the school integration decisions recently handed down by the Supreme Court.

This able address deals with the methods employed by district courts to enforce the monstrous decision in the Brown case. It clearly depicts the perversion of our judicial processes which was sure to follow judicial law based on psychology and the findings of a Swedish socialist rather than the Constitution and established law.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A TRAGEDY OF ERRORS

(By W. E. Michael, attorney, Sweetwater, Tenn., author of the Age of Error (Vantage Press, Inc., New York))

In July 1957, in the United States district court at Knoxville, Tenn., a trial was held which could be accurately designated a Tragedy of Errors. Had it not been that basic principles of human freedom were at stake, this trial might well have been named after one of Shakespeare's immortal plays, A Comedy of Errors. Sixteen citizens of Anderson County were first accused of criminal contempt for violating an injunction to which they were not parties. Later they were charged with having conspired with John Kasper to violate the same injunction. All circumstances indicated clearly that they were so joined because that was the only way in which they could possibly be accused, much less convicted, of any crime.

NEW TECHNIQUES

In this trial the new technique of Government by injunction, rather than the ordinary processes of law, made its bow to American jurisprudence.

In this trial was demonstrated the method by which the Supreme Court of the United States evidently intended, through the Department of Justice, to enforce against the South the philosophy of the Supreme Court as expressed in the school-integration cases.

In this contempt trial, for the first time in the memory of any of the lawyers for the defense, newspapers were admitted as evidence of a circumstance to show proof of notice of an injunction.

In this trial, through motion pictures, magazine articles, pictures and snatches of extraneous and unrelated fragments of circumstances, the Government undertook to, and evidently did, to the satisfaction of the jury, make out a case of guilt by association. Guilt by association is repugnant to every concept of American justice. It debases and violates the very fundamental proposition of law that one charged with a crime is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt by competent and credible proof.

The 16 Anderson County defendants were represented by more than 12 lawyers from 7 different States (6 from Tennessee), representing an aggregate of more than 300 years' experience, either upon the bench, or at the bar of justice. The fact that six of these defendants were convicted of a crime (conspiracy) which the defense believed had never even been committed, or if committed, certainly never proven by competent evidence, indicates the very grave dangers which we face if these new techniques of modern jurisprudence supplant the time-honored checks and balances of our historical form of government.

NO REFLECTION UPON THE JUDICIARY

I do not intend any reflection upon United States District Judge Robert L. Taylor, a personal friend of mine, an honorable man, and a conscientious judge, nor upon the able district attorney, John Crawford, and his equally able staff. I have the greatest reverence for all of our courts as institutions of government; but when any of these courts impinge upon our constitutional freedoms, it is the privilege of every citizen to disagree with such decisions, and that it is the duty of a lawyer to speak frankly, and forcefully for the purpose of correcting such errors and of preserving those principles of free government which we all cherish.

HISTORY OF CLINTON CASE

On December 5, 1950, a suit, known as the Jo Heather McSwain case, was filed on behalf of a small percentage of the Negro students in Anderson County. This suit was sponsored and prosecuted by the N. A. A. C. P. and its nonresident Negro lawyers. The purpose of this suit was to require the Anderson County School Board to admit these Negro students to the white schools in Anderson County.

When the case came to trial in the United States District Court at Knoxville, Judge Taylor denied the petition for integration. While the case was on appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States in the now famous integration case (Brown v. Topeka) handed down an opinion on May 17, 1954, holding that the 14th amendment prohibited the operations of segregated public schools by a State, even if school facilities were equal.

As a result of the Supreme Court action, the court of appeals reversed the Anderson County case, and Judge Taylor, on January 4, 1956, entered an order against the Anderson County School Board in which it is said: "It is the opinion of this court that desegregation as to high school students in that county should be effected by a definite date and that a reasonable date should be fixed as one not later than the beginning of the fall term of the present year of 1956." Let us observe in passing that this order was not limited, as we insist that it should have been, to ordering the Anderson County School Board to admit the petitioners under the opinion of the court of appeals, but it went further and ordered the desegregation of all high schools in Anderson County. In other words, all the other colored children were then to be forced to go to the white school whether they wanted to go there or not. In fairness to Judge Taylor the order which he entered appears to be exactly in keeping with what the Supreme Court had in mind in its opinion and orders in the case of Brown v. Topeka. The objection to it is that the order and the opinion of the Supreme Court were contrary to the law of the land, in violation of the Constitution of the United States and of the constitutions and statutes of the Southern States, to which alone the decision applied.

Ten of the Clinton defendants were either acquitted by the jury, or the charge as to them was dismissed, but not until these citizens, who stand not guilty of all charges, had been terrorized, humiliated and branded as hoodlums. They had been put in irons, kept in jail, paraded in front of television and newsreel cameras, torn from their homes, and their jobs and forced at great sacrifice to attend numerous hearings and to spend many days in court.

Were it possible to do so, the entire record of this contempt case should be written and should be required study in every school in the land. Under the proof introduced by the Government and upon which the conviction of the six Clinton defendants rests, any person present or any person reading, these words could have been convicted had that person simply happened to walk along a street in Clinton, sit in a parked automobile, attend a public meeting, sign a petition, appear before the school board as an interested patron, or do, while in Anderson County, any of the other lawful acts shown to have been done by any of the 16 defendants.

FACTS OF THE CASE

What were the facts in the case? Without leaving out any important matter intentionally, and certainly without misquoting or misconstruing any part of the evidence intentionally, this is in substance what happened. John Frederick Kasper came to Clinton, Tenn., about August 25, 1956, without the knowledge of any of the local defendants. He had been there only 2 or 3 days when an injunction was issued against him and others not now parties to the present contempt proceedings. Pertinent provisions of that injunction are as follows:

> "It is ordered and decreed by the court that the aforementioned persons, their agents, servants, representatives, attorneys, and all other persons who are acting, or may act in concert with them be, and they are, hereby enjoined and prohibited from further hindering, obstructing, or in anywise interfering with the carrying out of the aforesaid order of this court (the desegregation order) or from picketing Clinton High School, either by words, or acts or otherwise."

On the 4th day after his arrival, Kasper was convicted of violating the injunction, at which time he was sentenced to a year in prison.

A White Citizens Council, composed of more than 500 outstanding citizens of Anderson County, was formed for the purpose of trying to prevent mixing of the races in the local schools. Almost 500 citizens and patrons of Anderson County signed a petition to the school board to that effect, several weeks before Kasper's arrival. Local citizens of Anderson County filed at least two suits in the State courts seeking to prevent such integration and some of the defendants were parties to those suits. Others appeared before the school board and requested that the board take legal steps to avoid race mixing. All of these things happened without Kasper's knowledge or participation, according to the evidence. Therefore, he could not have been responsible for them.

The vast majority of people in Anderson County were opposed to integrating the schools and were trying in every peaceful and legitimate manner possible to prevent it. As these efforts failed to produce results, tension began to mount and feelings ran high, until about the latter part of November and the first of December 1956, they reached a crescendo. Newspaper reporters, magazine writers, radio and television cameramen and news photographers descended upon the little city of Clinton. It must be said that a few local people basked in this new sunlight of publicity. The majority of them regretted it, but there was little they could do except to protest. These people knew that something sacred had been violated, but no capable local leadership appeared to correctly inform them as to the law and to assist and advise them in their struggle to protect their fundamental freedoms.

Instead, they were faced with a condition unique in this country. An injunction had issued against certain individuals as already described. No one apparently understood it and some believed that this injunction was against everybody in the county and prohibited everybody from doing anything that would interfere with desegregation. Mr. Sidney Davis, one of the lawyers in the case originally, and one of those who helped to initiate the injunction and contempt proceedings, admitted that he so construed the injunction. Every lawyer knows that there is no authority for issuing a broadside injunction. An injunction must be specific. It must identify the person enjoined, must be served upon them by an authorized person, and must inform the persons involved exactly what they can, or must, or must not, do. None of the 16 defendants was served with the injunction, nor was there any proof that they knew or understood it.

The people were also faced in Anderson County with a rule of home guard. These were certain local persons organized into a sort of makeshift constabulary, armed with a variety of deadly weapons and permitted by the local authorities to go upon the streets breaking up any congregation of people, preventing any public speakings, and in general, suspending in Clinton, Tenn., the constitutional freedoms of speech, of assemblage, of petition, and of seeking redress for grievances. This so-called home guard actually threw tear-gas bombs into peaceful and unarmed groups where old men and women and little children were painfully injured.

WHY WAS KASPER INCLUDED?

When defenses were interposed for these 16 defendants under the attachment of December 5, 1956, it was evident that these defendants could not be prosecuted for violating an injunction to which they were not parties, unless they were either agents, employees, attorneys, or servants of, or acting in concert with, somebody who had been served with the injunction. Kasper was not even in Clinton when the event occurred on December 4, 1956, which precipitated this contempt proceeding, but he was the only one against whom the injunction was being prosecuted at that time. Furthermore, Kasper had received so much unfavorable publicity that most people were willing to convict him on general principles. The bringing of Kasper into this contempt proceeding with the 16 and charging them with having agreed with him in November, or in December, 1956, to violate the injunction, confesses a complete inability on the part of the Government to make out a case against the 16.

There was no evidence of any agreement or conspiracy between Kasper and any of the defendants. The Government did not produce a witness as to any such agreement or conspiracy, except the lawyer witness, Sidney Davis, who said that he helped to get out the petition for attachment against the 16 and while admitting that he had no evidence of a conspiracy between them and Kasper, he said, "I felt in my heart that they were working together." This is every word that the Government had upon which to predicate any proof of an actual agreement or conspiracy. In your mind, as American citizens, is that sufficient evidence upon which to convict and condemn to jail citizens who have done nothing more than to fight for their fundamental rights?

This is not a brief for or against John Kasper. Every concept of freedom requires that he be granted the constitutional guaranties of a fair and impartial trial, freedom of speech, and the presumption of innocence in any criminal case, until proven guilty by competent and credible proof beyond a reasonable doubt. On this basis, the Government's proof gives John Kasper a clean bill of health in this case. Let us look at part of the record briefly.

EVIDENCE AS TO KASPER

This is all the Government proved as to Kasper: he came to Clinton and met and talked to numerous people in their homes and in public places; he made public speeches at one of which a court reporter testified that she was present and recorded his speech, but not one word of it was introduced as evidence; he opened public meetings with prayer; he told members of the School Board of Anderson County that his purpose there was to try to get the Negroes out of the high school and to prevent the mixing of the races in public schools. This is no more than many hundreds of Anderson County parents and citizens told the school board orally and in writing. He did not say, and the Government witnesses did not testify that he said he intended to accomplish this end by any but peaceable and lawful means. The proof further showed that some high school girls approached Kasper and asked him to help them form a teen-age White Citizens Council. He responded that he was under an injunction and that he could not do so, but that he could tell them where to write for a charter. He was arrested and tried in Anderson County for inciting a riot, in which suit he was found not guilty by an Anderson County jury. There is not one word of testimony connecting Kasper with any violence, overt acts, conspiracy or agreement with anybody to violate any injunction.

If Kasper was not proven guilty of such an agreement or conspiracy, then a verdict of guilty could not stand against any of the other six who were convicted. Can anybody believe for a minute that under such proof that there would have been a conviction against any of the 16, had not Kasper been brought in as a defendant in the desperation move?

AS TO TILL

Willard H. Till was shown to have been president of the White Citizens Council. He opened meetings with prayer, and publicly stated that under no circumstances did the White Citizens Council condone violence or illegal methods, but that its purpose was to try to restore to the people of Tennessee the right to have segregated schools in accordance with the laws and the constitution of the State of Tennessee. He presented six requests to the Anderson County School Board on the subject, two of which the board adopted. He was not shown to have been involved in any violence. Neither had he lifted his voice against any person. He was in the courthouse in Anderson County, Tenn., when Kasper was acquitted of inciting a riot. The motion pictures introduced by the Government showed Till walking down the corridor of the courthouse and stopping behind a group which was evidently where some of the witnesses were congregated, at which place he stopped and lightly placed his hand upon the back of a person unknown, but who was not Kasper. Apparently the only basis for convicting Till was the argument that "he didn't have to put his arm around John Kasper." As an American citizen, are you satisfied with another American citizen being convicted and facing a possible jail sentence or fine, or both, for the activities of the man Till, which I have just described? Would it add anything to the evidence against Till if it were shown that he did meet and talk with Kasper on 2 or 3 occasions and that on some other occasions they were in the same public meeting? This is "guilt by association."

AS TO BRANTLEY

Lawrence Brantley was also convicted. The only proof concerning him was that his automobile was parked on a public street near the Clinton School on several occasions and that on December 4, 1956, he was seen standing in a large crowd some distance away from the school house and in front of the school recreation building. At some undisclosed time, Kasper had been seen on several occasions going to and from the home of Brantley. There was no proof that he had ever uttered a word, made any agreement, or performed any act even remotely connected with desegregation at the Clinton schools. Are you satisfied as American citizens that under the true facts which I have just given to you, Lawrence Brantley should be convicted of conspiracy, or criminal contempt and forced to either pay a fine, undergo a jail sentence, or both?

WHY THE CONTEMPT CASE?

The incident which occurred on December 4, 1956, when Kasper was not in town and which apparently occurred on the spur of the moment, and therefore could not have been the result of a conspiracy with Kasper, was a fist fight occuring between one of the defendants, Clyde Cook, and a certain preacher of Clinton, Tenn. Two suits are still pending in the courts of Anderson County against Clyde Cook on account of this fight and that is where the jurisdiction lies and where the question should be decided under our system of government. It had no place in this proceedings. Since a preacher was involved, it could be used, and was used, in the press and by radio and television to inflame the public—used by these forces who are fomenting all of this trouble and who are distorting the true facts to make it falsely appear to the Nation that only hoodlums oppose the integration of public schools in the South. This preacher announced from his pulpit that he was going to escort the Negro children to the Clinton high school. He went to the chief of police who took a dim view of the preacher's announced project. The preacher then went to the superintendent of schools who told him that the school board had complied with the Court's order by opening the high school to the Negro students. The preacher pointed to some automobiles parked along the street and said that the Negroes were afraid to go to school because of those automobiles. He was informed by the superintendent that such was simply a pretext; that the Negroes did not want to go to the white high school and he was not going to be a party to forcing them to go.

By some miraculous means, the Columbia Broadcasting System, Life Magazine and representatives of the press, radio and television, by the score, were on hand the next morning when this preacher started out to do what he called his Christian duty. It is too bad that he could not obey the other admonition not to "parade his good deeds before men." Thus esconced in the sunlight of national publicity, the preacher and others proceeded without obstruction, hindrance or interference to deliver several Negro children to the white high school. There was some heckling the preacher said, but nothing else. The Negroes were taken inside the school and the preacher thereupon returned to the place where several people stood who had tried to remonstrate with him; apparently to rub it in a little. In the course of rubbing it in, he became engaged in a fist fight with Clyde Cook. Apparently the preacher got the best of the fight. He is the one who should have been arrested and charged with creating the difficulties out there. Certainly Kasper was not there, and unless Kasper was one of the parties and unless that fight was a result of a conspiracy between Kasper and some of the defendants to violate the injunction, there could be no conviction in this case. The legal presumption of innocence should have resulted in the dismissal of the charges as to all defendants.

WHY?

You may well ask, "Why did the jury compound the error which began in the Supreme Court and worked its way down to a local situation in Clinton, Tenn.?" Time will not permit a discussion of a multitude of details. Rather we should consider the one overpowering misconception which pervades the subject of school segregation. This great misconception is that there is a law requiring the integration of schools in the Southern States. There is no such law. There is a $10,000 cash reward for any person who can point to a single existing constitutional provision or any statute duly enacted either by the Congress of the United States, or by any of the Southern States requiring or authorizing the integration of the Negro and white children in the public schools of these States.

We are not talking about integration in Illinois. If the people of Chicago and of Illinois want to integrate their schools, that is their business and they have a constitutional right to do so. If we don't want to integrate ours, we have a constitutional right not to do so. Nevertheless, because the Supreme Court of the United States rejected all the known law on that subject and proceeded to order integration in certain of the school cases then before it, the false impression has grown up that desegregation is the law of the land. The Constitution of the United States defines the supreme law of the land to be the Constitution and the treaties made under its authority. The decision of the Supreme Court in the integration cases is the law of the case in each individual instance and is binding upon the lower Federal courts, upon the officers of that court and upon the parties to those lawsuits and those who are working by or through them. It is not yet the law of the land. It will never become the law of the land unless it is legitimized by constitutional amendment and unless it stands the test of time.

This whole case, therefore, was predicated upon the misconception that when anyone did anything to interfere with, obstruct, hinder or oppose the integration of the white and Negro students in the public schools of Tennessee, that that person was a criminal and was in violation of the law.

LAW OF THE LAND OR LAW OF THE CASE

Almost every medium of public information in this country has undertaken to confuse the issue and compound the error by making it appear that there is a valid law or constitutional provision requiring the Southern States to desegregate their schools. It is hard for laymen to distinguish between the law of the land and the law of the case. But when precious liberties are involved, it is necessary to make that additional mental effort and to draw a clear line of demarcation between that which is law and that which is not the law. Every court order is not a law. A valid court order must be obeyed by all properly included within the order, and the question of whether it is a valid order is always subject to review.

Under our Government of checks and balances, the people enact constitutional provisions, or changes. They elect the legislative branch of the Government which is charged with enacting the laws. They elect the executive branch of the Government which is charged with enforcing the law. The judicial branch of Government is charged with interpreting and applying the laws.

In performing its function the judiciary has always felt itself bound by the rule of precedent, or of what we in law call stare decisis. That is the doctrine that when a court of last resort, such as the Supreme Court of the United States, has interpreted a law, or made a decision which is solidly predicated upon constitutional authority, and when that decision is accepted by the other coordinate branches of the Government, and by the people, having stood the test of time, it then becomes what is known as a precedent. When it is written into the records of the law and is cited by lawyers and judges as a part of the body of the law, it may be referred to as the law of the land. Without the guiding hand of legal precedent, our whole system of jurisprudence would be like a ship without a rudder.

Our present Supreme Court in the integration cases abandoned the doctrine of stare decisis and rejected the precedents of many cases throughout many years; giving as its reason for such rejection, its inability to discover, even by independent investigation, the meaning of the 14th amendment to the Constitution at the time of its passage and its doubts as to the amount of psychological knowledge available in the 1890's. Whereupon the Court then proceeded to cite modern authorities, consisting of numerous socialistic textbook writers. In other words, the Supreme Court refused to follow, but boldly rejected all the established law on the subject prior to the time when a majority of that Court came upon the bench. Having taken this first bold step, the Court then proceeded to find that segregated schools "were inherently unequal" and that maintaining such public schools by the States violated the 14th amendment and frustrated the children of the minority group (evidently meaning the Negro children) by "generating a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone." The opinion gives no history for this finding, unless it comes from the textbooks cited, nor does the opinion indicate how frustration could bestow jurisdiction upon a Federal court when it would otherwise have none.

THE CONSTITUTION SAYS

The 10th amendment to the Constitution of the United States specifically provides that all powers not delegated in the Constitution to the Federal Government were reserved to the States and to the people. The exclusive jurisdiction of a State over its schools has been repeatedly reaffirmed by the Supreme Court. No jurisdiction of their schools has ever been given to the Federal Government by the States, or the people.

The 14th amendment says: "No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." There could be no serious doubt as to the meaning of this amendment. It was interpreted many times by jurists and statesmen who were living at the time of its passage. It meant "protection of the laws". It dealt only with political, not social, affairs.

In 1896, the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case of Plessy v. Ferguson (163 U. S. 537) wherein it declared that in a case involving intrastate commerce, that if the State provided separate but equal facilities for the races, that the plaintiff in that case, a Negro, was not denied any right guaranteed him under the 14th amendment to the Constitution when he was required to ride in the space set apart for his race.

Later, the same question, involving schools, came before the Supreme Court a number of times, as in the case of Cummings v. Board of Education (175 U. S. 528) and, as late as 1927, in a case involving a Chinese girl, Gong Lum v. Rice (275 U. S. 78), the question of the constitutionality of the Mississippi constitution was tested in the light of the 14th amendment. In all of these cases the Supreme Court repeatedly held: (1) That the question of whether the public schools of a State should be segregated was purely a question, under the 10th amendment of the Constitution, for the individual States to decide; (2) that the terms employed in the 14th amendment applied to political rights and not to social rights.

In other words, many years ago, the Supreme Court gave the lie to the modern propagandist's device by which he contrives to make it appear that going to school in a desegregated school is a civil right. The Supreme Court has often rejected any such theory in strong language and this rejection had been and was the law of the land.

THE COURT HAS SAID

In Plessy v. Ferguson the Court said:

"The object of the amendment (14th) was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law but in the nature of things, it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social as distinguished from political, equality or commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either."

In the Cummings case the Court said:

"Any interference on the part of the Federal authorities with the management of such schools cannot be justified, except in the case of a clear and unmistakable disregard of rights secured by the supreme law of the land."

Let it be remembered that the supreme law of the land is the Constitution of the United States and the treaties made thereunder.

In the Gong Lum case the Court said:

"The right and power of the State to regulate the method providing for the education of its youth at public expense is clear * * *. The decision is within the discretion of the State in regulating its public schools and does not conflict with the 14th amendment."

The decision mentioned was from the Supreme Court in Mississippi, which was affirmed.

In overruling and rejecting the law of the land, and in substituting therefor an unsupported finding that the 14th amendment, contrary to what the Supreme Court had always said, prohibited segregation of the State owned and operated public schools, the Court exercised a legislative function and wrote into the records of this country a new and different statement of the law and one which we believe it had no authority to write. After having written that law, then the Supreme Court ordered its enforcement with all reasonable speed. It was that order that brings us back to the Clinton, Tenn., contempt case. That is the key to the method by which the present Supreme Court evidently undertakes to enforce its legislation. Thus, we have the spectacle of the courts making the law, then interpreting the law, then providing for the enforcement of the law by injunction, then making that injunction effective against everyone by charges of conspiracy in criminal-contempt proceedings. This has the effect of making the courts the lawmakers, the accuser, the prosecutor, and the judge. Such a state of affairs is completely and utterly repugnant to everything that we hold dear in this country.

The problem before us transcends any question of racial integration. It cuts at the very heart of the Republic. Without a rigid adherence to a written Constitution and without the stern guidance of precedent, our law would become a rule of caprice, a Government of men and not of law. We should consider the serious import of the developments just discussed upon the lives of those whom they are ostensibly designed to help—that is, the southern Negro. The southern Negro has been making great progress in the last 25 or 50 years. The South has developed a sort of peaceful coexistence. None are so blind as those who will not see the difference between civil and political rights, and social or personal privileges.

People from the North and East particularly who are pushing integration, are acting only under the guise of friendship for the southern Negro. For the most part, they are spreading the type of unrest that is such a strong weapon of communism. They may be doing it unwittingly, but nevertheless, that is what they are doing. Many integrationists are interested only in who gets the electoral vote in States such as Illinois and New York, where the Negro vote in Chicago and Harlem may mean the difference in winning or losing a presidential election.

The southern Negro is being used as a pawn in the great game of national (or international) politics. He will lose more than any other citizen if his constitutional guaranties are taken away. He may be cajoled into believing that he is receiving some transient advantage by forcing white people to accept him into white schools, but every intelligent southerner must know that it would be against the best interests of the southern Negro and against his better judgment.

The opposition to the Supreme Court's trend of opinions in integration cases, as well as the widespread dissatisfaction of the Court's decision in cases dealing with communism, is predicated not upon racial hatred or bitterness, but upon love of country and of Constitution, and a desire to continue a way of life that has proven itself to be, if not perfect, at least peaceful.

There has been more interracial strife in the United States, and particularly in the South, since Black Monday in May 1954, than there had been in any period of time of double that length: since Reconstruction days. The integration decisions have brought grief to the entire country. They are generating hatred, distrust of the law, enmity between the races, and will bring economic and political chaos. It behooves every citizen of this country to face the facts and take up the cudgel against any judicial act that threatens our constitutional form of government. One way is a continuance of our way of life—the preservation of written constitutional Government. The other way is usurpation of power by the courts, rule by injunction rather than by statute, and execution by the courts rather than by the executive branch of the Government. I may have attached more importance to recent developments than they deserve, but honesty and candor force the inescapable conclusions that it is even later than you think.

THE JURY-TRIAL AMENDMENT TO THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, regarding the news of the proposed compromise in the civil-rights bill, I wish to say that I greatly prefer the language of the Senate amendment, which makes a clear and precise distinction between civil and criminal contempt and gives the judge all the enforcement powers he needs, through the use of civil contempt proceedings, while protecting the jury trial system when criminal proceedings are the purpose of the judge.

Nevertheless, it is quite clear that the Republican Members of the House, and the administration, want to point to some language of their own, and I am willing to let them have that privilege in order to try to get some settlement of the issue at this session of Congress.

The language is quite confusing, and if it leads to serious legal complications, Congress can straighten it out early in the next session. I will reluctantly accept this language.

PROPOSED SUSPENSION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, the New York Times reports that "administration officials expressed confidence today that the Western proposal for 2 years' suspension of nuclear tests had improved the United States defenses against the Soviet propaganda barrage on testing."

What concerns me is the fact that this is just another instance where we have lost the initiative to the Soviets and are in position of defending ourselves in the court of world opinion.

I need not remind my colleagues that it was not necessary that we be on the defensive. If President Eisenhower and his Madison Avenue adviser had thought more of the merits of the matter and less of the rank political advantage, they would not have so unfairly and unceremoniously rejected Adlai Stevenson's proposal for a suspension of nuclear tests during last year's presidential campaign.

The Chicago Tribune, which has not supported a Democratic candidate in my memory, has this to say:

> It is still a little early for Adlai to laugh and laugh over the Eisenhower administration's willingness to suspend nuclear bomb testing; as yet it isn't entirely clear that the tests are going to be suspended or on what terms.
> But Adlai is entitled, at least, to a good, broad smile. In the course of the campaign last autumn he recommended stopping the tests and was roundly denounced by Mr. Eisenhower, us, and others for endangering the Nation's safety to win votes.

The Trenton Evening Times says:

> The presidential election is safely in the background. The votes have been counted and Mr. Eisenhower is in office for another 4 years, returned by a margin of historic proportions. * * * Nothing is to be lost now in conceding that he was right on a major issue of the last campaign—the danger to the health and the lives of millions of people from the fallout arising from continued tests of nuclear weapons.
>
> Among those who scoffed at the dark forebodings of Mr. Stevenson was President Eisenhower. Perhaps he was under the compulsion of political expediency to do so. Apparently, however, between October of last year and June of this, he has seen the ominous issue in a new light.

I think now, as I thought then, that it was a shocking thing for the Republicans to play politics with an issue which affects the lives and safety of all Americans and children yet unborn. It was an example of political cynicism and political expediency that has rarely been equalled in a presidential campaign.

I hope the American people will remember that they were sold a bill of goods by their President and his slick writers: that the Republicans put votes above the welfare of the country.

The Atlanta Constitution says:

> All this makes Adlai Stevenson look more and more the prophet. He urged international agreements to end such tests and was repudiated largely because the administration "pooh-poohed" him. Without doubt the White House now wishes it could withdraw that "pooh-pooh."

PROCEDURES FOR THE PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2377) to amend chapter 223, title 18, United States Code, to provide for the production of statements and reports of witnesses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming, in the nature of a substitute, identified as 8-22-57-D.

Mr. MORSE obtained the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator from Kentucky has an amendment, which I understand is agreeable to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to make this inquiry of the Chair. Before there is any action taken on the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming, it must be perfected by any other amendment which may be offered. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That would include the two amendments I intend to offer and the amendment intended to be offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. Once the substitute is adopted, no other amendments to it will be in order.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Before the substitute is adopted, it is certainly competent for the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Kentucky to offer their amendments.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Kentucky, with the understanding that I do not lose my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will send his amendment to the desk.

Mr. COOPER. First I wish to correct it. I will read it as I have corrected it. On page 3, line 12, immediately after the period insert the following:

> Whenever any statements, transcriptions, or records are delivered to a defendant pursuant to this subsection, the court in its discretion, upon application of said defendant, may recess the proceedings in the trial for such time as it may determine to be reasonably required for the examination of such statements, transcriptions, or records by said defendant and his preparation for their use in the trial.

I have discussed the amendment with the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 12, of the amendment offered by Mr. O'MAHONEY, it is proposed to insert, immediately after the period, the following new section:

> Whenever any statements, transcriptions, or records are delivered to a defendant pursuant to this subsection, the court in its discretion, upon application of said defendant, may recess the proceedings in the trial for such time as it may be determined to be reasonably required for the examination of such statements, transcriptions, or records by said defendant and his preparation for their use in the trial.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to accept the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has a right to modify his amendment. He modifies his amendment accordingly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield, with the understanding that he will not lose his right to the floor?

Mr. MORSE. I yield with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. As I understand the purport and intent of the amendment, it is to make entirely permissive within the power of the court to recess the proceedings so that the defendant may have a reasonable opportunity to examine the records which may be called into question. It does nothing more than that. Of course, in that respect, it is not offensive and, in fact, it should be adopted.

Mr. COOPER. It might not be required. I assume, of course, that the courts have power to make certain that a judicial proceeding is fair. However, I wish to make it plain that if information or documents are to be used for inspection and perhaps for other use, then there should be sufficient time given the defendant for their inspection. That would be the effect of my amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield once more?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Only for the purpose of clarifying the situation, I should like to say that the amendments which have been submitted, or virtually all of them, are moot now that the Cooper amendment has been adopted. Therefore, the only amendments which will be before the Senate, assuming that no new amendments will be offered, are the two I shall offer to paragraphs (a) and (b)—and I shall offer them at the appropriate time—to bring the substitute amendment in line with what the Department of Justice believes is necessary for the proper and adequate enforcement of the proposed legislation which is now before the Senate.

So it is in the nature of notice that I say I shall in due course offer my amendments to the substitute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will the Senator from Oregon yield once more?

Mr. MORSE. I yield, of course.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. My understanding is exactly the same as that now expressed by the Senator from Illinois. Only two amendments which will be offered to the pending amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming whether it is the purpose of the Senator to have the Senate remain in session tonight until we have concluded action on the bill. If not, then of course I would submit my amendments so that they could be printed and be available to the Senate on Monday.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that he is a much better judge of what the answer to that question should be than I am. I have examined the Senator's amendments. They are intended, as he says, to carry out the recommendations made by the Acting Attorney General in his letter to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

I have already stated to the Senator, and in my remarks on the floor today, the reasons why I believe quite sincerely the Acting Attorney General is entertaining exaggerated fears and that the amendments are not necessary. Therefore, I was hoping that after the Senator from Illinois had explained his amendment, in due course he would say, "Well, let us pass the bill without a yea-and-nay vote and do a great service to our Nation."

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gracious and affable Senator from Wyoming has such a nice way of stating things that I find it difficult to offer my amendments. However, I feel impelled to do so because, after all, the Department of Justice is the enforcing agency involved. The Department will have the responsibility in the matter. It is not the Senator from Illinois who will be passing on these questions and handling these cases. It will not be the Senator from Wyoming. It will be the Department of Justice. I believe that every request in this field, insofar as it comports with the proper defense of a defendant in any case, ought to merit the most careful consideration on the part of the Senate.

Therefore, in the proper course, notwithstanding the persuasive efforts of my good friend from Wyoming, I shall be compelled to offer the amendments.

Now, after trespassing on the time of the distinguished Senator from Oregon for so long a time, I wish to apologize to him.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Illinois a question without the Senator from Oregon losing his right to the floor?

Mr. MORSE. I yield for that purpose. First I should like to say that the Senator from Illinois is not trespassing at all. I intend to occupy the floor long enough so that Senators may adjourn to the cloakroom to hold certain conferences that are needed. I have some things to say on the Jencks opinion which I shall be glad to say during those conferences. I yield now to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I would be deeply grateful to the Senator from Illinois if he would be willing to read into the RECORD at this point what his amendments provide, so that our colleagues may have an opportunity to read them in the RECORD, since it seems at least possible that we will not vote on the pending bill until Monday. That will give us an opportunity to study the amendments. I have had the privilege of examining them, because the Senator from Illinois has been kind enough to show them to me. In my opinion—although I know not in the opinion of the Senator from Illinois—they destroy the validity of the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield briefly to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The first amendment is to subsection (a) of the modified O'Mahoney amendment, on page 2, beginning in line 3, to strike out the words "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, or."

The other amendment is to subsection (b) of the modified O'Mahoney amendment, on page 2, beginning in line 11, to strike out the words "and any transcriptions of records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government," and to insert in lieu thereof "and any transcriptions or recordings of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government."

The amendments are short, and now they will be found in the RECORD.

I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LAUSCHE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as modified.

The amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, there are 1 or 2 ancillary matters which I wish to discuss briefly.

But first I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I think a print should be made of the O'Mahoney amendment, modified by the Cooper amendment, and that print should be on the desks of Senators on Monday. Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a print be made of the O'Mahoney amendment, as modified by the Cooper amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I join in the request; and I am sure that if the Senator from Wyoming were in the Chamber at the moment, he would also join in the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent that the O'Mahoney amendment, as modified by the Cooper amendment, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. O'MAHONEY's amendment, as modified by Mr. COOPER's amendment, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

That chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding a new section 3500 which shall read as follows:

"(a) In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report of a Government witness or prospective Government witness (other than the defendant) made to an agent of the Government which is in the possession of the United States shall be the subject of subpena, or inspection, except, if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, or as provided in paragraph (b) of this section.

"(b) After a witness, called by the United States, has testified on direct examination, the court shall, on motion of the defendant, order the United States to produce any written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him, and any transcriptions or records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government, relating to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified. If the entire contents of any such statements, transcription, or records relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order them delivered directly to the defendant for his examination and use. In the event that the United States claims that any statement, transcription, or record ordered to be produced contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver such statement, transcription, or record for the inspection of the court in camera. Upon such delivery the court shall excise the portions of said statement, transcription, or record which do not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness. With such material excised, the court shall then direct delivery of such statement, transcription, or record of the defendant for his use. If, pursuant to such procedure, any portion of such statements, transcriptions, or records is withheld from the defendant, and the trial is continued to an adjudication of the guilt of the defendant, the entire text of such statements, transcriptions, and records shall be preserved by the United States and, in the event the defendant shall appeal, shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge. Whenever any statements, transcriptions, or records are delivered to a defendant pursuant to this subsection, the court in its discretion, upon application of said defendant, may recess proceedings in the trial for such time as it may determine to be reasonably required for the examination of such statements, transcriptions, or records by said defendant and his preparation for their use in the trial.

"(c) In the event that the United States elects not to comply with an order of the court under paragraph (b) hereof to deliver to the defendant any statement, transcription, or record, or such portion thereof as the court may direct, the court shall take such action, including but not limited to striking from the record the testimony of the witness, declaring a mistrial, or ordering the dismissal of the indictment, as the interests of justice require."

The analysis of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to propound a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MORSE. First, Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming will wait a moment——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes. However, I wish to propound the agreement because it is now after 8 p. m.

Mr. MORSE. I am entirely in favor of having the Senator submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement. However, are not we bound to have a quorum call before the agreement is entered into?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have not yet reached that point.

Mr. MORSE. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I wish to state the reasons why I shall make the request.

The amendments the Senator from Illinois plans to offer to my modified amendment have not yet been printed. I believe they should be printed. It is now after 8 p. m., and debate on the bill might very well continue to a very late hour, without having the Senate reach a determination.

Before asking that the agreement be entered into, I wish to read the proposal which I desire to submit. If consent is given, the order will read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Ordered, That, effective on Monday August 26, 1957, at the conclusion of the call of the calendar, during the further consideration of the bill (S. 2377) to amend chapter 223, title 18, United States Code, to provide for the production of statements and reports of witnesses, debate on any amendment, motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table, shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment or motion and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment or motion, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received.

Odered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said bill debate shall be limited to 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the majority and minority leaders: Provided, That the said leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, motion, or appeal.

Let me say that if there is no objection to the proposed order, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MORSE. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Under the parliamentary situation, is it possible for further amendments to be submitted to the committee substitute, as submitted by the Senator from Wyoming?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no limit upon the number of amendments which may be submitted.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to the proposed order—and I reserve the right to object only for the purpose of having an opportunity to submit to the modified substitute the two amendments which I have previously tonight read into the RECORD—let me say that I believe it might be well to have the amendments put in printed form. Therefore, I submit them for printing, under the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments submitted to the modified O'Mahoney amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MORSE. Before the Senator suggests the absence of a quorum, will he yield briefly to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, is it understood that if the absence of a quorum is suggested, following the quorum call and following the taking of action, one way or the other, on the unanimous-consent request, the Senator from Oregon will still have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so understood.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, is is so ordered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, which was read a minute ago, and which I have sent to the desk, be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed agreement? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will yield further, I wish to state that it is not expected that there will be any votes this evening.

At the conclusion of the debate this evening—and let me say that the unanimous-consent agreement which has been entered will not be in force, of course, until Monday morning—the Senate will adjourn until Monday, at 12 o'clock noon.

CHARGES AGAINST MAYOR OF PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I have some ancillary matters I wish to cover very briefly before I return to a discussion of the Jencks case.

It will be recalled that some weeks ago the mayor of Portland, the principal city of our State, was called before the McClellan special investigation committee, and some very serious allegations involving purported criminal conduct on the part of the mayor were made before that committee.

I advised at the time that, of course, the McClellan committee is not a court of law, that procedures are not required in Senate investigating committees, such as the McClellan committee, that prevail in a criminal court. Procedural guaranties and rights of a defendant, precious to due process of law, binding upon a court, are not binding upon the McClellan committee or any other Congressional investigating committee. Impeachment of witness, the right of cross-examination, the right of services of counsel, are not all available in our Congressional investigations. Therefore, it was not surprising to anyone, I am sure, to hear me take the floor of the Senate, in those early days of the investigation of the committee, and make two points or requests. One was that judgment should be suspended, in respect to any criminal charges, until the courts had spoken, through normal criminal procedures. Second, I suggested then that we in the Congress have a responsibility, I think, to adopt some rules and regulations and procedures for the handling of Congressional investigations in those instances where fellow citizens are charged with crime, because great damage is done to the reputation of fellow citizens whenever a charge of crime is made before any governmental body or tribunal.

I do not have to tell the Presiding Officer [Mr. LAUSCHE], a former distinguished judge from Ohio, that one of the risks of living in a democracy, of course—but it is well worth the price—is that sometimes grand juries go awry, and we have what is known as runaway grand juries. Indictments are issued, only to find subsequently that there was no basis in fact for the indictments, that really it would appear a prima facie case had not been made.

Of course, my position in insisting upon all the procedural protections, in keeping with due process which I think our Constitution guarantees, is no new position with me. I have taken it ever since I have been in the Senate, and I reiterate it on the floor of the Senate tonight. Earlier this year I asked that we withhold judgment on these charges, because I knew some of the witnesses who were appearing before the McClellan committee, testifying against the Mayor of Portland, for example, were disreputable persons; and I felt that we should at least withhold judgment until the allegations were tried in a criminal court. That has happened in my State, Mr. President, in regard to at least the charge that the mayor had accepted a bribe; and a jury acquitted him. Witnesses that appeared before the McClellan committee appeared before a jury, but they were subjected to cross examination, in the court case, Mr. President.

I need not say that I felt very sad to have so much adverse publicity about the principal city of my State and the mayor of that city appear in the American press, and therefore I am glad tonight, Mr. President, to ask consent to place in the RECORD three editorials that appeared in the Oregon Journal—which is not a Morse newspaper. I think these editorials are so pertinent to the position I have taken in regard to this matter. I think they are good editorials. They are sound editorials. I am very pleased, Mr. President, to ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this point. One of them is for Saturday, June 29, 1957, entitled "A Man Terribly Wronged." The second one is for Tuesday, July 2, 1957, entitled "No Substitute for Court of Law." The third is for July 3, 1957, entitled "Let Indictments Be Reviewed."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregon Journal of June 29, 1957]

A MAN TERRIBLY WRONGED

The acquittal of Mayor Terry Schrunk on a charge that he committed perjury when he denied before a grand jury that he, as county sheriff, accepted a $500 bribe leaves two other charges hanging over his head.

One relates to the alleged bribe-taking itself. The other concerns his part in the copying of wiretap tapes belonging to racketeer Jim Elkins, which were seized in a raid, with a search warrant, at the home of Elkins' chief henchman, Raymond F. Clark.

A jury's judgment that he did not lie when he denied receiving a $500 bribe ought to be sufficient to cancel out the bribery charge itself. In the case of the wiretap indictment, it could be at worst a purely technical violation.

In other words, it is time to let Terry Schrunk start tending to his job of being mayor. Every since he took office, he has been hounded and harassed. He has been required to spend long hours away from city hall. He has been forced to neglect essential city business. Even while on the job, he has never been free from the torturing thoughts of what fate had in store for him. Many persons have marveled that he has been able to carry on at all. A lesser man would have folded. A man with a guilty conscience could not have born up under the strain of civic responsibility while his reputation and career were in jeopardy.

Last April, the Journal said that if Schrunk is not guilty, "the crime which has been committed against him is more reprehensible than any other act yet uncovered in the vice probe, and nothing on this earth could compensate for the damage which has been done him."

These words are pertinent now, for whatever the disposition of the two remaining charges, Schrunk has been hurt, grievously hurt. There are those persons who are willing to think any public official is capable of being bribed, and there are others who think in these terms: "With all this talk, he must have done something." We do not know what effect this will have on Schrunk's political career. It may be that the experience will have curbed his desire for future public service. Many followers of this case have vowed it would turn them against ever seeking public office.

Many have been outraged at seeing a man, who grew up among them, who served his country heroically in time of war, who worked faithfully for the betterment of his city through church and civic organizations, who rose through the fire department into the sheriff's office and the city hall with a reputation for honesty and integrity, whose friends swore by him, being forced to defend himself against charges of acts which not only were completely out of character with his past record but which were said to have taken place under circumstances which tax one's credulity.

They are likewise outraged by the efforts of those arrayed against him to build an aura of respectability around one of his chief accusers, the man Elkins, and his aide Clark, Elkins, this ex-convict, this racketeer, this wiretapper, though he now faces a federal prison term, has been mingling freely with men in high places. He was one of those helping to brighten the departure of Robert R. Kennedy, counsel for the McClellan committee, from Portland airport, after the visitor had testified as a rebuttal witness for the state. It is astounding that Kennedy would fly 3,000 miles to Portland just to bolster the credibility of such a man as Elkins.

The Schrunk case, of course, is only one facet of the overall vice investigation. It has, in fact, been a departure not only for the State of Oregon but for the McClellan committee from their main jobs.

It has revived some old questions, particularly those involving acceptance by some members of the Portland police department of "smile money." The full story of Elkins' influence in the police department has not yet been told.

Portlanders must steel themselves for a long ordeal ahead in the unraveling of the vice picture, but most citizens, we believe, are ready to accept the acquittal of Schrunk as proof that he is an innocent man, terribly wronged, who now should be given a chance to work at his job unhampered by the machinations of underworld characters and those others who have fallen under their spell.

We hope that those persons who may have had some doubts about Schrunk's honesty will accept the jury's verdict and help to rectify the wrong that has been done him.

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR COURT OF LAW

There are some lessons for all of us in the recent exoneration of Mayor Schrunk of charges of perjury in denying that he accepted a bribe. Or, more accurately, there are some reminders of fundamentals which all of us knew but were prone at times to forget.

Foremost among these is the reminder that evidence developed before Congressional committees and lopsided publicity in the press and on television are unreliable and dangerous bases upon which to form opinions of guilt or innocence of crime. Many citizens who watched the proceedings of the McClellan committee on television last February and March jumped to the conclusion that Mayor Schrunk had accepted a bribe in the 8212 Club incident. Superficially, the evidence against him appeared damaging.

But when the same witnesses were subjected to cross-examination in a court of law by experienced legal counsel interested in developing the other side, many observers were shocked that the mayor should have been brought to trial on such flimsy and unreliable evidence.

The vaunted truthfulness of James B. Elkins, ballyhooed in Washington and in national magazines, was quickly exposed as an unadulterated myth. Even the last-minute efforts of Robert Kennedy to throw his national prestige on the side of the prosecution were ineffectual.

The reasons for this complete change in appearances are found in the different objectives and methods of the two bodies. The Senate committee was interested primarily in charges of racketeering against the teamster union. Elkins was of value to the committee because of his charges against the teamsters. It served the committee's purpose, therefore, to minimize or ignore the imperfections of Elkins and his crowd to present them to the public as reformed racketeers who had seen the error of their ways and were making amends by telling the truth about other racketeers. Every effort was expended, as well as considerable public funds, to bolster the credibility of Elkins and his cohorts.

Mayor Schrunk had been outspoken in his criticism of Elkins during the 1956 election campaign. It was his misfortune that the Senate committee decided to resurrect a charge of bribery aired during the campaign, although it had been investigated and twice rejected by two Multnomah County grand juries as baseless.

In presenting its case against Mayor Schrunk, the committee brought out as little as possible of evidence affecting the credibility of his accusers. The backgrounds and characters of some witnesses were not publicized at all, or were presented in the most favorable light. Apparently no effort was made to investigate evidence indicating that some of the witnesses to the bribe incident were not even present at the scene.

Inconsistencies in the stories of others were glossed over or left undeveloped. Defense witnesses having information refuting the charges were not called before the committee, and the record was filled by innuendo with hints of evidence in the possession of the committee concerning other wrongful conduct.

The result of this method of procedure was to develop a picture hardly recognizable as the same incident which was later tried in court. Elkins and his associates were made to appear as persons of unimpeachable candor although slightly soiled in other particulars.

While we sympathize with Mayor Schrunk and his family, it may well be that their ordeal will accomplish some public good. It should remind all of us that Congressional investigating committees are no substitute for the judicial process; that the traditional presumption of innocence is not a mere phrase to be tossed about in courts of law, but should be an established habit of thought in the mind of every American.

LET INDICTMENTS BE REVIEWED

Attorney General Robert Y. Thornton's decision to drop the bribery charge against Mayor Terry Schrunk, after a jury quickly and unanimously cleared him of perjury arising out of the same episode, was not controversial. Not even those most unfriendly to Schrunk could justify raking over the same set of facts again, at great expense to the State.

What will happen to the remaining indictments against Schrunk, 2 charging violation of the wiretap statute in the copying of Jim Elkins-owned tapes seized in a raid on the home of Raymond F. Clark, Elkins' aide (and Oregonian employe), and another charging subornation of perjury in the case of the 2 prostitutes who told conflicting stories, is not yet clear.

These indictments were returned by the March "runaway" grand jury, acting under the guidance of Arthur Kaplan, then assistant attorney general. It was later disclosed that Kaplan, while conducting the grand jury proceedings, was working closely with the McClellan committee staff and in fact had accepted a position with the committee, a job which he now occupies. The sensational and unorthodox report of this grand jury also revealed that many of its indictments were returned against the advice and recommendations of Thornton, including the indictments against Mayor Schrunk.

We hope Thornton and his staff now will scrutinize carefully the justification for the various indictments returned by that grand jury. Its intemperate and biased report and the nature of its charges indicate that it, like the Senate committee, was unduly impressed with the Elkins myth and incensed against those who dared to step on his toes. We strongly suspect that an unbiased review of the evidence supporting these charges will reveal that many of them are wholly unfounded and should be dismissed without the necessity of costly trials.

Now that Thornton's judgment concerning the bribery and perjury charges has been vindicated by verdict of a jury, he should have no hesitancy in exercising the discretion reposed in him by law, undeterred by hysterical threats of a recall movement. Those reasonably suspected of crime should, by all means, be speedily brought to trial. We trust, however, that the witch-hunting phase of the vice probe is nearing its end and that sanity will shortly be restored.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think these editorials should be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in fairness to Mayor Schrunk. I hold no brief for any charges that are made or allegations that are filed against anyone in my State. I do not know what the facts are, but I do know it is pretty basic to a system of government by law that when we are dealing with criminal charges, the precious procedural rights that I have spoken about so many times ought to be followed if we are to avoid the wrong of character assassination.

What I have said tonight on this matter is not to be interpreted, and should not be interpreted, as any indictment against the McClellan committee. The McClellan committee is acting within its jurisdiction and within its rights, and acting no differently than Congressional committees before it; but I think it is interesting, Mr. President, that as some of the cases that have been before the McClellan committee get before the bar of justice, we find the charges do not hold up. In that fact I think is to be found a lesson, and at the appropriate time, come next session of Congress, when it cannot be said that the Senator from Oregon is playing politics because a Congressional committee is dealing with matters that affect his own State, after the time has passed when the present investigations of the committee, so far as they involve any issue growing out of my State, become history, I am going to press upon the Senate again, by way of introduction of what I consider to be appropriate legislation for changing the rules of the Senate with respect to the procedures of Senate investigations, a set of rules which I think ought to be applied only in those instances in which a committee makes a charge of criminal contempt. I do not know of anything more precious than a man's innocence. I think we ought to take every step to safeguard and protect a man's innocence from false accusation.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves that subject?

Mr. MORSE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McNAMARA. I am very much concerned with the subject the Senator has been discussing. I noticed in his remarks relating to the McClellan committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, he treated the committee kindly by saying he was not leveling any criticism against it. I think that is quite proper. I agree with the Senator's suggestion about establishing some ground rules which will safeguard the reputation of free citizens, as suggested by the Senator. I want to say, as a layman, not as an attorney, I am in complete accord with that theory.

I look forward with interest and anticipation to the time when such ground rules will be established in the form of legislation. I look forward to an opportunity to cosponsor such legislation, if it meets with my approval, when it is brought forth for consideration by this body.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the words of the Senator from Michigan. I think the Senator from Michigan has been performing a great service for the Senate on this investigation committee, as have his colleagues.

I have mentioned the Schrunk case. Senators will recall that the executive secretary—which I think is his title—of the teamsters union of my State, Mr. Clyde Crosby, was also charged with criminal conduct before the committee. An Oregon jury found to the contrary. He was acquitted.

I think the record is perfectly clear as to my position in the Crosby case, as well as in these other cases. Let the record be perfectly clear that I said the committee has jurisdiction. So far as the right of the jury is concerned to conduct the investigation as the committee is conducting these investigations, I shall do nothing that seeks to interfere with the committee, by way of protest or otherwise. There is not anything one could do if one wished to, but I had no inclination to do it.

This became a subject matter of great concern out in my State, Mr. President, and to my great surprise after the acquittal of Mr. Crosby on one indictment, with other indictments still pending, he wrote me a letter, which I had printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some days ago, along with my reply to him, in which letter he seemed to indicate that I ought to seek to exercise some influence, which of course was presumptuous on his part, to have the pending indictments dismissed. My reply was, of course, that I would not do so if I could, because I happen to believe in the soundness of a system of government by law in which the judicial process runs its course.

Mr. President, after charges are made, I know of no way for one to really clear his name, if innocent, other than to have the judicial process run its course. That just happens to be my position on these matters.

I am pleased to be able to stand on the floor of the Senate tonight and say that some of us told the Senate some months ago that Oregon was not the bad place it was being painted, and are being proved right in case after case. Yet during these intervening weeks, Mr. President, I think it is only fair to myself to say that I have taken somewhat of a beating from certain groups in Oregon, who have been very much agitated about this matter because of my insistence to let the system of government by law operate. I believe in that system.

I want to say, in closing, that I have said more on this subject than I intended to. I asked permission to introduce these editorials. The Senator from Michigan has stimulated me on this matter.

I think the McClellan committee has been doing a very much needed job in respect to a good deal of the work it has been doing in this field of abuses of American unionism.

I stress the fact that we have to wait, so far as specific criminal charges are concerned, for jury verdicts. However, I do think that the McClellan committee has been doing a public service in focusing attention on the house of labor, with the result that the labor statesmen in the American labor movement in turn are doing a remarkable job, I think, in taking the necessary steps to clean up the house of labor in those dark corridors where some dirt has accumulated.

In fact, I have talked to some of the leaders of labor. I wish to particularly commend tonight George Meany and Al Hayes, the chairman of the ethics committee of the American labor movement, and their colleagues, for the work that they have done and are doing with regard to making perfectly clear to unions in this country that the American labor movement does not intend to countenance any corruption, racketeering, or illegal conduct.

In fact, some labor leaders have told me that some of the progress they have already made could not have been made thus far without the work of the McClellan committee, and that such work has been very helpful to them.

Yet, Mr. President, I am not one of those who take the position that, because a great deal of good is being done, we should not take a look at the procedures which are being followed in those instances where criminal charges are under discussion, to see whether we do not owe the responsibility to the country to adopt a uniform code of investigation procedures for all Congressional committees to follow, whenever they have brought before them charges of crime on the part of any fellow American, whether he is in the labor movement, is a member of the National Association of Manufacturers, is a member of the United States Chamber of Commerce, or is a member of any other business organization such as my own profession of the law, or the medical profession, or any other organized group of Americans who may be subject to Congressional investigation.

THE MORSE FORMULA

Mr. President, I make these statements only so that the RECORD will be made available for Monday. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] is not in the Chamber, but I have discussed with him the difference of opinion which we had. I am sure he will appreciate my putting into the RECORD these statements I am going to make about the application of the Morse formula.

In the course of the debate today on Calendar No. 1111, authorizing conveyance of certain lands within the Old Hickory lock and dam project, Cumberland River, Tenn., to Middle Tennessee Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America, for recreation and camping purposes, I raised objection. The bill was up by way of motion. I pointed out that the bill violated the Morse formula. The bill proposed to give Federal property to a private organization.

There was some discussion in the debate that the Boy Scouts are a quasi-public organization. Mr. President, the Boy Scouts are a private organization in the sense that they have no governmental connections or functions whatsoever.

I said that I thought it was a great mistake to establish this precedent. My good friend, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] suggested I had made exceptions, to which I replied, "Never to my knowledge, never willfully, and never knowingly have I ever made exception to the Morse formula." "The RECORD will show," I said, "if I ever do it is a dead formula, for the strength of that formula is in its uniformity of application."

I have no right to make an exception from the formula for this Senator or that Senator, for this State or that State, for this organization or that organization, and I never have.

The Senator from Tennessee was laboring under a misconception in regard to my record on this matter. The Senator had been advised by counsel of the Public Works Committee that the case was similar to the case of some time ago which arose in Kentucky, which I shall have in a moment.

CONSTRUCTION OF MILITARY BASE AT BETHEL, MINN.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may make an insertion in the RECORD?

Mr. MORSE. I yield. It will be very helpful to me, in fact, to do so.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD a letter which I addressed to Mr. Wilbur Elston, the editor of editorial pages, Minneapolis Tribune and Star Journal, Minneapolis, Minn., under date of August 10.

The reason I ask to have this letter printed in the RECORD is that I have noted in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that my colleague, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], had printed a resolution adopted by the city council of Minneapolis, Minn., under date of August 9, which refers to the airport site in Minnesota.

Because the resolution casts some doubt in the minds of readers as to whether there might be a delay in the acquisition of the land for the new airport site in Minnesota, my letter to the editor under date of August 10 without a question will answer the doubt.

For that reason, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 10, 1957.

Mr. WILBUR ELSTON,

To the EDITOR: I have read your editorial in the Minneapolis Star of August 8, entitled, "Don't Jeopardize Bethel." I fully concur with the statement that nothing should be done to jeopardize the construction of the new military base at Bethel.

I can say at the outset that the entire Minnesota Congressional delegation involved in this matter has spent endless hours in sincere efforts to effect a removal of military operations from Wold-Chamberlain Field at the earliest possible date. Senator HUMPHREY, Congressman JUDD, and Congressman WIER and myself have all worked with the Department of Defense in developing the plans for the new airbase.

So that there can be no misunderstanding of the status of the Bethel base, I want to repeat the following facts:

1. $550,000 of Federal funds for planning and engineering is included in current appropriations bills. These funds will be available immediately. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I assisted in approving these funds without delay.

2. The Department of Defense plans to occupy the new base on or about July 1, 1959.

3. The Air Force will request $13 million next year for construction costs.

4. The Navy will request $8 million for construction costs in the following year.

I want to also make it positively clear that the Thye reimbursement bill will in no way jeopardize or delay the construction of the airbase at Bethel. If there had been any chance of a delay as a result of the introduction of my bill, I would not have introduced the bill.

It must be pointed out that there is an administrative phase and a legislative phase in connection with the Bethel project. The State of Minnesota and the Department of Defense are charged with the administrative action which will lead to the purchase of the land by the State, the transfer of title of the land from the State of Minnesota to the Federal Government, and the actual construction of the facilities.

On the other hand, the Minnesota Legislature took action last year by passing a bill which called for negotiation for reimbursement of the purchase price of the land. The Thye bill is a legislative matter consistent with the action taken by the State legislature. The legislative acts will not delay or jeopardize the administrative action which must be taken.

I must also point out that by January of 1957, the Department of Defense had set up a land-survey committee to study possible sites for a new airfield. The survey had been made and a site selected before the Governor arranged for purchase of the land by the State.

This arrangement itself caused delay in the Bethel project. It necessitated action by the State legislature. The Federal Government could have proceeded in February of 1957 to arrange for the purchase of land. This is the procedure followed in all cases involving the construction of Federal facilities.

On February 7, 1957, the then Secretary of the Air Force, Donald Quarles, told the Minnesota Congressional delegation that he was ready to proceed with the Bethel project immediately. It has now taken 6 months for the State to negotiate an agreement concerning the purchase of the land with the Federal Government. This represents 6 months of time on the project which could have been saved. The State of Minnesota has not yet purchased the land. The purchase by the State could be time-consuming itself. As one who has served as Governor of Minnesota and who has been involved in land purchases, I know that this process can be complicated and time-consuming.

I am hopeful that the purchase can be made without any difficulty or delay. It will be within this area of administrative action that delay might occur.

Again I wish to point out that the Thye reimbursement bill will be handled by the proper committee of the United States Senate and by the Senate and House of Representatives. It will not stimulate any delay in the administrative phase of this matter.

My only purpose in sponsoring the bill was to save the Minnesota taxpayers money and to carry out the specific request of the Minnesota State Legislature as stipulated in its bill which was signed by the Governor. I cannot see why the Minnesota taxpayers should help pay for military installations in other States in the Union and then have to bear the entire cost of land acquisition in their own State.

It is now the responsibility of the Governor to acquire the land as speedily as possible and to effect a transfer of title to the Federal Government so that there may be no further delay in the Bethel project.

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. THYE,
United States Senator.

THE MORSE FORMULA

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee had been advised by counsel for the Public Works Committee that Calendar 1111, Senate bill 2531, was identical in legal effect to Senate bill 1823, the so-called Bunker Hill Island case, involving the proposed transfer of a tract of land located in the reservoir area of the Wolfe Creek Dam on the Cumberland River in Kentucky.

As the RECORD will show, I told .the Senator from Tennessee that I remembered the case as though it happened yesterday. The two cases were not similar. I made no exception in the Kentucky case, because the Kentucky case did not come under the Morse formula. I explained to the Senator from Tennessee what I was satisfied the RECORD would show with respect to my position in the Kentucky case. I am taking this time tonight because the matter of the uniform application of the Morse formula, in my judgment, is of great importance in the disposition of Federal property if we are to protect the taxpayers of the country.

The Morse formula happens to have been my one-man economy drive since 1946; and on the basis of the RECORD it can be shown that I have saved the taxpayers of the country more than $500 million by my insistance on its application. It has not always been easy or pleasant, although I must say that my colleagues have come to understand at least my stubborness—if one wishes so to designate it—in insisting that it be applied. Therefore I do not like to have any record stand that would leave the impression that I have favored some by making exceptions to it. I did not favor the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] with regard to the Kentucky case, because, as the RECORD I shall now read shows, the Kentucky case met the requirements of the Morse formula, in the sense that the Morse formula did not apply to it.

CONVEYANCE OF BUNKER HILL ISLAND TO THE COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1823) to authorize the conveyance of Bunker Hill Island in Lake Cumberland near Burnside, Ky., to the Commonwealth of Kentucky for public park purposes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I wish to discuss the bill for a few moments in connection with the so-called Morse formula.

The bill, S. 1823, proposes a transfer of a tract of land containing approximately 390 acres located in the reservoir area of the Wolf Creek Dam on the Cumberland River in Kentucky.

The conveyance, if authorized, would be from the Secretary of the Army to the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

The land in question is worth from $20,000 to $25,000—page 2 of report No. 519—and is desired by the Commonwealth of Kentucky for development of a daytime recreation center on what is known as Bunker Hill Island.

The report indicates that Kentucky has been offered a lease or license for the use of the 390 acres, but because of extensive developments proposed, the State desires to acquire title.

This is truly a close case; and yet I think there is a clear distinction between a case such as this and a case coming within the scope of the so-called Morse formula.

We are dealing here with a Federal dam. When we consider river basin development programs we take into account the recreational value of the projects.

I digress from the reading to stress the point that whenever the Morse formula applies and someone wishes to reduce the price which is to be paid by the recipients of the property, there must be a showing that a Federal interest is involved, and that there will be a Federal benefit from the use of the property.

Second, I wish to stress the fact that the Kentucky case involved a transfer to the Commonwealth of Kentucky. The case we had before us today involved a proposed transfer to a private organization, with no Federal interest whatever involved.

It must be remembered that in the Kentucky case we were dealing with a Federal dam. The Army engineers' program for the development of that area included attention to one of the multiple-purpose features of the dam, namely, recreation facilities for the benefit not alone of the people of Kentucky, but of all the people of the United States who might come to see the dam. There will be thousands of visitors every year.

The same situation applies with respect to the great dams in my State. We are spending money for these multiple-purpose developments. Part of the money goes toward the development of recreational facilities for the enjoyment of citizens of the United States who, on vacation and tourist trips, come out to see the projects.

There was a Federal interest in the Kentucky case. If the State of Kentucky had not committed itself to do this development work, the Federal Government would have done a substantial amount of it, and I was satisfied that the Federal Government would have had to spend a great deal in excess of 50 percent of the appraised fair market value of the island near the dam in Kentucky. So I said:

> We are dealing here with a Federal dam. When we consider river basin development programs we take into account the recreational value of the projects.
>
> If this particular area were not to be developed by the State for park purposes, for sightseers in connection with the Federal project, then it seems to me it should be developed by the Federal Government. I think this is the kind of cooperation between the State and the Federal Government, in connection with Federal projects, which should be encouraged.
>
> It is to be noted that the Federal Government retains a reversionary interest in the property. If the Commonwealth of Kentucky should not use the property for recreational facilities, it would revert to the Federal Government.
>
> Earlier this afternoon we heard the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] discuss a subject which I think is very closely related to this problem. My colleague, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER], discussed the same subject; namely, the importance of developing the recreational facilities of our country in connection with Federal projects.
>
> As I stated to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], because I feel that this area is intimately connected with the Federal dam which is located in that vicinity, when this particular piece of land is set aside for recreational purposes no violation of the Morse formula is involved, because there is a Federal interest in the area; namely, the interest of all the people who visit the site of the dam in having recreational facilities available to them for camping and other purposes.
>
> The report shows that housing facilities will be made available on the island for those who come to visit the dam. I think this project involves a direct Federal interest, and I am happy to approve the bill.

The Senator from Kentucky went on to bear out what I had said, and the record is perfectly clear. This park is a public park, available to all the people of the country, not for private use. It is to be used in connection with the Federal dam, and the recreational facilities created by that dam, including the lake, with the island in the midst of the lake or near the lake, are for the benefit of all the people of the country. So I was quite right in the Kentucky case in pointing out the Federal interest.

I come now to Calendar 1111, Senate bill 2531. There may be some Senator who is more enthusiastic for the Boy Scout movement in America than is the senior Senator from Oregon, but if there is, I do not know who he is. Yet, as a legislator, I feel that I owe it to the people of my State to be on guard against the establishment of principles which I think might lead to a great deal of trouble. This is one of them. When we start giving away Federal property to the Boy Scouts, we are opening a Pandora's box.

It is proposed in this case to give away property to a private organization—and a wonderful private organization, which performs a great service for the young boys of the country. But there is no uniformity of opinion in the country about the Boy Scouts. I do not share the criticisms, but I think it is pretty well known that there are some groups, religiously motivated, which have their own youth programs, and which do not support the Boy Scouts, because they feel that certain phases of their own programs are preferable. I ask the simple question: Have we the right to take their share of the taxpayers' money and give it away to the Boy Scouts, a private organization, when certain citizens disapprove of the Boy Scout movement?

Take another organization—let us call it X—with respect to which the emotions will not be so directly affected as they are when we talk about the Boy Scout movement. Consider movement X, with respect to which there is a great split in our country, on religious grounds. Organization X comes in and says, "We have a great youth movement. We would like about $50,000 worth of land to establish some summer camps."

Do Senators know what would happen to us if we voted the $50,000? We would receive very soon in our mail a little reeducation on the doctrine of separation of church and state.

Consider other private organizations of great public benefit, such as the 4-H Clubs and the various girls' clubs. I am a strong supporter of them, but I do not think we should be giving them Federal tax dollars. Then, too, I think we should be on guard against the tendency on the part of various private organization to run to Uncle Sam every time they see a little surplus property here or there and try to get Uncle Sam to dig down in his pocket, through an act of Congress, and give away surplus property to private organizations.

I am a little surprised that anyone has any doubt as to my position on this question. But let me cite a case or two. Let me cite a Boy Scout case, to which the Morse formula was applied.

I refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD volume 102, part 9, page 12808. The case involved the quitclaim of certain property in Coahoma County, Miss. It was Senate Joint Resolution 179, to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to quitclaim certain property in Coahoma County, Miss., to the Home Demonstration Club on Rena Lara, Mississippi, Inc. The joint resolution was announced as next in order. It involved 3.17 acres of land. I announced that I would object to the consideration of the joint resolution. I said:

> I do so with great reluctance. The joint resolution involves only 3.17 acres of land. However, it is a clear violation of the Morse formula. The report itself states that the land is valued at less than $1,000.
>
> The purpose for which the land is to be used is in connection with Boy Scouts and 4-H Boys and Girls Club work. That is a laudable purpose, but it should be taken care of by the State, and not by the Federal Government.
>
> We cannot start making this kind of exception to the policy which has been consistently followed since 1946. It is estimated that by adhering to that principle more than $500 million has been saved. I should like to help the Boy Scouts and the 4-H Boys and Girls Clubs, but we cannot start doing it at the Federal level and not do it in all the States. There is no reason why the State of Mississippi should receive this grant from the Federal Government, even though it amounts to less than $1,000. Therefore, I must object to the joint resolution.

I did object, and the Morse formula was applied.

Of course if Calendar 1111, S. 2531, is brought before the Senate by way of motion, and if Senators, in the closing days of the session, do not take the time to study the principles involved, the bill might pass. But it is not going to pass without my making this record against it. It is a very unfortunate bill.

Again let me say for the RECORD that I do not blame the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] for the position they took on the floor of the Senate, because I satisfied myself, after our discussion on the floor this afternoon, that they believe the Kentucky case was identical with the case involved in Calendar 1111, S. 2531. They now know differently.

I hope that they will not press for the enactment of that bill. If they do, come Monday I shall, of course, oppose them and do what I can to inform the Senate as to what is involved, in the hope that I can defeat the bill.

One more word on this subject, Mr. President. I believe that the passage of the bill would lead the Senate into a very unsound position. I might say that one of the more prominent cases in which the Morse formula has been applied was in connection with the so-called Methodist Church case. It is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 9, 1949. In that case it was proposed to return to a Methodist Church an office building, the ground floor of which had been used by the church for church services, and the upper stories of which had been used for rental offices, which the church used for commercial purposes.

The church lost the property in the depression, and the Government bought the property during World War II from the receivers, and used it for military office purposes. When the war was over a bill was introduced to give the property back to the church.

It was a laudable purpose, but the church did not own the property anymore. It was owned by all the taxpayers of the United States. They had paid good money for it.

I felt very sorry for the church, but I could not sit in the Senate and participate in what I consider to be a clear violation of the doctrine of the separation of church and state. I will not read the debate on the bill, because it was brought up several times over a period of months, in an endeavor to get the bill through in opposition to the Morse formula. I made it clear that if we start with the Methodists, we would have to do the same for the Baptists, the Catholics, the Lutherans, and every other religious group in the country. Why not? Of course, I considered it, in a way, a misuse of Federal funds. In fact, there was a rather interesting experience I had one afternoon, when a group of Methodist ministers came to see me. They called me into the reception room to see them, in a last effort to try to get me to change my mind. I suggested that they give me an answer to a question I wanted to put to them. I told them that, as a boy, in the winter months, when the weather was such that I could not get back to my farm home, 11 miles from Madison, Wis., I would stay with my grandparents. They went to the Truesdale Methodist Church in Madison, Wis. I said to the ministers, "If there is anything I gained from my attendance at that Methodist church it is the deep conviction that Methodists very strongly favor the doctrine of separation of church and state. If you Methodist clergymen can give me an answer to that, I may agree that the Morse formula does not apply."

They were very wonderful about it. They laughed and said, "Senator, you win. We did not think of it that way."

I mention it together because every year since the Morse formula has been in operation, come the closing days of the session, I have had to maintain a guard, so to speak, against motions to get around the Morse formula on bills which I had blocked during the year.

I had hoped that I would not be subjected to that this year. I particularly hope that that will not be the case next week. For a few days next week I shall have to fly home to attend the wedding of one of my daughters. I suspect that the Senate will still be in session. Therefore I think due notice ought to be given on my part that I am going to be away during that period of time, and I should at least appeal to the sportsmanship of the Senate not to bring any such measures as Calendar 1111, S. 2531, before the Senate while I am away for that very laudable and understandable purpose.

I believe that covers the matter. I summarize my position by saying that S. 2531, the proposed transfer to the Boy Scouts of certain lands in Tennessee, is not comparable at all to the Kentucky case. There is no Federal interest involved. It may be argued, of course, that some benefit would accrue to the Boy Scouts, and therefore, to the whole country, through the work of the Boy Scout organization, but that is not the kind of Federal interest that is a real Federal interest. There is no direct Federal interest of the Federal Government as such. It is a transfer to a private institution, not to a governmental body. It is a clear violation of the Morse formula. I suggest to the proponents of the bill, in view of the case I have made against it tonight, that they take up with the Boy Scout Council of America a proposal that the Council seek to buy the land from the Federal Government at the fair market value. I believe the American taxpayers are entitled to that protection.

PROCEDURES FOR THE PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS IN CRIMINAL CASES—THE JENCKS CASE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I turn now to my speech on the Jencks case. I ask the Chair not to be too much concerned by the length of the manuscript before me, because the important thing is to make it a matter of record tonight. I have received wonderful cooperation in regard to handling this matter. I agreed to make this speech so that time would be made available for the working out of a unanimous-consent agreement. That agreement has been worked out, but I wish these major points in the RECORD for the consideration of the Senate on Monday. First, I wish to express my very deep appreciation to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] for what I consider to be the very wonderful work he has done on the substitute amendment which he has offered, and which is pending, in regard to the Jencks case.

It will be recalled that when the Jencks case was first decided, and the criticism first broke forth in the press, I made a speech in the Senate in which I said the critics ought to read the decision first, because so much of the criticism bore no relationship whatever to what the court actually had said.

I said it would be a great mistake for us to act hastily in the Jencks case by way of legislation. I said what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA] said today, in effect, that we ought to hold full hearings, in which we could bring in some constitutional lawyers and constitutional authorities, including, I hope, some judges who would be in a position to testify—perhaps some great justices who are in retirement—because it is a very serious thing to start tampering with the judiciary.

Other Senators have spoken out in opposition to any hasty action on the Jencks case. The result is that there have been many conferences held on the matter. The Senator from Wyoming, who was the first proponent of major legislation in the matter, has been most reasonable. He has been most willing to adjust his point of view, as new information and points of view have become available to him in conferences. I wish to thank him very much.

I also wish to thank the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], who has worked so assiduously in connection with the so-called final compromise a group of us have reached in regard to the substitute amendment. It does not mean that a single one of us feels that we have it in the final form in which we would like to have it, but I think it is a good example of reasonable men working out reasonable compromises without compromising any principles in the convictions of any one of those involved in the negotiations.

I wish to thank the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], a distinguished judge in his own right, for the many contributions he has made to the working out of the substitute amendment. I think tomorrow's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will speak for itself in that respect.

The colloquy between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Wyoming, as the Senator from Wyoming answered a series of penetrating and enlightening questions which the Senator from Kentucky put to him, was, I thought, a masterful discussion; and I believe it will be of great help to the courts, if, as, and when the courts are called upon to interpret any legislation which may flow out of the O'Mahoney substitute amendment.

I also wish to thank the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], a distinguished former attorney general of the State of New York, for the work he has done on this matter. He has made suggestions which the Senator from Ohio has put into words, in connection with the amendment.

With the help of these Members, I believe we now have a substitute amendment which answers the critics who think the Jencks case decision would permit rifling of FBI files. Of course, Mr. President, the decision was never so broad as many of the comments on it would lead one to believe. But I am satisfied that in the substitute amendment, at least in its present form, as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, we have protected the Government and we also have guaranteed—and I use the word "guaranteed" advisedly—to defendants in this country that the Government will not follow a restrictive course of action which will prevent any defendant from obtaining information which he is entitled to obtain under the due process clause from the Government, so as to make it possible for him to impeach a witness whose testimony on the stand may be quite different from some of the things he said, for instance, to the FBI or the Internal Revenue Service, or some other agency of the Government which may have conducted an investigation of one who subsequently becomes a defendant in a case.

This afternoon the Senator from Kentucky pointed out that this problem is not limited to the FBI. In the speech I made the other day, I pointed out that it is of vital importance in connection with income-tax cases, when the Government brings action against a citizen for alleged criminal conduct in regard to the payment of income taxes. We must guarantee procedures which will assure meeting the due process clause in all respects.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I know the Senator from Oregon well recognizes the issue that is posed; namely, the necessity to protect the United States in very important cases, as against the necessity to protect due process for an individual who is charged with crime and who is placed in jeopardy.

I should like to say that in my short and varied terms in the United States Senate I have never heard raised in this body an issue which involved the constitutional right of an individual to due process without having heard the distinguished Senator from Oregon state the necessity of recognizing the importance of protecting that right.

At times we are faced with very difficult questions, such as the one we are now discussing. But there is a constitutional right of due process which must be taken into account.

What we are trying to work out is a solution which will provide due process for individuals under the decisions, and at the same time will protect, insofar as it is possible to do so, due process in the case of the necessary protection of the United States itself.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the comment the Senator from Kentucky has made regarding my attempts—very feeble ones, I fear, judging from the results—always to seek to protect the constitutional rights of the individual.

Sometimes I like to put it this way: If a choice must be made—although I do not think it will have to be made at any time under the procedure we are providing for in the substitute amendment—but if a choice must be made between protecting the so-called privilege of the Government and the constitutional right of the individual to full due-process protection, my answer is that the right of the individual must prevail. I take that position because of a very important historical fact, which we must never forget; namely, that this Republic was born out of a conviction that if the people are to be free, they must be free from governmental tyranny. Our forefathers had had the experience of trial without due process; they knew what star-chamber proceedings meant; they knew what a government could do if it applied police-state methods and procedures. That is what the monarchy of Great Britain had done.

So I wish to stress the point that throughout the entire constitutional history of this country there has been a recognition that one cannot trample upon the precious right of the individual to due process.

Mr. President, it is very easy to say, "The security of the Nation will be endangered. The Nation must come first." That argument has been used over and over again. But it is a non sequitur, and is irrelevant to the problem now before us.

As I said on another occasion, that argument was used against Patrick Henry, at the time of the constitutional convention in Virginia. It was used against him by great Americans. But he took his stand in opposition to the Constitution as then written, because it did not then contain precious procedural protections for the individual. It was only after promises were made that those protections would be included, by way of amendments which led to our Bill of Rights, that the Virginia convention by a very slim majority voted to ratify the Constitution. Patrick Henry was not willing to vote to ratify the Constitution until those amendments had been added. But a majority finally yielded, and voted to ratify the Constitution, but only on the basis of the promises that steps would immediately be taken to write into the Constitution the individual protections and safeguards upon which Patrick Henry insisted.

Mr. President, I could cite other historical incidents as long as my arm, figuratively speaking, to show that this country was born out of a will of a free people always to protect the rights of the individual against the State, in the matter of trial. Of course, out of it grows the maxim that it is much better that some guilty ones may escape, than that one innocent person be incarcerated wrongfully.

Mr. President, I have so much faith in our judicial process that I am never frightened by the argument that if we do not adopt strict procedures which take on the characteristic of police-state methods, in violation of the rights of free men and women, the country will be endangered. I have never believed it; I do not believe it now. I do not believe we have to fight communism by using Communist tactics. I believe the best way for us to demonstrate the superiority of our free society and institutions is to keep them free.

That is why, as the Senator from Kentucky knows, I have spoken at some length in the Senate—and will always be willing to do so again, if I continue to have sufficient strength—against repeated attempts to have a Federal wiretapping law enacted. Those attempts have been made on the basis of the argument that it is impossible to fight communism or to catch crooks unless wiretapping is permitted. I do not accept that argument, because in my judgment such procedure violates the freedom of the individual and his rights to privacy, as against intrusion by the State.

Mr. President, I feel that in some respects a related right is involved in the Jencks case. In fact, I believe the Jencks case decision will go down as one of the great landmarks in the protection of the rights of a defendant to due process.

So I do not wish to see the Senate pass, in connection with the Jencks case decision, a bill which later may be successfully challenged on the ground that it is unconstitutional.

That is why I was so much concerned with the colloquy which took place in the Senate this evening between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], and the floor leader for the substitute amendment, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], when those Senators were discussing the apparent failure on the part of the language of the substitute amendment to assure an appeals procedure which at least would give counsel for the defendant adequate opportunity to consider whether the material which had been denied his inspection in any way affected the right of his client to due process.

I became satisfied, as a result of that colloquy, that the appeal provisions which will prevail under this proposed law, including the power of the appellate judge to inspect thoroughly the material which had been denied inspection by defense counsel, do protect the right of the defendant to due process of law, because here again, I may say, I feel the judiciary will live up to its responsibilities of seeing to it that no right of a defendant is going to be denied him, so far as a fair trial and due process are concerned.

I do not see anything in the substitute amendment we are offering that can be interpreted by the court later as amounting to a repeal or a reversal by legislation of any decision the court has made protecting the rights of a defendant. Rather, I look upon the language of the substitute amendment as a codification of the decision in the Jencks case, but in no way a reversal or limitation of it.

Of course, I still would prefer to let the whole matter rest for the operation of the judicial process, because I think we shall have a case, in the not too far distant future, in the United States Supreme Court that will give the court an opportunity to make whatever clarifications need to be made in respect to interpretations and misinterpretations which have already been made of the Jencks case. I would prefer that method. I have not seen any evidence that the FBI is being really damaged by the Jencks case. I have heard many expression of fears. There were some lower court decisions which were not uniform in their interpretation of the Jencks case, but those cases are going "upstairs." At least one of them will go "upstairs". By "upstairs" I mean the Supreme Court, for interpretation. I am also a realist, I hope. I know legislation is going to be enacted. Therefore I shall try to do what I can to help enact legislation which will be good.

With those preliminary remarks, I turn to the main points of a speech I have worked on for some time. In view of the changes made in the substitute amendment, some of the speech no longer is applicable to what is now pending before the Senate, but I think it should be made a matter of legislative record on this bill.

A WARNING AGAINST LEGISLATIVE TAMPERING WITH JUDICIAL MACHINERY: CONGRESS AND THE JENCKS CASE

There have been some sober second thoughts on S. 2377, the bill reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee dealing with the Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case. On July 3, I discussed in the Senate two of the major objections to the bill as reported by the committee. I had prepared for delivery a detailed discussion of the bill in the expectation that on Monday, July 8, it might be before the Senate for consideration. Other developments had displaced that measure. Since the preparation of this speech, the substitute proposal has been changed. I shall give the speech as prepared, because it will provide legislative history of the objections which led in part, to the improvements made in the bill.

On Monday, July 8, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], who is the principal sponsor of S. 2377 and chairman of the subcommittee which considered the bill, announced that he intended to propose a series of amendments which meet in large measure the objections raised by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], myself, and some of the commentaries in the press. The amendments proposed on July 8 would have improved the bill substantially. However, the Department of Justice opposed the July 8 substitute. Thereafter, some of the staff of the Judiciary Committee and representatives of the Department attempted to come up with a compromise bill. The Senator from Wyoming made several changes in their efforts, and on August 12, submitted a second proposed substitute which appears in the RECORD at page 14457.

I would only wish that this second substitute represented further improvements upon the original bill, which was so poorly drafted by the Department. Unfortunately, the second substitute has most of the vices of the original bill and little of the improvements of the first substitute.

The measure, in all of its forms, is important in its own right as it affects the administration of justice. Over and above that, it has significance for the proper roles of the courts and Congress in determining questions of due process.

Under our constitutional system of checks and balances, each branch of the Government has its primary functions. Each branch has proven well adapted to the discharge of its responsibilities. Divided authority and responsibility are the genius of our form of government. It is only in rare and extreme cases that one branch can and should involve itself with the basic functions of another branch.

The administration of justice is confided by the Constitution to the judiciary. Congress should be wary indeed before intruding itself upon the domain of the courts.

A great justice of the Supreme Court warned in 1935: "Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have the capacity to govern." Mr. Justice Stone, later Chief Justice of the United States, issued this warning in his historic dissent in United States v. Butler, 297 U. S. 1 (1935), where he disapproved what he believed to be judicial intrusion into the realm of legislative policy.

His words have equal force as applied to congressional attempts to superimpose its views upon judicial determinations of fair procedure.

Congress is not the sole agency of Government that must be assumed to be concerned with the security of the United States, to paraphrase Justice Stone. In a matter of court procedure, it can hardly be claimed that Congress and all its Members can bring to bear upon a problem of procedure the experience or concentration of study and thought that the Supreme Court of the United States employs in the decision of a case and the formulation of procedure to insure due process. With all due deference to the lawyers in Congress and the expertness of our Judiciary Committees, it cannot be said that Congress has a greater capacity than the Supreme Court, or even equal talent, in the realm of judicial procedure.

We expect the Court to bow to the judgment of Congress in the determination of national legislative policy. Its function is to assure that Congress does not overstep the ample boundaries of due process and other constitutional protection and limitations. In dealing with Congressional legislation, indeed State legislation as well, the Court has erected and abided by a presumption of validity. It has gone further. The Supreme Court, and the Federal and State judiciary, have been conscientious in seeking interpretations consistent with constitutionality.

It is the rare and extreme case in which the courts will overturn legislative enactment or conduct as beyond the pale of constitutionality.

This is sound governmental procedure.

It is no less sound that Congress should stay within the bounds of its special competence and accord to the courts, and especially the Supreme Court of the United States, a similar presumption of validity for their determinations of what is appropriate and necessary in the discharge of their judicial functions.

THE JENCKS DECISION

Applying this constitutional principle to the Jencks decision and the rule of fair procedure that it declares, what should Congress do? It should keep hands off, except upon a showing of grave emergency demonstrated beyond doubt. If such an emergency should be proven, it is our responsibility to act with deliberation and care.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND JUDICIARY COMMITTEE STATE APPROVAL OF JENCKS PRINCIPLE

Both the Attorney General and the Judiciary Committee declare that they agree with the general principle of the Jencks decision.

In his statement before the Senate Judiciary Committee, the Attorney General stated what he believed the Court's holding to be and declared, "We accept this principle."

All that he assertedly seeks is "legislation to clarify the procedure to be followed in applying such a principle." (S. Rept. 569 on S. 2377, p. 4).

For its part the Judiciary Committee reports:

> The proposed legislation, as reported, is not designed to nullify, or to curb, or to limit the decision of the Supreme Court insofar as due process is concerned. The committee believes that legislation would clearly be unconstitutional if it sought to restrict due process. On the contrary, the proposed legislation, as reported, reaffirms the decision of the Supreme Court in its holding that a defendant on trial in a criminal prosecution is entitled to reports and statements in possession of the Government touching the events and activities as to which a Government witness has testified at the trial.

It too declares an intention of providing a procedure to accomplish the Court's purpose.

THE JENCKS HOLDINGS

The Jencks case involved a criminal prosecution for the filing of a false non-Communist affidavit under the Taft-Hartley Act. The principal evidence that the defendant falsely swore that he was not a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party was given by paid FBI informants Matusow and Ford. Matusow, as we know, is a convicted perjurer, who recanted his testimony in not only the Jencks case, but other proceedings involving the Communist Party.

Both Matusow and Ford were witnesses against Jencks. They also testified that they had made frequent reports about his activities, as to which they testified at the trial, to the FBI. Those reports were both written and oral. As the Court's opinion points out, Matusow could not remember what he said in those reports.

Defense counsel moved that those reports be presented to the trial judge for his inspection and, if relevant, turned over to the defense for its possible use for impeachment purposes.

The Court held:

> We now hold that the petitioner was entitled to an order directing the Government to produce for inspection all reports of Matusow and Ford in its possession, written and, when orally made, as recorded by the FBI, touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial. We hold, further, that the petitioner is entitled to inspect the reports to decide whether to use them in his defense. Because only the defense is adequately equipped to determine the effective use for purpose of discrediting the Government's witness and thereby furthering the accused's defense, the defense must initially be entitled to see them to determine what use may be made of them. Justice requires no less.

When I said earlier, Mr. President, that that would go down in judicial history as a great landmark, I meant exactly that. That is a great statement on the part of the Supreme Court in defense of the right of any American haled before the bar of justice to full protection of due process. If the Government is going to call witnesses against a defendant, the defendant is entitled to inspect the representations made by those witnesses to the Government agents which may subject the witness to impeachment. That is what the court said, in effect.

That is why I have never shared the alarm about the Jencks case. It is a pretty elementary principle that the court reiterated. There is nothing new about it, so far as the principle is concerned. All the concern has been over the definitive aspects of the language which the court used.

LIMITED NATURE OF COURT'S DECISION

The concern expressed over the breadth of the Court's decision is out of all proportion to what the Court decided and said. That the rule declared is limited and carefully formulated is shown by this passage from the opinion:

> The necessary essentials of a foundation, emphasized in that opinion, and present here, are that "(t)he demand was for production of * * * specific documents and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government on the chance that something impeaching might turn up.

The Senate Judiciary Committee observes in its report:

> The committee does not believe, after studying the decision very carefully, that a defendant would be entitled under the decision in the Jencks case to rove at will through the Government files.

I think it is perfectly obvious that the Court had no such intention, and I do not think the language is, fairly, subject to such an interpretation.

Mr. President, this is a far cry, indeed, from some of the comments the decision has occasioned. One dissenter, Justice Clark, claimed:

> The Court has opened their—FBI and other Government agencies—files to the criminal and this afforded him a Roman holiday for rumaging through confidential information as well as vital national secrets.

I have a great deal of respect for Justice Clark, but I do not see anything in the language of the majority of the Court which justifies the sweeping statement the learned Justice made in his dissenting opinion.

I think his statement is a serious and startling charge. But it did not secure the concurrence of even one other member of the Court and the committee report comment just quoted shows that our Judiciary Committee does not agree in the slightest.

WHERE'S THE FIRE?

Where then is the emergency? What is the fire for which the Attorney General has rung the alarm? What catastrophe impends requiring the Senate to shinny down the firehouse poles and charge off to quell?

The Attorney General and an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury made statements to the Judiciary Committee that lower courts were confused about the decision.

Attorney General Brownell's statement is in the committee report. It must be read carefully. As examples of the necessity of the pending limiting legislation he states:

> In many cases, however, the defense has attempted to use the Jencks decision to rummage through Government files prior to trial.

One court is considering a motion for pretrial production, he said.

> In one case a motion requested the production of all reports.

He also said:

> The result of one court's action under its interpretation of the Jencks case could be the freeing of a convicted tax evader and four convicted kidnapers.

In at least two cases cited by the Attorney General, the Justice Department refused to submit FBI summaries of witness' statements and the cases were dismissed. Obviously in these cases, the Justice Department decided unilaterally that the material was not to be produced.

The Department did not even give the court a chance to take a look at it. In explanation to the committee, the Attorney General says that the summaries were heresay. But that was a decision for the trial judge, not the Attorney General, and it was up to him, in the first instance, to decide how hearsay can be employed for impeachment purposes. More of the hearsay argument a little later.

I digress a moment to talk about the prosecutor attitude in the administration of criminal justice. I am in favor of strengthening the hands of prosecutors, but only by giving them procedural weapons which can be squared with due process.

I do not have to tell the present Presiding Officer [Mr. Lausche] and the present acting minority leader [Mr. Cooper] that often it is necessary in the administration of justice to be on guard against the so-called prosecutor complex, the attitude of the prosecutor that looks upon enforcement of criminal law as a game or as a contest.

I was disappointed by the statements of the Attorney General before the Committee on the Judiciary, which I have quoted. It was not for him to decide whether the summaries were this, that, or something else. As a prosecuting official he ought to let the court take a look at them. He refused, and the court dismissed the case. I think the court should have done so. It will be a sad day, let me say, for the administration of justice if we let the decisions be made by a prosecutor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair ask the Senator from Oregon: Did the court ask to see the papers and did the Attorney General refuse to show them?

Mr. MORSE. My recollection of the case is that the counsel for the defense made the demand. The court thought the demand was proper. The counsel for the Department of Justice took the position that the Department was not going to make the material available. The court dismissed the case, as I think under those circumstances it should have done so.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that I think a great Attorney General—and I recommend his record to Mr. Brownell—in the history of the United States Department of Justice, in his career before he became Attorney General, followed a course of action I use to recommend to my students as we discussed the great record of Mr. Cummings in that famous case in which he was the prosecutor. He knew of evidence which would be helpful to the defendant, and he knew the defendant was not going to have that evidence. He was satisfied that unless the defendant had that evidence, if he played law enforcement as a game he would be able to tally another score on the conviction list for his office. What did he do? He made the evidence available to the defendant, as was his duty as an officer of the court.

What we seek to do in the enforcement of the criminal law is to do justice. I have never shared the view that the prosecutor ought to conceal things. The prosecutor represents the Government. The prosecutor is an officer of the court. The prosecutor represents justice in the case. I care not whether it be the FBI acting through the United States Department of Justice, and I care not whether it be the enforcement branch of the Internal Revenue Department or any other agency of Government, I take the point of view that if the Government has evidence which would be helpful to the defendant, in the name of justice it ought to be turned over without even a court order being required.

Idealistic—I am told. I am told that is not a very realistic approach to law enforcement. I deny it.

Mr. President, to too great an extent, particularly in the Federal courts of America, too many prosecuting officers representing the Federal Government, have, I think, overly developed the notion that their job is to obtain convictions. My reply to them tonight, on the floor of the Senate, is that their job is to do justice as officers of the court. If they have evidence which they know, placed at the disposal of the defendant, will impeach a witness, the defendant ought to have the evidence, unless it is intended to make simply an empty phrase of the maxim that it is better that many guilty men escape than that one innocent man go to prison.

Do not tell me, Mr. President, that Government by law would break down if we strictly followed the ideal I have just enunciated, because although I have criticized some prosecutors I want to now make perfectly clear my charge is not a blanket charge. To the contrary, I, too, know a great deal about the work of prosecutors, and I say that the most able prosecutors are those who recognize their obligations as officers of the court and do not look upon prosecution as a game but instead recognize that they should not take the narrow and limited point of view which I judge, from the testimony of the Attorney General, apparently characterizes his attitude, in view of the legislation which he desires in connection with the Jencks case.

Suffice it to say that the Attorney General claims that there is imperative need for legislation on the subject because in a mere handful of early cases there have been difficulties. But some of those cases will go "upstairs," as I said earlier, for whatever clarification may be needed. In at least some of them, it would appear that the Justice Department was a good deal less than flexible in dealing with the problem. In view of the limited position taken by Justice before the committee, it appears entirely possible that the United States attorneys invited adverse decisions by their own arguments.

CONTRARY TO ASSERTIONS BILL GOES BEYOND JENCKS RULE

In the Jencks case itself and in most, if not all, of the cases cited by the Attorney General, it appears that there is no question presented as to the preservation of secrecy of sources of information. Yet this is one of the arguments made for this legislation.

The Jencks rule is limited to statements and reports made by witnesses who have testified.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Cooper] brought that out this afternoon in his colloquy with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'Mahoney]. All that the Court decision requires is the production of prior statements of individuals who are witnesses.

The press reports that FBI Director Hoover is concerned because the Jencks decision is drying up sources of information. That argument was made also on the floor this afternoon. If this is happening it may very well be the result of the inaccurate descriptions of what the Jencks decision did. The Department of Justice must bear responsibility for the cries of alarm heard in the land.

I suggest that the Department and the FBI undertake a small program of public information. All that needs to be made clear is that if a person is a witness for the Government in a criminal case his prior statements to Government agents relating to that case are subject to inspection by the defendant.

Despite this limitation of the decision, the proposed bill, as drafted by the Department of Justice, is drawn to apply to a "statement or report of any prospective witness or person other than a defendant"—S. 2377, page 1, lines 9 and 10.

1. PRETRIAL DISCOVERY

If the bill is actually designed to apply only to the Jencks situation, the words "or person" should be eliminated.

The proposed substitute would eliminate these words, which, it was anticipated might operate to cut off existing procedural rights.

Although the present version of subsection (a) eliminates this and other language of the original which could have curtailed rights now available under established procedures, there remains real doubt as to whether all such threats have been resolved.

Subsection (a) of the bill eliminates a criminal defendant's right of subpena, discovery, or inspection of a statement or report in the Government's possession any rule of court or procedure to the contrary notwithstanding except in the limited manner provided by subsection (b) after a Government witness has testified.

Such a broad prohibition would wipe out many precious rights now accorded by the Federal rules of criminal procedure.

If I am correctly informed—and I think I am—the proposals which will be made on the floor Monday in behalf of the Department of Justice will go back to the original language, against which I am now speaking. I think it is unfortunate language, and I do not believe it is deserving of the support of the Senate, because it could imperil rights presently enjoyed under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

For example, rule 16 presently provides for pretrial discovery of "books, papers, documents, or tangible objects" which the Government has obtained from the defendant or other persons by seizure or process. It should be clear that such material does not involve any security problem. The very purpose of the rule is to make available to defendants in advance of trial material required not only for impeachment purposes but general defense.

Rule 17 (c) gives criminal defendants the right to obtain data by subpena. This right is derived from the sixth amendment provision for defendants "to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." Assuredly it is as important to have compulsory process for documentary evidence and preparation for trial as it is to have compulsory production of witnesses.

The bill, however, would limit the subpena power for statements and reports in the Government's possession to those contradicting Government witnesses, and only after they testify.

The bill may also impair the protections afforded by rule 15 (a). It provides that if it appears that a prospective witness may be unable to attend a trial a defendant may take his deposition before the trial when this is necessary to prevent a failure of justice. Any designated papers or documents must be produced at the time and place of the deposition. This rule provides for the preservation of evidence when it might otherwise be lost through trial delay. Wherever such books or papers were in the possession of the Government the bill would nullify this provision for the preservation of evidence.

The practical effects of S. 2377, before its improvement by the present substitute, would probably be felt most strongly in antitrust and income-tax cases, where the defense must meet great masses of data obtained by the Government's superior investigatory powers. In criminal actions for violation of the antitrust laws, the Federal rules have made it possible for businessmen accused of conspiracy in restraint of trade to inspect documents and papers of an evidentiary nature obtained and held by the Government, other than confidential information or the Government's work product, when such evidence is necessary to enable such a businessman properly and fairly to prepare his defense.[1]

This power is frequently used in such cases, and defending a criminal antitrust action would, indeed, be well-nigh impossible without the right to see such evidence in the possession of the Government. In income-tax prosecutions, defendants are entitled to inspect evidentiary materials or memorandums in the possession of the Government obtained from persons having business relationships with the defendant and relative to the charges against him.[2] The importance of this right is illustrated by United States v. Iozia (13 F. R. D. 335 D. C. S. D. N. Y. 1952)). Defendant, the president of a small dye and print company, was charged with failing to report income from certain unrecorded sales to another company. The Government had in its possession evidence by which the defense hoped to show that certain employees, rather than the defendant, had received the income derived from such sales—evidence which the defense could not have obtained but for the Federal rules. The bill could make defense of income-tax cases infinitely more difficult.

The inclusion of blanket prohibitions and words in the original which take the bill beyond the Jencks situation casts grave doubts upon the claim of the Department that it seeks only a procedure for administering the rule of this particular case. Further, as the Jencks decision applies to witnesses, why does the bill seek to deal with prospective witnesses—an entirely different subject?

I am glad we have been able to get this language clarified in the substitute amendment, but the difficulty will reappear on Monday if we do not stand on guard against it, in support of the substitute amendment.

I submit that Justice is seeking to do more than limit or deal with the Jencks case, or at least, has not taken care to avoid legislation affecting other rules and rights.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks two memorandums prepared by experienced lawyers, analyzing the possible impact of the substitute of August 12 upon rights now afforded by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. I believe that the substitute offered today by the Senator from Wyoming obviates the objections made in these memorandums, but because the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has suggested that he intends to offer amendments which carry out the desire of the Department of Justice, I think it is important that these memorandums be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandums were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OUTLINE OF DIFFICULTIES

The proposed bill would wipe out the discovery provisions of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure in criminal prosecutions under the antitrust laws and tax statutes where no questions of national security would be or, indeed, could be involved.

The proposed bill would not necessarily regulate the production of all documents touching on national security. Certain types of FBI reports are not covered by the present draft.

The discovery procedures of the proposed bill would not begin to operate until after trial had commenced. This would hinder preparation for trial and interrupt the progress of a trial.

The proposed bill would exclude from production documents relevant to the credibility of a witness.

1. Paragraph (a) exempts certain types of documents from being the subject of subpena, or inspection, except as provided in paragraph (b) of this section. Rules 16 and 17 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure now provide, in certain circumstances, for subpenaing or inspecting the same types of documents. Thus the Federal rules would be limited by S. 2377.

(a) Paragraph (a) exempts from discovery under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure a statement or report of a witness or prospective witness. Paragraph (b), which permits discovery under S. 2377, nowhere mentions the word "report." Unless clarified, the bill would absolutely exempt reports from discovery. Similarly paragraph (b) nowhere mentions statements of a prospective witness. Thus while reports of a witness, reports of a prospective witness and statements of a prospective witness are made exempt by the provisions of paragraph (a) from discovery under the Federal rules, no equivalent discovery under paragraph (b) is provided for them.

This means that diligent counsel seeking to prepare for trial who has properly moved for discovery under rule 16 may be completely frustrated by the easy answer that the documents sought are reports of a witness or prospective witness or else statements obtained from a prospective witness. No sanction is provided for failing to call such a prospective witness.

(b) As to statements of an actual witness, paragraph (b) delays discovery until after that witness has testified. Not only will the opportunity of counsel to prepare in advance of trial be curtailed, but also the course of the trial will be subject to interruption if counsel seek to invoke the discovery procedures of paragraph (b). This interruption, as anyone who has ever participated in discovery proceedings will realize, may be for a substantial period of time.

There would appear to be little reason for the Senate to abolish the present pretrial discovery procedures in a criminal prosecution under the antitrust laws or the tax statutes. Yet a "statement or report" exempt under paragraph (a) would include a statement taken from a corporate official or an intracorporate memorandum reporting on a business transaction. In this connection, it should be noted that if that business memorandum is administratively regarded as a "report," there will be no way to obtain its production if its author is a witness or a prospective witness. Further, if the business memorandum is regarded as a "statement * * * of a prospective witness," the memorandum will be withheld certainly before trial and possibly forever if the author does not testify. It is not unlikely that such a memorandum, extremely important to an antitrust or tax defendant, might have been authored by someone not available to testify as a witness because of death or absence from the country. Surely it is not the intent of S. 2377 to minimize all discovery procedures obtaining in an antitrust or tax prosecution.

Memorandum on S. 2377, the Jencks Bill

Among the restrictions imposed by the proposed Jencks bill on the delivery to a defendant of relevant statements and reports of witnesses testifying for the Government are the following:

1. The statement or report must have been made to a Federal law officer;
2. The statement or report must be signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him or it must be a transcription or recording of his oral statement; and
3. The statement or report cannot be made available, under any circumstances, to the defendant for inspection until after the witness has testified for the Government on direct examination.

Such restrictions, it is submitted, legislatively wipe out judicial precedents which had been long and well established prior to the Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case.

These precedents are based upon rule 17 (c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which provides that the Court, on application of the defendant, "may direct that books, papers, documents, or objects designated in the subpena be produced before the Court at a time prior to the trial or prior to the time when they are to be offered in evidence and may upon their production permit the books, papers, documents or objects or portions thereof to be inspected by the parties and their attorneys."

The reach of rule 17 (c) is limited to materials which the defendant is attempting to secure in good faith for use as evidence in the trial, and includes prior statements or reports of a Government witness which may be admissible to impeach the witness. (Gordon v. U. S. (344 U. S. 414, 1953); Bowman Dairy Co. v. U. S. (341 U. S. 214, 1951).)

I—RULE 17 (C) DOES NOT REQUIRE THAT THE STATEMENT OR REPORT MUST HAVE BEEN MADE TO A FEDERAL LAW OFFICER

Since the purpose of rule 17 (c) is to enable the defendant to acquire relevant evidence in the possession of the Government, the only standard for production is whether the requested material is evidentiary, and, if a prior statement of a witness is relevant and may be used as evidence to impeach the witness, it is immaterial whether the statement was given to a Federal law officer, a State law officer, an agent of the Federal or State government, or to a private person. If, for example, a nonindicted defendant who had testified for the Government had previously given a written statement to a friend contradicting his testimony, then unquestionably rule 17 (c), and probably due process, would require the Government to deliver the statement, if it was in the Government's possession, to the indicted defendant.

In Asgill v. U. S. (60 F. (2d) 776, C. C. A. 4, 1932), cited and approved by the Supreme Court in Gordon v. U. S. (344 U. S. 414, 419) as a highly respectable authority, the defendant asked for letters in the Government's possession, which had been dictated for and in the presence of the Government's witness by a private person and sent to a Government attorney for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. The Court ordered the production of such letters or statements on the ground that they might be admissible evidence for the purpose of impeachment.

The Supreme Court, in Bowman Dairy Co. v. U. S. (314 U. S. 214, 221), has succintly stated the purpose and scope of rule 17 (c):

"There was no intention to exclude from the reach of process of the defendant any material that had been used before the grand jury or could be used at the trial. In short, any document or other materials, admissible as evidence, obtained by the Government by solicitation or voluntarily from third persons is subject to subpena."

It seems clear that the proposed Jencks bill would wipe out the above and other decisions, would substantially change rule 17 (c), and would probably deny due process insofar as it prohibits the delivery to the defendant of evidentiary statements of a Government witness made to persons other than a Federal law officer.

II—RULE 17 (C) DOES NOT REQUIRE THAT THE STATEMENT OR REPORT OF A GOVERNMENT WITNESS MUST BE "SIGNED BY THE WITNESS OR OTHERWISE ADOPTED OR APPROVED BY HIM," OR THAT IT MUST BE "A TRANSCRIPTION OR RECORDING OF HIS ORAL STATEMENT"

At the outset it should be stressed that "Relevancy and materiality for the purposes of production and inspection, with a view to cross-examination, are established when the reports are shown to relate to the testimony of the witness. Only after inspection of the reports by the accused, must the trial judge determine admissibility—e. g. evidentiary questions of inconsistency, materiality and relevancy." (Jencks v. U. S., p. 12.)

One of the functions of inspection under rule 17 (c), therefore, is to give the defendant the opportunity to discover whether he can lay a proper foundation for admission of relevant materials. As stated by the Supreme Court in the Bowman Dairy case, supra, at pages 219–220:

"There may be documents and other materials in the possession of the Government not subject to rule 16. No good reason appears to us why they may not be reached by subpena under rule 17 (c) as long as they are evidentiary. That is not to say that the materials thus subpenaed must actually be used in evidence. It is only required that a good-faith effort be made to obtain evidence."

"Demands for production and offers in evidence raise related issues but independant ones, and production may sometimes be required though inspection may show that the document could be properly excluded."

The Jencks bill, by requiring that the witness' statement must be signed or otherwise approved by him, runs counter to these rulings of the Supreme Court by imposing a test of admissibility on the defendant's right of inspection. Any purported statement of a witness, which has not been authenticated, cannot, of course, be admitted in evidence. But at the time of trial, the defendant can authenticate the statement through the testimony of the witness himself or of third persons. The bill deprives the defendant of this right to lay a foundation for admissibility. This again not only nullifies established precedents but also raises a serious constitutional issue. (Asgill v. U. S. (60 F. (2) 775, C. C. A. 4, 1932); U. S. v. Krulewitch (145 F. (2d) 76, C. C. A. 2, 1944).)

Both the Asgill and the Krulewitch cases were approved by the Supreme Court in the Gordon case, supra, as highly respectable authority for the rule that relevant statements of Government witnesses must be given to the accused. In the Asgill case, the Government's chief witness denied that she knew the contents of certain letters written on her behalf by a private person and contradicting her testimony. The defendant, however, through other witnesses presented testimony that the letter was dictated in her presence. The Court held that this was sufficient foundation to introduce the letters for impeachment purposes. The Asgill case aptly illustrates that a denial of a statement, or the failure to authenticate a statement when it is made, is not determinative of whether the statement is admissible to impeach the witness. The accused under the law has, and should have, the right to attempt to lay his own foundation to authenticate a statement otherwise relevant and admissible.

In U. S. v. Krulewitch the Government's chief witness had signed a statement given to an FBI official which contradicted her trial testimony. The trial court's denial of the defendant's demand for inspection was held by the second circuit, in an opinion by Judge Learned Hand, to constitute reversible error. The Court stated:

"It would have been proper to refuse that demand (for inspection) except for the fact that the statement was not competent until Joyce (the Government's witness) had been questioned as to whether she had not said what it purported to declare, and had been given an opportunity to admit that she had (citing cases). But since the accused could not ask her these necessary questions in preparation for admission of the statements, it was proper for him to demand an inspection, and the refusal was erroneous."

It should be noted that the fact of signature on a prior statement was not regarded as significant by the Court. The essential prerequisite to the statement's admission in evidence was that it be authenticated by the witness on the stand and under oath; the fact that a statement was or was not approved prior to the witness' testimony is immaterial; and the statement, if it is relevant, must be given to the defendant so that he has the opportunity to lay a foundation for its admission in evidence. The proposed bill, however, would deny the defendant this right and put into the hands of the law enforcement agency or the witness himself the power to withhold relevant statements from the accused, the jury, and the judge by the simple expedient of not having the witness physically approve his statement.

III—THE TIME OF INSPECTION OF MATERIALS UNDER RULE 17 (C) RESTS WITH THE DISCRETION OF THE TRIAL JUDGE

Rule 17 (c) provides that the court may direct production of materials subject to the rule "at a time prior to the trial or prior to the time when they are to be offered in evidence and may upon their production permit the books, papers, documents, or portions thereof to be inspected by the parties and their attorneys."

The drafters of rule 17 (c) expressly recognized that while in the normal case inspection should be denied until immediately before the materials were to be offered in evidence, the court, nevertheless, should "in the proper case, direct that they be brought into court in advance of the time that they are offered in evidence, for the purpose of enabling the party to see whether he can use it or whether he wants it." (Statement of Mr. G. Aaron Youngquist, member of advisory committee, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, Proceedings of the Institute on Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure—New York University School of Law, Institute Proceedings, Vol. VI, pp. 167–168.)

The Jencks bill, however, would substitute in the case of statements and reports of a witness the hard and fast rule that the materials could only be inspected after the witness had testified, no matter what the circumstances. There seems to be no justification or need for such a change in rule

17 (c). The courts have not abused their discretionary power under 17 (c) and in the great majority of cases have refused inspection of prior statements of a witness until after he has testified. But there certainly may be unusual circumstances where it is proper to permit inspection prior to the time of testimony. (See U. S. v. Iozia (13 F. R. D. 335, 340); (U. S. v. Bell (126 F. Supp. 612, 617).)

Moreover, in capital cases there would appear little reason for not permitting inspection in the ordinary case prior to the witness' testimony, since in capital cases the Government must deliver to the defendant 3 days in advance of trial the names of its witnesses. (Sec. 3432, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.)

The Jencks bill, however, would prohibit such inspection and nullify such decisions as Fryer v. U. S. (207 F. (2d) 134, C. C. A. D. C., 1953). The defendant in the Fryer case was charged with the capital offense of murder. The court held he was entitled to inspect statements of government witnesses prior to their testimony, stating—

"No sound reasons were offered by the Government, and we can think of none, for precluding pretrial inspection of such material. No objection was or could have been made to disclosing the identity of informants through such material. The Government had already furnished appellant with a list of witnesses whose statements were sought." (207 F. (2d) at 137.)

CONCLUSION

The Jencks bill unquestionably substantially amends or affects rule 17 (c). A proviso in the bill stating that it did not amend or affect rule 17 (c) would probably only create confusion and ambiguity by authorizing two conflicting procedures under which statements and reports of witnesses are to be produced, one under rule 17 (c) and the other under the Jencks bill. Accordingly, either the Jencks bill should be made to conform to rule 17 (c) or else restricted in its application to minimize the conflict with rule 17 (c).

It is submitted that the Jencks bill can be made to conform to rule 17 (c) and its court interpretations by further amendments to the bill, which would (1) provide that any statement or report of a witness which was relevant may be produced for the defendant's inspection; (2) leave to the court the determination in individual cases of what statements or reports, whether authenticated or not or whether they are verbatim or summary, should be given to the defendant under the test of relevancy; and (3) leave to the court the discretionary power to set the time of delivery.

2. ORAL STATEMENTS

Mr. MORSE. The court's opinion in Jencks makes it clear that a defendant is to have the right to inspect the prior statements of a Government witness, both written and oral.

As I explained on July 3, except for a limited class of informants, most Government witnesses do not, at the investigatory stage, file written statements with the FBI or other investigating agencies. FBI interviews may be reduced to stenographic transcrips or summaries by the interviewing official. They are not shown to the witness. Yet the original bill seeks to limit production to reports or statements of the witness "signed by the witness, or otherwise adopted or approved by him as correct."

That is still what the Department of Justice apparently wants or a bill almost as limited. We must be on guard against it on Monday.

There is not a Senator who has not been interviewed by the FBI many times. Have Senators ever signed a report? Have they ever signed a summary? Was the statement taken orally? Undoubtedly, the interviewer went back down to the FBI and wrote out a summary, and into a raw file it went. That happens not only in the case of United States Senators, but it happens to American citizens by the thousands.

Then a citizen is called to the stand to testify in a case which the Department brings against a defendant, and it is discovered that the witness has made previous statement to the FBI. Counsel is satisfied that he told the FBI one thing, while he is telling the jury something quite different. Counsel desires to impeach him. If the Department of Justice has its way, it will not be possible to get any statement from the Department of Justice files unless the witness signs, adopts, or approves it. Yet it was his statement given to the FBI agent—I am talking about a hypothetical case, but it is typical—in the oral interview which laid the foundation for the action brought against the defendant by the Federal Government.

Now counsel wishes to show that the witness lied. If the Department of Justice has its way in this matter, it will have the proposed legislation read that he can get the information from the FBI files only if the witness signed, approved, or adopted a report or the oral statement is as reproduced word for word or as nearly so as possible.

This is not the time or place to discuss a broader subject, and that is the whole matter of the FBI raw files.

I am in favor of the FBI carrying on its police functions and collecting information against people alleged to be guilty of wrongdoing. However, we can go too far in that respect. We can go too far, Mr. President, with regard to the precious right of privacy of free men and women, in collecting records pregnant with hearsay and unverified allegations.

I had a very interesting experience with an FBI report back in 1943 or in the early part of 1942. I was a member of the War Labor Board at the time, when one of the most distinguished and able labor leaders of our country at that time, now dead, was Bobby Watts, president of the Painters and Paperhangers Union. He had been appointed by President Roosevelt to represent the Government at an international conference. We had a dinner for him one night in celebration of the honor bestowed upon him. Employer and labor and public members of the Board were very much pleased that Bobby Watts was going to represent the United States at that conference. Bobby came into the Board meeting a couple of days later, with his face as long as my arm, and said, "I cannot go."

We said, "Why can't you go?"

He said, "I can't get Justice Department clearance."

We asked him what in the world had happened. He said, "I don't know what has happened. They won't tell me. Apparently it is for security reasons that I cannot get clearance."

So we appointed a committee of the board, composed of public members and labor members and employer members, to call on the Attorney General. The Attorney General was very secretive. He said he was very sorry about it, but they had a bad report. We could not find out what it was that Bobby had done. We could not find out what made him unacceptable to represent our country at the conference. So we made clear to the Attorney General that under the circumstances we would visit the President, because we were going to vouch for Bobby Watts, and unless we had clear evidence that he was not a suitable appointee, we would do what we could to stop the great injury we felt was being inflicted in this case.

The Attorney General said, "I will just show you this part of the report." He showed us a program of a luncheon held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York, at which Bobby Watts was listed as a speaker. It was a luncheon given by a group of artists, writers, and professional people. Apparently someone in the Department of Justice thought it was a suspect organization, although we were at war, and Russia was supposed to be our ally. Of course she never was. She never was our ally at any time. She just happened to be a nation which had a common enemy. Many times during the war I said that. I never accepted Russia, at any time, as an ally. I thought it was perfectly obvious throughout the war that she did not conduct herself as an ally but only as a nation which had a common enemy.

However, we were at war, and she was supposedly on our side. Apparently one of the main reasons why Mr. Watts could not go to Brussels was that he addressed this meeting at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. In those days we were addressing many meetings on the procedures of the War Labor Board, because we wanted to get the country to understand the way the Board operated, because the elimination of industrial disputes was vital to the successful prosecution of the war.

So, when Bobby Watts saw the program, he laughed, and he said, "Shall I tell him what happened, Wayne?"

I said, "Yes, tell him."

So Bobby told him this interesting story: "I was supposed to go to that luncheon to speak, but the night before there was an illness in my family. I did not go, but I asked WAYNE MORSE if he would go for me and make that speech for me."

I did that. I took the train to New York the next day, made the speech at the luncheon at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, and took the next train back to Washington.

Mr. President, I wish to say that that did not increase my confidence in the reports of the Department of Justice. When we explained that situation to the then Attorney General, I said if that was the kind of file they had, he had better get this injustice corrected. We were notified the next day that Bobby Watts had been reinstated as the American delegate. My colleagues on the Board said to me, "We wonder what would happen if you got the appointment to represent our country at some similar meeting."

I have digressed long enough to point this out. I do not wish to leave the impression that I am not in favor of a thorough investigation being carried out by the FBI. However, I wish to make it crystal clear that I am also in favor of thorough protection under the procedures of our courts by way of a review of any evidence taken out of those files, to the end of seeing to it that no right of due process of any American citizen is in the slightest measure violated thereby.

Therefore I do not go along with the Attorney General in his proposal before the committee, that there should be a limitation or that the statements should be made available only if in writing.

Such a limitation has two defects: (a) most statements are not in the form specified; and (b) the investigatory agencies can change their procedures so that no report or statement will come within the rule in the future.

The second substitute of August 12 would limit the Jencks rule to any "written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him, and any transcriptions or recordings of oral statements made by the witness to a Federal law officer."

I submit that the two objections to the original apply equally to the substitutes prior to the one presently under consideration.

The original draft of the substitute provided that the "recordings of oral statements" be "verbatim." This was discussed at a meeting conducted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], attended by several Senators and assistants and Deputy Attorney General Rogers. My assistant was also present. Senator O'MAHONEY properly pointed out that a "verbatim" recording is about impossible. If electronically recorded they can be changed and the change not discovered. If transcribed by a secretary, they are subject to error. Even the expert official reporters of the Senate can make mistakes, as we all know, although I am surprised, with the terrific pace and pressures under which they work, that they do not make many more than they do.

Mr. Rogers conceded this point, agreed to the elimination of the word "verbatim" but did so with the request that it be made clear in the legislative history that the statements be as close to verbatim as possible—in other words, as close to a word-by-word reproduction as possible.

What would be the result of such a limited rule? The FBI and other investigatory agencies could eliminate stenographic transcripts of interrogations. Indeed, it is not clear that such interrogations are the rule. In any interview I have had with FBI agents they have merely taken notes of our conversation. By the simple expedient of using summaries of interviews all Government investigatory agencies could avoid the Jencks rule under the original bill or the substitute.

The Attorney General's statement to the committee states that summaries by Government agents of interviews are hearsay. They are hearsay as to the truth of the contents of the statement; they are not, when properly qualified, hearsay as to the fact that the witness made the prior statement.

In the meeting with Senator O'MAHONEY the other day, Mr. Rogers made much of his contention that summaries of interviews would be excludable as hearsay even when used for impeachment purposes.

As the majority opinion makes clear, only after inspection of the reports by the accused, must the trial judge determine admissibility.

> The use of prior self-contradiction to discredit is not obnoxious to the hearsay rule. (III Wigmore on Evidence 687, 3d edition).

Moreover, the Jencks decision does not say that the Government document itself must be used for impeachment. This is implicit when the court said:

> Only the defense is adequately equipped to determine the effective use for purpose of discrediting the Government's witness and thereby furthering the accused's defense, the defense must initially be entitled to see them to determine what use may be made of them.

Obviously, the rationale of the Jencks case decision is that the accused is not to be limited to the use of the document itself. Knowledge that it exists may be sufficient to get the witness to admit a prior inconsistent statement. Or it can be used to put a Government agent on the stand, to attest to the prior inconsistent statement.

The argument of the Justice Department, based on spurious grounds that summaries of prior statements are hearsay, and hence excludable, is no warrant for emasculating the Jencks case rule, as the bill and substitute would do.

The substitute just prior to the present one also limits the application of the decision in the Jencks case to statements made "to a Federal law officer." Those terms are not defined.

Is a Civil Service Commission investigator a Federal law officer? Is any intelligence agent, including members of the armed services, a Federal law officer? Probably not. But who can tell? Statements made to such officials may very well come into question in criminal trials. Yet the proposed substitute—and here I speak, not of the O'Mahoney substitute, but of the second proposal or substitute proposed by the Department of Justice—contains this limitation, which is not found in the decision; and we are asked to believe the Justice Department when it says that it seeks to do no more than to regularize the Jencks case rule.

Let us understand that we are not asked to review the Jencks case decisions and enact its provisions into law. We are being asked to enact what is supposed to be the Jencks case rule and to exclude all other possible applications of the policy of the decision.

The limitations proposed by the Department of Justice would, in effect, cancel the fair opportunity for preparation for trial, as made mandatory by the Supreme Court, in most, if not all, cases.

I fear that on Monday an attempt will be made to return to at least the second proposal of the Department of Justice, to which I have referred, in the course of this speech, not as the O'Mahoney substitute, but as the substitute proposed by the Department of Justice. The Dirksen amendments are in line with the recommendation of the Department of Justice; and I am informed—and reliably informed, I believe—that on Monday other amendments may be proposed, in an attempt to carry out the desire of Mr. Brownell and of Mr. Rogers, the Acting Attorney General, to produce what I consider to be an undesirable restriction of the application of the rulings in the Jencks case.

PROTECTING FBI AND GOVERNMENT FILES

As I have already indicated, both the Court and the committee agree that the Jencks case rule is not to be used for fishing expeditions.

I believe that the Federal judiciary is sensitive to the problem of preventing invasion of FBI and other Government files which are essential to national security.

There may, indeed, be occasions, conceivably many occasions, on which the material to which the defendant has a right is intermingled with other information not related to a witness' testimony, and to which the defendant has no right.

The courts are not blind to this problem. I believe they can be trusted to differentiate between what a defendant must be shown and what should be withheld as unrelated to his case.

But the Government, as prosecutor, has solemn obligations, as well. The Court made this clear in quoting one of the most eminent jurists of our time, Judge Learned Hand, when the Court said:

> While we must accept it as lawful for a department of the Government to suppress documents, even when they will help determine controversies between third persons, we cannot agree that this should include their suppression in a criminal prosecution, founded upon those very dealings to which the documents relate, and whose criminality they will, or may, tend to exculpate. So far as they directly touch the criminal dealings, the prosecution necessarily ends any confidential character the documents may possess; it must be conducted in the open, and will lay bare their subject matter. The Government must choose; either it must leave the transactions in the obscurity from which a trial will draw them, or it must expose them fully.

I think that is simply another way of stating the maxim to which I have referred, namely, that when we come to deal with the rights of individuals, in connection with the matter of charging them with the commission of crimes, it is improper to attempt to hide behind privilege, in comparison with the right of the individual to due process. If ever there is reached a point where they seem to be inconsistent, then I think it is perfectly clear that due process must prevail, and the doctrine of privilege must give way.

THE COURTS CAN BE TRUSTED

For my part, I am confident that the courts can be trusted to evolve the necessary procedures for application of the Jencks case rule. They may do much better in applying the Jencks case decision. They will certainly do a better job of fashioning the appropriate procedure without, as this bill threatens to do, wiping out other necessary and time-proven procedures.

The American way, the democratic way, is based in large measure upon the procedures evolved by our courts for the protection of the individual. Those procedures do not require any sacrifice of national security.

When we seek to protect the national security, it would seem prudent—yes, essential—to make certain we are not eroding one of our most precious guaranties of liberty, namely, an independent judiciary.

This bill is not ripe for legislative action. It may be that within the few days after the decision was rendered, some Federal judges were unclear as to its meaning, and acted hastily and unwisely. With the passage of a few months, that situation may very well right itself.

If legislation is needed, let us act upon it after there have been thorough hearings and full analysis of the Federal court cases involving the rule. Let us have the benefit of the study of the law schools, law reviews, law associations, and of the judges. So far we have heard only the prosecutor's case.

Once enacted, an unwise law is difficult to amend or repeal. The Congress has not had the benefit of the kind of study and hearings required by a major piece of legislation. I urge judicious study before this bill is acted upon.

However, Mr. President, since writing those words, I have become convinced that proposed legislation in this field will be passed before the Congress adjourns. I want that proposed legislation to be simply a reiteration of the decision in the Jencks case itself, thus clearing up—if that is deemed necessary—some of the misunderstandings which have developed from interpretations of the decision in the Jencks case. I think the pending O'Mahoney substitute amendment does that.

I still would prefer to wait until January—as suggested today by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNamara]—until the courts have had a chance, during the few intervening months, to act upon appeals cases which may follow from the decision in the Jencks case.

But knowing that, in all probability, proposed legislation in this field will be passed before the Congress adjourns next week, I wish to make clear tonight that I support the O'Mahoney substitute amendment. I think there is much to be said for it, in order to answer some of the critics and to quiet some of the fears which have been expressed over the application of the decision in the Jencks case.

But on Monday, I shall oppose the Dirksen amendments, for the adoption of which I understand the Department of Justice, through the Acting Attorney General, Mr. Rogers, proposes to press. I think we shall go far enough when we adopt the O'Mahoney substitute amendment; I believe that will be going far enough, if any proposed legislation in this field must be passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 23, 1957

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Almighty God, in our prayer at this noon hour, we would thank Thee for friends who, amid the turmoil and tumult of our days, are always greeting us with the salutation, "Be of good cheer," and urging us to carry on with faith and fortitude.

We rejoice that we may lean upon them for counsel and look unto them for encouragement as we find ourselves challenged by problems and tasks which demand the consecration of our noblest manhood and womanhood.

Give us a greater appreciation of the blessedness of friendship and may our hearts go out to Thee in gratitude for friends who are solicitous about our welfare and continually giving us a lift when we are weary and downcast and the burdens of life are heavy to bear.

May we be grateful above all for the divine friendship of our blessed Lord; that Friend who sticketh closer than a brother and upon whom we may count through thick and thin; that Friend who is always teaching us to put our trust in Thee and willing to forgive and forget all our sins and mistakes.

Help us to hasten the dawning of that glorious day when men all around the world shall be friends and live together in the bonds of brotherhood.

Hear us in the name of our blessed Friend. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McBride, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 7671. An act to amend section 116 of chapter X of the Federal Bankruptcy Act, to make certain equipment trust provisions applicable to aircraft and aircraft equipment of air carriers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 25. An act relating to effective dates of increases in compensation granted to wage board employees; and

S. 1828. An act to retrocede to the State of Montana concurrent police jurisdiction over the Blackfeet Highway and its connections with the Glacier National Park road system, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 807. An act for the relief of Jackson School Township, Ind.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1568) entitled "An act to direct the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain public lands in the State of Nevada to the Colorado River Commission of Nevada acting for the State of Nevada," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BIBLE, and Mr. MALONE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

INCREASE IN MILK PRICES

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. Mr. Speaker, according to the press, the 1-day strike of the truckdrivers who haul bulk milk for the New York metropolitan area came to a sudden and dramatic end yesterday morning at 4 a. m., when the employers agreed to virtually all contract terms demanded.

After reading this, I called the National Milk Producers Federation to inquire about the status of the 1-cent-per-quart increase in milk prices requested by the Virginia dairy farmers because of the protracted drought. I was informed that nothing definite had been decided, but it was rumored that the commission would probably recommend one-half cent per quart instead of the 1-cent request.

How long, O Lord, how long will it be before the dairy farmers of Virginia, Maryland, and other States realize that they produce the Nation's milk and that this milk belongs to them before it can belong to anyone else. These farmers must band together and demand a fair and reasonable price for their products which are so essential to the health of the people of this Nation. Instead of begging on their knees like slaves for long overdue consideration which they seldom receive.

Here is what the men who haul the milk for metropolitan New York obtained in less than a 24-hour period. They did not beg—they demanded and received. They said in effect—Give us what we ask or quit drinking milk. They got what they asked because New York must have milk. When will the dairy farmers wake up—organize—quit begging and begin demanding.

The settlement gives the teamsters an 86½-cent-an-hour package of wage, welfare, and fringe benefits over a 3-year period.

The unexpected end of the walkout, which had threatened to cut off most of the city's fresh milk supply by this weekend, came after a 5½-hour bargaining session at the union's headquarters.

A 70-cent wage increase, with 40 cents effective immediately and 15 cents in both 1958 and 1959. New wage rates will be $2.37 and $2.47 per hour this year. A third rate of $1.87 in the old contract has been eliminated.

Institution of a pension plan providing for $100 per month on retirement at age 65, to be financed by the employers at a cost of 11½ cents per hour.

Institution of a 5-day, 40-hour week.

Other gains include addition of a fourth week of vacation after 15 years; an increase in insurance from $2,000 to $5,000; improvement in disability payments from $35 per week for 15 weeks to $50 per week for 20 weeks; 2 additional holidays for a total of 8, and provision for choosing runs on a seniority basis.

The men went back to work immediately after the agreement was announced.

INTRODUCTION OF PETITION TO DISCHARGE RULES COMMITTEE ON CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to advise the Members of the House that this morning I presented to the Clerk a motion in writing to discharge the Committee on Rules from consideration of House Resolution 398, which resolution was introduced by our colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEATING] on August 14, 1957, and provides that upon its adoption the civil rights bill, H. R. 6127, with Senate amendments thereto be taken from the Speaker's table to the end that all Senate amendments be disagreed to and a conference be requested with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

My action, Mr. Speaker, calls for what every Member must recognize as the normal procedure in ironing out differences between the two Houses of Congress, and I may say my purpose is to allow Members of the House to work their will, if, as appears likely, the Committee on Rules does not act in the meanwhile.

Should this session of Congress be terminated on a motion to adjourn sine die without the necessary number of signatures on the discharge petition it would hold over and, I hope, would assure positive action on a civil rights bill early in the second session.

Of course, I would prefer an immediate end of the deadlock that has developed on the civil rights issue. The minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] has suggested a compromise; but I note the distinguished chairman of the House Judiciary Committee calls this proposed amendment a hodgepodge. Therefore, it appears a discharge petition may be the only means of getting action. So as a precaution I have filed one now that the required 7 legislative days have passed since the Keating resolution was introduced.

INDIAN HOSPITALIZATION PAYMENTS TO BERNALILLO COUNTY, N. MEX.

Mr. HARRIS submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 9023) to amend the act of October 31, 1949, to extend until June 30, 1960, the authority of the Surgeon General to make certain payments to Bernalillo County, N. Mex., for furnishing hospital care to certain Indians.

CONVEYANCE OF LAND TO STATE OF TEXAS

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 499) to direct the Secretary of the Navy or his designee to convey a 2,477.43-acre tract of land, avigation, and seer easements in Tarrant and Wise Counties, Tex., situated about 20 miles northwest of the city of Fort Worth, Tex., to the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. ARENDS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give the House a short explanation of this bill?

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill would authorize the Secretary of the Navy to convey to the State of Texas 2,477 acres of land in Tarrant and Wise Counties. The State of Texas would use this property for the training of the National Guard and the Air National Guard.

The property was originally acquired by the United States in 1942 for use as a Marine Corps air station. It was used to train personnel subsequent to that time. It now is excess to the needs of the Navy and neither the Army or the Air Force have any requirement for the property.

This conveyance is similar to many which the Congress has passed during the last several years and you will note in the bill that the United States reserves the right to recapture the property in the event of need; the minerals are reserved to the Government; and the bill provides also that should the property not be used for National Guard purposes, then title will revert to the United States.

Under the bill the Secretary of the Navy also has the right to insert in the deed of conveyance such additional terms and conditions as he may feel necessary to protect the interests of the United States.

You will note that the committee has amended the bill in two places so as to make certain that the State keeps the property in a condition which will permit flying activities to be carried on there should the Government need it during an emergency.

This bill has been cleared by both the Navy and the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. ARENDS. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy or his designee is authorized and directed to convey by quitclaim deed, without consideration, to the State of Texas all right, title, and interest of the United States, except as retained in this Act, together with all buildings, improvements thereon with related personal property, all appurtenances, runways, and utilities belonging or appertaining thereto, of the former United States Marine Corps Air Station, Eagle Mountain Lake, Texas, as shown on maps on file with the Department of the Navy, Bureau of Yards and Docks, in and to a 2,235-acre tract of land out of and comprising lands acquired by the United States in condemnation proceedings in civil actions No. 432, and No. 461, in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Texas, Fort Worth division, and judgments rendered therein by said court as recorded in the deed records of Tarrant County, Texas, on January 21, 1943, in volume 1548, page 452; February 11, 1943, in volume 1552, page 348; May 10, 1943, in volume 1566, page 347; and May 11, 1943, in volume 1567, page 73; also judgment rendered and deed recorded on March 1, 1956, in volume 204, page 107, in the deed records of Wise County, Texas; plus an additional 241.46 acres of land with avigation easements conveyed to the United States by the Tarrant County Control and Improvement District 1, through exchange of lands made December 21, 1954, the deeds being recorded on March 16, 1955, in volume 2837, page 195; volume 2836, page 581, and volume 2837, page 183, of the deed records of Tarrant County, Texas. Sec. 4. The conveyance of the property authorized by this Act shall be upon condition that such property shall be used primarily for training of the National Guard and the Air National Guard and for other military purposes, and that if the State of Texas shall cease to use the property so conveyed for the purposes intended, then title shall immediately revert to the United States, and in addition, all improvements made by the State of Texas during its occupancy shall vest in the United States without payment of compensation therefor.

Sec. 5. Nothing in this Act shall prevent the State of Texas from disposing of or salvaging buildings and improvements now located on the land to be conveyed, or leasing, licensing or granting easements into and on the lands and improvements, except that the exercise of such rights shall not impair the use of the lands and improvements for the purpose set forth in section 4 of this Act, including preservation of the aviation potential of the property and that any revenues derived from such disposal, salvaging, leasing, licensing, or granting of easements shall be expended solely by the State of Texas for the protection, maintenance, and operation of the facility as a training center.

Sec. 8. The cost of any surveys necessary as an incident to the conveyance authorized herein shall be borne by the State of Texas.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 9, line 6, after "purposes," insert "and on condition that the aviation potential of the station shall be maintained in a condition equivalent to the condition of the property at the time of its conveyance, ordinary wear and tear excepted."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1958

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment in disagreement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Cannon moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken by said amendment insert:

"CIVIL AERONAUTICS ADMINISTRATION

"Construction and development, additional Washington airport

"For necessary expenses for the construction and development of a public airport in the vicinity of the District of Columbia, as authorized by the act of September 7, 1950 (64 Stat. 770), including acquisition of land, $12,500,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That not to exceed a total of $250,000 may be advanced from this appropriation to the applicable appropriations of the Civil Aeronautics Administration for necessary administrative expenses: Provided further, That such sums as may be necessary but not to exceed $100,000 shall be transferred from this appropriation to the President for expenses necessary for the investigation of alternate sites for said airport: Provided further, That no funds shall be expended for construction and development of said airport until the President shall make a report to the Congress with a recommendation as to the site, said report to be submitted not later than January 15, 1958."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Rooney].

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, the action now proposed represents the unanimous agreement of all the members of the conference, the conferees on the House side and the conferees of the other body.

This pending motion provides $12,500,000 to commence construction of a new airport in the vicinity of Washington. It also provides for a further study by the President of alternate sites for the airport and requires a report to the Congress at any time, but not later than January 15, 1958. Construction of the additional airport may then proceed at whatever location the President designates in the report.

The conferees of the other body have requested that Gen. E. R. Quesada, special assistant to the President on aviation, take part in the study. While the language of the bill does not specifically require this, the House conferees would not object if the President saw fit to have him take part.

I urge agreement to the pending motion of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon] which should bring to an end the long controversy over the Burke site. The President may now go ahead with the construction of an additional airport for Washington either at Burke or wherever he decides it should be located.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I feel that this is a satisfactory solution of the Washington airport problem. In the meantime I have been assured that the Civil Aeronautics Board will go after the airlines and force the use of Friendship Airport during the progress of the construction of this additional airport and, perhaps, afterward.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Cannon].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment in disagreement.

Senate amendment No. 54: On page 23 insert:

"DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE—CIVIL FUNCTIONS

"Department of the Army

"Rivers and Harbors and Flood Control

"Construction, general

"For an additional amount for 'Construction, general,' $475,000, to remain available until expended."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Cannon moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and concur therein with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the sum named in said amendment insert "$425,000."

Mr. LeCOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LeCompte moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54 and concur therein.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recede.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LeCompte].

Mr. LeCOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, I offer this preferential motion with respect to the Rathbun Dam in southern Iowa.

May I say to my colleagues in the House that this was authorized a number of years ago. Planning money has twice been recommended by the President and urged in a budget message. It was budgeted in the last Congress and again in the present Congress, this time in the amount of $100,000. However, we are now asking only $50,000. Twice this amount was provided in a bill by the other body. I find that the White House, the Budget Director, Corps of Army Engineers, and the Senate are in favor of a study being made on the Rathbun Dam.

For the benefit of my colleagues, may I read this statement from a report of the upper House regarding the Rathbun and Red Rock Dams, Iowa.

RATHBUN AND RED ROCK DAMS, IOWA

The House committee recommended against the appropriation of funds for the continuation of planning on these two projects, because it appeared that comprehensive watershed and soil-conservation practices might serve much of the flood-control purpose assigned to these two reservoirs. The representatives of the Corps of Engineers that appeared before the committee testified that these projects are required for flood control. The committee recommends the appropriation of funds to continue planning on these projects, and directs the Corps of Engineers to evaluate the effectiveness of watershed and soil-conservation practices on these watersheds in the control of major floods. It is desired that they be prepared to report on this matter when they appear before the Appropriations Committees next year.

Mr. Speaker, this $50,000 might be the most important economy money we have expended in a long time because it looks toward an understanding of flood control problems, soil conservation problems, and watershed problems. One hundred thousand dollars has been recommended by the White House, by the President in his budget message, it has had the approval of the Budget Director, and it has been twice placed in a bill by the other body. It seems to me, judging by the language of the report from the other body, that this is actually an economy proposition and the amount has been reduced to $50,000.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LeCOMPTE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROONEY. Does the gentleman realize that this would mean the start of a project that would run into at least $21 million, and that the cost-benefit ratio is only 1.19 to 1 percent?

Mr. LeCOMPTE. The $50,000 is only for planning money. The report of the other body requires the Corps of Engineers to make a statement as to whether it is an economy measure or not and whether they can come up with some answer to the ever-present problems of soil erosion and flood control, watershed problems, and kindred subjects. I would say that this $50,000, on which I shall offer a motion if the present motion prevails, if I am permitted to do so might very possibly be the best money this Congress has spent in a long time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Taber].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I want to talk to you about the $425,000 that would be left in this bill if this motion to recede prevails. That is an item to dredge the Columbia River from Bonneville to The Dalles about 45 miles upstream. Already they have a project which was completed for a channel from Bonneville to Vancouver. The only trouble with it is that it has silted so that they have a lot of money to spend upon it and they expect to spend $1,250,000 maintenance funds of the civil functions, War Department, on that this coming year. Now, I do not know why they allowed it to silt and fill in. I do not know whether it was because there was no demand of traffic to use it. There is no other activity of a major character that could not be served by small boats between Bonneville and The Dalles. The people who have sponsored this proposition are those who were given a contract by the Government some time back, the Harvey outfit for something in the nature of 50,000 tons of aluminum a year. They were not able to make good on it. They finally sold it out to the Anaconda Copper Co., as I understand it, and they made about $5 million out of the sale. They had a tax amortization on that thing. Now, I understand they have another tax amortization and have a contract with the Government to guarantee the building of a plant for aluminum and they want this channel dug to a depth of 27 feet from Bonneville up to Troutdale where The Dalles is. It seems to me this is absolutely ridiculous. It was not in the budget. They did not make a good enough case for it. It was placed in the bill in the other body without any talk about it anywhere except in the committee, and they did not even refer to it in their report. We went to conference with the other body and without any big kick on the part of the proponents of this thing, it was thrown out. This whole picture does not look good to me at all. I do not want to be a party to paying the $425,000 which is going to result in the expenditure of approximately $5 million before they get through on the whole thing and, furthermore, for the benefit of an outfit that has operated and that has the kind of record that this Harvey outfit has. I do not understand why there seems to be such great excitement about putting such a thing as this in, which was not even able to secure a budget estimate.

The only position I can take to try to keep things on the square is to be against this motion to recede. I hope that the House will support that position the same as it did the day before yesterday when we had this matter under consideration. Therefore, I hope that the House will vote "no" on the motion to recede, and that we will be able to stop this operation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND].

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House does not recede on either of those projects. Both of these projects have been interred and resurrected more often than a cat has lives.

To begin with, the Rathbun Reservoir was before the committee. It was a budgeted item of $100,000. It was defeated in the committee. When it came to the floor the House accepted the recommendation of the committee. It went to conference after the Senate put it in. It was defeated in the conference by the managers on the part of the House. It was defeated the day before yesterday by an overwhelming vote of this House, and again it is before the House today.

The same argument applies to the project which would dredge the Columbia River from Bonneville to The Dalles. Insofar as that project is concerned, there is not a line of evidence in the hearings which indicates that this is a project which should be started at this time. When we had outside witnesses before the committee, some of them espoused this particular project. But insofar as the Corps of Engineers are concerned, there is not a line of evidence in the committee hearings which indicates that this item should be put in the budget this year. This item was also considered by the managers on the part of the House, and we insisted that the Senate recede from its position on this project. The Senate receded. When the managers on the part of the House met with the Senate, there were 34 items that were put in by the Senate, and the House gracefully capitulated on almost 99 percent of those projects. The projects to which I have reference, the Rathbun Reservoir and the Columbia River project, particularly the Columbia River project, would cost in the neighborhood of $29 million. About $8 million for Columbia River project. This is an authorized project. It is not a budgeted project. About $21 million would be expended on the Rathbun Reservoir. This project was budgeted.

In 1949 the depth of the Columbia River was deepened to 27 feet. Since that time it has been allowed to silt up so that the depth now is only 15 feet. If we approve this project which would dredge the Columbia River from Bonneville to The Dalles, it would necessitate a further expenditure of money for the dredging of the Columbia River from Vancouver to Bonneville Dam. That would entail an expenditure of $2,500,000. Where is the $2,500,000 coming from? It is coming from operation and maintenance, which means that $2,500,000 would be deducted from operation and maintenance of other projects throughout the Nation.

What is the benefit to cost ratio on the Columbia River project? There is no benefit to cost ratio on this project. It has not been evaluated. I am sure when it is evaluated it will be a good benefit to cost ratio. At that time I can see myself going along with the project.

I have been sitting on this committee for the past 3 years, and there is no Member here who can say that I have not gone along with him on projects in which they have been intensely interested if those projects were justified. But I cannot find myself going along with some particular project on which there have been no hearings, on which there has been little or no testimony. I think this is an affront to the Subcommittee on Public Works of the Appropriations Committee if this House should vote this project at this time. I think it is wrong. I do not think it is right for the members of any committee to sit as Stoughton bottles and go along with some project on which it has little information.

Mr. SCHWENGEL. I agree with the gentleman. The point I want to make is that the motion has been made by the gentleman from Iowa because he wants to get his Rathbun project restored, and the only parliamentary maneuver to make that possible is this motion.

Mr. BOLAND. I think we ought to pass the motion and fail to recede and kill the project.

The Rathbun project has a benefit to cost ratio of 1.91 to 1. Evidence was taken before our committee. This was a budgeted item but was turned down by the committee. Work has been done up in that area which alleviates the flood problem. That is the only project which deals with flood control.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON].

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will see fit to vote "yea" on the pending motion, which is a motion to recede.

We had this question under consideration just the day before yesterday and got into a monumental parliamentary snarl for the reason that many of us on this side did not hear the request of the gentleman from New York that the question be divided so that those who wanted to vote No voted "aye" and vice versa.

I am interested, of course, in this Columbia River dredging project which has been discussed by both the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Massachusetts. The item as it appears in the Senate bill is $475,000. I would like to explain this situation so we will know where we stand.

$475,000 is the amount of the item. Of this amount $425,000 would be for dredging of the Columbia River. The other $50,000 would be for starting plans on the Rathbun Dam in Iowa, which will be a $21 million project.

I might say that I do not go along with the idea of starting work on the Rathbun Dam and would like to see the $50,000 stricken from this bill, but I would like to see the $425,000 appropriated for the Columbia River dredging project.

We need this channel opened up from Vancouver to The Dalles. In 1937 the work as far as Bonneville Dam was authorized, a channel of 27 feet. In subsequent years the river in that region was dredged to a depth of 27 feet. Since then it has been allowed to silt in, and in recent years it has been maintained at a depth of only 15 feet.

In 1946 authorization was granted to dredge to a depth of 27 feet from Bonneville on up to The Dalles. The need now is for deeper draft navigation up the river as far as The Dalles.

The total cost will be $5,350,000, of which this $425,000 would be the first installment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am directing my question to the gentleman because he represents that area and knows what the conditions are better perhaps than some of the rest of us.

It has been my understanding that there has been some shipping up the Columbia River but not much that requires greater depth of bottom clearance.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], said on the floor a few moments ago that this program was for the specific use of a firm known as the Harvey firm. Is that a fact, as the gentleman knows it, or is it not a fact?

Mr. MAGNUSON. It is not specifically for the benefit of the Harvey firm.

Mr. TABER. It is mainly for that firm.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would like to ask the gentleman further, what are the general shipping requirements, using a figure of 100 percent for the so-called industry, the Harvey or other people, as compared with the total shipping requirements percentagewise.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I am sorry to say I cannot give the gentleman the figure, but it would only be a small proportion of the total. We have a great potential in shipping down that river in fruit, grain, lumber products, and up the river in industrial supplies, petroleum products and so forth. The volume has been increasing steadily year by year.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HOLMES. In following up the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from California, let me call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the McNary Dam, which is many, many miles up the river from The Dalles, Oreg., has constructed in it one of the largest shipping locks of any dam constructed in the United States. There is navigation service to the people clear up to the Tri-City area, in the State of Washington, a service to around 70,000 people. I want to get the record straight that the dredging of the Columbia River and the keeping of the Columbia River open is not strictly devoted to any corporation or to any specific business.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, if I only have 1 additional minute I shall devote it to explaining the parliamentary situation.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROONEY. It is a fact, is it not, that this project has been authorized for at least 10 years?

Mr. MAGNUSON. The upper half of it 11 years, and the lower half of it 20 years.

Mr. Speaker, we are now considering a motion to recede. I hope the House will vote favorably on this motion, after which there will be offered a motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment. The amendment will be to reduce the amount of this appropriation from $475,000 to $425,000. In other words, that motion will cut out the start of the $21 million dam in Iowa and approve the $425,000 for this project in the Columbia River.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN].

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the House will show confidence in the Subcommittee on Appropriations having to do with public works and vote against the motion to recede. After all, the members of this subcommittee sit week after week looking into these various projects and now we have before us a proposal concerning which we have had no discussion whatever and are asked to agree to without knowing what this really entails. I would suggest to these gentlemen that they come before our subcommittee next spring and give us an opportunity to study the proposal. This bypasses consideration by this proper committee.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly hope that the pending motion is voted down.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. A vote against this motion to recede is in keeping with the position the House took day before yesterday by an overwhelming vote?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. That is my understanding. I agree fully with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] and the speech he made. He brought out in a very effective manner what our subcommittee is up against, what we have to contend with, and I hope the House will sustain the subcommittee and vote against the motion to recede.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. JONAS. We have had a lot of talk in this Chamber about reducing the budget. Is it not true that if this motion prevails it will increase the budget?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Yes, the gentleman is correct. It will also make those of us who are members of the Subcommittee on Public Works feel: Just what is the use of sitting on that subcommittee for weeks and weeks trying to determine the proper course to pursue and having a decision made here without our having an opportunity to even look into it during our regular committee hearings? It is a poor way to do business.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. The parliamentary situation, as I understand it, is in order to have this money for the Columbia River dredging we have to vote "yea" on the motion offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LECOMPTE], is that correct?

Mr. ROONEY. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMES. Then to clear up this other matter about the limited use of dredging of the Columbia River for a specific purpose; that is utterly untrue. The Columbia is one of the biggest streams in America. It has many miles of navigation wrapped up in it from its upper reaches down to its mouth. It has many dams that are involved on the Columbia River and, as I said a few moments ago, one of the largest locks built in a dam in the United States is in the McNary Dam, many miles up the stream from The Dalles. To try and bring in something to defeat the legitimate dredging of a navigable stream the size of the Columbia by referring specifically to a corporation that needs this is certainly not facing the issue and not looking at the problem factually. I do plead with you to take into consideration the fact that you have a big stream, a fine stream, a stream that needs channelizing and dredging. You have an authorized procedure to carry it out and I hope that the House will support the motion to recede and concur.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentlewoman from Oregon.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. It has already been brought out in this discussion that this project, the dredging of the Columbia, has been authorized for over 10 years, since 1946, for the full project. Is it not also true that the Army Corps of Engineers has recommended this in the 308 report and I understand other reports, also, as economically and technically sound and feasible?

Mr. HOLMES. That is correct. Not only have they recommended it in their 308 report, but they are vitally interested in seeing to it that the stream is properly dredged. On the upper reaches above the McNary Dam is the tri-city area of the State of Washington in which there are 70,000 people. We do not want bottlenecks up and down this river to prevent navigation being handled correctly on a fine, navigable stream.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ROONEY. There is one point that has been missed so far in this debate; I have not heard it mentioned. We are here and now concerned with a conference report on a supplemental appropriations bill carrying over $1.7 billion. This comparatively small amendment is the only item which delays the delivery of this bill to the White House for signature. We have been in conference twice with the other body on this amendment and the conferees of the other body are adamant in their position. I hope that these facts will be taken into consideration in connection with this debate.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BOLAND. In answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY], when the managers on the part of the House and the Senate got together on the original public works appropriation bill there was no difficulty with this project. We asked the other body to recede and they receded willingly; there was no problem at all. So there is no problem about a billion-dollar public works bill involved here. Our objection is that this project was brought to this floor after it was killed four times by the committee and by the House itself.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished gentleman yield for a brief observation?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROONEY. I should like to have it understood, and I am sure it is understood, that this is not a public works appropriations bill. This is a supplemental appropriation bill carrying funds for many Government agencies, the major part of the funds being for military construction.

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, in closing I want to make this remark, that here we have an item of $475,000 holding up this bill. Included is $425,000 for a project of dredging on the Columbia River in the State of Washington that is building its navigation capacity up yearly. To hold back $425,000 for dredging of this fine, navigable stream that serves many, many areas on upstream is a very shortsighted procedure.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLMES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KIRWAN. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOLAND] let me say this. He objected to the way this item came in here. I was the one who asked them to take it out and they did. But in the meantime I found out that I was wrong. This is a worthwhile project. We are spending billions and billions of dollars. This is not the first time some project came in as a rider. They come in this way every year. They could not take this back and put it in the public works bill again. There is only one way we can take it in and that is the way they took it in. And that is the right way. I say it is a good project. They convinced me that it was.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope that the Members of the House will give their wholehearted support to the appropriation which is now before us. The project for which these funds would be used is one of great importance not only to the district which I represent, but to the entire Pacific Northwest region.

The Vancouver to the Dalles deep-draft ship channel is certainly not a new project. A section of it was authorized as long ago as 1937 by Congress. Nine years later, in 1946, an extension of the project depth and width to The Dalles, Oreg., was authorized in the Rivers and Harbors Act. Yet, despite this Congressional authorization, adequate funds for the completion of the project were never made available. Moreover, inadequate maintenance funds have resulted in an accumulation of silt in that section of the channel that originally was developed. Thus, we are asking today only for an appropriation which will permit a fully authorized channel development and improvement project on the Columbia River to proceed.

Mr. Speaker, all are familiar, I am sure, with the potentialities of the great Columbia River and its basin. The Federal Government has authorized significant developmental projects on this great stream. We have spent millions of dollars for locks. Yet, we can only fully realize the benefits of these expenditures if we open the Columbia River Basin to continued expansion through channel development.

The navigation of oceangoing vessels to inland ports would further the development of our agricultural and industrial potential. Our wheat-export program which now involves 1,357,000 tons could be more expeditiously handled by deep-draft vessels rather than by rail and transshipment through overcrowded facilities as it is at present handled. New markets could be found for our extensive production of some of the finest fruit raised in the Nation. Moreover, development of the channel could mean a substantial increase in the outgoing tonnage of fertilizers, metals, and industrial products.

Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that this appropriation will receive the approval of the House and I urge its full support by all Members.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. The vote that we are about to take is on the question as to whether or not the House will recede?

The SPEAKER. From its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 54.

Mr. TABER. If the motion fails to carry, that immediately results in the House having determined to disagree to the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there are still two amendments remaining in disagreement between the two Houses on this last supplemental appropriation bill.

We now propose to dispose of those two amendments. The recommendation of the conferees is that the Columbia River item be approved and the Rathbun Dam item be disapproved. That is the recommendation of the managers on the part of the two Houses.

In order to permit a vote on the two amendments it is necessary to recede from our disagreement. Therefore our vote now is aye on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to recede.

After the House votes to recede it will then be in order to vote on the two propositions, the Columbia River and the Rathbun Dam. But we must first vote to recede.

So, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recede.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House recede from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 54?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN) there were—ayes 80, noes 63.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 166, nays 121, not voting 145, as follows:

The doors were opened.

A motion to reconsider the votes by which action was taken on the several motions was laid on the table.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the conference report just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LE COMPTE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, is any motion in connection with the conference report on H. R. 9131 now in order?

The SPEAKER. There is not.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances then the motion made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROONEY] effectively foreclosed the gentleman from Iowa from offering his motion; is that correct?

The SPEAKER. There was a vote on the previous question. The Chair put that motion.

COLORADO RIVER COMMISSION

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (S. 1568) to direct the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain public lands in the State of Nevada to the Colorado River Commission of Nevada acting for the State of Nevada, with House amendment thereto, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. ENGLE, ASPINALL, PFOST, BERRY, and HOSMER.

GOVERNMENT GUARANTY OF PRIVATE LOANS TO CERTAIN AIR CARRIERS FOR PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT AND EQUIPMENT

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2229) to provide for Government guaranty of private loans to certain air carriers for purchase of modern aircraft and equipment, to foster the development and use of modern transport aircraft by such carriers, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1219)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2229) to provide for Government guaranty of private loans to certain air carriers for purchase of modern aircraft and equipment, to foster the development and use of modern transport aircraft by such carriers, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "That it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress, in the interests of the commerce of the United States, the postal service, and the national defense to promote the development of local, feeder, and short-haul air transportation. In furtherance of this policy it is deemed necessary and desirable that provision be made to assist certain air carriers engaged in such air transportation by providing governmental guaranties of loans to enable them to purchase aircraft suitable for such transportation on reasonable terms.

"SEC. 2 As used in this Act—

"(a) 'Board' means the Civil Aeronautics Board.

"(b) 'Aircraft purchase loan' means any loan, or commitment in connection therewith, made for the purchase of a commercial transport aircraft, including spare parts normally associated therewith.

"SEC. 3. The Board is hereby authorized to guarantee any lender against loss of principal or interest on any aircraft purchase loan made by such lender to any air carrier holding a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the Board (a) designated therein to be for local or feeder air service, or (b) providing for operations wholly within the Territory of Hawaii, or (c) providing for operations (the major portion of which are conducted either within Alaska or between Alaska and the United States) within the Territory of Alaska (including service between Alaska and the United States, and between Alaska and adjacent Canadian territory), or (d) providing for operations within the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico (including service to the Virgin Islands and the Dominican Republic), or (e) providing for operations between Florida and the British West Indies (including service to Cuba), or (f) for the purpose of authorizing metropolitan helicopter service. Such guaranty shall be made in such form, on such terms and conditions, and pursuant to such regulations, as the Board deems necessary and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act.

"SEC. 4. No guaranty shall be made:

"(a) Extending to more than the unpaid interest and 90 percent of the unpaid principal of any loan.

"(b) On any loan or combination of loans for more than 90 percent of the purchase price of the aircraft, including spare parts, to be purchased therewith.

"(c) On any loan whose terms permit full repayment more than 10 years after the date thereof.

"(d) Wherein the total face amount of such loan, and of any other loans to the same carrier, or corporate predecessor carrier or carriers, guaranteed and outstanding under the terms of this Act exceed $5,000,000.

"(e) Unless the Board finds that, without such guaranty, in the amount thereof, the air carrier would be unable to obtain necessary funds for the purchase of needed aircraft on reasonable terms.

"(f) Unless the Board finds that the aircraft to be purchased with the guaranteed loan is needed to improve the service and efficiency of operation of the air carrier.

"Sec. 5. The Board shall prescribe and collect from the lending institution a reasonable guaranty fee in connection with each loan guaranteed under this Act.

"Sec. 6. (a) To permit it to make use of such expert advice and services as it may require in carrying out the provisions of this Act, the Board may use available services and facilities of other agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal Government with their consent and on a reimbursable basis.

"(b) Departments and agencies of the Federal Government shall exercise their powers, duties, and functions in such manner as will assist in carrying out the objectives of this Act.

"(b) Payments to lenders required as a consequence of any guaranty under this Act may be made from funds which are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Board for that purpose.

"(c) Administrative expenses under this Act shall be paid from appropriations to the Board for administrative expenses.

"Sec. 8. This Act shall become effective upon enactment, and the authority contained in section 3 hereof shall expire five years thereafter."

And the House agree to the same.

Statement

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2229) to provide for Government guaranty of private loans to certain air carriers for purchase of modern aircraft and equipment, to foster the development and use of modern transport aircraft by such carriers, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserted an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute agreed to in conference is substantially identical with the House substitute, except as follows:

Section 4 of the bill contained several paragraphs stating conditions under which loan guaranties could not be made. By its amendment the House eliminated one of these paragraphs, as follows:

"(f) On any aircraft manufactured under a United States type certificate issued prior to the passage of this bill."

This provision of the Senate bill would have had the effect of denying the benefits of the bill in the case of loans with respect to any aircraft except aircraft newly certificated as to type after the enactment of this legislation. The House conferees were unwilling to leave this rigid limitation in the bill, since it is felt that it might be appropriate to permit the guaranties in the case of some existing types of planes when in the judgment of the Board this would improve service and efficiency of operation of carriers. Therefore, in the conference substitute there has been substituted for the Senate paragraph above quoted a paragraph as follows:

"(f) Unless the Board finds that the aircraft to be purchased with the guaranteed loan is needed to improve the service and efficiency of operation of the air carrier."

Section 5 of the substitute agreed to in conference is the same as section 5 of the Senate bill. It differs from section 5 of the House amendment in that it eliminates language which would have required the Board to prescribe rates of interest, either specifically or by limits, and language which would have directed the Board to prescribe such fees and charges, in addition to guaranty fees, as it might deem necessary to require in connection with the guaranty of aircraft purchase loans. Therefore, as modified, this section would merely direct the Board to prescribe and collect a reasonable guaranty fee in connection with each loan guaranteed. Because of this modification of section 5, a minor conforming change was also made in section 7.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. This is the bill that provides for the Civil Aeronautics Administration guaranteeing up to $5 million apiece for any one of the 21 airlines involved. The Government will guarantee 90 percent of the interest. As I understand it, there are 21 of those carriers, which means a total of $105 million is what this thing will cost the Government of the United States; is that correct?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would not say the gentleman is correct at all. It is entirely possible that one or more of them could not qualify with the restrictions and limitations we have here. This provides an authorization for a guaranteed loan to local service and short-haul carriers, the small airlines in the United States and only to that group of airlines, other than the amendment that was included to bring in the helicopter operators in a metropolitan area. They must qualify by showing that they are unable to obtain the capital at other places, and they must obtain modern equipment that will add to the efficiency of the service.

GOVERNMENT GUARANTY OF PRIVATE LOANS TO CERTAIN AIR CARRIERS FOR PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT AND EQUIPMENT

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HESELTON. Will the chairman of the committee please explain the changes which were made in the conference report.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; I shall be glad to. There were actually three changes made in the conference report. The House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserted an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

First. The House version included certificated helicopter air carriers;

Second. Section 5 in the House version required the Civil Aeronautics Board to prescribe, either specifically or by limits, rates of interest, guaranty fees, and such other reasonable fees or charges as it might require in connection with guaranty of aircraft purchase loans; and Third. The House version eliminated a paragraph in the Senate bill which would have limited guaranties to loans made for the purchase of aircraft type—certificated after passage of the bill.

The bill agreed to in conference includes the House amendment making carriers certificated for metropolitan helicopter service eligible for the benefits of this legislation.

Section 5 of the House version, which required the Board to fix interest rates, was as follows:

> Sec. 5. The Board shall prescribe, either specifically or by limits, rates of interest, guaranty fees, and such other reasonable fees or charges as it may require in connection with guaranty of aircraft purchase loans.

The Senate version, in which the requirement regarding the fixing of interest rates was eliminated, is as follows:

> Sec. 5. The Board shall prescribe and collect from the lending institution a reasonable guaranty fee in connection with each loan guaranteed under this act.

It is felt that section 3 of the bill contains sufficient language which will permit the Board to pass on the reasonableness of the terms of the loan agreement, including, of course, the interest rate. That language is:

> Such guaranty shall be made in such form, on such terms and conditions, and pursuant to such regulations, as the Board deems necessary and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act.

Because of the modification of section 5, a minor conforming change was made in section 7.

The paragraph in the Senate bill relating to new-type aircraft was:

The House conferees was unwilling to accept the language of the Senate bill which would have limited loans to those made to buy aircraft type certificated after passage of the bill. It was felt that it might be appropriate to permit guaranties in the case of some existing types of planes when in the judgment of the Board this would improve the service and efficiency of operation of the air carrier.

> (f) Unless the Board finds that the aircraft to be purchased with the guaranteed loan is needed to improve the service and efficiency of operation of the air carrier.

It is felt that this language is sufficient safeguard against the approval of loans for out-of-date or inefficient aircraft. The Board, which sponsored this legislation, is given wide discretion to safeguard the interests of the Government.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, did any of these changes in the conference report in the opinion of the chairman remove the objections of the Treasury Department, the Department of Commerce or the Bureau of the Budget to this legislation?

Mr. HARRIS. The Treasury Department did not send a representative to the hearings. A Commerce Department representative did appear in opposition. The Bureau of the Budget is supporting the Department of Commerce which interposed an objection. The CAB not only initiated this, but submitted it to us for our consideration and are sponsors of the legislation.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield for one further question, is it not a fact that the Treasury Department filed a letter objecting to this legislation when it was heard before the subcommittee?

Mr. HARRIS. I am advised that during the time it was considered by the other body the Secretary of the Treasury did file a letter. I have the report of the other body which includes that position of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HESELTON. Is it not a fact that in the hearings before the House subcommittee a letter was introduced from the Treasury Department expressing the suggestion that they thought this was a step in the wrong direction and opened the door to similar types of guaranties that would be expected to be applied to other private corporations or other forms of transportation?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes. The Treasury Department did make such a statement. If the gentleman wishes, I shall be glad to read this short paragraph into the Record.

Mr. HESELTON. I think it might be helpful to the Members in considering the conference report. I am anxious to know whether the conference report removes those objections.

Mr. HARRIS. The letter is from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Burgess, and is dated July 3 of this year. Understand, we held our hearings on July 17 and 18.

> As a general policy, the Treasury is opposed to the establishment of new loan-guaranty programs except under conditions of extreme urgency. With the present heavy demand for available credit, it is essential that we do all we can to avoid adding unnecessarily to this demand. Under these circumstances, the Department would be opposed to the enactment of H. R. 7993.

That was the position of the Treasury Department.

Mr. HESELTON. There is nothing in the conference report that addresses itself to that objection?

Mr. HARRIS. Nothing that I could refer to in the conference report, but from the hearings and our consideration of this matter we feel that there are "conditions of extreme urgency" involved.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. The gentleman from New York referred to the fact that it cost the Federal Government $105 million. The gentleman refers to this as being merely a guaranteed loan. Will the gentleman kindly explain how it costs $105 million for this loan, where it comes from, and under what conditions it could cost $105 million?

Mr. HARRIS. After having held the hearings and considered this matter we feel that the Government will not be put to any such cost or will have to fulfill any such responsibility. We think the provisions of this legislation are sufficiently restrictive that these loans will be closely scrutinized and approval given only when there is great urgency and need; and the fact it is reasonably shown that the loans will be repaid. Therefore, there should not be any loss at all in connection with the obligation of the Government. We feel in fact that the estimated receipts from it will add about $1 million a year to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. From anyone who would enter into the contract, banks, lending firms, and so forth.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Anywhere they can get it? This is merely a guaranty?

Mr. HARRIS. They would go to the money market, of course. This is to provide a guaranty under strict terms to be approved by the CAB.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Is it not true that the feeder airlines are in a condition where nearly all of them have to replace their DC-3 equipment in the course of the next 3 or 4 years?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, the gentleman is eminently correct. The purpose of this bill is to carry out the program the Congress has considered for a long time, doing something about the present situation where we have no airplane to take the place of the old DC-3's for local service. The Fairchild people are now producing one, the F-27, and there are a couple more that are being considered and may be developed to help provide this service. The point is, the small local-service carriers do not have sufficient capital to purchase the equipment they must have. Talking about the availability of money on the market, we find it is not so easy for people of this kind to go into the market and get money. However, if there is some incentive, some way that they can have some help, then we do think the credit will loosen up insofar as they are concerned so, therefore, we may have to utilize this program to a very limited degree.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Will the gentleman please refresh my memory as to the guaranty? Is it 100 percent on the dollar?

Mr. HARRIS. It is 90 percent—not over 90 percent.

Mr. GROSS. Will the gentleman tell me the length of these loans? Is there any provision in this legislation with respect to the length of the loan?

Mr. HARRIS. It is not more than 10 years and the authority in this bill is for a period of 5 years.

Mr. GROSS. What about the interest rate on the loans?

Mr. HARRIS. The interest rate is to be worked out between those who would obtain the loans and the source from which the money is obtained. It has to be a reasonable interest rate because, otherwise, the Board in its scrutinizing of these contracts or these loans will deny them if the rate is excessive.

Mr. GROSS. How does the gentleman account for the fact that the Department of Commerce and the Treasury Department both are opposed to the enactment of this legislation?

Mr. HARRIS. It is just another one of these experiences we have where you have the Civil Aeronautics Board, a Government agency, sponsoring a program of this kind because they feel it is needed, and another agency, the Department of Commerce, at the outset offered objection to it and insisted that they wanted the capital gains bill which the House passed, but which has not yet been passed by the other body. They also wanted the equipment-trust bill, but those of us who are familiar with it agree with the Board that their program does not fully reach the problem altogether and cannot possibly reach it for many of these small local service carriers.

Mr. GROSS. Does not the gentleman think this is starting something which will be a rather dangerous precedent?

Mr. HARRIS. Not at all. As we explained a few days ago, there are precedents for it. The Merchant Marine has followed this procedure for many, many years.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRIS. I yield.

Mr. TABER. But the next thing we will hear is that the railroads and the trucking organizations will all be on our necks for a guaranteed loan just like this. That is what bothers me particularly about getting started on this thing.

Mr. HARRIS. I can appreciate the gentleman's apprehension. I have heard that suggested around here from the outset of the hearings on this problem. But, in my opinion, the gentleman need not have any fear at all on that score, and he would not if he had seen the reaction when one of the railroad presidents came to this committee with a program which would be quite different but which would do something toward what the gentleman has suggested. I do not think it is in the making at all.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker anounced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 203, nays 77, not voting 152, as follows:

Mr. BOLLING changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

Mr. ASHLEY changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

The doors were opened.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made on the conference report just agreed to, and further that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on that conference report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this conference report. The other body has yielded or compromised on most of the amendments and, therefore, we are returning with a bill which is substantially the same as the one passed by the House.

Mr. Speaker, one area of disagreement which was resolved by the acceptance of the House version was the provision to include helicopters under the loan provision of this bill. I am also pleased that this decision was made as I feel that helicopters will have a very important role in air commerce in the future.

While this service is still in its infancy, helicopters are already proving high utility value in transporting passengers from downtown terminals to outlying fields. With the advent of jet transportation the helicopter will develop a still higher utility value as it will be necessary to develop air terminals still further removed from metropolitan areas.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that this report is adopted as it is urgently needed in the development of air commerce for fixed wing as well as rotor type planes.

CITY OF DECATUR, ILL.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2460) to authorize the transfer of certain housing projects to the city of Decatur, Ill., or to the Decatur Housing Authority.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. TALLE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, I merely rise to say that the minority members of the Committee on Banking and Currency do not have any objection to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Housing and Home Finance Administrator is authorized and directed to sell and convey to the city of Decatur, Ill., or to the Decatur Housing Authority, all of the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to that part of the North Jasper Homes housing projects (ILL–11218 and ILL–11219) which comprises a single site of approximately 22.452 acres and on which there are located 180 dwelling units and an administration building. Such sale shall be made in consideration of the payment of $266,000 by the purchaser to the United States. The purchase price shall be paid at the time of closing or in such installments as may be agreed upon by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator over a period not in excess of 5 years after the date of sale. Such sale shall be subject to the condition that if, at the end of 5 years after the date of sale, any such dwelling units have not been demolished, the purchaser shall pay an additional amount, to be determined by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator, to the United States for each month beyond the stated 5-year period that any such units have not been demolished. Any sale pursuant to this authorization shall be made within 4 months after the date of enactment of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, S. 2460 provides for the conveyance of two Lanham Act projects by the Housing and Home Finance Agency to the city of Decatur, Ill., or to the Decatur Housing Authority, for a price of $266,000. Unless this bill is passed, the housing will be sold at public auction and will in all probability become a slum. The bill permits the city authorities to prevent this from happening. While time does not permit hearings on this bill by the House Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill was worked out on the Senate side after hearings had been held and was reported without objection by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. The price of $266,000 has been set by the Housing and Home Finance Agency as a fair price, based on a 5-year life for the project. The bill requires that the housing be demolished after 5 years and provides for a penalty to be paid if any of the housing is not demolished at that time. The Housing and Home Finance Administrator has indicated that a fair penalty would be $25 per unit per month. I have received a letter from the Housing and Home Finance Administrator stating that the Housing Agency and the Bureau of the Budget have no objection to the bill. I include the letter at this point in the RECORD.

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1957.

Hon. BRENT SPENCE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is in response to the request of your staff for our views on S. 2460, a bill to authorize the transfer of certain housing projects to the city of Decatur, Ill., or to the Decatur Housing Authority.

The bill would authorize and direct the Housing and Home Finance Administrator to sell to the city of Decatur, Ill., or to the Decatur Housing Authority, war housing projects ILL. 11218 and ILL. 11219. These projects comprise 180 dwelling units and an administration building. The units are classified as "permanent" as distinguished from "temporary" under the provisions of the Lanham War Housing Act. Under the bill, the sale would be made in consideration of the payment of $266,000 by the purchaser to the United States. The purchase price would be paid at the time of the closing or in such installments as may be agreed upon by the Housing and Home Finance Administrator over a period not in excess of 5 years from the date of sale. Such sale would be subject to the condition that if at the end of 5 years after the date of sale any of the dwelling units remained on the site the purchaser would be required to pay to the United States an additional amount to be determined by the Housing Administrator for each month beyond such 5-year period that they remained on the site. Officials of the community have indicated their intention that the dwellings be demolished at the end of this 5-year period in order to avoid the development of slum conditions. The report of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency with respect to this bill (S. Rept. 1043) makes note of the Housing Administrator's statement that a fair amount payable by the purchaser for each such additional month beyond the 5-year period would be $25 per unit per month. If the bill is enacted, the Housing Agency would require that this amount be specified in the contract of sale.

The bill also provides that any sale pursuant to its provisions shall be made within 4 months after the date of enactment of the bill. Section 614 of the Lanham Act now provides that all permanent Lanham Act housing not sold by January 1, 1957 be advertised and sold as expeditiously as possible to the highest bidder. This bill would thus suspend that requirement for a 4-month period to permit the sale of the property according to the terms of the bill.

This Agency has strongly objected to earlier bills providing for the sale of these projects to the city of Decatur or the Decatur Housing Authority, because the consideration for such sale would have been merely the value of the land without the improvements. It has been the policy of the Agency and the Congress to obtain full market value for the property being sold pursuant to the Lanham Act. This Agency has also objected to a proposal that the above property be sold at a consideration of no more than its appraised value for use during a limited period of 5 years. This sales price would furnish the Government with less than full market value and would result in a windfall to the community if the property were actually used for a period longer than 5 years.

The provisions of S. 2460 would not provide for the payment of the full market value of the property based on its appraisal as permanent construction. Unlike the earlier bills, however, it does contain provisions which we believe represent a satisfactory compromise under all the circumstances involved. Accordingly, this Agency has no objection to the enactment of the bill.

A general consideration in this regard is the firm policy of the Congress and the Administration that the war housing projects be disposed of as rapidly as possible. As you know, the major portion of the war housing properties have been sold and only a few remaining projects are still held by this Agency. It is also our opinion that the price of $266,000 prescribed in the bill is a fair evaluation of the property if it is assumed that the structures should and will be removed at the end of 5 years. The value of the property for long-term use has been appraised by independent appraisers at approximately $400,000. However, in view of the apparent desire of the community to remove the property at the end of the 5-year period and our desire for immediate disposal, we consider that the proposed price represents a reasonable compromise. In this connection, we do not question the good faith of the community in its feeling that the structures do not meet its standards for continued long-term use. The payment of $25 per unit per month in case the structures are used after the 5-year period would avoid one of our objections to the earlier proposals; namely, that the community could receive a windfall as a result of the continued use of the property. Because of the importance of this payment to the compromise involved in the bill, this Agency will insist that any contract for the sale of the property to the community contain a requirement that $25 per unit per month be paid to the Federal Government for the continued on-site use of the structures after the 5-year period.

A sale under the bill must be made within a 4-month period. This Agency has previously recommended to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency that the bill require the sale to be made within a 2- or 3-month period. It is important that this period be as short as feasible in order to help complete the disposal of the few remaining war housing properties. This is particularly important to the Agency in view of the very limited funds available for the administration of the remaining properties. Although the Agency recommends a period shorter than the 4 months provided in the bill, we would not object to the enactment of the bill on this ground.

I have been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that this letter is without objection insofar as the Bureau is concerned.

Sincerely yours,

ALBERT M. COLE,
Administrator.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the facts in this situation are rather clear.

The city of Decatur has offered to purchase these homes and to pay for them the sum of $266,000, which is the figure which has been set by the Housing and Home Finance Agency as the price they believe fair and reasonable.

This project was put in Decatur just before or about the time World War II opened. It was not very good housing in the first place, and there is considerable fear by the city that this project will become a slum if not demolished. The city of Decatur desires to demolish the project within 5 years and prevent it from becoming a slum, and wishes to develop it in the future as a part of the urban redevelopment program of the city.

Early this year the Senate Banking and Currency Committee had hearings on this bill. The mayor of the city of Decatur and others came to Washington to testify about the necessity of getting this land in possession by the city.

I wish to point out that the sale price is in every way one which has been set by PHA. The city is only paying the price which PHA has asked.

I think it only fair to tell the House that the bill would also require the city to demolish the housing project within the 5-year period or pay a penalty for failure to do so.

The Housing and Home Finance Agency has submitted a letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, a copy of which I append herewith. The House will also note there is no objection to filing of this note or to the payment by the Bureau of the Budget.

This bill has been cleared by both the majority and minority leaders in the House Banking and Currency Committee, and also with the leaders of both parties.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is noncontroversial and the sale is certainly in the best interests of the Government in that it is getting the full sale price, and it is certainly of benefit to the city because of the fact which I have hereinbefore pointed out. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill. For a further and more detailed explanation of the bill, I refer the Members to page 15501 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 21, 1957.

The said subpena was duly served as appears by the return made thereon by Frank O. Bell, United States marshal, who was duly authorized to serve the said subpena. The return of the service by the said Frank O. Bell, United States marshal, being endorsed thereon, is set forth in words and figures, as follows:

"I made service of the within subpena by handing to and leaving copy with the within-named Jim Grady, true named Louis Earl Hartman, at KCBS broadcasting station, Palace Hotel, San Francisco, Calif., at 7:15 o'clock a. m., on the 11th day of June 1957.

"Dated June 11, 1957.

"Frank O. Bell,
"United States Marshal.
"By Warren D. Cain,
"Deputy Marshal."

On the 17th day of June 1957, Louis Earl Hartman was sent the following telegram postponing his appearance to June 19, 1957. The telegram is set forth below in words and figures as follows:

June 17, 1957.

Lou Hartman,
2139 Stewart Street, Berkeley, Calif.:

You will not be reached as a witness until Wednesday, June 19, 1957, at 9:30 a. m., therefore, you need not appear until that time.

Francis E. Walter,
Chairman, Committee on Un-American Activities.

The said Louis Earl Hartman, pursuant to the said subpena and said telegram, and in compliance therewith, appeared before a subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities on June 19, 1957, to give such testimony as required under and by virtue of Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress. The said Louis Earl Hartman, having appeared as a witness and having been asked the questions, namely:

"Have you been a member, and are you a member now, of a professional cell of the Communist Party at Berkeley?

"Are you now the chairman and have you been the chairman of the professional section of the Communist Party in Berkeley since early January 1957?

"Will you tell the committee, please, how many professional cells of the Communist Party there are in Berkeley?

"Now, sir, will you advise the committee of propaganda activities that are now being carried on by the professional section or group of the Communist Party in Berkeley?

"Will you tell the committee, please, what activities the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley is now engaged in?

"Was the embarrassment resulting to the State Department in having to take action in regard to that so-called peace council the result of Communist Party propaganda disseminated in this country in which you played a part?

"Will you tell the committee, please, whether or not the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley took action in regard to this matter?

"Were you not at the time of the publishing of that article in the People's World, March 24, 1949, when you were quoted as I have read, engaging in an activity of the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley designed to embarrass the United States in its foreign policy?

"Were you an active member of the Civil Rights Congress in Berkeley in March 1951?

"Were you a member of the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley in March 1951?

"I have before me a copy of the July 30, 1917, issue of the People's World. This article reports that you were to participate in a cultural conference to be held on August 2 and 3 under the auspices of the California Labor School. From this article it appears that John Howard Lawson was to be the keynoter and that the cultural conference was broken down in panels. Under the motion-picture panel appears the name of A. Polonsky, a screen writer, Waldo Salt, whose profession was also that of a screen writer, and yourself, under the name Lou Hartman. There has been very extensive evidence before this committee of the Communist Party membership of John Howard Lawson, Abe Polonsky, and Waldo Salt. There has been considerable evidence relating to the activities, propaganda and otherwise, of the California Labor School. Will you state whether or not the occasion to which I have referred was the result of Communist Party consultation and planning?

"I have asked you whether or not you were the chairman of the Professional Section of the Communist Party in Berkeley which you refused to answer, and I will now ask you whether or not you are a member of the Communist Party on any level whether supersecret or not?"

which questions were pertinent to the subject under inquiry, refused to answer said questions, and as a result of said Louis Earl Hartman's refusal to answer the aforesaid questions, your committee was prevented from receiving testimony and information concerning a matter committed to said committee in accordance with the terms of a subpena served upon said Louis Earl Hartman.

The record of the proceedings before the subcommittee on June 18, 1957, insofar as it is pertinent to the appearance of the witness Louis Earl Hartman on June 19, 1957, is set forth in fact as follows:

"United States
House of Representatives,
"Subcommittee of the
Committee on Un-American Activities,
"San Francisco, Calif., Tuesday, June 18, 1957.

"Public Hearing

"A subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities met, pursuant to call, at 10 a. m., in the board of supervisors' hearing room, City Hall, San Francisco, Calif., Hon. Francis E. Walter (chairman) presiding.

"Committee members present: Francis E. Walter, of Pennsylvania; Gordon H. Scherer, of Ohio; and Robert J. McIntosh, of Michigan.

"The Chairman. The subcommittee will come to order.

"The investigation resulting in this hearing began June 14, 1956. The original plan contemplated that this hearing would be held in the fall of 1956, but postponement was necessary due to other committee commitments. The hearing was tentatively agreed upon on January 22, 1957, the first meeting of this year. The folowing is an extract from the minutes of an executive meeting held on the 15th of May 1957:

"'Counsel for the committee called the chairman's attention to the fact that although the proposed hearings on June 18, 1957, in San Francisco, had been discussed and authorized by the committee, no record of the action taken had been incorporated in the minutes; whereupon a motion was made by Mr. Willis, seconded by Mr. Doyle and unanimously carried, authorizing the setting up of hearings in San Francisco beginning on the 18th day of June 1957, and the conduct of investigations deemed reasonably necessary by the staff in preparation therefor, the subject of which hearings and the investigations in connection therewith to include all matters within the jurisdiction of the committee, with special reference to the extent, character, and objects of Communist Party activities within the professions and propaganda activities of a Communist origin.'

"The following order was entered on the Order Book of the Committee on Un-American Activities relating to the appointment of a subcommittee to conduct these hearings:

"'To the Clerk of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives:

"'ORDER FOR APPOINTMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

"'Pursuant to the provisions of law and the rules of this committee, I hereby appoint a subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, consisting of Hon. Edwin E. Willis, Hon. Gordon H. Scherer, Hon. Robert J. McIntosh, associate members, and myself, as chairman, to hold hearings in San Francisco, Calif., beginning on June 18, 1957, on all matters within the jurisdiction of the committee, and to take testimony on said day or any succeeding days, and at such times and places as it may deem necessary, until its work is completed.'

"Those of the subcommittee who are now present and constitute a quorum are Hon. Gordon H. Scherer, Hon. Robert J. McIntosh, and myself.

"Congress has placed upon this Committee the duty of investigating the extent, character, and objects of un-American propaganda activities in the United States, the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution, and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid Congress in any necessary remedial legislation. Congress has also placed upon this committee the duty of exercising continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of this committee.

"It is the purpose of the committee, in the conduct of this hearing, to discharge the duties thus imposed upon it by calling witnesses who it has reason to believe possess information which will be of value to it and to Congress in the intelligent consideration of legislative means of more adequately protecting our form of government and our country from the threat of international communism.

"This committee has made numerous legislative recommendations to Congress, the vast majority of which have been enacted into law. At the close of the 84th Congress, this committee made extensive recommendations relating to—

"(1) The revision of passport laws with regard to applicants who are members of the Communist Party or who conceal their former connections and associations with the Communist Party or its functionaries;

"(2) The protection of investigatory powers and procedures of Congress from interference by misconduct of witnesses, counsel, and others;

"(3) The need for a clarification of the provisions of the Lobbying Act so as to remove any doubt regarding its applicability to organizations and associations under Communist influence and direction which are trying to influence Congress in the repeal of legislation enacted in the field of subversion and security;

"(4) The strengthening of the Foreign Agents Registration Act so as to afford a more effective means of counteracting the schemes and devices used in avoiding the prohibitions of the act with regard to the tremendous flow of political propaganda of a Communist origin entering this country;

"(5) The strengthening of the provisions of the National Security Act of 1950 relating to the power of heads of certain departments and agencies of the Government to dismiss civilian employees in the interest of national security; and

"(6) The need for continued watchfulness and alertness to discover the Communist means and methods of infiltration in Government.

"The committee is continuing to study the foregoing matters, and each will be a subject for consideration in the course of this hearing.

"When this committee proposed the legislation, subsequently enacted into law under the title of the Internal Security Act of 1950, consideration was given to a proposal to outlaw the Communist Party as such. Although the committee was not willing at that time to advocate such a proposal, it did approve a compromise provision authorizing the President, by proclamation, to declare the existence of an "internal security emergency," and a further provision empowering the President, acting through the Attorney General, to apprehend and by order detain, during the existence of such an emergency, each person as to whom there is reasonable ground to believe that such person probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or of sabotage. Since that time numerous bills have been offered in both Houses of Congress, the object of which was to outlaw the Communist Party as such. The committee has been continuously engaged in the consideration of this subject, and it must keep Congress informed so that intelligent action may be taken when and if the necessity for such action arises. Information sought to be elicited at this hearing is expected to aid the committee in its consideration of this subject which, in the committee's opinion, has been rendered more vital by the trend of recent judicial decisions.

"This committee began hearings in February 1953, and has continued them intermittently ever since, for the purpose of determining the extent, character, and objects of Communist Party activities of individual members of the teaching profession with the view of determining what legislation, if any, is needed in this field. Information on this subject will be important to Congress in any legislation it enacts in the field of education. Another purpose of this hearing is to solicit additional information on this subject.

"In addition to the foregoing subjects to be considered at this hearing, the committee will hear any other matter within the jurisdiction of the committee which may develop from the testimony.

"It is the standing rule of this committee that any person named in the course of committee hearings be given an early opportunity to appear before this committee, if he desires, for the purpose of denying or explaining any testimony adversely affecting him. If this be a person's desire, he should communicate immediately with a member of the staff.

"I would remind those present in this hearing room that we are here at the direction of Congress to discharge an important legislative function. You are here by permission of this committee. I trust that you will conduct yourselves as guests of this committee. A disturbance of any kind or audible comment during the course of testimony, whether favorable or unfavorable to any witness will not be tolerated. For infraction of this rule, the offender will be immediately ejected from the room. I trust it is necessary only to call this matter to your attention once and that it will not be necessary to have it repeated.

"In nearly every hearing the committee has announced that it encourages witnesses to have counsel with them and has welcomed the presence of counsel. The fact that counsel appears with a witness before the committee should not be considered in disparagement of the counsel. We desire to make this same announcement here."

The record of the proceedings before the committee on June 19, 1957, during which Louis Earl Hartman refused to answer the aforesaid questions, pertinent to the subject under inquiry, is set forth in fact as follows:

"United States House
"of Representatives,
"Subcommittee of the Committee,
"on Un-American Activities,
"San Francisco, Calif.,
"Wednesday, June 19, 1957.

"PUBLIC HEARING

"The subcommittee met at 10 a. m., pursuant to recess, Hon. Francis F. Walter (chairman), presiding.

"Committee members present: Representatives Frances E. Walter, of Pennsylvania; Gordon H. Scherer, of Ohio; and Robert J. McIntosh, of Michigan.

"The Chairman. The committee will please come to order.

"Mr. Tavenner, call your first witness.

"Mr. Tavenner. Mr. Louis Earl Hartman, will you come forward, please.

"The Chairman. Raise your right hand, please. Do you swear the testimony you are about to give will be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

"Mr. Hartman. I do.

"The Chairman. Will you proceed, please, Mr. Tavenner?

"Testimony of Louis Earl Hartman, accompanied by his counsel, Lawrence Speiser, San Francisco, Calif.

"Mr. Tavenner. Will you state your name, please, Mr. Hartman.

"Mr. Hartman. My name is Louis Earl Hartman.

"Mr. Tavenner. It is noted you have counsel. Will counsel please identify himself for the record.

"Mr. Speiser. Lawrence Speiser, 690 Market Street.

"Mr. Tavenner. When and where were you born?

"Mr. Hartman. Second day of May 1915, Borough of Brooklyn.

"Mr. Tavenner. How long have you lived in the State of California?

"Mr. Hartman. How long have I lived in the State of California? I believe 12 years this month.

"Mr. Tavenner. Have you lived here continuously since that date?

"Mr. Hartman. Except for visits to my home in the East, I have, sir.

"Mr. Tavenner. What is your occupation?

"Mr. Hartman. I am a radio broadcaster.

"Mr. Tavenner. Where do you reside?

"Mr. Hartman. In Berkeley, sir.

"Mr. Tavenner. How long have you lived in Berkeley?

"Mr. Hartman. I believe I have lived in Berkeley for the 12 years that I have lived in California.

"Mr. Tavenner. Will you tell the committee, please, briefly, what your formal educational training has been?

"Mr. Hartman. I was graduated from the McBurney Prep School on West 63d Street in New York City. I went to the Johns Hopkins University in the city of Baltimore, taking a premedical degree for 2 years.

"Mr. Tavenner. What was that date, please?

"Mr. Hartman. That was the year 1932 I went to Baltimore, Mr. Tavenner. I then transferred to the arts division of Johns Hopkins for 1 year and transferred then to the University of Illinois, Champaign, Ill., and received my bachelor of arts degree in 1936.

"I was winner of the Bachelor Highland Guild playwriting prize and I was graduated with honors, and I was graduated Phi Beta Kappa. I returned after my graduation to take some postgraduate courses in journalism, but I did not complete the course.

"Mr. Tavenner. Have you had any other educational training at any school besides those that you have mentioned?

"Mr. Hartman. In respect to the question, sir, I wish to make the following objection: (1) The committee's authorizing resolution and the subject of the hearings as announced by the committee are vague and indefinite in that they fail to inform me of the nature, purpose, and extent and limitations of the hearing or the matters about which I have been called to testify. Therefore, the question posed is not pertinent or relevant to any legitimate, valid, definitive legislative purpose and thus violates my rights under due process of law under the fifth amendment, as held by the United States Supreme Court, as held in the case United States v. Watkins.

"(2) The first amendment prohibits the Congress from passing any law infringing on speech, conscience, and assembly. The mandate of this committee and the purposes announced at this hearing are unconstitutional in attempting to authorize it to investigate into an area in which the Constitution forbids it to legislate.

"(3) Questions asked me concerning my political beliefs and associations under the circumstances of these hearings abridge my rights of freedom of speech and association protected by the first amendment.

"(4) The inquiry of the committee and the purposes of this hearing are inquiry into affairs unrelated to any valid legislative purpose under article I of the Constitution and are solely designed for the purpose of exposing myself and others to publicity and ridicule.

"(5) This committee's inquiry is for the purpose of placing me on trial without any of the right guaranteed by the due process of laws of the fifth amendment and of the sixth amendment which affords me the right to notice of any charges, the effective aid of counsel, adequate time to prepare a defense, right of cross-examination, and the presumptions of innocence.

"(6) This committee's inquiry infringes on the rights retained by the people and the States under the 9th and 10th amendments. This hearing and this committee's inquiries are unconstitutional infringements by the legislature into the jurisdiction of the judiciary which has the sole power under the Constitution to place me on trial and to inquire into my personal conduct.

"Mr. Tavenner. Are you objecting to the question on the grounds that you fail to see its pertinency?

"Mr. Hartman. I am objecting on the issues of points 1 through 7, which I have just stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Specifically, are you raising the question that you do not understand the pertinency of the question?

"Mr. Hartman. I believe the statement I have just made, Mr. Tavenner, is what I am trying to say. I admit that the legal language is a little unusual for me, but that is what I believe.

"Mr. Tavenner. Due to the fact that the witness will not answer specifically the last question I asked, I will pass on to a question the pertinency of which may be more apparent to the witness.

"Have you been a member, and are you a member now of a professional cell of the Communist Party at Berkeley?

"Mr. Hartman. My answer to the question just posed is the answer which I gave to your first question, Mr. Tavenner, points 1 through 7 as stated, and they are in the record.

"Mr. Tavenner. I will try to explain to you the pertinency of the question and, assuming that that is the real basis of your refusal to answer, with the hope that when you see its pertinency that you will answer.

"First of all as to the subject, you said you had not been informed of the subject. Were you present when the chairman of the committee read the opening statement here yesterday?

"Mr. Hartman. I was, sir; I was in the press box.

"Mr. Tavenner. And you heard it?

"Mr. Hartman. I did, sir.

"Mr. Tavenner. The committee has been endeavoring to ascertain the workings of the professional groups of the Communist Party within this area. As far as you are concerned, it relates to Berkeley, not to the city of San Francisco. That is the only difference.

"The question of the activity, that is, the extent, the character and the objectives of Communist Party activities in the professional groups of the Communist Party is a very important matter to the committee because it is now and has been for a considerable period of time considering and weighing the question of need for further legislation with regard to the Communist Party.

"As the chairman pointed out to you and others, numerous bills have been introduced in the House of Representatives from time to time to outlaw the Communist Party as such. There has been some difference of opinion by individual members of this committee on that subject but the committee has not taken action recommending such procedure to the present time. It feels that it must be informed on that subject. It feels that Congress expects to be informed on that subject and therefore we are now hearing evidence which will be of value to Congress and this committee on that matter.

"Now, so much for the subject.

"You say you do not understand the pertinency of that question?

"Mr. Hartman. Excuse me, sir. I did not say that. I am sorry.

"Mr. Tavenner. It would seem to me that the question is pertinent on its face, that no one with any intelligence would need to have the pertinency explained, when I asked you the question of whether or not you are at this time a member of the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley.

"Of course it is important for us to know that because you are a man, as you say, engaged in an important field of work. This committee is entitled to know of these facts.

"Now the reasoning of the committee as to why that question is pertinent is that there is no way for the committee to ascertain facts regarding the activities of a secret cell of the Communist Party, you might say a supersecret cell because, as we understand from evidence, even the rank-and-file members of the Communist Party do not know either the names or the activities of such a group, and how can Congress be informed of the activities of such a group if it cannot ascertain who are in it in order to question?

"The reasoning of the committee, further, on that subject, I think is important. As I have said, the committee has been considering for some time the need for further legislation in this field. It is all pointed up very plainly by the position of the Communist Party as expressed in the press this morning.

"Dorothy Healey Connelly, the former chairman of the Communist Party of Los Angeles, quoted in this morning's press as having rejoiced in what she termed the greatest victory the Communist Party in America has ever received. As a quotation:

" 'It will mark a rejuvenation of the party in America. We have lost some members in the last few years"—and mark you, this is the rest of the quote—"but now we are on our way." '

"We feel that Congress is entitled to information which may help to block that way.

"Now does that explain the pertinency of the question to you?

"Mr. Hartman. Respectfully, Mr. Tavenner, I stand on the objection previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. You did not honestly give that objection because you felt you did not understand the question. You are merely offering it as an excuse for refusal to testify when you made up your mind as to a course which you were going to take?

"Mr. Hartman. I can only ask, Mr. Tavenner, that you believe me when I say that my objections are as stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. That your objection is that you do not see the pertinency of the question?

"Mr. Hartman. My objection is, sir, as stated in points one through seven.

"Mr. Tavenner. Mr. Chairman, I think I have made as full an explanation of the subject and of the pertinence of the question as is reasonable under all of the circumstances, and I suggest that he be directed to answer.

"The Chairman. Yes; I direct you to answer.

"Mr. Hartman. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Tavenner, I respectfully decline to answer on all the grounds previously stated as grounds to my objections. I wish to inform the committee specifically that I am relying in no way on the privileges of self-incrimination provided me by the fifth amendment, although I do not believe that any one who does should be criticized in any way for relying on that or any other rigths granted by the Congress.

"The Chairman. Then, as I understand it, you are not invoking the fifth amendment.

"Mr. Hartman. Mr. Walter, I am not invoking the fifth amendment. My attorney informs me that my legal language is very faulty. I am not invoking the criminal amendments of the fifth amendment. As I said in my earlier statement, I do rely on the fifth amendment in other aspects of the questioning.

"Mr. Tavenner. Are you now the chairman and have you been the chairman of the professional section of the Communist Party in Berkeley since early January 1957?

"Mr. Hartman. In objecting to that question, I rely on the points briefly made one through seven, as on the previous questions.

"Mr. Tavenner. Will you tell the committee, please, how many professional cells of the Communist Party there are in Berkeley?

"Mr. Hartman. My answer to that question, Mr. Tavenner, is the objection as has been stated.

"The Chairman. You are objecting to the question. Do I understand by that that you are refusing or declining to answer the question?

"Mr. Hartman. I am making an objection to the question on the grounds previously stated.

"The Chairman. You are objecting to it, and now I direct you to answer it.

"Mr. Hartman. Now, sir, I am respectfully declining to answer on all of the grounds previously stated. I am not going to answer the question as I previously stated.

"The Chairman. In addition to objecting to the question, you are now declining to answer the question for the reasons that you have given heretofore?

"Mr. Hartman. That is correct, sir.

"Mr. Scherer. To this question, do you also not invoke the self-incrimination portion of the fifth amendment?

"Mr. Hartman. That is right.

"Mr. Tavenner. Now, sir, will you advise the committee of propaganda activities that are now being carried on by the professional section or group of the Communist Party in Berkeley?

"Mr. Hartman. Once again I respectfully object to the question on the grounds previously stated.

"The Chairman. Just a minute, Mr. Tavenner?

"Do you decline to answer the question?

"Mr. Hartman. Is the Chair directing me to answer that question?

"The Chairman. Yes; I am directing you to answer the question.

"Mr. Hartman. I decline to answer on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Are you refusing to answer notwithstanding the explanation that was made of the subject of the inquiry that I am making at this time, as well as the explanation regarding the pertinency of the question, because the same explanation applies to this question?

"Mr. Hartman. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Tavenner. Will you tell the committee, please, what activities the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley is now engaged in?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question on the grounds previously stated.

"The Chairman. Just a minute, Mr. Tavenner.

"I direct you to answer the question.

"Mr. Hartman. I respectfully decline to answer on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Is your refusal to answer made notwithstanding the explanation that I previously made regarding the subject and pertinency of the question which applies also to this question which I have asked?

"Mr. Hartman. My objection, sir, is as previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Mr. Hartman, I have before me a thermofax copy of the People's World of March 24, 1949. I see there an article, the heading of which is 'ASP Urges Support for Peace Meet.' The article begins as follows:

" 'A call for "men and women of goodwill" to support the New York City cultural and scientific conference for world peace opening Friday, was made today by Louis Hartman, East Bay chairman of the arts, sciences, and professions council.

" 'Hartman declared that action by the State Department in canceling visas for 12 international delegates to the conference "exposes the war drive of American reaction." * * *

" ' "The attempt of our State Department to declare the cultural and scientific conferences for world peace as Soviet propaganda," Hartman said, "can only serve to expose the war drive of American reaction. Peace is a universal desire of all decent people of every nation and political persuasion. At a time when it wishes to sell the American people a bill of goods called the Atlantic Pact, the State Department suffers extreme political embarrassment." '

"Was the embarrassment resulting to the State Department in having to take action in regard to that so-called peace council the result of Communist Party propaganda disseminated in this country in which you played a part?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question on the grounds previously stated, Mr. Tavenner.

"The Chairman. Do you decline to answer the question?

"Mr. Hartman. I decline to answer on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. The article quoting you refers to the action of the State Department with regard to that so-called peace meet in New York City. The action of the State Department was set forth in House Report 1954, released by this committee on April 26, 1950. The report of this committee in referring to that matter at the time stated this:

" 'From the outset, Secretary of State Dean Acheson referred to the gathering as "a sounding board for Communist propaganda." The State Department pointed out that "none of the cultural leaders of eastern Europe" who attended "were free to express any view other than that dictated by the political authorities in Moscow," and expressed no doubt "as to the manner in which the Communists will attempt to use and manipulate" the Conference.'

"Will you tell the committee, please, whether or not the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley took action in regard to this matter?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question, Mr. Tavenner, on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Were you not——

"The Chairman. Just a minute. There is a distinction between objection to a question and declining to answer a question. You have objected to it. Do you decline to answer the question?

"Mr. Hartman. I decline to answer on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Were you not at the time of the publishing of that article in the People's World, March 24, 1949, when you were quoted as I have read, engaging in an activity of the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley designed to embarrass the United States in its foreign policy?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question, Mr. Tavenner, on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Mr. Chairman, I think I should explain a little more fully at this point to the witness of the effect of that question, the pertinency of it. I have explained the purpose of the inquiry that we are making here. I will not repeat that, but as to the pertinency of this question, it is the reasoning of the committee that it knows of the work of the professional cell or has information of the work of the professional cell at Berkeley at an early date. It is important, it thinks, to ascertain the workings of it today particularly in light of all that has transpired internationally, and it feels that by tracing the operations of this professional cell up to the present time, it will throw light upon the activities of the Communist Party and that it will be an indication of the seriousness of matters of the propaganda activities in which the Communist Party is engaged. Therefore, we would like to know, in other words, we are connecting up those activities, those propaganda activities, with a group of the Communist Party of which I have asked you as to whether or not you are a member, and your particular activity in it.

"With that explanation, may I ask again that you answer the question?

"Mr. Hartman. Am I directed to answer that question, Mr. Chairman?

"The Chairman. Yes; you are directed to answer that question.

"Mr. Hartman. Then I must refuse to answer the question on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Were you an active member of the Civil Rights Congress in Berkeley in March 1951?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question, sir, on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Were you a member of the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley in March 1951?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question, sir, on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. Is the professional cell of the Communist Party in Berkeley now carrying on a campaign of propaganda in any manner——

"Mr. Hartman. I object.

"Mr. Tavenner. Just a moment—in regard to the Sobell committee?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question on the grounds previously mentioned.

"Mr. Scherer. Mr. Chairman, I ask that you direct the witness to answer.

"Mr. Hartman. There was a series of questions. Is that the last question or all of them?

"The Chairman. Yes.

"Mr. Hartman. In regard to the last question I respectfully decline to answer on all of the grounds previously stated, for the grounds of my objection, and I again inform the committee that I am not in any way relying on the self-incrimination provisions of the fifth amendment.

"Mr. Tavenner. I have before me a copy of the July 30, 1947, issue of the People's World. This article reports that you were to participate in a cultural conference to be held on August 2 and 3 under the auspices of the California Labor School. From this article it appears that John Howard Lawson was to be the keynoter and that the cultural conference was broken down in panels. Under the motion picture panel appears the name of A. Polonsky, a screen writer, Waldo Salt, whose profession was also that of a screen writer, and yourself, under the name Lou Hartman. There has been very extensive evidence before this committee of the Communist Party membership of John Howard Lawson, Abe Polonsky, and Waldo Salt. There has been considerable evidence relating to the activities, propaganda and otherwise, of the California Labor School. Will you state whether or not the occasion to which I have referred was the result of Communist Party consultation and planning?

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question on the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Tavenner. May I have a direction?

"The Chairman. You are directed to answer the question.

"Mr. Hartman. I respectfully decline to answer on all of the grounds previously stated as grounds for my objection.

"Mr. Tavenner. I have asked you whether or not you were the chairman of the Professional Section of the Communist Party in Berkeley, which you refused to answer, and I will now ask you whether or not you are a member of the Communist Party on any level whether supersecret or not.

"Mr. Hartman. I object to the question, sir, on the grounds previously stated.

"The Chairman. You are directed to answer the question.

"Mr. Hartman. I respectfully decline to answer on all of the grounds previously stated as grounds for my objection.

"Mr. Tavenner. I have no further questions, Mr. Chairman.

"Mr. McIntosh. Mr. Hartman, you have not intended to raise the self-incrimination clause in any of your answers?

"Mr. HARTMAN. That is correct, Mr. McIntosh.

"Mr. TAVENNER. I have no further questions.

"The CHAIRMAN. The witness has been sworn. Go ahead, Mr. Tavenner."

Because of the foregoing, the said Committee on Un-American Activities was deprived of answers to pertinent questions propounded to the said Louis Earl Hartman, relative to the subject matter which, under Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress, the said committee was instructed to investigate, and the refusal of the witness to answer the questions, namely:

"Have you been a member, and are you a member now, of a professional cell of the Communist Party at Berkeley?

"Are you now the chairman and have you been the chairman of the professional section of the Communist Party in Berkeley since early January 1957?

"Will you tell the committee, please, how many professional cells of the Communist Party there are in Berkeley?

"Now, sir, will you advise the committee of propaganda activities that are now being carried on by the professional section or group of the Communist Party in Berkeley?

which questions were pertinent to the subject under inquiry, is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared, and his refusal to answer the aforesaid questions deprived your committee of necessary and pertinent testimony and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

OTHER PERTINENT COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS

"Be it resolved, That the chairman be authorized and empowered from time to time to appoint subcommittees, composed of 3 or more members of the Committee on Un-American Activities, at least 1 of whom shall be of the minority political party, and a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, for the purpose of performing any and all acts which the committee as a whole is authorized to perform."

The following is an extract from the minutes of an executive session of the subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, consisting of Hon. FRANCIS E. WALTER (chairman), Hon. EDWIN E. WILLIS, Hon. GORDON H. SCHERER, and Hon. ROBERT J. MCINTOSH, held on the 17th day of July 1957, in room 225, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

"The subcommittee was called to order by Mr. WALTER, who stated that the purpose of the meeting was to consider what action the subcommittee would take regarding the refusal of certain witnesses to answer questions propounded to them in the course of hearings conducted by the subcommittee in San Francisco, beginning on the 18th day of June 1957, and what recommendations it would make regarding the citation of any such witness for contempt of the House of Representatives.

"After full consideration of the testimony of certain witnesses, a motion was made and unanimously adopted that a report of facts relating to the refusal of Louis Earl Hartman to answer questions before the said subcommittee at the hearings aforesaid, be referred and submitted to the Committee on Un-American Activities as a whole, with a recommendation that the report of the facts relating thereto be referred to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that the said witness be cited for contempt of the House of Representatives for his refusal to answer questions therein set forth, to the end that he may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law."

The following is an extract from the minutes of an executive session of the Committee on Un-American Activities, consisting of Hon. Francis E. Walter (chairman), Hon. Clyde Doyle, Hon. James B. Frazier, Jr., Hon. Edwin E. Willis, Hon. Gordon H. Scherer, and Hon. Robert J. McIntosh, held on the 17th day of July 1957, in room 225, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

"The report of the facts relating to the refusal of Louis Earl Hartman to answer questions was submitted to the committee as a whole, upon which a motion was made by Mr. Frazier, seconded by Mr. Scherer and unanimously carried, that the subcommittee's report of the facts relating to the refusal of Louis Earl Hartman to answer questions before the said subcommittee at the hearings conducted before it in the City Hall, San Francisco, Calif., beginning June 18, 1957, be and the same is hereby approved and adopted, and that the Committee on Un-American Activities report and refer the refusal of Louis Earl Hartman to answer questions before the said subcommittee, together with all the facts in connection therewith, to the House of Representatives, with a recommendation that the witness be cited for contempt by the House of Representatives, for his refusal to answer questions, to the end that he may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives as to the refusal of Louis Earl Hartman to answer questions before a duly constituted subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the northern district of California, to the end that the said Louis Earl Hartman may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES] and now yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution relates to the refusal of the witness, Louis Earl Hartman to answer pertinent questions at a hearing conducted in San Francisco some months ago. Hartman did not rely on the self-incrimination clause of the fifth amendment in refusing to answer the questions, but stated to the committee that in his opinion the decision of the Supreme Court in the Watkins case made it possible for him to refuse to answer the questions. The decision in the Watkins case was handed down just 2 days before the hearing and in order to meet the situation squarely, the subcommittee prepared a very detailed statement as to the purpose of the hearing and the pertinency of the questions. We believe that in so doing, we very squarely met the objections made by the Supreme Court. Now I am going to call your attention to the part of the testimony of Mr. Hartman:

> Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Tavenner, I respectfully decline to answer on all the grounds previously stated as grounds to my objections. I wish to inform the committee specifically that I am relying in no way on the privileges of self-incrimination provided me by the fifth amendment, although I do not believe that any one who does should be criticized in any way for relying on that or any other rights granted by the Congress.

This witness, according to committee information, was not only a member of the Communist Party, but he was the chairman of the professional branch of the Communist Party in Berkeley, Calif. He was a radio broadcaster and the committee wished to interrogate him concerning the types of broadcasting he engaged in as well as to the activities of this particular cell of the Communist Party. As I have stated before, he refused to answer any questions basing his entire reason on the Watkins decision. I think in that connection it might be interesting for me to point out to the House how the Watkins decision was received in certain circles. The day before Hartman testified, there was a meeting of the Communist Party in Los Angeles and Dorothy Healy Connelly, the former chairman of the Communist Party in Los Angeles, stated that she rejoiced in what she termed the greatest victory the Communist Party in America has ever received. Quoting this woman:

> It will mark a rejuvenation of the party in America. We have lost some members in the last few years, but now we are on our way.

We felt that the Congress was entitled to the information this man had in order to see to it that we could probably block their course along the way.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. I deeply sympathize with the gentleman's plight in being chairman of this committee. Many, many difficult problems arise and among those problems is the reconciliation of the proceedings at hand with the Watkins decision. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not this case arose after the Watkins decision.

Mr. WALTER. This case arose right after the Watkins decision and, as I stated, with that decision before us we prepared a detailed statement of the purpose of the hearing and when the witness interposed the objection that the Watkins decision did not compel him to answer those questions, we then stated in detail the purpose and pertinency of each question that was asked of this witness.

Mr. CELLER. I read those statements, and I think the gentleman is substantially correct; that great pains were taken to detail exactly what the purpose of the committee was and what it had explicitly in mind when it directed the questions to the witness. But what bothers me now is whether or not this citation, if approved by the House and results in a conviction in the court, would be sustained by the Supreme Court. I am concerned whether or not you would not have the Watkins case all over again. However, I would like to ask the gentleman this question: In the Watkins decision the court went quite far and questioned the authorizing resolution, the original resolution, setting up the Un-American Activities Committee. Among other things it said:

> It would be difficult to imagine a less explicit authorizing resolution. Who can define the meaning of "un-American"? What is that single, solitary "principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution"? There is no need to dwell upon the language, however. At one time, perhaps, the resolution might have been read narrowly to confine the committee to the subject of propaganda. The events that have transpired in the 15 years before the interrogation of petitioner make such a construction impossible at this date.
> When the definition of jurisdictional pertinency is as uncertain and waivering as in the case of the Un-American Activities Committee, it becomes extremely difficult for the committee to limit its inquiries to statutory pertinency.

I am asking whether it would not be better if there could be a new resolution adopted by this House specifying the powers intended to the Un-American Activities Committee? That would spell them out explicitly so that one would know exactly what those powers are.

Mr. WALTER. Of course the gentleman from New York is reading from the dicta in the decision. That is one of the things that has caused confusion, because a great many judges have followed that rather than the opinion itself. I still have enough confidence in the Supreme Court of the United States to believe that it will never go out of its way in order to deprive the Congress of the United States of its authority to take whatever steps are necessary to protect our form of government. The decision has been misconstrued. If I may be so bold as to say so, it is a very loosely drawn decision, susceptible of many interpretations. I am sure that had the Court been disposed to permit this committee to function as it was intended it should function, the Court would have placed the kind of construction on the authorizing resolution which would not have attempted to strike it down. I think that resolution is entirely adequate, and I think that, with the preparation made in this particular case, the Supreme Court in taking another look at this question, assuming that the case will go to the Supreme Court, and I am sure that it will, because this man has many Communist friends who will support an appeal, I am sure that this kind of case will prevent the Supreme Court from striking down the functions of this committee.

Mr. CELLER. May I be privileged for another inquiry on a little different tack, if I may be privileged to address myself to the House by way of this question to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; has the gentleman from Pennsylvania given any thought to the idea of having the activities of the Un-American Activities Committee placed within the jurisdiction of the House Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. WALTER. As the gentleman knows, I advocated that several years ago because it seemed to me this committee should have been constituted, as was the case in the Senate, as a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee. In the Senate, it is the Internal Security Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee.

That, however, is beside the point, whether it is a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee or a separate standing committee, if the Court is disposed to interfere with that work it will find a way to do it no matter where the work is being performed.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman believe that the Judiciary Committee is better able to handle situations like this; that the committee, being composed of lawyers trained and skilled in the law, adept in propounding questions, knowing full well the limitations the Constitution places upon legislative and executive authority, might be all the better equipped than those members who have not legal training to handle situations that periodically come before the committee?

Mr. WALTER. I am sure the gentleman from New York does not intend to reflect on the competency of the chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mr. CELLER. Of course not, because the gentleman is a member of the Judiciary Committee and two of his fellow members of the Un-American Activities Committee are also members of the Judiciary Committee. In truth and in fact, I have great respect for all the members of the Un-American Activities Committee. I intend no reflection on them whatsoever. But, nonetheless, I feel that the members of the Judiciary Committee, whose jurisdiction encompasses the Federal Criminal Code and the Federal Judicial Code, which are the cornerstones of our Federal jurisprudence, are especially well qualified to handle the problem of witnesses suspected of subversive activities. Its members are former judges, governors, prosecuting attorneys, and State attorneys general. I firmly believe that the type of work devolving upon the Un-American Activities Committee could better be done by the Judiciary Committee. This is the situation in the Senate where the Internal Security Subcommittee, which is a counterpart of the Un-American Activities Committee, is a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WALTER. I do not know of a group of men on any committee in this House that has tried harder than has the membership of the Committee on Un-American Activities to conduct the very distasteful, to all of us, work of the committee.

It is not a pleasant thing to sit there and see a parade of people who have been, and still are, members of an organization whose purpose is to make us vassals of Russia, it is a very unpleasant thing, and I will say to the gentleman, very frankly, in this particular matter before us, it was with great difficulty that I restrained myself when this man was testifying, because I knew the general nature of the activities he was engaged in throughout that entire Bay area around San Francisco.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CRAMER].

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as I myself has been much concerned about the effect of the Watkins decision on the constitutional authority to investigate within the scope of Congress legislative powers. I know also, of course, in reading this report, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has done everything in his power to comply with the suggestions made in the Watkins case itself as to advising the witnesses involved of the purpose and the pertinency of the questions that were asked, this being one of the points raised in that case. I do not want my remarks to imply that I agree with that decision, and its vague dicta, which leaves Congress without any guidepost as to how to carry out its admitted legislative purposes.

I call to the attention of the House the first occasion on which the witness objected or refused to answer to illustrate the unjustified contempt of the witness for Congress. It was this question, and I am reading from page 8 of the report:

> Mr. Tavenner. Have you had any other educational training at any school besides those that you have mentioned.

This was asked after the witness had previously answered other questions as to his education.

It was at that time and to that innocuous question, the answer of which could not possibly have held the witness up to any ridicule whatsoever, that Mr. Hartman interposed his objection, which is based on the Watkins decision, Nos. (1) through (6) on pages 8 and 9 of the committee report.

The chairman of the committee has pointed out, and I believe the report will verify the fact, that unquestionably and without any basis for misunderstanding the witness was advised in great detail as to the scope of the authority of the committee and the pertinency of the questions asked, and there are a number of them, of course, which he refused to answer, the reason for those questions and the fact that those questions were within the scope of the investigating authority of the committee and its relationship to the constitutional powers and authority of Congress. I appreciate, as I am sure the gentleman does, the point brought out in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Clark in the Watkins case, where it was pointed out by Justice Clark that for the Congress to go back and review each one of the resolutions under which these investigating committees are acting and to attempt to spell out every facet of every conceivable and prospective field of investigation is a wholly impractical approach to the situation.

I want to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania in attempting to meet one of the grounds stated in this decision as best as could be done under the circumstances by pointing out clearly and distinctly the purposes and intent of the questions asked, the pertinency of the questions more specifically than is spelled out in the authorizing resolution for the House Un-American Activities Committee by pointing out in detail, leaving no room for misinterpretation why and in what respect they were pertinent to the general authority of the committee to investigate. It is my belief that the committee has met in good faith and in every detail the suggested grounds set out in the Watkins case by using this method in attempting to comply with that decision, so long as it stands in its present vague form. I believe it is essential that this House vote for the resolution.

I want to say that as the ranking minority member of the committee appointed by the Judiciary Committee to consider the Supreme Court decisions I know that I for one am going to be interested, as I am sure the Members of the House and Congress will be, in considering the effect of the decisions of the Supreme Court and the Watkins decision in particular on the ability and power which Congress admittedly has to investigate in fields where there is reason to believe legislation is essential or that there is legislative purpose to be served. I am going to be watching with a great deal of interest the outcome of this particular case.

I want to congratulate the committee for going, in my opinion, as far as it is possible to do so in advising this recalcitrant witness of what the pertinency of this question was and to spell out, even beyond the general authorizing resolution of this committee, exactly why the questions were being asked, why they were pertinent, why they were essential to future legislation or within Congress' authority as delegated to the committee in the consideration of this committee. I again congratulate the committee on its deliberations and for bringing this resolution before the House.

I trust the judicial treatment of this case will help to clarify some of the areas of uncertainty under the Watkins case. It is a challenge to the Federal courts to modify that decision in a manner permitting Congress to continue its essential investigative processes without undue restraint. I trust the court will accept the challenge of clarifying the Watkins decision.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Ray].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in commending the committee for the work it has tried to do and I would like also to join in the expressions of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that we in the House bear the responsibility for the kind of delegation of authority under which our committee acts.

We have not given the House Un-American Activities Committee a clear definition of principle. We neglect long established rules and we risk conflict with many court decisions if we do not clearly define the legislative authority which we confer upon the committee.

In this particular case I think the committee acted clearly within its authority and I am glad this resolution has been brought before the House.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Roosevelt].

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, if I may follow the previous practice and put my question in the form of a statement, it would seem to me that the colloquy here today has pointed up the value of the Supreme Court decision in the Watkins case. It has been very clearly brought out that the committee made a very careful presentation following the Watkins case which gave to the accused the right which the Supreme Court said belonged to him as an individual.

I would like to join in commending and praising the chairman of the committee and the committee for obviously making every effort to do what the Supreme Court said was essential in protecting the rights of individuals. After all, the basic difference between a democracy and communism is our belief in the rights of the individual. While this may not be the time to pass fully upon the colloquy between the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. Celler], and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Walter], nevertheless I feel there is a great deal of value in the thought seemingly approved by both, that the Un-American Activities Committee should perhaps become a subcommittee and a permanent subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary. There is solid evidence that the fight on subversive activity can be more effectively carried forward by such action.

I am sure all of us will join the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Walter], in supporting this resolution in which the case of the committee is clear and just.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 276, nays 0, not voting 156, as follows:

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9379. An act making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION, JUNE 30, 1958

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9379) an act making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Mr. CANNON, Mr. RABAUT, Mr. EVINS, Mr. TABER, and Mr. JENSEN.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST FRANK GRUMMAN

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Un-American Activities, I submit a privileged report, Report No. 1240, in the case of Frank Grumman.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST FRANK GRUMMAN

The Committee on Un-American Activities as created and authorized by the House of Representatives through the enactment of Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress, caused to be issued a subpena to Frank Grumman. The said subpena directed Frank Grumman to be and appear before the said Committee on Un-American Activities or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, of which the Honorable FRANCIS E. WALTER is chairman, on Wednesday, July 17, 1957, at 10 a. m., at their committee room, 226 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee, and not to depart without leave of said committee. The subpena served upon the said Frank Grumman is set forth in words and figures as follows:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
"CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES.

"To FRANK GRUMMAN, 16 Beaver Street, Room 400, New York, N. Y., greetings:

"Pursuant to lawful authority, you are hereby commanded to be and appear before the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives of the United States, or a duly appointed subcommittee thereof, on Wednesday, July 17, 1957, at 10 o'clock a. m., at their committee room, 226 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee, and not to depart without leave of said committee.

"Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

"To United States marshal, to serve and return.

"Given under my hand this 21st day of June, in the year of our Lord 1957.

"FRANCIS E. WALTER,
"Chairman."

The said subpena was duly served as appears by the return made thereon by Samuel Swartz, deputy United States marshal, southern district of New York, who was duly authorized to serve the said subpena. The return of the service by the said Samuel Swartz, deputy United States marshal, being endorsed thereon, is set forth in words and figures as follows:

"I made service of the within subpena by personally handing subpena to the within-named Frank Grumman, at 16 Beaver Street, New York, N. Y., at 3:25 o'clock, p. m., on the 24th day of June 1957.

"SAMUEL SWARTZ,
"Deputy United States Marshal, Southern District of New York."

At the request of the witness' counsel, Frank Grumman's appearance before the subcommittee was verbally postponed to July 18, 1957.

The said Frank Grumman, pursuant to the said subpena and verbal continuance, and in compliance therewith, appeared before a subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities on July 18, 1957, to give such testimony as required under and by virtue of Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress. The said Frank Grumman, having appeared as a witness and having been asked the questions, namely:

"Now, Mr. Grumman, yesterday a gentleman by the name of Michael Mignon testified under oath that he had at one time been a member of the Communist Party, that while he was a member of the Communist Party he knew a number of people as Communists. That he had served in closed Communist Party meetings with those persons. He also told us about certain of those persons who were employed in the vital communications industry of this Nation. Among those persons whom he said he had known as a member of the Communist Party was yourself, Frank Grumman.

"I now ask you, are you now a member of the Communist Party?

"Do you have information now, Mr. Grumman—and I ask this question so that no one in his right mind can conclude that the purpose of your appearance here is exposure for the sake of exposure—Do you have information with respect to Communists in the American Communications Association?

"Do you know of Communists presently in the vital communications industry of this Nation?

"As a member of the Communist Party when he was in the Communist Party, he said, with you and in local 10. He said that he sat in closed Communist cell meetings with you.

"Now I will ask you whether or not he was telling the truth or was he telling a falsehood?

"Mr. Witness, we have had an abundance of testimony under oath to the effect that Communists cannot be believed before Congressional committees or otherwise; that they are inveterate liars.

"Now, for the purpose of testing the credibility of the testimony that you have given to this committee today, I want to ask you now—and that is the purpose of this question, to test your credibility—Are you now a Communist?"

which questions were pertinent to the subject under inquiry, refused to answer said questions, and as a result of said Frank Grumman's refusal to answer the aforesaid questions, your committee was prevented from receiving testimony and information concerning a matter committeed to said committee in accordance with the terms of a subpena served upon said Frank Grumman.

The record of the proceeds before the subcommittee on July 17, 1957, insofar as it is pertinent to the appearance of the witness Frank Grumman on July 18, 1957, is set forth in fact as follows:

"UNITED STATES HOUSE OF "REPRESENTATIVES.
"SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
"COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES,
"Washington, D. C., July 17, 1957.

"PUBLIC HEARING

"A subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities met, pursuant to call at 10:10 a. m. in the caucus room, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., Hon. Clyde Doyle (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

"Committee members present: CLYDE DOYLE, of California (presiding), JAMES B. FRAZIER, Jr., of Tennessee, and GORDON H. SCHERER, of Ohio.

"Stay members present: Richard Arens, director, and W. Jackson Jones and Louis J. Russell, investigators.

"Mr. DOYLE. The subcommittee will please come to order.

"I have an opening statement, as the subcommittee chairman which I wish to read for the record.

"The committee has long been interested in the situation which exists in the communications industry in the United States; namely, the position and influence held by members of the Communist Party and organizations dedicated to furthering the Communist objective. On July 10, 1957, at a regular meeting of the committee, with all members except 2 present and voting, a motion was made by Mr. SCHERER and seconded by Mr. FRAZIER which authorized the holding of these hearings in Washington on this general subject. The resolution adopted by the committee is as follows:

"'A motion was made by Mr. SCHERER, seconded by Mr. FRAZIER, and unanimously carried, approving and authorizing the holding of hearings in Washington, beginning July 17, 1957, or at such later date as the chairman may determine, for the purpose of considering whether or not members of the Communist Party or persons subject to its discipline are employed in various media of communications used in the transmission of vital communications, and the advisability, in the national defense and for internal security, of the adoption of remedial legislation authorizing the Defense Department and other Government agencies to adopt and enforce appropriate regulations designed to protect and preserve inviolate secret and classified Government information, and investing in appropriate Government agencies power to preclude access to vital communication facilities in time of war or other national emergency, persons who probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or sabotage.'

"Before proceeding further, I would like to include in the record a copy of the order for appointment of this subcommittee, signed by the chairman on the 12th day of July 1957. In it, there is appointed a subcommittee consisting of Messrs. FRAZIER and SCHERER, with myself as chairman, to conduct these hearings in Washington, D. C., beginning on July 17, 1957. Those of the subcommittee of three who are now present and constitute a quorum of the subcommittee are Mr. FRAZIER, of Tennessee, and myself, DOYLE of California, Mr. SCHERER being necessarily temporarily absent.

"Congress, by Public Law 601 of the 79th Congress, placed upon this committee the duty of investigating the extent, character, and object of un-American propaganda activities in the United States, the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution, and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid Congress in any necessary remedial legislation. Congress has also placed upon this committee the duty of exercising continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of this committee.

"In these hearings beginning now, the first of a series of this general subject, the committee hopes to ascertain the extent of the penetration and control exercised by members of the Communist Party over an industry which is vital to our defense; namely, communications. In the event that testimony given during these hearings reflects a situation correctable by legislation, the committee will recommend the appropriate measures at the proper time. It is the purpose of the subcommittee in the conduct of these hearings, to discharge the duties placed upon us by the Congress by calling witnesses who, we have reason to believe, possess information which will be of value to us and to the Congress in the consideration of such legislation. It is a standing rule of this committee that any person named in the course of committee hearings will be given an early opportunity to appear before this committee if he so desires, for the purpose of denying or explaining any testimony given adversely affecting him. In the event there are such persons, they should immediately communicate with any member of the staff and make their request known.

"In every hearing, the committee has encouraged witnesses to have legal counsel with them if they so desire, and has always welcomed the presence of counsel. In fact, the rules of the committee expressly provide that 'at every hearing, public or executive, every witness shall be accorded the privilege of having counsel of his own choosing.

"'The participation of counsel during the course of any hearing and while the witness is testifying shall be limited to advising said witness as to his legal rights. Counsel shall not be permitted to engage in oral argument with the committee, but shall confine his activity to the area of legal advice to his client.'

"I would remind those present that we are here at the direction of Congress to discharge an important legislative function. You in the hearing room are here by permission of this committee, and I know and am sure you will conduct yourselves as guests of this committee at all times. Any disturbance of any kind or audible comment during the course of the testimony, whether favorable or unfavorable to any witness, will not be tolerated.

"Mr. Frazier, have you anything further to add?

"Mr. FRAZIER. I have nothing further, Mr. Chairman.

"Mr. DOYLE. The order will be made for the inclusion in the record of the order for appointment of subcommittee by the full Committee Chairman WALTER.

"'TO THE CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

"'Pursuant to the provisions of law and the rules of this committee, I hereby appoint a subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, consisting of Hon. CLYDE DOYLE, chairman, and Hon. JAMES B. FRAZIER, Jr., and Hon. GORDON SCHERER, associate members, to conduct hearings in Washington, D. C., beginning on July 17, 1957, on all matters within the jurisdiction of the committee, and to take testimony on said day or any succeeding days, and at such times and places as it may deem necessary, until its work is completed.

"'The clerk of the committee is directed to immediately notify the appointees of their appointment and to file this order as an official committee record, in the order book kept for that purpose.

"'Given under my hand this 12th day of July 1957.

"'(Signed) FRANCIS E. WALTER,
"'Committee on Un-American Activities,
"'House of Representatives.'

"The record of the proceedings before the subcommittee on July 18, 1957, during which Frank Grumman refused to answer the aforesaid questions, is set forth in fact as follows:

"UNITED STATES HOUSE
OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
"COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES.
"Washington, D. C., Thursday July 18, 1957.

"PUBLIC HEARING

"The subcommittee met, pursuant to recess, at 10:08 a. m., in the Caucus Room, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., Hon. CLYDE DOYLE (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

"Committee members present: Representatives CLYDE DOYLE of California (presiding), JAMES B. FRAZIER, Jr., of Tennessee, and GORDON H. SCHERER, of Ohio.

"Staff members present: Richard Arens, director; Frank S. Tavenner, Jr., counsel; and W. Jackson Jones and Louis J. Russell, investigators.

"Mr. DOYLE. The committee will please come to order.

"May the record show that the full membership of the subcommittee is present: Mr. FRAZIER, of Tennessee; Mr. SCHERER, of Ohio; and myself, DOYLE, of California, subcommittee chairman.

"Are you ready, Mr. Arens?

Mr. ARENS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. DOYLE. Please proceed.

"Mr. ARENS. The first witness, if you please, Mr. Chairman, will be Mr. Frank Grumman.

"Mr. Grumman, would you kindly come forward, please? Remain standing while the chairman administers the oath to you, Mr. Grumman.

"Mr. DOYLE. Do you solemnly swear you will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I do.

"Mr. DOYLE. Please have the witness chair.

"Testimony of Frank Grumman, accompanied by Leonard B. Boudin, counsel

"Mr. Grumman. I am Frank Grumman, 410 Park Place, Fort Lee, N. J., and my occupation is radio operator.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Grumman, may we be sure we have your name spelled correctly? Kindly accommodate us by spelling your name.

"Mr. Grumman. The last name?

"Mr. Arens. Yes.

"Mr. Arens. You are appearing today, Mr. Grumman, in response to a subpena which was served upon you by the House Committee on Un-American Activities?

"(Witness conferred with counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. The answer is 'Yes.' I am appearing in answer to a subpena which was objected to, the jurisdiction of the committee in the body of the statement which I would like to present at this time.

"Mr. Arens. Just a minute, Mr. Grumman. You are represented by counsel?

"Mr. Grumman. I am.

"Mr. Arens. Counsel, kindly identify yourself.

"Mr. Boudin. My name is Leonard B. Boudin, of 25 Broad Street, New York City.

"And I should like to address the question to the chairman of the subcommittee with respect to the procedure this morning.

"May I inquire whether, in the light of the Watkins case, the committee will be permitting objections to be made by counsel or a statement by counsel as to the jurisdiction of the committee or whether the procedure will be as in the period prior to the Watkins decision, when only the witnesses were heard, because if counsel can be heard I have certain things that I would like to say.

"Mr. Doyle. No. This is still not a court, Mr. Boudin, and I do not think that the Watkins decision has changed the nature of this committee.

"This committee is an investigative committee; it is not a court of law. While we will, as far as I am concerned, undertake, naturally, to comply with the ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Watkins case, we will proceed as an investigative committee. We do not abandon our rules, which were necessary before the Watkins case and are still necessary, which specify that the function of counsel with the witness is to advise his client and does not permit of counsel addressing the committee, arguing with us. I am a lawyer, as you know. All three members of this subcommittee are lawyers, and practiced many years before we first came here. We always feel we like to have the benefit of counsel talking with us, but we do not change our rules in that regard on account of the Watkins decision.

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Chairman——

"Mr. Boudin. Excuse me one second.

"May I simply note for the record, then, my objections as to the course the committee indicated they would follow, so my client's rights may be protected?

"Mr. Doyle. Your client's rights, I am sure, will be protected by you, and still I want to make my ruling clear, Counsel.

"Our rule has not changed, in our judgment, with the Watkins decision, and we are not now interpreting that decision, as far as I am concerned, as requiring us to permit counsel to argue with the committee.

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Grumman, would you kindly tell us where you are employed?

"Mr. Boudin. Excuse me one second, Mr. Arens.

"Mr. Scherer. I have heard enough from Mr. Boudin, Mr. Chairman. I object to any further conversation from Mr. Boudin.

"Mr. Boudin. May I address the Chair and ask one more question?

"Mr. Doyle. I will permit you to ask one more question.

"Mr. Scherer. I object.

"Mr. Boudin. My only question is that: Do I take it your ruling which is quite clear with respect to objection and argument, extends to asking of any questions by me of you? In other words, am I permitted to ask you any questions on behalf of my client?

"Mr. Doyle. You are not. My ruling is that you are not. The rule long established by the committee, with which you have been familiar for many years, is not changed, in our judgment, by the Watkins decision. Your jurisdiction before this investigative committee, it not being a court, is limited expressly by the rules of the committee, with which you are familiar for many years, to advising your client.

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. I would like to address myself to the chairman. I have, as I said, a statement which I would like to read.

"Mr. Arens. Now Mr. Grumman, may I ask you about that statement? The rules of this committee provide that any statement of a witness must be filed in advance with the committee; then the committee will determine whether or not it is incorporated in the record. Are you aware of those rules?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Doyle. May I suggest to the witness that you speak a little bit louder, and perhaps more directly into the loudspeaker, so we will be sure to hear you?

"Mr. Grumman. I am quite willing to do that. Is the speaker position adequate?

"Mr. Doyle. Thank you.

"Mr. Grumman. This statement is primarily a statement of objections to the jurisdiction of the committee and, since it is, for my mind, a little bit complicated, I would like to be allowed to state it concretely and clearly, once completely, and not try to do it piecemeal.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest that, pursuant to the rules of the committee, Mr. Grumman be permitted to file the statement, and the committee will take it under advisement.

"Mr. Doyle. I think that would be sufficient. You have registered your objection to the jurisdiction of this committee, in view of the Watkins decision, we understand that, in the statement that you prepared but have not submitted heretofore, in accordance with the rules of the committee. We would be glad to permit you to file it with your testimony, with the committee.

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Grumman. Mr. Chairman, I don't want to engage in an argument with the committee. The point here is that this position, I think, is necessary for me to take. I will have to state it somehow or other in order to make it clear for the record, and it would be simpler, I think, if I were permitted to make the statement once, clearly, so it is understood by everybody, and not piecemeal.

"Mr. Doyle. Your statement will be included in your testimony. I have stated before, we are not a court of law. We are proceeding under the direction of the instructions of the full committee, the Un-American Activities Committee, and you have your recourse in a court of law if you think this committee has no jurisdiction. We think that we have. This is an investigation, and there is no need of you taking 15 or 20 minutes to read a prepared statement on objections. We will be glad to accept them and place them with your testimony in the file.

"Mr. Grumman. The statement, sir, is quite brief, and will not take a great amount of time to put in the record and, as an answer to some of the questions which I anticipate will be raised, I will have to read, certainly, portions of the statement to answer.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Grumman, kindly tell this committee where you are employed.

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. I am currently employed by RCA Communications, Inc., and temporarily in leave of absence for union work.

"Mr. Doyle. I cannot hear you.

"Mr. Arens. Keep your voice up. I could not hear that last part.

"Mr. Grumman. I will repeat that, sir. I am employed by RCA Communications, Inc., and I am temporarily on leave of absence from that company for union work.

"Mr. Frazier. I cannot understand a word he says.

"Mr. Doyle. I wonder if the loudspeaker system is working.

"Mr. Doyle. The speaker is working. Thank you for trying again on that.

"Mr. Grumman. I am supposed to be an expert on this kind of thing, but, really, I am not. Is this more adequate, sir?

"Mr. Doyle. It is better.

"Mr. Grumman. Shall I repeat?

"Mr. Doyle. Please; yes.

"Mr. Grumman. I am employed by RCA Communications, Inc., and I am currently on leave of absence for union work.

"Mr. Arens. How long have you been employed by RCA Communications?

"Mr. Grumman. Something over 25 years.

"Mr. Arens. In what capacities have you been employed?

"Mr. Grumman. Always as a radio operator.

"Mr. Arens. And where have you been employed?

"Mr. Grumman. Always in New York City.

"Mr. Arens. And can you give us just a word about the functions which you have engaged in in your employment at RCA?

"Mr. Grumman. I take it you mean what is the work of a radio operator? That is all I have done.

"Mr. Grumman. A radio operator is a man trained in code, in Morse code, American Morse code, sometimes mostly international Morse code, because that is used in radio, and the job is simply that of transcribing that code, either by ear or from tape, onto message forms, in various manners. In later years I am also employed on such automatic equipment as may be on those same circuits.

"Mr. Arens. Do you or have you, at any time during the course of your employment at RCA, had access to any confidential or restricted information?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. I don't think so.

"Mr. Arens. Have you had access to any messages which have crossed the facilities of RCA, messages from any agency of the United States Government?

"Mr. Grumman. Well, going back over the years, I would say "Yes," I would handle any Government traffic that went over that particular—whatever particular circuit I was assigned to.

"Mr. Arens. Did you have access to any confidential Government messages?

"Mr. Grumman. I have no way of knowing what is confidential; the message comes; you handle it; there is no designation that I know of that lets you know whether it is confidential or not.

"Mr. Arens. Before I forget about it, you had this statement, Mr. Grumman. Do you care to cause that to be filed, before we leave that subject—the statement you were alluding to here?

"Mr. Grumman. At the close of my testimony we will act on that point. I mean I have only one copy, and I need the copy during the course of the testimony. Therefore, I will have to retain it.

"Mr. Arens. Where are you presently employed? I understand you to to say you are on leave of absence?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I am currently on temporary leave of absence for union work.

"Mr. ARENS. What union is that?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. The American Communications Association.

"Mr. ARENS. What is your connection at the present time with the American Communications Association?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I am an officer of local 10.

"Mr. ARENS. What office do you hold?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. The office of secretary-treasurer.

"Mr. ARENS. And how long have you held that office?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. GRUMMAN. As near as I can recollect. I was first elected to the office of secretary-treasurer in the early part of 1943.

"Mr. ARENS. Have you held it continuously since that time?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I think—yes; continuously, except for 1 term where I held the office, I believe, of president for 1 term.

"Mr. ARENS. What is the judisdiction of Local 10, ACA? Could you tell us that?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Well, generally, as far as our union charter is concerned, the jurisdiction of Local 10 would be any radio or international radio or cable workers whom we could organize in the general area of the United States east of the Mississippi River. I believe that is the break.

"Mr. ARENS. Could you help us on this: Where are the members of Local 10 employed, in what plant, or in what plants?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Well, the great bulk of the members of Local 10, the largest single group would be employed by RCA Communications in New York City.

"Mr. ARENS. And how many members are there of Local 10?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Well, I mean you have to take an approximate figure.

"Mr. ARENS. Surely. I appreciate that.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I believe that the membership at this point is something around 1,300 total.

"Mr. ARENS. And who is the president of Local 10?

"Mr. ARENS. Now, Mr. Grumman, yesterday a gentleman by the name of Michael Mignon testified under oath that he had at one time been a member of the Communist Party, that while he was a member of the Communist Party he knew a number of people as Communists. That he had served in closed Communist Party meetings with those persons. He also told us about certain of those persons who were employed in the vital communications industry of this Nation. Among those persons whom he said he had known as a member of the Communist Party was yourself, Frank Grumman.

"I now ask you, are you now a member of the Communist Party?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel).

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I am sorry but I must decline to answer that question, and to explain the reasons why, the basis on which I do that I would have to go into some of the questions in the statement which go solely to that question.

"I have conferred with counsel, in the light of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court——

"Mr. ARENS. You are reading from an extensive document that is presently before you.

"Mr. ARENS. It appears to be approximately two pages, typewritten, isn't that correct?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I can't explain my answer without going into all of this.

"Mr. ARENS. Kindly answer this collateral question:

"Is the document before you a document prepared by yourself?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. The document which is before me was prepared in conference with counsel.

"Mr. ARENS. And it is a document of approximately two pages, single spaced, typewritten?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. It is a document which I am sure I can read——

"Mr. ARENS. Kindly answer that question, Mr. Grumman.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Yes.

"Mr. ARENS. About how long is the document, so this record will reflect what you are doing there?

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Well, I think, sir, that I have to ask the chairman to permit me to state my reasons for refusing to answer. I think it is essential that I have to have a reasonable opportunity to state my position, why I am doing this, and a reasonable opportunity to protect my rights in this situation.

"Mr. ARENS. Mr. Grumman, may I ask a preliminary question there?

"Is your refusal to answer this particular question based upon the grounds incorporated in the document which you presently have before you, which we have discussed previously on this record?

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. GRUMMAN. This document is the statement of my objections, my reasons for refusing to answer the question, and I again ask the Chair to permit me to state my position.

"Mr. ARENS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to make an objection on this record from the standpoint of a possible precedent here.

"If this witness is permitted to read this extensive statement single spaced, apparently two pages long, in response to every pertinent question which we propose to ask him, the investigative processes of this and every other committee will be interminably impeded.

"I therefore respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the fact the witness has this extensive document which he says was prepared in consultation with counsel, if the witness so desires, he allude to the document as his reasons, but be obliged to give a summary of those reasons in response to the outstanding question.

"Mr. DOYLE. As soon as the witness is through consulting with his counsel I will make the ruling.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very summarized statement in itself. It is compact. I have no intention of trying to repeat it, unless I am required to do so. I believe that since I have presented it, its further——

"Mr. DOYLE. You are thoroughly familiar with that statement. Can't you give the summation of that statement as your objections?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Sir, I cannot readily do so. It is in a summary form, a compact statement.

"Mr. ARENS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest the witness be obliged to file the statement, so the work of this committee and other congressional committees using his case as a precedent, will not be interminably hindered.

"Mr. DOYLE. I believe the standing rule of the committee is a fair rule, that any prepared statement that the witness proposes to read should be first filed with the committee. I am not willing to undertake to suspend that rule of the committee.

"You are familiar with it. Your counsel has been familiar with it for years; therefore if you want to file that statement with the committee you are welcome to do so, even at this late date, but I do now ask you to comply with the rule of the committee, which is a manifestly reasonable rule. You were familiar with it before you came.

"Mr. ARENS. Would you kindly proceed to answer the question, Mr. Grumman? We have been in a state of consultation between you and your lawyer here now at least 5 or 6 minutes.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I honestly didn't think it was that long, sir. But, trying to summarize this thing, which is extremely difficult, and without waiving any rights which I may have in this situation, I would like to read, in an effort to summarize this thing, the first and last paragraphs of the statement, which I believe—while I don't think they are completely adequate, I believe they state some of the essences of the position.

"Mr. DOYLE. May I make this clear to the witness: We want you to have an adequate opportunity to state your objections in answer to that question. You have indicated that by reading a small portion of this two-page prepared statement—you go ahead and read those two, if it will help you in making your statement of objections.

"Mr. ARENS. Do you understand the question which is outstanding?

"Mr. DOYLE. But with this understanding, that you are offering that statement to the committee as part of your testimony. In other words, we have no objection to offering that statement to the committee, and it has been so stated before, twice.

"Naturally, if you are going to refer to the statement, we want it filed. If you are going to read from it that is entirely proper and reasonable, if the statement is filed with us.

"Now, Mr. Grumman, do you understand the question outstanding is: "Are you now a Communist?" You understand that is the outstanding question.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I understand the question perfectly.

"I would like just to understand the statement of the Chair clearly also.

"My intention was to read the entire statement and then to refer to that, certain kinds of questions might be answered, and I thought that would facilitate the whole procedure, I think you are making it more difficult for me by not permitting the entire statement to be read.

"Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire whether the witness has declined to answer that question?

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Well then, to answer that question, I would decline to answer it, and to state the reasons why, and I would read these two paragraphs which I think are not completely adequate, but which I do believe state the objections here.

"Mr. DOYLE. Then we will have this understanding, Witness. In addition to reading that small portion of a long prepared statement, you are welcome to supplement that reading by your own additional statement, if you feel you want to, if you believe it is pertinent, and a competent statement. In other words, we don't want to cut you off from making your complete statement.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Well, sir——

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. GRUMMAN. I suppose I should proceed to read, and if you think I am wrong, cut me off, and I will go——

"Mr. DOYLE. No. You read the two summarizing paragraphs that you have stated probably summarize your written statement.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. No; I am not reading them as a summary of the statement. I am reading them as explaining my reasons for declining to answer a specific question. I don't think I can proceed any other way here.

"Mr. DOYLE. Go ahead and read your two paragraphs.

"Mr. GRUMMAN. Right.

"I first stated that I decline to answer the question that was asked, and I wish to read the following:

" 'I have conferred with counsel, in the light of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the Watkins' and Sweezy cases I am advised by counsel that the powers of this committee are strictly limited, especially when the committee seeks to compel a witness to testify 'about his beliefs, expressions, or associations.' Such questioning, said the Court, constitutes governmental interference with free speech, press, and assembly.

" 'The Court further pointed out that a committee may not call witnesses just to expose or punish them, but only for a necessary legislative purpose. So, said the Court, the protected freedoms of free speech and assembly "should not be placed in danger in the absence of a clear determination by the House or the Senate that a particular inquiry is justified by a specific legislative need."

" 'And so, with all respect to this committee, acting on the advice of counsel, I shall decline to answer questions concerning my beliefs, expressions, or associations, on the ground that such questioning constitutes an interference with my rights under the first amendment to the Constitution and that such questioning is beyond the jurisdiction of the committee. The enabling resolution itself is an unlawful delegation of power to the committee. Moreover, I do not believe that any such questioning can be pertinent to any legitimate inquiry by the committee under its enabling resolution.'

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Grumman, I want to advise you that this committee is considering legislation, considering the possibility of legislation which might implement the Communist Control Act of 1954.

"The Communist Control Act of 1954 precludes the certification by the National Labor Relations Board of an organization which is found by the Subversive Activities Control Board to be Communist infiltrated.

"This committee is likewise considering whether or not there should be amendments to the Internal Security Act or the Communist Control Act or the creation of a new act for the purpose of precluding access to vital facilities by persons who are Communists who may engage in espionage or sabotage of vital communications facilities.

"I am not in this question undertaking to elicit from you anything of your beliefs, of your associations, or your expressions. This record at the present time shows that you, Frank Grumman, have been identified as a person known to have been a member of the Communist Party, you have told on this record that you are or have been employed as a radio operator in a vital communications facility.

"I therefore now ask you again this question: Are you now a Communist?

"Mr. Doyle. Now, counsel, as further foundation, to show the pertinency of this question, I have before me the full text of the recent decision by the United States District Judge Youngdahl, in case of U. S. of America v. Seymour Peck, criminal case No. 1214–56, decided here in the United States district court within the last 15 days, in which the Federal court said, among other things:

" 'For the Communist movement now constitutes a criminal conspiracy, and identifying members of the party may well be necessary under certain circumstances.'

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Doyle. Now, one further statement: "You testified that you are a member of the very same organization which Mr. Mignon, the witness yesterday before this committee, under oath testified. You testified you were onetime president of the same organization which he related yesterday under oath. On yesterday he testified that your union was dominated and controlled by the Communist Party, which Judge Youngdahl ruled within the last 15 days was now a criminal conspiracy.

"And here is what he said, as a member of the very union that you are a member of, and apparently have been for many years, a member of that same union:

" 'I was told and taught that only a Communist could be a good trade unionist.

" 'The eventual objective was when and if revolution came to change our form of government, that the Communists would be in a position to control communications facilities of the Nation.'

I wish to say, as subcommittee chairman, I think it is entirely pertinent and proper that we ask you whether or not you are a member of the Communist Party, for the purpose of this investigation.

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to supplement even that statement, by one other statement, so that this record will be abundantly clear.

"Namely, Mr. Grumman, if you are now a Communist, you could tell this committee, in all probability, of directives from the Communist Party to Communists respecting the vital communications facilities of this Nation. If you are now a Communist, you could tell this committee of the techniques proposed by the Communist Party to seize the communications industry, to intercept messages, to sabotage communications in the event of war.

"Further, I think the record at this point might well, so it is abundantly clear, reflect the fact again that Mr. Mignon's identification of you as a Communist was some several years ago. Whether or not you are now a Communist does not appear in the record.

"Therefore, I repeat the question:

"Are you now a Communist?

"And I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the witness be ordered and directed to answer the question.

"Mr. Doyle. You are ordered and directed to answer that question. I believe it is entirely pertinent.

"Mr. Scherer. Mr. Chairman——

"Mr. Doyle. Before you do that I am again saying we expect you and ask you and direct you to file your statement with the committee. I permitted you to refer to it and read part of it. I am not going to permit you to violate the rules of this committee any further.

"Mr. Boudin. Excuse me one moment.

"Mr. Boudin. One will be enough.

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Scherer, we have been 45 minutes trying to get the witness to answer this 1 question.

"Mr. Boudin. Could I be permitted to consult further for another moment?

"Mr. Scherer. Now, Mr. Boudin, counsel was talking with me.

"Mr. Boudin. I understand what counsel was saying about 45 minutes. I would like to consult with the witness in accordance with the instructions by the chairman.

"Mr. Scherer. I want the record to show we have been 45 minutes trying to get the witness to answer this 1 question.

"Mr. Boudin. It would have been 5 minutes if you would have allowed the witness to make a statement, exactly 5.

"Mr. Scherer. We are still running the committee, Mr. Boudin.

"Mr. Doyle. Witness, may I make this clear, and I want you to understand this before I require you to answer that question, whether or not you are a Communist now. You referred to a document, which you have before you, and I stated, as I permitted you to read from a portion of it, that I expected it to be filed.

"We believe it is entirely pertinent and proper that you do now file that statement so we can read it and consider it. I may want to make a ruling about it.

"Mr. Grumman. Well, I am in the position of having this one copy. I am perfectly willing to turn it over to be read. I would like to have it back because I want to refer to it.

"Mr. Doyle. Well, certainly, we want to consider it. That is the fair thing to you and the fair thing to us.

"Mr. Grumman. If you must consider it, there it is [handing document].

"Mr. Arens. Would you kindly answer the question?

"Mr. Scherer. Wait just a minute.

"Mr. Doyle. Wait until we read this, Mr. Arens.

"Mr. Frazier. It is a long thing.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Chairman, while the committee is considering that statement, I should like at this point to read into the record rule IX of the committee, so there will not be construed to be here any waiver of the rule of the committee, even though the committee is now reading the statement.

"Mr. Boudin. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest we can't do two things at once?

" 'A. Any witness desiring to make a prepared——'

"Mr. Boudin. If the chairman is reading the statement of the witness, how can he be listening to Mr. Arens?

"Mr. Arens. Counsel knows his sole and exclusive prerogative is to advise his client.

"Mr. Boudin. Go ahead and do both at one time, if you want. I am not going to interrupt.

"I want to read that into the record.

" 'IX. STATEMENT BY WITNESS

" 'A. Any witness desiring to make a prepared or written statement for the record of the proceedings in executive or public sessions shall file a copy of such statement with the counsel of the committee within a reasonable period of time in advance of the hearings at which the statement is to be presented.

" 'B. All such statements so received which are relevant and germane to the subject of the investigation may upon approval, at the conclusion of the testimony of the witness, by a majority vote of the committee or subcommittee members present, be inserted in the official transcript of the proceedings.'

"Mr. Doyle. I will ask your indulgence another minute or two while we complete reading the statement.

"We have read the statement, Witness, which you quoted in part, and we see that it contains a considerable elaboration of the activities of your union, which we believe is not pertinent to your own individual position in refusing to answer this question.

"We do not see where or how it is possible that the activities of your union are pertinent to your own individual situation in the presence of this question.

"We have considered all the other points set forth also in your statement. We will incorporate in the record only those portions of the statement which appear to be pertinent to your own individual position in the presence of this question and this investigation.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Chairman, at this point I should like this record to reflect a ruling by the Chair so that there will not be construed as a precedent a waiver of the rule of this committee which I have read, which requires a filing of these statements within reasonable time in advance of the proceedings of the committee. I say that for the reason that it is clear to me—and I believe it should be clear to any person who has had any experience in these congressional investigations—that if witnesses from here on in are to be permitted to read or to consume the time of the committee in statements, the length of which we cannot control, proceedings of this and other congressional committees would be interminably hampered.

"Mr. Doyle. I am sure the committee sustains our director or counsel in the reading of that rule, which is the text of the rule I have referred to previously.

"We have considered your statement, Witness, and I direct you to answer the question. I overrule your objection, and direct you to answer the question.

"Mr. Grumman. May I request the Chair to return the statement?

"(Statement handed to the witness.)

"Mr. Grumman. Thank you.

"I would like to ask, in answering this question, I would like to ask, in view of the statement of Mr. Arens on the nature of the investigation, I would like to ask under what resolution of the House the committee is taking up these matters.

"Mr. Doyle. Under Public Law 601, with which your counsel has been perfectly familiar for several years.

"As long as you ask that question—at the suggestion of your counsel, manifestly—your counsel is perfectly familiar with the law under which we are acting, and I hope you do not deliberately and unnecessarily take the time of the committee, and of yourselves, to ask these questions, the answers to which you already know, because we are prepared to stay here as long as you are.

"Mr. Boudin. Mr. Chairman, the answer is not known to counsel, of the resolution under which the committee is considering these matters.

"Mr. Doyle. You know we are proceeding under Public Law 601.

"Mr. Boudin. I did not know what you are proceeding under. The Supreme Court said that authority is not sufficient. The witness was asking you, since the Watkins' decision, whether the committee has a resolution——

"Mr. Doyle. The Supreme Court, Mr. Boudin—and I am not going to argue—did not say that law is not sufficient for this investigation.

"Mr. Boudin. I am sorry, but the Supreme Court said exactly that.

"Mr. Doyle. The Supreme Court set up certain guideposts, and we are following those guideposts.

"Mr. Boudin. They said that the resolution is too vague.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Boudin——

"Mr. Boudin. Excuse me. When I am talking to the chairman, if the chairman does not want to talk to me why doesn't he say so? I don't have to talk to the director when I am talking to the chairman.

"Mr. Doyle. Proceed, Mr. Witness.

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. I must continue to refuse to answer the question on the grounds that I have already stated, and those other grounds incorporated in the written statement which the committee has read.

"Mr. Arens. Let the record be clear on this point, if you please, Mr. Grumman:

"Are you in your response invoking that part of the fifth amendment which protects the witness against self-incrimination?

"Mr. Grumman. I am invoking only those things which I have read.

"Mr. Arens. Kindly answer that question, so this record may be absolutely clear. Are you invoking that part of the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which protects a witness against self-incrimination?

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Grumman. In response to that question I am invoking only that part of the fifth amendment which relates to due process; I am not invoking that part which goes to the question of having to bear witness against one's self.

"Mr. Arens. Thank you, sir.

"Mr. Boudin. Though I certainly believe any witness is entitled to it, if he wishes to do so.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Grumman, so that this record will not reflect, or so that no one in his right mind could possibly conclude that the purpose of your appearance here is to expose you just for the sake of exposure, may I ask you: Do you have information at the present time respecting Communists who are now in the vital communications industry?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. I have to refuse to answer that question on the same grounds as I said before.

"Mr. Arens. Do you have information now, Mr. Grumman—and I ask this question so that no one in his right mind can conclude that the purpose of your appearance here is exposure for the sake of exposure—do you have information with respect to Communists in the American Communications Association?

"Mr. Grumman. The answer is the same as before, and on the same grounds.

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Grumman——

"Mr. Scherer. Wait a minute.

"I ask that you direct the witness to answer that question, Mr. Chairman. You have to have a direction.

"Mr. Doyle. Very well.

"You understand the question, Witness? And you answered it the way you intended to do?

"I now direct and instruct you to answer that last question.

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Scherer. I think the record should reflect that we do not accept his answer nor the reasons given for refusing to answer the question.

"Mr. Grumman. I decline to answer the question on the same grounds as before, but I would like to, in view of that question, to——

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Boudin. I think that is a complete answer.

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Grumman, I say to you that the committee has not caused your appearance here today for the purpose of just exposing you, as such. We honestly feel that if you would testify you could tell this committee as did Mr. Mignon yesterday, about directives, policies, activities of the Communist Party, directed toward the communications industry, and that with that information this Committee on Un-American Activities would be enabled to formulate legislation to attempt to meet a situation in which a vital communications industry is potentially endangered by Communists.

"Therefore, I now ask you, Mr. Grumman: Do you have information respecting any directives by the Communist Party to Communists, for the purpose of causing confidential security-restricted messages to be intercepted in the communications facilities of this Nation?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. I think that at this point I ought to make myself clear.

"I have no knowledge or information whatever of anybody who does or wants to conduct sabotage or espionage or illegal interceptions, and so forth——

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Grumman——

"Mr. Boudin. The witness hasn't finished yet.

"Mr. Arens. I beg your pardon, Mr. Boudin.

"Mr. Grumman. Or any directives from anyone at all to do this kind of thing.

"Mr. Arens. Do you have information, Mr. Grumman, respecting any activities, directives, objectives of the Communist Party to obtain control of a labor organization operating in the vital field of communications?

"Mr. Grumman. Frankly, I never heard of any directions or actions by anybody to control our union. Our union is controlled by its members, and that is it. There is no other control.

"Mr. Arens. Do you know of Communists presently in the vital communications industry of this Nation?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. It seems to me that is the original question in a little different form, and the answer would be the same, sir.

"Mr. Arens. My Chairman, I respectfully suggest that will conclude the staff interrogation of this witness.

"Mr. Scherer. I think there should be a direction to answer your last question. There is no direction. I will ask the chairman to direct the witness to answer the question, after I make the statement that the committee does not accept his answer and the reasons given for refusing to answer the question, and now I ask the chairman to direct the witness to answer the question.

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Doyle. I will, as soon as the witness has completed conferring with his counsel.

"Do you understand the last question, Witness, Mr. Grumman?

"Mr. Boudin. Yes.

"Mr. Grumman. The last question.

"Mr. Doyle. And your answer? I now direct you to answer that last question. I am not satisfied we can accept your answer as sufficient.

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. The answer is the same, on the grounds that I have already stated, that are included in the statement which the committee has refused to accept, and I would now ask that the committee accept the full statement for the record, which I have already offered.

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Scherer. Mr. Chairman, I move——

"Mr. Doyle. Just a minute. May I inquire as to the witness' answer to my direction, please? That he answer the question.

"(The record was read by the reporter.)

"Mr. Scherer. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the witness' entire statement which he submitted to the committee be made a part of the record, word for word.

"Mr. Boudin. I now hand Mr. Arens a copy of the statement [handing].

"Mr. Grumman. Would you permit me to initial it, to identify it?

"Mr. Arens. Initial it on the margin of each page.

"(Mr. Grumman complies.)

"Mr. Arens. You probably have a copy of this, don't you, Mr. Boudin?

"Mr. Boudin. No; I am sorry, but I don't.

"Mr. Doyle. I think, Mr. Scherer, that that motion should include in the text that we file it and include it in the record without waiving rule IX.

"Mr. Scherer. That is assumed in my motion.

"Mr. Boudin. I take it this will appear in the transcript, Mr. Doyle?

"Mr. Arens. Yes.

"Mr. Boudin. Am I correct?

"Mr. Arens. Yes.

"Mr. Doyde. I will make that order; that it be filed with the committee and included with the testimony.

"Mr. Scherer. And made a part of the record.

"Mr. Doyle. But without any expressed or implied intention to waive in whole or in part any of the rules of the committee, especially with referenec to rule IX of our printed rules.

"'STATEMENT BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE, JULY 18, 1957 (SUBMITTED BY FRANK GRUMMAN)

"'I have conferred with counsel, in the light of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court in the Watkins and Sweezy cases. I am advised by counsel that the powers of this committee are strictly limited, especially when the committee seeks to compel a witness to testify "about his beliefs, expressions, or associations." Such questioning, said the Court, constitutes governmental interference with free speech, press, and assembly. The Court further pointed out that a committee may not call witnesses just to expose or punish them but only for a necessary legislative purpose. So, said the Court, the protected freedoms of free speech and assembly "should not be placed in danger in the absence of a clear determination by the House or the Senate that a particular inquiry is justified by a specific legislative need."

"'And further the Court said, "We start with several basic premises on which there is general agreement. The power of the Congress to conduct investigations is inherent in the legislative process. That power is broad. It encompasses inquiries concerning the administration of existing laws as well as proposed or possibly needed statutes. It includes surveys of defects in our social economic or political system for the purpose of enabling the Congress to remedy them. It comprehends probes into departments of the Federal Government to expose corruption, inefficiency, or waste."

"'"But, broad as is this power of inquiry, it is not unlimited. There is no general authority to expose the private affairs of individuals without justification in terms of the functions of the Congress. This was freely conceded by the Solicitor General in his argument of this case. Nor is the Congress a law enforcement or trial agency. These are functions of the Executive and Judicial departments of Government. No inquiry is an end in itself; it must be related to and in furtherance of a legitimate task of the Congress. Investigations conducted solely for the personal aggrandizement of the investigators or to "punish" those investigated are indefensible."

"'Further in the same decision, the Court said, "Kilbourn v. Thompson teaches that such an investigation into individual affairs is invalid if unrelated to any legislative purpose. That is beyond the powers conferred upon the Congress in the Constitution. United States v. Rumely makes it plain that the mere semblance of legislative purpose would not justify an inquiry in the face of the Bill of Rights. The critical element is the existence of, and the weight to be ascribed to, the interest of the Congress in demanding disclosures from an unwilling witness. We cannot simply assume, however, that every congressional investigation is justified by a public need that overbalances any private rights affected. To do so would be to abdicate the responsibility placed by the Constitution upon the judiciary to insure that the Congress does not unjustifiably encroach upon an individual's right to privacy nor abridge his liberty of speech, press, religions, or assembly.

"'The subcommittee asserts that it has been authorized by the committee to conduct this investigation. But that does not meet the test laid down by the Supreme Court—namely, that the House of Representatives make such an authorization. So far as I know, the House has never authorized this investigation either before or after House Resolution 5 was declared by the Supreme Court in the Watkins case to be unconstitutionally vague.

"'Now, as to the question of security in the communications industry:

"'Some of the communications monopolies have attempted to make my organization and its members targets of special repressive legislation. They point to the nature of the industry and its importance in the national defense.

"'The fact is that special legislation has existed for many years to protect the national interests in the communications industry. The Federal Communications Act of 1934 makes it a criminal offense for anyone to divulge the contents of a telegraph or cable message, or to commit sabotage. Severe penalties are provided for acts in violation of this law, and yet there is no record of any member of my organization or any other union in this industry, so far as I know, having charged with, let alone convicted, of violation of the law.

"'As to the record of my organization in the fight for the national interest, we are ready and willing and anxious to match it with any group of employers, Government agencies, or anyone else. In war or peace there is no group of employees in the United States, and no group of any kind, with a better record of devotion to the interests of our country. In fire, flood, or disaster on land or sea, members of our union have written an heroic record. This has been attested to by many people in high places over the years.

"'During World War II our Union proposed, and the Government adopted, the American Communications Association Safety and Anti-Espionage Plan to guarantee safety of communications and convoys at sea. Commander E. N. Webster (once a Commissioner in the FCC) speaking for the Commandant of the Coast Guard, said of ACA with respect to this plan: "The thorough study made by the ACA of the complex problem of providing, in time of war, greater protection of life and property at sea is most commendable and the suggestions of the Union have guided the various Government agencies in providing those vitally needed protective measures."

"'General Dwight D. Eisenhower, in response to a no-strike pledge of our Union during the War, spoke as follows: "All ranks of the Allied forces are deeply grateful for your pledge of continued cooperation. We fully appreciate the vital part played by all groups affording communications."

"'We could quote dozens of other distinguished Americans and newspapers in a similar vein.

"'In peacetime, similarly, ACA has not only fought in the interests of its members as part of the general national public interest, but has been an effective and sometimes the only voice against attempts of the telegraph communications monopoly to impose higher rates and to curtail service to thousands of communities.

"'Similarly, we are engaged in a continuing struggle to defeat the current attempts to secure a merger of international communications by creation of a monopoly; the chief advocate of such merger being Adm. Ellery Stone, of AC&R. Our opposition to this is based on our conviction that the national defense, the general public interest and the interest of the employees would be adversely affected by the creation of such a monopoly.

"'In the light of our record of steadily raising the average wages of telegraph workers for the past 20 years, securing paid vacations, improved pensions, higher sick benefits, night differentials, daily overtime and other premium pay, and job security, it is not surprising that the corporations in this industry initiate and support legislation designated to destroy our Union and all other labor unions which serve the interests of the American working people.

"'Finally, because there has been reference in these hearings to the possibility or potentiality of espionage or sabotage in this industry, I wish to make it clear that I have never heard of any worker, in any section of the industry, being engaged in or even charged with, let alone indicted or convicted on a charge of espionage or sabotage.

"'And so, with all respect to this committee, acting on the advice of counsel, I shall decline to answer questions concerning my beliefs, expressions, or associations on the ground that such questioning constitutes an interference with my rights under the First Amendment to the Constitution and that such questioning is beyond the jurisdiction of the committee. The enabling resolution itself is an unlawful delegation of power to the committee. Moreover, I do not believe that any such questioning can be pertinent to any legitimate inquiry by the committee under its enabling resolution.'

"Mr. Doyle. Now, have you any questions of the witness, Judge Frazier?

"Mr. Frazier. I have no questions.

"Mr. Scherer?

"Mr. Scherer. No.

"I have a motion to make. Is the witness excused?

"Mr. Arens. I have no further questions.

"(Representatives Doyle, Frazier, and Scherer and Messrs. Arens and Tavenner, conferred.)

"Mr. Doyle. Witness and witness' counsel, I am calling your attention to the fact that a few minutes ago I believe I quoted verbatim the testimony of Mr. Mignon.

"You are acquainted with him, are you? You know who he is?

"Mr. Grumman. I have certainly met Mr. Mignon.

"Mr. Doyle. Certainly met him. Well, he said he met you.

"Now on yesterday he, a former admitted Communist for several years, in the same union of which you are now secretary-treasurer, and at least you were at least one-term president, according to your own testimony, voluntarily named a number of the officers of that union before this committee, and he named you, Frank Grumman, secretary-treasurer of ACA Local 10.

"Mr. Doyle. As a member of the Communist Party when he was in the Communist Party, he said, with you, and in Local 10. He said that he sat in closed Communist cell meetings with you.

"Now I will ask you whether or not he was telling the truth or was he telling a falsehood?

"Mr. Grumman. I decline to answer that question, sir, on the same grounds as previously set forth in the statement.

"Mr. Scherer. I ask that you direct the witness to answer the question.

"Mr. Doyle. I direct you to answer the question. It is certainly pertinent. The testimony of Mr. Mignon and others has already shown before this committee that the union was at that time controlled by the principal officers, by identified Communists, in control of the policies of the union of which you are now a member, and secretary-treasurer, in the field of international cable communications, which is certainly an area involving the security of our Nation.

"I direct you to answer the question.

"Mr. Grumman. Sir, I decline to answer the question on the grounds of lack of committee jurisdiction, under the Watkins' decision, and on the grounds of lack of pertinency.

"Mr. Doyle. Now, one further question:

"Mr. Mignon testified yesterday that in his judgment, it was entirely possible for those in control of our international cables, to in time of emergency, within a very, very short period of time, take such action and sabotage as would incur very dangerous effects to the security of our Nation. What is your opinion in that connection? You have had 25 years with RCA as a cable, international cable operator, part of the time, according to your testimony.

"Mr. Grumman. Sir, I just don't believe that anybody employed in the international communications would sabotage the system, under any conditions.

"Mr. Doyle. I didn't ask you that question. I asked you whether or not it was possible for it to be done. I did not ask you whether or not anyone would do it. He said members of the Communist Party were taught that that was what they were to do. Was he telling the truth or not?

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Grumman. I have already stated that I never heard of any such directive from anybody concerning——

"Mr. Doyle. I am not asking you that question. I am asking you whether or not it wold be possible for an operator of international cable transmission to sabotage the international cable facilities if they so desired, in the early stages of a national emergency.

"Mr. Grumman. I think it would be extremely difficult, if you are taking it strictly as a technical question, as to the possibility. I think it would be extremely difficult. It is very hard for me to conceive that it could be done.

"Mr. Doyle. Well, it would be possible, would it? It might be difficult but it would be possible?

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Grumman. Well, sir, just going——

"Mr. Scherer. Now, Mr. Boudin, he is the expert. I don't see how you can advise him on that question.

"Mr. Boudin. I can advise him on the law.

"Mr. Scherer. On the law; yes.

"Mr. Boudin. And I am advising him on the law.

"Do you want my advice stated openly on the record?

"Mr. Scherer. No.

"Mr. Doyle. No. We are not interested.

"Mr. Boudin. Then I suggest Mr. Scherer address his questions to the chairman and not to me, if he doesn't want me to answer them.

"Mr. Doyle. You understand my question. You said it would be difficult. Mr. Mignon said it would be possible. Now, in your judgment, would it be possible or not?

"Mr. Grumman. Possibly, to only a minor degree, a very small degree, and, in my opinion, impossible to get away with.

"Mr. Arens. Would it be possible for persons who were disposed to do so, to intercept messages?

"Mr. Grumman. Well, any man who is handling a message, I suppose, might have a memory for it and hold it, though that seems incredible to me. As an operator I have handled thousands and thousands of messages in the years that I worked, and I don't remember for 10 minutes.

"Mr. Arens. During the time you handled these thousands and thousands of messages, was there any time during which you were under the discipline of the Communist Party?

"Mr. Grumman. That is the same question again. I decline to answer it on the grounds already given.

"Mr. Arens. I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that he be now directed and ordered to answer that question.

"Mr. Doyle. I direct you to answer that question. I believe it is entirely pertinent, in view of the testimony of other witnesses, at least one other witness, to date, that you were a member of the Communist Party, and that it is established that it is a conspiracy instead of a political party.

"Mr. Grumman. I decline to answer the question, sir, for the reasons I already set forth.

"Mr. Scherer. One question.

"Now, Mr. Doyle asked whether it would be possible for one individual to sabotage the communications system of this country, over which the Government directives were carried. I am going to ask you whether it would be possible for 4 or 5 individuals, properly placed, who were members of the Communist conspiracy, and who decided to do so, to sabotage our communications system.

"Mr. Grumman. Sir, if you mean is it possible for one person to sabotage the system, I think the answer is obviously 'No.' I don't believe it would be just possible.

"Mr. Scherer. I think you understood my question, but, in case you didn't, I said Mr. Doyle's question was whether one person, if [illegible] were so inclined, could sabotage the communications system, or any part of it, over which directives of this Government were carried.

"My question is whether in your opinion it is not possible for 3 or 4 individuals, acting together and properly placed, to sabotage our communications system, or part of it, over which directives of this Government are carried.

"Mr. Grumman. Well, I think——

"Mr. Scherer. I notice that you carefully answered that it would almost be impossible for one.

"Mr. Grumman. Well, I think the impossibility is still there for a small number, such as you state. This kind of a system—I think the answer for that really ought to come from some engineer who understands layout, and so on, because you go beyond the possibility of the people who operate and normally work in these communications companies, and would go to some incredible knowledge of layout of wires, and so on, and even then it would be difficult to do anything that would be prepared in very short order.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Chairman, I have still another question I should like to ask. It is the same question I have heretofore asked. I ask it now for a different purpose, and I want to explain the purpose to the witness.

"Mr. Doyle. Very well.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Witness, we have had an abundance of testimony under oath to the effect that Communists cannot be believed before congressional committees or otherwise; that they are inveterate liars.

"Now, for the purpose of testing the credibility of the testimony that you have given to this committee today, I want to ask you now—and that is the purpose of this question, to test your credibility—Are you now a Communist?

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Chairman, the pertinency of that question, I believe, has already been explained. It is pertinent to the whole testimony of this witness here today, to determine whether or not he has been truthful; because, if he is a Communist, if he is under Communist discipline, then this committee is justified, on the basis of an abundance of testimony, in disbelieving him; on the other hand, if he is not a Communist, we ought to know that, because we can give some degree of verity and authenticity to his statement.

"I, therefore, respectfully suggest that the witness now be directed and ordered to answer the question as to whether or not he is now a Communist.

"Mr. Doyle. I direct you to answer the question, Witness.

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Grumman. I decline, for all the reasons I have stated orally and in writing, before.

"Mr. Doyle. Very well.

"I have one more question:

"I made a note as you testified, that you were trained in international Morse code, transmitting that code into messages, and that you handled whatever Government circuit was assigned to you. I think that is the substance of one part of the testimony.

"Mr. Grumman. With one variation, sir. I don't recall ever working in a Government circuit, as such. I think there are none, as I know of. You take whatever comes over a particular connection, is what I mean.

"Mr. Doyle. I just made a quick note, and I could very well have made a mistake in what I heard.

"But now, the Government circuits—you know what they are—that are handled through the organization which employed you—what international cables, what departments of Government carry those cables?

"Mr. Grumman. I have practically no knowledge on that line, sir. I work on regular circuits. I take whatever traffic comes over. The only thing I could say in that connection is that the proportion of Government traffic on private or commercial lines is extremely small these days. Most of it is handled over the Government's own lines. We receive very little.

"Mr. Doyle. Leased lines?

"Mr. Grumman. That stuff we do handle, sir, is promptly and immediately turned over to a foreign national at the other end of the wire. That is what we have to do—that is what our job is.

"Mr. Doyle. The testimony by one of the vice presidents of one of the organizations of which you are employed, yesterday, and one of the technicians, as I recall it, was that the international Atlantic cables carried messages from the State Department, the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the National Security Agency.

"Mr. Grumman. Honestly, in my recent knowledge, going to the period, you know, the last few years, I believe that the State Department itself would probably be the biggest traffic filer, that is, actual messages handled. As to other messages, offhand I wouldn't know.

"Mr. Doyle. Of course, obviously, any message from the State Department to any of our allies, even in times of peace, is a very important message, isn't it?

"Mr. Grumman. Well, I would presume so, sir.

"Mr. Doyle. And it should not fall into the hands of any person transmitting it who might, for any design or purpose, loyalty or disloyalty or otherwise, have anything to do in the form of what might be sabotage?

"Mr. Grumman. In the——

"Mr. Doyle. Are there any other questions?

"Mr. Grumman. Could I just say something on that? I think it is quite important myself.

"Mr. Doyle. Yes, indeed.

"Mr. Grumman. As to the handling on the State Department traffic, which in my personal experience is only very occasional, the State Department stuff, if they consider it the least bit important, is what is called scrambled. The tape is really unreadable. In many cases a green operator will stop his circuit when one comes in there, because he thinks the circuit is going out of whack.

"You have to check the head of the message to find out.

"Mr. Arens. Have you reported the message, the example of which you have just given the chairman, to a person known by you to have been a member of the Communist Party?

"Mr. Grumman. I haven't reported this message to anybody.

"Mr. Arens. Does any person, to your knowledge, that is a Communist, have access to this information that you have just related to the chairman?

"(Witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Grumman. Well, everybody who works on that operating floor knows all about this. I mean the guys who work there know this and they handle it. There is nothing they can do with it.

"Mr. Doyle. May I ask this question? I wish to ask you this question dealing with the status of the union of which you are a member:

"I believe some years ago it was expelled, was it not, from the CIO on account of a claimed domination, claimed by CIO, by the Communist Party, or am I in error? Am I correct?

"Mr. Grumman. The union was expelled by the CIO, and I believe the claim is as you have stated it, and we certainly don't believe that was the basis.

"Mr. Doyle. Has your union ever made an application for reinstatement in CIO, having changed the conditions of the union, so far as the alleged Communist control is concerned, in the meantime?

"Mr. Grumman. Well, I am a little confused by your question, sir. I would say that we have never, as far as I know, we have never applied for reinstatement. I don't know of any such.

"Mr. Doyle. You were expelled in what year?

"Mr. Grumman. Well, I would say it was 1950. I am not 100 percent sure in my own mind at this point.

"Mr. Doyle. Is there any other question? "Thank you, Witness and Counsel.

"Mr. Scherer. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a motion that I would like to make.

"Mr. Frazier. Hold it to later.

"Mr. Doyle. It has been an hour and 15 minutes.

"Mr. Boudin. You realize it would have been 5 minutes if the witness had read the statement at the beginning, exactly 5.

"(Representatives Doyle, Frazier, and Scherer, and Messrs. Arens and Tavenner, conferred.)

"Mr. Scherer. Mr. Chairman, I move that this subcommittee recommend to the full committee of the House Committee on Un-American Activities that the last witness, Frank Grumman, be cited for contempt of Congress.

"Mr. Doyle. The motion is made and seconded.

Before I put the motion, I wish to say that this motion was made by Mr. Scherer at the consultation right here subsequent to the closing of the testimony by the witness. Our two committee legal counsel are present with us and have been present throughout the hearing of this witness. The committee sincerely feels that this is a good case of contempt of a congressional committee, even under the Watkins' decision, or any other decision of the Supreme Court.

"In stating that I felt it was a good case of contempt, I meant that it was a bad case of contempt, but it is a good case for us to carry to the High Court, if necessary.

"All those in favor of Mr. Scherer's motion say 'aye.'

"Mr. Scherer. Aye.

"Mr. Frazier. Aye.

"Mr. Doyle. Aye. It is voted unanimously and we will recommend it to the full committee at a later date.

"Let the record show that all three members of the subcommittee were present at all times during the hearing of the witness and on vote on the recommendation of contempt."

Because of the foregoing, the said Committee on Un-American Activities was deprived of answers to pertinent questions propounded to the said Frank Grumman, relative to the subject matter which, under Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress, the said committee was instructed to investigate, and the refusal of the witness to answers the questions, namely:

"Now, Mr. Grumman, yesterday a gentleman by the name of Michael Mignon testified under oath that he had at one time been a member of the Communist Party, that while he was a member of the Communist Party he knew a number of people as Communists. That he had served in closed Communist Party meetings with those persons. He also told us about certain of those persons who were employed in the vital communications industry of this Nation. Among those persons whom he said he had known as a member of the Communist Party, was yourself, Frank Grumman.

"I now ask you, are you now a member of the Communist Party?

"Do you have information, now, Mr. Grumman—and I ask this question so that no one in his right mind can conclude that the purpose of your appearance here is exposure for the sake of exposure—Do you have information with respect to Communists in the American Communications Association?

"Do you know of Communists presently in the vital communications industry of this Nation?

"As a member of the Communist Party when he was in the Communist Party, he said, with you, and in local 10. He said that he sat in closed Communist cell meetings with you.

"Now I will ask you whether or not he was telling the truth or was he telling a falsehood?

"Mr. Witness, we have had an abundance of testimony under oath to the effect that Communists cannot be believed before congressional committees or otherwise; that they are inveterate liars.

"Now for the purpose of testing the credibility of the testimony that you have given to this committee today, I want to ask you now—and that is the purpose of this question, to test your credibility—Are you now a Communist?"

which questions were pertinent to the subject under inquiry, is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared, and his refusal to answer the aforesaid questions deprived your committee of necessary and pertinent testimony, and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

"Be it resolved, That the Chairman be authorized and empowered from time to time to appoint subcommittees, composed of three or more members of the Committee on Un-American Activities, at least one of whom shall constitute a quorum, for the purpose of performing any and all acts which the committee as a whole is authorized to perform."

The following is an extract from the minutes of an executive session of the Committee on Un-American Activities consisting of Hon. Francis E. Walter, chairman, Hon. Morgan M. Moulder, Hon. James B. Frazier, Jr., Hon. Gordon H. Scherer, and Hon. Robert J. McIntosh, held on the 21st day of August 1957, in room 226, Old House Office Building.

"The report of the facts relating to the refusal of Frank Grumman to answer questions was submitted to the committee as a whole, upon which a motion was made by Mr. Scherer, seconded by Mr. Frazier and unanimously carried, that the subcommittee's report of the facts relating to the refusal of Frank Grumman to answer questions before the said subcommittee in Washington, D. C., on July 18, 1957, be and the same is hereby approved and adopted and that the Committee on Un-American Activities report and refer the refusal of Frank Grumman to answer questions before the said subcommittee, together with all the facts in connection therewith, to the House of Representatives, with a recommendation that the witness be cited for contempt by the House of Representatives, for his refusal to answer questions, to the end that he may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution—House Resolution 408—and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives as to the refusal of Frank Grumman to answer questions before a duly constituted subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Frank Grumman may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Willis].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the witness under consideration, Frank Grumman, is a radio operator trained in the various codes used in the transmission of messages. Mr. Grumman having been identified by another witness at the hearing as having been a member of the Communist Party, was questioned regarding his Communist Party membership, the presence of Communists in the American Communications Association, and the vital communications industry of the Nation.

The witness did not invoke the privilege of the fifth amendment, but instead refused to answer questions on the basis of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Watkins case. That has already been explained.

The Supreme Court in the Watkins case held that exposure for the sake of exposure is wrong. We all, of course, accept that statement. The Supreme Court, however, I am quite sure, did not mean to hold, or I hope they did not mean to hold, that if in the course of the work of a committee properly constituted and having a legislative purpose and conducting hearings consistent with that legislative purpose, exposure should result incidentally, I say I hope the Supreme Court did not mean to say that the committee must cease functioning.

Unfortunately, however, the decision was an open invitation for witnesses to say, and they are now practically all saying to us in effect: "Well, the Supreme Court said exposure for the sake of exposure is wrong. We say you mean to expose us; therefore, we refuse to answer, period."

That is the trend of some of these witnesses now on the basis of that decision.

Likewise, the Supreme Court said in that case that, of course, a Congressional committee must have a legislative purpose. I am quite sure the Supreme Court did not mean to say that, having a legislative purpose, the committee cannot conduct hearings and ask pertinent questions.

Unfortunately again, however, on the basis of that decision these witnesses are interpreting it and twisting it into telling us the Supreme Court said: "You must have a legislative purpose. We maintain you have no legislative purpose; and, therefore, we refuse to answer."

That is the basis of this particular privileged motion seeking contempt proceedings against this witness, Mr. Grumman.

Legislative purpose was spelled out to him. We made every effort to comply with the ritual of the Supreme Court in the Watkins case.

I submit in this instance as in the other case just considered the motion for the contempt citation should be adopted.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. WILLIS. The bill in connection with correction of the Supreme Court decision in the Jencks case was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and reported out of a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of which I happen to be chairman.

I not only express the hope but the expectation that action will be taken on that bill this year, certainly under suspension of the rules if in no other way.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I know of no opposition to the resolution on this side. I have no requests for time.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST BERNARD SILBER

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Un-American Activities I submit a privileged report (Rept. No. 1241).

The Clerk read as follows:

PROCEEDINGS AGAINST BERNARD SILBER

The Committee on Un-American Activities as created and authorized by the House of Representatives through the enactment of Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress, caused to be issued a subpena to Bernard Silber. The said subpena directed Bernard Silber to be and appear before the said Committee on Un-American Activities or a duly authorized subcommittee thereof, of which the Honorable FRANCIS E. WALTER is chairman, on Wednesday, July 17, 1957, at 10 a. m., at their committee room, 226 House Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee, and not to depart without leave of said committee. The subpena served upon the said Bernard Silber is set forth in words and figures as follows:

C., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee, and not to depart without leave of said committee.

"Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

"To United States Marshal, to serve and return."

"Given under my hand this 21st day of June, in the year of our Lord, 1957.

"FRANCIS E. WALTER,
"Chairman."

The said subpena was duly served as appears by the return made thereon by Samuel Swartz, deputy United States marshal, southern district of New York, who was duly authorized to serve the said subpena. The return of the service by the said Samuel Swartz, deputy United States marshal, being endorsed thereon, is set forth in words and figures as follows:

"I made service of the within subpena by personally handing to him the subpena the within-named Bernard Silber, 504 Grant Street, New York, N. Y., at 5:50 o'clock, p. m., on the 26th day of June 1957.

"SAMUEL SWARTZ,
"Deputy, U. S. Marshal, S. D. N. Y."

On July 19, 1957, the following telegram was sent to Mr. Bernard Silber, which is set forth in words and figures, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1957.
Personal report delivered to 225-B.
Mr. BERNARD SILBER,
Apt. F-42, 504 Grand Street,
New York, N. Y.:

Under continuing authority of subpena served upon you and pursuant to direction of subcommittee chairman on July 18, your appearance before Committee on Un-American Activities is hereby scheduled for July 29, 1957, ten a. m.

FRANCIS E. WALTER,
Chairman.

On July 23, 1957, the following telegram was sent to Mr. Bernard Silber, which is set forth in words and figures, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 23, 1957.
Personal report delivered to 226 HOB.
Mr. BERNARD SILBER,
Apt. F-42, 504 Grand Street,
New York, N. Y.:

Under continuing authority of subpena served upon you and pursuant to direction of subcommittee chairman on July 18, your appearance before Committee on Un-American Activities is hereby postponed from July 29 to Friday, August 2, 1957, ten a. m.

FRANCIS E. WALTER,
Chairman.

The said Bernard Silber, pursuant to the said subpena and telegraphic communications, appeared before a subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities on August 2, 1957, to give such testimony as required under and by virtue of Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress. The said Bernard Silber, having appeared as a witness and having been asked the questions, namely:

"Was he a communications worker?

"We should like to have you tell us now whether or not there are any persons engaged at Western Union who at any time have been known by you to be Communists.

"Were any of the officers of your union members of the Communist Party at the time you were a member of the Communist Party?

"Were any of the present officers of your union members of the Commuinst Party at the time you were in the party?"

which questions were pertinent to the subject under inquiry, refused to answer said questions, and as a result of said Bernard Silber's refusal to answer the aforesaid questions, your committee was prevented from receiving testimony and information concerning a matter committed to said committee in accordance with the terms of a subpena served upon the said Bernard Silber.

The record of the proceedings before the subcommittee on July 17, 1957, insofar as it is pertinent to the appearance of Bernard Silber on August 2, 1957, is set forth in fact as follows:

"UNITED STATES HOUSE
OF REPRESENTATIVES,
"SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
"COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES,
"Washington, D. C., July 17, 1957.

"PUBLIC HEARING

"A subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities met, pursuant to call at 10:10 a. m., in the caucus room, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., Hon. Clyde Doyle (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

"Committee members present: Clyde Doyle, of California, James B. Frazier, Jr., of Tenenssee, and Gordon H. Scherer, of Ohio.

"Mr. DOYLE. The subcommittee will please come to order.

"I have an opening statement, as the subcommittee chairman which I wish to read for the record.

"The committee has long been interested in the situation which exists in the communications industry in the United States, namely, the position and influence held by members of the Communist Party and organizations dedicated to furthering the Communist objective. On July 10, 1957, at a regular meeting of the committee, with all members except two present and voting, a motion was made by Mr. Scherer and seconded by Mr. Frazier which authorized the holding of these hearings in Washington on this general subject.

"Congress by Public Law 601 of the 79th Congress, placed upon this committee the duty of investigating the extent, character, and object of un-American propaganda activities in the United States, the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of Government as guaranteed by our Constitution, and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid Congress in any necessary remedial legislation. Congress has also placed upon this committee the duty of exercising continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of this committee.

"In these hearings beginning now, the first of a series of this general subject, the committee hopes to ascertain the extent of the penetration and control exercised by members of the Communist Party over an industry which is vital to our defense; namely, communications. In the event that testimony given during these hearings reflects a situation correctable by legislation, the committee will recommend the appropriate measures at the proper time. It is the purpose of the subcommittee in the conduct of these hearings, to discharge the duties placed upon us by the Congress by calling witnesses who, we have reason to believe, possess information which will be of value to us and to the Congress in the consideration of such legislation. It is a standing rule of this committee that any person named in the course of committee hearings will be given an early opportunity to appear before this committee if he so desires, for the purpose of denying or explaining any testimony given adversely affecting him. In the event there are such persons, they should immediately communicate with any member of the staff and make their request known.

"In every hearing, the committee has encouraged witnesses to have legal counsel with them if they so desire, and has always welcomed the presence of counsel. In fact, the rules of the committee expressly provide that—'at every hearing, public or executive, every witness shall be accorded the privilege of having counsel of his own choosing.

" 'The participation of counsel during the course of any hearing and while the witness is testifying shall be limited to advising said witness as to his legal rights. Counsel shall not be permitted to engage in oral argument with the committee, but shall confine his activity to the area of legal advice to his client.'

"I would remind those present that we are here at the direction of Congress to discharge an important legislative function. You in the hearing room are here by permission of this committee, and I know and am sure you will conduct yourselves as guests of this committee at all times. Any disturbance of any kind or audible comment during the course of the testimony, whether favorable or unfavorable to any witness, will not be tolerated.

"Mr. Frazier, have you anything further to add?

* * * * *

The record of the proceedings before the subcommittee on August 2, 1957, during which the said Bernard Silber refused to answer the aforesaid questions, is set forth in fact as follows:

"UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES,

"Washington, D. C., Friday, August 2, 1957.

"PUBLIC HEARING

"The subcommittee met, pursuant to notice, at 10:05 a. m., in the caucus room, Old House Office Building, Washington, D. C., Mr. CLYDE DOYLE (chairman of the subcommittee) presiding.

"Committee members present: Representatives CLYDE DOYLE, of California; JAMES B. FRAZIER, JR., of Tennessee, and GORDON H. SCHERER, of Ohio.

"Mr. DOYLE. The committee will please come to order.

"This morning's hearings are a continuation of previous hearings started on July 17, 1957, this being a continuation of a series of hearings in the communications industry in the United States; namely, the position and influence held by members of the Communist Party and organizations dedicated to the Communist objectives in that field of communications industry, principally.

"On July 10, 1957, at a regular meeting of the committee, with all members except two present and voting, a motion was made by Mr. SCHERER and seconded by Mr. FRAZIER, which authorized the holding of these hearings in Washington, D. C., on this general subject.

"The resolution adopted by the committee on July 10, 1957, was as follows:

" 'A motion was made by Mr. SCHERER, seconded by Mr. FRAZIER, and unanimously carried, approving and authorizing the holding of hearings in Washington, beginning July 17, 1957, or at such later date as the chairman may determine, for the purpose of considering whether or not members of the Communist Party, or persons subject to its discipline are employed in various media of communications used in the transmission of vital communications, and the advisability, in the national defense and for internal security, of the adoption of remedial legislation authorizing the Defense Department and other Government agencies to adopt and enforce appropriate regulations designed to protect and preserve inviolate secret and classified Government information and investing in appropriate Government agencies, power to preclude access to vital communication facilities in time of war or other national emergency, persons who probably will engage in, or probably will conspire with others to engage in, acts of espionage or sabotage.'

"Before proceeding further, I would like to include in the record a copy of the order for appointment of this subcommittee, signed by the chairman on the 12th day of July 1957. In it, there is appointed a subcommittee consisting of Mr. FRAZIER, of Tennessee, who is on my left, and Mr. SCHERER, of Ohio, who is on my right, and myself, DOYLE, of California, subcommittee chairman, to conduct these hearings in Washington, D. C., which began on July 17, 1957.

"As this order authorized the subcommittee to conduct hearings on this general subject, beginning on July 17, 1957, let the record further reflect that this hearing is a continuation of those begun on that date.

"(The order of appointment follows:)

" 'ORDER FOR APPOINTMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

" 'TO THE CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

" 'Pursuant to the provisions of law and the rules of this committee, I hereby appoint a subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, consisting of Hon. CLYDE DOYLE, chairman, and Hon. JAMES B. FRAZIER, Jr., and Hon. GORDON SCHERER, associate members, to conduct hearings in Washington, D. C., beginning on July 17, 1957, on all matters within the jurisdiction of the committee, and to take testimony on said day or any succeeding days, and at such times and places as it may deem necessary, until its work is completed.

" 'The clerk of the committee is directed to immediately notify the appointees of their appointment and to file this order as an official committee record, in the order book kept for that purpose.

" 'Given under my hand this 12th day of July 1957.

" '(Signed) FRANCIS E. WALTER,
" 'Committee on Un-American Activities,
" 'House of Representatives.'

"Mr. DOYLE. Those of the subcommittee who are now present and constitute a quorum are, in fact, the full subcommittee that I have just identified.

"Congress, by Public Law 601 of the 79th Congress, placed upon this committee the duty of investigating the extent, character, and objects of un-American propaganda activities in the United States, the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries, or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution, and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid Congress in any necessary remedial legislation.

"Congress has also placed upon this committee the duty of exercising continuous watchfulness of the execution by the administrative agencies concerned of any laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of this committee.

"In these hearings, the second of a series on this general subject, the committee hopes to obtain additional information respecting the extent of the penetration and control exercised by members of the Communist Party in the United States over an industry which is vital at all times to our defense, namely, communications.

"In the event that testimony given during these hearings reflects a situation correctable by legisaltion or which may be remedied by legislation, the committee will recommend the approprate measures at the proper time.

"It is the purpose of the subcommittee in the conduct of these hearings to discharge the duties placed upon us by the Congress by calling witnesses who, we have reason to believe, possess information which will be of value to us and to the Congress in the consideration of such legislation.

"It is a standing rule of this committee that any person named in the course of committee hearings, will be given an early opportunity, upon request, to appear before this committee if he so desires, for the purpose of denying or explaining any testimony given adversely affecting such person. In the event that there are such persons, they should immediately communicate with any member of the committee staff and make their requests known.

"In every hearing, the committee has encouraged witnesses to have legal counsel with them, if they so desire, and it has always welcomed the presence of legal counsel. In fact, the rules of the committee, which are well known and have been publicly distributed and widely distributed, provide that 'at every hearing, public or executive, every witness shall be accorded the privilege of having counsel of his own choosing.

" 'The participation of counsel during the course of any hearing and while the witness is testifying shall be limited to advising said witness as to his legal rights. Counsel shall not be permitted to engage in oral argument with the committee, but shall confine his activity to the area of legal advice to his client.'

"I would respectfully remind those present that we are here at the direction of Congress to discharge an important legislative function. Those in the hearing room are here by permission of the committee, and I trust and I know that you will all conduct yourselves as guests of the committee and of the Congress at all times.

"A disturbance of any kind, or audible comment during the course of testimony, whether favorable or unfavorable to any witness, will not be tolerated.

* * * * *

"Mr. ARENS. The next witness, if you please, will be Mr. Bernard Silber.

"Kindly come forward, Mr. Silber, and remain standing while the chairman administers the oath to you.

"Do you solemnly swear you will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God?

"Mr. SILBER. I do, sir.

"Mr. DOYLE. Please take the witness chair.

"TESTIMONY OF BERNARD SILBER, ACCOMPANIED BY VICTOR RABINOWITZ, COUNSEL

"Mr. ARENS. Kindly identify yourself by name, residence, and occupation.

"Mr. RABINOWITZ. All right. If we are going to have more pictures, let's get them over with before we start.

"Mr. SILBER. The question, please?

"Mr. ARENS. And your occupation?

"Mr. SILBER. Service writer for Western Union Telegraph.

"Mr. ARENS. You are appearing today, Mr. Silber, in response to a subpena which was served upon you by the House Committee on Un-American Activities?

"Mr. SILBER. That is correct.

"Mr. ARENS. And you are represented by counsel?

"Mr. SILBER. That is correct.

"Mr. ARENS. Counsel, kindly identify yourself.

"Mr. RABINOWITZ. Victor Rabinowitz.

"Mr. Arens. How long have you been engaged as a service writer?

"Mr. Silber. Forty-one years.

"Mr. Arens. And have you been engaged as a service writer all that time at Western Union?

"Mr. Silber. That is correct.

"Mr. Arens. Did you have any other job at Western Union besides service writer?

"Mr. Silber. I think for 2 years I was a service clerk, which is just before you become a service writer.

"Mr. Arens. Give us just a thumbnail sketch, Mr. Silber, if you please, of your duties as a service writer.

"Mr. Silber. Messages—I will put it this way: We handle messages after they have been transmitted, and they are referred to our department for certain types of handling, messages undelivered. We report and handle complaints from senders regarding deliveries, nondeliveries, immediate service, messages that come in bearing wrong checks, or what—wrong number of words. We manage to get the record for purposes of charging properly, and so forth.

"Mr. Arens. Have you or have you not access to confidential or restricted messages of any kind of the Government of the United States?

"Mr. Silber. Government messages are handled in the usual course of events.

"Mr. Arens. Just answer the question, please, sir. Do you have access to Government messages?

"Mr. Silber. In my line of work I would say 'Yes.'

"Mr. Arens. Do you have access to Government security messages, coded messages of any kind?

"Mr. Silber. Coded messages; yes. We have no way of telling whether they are security messages or not.

"Mr. Arens. You have access to Government coded messages; is that correct?

"Mr. Silber. That is correct.

"Mr. Arens. Have you now or have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?

"Mr. Silber. I must answer that in two ways. I am not a member of the Communist Party; I was a member of the Communist Party.

"Mr. Arens. When were you a member of the Communist Party?

"Mr. Silber. Well, if I may answer my way, I was a member for a brief period. Oh, from approximately 1948. I almost immediately drifted away. I wasn't too much interested. I was never active. I probably attended meetings for a year or so and then very rarely, and then, within a few years, I just was out.

"Mr. Arens. What cell did you belong to, Mr. Silber, at that time?

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. Just what do you mean by 'cell'?

"Mr. Arens. What group of the Communist Party were you a member of?

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. It had no real name, no designation for it of any kind.

"Mr. Arens. Who enlisted you in the Communist Party?

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. I must decline to answer that, sir.

"Mr. Arens. Why?

"Mr. Silber. On the basis—I have a short statement prepared, if I may—I must decline to answer on the grounds set forth in the decision of the Supreme Court in the Watkins and Sweezy cases, and the statement filed with the committee by Mr. Grumman on July 18, including (1) the lack of jurisdiction of the committee; (2) my rights under the first amendment; (3) the vagueness of the [illegible]tion setting up this committee; and (4) the lack of pertinency of this committee.

"Mr. Doyle. May I inquire?

"Mr. Silber. Yes.

"Mr. Doyle. Of course, you didn't prepare that yourself. Your legal counsel——

"Mr. Silber. It was prepared in conjunction with counsel.

"Mr. Doyle. Yes.

"You have been in the hearing room all morning?

"Mr. Silber. Yes.

"Mr. Doyle. And you heard me state to the last witness that we would not accept—and made it clear to him, I am sure, that we would not accept his reference and stated reliance upon a brief filed by someone else or offered by some other witness on July 17 or 18 before this committee?

"Mr. Silber. Yes.

"Mr. Doyle. I want to make it clear to you, therefore, regardless of what your own legal counsel advised you, this committee does not rely in any way upon your reference to the brief of the gentleman on July 17 or 18, as a valid ground of objecting to answer the questions. Is that clear to you?

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. All right.

"Mr. Doyle. All right.

"Mr. Arens. Before we proceed, if you are——

"Mr. Scherer. Just a minute, Mr. Arens.

"Mr. Arens. I beg your pardon.

"Mr. Scherer. You refused to answer Mr. Arens' question as to the person who recruited you in the Communist Party. You refused to identify that person.

"Now, without identifying him or telling us his name, is that person still a member of the Communist Party today?

"(The witness confers with his counsel.)

"Mr. Scherer. Is he still associated in the same type of work you are associated in?

"(The witness confers with his counsel.)

"Mr. Scherer. As a communications worker?

"Mr. Silber. To the best of my knowledge he is no longer in the industry.

"Mr. Scherer. Was he a communications worker?

"Mr. Silber. I must decline to answer that on the same grounds.

"Mr. Scherer. I ask that you direct the witness to answer the question.

"Mr. Doyle. I direct you to answer the question.

"Mr. Silber. I must decline.

"Mr. Doyle. I didn't hear you.

"Mr. Silber. I must still decline.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest that I be permitted to explain to the witness why it is pertinent to this inquiry for us to insist that this witness tell us whether or not the person who recruited him into the Communist Party was at that time in the communications field as a communications worker.

"Now, Mr. Witness, this committee is considering legislation to safeguard this Nation from possible espionage or sabotage facilities by Communists.

"If the person who enlisted you into the Communist Party was engaged in the communications field, that person undoubtedly would have some information which would be of use to this committee in developing facts respecting Communist penetration of the communications facilities of this country.

"Therefore, I respectfully suggest now, Mr. Chairman, that this witness be ordered and directed to tell the committee whether or not the person who recruited him into the Communist Party was, to his knowledge, engaged in the communications industry.

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Doyle. Go ahead, continue your counsel with the witness.

"Mr. Rabinowitz. I understand that counsel asked for a direction.

"Mr. Arens. That is correct.

"Mr. Doyle. I will make the direction when you are through counseling the witness.

"Mr. Rabinowitz. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, you make the direction first. If you do not make your direction, I will not have to counsel the witness.

"Mr. Doyle. I want to say to the witness before I make the direction: You were in the hearing room all this morning, Witness?

"Mr. Silber. That is correct.

"Mr. Doyle. And you heard me read my opening statement; did you not?

"Mr. Silber. I believe I did, yes.

"Mr. Doyle. You believe you did. Now, I direct you to answer counsel's question. I direct you to answer that last question. He has explained to you the pertinency, and my opening statement explained the pertinency of this investigation also.

"Mr. Arens. And so that there can be no question on this record, the question presently asked and outstanding is for you to please tell the committee whether or not the person who recruited you into the Communist Party was himself engaged in the communications industry.

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. May I have a short recess, please, for a few moments?

"Mr. Rabinowitz. May we have a moment or two to consult on this?

"Mr. Doyle. Yes; go ahead and take it.

"(At this point a short recess was taken, after which the hearing was resumed.)

"Mr. Doyle. The committee will please come to order again, after a few minutes recess, and the record will show that all three persons who are members of the subcommittee are personally present.

"Proceed, Mr. Arens.

"Mr. Arens. There is a question outstanding on the record and the witness wanted to confer with counsel, and I take it he has conferred and he is now ready to give his response to the question.

"Mr. Silber. After consultation with counsel, I decided I must answer that on the grounds, on the reasons stated previously, in addition I wish to add the question——

"Mr. Doyle. Well, previously stated in the statement you read?

"Mr. Silber. That is right.

"Mr. Doyle. That will be sufficient.

"Mr. Silber. Including the matter of personal conscience which prevents me from doing things that I am not sure of, and also on the grounds that I don't see what this question has to do with the question propaganda which this committee is concerned with.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Chairman, when you said that would be sufficient, I take it you wanted the record to reflect his reasons are sufficiently set forth in the record but that this committee does not accept his reasons and directs him and orders him to give a response.

"Mr. Doyle. That is correct.

"We are not accepting the reasons; we are merely stating that the reference to the same statement you said was prepared with the assistance of counsel, and which you previously read will be sufficient for you to refer to that as reasons why you refuse to answer this instead of taking the time to reread it.

"Mr. Silber. That is right.

"Mr. Arens. Mr. Witness, I want to make a statement to you.

"On the basis of extensive staff investigation it is the judgment of the staff that there is now in the establishment in which you are engaged at least one cell of the Communist Party operating.

"We should like to have you tell us now whether or not there are any persons engaged at Western Union who at any time have been known by you to be Communists.

"Mr. Silber. I think I must decline to answer that question on the grounds stated.

"Mr. Arens. I say to you that the pertinency of that question is this:

"If you do have such information and if we can get the names of those people and if we can get them to testify, we will have information which will form a solid foundation upon which this committee can recommend legislation to the Congress, to protect the security of this Nation.

"I therefore, Mr. Chairman, respectfully suggest now that the witness be ordered and directed to answer the question which is outstanding on this record.

"Mr. Doyle. I make that direction.

"Counsel now for the second time has explained the pertinency of the other question, and that same explanation plus this explanation as to pertinency applies.

"(The witness confers with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. The fact is, having been out of the party——

"Mr. Scherer. I didn't hear that.

"Mr. Silber. Having been out of the group so long I have no knowledge of anyone at this time of the people—no knowledge of anyone being a member, who was a member of that group, being a member of that group today. I can't——

"Mr. Arens. You know that isn't the question I asked you.

"Let us get the record clear.

"Mr. Arens. Counsel, you know your sole and exclusive prerogative is to advise your client as to his legal rights.

"You know what the question is, and you understand it. If you do not understand it say "I don't understand it."

"The question is: Do you, Mr. Witness, know people who are presently engaged in Western Union in the communications facilities who at any time have been known by you to be Communists?

"(The witness conferred with his counsel.)

"Mr. Silber. I must decline to answer that for the same reasons.

"Mr. Arens. Now, Mr. Witness, let the record carry forth the same explanation that I gave to you a few moments ago as to why I regard this question as pertinent.

"And I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the record now reflect an order and direction of the witness to answer the question.

"Mr. Doyle. I direct you to answer the question, Witness. We do not feel that your answer is sufficient and cannot accept it here.

"Mr. Silber. I must still decline. I am sorry.

"Mr. Scherer. As I understand it, in refusing and in declining to answer this last question and the previous question, you are not refusing to do so on the basis of the fifth amendment?

"Mr. Silber. That is correct.

"Mr. Scherer. All right.

"Mr. Rabinowitz. May I address the Chair just for a moment on this? There is a legal issue involved.

"Mr. Doyle. No. We are not settling issues here. This is not a court.

"Mr. Rabinowitz. I would like to clarify the reference to the fifth amendment. There are many parts of the fifth amendment.

"Mr. Doyle. You clarify it with your witness, not with us.

"(Counsel conferred with the witness.)

"Mr. Silber. I am stating I am not relying on the self-incriminating clause of the fifth amendment.

"Mr. Doyle. Judge Frazier? Have you any questions?

"Mr. Frazier. I have no questions.

"Mr. Doyle. Have you any further questions, Mr. Scherer?

"Mr. Scherer. I have no further questions.

"Mr. Doyle. May I ask this, Witness:

"When you first began to answer questions here, you volunteered the statement in answer to the question, that you had been a Communist?

"Mr. Silber. That is correct.

"Mr. Doyle. Do you remember doing that?

"Mr. Silber. That is correct.

"Mr. Doyle. All right?

"Now, why did you do that?

"Mr. Silber. I probably was interested. It is hard to explain, probably for theoretical grounds or some other grounds.

"Mr. Doyle. Why did you withdraw from the Communist Party?

"Mr. Silber. I lost——

"Mr. Doyle. After being in it a few years, as you testified?

"Mr. Silber. It wasn't a few years, sir; it was relatively short.

"I lost interest in it. I found I wasn't interested enough to do anything about it.

"Mr. Doyle. Why weren't you interested in the Communist Party group that you were in? What did you find about it that didn't keep your interest?

"Mr. Silber. Well, it simply didn't. I had other interests probably, that kept me more occupied. I didn't think sufficiently of it to keep me there.

"Mr. Doyle. You attended meetings quite frequently.

"Mr. Silber. Not frequently, sir. I might say frankly, after a very short time I attended the meetings infrequently. In other words, it was just a complete drifting away and it took such a time.

"Mr. Doyle. What caused you to drift away?

"Mr. Silber. I stated I was no longer interested in it. I don't believe that I was politically conscious in the first place; it wasn't interesting, and I just drifted away. I never formed too many opinions on it, and that was it.

"Mr. Scherer. What union do you belong to?

"Mr. Silber. The American Communications Association.

"Mr. Scherer. Were any of the officers of your union members of the Communist Party at the time you were a member of the Communist Party?

"Mr. Silber. I must decline to answer that, sir.

"Mr. Scherer. I ask that you direct the witness to answer the question.

"Mr. Silber. I must decline on all the grounds previously stated.

"Mr. Scherer. Were any of the present officers of your union members of the Communist Party at the time you were in the party?

"Mr. Silber. I must decline for the same reasons. I must decline to answer.

"Mr. Scherer. I ask that you direct the witness to answer the question.

"Mr. Silber. I must decline to answer.

"Mr. Scherer. And those questions were asked you for the same reasons that Mr. Arens, our counsel, gave you for asking the other questions. They are pertinent for the same reasons that he advanced.

"Mr. Doyle. May I inquire for one question?

"Mr. Silber. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Doyle. Have you any suggestions to this committee, and therefore, your Congress, in the field of legislation, anything you think or suggest that we might consider legislation which would protect the security of this Nation against any subversive activities, sabotage, or interference with Government messages, either in time of war or peace?

"Mr. Silber. Frankly, I don't consider myself qualified to offer any suggestions along technical lines or things of that sort. I really don't consider myself qualified in offering any suggestion.

"Mr. Doyle. I want to compliment you in getting out of the Communist group when you did. I also hope the time will come before long when you will feel it is also your duty and your obligation to yourself and family and your Nation to come to Congress and help us understand the Communist Party as you understood it when you got out of it. You got out of it, although you have not given us the full reasons here today, I don't feel, you got out of it for some other reasons. You were dissatisfied with it. It had no attraction for you.

"Now, why didn't it? I do not think you have given us the full answer, and I wish you would come to the point where you can help us.

"Try to do that, will you?

"Mr. Silber. I am sorry.

"Mr. Doyle. You needn't be sorry. I have given you an invitation.

"Mr. Silber. I have given you the best answer that I could under the circumstances. I have a conscience to protect, and other things. I am sorry.

"The committee today is continued to Friday, August 9, at 10 a. m., in this room.

"(Whereupon, at 12:15 p. m., Friday, August 2, 1957, the subcommitte recessed to August 9, 1957, at 10 a. m.)"

Because of the foregoing, the said Committee on Un-American Activities was deprived of answers to pertinent questions propounded to the said Bernard Silber relative to the subject matter which, under Public Law 601, section 121, subsection (q) (2) of the 79th Congress, and under House Resolution 5 of the 85th Congress, the said committee was instructed to investigate, and the refusal of the witness to answer the questions, namely:

"Was he a communications worker?

"We should like to have you tell us now whether or not there are any persons engaged at Western Union who at any time have been known by you to be Communists.

"Were any of the present officers of your union members of the Communist Party at the time you were in the party?"

which questions were pertinent to the subject under inquiry, is a violation of the subpena under which the witness had previously appeared, and his refusal to answer the aforesaid questions deprived your committee of necessary and pertinent testimony and places the said witness in contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States.

"Be it resolved, That the chairman be authorized and empowered from time to time to appoint subcommittees composed of 3 or more members of the Committee on Un-American Activities, at least 1 of whom shall be of the minority political party, and a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, for the purpose of performing any and all acts which the committee as a whole is authorized to perform."

The following is an extract from the minutes of an executive session of the subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities consisting of Hon. Clyde Doyle, chairman, Hon. James B. Frazier, and Hon. Gordon H. Scherer, held on the 21st day of

"In the absence of Hon. CLYDE DOYLE, chairman, the subcommittee was called to order by Hon. FRANCIS E. WALTER, chairman of the committee as a whole, acting as chairman ex officio of the subcommittee, who stated that the purpose of the meeting was to consider what action the subcommittee would take regarding the refusal of certain witnesses to answer questions propounded to them in the course of hearings conducted by the subcommittee in Washington, D. C., on the 2d day of August 1957, and what recommendations it would make regarding the citation of any such witness for contempt of the House of Representatives.

"After full consideration of the testimony of certain witnesses, a motion was made and unanimously adopted that a report of facts relating to the refusal of Bernard Silber to answer questions before the said subcommittee at the hearings aforesaid be referred and submitted to the Committee on Un-American Activities as a whole, with a recommendation that the report of facts relating thereto be referred to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that the said witness be cited for contempt of the House of Representatives for his refusal to answer questions therein set forth, to the end that he may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law."

The following is an extract from the minutes of an executive session of the Committee on Un-American Activities, consisting of Hon. FRANCIS E. WALTER, Hon. MORGAN M. MOULDER, Hon. JAMES B. FRAZIER, JR., Hon. GORDON H. SCHERER, and Hon. ROBERT J. MCINTOSH, held on the 21st day of August 1957, in room 226, Old House Office Building.

"The report of the facts relating to the refusal of Bernard Silber to answer questions was submitted to the committee as a whole, upon which a motion was made by Mr. SCHERER, seconded by Mr. FRAZIER, and unanimously carried, that the subcommittee's report of the facts relating to the refusal of Bernard Silber to answer questions before the said subcommittee at hearings conducted before it in Washington, D. C., on August 2, 1957, be, and the same is hereby approved, and adopted, and that the Committee on Un-American Activities report and refer the refusal of Bernard Silber to answer questions before the said subcommittee, together with all the facts in connection therewith, to the House of Representatives, with a recommendation that the witness be cited for contempt by the House of Representatives, for his refusal to answer questions, to the end that he may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 409) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives certify the report of the Committee on Un-American Activities of the House of Representatives as to the refusal of Bernard Silber to answer questions before a duly constituted subcommittee of the Committee on Un-American Activities, together with all of the facts in connection therewith, under seal of the House of Representatives, to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia, to the end that the said Bernard Silber may be proceeded against in the manner and form provided by law.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTER. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained in a dentist's chair, where I was receiving emergency treatment, when the rollcall occurred on House Resolution 407 citing Louis Earl Hartman for contempt. If I had been present I would have voted "yea." I was present when House Resolution 408 was adopted by voice vote and I voted "yea."

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, the matter before the House now involves the refusal of one Bernard Silber to testify as to facts that we felt would be of great assistance in the preparation of the National Security Act.

Silber admitted he was a Communist, and the committee was interested in knowing whether or not the officers of the union of which he was a member, the communications union, were Communists at the time he was testifying. We were positive he could furnish us with this information. The testimony that we attempted to adduce was extremely important because of the position this man occupied. He was in a position to decode secret Government messages.

I could not imagine a place where more damage could be done than in the position this man occupied. The committee was of the opinion that there were other people in the same union who were also in strategic positions; and, of course, our entire questioning was directed toward eliciting from these witnesses information that would have formed the basis for legislation.

We felt that the questioning was in accordance with the rule laid down in the Watkins case. The witness was advised fully as to the purpose of the hearing. The fact that he did not invoke the fifth amendment but relied on a decision of the Supreme Court, I believe, indicates very clearly the need to give the Supreme Court another look at this entire question.

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. This is an important citation, is it not?

Mr. WALTER. It is extremely important.

I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOSMER].

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question with respect to the proposed legislation regarding the Jencks case. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself both have bills in on that matter, as well as many other Members. Members on this side are very interested in it, having recently, during this week, passed a resolution in that regard.

I personally feel that the importance of the legislation has been highlighted by the recent indictment of Colonel Abel, a member of the Soviet Army espionage ring. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what progress is being made toward bringing that legislation to the floor, and if it is possible that we can handle it before this session adjourns?

Mr. WALTER. The bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and an application has been made to the Committee on Rules for a rule. That is the present status.

It is the hope of those of us interested in protecting the files of the FBI that we would be recognized to suspend the rules in the event a rule is not given promptly.

Mr. HOSMER. I am certainly reassured to hear of the gentleman's vigorous work on that piece of legislation, because I am sure many of the Members here want to do something to meet this extreme need.

Mr. WALTER. I would like to say in reply to the gentleman from California that the courts have misconstrued that decision just as badly as they did in the Watkins case. As a matter of fact, in one of the circuits the court went so far as to hold that because in the trial court the jury was denied access to the proceedings before the grand jury—and grand jury proceedings are secret, of course—the conviction had to be set aside.

Mr. HOSMER. I think that is an extremely important point because some people think perhaps the decision does not do any harm; but the confusion that has been thrown into the law by that decision is making it almost impossible for the Department of Justice to proceed in adequately protecting the security of the country and adequately prosecuting security as well as other cases that they have before it.

Mr. WALTER. If the gentleman remembers, in the Jencks case the decision of the Supreme Court pointed out that the question of national security was not raised; and I am enough of an optimist to believe that if the Supreme Court should get another look at that proposition where the question of security was raised, they might think in terms of the security—I say "might"—of the United States.

Mr. HOSMER. We should certainly hope so. Meanwhile, the field is left open and utterly confused.

Mr. WALTER. Yes; it would be a tragic thing if we adjourned without enacting legislation in this field.

Mr. HOSMER. I thank the gentleman and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the gentleman that this is an important citation, I object to the vote on the ground a quorum is not present and make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 263, nays 0, not voting 169, as follows:

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Heselton] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Heselton], for today be transferred to Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMED FORCES RESERVES

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Brooks], is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I have recently written the Secretary of Defense concerning a matter which is causing me grave concern.

I have reference to the development of new policies regarding the training of the Armed Forces Reserves.

There seems to be a trend to de-emphasize the training programs for older experienced officers in the various military services.

I have received considerable mail—and I am sure this is true of the other Members of Congress—from these citizen soldiers, sailors, and airmen who have a genuine concern for the effect these new policies may have on the national security.

There seems to be considerable dissatisfaction with the Air Force's so-called match-merge program because it will discourage a great many Reserve officers, if not actually halt their training. There is discouragement on the part of students assigned to United States Army Reserve schools and those with mobilization designations. This comes about because these people, totaling about 22,000 experienced, trained officers, many of them battlewise, will be deprived of drill pay in the future. I fear that abandonment of this portion of the incentive program will have a serious effect upon the morale and effectiveness of these reservists. I am the first to agree that we must continue the 6 months' training program because I understand the need for young enlisted reservists. On the other hand, I do not wish to see our Reserve officers treated in a cavalier manner merely because we seem to temporarily have a surplus of manpower.

Of course, I realize that some of the economies presently brought about are due to the necessity of having to shift funds from one type of Reserve training program to another. The 6-month program requires considerable money if we are to maintain even a modicum of training in this program. I helped develop this idea on the floor of the House the other day and was glad to receive assurance from members of the Appropriations Committee—especially Mr. Sikes of Florida—that the door is wide open for an appeal by the Defense Department for more money for Reserve training programs in January, if such is the desire and objective of the Defense Department. I feel that a thorough study should be made by the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and that they should be ready to come up with recommendations to our subcommittee in January.

Mr. Speaker, President George Washington first proposed reliance on an "energetic national militia" and since that time the traditional military policy in this country, in peacetime, has been to maintain a comparatively small Regular Establishment augmented by trained civilians.

The Department of Defense has recently announced the necessity for reducing the size of our active forces. Other reductions may follow. It is now, in my opinion, that we must take another look at our Reserve program, for I cannot foresee the international situation allowing us the luxury of reducing our Reserve forces as well.

We have a heavy investment in our Reserve officers, many of whom are combat trained. It would be folly to so reduce the Reserve program as to render it ineffective for any of these officers. We cannot afford to allow Reserve officers to drift away from the Reserve program for lack of interest or incentive.

We are told that we must reduce the size of our active forces in order to save money. Naturally, I want to effect savings for our taxpayers, but I do not want to do so at the expense of the Nation's security. We all know that the cost of maintaining a soldier in the active forces is many times the cost of maintaining the same soldier in the Reserve. Actually, the money spent for the Reserve program is one of our best investments in national security. It is for the foregoing reasons that I have asked the Secretary of Defense to require the military departments to make a thorough and painstaking study of their Reserves so that their findings can be reported to my subcommittee when Congress reconvenes in January.

We must have the Department's recommendations on the future size and roles and missions which we can expect the various Reserve components to assume in the future. In view of the international situation, the need for economy in defense spending, and the changing concepts of warfare, this study is necessary so that the Congress may be informed and, if necessary, enact implementing legislation.

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MILLER of Maryland. I want to congratulate and commend the gentleman for a very important and very worthwhile statement, and wish to add my voice to what he is saying. I think he is entirely right and that it is most important that we consider this problem very carefully.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I thank my friend for his kind remarks.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa who is a distinguished member of the Committee on Armed Services of the House.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM of Iowa. I thank the gentleman and I also wish to thank him for his splendid remarks and congratulate him for the position he has taken. I trust something will be done along the lines suggested by him.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN], also a member of the Committee on Armed Services and very much interested in what the gentleman from Louisiana has had to say, may have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD following those of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEVEREUX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. DEVEREUX. As the gentleman knows, I have been associated with this program for some time. I want to call the attention of the membership, and I think the gentleman is in agreement with me, to one subject when he speaks of Reserves. Does he include the National Guard?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Yes. The National Guard is, of course, a component part of the Reserves.

Mr. DEVEREUX. So that the National Guard people will know that the committee is very much concerned about the apparent change in policy, which I regret very much. I trust we will have a very thorough and detailed report from the Department of Defense in January.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. May I say to the gentleman from Maryland, who has worked hard on this same program, that the whole country is disturbed about the changes being effected. I dare say every Member of Congress is going to hear during vacation about some of these things and some of the comment may not be very palatable to the Members.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I hope the gentleman's subcommittee will look into this extension of the obligated service of those entering into the cadet field training program. I hope they will go into that. It may well be that some extension of service is necessary and in the best interest of our national defense. On the other hand, as I said on the floor yesterday, I know of no way by which we can reconcile an obligated service of 5 years for these young men while requiring an obligated service of only 3 years for those coming out of West Point and Annapolis.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. The ROTC members attend school largely at their own expense. The men who go to West Point, Annapolis, and the Air Force Academy do so at Government expense. Their obligation for active duty should correspond with the longer and heavier obligation now given to the flying ROTC officer. The ROTC man is a civilian at heart and he attends school at his own expense and gets his own education.

There is one matter we will have to take up with the services to make the obligation of the graduates of the Academies correspond to the obligation which they presently impose upon the civilian trained ROTC reservists.

Mr. GROSS. I want to commend the gentleman for that statement and say further that if it is within the purview of the gentleman's subcommittee I hope the subcommittee will give attention to a bill that I introduced yesterday to extend the obligated service of those who graduate from the various Academies.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I have not read the gentleman's bill yet, but I certainly will during the weeks that are ahead of me.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the floor at this time to eulogize the gentleman who is in the well of the House. I had the privilege of going to Korea with him when he was chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services. I shall always remember his effective administration of that committee as chairman. All of us who were on that trip, including our friend, Ralph Roberts, the Clerk of the House, enjoyed it because the gentleman was such an effective administrator.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. The gentleman is very kind and I appreciate greatly his remarks.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS] in the remarks he made in the forepart of his statement when time was yielded to him. I think we should examine into the type of work being assigned to these young men who are being held in service longer than their contract first provided. We should see if that work which is assigned to them cannot be done by people of lesser grades or by civilians. I think that the United States Government should be a paragon of virtue in maintaining its contracts and not be known for its breach of them.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, let me say to my distinguished friend that these men are not being required to extend their active-duty service against their own will. They are being permitted the option of staying in flight training for 5 years or remaining in nonflight service for the presently agreed period of 3 years. Nonetheless, I am in accord with him when he says that this is a very heavy obligation that they are placing upon men who are trained as civilian reservists. I think that the obligation should be evened up. The gentleman may rest assured that we are going to look into that very carefully when these hearings open.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I am more than pleased to learn from the gentleman of the appropriate action that he and his committee have taken looking into this state of affairs as far as our Reserve components are concerned.

I would say to the gentleman that it has been a matter of continuing concern to me over a long period of years that it would appear that some of our military, the professionals, give lipservice to the need for and the dependence which they place upon the civilian reserve, but do very little about actually implementing that and making a workable force until an emergency arises, when it is too late.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. Yes; and may I say to my distinguished friend this: That for 10 or 15 years we have been struggling with the Reserve program, which did not produce the manpower, and within 90 days after we get the available manpower which we needed, and even more than we actually need, then the problem changes immediately to one of curtailing our program of Reserve training. I think that needs thorough investigation.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I think another item is the use of these men who have signed up for the Reserve and whom they have taken into the Reserve, namely, giving them enough to do and keeping them interested in the activities of the Reserve, because I think there has been a real failing in that regard in the past.

Mr. DEVEREUX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DEVEREUX. I think we should get the record straight and should make inquiries about what is going on. But the cost of training a jet-bomber pilot is something like $250,000; at least the testimony has indicated that. Therefore, if we want to train those people, the Government must get some very definite returns so far as their use is concerned in the Air Force. That is one of the reasons why the requirement has been placed upon them to extend their period of active duty and, as the gentleman from Louisiana so well brought out, they are doing that purely on a voluntary basis.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. That is true.

Mr. DEVEREUX. The extension of the service for those people coming out of the military academies, as to that I certainly would be inclined to go along with the gentleman from Iowa. I think it is a pity and a shame that we have these young men who go through the academies but who do not give real service to our country after having received their education at Government expense.

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. So many of them now, when they finish their course in the academies and serve the minimum requirement of years, get out of the service at once.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Louisiana. I yield to the gentleman from Florida, who has done such fine work on the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. I appreciate very much the kind remarks the gentleman from Louisiana has made about me. We have enjoyed many years together here in the House and I have always found him alert to the needs of our national defense as well as to all things concerning the betterment of our country.

First, I would like to congratulate the gentleman on the leadership he is taking on this vital Reserve Forces issue. I wish to assure him that I feel that he is on sound ground and that I will consider it a privilege to work with him on correcting this situation.

Secondly, I would like to express the thought that when our personnel in the Armed Forces is being drastically cut at the request of the White House, for budgetary reasons, it is a particularly inappropriate time to be leveling blows at the Reserve Forces of our country. If our standing forces on active duty must be cut, we will then need more than before, the existence of additional strength in our Reserves. From an outstanding reservist in Florida I have just received a letter which includes the following comment: "In the State of Florida there are Reserve units composed of municipal and county law-enforcement officers who receive pay for inactive duty training as reservists to be military policemen in time of national emergency; there are engineers, architects, postal clerks, medical technicians, and so for the manifold occupations which have counterparts in civilian and military life. But no money is allocated to train a doughboy—a rifleman, a machinegunner, a mortar man." If this analysis of the situation in Florida is accurate, and I have every reason to believe that it is, this is certainly an unfortunate and highly dangerous situation.

Personally, I am going to do everything I can to correct this and will welcome the opportunity to work with the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana in an effort to find a prompt and adequate solution.

Mr. BENNETT of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am most encouragegd by the fact that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BROOKS], because of his long experience in dealing with the Armed Forces as well as because of the wisdom he has acquired through long service in this House, has evidenced a determination to delve into a matter which is of such vital concern to all of us.

Every schoolboy in America knows that this country won its independence with a nonprofessional, civilian military force, facing hopeless odds against the best-trained, most skilled mercenaries the world at that time had available.

We also know that throughout the history of our great country we have maintained our independence and have protected our liberties and our way of life through the prompt springing to arms of the civilian soldiers, civilian sailors, and civilian airmen—the minutemen of every generation—when their country needed their strength, their arms, and their valor.

It is true that we have reached the nuclear age, that specialization is the military keynote of this era and that quality and scientific advancement are the vital links in our security.

But this does not alter, by one whit, the fact that our civilian components of the military services have vital roles in our system of national security. In the event of mobilization, we still must rely for our protection upon the men and women who will come from the farms, the shops, the offices, and the trades, temporarily to don uniforms and shoulder arms and fight for America whatever may be the modern concept of warfare.

America's military record has been great not because we had numerically superior forces in all of our conflicts; as a matter of fact, we have been opposed by superior numbers and, apparently, insuperable odds time after time. We have won because we have built, nurtured, and maintained the minuteman spirit—with a combat morale matched few times before in history.

I do not wish to question the judgment of our military leaders but I am convinced the type of review or investigation which the gentleman from Louisiana has indicated the committee intends to make is in the national interest and I believe that, in initiating and carrying out such a program, he merits and does carry with him the best wishes and gratitude of not only all Members of the House but of the rank and file of citizenry of this great country.

INTERSTATE TRAFFIC IN FIREARMS AND AMMUNITION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, in the Federal Register of July 10, 1957, the Department of the Treasury published proposed regulations on the interstate traffic in firearms and ammunition, and at that time announced than on August 27 the Alcohol and Tobacco Tax Division of the Internal Revenue Service of the Treasury Department would hold hearings with reference to those proposed regulations.

The regulations cover a number of subjects. Some of them are very desirable and should be adopted. A good many of those regulations already exist in either law or regulation and these constitute some revision or amendment thereto. However, there are a number of proposed regulations which should not be adopted. The National Rifle Association and practically all sportsmen in the United States who are informed of this proposal are in strong opposition to these specific portions of the proposed regulations. I shall enumerate them:

First. The proposal that each manufacturer or importer of a firearm shall identify it by stamping, in a manner not readily obliterated or altered, the name and location of the manufacturer or importer and the serial number, caliber, and model of the firearm.

Second. The proposal that dealers' records of importation, shipment, and disposal of firearms must be retained permanently on the premises until discontinuance of business by the licensee.

Third. The proposal that manufacturers and dealers maintain records reflecting the production or receipt and the disposition at wholesale or retail of all pistol and revolver ammunition; such ammunition to be described as to manufacturer, type, caliber, quantity, and the identity of the person from whom received and to whom sold.

Fourth. The proposal that a person purchasing a firearm or pistol or revolver ammunition in over-the-counter sale or distribution must acknowledge receipt thereof in his own handwriting in the prescribed dealer's records.

Fifth. The proposal that any Internal Revenue officer shall have authority to examine the books, papers, and records kept by a manufacturer or dealer, and to examine his premises and stock during regular business hours in the daytime or whenever such premises may be open at night.

Mr. Speaker, these constitute attempts at this time to institute a system of registration of firearms. For a period of more than 30 years various elements in the United States have attempted to pass legislation or secure administrative regulation for the registration of firearms.

The constitution guarantees to the people of this country the right to keep and bear arms. Registration of firearms is the first step of infringement of that right.

It is evident, or should be, to all that registration will be observed by the law abiding. The lawless will pay it no heed.

I take the position, as do others who oppose these regulations, that all laws with reference to the control, registration and what not of firearms must remain within the jurisdiction of the respective States. Disarming the law-abiding citizen is of no value. I point to the fact that the State of New York has the most stringent law on the possession of firearms of any State in the Union and even the casual reader of the daily press can see that even delinquent juveniles in the State of New York seem to have ready access to firearms and other weapons. For a period of 15 years, and up until 1941, bills had been pending here to provide for the registration of firearms. In 1941, while the Congress was engaged in a frenzied effort to prepare for a war which most of us knew was inevitable, there came before the Congress the bill (S. 1579) to authorize the President of the United States to requisition property required for the defense of the United States. When that Senate bill was being considered by the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I was a member at that time, I developed from Judge Patterson, the Under Secretary of War, that the language was intended to include, and did include, firearms and they were particularly interested in the question of shotguns. Judge Patterson at that time stated that they had already made their plans for registration of firearms and particularly of shotguns. In the Committee on Military Affairs, I offered an amendment to the Senate bill which read:

> That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize the requisition, or require the registration, of firearms possessed by any individual for his personal protection or safety (and the possession of which is not prohibited or the registration thereof required) nor shall this act in any manner impair or infringe the right of any individual to keep and bear arms.

When that bill passed the House, it contained the amendment which I had offered in committee. When it came back to the House from the other body in the conference report, my amendment had been eliminated from the bill and substituted in place thereof was a provision "that nothing in the act shall be construed to impair or infringe in any manner the right of any individual to keep and bear arms." In other words, the Senate had repeated the language of the Constitution. That conference report was considered in the House of Representatives on the 13th day of August 1941. Opposition was made to the conference report because it had eliminated the language of the amendment that I had placed in the bill to prevent the registration of firearms and the requisitioning of firearms. A motion to recommit the conference report was made here with instructions to include the House amendments, and upon a roll-call, the conference report was recommitted by a vote of 255 to 51, exactly 5 to 1. When the conference report came back to the House, it contained the almost identical language of the original House amendment. Thereupon that conference report was adopted. I want to point out that there have been other efforts to secure legislation or regulation for the registration of firearms. In 1947, the Department of Justice attempted to secure such a regulation. It is now clear that having failed in all of the previous attempts for a period of more than 30 years to secure legislation to require the registration of firearms of sportsmen, they are now attempting to acquire it by administrative action and I hope it will not be overlooked by the officer holding the hearings on the 27th day of August that the Congress of the United States even in the excitement and the frenzy of preparation for war by a vote of 5 to 1 rejected a provision which would have permitted exactly what is now attempted to be done by the Treasury Department by regulation.

Mr. IKARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. IKARD. Like the distinguished gentleman from Texas, I have shared his great concern over the proposed regulations. It seems to me that as he has so ably pointed out and largely through his interest and others here in the House, the Congress has repeatedly indicated clearly that it was not the intention of any legislation that was considered or passed here that there would be any registration.

The proposed serial numbers that may be required under these regulations are certainly not in keeping with the intent of the law. As my distinguished colleague has so ably pointed out, this is simply an attempt to do by administrative procedure that which could not be done through normal legislative procedure. It seems to me that if these regulations were put into effect they would drastically hamper and penalize every sportsman and law-abiding citizen of this country, every dealer and every manufacturer of firearms. They would utterly fail to deter the criminal element. I congratulate my distinguished fellow Texan in calling this to the attention of the House.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman.

Since he has pointed out the serial-number question, I want to make it clear that approximately one-half the shotguns and two-thirds of all rifles manufactured in the United States are manufactured and sold without a serial number. With the antique weapons which might be transferred, it would be necessary that they be defaced in order to include such a serial number to comply with such regulation.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM of Iowa. I wish to thank the gentleman for bringing this matter up. I wish to associate myself with the splendid remarks the gentleman has made. I have received many communications from sportsmen, in opposition to this proposed regulation by the Department. If that regulation goes into effect, a farmer cannot buy a shotgun or a rifle for use on his farm without its being registered and he having to sign a receipt and giving information as to what he intends to use it for and the same with the ammunition which he buys for that gun.

Mr. KILDAY. The gentleman is exactly correct. Actually there would not be much objection on the part of the farmers, but for a period of 3 years there has been an attempt to get this registration provision. It was always rejected. We cannot expect them to come in with a straight-out registration which they actually want; but, to begin with they propose an apparently reasonable provision such as this. In other words, they are attempting to do indirectly what they cannot do directly by act of Congress.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM of Iowa. Does not the gentleman feel that it is an attempt to place this regulation over our protest, and it will be the duty of the United States to pass legislation to prevent it?

Mr. KILDAY. Definitely. Congress will have to take action.

Mr. PELLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. PELLY. I think the gentleman has made a very splendid statement. I have a great many complaints from my constituents regarding the imposition of these unnecessary regulations. Out of his long background I think the gentleman has contributed a great deal, and I shall look forward to rereading his statement and passing it on to my constituents.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Texas. I would like further to state to the gentleman and to this House that on the 27th of this month a number of bureaucrats in the Alcohol Tax Unit are going to get together and try to saddle the sportsmen and hunters of this country with regulations which may go a long way toward eliminating hunting and the possession of firearms by the people of this country under our Constitution, which confers on them the right to hold such firearms and such ammunition. I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman in condemning the great load that this is going to place on the ammunition manufacturers, sporting goods dealers, hardware dealers across this country who handle firearms. It may well prevent these people from selling supplies.

Mr. BREEDING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. BREEDING. I want also to associate myself with the remarks of my colleague from Texas. I, too, have received many letters of protest against this ruling from constituents. I have sent them down to the Department of Internal Revenue.

I hope that if this regulation is issued Congress will take some action to nullify it, because my people do not want to have to be registered to get guns to shoot rabbits, coyotes, and things like that.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. I wish to join my colleagues in expressing my appreciation to the gentleman from Texas for what he is doing and the fine statement he has made. It may be just a coincidence, but it happens that right now in Vandalia, Ohio, they are having their great annual shoot. It has been going on for a week, but today is the big day, and while I am here, my heart is out there.

I know that all those shooters are unalterably opposed to this regulation. They are opposed to it on the ground that it would practically make it impossible to continue their wonderful sport of trapshooting; and the regulation will serve no useful purpose when it is enacted. It would be more likely to help the criminal than the other fellow. The other fellow is the one who needs to be protected, yet he is not protected. I think, therefore, it would defeat its own purpose.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. LANHAM. I, too, Mr. Speaker, have received many protests against these proposed regulations. I trust that if they are issued that the gentleman from Texas and his committee will bring out legislation nullifying them.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PILLION. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. PILLION. I wish to associate myself with the gentleman from Texas in his remarks. I wonder if the gentleman can give us his opinion as to whether or not the Department presently has authority to enact these proposed regulations for the registration of firearms?

Mr. KILDAY. There are two laws involved; one is the National Firearms Act of 1934, the other is the Federal Firearms Act of 1938. The National Firearms Act is a tax act designed to eliminate the submachinegun, the sawed-off shotgun, and the traditional weapons of gangsters. The Federal Firearms Act has to do with regulations concerning the interstate transportation of firearms. This latter law applies to practically all firearms and ammunition.

These laws do grant to the Department power to make regulations for their enforcement. The provisions to which I have referred specifically are only a few of a number contained in the proposed regulations. In my opinion they are neither authorized, justified, nor desirable as regulations within the power delegated by the Congress to the Department to make regulations.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Texas. I, too, represent an area of the West which is known for its hunting, its sport, and recreation, and also the hunting of game as a business, which is important to the people.

I have looked into the proposed regulations very carefully. It seems to me particularly that the regulations requiring the keeping of permanent records forever is a very stringent one, and that it would be particularly serious to both the makers and users of ammunition and firearms.

I congratulate the gentleman and agree with him.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I, too, wish to associate myself with the position taken by the gentleman from Texas. I always appreciate the positions taken by the gentleman because in many matters in which we have been associated I have always found his opinion sound. Understandably I have a high regard for him, and I am glad to associate myself with him in the solution of this important matter.

Mr. KILDAY. It is needless for me to say that I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. BROOKS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BROOKS of Texas. I, too, would like to associate myself with the very fine statement the gentleman has made and to congratulate him on his concise, forthright statement of the legislative history of this matter. I hope it will be of considerable benefit to the Members of the House and I trust that the Alcohol Tax Division of the Department of Internal Revenue will read it and consider it in the light in which it is offered.

Mr. KILDAY. I will make it available to them, I can assure the gentleman. The hearing officer will have it on the 27th.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. YOUNG. I would like to commend my colleague from Texas on the fine statement he has made and I should like to associate myself with him in this matter.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank my colleague.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. COAD. I would like to associate myself with the remarks made by the gentleman from Texas. I may say that many thousands and thousands of sportsmen across the land are protesting this action taken by the Department in this proposed rule. I feel that as Members of the House, as Members of the Congress, it is our duty to point out to the administrative agency the inaccuracy of their action at this time.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BALDWIN. I would like to congratulate the gentleman for bringing up this subject at the present time and I hope the Department of Internal Revenue will give serious consideration to the remarks the gentleman from Texas has just made.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman.

As I have said, these proposed regulations are opposed by sportsmen. Their opposition is entitled to great weight. Show me a sportsman who loves guns and you have shown me a man I can trust and tie to. For you have shown me a man who loves God's great outdoors, his family, and his home. He is, inevitably, a man who has retained the pioneer spirit of the Americans who built this Nation and extended its frontiers from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. Speaker, the registration of firearms is only the first step. If secured it will be followed by other infringements of the right to keep and bear arms until finally the right is gone. It is no shallow pretext. The right to keep and bear arms is a substantial and valuable right to a free people, and it should be preserved. Those portions of the proposed regulations which I have mentioned should not be adopted.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. McBride, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9131) entitled "An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes."

The message further announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to Senate amendments numbered 6 and 54 to the above-entitled bill.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9379) entitled "An act making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. HILL, Mr. ANDERSON, and Mr. THYE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ATOMIC ENERGY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. CANNON submitted the following conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 9379) making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1242)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9379) making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

CLARENCE CANNON,
LOUIS C. RABAUT,
JOE L. EVINS,
BEN F. JENSEN,
JOHN TABER,
Managers on the Part of the House.

CARL HAYDEN,
LISTER HILL,
CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
EDWARD J. THYE,
Managers on the Part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9379) making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report as to each of such amendments, namely:

OPERATING EXPENSES

Amendment No. 1: Authorizes not to exceed $30,000 for official entertainment expenses as proposed by the Senate instead of $22,500 as proposed by the House.

Amendment No. 2: Authorizes not to exceed $46,100,000 for personal services as proposed by the Senate instead of $45,000,000 as proposed by the House.

Amendment No. 3: Appropriates $2,215,470,000 as proposed by the Senate instead of $2,196,556,000 as proposed by the House. The conferees on the part of both the House and the Senate are in agreement that the purpose of the $1,500,000 provided for advancement of the technology of the fast breeder concept is to make it possible for the Atomic Energy Commission to conduct research which is applicable to the development of a large-scale fast breeder reactor. Such a reactor is presently under construction by the Power Reactor Development Co., at Monroe, Mich. The Atomic Energy Commission has a contract with this company to provide certain research. The $1,500,000 requested in the budget estimate was for financing such research in the Atomic Energy Commission laboratories to be charged against the contract commitment.

The action that the conferees have taken provides for the same amount of money for research, the cost of which is not charged against the contract commitment. In other words, the conferees are not endorsing or implying approval of the existing contract with the Power Reactor Development Co.

PLANT ACQUISITION AND CONSTRUCTION

Amendment No 4: Appropriate $108,162,500 as proposed by the Senate instead of $103,162,500 as proposed by the House.

CLARENCE CANNON,
LOUIS C. RABAUT,
JOE L. EVINS,
BEN F. JENSEN,
JOHN TABER.
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9379) making appropriations for the Atomic Energy Commission, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. PASSMAN].

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to propound a question of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It is my understanding that this is the final appropriation bill for this session with the exception of the Mutual Security Appropriation bill.

Mr. CANNON. That is correct.

Mr. PASSMAN. If it should become necessary to reopen hearings briefly on the Mutual Security bill, is my understanding correct that the House rules and the rules of the Appropriation Committee permit that?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct. The authority is clearly set forth in rule XI.

Mr. PASSMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN].

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say that the minority members of the conference are in complete agreement with the report just read and are in complete agreement with the position taken by the conferees in regard to the bill. This report comes back to the House with the complete and unanimous agreement of the conference committee.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Is the appropriation up or down as a result of the conference?

Mr. CANNON. It is up.

Mr. GROSS. How much?

Mr. CANNON. It is still $167,992,500 less than the estimate.

Mr. GROSS. Less than what?

Mr. CANNON. The estimate. The budget.

Mr. GROSS. Of course, that does not mean very much.

They always ask for more than they expect to get. But how much is it up, does the gentleman know offhand?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; this conference report is $23,914,000 above the House figures. That is, the Senate has increased the amount about $24 million. But even at that, it is still $167,992,500 below the budget estimate. It is in that respect an economy bill.

Mr. GROSS. If the gentleman will yield further, I suppose we ought to be grateful that the other body did not kick it up some more.

Mr. CANNON. Off the record, small favors are always greatly received.

Mr. JENSEN. And large ones in proportion, may I add.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this represents complete agreement, a unanimous agreement, not only between the two Houses, but of all the House managers and all the Senate managers.

I therefore move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to inquire of the acting majority leader as to the program for next week.

Mr. ALBERT. Monday is District Day. There is one bill, H. R. 8220, to amend the Business Corporation Act.

There is a conference report on H. R. 1937, which is the District of Columbia stadium bill, subject to action by the Senate.

H. R. 6127, the Civil Rights Act of 1957, subject to a rule.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. The gentleman says it is subject to a rule. Can the gentleman tell us what is going to happen?

Mr. ALBERT. I can advise the gentleman that we program it with some additional confidence and certainly more hope than we did last week.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. On what date does the gentleman expect to bring that up?

Mr. ALBERT. That is some day following Monday.

The conference report on H. R. 9302, the mutual security appropriation bill for 1958, is expected to be taken up some time during the week.

It is hoped that arrangements can be made on Monday to call the Consent Calendar and suspend the rules later in the week.

Any further program will be announced later and conference reports may be brought up at any time.

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the distinguished gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. PASSMAN. Did I understand the distinguished majority leader to say that the mutual security appropriation bill would come to the floor on Tuesday?

Mr. ALBERT. No; the program I have announced is for Monday and the balance of the week.

Mr. PASSMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. May I ask the gentleman further, in regard to the Consent Calendar, when is that going to be called?

Mr. ALBERT. We have only announced that on Monday we would try to arrange a date for the call of the Consent Calendar, at some later date.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. But it is not definitely set for Monday?

Mr. ALBERT. It will not be called on Monday. No attempt will be made to call it on Monday.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, one more question. When may be expect to adjourn?

Mr. ALBERT. When we have completed the business of the session.

ADJOURNMENT OVER UNTIL MONDAY

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, when the House adjourns today, it adjourns to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

INTERIM AUTHORITY TO RECEIVE MESSAGES AND SIGN ENROLLED BILLS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding the adjournment of the House until Monday next, the Clerk be authorized to receive messages from the Senate and that the Speaker be authorized to sign any enrolled bills and joint resolutions duly passed by the two Houses and found truly enrolled.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. ALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the call of the committees under the Calendar Wednesday rule may be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION SHOULD NOT BE USED FOR COMMERCIAL PURPOSES

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACK of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am one of the Members of this body who is a sponsor of a resolution to establish a Commission to appropriately celebrate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln. I testified before the House Judiciary Subcommittee when these resolutions were being considered, and I expressed my support of this resolution again on Tuesday, August 20, when House Joint Resolution 351 was approved by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Speaker, I still strongly support this legislation and feel that it is imperative that Congress take action on it during this session. However, I am concerned about the possibility that some commercial concern might try to take advantage of the establishment of this Commission to promote their own cause.

Mr. Speaker, I am gratified that the Lincoln National Life Foundation had a representative testify before the Judiciary Subcommittee on behalf of this bill, but I feel that the testimony reveals a very close relationship with a commercial life insurance company. Therefore, I believe we should be extremely cautious to see that we are not promoting any commercial activity which is associated with this foundation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not feel unkindly toward the Lincoln National Life Insurance Co. as my relations with them have been extremely pleasant, and I hold a policy issued by them. However, I sincerely hope that the Commission will not authorize material received by it to be deposited in any private library such as the Lincoln National Life Insurance library, as this would appear that a public commission was serving a private purpose.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this statement will serve as adequate notice that the Congress does not intend for the Abraham Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission to be associated in any way with any type of commercial venture.

LEAD AND ZINC PRODUCTION AND IMPORTS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOGGS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, it so happens that I was not present on yesterday when there was considerable discussion about lead and zinc. It so happens that I have had the privilege of serving as chairman of the Subcommittee on Foreign Trade Policy of the Committee on Ways and Means, and in that connection I should like to address a few remarks to the Members of the House about the controversy which has arisen with respect to the situation now existing in these industries.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there has been wide appreciation of the decision and the action taken by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], in writing a letter to the President of the United States about this subject. As a matter of fact, the President of the United States, as I understand it, agreed with the gentleman from Tennessee in his press conference on Wednesday. In my judgment, the letter deserves the support of every Member of this body, for it calls for responsibility on the part of the President under the authority previously delegated to him by the Congress.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this is not a question of whether the domestic lead and zinc mining industries need relief. It is a question of determining the relief that is appropriate and the manner in which such relief should be granted. Let me remind my colleagues that in all the controversy that has been raised over the lead and zinc matter we have had little instruction or advice from the executive branch as to what the national requirements are and how they can best be served in the maintenance of a healthy lead and zinc mining industry. We have had no information as to how the executive branch arrived at the target prices of 17 cents per pound for lead metal and 14.5 cents per pound for zinc. We were not told how the sliding-scale import-tax system is to accomplish the achievement of these price targets nor what the effects would be on various segments and components of the lead and zinc industry. As a matter of fact, in testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means the industry itself testified that they felt that these proposals were not adequate.

The legislation proposed by the Department of the Interior has all the earmarks of having been hastily drafted and in my judgment of having not been thought through. It has provoked opposition and dissatisfaction on the part of all the parties at interest. The executive branch asked the Congress to take the responsibility for enacting legislation in a hurry and without providing the basis for an understanding of the implications and effects of the proposals.

What is particularly curious to me is that the President should ask for expeditious action by the Congress when it is perfectly clear that the import taxes proposed in the legislation could not become effective until the 1st of January 1958, even if the legislation were enacted during this session. If the administration's information justifies the legislation recommended to the Congress by the Department of the Interior, the President can bring corrective measures into effect more quickly under the escape clause and national security provisions of the trade agreements legislation. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, that is the orderly way to proceed. As a matter of fact, the Secretary of the Interior did not address a communication to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means about this matter until sometime late in June of this year. The chairman of my committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] in his letter to the President pointed out the desirability of respecting the procedures laid down by the Congress in existing law. He made clear the dangers involved in a shortsighted departure from these established procedures. The President, as I previously said, in his press conference statement on Wednesday agreed upon reflection that it was desirable to follow these procedures. He now has the benefit of Congressional opinion as well as those of the parties in interest in this legislation, as expressed in the hearings of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the other body. The question is now one for Presidential consideration and action within the framework of existing law, and in the light of our national interest, as established by these laws. It is my hope that the debate over this matter will prove to be instructive and helpful to the industry and that the executive branch will give adequate and intelligent and immediate consideration to the essential problems of identifying an effective and meaningful minerals policy and that in implementing such a policy recourse will be made to existing law and existing procedures to the extent possible and necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter addressed to the President of the United States by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Cooper].

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield.

Mr. EDMONDSON. I would like to express my personal appreciation to the gentleman for his statement, and particularly appreciation for his cooperation. I hope that we will have speedy action upon this problem by the executive department and a speedy response to the letter addressed to the President by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BOGGS. I thank the gentleman. I might say I know of no person who has been more anxious to bring about relief, if it be required, for these industries than has been the gentleman from Oklahoma. He has actively appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means as did the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Brown] who is now seated next to him in the Chamber in connection with this problem and I am quite certain that both gentlemen are well aware of the fact that the laws as now written are entirely adequate to cover these problems.

Mr. EDMONDSON. I thank the gentleman for the kind words. I have not yet expressed it publicly, but I would like to express my appreciation to the entire membership of the Commitee on Ways and Means for doing something rather unprecedented at this very late hour in the session, which they did in taking up this problem and in completely airing the problem when we were in what everyone knows are the last few weeks of the session. The hearings which were held, I do believe, were helpful to the understanding by the Congress and by the public in this country of a very great problem in a very vital industry.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think the gentleman knows my record on this question of tariffs. I am the only Member of Congress who testified in favor of the OTC bill a year ago last January without qualification and without any amendments.

Mr. BOGGS. That is correct.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do think it is the feeling of the President that he is not trying to escape his responsibilities on this, but the President does believe there is a joint responsibility with the Congress in this matter and that there is some responsibility in the Congress to express themselves on what ought to be done. I realize there are some remedies here through the escape clause and the peril-point provision and so on which does give the President a chance to make a survey, and maybe he is in a better position than we are to get all the facts in reference to it. At the same time I do not believe that we here in Congress can escape the responsibility which we also have in the same vital circumstances

Mr. BOGGS. I am quite certain that the gentleman has realized that if we attempt to legislate in this area with respect to two industries and at the same time neglected to take action with respect to a great many other industries which have either by representations to the clerk of our committee or by the introduction of legislation by Members of this body indicated that they, too, feel they are entitled to consideration. In my judgment the result of the proposal of the Executive in this instance would be the writing of another tariff bill on the floor of the House of Representatives. I do not think the gentleman contemplates or desires that.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think the President contemplates that that would be necessary, but I do believe when he specifically requests legislation on a particular subject, that takes on a different meaning insofar as the executive branch is concerned. I think the gentleman realizes that is rather unprecedented for the President to ask for legislation such as this, where he has the escape-clause provision, but I do believe he felt this was a policy which ought to be pointed out, and Congress should take a stand. In this particular instance I think he felt there should be some guideposts set up. I am not in argument with the gentleman at all. I respect his viewpoint. I think he is sincere. I have read the letter of the distinguished chairman of your committee and he has shown much statesmanship in the drafting of that letter.

Mr. BOGGS. I thank the gentleman. I do think it is the genuine hope of all of us that this problem can be worked out. Certainly there is no one who wants to see two industries such as the lead and the zinc industry, which are both essential to the security of the United States, experience any hardships. I can assure the gentleman that I, as well as the gentleman from Illinois, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Brown], and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Edmondson] are just as anxious as they are that these problems be worked out. But I think it is a vain and useless thing for us to establish machinery whereby these problems can be worked out, if the executive department is not to utilize them.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me ask the gentleman this question. In a way he has utilized the machinery that has been set up, is that not true?

Mr. BOGGS. No. What has happened now is that we had these hearings. Then the chairman directed this letter to the President of the United States, pointing out the escape-clause provisions, as well as section 7 (b) of the Trade Agreement Act, and mentioned how those can both be applied. Now the President has agreed that that is probably the best way to proceed, and we are now expressing the hope that they will proceed.

Mr. SPRINGER. If there is anything which the President does want, we will have a chance to review that when the Congress meets again in January.

Mr. BOGGS. That is true.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOGGS. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. I thank the gentleman for the kind reference he made a moment ago. I rise to emphasize what the gentleman just said, that there are two provisions in current law granting authority for relief of the lead and zinc industries, but the most important provision of all is section 7 (b), and the President has ample authority there, and I think the gentleman from Louisiana recognizes it and he has said so many times, that the President has the authority to adjust this situation in accord with the demands and needs of the times.

Mr. BOGGS. Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Brown] that I am vitally interested in our Government carrying on an enlightened foreign trade policy. I recognize that that policy cannot be carried on if certain industries in this country feel that they are being penalized by actions taken or not taken either by the legislative or the executive branch of our Government. So that in order to maintain an enlightened foreign trade policy, I think it is vital that we work out the problems affecting the lead and zinc industries, the fluorspar industry, the tuna fish industry, the textile industry, and others who have been before us with complaints that deserve the attention of our committee and plans which deserve the attention of the executive branch of the Government.

I hope I have made myself clear.

Mr. BROWN of Missouri. The gentleman most certainly has, and I concur with him in the statement he has just made. I believe it can be done within the framework of existing law. That is the reason section 7 (b) was placed in the law. It was also the reason for the escape clause. I just hope that we move forward to a speedy relief. That is that 7 (b) is the section being employed to relieve the difficulties around the domestic petroleum industry as the result of the imports of offshore oils; yet the same section is not being employed by the Office of Defense Mobilization in the case of the industry in which the gentleman is interested.

I thank the gentleman.

ARMY GENERAL HOSPITAL AT WALTHAM, MASS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall not use all the time allotted to me.

Mr. Speaker, on several occasions the House has expressed its interest and approval of keeping the Army Murphy Hospital at Waltham, Mass., open.

I received word today that on January 1, 1958, the Army plans to close it.

I shall continue to fight for it, Mr. Speaker, and I feel sure that the House which has supported the New England delegation so many times and which placed in the last appropriation bill money to keep the hospital open, will help me in this fight.

The Army states that the personnel will be taken care of in the main, but they do not say anything in this notice to me of the fact that it will be a tremendous tragedy to the patients who will have to be moved, some of them many miles away from home, probably to Walter Reed Hospital here in Washington, a distance of 450 miles.

I believe they will reconsider their decision, Mr. Speaker.

LATIN AMERICAN POLICY

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the flagrant inaccuracies in the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Reece] could be overlooked as merely ridiculous and a reflection on his sources of information except that the charges he makes on the basis of his misinformation are so serious and irresponsible.

He criticizes Governor Muñoz-Marin, of Puerto Rico, because a news item states that the two Dominican revolutionary leaders visited briefly at the Governor's residence. Both leaders are anticommunistic.

The gentleman refers to Puerto Rico as an American Territory, whereas it is, and has been since July 1952, an associated State which elects its own Governor and lawmakers.

That the gentleman is unaware of this basic fact about Puerto Rico is a sign of the vastness of his ignorance and the degree of his temerity in seeking to smear Governor Muñoz-Marin as favorable to the forces of international communism.

The gentleman is correct in saying that Governor Muñoz-Marín, President Figueres, of Costa Rica, former Venezuelan President Betancourt, and I are all enemies of Trujillo. This does not make us Communists, in spite of what Trujillo's hirelings insist.

The gentleman is incorrect in stating that Figueres and Betancourt are friendly with any Communists. They are distinguished and honorable leaders for democracy. If the gentleman had an elementary knowledge of recent events in Latin America, he would know that Figueres personally led the first armed attack in this hemisphere on Communist forces, and that he has been fighting them successfully ever since.

I challenge the gentleman to produce any evidence that Figueres and Betancourt are, in the gentleman's words, seeking to "get" Trujillo. On the other hand, I have at hand evidence indicating that Trujillo has sent paid killers to Costa Rica to kill President Figueres.

The gentleman states that the United States will come in for "its share of the blame" for "permitting" my activities—he does not specify which ones he has in mind. Can the gentleman suggest how the United States can forbid a Congressman from speaking his mind?

My constituents appear to approve my activities and statements even if the gentleman would prefer that I refrain from calling a murderer a murderer and a dictator a dictator. Trujillo is both murderer and dictator.

The gentleman wants our Government to investigate the people—including me—making charges against the so-called Dominican Republic. I point out to him that the investigation being conducted by our Government arose out of the Gerry Murphy case and that our Government, on the basis of proof gathered by the FBI, has rejected the explanation repeatedly offered by the Dominican Government as to how and why Gerry was murdered. Does the gentleman have information about me or the other persons he names which would discredit our charges? Or does he prefer to impugn our motives by dark inferences and flat assertions?

In conclusion, the gentleman states, in a flurry of non sequitur:

> One thing is certain, however, the assassinations of the leaders of friendly anti-Communist countries must stop, and they will not be stopped by investigating Trujillo.

Now, let us examine these remarkable words. Does the gentleman mean that the assassinations will stop if the investigation of Trujillo stops? That does not follow at all.

Our Government is not investigating Trujillo, except as the evidence in the Murphy-Galindez cases shouts his guilt and leads to him in that unhappy "Republic."

Trujillo is investigating Trujillo in this country through his public relations man, Sydney Baron ,and lawyer, Morris Ernst. Shall we call off this investigation to prevent further assassinations? The gentleman should take this up personally with Trujillo himself.

Of course, so far as it is within our power, we want to stop these assassinations, but our opinion in this regard does not require us to suspend judgment as to which countries are really anti-Communist nor to call off the investigation of the murder of an American boy.

MAJOR LEAGUE BASEBALL IN SAN FRANCISCO

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise for a happy occasion—to extend to my distinguished colleagues an invitation to attend with me and with the citizens of my native city of San Francisco, the opening game of the 1958 season of our new major league team, the Giants.

This invitation, coming as it does a full 6 months early, may seem a bit premature, but there is bound to be a mighty long line waiting to get in for this opening game.

The baseball team which for 74 years called Coogan's Bluff its home, has made—literally—a giant step forward, and the National League has truly become national in all respects.

The Giants will be playing not only in our beautiful weather; in the justly famous atmosphere of hospitality and enthusiasm of San Francisco baseball fans, but in the very home country of such baseball greats as the DiMaggios, Ty Cobb, Joe Cronin, Casey Stengel, and a score of others.

They will play in a brandnew stadium seating 40,000 fans, with adjoining parking space for 12,000 automobiles.

This move of the Giants to the Golden Gate was a logical development in San Francisco history. In the middle of the 19th century the mountain men moved up the western valleys. They were followed by the covered wagons of the first settlers. Hard on their heels, in forty-nine, came what can only be described as a westward migration when the shout, "gold" was on every man's lips. Next came the railroads bringing permanent settlers. Then industrialization and expansion, and now the big league has arrived.

Mr. Speaker, we are very much sought after in San Francisco.

I appreciate that many of my colleagues are already happily familiar with the lovely vistas and the many delights of my native city of San Francisco. For others the pleasurable experience lies ahead. We hope that both the old San Francisco hands as well as the uninitiated will be there to help give the Giants a rousing welcome this spring as the hickory hits the hide and the sun shines bright on the big leaguers in their new San Francisco home.

> Somewhere in this favored land the sun is > shining bright.
> The band is playing somewhere and somewhere hearts are light.

That "somewhere," Mr. Speaker, will be San Francisco, where the famous old song, Take Me Out to the Ball Game, may soon edge out California, Here I Come on what we hope will be a hit parade.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Proposal To Broaden Widow's Benefits Under Railroad Retirement Act of 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS L. ASHLEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 to provide that a widow who loses her widow's insurance benefits by remarriage may again be entitled to such benefits if her second husband dies within 1 year after their marriage.

Under the present provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act, a widow who remarries becomes ineligible for any monthly payments she may have received as the result of her first husband's death. Furthermore, if her second husband dies before they have been married 1 year, she is unable to collect any widow's benefits based on his income.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, would permit her to again collect the widow's insurance benefits she was receiving before her second marriage. In other words, it would restore the benefits she was receiving on the basis of her first husband.

This legislation probably would not be considered of major importance to anyone except the few unfortunate women who have twice become a widow and who, because of a quirk of fate, find themselves deprived of benefits to which they would have been entitled had tragedy not struck them a cruel double blow.

Both the House and the other body took favorable action on similar legislation last year, Mr. Speaker, when a bill was enacted amending our social security laws to allow a widow to claim benefits previously received in the event that her second husband dies within a year after their marriage.

I hope that the measure I have introduced today will receive the same considerate treatment early in the next session of the Congress.

Mr. William M. Miller

OF
HON. CLARENCE CANNON OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, here in the closing hours of the session it is appropriate that we should pause long enough to pay honor to whom honor is due.

There is not a Member of the House who has not had occasion to thank Fishbait Miller, the Doorkeeper of the House, for innumerable services rendered above and beyond the call of duty. Half a dozen times this afternoon the conferees on one of the pending bills has been under obligations to him for information and service we could have secured from no other source. When all the learned doctors in the Library of Congress are unable to supply missing data—when all the efficient staffs of the committees of the House are unable to secure results—when the Federal departments downtown have been appealed to in vain—Fishbait will find it for you or will accomplish it for you, promptly, accurately, and efficiently. He is always at hand when needed. He is always on the job. Like the Keepers of Israel he neither slumbers nor sleeps.

Outmoded and Unwarranted Postal Subsidies—Principle of Subsidy-Limiting Amendment

OF
HON. GEORGE M. RHODES
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable comment concerning an amendment which I offered to H. R. 5836, the postal rate readjustment bill passed by the House on August 13. This amendment would limit the Post Office Department's loss on the mailings of any publisher to $100,000 during any one fiscal year. It was adopted by the House on a teller vote shortly before final passage of the postal rate bill.

American taxpayers are just beginning to realize the tremendous cost of these indirect and hidden mail subsidies to a handful of big publishers.

Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify the purpose of my amendment and to explain the basic principles and statistical data which prompted its introduction, I ask that my statement of August 20, 1957, presented to the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee in support of my subsidy-limitation amendment, be included in the RECORD:

STATEMENT BY HON. GEORGE M. RHODES, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, 14TH DISTRICT OF PENNSYLVANIA, PRESENTED TO THE COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE, UNITED STATES SENATE, AUGUST 20, 1957

Mr. Chairman, distinguished members of the committee, I appreciate the opportunity of appearing here to express my views on H. R. 5836, the postal rate readjustment bill as passed by the House last week. Most of my testimony will deal specifically with the amendment which I offered on the House floor to limit the Post Office Department's loss on the mailing of any publisher to $100,000 during any one fiscal year. This amendment may be found in H. R. 5836, beginning at line 25 on page 4 and extending through line 3 on page 6 of the bill.

It was my pleasure to serve on the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee for 8 years, beginning with the 81st Congress and continuing my service through the 84th Congress. I served on the conference committee which produced the last postal rate legislation enacted by the Congress on October 30, 1951 (Public Law 233, 82d Congress). Let me assure the committee that I am not appearing here as an expert on postal ratemaking, cost ascertainment, or any other phase of the Post Office Department's operations. I do feel, however, that the committee is entitled to share the information which I have compiled relating to the huge losses being incurred by the Department in the handling of publisher's second class mail. This committee is entitled to know the reasons behind my amendment, what it would do, why it is necessary as a principle in postal ratemaking, why it is administratively feasible, and why I feel that some type of subsidy-limiting amendment should be retained in any postal rate bill reported by this committee.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take the time of this committee to go into a detailed discussion of the bill as reported by the House committee.

FIRST-CLASS MAIL PAYS ITS WAY

As to first-class mail, very briefly I will say that table 100 of the 1956 cost ascertainment report shows first class revenues which are $35.6 million in excess of allocated budgetary expenditures. Table 41 of this same report proves beyond any doubt that first-class mail at 3 cents an ounce is not being handled at a loss by the Department. All types of first-class mail brought into the Department an average revenue of 3.357 cents per piece or 7.22 cents per ounce.

Meanwhile, second-class magazines and periodicals brought in only 1.9 cents per piece or .16 cents per ounce. The 1956 deficit in handling this type of second class mail totaled $65 million.

COMMITTEE-RECOMMENDED SECOND-CLASS INCREASES INADEQUATE

The bill as reported by the House Committee would increase second-class revenues by about $33 million over a 4-year period, or about $8.25 million a year. The net effect would be to reduce the second-class deficit from $252 million to $244 million in the first year of the new rates and to $219 million after the four proposed annual increases. If we count on increased circulation and costs of handling, it may well be that the second-class deficit will not be reduced at all. In effect the committee bill would make more secure these subsidies which go to a handful of big publishers and hide them from the public by reducing the overall postal deficit at the expense of first-class-mail users.

Mr. Chairman, I could not in good conscience vote for an increase in first-class rates, when all of the statistical data shows that first-class mail is more than paying its own way.

POSTAL SUBSIDY LIMITATION NOT NEW IDEA

I supported the Holifield amendment on the House floor. It would have eliminated the 1-cent increase in letter postage. That amendment was defeated. My subsidy-limiting amendment was then adopted by the House. It places a limitation of $100,000 on the amount of subsidy to any user of second-class mail during any one fiscal year. My proposal was originally introduced in the 84th Congress (H. R. 10913). It was offered in the House Committee last year as an amendment to the 1956 postal rate increase bill. Again this year, I introduced the amendment in bill form as H. R. 8275. When approved by the House last week, Members were not voting for some unknown quantity. It had been before the House for well over a year, had been discussed in conversation, offered in committee, and was finally adopted by the House as an amendment to H. R. 5836.

PUBLISHERS' MAIL DEFICIT

During fiscal 1956, postal revenues for magazines and periodicals were $30.6 million. Allocated budgetary expenditures were $95.4 million, a deficit of some $65 million. The deficit in carrying daily newspapers through the mail amounted to about $61 million. These two produce about half of the total second-class-mail deficit of $252 million.

Other miscellaneous categories of publishers' second-class mail matter produce another $57 million of the deficit. These include publications with less than 5 percent advertising, newspapers other than dailies, and agricultural, business, professional and similar types of publications produced for profit. Thus, there is a deficit of some $183 million on all types of profit-motivated publications. As Deputy Postmaster General Stans pointed out last Friday, all of the other "exempt" categories of publishers' second-class mail would have produced only $3.1 million in additional revenue if these publications had paid regular rates of postage.

BIG MAGAZINE SUBSIDIES

Members of your committee have undoubtedly seen estimates of the losses incurred by the Department in the handling of a selected list of widely circulated popular magazines. They have been prepared by the Cost Ascertainment Branch, Bureau of Finance, of the Post Office Department and are presented in two different forms. Mr. Chairman, I ask that they be inserted as exhibits 1 and 2 at this point in the record:

EXHIBIT 1.—Volume, revenues, and estimated handling costs of selected 2d class publications, based on 1 issue for the year 1956

Publication	Weight (pounds)	Copies	Postage at present rates	Cost of handling	Excess of costs over postage	Estimated annual loss
Life	5,410,000	4,775,000	$144,000	$323,000	$179,000	$9,310,000
Saturday Evening Post	3,095,000	3,106,000	67,000	184,000	117,000	6,087,000
Reader's Digest	3,829,000	9,163,000	90,000	438,000	348,000	4,172,000
Ladies' Home Journal	5,835,000	3,706,000	128,000	287,000	159,000	1,917,000

NOTE.—In all cases costs were based on average cost factors computed for a subgroup of publications applied to volume data for each publication, and not on individual traffic studies and cost factors attributable to each specific publication.

EXHIBIT 2.—U. S. Post Office Department estimated annual revenues and costs of selected leading magazines

Publication	Revenue[1]	Cost[2]	Difference (cost minus revenue)
Life	$7,485,000	$16,979,000	$9,494,000
Saturday Evening Post	3,488,000	9,557,000	6,069,000
Reader's Digest	1,082,000	5,891,000	4,809,000
Look	1,534,000	5,016,000	3,482,000
Ladies' Home Journal	1,530,000	3,449,000	1,919,000
McCall's magazine	1,097,000	2,604,000	1,507,000
National Geographic	486,000	1,821,000	1,335,000
Good Housekeeping	881,000	2,175,000	1,294,000
Better Homes and Gardens	758,000	1,904,000	1,146,000
American Home magazine	623,000	1,753,000	1,130,000
Total	18,844,000	52,149,000	32,185,000

[1] In general, the revenue estimates are based on data from administrative records covering the mailings of all issues of these publications for the month of March 1956, extended to annual revenues on the basis of the number of issues per year. For Life magazine, revenue estimates were based on mailings of the first 3 issues in March. Revenue and cost estimates for Better Homes and Gardens and Saturday Evening Post are based on issues for the month of November 1954, and for Reader's Digest these estimates are based on the November 1955 issue.

[2] A complete cost analysis of the publications listed in this table would require detailed studies at all points of entry and of the large number of delivery offices. Such analysis would of course be very expensive and time consuming; therefore, the estimates have been developed as outlined below (above).

Source: Division of Cost Analysis, Bureau of Finance, U. S. Post Office Department. The column showing the difference between cost and revenue was computed by the Legislative Reference Service.

These figures have been quoted many times, so I will mention only a few and will not go into all the details. Two estimates of the Post Office Department loss in handling Life magazine were made during 1956. One was based on a single issue, the other based on 3 issues of March 1956. They show that Life magazine received a subsidy from the American taxpayers of somewhere between $9.3 and $9.5 million. Saturday Evening Post received a subsidy in the neighborhood of $6 million; Reader's Digest between $4 million and $5 million and so on. It is true that these estimates were not made on individual traffic studies of each magazine. They are estimates based on selected issues, averaged out for a year, and reinforced by cost ascertainment figures available to the Department. Mr. Stans, in reply to a question by Senator YARBOROUGH last Friday, indicated that these figures are accurate within 10 percent.

Moreover, during the recent hearings in the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee (hearings, p. 854) Mr. Stans pointed out that in 1954 the Department conducted a specific cost study of the cost of handling an issue of the Reader's Digest from the beginning of the time it was put in the mail and going through all the operations for that publication and the results showed a figure very close to the estimate previously made by the Department, the same type of estimate shown in these tables just placed in the record.

LIFE MAGAZINE OPERATIONS

Some very revealing testimony was presented to the House committee last April with respect to Life magazine. This is, of course. published by Time, Inc., which also publishes Time magazine, Fortune, Sports Illustrated, House and Home, Architectural Forum, and various foreign editions of both Time and Life magazines.

Three of these publications are weeklies (Time, Life, Sports Illustrated) while the other three are monthlies (Fortune, Architectural Forum, House and Home). They have a combined circulation per issue totaling 8.75 million copies. Their total annual circulation is approximately 438 million copies, 86 percent of which are carried through the mails at a staggering loss to the American taxpayers.

Since Life is the largest circulation magazine of the group and also received the largest subsidy, according to the 1956 estimates of the Department, let us examine some of its characteristics in greater detail:

1. Circulation: In 1956 Life magazine had a weekly circulation of 5,714,310 copies. Of this total 4,800,000 copies or 84 percent were carried through the mails. This amounts to 249,600,000 copies of Life having a combined weight estimated at more than 280 million pounds, were distributed by postal carriers during the year.

2. Second class postal bill: For this service Life paid about $7.4 million during the year, about 2.9 cents per copy or 2.8 cents per pound. Approximately $144,000 was paid by life in postage per issue in 1956. The Department estimates that it costs the taxpayers about $323,000 per issue to handle and deliver Life to its subscribers, or a difference between revenue paid and costs incurred of about $179,000 per weekly issue. This resulted in a total annual loss to the Department of about $9.4 million just on Life magazine alone.

In 1940 the newsstand price of Life was 10 cents; the subscription price per year was $4.50; by 1946, the individual copy sold for 15 cents and the subscription was $5.50 a year. In 1956 the single copy of Life sold on the newsstands for 20 cents and the subscription price was $6.75 a year. To buy the 52 issues of Life on a newsstand, it would cost $10.40. Special 3-year subscription rates offered periodically further reduce this latter subscription figure. While the single copy price doubled since 1940, the subscription rate has increased by only slightly more than 25 percent.

4. Advertising revenues: Printers Ink Annual Guide to Advertising for 1956 shows that Life had an advertising revenue of $137.4 million. This was 14.6 percent of the total magazine advertising revenues of $931 million for last year as reported by Advertising Age. For the year Life magazine carried approximately 3,700 pages of editorial matter and 4,400 pages of advertising, or about 54 percent advertising. In 1956 the cost of a full-page black-and-white ad in Life was $20,350. Beginning with the September 9, 1957, issue of Life, the cost for a four-color page ad will be $37,975.

The average weekly issue of Life produced $2,642,000 in advertising revenue alone. Added to this is the subscription revenue on 4.8 million copies per issue or $634,000, plus the newsstand revenue on another 900,000 copies or an estimated $117,000, we see that Life had a total revenue per issue of $3,393,000.

You will recall that Post Office Department estimates that Life only paid $144,000 in postage for a single issue in 1956 and the costs to the Department in handling the issue amounted to $323,000. Thus, if Life had paid its full share of the allocated costs, it still would have had a revenue per issue of $3,070,000, or $159.6 million for the year.

With the increased costs of advertising recently announced by most magazines this source of magazine revenue is expected to be even more profitable in the coming year.

5. Profit picture: Last Friday Deputy Postmaster General Stans told this committee: "Reports in the trade press predict another recordbreaking year in 1957 for both newspapers and magazines. In fact, some publishers are currently boasting of having attained profits unprecedented in the publishing industry."

Time, Inc., is high on the profit ladder in the publishing business. During the past 5 years (which incidentally includes the years when their second-class mail costs were increased by 10 percent a year for the years 1952, 1953, and 1954) the net profits after taxes of Time, Inc. increased from $7,750,000 in 1952 to $13,850,000 in 1956. This latter figure does not include the additional profits realized from the sale of $15 million worth of Houston Oil Co. stock held by Time, Inc.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to read an excerpt from a letter sent by Time, Inc. to its stockholders in January of this year which boasts of profits amounting to $6.75 per share as compared with $4.72 per share in 1955. The letter says that "it was of course profits derived principally from our magazines that made 1956 our best earning year. Time, Life, Fortune, and the international editions of Time all set new earning records." It goes on to say "we believe that the level of earnings attained by Life in 1956 has never been equaled by any other magazine in the history of publishing."

Actually, the letter to stockholders underestimated the extent of Time's profit. Final figures showed that the earnings on a share of stock in Time, Inc. (worth $70) was actually $7.10 during 1956.

Figures furnished the House committee by Time, Inc. reveal that second-class postage costs for all its publications amounted to only 4.8 percent of total publishing expenses during 1956. Based on the 1956 losses of $9.4 million incurred by the Post Office Department in handling Life, the loss would still be $8.3 million after the first year's rate increase provided for in H. R. 5836. This is assuming that postal costs were to remain fixed and circulation remained even. Both these assumptions are not likely to prove valid. As a publisher becomes more successful, as his circulation, advertising revenues, and profits increase, his mailing operations cost the Post Office more and the size of the subsidy received also increases.

OTHER MAGAZINES SUBSIDIZED

Mr. Chairman, the statistical data which I have presented with respect to Life magazine could also be generally applied to other large publishers in this same fashion. However, I will not take the time of the committee to do so. The Legislative Reference Service, at my request, furnished voluminous financial data on many other large publishing companies in addition to Time, Inc.

Permit me to just mention a few of the highlights with respect to other leading publishers. The Curtis Publishing Co., publishers of the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies' Home Journal, Holiday, and other magazines increased their profits after taxes from $4,404,000 in 1952 to $6,234,000 in 1956. The two Curtis publications listed in the Post Office estimate show a total of $8 million in annual subsidy.

McGraw-Hill Publishing Co., publishers of Business Week and 27 other small circulation business-trade magazines more than doubled its profits after taxes—$3,273,000 in 1952 to $7,871,000 in 1956. Its advertising revenues during this period are not available. Its earnings per share of common stock were $7.40 in 1952. It was split 2 for 1 in 1953, each share earning $4.03 and in 1956 its stock was again split 3 for 1, each share earning $2.98 during that year. Subsidy figures for McGraw-Hill publications are not listed in the Post Office estimate.

Mr. Chairman, financial data is not available from public sources on such big magazines as Look (which received an estimated subsidy of $3,482,000), Reader's Digest (whose subsidy totaled $4,809,000), based on November 1955 estimates of the Department. This magazine now has the largest circulation of any magazine in the United States—upward of 11 million copies per month. It paid an estimated $90,000 in postage for one issue and cost the Department $438,000 to handle, a subsidy of $348,000 per single issue. Incidentally, a single page four-color ad in Reader's Digest will cost $38,000 beginning next January 1.

No financial data is available for Confidential, Inc., publishers of Confidential, and Whisper magazines currently in the headlines because of libel suits. Confidential has a monthly circulation of 3,442,536 copies.

Data is also unavailable on other magazines such as Newsweek, U. S. News & World Report, American Home, TV Guide, and magazines such as True Confessions, My Romance, Secret Confessions, Startling Detective, Daring Romances, Revealing Romances, Modern Romances, and many other similar-type publications.

AMENDMENT ESTABLISHES FAIR PRINCIPLE

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is not to penalize any publisher or to cut his profit margin. A small increased cost of individual publisher's subscription rates could easily offset their higher postal costs. The purpose of my amendment is simply to apply a principle in second-class publisher's mail rates that the annual revenue they pay to the Department for the service they receive should equal the costs to the Department to render that service, less $100,000. The popular magazines which incur such huge deficits in second-class mail do have some "public interest" value in the dissemination of news, helpful household information, political views, and other "educational" material. My amendment merely places a subsidy limitation on these values.

Low second-class mail rates, when originally established in 1879 were meant to provide the types of news services unavailable through any other public media. Today we have radio, television, motion pictures and other sources of more current news and information. Present zone rates, according to Mr. Stans, on the advertising portion of newspapers and magazines are actually less than they were in 1917. This is despite the fact that advertising revenue of magazines was practically nil in 1917, while today they are rapidly approaching the $1 billion mark for a single year.

The principle of limiting subsidies is not unique. Just last week the Congress enacted a law to curb subsidies to industries through the 5-year fast-tax writeoff device. Only recently a $3,000 limit was placed on acreage reserve payments and a $5,000 limit on conservation reserve payments to any farmer participating in the soil-bank program. Abuses in the operation of this program made it possible for a single corporate farmer to receive $209,000 a year for not planting crops. Congress reacted to this by placing a limitation on the payments. Last year in the Senate an amendment to the farm bill, limiting to $100,000 the amount of price-support loans to a single producer was adopted by a vote of 78–11. Is it not fair that this principle of limitation also be applied to big magazine publishers?

MAGAZINES ATTACK SUBSIDIES TO OTHERS

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to pick up these subsidized publications and to read in them articles attacking subsidies going to other segments of our population. For example, a recent editorial in Life is entitled "King Cotton—the Royal Nonesuch." Let me read to the committee a portion of this editorial:

"If the (cotton) industry was put on a basis of free competition, and our prices left to find their own level * * * the (cotton) business would quickly thin down to efficient operators who could produce all the cotton really needed and at a profit."

Listen to this next part, Mr. Chairman:

The editorial continues:

"We have every sympathy for the marginal, high-cost little fellow who is inexorably being crowded out, but is there any depression to justify keeping him on a dole? There is no likelihood of agricultural shortages either. The longer the 92.7 percent of the rest of us taxpayers keep him there by giving him money to stay in business he can't possibly succeed at, the longer will the whole farm picture stay in a needless and senseless mess."

Thus in this editorial, Life magazine, which received a $9.4 million "dole" itself last year, presumes to prescribe a remedy for the cotton industry. The editorial concludes by saying:

"If enough Americans squawk, something will be done to stop this silly business."

Mr. Chairman, this might also be said of the huge subsidies going to Life magazine and other publications being carried through the mails at such tremendous losses to the American taxpayers.

Or take another example. The Reader's Digest has carried many "planted" articles expressing its views on political issues. One of these articles, entitled "The Biggest Con Game in Politics," written by former Governor Driscoll, of New Jersey, was reprinted and circulated throughout the country. It is a wholesale attack on Federal grants-in-aid programs, but did not mention Federal aid to magazine publishers.

Another more recent Reader's Digest article, written by William Hard, was entitled "Pacific Northwest Stands on Its Own Feet." It was a complete distortion of the issues involved in the fight for a high dam at Hells Canyon, timed to coincide with the consideration of this issue by the Congress. Senators MAGNUSON and JACKSON, and Congressman DON MAGNUSON of Washington effectively destroyed this piece of misleading political propaganda in a letter to the editor of the Reader's Digest, released to the press.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT'S ATTITUDE

Mr. Chairman, I was disappointed at the cavalier manner in which the principle of my amendment was received by the Postmaster General and his deputy. I was under the impression that the official policy of the administration was to place the Department on a sound businesslike basis. They didn't even see fit to tell this committee the additional revenue which would be produced by the adoption of my subsidy-limitation amendment. I should think that if they are sincerely interested in reducing the second class publisher's deficit, they would at least estimate what it would bring in additional revenue.

Chairman, I trust that this committee will give serious thought to the data I have furnished. The objectives set forth by my amendment offer a fair and workable method of reducing the scandalous subsidies being handed over each year to a few magazine publishers.

When questioned about the amendment, Mr. Stans commented that it would be expensive and difficult but admitted that it would not be impossible to administer. Mr. Chairman, I submit that if there is the will to put a limitation on these subsidies it can be done without great difficulty or inconvenience to the Post Office Department.

AMENDMENT IS WORKABLE

This amendment was not drafted in a vacuum, Mr. Chairman. It was drafted by recognized experts on Post Office Department accounting and cost ascertainment procedures. I was assured well in advance of my introduction of the proposal in bill form and before offering it as an amendment to H. R. 5836 that it was feasible, workable, and capable of being administered. Otherwise, I would not have offered it.

I do not say that this amendment, as adopted by the House, is the only way in which the principle of limiting second class publisher's subsidies can be established. There is no sane reason why a beginning should not be made. This committee in its wisdom and its long experience in this field can undoubtedly put a limitation on these postal subsidies.

If the distinguished members of this committee agree with me in principle a limitation of these subsidies can be accomplished. For example, the circulation of a particular magazine or the amount of its subsidy could be the controlling factor in limiting the loss to a certain percentage of its annual cost of handling.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not unworkable. There may be some logic to arguments to amend the amount of the limitation, but how can anyone object to the principle involved? The American people are beginning to learn about postal subsidies. They want Congress to do something about it.

POWERFUL OPPOSITION

Any proposal of this kind will naturally draw fire from those who are the beneficiaries of this type of Federal aid. I am aware, as all of you gentlemen must be, of the great power, wealth and influence behind those seeking to kill this amendment. There is some question that the amendment may bring a lawsuit. There's always such a possibility, since even at present the Department's cost ascertainment system in allocating costs can be challenged by court action.

I contend, and I hope you gentlemen will agree, that if my amendment is right in principle, as Members of Congress, it is our duty to see that steps are taken for its application.

Opponents to my amendment will go so far as to claim that the post office actually makes a profit in handling some second-class matter. Mr. David W. Brumbaugh, vice president of Time, Inc., made the claim that the Post Office Department is actually handling Life magazine at a profit. He boldly attacks the basic principles of the cost ascertainment system of accounting. Deputy Postmaster General Stans prepared an analysis of Mr. Brumbaugh's allegations concerning the proper allocation of Department costs to Life magazine. It is dated April 25, 1957. It completely demolishes the case presented by Time, Inc. On the matter of possible lawsuits through the imposition of any limitation on second-class publisher's subsidies, I am willing to rest my case on the analysis prepared by Mr. Stans, which appears at pages 743-747 of the House hearings on H. R. 5836.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that publishers will pass on to subscribers the additional postage costs provided for in any postal-rate law. It is more fair to the general public to let those who want to subscribe to Life, Saturday Evening Post, Reader's Digest, or Confidential pay whatever the publishers of these magazines feel is necessary for them to continue their service and make a profit. It is far more equitable than to continue to tax the many millions of Americans who do not subscribe to these magazines.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank you and the committee for the courtesy you have shown me.

Protect the Security of America

OF

HON. RICHARD H. POFF

OF VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. POFF. Mr. Speaker, I, for one, refuse to vote for adjournment of Congress until legislation is enacted to reverse the Supreme Court decision opening FBI files to Communists and other criminals in the Federal courts. The recent indictment of the Russian Colonel Abel, the boss of the Soviet espionage system in America, serves to dramatize once again the threat of Communist infiltration and internal subversion, and any further delay in plugging this hole opened in the dike of our national security may prove disastrous.

In conjunction with several other Members of Congress, I have introduced a bill (H. R. 8423) designed to reverse the Supreme Court decision in the Jencks case. That decision, which decided that an accused Communist or other Federal-law breaker had the right to rummage through the FBI files to determine what evidence the prosecutor had against him, literally blew the lid off the law enforcement agencies of the Federal Government. Other Government departments charged by law with the protection of the security of America have been thrown into utter confusion by this calamitous decision. In effect, the decision gave to the accused criminal a right to conduct a fishing expedition through Government files—a right which is not enjoyed even by the elected representatives of the people.

FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover called for corrective legislation, and the bills which we have introduced have the approval of the Department of Justice. Under these bills, the defendant has the right to see only those documents signed by the prosecuting witness and relating directly to the subject matter about which the witness is testifying. Even these documents are subject to the prior scrutiny of the judge trying the case. The judge is given the power to determine the relevancy of the documents and to refuse to show them to the defendant if they contain any security data which, if disclosed, would jeopardize national security interests. Under the bill, all other documents in the possession of the United States are exempt from the subpena power.

The passage of this legislation would do much to restore stability to the criminal procedure of the Federal courts and to protect the vital interests of the Nation and its people. The Jencks decision was applauded by the Daily Worker, the Americans for Democratic Action, the Communist Party of the United States of America, and many other similar organizations and publications. They described it as "a great blow struck for individual liberty." Individual liberty is, of course, our most priceless American heritage. However, the phrase "individual liberty" has never been properly defined to include unbridled freedom to thwart the criminal laws of the land. The Bill of Rights did not guarantee the right of one individual to trample upon the rights of his fellow citizens. It is the function of every well-ordered government to protect society against those few individuals who would misuse and abuse the individual freedom guaranteed to all men. Society cannot be protected if the lawbreaker is to be allowed unlimited access to the law-enforcer's files.

American Tariffs

OF

HON. WILL E. NEAL

OF WEST VIRGINIA

Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, in 1934, at the instance of Cordell Hull, then Secretary of State, the Congress passed the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act as an emergency. This was done in the hope of retrieving some of our losses in international exports resulting from competition with cheap-labor products produced in Japan, Germany, and other European nations, and trade restraints imposed by the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act of 1930. By this act the Congress surrendered its constitutional powers to regulate foreign trade and national economy through the adjustment of duties, imports, and excises to the Tariff Commission, an agency of the Executive.

Under Mr. Hull's direction, several bilateral trade agreements were made, especially with nations that could export to us strategic materials we needed in our industrial activities. However, the anticipated upsurge in our foreign exports lagged until the second World War clouds began to shower America with orders for arms. The story of America's exports during and following the second World War is common knowledge.

When the rush began to subside, our expanded industrial machine and the international traders prevailed upon the President to liberalize tariff regulations in the hope of maintaining a more extensive export-import trade.

In response to this plea and under the authority of the act of 1934, the President proceeded to set up in 1947 the so-called GATT—General Agreements on Tariffs and Trades—and designated Geneva as its headquarters. This organization continues to function at Geneva and now numbers 34 foreign nations, and acts as a tariff-making body with each member nation having an equal voice. In short, trade tariffs and multilateral agreements are regulated in Geneva where we have one vote in 35.

The Congress has never officially recognized GATT, yet the President and his Tariff Commission have the full power to approve or reject specific tariff schedules adopted by this group. Under continual pressure from export-import groups, aided by international financial interests, the President and his Tariff Commission have whittled away our tariffs until we now have virtual free trade.

Under the theory that America must buy from free nations in order that they may secure dollars with which to buy from us, we have succeeded in greatly increasing our exports. In some respects, this policy has been nationally beneficial. This is especially true with heavy industry, agricultural machinery, and household appliances. In that these industries have found outlets for their productive capacity, they have materially augmented full employment for American labor. But while this is true, the American consumer market has been increasingly flooded with foreign-made goods produced abroad under low paid labor conditions that make it all but impossible for American producers to compete pricewise. Hence, reduced demands for American consumer goods has caused hundreds of our manufacturers to slow their output or close entirely, leaving thousands of our own labor force unemployed. This has brought about heavy loss both in plant investment and high standard American labor in industries such as textiles, livestock, mining, crockery, glass, precision instruments, machine tools, chemicals, and many others. Under existing tariff regulations, markets for these products are progressively dwindling as cheaper products produced abroad continue to flood the American market.

In approaching the value of foreign trade to the American economy, we must not forget the fact that it is a two-way street. Following the late World War, the great need abroad for durable goods to restore the productive economy of defeated nations made possible ready markets for the products of big industry which has continued to be subsidized to a great extent through our foreign-aid program. Now that foreign plant capacity has been fully restored, their ability to export begins to challenge American markets here at home as well as in our overseas trade areas.

Hence it becomes obvious that more attention must be directed toward protection of American producers of consumer goods against foreign competitors who, under existing trade and tariff regulations, are extended the freedom to usurp our home markets at the expense of American plant investment and the labor forces involved.

Incidents of injury to and casualties among American small industries and labor groups are becoming altogether too common to be pushed aside as inconsequential by an unsympathetic Tariff Commission.

America no longer enjoys its first rank as an exporting nation. We are facing new conditions under which the Old World restored industrial competition is beginning to pinch.

The future well-being of the American economy demands that the Tariff Commission revise its schedules upward to prevent unlimited, competing, injurious imports and to respond more readily to pleas of injured American manufacturers when they are able to show just cause.

It is not conceivable that GATT or the proposed OTC, operating in faraway Geneva, can agree upon tariff rates that tend to be beneficial to American manufacturers.

Judging from past experience, injured American industrialists can expect no relief until the Congress recovers its constitutional authority to regulate trade and tariffs and proceeds to require the Tariff Commission to hew to a policy of adequate protection of American industry.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I profess no talent as a naval strategist. I feel that I am wise to leave that to the admirals. But I do profess considerable knowledge of the sea and the men who sail it, having spent a good many years before the mast. The men who make up the complement of the beautiful new Ranger are, I am sure, no different in their tastes and desires from the merchant seamen; the bluejackets of the lesser but no less proud vessels of our splendid fleet, or the boys who man the lovely white cutters of the United States Coast Guard.

Ask them their idea of the best liberty town on the coast and we will wager that San Francisco wins the toss, hands down.

There has been much argument and comment both in the public prints and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on why the Ranger should make Long Beach her home port rather than Bremerton or San Francisco. The reasons given are certainly valid as far as they go for either of these two fine ports to the northward and southward of San Francisco. But let us take a minute or two to discuss the ship's assignment from the point of view of her 3,500 crew members' welfare and morale.

Has anyone ever walked down the main street of a Navy town when liberty has been granted and the town's population virtually doubles in the space of hours? The sea of white hats may make the hustlers, the gyp artists, the tattoo parlors, and the beer-joint operators faint with delight as the jacktars struggle with their own form of temptation on where to spend their money.

Has anyone ever thought of the housing and schooling problems that beset the smaller Navy town when a ship the size of the Ranger drops her hook in her permanent anchorage? Has anyone experienced the married sailors' dismay when they learn the stepped up rent they would have to pay for cramped quarters in an already cramped community?

To a city the size of San Francisco, the influx of 3,000 Navy families would be a drop in the bucket. The city is big enough to absorb far more than that, and in San Francisco the natural beauties, the wonderful climate, and the cultural and educational advantages are a strong morale inducement which I feel should be carefully considered.

The quasi-military experts have argued that farther south in California the flying conditions are better than those in the San Francisco area. The number of crystal-clear days may be more frequent farther south, but I doubt it. This may seem naive of me to mention, but nowadays is aerial combat limited only to those days when no vagrant whisp of nimbo-stratus clutters the horizon and the eyeballs of the foe are clearly visible a rocket's range away?

San Francisco's shipyards are quite capable of handling a ship of the Ranger's bulk. The critics point out that another west-coast port would be better equipped to handle her if she ever became badly damaged. Again at the risk of naivete, may I suggest that were she banged up, the unfortunate event would probably occur somewhere east of Suez, and were she required to limp home for docking, the difference in nautical miles on a great-circle run from the Far East to any port on the west coast would be practically negligible.

I enjoy a mental picture of the Ranger, steaming in stately dignity beneath the Golden Gate Bridge, inbound from a Far East patrol. Below, in her berthing spaces the liberty section is getting ready to go ashore. The dialog might go something like this.

"What are you gonna do tomorrow, Boats?"

"Going to take the wife and kids out to the ball game. I hear those San Francisco Giants are playing a doubleheader."

San Francisco, with its unlimited facilities to absorb, educate, and entertain the 3,500 sailormen and their families, wants to be home port of the Ranger; and with its shipyard facilities and unquestioned position as a major port city on the Pacific coast, ought to be the home port for the queen of the Pacific Fleet.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LYNDON B. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 23, 1957

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, one of the finest instruments of Government which has been created in recent years has been the National Security Training Commission. This body has been under the leadership of some of our ablest Americans, including Gen. David Sarnoff.

On June 30 of this year, the Commission wound up its work and voluntarily ended its operations. Mr. President, I may say that is an unusual thing for a Government commission to do.

I am proud of the Commission for many reasons. One is that its Director was Edgar G. Shelton, Jr., a young man from my State, who for a period of time was associated with me, as a member of my staff. He did an outstanding job, in keeping with the high standards he has set for himself all his life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement summarizing the Commission's activities be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that Americans may have full knowledge of the faithful service the Commission has performed.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL SECURITY TRAINING COMMISSION

I wish to pay tribute to the National Security Training Commission, which on June 30 concluded its task, filed its final report with the Congress, and voluntarily closed its door. Seldom is it that a permanent Government agency voluntarily goes out of business when its task is completed. Few agencies have faced difficulties of the magnitude which faced this Commission—and few have achieved the degree of success the National Security Training Commission has achieved. I believe that this is due largely to the caliber of the men who served on the Commission over the years.

Some of the most outstanding Americans of our age have given freely of their time and effort—without compensation—to serve as members of this Commission.

The National Security Training Commission was created by the Universal Military Training and Service Act of 1951 and came into being on June 19, 1951.

Under the chairmanship of the late Senator James W. Wadsworth in 1951–52 the Commission began its activity and submitted its first report. Under the acting chairmanship of the late well-known scientist, Dr. Karl T. Compton, the Commission was kept alive in 1952–53. The late Maj. Gen. Julius Ochs Adler, of the New York Times, who served as Chairman from 1953 to 1955 provided the leadership which led to 20th Century Minutemen, the 1953 report to the President which became the basis for the Reserve Forces Act of 1955. The late Lt. Gen. Raymond S. MacLain, of Oklahoma, who was a member from 1951 until his death in 1954, was one of the great civilian soldiers of our time. My fellow Texan and statesman, William L. Clayton, who is well known to all of us, was a member from 1951 to 1953.

One of the most distinguished admirals in history, Thomas C. Kinkaid, served on the Commission from its beginning to its end. Warren H. Atherton, past national commander of the American Legion, served from 1953 to 1957. Albert J. Hayes, president of the International Association of Machinists, served from 1954 to 1957. In 1955 Gen. Walter Bedell Smith was appointed to the Commission and in 1955 one of the almost legendary figures of American industry, Gen. David Sarnoff, president of RCA, became the Commission's final Chairman.

With men such as these it is little wonder that the Commission accomplished great things when faced with many obstacles. It is due largely to this group that we today have an effective, growing, trained Reserve.

The Commission's task was born of the danger with which we were faced in 1950—unpreparedness. No nonveteran reserves were trained between World War II and June 1950. Then came the Korean war. Over 600,000 veterans of World War II were recalled to active duty in place of the men whom we had failed to train.

The conscience of America was shaken.

The UMTS Act was passed in 1951.

The NSTC was created. Its purpose was to help build a trained, nonveteran Reserve through the promotion of a 6-month Reserve training program.

The Commission, on October 29, 1951, submitted legislative recommendations to the Congress.

These recommendations were reported favorably by the two Armed Services Committees, but the House of Representatives recommitted the legislative proposal.

The Commission did not give up. On December 1, 1953, the members submitted to the President a report entitled "20th Century Minutemen," which became the basis for the Reserve Forces Act of 1955. From 1953 through 1955 the Commission was instrumental in developing the national Reserve plan, which after numerous and almost insurmountable executive and legislative problems became the Reserve Forces Act of 1955 on August 9, 1955.

The Reserve Forces Act of 1955 wrote into law the three basic objectives of the NSTC report of 1953. They were:

1. A 6-month Reserve training program.
2. The replacement of veterans in the Ready Reserve by trained nonveterans to the greatest extent possible under the requirements of the national security, thus permitting veterans to transfer to the Standby Reserve if they so desire.
3. Selective recall of the Standby Reserve in the event of emergency, to do away with the inequities which existed in the recall of veterans during the Korean war.

It should be noted that the Reserve Forces Act of 1955 did not require war veterans to participate involuntarily in the Ready Reserve. And, as of July 1 of this year about 700,000 Army veteran reservists have been transferred to the Standby Reserve. One of the main reasons this has been possible is the success of the voluntary 6-month Reserve training program.

The Reserve Act of 1955 did not give the authority to draft young men into the 6-month program even though the Commission and the Defense Department had requested such authority. The program was entirely voluntary.

In December 1955, Gen. David Sarnoff, newly appointed as Chairman of the Commission, decided that the American public must be told about the new Reserve program. He suggested that an entire week in the spring of 1956 be set aside for the purpose of an educational campaign through all public media such as radio, television, newspapers, magazines, and motion pictures. He secured the wholehearted cooperation of the radio-television industry.

The National Security Committee, a private citizens' group, sponsored what became known as Military Reserve Week, April 22–28, 1956.

Military Reserve Week set off the most intensive educational campaign on behalf of the Reserve in peacetime history. The campaign was supported by private organizations and the radio-television industry.

Over a period of only a few months there were 173 special radio programs broadcast at least 12,725 times; 19 special television programs shown at least 5,885 times—5 of which were seen and heard 14,200,000 times; radio spot announcements were broadcast locally at least 175,938 times. TV spot announcements were shown locally at least 50,744 times. Over 6,000 radio-TV spots were broadcast on the 3 networks or their affiliates and heard and seen 995,200,000 times. One hundred and fifty-six plugs by radio-TV stars on the 3 networks were heard and seen 928 million times. The public-service radio-TV time (not counting talent) used to plug the Reserve program was worth nearly $8 million.

This is to the everlasting credit of the Nation's free television-radio industry.

After Military Reserve Week the Reserve program began to grow.

Today the program is a success.

This is due in large measure to the continual educational program which was waged from the day the Reserve Forces Act of 1955 became law to the present time. The Armed Forces, the many private organizations, public-spirited individuals, the free radio-television industry, and the press deserve the Nation's thanks for their persistent and effective effort in helping to build a strong Reserve.

On February 5, 1957, the Commission reassessed its role and wrote to the President stating in part, "Now that the Reserve program is well under way, the members of this Commission feel that our mission has been accomplished. * * * We recommend, therefore, subject to your approval, that the Commission terminate its activities on June 30, 1957, and thus make a contribution, even though small, toward reducing the expenses of Government."

On March 25, the President, reluctantly accepted the Commission's proposal.

On June 30, the Commission closed its doors.

On July 15 the Congress received their final report.

Before World War II, our entire military Reserve consisted of about 400,000 men, many of them inactive and untrained. Today we have some 2,500,000 ready reservists with nearly 1 million of them in active drill-pay status, plus some 700,000 standby reservists.

On June 30, 1950, just as the Korean war broke, the Army Reserve and Army National Guard in active drill-pay status numbered 384,000. Three years later, June 30, 1953, just prior to the Commission's report to the President they numbered only 373,000. Today they number 678,000, an all time high.

On June 30, 1954 over 73 percent of all reservists were veterans. In the Army Reserve alone 98 percent were veterans. Today this imbalance is being remedied by the tens of thousands of nonveteran 6-month trainees who are entering the Ready Reserve, permitting veterans to move to standby status.

In the first 6 months of this year, the Reserve components of the Armed Forces have grown more rapidly than in any comparable period in peacetime. Particularly gratifying was the upsurge of enlistments in the 6-month Reserve training program. In the spring of 1956 there were only about 600 enlistments per week. Then came Military Reserve Week. By June 1956 enlistments were up to about 1,000 per week. By April 1957, the rate had increased to more than 4,000 a week—equivalent to an annual rate of well over 200,000.

This is not the result of accident. The success which has become apparent during the last few months didn't just happen. It has taken an incredible amount of work over a period of 6 long years to accomplish this. Full credit should go to all, both in and out of the Government, who have worked so hard on the program. Certainly, however, there would have been no 6-month Reserve training program without the Commission and its outstanding members.

Due to their efforts in creating our 20th Century Minutemen the Nation is more secure. With the ever-growing strength furnished by our Reserve the chances of world peace will be improved.

The NSTC can well be proud of its contribution.

SENATE

Eternal Spirit, hope of the souls that seek Thee, strength of the souls that find Thee, grant unto these chosen servants of the Commonwealth, pressed by grave questions and vexing problems, the refreshment and renewal which will make them adequate to serve the present age. Make them conscious of eternal verities that outlast the strident noises of today. We cannot adequately face such a world, so full of violent and dark deeds, and make our humble contribution to the healing of its disordered state, unless we keep untarnished our faith in Thy power to make even the wrath of men praise Thee. To our stricken generation may there come peace with honor, with human dignity vindicated and with social justice the panoply of all nations. In the Redeemer's name we ask it. Amen.

RESOLUTION OF VILLAGE COUNCIL, KENYON, MINN.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I have received a resolution which was adopted by the Village Council of the Village of Kenyon, Minn. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VILLAGE OF KENYON,
Goodhue County, Minn., August 22, 1957.

HON. EDWARD J. THYE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

The Village Council of the Village of Kenyon, in regular session Monday, August 5, 1957, passed the following resolution on motion by Trustee Bohan, seconded by Trustee Schwasinger:

"The Village Council of the Village of Kenyon, Minn., representing the citizens and industrial leaders of the community, do hereby resolve that the Federal Power Commission give careful and favorable consideration to the Northern Natural Gas Co.'s application for permission to extend its gas lines to southern Minnesota communities specified in the application, one of these communities being Kenyon. The growth and future development of the areas named in the application are dependent upon the decision rendered by the Federal Power Commission. An adverse decision for Northern Natural Gas Co. would seriously stunt a bid for progress in villages and cities that can be served only by Northern Natural Gas Co. because of its present availability of service to most sections of southern Minnesota. Approval of the application of the above named company would serve communities from main gaslines already in the territory, thereby providing fast, economical service."

Upon rollcall Mayor Jacobson, Clerk Akre, and Trustees Bohan and Schwasinger voted "aye." There were no "noes" so the resolution carried and was so declared.

RESOLUTIONS OF 1957 CONVENTION OF OREGON STATE LABOR COUNCIL

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, organized labor in the State of Oregon has been long in the forefront of groups supporting progressive legislation. The leadership from the ranks of labor has made possible significant achievements in health and welfare programs and in enlightened statutes for the benefit of working men and women.

Representatives of Oregon labor organizations met again this year in the city of Klamath Falls, from August 5 to 9, 1957, to discuss problems confronting their unions, members, and the country generally. During the course of this second annual meeting of the Oregon State Labor Council, AFL–CIO, several resolutions were adopted which establish the stand of one of the Nation's outstanding labor groups on such questions as public housing, political campaign financing, and group health insurance for United States postal employees.

The Oregon State Labor Council urges in one of the resolutions a vast expansion of the public housing program. This is especially important to the State of Oregon because of its economic dependence on demands in housing for the prosperity and growth of the lumber industry. Convincing arguments for better housing legislation, and for improvement of other national programs are presented in the resolutions adopted by the Oregon State Labor Council which have been forwarded to me. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, the following resolutions, Nos. 24, 8, and 10.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 24

Whereas a dynamic housing program is an indispensable ingredient of an ever-expanding and fully employed economy, and

Whereas the National Housing Conference reported in its July 7, 1957, publication The Housing Yearbook that "new standard housing is priced beyond the reach of the average family." The Conference survey of private housing, available in the cheapest range made in 11 major cities, including Seattle, Wash., shows minimum prices for new dwellings in the 11 cities ranged from $8,490 for a row house in Philadelphia, to $13,900 for a detached dwelling in Milwaukee. The medium price was $11,450 in Kansas City. Estimated expense of paying off the mortgage, taxes, insurance, maintenance, utility, and heat for the $11,450 was $119 per month, and

Whereas the Yearbook states that on the theory that housing expense should not exceed one-fifth of the income, a family should have $7,156 a year to carry this house, except in the South. Therefore, a family must have an income of $8,000 or more to take a choice among these new houses. Only about 1 urban family out of 6 has that much income. Private builders are serving less than 20 percent of the people; and

Whereas families with incomes less than $8,000 have been buying new homes priced between $10,000 and $12,000 or more by using savings, borrowing on life insurance, putting additional members of the family to work, and curtailing other expenses; and

Whereas from a statistical analysis made by labor, it was shown that from 1955 up through 1959, 1,430,000 new dwellings will be needed yearly to provide for additional families; also 100,000 units yearly to replace annual losses. A conservative request was made the previous year for construction of 2 million new homes; however, only 1 million new low-priced dwellings were constructed; and

Whereas the need is still great in the United States to eliminate tenement conditions to effect slum clearance; and

Whereas organized labor in the past 20 years urged Government measures for housing and for many other economic policies beneficial to the interests of low and medium income groups: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the second annual convention of the Oregon State Labor Council, AFL–CIO:

1. Ask Congress to provide for the housing needs of low and medium income families by authorizing the construction of at least two million subsidized public housing units a year, and at the same time, work to curb inflationary trends.

2. Urges construction of two million new housing units a year until every American family may be adequately housed.

3. Calls upon Congress to insure by appropriate legislation, good housing for all individuals, regardless of national, religious, or racial background.

4. Recommends that this resolution be sent to President Eisenhower, the United States Congress, and our Oregon Congressional delegation.

Adopted unanimously August 9, 1957.

RESOLUTION 8

Whereas we believe that democracy means full participation by all of the people in the functions of Government including political campaigns; and

Whereas the extravagant cost of political campaigns makes it exceedingly hard for a man of integrity to win public office without owing favors to special interests which have financed his campaign; and

Whereas the trend in recent years is to sell a candidate to the public as one would sell soap or toothpaste by saturation advertising; and

Whereas during the 1956 national campaign 5 families in the United States contributed more to candidates or parties than the 15 million members of organized labor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That in order to stimulate more widespread participation and interest in political campaigns we call for legislation to provide by law; that each Federal taxpayer may deduct any amount not to exceed $10 from his Federal income tax when his return is accompanied by a receipt, or receipts, for contributions to any bona fide party, candidate, or political organization; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to our delegation in Congress, with a request for favorable action; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be presented to the Oregon State Labor Council, meeting in convention at Klamath Falls, Oreg., for their approval and adoption.

Adopted August 9, 1957.

RESOLUTION 10

Whereas the administration has seen fit to institute a group life-insurance plan for post-office employees, which operates at a minimum cost to said employees, and as a result has accumulated a huge surplus; and

Whereas there now exists a dire need for a group health and accident plan for postal employees and their families: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Oregon State Labor Council in convention assembled at Klamath Falls, Oreg., August 5–9, 1957, go on record as favoring an equitable health and accident plan for postal employees and their families, with full cost to be borne by the Federal Government.

Adopted August 8, 1957.

RESOLUTIONS OF OREGON STATE LABOR COUNCIL, AFL–CIO

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, resolutions adopted by the Oregon State Labor Council, AFL–CIO, at Klamath Falls, Oreg., August 5 to 9, 1957.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION 8

Adopted August 8, 1957.

RESOLUTION 73

Whereas in America we have established the principle that accused individuals are innocent until proven guilty; and

Whereas various investigative bodies have adopted methods of investigation which tend to accuse individuals and organizations; and

Whereas this method is used to form public opinion against certain individuals and organizations, regardless and in opposition to the facts; and

Whereas these investigative bodies employ such methods as TV coverage and public statements by members of these bodies: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention go on record as opposed to this form of public trial by accusation, and opposed to TV and radio presentation of slanted investigations and to public statements by members of these investigative bodies, during the course of these hearings; be it further

Resolved, That our national Congressional representatives be informed of this resolution by this body.

Adopted August 9, 1957.

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1011 of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948, as amended, the special account established pursuant to such section shall not be available for the payment of obligations arising under informational media guaranties made after 30 days after the enactment of this act, and no payments shall be made of obligations arising under such guaranties made after such date except from amounts hereafter appropriated for such purpose, which appropriations are hereby authorized. The Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer from such special account to the general fund of the Treasury such amounts (including foreign currencies available from conversions made pursuant to the obligation of such guaranties, and the proceeds of the sales of any such currencies) as the Director of the United States Information Agency shall from time to time determine to be in excess of the amounts necessary to discharge obligations arising under guaranties made prior to 30 days after the enactment of this act."

Mr. RUSSELL also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9302, making appropriations for mutual security for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1140) to amend Public Law 85-56 to permit persons receiving retired pay for nonregular service to waive receipt of a portion of that pay to receive pensions or compensation under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, which has been referred to that committee, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Finance. The bill involves a tax feature, which would more properly be considered by the Finance Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. MARTIN of Pennsylvania:

Address intended to have been delivered by him at civil liberties meeting of grand lodge convention, Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks of the World, in South Philadelphia High School, August 26, 1957.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF ROBY C. THOMPSON TO BE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE WESTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, August 27, 1957, at 11 a. m., in room 424, Senate Office Building, upon the nomination of Roby C. Thompson, of Virginia, to be United States district judge for the western district of Virginia, vice Alfred D. Barksdale, retired.

At the indicated time and place all persons interested in the above nominations may make such representations as may be pertinent.

IRON ORE DEPOSITS IN MONTANA

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the last few weeks I have discussed on the Senate floor the recent developments of new iron ore deposits in Montana. Available reports indicate that some of these deposits are among the richest in this country. These iron ore deposits immediately awakened interest in the possibility of a steel mill being established in my State.

My distinguished colleagues, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] was one of the very first to realize this great potential, and has worked unceasingly toward that end. Senator MURRAY has explored the feasibility of a steel mill and, while his untiring efforts have resulted in generating some new interest, we Montanans feel that our State's industrial potential is not being fully utilized.

Senator MURRAY has a long and enviable record of working toward the development of Montana. This new steel industry is only one of the many instances.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the August 15 issue of the Lewistown Daily News commending Senator MURRAY be printed at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, along with an editorial that appeared in the Great Falls Tribune, of Great Falls, Mont., dated August 23, having to do with Senator MURRAY and his position in re the mineral price program.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Lewistown (Mont.) Daily News of August 15, 1957]

MURRAY AND STEEL MILL RESEARCH

If they do not, it won't be because a number of central Montanans and United States Senator JAMES E. MURRAY haven't tried in every way to bring such an industry here.

Much has been said and done in the exploration of the feasibility of a steel mill here, but MURRAY's office is the first to acknowledge the fact that we are doing little more than scratching the surface thus far. Extensive investigation lies ahead, and the senior Montana Senator has a number of agencies making inquiries regarding the various possible methods that could be used to operate a steel mill in this area.

Preliminary studies have not been discouraging. With a bit of good fortune and the type of work that MURRAY is putting forth in Washington, D. C., such an industry well might be established here eventually.

If studies continue to show that there would be a good chance for a financial success for a steel mill in central Montana, then it will be up to the State planning board to do its utmost to interest steel companies in coming here.

All of this won't happen tomorrow. But the groundwork is now being handled, and handled well, by MURRAY's leadership in Washington.

It is indeed encouraging when a Senator finds the time and energy to pursue such a full-scale research. However, the establishment of new State industries is a foremost project with MURRAY.

In recent speeches he has pointed out that the economical condition of the State is not good. Realizing the importance now of new industries for the State, MURRAY has devoted a great deal of time toward the investigation of a possible steel mill.

There are a number of obstacles to overcome before a steel industry could make its way to central Montana, but there has been nothing yet which has discouraged the objective one iota. On the contrary, there have been a number of encouraging signs for such a steel mill in the future.

SENATOR MURRAY RAPS MAKESHIFT MINERAL PRICE PROGRAM

Senator JAMES E. MURRAY has voiced sharp pertinent criticism of the Eisenhower administration's long-range mineral program. The particular target of the Montana Senator's attack is the proposed administration bill for a sliding scale of lead and zinc import excise fees. This he describes as totally inadequate. He adds, however, that the Senate Finance Committee had no choice other than to adopt the bill when it learned that any other tariff legislation would meet the disapproval of the President.

The aim of this proposed tax, which Congress is being urged to pass before adjournment, is to stabilize the price of lead at between 16 and 17 cents per pound and the price of zinc at about 13½ cents. This would be attempted by a tax on imports of these metals when domestic prices of them drop below certain levels. It involves a complicated formula but the effect is to protect United States lead and zinc producers against the competition of foreign suppliers.

Canada sells the United States about $80 million worth of these 2 metals a year and is making vigorous protest to the State Department about this measure. Mexico, Peru, and Australia have also entered protests.

As a Washington observer points out, lead and zinc producers in this country are having trouble now, and appear to be headed for more. They need help and on the record Congress and the President seem willing to give them some help. The big question is whether this tax is the proper way to render aid.

As Senator MURRAY points out, the President had adequate power and authority under the escape clause of the Trade Agreement Act, and other acts of Congress, to immediately set in motion machinery for quick adjustments of the tariffs on lead and zinc at a higher figure than is proposed in this measure. That would have been a simpler and more direct way to provide the desired relief to the domestic producers.

METAL PRICES

> BUTTE, MONT.,
> August 25, 1957.
> Senator MIKE MANSFIELD,
> Senate Office Building,
> Washington, D. C.:
>
> People engaged in mining operations and others in western Montana will soon be in desperate economic need due to deflated metal prices. Relief must be forthcoming soon to avoid serious financial setbacks to a large number of people. As president of the Montana Municipal League, I urge you to prevail upon the Tariff Commission, the Congress, and the President to take immediate steps to help the mining segment of our economy. It appears that fast action will be necessary to avoid mass unemployment and the serious effects that such unemployment would bring to communities throughout the West.
>
> JIMMY SHEA,
> President of the Montana Municipal League.

I join with Mr. Shea in urging the President to do something about this particular situation, because lead and zinc are in the doldrums, and if something is not done very soon, practically all mines producing those minerals in this country will be shut down. Copper is on the way down, because we find, for example, custom smelters have quoted copper prices at 27½ cents a pound. I repeat the statement that on the richest hill on earth, in Butte, Mont., it costs 31 cents a pound to produce copper. So I earnestly hope that President Eisenhower, under the escape clause contained in the reciprocal trade agreements, will take action—and soon—to bring relief to lead and zinc producers at the present time, and to the copper industry when that time arrives.

THE MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Pres- , on last Friday, August 23, in discussing the mutual security program in the morning hour, I pointed out that the Appropriations Committee of the House had made the overall assertion that upward of $12 billion is available at the present time, and therefore only a small current appropriation for the 1958 program is necessary. At that time I inserted the conclusions of a study I had had made and which indicated that the alleged availability of foreign currencies was an erroneous assumption.

Again at my request the ICA and other departments of the Government have assisted my staff in preparing a statement covering this entire alleged availability of something over $12 billion.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this statement, which I believe to be accurate, be inserted in full in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ALLEGED AVAILABILITY OF $12 BILLION FOR THE MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM IN FISCAL 1958

I

The claim of availability is made up of the following figures:

	Billion
Pipeline	$6.3
Foreign currencies	2.6
Available	8.9
House additions:
New appropriation	2.5
Reappropriation	.7
	12.1

It is argued that these available funds are ample to take care of the fiscal 1958 mutual security program for which the President originally asked $3.8 billion (with an additional reappropriation of approximately $500 million).

II

The foregoing overall figures making up $12 billion, I am advised, must be modified for accuracy in the following respects:

Through an unintentional error $700 million was included twice—once in the pipeline and again in the reappropriation for 1958; also an adjustment is necessary to bring these figures up to July 1, 1957.

The revised figures, therefore, should be:

	Billion
Pipeline ($6.3 billion minus $700 million and minus the adjustment of $200 million)	$5.4
Foreign currencies	2.6
Available	8.0
House additions as above	3.2
Total	11.2

In my remarks of last Friday, I pointed out that foreign currencies amounting to $2.6 billion were not available and the reasons were set forth in the study I inserted in the RECORD at that time.

If we deduct the $2.6 billion in foreign currencies from the total of now-available funds—namely, $8 billion—we arrive at the figure of $5.4 billion, which is the real figure under discussion. This was the figure the House used to justify the House appropriation of approximately $1.2 billion below the President's first request and approximately $800 million below the authorization bill as passed by the House and Senate.

III

The question is whether we can rely on any of the pipeline "availability" to take care of the 1958 planned program. What is not generally understood is that with the continuing security program, the pipeline "hardware" is constantly moving and also whatever economic aid is started on its way. Because of the so-called lead time necessary, especially for military hardware, we find that we have to figure on a period of from 2 to 3 years before deliveries to fulfill our commitments, and the amounts payable therefore do not become due until those deliveries are made. This means that the figure of $5.4 billion referred to above has been definitely committed in the development of the continuing program, and is not available for the 1958 program.

Both the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House and the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, in their extended hearings, received full evidence with regard to these pipeline operations. I am advised also that the Appropriations Committee of the House and now the Appropriations Committee of the Senate have both received the same testimony.

IV

This leaves us with the question of whether the new money for the 1958 program, provided by the House in its appropriation, is adequate for our needs.

This new money, as I stated above, is comprised of the following:

	Billion
New appropriation, 1958	$2.5
Reappropriation	.7
Total	3.2

During the past year the entire program of so-called foreign aid has been revised due to the recommendations of the elaborate study that was made by both the House and the Senate. In the Senate I was personally familiar with all these studies which unanimously urged that our mutual-security program be continued and put on a more permanent basis. The studies also provided for a revolving loan fund to assist backward countries to get on their feet economically and to help them in their striving for freedom, independence, and self-determination. It was felt by all our advisers that to save these underdeveloped countries from slipping behind the Iron Curtain because of their poverty, it would be necessary to help them help themselves by reasonably long-term loans.

To keep the program moving and especially to insure the continuance of the security program during these critical years, it was felt by the President and his advisers, and carefully developed in the testimony, that we would need $3.8 billion for the 1958 program in new money—the basic purpose of which is to insure the security of our own United States. These figures were reduced in the conferences between the Senate and the House and in the ultimate authorization bill to $3.3 billion in new money, which the President stated in a nationwide broadcast and reiterated again, is the lowest figure we can safely go to if we are to remain in a position of strength to meet these Communist aggressions. The cut by the House of over $800 million below the authorization is before the Senate Appropriations Committee at the present time.

Let me point out that in the cuts made by the House there were two items of special danger and which certainly should be fully restored. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 20, pages 15268–15269, I inserted a breakdown of the various titles of the bill indicating the President's original request, the Senate authorization, the House authorization, the conference compromise and the House appropriation figures.

The two cuts to which I now wish to call attention are Title II: Defense Support, where the authorization conference agreed on a figure of $750 million and the House cut this to $585 million in new moneys—a cut of $165 million. The danger involved here is due to the fact that defense support is what is needed to take care of the vital and critical areas in the world where we may be subject to a sudden attack at any time. These critical areas are five in number and are the following: Korea, Formosa, Vietnam, Pakistan, and Turkey. We simply cannot afford to cut our defense support in these areas. These countries, for example, will immediately have to begin planning to reduce their armed forces or adjust their economies in expectation of lessened United States aid.

The other item is title V, entitled "Special Assistance." This is the President's discretionary fund to be used anywhere in the world in case of a sudden emergency. Originally the President asked for $300 million. The House Appropriation drastically cut this, allowing only $175 million. The critical situation in the Middle East and especially the recent developments in Syria highlight the danger of such a cut in this fund.

V

It is my sincere hope that the study which I presented to the Senate last Friday and included in the RECORD, and this study which I am presenting today may assist us in arriving at our final conclusions with regard to a sound and safe appropriation for the 1958 mutual security program.

THE NEED FOR CONTINUED OPPOSITION TO THE CHICAGO WATER STEAL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I was pleased to receive this morning from the distinguished chairman of the Senate Public Works Committee our able colleague, the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], confirmation that there will be no action attempted this year on H. R. 2, the Lake Michigan water diversion bill.

Chairman CHAVEZ indicated:

> I have received numerous letters and telegrams from interested parties in the Great Lakes area regarding these hearings. I have advised those parties that no hearings are scheduled or anticipated at this session of Congress, but that I expect to schedule hearings on this matter early next year.

Mr. President, I should like most earnestly to alert all interested civic-minded folks throughout the Great Lakes region to the danger that H. R. 2 may be approved by the Senate Public Works Committee when it is taken up early in the second session.

I will not attempt at this time to spell out the long history of our battle against this unfair, unsound, and unconstitutional legislation.

I will simply state that every reason for our past opposition to the Chicago water steal continues, and new reasons have arisen, as well.

It is absolutely absurd for the United States Government to be constructing with our good neighbor, Canada, the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Seaway—a seaway which relies upon an appropriately high water level throughout the lakes—while at the same time to allow a disastrous drop in that water level.

It is absolutely absurd and self-contradictory for the United States to be engaged in talks with the Government of Premier Diefenbaker in which we ask for various concessions on the part of our Canadian friends on matters in which we are interested, while at the same time risking the very serious displeasure of our Canadian friends in a matter like this, in which their vital interests are imperiled.

If we expect to get fair dealing from Canada, then let us deal fairly with Canada.

Let us not sacrifice good relations between two sovereign governments in order that the Chicago Sanitary District can save money which it should spend to handle its own sewage pollution problem.

The Great Lakes area has now been put on notice. Let it mobilize its combined effort so that next year, when the Senate Public Works Committee holds its hearings, the entire Great Lakes region will be well organized to battle this danger.

Let us not have to witness the sorry spectacle of one city in one State prevailing upon 47 other States to send to the White House, once again, a bill which the President will have no alternative but to veto.

Surely, we can avoid the sorry spectacle of the Congress making so serious a mistake once again, and forcing the President to do something which I know he would prefer not to have to do, and that is to veto this unwise proposed legislation.

But veto it, I believe he must, if the Congress commits that error again. Let us hope that a veto will not prove necessary.

I send to the desk three items.

The first is a resolution which had been forwarded to me earlier this year, signed by municipal officials of Milwaukee, opposing the water diversion bill.

Finally, as an indication of Canadian sentiment on this issue, I send to the desk the text of a brief prepared by the government of Ontario, on the invitation of the Government of Canada, to present its views on this subject.

I earnestly hope that we of the United States will be as considerate of the judgment of our friends to the north, as we would ask them to be if one or more of our own States indicated that it would be jeopardized by some proposed Canadian action.

I ask unanimous consent that all of these items be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution, editorial, and brief were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
Milwaukee, June 24, 1957.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The city of Milwaukee is vigorously opposed to bills before the Senate which would authorize increased water diversion at the request of Chicago. Our city, in close cooperation with the Federal Government, is currently expending approximately $10 million of municipal funds to provide the most modern navigation facilities and deep-draft channels for the benefit of Great Lakes and ocean commerce.

We respectfully urge that the Senate take no action now to grant a special privilege to one community, which no matter how rationalized will produce the consequence of less water under the keels of lake and ocean ships sailing the Great Lakes.

We sincerely trust you will defeat any action to grant further water diversion.

We are sending you a statement of our case.

Yours truly,

FRANK P. ZEIDLER,
Mayor.
MARTIN E. SCHREIBER,
President, Common Council.
WALTER J. MATTISON,
City Attorney.
HARRY C. BROCKEL,
Municipal Port Director.

ARGUMENTS ON LAKE DIVERSION

The building of the St. Lawrence Seaway and its accompanying power dams being a mutual effort of the United States and Canada, the State Department has done the right thing in asking that action on the diversion bill be held up for completion of talks by the two countries.

The Army engineers found that withdrawal of another 1,000 cubic feet per second for Chicago ultimately would lower levels of Lakes Michigan and Huron by an inch, and in the 3-year test period proposed, would drop them by three-eighths of an inch. Insignificant, say proponents of the bill.

Dangerous, as a precedent, and because it must be added to the steady decline in lake levels, which has totaled 3 feet since the 1952 high, say the opponents, including Milwaukee.

A 1-inch drop, continue the opponents, puts lake ships 1 inch closer to scraping bottom, calling for lighter loads for the bulk carrier fleet, a loss of 300,000 tons in shipping capacity, worth $240,000 annually.

The antidiversion spokesmen go on to stress the effect on powerplants. They cite an Army engineers' claim that it would mean loss of 148 million kilowatt-hours in the 3-year period in United States plants (existing and proposed) and nearly twice that in Canadian plants.

Although they admit this is only a fraction of 1 percent of the total power, the opponents point to an estimated annual loss if the diversion became permanent of $708,000, while the boost at a Lockport (Ill.) plant from diversion would be worth only $67,000.

Milwaukee has made overtures to Canadian officials to join the already long and bitter fight over diversion. Surely the Canadians should have time to study the engineers' report, and all other pertinent data, if the historic spirit of cooperation is to be maintained.

BRIEF RESPECTING A PROPOSED INCREASE IN THE DIVERSION OF LAKE MICHIGAN WATERS AT CHICAGO, BY THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PROVINCE OF ONTARIO, MAY 6, 1957

The government of Ontario appreciates the invitation extended by the Government of Canada to express its views on the proposed diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago. Speaking on behalf of the people of this province, the governments must express extreme concern over such a proposal by United States interest to divert additional water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway.

An examination of the background of this problem shows that there has been persistent requests by interested groups for such a diversion of water since the middle of the last century. We are advised that the present proposal is to divert an additional 1,000 cubic feet per second for a period of 3 years beyond the present allowable water withdrawal of 3,100 cubic feet per second. From 1939 to date, in response to a decree of the United States Supreme Court, an average total diversion of 3,100 cubic feet per second into the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal has been permitted with domestic water supply pumpage averaging approximately 1,600 cubic feet per second. Thus, the Chicago Sanitary District is permitted at the present time to divert 1,500 cubic feet per second which may be used for sewage dilution. The present request by certain United States interests to divert this additional water is to obtain, among other benefits, aid in the disposal of sewage for a rapidly growing population in the south Chicago area. These interests would drain water from Lake Michigan to simplify the processing and discharge of sewage and thereby avoid the cost of constructing additional modern sewage treatment works.

The Province of Ontario must face the problems of rapid population growth and industrial expansion and realizes and appreciates the difficulties of servicing rapid municipal growth in such places as the Chicago Sanitary District. We wish to point out, however, that other cities bordering on the Great Lakes are confronted with similar difficulties and must process their sewage by modern treatment plants and return it to the lake upon which they are located. The Province of Ontario in order to assist municipalities in the construction of such costly sewage treatment works has established the Ontario Water Resources Commission and given the necessary authority to the Commission to assist the municipalities. Engineering advances enable such municipalities to process sewage to the high degree of purification so that treated wastes may be effectively disposed of without an adverse effect on the sanitation situation. It is, therefore, quite improper for any one area to divert the natural flow of the Great Lakes system into an entirely different watershed merely to flush sewage downstream.

We recognize that the United States Supreme Court has consistently taken a determined stand against any further unwarranted diversion of water from Lake Michigan. This position was taken after full and exhaustive examination of the pollution problem of the Chicago Sanitary District and the resultant injury of such action to other areas abutting on the Great Lakes and to persons both private and corporate who are dependent upon the free and unrestricted flow of the Great Lakes system. Studies conducted by this government show that an additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second will have the effect of decreasing lake levels from five one-hundredths to seven one-hundredths feet in each of the Lakes Huron, Erie, and Ontario. This, of course, is accompanied by a corresponding decrease in water flow therefore has an adverse effect on power potential and freedom of shipping. These undesirable subsidiary effects are of great concern to the people of this Province. The cost which is most readily computed resulting from the 3-year diversion is the loss in power to Ontario Hydro of 205,349,000 kilowatt-hours with an annual value of $581,200. The details of the loss of power and the resultant cost to the Province are set out in the accompanying brief prepared by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

If such an unwarranted diversion of water in Lake Michigan were allowed, it would occur at a time when the power demands of Ontario's industrial, commercial and residential users are increasing at an unprecedented rate. It is essential that there be no interference with normal water flows if the Province is to plan the necessary program of power development since projected requirements in Ontario indicate a total demand of 22 million horsepower by 1975, nearly 4 times existing requirements. The investment involved to provide for this power will necessitate the expenditure of at least $175 million a year including the water power developments already constructed or in process of construction in the St. Lawrence which are vital to the welfare of our people.

Any decrease in the natural flow of water in the Great Lakes and reduction in the water levels will have a serious adverse effect on shipping, particularly in times of low-water levels when ships in harbor and in passage through shallow waterways must of necessity limit tonnage to permit passage in safety. Municipalities in Ontario bordering on the Great Lakes are extremely concerned over any interference with water flows which may have a harmful effect on operations. The original settlement and development of this Province depended upon our excellent natural waterways and we must be most vigilant in protecting the interests of our people against any improper interference with water levels which would have an adverse effect on the freedom of our shipping and the development of lake ports.

For many years people of this Province, in common with the rest of Canada, have looked forward to the great developments on the St. Lawrence and quite willingly have approved the expenditure of tremendous sums of money to develop the St. Lawrence Seaway. Any proposed diversion must be considered in the light of the adverse effect it may have on the development and use of the seaway.

It has been suggested by some of the supporters of water diversion from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway that the Province of Ontario might counteract any adverse effects of such diversion by increasing the Long Lac-Ogoki flow into Lake Superior. Our engineers advise us that such an increase is not possible however, since virtually all the inflow from the Albany River system is being diverted to the south. The present flow is approximately 5,000 cubic feet per second and Ontario regrets that there is no way in which this can be increased. It should be noted that in the power arrangements on the St. Lawrence River the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario, working in complete harmony with the New York State Power Authority, shares equally in this additional flow of water from Ontario sources. This we consider is evidence of the cooperation of Canadian and United States groups in working together with each other's interest in mind in developing and utilizing the natural resources of border waterways.

The normal flow of water in the Great Lakes system should not be diverted elsewhere without the consideration and approval of various States and Provinces abutting on the lakes. It is reasonable to assume that the spirit of cooperation will continue to exist in the matter of sharing the great advantages of location on the Great Lakes system which has characterized the relationship of the people of this country with the citizens of our great neighbor to the south. Ontario wishes to join with the States of Minnesota, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York in protesting any additional diversion of water from Lake Michigan.

In making this protest the Province of Ontario is mindful of the terms of article 2 of the Boundary Waters Treaty between Canada and the United States, signed at Washington, January 11, 1909, and which states in part that the Province in common with other contracting parties has the right "to object to any interference with or diversions of waters on the other side of the boundary the effect of which would be productive of material injury to the navigation interests on its own side of the boundary." Ontario feels that Lake Michigan is an integral link in the Great Lakes system and that any alteration in the natural flow should only be accomplished through agreement of abutting jurisdictions.

Taking all these factors into consideration the Province of Ontario must take a firm stand against any such proposal to divert water from the normal Great Lakes watershed into another water course. The Province wishes to support the stand of other jurisdictions bordering on the Great Lakes who have protested most strongly the views of their people against such a diversion proposed by the Chicago Sanitary District. We ask the Government of Canada to protest to the proper authorities in the United States in the most vigorous terms such an unwarranted withdrawal of water from one of the Great Lakes without any prior consultation or approval by interested jurisdictions facing similar problems and sharing the same water.

BRIEF BY THE HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER COMMISSION OF ONTARIO RESPECTING A PROPOSED INCREASE IN THE DIVERSION OF LAKE MICHIGAN WATERS AT CHICAGO

1. Purpose of brief: In a letter dated April 9, 1957, from the Honorable L. B. Pearson, Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the Honorable Leslie M. Frost, Premier of the Province of Ontario, information was given with respect to proposed legislation in the United States which would authorize the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago to test, on a 3-year basis, the effect of increasing the diversion of Lake Michigan waters at Chicago by 1,000 cubic feet per second. In view of the important effects of such an increased diversion on power generation at Niagara Falls and on the St. Lawrence River at the generating stations of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, the Premier of the Province of Ontario has requested that this commission prepare a brief on this subject. The brief by this commission will be largely confined to the effects on power generation of the increased diversion, and it is understood that another brief by the Province of Ontario will deal in a comprehensive manner with its effect on Provincial interests.

2. Chicago diversion: Water is diverted from Lake Michigan for two purposes; domestic pumpage and sewage dilution in the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal. The diverted water flows south in the canal and enters the Mississippi River watershed by way of the Illinois Waterway. The Chicago Diversion commenced in 1900, and gradually increased from 3,000 cubic feet per second in 1900, to 10,000 cubic feet per second in 1928. A decree of the United States Supreme Court in 1930, however, provided for a gradual reduction in the diversion and that after 1938, the sewage dilution must be limited to 1,500 cubic feet per second in addition to domestic pumpage. From 1939 to date, domestic pumpage has averaged about 1,600 cubic feet per second and sewage dilution 1,500 cubic feet per second giving an average total diversion of 3,100 cubic feet per second. On December 17, 1956, in view of an emergency in navigation on the Mississippi River, the United States Supreme Court issued a decree authorizing a temporary diversion of 8,500 cubic feet per second plus domestic pumpage for a period of 46 days. It is now proposed that authority be given the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago, to test, on a 3-year basis, the effect of increasing the diversion at Chicago by 1,000 cubic feet per second. It is felt that should such an increase be authorized, efforts undoubtedly will be made to make the additional diversion permanent or even to increase it.

3. Effect on power generation of increased diversion: In a report by the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, dated January 1957, and entitled "Effect on Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River of an Increase of 1,000 Cubic Feet Per Second in the Diversion of Chicago," the effect on power generation of both a 3-year and a permanent increase in diversion was computed for both existing and proposed plants. These computations of power loss at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence have been checked by this Commission and general agreement was found except for Ontario Hydro power losses at Niagara where considerably greater losses were found during the temporary diversion, and somewhat lesser losses during the permanent diversion.

Tabulated below are the computed losses in power at Niagara and at the St. Lawrence for both Ontario Hydro and the Power Authority of the State of New York. Losses to Quebec Hydro are also tabulated. Ontario Hydro power loss figures are used where these are different than those in the Corps of Engineers report. Monetary values have been assigned to Ontario Hydro's power losses, on the basis of replacement energy costs of 3.17 mills per kilowatt-hour and replacement capacity costs of $14.43 per kilowatt.

A. EFFECT ON POWER GENERATION OF A TEMPORARY 3-YEAR INCREASE IN DIVERSION OF 1,000 CUBIC FEET PER SECOND

As the effects of a temporary diversion exist for a definite period of years and then disappear, the effects on power generation must be based on the plants that will be in operation during this period. On the basis that the plants in operation will be those now existing, those under construction, and those proposed, the computed power losses due to the temporary diversion are given in table I below. It should be noted that in this brief it is assumed that the proposed Lewiston plant at Niagara will be developed by the Power Authority of the State of New York.

TABLE I.—Temporary 3-year increase in diversion existing, under construction, and proposed plants in operation

Power entity	Total energy loss (in thousands of kilowatt-hours)			Value of total energy loss
	Niagara	St. Lawrence	Total
Ontario Hydro	136, 126	69, 184	205, 310	$650, 800
Power Authority of the State of New York	78, 236	76, 065	154, 301	--------
Hydro Quebec	--------	123, 133	--------	--------

On the basis that the proposed plants, that is, those at Lewiston and Lachine will not be in operation during this period, then the power losses would be somewhat reduced, the computed losses being given below in table II:

TABLE II.—Temporary 3-year increase in diversion existing and under construction plants only in operation

Power entity	Total energy loss (in thousands of kilowatt hours)			Value of total energy loss
	Niagara	St. Lawrence	Total
Ontario Hydro	74, 932	69, 184	144, 116	$456, 850
Hydro Quebec	--------	122, 568	--------	--------

B. EFFECT ON POWER GENERATION OF A PERMANENT INCREASE IN DIVERSION OF 1,000 CUBIC FEET PER SECOND

As a permanent increase in diversion will continue indefinitely, all plants existing, under construction and proposed, are assumed to be in operation. For the temporary diversion, the total loss in power generation can be computed and evaluated. For the permanent diversion, the figures obtained are annual loss in power generation and they are evaluated on an annual basis. In table III below is given the computed loss in power generation for a permanent increase in diversion:

TABLE III.—Permanent increase in diversion existing, under construction, and proposed plants in operation

Power entity	Annual energy loss—kilowatt hours			Peak capacity loss, kilowatts
	Niagara	St. Lawrence	Total	Niagara	St. Lawrence	Total
Ontario Hydro	85, 936, 000	27, 000, 000	112, 936, 000	11, 000	3, 080	14, 080
Power Authority of the State of New York	96, 426, 000	27, 000, 000	123, 426, 000	11, 000	3, 080	14, 080
Hydro Quebec	----------	56, 293, 000	----------	--------	8, 600	--------

NOTE.—Annual value of power loss for Ontario Hydro, $561,200.

4. Conclusions: From the above tables it may be noted that if the proposed temporary increase in Chicago diversion is authorized, Ontario Hydro would lose at least 144,116,000 kilowatt-hours power generation valued at $456,850 and probably as much as 205,310,000 kilowatt-hours valued at $650,800. If the increased diversion should be made permanent then each year Ontario Hydro would lose 112,936,000 kilowatt-hours of energy and 14,080 kilowatts of capacity, valued at $561,200. As may be seen from the tables, very substantial losses in power generation also would be incurred by Hydro Quebec and by the Power Authority of the State of New York. It is not possible to compensate for the increased diversion at Chicago by diverting additional flow into Lake Superior by way of the Long Lake and Ogoki diversions, as all flow that can be so diverted is being diverted. In view of these substantial power losses, it is urged that strong representation be made against this increased diversion of Great Lakes water into the Mississippi watershed.

Chairman, the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

WHY THE JUNIOR SENATOR FROM OREGON VOTED NOT TO SEND THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL TO THE SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, a great many people in the State of Oregon have written letters which ask me why I voted, on June 20, to place on the Senate Calendar the civil-rights bill passed by the House of Representatives, rather than having the bill referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee as normally would have been done.

It is understandable why such letters have come to me from Oregon because the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], with his customary vigor and force, has referred to that decision of the Senate as a resort to "parliamentary expediency." In addition, he has charged that such a decision played into the hands of the enemies of labor and of liberalism.

Inasmuch as many thousands of reprints of these speeches by my senior colleague were sent by him to Oregon, some of my constituents have wanted to know why I voted with those who sought to place the civil-rights bill on the Senate Calendar, instead of allowing it to go to committee.

Thus, today, August 26, I desire to make a very brief statement as to why I voted as I did. I did not actively participate in the debate on the issue, and this is my first declaration on the Senate floor with respect to this procedural question.

The determining factor in my stand was the position of the one member of the Senate Judiciary Committee who had stood out above all others as the foremost advocate of civil rights on the committee, as well as one of the most courageous civil-rights exponents in the entire Nation. He had originated many of the specific proposals which formed the civil-rights program, and he had pioneered this cause from within the committee. This was the illustrious senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

On June 20, Senator HENNINGS told the Senate why the bill should not be sent to the Judiciary Committee. This is what he said:

> As a supporter and sponsor of meaningful civil-rights legislation over the years; as chairman in the 84th Congress of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights which favorably reported four civil-rights bills, only to see them die in the full Judiciary Committee; as a sponsor this year of four bills similar to those of the previous Congress referred to above; as chairman of the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee which held exhaustive public hearings this year on 15 civil-rights proposals, and which favorably reported a bill to the full Judiciary Committee on March 19, 1957; as a member of the Judiciary Committee who has sought action on the merits of the legislation, to the end that a bill could be reported expeditiously to the Senate itself so that full, fair debate and consideration can be given to the subject; and thus as one who has been close to the issues throughout the past few years—I believe there is no convincing assurance that the Judiciary Committee will report a bill in the near future.

Let me announce that this continues to be the attitude of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. I recently asked him how he felt in retrospect about the Senate vote of June 20, which kept the civil-rights bill on the calendar. Although Senator HENNINGS has been recovering from surgery, he took the time and trouble to reply to me by letter. Here is what he wrote:

> This was my opinion then, and it is my opinion now.

In other words, Senator HENNINGS stands by his view that it would have been a mistake to send the civil-rights bill to the Judiciary Committee, of which he himself is a ranking member. I stress this circumstance because, day in and day out, over a period of nearly 10 years, Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., has been the American legislator whose name has been most intimately associated with civil-rights legislation, for he has been the leader of the long struggle to report an effective civil-rights bill from the Senate Judiciary Committee to the floor of the Senate.

I voted as I did on June 20, because of this stand by the principal adherent of civil rights on the Senate Judiciary Committee. I felt that he should know, if anybody would, the wisest and most practical course for a majority of the Senate to follow in this vital crisis.

It seemed to me important that a civil-rights bill—as finally passed by the House of Representatives—should not be buried in committee where so many civil-rights measures in the past had been laid to rest. This was an unusual situation; it did not apply to any other issue—for what other particular issue had been delayed, held up and kept from decision ever since the Reconstruction Era?

In essence, that was the fundamental basis on which I premised the way that I voted. I have not amplified my reasons until now. However, in fairness to myself, I have thought I should make this brief explanation for the record inasmuch as many inquiries have come to me from Oregon concerning that particular rollcall vote.

In conclusion, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD with these remarks a letter of August 7, 1957, addressed to me by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., August 7, 1957.

The Honorable RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DICK: You have inquired as to my views with respect to the decision of the Senate to place the House-passed civil-rights bill on the calendar, rather than send it to the Judiciary Committee.

I, too, voted in favor of that decision and you may recall that I made the following statement in the Senate on June 20, before the vote was taken:

"As a supporter and sponsor of meaningful civil-rights legislation over the years; as chairman in the 84th Congress of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights which favorably reported four civil-rights bills, only to see them die in the full Judiciary Committee; as a sponsor this year of four bills similar to those of the previous Congress referred to above; as chairman of the Constitutional Rights Subcommittee which held exhaustive public hearings this year on 15 civil-rights proposals, and which favorably reported a bill to the full Judiciary Committee on March 19, 1957; as a member of the Judiciary Committee who has sought action on the merits of the legislation, to the end that a bill could be reported expeditiously to the Senate itself, so that full, fair debate, and consideration can be given to the subject; and thus as one who has been close to the issues throughout the past few years, I believe there is no convincing assurance that the Judiciary Committee will report a bill in the near future."

My estimate of the failure of the legislation to make progress and the extreme unlikelihood of its being reported were based on attendance, week after week, of meetings of the Judiciary Committee.

This was my opinion then, and it is my opinion now.

DICK, it is not possible for me to express adequately my appreciation and admiration for all that you have done in behalf of the civil-rights legislation. You have ever remained in the forefront of the stanchest supporters of this legislation. I am certain that you have received plaudits from all parts of America on your work on this issue. Let me add simply my own thanks and feelings of deep respect.

With every best wish, I am,
Sincerely yours,
THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
United States Senate.

MR. REUTHER AND INFLATION

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, on August 22 Walter Reuther, president of the UAW-CIO, sent to the major automobile manufacturers of this country a suggestion that prices on their 1958 models be cut by $100 per unit. Since that time the indefatigable propaganda mills of Reuther's socialist cohorts have relentlessly cheered this move as a major thrust against inflation.

Mr. President, this suggestion is as phony as a $3 bill, and I want to point out why I say that. To begin with, since when has a labor leader assumed the right to tell any American company what its prices should be? Prices are based on costs equated with competition and the law of supply and demand. Wages are negotiated, and rightly so, over the bargaining table, but prices are set by the factors I have mentioned above.

Mr. President, I desperately want to see inflation controlled with the resulting stabilization of prices, but the only way this can be accomplished is by the free play of the natural economic forces which are the foundation of a free-enterprise system. If Government and/or labor leaders can enter the field of price fixing then free enterprise has ceased to exist.

If Mr. Reuther really wants to curb inflation, he should recognize that taxes and governmental spending probably more than any other factors have created the present rash of trouble. High Federal taxes bring about a tight money market in which there is bound to be competition, and which in turn forces interest rates up and the money supply down. If Mr. Reuther so piously wants to end inflation, then let him quit demanding more Federal spending for schools, for public power, for foreign aid, for agriculture, for housing, and for the many fields he suggests in the resolution adopted by his 16th constitutional convention, April 7 to 12 of this year. If he means what he says, let him join with those of us who demand less Federal spending so that all taxes may be reduced. I say if he means what he says, because this present gesture smacks of one he used back in 1946 when he demanded that General Motors "open their books to prove or disprove their ability to pay," and then said later it was merely a public-relations job and was used to put the company on the spot to talk economics or be over a barrel.

This is a strange form of proposal coming from a man who evidently dislikes and distrusts American businessmen and their free way of conducting the economy of the Nation.

On May 22 the same Mr. Reuther spoke before the National Press Club here in Washington and stated that "Beck got in trouble not because he acted like a labor leader but because he acted like a businessman and applied the ethics of the market place."

Mr. Reuther, continuing his tirade against free enterprise, accused key industries of arbitrarily rigging prices without regard for the law of supply and demand. Is not this statement irreconcilable in view of his present demand for a rigged price? This is the same man who suggests that the Government take over some of the businesses in this country. This is also the man who wants to breathe life into the suggestions of Leon Keyserling, the ADA and other left-wing, socialistic organizations engaged in expediting our transition from the blessings of free enterprise to the oft-proved disasters of socialism.

Yes, Mr. President, Walter Reuther detests free enterprise. He abhors any form of private management, and the market place in which we and our ancestors have met for thousands of years he considers the very epitome of evil.

Mr. President, this is the same man who in 1934 was so enamored of the Soviet Union that he closed a letter with the statement "Carry on the fight for a Soviet America." I say, Mr. President, that if and when the businessmen of this country succumb to the constant siren wails of Mr. Reuther then the fight for a Soviet America will be won.

Mr. President, I repeat, Reuther's proposal is as phony as a $3 bill and the American automobile manufacturers and the American public have recognized it as such.

NUCLEAR POWER DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM OF CONSUMERS PUBLIC POWER DISTRICT, NEBRASKA

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I deem it fitting that I make a statement in reference to the Consumers Public Power atomic project in Nebraska. In recent weeks, this matter has been subjected to considerable comment in the news media of the country, in official circles in the Government, by individuals directly connected with the project, and the general public.

The whole field of atomic energy is technical and complex. The peacetime uses of atomic energy are closely related to the defensive uses of atomic energy and, for that reason, certain phases of the whole program have, throughout the years, been in the category of classified material. Sometimes when those of us who are not technically trained in the field discuss matters pertaining thereto, errors are made in terminology and definition. It is not unlikely that some of the comments concerning the controversial legislation which has been before us, and the public comments in reference thereto, have contained some error and misunderstanding.

The measure which was recently passed authorized the appropriation of the full funds for the carrying forward of the Consumers Public Power atomic project. This project has been in the making for some time. Because it was one of the earlier ones, it is in round one of the program. Due to the fact that it is in round one, and for the added reason of the size and competency of the Consumers Public Power District, this project was not put in the category that called for mandatory, direct contracting by the Atomic Energy Commission for the building of the project. This restriction was placed on the later projects sponsored by cooperatives and public bodies which were not placed in round one, and a number of which are smaller. The Atomic Energy Commission and the Consumers Public Power District will be free to negotiate a contract and choose the method of construction which is most suitable to both parties.

One of the errors that developed in the minds of some was the question of whether or not the legislation, as proposed by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, would have relieved the Consumers Public Power District of the necessity of making their contribution of $5,220,000 toward the construction costs. The fact is that neither of the proposals, which were before both the Senate and the House of Representatives, would have dispensed with this $5,220,000 contribution by Consumers. This is clearly set forth in the following colloquy between the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and the Vice Chairman of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy [Mr. Anderson], and the junior Senator from Nebraska:

> Mr. Curtis. A contribution of $5,220,000 by Consumers Public Power District is called for by the committee bill, is it not?
>
> Mr. Anderson. The wording of the report is that we would expect to get the same contribution.
>
> Mr. Curtis. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to page 10 of the Senate committee's report. Then I shall not take any more time. Just prior to the third line from the bottom there appears to be an error in printing. A line is left out. I am aware of it both by reason of the odd wording in the report and the fact that the House committee report has another line in it.
>
> I wonder if the distinguished chairman of the committee, in order to clarify the matter, would care to have item 3 at the bottom of page 10, which runs over to the middle of page 11, printed in the Record at this point, because of the error in printing.
>
> Mr. Anderson. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that that be done, because of the error in printing. It does leave out the fact that the AEC would also pay for the cost of construction of the reactor, except for the contribution by Consumers Public Power District of $5,220,000. The estimated cost to the AEC is $24,013,000.

There has been some discussion about fuel costs under the Consumers' contract. The legislation recently enacted, Public Law 85–162, requires that the AEC contract with organizations in the second round of the power demonstration reactor program on the basis of AEC paying all operating costs and selling steam to the organization at prices comparable to the costs which would have been incurred had these organizations constructed conventional powerplants. Public Law 85–162 does not establish the specific contracting method to be followed with the Consumers Public Power District. It is understood that the AEC and Consumers are free to continue their negotiations on the same basis which the two organizations had been considering prior to the recent actions of Congress. This basis contemplated that Consumers would pay all normal operation and maintenance expense in return for the steam from the reactor. It was also contemplated that AEC would pay the cost of unusual maintenance and in addition would pay for fuel cycle costs in excess of an amount originally contemplated by Consumers. Under this arrangement it is understood that Consumers expects to end up paying no more for the energy from the atomic plant than they would have paid for energy from a conventional plant. In summary, it may be said that although the form of the contract with Consumers may vary substantially from the contract with the second round organizations there is no reason attributable to the recently enacted legislation for Consumers final position to be any less favorable than the position of the other public power organizations in the second round of the power demonstration program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record the statement in reference to the Consumers Public Power District project as it is found in the reports of both the House and the Senate committees.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

> 3. Consumers Public Power District, of Columbus, Nebr., to construct and operate a 75,000 electrical kilowatt sodium graphite power reactor. This proposal is still under negotiation, and as late as July 5, 1957, the Joint Committee was advised by the Commission of a possible $6 million increase in the amount of assistance to be contemplated if a contract should be signed under this proposal. Under the proposal made by Consumers, the AEC would pay all preconstruction research and development costs on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis, with an estimated cost to the AEC of $18,165,000. The AEC would also pay for the cost of construction of the reactor, except for a contribution by Consumers of $5,220,000; estimated cost of construction to the AEC is $24,013,000. The AEC would also contribute up to a ceiling of $8 million toward costs of unusual maintenance and expenses during the postconstruction operating period. The AEC would also waive charges for the use of fuel having an estimated value of $1,325,000. Although title to the reactor would be in the United States, consumers would be given a credit for plutonium recovered during fuel reprocessing. It is estimated that approximately 50 kilograms of plutonium should be recovered during fiscal year 1963, involving an estimated credit of $1,500,000.
>
> In summary, total assistance to be provided by the AEC under this proposal can be shown as follows:

Preconstruction research and development (estimated)	$18, 165, 000
Reactor construction (estimated)	24, 013, 000
Postconstruction (maximum)	8, 000, 000
Waiver of fuel-use charges	1, 325, 000
Total value of AEC assistance (estimated)	51, 503, 000

> Such estimate of funds could run considerably higher under this particular proposal, since there are no ceilings on the costs to be paid by the AEC during the preconstruction and construction phase of the project.
>
> Further details on the first round proposals are set out in the record of the hearings on authorizing legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Carlson in the chair). The Chair will advise the Senator from Nebraska that he has used up his allotted time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and the Senator may proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the Consumers Public Power District is a well-managed district, operating under State law as a political subdivision of the State and it serves a great portion of the State of Nebraska. The Consumers Public Power District has been financed solely by bonds sold to private investors. There are no Federal funds or Federal borrowings of any kind in Consumers' financing. It is in a sound position. It has excellent leadership. Its officers and employees are competent. They have been diligent in their efforts to assume their responsibility and to cooperate with the Atomic Energy Commission. From the very inception of the project, they have maintained their own scientific department, headed by a well-trained physicist.

The Consumers Public Power District has shown every evidence of making their contribution and assuming their full responsibility. We are, however, in atomic matters, dealing with many unknowns. The risks to be taken by all sponsors are such that the Atomic Energy Commission, in behalf of the Federal Government, has very appropriately assumed the major risks. There was one bit of discussion in connection with the recent legislation that was susceptible of throwing some doubt on the risk that might be incurred by the Consumers Public Power District. This arose by the reason of a colloquy that took place on the floor between the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Anderson], and the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. Aiken]. The colloquy I refer to is as follows, page 15003, middle of third column:

> Mr. Aiken. Do I understand consumers public power district in Nebraska will pay the same rate?
>
> Mr. Anderson. It would under the provision which is in the Senate bill. It would not under the House bill as it was finally amended.
>
> In the case of Consumers Public Power District of Nebraska, the transaction is clearly set forth at page 14351 of the Record. The Government would pay consumers public power district an amount for preconstruction research and development of $18,165,000. If the Consumers Public Power District has guessed correctly, that cost will have been met. If it has guessed incorrectly, it will have to take the loss, which may run to $10 million or $15 million.

I have gone to the Atomic Energy Commission for information and clarification of these remarks which occurred in the general discussion of the bill and at a time when a number of projects were being commented upon. The reply I have received from the Atomic Energy Commission dispels any fears of any new or other risk being imposed on the Consumers Public Power District. That reply is as follows:

> Dear Senator Curtis: This refers to your inquiry concerning the remarks made on the floor of the Senate on August 16, 1957, relative to the Consumers Public Power District project (Congressional Record, p. 15003, bottom of third column).
> Under the proposal made by consumers the AEC would pay all preconstruction research and development costs on the reactor and perform the work on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis with an estimated cost to the AEC of $18,165,000; further, the AEC would also pay for construction of the reactor except for a contribution from Consumers of $5,220,000. It is contemplated that the research and development work would be carried out under a direct contract between the AEC and Atomics International, a division of North American Aviation Corp. The method of performance of the construction work is still under consideration. In either case, it is not expected that the Consumers Public Power District would be obligated for costs with respect to the reactor in excess of their contribution of $5,220,000.

In connection with the Consumers project there is a final matter which has given concern to the district, and that is the provision in the bill that passed requiring the Atomic Energy Commission to submit the basis of their proposed contract to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, and the Joint Committee shall have 45 days to act thereon. This is somewhat similar to existing law. The concern of Consumers was due to the fact they are nearing a deadline in some of their negotiations with suppliers, and this 45-day waiting period could be a very material hindrance to the progress of this project. I am pleased to invite attention to the fact, however, that the legislation contains a provision whereby upon the certification of the Atomic Energy Commission, the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy of the Congress can waive that waiting period. I took this matter up with the distinguished Vice Chairman of the Joint Committee, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Anderson], in our discussion on the floor of the Senate in a colloquy that shows the helpful and cooperative spirit in which this matter will be approached by the Joint Committee. That colloquy is as follows:

> Mr. Curtis. I should like to make inquiry with respect to section 111 (b) of the bill. It provides, in substance, that when the basis of a contract proposal is about to be consummated, before final action can be taken the basis of the contract must be submitted by the AEC to the Joint Committee, and then it calls for a 45-day waiting period before consummation.
>
> I ask whether there is any provision, under certain circumstances, for a waiver of the 45-day period.
>
> Mr. Anderson. Yes; I will say to the able Senator from Nebraska that there is such a provision, reading as follows:
>
> "Provided, however, That the Joint Committee after having received the basis for a proposed arrangement, or amendment thereto, may by resolution in writing waive the conditions of or all or any portion of such 45-day period."
>
> That provision for waiver has been utilized by the Joint Committee under similar circumstances. This is a new provision, but the provision for waiver is not completely new to the basic act. It has been utilized by the committee previously.
>
> Mr. Curtis. I may say to the distinguished vice chairman that the consumers public power district is nearing the deadline with respect to consummation of a contract, and we hope that it may be consummated soon. However, the 45-day period, if there were no opportunity for waiver, might be a very material problem.
>
> Mr. Anderson. I will say to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, that, knowing every member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, I think I can safely say that every one of them would be happy to help the consumers public power in its negotiations. We were keenly aware of his problem, and were desirous to make sure that it could be worked out. I believe that if a request for waiver were presented—while I would not attempt to predict what individual members of the committee might do—I am sure it would be in the hands of a receptive group.
>
> Mr. Curtis. I appreciate that statement very much. I note that the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy has already taken considerable testimony and obtained additional information about the proposal discussed by the AEC and the consumers public power. I notice particularly the language in the report beginning at page 10.
>
> Mr. Anderson. At page 34 there is language that ought to appear in the record in connection with the colloquy. It deals with the waiver of the 45-day period. The language is as follows:
>
> "It is the intention of the Joint Committee not to hinder unnecessarily progress under proposals which may be reached by the Commission as a basis for negotiation and submitted to the Joint Committee. Therefore, especially when Congress is adjourned, if the Commission certifies that a project is ready for immediate construction or other development, and requests waiver of the waiting period by the Joint Committee, the Joint Committee will proceed to consider the matter expeditiously, and grant the waiver if it seems appropriate in the opinion of the Joint Committee."
>
> That is a promise of expeditious handling, which is as far as the Joint Committee could go, but it certainly meets the question propounded by the Senator from Nebraska, I am sure.

Mr. President, the record, when examined carefully, clearly dispels these erroneous concepts which have arisen and which I have mentioned. In the light of all the facts, I have full confidence in the ability of the Consumers Public Power District in Nebraska to proceed with their project in a most creditable way. They are following an uncharted course that will have many problems and difficulties, but I am likewise convinced that the attitude of the Atomic Energy Commission and that of the Congress, and the legislation and rules promulgated, are going to work out to the best interest of consumers and of the United States Government.

Mr. President, I wish to express my gratitude to the members of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and the entire Senate for their assistance and their helpful attitude. I also wish to express my gratitude and commendation to the Atomic Energy Commission for the excellent leadership they have shown, their knowledge and their foresight, and their fair and considerate treatment that has always been extended to those of us in Nebraska who have, from the inception of the program, been interested in having a part in this great peacetime atomic energy development. I believe that the interests of Nebraska and the Federal Government will best be served by our full cooperation with the Atomic Energy Commission and this we propose to continue to give.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HRUSKA. I should like to say, Mr. President, that the statement just made by the junior Senator from Nebraska is a very splendid explanation of all the circumstances which have preceded the legislation recently passed by the Senate in a very complicated field. I should like to commend the Senator from Nebraska for the contribution he has made in this regard. I think it will clear up a great deal of confusion which has attended not only the passage of the legislation, but also much discussion which has been particularly interesting, and, of course, very pertinent to the Nebraska power situation.

To that extent I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the Senator from Nebraska in this connection, and I wish to again commend him for the thoroughness with which he has gone into the subject.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank my colleague. I also wish to thank him for the heavy load and splendid part he has carried in this matter through the weeks it has been under discussion.

RECORD OF 1ST SESSION OF 85TH CONGRESS IN FIELD OF MEDICAL RESEARCH AND HUMAN HEALTH

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, no field of legislative endeavor is more urgent than that involving protection of the health of our population of 171 million people. Dr. Howard A. Rusk, medical editor of the New York Times, has written a most thorough analysis of the record of this session of Congress entitled "Congress and Health," which appeared in the Times of August 25, 1957.

Dr. Rusk pays appropriate tribute to the magnificent leadership in this vital area of the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Hill] and of Representative John E. Fogarty, of Rhode Island.

Let me emphasize two sentences by Dr. Rusk, this eminent authority in the realm of medicine:

> The formulation of our national policies for medical research by Congressional leaders has been both democratic and intelligent.
>
> The legislative process has translated the public interest in relieving human suffering caused by disease into support of medical research with consummate effectiveness.

As one Senator who has served in the ranks under the leadership of Senator Hill, I am proud of the high estimate and profound recognition given to our attainments in medical research by the able physician who is medical editor of the New York Times. Dr. Rusk's summation may be regarded with pride and satisfaction by many of us and particularly by Lister Hill and such of his associates on the Appropriations Committee as the senior Senator from Maine [Mrs. Smith], the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. Magnuson], and the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Thye].

I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Howard A. Rusk's article from the August 25 issue of the New York Times appear in the body of the Record.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Congress and Health: An Appraisal of Legislators' Support of Research and Training of Scientists

(By Howard A. Rusk, M. D.)

As Congress settles into its closing days it still faces many unresolved controversial issues. There was no major controversy, however, during session on the question of Federal support of medical research. Recognizing that this question had the full support of the people, Congress took an important and decisive step in strengthening our national attack on disease through medical research.

In his budget President Eisenhower had recommended an appropriation of $190 million for medical research to be administered by the National Institutes of Health. This was a $7 million increase over last year's appropriations. Following a series of exhaustive hearings by committees in both the Senate and House of Representatives on how much money could be spent effectively on research, Congress increased the amount to $211 million.

This record level of funds, which became available last July 1, means that our medical schools and universities are already broadening and quickening the pace of their research activities.

GROWING STATURE INDICATED

Approximately three-quarters of these funds are earmarked for research and training grants, primarily to medical schools and university investigators. Most of the increased funds will go for this purpose. The amount of research conducted directly by the National Institutes of Health in their splendid laboratories in Bethesda, Md., will remain approximately the same.

The actions taken this year by Congress in support of medical research, particularly of its appropriations committees, indicate growing stature and statesmanlike leadership in the complex issues of national policy in this field. The understanding shown by the appropriations committtees under the chairmanships of Senator Lister Hill of Alabama in the Senate and Representative John E. Fogarty of Rhode Island in the House in dealing with the needs of medical research is illustrated by such recent Congressional actions as:

Measures and funds to deal with the serious shortages of research manpower at all levels of training.

Support of concerted research efforts to exploit rapidly and fully clinically promising scientific leads; for example, in the chemotherapy of mental illness.

An example of Congressional insight into the research process is to be found in this year's report of the Senate Appropriations Committee. The report states, "It is increasingly clear that rapid progress into the conquest of disease is dependent in large part on the availability of a large body of basic scientific knowledge from which advances against heart disease, cancer, mental illness, and other major killers and cripplers of our time can be derived."

But Congress recognizes that basic research requires more than money and laboratories. It requires skilled personnel. In last year's report to the House, the Appropriations Committee said, "The committee calls particular attention to the urgency of taking steps at this time to insure that an adequate supply of medical research scientists will be available in the years ahead. No aspect of the Federal program for support of medical research is more significant than manpower training."

This is certainly true. In addition to meeting its growing personnel needs because of an expanding program, medical research faces the competition of the higher economic returns of private practice. Today, both the average general practitioner and specialist engaged in private practice can easily earn two to three times as much as the research scientist. Congress has wisely attempted to offset this to some degree by providing sufficient funds for increased salaries for scientists engaged in research aided by Federal grants.

By urging more basic research and directing an expansion of efforts to train and retain medical scientists, Congress has shown that its interest has not been limited to insuring that adequate money is available. It has shown an awareness of the fundamental as well as the more obvious needs of medical science.

An inherent fundamental aspect of democracy is the right and privilege of each citizen to criticize his elected representatives freely. This is a prerogative that most of us exercise freely. It is neither valid nor fair, however, when applied to Congressional action on the highly professional and technical matters of medical research.

OUTSIDE ADVICE SOUGHT

Our national medical research policy has evolved on a sound basis because of close and sympathetic understanding between the executive and legislative branches of our Government and our private organizations. Congress at all times has wisely sought the advice of outstanding leaders in all fields relating to medicine. The formation of our national policies for medical research by Congressional leaders has been both democratic and intelligent.

The legislative process has translated the public interest in relieving human suffering caused by disease into support of medical research with consummate effectiveness, and has done this with remarkable sensitivity to the conditions prerequisite to the vigorous growth of science. On the one hand, a complex set of scientific questions have been brought into the public forum in a manner understandable to the layman. On the other hand, medical research has been harnessed to the public interest without injuring the freedom essential to success. This is democracy operating at its best.

AUTHORIZATION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE REPORT ON MUTUAL SECURITY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to announce that the hearings on the mutual security appropriation bill will be on each Senator's desk this afternoon. The bill has been ordered reported.

I should like all Senators to know that we expect to bring the bill up as soon as the reports are available.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the Committee on Appropriations be permitted to file its report even though the Senate is not in session, and that it be in order to consider the bill when the report is available to Members.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DREDGING OF UPSTREAM NAVIGATION CHANNEL ON COLUMBIA RIVER TO PROJECT DEPTH OF 27 FEET

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, recently there was some controversy in the House of Representatives over an item of $425,000 for beginning work on the Columbia River upstream navigation channel, after some of us had been successful in having this undertaking included in the supplemental appropriation bill. The project involves restoring to authorized depth of 27 feet the channel from Vancouver, Wash., to The Dalles, Oreg. Once the Corps of Engineers had dredged the channel to this necessary extent, but it had been allowed to fill with silt, snags, and boulders during recent years.

Because of the controversy in the House—a controversy which becomes ironic when we contemplate that this was an item of $425,000 in a bill carrying total sums of $1,734,011,947—I desire to call to the attention of the Senate the testimony which the distinguished senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Murray] and I submitted to the Senate Appropriations Committee on August 14, 1957. This was the day when the Senate Committee formally added the $425,000 item to the supplemental appropriation bill.

Senator Murray and I stressed the fact that the Columbia River is the sole navigable waterway that trenches through the great Cascade-Sierra Mountain barrier, which shuts off the Pacific seaboard from the intermountain region and which extends from British Columbia far into Mexico. Can such a river be denied its commercial and economic potential because of comparatively small appropriation allowances, in the great scheme of things?

Of course, I want to add my appreciation to that of Senator Murray for the characteristic patience, understanding and thoroughness with which our request was considered by the beloved chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. Hayden], who is admired by us all because he uses his great influence with such restraint and fairness.

When Senator Hayden celebrates his 80th birthday this fall, many of us in the Pacific Northwest will know that his long life and his long career have been of immense benefit and value to our own region.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the Congressional Record the testimony presented to the Senate Appropriations Committee on August 14, 1957, by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. Murray] and myself in behalf of the $425,000 item for dredging to project depth of 27 feet the Columbia River navigation channel between Vancouver and The Dalles.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Statement of Hon. James E. Murray, a United States Senator From the State of Montana

DREDGING OF COLUMBIA RIVER CHANNEL

Chairman Hayden. The committee will come to order.

We will be pleased to hear from you now, Senator Murray.

Senator Murray. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in my many years as a Member of the United States Senate there has never been called to my attention a project with greater merit than the proposal that the Columbia River be dredged to a channel depth of 27 feet from Vancouver to The Dalles.

The agricultural, mining, and general economy of Montana, as well as the other Northwestern States vitally needs the easy access to deep-water ports that would result from deepening of the Columbia River channel.

All the evidence clearly shows that this great inland agricultural-mining empire requires this facility if it is to come into its own in the economic life of the Nation.

The wheatgrowers of the Northwest would be particularly benefited, and there is clear evidence that more than 200 ships of 8,000 tons each will annually carry a variety of agricultural products over this waterway when it is deepened. This will make possible an average savings of $1.68 per ton in transportation charges.

In addition to these more than 200 ships carrying agricultural products, newly established industrial development at The Dalles will call for the movement of 35 to 40 ships of 10,000-ton capacity in and out of The Dalles annually.

The producers of fresh fruits would also be greatly benefited by deep draft navigation on the Columbia. It has been conservatively estimated, for instance, that from 20,000 to 40,000 barrels of cherries would be shipped annually over this inland waterway at a transportation saving approximately $1 per barrel.

The Federal Government would directly benefit through the Commodity Credit Corporation being enabled to use the ship channel, at greatly lowered transportation costs, for the movement of surplus grains destined for Far Eastern countries.

I need not remind this committee that the channel deepening from Vancouver to Bonneville Dam has been authorized since 1937 to a depth of 27 feet. Then in 1946 Congress extended the authorization from Bonneville Dam to The Dalles. In recent years past, however, irrespective of authorization, the channel has been maintained to a depth of only 15 feet.

Appropriation request

I urge the committee to implement the authorization by appropriating the sum of $500,000 to get the initial dredging underway.

The economic development and welfare of a vast area—the entire Pacific Northwest—cries for this appropriation, and I urge you to answer the cry.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for giving me this opportunity to appear.

Chairman Hayden. What I cannot understand, Senator, is that here is an authorization that was made for this extra depth 10 years ago, and yet we have done nothing about it. And the agitation in favor of channelizing the streams in the eastern part of the United States is kept on regularly. You take the great harbors of the Atlantic coast, like for instance Norfolk. Since the advent of these greater tankers they could not come into the harbors without having to lighten part of their load, and deepening of the channels has enabled the ships to land and bring in their oil from abroad and make it so that the cost of fuel is less in the community. We are deepening the channel of the Delaware River to bring in iron ore.

Senator Murray. Yes.

Chairman Hayden. I have been on this committee quite a time, and I am just wondering why there has not been more effort made in the past 10 years to get something done.

Senator Murray. Well, I guess we are not experienced as they are in the East in handling these political problems. It does seem to me that there has been a little neglect there.

Chairman Hayden. It does seem to me that the West is behind the times. That is why I brought out the question.

Senator Murray. It is very important that we get cheap transportation. For instance, in Montana we could have a big chrome industry there. Instead, chrome is brought all the way across the ocean from Africa to be processed in Memphis, Tenn.; yet we have the chrome right there in Montana.

Chairman Hayden. But you do not have the water transportation.

Senator Murray. That is it.

Chairman Hayden. I thank you for your statement.

Senator Neuberger?

STATEMENT OF HON. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, A UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM THE STATE OF OREGON

COLUMBIA RIVER PROJECT

Senator Neuberger. I was listening to Senator Murray's very able testimony, and as usual he was very thorough. I will not go into the statistical details which he gave you so well.

I would just like to explain the answer to the very logical and very reasonable question which you put.

The Columbia River, as I think you know, is the only river that cuts through the great mountains that rise above the Pacific Ocean. There is no other waterway between the great Intermountain West and the Pacific Ocean except the Columbia River. It cuts through the Cascade Range, which is the continuation of the Sierra Range. God made one mountain range, but it is called the Cascades in the north and the Sierras as it extends on into Mexico.

That river has been a natural avenue for navigation since Lewis and Clark came down it with the American flag in 1805.

Indeed, when Meriwether Lewis sent his reports to Thomas Jefferson, he said then that this was a great avenue of commerce. And Thomas Jefferson, in the first papers ever written by any American President about the American West, envisioned a great commercial empire on the Columbia River because of its navigability. As we know, water transportation was then the only means of travel except by horseback or on foot.

But there have been barriers to navigation on the Columbia River in the form of rapids which act as blockades.

The first great rapids was Cascade Rapids, which Bonneville Dam inundated. Bonneville Dam, however, did not inundate Cascade Rapids until 1938. President Roosevelt came to Bonneville in 1937. I think you remember that. Senator McNary introduced him. It was a great event. And President Roosevelt dedicated Bonneville on that date, and in 1938 the river was sealed off and power production began and Cascade Rapids was inundated beneath the pool.

So that meant that for the first time navigation began into the upper river. So you see, it was only 20 years ago that any navigation at all began on the section of the Columbia.

Umatilla Rapids

But there was still another great obstacle, and that was Umatilla Rapids located about 120 or 130 miles above Bonneville. It was very difficult to contemplate use of barges and diesel tugs as long as Umatilla Rapids remained. But the dam that is taking care of Umatilla Rapids is McNary Dam, named for your old colleague and your former associate in the Senate. And today McNary Dam is completed. Every generator has not been put in, but it is in operation, both powerwise and navigationwise.

So with the inundations by the pools back of Bonneville Dam and McNary Dam of the two main rapids which were obstacles to successful navigation, the impetus began to use the upper Columbia for water transportation.

Bonneville Dam was constructed at a cost of approximately $88 million—which seems so little now for a great dam, does it not? McNary cost about $320 million. The question before us today is this: Are we going to allow a bottleneck of maybe $8 or $10 million prevent the full use of those dams for navigation? Because as long as you have the channel silted over, filled with snags, clogged with all kinds of debris, sand, and gravel, that come down a great swift flowing river like the Columbia, you cannot make use of the pools that over $400 million worth of dams have created.

Authorization for channel depth

Now, Senator Murray very properly pointed out the channel above Vancouver is authorized for a depth of 27 feet and a width of 300 feet. However, maintenance has lagged and the depth now is only 15 feet. But the great pressure in recent years for bringing petroleum and manufactured products and alumina ore and other commodities or raw materials upstream and then taking downstream wheat and apples and other farm products of the intermountain region back of the Cascades—that all dates from the completion of Bonneville and McNary Dams.

Now, you know the size of the appropriations that this committee regularly authorizes for navigation on the Mississippi River, on the Ohio River, on the Delaware River, and in the great seacoast harbors of the Eastern States. Why, this little $500,000 appropriation that was knocked out is in comparison a mere bagatelle. And yet it would be very important to making some use, not full use but some use, of the navigation possibilities of the greatest river system we have in the West.

Magnitude of Columbia River

You know, Mr. Chairman, I have recently been working on an article for Harper's magazine about the Columbia River. And I do not think anybody realizes that magnitude of the Columbia River. The Columbia River at its maximum flow, when all the great ranges in British Columbia, in Canada, are melting to their maximum, carries across the border and down into the United States five-sixths of the maximum flow of the Mississippi. That is the extent of the Columbia River. It carries down to the sea 180 million acre-feet of water. I think your great Colorado River has 17 or 18 million feet.

Chairman Hayden. I looked up the records one day, and my recollection is that more water runs into the Columbia River out of the Pend Oreille than there is in the whole Colorado River system.

Senator Neuberger. I am sure that there is no doubt about that. This is a thing that I know is correct, because these figures are very vivid in my mind.

The Colorado system has about 17 or 18 million acre-feet.

The Columbia, where it crosses the border out of Canada, hasn't picked up a single drop of water in the United States. It has not picked up the Snake. It has not picked up the Willamette. It has not picked up the Deschutes or any of the great rivers that we know in the United States. The Columbia, where it crosses the border out of Canada, has 62 million acre-feet; this shows you what a river it is. Here is the only river that offers any competitive factor with the railroads and the trucklines for travel through the mountains of the intermountain west, of the Cascades. And we in the Northwest are being choked by high freight rates.

Unemployment crisis

The Senator from Montana made an outstanding speech on the Senate floor the other day about the unemployment crisis that grips our region. One of the big factors is truck and railroad freight rates. As you and I know, Senator MURRAY, industrial development in our States is virtually impossible because of this great rate factor.

The Columbia offers the only possible competition to the railroads and the trucklines. We need $500,000 to dredge this channel down to project depth and then continuation of appropriations so that it can be maintained at project depth. It just seems to me tragic not to——

Senator CHAVEZ. Was that the authorization that we took care of the other day in public works?

Senator NEUBERGER. No; this has been authorized for many years. This project from Vancouver to The Dalles was authorized in two pieces. First, in 1937, from Vancouver to Bonneville pool, when Bonneville was built, and then in 1946 from Bonneville pool to The Dalles, when it became obvious that dams such as McNary Dam and the Dalles Dam would be built on the upper river.

Condition of The Dalles

Senator CHAVEZ. What about The Dalles? What is the condition of that now?

Senator NEUBERGER. The structure is virtually completed, but none of the power equipment has been installed. But the river has been sealed off. And already the pool back of The Dalles has started to flood out the Indian fishing grounds.

Senator CHAVEZ. Tell me now: What about the Indians?

Indian problem

Senator NEUBERGER. Well, your committee appropriated for the Indians, if I am not mistaken, $26,900,000. That was to reimburse the Indians for the loss of their ancestral fishing rights. And I think that some of the Indians regard that as not generous, but I believe that on the whole it was a quite adequate appropriation. The Indians have a very sentimental feeling about this area.

Senator CHAVEZ. Besides that, now, the practical end of it—as I recall, this would not provide that with the money appropriated for the Indians they could still go further and get their ancestral homes.

Senator NEUBERGER. You provided that they could go to their fishing grounds. In all candor, though, there are none in the Columbia to match those at Celilo. There is no other place at which so many salmon can be caught.

However, I do want to say that the greatest escapement up into the headwaters of the river has been experienced this year—way up into the Salmon and the Clearwater, up into the Continental Divide, where Lewis and Clark first crossed the mountains. This great escapement has occurred, I believe, because Indian fishery formerly made such depreciations on the fish going upstream.

But your committee provides, I think, quite adequately, $26,900,000. Is that not the correct figure, Colonel?

If it is not correct, would you correct it in the record for me? I believe it is, though. (The Corps of Engineers subsequently advised that $26,907,155 had been paid or approved for payment to the Indians.)

But, Dennis, this is the thing we are talking about here: This is the second greatest river system in the United States, second only to that on which Senator ELLENDER lives, and its use for navigation has just been minimal. We need it so badly out there.

Per capita income in Oregon

The State I help to represent, was once a very wealthy State in per capita income. In 1947, average per capita income in Oregon was $202 above the national average. Last year it was $10 below the national average, at a time of national prosperity. We have just been going down on the economic toboggan every single year. And one reason is that the States like Oregon and Montana are farther in distance and in terms of freight rates from the major markets of the United States than other parts of the United States. Waterborne transportation is vitally needed to offer some competitive control over railroads and trucklines. It is life and death to us.

Problem of freight rates

Senator CHAVEZ. What rate do they use? Pittsburgh?

Senator NEUBERGER. They use Pittsburgh plus; that is right.

Senator CHAVEZ. We suffer from the same thing.

Senator NEUBERGER. Sure. I know. And Senator HAYDEN's State suffers also from the same thing. But we are even farther away than you are. We are another 800 miles from Chicago.

I had an experience in April. I was out in Oregon. One of the largest turkey warehouses in our State closed down permanently. We are a large turkey-raising State. It has closed because it costs 5 cents a pound more to put an Oregon turkey down in the Chicago market, where they have to sell a lot of them, than a Texas or West Virginia turkey.

Well, the Thanksgiving turkey that your wife buys for your dinner is 30 pounds, perhaps. You add 5 cents a pound to each pound of that turkey, and it means either the Oregon turkey cannot compete or the grower has to absorb 5 cents a pound, which may be far more than his whole margin.

I am sure your State has experienced the same thing, Senator MURRAY, in all kinds of agricultural, mineral, and timber situations.

Senator MURRAY. Yes; that is the main problem we have in our State. As I pointed out a little while ago, we could have had a big chrome industry in Montana if we had had proper rates.

Concentration of population

Senator NEUBERGER. The whole North American Continent has a unique situation economically, because most of the people in both the United States and Canada live in a comparatively small area in the east.

I looked it up the other day. I think something like 55 to 60 percent of the American people live within a 500-mile area of Pittsburgh. I remember when I was up with my wife in Canada where the Aluminum Company of Canada has built the largest aluminum smelter ever constructed in northern British Columbia, using 2-mill power created by dropping those great hanging lakes at the head of the Frazier River 600 feet to tidewater. One reason that such a project is feasible is that there is water access to the plant from the ocean. The smelter is located at the end of a great fjord that goes for 80 or 90 miles back into the mountains.

But we need this water transportation in the Northwest.

Senator CHAVEZ. What was this that Senator MAGNUSON said the other day about transportation, I think, getting it over from Walla Walla?

Senator NEUBERGER. I think that was a bill in the Public Works Committee if I am not mistaken, having to do with the relinquishment or trading of some Government lands, Dennis, so that the port of Walla Walla could establish a port authority there.

Here is Senator MAGNUSON now.

MAGGY, Senator CHAVEZ just asked me about your bill dealing with Walla Walla. Was that not for the exchange of lands so that they could develop a port authority there?

Senator MAGNUSON. Yes. There is a port authority developed there, and there are three or four of them, and all of that land around there was Government land backed up by McNary Pool. And we are leasing some of that land and giving title to some of it when they express a purpose to put in industrial development. There are all kinds of grain elevators. And this will be a pulp and water mill. The whole thing is growing. The whole McNary Pool is growing, because it has a chance. There is nothing there, and they need this navigation.

Importance of Columbia River navigation

Senator NEUBERGER. Senator MURRAY and I were just stressing the fact that the only possible way we could have a competitive factor with the railroads and the trunklines in the Northwest is to have extensive navigation on the Columbia River because that is the only water route through the mountains.

Senator MAGNUSON. And there is a big oil movement back and forth that goes to the inland empire and into Idaho and even into Montana.

Senator NEUBERGER. It brings out wheat and apples.

Senator MAGNUSON. Wheat and apples, fruit. As a matter of fact, the tonnage has quadrupled in the past 5 years. More than that, I believe.

Senator CHAVEZ. I want you boys from Oregon and Washington and Montana to know this. They take me to task at home once in a while because I get a couple of million for the Rio Grande, and they say, "You give $90 million to the Columbia." But I say, "They have that kind of a river," which is true. You have a terrific resource there in the Columbia.

Senator NEUBERGER. Dennis, I can remember in 1937, when I was correspondent for the New York Times in the Northwest, I stood up at Chanticleer, a thousand feet above the Columbia, with a great Swedish engineer who had been their chief delegate to the World Power Conference. He was the chief hydraulic engineer for Sweden. Most of their power, I guess, comes from those small rivers that drop down to the ocean through fjords. He stood there, looking at the Columbia River pouring through the gates of the mountains, and tears came into his eyes, and he said, "Do you people in the Northwest realize what you have here?" He said, "Here is a river greater than the Rhine, and it falls farther than our brooks."

And we have never fully utilized that river.

Chairman HAYDEN. Senator MAGNUSON, do you have a statement you want to offer to the committee?

Senator MAGNUSON. No; I just want to supplement this statement by all of the Senators here, MORSE, JACKSON, NEUBERGER, and the rest.

The committee is quite familiar with this item. It is something that should be done, and we are hopeful that we can get the matter into the supplemental and get going. Because the money here for the maintenance—we doubled the amount, I believe—is in the regular bill, and this would be a continuation up the river to do the job that is going to have to be done ultimately.

Senator NEUBERGER. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Prepared statement

Chairman HAYDEN. Do you have a statement for the record, Senator Magnuson?

Senator MAGNUSON. Yes; I will offer this.

(The statement referred to follows:)

"STATEMENT OF SENATORS MAGNUSON, MORSE, JACKSON, AND NEUBERGER ON THE COLUMBIA RIVER VANCOUVER TO THE DALLES PROJECT

"Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as Senators from the States of Washington and Oregon we are intensely interested in the project for the deepening and widening of the Columbia River between Vancouver, Wash., and The Dalles, Oreg. Our interest is predicated upon our firm conviction that this project is in the national interest as well as in the interest of the economy of great industrial and farming areas adjacent to the Columbia River.

"In 1937, Congress authorized a ship channel from Vancouver, Wash., to Bonneville Dam, with a project depth of 27 feet and width of 300 feet. In 1946, the extension of the project depth and width to The Dalles, Oreg., was also authorized by Congress.

"The dredging of the main channel between Vancouver and Bonneville Dam was completed in 1949, but during the past several years it has been maintained only to a depth of 15 feet, presumably upon the Corps of Engineers' conclusion that the needs of existing traffic can be served thereby. However, as we shall point out, the needs of vast areas on both sides of the river cannot be served adequately by the maintenance of the river in its present inadequate conditions of depth and width.

"This whole area has entered a new phase of rapid industrial development and unless work is undertaken promptly to develop that part of the Columbia River lying between Vancouver and The Dalles in accordance with previous Congressional authorizations, the upper Columbia will serve as a bottleneck rather than as an artery of commerce.

"In testimony submitted to the Senate Appropriations Committee on H. R. 8090, the public works appropriations bill, 1958, the Corps of Engineers advised that it would need $500,000 of new construction money to begin rock removal between Bonneville Dam and The Dalles and improvement of the entrance to the Bonneville Canal (Senate hearings, H. R. 8090, p. 2744). This $500,000 of construction work constitutes an integral part of the overall estimated total of $5,350,000 needed for restoration of this section of the river to project depth and width.

"Channel work on the Columbia between Vancouver and The Dalles is urgently required, not only on the basis of economic considerations but also because of the fact such work constitutes a defense measure of primary importance.

"The economic situation along this 85-mile section of the Columbia is entering a new phase of rapid industrial development. Unless immediate action is taken to assure ample funds for the initiation of work to restore project depth and width, this section of the river will be wholly inadequate to meet the needs of a rapidly expanding area. Therefore, it is of utmost importance that this committee give serious consideration to the inclusion in the supplemental appropriation for fiscal 1958 of funds sufficient to accomplish the maximum channel construction work that can be performed by the Corps of Engineers on this project during the present fiscal year.

"We recall with deep satisfaction the favorable action taken by the Senate Appropriations Committee in recommending $500,000 for the initiation of construction work on the upper Columbia when it took action on the public works appropriation bill, H. R. 8090. We are sure this committee recalls the importance and the worthwhile nature of the project.

"In support of our request for funds in the sum of $500,000 to initiate construction, we submit for the consideration of the committee the following salient points:

"1. A major aluminum company has indicated that by late 1957, there will begin an annual movement of 18 round-trip ocean vessels carrying alumina from the Orient for the initial operations of a reduction plant that is scheduled for completion in late 1957; that during 1958 and 1959, this annual movement will increase to 24 round trips; that by 1960, if sufficient electric power is available, the company will double its aluminum production capacity so as to assure 48 annual round-trip ocean vessel movements. By 1961, the company expects 84 annual vessel movements.

"2. This additional ocean vessel tonnage will result in an increase in the outgoing tonnage of aluminum, titanium, or steel products, chemical fertilizers, possibly coal, and other industrial products.

"3. Grain from one of the great wheat-producing centers of the Nation—eastern Oregon and eastern Washington—can be shipped for export on oceangoing vessels at The Dalles if the authorized channel depth is attained. Also, a very substantial volume of fresh fruit can be shipped for ocean travel under these circumstances.

"4. A number of new smaller industries in existence or under construction also can be expected to contribute substantial tonnage to this stretch of the Columbia. Thus, agreements have lately been signed for the construction of a new pulp mill on the McNary pool at a $30 million investment. Deepening of the Columbia River Channel to The Dalles would make it possible for this firm to barge its products to The Dallas for transshipment to deep-draft vessels at that point, rather than the more costly haul all the way to the mouth of the river.

"An existing plant located between Vancouver and Bonneville engaged in production of aggregate for use in concrete would be able to barge gravel from upstream to its mill in more economical loads. In addition, when construction gets underway on a new contract for making concrete pilings, these products could be transported upriver from the plant.

"Two petroleum storage facilities, representing an investment of $10 million, are already in existence on McNary pool at the terminus of a major pipeline. With completion of the deeper channel, petroleum could be barged to The Dalles for transshipment to deep-draft vessels at considerable savings over the longer haul downstream.

"These examples of new industries which are anxious to increase the use of the river for transportation purposes point up the extremely varied nature of the river traffic which would use the deeper channel.

"We are hopeful that the committee will again approve this appropriation request which we are satisfied is most meritorious."

HELLS CANYON OR NOTHING

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, the people of my State are becoming thoroughly aroused over the unyielding opposition to the authorization of Bruces Eddy Dam on the North Fork of the Clearwater River in Idaho by organized interests which seek their own aggrandizement by denying beneficial use of water resources in the upper watershed.

Bruces Eddy Dam, which would be 570 feet high, is alleged to be a real hazard to fisheries. However, wildlife groups which are opposed to this project, have vigorously supported a high Federal Hells Canyon Dam 722 feet high. It is extremely difficult to rationalize such figures and understand how fish could negotiate a dam 152 feet higher with less impediment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "The Sincerity of a Zealot," which was published in the Idaho Statesman August 20, 1957.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SINCERITY OF A ZEALOT

It's quite evident, on the basis of current news reports, that lower river interests set up the legislative roadblock that has again stalled plans for power development and flood control with construction of a dam at Bruces Eddy on the Clearwater River in Idaho.

This was accomplished lately when the House voted to knock out Senator DWORSHAK's amendment to the $858 million public works bill that would have provided $500,000 for planning of that project.

Inherent in this action were factors that had been brought to the fore in earlier Senate debate in which Oregon's Senator NEUBERGER, a foremost opponent of upper river development, again made his antagonism quite plain. Stung by threat of setback to all his efforts to advance the Bruces Eddy project on which central Idaho in particular has been basing hopes for early development of its natural resources, Senator DWORSHAK, in that debate, lashed out at the Oregonian, terming him a saboteur and asserting that he was in collusion with hypocritical groups trying to block this undertaking.

The Idaho Senator pointed out that the lower basin States along the Columbia River, Oregon and Washington, had obtained more than a billion dollars for dam projects, but that Idaho had not a single water storage project along streams in the Bruces Eddy area.

And, he charged that this gross disparity in the apportionment of Federal funds had been brought about by lower river interests' insistence upon the demand that for Idaho it was to be Hells Canyon or nothing.

Mr. NEUBERGER on that occasion shied away from the debate, but he said he hoped he might eventually be given credit for sincerity.

Of course he's sincere.

He is sincere in his stubborn campaign for construction of a Federal power project at Hells Canyon, if not only because of special advantages he may see in it for the lower basin, then, at any rate, on account of its value as a political issue on which he has staked his own political fortunes.

He's sincere, of course, in his opposition to all other Idaho resources development so long as there may be a chance that such opposition may tend to force acceptance of Hells Canyon.

His sincerity, though, may be wearing a bit thin whein he hitches his opposition to the Clearwater project on the claim that it might endanger fish and wildlife; and that notwithstanding the fact that backers of this project have taken the lead in starting surveys and studies in which alone the answer to that question may be accurately based.

But granting, as his colleague Senator MORSE attests, that Mr. NEUBERGER is sincerely interested in wildlife conservation, he has certainly put himself in a position where he seems to be a good deal more concerned about one proposed Idaho dam's possible threat to fish than he is about a proposed Idaho border dam's menace to the security of thousands of Idahoans whose livelihoods are dependent upon the Snake River area's agriculture, commerce and industry that exist only because Snake River waters have been dedeciated to reclamation of the desert and that would surely suffer sadly if ever these waters were hypothecated for another use.

His is the sincerity of a zealot, and it's the more dangerous on that account.

It's an element that presently stands in the way of Idaho's development. It must be recognized for what it is, and dealt with accordingly.

AMBASSADORIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for not to exceed 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEUBERGER in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Montana may proceed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wonder whether there is anyone in this country who can read who does not know the name of Maxwell Gluck. I wonder how many newspaper columnists have been provided with a free subject during the last month. I wonder how many recent jokes have used the name of Mr. Gluck.

Mr. President, I feel sorry for Mr. Gluck. He did nothing different from a large number of ambassadors who have been appointed under this administration and previous administrations both Republican and Democratic.

The fact is, however, Mr. President, that the trial of Mr. Gluck has placed the spotlight of healthy publicity on several long-standing problems in the conduct of the foreign relations of the United States and has made available to the public considerable new information.

I think a great many people now appreciate for the first time how important it is that we have good ambassadors to represent us overseas. I think that the proper policy on this subject is now pretty well agreed. The right policy is well stated in the words of the letter which was sent by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. GREEN, to the Secretary of State on April 3, 1957, on the subject of ambassadors:

> It should be obvious in each case, whether the nominee is a career man or not, that his record, his intelligence, his background, and his attitude are such that he will ably serve our country in his assignment.

The controversy over Mr. Gluck has, I think, dramatized another fact—the fact that Presidents of the United States, both Republican and Democratic, in recent years have not been wholly to blame for some of the bad appointments which we have had. Republican and Democratic National Committees have not been wholly to blame either. The sad truth is, Mr. President, that the Congress must share the blame for this unhappy situation. The fact is that if the Department of State had available to it adequate funds to pay the necessary cost of running our embassies abroad and doing the official entertaining which is unavoidable we could fill every ambassadorial post with an able man whether he happened to be a career Foreign Service Officer or a noncareer appointee. If the representation allowances were sufficient it would be possible to make appointments of ambassadors strictly on the basis of merit and qualifications. I would like to say, incidentally, that I am not one of those who believes that we should never appoint a noncareer ambassador. Career people are usually very able but there are also men and women—such as David Bruce, Clare Booth Luce, Ellsworth Bunker, Douglas Dillon, and others—of outstanding qualifications outside the career service. It is a very good thing for the career service to have brought in from time to time individuals of high ability who have had careers in business or science or education or labor which qualify them to represent the United States abroad quite as fully as a lifetime in the Foreign Service.

I have said that the Congress must take a large share of the responsibility for poor ambassadors. The Committee on Foreign Relations must take a major part of the blame for having let some poor nominations become confirmed. But, Mr. President, we would not have had many of these poor nominations come before us if there were not the underlying problem of inadequate representation allowances for the Department of State. Those on the inside of Congress, so to speak, know where the fault lies here. The blame can be laid squarely at the door of the House Committee on Appropriations. Year after year the Department of State, in presenting its request for appropriations, asks for an adequate amount for representation allowances. Every year the House committee slashes the request. This year the Department asked for $1,200,000 for representation allowances. The House committee cut the request to $600,000. Every year the Senate Appropriations Committee does its best to restore some of the cut made by the House, but in the process of compromise the Senate cannot fully succeed in obtaining an adequate appropriation. I strongly regret this unhappy history, Mr. President, and I hope the recent education on the subject which we have had will make it possible to do something more constructive next year.

Mr. President, one of the other interesting facts which has come out as a result of Mr. Gluck's appointment has been the revelation that the most sought after ambassadorial posts are not being given to career diplomats, but to political appointees. London, Paris, Rome, Bonn, Brussels, The Hague, Stockholm, Madrid, Copenhagen, Dublin, New Delhi, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Paris—all these important posts, Mr. President, are now filled by noncareer appointments. Some of these noncareer people are indeed excellent people, but the fact that a career person has not been appointed is almost invariably related to a question of money. These desirable posts are located in countries of the highest importance to the United States. We ought to have our very best people there. Because these countries are important, however, there is a great deal of official business to transact. We must have large embassies and there is much official and necessary entertaining to be done. Ambassadors without some outside income—and even second- or third-ranking people in these embassies without some outside income—simply cannot, under present circumstances, remain in these posts. The question again is whether the United States, the richest country in the world, is willing to pay what it costs to get the best men available in these jobs.

Mr. President, I wish to mention another cause of poor ambassadorial appointments which is not always related to the question of money. It is generally known that Presidents and Secretaries of State of whatever political party have in the past been under pressure from those who feel that an ambassadorship is a reward for past service to a political party. One of the purposes of sending from the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Department of State the letter, to which I referred a moment ago, was to try to take some of this pressure off the President and the Secretary of State. Far be it from me to discourage financial contributions to political parties, but I think that any President, if he has a mind to do it, can see to it that a financial contribution or a nonfinancial contribution to a political party is not of itself sufficient to obtain for a man a nomination to be ambassador. Frankly, I am of the opinion that President Eisenhower was either uninformed or just plain naive in disclaiming any knowledge of a connection between campaign contributions and ambassadorial appointments. This is silly. Of course he knows—or ought to know—about the connection, and he can do something about it. We need more money for representation allowances, but even if representation allowances stay the same, the President of the United States has power to insure that those rich men whom he nominates are also men with outstanding qualifications to be ambassadors.

Mr. President, the travail of Ambassador Gluck has also focused attention on the problem of absences from duty of our ambassadors. It took me several months this year to get from the Department of State figures on absences from posts. I became interested in this matter because a former Ambassador to Luxembourg spent 264 days away from his post over a period of 2 years, for reasons which had nothing to do with foreign relations or illness.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a letter from the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Administration to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the subject of absences of chiefs of mission from their posts of duty, and two tables showing the absence figures for each of our chiefs of mission during the calendar years 1955 and 1956.

There being no objection, the letter and tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 6, 1957.

Hon. THEODORE F. GREEN,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GREEN: In the course of Governor Herter's testimony last week before your committee, Senator MANSFIELD requested that the Department supply information regarding absences of chiefs of mission from their post of duty during a period of approximately the past 10 years. The reference to the testimony appears at pages 72 to 74 of the hearing transcript.

Senator MANSFIELD recalled correctly that he had asked the Department for somewhat comparable information over a period of the last 5 years. Information was supplied to him on February 4, 1957, and subsequently on February 25 to your office, in response to a similar inquiry from Mr. Holt of the committee staff. The Department's records were not adequate and a very detailed investigation was required including checks with the posts in the field. In the course of this investigation, it was determined that the longest period for which this information could be obtained with any certainty of accuracy was 2 years.

I can appreciate fully the reason for Senator Mansfield's request having encompassed a 10-year period, but I regret that the Department's records will not readily provide the information. I am supplying, therefore, as an enclosure, copies of the information covering calendar years 1955 and 1956, in the hope that it will be of assistance to the committee and in the personal belief that if data were available for the 10-year period it would prove generally comparable. Following Senator Mansfield's original request the Department instituted procedures whereby this type of information would be available for any period beginning January 1, 1955.

Sincerely yours,

Loy W. Henderson,
Deputy Under Secretary for Administration.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, these figures are shocking. They show that noncareer chiefs of mission in 1955 and 1956 were away from their posts of duty twice as often as members of the career Foreign Service. This bad showing, I believe, is a reflection of the respective attitudes of career and noncareer people toward their jobs. If an ambassador regards his appointment as a reward for some past service, why should he not be away from his job? In his mind he has already done his job and he is merely enjoying the fruits of it. A man with that kind of an attitude is always willing to let his career assistants in the Embassy do the work for him. It may be, Mr. President, that the publication of the figures of absences of ambassadors from their posts will serve as a deterrent to unreasonable conduct in the future. I want to say, Mr. President, that I shall do my best to see to it that similar figures are published regularly from now on.

While these figures are shocking, it must be recognized in truth and in fact that they are, at times, misleading as well. I refer, for example, to the outstanding services performed by such brilliant ambassadors as Clare Boothe Luce in Rome and Douglas Dillon in Paris. It is a well-known fact that both of these individuals were incapacitated for relatively long periods of time due to illness. It is also a fact, to my personal knowledge, that much of their time away from their posts on a nonduty status was in connection with their duties as Ambassadors and was in the performance of responsibilities which were carried out in the line of duty and in accord with their responsibilities.

We find, however, that during certain critical periods this Nation has been without ambassadors to countries which were going through great difficulties. Last fall during the uprising in Hungary I called attention to the fact that there was no United States Ambassador on duty in Budapest at that time. In fact, some 3 months elapsed between the time that Ambassador Ravndal left his post and his successor, Ambassador Wailes, arrived. It is also my recollection that during disturbances in Poland last fall the United States was not then represented by an ambassador in Warsaw.

Certainly during the past few months one of the major postwar crises in the Soviet Union has been in progress. Again, the United States had been caught without an ambassador on the spot. Mr. Bohlen had left Moscow and the new ambassador, Mr. Llewellyn Thompson, has only recently arrived at his post—and then only because of the ousters of Malenkov, Molotov, and Shepilov. There were extenuating circumstances in this case due to Ambassador Thompson convalescing from an operation; there may have been in others.

Records which I have obtained from the Department of State indicate that we have been left without ambassadors for substantial periods of time in the following critical spots: In Germany we were recently without an ambassador for more than 6 months. In India we were without an ambassador for more than 4 months in 1954 and 1955, and in 1956 and 1957 we were without an ambassador for an interval of 10 months. In Iran in 1954 and 1955 we were without an Ambassador for 9 months. In Korea we were without an ambassador for 9 months in 1955 and 1956. In Lebanon we were without an ambassador for some 5 months in 1954 and 1955. In Vietnam more than 6 months elapsed without our having an ambassador in the years 1954 and 1955.

Mr. President, I could add to this list other examples of protracted periods of time when the United States has been unrepresented in important foreign countries because of delay in appointing Ambassadors to succeed those who have retired or been reassigned.

It is my belief, Mr. President, that career and noncareer ambassadors should stay on the job as long as it is necessary so that the contact between the outgoing ambassador and his successor would be well established, so that there would be as little a break as possible in the continuity of the position, and so that we would be assured of adequate representation at all times in all countries to which we send our accredited representatives.

I should like to conclude these brief remarks by discussing another result, a favorable result, of the flurry over Mr. Gluck. The Committee on Foreign Relations has now decided that it will hold public hearings on every ambassadorial nomination unless for good reason the committee decides otherwise. The rule of the committee used to be that nominees were heard in executive session unless some member of the committee asked that the nomination be heard in public session.

I can appreciate the doubts which some Senators may have about this change in the committee rule. I realize that there is some risk that questions will be asked and statements will be made which may embarrass us in our relations with some foreign country. I believe myself that it is possible to avoid instances of this kind to a large extent and I believe that foreign countries will be understanding about this democratic process, especially if they appreciate the fact that public hearings on ambassadors will help insure that we get better men. Mr. President, of course I have no intention of insisting upon hearing in public session those career officers whom the Senate has confirmed time and time again to be ambassadors and whom many of us know very well. I know that the new committee rule will, even with these exceptions, cause an additional burden on the Committee on Foreign Relations. We must look forward to many additional hours each session in thoroughly examining in public ambassadorial nominees. In my judgment, however, Mr. President, this additional burden will prove to be well worth the trouble in the long run.

Mr. President, the United States has heavy responsibilities throughout the world. The importance of good foreign relations becomes greater year by year. The United States cannot afford to have less than the very best ambassadors. Let us hope that it will be to Mr. Gluck's unwitting credit that he made the whole country and the Congress appreciate this important requirement of our national policy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article entitled "COOPER Learns Hard Way That Congress Is Stingy," concerning our distinguished colleague, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], who was an outstanding American ambassador to India; an article published in the New York Times entitled "What Gluck Achieved," written by James Reston; an article from today's Baltimore Sun; and two articles published in the New York Herald Tribune, one of which was written by Marguerite Higgins.

I should like to make one correction in the article in the Herald Tribune which I know was an oversight on its part when it said that Mrs. Eugenie Anderson, our former Ambassador to Denmark, was appointed during the present administration. She was appointed Ambassador under the previous administration.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COOPER LEARNS HARD WAY THAT CONGRESS IS STINGY

Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER, Republican, of Kentucky, said yesterday he had to learn the hard way that Congress is too stingy with funds for United States ambassadors and ministers.

COOPER said that when he was Ambassador to India he found that there was not enough money available to finance even a modest July 4 celebration where no liquor was served.

He said all other embassies in New Delhi observed their national holidays but that the United States Embassy had not observed Independence Day for 4 years before he went there.

With the encouragement of his wife, COOPER said, he gave a party at which a modest amount of food was served and no liquor was offered. The total bill was $1,800, he said, of which he paid half out of his own pocket.

Indians flocked to the party, he said, and the celebration made many friends for the United States.

"Congress does not provide enough for ambassadors and ministers to do just the work of representation of the country," he said.

COOPER said the salaries paid to ambassadors were satisfactory but they needed more money for entertainments, receptions, and celebrations.

The Senator, appearing on the ABC-WMAL television program College News Conference, was asked about his support of dress-shop operator Maxwell Gluck to be Ambassador to Ceylon without knowing the name of the Prime Minister of the country.

COOPER said he recommended Gluck for the post at the request of Senator JACOB JAVITS, Republican, of New York, because he regarded Gluck as a successful businessman who was sympathetic toward the problems of the Ceylonese.

In his own experience in India, he said, he learned that the people in that part of the world do not like aggressive public-relations people. Gluck, he said, would be more relaxed toward the job.

WHAT GLUCK ACHIEVED: A VIEW THAT HIS CASE SHED NEW LIGHT ON KEY UNITED STATES AMBASSADORIAL PROBLEMS

(By James Reston)

WASHINGTON, August 11.—Maxwell H. Gluck may not be the smartest ambassador nominated by President Eisenhower, but he has succeeded in doing these things nobody else has been able to do in the last 10 years:

By his failure to know the name of the Prime Minister of the country to which he was appointed, Ceylon, and his failure to pronounce Jawaharlal Nehru, he has focused attention on the odd ways in which ambassadors are selected by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

He has forced the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to reconsider its practice of confirming ambassadors in secret.

And finally, he has forced the State Department to release information it has previously refused to make public on the high cost of being a United States Ambassador.

COST FIGURES DISCLOSED

For example, it has long been known that the root of the trouble in getting the best Americans available for these jobs was that the Government would not foot the bill. But not until the administration had to defend itself against criticism of the Gluck appointment would it release the figures that illustrated the problem.

This has now been done. Christian A. Herter, the Under Secretary of State, called before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to explain the case of the innocent ambassador, producing a memorandum showing what the United States pays its Ambassador in London, John Hay Whitney, compared with what the British Government pays the British Ambassador, Sir Harold Caccia, here in Washington.

This illustrates why the United States feels it has to select its top diplomats only from the ranks of the wealthy, for, according to the Herter figures, Sir Harold gets $42,468 more a year for salary and allowances than Mr. Whitney, and while this is not likely to bankrupt Mr. Whitney, it is still an interesting statistic.

"The American Ambassador to Great Britain," the Herter memorandum says, "receives a salary of $27,500; a representation allowance—limited strictly to official functions—which does not even pay for the Embassy's annual Fourth of July party and an official residence allowance of $11,312.

SIXTY-FOUR THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND FOUR DOLLARS VERSUS ONE HUNDRED TWO THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND SEVENTY DOLLARS

"The total salary and emoluments is $50,812. If we add to the $50,812 figure the items of expense that are paid directly by the [London] post through operating allotment and which are included in the British allowances, we would have to add the wages of a local chauffeur who drives the Ambassador's limousine and the wages of gardeners and janitors. This amounts to $9,592, and makes the new total $60,404.

"The $60,404 of the American Ambassador to Great Britain and the $102,870 of the British Ambassador to the United States are comparable in that the two figures exclude identical categories of expense."

In addition, the British, who are supposed to glory in austerity and maintain they have less money than the United States, give their Ambassadors other advantages. For example, a British Ambassador receives a transfer allowance for every change of post that comes to 10 percent of his salary if he has 2 children. A United States Ambassador's transfer allowance is $200.

The British, moreover, pay much more liberal clothing and educational allowances. One example is that the British Ambassador, for example, would be given allowances for his children's education in the United Kingdom as well as at his post of duty.

In questioning Mr. Herter on the Gluck appointment, Senators pointed out that all the most desirable ambassadorial posts overseas recently went not to career diplomats, but to political appointees: London, Paris, Rome, Bonn, Brussels, the Hague, Stockholm, Madrid, Copenhagen, Dublin, New Delhi, and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in Paris.

The Congress had great sport with Mr. Herter about this, but he was able to point out that the Congress itself had repeatedly rejected the requests made by the administration for funds to enable the administration to appoint men who could not afford to pay the costs of entertaining Americans, including visiting Senators and Congressmen.

Mr. Herter was also able to note that the Congress had cut its request for representation allowances to be given to needy United States diplomats overseas, and that recently the top career officers in London and Paris had requested transfers because they were out of pocket between $5,000 and $10,000 each in the last year.

Thus, Mr. Gluck, who has been condemned by the Congress and the Foreign Service as a terrible example of the practice of appointing well-heeled party contributors to important posts, may very well prove to be the best thing that has happened to the Foreign Service in a long time.

FIGURES WERE REFUSED

Others have tried to throw some light on this expense problem. The New York Times, for example, asked for precisely these figures on the British and American Ambassadors immediately after the last election, before the recent wholesale change in United States

Ambassadors took place. The State Department refused to cooperate. Now that there are no more posts to fill, it is more cooperative.

This newspaper also urged that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee open its hearings on ambassadorial appointments so that the public would know something about the quality of the people who were being sent abroad to represent the United States at such a critical period of negotiation. This, too, was refused.

Mr. Gluck, however, has thrown a shaft of light on what is generally regarded here as an anachronistic system that cannot be reconciled with the Nation's responsibilities.

At present the defense budget is running to over $38 billion a year while the Congress, which votes these funds, is boggling at a few million dollars to take diplomatic appointments out of the pork barrel.

To put a man without financial means in the London Embassy, the State Department says it would have to do the following to bring him up to the standards paid by the British to their career Ambassador in Washington:

Give him an additional $13,188 for the expenses of his official residence.

Add another $20,000 in representation allowances.

Provide $13,000 for clothing, secretarial help, printing and engraving and club memberships.

The question, therefore, is not whether the Congress wants the best available men in these jobs—as it has been maintaining recently—but whether, as Mr. Gluck has demonstrated, they want to pay what it costs to get them.

FOR BETTER DIPLOMACY

(By Price Day)

Senator JOHN SHERMAN COOPER, of Kentucky, told a sad and instructive little story on television the other day. He said that when he went to India as Ambassador he found that the Embassy had given no Fourth of July parties for several years, because of insufficient funds. He gave one on the following Fourth, for Americans in Delhi and some 3,000 Indian guests. It costs $1,800. Mr. COOPER, not a wealthy man, paid half of it out of his own pocket.

This was a nonalcoholic party, as occasions of that sort in India always are. If it had been alcoholic the costs might have exceeded the resources of the United States of America and Mr. COOPER combined. It would have been too bad. Our Embassies must entertain. To say that they need more whisky is to put the problem too bluntly, but that is part of it. Entertainment, public and private, is a necessary element in diplomacy—in serious diplomacy. Serious, effective diplomacy costs money. It costs more money than the United States is willing to spend.

It costs so much money that the big posts, in London and Paris and Rome, are closed to Foreign Service career diplomats, unless they have private means beyond their salaries. The prize appointments go instead to people of independent wealth. Some of them, past and present, have made good Ambassadors; but that is not the point.

It is beside the point, also, that some noncareer Ambassadors in posts that are not particular plums have done excellent jobs. Mr. COOPER's dedicated Indian service, which he relinquished reluctantly, provides one example. The point is that the quality of our diplomacy in general over the world suffers from chinchiness, and that no recent President or Congress has seemed interested in spending the $1 million or so that could wholly change the situation.

Some Foreign Service career men think they know the reason for the lack of interest. They believe that the present system is deliberately and calculating retained as a means for paying political debts. They argue that even with diplomatic pay and allowances at the present levels career men could manage to get along in all posts but the few that are most expensive, if they were not pushed aside in favor of political appointees.

The fruits of the system, they say, are low morale (even pre-McCarthy) and a high rate of resignations from the service the moment retirement age is reached, which in many cases is also not far from the moment in early middle age when a man ought to be of greatest value.

A spokesman for this point of view, Mr. Edward P. Lawton, a retired Foreign Service officer, declares in a letter to the New York Times that the chief reason for low morale in his time was that the career men, who had entered the service after a stiff competitive examination and had risen in rank slowly over the years, found themselves suddenly joined in class standing by outsiders appointed—or so it was believed—largely through influence, and were blocked from the most desirable ambassadorships by the preference given political proteges.

Mr. Lawton is not impressed by State Department statistics that show increases in the number of career appointments, and a drop in the percentage of noncareer appointments. Such statistics fail to reveal, he says, that a large number of new Embassies have been created in recent years and that nearly all of them are in out-of-the-way posts where climate or living conditions are so difficult that no self-respecting politician would endure them.

Nor, he notes, do the figures disclose the fact that the Iron Curtain posts, where the going is both rough and delicate, where diplomacy matters most, are filled by career men.

Foreign Service career men do not mind rough going. They expect it. The old popular picture of the diplomat as a tea drinker and cookie pusher has long ceased to resemble reality, if it ever did. Just as false is what seems to be a new legend that diplomats already devote too much time to parties at which alcoholic beverages are served; that the American public is being urged by the career service to spend its precious cash on more whisky for more parties, just for fun.

Effective diplomacy is always hard. In times of peril and confusion it grows harder, and these are such times. One would think that all hands would be concerned with helping to see that it does the jobs it is supposed to do.

For that the first need is more money. Not much more: 1 percent, say, of the $100 million the Air Force spent on the now-abandoned experimental XF-103 that never flew; just enough to allow our representatives abroad to perform properly their necessary duties.

The second need is for a determination at the highest executive level—the Presidency—that the Foreign Service of the United States shall be as good as any diplomatic corps in the world. Room must be left for the appointment of noncareer ambassadors under special circumstances, but nothing should be allowed to prevent the rising of a career man to any post for which his experience and ability make him the logical choice.

REAL ISSUE IN FUROR OVER GLUCK: IS AMATEUR DIPLOMAT OBSOLETE?

(By Marguerite Higgins)

WASHINGTON, August 17.—Has the increased sensitivity of formerly remote and relatively unimportant parts of the world—such as Ceylon—made the amateur diplomate obsolete, even dangerous? This is the heart of the furor over Maxwell H. Gluck, the new Ambassador to Ceylon, who couldn't call out the name of Ceylon's Prime Minister. But today, despite all the clamor, the Eisenhower administration stands just as determinedly for the principle that an injection from time to time of noncareer ambassadors into the Foreign Service contributes a healthy, even essential, balance and that the record shows it.

PERSONAL FORTUNE ANGLE

What, then, is the record? How do the amateur and the professional compare in language proficiency, performance of duty, diligence, sound judgment? Are the amateur ambassadors given an adequate briefing on their areas of responsibility before their departures? How much does the possession of a personal fortune play in the selection of an ambassador and is this a good or bad thing?

First, it ought to be reported that the case of the Senate testimony of the unlucky Mr. Gluck had at least one good result: it focused public attention on many anachronisms in ambassadorial appointments including the one that victimized Mr. Gluck. This was the State Department custom of briefing ambassadorial appointees only after they had been confirmed by the Senate. Presumably this meant that in the remote possibility that confirmation was refused, the rejected nominee would not be left in unlawful possession of classified information.

BRIEFINGS A CERTAINTY

But—as Under Secretary of State Christian A. Herter freely admitted—this absence of briefing sets a perfect stage for the nominee to make a fool of himself while facing cross-examination from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

As a result of changes wrought by the Gluck case, all nominees from now on will be given at least a minimum briefing before having to face the Senators. And it's a safe bet that a good deal of attention will be paid to rehearsing the ambassadors on pronouncing the names of the officials in their area.

When Secretary of State John Foster Dulles insisted that contributions to political parties ought not to debar anyone from being considered for a diplomatic post, it was a backward way of saying that being rich doesn't automatically mean being narrow or lacking in those qualities required of a good ambassador.

SUCCESS OF DOUGLAS

Among those amateur but well-to-do ambassadors who more than prove his point are—to stick with the recent past—such men as Lewis Douglas, a prominent one-time Democrat who turned in a brilliant performance as Ambassador to Great Britain during the days of the Berlin airlift, and Ellsworth Bunker, a heavy contributor to Democratic campaign funds in the Roosevelt era, who has done so well in diplomacy that the Republicans reappointed him, paying him most recently the compliment of entrusting to him the crucial post of New Delhi.

Mr. Bunker, incidentally, not only knows how to pronounce the name of Jawaharlal Nehru, Prime Minister of India, but speaks two foreign languages: French and Spanish.

Another prominent Democrat and campaign contributor is David K. E. Bruce, who after distinguishing himself in Paris was later named Ambassador to West Germany.

Among outstanding amateurs appointed by the Eisenhower regime have been Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, former Ambassador to Italy, who, among other things, learned Italian well enough to deliver speeches in the language; C. Douglas Dillon, former Ambassador to France; Eugenie Anderson, Ambassador to Denmark; James B. Conant, former president of Harvard and former Ambassador to West Germany.

ECONOMICS A FACTOR

Under present procedures, all amateur diplomats are given a minimum of three to a maximum of six weeks intensive briefing on every aspect of the country to which they will go.

But knowing the language of a country to which a person may be assigned is not of itself a criterion for handing out appointments. As a State Department official put it, "linguistic ability is not synonymous with sound judgment, integrity of character, capability of handling people, and a wide knowledge of business and economics which, since foreign aid began, has gained a vast new importance. These are the qualities we look for."

Except for the so-called global languages (the languages of Europe such as French, Spanish, German, etc.) it is rare even in the regular Foreign Service that an officer knows the language of a post to which he is assigned, especially if it is in Asia, the Middle East, or Africa. But of the 52 career ambassadors—the highest proportion of professionals in recent history—every one speaks at least one foreign language, usually Spanish or French, according to State Department records.

QUESTION OF EXPENSES

Of the 26 ambassadors, it is naturally less likely that they will have at the start of their assignments a real command of a foreign language because the amateurs just haven't been exposed to foreign languages as much as the professionals.

But almost unanimously the amateur diplomats set about correcting this deficiency. A check with the respective desks at the State Department revealed that the vast majority of newly appointed ambassadors promptly set about studying the language of the post to which they are assigned.

As to charges that the administration saves the plum jobs for wealthy political appointees, the State Department says—and the facts unquestionably confirm—that Congress itself is guilty of imprisoning the State Department with outrageous budget practices that leave no other choice.

COST OF LONDON PARTIES

Is it fair, for instance, that regular professional diplomats acting as deputy chiefs of mission in France and England had to ask to be relieved from their posts, citing that they had to borrow $5,000 and $10,000 individually because Congress refused to authorize residence maintenance allowances?

Does it make sense that in London the cost of the annual Embassy Fourth of July party eats up the Ambassador's entire entertainment allowance for the year? When Congress sets those low budgets in areas of high expenditure, how can any government do otherwise than find a wealthy man to take the post?

Naturally it creates envy and sometimes a measure of frustration in the regular Foreign Service to know that key jobs such as Rome, Paris, London, Bonn, etc., are, of necessity, beyond reach. But until the era of much richer career officers or a more openhanded Congress, there just is no alternative available to the Department of State. And, ipso facto, it usually follows that rich men have given money to political campaigns.

In both the Republican and Democratic administrations, the men proposed are almost invariably wealthy (and therefore political contributors) for the simple reason that their sponsors know the rules of the game. There would be no point in proposing someone who had no visible means of being able to afford the post.

But there is every reason to believe that, once proposed for consideration, the question of size and scope of any candidate's contributions plays no role whatever and such details are never brought up among the officials making the selections.

The amateurs are of value in the Foreign Service not only because of backgrounds that include a wide, practical knowledge of business and economics but also because they are less likely to be bound by the inhibitions and fears that sometimes—as Mr. Dulles put it—turn Foreign Service officers into machines preoccupied with diplomatic niceties but fearful of the human touch. The world remains enormously diverse and as Under Secretary Herter testified, sometimes even in America's excellent professional service situations arise where a search reveals an absence of precisely the right man for the job. It is on those occasions that the Department of State is grateful for those Americans outside the service willing to sustain financial sacrifice for the privileges and hazards of serving their country.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message received from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEUBERGER in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1002) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to extend financial assistance to desert-land entrymen to the same extent as such assistance is available to homestead entrymen, which was, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

> That (a) the first sentence of the act entitled "An act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to extend financial assistance to homestead entrymen, and for other purposes," (approved October 19, 1949 (63 Stat. 883) is amended (1) by inserting immediately after the words "Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended", the words "title V of the Housing Act of 1949, as amended," and (2) by striking out "homestead entry" and inserting in lieu thereof "homestead or desertland entry."

(b) The last sentence of the first section of such act is amended by inserting after "project", the following: "or to an entryman under the desert-land laws": Provided, however, That for any person to qualify for a loan under said act by reason of desert-land entry on public lands the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine that such person meets all requirements of residence, possession, and use required by the Homestead Acts (43 U. S. C., ch. 7).

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, request a conference thereon with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. TALMADGE, Mr. MUNDT, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE DEPORTATION OF MRS. JAMES MASTERSON

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter which I had delivered last Friday to Under Secretary of State Christian A. Herter.

The letter concerns one of my constituents, James Masterson, and his wife, Doreen, a British subject who is denied reentry into this country because of the construction that has been placed upon section 212 (a) (I) (ii) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

When his wife was deported Mr. Masterson accompanied her back to England. For 3 years they have been trying, unsuccessfully, to obtain permission from our Government for her return.

The information furnished me on this case by the State Department and the Mastersons indicates that her readmission is permissible, and that an injustice is being done a devoted husband and a woman who long ago repented the errors she was led into in her youth.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
August 23, 1957.

The Honorable CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
Under Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing you on behalf of one of my constituents, James R. Masterson, and his wife, Doreen, a British subject who is denied reentry into this country under the McCarran-Walter Act.

Masterson accompanied his wife to England when she was deported 3 years ago. Since then they have been trying to obtain permission for her to return to this country under section 212 (a) (I) (ii) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, which provides that a visa may be issued if the alien "establishes to the satisfaction of the consular officer when applying for a visa, and the consular officer finds that since the termination of such membership or affiliation, such alien is and has been for at least 5 years prior to the date of application for a visa actively opposed to the doctrine, program, principles, and ideology of such party or organizations, or the section, subsidiary, branch, or affiliate or subdivision thereof, and (b) the admission of such alien into the United States would be in the public interest."

It appears, on the basis of information furnished me by the State Department and the Mastersons, that readmission of Mrs. Masterson is permissible under present law.

It appears that injustice is being done a woman who has long ago repented the errors of her youth.

It appears that an injustice is being done her devoted husband, who is a member of a highly respected pioneer family of Miles City, Mont.

It appears that a decision in favor of her reentry will reflect favorably upon the United States Government.

For these reasons I am asking you personally to review the case and take appropriate action.

Here is a summary of the background on this case:

Before the Mastersons met, when Mrs. Masterson was about 19 years of age, she became engaged to a man about 12 years her senior who was a member of a branch of the English Communist Party. During this period of her engagement, which was also during the time when the United States, Great Britain, and the U. S. S. R. were allied in war against a common enemy, she joined the Communist Party and the Young Communist League.

In 1943 she broke her engagement with this man and, in turn, in either 1943 or 1944, she terminated her membership in the Communist Party and Young Communist League.

Masterson served with the United States Army Air Force in England during World War II. He married his wife in 1945. She came to this country under the GI bride program. They lived in Montana, where he attended Montana State University, earning B. A. and M. A. degrees in 1949 and 1950. Subsequently they lived in Seattle and Boston, where he did postgraduate work at the University of Washington and at Harvard.

On April 24, 1951, a warrant of arrest was issued charging that Mrs. Masterson had been a Communist prior to entry into the United States and that she was in this country in violation of United States immigration laws. There followed hearings and appeals and her deportation to England on August 27, 1954.

My files on this case indicate the following significant information:

(1) Numerous affidavits submitted to appropriate agencies in behalf of Mrs. Masterson certifying that during the period of her membership in the party she was loyal to her government and her church. I know of no evidence to the contrary.

(2) She swore that she terminated membership in the Communist Party and Young Communist League in either 1943 or 1944 and never rejoined those or similar organizations. I know of no evidence to the contrary.

(3) Despite her youthfulness, she became disillusioned with the Communist Party and terminated membership in it long before many mature citizens, who have not been denied residence in this country as she has, did so.

(4) While in Missoula, Mont., in 1948 she was asked to join the Communist Party of the United States. She refused to do so.

(5) Her character, devotion to democracy, and opposition to communism have been attested to by substantial citizens in both this country and England, including a distinguished former member of the Montana State University faculty and a former Rhodes scholar in England.

(6) My staff discussions with the State Department indicate that officers of the State Department are not fearful that admission of Mrs. Masterson would be prejudicial to the public interest or endanger the welfare, safety, or security of this country.

(7) The director of the visa section in London was favorably impressed by Mrs. Masterson.

But Doreen Masterson apparently is not the type of individual who, after breaking with the Communist Party, seeks the spotlight by making speeches and writing articles, thus creating for the officials who must judge the case conveniently tangible evidence of anti-Communist activity.

You know, as I do, that repentance before one's God, family, and friends can be at least as genuine as that which is performed in public. You know, too, as I do, that the person who does not have the faculty for writing or public speaking can nevertheless be as active in opposition to communism as are the more articulate converts.

Consider, for example, this notarized statement submitted in her behalf by an American teacher, now in England, who has known her for 6 years:

"I became acquainted with Doreen Masterson and her husband while working in Seattle, Wash., during the summer of 1951. I have corresponded with them regularly during periods when we have not been within visiting distance. Knowing of her legal difficulties, I am glad to make this affidavit to support her application for reentry into the United States. She and her husband are personal friends of mine, and I have a high opinion of her character—not least because of the uncomplaining courage and integrity with which she has met the hardships of the past few years.

"Even before it involved her in these difficulties, Doreen made no attempt to conceal the fact that as a girl during World War II she had joined the Young Communist League. She soon recognized the disparity between communism's professed ideals and its actual practices, became disillusioned with it as a vehicle for social idealism, and disassociated herself from it. I know her to be a person with strong democratic ideals and the courage of her convictions. Her convictions and ideals have never been compatible with Communist practice; for she hates intolerance, ruthlessness, authoritarianism, and oppression of any kind, and cannot see a lost kitten without taking it home. She accompanied my wife to church when they were together and during the 5½ years of my acquaintance with her I have never known her to be hypocritical or to express any sentiment whatever suggestive of Communist sympathies. On her last visit to us she condemned the Russian suppression in Hungary as strongly as her husband. She is definitely not the sort of person who should be barred from returning to the United States with her husband, where she has many friends, of whom I am glad to be one."

Our Government is one which recognizes human values above all else. Therefore, for the sake of this young man and his devoted wife, I ask your reconsideration of her status, and I do so in the knowledge that the final decision must be yours. I ask only that your finding be based on the facts as I have tried to present them, as I know them, and as you have them in your files.

With warm personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY,
United States Senator.

MUTUAL SECURITY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, one of the most important examples of the value of the mutual-security program has been provided by a sister Republic—Guatemala.

It was only a few years ago that world communism got its first real foothold in the Western Hemisphere. The people of Guatemala themselves finally got rid of the foreign yoke.

Since then, Guatemala has been the recipient of American help.

No less an authority than the distinguished and very hardheaded correspondent, Edwin A. Lahey, of the Chicago Daily News, attests that this help has been effective. I ask unanimous consent that his article be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Lahey Feels United States Aid Should Be Continued

(By Edwin A. Lahey)

GUATEMALA CITY.—Guatemala has been operated for 3 years as a laboratory experiment in democracy. This experiment has had the moral and financial support of the United States.

In the uncertainty created by the assassination of President Carlos Castillo Armas, there have emerged two questions of vital and immediate importance to both the United States and Guatemala.

1. Has the investment of the United States in Guatemala been justified?

2. Should the United States Congress renew its faith in Guatemala by continued generosity in foreign aid?

The answer to the first question is an unqualified "Yes." The United States has nothing to be ashamed of in its strong support of the late President Castillo Armas. The objective evidence in Guatemala supports this statement.

The answer to the second question involves political argument, rather than an examination of the record.

But it can only be "Yes" if Congress, now about to appropriate for foreign aid for fiscal 1958, wishes to protect our investment in democracy in Guatemala.

AID WITHDRAWAL INVITES CHAOS

Withdrawal of United States aid, or substantial reduction of it at this critical time, would be an invitation to chaos in Guatemala, and an American confession of failure in the project we undertook when we first supported Castillo Armas in the revolution of 1954.

It was then that the Communist-dominated government of Jacobo Arbenz, the only Red bastion in the Western Hemisphere, was overthrown.

These hard political facts make it probable that the Department of State will urge Congress, if Congress needs the urging, to back its faith in Guatemalan democracy with money in the coming weeks, when appropriations for foreign aid are voted.

The same facts make it probable that both civil and military leaders in Guatemala will strive to avoid the traditional excesses of Latin American politics and follow the middle-of-the-road policies to which Castillo Armas was firmly dedicated.

Castillo Armas was baited and badgered by both the far right and the far left in Guatemala, but he made no bones about his desire to shape the character of his country to something resembling that of its political godfather north of the Rio Grande.

A recent official progress report on the 3 years under Castillo Armas gives a conclusive answer to the question whether our investment of about $60 million in direct grants and loans since 1954 has been a good one.

That money has helped the Guatemalan Government launch programs to improve the lives of the people, particularly in the rural areas, and to help them help themselves.

The assistance has been translated into roads, low-cost housing, hospitals, health centers, and education.

PROGRESS CALLED MIRACULOUS

Considering the opposition that Castillo Armas had from both the far right and the far left, it is a modern miracle that he made as much progress in a middle-of-the-road program that he did.

The landed barons of the country, for example, wanted revenge against the shoeless proletarians who had given them a hard time under Communist leadership before 1954.

But Castillo Armas, by Presidential decree, established a minimum-wage law for agricultural labor, inadequate even by Latin American standards, but a sign of his sense of moderation.

And in recent weeks, the late President told a meeting of private employers:

"At no time must we think that the exploitation of our wealth can be carried out at the cost of inhuman exploitation of our workers."

When he died, Castillo Armas was trying to persuade the middle and upper classes of Guatemala that they must accept the income tax as inevitable. This tax is now under consideration in Congress.

At the working class level, large groups were equally impatient with the Castillo Armas government and unable to understand the slow pace of its reforms.

The labor movement, completely dominated by Communists under the Arbenz regime, was shattered in the revolution.

It has been necessarily slow in rebuilding, because of the quarantine against Communists.

In the May Day parade a few months ago, which the late President reviewed from the balcony of the national palace, workers carried angry placards denouncing the Government as antidemocratic and complaining about their own wages and working conditions.

RICH, POOR FORGET HOSTILITY

The most remarkable aspect of the assassination of Castillo Armas was the evaporation of this hostility at both ends of the social spectrum.

Rich and poor alike suddenly came to the conclusion that Castillo Armas had done a heroic job for his country in the 3 years of his service.

Without the magic spell of the late President's sincere devotion to his country's democratic aspirations, some sort of a military coup would have been as natural in Guatemala City last week as the afternoon rains that come plopping out of the low clouds with deadly regularity.

CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, sober second thought has confirmed the wisdom of the compromise agreement on the jury-trial amendment which the House leadership reached Friday.

The compromise is not one that satisfies everybody. I personally believe that the Senate version of the measure is stronger in every respect.

It is my hope that next year we will consider the whole problem of jury trials for criminal contempt cases. I would urge my colleagues to hold long and careful hearings on this question.

I believe that if we can consider the matter divorced from a highly emotional issue we will return to the Senate bill.

Give and take, however, is not a one-way street. Men of principle have yielded on both sides in order to make possible a forward step in the field of human rights.

The Washington Post and the New York Times in editorials have summed up the situation with precision. I ask unanimous consent that these editorials be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of August 26, 1957]

Victory for Everyone

The agreement among leaders of both parties in both Houses of Congress to a compromise on the civil rights bill is an act of genuine statesmanshp. No one ought to dismiss lightly the difficulties that were surmounted. Political advantage was subordinated to the need for a bill which can become law as the first real civil rights act in a generation of talk. What has come forth is truly a bipartisan measure which both parties can support with satisfaction. This is the consideration which ought to govern discussion as the bill comes up for final endorsement.

Like many compromises, the specific amendment is something less than ideal. Supporters of the jury-trial guaranty are disappointed because the amendment seems to weaken the guaranty (though we suspect that this will be the case more in theory than in practice). Champions of a stronger bill are equally disappointed because the amendment leaves a restriction on the power of Federal judges to punish offenders in voting-right cases for criminal contempt-of-court orders.

The prime virtue of the amendment is that it is a catalyst. It is a middle course between the jury-trial provision engineered by Senate Democrats and the modification suggested by House Republican Leader MARTIN. Under the amendment a judge will be empowered to try criminal contempt in voting-right cases with or without a jury, but if the punishment exceeds $300 fine or 45 days in jail a defendant will be entitled, if he wishes, to a new trial before a jury with the risk of greater penalty. The amendment also wisely narrows the jury-trial provision to cases involving voting rights and makes clear that the penalties for unauthorized use of testimony before the new Civil Rights Commission apply to disclosure rather than to news publication.

Republican support now seems assured to push the bill over the obstacle course set up by Representative HOWARD SMITH in the House Rules Committee. Attention will then turn to the Senate, where there seemed to be considerable possibility of a filibuster until Senator RUSSELL made his conciliatory statement. Southern Democrats who acquiesced in the Senate bill but object to the compromise can thank Mr. SMITH's obstructionism for much of their dilemma. Every day that he delayed, the price of agreement went up.

On this point the country must now hope that Senator RUSSELL and his southern colleagues will exericse the same dignity and forbearance that most of them displayed during the Senate debate. It has been a painful wrench for many of the southerners to yield as much as they have without resorting to a filibuster; and no one, in asking for additional restraint, can expect them to endorse the bill. But both sides have yielded in this classic debate. And actually, if the bill aims at compliance rather than punishment, and if southern legislators will use their influence in support of the law, the civil proceedings prescribed in the bill should suffice and the invocation of criminal penalties should be a rare thing. If the defiance of a court order were serious enough to warrant criminal punishment, in all probability most judges would conclude that a jury trial was called for anyhow.

From the outset this newspaper's concern in appraising the various changes in the civil-rights bill has been to obtain a workable measure that could actually be passed. We believe that the compromise bill, whatever the disappointments over individual details and omissions, should afford real protection of voting rights and encourage respect for other rights. The common denominator of agreement that has been evolved in a masterful achievement. The country has real cause for gratitude to the members of both parties who have composed their fears and differences in meeting a national need.

A Civil-Rights Bill

It now seems evident that a civil-rights bill will be adopted by Congress this week and sent to the President. A compromise has been reached and announced on some controversial points. There is little likelihood, now, of any insurmountable obstacle to passage.

In the form that is now agreed upon the measure is not as strong as we, and other exponents of the civil-rights cause, might lems in respect to racial minorities, rights of citizenship, school, and other social integradent Eisenhower proposed and urged. It is not an ultimate solution of a variety of problems in respect to racial minorities, rights of citizenship, school and other social integration, and human understanding.

Nevertheless, an immense step can be taken. When the Congress adopts this measure it will be in the first real legislation in the field of civil rights on behalf of our racial minority in almost 80 years. It will be the first legal attempt to provide the machinery for making the 14th amendment a reality.

What is more, it will have been proved that the senatorial roadblock to remedial legislation is not completely impassable. It will also have been proved that the spirit of compromise and desire to effect a meeting of minds has not been lost in even so controversial a field.

The legislation, as it is now being readied for submission, really confines itself to voting rights. The restriction may be too narrow, but within this limitation there are provisions for genuine enforcement. The teeth have not been withdrawn. The constitutional provision for the right of jury trial has been upheld, but there has been an honest effort to prevent the devotion to this principle from becoming an instrument for the denial of human rights.

Among those rights, in the political sense, that of the free ballot is of first importance. This is a civil right, in the best sense, and one of the purposes of the legislation is to make it secure. A denial of such a right can be criminal and the legislation provides for punishment.

There will doubtless be extended argument as to whether this is half a loaf, a tenth of a loaf or three-quarters of a loaf. It will not be denied that in any case it is better than no bread. A movement in the right direction is being made. It is also a movement in the right direction that the conferees have decided to drop the provision under which newspapermen could have been penalized for reporting the activities of the Civil Rights Commission that is to be established. The press and the public also have rights that need continued protection.

It is important now, that all of us realize that the adoption of one bill is no panacea. There is still a long way to go before we can establish, for ourselves and for the world, that there can be no such thing as a second-class citizen in this country. The present measure moves toward that eventual goal. Its adoption should make it easier for others that must follow.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish to say that I, too, am disappointed that the Senate version of the civil-rights bill having to do with jury trials was not accepted in toto. I am disappointed because it seems to me that in arriving at a compromise those who reached it have come up with the idea that days and dollars can work out the difference between us, and that the procedure of a jury trial itself as applied to all criminal contempt cases can be compromised in this manner.

I am certainly in accord with what the Senator from Texas has stated. I know how long he has worked to bring about a workable and enforcible civil-rights voting bill, but I am disappointed that there has been written into the bill a compromise of the jury-trial amendment as passed by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A. M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until 11 a. m. tomorrow.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER LIMITING DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes tomorrow, during the usual morning hour for the transaction of routine business, statements of Senators be limited to 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

H. R. 6127—COMPROMISING CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, despite its "compromise" label, and despite the fact that the zeal of many to pass a so-called civil-rights bill may cause them to accept unsound provisions of the bill, I hope a sufficient number of votes can be obtained to defeat the compromise amendment regarding the jury trial provision of H. R. 6127.

Mr. President, the plain provisions of the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution provide, "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed."

I will accept the argument that a court's power includes the power to imprison for direct contempt to enforce compliance with its order. This was excepted by implication when the sixth amendment was adopted.

However, we plainly violate that provision of the Constitution when—in a wholesale fashion—we transfer great segments of our criminal law over to courts of equity for enforcement and command those courts to assume jurisdiction, and then permit trial and punishment for crime without a jury trial. No clever use of words or distinctions or legal arguments can change the realities of this.

Furthermore, the expressed language of the amendment recognizes this principle when the amendment makes a jury trial mandatory if the punishment is to be beyond $300 fine or 45 days in jail. Having recognized this right to a trial by jury, the right cannot be split and conferred as to one quantity of punishment and withheld as to another quantity of punishment. Only the Constitution could make such a distinction, and none is made by that document.

Regardless of the subject matter of the bill in which such a compromise is found, we shall regret the day that we set the following two precedents:

First. When we transfer a great volume of criminal law over to a court of equity for enforcement.

Second. When we violate the jury trial mandate of the Constitution by evasive split level quantities of punishment.

I shall be heard further on this subject at a later stage of the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Carlson in the chair.) Without objection, it is so ordered.

HOURS OF DAILY MEETING AND LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following tomorrow, and for the remainder of the week, it be in order for the Senate to convene at 10 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to announce that it is very likely that the Senate will hold evening sessions during this week. We shall make every possible attempt to conclude the business of the Congress by Saturday evening.

The Senate will convene at 11 a. m. tomorrow, and, under the order just entered, will convene at 10 o'clock during the remainder of the week.

I want all Senators to be on notice that their presence is likely to be necessary for the entire week.

We expect to bring up several important pieces of proposed legislation, including the mutual security appropriation bill, the civil rights bill, the postal pay bill, the classified pay bill, and many other bills which I have previously announced, and which have been cleared on the calendar. Just when each one will be brought up, no one can tell; but I wish to give the minority leader advance notice, and I wish this to be notice to all other Members of the Senate, that we shall make a determined effort to conclude our work this week.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY AND THE COMMUNIST COUP IN SYRIA—MUTUAL SECURITY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I wish to be recognized for a few minutes. I understand that morning business has been concluded. Will the Senator from Texas permit me to request unanimous consent to speak at this time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Certainly. I yield the floor.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the American press is now being very much occupied and United States foreign policy is being very much concerned with the Communist coup in Syria. I think that situation constitutes a most potent argument in favor of having the Senate vote to appropriate the full amount of the authorized appropriation for mutual security for this year, namely, $3,386,860,000. That amount was very sharply cut in the other body. I understand that the mutual security appropriation bill is being reported today by the Senate Appropriations Committee, in an amount very much nearer to that with which the Mutual Security Agency and, indeed, our country can live.

In my opinion, Mr. President, the Syrian coup reflects so immediately upon this question, that I desire to address the Senate for a few minutes on this subject.

Mr. President, the Communist coup in Syria presents a grave threat to the Free World, because the Soviet Union is establishing a base of operations in the eastern Mediterranean for the pursuit of its objectives to cut off the oil of the Middle East and subvert the nations there. The irresponsible supplying of arms by the Soviet Union and its satellites to Egypt and Yemen, and now to Syria, could also, at a moment's notice, plunge any one of them into a military adventure disastrous to the entire Middle East. During these few minutes, I propose to suggest a series of measures which might be undertaken by our Government to combat this new danger.

First. Under the Eisenhower doctrine, nations in the Middle East which are threatened by international communism may request our assistance. Without delaying to wait for precise legal determinations on the political complexion of the government of Syria, it seems obvious that we now should be strengthening the countries which border on Syria and which may be threatened by her aggression. In the light of this new danger, we should be reviewing and strengthening our programs of assistance to nations which are clearly alined with the Free World, such as Turkey, Iraq, Jordan, and Israel.

Certainly the mutual-security appropriations for that purpose should not be cut.

Second. Our military assistance policy should emphasize self-defense, and should avoid exacerbation of an arms race in the Middle East. Our assistance to the Middle East should be heavily economic aid. Now is the time to press forward with the highly constructive and imaginative program for the development of the Jordan River Valley, which was offered to the Arab States and Israel by Ambassador Eric Johnston several years ago. This program was killed by a political veto by Syria. I understand that Syria can very well be left out of it, and that the program can be consummated through using a United Nations agency as a managerial body, simply by means of cooperation with both Jordan and Israel. This project alone will resettle 150,000 to 200,000 Arab refugees, representing in toto approximately 900,000 persons who are the hard core of the most nettling problem in that entire area of the world.

Third. The Soviet Union's main interest in Syria may arise from the fact that Syria can at any time—as it did during the Suez crisis—cut off the oil pipelines which carry vital fuel to Western Europe from Saudi Arabia and Iraq. Therefore, it is vital that the Western World, under our leadership, accelerate its plans and programs for developing alternate routes of supply. We must encourage the building of tankers to carry oil by sea, and we must encourage the construction of new pipelines, such as the pipeline from Iraq to Turkey, and the one using the shorter route from the Gulf of Aqaba, across Israel, to the Mediterranean. At the same time, it is to be hoped that the British oil companies will now be dissuaded by the Syria coup from abandoning their existing oil facilities in Israel. The Syrian coup argues for expansion, not contraction, of oil facilities secure to the Free World.

Fourth. I urge that a major effort be made at this time to solve the Palestine-Arab refugee problem. It is one of the major problems in that entire area of the world. All governments in the Middle East, and especially those which have been expanding their economies by the development of oil resources, should be encouraged to accept their share of the responsibility in the resettlement of the Arab refugees. Mr. President, if all states in the region—both Israel and the Arab countries—agreed to contribute to a solution by accepting refugees for resettlement and by compensating refugees for abandoned and confiscated property, there would be a substantial measure of progress toward development and peace. The United Nations Relief and Works Agency, now caring for the Arab refugees, expires on June 30, 1960. It is time to consider placing a greater responsibility on the host governments, if they continue to oppose resettlement efforts.

Mr. President, by way of conclusion, let me say that we must not be frustrated or dismayed by the Syrian coup. We must react to it in an affirmative and vigorous way. I suggest that we react to it by bypassing this particular area and by working with peoples in the Middle East who will work with us, and by working on the manifest problems there. The best way to deal with Syria and Egypt is to isolate them in the Arab world.

Continued Soviet infiltration and subversion in the Middle East have been facilitated by the disunity of the region. Our Government should now exercise every resource to promote cooperation and peace in the area. The development of the Johnston plan for the Jordan River waters, the building of alternate oil pipelines, the expansion of economic aid and technical assistance, and the observance of the Eisenhower doctrine, which seals off that area from Communist aggression, will contribute to the attainment of stability, and all of them will foster conditions making for a peace settlement.

As a leader of the Free World, our Government must go forward now in an affirmative way.

The subversion of Syria and its apparent capitulation to the Kremlin's influence must serve as a stern warning to all the other nations of the Middle East that they will not preserve their independence or secure the prosperity and welfare of their people by following Syria's example, nor will they defend themselves from the threat of Soviet subversion and aggression by persisting in intraregional conflict. They owe it to themselves to settle their disputes, to make peace, and to work together for the cause of freedom.

Mr. President, in order to accomplish our policy, we need the sinews and the means, and these are contained in the appropriations for mutual security. If we fail to make adequate appropriations—and that is something we control—we shall be failing to read the lesson of the Syrian coup in the interests of our national security. And that lesson is written large upon the wall.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to consider the bills and other measures on the calendar.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that all the measures on the calendar will be objected to, down to Calendar No. 1037, except for Calendar No. 873, House bill 38, Calendar No. 733, House bill 1733, and Calendar No. 415, Senate bill 931, I ask unanimous consent that with those exceptions, the call of the calendar begin at Calendar No. 1037. In other words, preceding Calendar No. 1037, there are three bills to which we do not object. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider Calendar No. 415, Senate bill 931, Calendar No. 733, House bill 1733, and Calendar No. 873, House bill 38; and that upon the completion of action on those measures, the next measure on the calendar to be called be Calendar No. 1037.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Calendar No. 415, Senate bill 931, will now be stated.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 931) to provide for the reorganization of the safety functions of the Federal Government, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PHILIP COOPERMAN AND OTHERS—BILL PLACED AT FOOT OF CALENDAR

The bill (H. R. 1733) for the relief of Philip Cooperman, Aron Shriro, and Samuel Stackman was announced as next in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I shall object—let me say that this bill appears to have great merit. However, it would establish a precedent. For that reason, and that reason only, we believe it should not be acted on during the call of the Consent Calendar. I suggest that the bill be brought up by motion, at which time there will be no objection from the members of the minority Consent Calendar Committee.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. PURTELL. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. This is a bill involving residents of New York. It is a private bill. As the Senator from Connecticut says, there is no objection to the bill; of course, we know that when the bill is brought up by motion, there will be no objection to it.

Since this is the final week of the session, let me ask whether the bill will really establish a precedent.

Mr. PURTELL. The members of the minority calendar committee believe they have a responsibility to the entire Senate, in that when bills which may be precedent-setting are presented to the minority calendar committee, the members of that committee should alert the Senate to that fact.

I believe that this bill is in the same category as was a bill which we did not permit to pass on a call of the Consent Calendar on the last calendar call. Let me again state the bill is a meritorious one. We feel that there is equity involved in the bill and that relief should be given. We believe, however, that it ought not to be passed on a call of the Consent Calendar. I suggest that the Senator from New York may make the suggestion that it be brought up by motion immediately after the call of the calendar.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, may the bill be passed to the foot of the calendar, so that it then may be taken up on motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, the bill will go to the foot of the calendar.

FREE IMPORTATION OF CASEIN

The bill (H. R. 38) to amend the Tariff Act of 1930 to provide for the temporary free importation of casein was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA INCOME AND FRANCHISE TAX ACT OF 1947

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the call of Calendar No. 1009, H. R. 8256. Any objection on this side of the aisle to the consideration of that bill has been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8256) to amend the District of Columbia Income and Franchise Tax Act of 1947, as amended, to exclude social-security benefits and to provide additional exemptions for age and blindness, and to exempt from personal property taxation in the District of Columbia boats used solely for pleasure purposes, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments, on page 4, line 14, after the word "amended", to strike out "(sec. 47-1507b (a) (13)" and insert "(sec. 47-1557b (a) (13)"; in line 25, after the word "and", to strike out "wife, living" and insert "wife living"; on page 5, line 21, after "ch.", to strike out "1352)" and insert "1352),"; on page 6, line 15, after the word "year", to strike out "1957" and insert "1957,"; at the beginning of line 20, to strike out "business" and insert "business,"; on page 7, at the beginning of line 1, to strike out "business" and insert "business,"; at the beginning of line 7, to strike out "$5,000 and provided further that" and insert "$5,000: And provided further, That"; in line 8, after the word "calendar", to strike out "year" and insert "year,"; in line 20, after the word "trade,", to strike out "business" and insert "Business,"; in line 23, after the word "trade,", to strike out "business" and insert "business,"; on page 8, at the beginning of line 2, to strike out "business" and insert "business,"; in line 7, after the word "Columbia", to insert "and no license shall be required of any person licensed under chapter II, section 26, of the 'Life Insurance Act', approved June 19, 1934 (48 Stat. 1125, ch. 672; sec. 35–425, D. C. Code, 1951), for the purpose of acting within the District of Columbia for any life insurance company as a general agent, agent, or solicitor in the solicitation or procurement of applications for insurance,"; in line 24, after the word "or", to strike out "joint venturer" and insert "joint venture", and, in line 25, after the word "Columbia.", to insert "The license required to be obtained under the provisions of this subsection shall be in addition to all other licenses, fees, and permits required by law."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, in connection with this particular bill, I should like to send proposed amendments to the desk and ask the clerk to state them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 8, line 4, after the word "required", to insert "(1)"; on page 8, line 7, after the word "Columbia", to strike out "and no license shall be required" and insert "(2)"; and on page 8, line 14, to strike out "and no" and insert "or (3) of any person engaged in the ministry of healing by prayer or spiritual means alone and who is a member of a church or denomination whose tenets and teachings include the practice of such healing. No."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be considered en bloc.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement concerning the amendments. There has previously been objection to the passage of the bill by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. The matter to which the amendments are pointed was not posed to the full committee until the very day on which we met. I think there is considerable merit in the suggested amendments which were offered to the committee by and on behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin. The committee has been polled and is perfectly willing to accept the amendments and take them to conference. The feeling of the committee at the time of the consideration of this particular District of Columbia income and franchise tax legislation last year was that it certainly did not have in mind reaching this particular class. It occurs to me, and I believe the other members of the committee share my view, that this is a bona fide exemption. I have assured the Senator from Wisconsin we shall accept the amendments and take them to conference.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared in connection with the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BIBLE

The purpose of this bill is to amend the District of Columbia Income and Franchise Tax Act of 1947, as amended, and certain provisions of law pertaining to taxation of personal property in the District of Columbia, so as to accomplish the following:

(1) To exclude from gross income for individual income-tax purposes insurance benefit payments received by a taxpayer under the Social Security Act, as amended.

(2) To add to the exemptions to which a taxpayer is entitled, $500 for taxpayers and their spouses when those individuals have reached the age of 65; and $500 will be allowed to taxpayers and their spouses who are blind. This provision is substantially identical to that contained in the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(3) To change existing exemption allowed a head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife. Presently, a husband and wife living together shall receive 1 personal exemption of $2,000, but if they make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either, or divided between them. This bill would retain the exemption of $2,000, but provides that if the husband or wife makes separate returns the personal exemption of $2,000 shall be divided equally between them.

(4) To modify the provision of present law, pertaining to the exclusion from gross income of payments made under laws relating to veterans. This would conform to provisions under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(5) To provide for the exclusion from gross income for individual tax purposes of amounts received as a pension, annuity, or similar allowance for personal injuries or sickness resulting from active service in the armed forces of any country or in the Coast and Geodetic Survey or the Public Health Service to the extent such amounts are excluded from gross income under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(6) To increase the maximum amount allowed to taxpayers who elect to take an optional standard deduction, rather than to itemize their deductions, from the present $500 to $1,000 and, in this respect, will also conform with the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(7) To limit taxpayers using a tax table to persons whose income from specified sources does not exceed $5,000. Present law is $10,000.

(8) To eliminate from personal-property taxation boats used solely for pleasure purposes. Under existing law such boats are subject to taxation on their value in excess of the first $1,000.

(9) To exempt from the licensing tax, under certain circumstances, individuals who engage in a trade, business, or profession in the District of Columbia, but whose gross receipts during a calendar year are less than $5,000. The exemption also applies, under certain conditions set forth in the bill, in cases where the annual gross receipts of a partnership, association, or joint venture in the District were, during a stated calendar year, less than $5,000. The present exemption of registered and practical nurses from the requirements of licensing is retained and, in addition, exemptions from these requirements are provided officers and employees of the United States Government, or the District of Columbia government, as well as individuals in private or public employment who are compensated for service performed by them as employees.

The committee amendment to section 7 of the bill would add to those exempted from the licensing requirement persons licensed under chapter 11, section 26 of the Life Insurance Act, approved June 19, 1934, when such persons are acting, under their license, for any life insurance company as a general agent, agent, or solicitor in the solicitation or procurement of applications for insurance.

Enactment of this legislation, as amended by the committee, will result in a loss of revenue to the District of Columbia of approximately $350,000 per annum. (See page 4 of attached report for breakdown).

This legislation was recommended by and has the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANCE TO STATE AND TERRITORIAL MARITIME ACADEMIES OR COLLEGES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1728) to provide certain assistance to State and Territorial maritime academies or colleges, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with amendments on page 1, after line 5, to strike out:

Sec. 2. It is herewith declared to be the policy of the Congress to promote the development of a strong merchant marine through assistance and cooperation with States and Territories which operate or maintain a maritime academy or college for the training of merchant marine officers.

And insert:

Sec. 2. On page 6, line 8, after the word "the", to strike out "Navy, Coast Guard, or merchant marine" and insert "Navy or Coast Guard or United States Maritime Service instructors employed under the provisions of section 216 (a) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936,"; in line 13, after the word "act.", to strike out "Officers so detailed shall be compensated by the Federal agency ordinarily compensating them when they are serving on active duty for the Federal Government." and insert "Officers or instructors so detailed shall be compensated by the Federal agency ordinarily compensating them for service as such an officer or instructor."; after line 18, to insert:

RULES AND REGULATIONS

Sec. 8. The Secretary may establish such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

On page 7, at the beginning of line 2, to change the section number from "8" to "9", and, at the beginning of line 10, to change the section number from "9" to "10"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Maritime Academy Act of 1957."

Sec. 3. (a) In order to carry out the policy set out in section 2 of this act, the Secretary of Commerce (hereinafter referred to as the Secretary) may furnish any suitable vessel under his jurisdiction, or obtained under the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, or construct and furnish a suitable vessel if such a vessel is not available, to the State of Maine, the State of Massachusetts, the State of New York, the State of California, and to any other State or Territory of the United States, for use as a training vessel for a maritime academy or college meeting the requirements of this act. The Secretary may enter into agreements with not more than one maritime academy or college, which meets the requirements of this act, in each State or Territory, to make annual payments to such academy or college for not in excess of 4 years in the case of each such agreement, to be used for the maintenance and support of such academy or college. Such payments for any year to any maritime academy or college shall be an amount equal to the amount furnished to such academy or college for its maintenance the support of the State or Territory in which such academy or college is located, except that such payments to any academy or college for any year shall not exceed $75,000, or $25,000 if such academy or college does not meet the requirement of section 5 (b) of this act.

REQUIREMENTS

Sec. 5. (a) As a condition to receiving any payments or the use of any vessel under the provisions of this act an academy or college shall—

(1) provide courses of instruction to youths in navigation and marine engineering, including steam and diesel propulsion, and courses in atomic or nuclear propulsion as soon as practical and possible; and

(2) shall agree in writing to conform to such standards in such course, in training facilities, in entrance requirements, and in instructors, as are established by the Secretary after consultation with superintendents of maritime academies and colleges in the United States.

(b) As a condition to receiving payment of any amount in excess of $25,000 for any year under the provisions of section 4 of this Act, a maritime academy or college shall agree to admit to such academy or college students resident in other States in such numbers as the Secretary shall prescribe, except that the number of such students prescribed for any academy or college shall not at any time exceed one-third of the student capacity of such academy or college.

SUBSISTENCE PAYMENTS

Sec. 6. (a) The Secretary may enter into agreements, with each academy or college with which he contracts under section 4 to make payments, at a rate not in excess of $600 per academic year per student, to such academy or college, with respect to each student attending such academy or college. Such payments (1) shall be used to assist in defraying the cost of uniforms, books, and subsistence for such student, (2) shall commence to accrue on the day such student begins his first term of work at such academy or college, and (3) shall be paid to such academy or college in such installments as the Secretary shall prescribe, while such student is in attendance and until the completion of his course of instruction, but in no event for more than 4 academic years for any one student.

APPROPRIATIONS AUTHORIZED

SEC. 10. There are authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by the Senator from Maine [Mr. PAYNE] be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR PAYNE ON S. 1728, STATE MARITIME ACADEMY BILL

This bill (S. 1728) would codify and modernize Federal laws relating to State maritime academies. This bill is sponsored by my colleagues, Senator MARGARET SMITH of Maine, and Senators SALTONSTALL and KENNEDY of Massachusetts, IVES and JAVITS of New York, and KUCHEL of California. It was unanimously reported to the Senate by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

This bill is an outgrowth of the comprehensive review of maritime training and education made by the Special Maritime Training Subcommittee of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in 1955–56, under authority of Senate Resolution 35, 84th Congress, 1st session. The special subcommittee, composed of the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] as chairman, and myself, held hearings on both the east and west coasts and visited 3 of the 4 State maritime academies as well as the United States Merchant Marine Academy at Kings Point, N. Y., in the fall of 1955. The record developed by the special subcommittee forms one of the most complete compilations of factual material on maritime training and education ever assembled in the United States.

In these days, with the experience of two World Wars still fresh in our minds, it goes almost without saying that a strong merchant marine is essential if the United States is to maintain its position of world leadership. The merchant marine is indeed, as has so often been said, our fourth arm of defense. Without the highly trained personnel needed to man a modern merchant vessel it would be impossible for this Nation to have an adequate merchant marine to meet both its commerce and defense needs.

The special subcommittee found that both the Federal and State maritime academies in this country were doing an outstanding job of training highly skilled officers to man the ships of our merchant marine. It found that, while the merchant marine annually needs from 1,000 to 1,600 new officers, the maritime academies, both Federal and State, are currently producing only 400 to 500 graduates annually.

The special subcommittee found, and its report so indicated, that one of the major problems annually plaguing the four State maritime academies was the uncertainty over the continuance of Federal financial assistance. Since this assistance is presently on a strictly annual basis, the State maritime academies are not able to tell a prospective student applying for admission what his expenses will be during his course of instruction. This has deterred many interested prospective students from attending the State maritime academies. I was recently advised by one academy that the report of the special subcommittee alone has had a salutary effect and that applications for admission have risen steadily in the last 2 years.

In its report the special subcommittee recommended that legislative action be taken to give the State maritime academies some assurance of continuity in Federal financial assistance (S. Rept. 1465, 84th Congress, p. 15). The basic purpose of S. 1728 is to implement this recommendation by giving the Department of Commerce authority to make contracts for annual payments with each academy for periods of up to 4 years. This provision would keep the actual appropriation of funds for the State maritime academies on an annual basis but would at the same time give each academy some assurance that assistance would continue for at least the period of the course of instruction of each entering class.

The bill would also codify the existing laws relating to State maritime academies by bringing together several rather widely scattered provisions. It would make a very modest increase in the level of financial assistance to the State maritime academies through increasing the annual grants for maintenance and support and by placing the presently vague program of subsistance allowances for cadets on a basis very comparable to the Department of the Navy's Reserve Officer Training Corps (Holloway plan) program.

The State maritime academy bill has been under careful study and consideration for over a year and represents the carefully considered opinions of many of those interested in the outstanding and vital programs of the four State maritime academies in Maine, Massachusetts, New York, and California. It is my firm conviction that this legislation must be enacted if we are to insure a continued adequate supply of highly trained merchant marine officers to meet the needs of the United States for a strong merchant marine in both peace and war.

MEMORANDUM ON INCREASED FEDERAL FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO THE STATE MARITIME ACADEMIES PROPOSED IN THE MARITIME ACADEMY ACT OF 1957

1. Maintenance and repair of vessels: Existing law authorizes the loan of suitable vessels to State maritime academies or colleges and provides that such vessels shall remain the property of the United States and be kept in repair by the United States. The proposed bill would not change the financial obligation of the Government for the loan and maintenance of the State maritime training ships. The Federal budget for 1958 requests an appropriation for this purpose of $149,800 ($37,450 per ship) which is the same as that appropriated for fiscal years 1956 and 1957. No additional cost.

2. Grants for State maritime academies: Existing law authorizes annual grants to State maritime academies, not to exceed the amount annually appropriated by a State for such school, and not to exceed $50,000. Moreover the annual grant to each school is limited to $25,000 unless the school agrees to accept out-of-State students on terms prescribed by the Maritime Administration and then a school may receive only so much of the additional $25,000 as is necessary to cover the per capita costs of the out-of-State students. The proposed bill would change this by setting the total annual grant limit at $75,000 per school and would limit a school to $25,000 annually unless it accepted out-of-State students. Maritime schools eligible for assistance and meeting this requirement would receive the full annual grant of $75,000. The proposed bill would also give the State maritime academies some degree of assurance of continuity of Federal financial assistance by authorizing the Department of Commerce to make contracts for annual payments for periods up to 4 years. Additional cost per year, $110,000.

3. Allowances for cadet-midshipmen: Existing law permits expenditures incident to maritime training under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce. Under this authority uniform, book, and subsistence allowances have been established for cadet-midshipmen at the four State maritime academies. At the present time these allowances amount to $475 per year per cadet and the number of cadets eligible for such allowances is limited to those who qualify as merchant marine students in accordance with Navy Department directives with the maximum number eligible at each school limited to slightly less than the enrollment of each school. The proposed bill would authorize a subsistence allowance of up to $600 per year for each cadet attending a State maritime academy. This amount is identical to that paid to students attending private colleges under the Navy's Holloway program. As with the funds for maintenance of State maritime academies, discussed in paragraph 2 of this memorandum, the proposed bill would provide authority to contract in advance to make these subsistence payments for the duration of the course of instruction but in no case to exceed 4 years. Additional cost per year estimated to be no more than $225,150. (NOTE.—Maine, Massachusetts, and California State Maritime Academies have a 3-year course, and the New York State Academy has a 4-year course.)

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement I have prepared.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAVITS, NEW YORK, ON THE PASSAGE OF S. 1728

Passage by the Senate of S. 1728, a bill introduced by Senator PAYNE and of which I am a cosponsor, to provide Federal assistance to State and Territorial maritime academies and colleges will mark a beginning in the effort on behalf of the maritime service of our country. If it passes the other body, it will be of direct financial benefit to the New York State University Maritime College, as well as those like institutions in other States.

Through the Nation's history, a strong merchant marine has been one of our bulwarks in peace and war. In peace, commercial vessels flying the American flag have written a great chapter in the story of world-trade development. In war, the work of our merchant seamen in supplying our Armies and our allies overseas with the goods of war has been a key factor in victory in two World Wars.

It is significant that the Senate recognizes the need for assistance in the work of our merchant marine schools in training personnel to man our fleets. This bill would (1) make ships available to maritime institutions of any State or Territory for use as a training vessel; (2) authorize a $25,000 yearly increase to a total of $75,000 per school of grants to State maritime academies; (3) authorize the Secretary of Commerce to pay maritime academies up to $600 per year per student for a subsistence allowance.

It represents an excellent beginning on realistically recognizing the needs of this branch of service and it is my hope that approval may be forthcoming quickly in the other body.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS WITH RESPECT TO CIVIL ACTION

The bill (H. R. 277) to amend title 17 of the United States Code entitled "copyrights" to provide for a statute of limitations with respect to civil action was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESCRIBING FEES FOR UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS

The bill (H. R. 4191) to amend section 633 of title 28, United States Code, prescribing fees of United States commissioners was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WESTFELDT BROS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1324) for the relief of Westfeldt Bros.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to correct an error on the part of a customs examiner in the assessment of customs duties against Westfeldt Bros., a commercial firm of New Orleans, La. Briefly, the Treasury Department levied a duty of $1.75 per package on certain sweetstuffs imported by Westfeldt Bros., instead of the proper duty of $1.75 per 100 packages. The total overassessment thus outstanding amounts to $540,540, the amount in the bill.

The Treasury Department has reported favorably on the bill, and has admitted that the increased liability was the result of inadvertence and error on the part of a customs examiner.

This bill involves no payment from the Federal Treasury, but, rather, would only result in relieving Westfeldt Bros. of liability which, according to the law, should not attach.

Unfortunately, there is no way for this admitted clerical error to be corrected short of passage of this bill. The Customs Simplification Act of 1953 provides an administrative procedure for correcting clerical errors, but because the assessment here involved became final prior to the passage of that act, it is specifically excluded from the administrative proceeding.

As a matter of simple justice and equity, Mr. President, this bill should be passed. I emphasize again that it involves no cost to the Treasury, but would merely preclude an importer from being compelled to pay the sum involved to the Treasury due to an error in appraisal of imported merchandise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS F. MILTON

The bill (H. R. 6172) for the relief of Thomas F. Milton was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 374) for the relief of certain aliens.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, House Joint Resolution 374 grants the status of permanent residence in the United States to 10 persons. Since reporting the joint resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary, the case of Lino Aguilon Reyes, whose name was deleted from House Joint Resolution 338 pending further study, has now been approved.

I send to the desk an amendment to provide that the additional name of Lino Aguilon Reyes be included in House Joint Resolution 374, and I move that the amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed, on page 1, line 5, after the name "Kukic" to insert "Lino Aguilon Reyes,".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the joint resolution.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

WAIVER OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS IN BEHALF OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 430) to waive certain provisions of section 212 (a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act in behalf of certain aliens was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARIA DEL CARMEN VIQUERA PINAR

The bill (S. 1294) for the relief of Maria del Carmen Viquera Pinar was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

DEANNA MARIE GREENE (OKHE KIM)

The bill (S. 2352) for the relief of Deanna Marie Greene (Okhe Kim) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purposes of sections 101 (a) (27) (A) and 205 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Deanna Marie Greene (Okhe Kim) shall be held and considered to be the natural-born alien child of Mr. and Mrs. Doyle Greene, citizens of the United States.

CHARLES FREDRICK CANFIELD (KIM YO SEP)

The bill (S. 2353) for the relief of Charles Fredrick Canfield (Kim Yo Sep) was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purposes of sections 101 (a) (27) (A) and 205 of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Charles Fredrick Canfield (Kim Yo Sep) shall be held and considered to be the natural-born alien child of Mr. and Mrs. Charles N. Canfield, citizens of the United States.

Mr. STENNIS subsequently said: Mr. President, this afternoon, Calendar No. 1061, House bill 8030, was passed by the Senate. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately following the passage of that bill a short statement by myself.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR STENNIS

Passage of H. R. 8030 is most important. It is similar to my bill, S. 2777, designed to prevent shifts in cotton acreage history resulting from unplanted acres. H. R. 8030 differs from my bill in that it includes all alloted crops and is temporary in nature, covering only the 1956–59 crop years. The provisions of my bill apply only to cotton and would be permanent instead of temporary. I am glad that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has included other crops and hope that consideration will be given later to making this permanent legislation.

The decline in cotton acreage history has been a serious problem throughout the Cotton Belt, and I believe that this bill will assist greatly in bringing about desirable stability. When allotted acreage is underplanted and complicated legal precautions are not taken to preserve the acreage credit, allowable acreage not only on the farm but within the county is diminished in future years. Because of the complicated provisions of existing law—designed to protect the individual farmer—many inequitable shifts at the farm and county level are being experienced. As I pointed out earlier, some counties in my State in 1957 suffered a loss of as much as 6.5 percent of their 1956 cotton acreage allotments, even though our State allotment was reduced by only 1 percent.

Since it is almost impossible to regain acreage once it is lost, many farmers seek to plant their full allotments rather than to underplant and apply for credit under present law. This has resulted in building up surpluses which have given us so much trouble.

Administration of the statutory provisions for protection of acreage history is a burden on the county committee and other agricultural workers and is also a burden to the individual farmer who must at his own expense and on his own time go to the county office and execute the required documents prior to planting time to preserve his history. In addition to the saving to the farmers in time and travel, I understand from the Department of Agriculture that this proposed legislation in the case of cotton alone would save the Government at least $1 million annually in administrative expenses.

I believe the primary purpose of the five exemptions provided in present law can be more easily accomplished both for the farmer and for the Government through the passage of H. R. 8030, to authorize acreage allotment history to be computed automatically regardless of whether or not the farm allotment had been fully planted. The latest 5-year average acreage as a base for acreage history would be retained, but the undesirable shifts resulting from underplanting would be removed as an obstacle to effective operation of the program at the farm and county level.

This bill is a move in the right direction and I hope that it will receive the full approval of the Senate.

ASSISTANCE TO COTTON TEXTILE INDUSTRY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 314) to assist the United States cotton textile industry in regaining its equitable share of the world market.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, I urge favorable action on S. 314.

Briefly, it proposes to assist the United States cotton textile industry in regaining its equitable share of the world market by using our surplus cotton to save our cotton textile industry by making it available to textile mills at prices with which they can compete in world markets with cheap foreign labor, and limiting the use of such surplus cotton exclusively for sale in world export markets at competitive prices.

In other words, it proposes a new differential or equalizer to offset the cheap Japanese labor. My bill proposes that the Secretary of Agriculture make available to textile mills 750,000 bales of surplus cotton at such prices as may be necessary to enable American mills to regain their just and fair share of export markets. These 750,000 bales of surplus cotton would be used solely for export markets and would not affect the domestic market.

An American cotton textile leader has said that this bill can prevent the liquidation of at least 2 million spindles and the jobs connected with this manufacturing capacity.

I want to concentrate my remarks at this time to answering the objections raised by the Departments of State and Agriculture to this bill. But before doing that, let me make certain observations. No bill is perfect. It is easy to find fault with anything. It is easy to oppose. But it is not easy to offer constructive substitutes for that which is opposed and with which fault is found.

That is certainly the case with this bill. For its critics and opponents have failed to offer a constructive substitute for it. I say that it is at least worth a trial and that it should not be killed by those who offer no constructive substitute for that which they oppose.

The Departments of State and Agriculture have based their opposition to my bill on the following claims:

First. That it would entail an annual cost of $37½ million a year;

Second. That because only 10 percent of cotton textiles are exported by integrated mills, it would be almost impossible administratively to follow the other 90 percent throughout the channels of trade until finally exported;

Third, that it would give preferential treatment to cotton textile producers and exporters over other American industries producing for export; and Fourth. That foreign-textile industries and their governments would react unfavorably to it.

Let us examine each of these objections to the bill.

That it would cost $37½ million annually.

Whenever a businessman talks of cost, he measures it in terms of investment—in other words, what will he get in return for what he pays out. The Federal Government is our biggest business, so it is logical for it to measure this proposal in terms of what it would get in return to an investment costing $37½ million a year. In other words, will it pay back more than it costs?

I do not profess to be a textile economist but I think it will, because it offers the following gains:

First. Saving several American textile mills from being liquidated;

Second. Saving the jobs of thousands of textile workers;

Third. Saving the economy of several textile communities and areas;

Fourth. Return revenue in Federal income-tax payments of employed textile workers instead of terminated tax income from unemployed textile workers;

Fifth. Return revenue in Federal taxes on profits of prosperous textile mills instead of terminated tax income from liquidated textile mills; and Sixth. Prevention of the cost of unemployment benefits to displaced textile workers.

Measured in terms of these potential gains, I believe the cost of the investment would be relatively small compared to the return that it would provide.

Administration and enforcement problems on 90 percent of exports.

No one in the textile industry has expressed agreement with this fear expressed by the Departments of State and Agriculture. Instead the contrary has been expressed. One American textile leader has dismissed this fear by saying that it would be very easy to increase our exports from the present levels to the level we were exporting in the 1947–1952 period, through the regular channels of distribution—namely, 10 percent by the mills and 90 percent through the regular exporters who buy from the mills and reship abroad.

In other words, there would be a natural point of center for the administration and enforcement at the point of the mills themselves—either through their own direct exports and through their sales to regular exporters.

Preferential treatment for cotton textiles over other American producers for exports.

If other American industries which also produce for export have any objection or complaint, they have thus far failed to register it. In other words, this point raised by the Department of State is strictly a theoretical one at this time. It is an unproved allegation. It is the difference between theory and practice.

Surely such an argument is not an acceptable justification to textile workers and communities and the American textile industry for the liquidation of 10 percent or more of cotton textile production in this country—and the liquidation of the jobs and the economy of the communities dependent upon this segment of the textile industry.

Foreign textile industries and their governments would react unfavorably.

I submit that there is a respectable limitation to this argument. There is a point where we must stop being afraid of other foreign governments, such as Japan, to whom we have poured millions of dollars and the finest and most modern of textile machinery out of the goodness of our heart—only in the end to find Japan fully exploiting her cheap-labor, paid coolie wages, for cutthroat competition against her benefactor—the United States. The point at which we must call a halt to this fear psychology of foreign reaction is that point where we are starting to export American jobs to cheap labor, foreign beneficiary countries.

In short, this bill calls for a method by which to meet this unfair, cheap-labor, cutthroat competition by giving our cotton textile industry the ability to compete for foreign markets. This bill proposes that we export cotton textiles instead of exporting our textile jobs and industry.

There is a point where we must start helping our own people instead of helping the people of foreign countries take jobs away from our own people. We have reached that point and that is the purpose of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the purpose of this act to assist the United States cotton textile industry to reestablish and maintain its fair historical share of the world market in cotton textiles so as to (1) insure the continued existence of such industry, (2) prevent unemployment in such industry, and (3) allow employees in such industry to participate in the high national level of earnings.

SEC. 2. (a) In order to carry out the purpose of this act the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to make available to textile mills in the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and each of the 4 succeeding fiscal years not less than 750,000 bales of surplus cotton owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation at such prices as the Secretary determines will allow the United States cotton textile industry to regain the level of exports of cotton products maintained by it during the period 1947 through 1952. Cotton shall be made available to a textile mill under this act only upon agreement by such mill that such cotton will be used only for the manufacture of cotton products for export.

(b) The Secretary shall announce, not later than September 1 of each year for which surplus cotton is made available under this act, the price at which such cotton is to be made available and thereafter for a period of 30 days shall accept applications from textile mills for the purchase of such surplus cotton. In the event the quantity of cotton for which application is made exceeds the quantity of such cotton made available for distribution under this act, the cotton made available for distribution shall be distributed pro rata among the mills making application therefor on the basis of the quantities of cotton processed by such mills during the 3 calendar years preceding the year for which such distribution is made.

SEC. 3. The Secretary shall promulgate such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. Any person who knowingly sells or offers for sale in the United States any product processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any cotton made available under this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mrs. SMITH of Maine subsequently said: Mr. President, I move that the vote by which Calendar No. 1078, S. 314, was adopted be reconsidered.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted etc., That a right-of-way is hereby granted for a period of 50 years from the date hereof to the city of Alamogordo, a municipal corporation of the State of New Mexico, its successors and assigns, over, through, across, and upon lands of the United States in the Lincoln National Forest, in the State of New Mexico, subject to the conditions herein contained, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of that certain pipeline, and branches thereof, known as the Bonito pipeline, constructed by the El Paso & Rock Island Railway Co., as now located upon the right-of-way granted to said company by the act of Congress of March 4, 1915 (38 U. S. Stat. L. 1195), within sections 4, 7, 8, and 9, township 10 south, range 13 east; section 12, township 10 south, range 12 east; and sections 8, 9, 16, 17 and 21, township 9 south, range 13 east, New Mexico principal meridian, and such additions and extensions as said city of Alamogordo may make thereto, for the purpose of transportation of water for domestic, public, or for any other beneficial uses, together with the right to construct, maintain, use, and occupy the present or additional reservoir sites for the storage of water for such purposes: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may upon abandonment or nonuse of the same for the purpose for which it is granted for a period not less than 1 year declare said right-of-way or any part thereof forfeited and annul the same.

Sec. 5. That the enjoyment of the rights hereby granted shall be subject at all times to all laws relating to the national forests and to all rules and regulations authorized and established thereunder. For infraction of such laws, rules, or regulations the owner or user of such right-of-way shall be subject to all fines and penalties imposed thereby, and shall also be liable in a civil action for all damages that may accrue from such breach.

Sec. 6. That said city of Alamogordo shall continue to maintain the present connections of lines and permit the future connections of lines to and supply water for nearby Department of Agriculture installations and shall continue to maintain the present watering troughs and supply water as at present for the use of animals lawfully grazing upon such national forest or at such other place along said pipeline, in lieu thereof, as the officer in charge of such national forest shall from time to time direct.

SALE OF CERTAIN KEYS IN THE STATE OF FLORIDA

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LANDS TO THE CHARLOTTE RUDLAND DANSIE ASSOCIATION; BILL PLACED AT FOOT OF CALENDAR

The bill (S. 2230) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands to the Charlotte Rudland Dansie Association was announced as next in order.

Mr. TALMADGE. Over, Mr. President, by request.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Georgia state the grounds of the objection?

Mr. TALMADGE. One of the Senators on this side of the aisle I think would request that the bill go over, because his formula for the transfer of property is well known.

Mr. WATKINS. I understand that. I think the Senator, if he were present, would withdraw any objection. This is a request for a transfer of a grave which contains the remains of a pioneer woman who was buried on the way westward over 100 years ago.

Mr. TALMADGE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I yield.

Mr. TALMADGE. Is there a request to transfer anything besides the grave?

Mr. WATKINS. That is all. It is just enough land so that the family can decorate the area. The family wants to decorate and protect the grave of the mother and have placed in the burial area an historical monument honoring the mother and other pioneers.

Mr. TALMADGE. In view of the Senator's explanation, I am happy to withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in view of the precise request filed with us, to the effect that the bill go over, I wonder if the Senator from Utah would be willing to have the bill go to the foot of the calendar, so that we may ascertain if we can arrange to have the request withdrawn. There is a specific request.

Mr. WATKINS. I have no objection to that procedure, but I am sure the objector will not wish to object when he knows the circumstances.

Mr. CLARK. We will undertake to try to get that cleared by the time the foot of the calendar is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Calendar No. 1087, Senate bill 2230, will go to the foot of the calendar.

PRINTING OF COMPILATION OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

The resolution (S. Res. 189) to print a compilation of proposed constitutional amendments for the period of the 2d session of the 69th Congress through the 84th Congress with additional copies was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed as a Senate document a list of proposed amendments to the Constitution of the United States submitted during the 69th Congress, 2d session, through the 84th Congress, as compiled by the Senate Library, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate, and that 1,500 additional copies be printed for the use of the Committee on the Judiciary.

ESTABLISHING OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE MATTERS RELATING TO GROWTH OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CONCURRENT RESOLUTION PLACED AT FOOT OF CALENDAR

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 172) to establish a joint Congressional committee to investigate matters pertaining to the growth and expansion of the District of Columbia and its metropolitan area was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that concurrent resolution? If we do not have, I shall ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I shall be happy to attempt to explain the concurrent resolution to my friend, the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. President, the concurrent resolution would establish a joint committee of six members selected from the membership of the House and Senate committees on the District of Columbia, to make a study of matters pertaining to the growth and expansion of the District of Columbia and its metropolitan area.

The joint committee is charged with reporting its findings not later than January 31, 1959, when the joint committee shall cease to exist.

The Committee on Rules and Administration has amended the measure as it was sent to them from the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, so as to provide that a progress report shall be forthcoming on January 31, 1958.

For expenses to that date, the Committee on Rules and Administration has approved the sum of $50,000, to be paid from the contingent fund.

I may say to my good friend, the Senator from Georgia, that the members of the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, on which I serve, are gravely concerned about the manifold and difficult problems of the proper government of the District of Columbia and its surrounding metropolitan area in Maryland and in Virginia.

Mr. President, there are various problems which confront every one of the large cities of the United States today. Perhaps the most critical problems are faced by the city of New York, because it is the largest city.

I happen to be aware, because of my service as mayor of Philadelphia, of the equally difficult problems our city faces involving the States of Delaware and New Jersey.

In each of the larger cities I have mentioned, Mr. President, steps are now afoot to make studies of the metropolitan area problems, in the hope that some type of governmental organization can be devised—by compact, by the creation of special districts, or by some method of governmental arrangement—so that these metropolitan area problems can be handled politically in such a situation as prevails today in the District of Columbia when it cannot deal with certain problems the State of Virginia cannot deal with them, and the State of Maryland cannot deal with them. These problems overflow the boundaries.

It is the purpose to attempt to bring the best available brainpower possible to work on the program. I hope I have convinced my friend, the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RUSSELL. I may say, Mr. President, that I am not convinced at all. I can see no need whatever for a study to expand the District of Columbia, but if the Senators from Virginia and the Senators from Maryland have no objection, I know of no reason why I should interpose one.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. It is not proposed to expand the District of Columbia at all in any way. It is hoped that we can devise some procedure by which certain problems which have overflowed the District boundaries can be handled more effectively.

Mr. RUSSELL. Just what problems are involved? Does one of them relate to the school system?

Mr. CLARK. I should not think it would relate to the school system. It clearly would relate to problems of transportation, problems of water supply, problems of housing and shelter, and problems of air pollution. There are a whole host of problems which flow across the political boundaries of our great urban communities. There is no one unit of government which is capable of dealing with those problems under the present constitutional system.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. RUSSELL. I understood that the Senator from Pennsylvania had the floor, but I am happy to yield.

Mr. CLARK. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BEALL. I should like to say to the Senator from Georgia, that, as the Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested, this is not a new situation. The District of Columbia faces such problems as have been referred to. In my 15 years of service, it has been my experience that there have been many, many different bodies making surveys, but we on the Congressional committees have no way of coordinating them. What is proposed is a process by which we hope to find out for ourselves what is going on, so that the committees may legislate properly. The proposed survey is purely for legislative purposes, to enable the files to be brought together so that we may know what should be done. There are some very serious highway problems, for instance.

Mr. RUSSELL. At the present time there is certainly no limitation on the ability of the Committee on the District of Columbia to study and to gather material. The Committee on the District of Columbia can be convened and it can put its staff to work and gather statistics and produce recommendations, to be presented to the Senate. We generally pass the measures thus drawn with very little question.

Mr. BEALL. We do not have the staff available to make such a survey. We want to coordinate all the various groups. As the Senator from Pennsylvania has said, there are many groups operating in the surrounding territory, but the committees in both Houses feel that Congress should have a file on just what is going on. There is only one way to accomplish that purpose, and that is to coordinate the bodies in order that the committees may have the information.

Mr. RUSSELL. What bodies does the Senator propose to coordinate?

Mr. BEALL. There are a number of bodies operating in the surrounding area. There is, for example, the Suburban Sanitary Commission, and there are 8 or 10 different Commissions including the National Parks Commission, and a number of others. We do not have the facilities, in the District Committee, to make these investigations. The concurrent resolution was adopted by the House unanimously, and in the Senate District Committee it was agreed that we should have this information in our files.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not think I shall object to the concurrent resolution, but it seems to me odd for a joint committee of the Congress to be investigating areas within the province of the State of Maryland or the State of Virginia. If those two States wish to have the study made, I have no objection.

Mr. BEALL. The two States do not object. They have asked for it. The Maryland Legislature has requested it. A number of cities have joined in the request.

Mr. RUSSELL. In all the larger cities today there is an expansion of metropolitan areas. Many people are moving from the cities to areas outside the corporate limits. It seems to me to be rather unusual to institute such a study at the expense of the American taxpayer, particularly when it involves matters within the States. However, if the States have asked for the study, I will not object.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I should like to ask whether any of the governing bodies in Virginia have been consulted—such as Arlington County or Fairfax County.

Mr. BEALL. It is my understanding that Arlington County and Fairfax County have approved the study.

Mr. BYRD. That may be the Senator's understanding, but is that absolutely correct?

Mr. BEALL. I cannot answer that.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the concurrent resolution be placed at the foot of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the concurrent resolution will be placed at the foot of the calendar.

PRINTING OF ADDITIONAL COPIES OF HEARINGS ENTITLED "INVESTIGATION OF THE FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE UNITED STATES"

The resolution (S. Con. Res. 47) to print additional copies of part 1 and subsequent parts of hearings entitled "Investigation of the Financial Condition of the United States" held by the Committee on Finance during the 85th Congress, 1st session, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Finance 3,000 additional copies of part 1 of the hearings entitled "Investigation of the Financial Condition of the United States," and 5,000 additional copies of part 2 and subsequent parts of said hearings held by that committee during the 85th Congress, 1st session.

INVESTIGATION OF ANTITRUST AND ANTIMONOPOLY LAWS—RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 166) amending Senate Resolution 57, 85th Congress, authorizing an investigation of antitrust and antimonopoly laws and their administration was announced as next in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

PROCUREMENT OF LIKENESSES OF SENATORS FOR SENATE RECEPTION ROOM

The resolution (S. Res. 174) relative to the procurement of likenesses of Senators to be placed in the Senate reception room was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That a commission to consist of the Architect of the Capitol, the Director of the National Gallery of Art, and the Chairman of the Commission on Fine Arts shall, subject to the advice and approval of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, procure appropriate likenesses of the five outstanding Senators who were selected pursuant to Senate Resolution 145, 84th Congress, as amended (S. Rept. No. 279, 85th Cong.), to have their likenesses placed in the reception room in the Capitol outside the Senate Chamber. Such likenesses may be procured either through the purchase, or acceptance as a gift or loan, of appropriate existing likenesses or through the execution of appropriate likenesses by a qualified artist or artists to be selected and employed for such purpose by the Commission.

SEC. 2. The expenses of carrying out the provisions of the first section of this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers signed by the Architect of the Capitol and approved by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO ATTEND MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION IN INDIA

The resolution (S. Res. 177) amending Senate Resolution 160 to appoint a special committee to attend the coming meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in India was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 160, agreed to August 5, 1957, is amended to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Vice President is authorized to appoint four Members of the Senate as a special committee to attend the next general meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association to be held in India on the invitation of the Indian branch of the association, and to designate the chairman of said committee.

"The expenses of the committee, including staff members designated by the chairman to assist the committee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman."

PROHIBITION OF INTRODUCTION OF OCCUPANTS OF THE GALLERIES DURING SESSIONS OF THE SENATE—RESOLUTION PASSED TO FOOT OF THE CALENDAR

The resolution (S. Res. 183) to amend rule XIX so as to prohibit the introduction of occupants of the galleries during the sessions of the Senate was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK. Over, Mr. President.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. CLARK. I am happy to do so.

Mr. BUSH. Is the Senator in a position to state the nature of the objection to this resolution?

Mr. CLARK. It appears to be a precedent—the Senator from Connecticut would know better than I—that no amendment to the Senate rules shall be made on the call of the calendar. That is the only reason.

Mr. BUSH. That is news to me. Is that the sole basis of the objection?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. May we have the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE], the acting majority leader, for a moment?

Mr. BUSH. The resolution has been cleared on this side of the aisle. Most of the sponsors of the resolution are on the other side of the aisle. In fact, one of the distinguished Senators on the other side of the aisle told me that the only way to get such an amendment through was on a call of the calendar.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the rules of the Senate are extremely important, and I do not think they should be amended on the call of the calendar.

Let me say that I wholeheartedly support the resolution, and I hope it will very shortly be approved by the Senate. However, I do not think we should be changing anything so important as a rule of the Senate on the call of the calendar.

Mr. BUSH. Would the Senator be willing to allow the resolution to go to the foot of the calendar?

Mr. TALMADGE. I shall be very happy to have that done. I shall have no objection to the resolution being taken up on motion at the conclusion of the call of the calendar. However, I think it would be an extremely bad precedent to change a rule of the Senate on a call of the calendar. The call of the calendar is supposed to be reserved for the consideration for measures involving no great controversy. I believe it would be establishing a very bad precedent indeed if the Senate started to amend its rules by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUSH. I cannot think of any better way to amend the Senate rules than by unanimous consent. I beg the Senator to reconsider his position. I have consulted with some of my senior colleagues, who have been here longer than either of us. They feel that this is a perfectly proper way to do it.

Mr. TALMADGE. I do not know of a single Senator who is opposed to the resolution. Certainly I am not. However, I am opposed to the policy of changing the rules of the Senate on the call of the calendar. I think the resolution should be passed over, or placed at the foot of the calendar, because a very serious rule change might be made without a great number of Senators knowing that it was even to be discussed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution will be placed at the foot of the calendar.

The clerk will call the next measure on the calendar.

RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 186) increasing the limit of expenditures for the Select Committee on Improper Activities in Labor or Management Field was announced as next in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 191) amending S. Res. 52, 85th Congress, authorizing an investigation of juvenile delinquency in the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 192) to extend the Subcommittee on Disarmament until January 31, 1958, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Over, by request.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. PURTELL. I shall be happy to withhold my objection.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], who is chairman of the subcommittee, is not in the Chamber at the moment. However, this resolution was reported unanimously, I believe, from the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. It had the approval of the Department of State. It was felt advisable that this subcommittee remain in operation, in view of the fact that a disarmament conference is being held in London at the present time.

Can the Senator throw any light on the subject?

Mr. PURTELL. The resolution is being passed over by request. I understand that it will be taken up on motion tomorrow, and at that time there will be no objection from the calendar committee of the minority.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, with reference to Calendar No. 1099, Senate Resolution 186, to which the Senator from Connecticut objected by request, is the Senator prepared to disclose the source of the request?

Mr. PURTELL. I have been reluctant in the past, and I am reluctant today, to divulge the source of the request that any measure be passed over. I have consulted with the Senator who has asked me to have the resolution go over. It is my understanding that Calendar Nos. 1099, 1100, and 1101, which are, respectively, Senate Resolutions 186, 191, and 192, will be taken up tomorrow on motion, at which time there will be some debate. I know of no great opposition to the approval of the resolutions.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL JUDGE FOR JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7785) to provide for the appointment of an additional judge for the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, in my capacity as a member of the calendar committee, I am forced to ask that this bill be passed over, by request.

However, inasmuch as the bill was reported from the subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia of which I am chairman, and inasmuch as I am very much in favor of passage of the bill, I should like to make that fact clear in the RECORD. I hope the leadership will be willing to have the bill taken up on motion some time during the course of the week, so that the desperately needed additional judge on the Juvenile Court for the District of Columbia can be provided before the Congress adjourns. The House has already passed a bill providing for the additional judge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 253) to establish a commission to commemorate the 100th Anniversary of the Civil War, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PURTELL. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

SITE FOR NEW SIBLEY MEMORIAL HOSPITAL—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8918) to further amend the act of August 7, 1946 (60 Stat. 896), as amended by the act of October 25, 1951 (65 Stat. 657), to provide for the exchange of lands of the United States as a site for the new Sibley Memorial Hospital; to provide for the transfer of the property of the Hahnemann Hospital of the District of Columbia, formerly the National Homeopathic Association, a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, to the Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School for Deaconesses and Missionaries, including Sibley Memorial Hospital, a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TALMADGE. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement for the RECORD with respect to Calendar No. 1107, House bill 8918. It has been passed over by request. The bill, which was unanimously approved by the Committee on the District of Columbia, would permit one of our fine hospitals to occupy a new site in the District.

Extensive hearings were held by the subcommittee headed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. I hope the leadership will be able to have the bill taken up on motion before the Congress adjourns at the end of the week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2531) to authorize the conveyance of certain lands within Old Hickory lock and dam project, Tennessee, to Middle Tennessee Council, Boy Scouts, was announced as next in order.

TRANSFER OF SHELBY COUNTY FROM BEAUMONT TO TYLER DIVISION OF EASTERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS

The bill (H. R. 2136) to amend section 124 (c) of title 28 of the United States Code so as to transfer Shelby County from the Beaumont to the Tyler division of the eastern district of Texas was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSON OF TEXAS

H. R. 2136, which is identical to a bill I introduced in the Senate, provides for the transfer of Shelby County in Texas from the Beaumont to the Tyler division of the eastern judicial district of Texas.

This change is supported by everyone concerned with the operation of the courts, both locally and nationally, and there are no objections.

The purpose of the change is to make more convenient the trial of suits arising in Shelby County affecting litigants, lawyers, and witnesses. Beaumont division is geographically much further from the seat of Shelby County than is the district court of Tyler. This change will take cognizance of and correct these inconvenient circumstances.

The legislation is supported by the Judicial Conference, the fifth circuit, the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, and the bar associations.

I urge its passage by the Senate.

KNOX CORP., THOMSON, GA.

The bill (H. R. 2904) for the relief of the Knox Corp., of Thomson, Ga., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. TALMADGE. I shall be glad to give an explanation of it, unless the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary would like to make it.

Mr. EASTLAND. No; the Senator from Georgia may give the explanation.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, the bill would pay $7,809 to a construction corporation in Georgia as reimbursement for commitment fees paid by it in connection with two proposed large-scale housing projects to be completed under the laws relating to the Federal Housing Administration.

The company initiated the projects after being solicited to do so by the Federal Housing Administration on the basis of what was stated to be a need for such housing for minority groups. Due to certain limitations placed by Congress on the maximum amounts of mortgage insurance available for this purpose, the applications were initially rejected but the company was encouraged to continue with the program. Ultimately, after the company had gone to considerable expense in obtaining options on property and negotiating subcontracts for the construction, as well as having carried out certain other preliminary work, it was informed that new applications based on the Housing Act of 1954 would have to be submitted. The company was unable to meet the requirements of the new legislation, nor was it economically feasible at that time to continue with the project and, accordingly, the old applications were canceled by the Government agency and the commitment fees, in accordance with the original contract, were withheld from the contractor.

The committee believes that the construction company is entitled to this refund because the circumstances indicate that the rules were changed in the middle of the game, so to speak, and that the company should not bear the entire loss in this case.

The committee recognizes that, insofar as it can be determined, this bill creates a precedent but, on the other hand, the committee feels that it would be extremely unlikely that such a situation would arise again.

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Georgia for the explanation. I have no objection to passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 2, line 1, after the word "Act", to strike out "in excess of 10 per centum thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, there is pending before the Committee on the Judiciary House Joint Resolution 351, to establish a Lincoln sesquicentennial commission. The joint resolution is similar to Senate Joint Resolution 98. In view of the fact that Congress may adjourn this week, and the fact that House Joint Resolution 351 has been passed by the House, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 351 and that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House joint resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 351) to establish a Lincoln sesquicentennial commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Committee on the Judiciary is discharged from the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 351. Is there objection to the present consideration of the House joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared on the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR COOPER

There is presently pending before the Committee on the Judiciary House Joint Resolution 351 to establish a Lincoln sesquicentennial commission, similar to Senate Joint Resolution 98, which is now before the Senate for consideration. In view of the fact that the Congress may adjourn this week and the fact that House Joint Resolution 351 has passed the House, I therefore move that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of House Joint Resolution 351 and that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

On June 6, 1957, I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 98, being joined in sponsorship with Senators MORTON, of Kentucky; CAPEHART and JENNER, of Indiana, and DOUGLAS and DIRKSEN, of Illinois. I desire to express my appreciation of the action taken by the Judiciary Committee and particularly the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator O'MAHONEY, reporting favorably to the Senate the Senate Resolution 98 which would create a Lincoln sesquicentennial commission. I am sure I speak for my cosponsors when I say that all of us have a great interest in speedy action on a resolution which would establish the Lincoln sesquicentennial commission. But it is important that the Congress take action at this session so that the Commission will have time to prepare for the celebration in 1959, of the 150th birthday of Abraham Lincoln. It is for this reason that I ask that the resolution which I introduced with my cosponsors be postponed and that the House resolution be passed.

The House resolution was introduced by Congressman F. J. NIMTZ, of Indiana upon request of the Lincoln group of the District of Columbia, an organiztaion which for years has kept alive the memory and tradition of Abraham Lincoln. Both the House and Senate resolutions had the support of many organizations and groups throughout the United States. I am particularly glad that the people of my own State—Kentucky—in which Abraham Lincoln was born. have been very anxious that the Congress take appropriate steps to prepare for the celebration of the birth of Kentucky's and the Nation's greatest son.

The House resolution would establish a commission, to be composed of 28 members—the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, as ex officio members; 6 members of the House to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives; 6 Members of the Senate to be appointed by the President of the Senate; 12 public members to be appointed by the President of the United States, and the Director of the National Park Service or his representative.

The Commission is authorized to give appropriate consideration to plans advanced by State, civic, historical, or similar groups, and it may designate special committees with representation from these bodies to plan and conduct specific ceremonies.

In order to minimize the cost to the Federal Government, the Commission is authorized to accept donations of money, property or personal services. It is contemplated that it will make maximum use of such facilities and services as may be offered to it by appropriate agencies and groups.

The Commission is to submit a report to the Congress, presenting its preliminary plans not later than March 1, 1958, and the resolution would authorize not to exceed the sum of $10,000 for the expenses of the Commission.

As I have said, the proposal to establish a Lincoln sesquicentennial commission has a wide range of support, including statements in support from the Vice President of the United States, Governor Sherman Adams, Assistant to the President of the United States, the Librarian of Congress, and many State and civic bodies.

It is believed that by the creation of this commission there would be attached greater significance to the celebration of the 150th anniversary of Lincoln's birth than otherwise would be the case. It would give official government recognition to Lincoln's anniversary, and furthermore, it would enable planning on a national scale to commence at once.

I therefore hope the Senate will act favorably on House Joint Resolution 351.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I was the chairman of the subcommittee which considered Senate Joint Resolution 98, introduced by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], to establish a commission to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln.

I wish the RECORD to show that the subcommittee was in unanimous agreement on the Senate joint resolution and for the substitution of the House joint resolution therefor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 351) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate Joint Resolution 98 is indefinitely postponed.

AMENDMENT OF LIFE INSURANCE ACT AND FIRE AND CASUALTY ACT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1040) to amend the acts known as the Life Insurance Act, approved June 19, 1934, and the Fire and Casualty Act, approved October 9, 1940, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment, at the end of the bill to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 11. Where any provision of this act or any amendment made by this act refers to an office or agency abolished by Reorganization Plan No. 5 of 1952 (66 Stat. 824), such provision or amendment shall be deemed to refer to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or to the office, officer, or agency which the Commissioners have heretofore designated or may hereafter designate to perform the functions of the office or agency so abolished.

The Superintendent may, however, satisfy himself by such investigation as he may deem proper or necessary that such company is duly qualified under the laws of the District to transact business therein, and may refuse to issue or renew any such certificate to a company if the issuance or renewal of such certificate would adversely affect the public interest. In each case the certificate shall be issued under the seal of the Superintendent, authorizing and empowering the company to transact the kind or kinds of business specified in the certificate, and each such certificate shall be made to expire on the 30th day of April next succeeding the date of its issuance. No company shall transact any business or insurance in or from the District until it shall have received a certificate of authority as authorized by this section and no company shall transact any business of insurance not specified in such certificate of authority."

"(b) is insolvent;

"(c) is in such a condition that its further transaction of business in the District would be hazardous to its policyholders or creditors or to the public;

"(d) has refused or neglected to pay a valid final judgment against such company within 30 days after such judgment shall have become final either by expiration without appeal within the time when such appeal might have been perfected, or by final affirmance on appeal;

"(f) has refused to submit its books, papers, accounts, records, or affairs to the reasonable inspection or examination of the Superintendent, his deputies, or duly appointed examiners;

"(k) has made, issued, circulated, or caused to be issued or circulated any estimate, illustration, circular, or statement of any sort misrepresenting either its status or the terms of any policy issued or to be issued by it, or the benefits or advantages promised thereby, or the dividends or shares of the surplus to be received thereon, or has used any name or title of any policy or class of policies misrepresenting the true nature thereof.

"The Superintendent shall not revoke or suspend the certificate of authority of any company until he has given the company not less than 30 days' notice of the proposed revocation or suspension and of the grounds alleged therefor, and has afforded the company an opportunity for a full hearing: Provided, That if the Superintendent shall find upon examination that the further transaction of business by the company would be hazardous to the public or to the policyholders or creditors of the company in the District, he may suspend such authority without giving notice as herein required: Provided further, That in lieu of revoking or suspending the certificate of authority of any company for causes enumerated in this section, after hearing as herein provided, the Superintendent may subject such company to a penalty of not more than $200 when in his judgment he finds that the public interest would be best served by the continued operation of the company. Before the Superintendent of Insurance shall revoke or suspend the license of any such person he shall give to such person an opportunity to be fully heard, and to introduce evidence in his behalf. Within 30 days after the revocation or suspension of license or the refusal of the Superintendent to grant a license, the general agent, agent, solicitor, or broker, or applicant aggrieved may appeal from the ruling of the Superintendent of Insurance to the court of competent jurisdiction designated in section 28. Appeals may be taken from the judgment of said court as prescribed in section 28. At any hearing provided by this section, the Superintendent shall have authority to administer oaths to witnesses. Anyone testifying falsely after having been administered such an oath shall be subject to the penalties of perjury.

"Any person who violates any provision of this section upon conviction shall be fined not exceeding $100 for each and every violation: Provided, That in lieu of revoking or suspending the license of any such general agent, agent, solicitor, or broker for causes enumerated in this section after hearing as herein provided, the Superintendent may subject such person to a penalty of not more than $200 when in his judgment he finds that the public interest would be best served by the continuation of the license of such person. The amount of any such penalty shall be paid by such person through the office of the Superintendent to the Collector of Taxes of the District of Columbia."

"No such contract covering persons, property, business activities, or insurable interests in the District, except contracts of title and ocean marine insurance, shall be written, issued, or delivered by any authorized company or by any of its representatives unless such contract is duly countersigned in writing by a person who is licensed as provided in this act to countersign such contracts, and no salaried officer, manager, or other salaried employee of any authorized company, unless he be licensed as provided in this act, shall write, issue, or countersign any such contract.

"No company, agent, or salaried company employee shall make any agreement as to a policy other than that which is plainly expressed in the policy issued.

"No company, agent, salaried company employee, or broker shall pay or offer to pay or allow as an inducement to any person to insure any rebate of premium or any special favor or advantage whatever in the dividends to accrue thereon, or any inducement whatever not specified in the policy.

"Every company authorized by this act to do business in the District shall file annually with the Superintendent on or before the 15th day of April, and at such other times as they may be appointed, a list of agents and salaried employees of said company who are authorized to solicit, write, effect, issue, or deliver policies for such company in the District, except that the names of soliciting agents may be filed either by the company or by the policy-writing agent.

"Any policy-writing agent or salaried company employee authorized by any company to solicit, negotiate, bind, write, or issue policies or applications therefor shall, in any controversy between the insured or his representative and the said company, be held to be the agent of the company which issued or effected the policy solicited or so applied for, anything in the application or policy to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Any payment made by or on behalf of the insured to any broker for policies issued to such broker for delivery to the insured or issued directly to the insured on the order of such broker, shall, in controversies between the insured and the company, be deemed to have been paid to the company.

"No soliciting agent shall have any authority to countersign any policy."

Any person hereafter desiring to engage in business in the District as a policy-writing agent, soliciting agent, broker, or salaried company employee, as defined by this act shall, before engaging in such business secure from the Superintendent a license authorizing him to engage in such business. The person to whom the license may be issued shall file sworn answers to such interrogatories as the Superintendent may require. Before the Superintendent shall issue or renew a license to any policy-writing agent, soliciting agent, or salaried company employee, he shall require the company or policy-writing agent desiring the appointment of such person to certify—

"(a) that the person to be appointed, if not a salaried company employee, is a resident of this District, or that his principal office for the conduct of such business is in or will be maintained in the District;

"(b) that he is personally known to the person making the certification;

"(c) that he has had experience or instructions necessary to the proper conduct of the kind or kinds of business to which the license is to extend;

"(d) that he has a good business reputation, is trustworthy, and is worthy of a license.

"Resident and nonresident brokers shall, as a prerequisite to the issuance of a license file with the Superintendent a corporate surety bond in an amount not less than $1.000 for the benefit of any person who may suffer loss resulting from fraud or dishonesty on the part of said resident or nonresident broker. Before the Superintendent shall issue a license to any policy-writing agent, soliting agent, salaried company employee, or resident broker, who has not previously been licensed under this act, he shall personally, or through his deputy or any person regularly employed in the department, within a reasonable time, and in a designated place within the District, subject each such person to a personal written examination relating to such person's knowledge of the kind or kinds of business to which the license may extend and his competency to act as such policy-writing agent, soliciting agent, broker, or salaried company employee. The Superintendent may in his discretion limit the scope of such examination to such particular kind or kinds of business in which the person to be licensed is to be principally engaged. The Superintendent shall issue or renew such license as may be applied for when he is satisfied that the person to be licensed is (a) competent and trustworthy and intends to act in good faith in the capacity involved by the license applied for, and that not more than 25 percent of his commission income from business to which the license applies will result from policies the premiums on which are paid or are to be paid in the manner set forth in paragraph (f) of section 36, and (b) that he has a good business reputation and has had experience, training, or education, or is otherwise qualified in the line or lines of business in which the license would entitle him to engage, and, except in the case of a nonresident broker or salaried company employee, is a resident of the District, or maintains his principal office for the conduct of such business in the District; and (c) is reasonably familiar with the insurance laws of the District, and with the provisions, terms, and conditions of the policies he is proposing to solicit, negotiate, or effect, and is worthy of a license. In the case of a nonresident applying for a broker's license, the Superintendent may waive the examination requirement and accept in lieu thereof evidence that the applicant holds a license as broker or agent in the State where his principal business is conducted. The Superintendent may also waive the examination requirement in the case of any person who has been licensed in the District prior to the effective date of this act. The examination requirement shall be waived in the case of any applicant for a license under this section who holds a license under section 26 of the Life Insurance Act (D. C. Code, sec. 35–425), if the company desiring the appointment of such applicant certifies in writing to the Superintendent that such applicant will solicit only accident and health insurance on its behalf. Licenses may be issued in the names of individuals, or in the names of firms, partnerships, or corporations, including banks, trust companies, real-estate offices, and building and loan associations: Provided, That on such licenses in addition to the name of the applicant, there shall be listed the name of every member or officer of such firm, partnership, or corporation who solicits insurance or who countersigns policies: Provided further, That such named persons as well as the licensee shall be subject to all requirements of this act, and that the Superintendent shall have authority at any time to require the applicant fully to disclose the identity of all stockholders, partners, officers, and employees, and he may in his discretion refuse to issue or renew a license in the name of any firm, partnership, or corporation if he is not satisfied that any officer, employee, stockholder, or partner thereof who may materially influence the applicant's conduct, meets the standards of this section applicable to persons applying as individuals. No person shall be licensed as agent, broker, or salaried company employee when it appears to the Superintendent that said license is sought primarily for the purpose of obtaining commissions on policies on which he, on his own account, pays, or is to pay, the premiums, or on which the premiums are paid or are to be paid by any person who receives or is to receive any benefit, direct or indirect, from the commissions obtained, or on which the premiums are paid or are to be paid by any partnership, association, or corporation of which he is a member."

Sec. 7. That section 35 of chapter II of the Fire and Casualty Act (sec. 35–1339, D. C. Code, 1951 edition) is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 35. Upon application for renewal of an expiring license and the payment of the applicable fee prescribed in section 41, the Superintendent shall issue the license applied for when he is satisfied that the applicant therefor meets the conditions set forth in sections 32 and 36. Before the Superintendent shall refuse to renew any such license he shall give to the applicant an opportunity to be fully heard and to introduce evidence in his behalf. If the Superintendent shall refuse to renew any such license he shall give the applicant written notice thereof and he shall not, for a period of 10 days from the date of that notice, take any action to stop the applicant from continuing in business, within which period the applicant may apply to any court as provided in section 45 hereof, for leave, in the discretion of the court, to continue in business until an appeal from such refusal is decided."

SEC. 8. That section 36 of chapter II of the Fire and Casualty Act (sec. 35–1340, D. C. Code, 1951 edition) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 36. The Superintendent may revoke or suspend the license of any policy-writing agent, soliciting agent, broker, or salaried company employee when and if, after investigation, it appears to the Superintendent that any license issued to such person was obtained by fraud or misrepresentation, or that such person has otherwise shown himself untrustworthy or incompetent to act in any of the foregoing capacities, or that such person has—

"(a) violated any of the provisions of the insurance laws of the District; or

"(b) has failed within a reasonable time to remit to any company all moneys which he has collected, and to which the company is entitled; or

"(c) has been guilty of rebating or has misrepresented the provisions of the policies which he is selling, or the policies of other companies; or

"(d) has countersigned policies in blank; or that

"(e) more than 25 percent of his commission income from business to which the license applies results from policies the premiums on which are paid or are to be paid in the manner set forth in paragraph (f) of this section; or that

"(f) said license is being used primarily for the purpose of obtaining commissions on policies on which he, on his own account, pays or is to pay the premiums, or on which the premiums are paid to or are to be paid by any person who receives or is to receive any benefit, direct or indirect, from the commissions obtained, or on which the premiums are paid or are to be paid by any partnership, association, or corporation of which he is a member.

"Before the Superintendent shall revoke or suspend the license of any such person he shall give to such person an opportunity to be fully heard, and to introduce evidence in his behalf: Provided, That in lieu of revoking or suspending the license of any policy-writing agent, soliciting agent, broker, or salaried company employee for causes enumerated in this section after hearing as herein provided, the Superintendent may subject such person to a penalty of not more than $200 when in his judgment he finds that public interest would be best served by the continued operation of such person. The amount of any such penalty shall be paid by such person through the office of the Superintendent to the Collector of Taxes, District of Columbia. At any hearing provided by this section, the Superintendent shall have authority to administer oaths to witnesses. Anyone testifying falsely after having been administered such an oath shall be subject to the penalties of perjury."

SEC. 9. That section 38 of chapter II of the Fire and Casualty Act (sec. 35–1342, D. C. Code, 1951 edition) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 38. The provisions of this act relating to the licensing of policy-writing agents, soliciting agents, salaried company employees, and brokers shall not apply to the sale of personal accident insurance in the ticket offices of railroad companies or other common carriers, or in the offices of travel bureaus, nor to the business of ocean marine insurance, nor to insurance covering the property of railroad companies and other common carriers engaged in interstate commerce."

SEC. 10. That section 39 of chapter II of the Fire and Casualty Act (sec. 35–1343, D. C. Code, 1951 edition) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 39. Except as provided in section 40, no person shall act as agent in the District for any company which is not authorized to do business in the District, nor shall any person directly or indirectly negotiate for or solicit applications for policies of, or for membership in, any company which is not authorized to do business in the District. The term 'company' as used in this section shall include any association, society, company, corporation, joint-stock company, individual, partnership, trustee, or receiver engaged in the business of assuming risks of insurance, surety, or indemnity, and any Lloyd's organization, assessment, or cooperative fire company, or any reciprocal or interinsurance exchange, and any company, association, or society, whether organized for profit or not, conducting a business, including any of the principles or features of insurance, surety, or indemnity. Any person who violates any provision of this section upon conviction shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000 for each offense, or be imprisoned for not more than 12 months, or both, and any such person shall be personally liable to any resident of the District having claim against any such unauthorized company under any policy which said person has solicited or negotiated, or has aided in soliciting or negotiating: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any person who negotiates with an unauthorized company for policies covering his own property or interests, nor shall the provisions of this section apply to the officers, agents, or representatives of any company which is in process of organization under the laws of the District, and which is authorized temporarily to solicit or secure memberships or applications for policies for the purpose of completing such organization. Prosecutions for violations of this section shall be upon information filed in the municipal court for the District of Columbia by the corporation counsel or any of his assistants."

SEC. 11. Where any provision of this act or any amendment made by this act refers to an office or agency abolished by Reorganization Plan No. 5 of 1952 (66 Stat. 824), such provision or amendment shall be deemed to refer to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia or to the office, officer, or agency which the Commissioners have heretofore designated or may hereafter designate to perform the functions of the office or agency so abolished.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN FEMALE MEMBERS OF THE AIR FORCE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3028) to provide for the relief of certain female members of the Air Force, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, with an amendment, and subsequently reported from the Committee on Armed Services with an additional amendment.

The amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 2, after line 22, to insert:

SEC. 4. The Career Compensation Act of 1940, as amended (37 U. S. C. 231 et seq.), is further amended by adding the following new section at the end thereof:

"§ 534. Regulations affecting pay and allowances.

"No regulation under this act, or any other law relating to pay and allowances of military personnel, shall be prescribed by the Secretary of a military department within the Department of Defense, relating to the pay and allowances of members of the Armed Forces under such military department, unless such regulation be first approved under procedures prescribed by the Secretary of Defense. Regulations of the Secretaries of the Treasury, Commerce, and Health, Education, and Welfare, which relate to similar items of pay and allowances authorized for members of the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service, shall, to the extent practicable, agree with regulations so approved. Nothing in this section shall prevent the Secretary of Defense or the Secretaries of the Treasury, Commerce, and Health, Education, and Welfare from securing from the Comptroller General an advisory ruling with respect to a proposed regulation especially affecting the department or departments under such Secretary's jurisdiction."

SEC. 5. The analysis to the Career Compensation Act of 1949, as amended, is amended by adding the following new section caption:

"§ 534. Regulations affecting pay and allowances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Armed Services, was, on page 2, line 23, in the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, after the word "of", to strike out "1940" and insert "1949."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LAND TO THE STATE OF TEXAS

The bill (S. 41) to direct the Secretary of the Navy or his designee to convey a 2,477.43-acre tract of land, avigation and sewer easement, in Tarrant and Wise Counties, Tex., situated about 20 miles northwest of the city of Fort Worth, Tex., to the State of Texas was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TALMADGE. Did not my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] obtain unanimous consent a few moments ago to recommit Calendar No. 1140 to the Committee on Finance?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the senior Senator from Georgia secured unanimous consent to recommit House bill 1140 to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TALMADGE. I thank the Chair. It is H. R. 1140 that was recommitted; not Calendar No. 1140. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Is there objection to the present consideration of Calendar 1141, S. 41?

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I understand that H. R. 499, an identical House bill, is now at the desk. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be substituted in lieu of the Senate bill. I also ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] be printed immediately prior to action on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, S. 41 would authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to convey a 2,400-acre tract of land about 20 miles from Fort Worth, Tex., to the State of Texas for the purpose of National and Air National Guard military training.

The legislation is in conformity with a number of other bills which have passed the Congress transferring land for National Guard uses. I am confident that it meets all the standards and formulas governing such conveyances.

All mineral rights are reserved to the United States. Any benefit from the land must be used for maintaining and improving the properties for military training by the National Guard and in the event of a national emergency the United States has the right of recapture. In addition, if the land ceases to be used for National Guard purposes, it reverts to the United States.

Upon the transfer of this land, which is without monetary consideration, it would be the obligation of the State to maintain the land and its facilities for current military training purposes and for future national emergency uses in the event such arise. I urge favorable action by the Senate on this bill.

An identical bill, H. R. 499, is at the desk. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of H. R. 499, and upon its passage by the Senate, that S. 41 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement by the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], which the Senator from Georgia requested to have printed in the RECORD, will be so printed.

The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHNSON

S. 41, and the identical House-passed bill H. R. 499, which is at the desk, provide for a transfer of a tract of land to the State of Texas for the purpose of National and Air National Guard military training. The tract lies about 20 miles from Fort Worth and consists of approximately 2,477 acres.

While the bill provides for no monetary consideration, it meets the standard formulas for Federal land transfer legislation in every respect. Mineral rights are reserved to the United States and if the land is not used for military purposes it will revert to the Federal Government.

The State assumes the obligation to maintain and operate the properties for current military training, and for use in the event of a national emergency by the Federal Government. The bill is similar to many others which have passed Congress for National Guard training purposes and I sincerely urge favorable action by the Senate on the bill at this time.

Mr. WATKINS. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to the bill, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the bill does not involve any monetary consideration. A few moments ago objection was raised to a bill, in which I am interested, to convey 1¼ acres of land to be maintained as an historical monument and a grave for a pioneer woman. I understand that the bill was passed over on the objection of a Senator who maintains that the so-called Morse formula applies.

I understand the pending bill is to serve a very good purpose, in transferring land to the State of Texas, but I cannot understand why no objection was made to it by the calendar committee for and and in behalf of the same Senator.

Mr. TALMADGE. I understand that the senior Senator from Oregon makes an exemption in the conveyance of land when the land is to be used for military purposes.

Mr. WATKINS. The land I asked to be transferred would come under the Recreation and Public Purpose Act of 1954 and the Federal Property and Administrative Service Act, both of which permit conveyances without compensation where the property is to be used for historic monument purposes for the benefit of the general public.

I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill which has been stated as being next in order, but I call attention to the fact that it seems unfair to make an exception in a similar case and let it be adopted while the other bill is rejected.

Mr. TALMADGE. I am sure the Senator from Utah recognizes the fact that it is the duty of the Calendar Committee to register an objection to the consideration of a measure when a Member of the Senate from this side of the aisle requests that such an objection be made.

I am perfectly satisfied about the bill of the Senator from Utah. His explanation of it was entirely satisfactory insofar as the junior Senator from Georgia is concerned. But I cannot speak for the senior Senator from Oregon.

Mr. WATKINS. I wondered whether the Senator from Georgia had received an objection from the senior Senator from Oregon to the conveyance to the State of Texas of more than 2,000 acres of land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BIBLE in the chair). The Senator from Georgia has asked unanimous consent to have House bill 499 considered at this time.

The Chair now lays before the Senate the bill (H. R. 499) to direct the Secretary of the Navy or his designee to convey a 2,477.43-acre tract of land, avigation, and sewer easement, in Tarrant and Wise Counties, Tex., situated about 20 miles northwest of the city of Fort Worth, Tex., to the State of Texas.

The bill was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the House bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 499) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 41 is indefinitely postponed.

RANK OF COMMANDING GENERAL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA MILITIA

The bill (H. R. 4144) to provide that the commanding general of the militia of the District of Columbia shall hold the rank of brigadier general or major general was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FURNISHING OF HERALDIC SERVICES

The bill (H. R. 896) to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to furnish heraldic services was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8576) to authorize the conveyance of certain lands within the Old Hickory lock and dam project, Cumberland River, Tenn., to Middle Tennessee Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America, for recreation and camping purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. TALMADGE. Over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

SUBMISSION OF PLAN FOR FUTURE CONTROL OF THE MENOMINEE TRIBE

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6322) to provide that the dates for submission of plan for future control of property of the Menominee Tribe shall be delayed, which had been reported from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act entitled "An act to provide for a per capita distribution of Menominee tribal funds and authorize the withdrawal of the Menominee Tribe from Federal jurisdiction," approved June 17, 1954, as amended, is further amended as follows:

(a) Section 6 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. The tribe is authorized to select and retain the services of qualified management specialists, including tax consultants, for the purpose of studying industrial programs on the Menominee Reservation and making such reports or recommendations, including appraisals of Menominee tribal property, as may be desired by the tribe, and to make other studies and reports as may be deemed necessary and desirable by the tribe in connection with the termination of Federal supervision as provided for hereinafter. Such reports shall be completed not later than December 31, 1958. Such specialists are to be retained under contracts entered into between them and authorized representatives of the tribe, subject to approval by the Secretary. Such amounts of Menominee tribal funds as may be required for this purpose shall be made available by the Secretary. In order to reimburse the tribe, in part, for expenditures of such tribal funds as the Secretary deems necessary for the purposes of carrying out the requirements of this section, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to one-half of such expenditures from tribal funds, or the sum of $275,000, whichever is the lesser amount."

(b) Section 7 is amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 7. The tribe shall as soon as possible and in no event later than December 31, 1958, formulate and submit to the Secretary a plan for the future control of the tribal property and service functions now conducted by or under the supervision of the United States, including but not limited to services in the fields of health, education, welfare, credit, roads, and law and order and for all other matters involved in the withdrawal of Federal supervision. The Secretary is authorized to provide such reasonable assistance as may be requested by officials of the tribe in the formulation of the plan heretofore referred to, including necessary consultations with representatives of Federal departments and agencies, officials of the State of Wisconsin and political subdivisions thereof, and members of the tribe. The Secretary shall accept such tribal plan as the basis for the conveyance of the tribal property if he finds that it will treat with reasonable equity all members on the final roll of the tribe prepared pursuant to section 3 of this act, and that it conforms to applicable Federal and State law. In the event the tribe fails to submit a plan approvable under the terms of this act by December 31, 1958, the Secretary shall cause such a plan to be prepared and submitted to the tribe within 3 months thereafter. The tribe shall thereafter have 3 months within which to accept the plan of the Secretary or to submit to the Secretary tribal proposals for modification. If the Menominee Tribe and the Secretary cannot agree upon a plan within the aforementioned 6 months period, the Secretary shall within the following 6 months transfer the tribal property to a trustee of his choice for management or disposition for the benefit of the Menominee Tribe. The responsibility of the United States to furnish all such supervision and services to the tribe and to the members thereof, because of their status as Indians, shall cease on December 31, 1960, or on such earlier date as may be agreed upon by the tribe and the Secretary. The plan shall contain provision for protection of the forest on a sustained-yeld basis and for the protection of the water, soil, fish, and wildlife. To the extent necessary, the plan shall provide for such terms of transfer pursuant to section 8 of this act, by trust or otherwise, as shall insure the continued fulfillment of the plan. The Secretary, after approving the plan, shall cause the plan to be published in the Federal Register. The sustained-yield management requirement contained in this act, and the possible selection of a trustee in the event of a tribal planning default, shall not be construed by any court to impose a financial liability on the United States."

(c) Section 8 is amended by striking out "December 31, 1958," where it appears, and by inserting in lieu thereof "December 31, 1960."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, during the call of the calendar, Calendar No. 1072, Senate bill 2107, was passed. I am now advised that there is at the desk an identical House bill, being House bill 7636.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Florida withhold his request regarding that bill until action has been completed on the pending measure, House bill 6322?

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to be heard on Calendar No. 1146?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Action on Calendar No. 1146, House bill 6322, has not yet been completed.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I may say that the Menominee Tribe in my State, supported by the Wisconsin Legislature, State officers, and other interested citizens and State organizations, believe that more time is needed by the Menominees to put their house in order, prior to the removal of Federal control over their affairs.

This bill, although slightly different from the one I introduced, requires a per capita distribution of the funds, as well as distribution of the property controlled by the tribe. The bill also extends the date for the termination of Federal control. But it is believed that by the time allowed, the Menominees would not have time to set up the machinery for the control and management of their affairs.

Under the bill reported by the Senate committee, however, the time for submitting the plan under which these Indians will assume control of their own assets has been extended only to December 1, 1958, instead of to 1959. The 1958 date is a deadline which the tribe felt it could not meet.

The bill passed by the House of Representatives extends the time for the submission of a plan of tribal control to December 31, 1959. But House bill 6322 calls for a 1958 date.

Therefore, I propose that House bill 6322 be amended so as to extend the time for the submission of a plan of control for the Menominee Indians to December 31, 1959, as originally proposed in the bill. The amendment would strike out the date "December 31, 1958", where it appears in sections 6 and 7 of the bill, and would insert in lieu thereof "December 31, 1959."

I urge that the bill be amended in this way, and, as thus amended, be passed.

Mr. President, I have been over a portion of the reservation. There is some very fine standing timber there. Many persons would like to get their hands on the timber. I have received telegrams and letters from bankers and businessmen and others who say that in the interest of preserving the rights of the Indians, the bill should be amended accordingly.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Has the Senator's amendment been cleared with the committee? Does it have committee approval?

Mr. WILEY. No. The amendment has not been cleared, although I will say there was considerable testimony before the committee at its last session, which was held just a few days ago.

This matter involves nothing of any significance, except to protect these wards of the Government. So, when they ask for it, and when other people in the community ask for it—in other words, that the date be changed from 1958 to 1959—it seems to me that when a Senator from the State asks that that be done in the interest of those people, and when that Senator knows the situation and the facts, there should be no hesitancy. No one can be prejudiced.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I am afraid I shall object—I must tell my distinguished friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, that the members of the Majority Calendar Committee are under obligation not to agree to any floor amendment which has not been approved by the committee which reported the bill.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will understand when I ask that the bill go over and that his amendment be considered by the committee.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in the last few days I have seen the Senate take action on bills about which I thought there was serious question.

On the other hand, when the Indians want another year to be allowed—another year for the submission of the plans—when they want to continue as wards of the Government for another year, so that others cannot cheat them out of their assets, it would seem to me that there would be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that in the case of all other bills, the amendments were either cleared by the committee or were considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I regret that I was not on the floor when the Senator from Wisconsin raised the question about the termination date.

I should like to point out that the Indian Affairs Subcommittee was merely following the view of the Department of the Interior when it adopted the language with respect to the final date for submitting the report and terminating Federal supervision.

I have before me a letter which I received under date of August 12, from Mr. Hatfield Chilson, the Under Secretary of the Interior, who was then Acting Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary has said:

> We believe that the extended time limits should be one year for submitting an acceptable plan (making the date December 31, 1958), and 2 years for final termination of the Federal trust (making it December 31, 1960).

In view of all these circumstances, I submit that the Secretary and the Department have submitted what I believe to be a reasonable time limit for extending this period.

I notice that the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Watkins] is on the floor. He has been conversant with this problem far longer than I have. He has much experience regarding it. If I am not mistaken, I believe he was one of the Members of the Senate, if not the leading Member of the Senate, who helped to pioneer some of these termination plans.

I wonder what his attitude is with respect to this particular controversy.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. WATKINS. I merely wish to explain that I do not think 1960 as a final date for termination of guardianship is unreasonable, and I do not think December 31, 1958, is unreasonable as the date of the deadline within which the Indians must file their plan for use of their tribal property.

Previously the termination date was much earlier than this one. But if they are ever to get a plan submitted, a final date must be set.

I do not think it is unreasonable at all, and I would certainly object to an amendment to extend it another year.

This is a program on which we have been working with the State of Wisconsin, and we have yielded largely to the wishes of the Indians and the State of Wisconsin.

I see no reason now for changing the committee's recommendation. I think the committee was unanimous in its position on the bill.

Mr. President, I object to the amendment which has been proposed on the floor.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I wish to make it very clear that my only point is that the House bill provides for the later date. The House gave consideration to it, and held hearings. The House recognized that many persons would like to take advantage of those who have been the wards of the Federal Government. The House recommended the later date. I realize that under the circumstances the bill will probably go to conference, and that probably will mean that the bill will not be passed until next year.

But I felt the Senate should give consideration to, let us say, the preservation of the rights of the wards of the Government, when they request it. Ordinarily the Indians are ready to fall into traps which are laid for them, when some persons who are hungry for timber wish to obtain the timber.

I have been in that area; and, as I have said, I have received letters and telegrams from bankers who sense the significance of what is involved. The timber on the reservation is one of the finest pieces of standing timber remaining in the State, and they believe the period should be extended in the way I have suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Wisconsin submitted his amendment?

Mr. WILEY. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I object to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, I do not object to the bill. I object only to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Did the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his amendment?

Mr. WILEY. Let me ask the consequences of such an act.

Mr. CLARK. Then the bill will be passed.

Mr. WILEY. I have never been in the position of one who backs out. But I want a bill on this subject to be passed, and I want the Congress to pass a measure which will effectively protect the interests of these wards of the Government. It may be that the conferees on the part of the Senate will listen to the conferees on the part of the House, if the bill goes to conference, better than they will listen to me, and that better results will be had in that way. So I shall not press the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The objection is withdrawn.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I believe that I must comment briefly on this matter, because the Senator from Wisconsin has raised this issue.

I wish to make this statement, also, because I know the Senator from Wisconsin is one of the outstanding Members of the Senate, and certainly is diligent in trying to protect the welfare of this tribe in his State.

First, I believe we are giving the Menominee Tribe a reasonable length of time in which to submit a plan for terminating Federal custodianship over their resources. Secondly, I wish to remind the Senator from Wisconsin that in my own State of Oregon there is the great Klamath Indian Tribe. They, likewise, are going through the termination process. They are to receive approximately the same length of time for submitting a plan and their inventory as the Menominee Tribe is to be given. The Klamath Tribe—and I believe the Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS] who has great knowledge in this field will confirm this statement—has timber resources which dwarf even the holdings of the Menominee Tribe. If I am not mistaken, the Klamath Tribe owns the greatest ponderosa pine timber stand anywhere in the Northern Hemisphere, and that timber is included in the inventory they are making.

As chairman of the Indian Affairs Subcommittee, I join with my colleague in giving to the tribe in the State of Wisconsin the same amount of time which has been given to the tribe in the State of Oregon.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. Ordinarily I would say the Senator is very logical. I should say one tribe should be treated the same as another, unless the circumstances are different. The circumstances here involved go to the very protection of valuable assets of Government wards. One would not think that bankers and businessmen would be wrong, who by telegrams and letters have said that this should be done. This is an age when wise guys reach out and take valuable property from those who are unable to protect themselves. All I am urging is what the House of Representatives has provided, namely, to give the tribe another year. That was my object in making my request. I trust that when the House conferees and the Senate conferees get together they may learn that the situation in Oregon may not be comparable to the situation in Wisconsin.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I believe the two situations are quite comparable. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin will find that the Menominee Tribe has been given a fair amount of time to submit their plan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Presiding Officer correctly understands, the Senator from Wisconsin has withdrawn the amendment, and the amendment of the committee has been adopted.

If there is no objection, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to make a comment on what has been stated. An effort is being made to give the Indians full and complete control of their affairs, under safeguards which will protect their assets for their use. When I first came to Congress more than 10 years ago it was reported by the then Acting Indian Commissioner that this tribe was ready to take care of its own property. No bills were introduced, but the tribe was supposed to be able to have control over their own property. In 1953 Congress adopted unanimously a resolution declaring it to be the policy that as soon as the Indians were ready to take care of their property it should be turned over to them. The Menominees were actually named in the resolution. That has been the policy of Congress. A bill was passed some time ago providing for a termination of United States guardianship of this Indian tribe. The time has been extended once. All we want the Indians to do is to submit a plan for the use of their property. The State of Wisconsin and the Interior Department and a special group which has been retained by the Indians are now working out a program. All we ask is that they get busy and not drag their feet. We are not trying to take anything away from the Indians. I would be one of the first to protest against any move which might result in divesting the Indians of their holdings. I am as strongly in favor of the Indians as is any other Senator. I objected to an amendment which would allow the Indians to drag their feet perpetually. As long as they can stay under the guardianship of the United States, they will keep doing it, because there are several things they do not want to do. One thing is that they do not want to pay taxes on any property.

Next, if anything goes wrong, they want to hold the United States responsible. That kind of an incident happened a few years ago. The Federal Government and the Indian Bureau went on an Indian reservation on which certain timber had been knocked down as the result of a hurricane. The Government did the best it could to salvage what timber it could. Apparently, the Government's job did not satisfy the Indians. They filed a claim against the United States in the Court of Claims and the United States had to pay $8 million for a violation of the guardianship. I can see why some of the Indians would like to have the United States continue to take care of their business. If all goes well, they get all the benefits of it. If something goes wrong, they would like to hold the United States responsible for damages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN TRACT OF LAND TO THE STATE OF FLORIDA

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now proceed to the question of the reconsideration of a vote, which the Senator from Florida desires to bring up.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, upon the regular call of the calendar, Calendar No. 1072, S. 2107, to provide for the conveyance to the State of Florida of a certain tract of land in such State owned by the United States, was passed without objection. A companion House measure, already passed by the House, H. R. 7636, is before the Judiciary Committee. I ask unanimous consent that we may return to Calendar No. 1072, S. 2107, that the vote whereby the Senate passed the bill be reconsidered, that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of House bill 7636, and that the House measure be taken up and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida that the Senate reconsider the vote by which it passed S. 2107? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Without objection, the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from further consideration of House bill 7636.

Is there objection to the present consideration of H. R. 7636?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7636) to provide for the conveyance to the State of Florida of a certain tract of land in such State owned by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 7636) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 2107 is indefinitely postponed.

ESTABLISHING OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE MATTERS RELATING TO GROWTH OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask that Calendar No. 1093, House Concurrent Resolution 172, which was placed to the foot of the calendar, be called up.

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, I wish to inquire what other bills were placed at the foot of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Four bills were placed at the foot of the calendar, which the clerk will state.

The CHIEF CLERK. Calendar No. 733, House bill 1733, an act for the relief of Philip Cooperman and others——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I had asked that Calendar No. 1093 be called up. Then I yielded to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer desired to call attention to the four measures which went to the foot of the calendar. The clerk is proceeding to state them.

The CHIEF CLERK. Calendar No. 1087, S. 2230, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands to the Charlotte Rudland Dansie Association.

Calendar No. 1093, House Concurrent Resolution 172, to establish a joint Congressional committee to investigate matters pertaining to the growth and expansion of the District of Columbia and its metropolitan area.

Calendar No. 1098, Senate Resolution 183, to amend rule XIX so as to prohibit the introduction of occupants of the galleries during the sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those are the four measures which went to the foot of the calendar, and the Presiding Officer will state that the Senator from Pennsylvania made a request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1093, House Concurrent Resolution 172, one of those four measures.

The clerk will state Calendar No. 1093, House Concurrent Resolution 172, which was placed at the foot of the calendar.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 172) to establish a joint Congressional committee to investigate matters pertaining to the growth and expansion of the District of Columbia and its metropolitan area.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments, and subsequently reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration with additional amendments.

The amendments of the Committee on the District of Columbia were:

After the resolving clause, to strike out "That there is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be composed of the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate and the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives" and insert "That there is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be composed of three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, to be appointed by the chairman of such committee, and three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the chairman of such committee.", and, on page 3, after line 11, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. The expenses of the joint committee, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the joint committee.

The amendments of the Committee on Rules and Administration were:

On page 2, line 24, after the word "terminate", to insert a semicolon and "but the joint committee shall make a progress report on its activities by January 31, 1958.", and, on page 3, line 12, as proposed to be amended, after the word "committee", to insert "through January 31, 1958."

So as to make the concurrent resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there is hereby established a joint congressional committee to be composed of three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, to be appointed by the chairman of such committee, and three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the chairman of such committee. The joint committee shall select a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members. A majority of the joint committee shall constitute a quorum except that a lesser number, to be fixed by the joint committee, shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of administering oaths and taking sworn testimony.

SEC. 2. The joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to (a) the problems created by the growth and expansion of the District of Columbia and its metropolitan area, (b) how and with what degree of success such problems are handled and resolved by the various agencies and instrumentalities of the Government which are charged with the duty of resolving such problems, and (c) how the resolution of such problems is affecting the affairs of the District of Columbia. The joint committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate and the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1959. Upon the submission of such report, the joint committee shall cease to exist and all authority conferred by this resolution shall terminate; but the joint committee shall make a progress report on its activities by January 31, 1958.

SEC. 3. The joint committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act at such places and times within the United States, to hold such hearings, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony as it deems advisable.

SEC. 4. The joint committee shall have power to employ and fix the compensation of such experts, consultants, and other employees as it deems necessary in the performance of its duties.

SEC. 5. The expenses of the joint committee, through January 31, 1958, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the joint committee.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I should like to say I have communicated with the county manager of Arlington and with the assistant manager of Fairfax County. They advised me that both counties approve of the concurrent resolution. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the District of Columbia Committee and the amendments subsequently reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

PHILIP COOPERMAN AND OTHERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the next bill placed at the foot of the calendar, Calendar No. 733, H. R. 1733.

The bill (H. R. 1733) for the relief of Philip Cooperman, Aron Schriro, and Samuel Stackman was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May we have an explanation of Calendar No. 733, H. R. 1733?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, this is a bill which relates to a corporation of New York. I am happy to make the explanation, based upon the report made by the Committee on the Judiciary as to the House bill, which has been passed by the other body.

I have in my office, Mr. President, a letter from the attorney for these parties. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

New York, N. Y., August 14, 1957.

Hon. Jacob K. Javits,
United States Senate, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: I have your letter dated August 12, 1957, for which I am deeply appreciative.

The only facts that I have involved in H. R. 1733, which I believe are covered by the committee's report, are as follows:

"On September 1, 1951, Queens Syndicate, Inc., a New York corporation, voted to dissolve the corporation and transfer the assets of the corporation to the stockholders under the provisions of section 112 (B) (7) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended. There were only three stockholders—Philip Cooperman, Aron Shriro, and Samuel Stackman. The only asset of the corporation was an apartment building in Brooklyn. The referred to section of the Internal Revenue Code is a relief provision which prevents the imposition of a tax immediately upon the dissolution of a corporation and distribution of the assets. The imposition of the tax is delayed until the physical property is actually sold by the individual stockholders. We desired to delay the sale of the property until such time as we felt that the real estate market was most favorable.

"In order to comply with all the provisions of section 112 the accountant, Samuel Grenblatt, of Brooklyn, was instructed to prepare the necessary forms provided by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The Internal Revenue Code calls for the filing of these forms within 30 days of the date of dissolution. Because of the illness of the accountant the forms became mixed with other papers in his office and were not actually filed within the time specified. I have been advised by the accountant and by counsel that this error can be remedied only through the means of a private bill. The accountant has advised that the stockholders stand to suffer a tax penalty of approximately $30,000 unless such relief is granted."

Because my clients will suffer a substantial tax penalty because of circumstances actually not of their own making, I solicit your interest and consideration on behalf of this bill.

With my deepest gratitude and respect, I am,

Very sincerely yours,
Herbert S. Siegal,
Counselor of Law.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, this bill relates to the late filing of a notice, which apparently must be filed if the taxpayers elect to have a determination, as to value of property which they receive as a result of complete liquidation, deferred for taxation purposes until the gains are actually realized.

The affidavit contained in the committee report shows that the accountant to whom the work was entrusted fell ill, and it was 45 days later than the 30-day limit, or an aggregate of 75 days, before the papers were filed, when the papers should have been filed within 30 days.

The committee has recited two other precedents of the same kind; one involving considerably more time, 250 days, and the other involving considerably less time, some 38 days, in which cases the Senate has also passed private bills of this character.

The Treasury Department says that it does not wish to have precedents established; but of course precedents have been established. I must rely, as I believe the Senate must rely, upon the committee's judgment as to the validity of the facts which have been set forth in affidavit form.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the statement contained in the committee report be made a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the statement from the report (No. 712) was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Statement

On September 1, 1951, a meeting of the stockholders of the Queens Syndicate, Inc., a New York corporation, was held at the offices of its attorney, Hyman E. Kamen, at 50 Court Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. At that meeting the stockholders voted to dissolve the corporation and transfer the assets to the stockholders in accordance with the provisions of section 112 (b) (7) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 as amended. This section provides a special rule in the case of certain complete liquidations of domestic corporations occurring within 1 calendar month for the treatment of gain on the shares of stock owned by qualifying electing shareholders. This section has the effect of permitting deferral of tax upon unrealized appreciation in the value of the property distributed in liquidation. The election must be filed by the shareholder or by the liquidating corporation with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on or before midnight of the 30th day after the adoption of the plan of liquidation.

In the instant case the stockholders acted to avail themselves of this provision of the Internal Revenue Code and executed forms 966 (for the corporation) and 964 (for each of the three stockholders) which, together with the minutes of the stockholders' meeting, were all placed in the custody of a certified public accountant who was to file these documents with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. However, the certified public accountant was taken ill, the forms were not filed within the time limitation contained in the statute, but were filed as soon as the error was discovered. The total delay in the filing of the necessary papers involved approximately 75 days following adoption of the plan for liquidation.

This claim is similar to another presented to the committee earlier in this Congress, S. 674, which was approved by the committee on February 4, 1957, and passed the Senate on March 8, 1957. S. 674 involved the same section of the Internal Revenue Code and it also involved failure to file due to illness of the agent to whom responsibility had been delegated. The delay involved in that claim was some 250 days following the adoption of the plan for liquidation.

In the 82d Congress the committee approved H. R. 1596, which ultimately became Private Law 362 of the 82d Congress. Again, this involved the same section of the Internal Revenue Code and a failure to file by a designated employee, due to illness. In this instance, filing was not accomplished until the 38th day following the adoption of the liquidation plan.

In the light of the action of the Senate on the previous claims of a similar nature, the committee believes that this legislation should be approved. The required forms were actually prepared promptly on September 1, 1951, and their filing with the Commissioner was delayed by the unforeseen combination of the illness of the individual to whom the filing had been entrusted, coupled with the erroneous handling of the documents during the time of the absence of such individual from his office. In these circumstances, the committee believes that a waiver of the time within which the election could be filed is justifiable.

Attached to this report is the report of the Department of the Treasury, submitted in connection with a similar bill introduced in the 84th Congress, together with an affidavit executed by the certified public accountant retained by the claimants.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have consulted with the Senator from Montana [Mr. Mansfield] on the Democratic side, and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen] on this side, representatives of the leadership who are available, who say they have no objection to the bill. I think we are in a situation which is tantamount to the bill being before the Senate on motion, that being the desire of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senator from New York for his explanation. I might point out that it has been the policy of the calendar committee on the minority side to invite attention of the Senate, either by objecting to bills being passed on the call of the calendar, or by objecting to the passage of the bills at some other time, knowing that the Senate will be on notice of the nature of the bills at some subsequent time. The bill under consideration has been objected to on two previous occasions. It has been given attention by the Senate. I believe the bill has merit. In the light of the information presented by the Senator from New York, I withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 1733) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2230) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey certain lands to the Charlotte Rudland

Dansie Association was announced as next in order.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, over, by request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, by request.

That completes the call of the calendar.

PROHIBITION OF INTRODUCTION OF OCCUPANTS OF THE GALLERIES DURING SESSIONS OF THE SENATE

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of Calendar No. 1098, Senate Resolution 183.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 183) to amend rule XIX so as to prohibit the introduction of occupants of the galleries during the sessions of the Senate which had been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration, with amendments, in line 6, after the word "of", to insert "the"; in line 7, after the word "nor", to strike out "shall" and insert "may", and after line 8, to strike out:

(b) The last sentence of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended to read as follows: "Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, rule XII, or clause 7, rule XIX."

So as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That (a) rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"(7) No Senator shall introduce to or bring to the attention of the Senate during its sessions any occupant in the galleries of the Senate. No motion to suspend this rule shall be in order, nor may the Presiding Officer entertain any request to suspend it by unanimous consent."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I believe this is good legislation, a desirable amendment to rule XIX. I am glad the Senator from Connecticut has brought the resolution to the calendar. I hope it can be adopted unanimously. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the amendments are agreed to en bloc.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe I am the only Senator present from the Committee on Rules and Administration. This resolution was considered by the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The amendment adopts the language of the House rule.

I served with the other body. This was the rule in the other body. I was rather surprised to find it was not the rule in the Senate.

I compliment the Senator from Connecticut for his initiative in this regard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

PROCEDURES FOR THE PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the calendar having been completed, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2377) to amend chapter 223, title 18, United States Code, to provide for the production of statements and reports of witnesses.

AMENDMENT OF COLUMBIA BASIN PROJECT ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1482) to amend certain provisions of the Columbia Basin Project Act, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of August 26, 1957, pp. 15959–15961, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a statement by the House conferees, which should be a part of the legislative history of this bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1482

The conference committee discussed at some length the matter of adequacy of the farm units established by the Bureau of Reclamation. While recognizing that the Bureau has conscientiously adhered to the basic principles established by the project act, it is the view of the conferees that, because of fast-changing economic conditions and great acceleration in mechanization of farming operations, the technical guidelines followed by the Bureau are outdated. The conference committee understands that farm units have already been established to meet the needs of the settlement program through 1961 or longer. While the new units that have not yet been settled are somewhat larger than the earlier units, the conferees doubt whether they are truly economically adequate units under present and expected future conditions.

It is the sense of the conferees that the Bureau should be rather liberal in its interpretation of the basic principles in the project act and that, with respect to the units not yet opened, the Bureau should restudy the matter of the economic adequacy of such units recognizing present economic conditions, presently prevailing living standards, the need for more diversified farming, and new methods of mechanized farming, and on the basis of the results of such study should make such changes and rearrangements in the units as are warranted.

COMPREHENSIVE RIVER DEVELOPMENT OF PACIFIC NORTHWEST

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, last week I joined with five other Senators from the Pacific Northwest to sponsor an amendment to the Federal Power Act which would assure our region of comprehensive river development. I do not wish to revive the Hells Canyon fight at this late hour of Congress—although the time would be well spent. However, a situation has developed in the Columbia River Basin which again illustrates the need for comprehensive development, especially the upstream storage we are not going to get from the pygmy dams of the Idaho Power Co.

The fact is that as of midnight next Saturday, August 31, the Bonneville Power Administration again is going to have to cut off interruptible power throughout its system. This is because we are having the lowest stream flows in history for this time of the year. This is a fact, not a political argument. It demonstrates as no words can the need for upstream storage, such as would have been provided by the high Hells Canyon Dam. The effect of the shutdown can be measured in lost time for thousands of workers in industries dependent upon that power, in terms of millions of dollars' worth of production lost, and in terms of private and personal taxes lost to the Federal Treasury.

Mr. President, there was a lot of talk about the investor-owned utilities and private enterprise on this floor during the debate on Hells Canyon. I would like to direct attention to what is happening to a large segment of free enterprise in our region because, in the guise of leaving river development to free enterprise, we have failed to provide the water storage necessary in the Columbia River Basin. Listen to this rollcall:

Aluminum Company of America, Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., Reynolds Metals Co., Electrometallurgical Co., Pacific Carbide & Alloys Co., Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Co., Crown Zellerbach Corp., Rayonier Corp., Keokuk Electro-Metals Co., Pacific Northwest Alloys, Inc., Victor Chemical Works, Carborundum Co., and Anaconda Aluminum Co.

The plants of each one of these investor-owned free enterprises in Vancouver, Wenatchee, Tacoma, Longview, Port Angeles and Spokane, in my State of Washington; in Portland and Troutdale, in my neighboring State of Oregon, and in Butte and Columbia Falls, in Montana, have been given their notice to cut down, or shut down, by August 31.

Mr. President, Mr. Wilfred Woods, editor of the Wenatchee (Wash.) Daily World, has stated the situation clearly and concisely in his front-page editorial column of August 21. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point, and I recommend it to my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to remember the next time the phony issue of private versus public power is substituted for the real issue of comprehensive versus partial river development.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALKING IT OVER WITH WILFRED R. WOODS

Today comes the bad news from the Bonneville Power Administration. Interruptible power will be cut off as of midnight, August 31. The lowest stream flows in history for this time of year are responsible.

Once again we'll go through that agonizing time, waiting and hoping for a break that will change the picture. Will the fall rains in the Columbia River Basin come early? Or will this be a prolonged water-short year?

How dependent we are upon the whims of Mother Nature.

It is no laughing matter for several thousand men and women who are due to be laid off. The impact on an individual family can be substantial.

And it points up that old, old need for water storage on the Columbia River.

There is no politics in the fluctuation of a river. If we can trap it at his headwaters, hold it, and then release it when we need it, everybody benefits.

Millions of acre-feet of storage are necessary to do the job. And we have but a few large sites left on this side of the border.

How long will the present stalemate continue, a stalemate that prevents any large storage sites from being constructed? We have already lost one of the biggest water storage sites—at Hells Canyon.

Will the Federal Government allow further steps in the Snake River that will reduce storage? That is one of the questions arising now in regard to further development.

This is not a simple private-versus-public power fight. It involves the whole future of water storage in the Pacific Northwest.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a followup editorial in the Wenatchee World, which strikingly points up both how Federal multipurpose projects pay for themselves with interest and how they contribute to the private economy.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wenatchee (Wash.) Daily World of August 22, 1957]

GRAND COULEE INVESTMENT BRINGS IN A DOLLAR A SECOND

One of the slickest gimmicks for selling the general public on the wealth-producing aspects of Federal reclamation has been devised at Grand Coulee Dam.

It's a revenue meter that registers the gross dollar income of the dam's powerplant in synchronization with the output of its 18 big generators. The more the dynamos produce, the faster turns the dollar sign on the face of the machine.

It ought to be set up on the floor of the House and Senate.

There are still a lot of Representatives and Senators who like to refer to the investment of public funds in western irrigation and power projects as a drain on the taxpayers pocketbook. They're continually fighting what we in the West know is a wise use of Federal moneys.

Watching the dollars pile up on the machine's totalizer couldn't help but impress even the hardest diehard among the antagonists of our resource-development program.

This week they'd see the machine register a gross income of a dollar a second, or $86,400 a day, or $32 million a year.

They'd learn that the Columbia Basin project has already returned to the Federal Treasury some $143 million.

They'd learn that the payout of costs allocated to power for all Federal projects in the Northwest is $77 million ahead of schedule.

Clever as is USBR Power Manager Al Darland's new money machine, regrettably it only registers part of the dollars a-rolling because of the project.

We'd really have something if the dollar-counter would show the new dollars of purchasing power created for goods the country over, the new dollars earned by Americans working in western industry created by low-cost power projects and by workers in all parts of the Nation making and transporting the products consumed by the growing western population.

Even then these dollars would tell but part of the story.

Dams like Grand Coulee make feasible irrigation projects that could not otherwise be constructed. From these roll wealth in agricultural products, profits for farmers, wages for farm hands, ringing cash registers and jobs in new or expanded towns.

They say in Reclamation that for every job on the farm, a second job is created in the town, and a third job elsewhere in the United States in the manufacture and shipment of products consumed by the West.

There's need for a machine, too, to show the waste of dollars involved in allowing such a river as the Columbia to run to the sea with only part of its great water resource developed.

After the big revenue board is set up in the new tour center at the dam—as surely it should—thousands of sightseers will leave the project with a tangible demonstration in their minds of how Grand Coulee Dam is paying back its cost.

It's a step in the right direction.

Eventually we may even educate our eastern Congressmen.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD an article which appeared in today's Washington Evening Star, written by David Lawrence and entitled "America's 'Week of Infamy' Label Is Applied as Congress Is Seen Approaching Civil-Rights Passage."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S "WEEK OF INFAMY" LABEL APPLIED AS CONGRESS IS SEEN APPROACHING CIVIL-RIGHTS PASSAGE

This may turn out to be the week that future historians will call "The Week of Infamy" in American history. For this is the week in which an intolerant majority in Congress is to take away one of the most important rights given to the States by the Constitution.

In fact, the Federal Government now is to become the policeman authorized by a law—in disregard of the Constitution—to arrest and put in jail not only those local officials of the States who seek to obey the voting procedures as set forth in their State laws but those individuals who allegedly influence improperly the votes of other persons.

Nearly 20 years ago the late William E. Borah, of Idaho, a great progressive and perhaps the greatest of the liberals of this century—a man who first achieved fame as a lawyer for organized labor and who recently was named as one of the 15 deserving honorable mention for the Hall of Fame of the United States Senate—made a historic speech when the same basic principle now at stake in civil-rights legislation was up for debate in connection with an anti-lynching bill. He said to the Senate:

"I make no contention but that the 14th amendment has forever placed it beyond the power of any State to deny any person the equal protection of the laws, or to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process. I recognize also that the State acts and speaks through its officers, legislative, judicial, and executive. I am not going to take refuge in technicalities, but I contend for what I believe to be a fundamental principle, and that is that while you may call a State thus acting and thus speaking to account, you cannot take jurisdiction over or deal with acts and deeds not done by the authority and by the direction of the State. It must at all times be State action.

"You cannot deal with acts under the 14th amendment not done by and under the direction of the State. The dereliction of an officer in violation of the laws of the State, in disregard of the sworn duty exacted of him by the State, and subject to punishment by the laws of the State, cannot by any possible construction, either in law or in conscience, be the act of the State.

"To establish any such principle would be to undermine and break down the integrity of every State in the Union. If a State may not be entrusted exclusively with the authority and relied upon to exercise the authority to punish those who violate its own laws, public or private persons, then there is no such thing as local government, because the State is deprived of the very instrumentality by which it maintains State integrity."

The new civil rights legislation is aimed at local officials who in spite of State laws which say to them that they must not discriminate nevertheless are alleged to be denying Negroes the vote. It is aimed also at any individual who exercises any influence that can be described by the words "intimidate, threaten, coerce," or "attempts to coerce," in voting.

But who is to say that in the many heated discussions between individuals during the modern campaigns, the influence actively exerted by precinct workers for labor unions or by employers or by committees formed by other groups, including church organizations, is not an attempt sometimes "to coerce" by "causing" a person to vote for one candidate as against another?

For now the Federal Government through a special division in the Department of Justice, created by the proposed law, can move in and investigate the political organizations in New York, the acts of its workers on election day, or the activities—prior to as well as after an election—carried on by any political bosses or organizations in Chicago or Detroit or any of the other big cities throughout the country. These have always been obligations of State law enforcement.

What the new civil-rights bill amounts to is a Federal license to penetrate any local political organization to determine whether or not it is keeping within the bounds set by the party in power in Washington or by the Federal judges who, without a jury trial, can inflict a 45-day jail penalty for "coercion." There is to be no assurance, either, of a jury trial. Only if the penalty given at the trial by the judge is beyond 45 days imprisonment or the fine greater than $300 is a jury trial to be required when a defendant requests it. No citizen will want the stigma of a conviction—with even a 1-day penalty—to be put on his record as a citizen. So the threat to punish unless the Federal policeman is obeyed will probably be effective.

Thus are rights of the States taken away "under color of law" which really means under the totalitarian doctrine that "the end justifies the means." It's a sad chapter in American history—a turn back to the "Reconstruction Era" and to the reactionary concept that an intolerant majority can at any time ignore the constitutional rights of the States.

PROCEDURES FOR THE PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS IN CRIMINAL CASES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to invite attention of the Members of the Senate to the fact that the Senate is now operating under controlled time. The time is under the control of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. O'MAHONEY obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wyoming may yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum, without losing his right to the floor and without the time for the quorum call being taken from the time of the Senator from Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARROLL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized for 5 minutes on the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, it seems to me that it would be appropriate to make a brief statement about the substance of the bill.

In the first place, the pending amendment would do two things. First of all, it would protect the Government files from fishing expeditions by defendants and their attorneys for the purpose of revealing material which has no relation to the issues on trial.

The bill is carefully drafted to make certain that no records of the Government, no stateemnts written or oral, of any witness, may be produced at any trial on the motion of the defense unless it is clear that such statements, written and oral, relate to the testimony of the Government witness who has been called and sworn, and who has testified on direct examination.

The second objective of the bill is to preserve the constitutional due process of law, to which every defendant is entitled.

One reason the measure is before the Senate is that, by reason of misinterpretation and misunderstanding, not only of the Supreme Court decision in the Jencks case, handed down on June 1, but also because of misinterpretation and misconstruction by the lower courts, it is necessary to clarify that opinion.

An examination of what the majority of the court said in this case, in the opinion handed down by Mr. Justice Brennan on June 3, 1957, for the court, and in the concurring opinion of Justices Burton and Harlan on the same date, reveals that the confusion created among the lower courts and attorneys for the Government and for defendants is caused chiefly by a failure to realize that the court was dealing solely with what it held to be the right of the defendant to have access to oral and written reports made by a Government witness concerning the events with respect to the defendant, and conversations which such witness had with respect to him.

Another source of confusion was the position taken by the court, not only that the defendant "was entitled to an order directing the Government to produce for inspection all reports" of the Government witnesses "in its possession, written, and, when orally made, as recorded by the FBI, touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial," but also that the defense was entitled to inspect the reports without the intervention of the trial judge. That will be found upon page 11 of the Jencks decision.

The confusion which must be corrected by legislation arises from two facts:

First. That the language of the decision does not make it altogether clear that the Court was talking only about reports written by the Government witnesses, or orally made to the FBI, with respect to the specific events and activities as to which that witness testified.

Second. That since it is impossible to determine in advance whether or not the written reports of a Government witness contain matter dealing with events and activities concerning which the Government witness did not testify, or privileged matter which the Government is entitled to withhold, that should first be reviewed by the Court before being released to the defense.

It will be seen that if the defense is to be allowed, as due process of law requires, to be confronted with the reports received by the Government from the Government witnesses against him, it does not mean that the defense should also be permitted to roam at large through the files of the Government whether in the FBI or elsewhere.

The majority opinion quoted approvingly from Judge Learned Hand in United States v. Andolschek (142 F. 2d 503,506). But in this decision, indeed in the very language quoted, Judge Hand said:

> While we must accept it as lawful for a department of the Government to suppress documents, even when they will help determine controversies between third persons, we cannot agree that this should include their suppression in a criminal prosecution, founded upon those very dealings to which the documents relate, and whose criminality they will, or may, tend to exculpate.

Mr. President, I repeat that phrase: "founded upon those very dealings to which the documents relate, and whose criminality they will, or may, tend to exculpate."

That language is clear. It is clear from the statement of Judge Learned Hand, whose reputation is of the very highest character throughout the country, that he did not grant his consent to anything resembling a fishing expedition.

The foregoing language of Judge Learned Hand upholds the right of the defense to be permitted to examine reports concerning the matters with respect to which the Government witness testified, but the same quotation contains language which illustrates the necessity of giving the trial judge the discretionary power to determine first whether the reports held by the Government are relevant. This language reads as follows:

> Nor does it seem to us possible to draw any line between documents whose contents bears directly upon the criminal transactions, and those which may be only indirectly relevant. Not only would such a distinction be extremely difficult to apply in practice, but the same reasons which forbid suppression in one case forbid it in the other, though not, perhaps, quite so imperatively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

The necessity of making the distinction to which Judge Learned Hand referred, was made clear by the majority opinion itself. It will be found, beginning on page 9 of the opinion, that the court made it clear by quoting from Gordon v. United States (344 U. S. 414), that is was not supporting a fishing expedition. This is the language of the Court:

> The necessary essentials of a foundation, emphasized in that opinion, and present here, are that "the demand was for production of * * * specific document and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government on the chance that something impeaching might turn up. Nor was this a demand for statements taken from persons or informants not offered as witnesses." We reaffirm and reemphasize these essentials. For production purposes, it need only appear that the evidence is relevant, competent, and outside of any exclusionary rule.

In other words, the majority opinion in the Jencks case upholds the rule of Gordon v. United States (344 U. S. 420), that "for production purposes it need only appear that the evidence is relevant, competent and outside of any exclusionary rule." This is so because Justice Brennan wrote:

> We reaffirm and reemphasize these essentials.

Because of the confusion, however, which has arisen with respect to the meaning of the Jencks opinion it is essential that the Congress now, by legislation, provide a legislative confirmation of the holding in the Gordon case which the Supreme Court has confirmed in the Jencks case, namely, that the evidence the defense is entitled to receive must be, first, relevant; second, competent; and third, outside of any exclusionary rule.

The mistake made by the majority opinion which is a source of confusion arises from the overruling of the decision in Goldman v. United States (316 U. S. 129, p. 132). This will be found on page 11 of the Jencks opinion. After reciting that the Supreme Court had held in the Goldman case that the trial judge had discretion to deny inspection when the witness "does not use his notes or memoranda relating to his testimony in court" the majority opinion in the Jencks case says:

> We now hold that the petitioner was entitled to an order directing the Government to produce, etc.—

And then on page 12—

> The practice of producing Government documents to the trial judge for his determination of relevancy and materiality, without hearing the accused, is disapproved.

This is the language which we say goes beyond the right of the defense, under due process, to examine relevant or competent documents which are outside of any exclusionary rule and which denies to the trial judge the discretion to examine the material before it is presented to the defense in order to determine that it does not contain irrelevant and incompetent matter, as well as matter which is within the exclusionary rule. The majority opinion recognizes the unquestionable right of the Government to protect national interests against public disclosure of documents. It is positively stated by Justice Brennan on page 13 of the majority opinion in these words:

> It is unquestionably true that the protection of vital national interests may militate against public disclosure of documents in the Government's possession.

The statement of the majority opinion in the Jencks case that in criminal cases, "The Government can invoke its evidentiary privileges only at the price of letting the defendant go free" cannot be rationally interpreted without reference to the basic facts in the Jencks case which are:

First. That the defense asked only for relevant matters.

Second. That in the trial the Government did not raise any claim of privilege, and Third. That the majority opinion deals only with relevant reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield myself 2 additional minutes.

An examination of the concurring opinion of Justices Burton and Harlan, reveals the undisputed facts as stated in this opinion. Cross examination developed that the witnesses against the defendant had each made oral and written reports to the FBI "relating to the respective events about which each had testified on direct examination." Then it is pointed out that the defendant asked for the production of these reports only and was willing that the reports should first be submitted to the trial judge to determine whether or not they "had evidentiary value for impeachment of the credibility of Ford or Matusow." Justices Burton and Harlan agreed under these circumstances it was unnecessary for the defendant first to show that the reports of Ford and Matusow contradicted their testimony. It is pointed out that the Supreme Court has never before made such a holding. It seems to me that the Burton-Harlan opinion is correct when it says "A rule requiring a showing of contradiction in every case would not serve the ends of justice." The concurring opinion then states the rule which I feel ought to be given the support of legislation in order to protect the files of the Government from being made the domain of unrestrained fishing expeditions by defense attorneys. Mr. Justice Burton, on page 3 of the concurring opinion, writes:

> I would not, however, replace the inflexible and narrow rule adopted by the courts below with the broader, but equally rigid rule announced by the Court. In matters relating to the production of evidence or the scope of cross-examination, a "large discretion must be allowed the trial judge."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, would the Senator consider yielding himself an additional 2 or 3 minutes, so that I may ask him a few questions?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania. That time is allowed on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Would the Senator be willing to answer a question or two, which I should like to ask and the answers to which I hope will clarify what I believe both of us have in mind?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be very happy to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has yielded 3 minutes on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. In the debate last Friday night and in the very fine statement of the Senator from Wyoming this afternoon we have focused attention on one of the matters on which I believe we are clearly in accord; that is, that only relevant statements or statements relating—as the Senator from New York [Mr. Javits] has so well stated—to the testimony of a Government witness can be produced. However, with all due deference, I believe that on the question of privilege perhaps the record in the debate is not entirely clear.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to say to the Senator that on the question of privilege, which we discussed on Friday night, I pointed out that the extent of the Government privilege, which has been claimed from the days of George Washington, our first President, down to this hour. But we are not now dealing with the Jencks opinion, because the question of privilege was never raised in the Jencks opinion.

Mr. CLARK. Therefore we are not dealing—does not the Senator agree—with the question of privilege in the Senator's substitute?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. We are going to leave the question of privilege, after the passage of the proposed legislation, just where it was before the legislation was brought up. Is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case did not disturb the rule. There is no reason why we should embody it in any way, by reference or otherwise, in this proposed legislation.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator does not contend that his amendment should be so construed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, not at all.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A question has arisen on the yielding of time. Is the time of the Senator from Wyoming to be allotted on the substitute amendment or on the bill?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The time which I have allotted thus far is on the bill, and I so announced, and I stand by it. I do not believe all the time will be used.

Mr. CLARK. Are we not discussing the amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are, indeed.

Mr. CLARK. Not the original bill?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are discussing the substitute. That is the pending amendment. If it will suit the timekeepers better, we will assign the time to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be satisfactory, according to the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, before I call up my first amendment, which is at the desk, I feel I should raise a parliamentary inquiry with respect to the substitute now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In the interchange which took place late Friday evening, the distinguished Senator from Wyoming said:

> Mr. O'Mahoney. I call attention of the Presiding Officer to Report No. 981. The amendment reads:
>
> "To strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following."
>
> Then there is shown the amendment for which I am now offering the substitute on behalf of the committee.

I believe the Record ought to be clear as to whether the substitute is a committee substitute. The members of the subcommittee are the distinguished Senator from Wyoming, as chairman, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Eastland], the chairman of the full committee, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Neely], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Butler], and myself.

I have no recollection that this substitute was perfected and formally adopted and then recommended as a committee substitute, and certainly I should like to have the record on that point clear. It may be that my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Wyoming, can enlighten me on that point.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think I can, Mr. President. The Senator from Illinois will remember that when this measure was taken up in the full committee, after the subcommittee had held hearings, it was pointed out to the full committee that it seemed to the subcommittee, without division of any kind, that speedy action should be had. But it was explained to the full committee that the language of the bill had been criticized, and that some changes should be made. So the full committee gave the subcommittee complete authority to make these alterations, and they were made. Conferences were held; and they were attended by the Senator from Maryland, the Senator from Illinois, the chairman, representatives of other Senators who were not on the committee, the representative of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Neely] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Clark], himself. There was a discussion. The Assistant Attorney General, Rogers, was present.

Unfortunately, the Senator from Illinois—because his time was being claimed by the Appropriations Committee, before which the mutual-aid appropriation bill was pending, as I recall—excused himself for the afternoon.

But I believe it was the understanding that the chairman, with those who were assisting him, should continue in his efforts to perfect the bill; and an effort to do so was made.

A substitute was generally agreed upon. But between Mr. Rogers and myself there was a misunderstanding as to the exact meaning of two phrases in it—and only two phrases; and those two phrases are the subject matter of the amendments the Senator from Illinois plans to offer.

I think the amendment in the nature of a substitute—amendment D, which I have offered—has been offered with the authority of the full committee, as well as with the authority of the subcommittee.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wish to say to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Wyoming, that of course it was my understanding that the committee had authority to provide some clarification in the bill, as originally reported. But I must respectfully point out that there have been some really substantial changes in the pending substitute, and I would be less than candid if I did not say that in my judgment the substitute is a weak substitute; and, for aught I know, we might be better off under the Jencks case decision than we would be under the substitute now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will suspend for a moment. Let the Chair state that the Chair is informed that the time is being charged to the opposition; and the distinguished Senator from Illinois has not allotted time to himself. Does he wish to do so?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this is a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asked that very question, and the Chair is informed that even the time spent in propounding parliamentary inquiries is subject to the provisions of the agreement which has been entered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Very well, Mr. President; that is perfectly agreeable. I now yield myself 20 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, first I call up my amendment identified as "8-23-57-C."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. CLARK. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from Illinois has yielded himself 20 minutes on his amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. President, I ask that my amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the pending amendment, as modified, will be stated.

The Legislative Clerk. In Mr. O'Mahoney's amendment, as modified, on page 2, beginning on line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, or."

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me, to permit me to request the insertion in the Record of a statement pertaining to the bill as originally reported by the committee?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement on Senate bill 2377 as originally reported by the committee. Inasmuch as that measure is no longer pending, although we hope by means of some of the amendments which are being proposed that it will revert more or less to its original form, I ask unanimous consent that the statement which I have prepared be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Statement by Senator Hruska on Senate Bill 2377 as Originally Reported by the Senate Judiciary Committee

The Jencks decision pertaining to FBI files in criminal cases prosecuted by the Federal Government has been widely discussed since June 3, 1957, when it was rendered by the United States Supreme Court.

In brief it embraced the following situation:

Jencks, as president of a local trade union in New Mexico, filed an affidavit of non-Communist union officer. He was charged with falsely swearing that he was not a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with it. He was found guilty by the trial court.

During the trial, two Government witnesses testified against Jencks, whose attorney requested an opportunity to inspect the reports of such witnesses to the FBI. The Government opposed the request upon the sole ground that preliminary foundation was not laid of inconsistency between the contents of the reports and the testimony of the witnesses.

Held by the Supreme Court: trial court erred. Request should have been granted and reports produced for inspection by defense. Jencks was not required to lay a foundation of inconsistency because a sufficient foundation was established by Government witnesses' testimony that their reports to the FBI were of the events and activities related in their testimony.

This bill, S. 2377, is not an effort to nullify, circumvent, or modify the ruling of the Supreme Court in this case. The merit or the propriety thereof was not a matter of concern, to the committee when it approved the bill and reported it favorably to the Senate.

The occasion and necessity for the bill arises not because of the ruling itself, but because of varied and erroneous interpretations and applications thereof in the courts. The liberality and variety of such interpretations and applications have already occurred in sufficient number and with sufficient disastrous effect on law-enforcement agencies, as to warrant action by Congress with all due dispatch to enact the bill into law.

The rule of the case is relatively simple, to-wit: That if the Government calls a witness to testify against a defendant, and the Government has in its files a statement or report by the witness relating to activities of the defendant, the latter is justified in asking for and receiving a court order compelling presentation in court of the material relating to the testimony of the witness.

The narrow basis of the ruling is shown by the following language quoted from the Jencks opinion:

"The necessary essentials of a foundation, * * * present here are that 'the demand was for production of * * * specific documents and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government on the chance that something impeaching might turn up. Nor was this a demand for statements taken from persons or informants not offered as witnesses' (344 U. S. 419). We reaffirm and reemphasize these essentials."

Notwithstanding the apparent clarity of the decision, three principal and very disturbing problems have arisen in cases in which the Jencks rule has been applied:

1. In some cases, the court has ordered that the entire FBI file be produced and handed to defense counsel, even though only a small part thereof related to the testimony of the Government witness.

2. In other cases, the court has ordered the Government to produce reports orally made by the Government witness.

3. In still other cases, the contention was made that the Jencks ruling would make it necessary for the Government to produce statements and reports during pretrial hearings.

To comply with any of these points is not only beyond the Jencks ruling, but is completely unacceptable to the FBI or other governmental investigating agencies, to the Department of Justice, and to general public policy.

The nature of the FBI files and the fashion in which they are compiled, make it unthinkable that counsel for those accused of serious crimes would be allowed access to the contents thereof. Sources of confidential information would be disclosed in the files already existent. As to files to be compiled in the future, such sources would dry up completely. Much information is now freely available to the FBI investigators upon assurance of complete confidence. Such assurance could no longer be given, if the court would order production of the entire file to counsel for the defendant. Hence, no disclosures would be forthcoming in the future.

Examination of the full files would also divulge investigation and law-enforcement techniques, as well as sources of intelligence.

All of these things would be harmful to the cause of good government. They are all beyond what is required by the law of the land, as set out in the Jencks ruling or otherwise.

For these and many other reasons, the disclosure of FBI files should be restricted to such portions as ruled by the Jencks Supreme Court ruling as necessary for observing the defendant's assured rights to give him a fair trial.

That is precisely what the pending bill would do by establishing the following procedures:

1. It provides that only reports or statements which relate to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified are subject to production.

2. It gives to the court the power to excise from any such statement or report matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness who made it. Thus reports about other persons or transactions, information disclosing the techniques of investigation, and all other extraneous matter would be safeguarded by the court.

3. The bill makes it clear that the Government need produce only reports or statements of a witness which are signed by him or otherwise adopted or approved by him as correct.

4. It provides that statements and reports to be used for impeachment of a Government witness are not subject to production until the witness has been called and has testified for the Government.

5. It provides that if the Government declines to produce such a statement or report the court shall either strike out the testimony affected or order a mistrial. Since the Jencks decision courts have dismissed the prosecution completely where the Government has found compliance with a production order unacceptable.

If these procedures are provided and followed, full protection would be given to the defendant to the end that all rights accorded him by the Constitution and by statutes would be fully observed; uniformity would be possible in the application of the Jencks ruling by the several trial courts; and law enforcement agencies would be enabled to function in a fully effective way, as they have been doing heretofore.

The Judiciary Committee has been assured that if these procedures are followed, serious miscarriage of justice will be avoided in Federal criminal cases where the production of statements or reports comes into issue.

Speed in enactment of this legislation is necessary because already the Government has been forced to dismiss several cases, serious in nature, because of adverse and divergent ruling made by the trial court upon the ostensible authority of the Jencks decision.

It is hoped that the Congress will act promptly and that the President will follow through in order that this situation will be clarified and put upon the proper basis.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will yield further to me, I should like to say that the substitute measure, which is pending before the Senate, insofar as it is designated as being offered on behalf of the committee, is offered on behalf of the committee without the knowledge or the acquiescence of the Senator from Nebraska. I do not say that in criticism of the fashion in which the substitute finds itself before the Senate. I make that statement only to indicate that I do not feel that the form which it now enjoys is within the pure purview of the clarification of the original bill, but, rather, is by way of substantially changing it; and to that extent I reserve the right to oppose some of its substance and to support some of the amendments which will be proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to inform the Senator from Illinois that he has 1 hour on his amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I so understand.

Mr. President, as a member of the legal fraternity, I know how lawyers become bogged down in legalistic jargon. So I believe it necessary to review some of the facts of the case and the history of the pending substitute, and to understand the difficulties which have prompted the preparation of two amendments which I propose to offer this afternoon.

First, I believe we should review a little of the history of the Jencks case. As everyone knows, or should know by this time, Clifton Jencks was the president of a union which filed a sworn non-Communist affidavit. As a result, he was indicted under section 1001 of title 18 of the United States Code. In that criminal case, the Government relied on the testimony of two witnesses, one whose name was in the headlines for quite a while, Harvey Matusow; the other was James W. Ford. At one time they had been undercover agents for the FBI. They testified in the case, on direct examination, about certain events and meetings and conversations. But actually, as the trial disclosed, they could not remember whether the reports they made were written or oral. At that point the defense petitioned the court for an order "requiring the Government to produce, for inspection by the court," data relating to matters about which each witness had testified.

That was a rather narrow and a very limited request. It dealt only with specified meetings and specified conversations. The court was to determine whether the reports had evidentiary value for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the witnesses. The defendant did not ask to see the reports. He asked only to have the court examine them, to determine their evidentiary value. The Government resisted those motions, and the matter went to the appellate court. The court of appeals sustained the trial court, on the ground that no foundation for inconsistency had been laid.

When the Supreme Court was asked to issue a writ of certiorari and call up the record, that was done; and on June 3, the Supreme Court entered a decision in the case. I think it will be agreed that the essence of that decision is about as follows:

First, that the defense was entitled, without laying a foundation, to inspect all reports, written and oral, if recorded, touching on the events and activities to which the witness testified. That relates to the question of relevancy; and I do not believe anyone takes exception to the position that the information, the testimony, must be material and must be relevant to the cause under trial.

The second thing I believe it is agreed that the Supreme Court found is that it disapproved the practice of first submitting documents to the trial judge, for him to determine their relevancy and their materiality.

Third, that only after the defense had inspected the data and reports, could the trial judge determine their admissibility and how they should be admitted.

Finally, that a criminal action must be dismissed if the government elects not to produce the statements and reports touching on the subject matter.

I think the crux of the decision is as follows—and now I quote from the case and what the Court said:

> The demand was for specific documents, and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among the documents possessed by the Government, on the chance that something impeaching might turn up, nor was this a demand for statements taken from persons or informants who appeared as witnesses.

Mr. President, the danger in the decision in the Jencks case is essentially, as I see it, this:

First, the possible misinterpretation by the lower courts.

Second, the danger of disclosure of the FBI files.

Third, the possible danger of the exposure of the FBI enforcement techniques.

Fourth, possible disclosure of the confidential sources on which the Federal Bureau of Investigation must rely in matters of this kind.

That was the situation when the Judiciary Committee, and particularly the subcommittee, addressed itself to the problem. It took the form of the introduction of a bill, which bears the number S. 2377, on the 24th of June. That was 21 days after the Jencks decision by the United States Supreme Court. Hearings were held, and a bill was reported on the 1st of July. I am one of the cosponsors of the bill——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me continue for a little while, and then I shall be glad to yield.

I was one of the cosponsors, along with quite a number of other Senators. In fact, I think there were seven, in addition to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Here and now I want to pay a tribute to the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. I doubt whether anybody has summoned and mustered so much patience and time and forbearance in the development of the bill as has he. I think he recognizes its importance. He recognizes particularly the impact it would have on the FBI and the records of Government, upon the possible security of the Government. So he has labored earnestly and late, and although we may disagree on the substance of the bill, I salute him now for the job he has done and for his determination to have passed a bill on the subject, if it is humanly possible, before the curtain rings down on the present session of the 85th Congress.

So, I salute my distinguished friend from Wyoming for a job undertaken at the sacrifice of energy and time. As I say, while we may disagree on the substance, I still recognize the heruclean labor the Senator from Wyoming undertook in trying to procure a bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to my affable friend from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In acknowledging the gracious compliment paid to me by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, I wish to say I do not agree with his statement concerning the substance of the bill. The only criticisms I have yet heard deal with immaterial technicalities raised by the Acting Attorney General at the last minute. I agree wholeheartedly with almost everything the Senator has said, with the exception of the great compliments he has paid to me in his remarks. We see eye to eye on the necessity for getting substantive legislation which will clarify the decision and take away the possibility of misconstruction and misinterpretation which would interfere with the enforcement of law.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The only comment I can make to my agreeable friend is that the compliment which I bestowed on him is richly deserved, and that the Department of Justice is against the bill in its present form. That does not mean it does not want a bill, if there is a chance of ironing out the difficulties in conference. I hope the Senate appreciates the importance of the bill, even as the subcommittee and full committee have done, because this is indeed a very important measure.

To return to the history of the bill, the original bill was introduced on the 24th of June. Hearings were held, and on the 1st of July the bill was reported——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator will agree—and I shall be brief—that there were no public hearings on the bill. The Attorney General came before the committee, in what I considered to be a scare approach, and said the country would not survive if Congress failed to pass the bill on the subject. The representative from the Treasury Department made an emotional appeal. No civic agency or any other persons were given an opportunity to testify. If there were hearings, they were certainly brief and quick.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That raises another question. I must ask the Senator from Wyoming a question on this point. I remember when the Attorney General came and when the secretary came, but I have no recollection that they were closed hearings.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield, where are the hearings?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The hearings were not printed.

Mr. CLARK. Is this not an important bill? Are we not entitled to hearings?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not going to charge laches or negligence on the part of anybody. There are times when hearings are not printed, particularly when there are urgencies about a matter. I think we will agree there is an urgency about this matter.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator agree the only testimony was that of Attorney General Brownell and a representative of the Treasury Department?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not at all, because we had a meeting in the Capitol, and the Senator from Pennsylvania was present.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Illinois knows that was not a hearing. No transcript of the testimony was made. It was not a hearing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not know about a transcript. I do know it was held here in the Capitol. A number of people were there.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will admit that was not a hearing, will he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania may be right. Perhaps he will make an amplification and a verification of my case before I get through. I should like, however, to get back to the history of the bill.

The bill was introduced on the 24th of June. There were hearings. The bill was reported on the first of July. I think the Senator from Wyoming is correct in that the full committee allowed some latitude for clarification.

Subsequently, eight amendments were offered by the Senator from Wyoming. If anybody cares to see them, they are pending on the desk. On the 24th of August, an amendment as a substitute was offered, and that is the substitute now pending before the Senate.

The Cooper amendment to the amendment was adopted on Friday. There was no objection to it.

Under the parliamentary situation, the substitute must be first perfected. Then the question is whether the substitute shall be adopted as against the original bill, which was reported on the 1st of July 1957.

I can only say to the Senate what I know. The Department of Justice would like to have the original bill. They have to enforce whatever bill may be passed.

They have to live with the Jencks decision. The United States attorneys from one end of the country to another have to deal with this question before district and circuit judges. It seems to me since the Department of Justice is the enforcing arm of the Government, and since the Attorney General is the Government's No. 1 lawyer, we ought to give some ear to what the Department of Justice wants, since they will have to live with it.

That is the history of the bill. There is the substitute pending. It has been changed in a number of particulars from the original bill; and, as between the two, I would rather go back to the original bill.

I would rather vote the substitute down, unless we can perfect it. I know the Department of Justice, no later than Friday afternoon, when the Deputy Attorney General came here, said, "We would like to have the original bill," as distinguished from the substitute offered by the eminent Senator from Wyoming. That is the parliamentary history. That brings us right up to date, as I understand the record.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, for a matter of clarification and, I think, correction?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am sure the Senator is mistaken when he says that the Department wants the original bill. The Department does not want the original bill. The Department would like to have the bill which resulted from our conference. So I think the Senator ought to change his statement.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. My statement deserves a correction. I think I can say, in that respect, the Department wants the proposal which was submitted on the 12th of August. The one that is pending now was submitted on the 22d of August. I think that is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I insert in the RECORD at this point, and I ask unanimous consent to do so, a copy of a letter addressed to me by Mr. William Rogers, Assistant Attorney General?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes, indeed.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
Senate Judiciary Committee,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR O'MAHONEY: On August 12, 1957, you introduced an amendment in the nature of a substitute for S. 2317, a bill which had originally been sponsored by the Department of Justice with the purpose of conforming chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, to the opinion of the United States Supreme Court in Jencks v. United States of America. That particular amendment, by way of a substitute to which I have reference, is reported at page 14457 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 12, 1957.

As you are aware from the views which I expressed at our recent meeting with you and other Senators of the Committee, the Department of Justice would have preferred the language of the original S. 2377, but it is felt that this substitute, which is in the nature of a compromise, should substantially achieve the purposes sought by S. 2377. Therefore, the Department of Justice not only has no objection to this amended bill but earnestly recommends its passage in order to accomplish the remedial purposes sought by this legislation.

Sincerely yours,

——— ———,
Acting Attorney General.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Will the Senator from Illinois give us an explanation of the difference between the substitute amendment, which is now pending before the Senate, and the one that the Department of Justice requests?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If there is time, I shall do so. I would, first of all, labor the amendment I have pending now. Then if I can get around to it, I shall do what the Senator from Ohio requests. That we can do, of course, during the debate on the bill for which two hours are provided and will be available.

First of all, having given the legislative history, I desire to recur to the amendment, which is very short. It is an amendment to paragraph (a). In substance, the paragraph as it appears in the substitute says, in effect, that no statement or report by a witness in a criminal prosecution shall be subject to subpena or inspection except. Then it makes two exceptions. The first one is, "if provided in the Federal rules of criminal procedure." The second one is, "as provided in paragraph (b)."

I shall deal only with the first exception, namely, "if provided in the Federal rules of criminal procedure." The amendment, in brief, simply would strike out the words "if provided in the Federal rules of criminal procedure."

Let me make the case for that amendment as briefly as I can. In the first place, that language was never in the original bill, and I do not know why it has been suggested at this late day.

Secondly, I think it raises an implication that the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure contain language which in some way may deal with the production and disclosure of witnesses' statements made to a Government agent. If that be true, I have never found it. Certainly, it cannot be the case.

Senate bill 2377 proposes to amend title 18 of the United States Code. It is my considered opinion that this was intended to be an exclusive approach to the problem as a result of the Jencks case. It certainly will not be an exclusive approach if we include the words "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure," because if that is an exception, there will be dependence upon how a judge in any trial court may interpret some of the provisions in the rules of procedure, notably rule 16 or rule 17, and particularly rule 17 (c), which deals with the subpena power. Some rather strange things have happened in that regard.

Are we going to inject the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and let a trial judge determine what they mean finally, and thus confuse the whole provision?

I point out that that language was not in the original bill. It is before us now. I think it will add to the confusion. I think it will weaken the bill to such an extent that we may be worse off than we are under the Jencks decision.

I think a case in point is the Fryer case, which is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 20 minutes of the time of the Senator have expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

The Fryer case is a homicide case pending in the District court. Frank Fryer is charged with first-degree murder, which is a capital offense. As provided in the rule, the Government submitted a list of witnesses pretrial, because it was a capital case. The defense served a subpena on the Government to produce statements of witnesses and third persons who had volunteered certain information. The subpena was quashed in the trial court.

On appeal, the defense alleged two grounds of error. One of them was that the subpena was quashed with respect to the production of certain information. The case then went to the circuit court of appeals. What happened there? The court held that under rule 16 the defense could not obtain certain information, but under rule 17 (c), which deals with the subpena power, under a very liberal interpretation, certain things could be done. As a result, a subpena duces tecum was issued to bring the documents into court. That was a trial court, and a circuit court of appeals, in essence, which was dealing with the rules of criminal procedure.

The question is, How far are the courts to go? What is a judge to say to the United States attorney in a given case under the rules that exist at the present time?

I can see that finally many things may be demanded, pretrial, during trial, and after trial, and it will all add up to confusion, before we get through.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. So I do not understand why the words "except, if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure," were ever injected into the bill in the first instance.

I do know, Mr. President, that the Department of Justice feels that this provision will occasion great difficulty in the enforcement of the law.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe this is a rather interesting amendment, Mr. President. I do not have, with respect to it, the strong views I have with respect to the other amendment of the Senator from Illinois, which I hope to have the privilege of discussing.

I should like to point out—and I should appreciate it if the Senator would confirm this for me—that the bill to which the Senator has referred as the original bill, which itself was an amendment, did not contain a restriction with respect to a Government agent. That bill related to all reports and statements in the FBI file, whether they came from third parties or not. Is that not a correct statement?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think so.

Mr. JAVITS. Therefore, restricting the bill to the statements of a Government agent is already a very big step, in my opinion, toward keeping the provision constitutional. It may very well allow us to do what the Senator from Illinois requests, which we otherwise could not have done.

I should like to ask the Senator a question. There has been a great deal of discussion about the bill meeting the problems of the Jencks case. Is it not a fact that in respect of the amendment of the Senator from Illinois—which is really the desire of the Department—an attempt is now being made to meet the problem of another case, known as the Fryer case?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Which has not been discussed and which has nothing to do with the Jencks case. Is that not true?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think so, but I was pointing out how liberal the Court was when the Court said that if certain documents had evidentiary value, even though they could not be obtained under rule 16, they could be obtained under rule 17 (c). The question is, how far will the courts finally go? If they interpret the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, we may be worse off than we are under the Jencks decision, because the problem will be enlarged and be more and more confused.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator is a very able lawyer. I know he has as deep a conscience on this subject as any other Senator.

The Fryer case was a case involving capital punishment, as the Senator says. Of course, that perhaps will be true in some of the subversive cases. The alleged spy Abel is on trial for his life, so the principle might apply in that case.

In the Fryer case there was notice for the Government to deliver to the defendant 3 days in advance of the trial the names of witnesses.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. The Government will have to do that in any case. The circuit court of appeals took that as jumping one step, which was not apparent in the Jencks case, because in the Jencks case the names of the witnesses were not revealed and did not have to be revealed until the witnesses took the stand. Therefore, we could seek to protect to the maximum extent possible the so-called sources of information by not disclosing any names until the witnesses testified.

I am all in favor of the bill on that score. It seems to me we have to think a little more about a capital punishment case, where the Government has to reveal the names of its witnesses anyway. In that case is it not true that convenience and the desire to do justice dictate that so long as the Government has revealed the names in the list of witnesses we should allow the court to go one step further and require the Government, as early as possible, to give the defendant what may be necessary to impeach those very witnesses? I ask that question, as to whether that does not differentiate the case from the Jencks case.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Actually what the defense is asking is pre-trial information or pre-trial statements. That makes a very considerable difference. If it is carried a step further, will it apply finally in a non-capital case? How far are we going?

When we look at some of the amazing decisions which have been rendered, and the amazing demands in the lower courts since the Jencks decision, it seems to me this is a point which is most important for the operation of the Department of Justice.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I point out that in the capital punishment cases the names of the witnesses are revealed. That differentiates it from the Jencks case.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is a requirement.

Mr. JAVITS. Therefore I ask the question: Shall we have, in cases where the names of the witnesses are revealed, a pre-trial discovery?

I may say to the Senator from Illinois that we face a fundamental question of ideology here. I think we have to go forward on the fact that the FBI is not a secret police, but that instead the FBI is a police agency which is required to observe the standards of the Constitution. We will accommodate them as much as we humanly can. We do that in our appropriations. We cannot accommodate them in a violation of the Constitution. We should not accommodate them where the ends of justice and the public interest do not require it.

Therefore, I ask the Senator a question. I may well vote for the Senator's amendment, and I am asking the honest question: Does what the Senator is seeking to reach by this amendment—the case where the names of the witnesses must be revealed in advance—make enough difference to differentiate it from the Jencks case, and therefore dictate that we should not vote for the amendment? I ask that, as a lawyer.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I want to be sure that the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as carried on the statute books do not become the vehicle for fishing expeditions, whereby records may have to be indiscriminately revealed, and actions go so far as finally to reveal the Government's confidential sources of information. We may even get to the point where this has to be done pretrial. I wonder what would happen in a racket case if the name of an informant were to be disclosed in the pretrial proceedings. Probably the life of the informant would not be worth a nickel.

Another important matter is that the confidential sources of information would quickly dry up. That becomes one of the important elements, so far as the operations of the FBI are concerned.

Mr. THYE and Mr. O'MAHONEY addressed the Chair.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, the very last sentence stated by the Senator from Illinois is the meat of the entire question with which we are confronted. It is a very pertinent part of the entire question involved in the Jencks case, as the Senator has stated it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think I can agree with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] that the questions are these: First, to make sure that the accused in a given case has full due process, and that none of his rights are taken away. Second, to make sure that the national defense is not jeopardized and that the sources of information are not cut off. Third, to devise an orderly and judicious exclusive way of handling the matter, now that the Jencks case decision has been handed down. I think the essence of the problem is that simple.

But the Supreme Court in the Jencks case decision never mentioned the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. Those rules are mentioned in the substitute bill. All we will get from that is confusion. I think that language ought to be deleted from the substitute bill. That is as simply as I can state it.

I yield now to my friend, the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

I want to compliment the Senator from New York for the statement he made in his colloquy with the Senator from Illinois. I agree with what the Senator from New York has said.

I wish to point out that in the Fryer case, which was, as the Senator from New York has stated, a capital offense case, and under which the Federal rules of criminal procedure required only that the names of the witnesses should be produced for the defense, the Court of Appeals, by a divided decision, said in effect, "Since you must give the names of the witnesses you might also give the text of the testimony and the reports."

I want to say to the Senator that the third judge on that court disagreed explicitly, and later on in the District Court of the District of Columbia a District judge himself declined to follow the rule of the Court of Appeals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield me some time?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. How much time did the Senator from Wyoming occupy in his interruption of the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no record of that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will yield the Senator from Illinois 5 minutes of the time of the opposition in connection with this colloquy, and relieve the Senator of that tax on the time of his side.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I point out to the Senator that our purpose was to make clear that we were not changing the rules of criminal procedure in one way or another. The language which was proposed to us read "as provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure." The word "as" was the word which I thought carried the implication that there was something in the Rules of Criminal Procedure which required revelation of the statements of witnesses, so I would not accept the word "as." I insisted—and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK] agreed—on the substitution of the word "if," and that is the way the language reads in the substitute amendment—"if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure." That implies nothing. It merely says, "If it is in there, all right." But I do not believe it is. The Senator from Pennsylvania may believe that it is.

But to show that confusion is not confined to Senators or to the judges of inferior courts, I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that in the Fryer case, the court of appeals itself was divided, and in the Jencks case the Supreme Court itself was divided. If we lock ourselves up in confusion by technical legalistic arguments, we may well lose the basic bill which the Department of Justice, the FBI, and every other agency of Government believes is so necessary.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I certainly do not concur in the last implication of my friend, that we should get as good a bill as we can, even though it is a bad bill. If it has a weakness in it, this is the time to correct it, because, otherwise, between now and the time Congress returns in January a great deal of mischief and deviltry may occur.

What the Senator from Wyoming says bears out what I have stated. What is the difference between the Appellate Court of the District of Columbia and the trial court? Congress knew what it was about in the first instance, based upon the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. It provided for the surrender of the witness list by the Government. But many other things it did not do, including provision for surrender of reports and statements on a pretrial basis. If it had wanted to do so, Congress could have done it.

But who can say what the implication will be if we leave that phrase in the bill? It will be up to every district judge, and, on appeal, every circuit judge, to determine, finally, how much latitude there shall be, and what shall be opened up.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on my own time, for the opposition, I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that his past three sentences have been filled with "ifs"—beginning with "if this is a bad bill." I will say to the Senator that this is not a bad bill. The measure which is before the Senate, if it is not complicated and confused by the amendments which the Senator from Illinois is offering, will serve the ends of justice and protect the files.

I should like to yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] 3 minutes on this subject.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am in the middle. I hope we can go on to a logical conclusion with respect to this particular amendment. Does the Senator from Kentucky wish to discuss this amendment?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me proceed for a moment. I must save some time for my colleagues, if they desire time.

My distinguished friend from Wyoming says that my remarks are studded with "ifs." Let us see how many "ifs" there are.

In a Georgia case recently the court ordered the United States to turn over the entire intelligence report.

In another Georgia case, the court ordered the production of the entire Secret Service report.

In a Pittsburgh case the judge ordered the production of the entire Narcotics Bureau report.

In a Texas case, the United States attorney telephoned the Department of Justice and said that he had to turn over 122 documents, under a misinterpretation of the Jencks decision. The result was that insult was added to injury when the defense attorney called up the United States attorney and said, "Mail them to me." That is how far they have gone. There are no "ifs." That is the record. In Georgia there are two such cases. In Pennsylvania there is one case, and there will be a good many more.

Are we to confuse the issue by interpretations of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure—and there are many of them—to make the situation even worse than it would be if we operated under the Jencks decision?

That is the reason for my amendment. It is in the interest of clarification. It is to avoid confusion. It is to give the Department of Justice a better chance at the enforcement of the law, while preserving the rights of the accused in any case.

The Department, being the law enforcement agency of the Government, has asked that these words be stricken; and I think, in all conscience, we ought to take seriously the words of the Department of Justice, because it is not Senator DIRKSEN, of Illinois; it is not Senator O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming; it is not Senator CLARK, of Pennsylvania, who must deal with the problem. It will be the United States attorneys and the Attorney General and his staff who must deal with it.

I think we should be entirely fair with them in striking from the bill the words I have indicated. I hope, therefore, that since the words relating to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were not mentioned in the Jencks decision, they will find no place in the bill. Under this simple amendment, they should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming grant me a moment in order that I may address a question to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very happy to yield to the Senator from Ohio, who wishes to address an inquiry to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The Senator from Illinois proposes to strike from the O'Mahoney substitute the language in line 3 on page 2, reading "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure."

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Now I put the question. If this language is stricken, the only law which will be applied will be that laid down in the Jencks decision, sought to be interpreted by this amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The effect will be to repeal and to render nugatory all previous decisions by the United States Supreme Court in determining what documents a defendant is entitled to see.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The answer is simply this: When we embarked upon the pending measure, I thought we were trying to develop an exclusive procedural rule, as set forth in the bill, for dealing with situations which arose out of the Jencks case.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have in mind the rule in law, "Inclusio unius est exclusio alterius."

Mr. DIRKSEN. My Latin is too rusty for that.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The rule is, when you include the one, you exclude all others. Therefore, in this bill, when we close in the Jencks decision, we exclude all other rules under which the defendant would be entitled to examine documents.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on the time of the opposition I desire to invite the attention of the Senator from Illinois, and of all our colleagues on the floor who have been listening to his argument, to this fact: He has cited a Texas case, in which the attorney for the defense, as a result of the Jencks decision—not as the result of any Federal rule of criminal procedure—appealed to the United States attorney, and said, "Mail me the statements," because he had misinterpreted the Jencks decision.

The Senator from Illinois has resumed his seat. In order to prevent misunderstanding, let me say to him that the Texas case to which he referred had nothing in the world to do with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. It dealt only with the Jencks decision.

Let me invite the Senator's attention, and the attention of all our colleagues, to the language of the proposed amendment on page 2, beginning in line 18. I ask my colleagues to observe, and tell me whether or not, in the proposed substitute amendment, I have protected the files of the Government. I should like any Senator to tell me whether I have laid them open to any fishing expedition or imposed any restraint upon the Department of Justice.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. These are the words. I ask the Senator to listen. Beginning in line 18, the language reads:

> In the event that the United States claims that any statement, transcription, or record ordered to be produced contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver such statement, transcription, or record for the inspection of the court in camera.

Not to the defendant, but to the court. That is a specific protection for the Department of Justice.

The Senator from Kentucky——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 30 seconds at that point so that I may answer the statement?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I pointed out that there were two exceptions. The amendment I have offered is to paragraph (a). The two exceptions are:

> Except as provided in paragraph (b) and except as provided in.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No, no. That is where the Senator makes his mistake. The language is, "except if provided."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; "if provided."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator said "as." That shows how a Senator can become confused on this point, even so capable and gracious and wise and eminent and able a Senator as the Senator from Illinois. We say "if provided in the Federal rules of criminal procedure." I wish to clear this up with the assistance of the Senator from Illinois. We say "if provided in the Federal rules of criminal procedure." That leaves the question utterly open.

Mr. DIRKSEN. M. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. There is not a line in the Jencks decision by the Supreme Court which refers to the rules of Federal criminal procedure. Why were those words placed in the substitute bill?

Mr. JAVITS. They were put in the bill in order to obtain unanimity on the floor of the Senate, and in order to get a bill to permit the Department of Justice——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Unanimity with whom? I am a member of the subcommittee. I did not ask the Senator from Wyoming to put those words in the bill. I doubt whether the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER] asked to have them put in the bill. I doubt whether any other member of the subcommittee did.

In order to get unanimity, how many Senators does it take to make it unanimous? Who insisted that the words "if provided in the rules of Federal criminal procedure" be inserted in the bill? I made no such request. The distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], who is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, did not ask that they be included, nor did the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. WATKINS]. I know the distinguished Senator from Indiana, who is not a member of the subcommittee, but of the full committee, never asked for their inclusion, so far as I know.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I did.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Who insisted on it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. "I killed Cock Robin." [Laughter.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. That makes it unanimous. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. When I concluded my remarks I believe I yielded 3 minutes to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], or intended to do so.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to address myself to the first amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois. I join with my colleagues in the statement that all of us want to support the FBI in every way possible. We must agree, however, that when we reach the point where such a desire would conflict with due process to a defendant, it is impossible to go that far. I should like to make a distinction between the amendment which deals with the Federal rules of criminal procedure—I refer to the first amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]—and the Jencks case. I would say, first, that the pending amendment, in my opinion, has nothing at all to do with the Jencks case. The Jencks case, as was pointed out in the debate last Friday night, deals with the production of prior statements of a witness, after the witness has testified, and for the sole purpose of impeaching or testing the credibility of that witness. The amendment which the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has offered would affect, as I see it, rules 16 and 17 of the Federal rules of criminal procedure.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will yield at that point, I should like to say it may also affect rule 15.

Mr. COOPER. Rule 15, also. The Jencks case deals with the production of testimony after a witness has testified, and for the sole purpose of testing his credibility. Rules 15, 16, and 17 could conceivably embrace the production of records after a witness has testified, but they deal chiefly with discovery before a trial, and before a witness has testified.

Rule 16 permits the production of records or documents which once were in the possession of the defendant. The reasoning behind the rule is that a defendant ought to be able to look at what belongs to him.

Rule 17—and that is the rule which I believe the pending amendment would reach—gives the power of subpena to a defendant for the production of records, in order to prepare his case, if permitted by the court.

As the rule is today, the subpena can be directed against persons and the Government as well. The effect of the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Illinois would be to remove the Government from the scope of the rule the defendant could secure a paper or document from persons, but not the Government of the United States.

I should like to make this point. I believe the Jencks case has limited the effect of rule 17. Conceivably before the Jencks case a defendant might have said, "I want to secure a record in advance of the trial in order to be ready to test the credibility of a witness on cross-examination." Now the Jencks case holds you cannot secure the records until after a witness has testified.

Frankly, although I do not believe it is necessary, there may be grounds for changing rule 16 and rule 17 in order to make it impossible for a witness——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. To make it impossible for a defendant to discover in advance of the trial, or the testimony of a witness, records of the Government to help him prepare his case.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COOPER. I wish to finish my statement first. I say that, because at common law and traditionally there was not any right of discovery in a criminal proceeding—any right of a witness to secure records to help prepare his case. But because of the more liberal view which has been taken—that it is the duty of the Government to do justice—there have been from time to time changes in the rules regarding discovery. I would say that the Jencks case has actually limited and circumscribed the effect of rule 17. Therefore, I would say—and I am not a member of the Committee on the Judiciary—whether we want to change rules 16 and 17 is a question entirely separate from the Jencks case and deserves careful study. It is perfectly conceivable that the rules regarding discovery ought to be changed because there is debate and argument as to whether a defendant has the right to secure papers to help him prepare his case, because everyone is expected to tell the truth. My own judgment is that the rule ought not to be changed when we are discussing the Jencks case, because that case had nothing to do with the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I merely wish to propound a brief question to the Senator from Kentucky. Is it the Senator's understanding or contention that pretrial proceedings apply now to criminal cases

Mr. COOPER. I believe that under rule 17, if the court wished to order the production of books and papers and documents, it may do so under a showing——

Mr. HRUSKA. That does not extend to statements and reports of the witnesses themselves. That relates to books and papers.

Mr. COOPER. Rule 17 provides that a subpena may also command the person to whom it is directed to produce the books, papers, documents, or other objects designated in the subpena.

Mr. HRUSKA. That does not include a statement or report of a witness in a criminal case.

Mr. COOPER. Some courts have so held. There are numerous cases that have been cited.

Mr. HRUSKA. There may be some judge-made law on that point. I know of only one instance, and that refers to disclosures of names of witnesses in a capital case. There is nothing in the rule that reaches into statements or reports of witnesses.

Mr. COOPER. I believe the distinguished Senator is in error. I refer the Senator to the cases cited in the footnote in the Jencks case. There are 5 or 6 cases in which that point has been discussed. Of course, there is also the Fryer case. I do not say that the Fryer case ruling is correct. However, it is an interpretation of rule 27, and I believe that interpretation has now been limited by the Jencks case. If we wish to change rule 16 or rule 17, it ought to be done after separate hearings have been held on the subject, and not in connection with the Jencks case.

Mr. HRUSKA. I rise to support the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for about half a minute?

Mr. HRUSKA. Will the Senator obtain some time from the other side?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to yield 1 minute to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. In the opinion of the Senator from Kentucky, if the bill has eliminated from it the language mentioned by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], does it mean that the legality of the rules mentioned by the Senator from Kentucky will be destroyed, and that they will be repealed?

Mr. COOPER. So far as rules 16 and 17 are concerned, the amendment would do what it says. It would not be possible to secure particular types of record from the United States Government by subpena.

Mr. LAUSCHE. My interpretation is, if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is adopted, that the only method for obtaining evidence would be under the decision in the Jencks case.

Mr. COOPER. That is true.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I do not understand that the rules would be abrogated. I understand that the rules would remain intact, as they now exist. They would not be abrogated.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But the bill provides:

> (a) In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, any rule of court or procedure to the contrary notwithstanding, no statement or report of any prospective witness or person other than a defendant which is in the possession of the United States shall be the subject of subpena, discovery, or inspection, except as provided in paragraph (b) of this section.

Then subsection (b) follows.

That would mean that no statement would be subject to subpena or would be capable of being used unless it fell within the provisions of subsection (b), which relates to the decision of the Jencks case.

Mr. HRUSKA. That is correct; to the extent that the scope of the bill is concerned with the rules, the Federal Rules of Procedure would be abrogated. Was that the intent of the Senator's statement?

Mr. LAUSCHE. No. I believe that if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is adopted, all we shall have will be the declaration made in the Jencks case, and the rules will be repealed.

Mr. HRUSKA. That is correct—they will be repealed from the scope of this bill.

Mr. President, that is what the bill started out to be; it started out as a bill to correct the impact of the decision in the Jencks case. But if we are to get into the matter of pretrial proceedings in criminal cases, it seems to me that is a question on which there should be full public hearings and full and ample consideration of all the facets of the question. But we have not gone into that question at all.

I may say that if the amendment of the Senator from Illinois is not adopted, the substitute will be substantially self-defeating. And it will also lend weight to the contention that under the Jencks case decision doctrine the Government's files must be made available to the defense, in advance of trial.

As a matter of fact, Judge Matthews, in the recent case in which Hoffa was tried, already has expanded the doctrine in the Jencks case decision, by ordering the Government to make available to the defendant, before trial, the records with respect to the statements of all Government witnesses—something not intimated in the slightest by the decision in the Jencks case. Instead, the basis of that procedure was the decision in the Fryer case.

Such a rule would force the Government to disclose the identity of all its agents or witnesses in advance of trial, regardless of whether the case is a capital one, and would be contrary to all the precedents; and, if carried to its reasonable conclusion, presumably it might prevent the Government from using a witness whose name was not disclosed when the trial commenced. Clearly that was not contemplated by the decision in the Jencks case.

So it seems to me that when we consider a bill which is born of the idea of meeting the situation brought about by the decision in the Jencks case, and then propose to broaden it to the very important field of pretrial in criminal cases, certainly we should consider the matter well, before we go to that extent.

I understand there has been introduced in the Senate a bill which deals with pre-trial proceedings in criminal cases. But we should not, in this backhanded fashion, dispose of the rules of procedure, which have not been altered by the Congress through all the years of the history of this Republic, except in one respect, namely, to the extent of disclosing the names of witnesses in capital cases, but in no other respect.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MORTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HRUSKA. I yield for a question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Did I correctly understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that the rules of criminal procedure compel the Government to disclose the names of its witnesses in a capital case?

Mr. HRUSKA. That is in the form of a statute, as I understand.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct. But I understood the Senator from Nebraska to say it is a rule.

Mr. HRUSKA. I am sorry; it is on the basis of a statute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes. As a matter of fact, it is section 3432 of title 18, United States Code.

Mr. HRUSKA. I accept the Senator's designation of the section; I am not familiar with it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So there is nothing in the rules of Federal criminal procedure that effects the disclosure of the names of the witnesses.

Mr. HRUSKA. Yes; it is by reason of the statute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I also contend that, as the rules of criminal procedure are mentioned in the pending amendment, nothing is changed. We merely say, "If the rules of criminal procedure make such a provision."

I wish to say to my colleagues—and I say it with the utmost emphasis and sincerity, and I do not believe I am wrong—that if we do not include these words we shall give to every defendant a constitutional right to appeal from a conviction. That is why I want these words included.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I should like to say that the mere existence of these words in the bill will give additional ground upon which trial judges may hang their variations of the decision in the Jencks case. I submit that decision has been tortured beyond its original scope to a much greater degree than anyone expected when the decision was made. By including these words in the bill, the judges will be given additional grounds for saying that there were respects in which the Congress wanted to review the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. I say that, by striking out these words, the intent of the bill and its clear import will be greatly subserved.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I state here and now, for the legislative history, that we do not propose in any respect to change the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. That will be the legislative history; and no one—except Senators who support this amendment—can change it.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I should like to submit that when this measure takes the form of a statute, the trial judges will look at the statute and will do their own interpreting of it and will make their own application of it. They have shown that even with the language in the Jencks case decision, they will go greatly beyond the scope of that decision. One who examines the committee report will find that it refers to many such instances, which have happened since June 30 of this year—within less than 60 days.

If this language remains in the pending measure, there will be further distortion and further wide application of the rule, which will be in violation of the stated purpose of the bill, which is to meet the situation in connection with the decision in the Jencks case.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield for a question?

Mr. HRUSKA. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe that the Senator from Nebraska is raising a very valid point; and although I do not agree, yet I believe he is entitled to the greatest of respect as to the substance of the point.

If the decisions made in the future are in line with the decisions of the court since 1948, in the case of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, then the Senator will not need to fear the result. What the Senator fears, as I understand, is that the courts will decide something other than what they have been deciding for the past 10 years, in respect to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. HRUSKA. Yes; that is the basis of my chief effort.

Mr. JAVITS. Does that pinpoint the question?

Mr. HRUSKA. That is correct. It seems to me that when we are getting into the matter of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, where we might open up to some judges the issue of pretrial procedure in criminal cases, we are treading on very dangerous ground. If that is what the Congress desires, we should proceed to the consideration of that matter by means of extensive public hearings in which all aspects of the problem will be considered.

Mr. President, I ask for approval of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Illinois to the pending substitute amendment.

I yield back the remainder of the time available to me.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I think it of great importance that, in considering this highly technical legislative proposal, we should be precise. In my judgment, this amendment is not in the interest of clarification. Instead, I believe it to be in the interest of confusion.

Mr. President, why is the phrase "except, if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure" included in the substitute amendment of the Senator from Wyoming? It is included in order to make it abundantly clear that we are not tampering with the Federal rules.

Why does the Department of Justice want these words deleted? Because it wants to be able to argue that, by deleting them, the Congress has tampered with the Federal rules.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will yield to me, let me say the Department wants to overrule the decision in the Fryer case, not the decision in the Jencks case. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania not agree?

Mr. CLARK. I agree, and I shall discuss that point in a moment.

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois gave us a little of the legislative history of the amendment; but he neglected—inadvertently, I am sure—to refer to the second draft of the pending bill, which was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on July 8, 1957, and which contained, with one exception, language identical to the language of the substitute amendment. The language included in the version of July 8 was—

> In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report of a prospective witness which is in the possession of the United States shall be the subject of subpena, except as provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Now we are to change the word "as" to the word "if", for the reasons the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has made clear to us. But that version has been before the Senate since July 8, and has always been a matter of controversy.

Why was the deletion made in the third draft, in the draft in which the Department of Justice would now like to have the words reinstated? Those words were taken out at the demand of the Department of Justice; and they have been reinstated because my friend, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], realizing full well the dangers of repealing by implication the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, or of overruling—without mentioning them—the decisions in cases in the Federal courts of appeals, agreed with me that the words should be restored, so as to make it abundantly clear that we have no intention of dealing in any way with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Now, Mr. President, what are those rules? My good friend from Illinois, again I am sure quite inadvertently, stated that the Federal rules were the product of the Congress. They are so in part, but only in small part. Congress authorized the Supreme Court of the United States to draft and approve rules of criminal procedure. They did so. Those are the rules under which the courts now act in connection with criminal trials. Congress did say those rules should not become effective until they had been presented to the Congress of the United States at the beginning of the session, and would not become effective until the end of the session; so Congress could, if it desired, change the rules. But these are judge-made rules, subject to legislative veto, and it is the Supreme Court of the United States, and not the Congress, which makes those rules.

It is for that reason, I say, we ought to be pretty careful about "monkeying" with that buzz saw. We ought to be pretty careful about maintaining rules which were drawn up by the Supreme Court of the United States and approved by a previous Congress. Before we undertake to change them, we ought to have full hearings, and not very brief hearings, in which only two Government witnesses testified in respect to the bill, and in which the Rules of Criminal Procedure were not even mentioned.

What is the reason given by the Justice Department for wishing to eliminate the designated words from the pending bill? I suggest that the Justice Department has not given us the real reason why it wants those words eliminated.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Friday, the letter of the Attorney General appears, in which he said that the proposed change in the language of section (a)—which was inserted in the fourth draft, as it had been in the second draft—with reference to the rules of criminal procedure, was objectionable to the Department of Justice because it implied that prior statements of Government witnesses could be secured by the defendant in a criminal case through discovery proceedings under the present Federal rules of criminal procedure. These words carry no such implication, as the distinguished Senator from Wyoming has so clearly pointed out.

Continuing to read from the letter:

> The implication in the suggested language would be bound to cause confusion and might result in a broad and highly undesirable extension of the right of discovery in criminal cases which is not at all intended by the subcommittee or the Congress.

Mr. President, it needs no lawyer, no one learned in the law, to review the language of the statute and to determine that the point raised by the Department of Justice is completely illogical and does not follow the thinking which indicates why these words are included. That thinking is to prevent any implication that we are to deal in any way with rules of Federal criminal procedure without hearings before a committee, and to usurp to some extent the function which the Congress has delegated to the Supreme Court of the United States.

It is for that reason I think it is quite clear the amendment of the Senator from Illinois would not allay confusion, but would create it.

I have made the charge that the position of the Department of Justice in this regard is, to put it mildly, disingenuous. I say that because when the Attorney General testified before the committee, and engaged in the conference when we were putting the bill in shape to do what the Senator from Wyoming wants it to do—which is merely to protect the Government files to the extent they should be protected and yet give a defendant his appropriate right to proceed in due process—at that point the Department of Justice made clear what it is trying to do—to repeal rule 17 (c), and perhaps rule 15 and rule 16.

They were trying to erase the case of Fryer v. United States (207 Fed. (2d) 134) without telling anybody that is what they had in mind to do. We would never have known it if it had not been for the painstaking work of the Senator from Wyoming, the Senator from Kentucky, the Senator from New York, and other Senators, which showed that was the intent. If we had not explored the matter to its ultimate conclusion, we would not have found what they wanted to do was to give the Government a free and clear right in this bill to repeal by implication rules of criminal procedure, to overrule cases in the appellate courts, and not even tell the Senate that is what they had in mind. I suggest that we do not want that kind of legislation enacted in that way by the Senate of the United States. I suggest again, for the reasons so ably stated by my friend from Wyoming, these words should remain in the bill, and I hope the pending amendment will be defeated.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Ohio would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania some questions. First, I should like to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania the Fryer case was a decision by the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. There are nine members of that court. Only three members sat in that case and participated in the decision. It was a divided court. Two judges made the ruling. One disagreed. I have given assurance, and I now repeat it, to the Department of Justice and to the Senator from Illinois and all others who are concerned, that when Congress comes back in January the Subcommittee on Improvements in the Criminal Code will be very happy to go into the whole matter of the criminal rules. It is one of our jobs.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield briefly?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure when the Senator does that he will want to have full and extensive hearings so as to make sure that all interested parties are heard. That was not done with respect to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Senator from Ohio would like to ask some questions. I yield him 3 minutes for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. LAUSCHE. It has been stated that this amendment, if adopted, will nullify the rules under which the courts are now operating. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLARK. I would not put it quite that strongly to my friend from Ohio. I would say it may nullify rules under which we are now operating. If I were a judge, I think I would hold it did. However, it would still be possible to argue that we were not attempting in this proposed legislation to repeal rules of Federal criminal procedure, because there is no such reference to it. I think, however, in view of the legislative history, if these words remained in the bill after the debate, it would be very clear that the Senate is trying to do that, namely, to nullify Rules of Federal Criminal Procedure.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I understand one of the rules provides that in a criminal prosecution, whenever papers and documents have been taken, and they constitute a part of the evidence upon the defendants demand the Government must allow an examination of them?

Mr. CLARK. I think that is a fair interpretation of rule 17 (c).

Mr. LAUSCHE. I think that is what the Senator from Kentucky was referring to.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, rule 17 (c) is broader than that, because it has to do with the subpenaing of books, papers, documents, and other data which a defendant may need for preparation of his defense. That might include, and in the Fryer case it was held to include, the statement of a Government witness. That is the only thing the pending bill deals with.

Mr. LAUSCHE. The reason I ask the question is that I am of the belief that the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming, if it is amended by the proposal made by the Senator from Illinois, would definitely say that in any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report of a Government witness, or prospective Government witness other than the defendant, made to an agent of the Government which is in the possession of the United States shall be the subject of subpena or inspection except as provided in the Jencks case. That is in substance what it says.

Mr. CLARK. Except as provided in subsection (b), which to some extent modifies the Jencks case. I wish it did not, but it does, as the Senator and I know from the debate of Friday.

Mr. LAUSCHE. But the Jencks case deals with due process of law, and the principal purpose of subsection (b) is to give a Congressional interpretation of the decision in the Jencks case.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. What I have in mind is that when it is specifically provided that no papers shall be——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LAUSCHE. When it is specifically provided in this bill that no papers shall be subject to subpena except those provided in subsection (b), in effect there is endangered the future existence of all the rules adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CLARK. With respect to discovery.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Very well.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I have one further question I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania. Under the provisions of the Criminal Code and Criminal Procedure, adopted by Congress, the rules formulated by the Supreme Court are the equivalent of law?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. LAUSCHE. This bill, if it be passed subsequent to the adoption of those rules by the Supreme Court, in all probability would be construed to mean a repeal of those rules?

Mr. CLARK. That is my view. The end result would be accomplished without any hearings and without the Department of Justice telling us that is what it wished to do, until today.

Mr. LAUSCHE. I thank the Senator very much.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired. Does the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] desire to yield additional time?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understood the Senator from Illinois wanted to make a few remarks. I should be glad to yield 5 minutes of my time to the Senator from Illinois if he so desires.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am not disposed to continue the debate any longer than is necessary. I simply wish to summarize what we have said on this side heretofore.

We have under consideration a trial, where a man is charged with a crime. The Government is the prosecutor. The Government brings in a witness and puts him on the stand. It is understood that the witness made a statement to a Federal agent some time before. The defense wants to find out what that statement was. The question is, how does the defense obtain that information?

This bill, as the substitute now stands, provides that there are two ways of getting the information. One is under the procedure set forth in paragraph (b). The other is under the words which have been written into the substitute, which were not applied in the Jencks case, and on which there were no extensive hearings. There was no extensive testimony of any kind before the subcommittee or before the full committee regarding the language "except, if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure." That is an entirely new note. It confuses the issue. It opens the door.

I can readily understand why the law enforcing agency of the Government is opposed to such a provision. That is the reason for the amendment. I earnestly hope that the Senate will see fit to strike out that language, before greater confusion is brought about.

There is only one other thing I desire to add. When the Jencks case decision was rendered and its implications were understood by the Members of the Senate, they held up their hands in a holy horror and said, "Something has to be done. The Government is about to topple. The files are to be made available to any defendant who comes forward and gets a subpena for that purpose."

Humpty Dumpty fell off the wall, and the question was, how to put Humpty Dumpty together again. We thought we could put him together and that would be sufficient, and that was covered by the bill originally introduced. The substitute would put Humpty Dumpty together and would add a few pieces to him. That is what this phrase amounts to. It has no business here.

I sincerely hope that the amendment to remedy that defect in the substitute will be adopted.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the time.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate with a very great interest. I think the debate has sharpened the point. Perhaps we can come to a resolution as to what is troubling us all.

As I understand, the Senator from Nebraska says he does not want to affect the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. That is true with regard to the Senator from Wyoming. Apparently the two sides are trying to obtain the same result.

It seems to me that if we leave the provision in the bill "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure" we are not affecting such rules by the bill. What we would be doing, as has been pointed out already, is this: In other provisions of the bill, when we come to subsection (b) we would not be giving the Federal judge the same power to protect the FBI files. Under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure if we are giving the court the right to protect the FBI files, if something is produced under the Jencks case decision, that is a different subject. Therefore, Mr. President, if this amendment should fail I believe what I am about to suggest would best carry out the intentions stated. If the amendment should fail, I shall then propose an amendment which will make a separate subsection of all the material in what is now subsection (b), which begins at line 18. The effect of that would be to give the Federal judge the same power with respect to the FBI files, no matter how the material was produced; whether under this bill or under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the power to prescribe which we decided to give to the court by legislation.

In that way, Mr. President, I think we would not affect the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which I think it would be dangerous to do. They have been in effect for more than 10 years. They have been construed and reconstrued by the courts. We have had the Jencks case, and the Fryer case has been pointed out. We do not wish to affect that whole body of law, but we do want to protect the FBI files, which is the purpose of this bill.

I think that would be the fairest and most equitable and just thing to do. Therefore, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, with the expectation that if it fails—if it succeeds there is no point about it—I shall then seek to protect the FBI files in the way I have described no matter how the material is produced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. WATKINS. The Senator has indicated something he plans to propose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I extend the time by yielding an additional 3 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for an additional 3 minutes.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WATKINS. Something else will be proposed if this proposal is defeated. How do we know what that something else is? I think we ought to have that information.

Mr. JAVITS. I will state to the Senator from Utah that on line 18, at the end of the sentence—that is page 2, line 18——

Mr. WATKINS. I have the draft of the August 23. We have a great many substitute prints.

Mr. JAVITS. The print of the August 23 is the one to which I shall refer. In the print for the August 23, on line 18, at the end of the sentence I would insert——

Mr. WATKINS. There is no end of the sentence on line 18, page 2.

Mr. JAVITS. I guess this is not the correct print.

Mr. WATKINS. The Senator desires the August 23 print?

Mr. JAVITS. May I borrow the Senator's copy.

Mr. WATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. JAVITS. At the end of the sentence on line 16——

Mr. WATKINS. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has indicated he thought we were dealing with the August 22 print. As I understand, the one we are dealing with is the August 23 print, modified, and ordered to be printed on that date. That is the modification of the August 22 print.

Mr. JAVITS. That is the one which contains the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

At the end of the sentence in line 16, I would insert the letter "(c)", and in the next sentence, after the word "produced," I would insert "under this section."

That is in line 20. That would be line 18 of the copy the Senator has. After the word "produced," I would insert the words "under this section." That would make it applicable to section 3500, which is the section we are amending.

My construction of what I would do is that we would give the judge the power over the FBI files, whether the material were produced under this bill or under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. WATKINS. Would that have the effect of providing a pretrial procedure?

Mr. JAVITS. The pretrial procedure question would then depend upon existing law. The existing law has been discussed here at great length. As I understand, the general view of both sides is that we do not want to affect the existing law as to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which would then affect the Fryer case and other cases. We do want to protect the FBI files.

I deeply feel my amendment would perform that function.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I do not want to misquote my good friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], so I am glad he is listening.

It is my understanding that the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is in error, and that the purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is to repeal, pro tanto, rule 17 (c) as interpreted in the Fryer case. If I am incorrect, I hope the Senator will correct me.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator please, may I answer for myself only. I understood from the argument of the Senator from Nebraska, to which I listened with great care, that was the case. I have the greatest respect for the Senator from Illinois. He is trying to perform an invaluable service, by representing the views of the administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has again expired.

Mr. JAVITS. May I have 1 more minute?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield the Senator from New York 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I was following the argument of the Senator from Nebraska, who I think was explaining, more or less, his parliamentary views as to what he thought we ought to do. I said, I think that intention is proper. I am trying to carry it out. However, we do not wish to affect the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

I understand what the Department desires. We do not wish to affect the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. We simply wish to protect the FBI files by this bill, no matter how they are produced. That is all I shall seek to do if the pending amendment fails.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. I should like to associate myself with the Senator from New York. I do not think by this bill, without having a chance to make a detailed study of the matter, we ought to change the rules, whatever they may be, as to discovery in a criminal case, or inspection, or pretrial practice. However, I will agree to this extent: Whenever the subject of discovery is up, by the order to produce on application, on subpena, or otherwise, and there is a statement in the files of the FBI made by a witness, then the limiting language of what is now subsection (b) ought to be applied to it. Therefore, I fully support the Senator from New York in his two points. One is that we should not exclude the language "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure," and the second is that we make the substance of subsection (b) applicable to the whole proceeding.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. WATKINS. Suppose the information is in the files of the United States marshal for the district.

Mr. JAVITS. The normal discovery rules would apply, because this bill is intended to relate only to statements or reports of Government agents, and we understand those to mean enforcement officials.

Mr. WATKINS. Is the United States Marshal not a Government agent?

Mr. JAVITS. The Senator asks me a question which I am not prepared to answer at this particular point, because our sights have not been leveled at that particular question.

Mr. WATKINS. It is about time that they were leveled at it, since that may affect the problem.

Mr. JAVITS. I am willing to say this to the Senator: I would be glad, for myself, to apply the provisions of this bill to all officials of the Federal Government. If the words do go that far, it is perfectly all right with me, and I know exactly what I am voting for. I think they do.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the Senator yield for one observation?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, I yield.

Mr. WATKINS. In view of the debate I have heard, it seems to me that the matter should be clarified. I am not a member of the subcommittee which developed the bill, but in view of the discussion I have heard, it seems to me we who have not taken part in the debate, are in a position just about the same a court would be in, which would be a position between a prosecution group of attorneys and a defense group of attorneys, each arguing for its own side and not making the matter entirely clear. If we are to legislate in that sort of climate, I am afraid we shall come up with something which may not be helpful, and may be positively damaging.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say to my friend from Utah that I think his statement is absolutely correct. Senators who are not members of the subcommittee or who have not participated, either as members of the subcommittee or as Members of the Senate, in various discussions which have taken place, are sitting here as an ultimate court to pass upon what we say.

I will say, however, to the Senator that if he had been present when the discussion opened, I think he would agree that I have stated rather clearly the position of those who are supporting my substitute amendment. The Senator from New York has stated it very clearly; and I will say to the Senator from Utah, with respect to his inquiry about United States marshals, that it must be born in mind that we are dealing with one character of statements, and one character only, namely, statements made by Government witnesses who have been called and who have testified before the court, who have made statements to a Government agent. That is all. Unless a United States marshal were a witness, nothing that he had said to a Government agent would be admissible under the terms of the bill.

Mr. WATKINS. How about statements which he has in his possession, statements by witnesses, which he has gathered?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Bear in mind that only the witnesses who testify are concerned—and after they have testified, not before.

Mr. WATKINS. But this rule may have an effect on whether or not they are called.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Which rule?

Mr. WATKINS. The rule proposed in the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not think it would apply.

Mr. WATKINS. It might bar them from producing such testimony if the witnesses were required to give up whatever information they had.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me say to the very able former judge from Utah, and now a very able Senator from Utah——

Mr. WATKINS. In the interest of time, let us move on. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Due process of law requires that the defendant be given statements which were made to a Government agent. The Department of Justice agrees to that. That is all agreed to in subsection (b). The question that is at issue here is, What are we to do about subsection (a)? I should like to say a few words on that subject.

Senators who have agreed with the Senator from Illinois have expressed great fear and are trembling lest, if the bill is passed containing the words which he seeks to strike out, lower courts throughout the land, and courts of appeal, will be greatly upset and confused, and they may, by reason of the contents of Federal rule 17 (c) make it difficult for the Government to prosecute.

I should like to read rule 17 (c). It is headed "For Production of Documentary Evidence and of Objects":

> A subpena may also command the person to whom it is directed to produce the books, papers, documents or other objects designated therein. The court on motion made promptly may quash or modify the subpena if compliance would be unreasonable or oppressive. The court may direct that books, papers, documents or objects designated in the subpena be produced before the court at a time prior to the trial or prior to the time when they are to be offered in evidence and may upon their production permit the books, papers, documents or objects or portions thereof to be inspected by the parties and their attorneys.

I submit that that rule has to do with the production of books, papers, documents, and the like. It does not deal with the subject matter before us; namely, a particular sort of papers, or statements made to an agent of the Government by a witness of the Government who has already testified. These are to be produced, under the Jencks case, because due process of law requires that they be produced.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HRUSKA. Is it not true that if we allow to remain in the bill the words to which the Senator from Illinois objects, not only will such statements and reports of witnesses be available to defendants, but they will be available to the defense prior to the trial?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The answer to that question is "No."

Every ounce of evidence which the defense could get under rule 16, via the procedure specified in rule 17 (c), it can still get. However, the defense has never been entitled to obtain and inspect the statements of a propsective witness in advance of trial. The Jencks decision did not alter that situation, and Senate bill 2377 provides that the defense shall be entitled to such statements only after the witness has testified in open court.

Mr. HRUSKA. But that is the Jencks case, and that is what we set out to correct. That is what we undertook to solidify and stabilize. But now we find ourselves in a brandnew area, because under the terms of the bill, including the words sought to be stricken, such statements and reports are available under the Fryer case and under the Abel case, which was a capital case. They will be available in a pretrial proceeding, something not contemplated by the Judiciary Committee when it originally considered the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Senator is mistaken, because the Fryer case applies only to the District of Columbia. As I have already pointed out, it was a case decided by only two members of a court consisting of nine members. One of the three members disagreed, and afterward, in an opinion which he wrote, a District judge expressed very diplomatically, I must admit, his disagreement with the decision.

Mr. HRUSKA. Yet it is the highest existing authority.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The Fryer case, as the Senator has said, was tried in the district court, and then went to the circuit court of appeals. Its decision can be interpreted, to say that rule 17 intends that documents and statements shall be turned over to the defendant prior to the testimony of a witness.

Mr. HRUSKA. Statements and reports.

Mr. COOPER. Yes. The case was decided in 1953. Since that time we have had the Jencks case. The Jencks case says it cannot be done—that statements cannot be produced for the purpose of cross-examination, or to test the credibility of a witness, until after the witness has testified.

Mr. HRUSKA. Yet in the James Hoffa trial the district judge, on the basis of the Fryer case, made such statements available in pretrial proceedings. The Hoffa trial was held after the decision was rendered in the Jencks case.

Mr. COOPER. Let me say to the distinguished Senator that there have been several district courts which have not interpreted the Jencks case in the same way, and which have forced the production of records at various times. However, the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming would settle the question. It would say flatly that such papers may not be produced until after the witness has testified.

Mr. HRUSKA. That is not what it says.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is exactly what it says. I thank the Senator from Kentucky for a very clear and explicit statement dealing with this question.

Let me read subsection (a) again, because I was very much impressed by what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. LAUSCHE] said in his colloquy with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK]. He made plain language perhaps plainer than it is in the bill. This is what we say in the proposed amendment. I read the very first sentence of the proposed amendment:

> In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report of a Government witness or prospective Government witness (other than the defendant) made to an agent of the Government which is in the possession of the United States shall be the subject of subpena or inspection—

That is a complete exclusion so far. Nothing in the nature of a statement made by a Government witness to the Government can be subjected to subpena or inspection, except—and here are the two exceptions:

> Except, if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure—

I accepted those words which the Senator from Illinois would like to strike out, because I say common sense and an understanding of the English language must lead inevitably to the conclusion that "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is merely a statement that if there is such a provision in the rules, we do not want to touch it. I say I have found no such provision in the rules. The Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Nebraska seem to be of the opinion that there is something in the rules.

Although the Department of Justice says there is the Fryer case and that the Fryer case interpreted the rules, I say that the Fryer case is not a good case, and is bad law, and will not be followed. The Senator says, "But it may be followed, and unless we protect against it now somebody may be doing something wrong some time in the future.

What I am afraid of is that what may be wrong may be done after the adjournment of Congress. What I am afraid of is the misconstructions of the Jencks case, in lower courts and courts of appeals, which will result in revealing testimony which the Department of Justice has and which should not be revealed. I want to protect them, and that is what I am trying to do.

The section proceeds: "or as provided in paragraph (b) of this section." Why do we use "as"? Because we know precisely what is in paragraph (b). Therefore every provision there as now written is before us. If the bill becomes law, that language will be in the law. After the bill is passed no one will be able to say that the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure have been changed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to make an observation addressed to my good friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], to clarify what the Senator from Wyoming said about my position.

My position is merely that the Senate, on the floor, without hearings and without careful consideration, should not attempt to modify the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. We do not intend to do that. The purpose of putting those words in the bill is to make sure that we do not do that. I have suggested that perhaps the Senator from Illinois will find later that the purpose of the Department of Justice is to modify the Rules of Criminal Procedure, and I am not too clear as to whether the Senator from Nebraska wishes to modify them.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I hope the Senator will not prolong the discussion. I have two good friends here, and I wish to preserve the amenities between the two of them.

Mr. HRUSKA. What I have to say would not disrupt our friendship. It might straighten out the record.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It might confuse things. Let me read from the decision of Judge Holtzoff. He used to be in the Department of Justice. He was a member of my class at Columbia College in New York City. As a matter of fact, he cooperated with the Supreme Court in writing of the Rules of Criminal Procedure. In the case of United States v. Carter, which is found in Federal Rules Decisions, volume 15, page 367, at page 371 he gives his construction of rule 17 (c):

> Rule 17 (c) is applicable only to such documents or objects as would be admissible at the trial, or which may be used for impeachment purposes.
>
> Rule 17 (c) does not extend broadly to statements of witnesses, since such statements are not admissible in evidence. While they may be invoked for impeachment purposes, such use may be made only in the event that the witness testifies at the trial.

That is precisely what we have written into subsection (b). We are dealing with a very narrow field—statements of witnesses whom the Government voluntarily selected and summoned to court to testify. That is what we are dealing with. The fears engendered by the Department of Justice, I am sure, are without foundation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield myself 1 minute. We shall ask for a yea and nay vote on the pending question, because I believe it is of sufficient importance, inasmuch as what we are doing today will be interpreted in every corner of the country where there is a Federal court.

I can sum up the case in this fashion: I remember that more than 20 years ago I took a bar examination in the District of Columbia and I failed. Some time later I met one of the professors at a dinner in Washington. He had in the meantime discovered that I was a Member of Congress and that I had failed in the bar examination. I said to him, "Doctor, perhaps you can tell me why I flunked the bar examination." He said, "Yes; I can tell you. I happened to look up your paper and discovered that you volunteered information beyond what the questions called for. When you volunteer information and it is wrong, you get a zero on the question."

Mr. President, the phrase we are discussing was volunteered. It is not in the Jencks case. It has just been intruded without any warrant for it at all. It ought to come out before it confuses the situation further. Since this language is to be interpreted by district judges all over the country, when a judge sees this phrase "if provided in the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure," he will scratch his head and say, "Perhaps there is something there, after all, that I have not discovered. I had better go back and look at those interpretations." That will start things all over again. That was not contemplated when the bill started its tortuous course in July of this year.

In the interest of clarity, in the interest of better law enforcement, and in the interest of cooperation with the Department of Justice, this phrase ought to be stricken out. I yield back the time remaining to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask that the yeas and nays be ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

So Mr. DIRKSEN's amendment to Mr. O'MAHONEY's amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment labeled "8-23-57-B."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 2, beginning on line 9, to strike out the words "and any transcriptions or records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government", and to insert in lieu thereof "and any transcriptions or recordings of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the debate on this amendment is limited to 2 hours, 1 hour to be controlled by the Senator from Illinois, the proponent of the amendment, and the other hour to be controlled by the Senator from Wyoming.

The Senator from Illinois is recognized. How much time does he yield himself?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I might say to the Senate, while under the rule an hour is available to each side on the amendment, I think what I have to say can be uttered in the space of 10 minutes. I believe the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] has perhaps a 5-minute statement. So within the space of 30 minutes perhaps we could dispose of the amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I shall cooperate with the Senator from Illinois, and I think that on our side we shall not need more than 15 or 20 minutes. It will depend, of course, on what is said on the side of the proponents of the amendment and what desires may be expressed by those who are opposed to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 2 minutes just consumed will be divided equally between the two sides.

The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield for that purpose?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. KUCHEL. So that the RECORD may be scrupulously accurate, is it not true that the amendment which is offered by the Senator from Illinois which refers to page 2, beginning on line 11, should read, on page 2, beginning on line 9, and then continuing?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think the Senator from California is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

The Senator from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, this is an amendment to paragraph (b) of the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee to deal with the so-called Jencks decision of the Supreme Court. I think probably I ought to summarize again what I said earlier this afternoon: We are all agreed that we ought to safeguard the rights of the accused in any criminal case; we ought to safeguard the security and the information sources of the Federal Government; and at the same time establish an exclusive procedure for orderly and judicious discovery of information to the defendant.

That involves three elements. The question is, when should these data and information be made available, and to what extent, and to whom? Two of the three questions have already been pretty well established. With respect to the timing, obviously it comes after a witness has testified in court. As to whom the information shall go, the power lies finally with the judge to excise anything which might be irrelevant or immaterial. The question is, What recordings, what transcriptions of records, are to be submitted?

In the original bill the language contained was:

> Such reports or statements of the witness as are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him as correct.

On the 12th of August someone came forward with a different version, which contained this language:

> Written statements signed or adopted or approved by the witness, and any transcriptions and recordings of the oral statements made by a witness to a Federal officer relating to the subject matter to which the witness had testified.

Then there developed a third version. That version, the one of August 22, reads substantially as follows:

> Written statements signed or otherwise adopted or approved by the witness, and any transcriptions or records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government.

The question is, What is a record? That is a question which is giving the Department of Justice a great deal of concern. A record could be a file in the FBI that contains a lot of hearsay. If, through the order of a judge, such information was spread on the records of the court and put in the proceedings of a trial, conceivably innocent people could be hurt, and matters could be brought out that properly should not be injected into a trial.

I think that would endanger the confidential sources of the Government. In the case of sabotage trials, where the Government is particularly dependent upon intelligence from confidential sources, that would jeopardize those sources, and they might conceivably dry up.

In the Jencks case the court called only for "reports written and when orally made as recorded by the FBI touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial."

The word "records" did not appear. This question of records is subject to interpretation by judges at the trial level.

Some rather strange things have already happened. There is a case from Texas, where the judge ordered the United States attorney to turn over the entire FBI investigative file prior to trial.

There is a Georgia case, where the court ordered the United States attorney to turn over the entire United States intelligence report.

There is a Georgia case where the judge ordered the production of the entire Secret Service report.

There is a Pittsburgh case where the judge ordered the production of the entire Narcotics Bureau report.

There is a Pennsylvania antitrust case where the court ruled that if FBI agents testified their entire reports would have to be produced, and the Government was denied the use thereby of material testimony in that case.

Then the question arises whether grand jury testimony can be brought before the court under the language carried in the substitute amendment. Other cases, I think, could be outlined to show that we are depending upon interpretations at the lower level, and we can easily see that it is difficult to know what the trial judge may determine to be a record for the purposes of the trial.

That is the thing which disturbs the FBI. That is the thing which disturbs the Department of Justice. They have made a very special point of the fact that the word "records" ought to be deleted and that the word "recordings" of oral testimony should be substituted. They would have no objection to it then, and would feel infinitely safer if that modification were made.

I simply state that the amendment, like the earlier amendment which failed, has the approval of the Department of Justice. In fact, the Department thinks it is most indispensable to the enforcement of the law.

I can add one other thing, and then I shall have stated the case. When it comes to the interpretation of the word record exactly what will happen in some of the espionage cases? I know there is deep anxiety and concern in the Department of Justice with respect to the inclusion of that word. Actually, what the amendment does is to delete that word and substitute the word "recordings" so that the rule will be applied to transcriptions and recordings of oral statements which may have been made to a Government agent.

Since the chief law enforcement agency of the Government has asked for this amendment, since it is thought to be necessary to the effective enforcement of the law, to the protection of our security and to the protection of our confidential sources, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Can the Senator give me an example of what records of oral statements would not be available to the defendant in a criminal case under the language of the Senator's amendment, "recordings of oral statements"?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They would have to be the actual recordings of oral statements made by the witness who is testifying in the case. When it comes to the question of records, what is a record? How far does the description go? What can be summoned by way of records? The sky may be the limit.

If we consider the case in Texas, under an interpretation of the Jencks decision in the southern district of Texas the judge finally ruled that all the records had to be admitted, and the United States attorney called the Department of Justice and stated that he had to submit 122 records. Then, to add insult to injury, the defense attorney called the United States attorney on the telephone and said, "Mail them to me."

I cannot tell Senators how far that would go. I can only say that the Department of Justice, which has to deal with the matter, is very concerned as to what might finally be summoned under an interpretation of the word "records."

Mr. KUCHEL. To turn the subject around, the intention of the Senator in using the word "recordings" is to cover the actual mechanical transcription of the very words used by the witness prior to the time of trial.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly so.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment.

I should like to say that the language now contained in the bill is much too broad, because it includes all parts of the FBI files, including summaries and prosecutive records. The FBI summaries are prepared by agents other than those who have prepared and filed the original reports.

The purpose of having these documents submitted at all to the attorneys for the defense is to enable them to impeach the witness. If the language remains as it is in the bill, many documents for which the witness himself is not responsible will be available for the purpose of impeaching the witness.

I should like to give several illustrations of that. The investigative files, which almost invariably include material of a confidential nature, would be included in the definition of the word "records." That would reach the summary reports to which I have referred, which represent not the words of a witness whom it is sought to impeach, but, instead, the words of some third person's understanding of what the witness said.

The statements of the witness to investigators for Congressional committees, for example, would be included in the definition of "records." Therefore, a witness in a case could come before one of the Congressional committees, and testify on certain aspects of the case, and his testimony would be included in the records to which the defendant would be entitled, upon which to base impeachment of the witness. That right might even extend to an executive session of a Congressional committee.

Further, the word "records" would be broad enough to include testimony of the witness before a grand jury.

It would include, in direct answer to the inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], a situation of this kind: No careful lawyer ever puts a witness on the stand without interrogating the witness as to the ground he can cover legitimately in the testimony in the case at hand. In the process of interviewing the witness, if the lawyers are at all careful and if they follow the pattern which has been followed for many, many years, they will make a memorandum as to what the witness said to them, which is their understanding of what the witness said he would cover in the testimony. It is submitted that the word "records" would extend even to such memorandums, for which the witness is not responsible, since he is not the one who wrote them and he is not the one who set them down on paper. Those memorandums would be available for the purpose of impeaching the witness.

It would seem to me not to be in keeping with the purpose of the proposed legislation to have a witness impeached by material for which he himself was not responsible.

It should be borne in mind also that the word "records" is not a word of art. It is not something with a definitive meaning. It must be given the ordinary dictionary meaning and the ordinary dictionary definition, unless it is defined in terms within the statute itself, and that has not been done. The courts will not have recourse to a legislative history in this instance, when the statute is plain on its face. Certainly the word "records" has a dictionary meaning and is not limited within the statute, and would be subject to a wide interpretation, which would include a great variety of things to which reference has been made by the Senator from Illinois and to which I also have made reference.

I urge, therefore, that the amendment be adopted.

I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

It ought to be clear from what has been said by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Nebraska that the only issue now before the Senate, as presented by the amendment, is the difference between the word "recordings" and the word "records." Much of the argument which has been made in support of the amendment has not used the langauge which defines the sort of records or recordings of which we are talking.

The language is clear. It has been worked out most carefully with the cooperation of the Department of Justice. It reads as follows, with reference to when the word "records" first appears—and I shall begin reading at the start of subsection (b).

> After a witness—

Senators will note the word "After"—

> After a witness, called by the United States, has testified on direct examination, the court shall, on motion of the defendant, order the United States to produce any written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him—

This language has been accepted by the Department of Justice. It is accepted by me. The sentence proceeds:

> and any transcriptions or records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent > of the Government, relating to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified.

The language clearly confines the records about which we are legislating to the records of oral statements made by a Government witness to an agent of the Government, but which relate to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified—nothing else. If a witness has made a record or recording, on another case, or another subject matter, or on anything concerning which he has not testified, it is not covered by this bill.

What is the difference between record and recording?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. If that is the position of the Senator, why not stop, in subsection (b), with the words "which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him," and leave out the rest of it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Because neither the Department of Justice nor the committee thought it was necessary to do so. I emphasize that the reason they did not think it was necessary to do so was that frequently witnesses, in addition to making written reports, which they sign and approve, also make oral reports. In the Jencks case the two witnesses called, Matusow and Ford, testified that they had made oral reports. All due process of law requires—and that is all we are seeking to accomplish—is that the records of such oral statements or oral reports shall also be available if they deal with the subject matter concerning which the witness testified, and in no other case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes more.

So we rejected the word "recording" because the word "recording" is a limited word. In response to the inquiry of the Senator from California [Mr. Kuchel], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen] acknowledged that a recording would have to be considered as a recording made by some mechanical instrument. In common parlance, a recording is now understood to be a tape recording. Everyone knows how a tape recording can be manipulated, how it can be snipped.

All we are asking is that the records which are relevant and competent, which deal with the oral statements made by Government witnesses whom the Government puts on the stand, with respect to the matters concerning which they testify, be made available.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I certainly would not limit the word "recordings" to tape recordings. A pencil is as much a mechanical device as any device which is operated by electricity. So when anything is recorded with a pencil or a pen, or any similar device, it is recorded by a mechanical device.

Do I correctly understand the Senator's position to be that if a witness has at some time telephoned to an agent of the Government and talked with the agent over the telephone, and the agent later, from memory, has written down his interpretation of what he understood that person to say over the telephone, and himself made a notation of it which the witness has never seen or approved, and has never said was a correct interpretation of what he said, such a record could be made available?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think such a statement would not be admissible under the ordinary rules of evidence, as hearsay.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. As I interpret it, that is exactly what the effect of this language would be.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Not if the Senator will read the next sentence. The next sentence says:

> If the entire contents of any such statements, transcription, or records relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order them delivered directly to the defendant for his examination and use. In the event that the United States claims that any statement, transcription, or record ordered to be produced contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver such statement, transcription, or record for the inspection of the court in camera.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I read that, but that is not what I am talking about.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, do I correctly understand the Senator to say that the language in the substitute has the approval of the Department of Justice?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Definitely not.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Everything except the word "records."

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Department of Justice is violently opposed to the use of the word "records."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I so stated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Unless I am misinformed——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator should not waste time arguing against something which I did not say. I stated that the Department of Justice has approved every word in this sentence except the word "records," which we substituted for the word "recordings." I think it is a matter of such trivial importance that the Senator ought to throw up his hands and withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Neither the Senator from Wyoming nor the Senator from Illinois will be enforcing the law. They will not be trying antitrust cases. They will not be trying any treason cases. The Senator from Wyoming and the Senator from Illinois will not be trying any espionage cases.

I know something about the concern of the Department of Justice over its confidential sources, and the question of what it may be called upon to disclose if we leave the word "records" in the bill. That is the reason I make a special point of it. I earnestly hope that the Senate will vote to strike out the word by adopting the pending amendment.

That is the whole story. I am not inclined to carry the discussion any further, because my affable friend has agreed that we should conclude the consideration of this question in adequate time. I am ready for a vote.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask that the time used by the Senator from Illinois be recorded on the side of the proponents.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We have plenty of time.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wonder if I may ask the Senator from Wyoming a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. KUCHEL. The Senator from Illinois said that some circuit court had interpreted the law so as to direct the Government to turn over records——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Illinois said that a Texas court had interpreted the Jencks opinion to that effect—not the law.

Mr. KUCHEL. If the Jencks opinion is the law of the land, and is to be so interpreted——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not think it is the law of the land; and we are trying to make sure that it will not be, in this respect.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me ask this question: If a court of competent jurisdiction should interpret the law as granting the right of the defendant to take possession of the records of the Government, that would not seem fair to the junior Senator from California. It would not seem to be equitable. I want to enforce the right of a defendant to be able to impeach a witness who sits on the witness stand and testifies against him, but I think the ends of justice require the Congress, in determining the procedures in such a case, to clothe the witness, as against the defendant, with some protection, so that the witness will not have thrown at him records which are not agreed to be the witness' statements.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, that would not happen under the terms of my amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. There is considerable competent opinion to the contrary.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I dislike to say this about my genial friend from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen], but he reminds me of the judge in the State of Texas who sowed the first seed of confusion and misconstruction. It is not his fault. It is the fault of the Department of Justice.

Let me say to the Senate, with every bit of sincerity I can command, that the Assistant Attorney General has an exaggerated fear as to what is likely to happen. I say that we must pass the bill quickly in order that the records of the Government may not be made the happy hunting ground of defendants and attorneys who want to obtain irrelevant and incompetent matter.

Mr. KUCHEL. Then are the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wyoming agreed as to what should be done?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the word "records" would accomplish the purpose. The word "recordings" would not, simply because recordings have the connotation of tape recordings, which can be snipped and gypped and misrepresented.

Mr. KUCHEL. Does the misrepresented, snipped, and gypped recording also constitute a record, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; it does not, because the word "record" has a general meaning.

Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I should like very briefly to address myself to the junior Senator from California. I regret that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] has left the Chamber, because I wish to make certain points with which he may not agree, but I shall try to make them in any event.

Let us make it clear that we are not talking about evidence. The important question is not whether these records or recordings can get into the evidence.

Mr. KUCHEL. I understand.

Mr. CLARK. It is merely that they may be produced for purposes of impeachment. Let us make it clear that we are talking only about records of statements made to a Government agent. Grand jury proceedings could not possibly be based upon the provisions of the bill, because a grand jury is not a Government agent. We are talking only about the difference between "record" and "recordings."

I may point out to my friend from California an example of what seems to me to be the difference between the two. I agree with my friend, the Senator from Wyoming, that "recording" is an extremely narrow word. A "record" is something which is taken down by a Government agent, and is his version of what a witness called by the Government has said about an incident with respect to which he has already testified.

If I may carry my friend from California with me further, I quote briefly from the Jencks opinion. Let me show how we narrow the Jencks opinion in order further to protect the Government.

In the Jencks case the majority opinion held:

> We now hold that the petitioner was entitled to an order directing the Government to produce for inspection all reports of Matusow and Ford in its possession written and, when orally made, as recorded by the FBI touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial.
>
> We hold, further, that the petitioner is entitled to inspect the reports to decide whether to use them in his defense.

We were concerned about the word "report" because the FBI did not like the word "report." It was too broad. So we changed it to "records."

We let the word "records" stand, instead of "recordings" because Matusow, who had made an earlier oral statement to a Government agent, had gone on the stand and lied about it, and was convicted of perjury.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I wish to refer to the language on which, apparently, everyone in the Senate is in agreement, because no amendment has been offered to eliminate the language. Immediately before the place where the amendment of the Senator from Illinois would be inserted, the language reads the court shall, on motion of the defendant, "order the United States to produce any written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him."

Does the Senator suggest that that does not cover a statement by a witness which is taken down by an agent of the Government, but which does not have the approval of the witness?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, I do; because he has not approved it and he has not signed it. That is why we were fearful that the word "recording" would be used by the FBI—or any Government agency, for that matter—to keep its files in such a way that they would not be called upon to produce them in court. In other words, it would not be a record and, therefore, it would not be produced. That, it seems to me, is the whole issue.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me ask the Senator this question. Suppose the agency has taken down a statement of a witness and the witness has not seen it, and the witness testifies in court, and the statement is to be used in an effort to impeach the witness, and the witness then denies that he ever made the statement. Let us say that the witness says the FBI agent made a mistake in taking it down. I wonder whether the Senator would contend that that type of statement should be used as a basis for impeachment.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator that I believe that any competent Federal district attorney would certainly know before his Government witness went on the stand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield 2 additional minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure that he would have seen the statement in the Government file which the witness is supposed to have made, and therefore he would not be surprised. In the second place, if that kind of statement had been available to the defendant in the Jencks case, I do not believe we would have a situation where Matusow would have perjured himself. The witnesses in the Jencks case were admitted Communists who were paid money. We must bear in mind, moreover, that a defendant is entitled to some rights for impeachment purposes.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. PASTORE. So far as the evidential procedure is concerned, if it should happen, for instance, that the witness denied that he ever made a statement, let us say, to an agent of the Government, then, so far as bringing it to the attention of the jury is concerned, it would be necessary to call the agent to prove that the witness did make such a statement.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PASTORE. Now we are getting into evidence. We are going beyond the field of record perusal.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PASTORE. Am I right?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the amendment reflects most accurately the controversy in which we are engaged, and on which I have taken the liberty to speak for a brief time. On the one hand, there are the people who think that we should toughen up the procedures which were employed in the Jencks case; on the other hand, there are people who think we should let the courts decide questions of evidence. I deeply believe in the toughening up process.

There are two questions which are raised by the proposed amendment. One is that, in the toughening up process, we do not make the whole act unconstitutional. The second is that, in the toughening up process, we do not make the act unfair. I do not believe the Senate wants to do either. In dealing with the problems raised by the Jencks case, we ought not to write an unconstitutional statute or make it unfair. I believe that the amendment, although well intentioned, does both.

There is also the third point to consider, and that is, that we are about to legislate with regard to all crimes, not only with respect to subversion. We are legislating with respect to murder and every other crime on the Federal calendar. We are legislating with respect to counterfeiting, narcotics, immigration, and every other crime against Federal law. We must never forget the American democratic concept for legislators, and that is, "There, but for the grace of God, stand I." We must protect the rights of the individual defendant.

The job of the Department of Justice is the very proper job of prosecuting. The job of the courts is to do justice. Our responsibility is to hold the scale balanced evenly as between the Constitution as it is and as interpreted by the courts and the prosecuting authorities. I submit the pending amendment runs squarely counter to that proposition. Its adoption, it seems to me, would make the whole act unconstitutional. It would so toughen it as to make it unfair.

It is for that reason that we use the word "record." The use of the word "recording" would have the opposite effect. It would allow the prosecuting authorities or a witness to avoid the plain mandate of due process by simply not signing the statement. This the courts will not tolerate. That is precisely what the Jencks case held.

It seems to me that, in short, the court has held:

> You cannot avoid the due process mandate based upon whether the report was written or not. If a report is sufficient to impeach the defendant, he is entitled to it.

If we amend the bill, that mandate could be avoided.

As to the other fundamental point involved, it must be remembered that whatever we do will be passed on by the Supreme Court, which must pass on the constitutionality of the act. Certainly we cannot repeal or change the due process clause; nor do we wish to do so. Within the limits of the Constitution, we are trying to protect the FBI files; also, within the concepts of American justice in which I know the FBI fully joins, we wish to make sure that secret police methods are never employed within our Government and that we will do nothing to deal with the lives and liberties of our people except by due process of law.

Let us understand that we should give the FBI an adequate appropriation, and we do, without inquiring too deeply into its sources of information. That does not mean that the Supreme Court should not make some rules with respect to what should be revealed and what should not be revealed to the individual defendant on trial for his life or liberty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield 3 more minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Let us see what we are doing. We are certainly doing something effective in the bill even if we do not adopt the amendment. We say in the bill "after a witness has been called by the United States and has testified" we cut off all disclosure under the Jencks case rule until the witness has taken the stand.

The second thing we do is not to allow the defendant to forage through the files of the FBI to see what relates to the testimony. We lay down the rule that it is the judge who may determine what relates to the testimony, and give the defendant only what actually, in the view of the judge, relates to what the witness has already testified to. In that way we have done everything that can humanly be done to protect the FBI files from a fishing expedition. Yet we are not depriving a defendant of material with which to defend himself according to the Constitution.

The bill is designed to protect, and does protect, the FBI files to the full extent they ought to be protected, consistent with the right of the individual to due process—which must then run the gauntlet of the Supreme Court. I believe the bill with the amendment of the Senator from Illinois could not successfully run that gauntlet.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I appreciate very much the remarks of the Senator from New York.

Is there today any provision of law that a witness may be impeached by a prior contradicting statement written by a third person, which statement the witness himself—let us stipulate—has never seen? Is that possible?

Mr. JAVITS. In the first place, that is not the amendment of the Senator from Illinois. The witness may very well have seen it, but the witness did not sign it or record it.

Mr. KUCHEL. No, I am speaking now about the language of the substitute amendment to which no one objects; namely, that if a statement is approved by the witness, it can be used as a basis for impeachment.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. KUCHEL. As I understand, if the word "records" remains in the substitute amendment, that word is sufficiently broad to include a statement made by a witness to a third party, which statement the witness himself has never seen.

Mr. JAVITS. The case to which I should like to refer the Senator is that of Asgill v. United States (16 Fed. (2d) 775, Circuit Court of Appeals 4), decided in 1932. In that case, the Government's chief witness denied that she knew the contents of certain letters written on her behalf by a private person, and contradicting her testimony. However, the defendant, through other witnesses, presented testimony that the letters were dictated in her presence. The court held that was sufficient foundation to introduce the letters for impeachment purposes. I cite that case in that connection.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wonder whether either side will yield 1 or 2 minutes to me.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wish to say that I think the last decision cited by the Senator from New York is quite clearly covered by the language of the amendment in the nature of a substitute around which the present controversy does not revolve, because the amendment in the nature of a substitute states, in part:

> Statements * * * which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him.

If I make a statement in the presence of the Senator from Illinois, and if my statement is taken down, and if I see it and read it, and do not make any correction in it, I think it fair to infer that it is my statement.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I believe the Asgill case holds that when the witness adopts the statement at the trial, or when there is evidence at the trial which shows that the witness adopted it, that is adequate, whether the witness adopted it before or not. That is the key of the argument I am making in connection with this amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me say that a statement made to a third party would not be admissible. Only an oral statement made to an agent of the Government, not to a third party, would be admissible.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, on that point, will the Senator from Wyoming yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Wyoming, as it is mine, that summaries, for example—as has previously been stated—made by someone who did not hear the oral statement, would not come within the meaning of the word "records" in this instance?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly they would not.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. The record has to be made by the person to whom the oral statement was made, in order to be admissible; is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, in that connection, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HRUSKA. In lines 12 and 13 of the amendment in the nature of a substitute, where reference is made to "made by the witness to an agent of the Government."

Do those words modify the words "oral statements", or do they modify the words "records of"?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. They modify the phrase "records of oral statements."

Mr. HRUSKA. If that be true, I should like to have the legislative history in connection with this matter clearly shown.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, that is absolutely the case.

Mr. HRUSKA. Because I have read that part of the language a number of times, and I construed it to modify the word "statements."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no; it modifies the phrase "records of oral statements made."

Mr. HRUSKA. If that is true, the word "records" is greatly limited.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is what I have been trying to tell the Senate all afternoon.

Mr. HRUSKA. But the Senator from Illinois stated at least six different classifications of witnesses as to whom the records made by others could be used.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. With all due respect to the Senator from Illinois, I think his illustrations were not in point.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, with all due respect to the Senator from Wyoming, this is the first time I have heard him make that comment with reference to the statement made by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I have said it over and over again, namely, that the phrase "and any transcriptions or records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government"—and let me say that no comma appears in that entire phrase—relates to the subject matter about which the witness has testified, and that subject matter is "records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government."

Mr. HRUSKA. Yes. So it is the position of the Senator from Wyoming, is it, that the words "records of oral statements" are the words to which the words "made by the witness to an agent of the Government" relate? Is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I still hope the amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be agreed to, despite the explanation which has been given.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am ready to vote.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, to be sure that the legislative history is clearly made, I now refer to the sentence following the one which has been under discussion in the last few minutes. The following sentence reads, in part, as follows:

> If the entire contents of any such statements, transcription, or records relate to the subject matter of the testimony.

In that connection, one will still be up against the question of how the court will interpret the word "records." That is the seat of all the trouble, and it is responsible for the anxiety of the law-enforcement branch of the Government.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We can dismiss all of it now, very clearly, because I say to the Senator from Illinois positively, and as a part of the legislative record, that the words the Senator from Illinois has just read have the same interpretation as the words preceding them, which I read a moment ago to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. President, let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNAMARA in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield back the remainder of the time under his control?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield back the remainder of the time under my control.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time has been yielded back.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to the O'Mahoney amendment in the nature of a substitute, as modified. [Putting the question.]

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

So the amendment of Mr. DIRKSEN to the O'Mahoney amendment, as modified, was rejected.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk, which I call up and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], as modified, it is proposed on page 3, beginning immediately after the word "shall" in line 23, to strike out all down to and including line 3 on page 4, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

> Strike from the record the testimony of the witness and the trial shall proceed unless the court in its discretion shall determine that the interests of justice require that a mistrial be declared.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have consulted the Senator from Nebraska with reference to this amendment. I see no great difference between the amendment he offers and the amendment as it lies on the desk awaiting action. I am willing to accept the amendment and take it to conference, in the interest of expediting action.

Mr. HRUSKA. I am grateful to the Senator from Wyoming for his statement.

Mr. HRUSKA subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to have printed in the RECORD a statement of my own preparation with reference to the amendment which was accepted by the Senator from Wyoming to subsection (c), at the point in the RECORD immediately after its acceptance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HRUSKA's statement is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HRUSKA

In support of the amendment which I have proposed to section (c) of the substitute bill now pending before this body, I want to say that it has to deal with the situation arising in instances where the Government does not comply with the court order to produce the statements and reports of the witnesses.

In the substitute bill as pending there are three alternatives which the court may follow:

1. He may strike from the record the testimony of the witness.
2. He may declare a mistrial.
3. He may order a dismissal of the indictment.

The purpose of my amendment is to strike the third alternative; that is to say, the order dismissing the indictment. Under the amendment the trial judge would be limited to either striking the testimony from the record or declaring a mistrial.

In a criminal trial dismissal is equivalent to acquittal. It is not appealable. This means that if the trial judge should dismiss the indictment the defendant would be freed. Inasmuch as he had already been placed in jeopardy, he could not be reindicted, according to the understanding which I have of the law pertaining to that situation. It is true that the Government could appeal the ruling of the trial court, but it would be solely for purposes of establishing precedent. It would not enable the Government to retry the case. It is submitted that by vesting the trial judge with the power to dismiss he is given powers far too great. It would mean that there would be no appeal and no possibility of very important cases being followed through to conclusion on their merits.

If a mistrial is declared, the decision of the trial court in formulating the motion to produce is reviewed by the circuit court and passed upon. If it is confirmed no harm is done. If the trial court is reversed the trial will then proceed without any harmful effect to the cause of bringing a defendant to the bar of justice for completion of the trial.

With the trial court limited to two alternatives—namely, to strike the testimony of the witness or to declare a mistrial—the purposes of the act would be subserved. It should be pointed out that in the Jencks decision of the Supreme Court it was not possible for the defendant to be retried inasmuch as the Supreme Court ordered dismissal of the cause. The trial court was not given an opportunity to retry the case, thus giving to the Government the choice of either producing the statements and reports referred to in the decision or of dismissing the case in the alternative. It is therefore my hope that the proposed amendment will be adopted in order that it will assume the same form in this particular respect which this section enjoyed in previous versions of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, do I understand the amendment was adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I call up my amendment——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana will state his point of order.

Mr. LONG. Was the last amendment submitted to the Senate for a vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming indicated he agreed to the amendment, which modified his amendment accordingly. Therefore, it was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. What did the Senate do?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming had the right to modify his amendment in accordance with the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. The Senate has not voted yet on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS] will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. Beginning with the word "In" in line 16, page 2, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the period in line 22, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) In the event that the United States claims that any statement, transcription, or record ordered to be produced under this section contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver such statement, transcription, or record for the inspection of the court in camera.

On page 3, lines 13 and 14, strike out "subsection" and insert in lieu thereof "section."

On page 3, line 19, strike out "(c)," and insert in lieu thereof "(d)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be considered en bloc.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York if this is the amendment the Senator discussed with me earlier this afternoon?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly. The Senator has been shown a copy.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. This is that amendment?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am willing to accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming modifies his amendment accordingly.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, I should like to address a question to the Senator from New York.

I did not understand the latter part of the amendment striking out certain sections. Does the amendment strike out a part of the amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. JAVITS. The amendment strikes out nothing at all. What the amendment does is to let stand the language as a new subsection (c) in order to comprise within the powers of the court the alternative ways of producing material under this bill, if it becomes law, which are that they might be produced under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or might be produced pursuant to provisions of this bill. This is an effort to tighten up further on the question of the FBI files and how they should be covered.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. JAVITS. Certainly.

Mr. REVERCOMB. The amendment does not strike out any part of (b), (c), or (d), except, as I understand, the language in line 16 on page 2?

Mr. JAVITS. It does not strike out that language, either. It is simply written that way in the text. It actually adds two things. First, there is added the subsection "(c)" in front of the words "in the event" in line 16 on page 2; and, second, after the word "produced," which comes on line 18, there are added the words "under this section."

Mr. REVERCOMB. The amendment strikes out the language and adds the language back, with a few additional words?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Is subsection (c) relettered?

Mr. JAVITS. That subsection is relettered (d).

Mr. REVERCOMB. I thank the Senator.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COTTON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as modified, offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, it is my understanding—and I am speaking now for the information of all Senators—that the vote will be on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by me, as modified by the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], which was adopted on Friday night, the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], which was accepted by me this afternoon, and the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], which has also been made a part of my amendment.

In that case, when the Senate votes, those Senators who are in favor of the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the chairman of the subcommittee will vote "aye"; and those who are against it will vote "no."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement of the Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, at this point in the RECORD I should like to ask unanimous consent to have printed an amplified statement with respect to the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DIRKSEN

As a cosponsor of this bill (S. 2377) which provides for the production of statements, transcriptions, and reports of Government witnesses in criminal cases, I fully agree with the Attorney General that "a grave emergency in law enforcement," has arisen stemming from the conflicting interpretations of the Jencks decision by many district courts as well as circuit courts of appeal.

My colleagues are well aware that recently the Supreme Court handed down a number of decisions that have caused much controversy and confusion and stimulated a nationwide demand for clarifying and corrective legislation by the Congress of the United States. Among these recent decisions is the case of Clinton E. Jencks, petitioner, v. The United States of America, which was decided on June 3, 1957.

Briefly, the issue in the Jencks case involved the procedure under which a defendant may inspect a statement of a Government witness, in order to impeach the credibility of said witness. The argument of the case centered on whether it was necessary for the defendant to establish a foundation of inconsistency between the testimony of the witness and the statement, before the statement was made available to the defense. The Court held that numerous lower court cases, holding that such a foundation was necessary, were wrong and that statements which relate to the testimony of the witnesses must be made available to the defense without requiring the defense to establish some inconsistency. I accept this principle.

Nevertheless, while the principle is acceptable, there is an urgent need for legislation outlining the procedure to be followed in judiciously carrying out this principle while keeping in mind the rights and security of people.

This bill provides for statements, transcriptions, and reports of Government witnesses, in criminal cases, to be handed over to a defendant but, at the same time, establishes a procedural device for its orderly and judicious delivery without impairing the rights of the defendant or the security of the Nation.

Daily since the Jencks decision, cases have been called to the attention of Congress by the Department of Justice and published widely by the press which are vivid illustrations of the urgent need for the passage of this bill.

Primarily the confusion and misinterpretation by courts, Government attorneys, and defense lawyers extends from the area as to when the reports should be delivered to the defense, i. e., before, during, or after trial; the extent that the file should be turned over to the defense for the purpose of testing credibility and possibly impeaching the witness; and, finally, to whom—the court or the defense?

It is difficult to understand by what stretch of the imagination or extension of legalistic semantics anyone could misinterpret the Jencks decision as to when the statements or reports should be produced. The Supreme Court stated clearly:

"We now hold that the petitioner was entitled to an order directing the Government to produce for inspection all reports of Matusow and Ford in its possession, written and, when orally made, as recorded by the FBI, touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial."

Again the Court states:

"Relevancy and materiality for purposes of production and inspection, with a view to use on cross-examination, are established when the reports are shown to relate to the testimony of the witness."

Further in the concluding paragraph of the Jencks decision the Supreme Court said:

"We hold that the criminal action must be dismissed when the Government, on the ground of privilege, elects not to comply with an order to produce, for the accused's inspection and for admission into evidence, relevant statements or reports in its possession of Government witnesses touching the subject matter of their testimony at trial."

Obviously the Court did not mean prior to trial or after trial, but during trial after the witness had testified.

Senate bill 2377, as amended, carrys out the strong intentions and statements of the Court by providing in section (b) the following:

"After a witness called by the United States has testified on direct examination, the court shall, on motion of the defendant, order the United States to produce any written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him, and any transcriptions or recordings of oral statements made by the witness to a Government agent, relating to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified."

Regardless of the Court's strong pronouncement that the statements of a Government witness after he has testified must be produced when there is reason to believe that the witness has made conflicting statements to a Government agent, there are those who feel that this bill will repeal all discovery, subpena, and deposition rules of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

I say to them that the Supreme Court at no time in the majority, concurring or dissenting opinions mentioned subpena, deposition, discovery, or any of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, in considering the Jencks decision. Further, Congress never contemplated in the passage of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or in any other law of trial procedure that such statements be subject to pretrial production unless, as provided by rule 16, obtained by seizure or by process.

Of course, there are those who will quickly refer to the Fryer case (207 F. 2d 134) in which a defendant was charged with a capital offense. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit reversed the district court and ruled in effect that since the law (18 U. S. C. 3432) provides that the Government must supply the defense with a list of Government witnesses in a capital case that the reports and statements of said witnesses must also be turned over to the defense prior to trial. Is it not obvious that if Congress desired to include the statements of Government witnesses it would have said so? This is clearly another example of judge-made law, departing from the clear statement and intention of Congress.

The second controversial question that has led to much confusion is as to the extent that the files should be made available to the defendant.

Firstly, the Court said:

"We now hold that the petitioner was entitled to an order directing the Government to produce for inspections all reports of Matusow and Ford in its possession, written and, when orally made, as recorded by the FBI, touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial."

Secondly, the Court favorably quoted the Gordon case (344 U. S. 414) as follows: "[T]he demand was for the production of * * * specific documents and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government on the chance that something impeaching might turn up. Nor was this a demand for statements taken from persons or informants not offered as witnesses."

The Court further stated: "We reaffirm and reemphasize these essentials," and then quoted from the Gordon case:

"For production purposes, it need only appear that the evidence is relevant, competent, and outside of any exclusionary rule."

Surely it is clear from the above language that the Court did not say that the entire file or the hearsay reports of informers or others, not witnesses, or memoranda of Government agents must be turned over to the defense.

Senate bill 2377 expresses the opinon of the Court by providing in section (b) that the Government must produce any written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him, and any transcriptions or recordings of oral statements made by the witness to a Federal law officer relating to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified.

While the protection of law-enforcement techniques, sources of intelligence, and protection of confidential informants is vital to the Government, it is just as vital that the raw material, which might include hearsay or irrelevant matters, not be opened, for we must protect innocent people and others not charged with crime. Indeed, the opening of the entire file could be tragic—not only to justice—but to the people and Government of the United States, and its allies in cases involving treason or sabotage.

This bill, therefore, in addition to providing that only statements written or oral of Government witnesses that have been signed, adopted or approved by him be delivered directly to the defense, provides in section (b) that the United States may, upon order of the court, deliver said statements to the court for its inspection in camera. The court shall then excise the portions of such statement, transcription, or recording that do not relate to the testimony of the defendant and that are otherwise incompetent or within any exclusionary rule.

The Court in the Jencks decision stated that it would disapprove a procedure of submission to the trial court in camera of such statements and further stated that justice required that said statements be delivered directly to the defendant.

In many cases it is wise to look for what the Court did not say. In this case, while it strongly indicated its disapproval, it did not say that such a procedure would violate "due process" and hence be unconstitutional. In fact, Justices Burton and Harlan specifically approved and Justice Clark stated that he would have no objection to this procedure which is followed in Senate bill 2377. Moreover, on June 28, 1957, when the Attorney General appeared before the subcommittee on improvements in the Federal Criminal Code of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the committee asked the following question: "Inasmuch as the Supreme Court in the majority opinion condemns so clearly this method, is it still your opinion that this bill does meet all constitutional requirements and due process?" The Attorney General replied: "After careful consideration we have come to that conclusion, that it does meet all requirements of due process and it is constitutional and it is a procedural matter within the proper province of the Congress."

Lastly, there have been a number of expressions by Members of Congress and the press, that the provisions of section (c) which would allow the United States to elect not to comply with an order of the Court to deliver under section (b) after testimony of the Government witness would be grossly unfair to the defense.

Of course, most informed persons will agree that after a jury has heard a damaging statement and the Government elects not to deliver the statement of the witness no mere order by a trial court to strike the testimony from the record will entirely erase the impression on the juror's mind.

But section (c) also provides that the court, in its discretion, may declare a mistrial or grant a motion to dismiss the case or any other motion that would serve the interests of justice in the instant case. Those who would prejudge the district courts of unfairness would be guilty of an unfair imputation against the Federal courts of the United States.

In conclusion, it is my opinion, shared by many of my colleagues, the Attorney General, trial courts, practicing attorneys and law enforcement bodies throughout the Government, that the Jencks decision as stated in the majority opinion of the Supreme Court has created a grave problem in law enforcement which jeopardizes the orderly function of Government to protect the people against violators of Federal law.

It is my since hope that this urgent legislation be approved by this body prior to adjournment, otherwise many racketeers, spies, narcotics peddlers, and other criminals may go free to prey upon the good people of our country and endanger the security of our Nation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the time on the substitute amendment, except to take 1 minute to say that while this perhaps is a personal opinion I think that by the bill in its present form we are compounding the confusion under the Jencks case decision. For that reason I feel impelled to vote against the amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill which was originally reported by the subcommittee and the full Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Illinois yields back the remainder of his time on the amendment in the nature of a substitute?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield back the remainder of my time on the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time on the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute, as modified, offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY]. [Putting the question.]

The amendment of Mr. O'MAHONEY in the nature of a substitute, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I hope that the bill, as amended, may be voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 2377) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is time remaining on the question of the passage of the bill. Is the time yielded back?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I yield back the time on the bill, if the acting majority leader is prepared to do so.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to yield back my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back.

The bill having been read the third time, the question is, shall it pass? [Putting the question.]

The bill (S. 2377) was passed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as a part of the record on the bill a brief with respect to the technicalities of this measure.

There being no objection, the brief was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT FILES IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS IN UNITED STATES COURTS

I. PURPOSE AND OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL

The specific purpose of S. 2377, as amended, is to amend chapter 223, entitled "Witnesses and Evidence" of title 18, United States Code, by adding a new section 3500, to be entitled "Demands for Production of Statements and Reports of Witnesses."

The objectives of the bill are twofold: (1) To clarify the principle in the opinion handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States on June 3, 1957, in the case of Clinton E. Jencks, petitioner v. United States of America, and (2) to provide for the orderly implementation of that principle by establishing a set procedure to regularize the demand for, and production of, statements and reports of witnesses in the Government files. It is well to emphasize that this bill deals only with reports and statements of witnesses made to an agent of the Government.

II. BACKGROUND OF THE JENCKS DECISION

Clinton E. Jencks, as president of a local labor union, filed in 1950 a sworn affidavit, as required by law, with the National Labor Relations Board "that he is not a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party." Subsequently, he was indicted under title 18, United States Code, section 1001 (which makes the willful filing of a false statement a crime punishable by a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both) for falsely swearing in that affidavit that he was not a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party.

At the trial the Government relied heavily upon the testimony of two Communist Party members who had become undercover agents for the FBI. They were J. W. Ford and Harvey Matusow. These witnesses for the Government testified at length on direct examination during the trial as to events, conversations, et cetera, which had occurred over the past several years and which, according to their testimony, would prove that Jencks was a Communist.

Upon cross-examination by Jencks' attorney, both witnesses testified that these events, conversations, et cetera, were covered in reports submitted to the FBI. However, neither witness could remember which reports were oral and which were written. Moreover, although he had testified fluently as to the events, conversations, et cetera, Matusow upon cross-examination admitted that "I don't recall what I put in my reports 2 or 3 years ago, written or oral, I don't know what they were."

At this point in the trial (and repeatedly thereafter) the attorney for the defendant Jencks, recognizing the value of the reports for impeachment purposes, petitioned the court for "an order requiring the Government to produce, for inspection by the court, the reports relating to those matters about which each witness had testified." The request was "limited to a narrow category of reports dealing with specified meetings and conversations."[1] "The procedure to be followed was carefully specified: the court was to determine whether the reports had evidentiary value for impeachment of the credibility of Ford or Matusow; if the court found that they had value for that purpose, it was then to make them available to petitioner for his use in cross-examination. The purpose of the requests—to impeach the credibility of crucial Government witnesses—was made clear. Petitioner did not ask to inspect the documents himself; he sought access only to those portions of the reports which the trial court might determine to have evidentiary value for impeachment purposes, and to be unprivileged." "The Government opposed each motion solely on the ground that no showing of contradiction or inconsistency between the witness' testimony and his reports had been made." (Pp. 1 and 2 of the concurring opinion.)

The trial court, because no preliminary foundation of inconsistency was laid by the defense, denied all such motions to produce the reports and statements of Ford and Matusow. The court of appeals, also, rested the affirmance upon that ground.

The Supreme Court granted certiorari and, on June 3, 1957, handed down its opinion in the case.

The majority, in holding both the trial court and the court of appeals in error, made the following rulings based on the facts of the case:

"1. That the defense was entitled, without laying a preliminary foundation of inconsistency, to an order directing the Government to produce for inspection all reports of Matusow and Ford, in its possession, written and, when orally made, as recorded, touching the events and activities as to which they testified at the trial.

"2. That the defense is entitled to inspect the reports to decide whether to use them in his defense [and] The practice of producing Government documents to the trial judge for his determination of relevancy and materiality without hearing the accused is disapproved.

"3. That only after inspection of the reports by the defense, must the trial judge determine admissibility, e. g., evidentiary questions of inconsistency, materiality, and relevancy—of the contents and the method to be employed for the elimination of parts immaterial and irrelevant.

"4. That the Government has a privilege, based on national security, confidential character of the reports, public interest, et cetera, but a criminal action must be dismissed if the Government, on the ground of privilege, elects not to comply with an order to produce, for the accused's inspection and for admission in evidence, relevant statements or reports in its possession of Government witnesses touching upon the subject matter of their testimony at the trial.

"5. That the burden is on the Government, and is not to be shifted to the trial judge, to decide whether the public prejudice of allowing the crime to go unpunished is greater than that attendant upon the possible disclosure of State secrets and other confidential information in the Government's possession."

Concurring in the result of the majority, but with different reasoning, were Justices Burton and Harlan. They stated, with regard to the principle involved, that a sufficient foundation had been laid as to the existence and importance of the reports and that, under the circumstances of the case, the defense was entitled to an order for the production of the reports without laying a foundation of contradiction or inconsistency.

At this point, however, Justices Burton and Harlan parted company with the majority and stated that they would not replace the inflexible and narrow rule adopted by the courts below with the broader but equally rigid rule announced by the Court. To them, "In matters relating to the production of evidence or the scope of cross-examination, a large discretion must be allowed the trial judge."

They pointed out that the Court went beyond the request of the petitioner in the case, i. e., that reports be produced for examination by the trial court. Justices Burton and Harlan stated that:

"The Government's privileges with respect to state secrets and the identity of confidential informants embody important considerations of public policy. They are peculiar privileges in that they require the withholding of evidence not only from the jury, but also from the defendant. Once the defendant learns the state secret or the identity of the informer, the underlying basis for the privilege disappears, and there usually remains little need to conceal the privileged evidence from the jury."

And—of course—since the trials are held in public, the state secret handed to the defendant and the jury would become public knowledge.

Thus, Justices Burton and Harlan, continue:

"When the Government is a party, the preservation of these privileges is dependent upon nondisclosure of the privileged evidence to the defendant. This makes it necessary for the trial court, before disclosing the privileged material to the defendant, to pass on the question by examining in camera the portions claimed to be privileged."

Furthermore, the concurring Justices add:

"There is nothing novel or unfair about such a procedure. According to Wigmore, it is customary. * * * Numerous Federal de-

[1] At this point, the decision contained, as a footnote, the following language from the brief filed by the attorney for Jencks: "Petitioner asked only that the reports be produced to the trial judge so that he could examine them and determine whether they had evidentiary value for impeachment purposes. Petitioner sought access only to those portions of the reports having this value. The motion therefore proposed no broad foray into the Government's files and afforded the judge every opportunity to protect the Government's legitimate privilege as to the matters not connected with this case."

cisions have followed this practice with respect to the type of documents here involved—contemporaneous reports made by a Government investigator or informer who later testifies at the trial. This procedure protects the legitimate public interest in safeguarding executive files. It also respects the interests of justice by permitting an accused to receive all information necessary lic interests."[3]

"The trial judge exercises his discretion with knowledge of the issues involved in the case, the nature and importance of the Government's interest in maintaining secrecy, and the defendant's need for disclosure. By vesting this discretion in the trial judge, the conflicting interests are balanced, and a just decision is reached in the individual case without needless sacrifice of important public interests.[2]

Justices Burton and Harlan concluded with these words: "Petitioner requested only that the records be produced to the trial court. He is entitled to no more."

Justice Clark dissented, arguing that the majority had fashioned a new rule of evidence in holding that:

"The criminal action must be dismissed when the Government, on the grounds of privilege, elects not to comply with an order to produce, for the accused's inspection and for admission in evidence, relevant statements or reports in its possession of Government witnesses touching the subject matter of their tsetimony at the trial."

Justice Clark was opposed to the production of the documents, but if there were compelling reasons for producing them he felt they should be delivered to the trial judge for his determination of whether the defendant should be permitted to examine them, saying, "This is the procedure followed in some of our circuits."

III. WHAT THE LEGISLATION DOES

The bill, S. 2377, adopts the principle in the majority opinion of the Jencks decision, insofar as it requires the Government to produce the statements and reports of a witness in the possession of the Government, written and, when orally made, as recorded, touching the events and activities as to which the Government witness has testified at the trial. The bill, however, adopts the procedure set forth in the concurring opinion for implementing the principle, as adopted. Specifically, S. 2377 provides:

"1. An exclusive procedure to be followed during trial in demands for, and production of, statements and reports of witnesses made to, and in the possession of, the Government.

"2. Only written statements previously made by the witness in the possession of the United States which are signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him, and any transcriptions or records of oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government, relating to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified are subject for production under this proposed new section 3500. Except, if the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure require the production of any statement or report of a Government witness, such statement or report shall be produced in accordance with the procedure established in this section."

"3. That such statements and reports of a Government witness shall be produced only after such witness has testified on direct examination during the trial.

"4. That, if the entire contents of the statements or reports relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order them delivered directly to the defendant for his examination and use.

"5. That, in the event the United States claims that any statement or report ordered to be produced contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver such statement or recording for the inspection of the court in camera.

"6. That, upon delivery, the court shall excise the portions of such statement or report which do not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness and, with such material excised, the court shall then direct delivery to the defendant for his use.

"7. That, if any portion of such statements or reports are withheld from the defendant, the entire text shall be preserved by the United States and, in the event the defendant appeals, shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge.

"8. That, in the event the United States fails to comply with an order of the court to deliver to the defendant such statements or reports, or portions thereof, the court shall strike from the record the testimony of the witness and the trial shall proceed unless the court in its discretion shall determine that the interests of justice require that a mistrial be declared."

The course of action to be pursued by the trial judge must depend upon the importance of the testimony, the documents to be produced, and other facts and circumstances.

IV. NEED FOR THE LEGISLATION

The need for this legislation is becoming more apparent each day as a growing number of conflicting decisions—even within judicial districts—is handed down by the courts. Many of these interpretations are just short of being revolutionary—ordering the Government to hand over to the defense its entire case in advance of trial; ordering the production of entire investigative files and grand jury proceedings; and even ordering the release of convicted kidnappers when the Government objected to producing its entire FBI file in the case.

These interpretations demonstrate the need for a regular procedure to handle demands for, and production of, statements and reports of witnesses in the Government files if we are to prevent serious damages to Federal law enforcement.

Conflicting interpretations

Within One Judicial District

The conflicting interpretations of the Jencks decision are well illustrated in the Southern District of Texas where the differing interpretations go both to the time of production and to the kind of documents to be produced.

One United States district judge, involving defendant Young, granted the defense's request and ordered the United States Attorney to turn over to the defense its entire FBI investigative file, prior to the trial. [To add insult to injury, the attorney for the defense asked the United States Attorney to mail him the file] (United States v. Young).

Another United States District Judge, in the same judicial district, involving defendant Parr, restricted his order for production to only relevant statements and reports, after the witnesses had testified. [Parenthetically, this is believed to be the correct interpretation of the Supreme Court's decision] (United States v. Parr et al.).

In Other Judicial Districts

In judicial districts throughout the United States the courts have reached equally varying interpretations as to the meaning and scope of the Jencks decision. The following cases are illustrative:

1. VARYING INTERPRETATIONS AS TO THE MATERIALS TO BE PRODUCED

Entire investigative reports

(a) In a wagering tax act case tried in Atlanta, Ga., defense counsel moved for the production of an entire intelligence report after the first Government witness, a group supervisor, had testified. The witness had testified only as to his personal knowledge, details of the raid and arrest. He also testified that as supervisor he had read the report of investigation prepared by other agents who had not testified. The court ordered the production of the entire report and when the Government resisted the court dismissed the action contending that the Government's intention to delete nonrelevant portions of the report did not comply with the Jencks decision. (United States v. Stanley.)

(b) Recently also in Atlanta, Ga., the Government suffered a dismissal of a check forgery case when the order of the court to produce an entire Secret Service report was resisted. The Government offered to produce that portion of the report concerning which the Secret Service agent had testified. The remainder of the report concerned another check forgery by the defendant about which the agent had not testified and which was not part of the charge. The Government had indicated at the outset of the trial that it would not introduce evidence concerning this check and, as a matter of fact, one of the witnesses to that offense had died. The report contained other extraneous matters not related to the testimony or the charge. (United States v. White.)

(c) In a narcotics case tried in Pittsburgh shortly after the Jencks decision, defense counsel sought the production and inspection of the entire Narcotics Bureau report after the Government agent had testified. The report covered all of the investgation of the case. The judge ordered the production of the entire report. When the United States attorney declined to produce the entire report for inspection by the defense, the court summarily dismissed the case. (United States v. Clark.)

(d) In an antitrust case, also tried in the western district of Pennsylvania, the Government was required to dispense with material testimony of FBI agents because of the court's ruling that if the agents testified their entire reports would have to be given the defense (United States v. Erie County Malt Beverage Distributing Association).

(e) In another narcotics case, which Commissioner Anslinger reported to the committee, the defense attorney asked for the production of any statements that the Government witness was testifying from and any intelligence reports submitted to the Government in the investigation carried on in connection with this case. The court ordered that the Government produce for inspection by the defense any of the reports relating to the events and activities about which either of the witnesses had testified or is expected to testify. The United States attorney assured the court there were no written statements by the witnesses but declined to produce the entire report. The court, without further discussion, dismissed the cast. (United States v. Leonard.)

Grand jury testimony

Although a brief time has elapsed since the Supreme Court decided Jencks, appellate courts have had opportunities to express opinions as to certain aspects of the application of that decision. It is not surprising that lower court confusion has seeped into at least one of these holdings:

In an opinion by the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit the judgment of conviction in the Eastern District of Pennsylvania was reversed and a new trial ordered. The case involved the transportation in interstate commerce of a check

[2] Privileged material sometimes can be excised from the reports without destroying their value to the defendant. Only when deletion is impracticable is the court compelled to choose between disclosing the document as a whole and withholding it completely. Material withheld from the defendant should be sealed as part of the record so that an appellate court may review the action of the trial court and correct any abuse of discretion.

obtained by fraud. The principal Government witness had made a detailed statement to the FBI before trial. The trial judge denied a pretrial motion by the defense for permission to examine the testimony of the witness before the grand jury and his statement to the FBI. During the trial the testimony and statements were produced for examination by the trial judge in camera, who indicated to defense counsel wherein the witness' testimony in court differed. The defendant's attorney was not permitted to examine the grand jury testimony. The court of appeals based its reversal on the failure of the trial judge to permit the defense to inspect the grand jury testimony and statement, relying on the Jencks decision. (United States v. Joel Rosenberg.)

It should be noted that grand jury testimony in Federal courts is protected from disclosure by a Federal rule of criminal procedure, 6 (e), and it is within the discretion of the trial judge to decide when grand jury testimony is to be revealed to the defense after a proper foundation is laid. Jencks makes no reference to this rule and such a disclosure was not mentioned directly or indirectly in the opinion.

Nevertheless, in United States v. Parr, cited above, in the southern district of Texas, the Federal district judge ruled on the basis of the Jencks decision that the Government had to produce the testimony of witnesses before State grand juries. State grand jury proceedings, of course, are not protected by the Federal rules and such an interpretation of the Jencks decision would throw State grand jury proceedings wide open in Federal trials.

Against disclosure of entire files and grand jury testimony

Not all the courts, by any means, have made such far-reaching interpretations of the Jencks decision. To be sure, the overwhelming judicial thought, expressed in rulings based on the Jencks decision, holds that the Supreme Court's decision does not require the production of entire legislative files, grand jury proceedings, and similar materials.

For example, contrary to the opinion of the Court of Appeals of the Third Circuit, just cited, that grand jury proceedings are to be disclosed pursuant to the Jencks decision, is the ruling of an United States district judge in New Jersey:

In a Veterans' Administration fraud case in New Jersey the defense motion for pretrial production of the grand jury testimony was denied. In denying the production of grand jury testimony, the court properly pointed to rule 6 (e) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure which protects the secrecy of grand jury proceedings. Moreover, the court held that a motion to "open up grand jury testimony before trial is premature and that the need for such disclosure must be presented to the court during the trial" (United States v. Grossman et al.).

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, in an opinion upholding a murder conviction, expressed their view of the limitations of the Jencks decision in these words:

"Appellant cites the recent opinion of the Supreme Court in Jencks v. United States. But that case does not resemble the present one. There a witness had testified to certain facts; the prosecution was alleged to have in its possession a report made by the same witness to the FBI, concerning the same facts, the report being made contemporaneously with the occurrence of the facts, and this report was alleged to be inconsistent with the testimony of the witness on the stand. The court did not intimate approval of unlimited examination into FBI files in the hope that something might turn up of benefit to the accused. As a matter of fact the court made amply clear the continued prohibition upon judicial invasion of executive internal memorandums and reports. The court cited and italicized its holding in the Gordon case that the demand there approved was for the production of specific documents and did not propose any broad or blind fishing expedition among documents possessed by the Government." (Calvin G. Simms v. United States.).

An interpretation which sets a standard, based on the Jencks decision, was made by Judge George H. Moore of the Eastern District of Missouri in a Finding of Fact and Conclusion of Law filed June 18, 1957, in a labor racketeering case. Judge Moore stated in part:

"(1) Before a defendant in a criminal case is entitled to production and inspection of a statement made by a person other than himself in the possession of the United States (a) such person must have been called as a witness by the United States, (b) the defendant must establish on cross-examination that the statement was made by such witness, (c) that such statement is in possession of the United States, and (d) that such statement touches the events and activities related in his direct examination. (2) Such statements must either have been (a) written by the witness himself, or (b) recorded by someone acting for the United States.

"Category (b) includes only continuous, narrative statements made by the witness recorded verbatim, or nearly so, and does not include notes made during the course of an investigation (or reports compiled therefrom) which contain the subjective impressions, opinions, or conclusions of the person or persons making such notes" (United States v. Anderson et al.).

It is important to recognize the inroads into the files of the Government which are resulting from the broad interpretations of the Jencks decision. In this connection, a letter from the United States attorney for the southern district of Texas, reads in part:

"In response to demands of defense counsel and orders of the court 122 documents were turned over to defense counsel for inspection and use on cross-examination." They consisted of sworn statements of witnesses, reports of investigative agents, question-and-answer interrogatories, and State grand jury transcripts" (United States v. Parr).

2. VARYING INTERPRETATIONS AS TO THE TIME FOR DEMAND AND PRODUCTION OF WITNESSES' STATEMENTS

The courts are also unable to reach similar interpretations as to the proper time for demand, and production of, materials from the Government's files. Rulings have been handed down ordering the production of material (1) in advance of trial, (2) during trial, and (3) after trial and conviction. The following cases are illustrative of the problem:

Disclosure in advance of trial

(a) Prior to the trial of a complex and important fraud and bribery case in Seattle, Wash., involving Navy contracts and a former naval officer, the United States attorney was served with a subpena duces tecum to produce for inspection all FBI reports and documents. The court ordered compliance with the subpena modified only to produce before trial relevant statements of prospective Government witnesses to any Government agency whether written or oral. The judge dismissed the action on the defendant's motion after the Government had resisted and argued at length against the applicability of Jencks to this situation. He stated: "If the Government can be required to produce statements of its witnesses after they have testified, there is no valid reason for not requiring such production a reasonable time in advance of trial in order to permit a defendant to use them in preparing his case. * * * Additional witnesses could also be called, provided the statements of such witnesses were furnished to the defense in advance of the witnesses' testimony" (United States v. Apex Distributing Co.)

(b) Perhaps the most widely publicized decision illustrating the disturbing conflict of judicial opinion in applying Jencks to pretrial disclosure occurred in one of a number of related Federal Housing Administration criminal fraud cases in Bowling Green, Ky. The defense moved for pretrial examination of all documents, exhibits and statements intended for trial use and the court granted the motion. The Department instructed the United States attorney not to produce and furnished him with copies of opinions from other courts reasoning against such pretrial production under Jencks. When the FBI agent appeared in court with the United States attorney the judge inquired of him why he had refused the request of defense counsel in compliance with the court order. The agent cited Departmental Order 3229 in stating that he was without authority to make the statements available. The court, after a lengthy and heated statement held the FBI agent in civil contempt, imposed a fine of $1,000, suspending payment until October 18, 1957, to give the agent an opportunity to comply with the order or to appeal to a higher court. In his ruling, the judge stated: "I cannot understand why the United States would object to a full compliance with the order. It seems clear that the language of Jencks decision entirely dissipates any thought that the court must wait until the trial of the case before requiring the production of documents. There could be no reason for such a rule." (United States v. Ernest Hall, Raleigh Meeks, et al.)

Disclosure during trial

In direct contradiction to these rulings are the rulings by many distinguished and experienced Federal district court judges—including Judge Palmieri, Judge Moore, Judge Hartshorne—which do not interpret the Jencks decision as providing any extension of the rights of pretrial examination.

(a) Judge Edmund L. Palmieri, of the southern district of New York, in granting the Government's request to quash a subpena duces tecum requiring the production of all relevant statements and reports * * * of Government witnesses in advance of trial, ruled: "Strict compliance with the subpena would hamper the prosecution either by requiring the expenditure of much time and effort in order to determine which statements are likely to be relevant before the testimony of the authors of the statements has been adduced at trial, or by permitting an exploration of documents possessed by the Government and which perhaps may never become relevant at the trial. Both alternatives are equally undesirable. To impose either one upon the Government would be neither realistic nor practicable.

"Totally apart from the considerations, however, I believe that the defendant's reliance upon the Jencks decision is misplaced. As I read the Supreme Court majority and concurring opinion, I find no language which would justify its application to pretrial procedure. Close scrutiny of the opinions in the Jencks case reveals no references to rule 16 or rule 17, or to disclosure in advance of trial. Moreover, it appears from the briefs before the Supreme Court that they contain no argument urging pretrial disclosure of statements of potential Government witnesses. Indeed, the very touchstone of the Jencks decision is the test of credibility of the witness at the trial. Before the defense is entitled to disclosure of any statements made by a Government witness for the purpose of discrediting him, the credibility of the witness whose prior statements are sought must be in issue. Clearly, that condition cannot be satisfied here, as the Government has not yet determined with definiteness who its witnesses will be.

"The necessary impact of the Jencks holding is that the Government must accept obligations of disclosure once its witness is called to the witness stand. But I do not understand it to mean that the vast horizon of pretrial disclosure, in the sense urged upon me on this motion, is now available to defense counsel in criminal cases. Since there is no trial in progress and since, necessarily, no witnesses have been called to testify, there is no present issue of credibility which can justify the disclosure sought by the defendants. The defendants have acted prematurely" (United States v. Benson et al.).

(b) In a case previously cited, the Veterans' Administration fraud case in New Jersey, the defense's motion for pretrial production of witnesses' statements to the FBI and the grand jury was denied by Federal District Judge Hartshorne. A similar motion to produce and permit the defendant to inspect and copy each and every document upon which the Government will rely as part of their proofs was also denied. The court emphasized that Jencks "in no wise deals with discovery before trial." The court also stated that pretrial discovery procedure is set forth in rules 16 and 17 (c) of the Rules of Criminal Procedure, and these rules were not even referred to in the Supreme Court opinion (United States v. Crossman et al.).

(c) A court in the District of Puerto Rico considered a motion for the pretrial production and inspection of complete investigative reports. Sixteen criminal cases are affected by the court ruling. After vigorous argument, the court denied the motion. The judge characterized the motion as a fishing expedition not within the scope of rules 16 and 17 (c) of the Jencks decision. The court stated he agreed with Judge Palmieri that the Jencks decision was limited to the situation where a defendant should be permitted to inspect a statement of a Government witness when that witness is called to the stand and only for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of such witness (United States v. Vasquez et al.).

(d) Judge George H. Moore of the eastern district of Missouri in a F. F. C. L. filed June 18, 1957, in a labor racketeering case, interpreted the Jencks decision as not authorizing any pretrial disclosure of statements or reports in the Government files and stated: (1) before a defendant in a criminal case is entitled to production and inspection of a statement made by a person other than himself in the possession of the United States (a) such person must have been called as a witness by the United States; (b) the defendant must establish on cross-examination that the statement was made by such witness; (c) that such statement is in the possession of the United States; and (d) that such statement touches the events and activities related in his direct examination (United States v. Anderson et al.).

Disclosure after trial

At least one Federal court has interpreted the Jencks decision to require production of FBI files after trial and when the Government objected, to upset convictions already obtained.

(a) In a kidnaping case in Rhode Island involving four defendants who were convicted of kidnaping on May 29, the court—on July 8—entered an order directing the Government to produce and permit the defense to inspect the FBI reports prepared by agents who were witnesses "as the same relate to the testimony given by them, during the trial of said cause, and touching the events, activities and interrogation of other witnesses in the case, including each of the defendants." The order also directed the production of the written and oral statements of the victim and his wife. The order permits the defense to copy or photostat the reports and statements, even authorizing the use of any recognized commercial photostating establishment at Providence, R. I. The United States attorney at the direction of the Department refused production. As a result, the judge set aside the convictions and dismissed the indictments against all four defendants (United States v. Morgan et al.).

(b) In a criminal tax evasion case, involving a defendant already convicted (before the same court in Rhode Island), the court ordered the Government to produce and permit the defense to inspect all FBI reports prepared by agents who were witnesses at the trial. The Government objected and, subsequently, the judge set the income tax conviction aside and dismissed the indictment (United States v. Nardollilo).

Disclosure of witnesses in advance of trial

At least one court has ruled, on the basis of the Jencks decision, that the Government must determine and declare in advance the witnesses it plans to call during the trial.

(a) Judge Solomon, in the United States District Court, Seattle, Wash., granted a defense motion for pretrial examination of relevant statements and reports and added: "If the Government can be required to produce statements of its witnesses after they have testified, there is no valid reason for not requiring such production a reasonable time in advance of trial in order to permit a defendant to use them in preparing his case. Except for witnesses who had made no statements which were in the possession or under the control of the United States attorney, this would require the prosecution to determine and declare in advance the witnesses which it planned to call. Additional witnesses could also be called, provided the statements of such witnesses were furnished to the defense in advance of the witnesses' testimony. Although the Government may suffer some hardship as a result of this decision, it appears from Jencks that the opportunity for the defense to prepare its case is more important in our system of justice than the inconvenience that may result to the prosecution because of such requirement" (United States v. Apex Distributing Co.).

This ruling completely ignores, but changes, existing law, which provides that the Government must furnish a list of its prospective witnesses only in cases involving capital punishment (18 U. S. C. 3432).

Opposed to disclosure of witnesses

The identical problem was met and resolved in U. S. v. Benson et al, on June 17, 1957, in the ruling handed down by Judge Palmieri in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. Judge Palmieri stated in part:

"It was conceded by defendants' counsel that a pretrial disclosure of the statements which they have requested would necessarily supply them with a roster of the names of the Government's witnesses in advance of trial, an advantage which has hitherto been denied defendants in criminal prosecutions, except in capital cases. See United States v. Carter (15 F. R. D. 367 (D. D. C. 1954) (Holtzoff, J.)). In addition to thus compelling the Government to divulge the names of its witnesses before trial, the granting of the defendants' application would cause the Government both vexation and delay. In order to comply with the subpena, the Government would have to determine in advance of trial the identity of its trial witnesses. The exigencies of a trial frequently require such decisions to be made at the last moment. United States v. Carter, supra, at 369, 370. Moreover, strict compliance with the subpena would hamper the prosecution either by requiring the expenditure of much time and effort in order to determine which statements are likely to be relevant before the testimony of the authors of the statements has been adduced at trial, or by permitting an exploration of documents possessed by the Government and which perhaps may never become relevant at the trial. Both alternatives are equally undesirable. To impose either one upon the Government would be neither realistic nor practicable" (United States v. Benson et al.).

V. THE PROBLEM CANNOT BE SOLVED VIA JUDICIAL PROCESSES, WITHOUT LEGISLATION

There are several reasons why time will not solve the problems presented by these varying interpretations and why legislation is urgently needed:

1. The Government does not have the right to appeal from orders of the court such as are involved in these cases.[3] The Government must either (1) produce such files at such times as the court orders or (2) suffer dismissal of criminal actions. Naturally, defendants are not going to appeal favorable rulings. As a consequence, it is virtually impossible to get the specific questions involved before the appellate courts.

2. Even if the questions could be brought before appellate courts, they do not have the power to reestablish the procedure, stricken down by the Supreme Court in the Jencks decision, of letting trial judges examine Government files in camera before ordering the production of relevant material to the defense for its examination and use.

Neither do they have the authority to relax the strict holding in the Jencks case which requires the dismissal of the criminal action in all cases where the statements and reports are not produced by the Government—no matter how meager or insignificant the statements or reports might be in the case. [S. 2377 solves both of these problems.]

3. The United States courts have been on vacation almost all of the time since the Jencks decision was announced, with only one or two judges sitting. As a consequence, the full impact of the Jencks decision will not be felt until courts begin their fall terms. Criminal cases are piling up, and clarifying legislation is urgently needed unless Federal law enforcement is to be severely crippled.

4. Finally, as the language of the cited cases clearly shows, it will be virtually impossible to resolve, or harmonize, in the near future, the different interpretations of the Jencks decision. It would take years, with defendants subject to entirely different criminal rules and procedures, depending upon the particular judicial district in which they were being tried.

VI. GROUPS FAVORABLE TO S. 2377 AS REPORTED

SCHOOL SEGREGATION PROBLEM IN NORTH

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. May we have order, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend until the Senate is in order. The Chair requests that conversations cease and that those who must confer retire to the cloakrooms, so that the Senate will be in order.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, the Senate hears much about school matters these days; much about segregation problems and about desegregation. Much of what we hear relates to the South.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that apparently there is considerable trouble on the same subject matter, and much discussion of it, in other sections of the country.

In today's New York Times there is an article written by Dr. Benjamin Fine, who is known as an expert and a specialist in this field.

Mr. President, may we have order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I think if some of the Senators from other parts of the country would deign to listen, they might discover that questions relative to school segregation problems are not solely southern, because today Dr. Fine, who is a rather eminent authority on this subject gives us something to think about in the article upon which I am going briefly to comment, if I am allowed the chance to do so.

Mr. President, this article by Dr. Benjamin Fine in today's New York Times is entitled "North Moves To Eliminate Color Line in Its Schools."

In the carryover of this article to page 13 of the Times, there is an even more enlightening headline, "North Is Fighting Own School Bias."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend. The Senate is not in order. The Senator will not resume until Senators have taken their seats or retired to the cloakrooms and conversation has ceased, so that the Senator may be heard.

The Senator from Florida may proceed.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article by Dr. Fine be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NORTH MOVES TO ELIMINATE COLOR LINE IN ITS SCHOOLS

(By Benjamin Fine)

The North has its integration problems, too. The Supreme Court's decision outlawing separate but equal schools has left its mark in all parts of the country. During the 3 years since the ruling on May 17, 1954, there has been considerable agitation to end segregation in States north of the Mason and Dixon's line.

The problems are somewhat different from those in the South. Most of the woes are caused by the residential patterns in the North, as well as the South. Negroes usually live in certain districts or areas within a community. As a result, their children attend schools that are predominantly all Negro.

Of late, there has been a slow shift in population trends. Some Negroes are moving to the suburbs. Others are entering public housing developments, on a biracial basis. Schools are getting a greater proportion of Negroes, under these circumstances.

A SURVEY MADE HERE

The result has been agitation by leading Negro groups to hasten integration. New York City is a prime example. The fight over integration is gaining momentum. Two years ago the board of education appointed a commission on integration to survey existing conditions and make necessary recommendations.

This last spring the six subcommissions reported to the board. Their recommendations covered such areas as community relations, zoning, teacher placement, and substandard school facilities. Two of the reports—those dealing with zoning and with teacher assignments—created considerable controversy.

The commission urged the school board to reevaluate its present policy on integration. It proposed that wherever possible, existing de facto segregation be modified. They urged that experienced teachers be assigned to the difficult all-Negro or predominantly Puerto Rican schools. And they asked that school districts be modified on the junior and senior high school levels to permit greater integration patterns.

MAJOR PROBLEMS FOR NORTH

The integration commission is not satisfied with the efforts by Dr. William Jansen, superintendent of schools, or the board of education, in implementing the recommendations. The commission will meet with Charles H. Silver, board president, early next month to air its grievances.

What are the major problems facing the Northern States on the desegregation issue? Legally, these States have outlawed segregation. The statute books insist that all children, regardless of race, creed, or color, attend the same schools. In practice, though, there are often gaps between what the law says and what actually takes place.

Recently the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, New York State conference of branches, presented a memoradum to Dr. James E. Allen, New York State Commissioner of Education, outlining the steps some communities take to circumvent the laws on segregation. The association charged that in some instances segregation had been preserved or extended by these means:

The manner in which school zone lines have been drawn.

The selection of sites for new schools.

The practice of permitting white children in predominantly Negro zones to transfer to other schools.

The failure or refusal to alter school zone lines to include white children attending overcrowded schools in proximity to all-Negro or predominantly Negro schools when the latter schools become underenrolled because of population shifts.

The practice of expanding schools in all-Negro or predominantly Negro areas to take care of increased Negro populations in these areas rather than alter school zone lines to permit Negro children to attend other noncapacity schools.

EMPLOYMENT OF TEACHERS

In addition to the de facto segregation, the charged is frequently leveled at northern school boards that they discriminate in the employment of Negro teachers. Some of the metropolitan suburban areas are gradually appointing Negro instructors. But thus far it is done on a token basis. A suburban school system will boast that it has employed one or two Negroes on its faculty.

A case is now pending in the courts to compel the Union Free School District 16, Elmont, Nassau County, N. Y., to employ a Negro teacher. Mrs. Dorothy Brown applied for a teaching post, but when it was learned that she was a Negro, the suit charges, she was not employed.

Whatever the outcome of the Brown case, it is well known that it is not so easy for a Negro to get a teaching post as a white teacher.

When some 500 southern Negro teachers lost their jobs because of desegregation, school officials in this city suggested that they apply for positions here. Vacancies exist in junior and senior high schools.

That was 2 years ago. It now appears as if not a single one of the discharged Negro teachers found the way into the New York City school system.

New York is also plagued with law suits over its zoning laws. Two are pending in the courts, seeking to overthrow the district lines that separate all-Negro from white or mixed schools. Here the pupils were assigned to schools in their own district. But the suit charges that the pupils would be forced to go to inferior all-Negro schools. The parents say they are ready to transport their children to schools out of their district, and a mile or more away from their homes.

These suits are being watched with great interest by school officials as well as parents. Upon their outcome may well depend the speed with which this city ends de facto segregation.

But New York is not alone with its woes and integration headaches. Comparable problems exist in many major cities of the North.

In the Philadelphia school system, most schools are mixed. Where they are not, it is because of residential patterns.

Where schools are all-white or all-Negro, the teachers and administrators also are either all-white or all-Negro. There is some agitation for faculty integration but the board of education has rejected the request. It points to the peaceful and wonderful progress over the last decade. In the public schools where the pupils are mixed, the teachers are, too.

The Philadelphia Teachers Association, a 6,000-member affiliate of the National Education Association, recently elected its first Negro, a woman, as its president.

Gov. George M. Leader reported on May 15 that a survey by the department of public instruction has showed that three Pennsylvania school districts practiced limited segregation of Negro pupils. The governor threatened to cut off State funds and invoke legal sanctions against the districts unless segregation was eliminated. Governor Leader fixed October 1 as the deadline for compliance.

In Chicago and its surrounding area, the integration question is beginning to attract attention. There are four all-Negro high schools in Chicago and three others that have more than 90 percent Negroes.

The big problem the county school system faces is the placing of Negro teachers. Their numbers have been increased by migration from the South.

Of 10,000 teachers in the county districts, only 100 are Negroes; 60 of these are in one district—Robbins. Although Illinois law bars discrimination because of race, many districts do not hire Negroes.

Elsewhere in the State all-Negro schools exist because of residential patterns and in some cases because of traditions and habits. An example of the latter is in Cairo, where the Negro population is fairly evenly distributed in the community and children may choose their school. Although they have the option, Negro children continue to attend the schools Negro children have always attended.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Chicago is making a study to find means to end de facto segregation. Two workshop conferences on the problem have been held this month.

FACING THE PROBLEM

One suggestion is that integration would be promoted in Chicago by changing school districts to run from east to west instead of from north to south. Integration in high schools could be increased if the arrangements for feeding elementary school graduates into high schools were revised, it has been suggested.

A bill that would have required Chicago to redraw its school district lines was defeated in the legislature at the last session. Incidentally, the rezoning issue is giving New York City school officials their greatest headache.

The nonwhite population of Detroit is estimated at 360,000 out of a total population of 2,000,000. Here, as in the other northern cities, the most serious racial problem stems from residential segregation. As a consequence, Detroit has many schools with a great preponderance of Negroes and others with great preponderance of whites.

Although there is concern about this situation, there is evidence that the board of education and citizens groups are facing up to this problem. The Commission on Community Relations reports increased moves at various economic levels toward integrated housing patterns. If continued, this trend would mean more mixing in the city's schools.

In general, the situation in suburban communities is similar to that in Detroit. However, a few have maintained a lily-white status through tacit residential restrictions.

The Greater Cleveland school boards are confronted with many integration problems. A few Cleveland schools in predominantly colored districts have a 100 percent Negro enrollment. Others have from 5 to 70 percent.

In Cleveland's numerous suburbs, segregation is a matter of boundaries. In recent years Negroes have been moving in large numbers to the outskirts of the city, but with several minor exceptions have not succeeded in moving into the suburbs.

Despite the setbacks for integration in the North, one fact emerges clearly: segregation is not encouraged, nor is it the policy of the school boards. It is a community problem, based on the reluctant or even cynical acceptance, in some communities of Negro residents. It is basically a residential pattern, which has concentrated the bulk of all Negroes within definite areas in each community.

But with this residential trend breaking down, and with a gradual spreading of Negroes into other districts, the question of school integration will assume growing proportion in the next few years.

As New York City has found, integration will not lie still much longer. The North, as well as the South, has learned that the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954, has left a host of still to be answered questions in its wake.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I am going to comment briefly on three aspects of this article, because I think they are worthy of comment, and I believe they should give some concern to all Senators, regardless of from what part of the country they may come.

The first comment relates to something that is happening in New York. I read as follows a quotation from Dr. Fine's article:

> A case is now pending in the courts to compel the Union Free School District No. 6, Elmont, Nassau County, N. Y., to employ a Negro teacher. Mrs. Dorothy Brown applied for a teaching post, but when it was learned that she was a Negro, the suit charges, she was not employed.
>
> Whatever the outcome of the Brown case, it is well known that it is not so easy for a Negro to get a teaching post as a white teacher.
>
> When some 500 southern Negro teachers lost their jobs because of desegregation, school officials in this city suggested that they apply for positions here. Vacancies exist in junior and senior high schools.
>
> That was 2 years ago. It now appears as if not a single one of the discharged Negro teachers found the way into the New York City school system.

I am not finding fault with anyone, but I am calling attention to the fact that some years ago the Senator from Florida predicted on the floor of the Senate, when we were discussing at some length the proposed southern regional school plan, that one of the groups which would suffer most severely if desegregation came to the public-school system would be the group of Negro teachers who are highly dedicated people and who have spent years in training themselves in order to lift the standard of living of their own people. They are more highly respected and admired among their own people—and I am sorry to have to admit it—than are white teachers by white people.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I recall that the Senator made such a statement some years ago, and his logic in that regard was inescapable. It so impressed me that I am not at all surprised to find that what he said has been found to be correct. His prophecy has come true.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend.

I reread one sentence:

> That was 2 years ago.

At that time it was suggested that 500 schoolteachers from the South who had lost their positions—and this related to teachers from the marginal States, where desegregation went into effect—might apply in New York and obtain positions there. Dr. Fine says:

I call attention, in passing, to the fact that we have a serious problem. When I last looked into this question some years ago, there were in excess of 70,000 professional Negro teachers in the South, which was at the rate of more than 7 to 1 as compared with the rate which prevailed in other parts of the country, considering the opportunity for employment as schoolteachers.

It now appears very clearly that many of those dedicated people are to be denied the opportunity to practice their profession, because there is no opening for them where desegregation is being enforced, in the marginal States. It is quite clear from this article—which is not commented on editorially, because Dr. Fine has been reporting—that no door of opportunity has been opened to them in the great city of New York.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. IVES. I did not have an opportunity to read the article. Does it involve a case before the courts of New York State?

Mr. HOLLAND. The case before the New York court is the case of one Mrs. Dorothy Brown.

Mr. IVES. Was she the one who applied for the position?

Mr. HOLLAND. She alleges that she was not employed simply because of her color. The comment which is made by Dr. Fine in reporting the case is the thing to which I call special attention. I am very sure, from my knowledge of Dr. Fine's reporting—and I read him both editorially and when he writes as a reporter, as he does today—that he is regarded as an authority in this field; and I am sure he is regarded as quite a distinguished authority.

Mr. IVES. We have a very high regard for Dr. Fine in our State. He is one of the leading authorities in the country in this field. What the Senator is referring to is apparently a direct violation of the New York State law. I know something about the law in New York State.

Mr. HOLLAND. I dare say that is correct; but we are dealing with a field in which it is not the law which controls the settlements. It is the feeling of good people of both colors toward one another which determines this problem.

I am not speaking as a person with extravagant views, hostile to everyone else. I am merely reporting a fact. I am saying that this is something to which my two distinguished friends from New York and Senators from other parts of the country might well give some attention, because this is a report from an eminent authority about a situation which was long predicted, in which it is very clear that the Negro teachers will be among the first to be distressed as desegregation is attempted.

Mr. IVES. Is the distinguished Senator from Florida sure that the only reason that teacher was not hired was the teacher's color?

Mr. HOLLAND. I know nothing about that.

Mr. IVES. There may have been other reasons, involving qualifications.

Mr. HOLLAND. I have merely quoted Dr. Fine. The thing which I think should hang out the red flag for the two Senators from New York is the latter statement:

> When—

Two years ago—

> some 500 southern Negro teachers lost their jobs because of desegregation—

They were from the marginal States, or the border States—> because of desegregation, school officials in this city suggested that they apply for positions here. Vacancies exist in junior and senior high schools.

Dr. Fine now reports:

> That was 2 years ago. It now appears as if not a single one of the discharged Negro teachers found the way into the New York City school system.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. IVES. May I inquire who invited them into New York?

Mr. HOLLAND. I read again from Dr. Fine:

> When some 500 southern Negro teachers lost their jobs because of desegregation, school officials in this city suggested that they apply for positions here. Vacancies exist in junior and senior high schools.

I take it from the report that the school officials of the great city of New York are the ones who extended the invitation. I am not speaking from my own knowledge, and I am not trying to throw bricks at anyone. I simply call attention to the fact that this problem exists in other areas besides the South, and that it exists in a very critical way in the great city of New York. People who have devoted their lives to training themselves in order that they might help to raise the standard of living of others of their color are being shoved out of their profession as a result of desegregation.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. IVES. Judging from what the Senator has read, I gather that the city of New York did invite these people to come there and apply for positions. However, I understand that the particular position to which he refers was in the county of Nassau.

Mr. HOLLAND. The one suit to which Dr. Fine refers was there.

Mr. IVES. Nassau County is not a part of New York City.

Mr. HOLLAND. Dr. Fine says:

> Whatever the outcome of the Brown case, it is well known that it is not so easy for a Negro to get a teaching post as a white teacher.

This is Dr. Fine reporting, not SPESSARD HOLLAND, of Florida. This is the authority on school matters of the New York Times. I think he is regarded as a very eminent authority; and, notwithstanding some unfortunate affiliations he had some time ago, he is still regarded, and I still regard him, as sufficiently eminent to justify quoting him for the information—and, I hope, the edification—of my distinguished friends from New York, who I think ought to take note, if they have not already done so, of what is happening in their own great city, the city of New York.

Mr. IVES. I have not discovered, in what the Senator has read, anything that shows that the city of New York has refused to hire Negro teachers. I do not think that has occurred with respect to the city of New York.

Mr. HOLLAND. The words used by Dr. Fine are:

> School officials in this city suggested that they apply for positions here.

I take that to mean the city of New York. The New York Times is published in the city of New York. Dr. Fine is writing primarily for New York people. I do not think 500 Negro teachers would find room to apply at the Elmont Union Free School District 16, in Nassau County. The Senator has not seen the article, and therefore he is somewhat at a disadvantage.

Mr. IVES. I have not seen the article.

Mr. HOLLAND. The article makes it very clear to me, as a rather careful reader, that the city of New York, through its school officials, invited 500 displaced colored teachers to come there and apply for positions. Dr. Fine now notes:

> It now appears as if not a single one of the discharged Negro teachers found the way into the New York City school system.

Apparently New York City is the city being discussed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am glad to yield to the distinguished junior Senator from New York. Perhaps he can throw some light on this subject.

Mr. JAVITS. The junior Senator from New York is from New York City, and for a number of years represented in the other body a very thriving and wonderful district in New York City.

The junior Senator from New York would like to say two things. First, I respect Dr. Fine. I think he is a great authority. It will be noted that he uses the language "to qualify."

It is at least as good a hypothesis as the Senator from Florida has offered, that if they could not qualify, aside from the fact that many of our own substitutes are on the rolls, we at least have a right to assume that it is because of the difficulties which are created for the teachers themselves, and for their training, by the "separate but equal" doctrine.

The second thing I should like to point out to my dear friend——

Mr. HOLLAND. Let me say, before we go further, that most of the Negro teachers who are well trained received their training in southern schools, because that is where they found their greatest opportunity.

If the Senator is suggesting that of 500 teachers there were found none who were highly qualified to teach in the New York schools, or in any other schools, I differ with him. The Senator from Florida was chairman of his local school board in Florida for many years prior to the time he became Governor of Florida. He knows something about the qualifications and standards of Negro teachers who have graduated from the fine schools which the Southern States, in general, make available to Negro pupils.

The Senator from Florida would not be inclined to accord any validity whatever to the suggestion that of 500 displaced southern teachers not one could be found qualified to teach in New York City, especially when it is said that the school officials in New York City are looking for teachers. Dr. Fine says:

> Vacancies exist in junior and senior high schools.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Aside from that point, the situation in New York is not at all the same as the situation in many Southern States about which we talked so long and so arduously.

In the State of New York there is both law and an aroused public opinion for complete integration of schools, and any headline reader can see that in the State of New York it is not only the law, fully carried out by the courts, but it is also the fundamental basis for public opinion, which is overwhelmingly on record in that regard. I respectfully submit that it is quite different from other States, which are endeavoring by State law—and, I believe, in defiance of the Constitution—to perpetuate schools which are completely segregated; therefore, the situation bears no analogy whatever to that in the city of New York or in the State of New York.

Mr. HOLLAND. Of course, the distinguished Senator is entitled to his opinion, but I suggest that, if he reads the whole article, he will find that it relates to New York City, and I read this brief portion:

> New York is also plagued with lawsuits over its zoning laws.

The article goes on to state:

> Two are pending in the courts, seeking to overthrow the district lines that separate all-Negro from white or mixed schools.

There is considerable discussion of that point. If the Senator will read further, he will find that numerous parents have offered to transport their children, in some instances some miles, in order to get away from segregation which Dr. Fine says exists in that case, not as a matter of law but as a matter of district zoning.

I did not begin this discussion in an effort to irritate my distinguished friends from New York. It was pointed out the other day that the city of New York has lost 200,000 people, who have moved to the suburbs. I am sure one reason for their moving is the blockbusting tactics which have been used there and in other parts of the country. That loss in population has, according to the article I read, placed New York City in second place, behind the city of London, and perhaps even in third place, behind the city of Tokyo, in total population. That statement was made in an article published in the New York Times the other day.

That is what is happening to the fine and great city of New York beloved by all of us and praised by all of us.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Florida is making a statement which deserves our very careful consideration. If the schools are forcibly integrated, by colored people trying to find places for their children in white schools, that will displace, in Louisiana, large numbers of colored schoolteachers. I am interested in that situation. If the State of New York and other States are going to issue invitations to our colored schoolteachers to come to their States and accept teaching positions which will be open to colored teachers, I hope the invitations will be sincerely made.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

I have already read that part of Dr. Fine's article which says that two suits are pending in the courts, seeking to overthrow the district lines that separate all-Negro from white or mixed schools. The article also states that the pupils were assigned to schools in their own district, but the suit charges that the pupils would be forced to go to inferior all-Negro schools.

So, apparently, there is feeling, at least on the part of some Negro parents of schoolchildren in New York City, that their children are being forced by districting, of which they do not approve, to go to schools which they say are inferior.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. IVES. Has the Senator concluded his statement?

Mr. HOLLAND. No; I have not concluded it. I am about to touch on the Philadelphia situation. Does the Senator wish me to yield?

Mr. IVES. No.

Mr. HOLLAND. Dr. Fine appears to be impartial, and he says in his article:

> But New York is not alone with its woes and integration headaches. Comparable problems exist in many other major cities of the North.

Mr. President, I am about to discuss Dr. Fine's comments on the Philadelphia school system and I am sorry that the able Senators from Pennsylvania are not on the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The junior Senator from Pennsylvania happens to be in the chair.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am glad the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania is in the chair, where he will be held speechless while I have an opportunity to read a part of the article which pertains to the city of Philadelphia. [Laughter.]

Again I should like to say that I know sincerity prevails in the hearts of my colleagues from Pennsylvania, as it prevails in the hearts of my two colleagues from New York. Dr. Fine treats the Philadelphia situation, the situation in Illinois, and also the situation in Cleveland, Ohio. Of course, I will not take time to read all of the article, but I hope Senators will read all of it. It is enlightening; it is factual reporting.

In the Philadelphia school system——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am sorry that I had to leave the floor. It was not intentional. I may say that we have never claimed to be perfect in the State of Illinois. We have many problems. We are trying to solve them. We make mistakes. We hope to do better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to associate himself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Illinois has sounded a note of modesty, and I am glad the distinguished occupant of the chair has associated himself with those remarks in the RECORD. I see on their feet the distinguished Senators from New York, who also wish to come down to the mourners' bench. There is room for all of them. (Laughter). In the case of Philadelphia, there is a very interesting comment, as there is with respect to Illinois. I may say that I had a chance to communicate this information only to the senior Senator from Illinois, because he happens to be my close neighbor in the Senate. I showed him the article earlier in the afternoon, and told him that I expected to make some comments about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Florida is performing a real service. It is a national problem. We are doing all we can in Illinois to solve the problem. I assure the Senator from Florida that we will try to do our best to correct it.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank my distinguished friend. I have been trying to get to Philadelphia for some time now.

> In the Philadelphia school system, most schools are mixed. Where they are not, it is because of residential patterns.
>
> Where schools are all white or all Negro, the teachers and administrators also are either all white or all Negro. There is some agitation for faculty integration, but the board of education has rejected the request.

That is the ruling of the board of education.

I read further:

> It points to the peaceful and wonderful progress over the last decade. In the public schools where the pupils are mixed, the teachers are, too.

Mr. President, about all we can do in the South is to point to the peaceful and wonderful progress which we have made. We have pointed to it repeatedly. It is actually peaceful and wonderful. I am glad to find that at least we have sympathy and comfort and identical reliance upon the same thought on the part of the Board of Education in Philadelphia, which I am sure is a very distinguished body, because it has rejected—so Dr. Fine says—the request that faculties be integrated.

Not only are they not going to have integration of pupils, but in Philadelphia they are not going to let the faculties be integrated. That seems to be, judging only from the report of Dr. Fine, the deliberate judgment of the Board of Education of the city of Philadelphia.

I am not going to dwell on that subject overly long, but it occurs to me that there are two points which we can reiterate very cheerfully for the South. First, that we have made peaceful and wonderful progress, that we hope to be left alone to continue to make progress, and that the progress is redounding to the great benefit of the children of both races and parents of both races and the whole Nation. It is progress of which the whole Nation should be proud.

In the second instance, we believe we have the same right to insist upon continued segregation of our faculties that the learned school board of the city of Philadelphia has in rejecting the petition to integrate the faculties there, as stated by Dr. Fine, and in insisting that the faculties must not be integrated if schools are either all white or all colored.

There is very much more interesting material in the article. I wish I could read it all. I commend it to the careful reading of all Senators, and I shall close by adverting to that part of the article which relates to the great State of Illinois.

> In Chicago and its surrounding area, the integration question is beginning to attract attention. There are four all-Negro high schools in Chicago, and three others that have more than 90 percent Negroes.

Mr. President, I think Dr. Fine is making a decided contribution to the knowledge of the Nation, when he states that there are four all-Negro high schools within the confines of Chicago alone, and three others that have more than 90 percent Negro children.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. I should like to observe to the Senator from Florida that last September the press carried a dispatch, which bore a Chicago dateline, to the effect that the NAACP chapter in Chicago had made a demand upon the public-school authorities of Chicago that Chicago schools be desegregated.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I am not surprised to hear that, and I appreciate the contribution the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has made.

Mr. President, I quote further from the article:

> The big problem the county school system faces is the placing of Negro teachers.

The reference is to the Cook County system.

I read further:

> Their numbers have been increased by migration from the South.
>
> Of 10,000 teachers in the county districts, only 100 are Negroes; 60 of these are in one district—Robbins. Although Illinois law bars discrimination because of race, many districts do not hire Negroes.

Mr. President, I am sure that is a factual statement; and I am sure it indicates that desegregation in Chicago, both in respect to the school-attendance problem and in respect to the naming of the faculty, is a principle announced in law, but not applied in fact.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator from Florida have any information as to what percentage of the population of Chicago is composed of colored citizens?

Mr. HOLLAND. No; I do not. I remember that my learned friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] put that information into the RECORD some time ago. It is my recollection that he stated then that there were more citizens of color in Chicago than there were in any of our Southern States, except one, as I recall.

Mr. LONG. Can the Senator from Florida tell us what percentage of the teachers in Chicago are colored?

Mr. HOLLAND. One percent.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator from Florida say 1 percent?

Mr. HOLLAND. By using mathematics, and by comparing the total numbert of teachers to the number of Negro teachers, as stated by Dr. Fine—and I shall read again the statement:

> Of 10,000 teachers in the county districts, only 100 are Negroes.

The reference is to Cook County.

I read further:

> Sixty of these are in one district—Robbins.

The other 40 evidently were scattered all over the rest of the county.

Mr. LONG. That certainly is not a very encouraging prospect for the displaced Negro teachers of Louisiana, when the schools there are integrated, and when they wish to find employment in Chicago, I take it, if only 1 percent of 10,000 teachers in that part of Illinois is colored. I would assume that the population of Chicago is perhaps 15 or 20 percent colored.

Mr. HOLLAND. My recollection of the figures stated by the Senator from Illinois is that the colored population of Chicago is approximately 18 or 20 percent. But as to that, the RECORD will have to speak for itself; the Senator from Illinois placed that information in the RECORD some days ago.

I read further from the article:

> Elsewhere in the State all-Negro schools exist because of residential patterns and in some cases because of traditions and habits.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate to note the following particularly:

> An example of the latter—

In other words, an example of a segregated school, because of traditions and habits, not because of law—> is in Cairo, where the Negro population is fairly evenly distributed in the community and children may choose their school. Although they have the option, Negro children continue to attend the schools Negro children have always attended.

And they are all-Negro schools.

Listen to this, Mr. President; I think the following portion of the article is particularly interesting:

> The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Chicago is making a study to find means to end de facto segregation.

In other words, it is terrible for the Negro children to be alone in the schools to which they have chosen to go as a matter of choice; and the NAACP leaders are seeking to find some way by means of which some form of compulsion may be used to keep Negro children from going to the schools to which they prefer to go.

Mr. President, how silly, how ridiculous, can this situation become?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Will the Senator from Florida permit the Chair to answer the question briefly—although the Chair realizes that it is unusual for the Chair to participate in the debate.

Mr. HOLLAND. I gladly yield to the distinguished occupant of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. First, let the Chair state that the Chicago city school system is separate from the Cook County school system; and the statistics the Senator from Florida has read about the county system's proportion of Negro teachers do not apply to the number of Negro teachers in the city of Chicago, where of course the proportion is infinitely higher.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Pennsylvania may be correct, but I should think there would not be 10,000 teachers in the area of Cook County outside the city of Chicago. However, the facts will have to speak for themselves.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. First, I should like to complete reading from the Illinois dispatch:

> The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in Chicago is making a study to find means to end de facto segregation.

I may say to the distinguished occupant of the chair that the reference seems to be to Chicago, because the sentence I have just read refers to Chicago.

This paragraph in the article concludes with the following:

> Two workshop conferences on the problem have been held this month.

Mr. President, we find that the problem created when Negro children prefer to go to all-Negro-children schools is so aggrevated that the NAACP has held two workshop conferences, to see how it can bring about an end to that situation.

Mr. President, I repeat, how silly can people get? Let me say that I am glad to see the Presiding Officer nodding his head in acquiescence.

Mr. President, I think it well to read one more of the comments made by Dr. Fine, as follows:

> One suggestion is that integration would be promoted in Chicago by changing school districts to run from east to west, instead of from north to south.

Apparently in Chicago they are trying to get away from all north and south references, and are trying to change even school districts to run from east to west.

I read further from the article:

> Integration in high schools could be increased if the arrangements for feeding elementary school graduates into high schools were revised, it has been suggested.
>
> A bill that would have required Chicago to redraw its school district lines was defeated in the legislature at the last session.

In other words, Mr. President, the people of Chicago do not want to rezone the city of Chicago so as to accomplish any such purpose; and they think it is simply folly to go about a complete revamping of all their programs which have to do with school districts, tax lines, and the like, simply to try to force greater integration.

The next two situations dealt with in the article are those in Detroit and Cleveland. I shall not take more of the time of the Senate, except to say that the article clearly states, regarding the city of Cleveland, that—

> A few Cleveland schools in predominently colored districts have a 100 percent Negro enrollment.

In other words, they are completely segregated schools.

Mr. President, I do not want this matter to be taken with levity or as a sample of the use of sarcasm, although I admit that considerable sarcasm could readily be employed in connection with reading the article. I hope all Senators and all others who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will realize that the problem of desegregation is nationwide, and I hope they will realize that little progress is being made in the portions of the Nation which are trying to use coercion against other parts of the Nation. I hope they will realize that a great many people—and I am thinking now particularly of the Negro teachers—will be very adversely affected by the program to which so many of our distinguished friends are so passionately devoted.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not think the Senator from Florida can find any comfort in what he has read from the article by Dr. Fine, as regards any pattern by means of which segregation in public schools is in force, either by means of local law or by means of local custom.

Mr. HOLLAND. I certainly have not found any comfort in the article, and I am not seeking comfort from it. We in the South have our own problem, which we will continue to face. But I am simply pointing out, by quoting from the article by this eminent authority, the fact that these problems exist in other parts of the Nation, but are not being solved there.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield further to me?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield further to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. In New York City, in my own community, we have made enormous progress.

Mr. HOLLAND. So have we in Florida.

Mr. JAVITS. I respectfully submit—and this is the point I am trying to make—that the progress which has been made in the communities to which the Senator from Florida has referred—and I know this is especially true in the case of my own community of New York City—is infinitely greater in depth, in character, in backing, in purpose, and in law, than any similar progress the Senator from Florida can claim in the case of any of the States whose progress those of us who have been debating the civil-rights issue have complained about; and it will be a happy day for the country when as good a record can be shown for Georgia, Mississippi, and Alabama as the record we can show for New York, even with the trouble we have. We are doing to great deal about it now, and we are having a great degree of success.

I hope very much that the same record may be shown in the coming years by the States which are obstructing the Supreme Court's decision by every kind of legal method and stratagem they can find, including the idea of making the schools private, and not public.

Again, just as the Senator from Florida has tried not to condemn, but has sought only to bring the facts into focus, let me state that is my only reason for speaking. I am not throwing stones at anyone else; neither am I trying to find, from the situation existing in other States, justification for what exists in my own State.

My State and other States like it are working assiduously, as I know all other Senators concerned will agree, in the effort—and we are enjoying a great degree of success—to change the previously existing social tradition and custom and system; and during the debate on the civil-rights bill it was stated that what we were trying to destroy was the social system.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from New York for his restrained comment.

So far as I am concerned, I know that a problem exists in my State. I have been working for a long time on the solution of that problem. I have no apology to make to anyone for the great interest I take in the local schools. Many years ago, as chairman of the local school board, I secured the construction, for Negro pupils in our area, of buildings which were regarded as far ahead of their time.

As Governor of his State, the Senator from Florida has held up the hands of those very fine educators, and they were very fine educators, who headed the Negro college at Tallahassee, now a university. On a note of lightness, I have noticed they have won the football championship of the Nation so consistently that it has gotten to be an old thing to them. They are a fine bunch of youngsters.

This is not susceptible to proof any more than is the claim of the Senator from New York, but I doubt very seriously if the standards of training, bodily cleaniness, devotion to Nation and State, and devotion to the advancement of their own people, is any higher on the part of those of the colored race trained in the schools of New York than is the case of those who have been trained in the schools of Florida. We are proud of their great progress in Florida.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to speak briefly in connection with the statement of the Senator from Florida. Perhaps I have had more to do than has any other Member of the Senate with the question of discrimination, especially discrimination in employment. We have had a struggle in New York State to secure the enactment of a law to that effect. Strange as it may seem to Members of the Senate, we had just as much opposition in having such a law enacted in New York State as we are having in securing the passage of the civil-rights bill.

I know there is prejudice. I know there is discrimination. I never made any bones about it. We all know there is both. What we are trying to do is to overcome the obstacles. Gradually and by degrees, we are doing so.

I want to say to my friend from Florida that the law we have in New York State, far from hurting, is helping tremendously.

If there are any southern teachers of the colored race in New York who are not getting jobs, it is not because of their race or color. Such discrimination would be prohibited by the laws of the State of New York. It could not possibly occur. The only reason they are not getting the jobs is that they do not conform in some way with the standards of the State or city. I do not know what the reason is. We are struggling with the problem. I am not condemning the South or any other section of the country. We have to work together. The way we are working, I think we will get somewhere.

While I am on the subject, I should like to say something about the civil-rights bill, on which I understand some kind of an agreement has been reached. I have been rather caustic about the bill, because, comparatively speaking, it does not amount to very much. But in the long run, it is a step—not a tiny step, but a real step—in the right direction, as it is being amended in the report we are to get from the House—not from conferees, because the bill is not in conference. The report from those who have consulted on the bill is that they are agreed the bill will be in satisfactory form when the Senate gets it. I intend to vote for the bill because it is a step.

We must try to solve the problem by degrees. We cannot do it simultaneously and all at once. It cannot be done that way. We have got to have patience.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. IVES. No, I am not yielding at this time. When I hear statements made concerning the comments of Dr. Fine, for whom I have a high respect, I have to point these matters out, because I do not think Dr. Fine understands the law in the State of New York as some of us do, but he must know we have a law which prohibits the happening of the thing the Senator from Florida mentioned.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. IVES. I yield.

Mr. ELLENDER. Is the Senator familiar with the compromise which is supposed to be presented to us tomorrow or the next day?

Mr. IVES. All I know is what I have seen in the RECORD. I think it was read into the RECORD.

Mr. ELLENDER. Does the Senator concede that the compromise really nullifies the jury-trial provision as adopted by the Senate?

Mr. IVES. I think the compromise has straightened out the jury-trial amendment so that it does not apply to every law in kingdom come.

Mr. ELLENDER. The compromise provides that a person can be tried by a jury for a criminal offense only if the fine is over $300 or the sentence is 45 days or more in jail; otherwise, the judgment of the court stands.

Mr. IVES. I understand. The Senator from Louisiana should remember I am opposed to the jury-trial amendment anyway. I was for part IV exactly as it was originally drawn, and I still am, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. ELLENDER. In my judgment, if the Senate and House agree to the proposed compromise, it will nullify the jury-trial provision.

Mr. IVES. It is all right with me if it does.

AMENDMENT OF REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1949—LETTER FROM THE PRESIDENT

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter addressed to me on August 7, 1957, by the President of the United States. The letter deals with the proposed legislation relative to the Reorganization Act of 1949.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 7, 1957.

The Honorable WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: On April 1, I transmitted a special message to the Congress pointing out that the period for transmitting reorganization plans under the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended, would expire June 1, 1957, and I recommended that the Congress enact legislation to extend that period. I observed that the Reorganization Act provided practical arrangements "by which the Congress and the President can carry forward their cooperative endeavors to provide the best possible management of the public business."

On June 5, the Senate enacted a measure, S. 1791, which would extend the period for transmitting reorganization plans until June 1, 1959. On July 10, the House of Representatives passed S. 1791, but added a section which would also amend the Reorganization Act with regard to the manner in which a reorganization plan could be disapproved by the Congress. Under the Reorganization Act of 1949, a reorganization plan could be disapproved only by a majority of the authorized membership of either House of the Congress. The House amendment would authorize disapproval of a reorganization plan by the vote of a simple majority of those present and voting in either House.

In my judgment, the House amendment would seriously impair the value of the reorganization procedure established by the Reorganization Act of 1949. That act was enacted after the first Hoover Commission had demonstrated the necessity for comprehensive reorganization authority. The Commission recommended that reorganization plans of the President be subject to disapproval by a concurrent resolution adopted by both Houses of the Congress. Disapproval by a majority of the authorized membership of either House was developed at that time as an alternative. This arrangement has proved successful during the past 8 years. To weaken it further as now proposed would deprive the President of the minimum reorganization authority which he should have.

I hope that the Senate will not accept the House amendment to S. 1791 but act to assure acceptance of that measure in the form enacted by the Senate on June 5.

With warm regard,

Sincerely,

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

STATEMENT ON CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement which was prepared last Friday, prior to the agreement between the leaders of the two parties and the two bodies of Congress. It is a statement made by the leaders and organizations working for effective civil-rights legislation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ON THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL

Two weeks ago, we expressed our bitter disappointment at the action of the Senate in deleting part III of the civil-rights bill and in adding a jury-trial amendment to part IV. Nevertheless, we urged Senate supporters of civil rights to vote for the bill in the hope that some means would be found to strengthen it in the House and that a civil rights bill would be passed this year. We feared that if the bill was not passed overwhelmingly by the Senate or was sent to conference, it would be buried there, not only for the rest of this session, but quite likely for next year as well.

Our position was and remains: We want the best bill we can get this session.

The Democratic leadership has proposed that the jury-trial amendment be limited to voting-right cases. The Republican leadership has proposed an additional provision that will allow a judge to act without a jury where the punishment is not more than 90 days' imprisonment or a $300 fine or both. Taken together, these proposals strengthen the Senate bill and provide a reasonable basis for reconciling the difference between the Senate and House versions.

We renew our call upon the friends of civil rights in both parties to place the goal of some progress in this area ahead of any fancied political advantage and to agree upon a course of action in support of these proposals that will break the current stalemate and will result in the speedy enactment of a meaningful bill. Those who persist in stalling the progress of the bill must bear the onus for any failure to enact civil-rights legislation this year.

Enactment of the pending bill will not be the end of our struggle: It is only the beginning of the fight for equality for all.

LATIN AMERICAN PETROLEUM—INTERAMERICAN ECONOMIC CONFERENCE

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD a statement concerning an interview published in an Argentine newspaper, in which Senator Fontes charged that American oil interests, and specifically former Assistant Secretary of State Henry Holland, influenced the Bolivian Government against implementation of the treaty with Brazil for Brazilian petroleum exploitation in the Santa Cruz area.

Along with that statement, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed Hanson's Latin American Letter of August 24, 1957.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed an article from the Journal of Commerce entitled "Export-World Bank Lending Policies Hit."

I do not vouch for the contents of this material, but, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on South American Affairs, I desire to have the material in the RECORD. The statements contained in the material concern me very much. I think they also should concern the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

There being no objection, the statement, letter, and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(This is an unclassified report from Embassy Rio to Washington (No. 220 dated August 13. Repeated to La Paz and Buenos Aires))

In a lengthy interview published in Diario de Noticias August 11, Senator Lourival Fontes charges that American oil interests and specifically former Assistant Secretary of State Henry F. Holland influenced the Bolivian Government against implementation of the treaty with Brazil for Brazilian petroleum exploitation in Santa Cruz area.

The senator further charges that United States objective is to prevent progress and development of Brazil which is dependent on development of its petroleum resources. And that this is behind efforts to deny Brazil access to Bolivian oil.

The senator charges Bolivian petroleum code was drafted with assistance of two American technicians designated by Holland and that the purpose was not to promote economic liberty or political dignity of Bolivia but to obtain advantages and privileges for United States companies. He asserts that Bolivian petroleum is now controlled by these foreign oil interests and that petroleum code has brought ruin, misery, and the moral and material destruction of the Bolivian people.

In the interview the senator also touches on the international petroleum situation, asserting that oil rivalry and imperialistic interests have dominated policies of United States and Britain in the Middle East as well as in the hemisphere. Statements from beginning to end are bitter attacks on United States policy in Latin America which he described as a "policy of the good neighbor controlled and manipulated by businessmen and corporations."

In an editorial August 12 (the following day) entitled "Serious Charges Against the United States," O Globo recalls that it has always favored participation of private capital, domestic as well as foreign, in the development of Brazil's petroleum resources. Noting the gravity of the accusations made by Senator Fontes, the editorial declares that it does not accept the validity of these accusations but does consider that they call for thorough-going clarification.

The editorial continues: "There exists a formal accusation spelled out in all its details by a person who has the authority to speak, regarding the existence of a plot intended to injure Brazil in its relations with Bolivia. There is no other course but to investigate the charges thoroughly to discover what there may be in the accusation, to learn whether in fact Brazil is being injured in the matter of Bolivian petroleum. The truth needs to be known not only for the sake of Brazil. The United States also has everything to gain from a clarification of the facts described by the senator. We must not allow the friendship between the two largest countries of America, sealed and consolidated by brotherly cooperation over the centuries, to be endangered in such a way by the unrestrained ambitions of groups or by less tolerable charges of unacceptable diplomatic activities."

O Jornal on August 13 carries AP story from Washington reporting Holland's categorical denial of Fontes' charges.

[From Hanson's Latin American Letter, No. 649]

WASHINGTON, August 24, 1957.

A NEW ERA IN THE LATIN AMERICAN PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

BRAZILIAN CHARGES CONCERNING BOLIVIAN OIL

DEAR SIR: On August 11, Senator Lourival Fontes in an interview published in Diario de Noticas charged that United States oil interests and specifically former Assistant Secretary of State Holland had influenced Bolivia against implementation of the treaty with Brazil for oil exploitation in the Santa Cruz area. He charged that the Bolivian petroleum code had been drafted with the aid of technicians designated by Holland, that Bolivian petroleum was now controlled by foreign interests. And he criticized the manner in which United States foreign policy is dominated by oil.

NEED TO INVESTIGATE

On August 12, O Globo noted that although it had always favored the use of private capital in the oil industry, "there now exists a formal accusation spelled out in detail by a person who has the authority to speak regarding the evidence of a plot intended to injure Brazil in its relations with Bolivia. There is no other course but to investigate the charges thoroughly."

HOLLAND DENIES

On August 13, O Jornal carried an AP story from Washington reporting former Assistant Secretary of State Holland's categorical denial of the Brazilian senator's charges.

UNITED STATES SENATE PROBE?

Since every phase of American foreign economic policy is involved in United States activity in Bolivia, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will presumably want to conduct an investigation of its own, in addition to the probe to be carried out in Brazil. The charges are after all against United States interests, and an early clarification of the situation is imperative lest United States prestige in Latin America be damaged further.

WHAT IS GOING ON IN BOLIVIA?

We already know that the foreign-aid program for Bolivia for years has been presented to the Congress with something less than frankness. We know that foreign-aid for Bolivia is being used to service speculators in defaulted bonds of this bankrupt country in a manner so inconsistent with the purposes of the Mutual Security Act that the State Department at one hearing told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that such a use of foreign-aid appropriations does not constitute sound public policy. We know that foreign aid for Bolivia is being used to perpetuate the myth that socialized finance (Exim Bank) never suffers defaults and is thus superior to the American system of private banking, and that the myth has served to divert the public from adequate interest in the Exim Bank portfolio and particularly from taking an adequate interest in the activity of middlemen at the Exim Bank.

We know that after Hanson's Latin American Letter No. 608 appeared, a top official of the State Department told a reporter on the record that the long delay in appointing a new Assistant Secretary for Latin American affairs was partly occasioned by the long-standing concern of certain members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with quis custodiet ipsos custodes as it affects State Department appointments generally.

We know that in Latin America there has been criticism that certain former top-level officials of the United States, who had as officials supported big grant programs for Bolivia, have appeared in La Paz to negotiate for their own or other private interests. The Latin feeling apparently has been that such negotiators must inevitably be benefiting excessively from the friendly climate engendered by their previous position on foreign aid. There is actually nothing illegal about earning a living in such private activity after making policy in the Government. Any official in the State Department has a right to use the United States Treasury to underwrite the economic chaos occasioned by expropriation of investments by a revolutionary government, if the Congress is foolish enough to hand him the appropriation with which to do it.

And we know that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on June 10 showed an interest in the private activities of certain former top officials of the State Department, which aroused the curiosity of the press as to what the committee might be planning next.

WHAT WOULD THE SENATE COMMITTEE INVESTIGATE?

On June 10, Senator MORSE, chairman of the Inter-American Subcommittee of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, asserted that he was convinced that "the subcommittee should make an investigation into Latin American affairs over the recess period" (i. e., after Congress adjourns). The failure of the Buenos Aires Conference (as expected) and the sensational charges in Brazil concerning our Bolivian policy make an investigation imperative. Obviously, the latter alone might provide ample material for an investigation and for wide political values within the United States political scene. But the committee has a much more important function to perform which far transcends the politics of an investigation of that kind.

UNITED STATES POLICY FAILURE

The Council on Foreign Relations (most conservative and most respected of all United States organizations in the foreign field) recently reported: "The United States over the years has developed a special technique for warding off Latin American demands which it knew in advance it would be unable to satisfy. In lieu of concrete action, it could suggest a fresh discussion of economic problems, preferably under conditions that would postpone or obviate a stand on specific issues." The trial of insincere dishonest discussions has since 1954 taken us from the Caracas Conference to Rio to Panama to the Presidential Representatives Meetings in Washington and now to and through Buenos Aires.

PETROLEUM IS THE ISSUE

Who is fooling whom? Does the Council on Foreign Relations or the State Department believe the Latins are so stupid that they cannot recognize the "special technique" of evasion and insincere discussion? The truth is that none of the propositions put forth even by the Latins at the conferences reaches the core of the problem. For, the issue is petroleum. The course of world events is rushing us into a situation where petroleum policy is going to have to be rewritten, including the basic profit-sharing formula. And this issue will not be settled by isolated arrangements reached by State or Treasury or ICA officials who are planning to negotiate for themselves in the recipient countries at a later date.

In Brazil, in Argentina, in Mexico, in Venezuela, major adverse alterations in the United States political, investment, and military position impend unless the impasse on petroleum is broken. In Brazil and Argentina per capita income has ceased to grow, real wages are declining, foreign exchange position is critical. In Mexico we may before long witness still another challenge to the value of the peso with its harsh shock to the economy, occasioned by the inflexibility of United States petroleum policy. In Venezuela, the oil industry is sandwiched between (a) the generalizing of the New York Times campaign against the dictatorships with its alienating of United States public opinion by false information on the extent to which the productivity of the oil industry has been withheld from the mass of the people, and (b) the Venezuelan political exiles' clamor that $2.3 billion of petroleum income has been lost to Venezuela during the 8 years of dictatorship. And in Persia the Italian 75–25 formula must, once oil is found, reshape the whole pattern of world petroleum exploitation.

We are then at the beginning of a new era, much as we were between Mexican expropriation and Welles' strenuous efforts of 1939–41 which saved the Venezuelan industry from expropriation. In the early 1940's there was a Sumner Welles to make the decision. Who can make the policy determination now?

WHO SHALL DECIDE NEW OIL POLICY?—THE INDUSTRY?

The industry itself? Surely not the industry which, starting with the stupidity which necessitated the Mexican expropriation, resisted Mr. Welles' formula for Venezuela without which the industry would have been expropriated there too, rejected Vargas' plea for a 50–50 arrangement in Brazil, on the theory that the Brazilians were so ignorant that they could be bled for a larger percentage than the industry accepted elsewhere, wrecked their chances in Argentina with an agreement which no self-respecting sovereign nation could properly accept, and has now apparently gotten itself involved in controversy in the Bolivian-Brazilian area which will damage United States prestige throughout Latin America.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT?

The State Department? Surely not officials of the small-stature now being demonstrated in the Department. These after all are the persons who bungled the Argentine opportunity. On June 10 the Department testified that "it is a fair statement" to say that "the State Department follows the policy of advising wih American foreign investors, urging the correction of policies that we think are not in the best interests of our country . . . or not in the interests of these (foreign) people." Yet, it testified also that in the case of the notorious Argentine agreement which Peron signed, the Department "did not try to influence the course or the substance" of the arrangement or negotiations. If that is a measure of the Department's competence on this vital issue, clearly the policy determination cannot be made in State.

ACTION BY SENATE COMMITTEE URGENT

Who then? It is clear that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee must now fill a role that a Welles or Hull might once have performed inside the State Department. And this is a matter of great urgency, because danger signals are flying both in the economic situations of our leading good-neighbors and in the new Italian formula on which the eyes of all oil-producing countries are centered. The special technique of avoiding action by discussions obviating stands on specific issues has had its last success at Buenos Aires. One more such success will wreck hemisphere relations in the investment, political, and military fields.

STATE DEPARTMENT FILES AS HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

(1) First, repeat the historical background. The files of the State Department reveal that in 1939–40 the oil companies faced a threat of expropriation in Venezuela, that they seemed still not to have learned the lesson of Mexico, that had not Sumner Welles exerted strenuous pressure on the oil companies to yield certain of their legal rights as well as a larger share of earnings, the simultaneous efforts of the State Department to obtain a moderating of the demands of the Venezuelan Government would have failed, and expropriation would have been likely.

Five billion dollars (repeat $5 billion) of oil company profits since that time in Venezuela alone attest to the wisdom of the policy which Mr. Welles forced the oil companies to accept against their own judgment. And now a major decision of similar importance must be forthcoming. A new era is at hand.

ITALIAN FORMULA'S INFLUENCE

(2) Analyzing the new Italian (75-25) formula in Persia as introducing a new element of security into the granting of concessions, the great Manchester Guardian warned the oil companies on August 7 that "it is to be hoped that the existing oil companies in the Middle East will be ready with plans to offer partnerships on the Italian-Persian model before they are forced out by disputes like the unhappy Anglo-Iranian affair." And it notes that "if the partnership does find oil and succeeds in exploiting it, the agreement on which it is based may have a great influence throughout the Middle East."

Needless to say, the Italian formula bolsters the argument of the Venezuelan political opposition, and might compel the dictator himself if he is not overthrown to demand an alteration of the formula to forestall such opposition.

NUTTING'S VIEW

(3) The Right Honorable Anthony Nutting, former British Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, wrote sometime ago that he is convinced that "security for western tenure in Middle Eastern oil"—and he might as well have included hemisphere oil—can only be achieved by a new international arrangement which would create multilateral cooperation among producer, transport, and consumer states, and enterprises with a joint-development fund and common marketing and profit system.

WORLD BANK PROPOSAL

(4) Again, the World Bank's recommendation for a joint development fund financed out of oil royalties would likewise call for a change in the 50-50 formula if it were to have any chance of continuing success.

WHAT HAPPENED IN VENEZUELA

(5) Some years ago we pointed out that Venezuela's Government and the oil companies were failing public-relationwise in not acquainting the United States public with the fact that Venezuela had achieved a greater spread of the oil wealth to the masses than any other country in the world with a similar task had been able to do in such a short time. Instead, ignorance of the Venezuelan experience finds American public opinion now being built up against the Venezuelans as having failed totally in this job. Coupled with the exiles' attack on $2.3 billion of lost earnings, it is a bad combination.

THE SEARCH FOR A FORMULA

(6) What is important is that there is a formula which can conform with the political realities in Brazil, Argentina, and Mexico, which would accelerate the development of petroleum resources and thereby provide a base for the steady increase in per capita income which is essential to stability in the area, and yet which would not destroy the United States concept of some role for private capital nor necessarily eliminate the opportunity to make a profit.

But it must be clear that the State Department is a prisoner of its mediocrity and cannot be expected to implement such a formula. The industry surely cannot devise it, if we are to judge from its record of bad judgment in the past in Latin America. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee by open hearings directed not at discussion to obviate a stand on the issue but rather at action to obviate insincere discussion must make its contribution on this point before it tackles anything else in the inter-American field.

[From the Journal of Commerce of August 23, 1957]

EXPORT, WORLD BANK LENDING POLICIES HIT

BUENOS AIRES.—Leading policies of the World Bank and the Export-Import Bank were criticized by the Cuban delegate to the Inter-American Economic Conference. He appealed for an Inter-American bank to help develop backward nations in Latin America.

"Where there is a danger of communism there is no credit," said chief Cuban delegate Gustavo Gutierrez. "What we need is a little Communist danger—just a little."

CHANCES FOR BANK DIM

Such appeals, however, are not considered likely to boost the dim chances of setting up a hemisphere bank since the United States has said it would not put up the essential credit.

But Mr. Gutierrez said that Latin American nations have over $4 billion abroad in international financial institutions and commercial banks. He suggested that this credit could be used to finance economic development in Latin America.

He also suggested caution on another major topic before the 20-nation meeting, a common market for Latin America. Mr. Gutierrez told a news conference that Latin America's situation in relation to a common market is different from that of a highly industrialized Europe. Nevertheless, he backs such a plan for the Americas.

Already bogged down over policies, the conference itself came to a virtual halt today on technical matters. Complete details of the one hundred plus proposals submitted by delegates for committee discussion still had not been distributed this morning by the secretariat, which was organized by the host Argentine Government.

Although the conference is in its eighth day, the foreign commerce committee suspended deliberations in its morning meeting because there was nothing before it. Conference rules provide that delegates must have 24 hours to study documents before discussing them.

These difficulties, which are not uncommon at international conferences, could in part be attributed to the delegates themselves. Many waited until the deadline of midnight on Tuesday to present their ideas.

In addition to the hemisphere bank and the Latin American common market other major proposals expected to cause serious debate include a Peruvian proposal affecting the use of the most-favored-nation clause within the hemisphere, a proposal by Ecuador on ways to prepare for the disposal of surplus goods, a Bolivian suggestion that landlocked nations be guaranteed free transit to the sea and a hemispherewide economic agreement.

The bank and the economic agreement are the two major ideas discussed here, and chances for both appear very dim.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORSE. I yield.

Mr. McNAMARA. The Senator from Oregon made some reference to the chairman of the Subcommittee on South American Affairs. I did not understand who that was. Will the Senator enlighten me?

Mr. MORSE. I happen to be chairman of the subcommittee, although there seem to be some Senators who do not know it.

Mr. McNAMARA. I did not know it. That is why I asked the question.

Mr. MORSE. I could tell the Senator from Michigan of others who do not know it.

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON IMPROPER ACTIVITIES IN LABOR OR MANAGEMENT FIELD

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, at the instance of the majority leader, I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1099, Senate Resolution 186.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 186) increasing the limit of expenditures for the Select Committee on Improper Activities in Labor or Management Field.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, what is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to Senate Resolution 186.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I enthusiastically urge the adoption of the resolution. I am glad I have this opportunity, with the Senator from Arkansas present on the floor, to tell him that in my judgment, as I told the Senate on Friday, as can be seen by checking the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day, I do not think some abuses of labor would have come to light if it had not been for the Select Committee on Improper Activities in Labor or Management Field, nor would we have been in a position to help clean up the house of labor, as I think is being done effectively, had it not been for the work of the committee of the Senator from Arkansas.

As I said last Friday, on the whole matter of Congressional investigations, I have some definite views as to procedural changes in cases where charges of criminality are involved, but I know no one who is a more ardent supporter of Congressional investigations than is the Senator from Oregon.

I think the sum of money for which the Senator from Arkansas is asking for his select committee is reasonable and should be granted.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. IVES. I wish to back up the chairman of the select committee. In the first place, I desire to pay tribute to the chairman. He has done a marvelous job in handling the committee and the work before it. If the work of any committee should be continued, it is the work of his committee, which is wholly justified, and the money asked for is needed.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. President, I only want to say that I hoped there would be a yea and nay vote on this resolution, but I shall not ask for it, because I believe there is not a Senator who would oppose the resolution.

The committee has worked diligently. The committee members have worked hard. We are digging. Nothing is handed to us on a silver platter. We have to do the work.

I appreciate the support of my colleagues in the Senate from both sides of the aisle. This is not a partisan matter. This is American. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield to my friend, the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. I wish to join the Senator from New York, in his commendation of my good friend, the Senator from Arkansas, who is doing a very noble job.

I wish to inquire whether the other investigating committee, the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations, is functioning as it has in the past.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am sorry; I did not understand the question.

Mr. ELLENDER. As I recall, the Senate has a Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations, as well as the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field. Has the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations obtained funds to carry on its usual work?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my friend, who is referring to the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

Mr. ELLENDER. That is the subcommittee to which I am referring. We have provided funds for the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations each year for a number of years. Is that Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations still operating?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Yes, indeed. I may say to my friend I am very glad he asked me that question. We shall have hearings on Wednesday morning on a matter which has been practically worked out and in connection with which we have found waste, extravagance, and inefficiency.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes. I saw an item relating to that in the newspapers.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad my friend saw it in the newspapers. I simply wished to point it out.

Mr. ELLENDER. Yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. That committee, based upon what the Senator has seen in the newspapers, which can be substantiated, is going to make it possible to save more money than it would cost to operate the committee for 15 or 20 years.

Mr. ELLENDER. I was simply asking for information.

To what extent do the investigators connected with the two investigating committees dovetail their work? In other words, do the investigators for the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations work with investigators for the Select Committee on Improper Activities in Labor or Management Field?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I will say to the Senator frankly, as chairman of both committees, I use the investigators when I can.

Mr. ELLENDER. I understand.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Whatever I use them for is in the best interests of the Federal Government.

Mr. ELLENDER. I realize that.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my friend.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCLELLAN. Would the Senator like to have the floor in his own right?

Mr. CURTIS. It does not matter. Whatever the Senator would prefer.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the resolution. I agree with my distinguished chairman, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] that were it possible to have a yea and nay vote I believe the vote would be unanimous.

The committee has done a great deal of work already. There is much work yet to be done in the fall.

While those of us who serve on the committee will be giving time to committee meetings and other work, I wish to point out that many more duties will fall upon the distinguished chairman, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN]. He is making a great sacrifice for this important work. He is going far beyond the needs and the requirements of serving his own fine State of Arkansas. He is making a contribution toward the economy and well being of the entire Republic.

I wish to take this occasion to commend the Senator from Arkansas for his thoroughness, for his untiring efforts, for his devotion to principle, for his fairness, and for his fearlessness in the conduct of investigations.

The money to be provided by this resolution is needed. I am sure the resolution will be agreed to unanimously.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, I simply wish to take this occasion to join in the remarks of felicitation to our chairman made by my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS]. I share those views fully.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] is doing a fine, courageous, and objective job in serving as chairman of this unusual bipartisan committee which is charged by the United States Senate with some very heavy and significant responsibilities.

The Senator from Arkansas has conducted the affairs of our investigations without partisanship, as he quite appropriately should, by virtue of the nature of the subject matter we are investigating, and by virtue of the fact that the Senate in its wisdom made this committee strictly a bipartisan committee, with a like number of Democrats and Republicans.

I believe nobody can forecast at this time how long the committee will have to labor over the problem before it is able to state that it feels the committee has adequately covered the subject.

Certainly the amount of money requested in this resolution is a modest sum as it relates to the challenges which lie ahead of the committee. I know the Scottish impulses of our chairman are shared by the other members of the committee, as we pledge to do this job as economically as we can, commensurate with the size of the task.

Mr. President, tomorrow afternoon I propose to address the Senate at some length regarding the work of the committee and the findings we have made thus far, as well as with regard to some of the problems which lie ahead, as I envision them. I do not wish to detain the Senate longer tonight, except to say that I certainly favor the adoption of the resolution to make adequate funds available.

I did not desire to let this opportunity pass without saying a word of tribute, respect, and encouragement to our distinguished chairman, with whom I have served so long on so many difficult investigations ordered by the United States Senate.

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I shall not long delay the motion which I know the Chair is anxious to put, and which we are all anxious to have agreed to. I simply wish to add my voice to the praise for the fine job which the chairman of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in Labor or Management Field has done. I assure the Senator from Arkansas of my continued support, and I advocate the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], and the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. McNAMARA], and to add the statement that our chairman has done a truly magnificent job in presiding over the committee. As one who has been unable to attend many meetings of the committee, I wish to commend the fine work done by all the members of the committee, in addition to the chairman.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I wish to thank each of my colleagues on the Committee for his kind remarks. I know they mean what they say.

I believe they know that I have tried to be an impartial chairman, not partisan, because I believe, Mr. President, the problem we are investigating rises above partisan politics. I believe there is an issue here which strikes at America. There should not be any Republicanism or Democratism involved. We are trying to do a job. A situation has developed which needs attention. I will not be anti-Republican in doing this work, and I will not be pro-Democrat in doing it. I will extend to every member of the committee every courtesy that is attendant upon their efforts to do a good job for America.

Mr. President, I believe I can state to Senators tonight that the work we have done so far, disregarding politics and partisanship, has demonstrated there is a real job which ought to be performed and made of record, so that the Congress of the United States of America can find a way to correct some of the evils which have developed and which, if unchecked, could become dangerous to our American way of life.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am happy to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. IVES. I am glad the Senator from Arkansas, as well as other Senators, has brought up the question of nonpartisanship so far as the committee is concerned. In that connection I wish to commend the chairman especially for having been utterly nonpartisan, and for the manner in which he has conducted the affairs of the committee.

This committee simply has to be entirely nonpartisan, or it will not accomplish the results it seeks to achieve. I can say now that following the leadership of the chairman we are going to keep on that kind of track.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank my distinguished friend, the Senator from New York.

I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the amount authorized in Senate Resolution 74, agreed to January 30, 1957, and Senate Resolution 88, agreed to February 7, 1957, 85th Congress (authorizing and directing the committee to conduct an investigation and study of the extent to which criminal or other improper practices or activities are, or have been, engaged in in the field of labor-management relations or in groups or organizations of employees or employers to the detriment of the interests of the public, employers or employees, and to determine whether any changes are required in the laws of the United States in order to protect such interests against the occurrence of such practices or activities), is hereby increased by the additional amount of $150,000.

TARIFF TREATMENT OF ISTLE OR TAMPICO FIBER

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, at the request of the majority leader, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 882, H. R. 7096.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7096) to amend paragraph 1684 of the Tariff Act of 1930 with respect to istle or Tampico fiber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

EXPANSION AND GROWTH OF NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks a very encouraging exchange which I have had with Dr. Alan T. Waterman, Director of the National Science Foundation. It is especially gratifying, in these days of social crisis, to realize that the leadership of this vital organization is in the hands of a distinguished scientist who, in addition to his understanding of the physical sciences, demonstrates a sensitive awareness of the essential importance of the sciences of human social behavior.

I am sure that we are all impressed with Dr. Waterman's report of expansion and growth of the Foundation's social science research program, despite the budgetary handicaps with which the Foundation is faced. This is a very promising beginning and I look forward to continued progress and development of the Foundation's contribution to research and education in the social sciences.

I am particularly pleased to learn that the Foundation has under serious consideration the broadening of its fellowship awards in the social sciences. The Nation's need for expert, professional competence in the social sciences is acute and pressing and I hope that the Foundation, through its fellowships, will be able very soon to contribute substantially toward meeting this need. I am confident that Dr. Waterman will be equally successful in establishing a broad-based program of fellowships in the social sciences as he has been in creating a well-considered program of social science research support.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 25, 1957.

Dr. ALAN T. WATERMAN,
Director, National Science Foundation,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR DR. WATERMAN: Your attention has undoubtedly been directed to the statements I made on the floor of the Senate on June 3 and June 12 in which I supported the budgetary request of the National Science Foundation and called attention to the need to strengthen the Foundation's program of research grants and fellowships in the social sciences. I was very pleased to note the subsequent concurrence with these views expressed on July 9 by my distinguished colleague from Minnesota, Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY.

As you know, I was keenly disappointed in the final action of the Congress in limiting your 1958 appropriation to the 1957 level. I trust, however, that despite this limitation, you have been able to proceed with an expanded program in the important area of the social sciences. In this connection, I should greatly appreciate your advising me regarding the current status of your activities in support of the social sciences. It would be particularly helpful to have information on (1) your present level of support of research in the social sciences; (2) the extent to which you may have broadened the areas of social science support; and (3) your present program of fellowships in the social sciences.

With assurances of my continued interest in and support of the activities of the National Science Foundation, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

WAYNE MORSE.

NATIONAL SCIENCE FOUNDATION,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., August 2, 1957.

The Honorable WAYNE MORSE,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR MORSE: Thank you for your letter of July 25, 1957, in which you refer to your statements on the floor of the Senate regarding the 1958 budget and social-science activities of the National Science Foundation. I am deeply appreciative of your efforts in behalf of our program.

I note also your request for information regarding the current status of the foundation's activities in support of the social sciences. Despite the severe budgetary limitations under which we are operating, we have been able to allocate $600,000 for the support of basic research in the social sciences. This represents a substantial increase over funds previously assigned to this activity.

To administer these increased funds efficiently we have established, as of August 1, a unified social-science-research program under the general direction of the associate director (research). This new program will support basic research in the anthropological, economic, and sociological sciences, as well as in the history and philosophy of science. We have broadened the scope of the social-science-support program to include, within these areas, support of research irrespective of convergence with the natural sciences.

As you know, our fellowship programs were broadened 2 years ago to provide for a limited number of fellowships in the fields of convergence of the natural and social sciences. In addition to fellowships in anthropology, geography, and psychology, which are considered part of our regular fellowship program, we have awarded, in the past 2 years, 30 fellowships in the convergent fields at the approximate cost of $94,000. It is anticipated that from 15 to 20 fellowships will be awarded this year to qualified applicants in the fields of natural science-social science convergence. In connection with our planning for fiscal year 1959, we are giving serious consideration to the possibility of broadening further the scope of the social-science fields for which National Science Foundation fellowships may be given.

I trust this provides you with the information you requested. I should be pleased to give you any further details you may wish.

Once again, I should like to say how much we appreciate your continued support of the foundation's program.

With kind regards.

Sincerely yours,

ALAN T. WATERMAN,
Director.

HAZARDS OF CONTINUED NUCLEAR TESTING

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, as Senators know, I have pending before a committee of the Senate a resolution which seeks to focus attention on the need for the United States to take the lead in the great humanitarian cause of bringing to an end the nuclear tests, which I think may very well threaten the very survival of civilization itself. At least, I believe the continuation of the nuclear tests might very well jeopardize the health of mankind.

In recent months a great deal of propaganda has been put out by the administration, particularly under the usual coverup tactics of the head of the Atomic Energy Commission, Mr. Strauss. It would be very difficult for me to name a person in the Government service today who has been more guilty of misleading the American people than Mr. Strauss.

I was interested in reading in today's press that a report has been issued by a Congressional committee which forewarns the American people that there is great danger involved in a continuation of nuclear tests. I ask unanimous consent that this news story be printed in the Record at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Report on Hearings—Congress Cautions on Test Fallout Peril

(By Warren Unna)

The Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy warned yesterday that prolonged continuance of nuclear weapons tests at their current rate could constitute a hazard to the world population.

The committee's remarks came in the form of a lengthy analysis of the testimony of some 50 scientists given during 8 days of radioactive fallout hearings last May and June.

Although making no recommendations for fallout control, the committee analysis declared: "It would appear that the consequence of further testing over the next several generations at the level of the past 5 years could constitute a hazard to the world's population. If the level of future testing rises, then the hazard could be greater and could arrive sooner."

Referring to the Atomic Energy Commission without naming it, the committee analysis further stated: "The assumption has often been made of a constant average annual rate of testing. But the testing up to now has been sporadic. The concept of present rate of testing is in any exact sense meaningless. Not only the rate, but the kind and location of testing are important, and difficult to predict."

MORE RESEARCH NEEDED

The committee found scientists in agreement that some increase is necessary in further research, if we are to accomplish our objectives of understanding the nature of radioactive fallout and its effects on man at an earlier date.

It also took a backslap at the AEC for referring to man's tolerance to the deadly strontium 90 fallout particle in terms of sunshine units. "A strontium unit," declared the committee, "is much better named."

During the fallout hearings, Chairman Chet Holifield, Democrat, of California, had seized upon the sunshine label with the words: "I was wondering if we were allowing—let us say—propaganda to creep into our scientific terminology. * * * I (at first) thought this might be a tranquilizing pill."

OTHER FINDINGS

The committee's analysis of the hearings also found:

"General agreement that any amount of radiation, no matter how small the dose, increases the rate of genetic mutation (change) in a population.

"General agreement that there is a limit to the amount of radioactivity and, hence, to the amount of fission products that man can tolerate in his environment.

"General agreement that man's exposure to fallout radiation, including strontium-90, is and will be in general small, from the testing already done, compared with his exposure to other, normal background sources of radiation.

"A difference of opinion as to whether a very small dose of radiation would produce * * * an increased incidence of such somatic (non-genetic) conditions as leukemia or bone cancer, or a decrease in life expectancy in a population.

"Considerable evidence * * * that in no part of the atmosphere is fallout uniformly distributed."

EFFECT OF "JET STREAM"

The analysis pointed out that such factors as stratospheric jet streams could induce heavier fallout in the Northern Hemisphere, specifically in the Northeastern section of the United States.

The committee report also declared that it had been clearly brought out that the target area fallout from a one-megaton bomb (with the explosive equivalent of 1 million tons of TNT) could produce 100 to 300 times the amount of strontium-90 radiation now considered safe.

The committee said it had been estimated that the equivalent yield of about 50 tons of fission products had been injected into the atmosphere by all countries so far. This figure was computed prior to last Thursday's substantial size Russian bomb test. The strontium-90 proportion of the fission products was estimated at 3½ percent.

In contrast with these million-ton figures, the committee anaysis said the explosive energy released by the August, 1945 Hiroshima bomb was equal to a mere 20,000 tons of TNT.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I serve notice now that, come January, when the Senate reconvenes, I shall do all within my power to try to focus the attention of the American people on this nuclear test problem, because, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I am convinced that if we should exercise our potential leadership as a great country, a country dedicated to great spiritual values, we could turn the tide in the nuclear field, so far as Russia is concerned, and, through our leadership in the United Nations, so focus attention on Russia if she should refuse to accept a sound program for bringing to an end this great threat to the health of mankind, that we could write a glorious chapter in the history of civilization.

I am greatly disappointed that apparently the President of the United States is willing to go along with Mr. Strauss and with the Secretary of State in what I call an attempt to threaten Russia with massive retaliation, with the promise that if Russia does not do our bidding in this field she will be subjected to a course in annihilation bombing. The sad feature about that threat is that the annihilation would not be confined to Russia. There would be annihilation to a great degree in our own country, and, in terms of history, a very sad failure on the part of American leadership to rise to what I consider to be a clear moral challenge.

At a later time I shall speak in the Senate by way of presenting a chronology of the great historic events in the history of mankind, showing how, from time to time, various nations have risen to great moral responsibilities. The fact is that when that happens in history, civilization moves forward.

On the other hand, when the leaders of a given historic time fail to fulfill their moral responsibility, history suffers a devastating slump. Therefore, we find that history is dotted with periodic dark ages, because the leadership of a given time failed to rise to great moral heights.

If we do not change our course of action in the United States, I think history will record that today the United States is falling far short of living up to what I regard as clear spiritual obligations in regard to the nuclear challenge.

As I have previously said, and repeat tonight, we cannot justify, on religious and moral grounds, the record we are making in the entire field of conducting nuclear tests, when we know what the scientific data are, when it is perfectly clear that we are playing a game involving great jeopardy, so far as concerns the future health, not only of our own people, but of all peoples around the world.

So I hope that during the recess period, Members of Congress will discuss this problem at the grassroots level with their constituents. I am satisfied that if, as, and when they do so, they will find that the people are ahead of us. They will find that for many months past throughout America in the churches there has been a great deal of focusing of attention on this moral and religious responsibility.

I suggest to the President of the United States and to Mr. Strauss that they listen to what the great moral leaders of America are saying with regard to our obligation to support a program which will put America in the forefront in the advocacy of bringing to an end nuclear testing.

ADJOURNMENT TO 11 A. M. TOMORROW

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until 11 o'clock a. m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Tuesday, August 27, 1957, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, AUGUST 26, 1957

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend Earl S. Cummings, Jr., pastor, First Christian Church, of Brazil, Ind., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, as we meet this noon may your spirit so dwell within us that we shall do in every act Thy bidding and always find favor in Thy sight.

Bless this body. In the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, August 23, 1957, was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

PROTECTION OF FILES OF THE FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, this Congress should not adjourn until we have acted to protect the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

We know that the Supreme Court decision in the Jencks case is being broadly interpreted to give those who are accused of attempting to overthrow our Government the right to rummage through the secret files of the FBI.

Some who have been convicted of partnership in the Communist conspiracy are being released to walk as free men.

Others on whom the FBI has laboriously built its cases may never face trial because the Department of Justice cannot risk disclosure of the FBI records.

The effectiveness of the FBI in our fight against subversion will be destroyed if Congress does not act.

Mr. Speaker, the necessary legislation was reported July 5 from the House Judiciary Committee. It has the support of the FBI, the Department of Justice, and the White House. It is a carefully prepared measure, implementing the Court decision but restricting the availability of Government files to those that in the opinion of the Court are relevant to the case. Individual rights are fully protected.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot afford to delay on this legislation. We are already seeing the effects of the Court decision. By January the damage to our entire campaign against the Communist conspiracy may be beyond repair. The time for action is now.

I fully appreciate the importance of the civil-rights bill. I recognize that the mutual security appropriation is considered urgent. I consider the FBI files bill is at least as important as either of these, and we should not leave Washington until it is enacted. I am opposed to adjournment until this urgent legislation is passed.

THE FBI FILES

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, last week I stated my opposition to the adjournment of this session of Congress until adequate legislation has been enacted to protect the sanctity of FBI files from the effects of the Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case. You have only to read FBI Counterspy Boris Morro's recent revelations and take note of the escape to the Iron Curtain of Martha Dodd and Alfred Stern to reassure yourselves of the constant dangers we face to our Nation's security. If anything further is needed to point up the danger, the indictment of Soviet Army Col. Rudolph Abel, with its disclosure of the official Soviet spy apparatus entwining the Nation's secrets most certainly furnishes it.

Unless this legislation counteracting the effects of the Jencks decision is enacted, at least 312 convicted criminals could be freed within the next year.

The decision not only poses threats to our security, but to law enforcement of every kind. Second only to security is the distressing possibilities the decision poses with respect to enforcement of laws against the dreaded illegal narcotics traffic. In the last 3 months the Justice Department has allowed 13 criminal cases to be dismissed rather than give the 17 defendants access to FBI files. These cases involved kidnaping, fraud, bribery, narcotics violations and other Federal crimes. These dismissals are a direct result of the Jencks decision.

Opening files to defendants in criminal cases at random gives the FBI the difficult choice of refusing to prosecute many criminal cases, or going ahead with prosecutions at the cost of destroying its effectiveness as an investigative organization. During every moment Congress fails to act on this important legislation both the Nation's security and the Nation's power to enforce its laws against crime are impaired.

Congress has a definite and clear obligation to handle this vital matter without further delay or procrastination. I repeat again, Congress has no business adjourning until this gapping hole in the Nation's security is plugged up, and I shall resist all efforts to adjourn before this action is taken.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER] assured me during a colloquy last Friday that he is exerting the utmost effort to obtain passage of this legislation. The Republican conference last week instructed its party leadership to press vigorously for enactment of the legislation before adjournment. The matter is in the hands and control of the Democrat leadership of this Congress. Realizing the urgency of the legislation, and realizing as well the heavy fire which the Democrat Party underwent on the security issue during the Truman era, I would think its leadership would have cause to worry over the political consequences of bringing about any adjournment of this Congress before adequate legislation is enacted, as has been urgently requested by Attorney General Herbert Brownell and FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, to protect the FBI's files, and in so doing, protect the Nation's security.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman will have to wait until tomorrow to get the answer to his question.

THE TENTH WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] and I were appointed as delegates to the Tenth World Health Organization. We attended.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as part of my remarks speeches and remarks that were made by other members of the organization, which I consider noteworthy.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE MUTUAL SECURITY APPROPRIATION ACT, 1958

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, we certainly hope that during the week we will have the mutual security bill back on the floor. I hope that the membership will be prepared to support the position of the House conferees. We are not damaging this program. There are sufficient funds in the House bill to carry out the commitments of our Government. It would be a better-managed program with the amount of money that the House has approved. I certainly hope if it is necessary for the House conferees to come back to the House for instructions on any item in disagreement that the membership will be prepared to support the position of the House conferees.

A business well managed can do a better job. That applies to a family, or to an individual. Certainly this would apply to any governmental agency. What we are trying to do is to get this complex foreign-aid program on a business basis and I can assure each and every one of the Members, pressure and publicity notwithstanding, that there are ample funds in the bill to carry out this program according to our Government's commitments, and the testimony submitted by the witnesses who came before our committee.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PASSMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. It may even be the means, if the House position is supported, of the administration's staying within the $275 billion debt limit, is not that correct?

Mr. PASSMAN. I thank the gentleman for his observation.

CURTAILED WEATHER BUREAU OPERATIONS CALLED IRRESPONSIBLE

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASHLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is hard to find a better example of false, pound-foolish economy than that which has resulted in curtailment of United States Weather Bureau operations throughout the country.

It is too much to hope that this reduction in service will not result in unnecessary loss of life and property damage. This will be particularly true in the hurricane and tornado belts, but it will also be true in inland districts such as the one I represent.

In the area of Toledo, Ohio, Mr. Speaker, private aircraft and small-boat activity has increased manyfold in recent years and every indication points to continuation of this phenomenal growth. During this same period the United States Weather Bureau at Toledo, Ohio, has been fighting a losing battle. Today the Bureau staff is down to six, two persons under a year ago. With the recent Presidential order prohibiting the filling of vacancies due to death, retirement, or resignation, the situation can only become worse—although already Weather Bureau service at Toledo has been suspended from midnight to 5 a. m.

Because the Toledo area is both highly industrial and rich in agriculture, curtailment of the many special Weather Bureau services will have a very real impact.

As one of the great inland ports of the world, Toledo is especially dependent on wind and weather forecasts for its great volume of Great Lakes shipping. Because Toledo is also an important railroad and trucking artery, detailed forecasts of cold waves, sudden temperature changes, freezing rain, and sleet for these shipping and transportation interests are also essential.

Our farmers and fruitgrowers, too, count on special agricultural forecasts—especially frost-protection warnings.

Forecasts and warning services relating to heavy rainstorms and severe windstorms are of very real interest to hundreds of families living along the unprotected shores of western Lake Erie. Time and again these families have been driven from their homes by sudden storms from the northeast, and Weather Bureau warnings have done much to prevent serious loss of life.

In the last 4 years, Mr. Speaker, hurricanes alone have taken almost a thousand lives and have caused property damage in excess of $1 billion. Civil Defense and other officials tell us that most of the lives lost and a substantial part of the property damage could have been prevented had sufficient funds been available for the Weather Bureau to establish the type of warning service which was possible. The investment of a few million dollars then would have been repaid many times over—and this is no less true today.

The responsibility for this false economy can be placed equally with the White House and the Congress. Certainly the President is to blame for not standing up and fighting for funds to carry out programs vital to the health and safety of millions of Americans. Similarly, the Congress must accept responsibility for failing to distinguish between real and false economy, and for seeking to please rather than protect the American public.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that these mistakes can be corrected before irreparable damage results.

MISS JUDY FORD, OF CHERRYVILLE, N. C.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of deep pride that I call the attention of the House to the accomplishment of a young lady residing in my Congressional District. I refer to Miss Judy Ford, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Howard Ford, Cherryville, N. C.

Judy was recently elected president of the Luther League of America at its annual convention at the University of Kansas. Her achievement is all the more striking when we realize that she is the first young lady to be elected president of the Luther League of America in the 62-year history of the organization.

As we all know, the Luther League is the young people's auxiliary to the great United Lutheran Church in America. It is devoted to the building of good citizenship among our young people, and its activities exemplify and promote the very highest type of Christian living. I am proud and honored that a constituent of mine should be selected to direct such a worthwhile organization.

Judy Ford has been a natural leader in all of her school and church activities. She is a rising senior at Lenoir-Rhyne College in Hickory, N. C., where she is editor of the college yearbook, a member of the college debaters, the dramatic club, and Kappa Delta and Alpha Tau Kappa, honorary forensic orders.

This outstanding young lady is a member of St. Johns Lutheran Church at Cherryville, N. C. Rev. Leroy C. Trexler is pastor of that splendid church and has faithfully directed her efforts in behalf of Christian citizenship. She has participated in every activity of her church and has contributed articles to such Lutheran publications as Luther Life and the North Carolina Lutheran. In the latter publication she has written a regular column called Ford's Forum.

Her devotion to her church and her efforts in its behalf began at an early age. Her example is an inspiration to all young people, and her untiring efforts in behalf of the Christian way of life have enriched the lives of all who have been privileged to know and work with this outstanding young lady.

Mr. Speaker, I salute Judy Ford and wish her continued success in her efforts in building a greater Lutheran Church and instilling a sense of devotion to Christian principles in the hearts and minds of the young people with whom she is associated.

PLIGHT OF THE RURAL ELECTRIC CO-OPS

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest things to come to rural America in this generation was the birth of rural electrification. These home-owned, home-controlled, free-enterprise groups have brought the comforts and conveniences of electricity to the farm homes of this country and have completely changed rural living. In my section, even with an average of less than three users per mile of line the rural electric co-ops are meeting their payments of principal and interest on their loans, paying their share of State and national taxes, and are doing a good job of keeping our young people on the farms, where they are so badly needed.

Yet, with all this fine record, trouble looms ahead. Circular A-47, of the Bureau of the Budget, plus recent decisions of the Federal Power Commission increasing rates to be charged by the Southwest Power Administration for power sold to the rural electric co-ops in the Southwest, bode no good. This rate increase was ordered over the protest of the co-ops, who asked permission to argue their case, but were denied the right to be heard. Other interested firms and people were heard—a rank discrimination to those serving rural communities. Another example of this discrimination was putting off for 1 year the increase in rates to other power companies while they renegotiated their contracts; but the rural electric co-ops were walloped with an immediate increase of 27 percent, and this without being given the courtesy of a hearing.

This was all done upon an admitted preliminary cost allocations figure. Why could not the rural electric co-ops have been granted the same year's time while the Federal Power Commission arrived at the true facts? Your guess is as good as mine. The only thing I can say is that under the facts, as I see them, the Department of the Interior had no right to propose this increase; and the Federal Power Commission had no right to approve it. The universal law of equity and justice should have been applied.

To add to the woes of the rural electric co-ops is Circular A-47 of the Bureau of the Budget, which I discussed about 2 years ago. It is adding additional cost to the power which co-ops buy from hydroelectric dams. Because of the sparseness of customers, the rural areas cannot be profitably served by any organization operating for profit.

I can discern in the distance what I think to be a calculated design to cripple or destroy these servants of our rural people. High power rates; a partnership policy with others getting the "partner" and the co-ops getting the little "ship"; higher interest rates; removing power generation from flood control and navigation projects; and finally a tendency, I fear, to name to service agencies those who are either uninformed or not in sympathy with a proper concept of rural service.

The rural electric co-ops and all friends of rural living had better batten down the hatch. There are storms ahead for the "ship" part of "partnership"—and the farmers service organizations in the field.

PROGRAM FOR THE WEEK OF AUGUST 26

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time to secure the program for the week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I can announce the program for tomorrow. The Committee on Rules, as is known, has reported out the rule making in order the civil-rights bill. That will be the first order of business tomorrow. It also reported out a rule making in order a bill from the Committee on the Judiciary in connection with the Jencks decision of the Supreme Court. That bill will follow the civil-rights bill.

As to the District of Columbia business, the stadium bill conference report is in order, subject to the Senate's acting upon it. If the Senate acts on it today, it will come up today.

Mr. MARTIN. What is up for today?

Mr. McCORMACK. Today is District Day. There is one bill to come up, amending the District of Columbia Business Corporation Act. If the Senate acts on the stadium bill, that will be brought up.

Mr. MARTIN. What time will we be coming in tomorrow?

Mr. McCORMACK. I think 12 o'clock will be all right for tomorrow, having in mind what the program shows for the rest of the week.

Mr. MARTIN. As I understand, there is 1 hour's debate under each of the two rules that are to be brought up today.

Mr. McCORMACK. There is 1 hour under each one of the rules, so I have been informed. I may say also that the stadium bill conference report, I have been informed, is in order now for action, so that will follow the District Day business.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I should like to make this expression. I have talked to a great many Members. The Labor Day weekend is coming up and they are very anxious to get home. The vacation season is practically over for many of them in our area. I should like to express the hope that we could wind up this session of Congress by Wednesday night. It seems to me that could be done. If we could, I think it would be good for us and I think maybe good for the country.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FEIGHAN. I should like first to subscribe to the observation made by the distinguished assistant minority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is the most popular remark he has made in all the years I have been associated with him.

Mr. FEIGHAN. I am particularly interested in the immigration bill. I agree with him in the hope that we will conclude on Wednesday, but there is an immigration bill that may come before the House. It may come up under suspension of the rules. I have submitted in the report minority views, and I should like to know whether or not, if this is called up, I will be advised.

Mr. MARTIN. That would be up to the majority leader.

The SPEAKER. If it comes up under suspension of the rules, everybody will know it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. I said to my friend from Massachusetts that there is one District bill to come up today. I am informed now that there are two bills. The other one is the bill (S. 969) to prescribe the weight to be given to evidence of tests of alcohol in the blood or urine of persons tried in the District of Columbia for operating vehicles while under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

As to the time to be used on the rules tomorrow, there is 1 hour on the civil-rights conference report, and on the other there is the hour on the rule and the hour on the bill itself.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. If we get to the conference report on the mutual-security bill, and adopt that and get the civil-rights conference report out of the way, I wonder if the gentleman will entertain a motion to adjourn sine die.

Mr. McCORMACK. I can inform my friend that a motion to adjourn sine die will be made just as soon as it is possible. I can assure the gentleman of that. I hope the views of the gentleman from Indiana can be carried out, but nobody can subscribe to that definitely. The motion to adjourn sine die will be made just as soon as we have completed our business.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. It is very difficult to get reservations on planes. Transportation is tight. I have speaking engagements for both Saturday and Monday. I have been rather patient, and so have a lot of other Members. I notice there are only about half of us left here, barely a quorum. It may become necessary for some of us to see that a quorum stays on the floor of the House in order to prevent some legislation being brought up that should not be put through with a minority of the Members here. I would not suggest doing that if we are going to make an effort to get the two major bills confronting us out of the way and then go home and let the country think over what we have done in the last 6 or 8 months.

ASIATIC FLU EPIDEMIC

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am horrified that the Army is closing the Murphy Army Hospital at Waltham, particularly in view of the Asiatic flu epidemic. During 1918, I was volunteering in an Army hospital daily and sometimes 36 hours at a time trying to help take care of flu victims. We did not have beds. We were short of doctors and nurses. In the pneumonia wards every nurse contracted the flu. Civilian hospitals were packed and jammed. It is an outrage, I think, to close the hospital at this time, and today our civilian hospitals are plagued with a shortage of medical personnel.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly think the doctors should insist that President Eisenhower should have the Asiatic flu vaccine, if anyone in the country has it. He is our No. 1 citizen. He is vitally important to us and vitally important to the Free World today. He should be treated with the greatest respect and given the best of care.

LACK OF CIVIL DEFENSE—A NATIONAL SHORTCOMING

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, in recent years we have seen military weapons developed beyond all comprehension. We have built bombs so deadly that a single missile cannot only kill and maim thousands, if not millions, but also permanently damage the entire human race. We have such bombs and though we might have made them first, there is no doubt that our enemies have them now, too. It is merely a deliberative daydream to pretend that the enemy is not capable of penetrating our military defenses to drop a thermonuclear bomb over a target in the United States. To disregard this threat with continued apathy is to flirt with omnipotent danger such as our civilization has never known.

In 1950 the Congress created the Federal Civil Defense Administration to plan for an effective defense against atomic attack. Of late some have criticized this agency with the charge that it has wasted all of the public funds allotted to it. In defense, others have argued that the Civil Defense Administration never had an opportunity to prove its worth because Congress would not appropriate the requested funds to carry out its work. Both of these opposite points of view are unwarranted. There is no doubt that the Civil Defense Administration could have done a far better job, but all in all it has served an important role.

Congress, in refusing to pour more and more money into the Civil Defense Administration, is not losing interest in civil defense. On the contrary, it is my strong conviction that there is more genuine concern in Congress now than ever before for an efficient system of national civil defense. My fellow legislators have balked, and rightly so, because the Civil Defense Administration has such a shortsighted policy. In the 7 years since its creation, it is already outmoded and obsolete.

Basically, civil defense is a planning program and to be workable, it must be keyed far in advance of the present. For the program to operate on a current basis is indeed reckless and for it to be years behind, as it is presently, is downright negligence.

A strong and well-organized civil defense can be a very definite power for peace. To allow our great centers of population and industry to lie exposed to possible attack is to invite disaster. Such an attack at home could virtually paralyze our military forces, even if the military escaped to launch its massive retaliation. The victor, in my firm opinion, will undoubtedly be the nation which can withstand attack rather than merely attack. In event of atomic war, our success becomes a question of survival.

In this respect, the Civil Defense Administration has been active in testing various types of shelters for some time. In recent nuclear bomb tests in Nevada, a lot of scientific data has been obtained on shelter structure needed to withstand attack. Generally, there seem to be three types of shelters under study depending on whether the shelter is designed to offer protection from the immediate blast or shock wave, the following flash of fire or lastly, the fallout of radioactive materials.

The problem of survival has vastly increased since the Federal Civil Defense Administration came into being. At that time, the terrible dangers of radioactive fallout were not considered. Perhaps the Atomic Energy Commission knew of the dangers, but the Civil Defense Administration says it did not. This in itself is an illustration of the poor governmental coordination which has hampered the effectiveness of our domestic civil defense. The fact that the Civil Defense Administration is now testing various shelters in Atomic Energy Commission experiments is significant of much-needed improvements in liaison. Let us hope that these agencies are now cooperating fully for the protection and well-being of the American people.

The United States Constitution gives the Federal Government the authority to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. The common defense, Mr. Speaker, is both military defense and civil defense. One without the other is not an adequate defense in this atomic age. It is my considered judgment, therefore, that a far-reaching plan for national survival in case of atomic war should be worked out as soon as possible.

Although the tense world situation demands a certain urgency, it is paramount that proper consideration be given to all aspects of a national survival program. All factors should be duly and fully considered. Certainly we do not want to weaken the national economy by channeling billions upon billions of tax dollars into a nationwide system of shelters which might be outdated by the time they are finally built. Nor do we want to be lulled into a false feeling of security with the mistaken view that such shelters will make us invincible. Still, time is all-important in launching a full-scale inquiry into the feasibility of atomic shelters.

Despite the objections which have been raised, the Federal Civil Defense Administration contains the framework under which such an investigation can be carried out at present. This study might indicate the need for a top-to-bottom revamping of the present civil-defense program or even an entirely new agency.

The Military Operations Subcommittee of the House Committee on Government Operations has already held lengthy hearings on the subject of additional civil-defense legislation. The committee report shows that Congress appropriated the full amount which the Civil Defense Administration requested for shelter design and testing. In fiscal year 1957, $10 million was appropriated for this purpose but civil defense failed to develop a worthwhile program, carrying over more than $6 million. In this session, Congress added $2 million of new money which was the full amount asked for shelter experiments and Congress so earmarked this appropriation.

In the past and even at the present, our civil-defense program is based on the concept of mass evacuation. This plan, even if workable, is completely unsound and unrealistic. In the event of actual attack, it would result only in mass mayhem. Everyone's evacuation is, first of all, impracticable for the simple reason that our Nation does not have the highways to evacuate key target areas, assuming that we received as much as 1½ hours' notice. An expenditure of several billions would be required to expand our highway system so that it would carry the traffic load even to points 15 miles outside the target areas.

At 15 miles or even 30 miles, there is little assurance that evacuated persons would escape death or serious injury. The reason for this is because the dangers of radioactive fallout are haphazardly discounted. Perhaps the lethal qualities of fallout were not realized at the time the mass evacuation plan was evolved, but now there can be no doubt that death by fallout can be an agonizing and prolonged torture such as few mortals have ever experienced. Therefore, mass evacuation, even if accomplished, offers little chance of escaping the fatal radiation of an atomic attack.

Mr. Speaker, it appears that shelters in which persons can remain for perhaps several days offer our only sure chance of survival. Most shelters, of course, would not withstand a nearby blast. The ensuing fires would destroy other shelters. The blast and fire is an imminent danger, however, only in the immediate bombed area. Everywhere else, shelters provide the only known means of surviving atomic attack.

As a defense against fallout, shelters are very certainly an integral part of our civil-defense system. It is appalling indeed that extremely few shelters or underground areas which might be used as such, are in existence today. One of the most effective, I am informed, is the subway running from the United States Capitol to the Senate Office Building. The subway to the House Office Building is a little too shallow. Any widespread shelter program in a metropolitan area might take a cue from the United States Capitol subway system. Shelters might well be dual purpose constructions, either as subterranean crossings at street intersections or as underground passageways or subway stations. In this fashion, a portion of the construction expense might be borne by others besides the Federal Government. The shelters alternate use would also serve to alleviate any misgivings that our elaborate shelter system would never be used.

At this point, what is urgently needed is more sound leadership and guidance on the part of the executive branch of Government. More than a year ago, President Eisenhower wrote Civil Defense Administrator Val Peterson:

> An effective civil defense is an important deterrent against attack on our country and thus helps preserve peace. In the event of an attack upon us, civil defense at once becomes one of our immediate reactions imperatively required for our Nation's survival. * * * Therefore, our whole civil-defense effort needs both strengthening and modernizing.

The President's words are the consensus of almost everyone concerned with our civilian defense. Indeed, there has been a great laxity on the part of all concerned. Too little attention has been and is being given to civil defense.

The executive branch must inform the people and keep them informed on the actual dangers to be encountered in an atomic attack. The executive should not, of course, engage in a scare campaign but neither should it attempt to gloss over the honest facts. The public should be made aware of the terrible dangers of atomic radiation and fallout. The American people should also be educated on safe methods of surviving attack.

An adequate civil defense is a matter of national security. To base our peaceful existence upon the threat of massive retaliation, as we do, is to invite attack. In this horrible event, we must outsurvive our enemy. Sufficient and effective shelters most certainly appear to be the key to our survival if thermonuclear war comes. Let our country exert every effort to build and maintain a strong and ready civil-defense system.

AMERICAN NEWSPAPERMEN GOING TO CHINA

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, the State Department should be given whatever credit is due for their belated decision to permit American newsmen to go into China and report back to the American people their observations. Certainly it is a lot better for us to have our own observers reporting to us from Communist China rather than being forced to rely on information from other sources as to what is going on in China.

It is regrettable, however, that the State Department should have reserved to itself the right to handpick the American reporters who have been cleared to go to China. In making this decision, the State Department did not select a single representative from any of the hundreds of smaller American daily newspapers. Only the large news-gathering organizations and metropolitan organizations and metropolitan newspapers are represented.

This discrimination against the newspapers which provide coverage for States such as my own is entirely out of line with the normal treatment of the American press. It betrays either a lack of confidence by the State Department in the smallest newspapers or else a callous disregard for their rights to the news sources that are made available to the large newspapers.

If the State Department insists on limiting the number of American reporters permitted to go into China, it should at least make certain that all segments of the press regardless of size should be represented. Is there any logical reason why any American newspaper desiring to give its readers firsthand information should be denied the right to send a reporter to China?

The Sioux Falls (S. Dak.) Argus-Leader is one newspaper that very much wanted to send a representative to China to cover developments there. Mr. John A. Kennedy, publisher and editor in chief of the Sioux Falls paper, has traveled widely in Russia and in central and eastern Europe in recent years. He wanted very much to give his readers the benefit of his observations from China. His application was not given favorable consideration.

The editorial comments of the editor of the Argus-Leader put the case of the smaller dailies very clearly and I submit them at this point in the Record.

Why Deny Rights to Small Newspapers?

It was a wise decision of the United States Department of State to allow American reporters to go to China.

It was much less than wise, however, for the Department to delegate to itself the right to pick in effect the reporters who should go and to restrict their number.

The authorization provides that 24 reporters can go. These include representatives of 12 newspaper, radio, television, and news magazine organizations and 12 from individual newspapers.

Included among them is not one reporter from the smaller American dailies. Only the larger publications are listed.

This involves a discrimination that is intolerable under the American press system.

The smaller newspapers, too, gather the news in both the domestic and the foreign fields. They, too, are eager to obtain direct information for their readers and often spend large sums of money in so doing. This newspaper, for example, has sent its representatives to Russia, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and other satellite countries to get the news. That is a part of its policy because it believes the people of this area have the same right to receive firsthand information about these countries as do the residents of other sections of the Nation.

The Argus-Leader speaks for itself in this case, to be sure, but it speaks as well in behalf of a right that is a basic privilege of all American newspapers, both big and small. The Argus-Leader, if it so desires, has as much right to send a reporter to China as does the New York Times or the Minneapolis Tribune. And, in truth, the Argus-Leader desires to do so. Actually, early last month this newspaper filed with the Department of State a request that John A. Kennedy, publisher and editor-in-chief, be permitted to go to China. That request was acknowledged, but this newspaper was not included in the permission granted yesterday.

This newspaper, of course, asks no special privilege in this respect. It wants nothing denied to others, but it does want—and it believes with good reason—the right to seek out the news wherever it can within the proper scope of national policy.

The Department of State obviously has decided it is within good national policy to allow American reporters to go to China. That being the case, the Argus-Leader has the right to be represented. And so do all newspapers, regardless of size, that are willing to send reporters to China.

COLUMBIA BASIN PROJECT

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 1482) to amend certain provisions of the Columbia Basin Project Act, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

Conference Report (H. Rept. No. 1238)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1482) to amend certain provisions of the Columbia Basin Project Act, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following: "That (a) section 2 (b) (iii) of the Columbia Basin Project Act (57 Stat. 14), as amended, is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"'(iii) Water shall not be delivered from, through, or by means of the project works to or for lands not conforming in area and boundaries to the farm units covering the lands involved. Water may be delivered to one or more farm units held by any one landowner (a) which, taken together, comprise not more than one hundred and sixty irrigable acres, or (b) in the case of a nominal quarter section comprising more than one hundred and sixty irrigable acres referred to in subdivision (i) of subsection (b) of this section, which comprise the acreage contained in such quarter section: Provided, That water may be delivered to one or more farm units comprising a total irrigable area of not more than three hundred and twenty acres held by members of a family: Provided further, That notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, water shall not be delivered (1) to more than one farm unit held by any one owner or family on September 1, 1957, except that, in the case of land held by one having equitable or legal title on May 27, 1937, or by the heir or devisee of such owner, delivery may be made to farm units comprising not more than one hundred and sixty irrigable acres or a nominal quarter section, or (2) to any excess lands disposed of after September 1, 1957, which are reacquired (otherwise than in the circumstances set forth in the proviso to section 2 (b) (iv) of this Act) by the present owner or a member of his family within five years from the date of their disposition, or which are reacquired by the present owner or a member of his family at any time pursuant to any contract, arrangement, or understanding (other than a bona fide security transaction) made in connection with or as an incident to their disposition, or in which the owner or any member of his family retains any interest (except a bona fide security interest) or from which he or any member of his family derives any profit or advantage after their disposition."

"(b) Section 2 (b) (iv) of said Act is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"'(iv) Lands within the project held by any landowner in excess of the farm unit or units to which water may lawfully be delivered as provided in subdivision (iii) of this subsection shall be deemed excess land: Provided, That if excess land is acquired by foreclosure or other process of law, by conveyance in satisfaction of mortgages, by inheritance or by devise, water therefor may be furnished temporarily for a period not exceeding five years from the effective date of such acquisition, delivery of water thereafter ceasing until the transfer thereof to a landowner duly qualified to secure water therefor.'

"(c) Section 2 (b) (v) of said Act is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

"'(v) As used in this Act, the terms "owner", "landowner", and "any one landowner" denote any person, corporation, joint-stock association; the term "family" denotes a group consisting of either or both husband and wife, together with their children under eighteen years of age, or all of such children if both parents are dead; the term "their children" includes the issue and lawfully adopted children of either or both husband and wife; and the term "lands within the project" denotes those lands within the boundaries of the existing Columbia Basin irrigation districts, or revisions thereof approved by the Secretary, which the Secretary determines may be supplied water from, through, or by means of the project works and are required to be included to provide for sound development and operation of the project. Lands shall be deemed to be held by a family, if held as separate property of husband or wife, or constitute a part or all of their community property, or if they are the property of any or all of their children under eighteen years of age. Lands held in trust for any person shall, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed to be held both by that person and, if the trustee derives any profit or advantage from the trust other than a moderate fixed fee for the management of the same, by the trustee.'

"The last sentence of this amendment shall not be deemed to affect any irrevocable trust for the benefit of a child under eighteen created prior to this amendment, which would then have been held to be consistent with the provisions and intent of the Columbia Basin Project Act or to excuse any violation or evasion of that Act, or of the rules and regulations issued pursuant to it or of contracts entered into under it, by the creation or purported creation of a trust prior to this amendment, which would then have been held to be inconsistent with said provisions and intent.

"(d) Section 4, subsection (b), of said Act is hereby amended by substituting a comma for the period at the end thereof and adding thereto the following: 'and each such applicant shall be required to agree that he, his heirs and assigns will not, except with the approval of the Secretary, sell, assign, lease, or otherwise dispose of or contract to sell, assign, lease, or otherwise dispose of his land during a period ending five years from the date of his purchase contract. No application for a farm unit shall be received from any person who, or a member of whose family, then has outstanding another application for a farm unit on the project or to whom a farm unit could not at the time of application lawfully be sold under this act. No farm unit shall be sold to, and no contract to sell a farm unit shall be entered into with, any person, corporation, joint-stock association, or family which has theretofore purchased or entered into a contract to purchase a farm unit under this Act or which then owns a farm unit within the Columbia Basin Project. The prohibition of the preceding sentence, however, shall not preclude a purchase or contract to purchase by a person, otherwise eligible, whose farm unit has been or is acquired by the United States for exchange purposes under this Act or the Act of August 13, 1953 (67 Stat. 566) or, if he is 18 years of age or older, whose family purchased or entered into a contract to purchase a farm unit at a time when he was under 18 years of age.'"

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

Managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1482) to amend certain provisions of the Columbia Basin Project Act, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate-passed bill would have amended the Columbia Basin Project Act to provide for the delivery of water to (1) one or more farm units held by an individual, corporation, or joint-stock association which taken together would comprise not more than 160 irrigable acres or a nominal quarter section, and (2) one or more farm units held by members of a family which taken together would comprise not more than 320 irrigable acres. Under the language in the Senate-passed bill, prospective settlers would have been able to acquire more than one unit, within the above-stated limitations, from the Federal Government under its settlement program, and a landowner having legal title to lands on May 27, 1937, could have retained from his holdings and could have gotten water for 320 irrigable acres. In addition, the Senate-passed bill, as interpreted by the Solicitor's Office of the Department of the Interior, would have permitted a family to arrange, through the establishment of a trust estate, for an additional unit or units totaling not more than 160 irrigable acres to be held by a proper trustee for each minor child.

The House amended the Senate-passed bill to limit the delivery of water to two farm units whether held by an individual, a corporation, a joint-stock association, or a family. In addition, the House added language to prohibit the creation of a trust as a means of exceeding the ownership limitation. With respect to disposal of units by the Federal Government under its settlement program, the House report stated the position that, because of the high degree of subsidy involved and in the interest of consistency and fairness, no landowner should be allowed to acquire more than one farm unit from the Federal Government under its settlement program. However, the House-passed bill itself does not include such a limitation.

The conference committee agreed to an amendment which would (1) retain the limitations in the Senate-passed bill with respect to ownership, i. e., 160 acres for an individual, corporation, or joint-stock association and 320 acres for a family; (2) prohibit a prospective settler from acquiring more than one unit from the Federal Government under its settlement program; (3) permit landowners holding legal title prior to May 27, 1937, to get water for 160 irrigable acres of their present lands; (4) permit other landowners to get water for one unit of their present lands; and (5) prohibit the establishment of trusts as a means of exceeding the 320-acre ownership limitation in the legislation.

The amendment agreed to by the conference committee results in ownership limitations greater than those in the House-passed bill. On the other hand, the amendment retains the Federal financial subsidy per individual or family at its present level and below that which would have been permitted by the House-passed bill. Further, the amendment prevents undue enrichment of present landowners.

In the opinion of the managers on the part of the House, the amendment to the Columbia Basin Project Act, as recommended by the conference committee, meets the objectives sought by this legislation consistent with general reclamation policy and principles.

The conference committee discussed at some length the matter of adequacy of the farm units established by the Bureau of Reclamation. While recognizing that the Bureau has conscientiously adhered to the basic principles established by the Project Act, it is the view of the conferees that, because of fast-changing economic conditions and great acceleration in mechanization of farming operations, the technical guidelines followed by the Bureau are outdated. The conference committee understands that farm units have already been established to meet the needs of the settlement program through 1961 or longer. While the new units that have not yet been settled are somewhat larger than the earlier units, the conferees doubt whether they are truly economically adequate units under present and expected future conditions.

It is the sense of the conferees that the Bureau should be rather liberal in its interpretation of the basic principles in the Project Act and that, with respect to the units not yet opened, the Bureau should restudy the matter of the economic adequacy of such units recognizing present economic conditions, presently prevailing living standards, the need for more diversified farming, and new methods of mechanized farming, and on the basis of the results of such study should make such changes and rearrangements in the units as are warranted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWALS, RESERVATIONS, OR RESTRICTIONS OF MORE THAN 5,000 ACRES OF PUBLIC LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5538) to provide that withdrawals, reservations, or restrictions of more than 5,000 acres of public lands of the United States for certain purposes shall not become effective until approved by act of Congress, and for other purposes, together with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, strike out all after line 19 over to and including line 4 on page 3 and insert: "(4) nothing in sections 1, 2, or 3 of this act shall be deemed to be applicable either to those reservations or withdrawals which expired due to the ending of the unlimited national emergency of May 27, 1941, and which subsequent to such expiration have been and are now used by the military departments with the concurrence of the Department of the Interior, or to the withdrawal of public domain lands of the Marine Corps Training Center, Twentynine Palms, Calif., and the Air-to-Air Gunnery Range, Sahwave Mountain, Nev."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. Engle]?

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARING. Mr. Speaker, I object. It is necessary that I oppose my chairman's request for unanimous consent to concur in the Senate amendment to H. R. 5538. I originally coauthored that bill which was intended to restore to Congress its constitutional responsibilities to screen and approve the military use of our public domain. This bill is essential to stop unwarranted and flagrant misuse of public lands by the military. The amendment would exempt from the bill one of the largest military land grabs in history. I, therefore, object to the amendment but heartily endorse the bill as originally written.

TO AMEND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS CORPORATION ACT

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8220) to amend the District of Columbia Business Corporation Act and ask unanimous consent that the same be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McMillan]?

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

May I inquire of the gentleman, This is largely a technical amendment to the Business Corporation Act of the District which was passed some years ago?

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. The main purpose of this bill is to correct some typographical errors that appeared in the bill which we passed in 1954.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. And to make one or two slight changes with reference to the Recorder of Deeds Office?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is correct. This bill eliminates the requirement for recording of duplicate originals in the case of incorporation.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. It is also true, Mr. Speaker, that this has the approval of the Bar Association and the Commissioners as to the necessary amendments and corrections of the so-called business incorporation laws.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is correct. All parties concerned have approved the bill.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota. And it has the unanimous approval of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes. Reported unanimously by the full committee.

Mr. Speaker, the District of Columbia Business Corporation Act was approved June 8, 1954. Since is became effective, it has been discovered that a number of errors of typography and nomenclature were included in the act. The bill would correct these errors.

Another purpose of the bill is to eliminate the requirement under the act for the recordation in two offices of duplicate original papers incident to the incorporation of companies and other acts taken regarding corporations. At present these papers must be recorded in the office of the Superintendent of Corporations and also in the office of the Recorder of Deeds. The requirement for duplicate recording would be eliminated by the bill.

Another purpose of the bill is to clarify provisions relating to reincorporation and incorporation of existing companies. Under the bill companies incorporated under the general incorporation laws of the District of Columbia prior to the enactment of the act approved June 8, 1954, may be "reincorporated" under the new act and companies created by special acts of Congress may be "incorporated" under the new act.

This legislation has the approval of the District of Columbia Bar Association and the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the action of the House on the bill, H. R. 8220, a bill to amend the District of Columbia Business Corporation Act, to take from the Speaker's table the bill, S. 2438, and for its immediate consideration. S. 2438 was introduced as a companion bill to H. R. 8220 and the Senate amended the bill with certain clarifying provisions which must be written into the bill to make it conform to the intent of the two bodies in reporting the bill.

"(2) the address, including street and number, if any, of its registered office in the District of Columbia, and the name of its registered agent at such address;

"(3) the purpose or purposes for which the corporation was organized and which it will hereafter carry on;

"(5) if the shares were divided into classes, the designation of each class and a statement of the preferences, qualifications, limitations, restrictions, and the special or relative rights in respect of the shares of each class, and whether the shares of any class have full, limited, or no voting power;

"(6) a statement that the corporation elects to avail itself of the provisions of this act and become incorporated thereunder;

"(7) the number of directors of the corporation, and a statement that the board of directors adopted a resolution declaring it advisable in the judgment of the board that the corporation should elect to avail itself of the provisions of this act and become incorporated hereunder;

"(8) the aggregate number of shares outstanding of each class; and

"(9) the number of shares of each class voted for and against such incorporation.

"(c) It shall not be necessary to set forth in the statement of incorporation any of the corporate powers enumerated in this act.

"(d) Duplicate originals of the statement of incorporation shall be delivered to the Commissioners, together with a copy of the corporation charter or articles or certificate of incorporation then in effect, certified by the secretary of the corporation. If the Commissioners find that the statement of incorporation conforms to law, they shall, when all fees and charges have been paid as in this act prescribed—

"(1) endorse on each of such duplicate originals the word 'Filed' and the month, day, and year of the filing thereof;

"(2) file one of such duplicate originals in their office, together with said copy of the corporation's charter or articles of certificate of incorporation as then in effect;

"(3) issue a certificate of incorporation to which they shall affix the other duplicate originals; and

"(4) deliver such certificate of incorporation and other duplicate original to the corporation or its representative."

SEC. 34. Section 142 of said act is amended by striking the title and inserting in lieu thereof the following title: "Effect of Issuance of Certificate of Reincorporation or Incorporation." Said section is further amended by striking: "Upon the issuance of articles of reincorporation or the certificate of incorporation by the Commissioners the existence of the corporation shall be continued under this act" and inserting in lieu thereof "Upon the issuance under section 141 of this act of a certificate of reincorporation or of incorporation, as the case may be, by the Commission the existence of the corporation shall be continued under this act, and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence that all conditions precedent required to be performed under section 141 of this act have been compiled with and that the corporate has been reincorporated or incorporated under this act, as the case may be, except as against the District of Columbia in a proceeding to cancel or revoke the certificate of reincorporation or of incorporation."

SEC. 35. Section 143 of said act is amended as follows:

(1) In subsection (a) (3) strike "the other duplicate original shall be recorded in the office of the Recorder of Deeds" and insert in lieu thereof "return the other duplicate original to the corporation or its representative."

(2) In subsection (b) strike "of" after "recordation" and insert in lieu thereof "or."

SEC. 36. This act shall take effect on the 30th day after its approval.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 8220) were laid on the table.

AMENDING MOTOR VEHICLE TAX LAW

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 6258) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide additional revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved August 17, 1937, as amended, with a Senate amendment thereto and concur in the amendment of the Senate with an amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That subsection (b) of section 3 of title IV of the act entitled 'An act to provide additional revenue for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved August 17, 1937 (50 Stat. 681), as amended (sec. 40-103 (b), D. C. Code), is amended by striking class C of such subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

" 'Class C. For each trailer, when the manufacturer's shipping weight of the chassis, plus the weight of the body, is less than 500 pounds, $8; 500 pounds or more but less than 1,000 pounds, $12; 1,000 pounds or more but less than 1,500 pounds, $20; 1,500 pounds or more but less than 2,500 pounds, $32; 2,500 pounds or more but less than 3,500 pounds, $46; 3,500 pounds or more but less than 6,000 pounds, $60; 6,000 pounds or more but less than 8,000 pounds, $74; 8,000 pounds or more but less than 10,000 pounds, $92; 10,000 pounds or more but less than 12,000 pounds, $122; 12,000 pounds or more but less than 16,000 pounds, $152; 16,000 pounds or more, $182: Provided, That in determining the total weight of a trailer subject to the provisions of this class C, there shall be excluded, in computing such weight, the weight of any special equipment which is subject to taxation as tangible personal property under subsection (e) of this section.'

"SEC. 2. Subsection (b) of section 3 of title IV of said act approved August 17, 1937 (50 Stat. 681), as amended (sec. 40-103 (b), D. C. Code), is amended by inserting between classes D and F the following:

" 'Class E. For each motor vehicle classified by the Commissioners or their designated agent as an antique motor vehicle on the basis of a finding that such vehicle was manufactured prior to January 1, 1930, and is owned solely as collector's item, with its use limited to participation in club activities, exhibits, tours, parades, and similar uses, but in no event for general transportation, $5.'

"SEC. 3. The first proviso of paragraph (c) of section 3, chapter 6, of title 40 of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia, 1951 edition, relating to issuance of Congressional tags, is amended by inserting after the phrase 'to the elective officers and disbursing clerks of the Senate and the House of Representatives' a comma and the words 'the Chief Clerk of the Senate, the Parliamentarian of the Senate, the Deputy Sergeant at Arms, Auditor, and Procurement Officer of the Senate.' "

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McMILLAN moves that the House concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment as follows: "On page 3, strike lines 6 through 8, inclusive, and insert: 'The Chief Clerk of the Senate, the Parliamentarian of the Senate.' "

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TESTS OF ALCOHOL OF PERSONS TRIED IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 969) to prescribe the weight to be given to evidence of tests of alcohol in the blood or urine of persons tried in the District of Columbia for operating vehicles while under the influence of intoxicating liquor and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, (a) if as a result of the operation of a vehicle, any person is tried in any court of competent jurisdiction within the District of Columbia for operating such vehicle while under the influence of any intoxicating liquor in violation of section 10 (b) of the District of Columbia Traffic Act, 1925, approved March 3, 1925, as amended (D. C. Code, title 40, sec. 609), and in the course of such trial there is received in evidence, based upon a chemical test, competent proof to the effect that at the time of such operation—

(1) defendant's blood contained five one-hundredths of 1 per centum or less, by weight, of alcohol, or that defendant's urine contained eight one-hundredths of 1 per centum or less, by weight, of alcohol, such proof shall be deemed prima facie proof that defendant at such time was not under the influence of any intoxicating liquor;

(2) defendant's blood contained more than five one-hundredths of 1 per centum, but less than fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per centum, by weight, of alcohol, or defendant's urine contained more than eight one-hundredths of 1 per centum, but less than twenty one-hundredths of 1 per centum, by weight, of alcohol, such proof shall constitute relevant evidence, but shall not constitute prima facie proof that defendant was or was not at such time under the influence of any intoxicating liquor; or

(3) defendant's blood contained fifteen one-hundredths of 1 per centum or more, by weight, of alcohol, or defendant's urine contained twenty one-hundredths of 1 per centum or more, by weight, of alcohol, such proof shall constitute prima facie proof that defendant at such time was under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

(b) Upon the request of the person who was tested, the results of such test shall be made available to him.

(c) Only a physician acting at the request of a police officer can withdraw blood for the purpose of determining the alcoholic content therein. This limitation shall not apply to the taking of a urine specimen.

(d) The person tested shall be permitted to have a physician of his own choosing administer a chemical test in addition to the one administered at the direction of the police officer.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, (a) if as a result of the operation of a vehicle, any person is tried in any court of competent jurisdiction within the District of Columbia for (1) operating such vehicle while under the influence of any intoxicating liquor in violation of section 10 (b) of the District of Columbia Traffic Act, 1925, approved March 3, 1925, as amended (D. C. Code, title 40, sec. 609), (2) negligent homicide in violation of section 802 (a) of the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, as amended (D. C. Code, title 40, sec. 606), or (3) manslaughter committed in the operation of such vehicle in violation of section 802 of such act approved March 3, 1901 (D. C. Code, title 22, sec. 2405), and in the course of such trial there is received in evidence, based upon a chemical test, competent proof to the effect that at the time of such operation—

(1) defendant's blood or urine contained five one-hundredths of 1 percent or less, by weight, of alcohol, or that an equivalent quantity of alcohol was contained in 2,000 cubic centimeters of his breath (true breath or alveolar air having 5½ percent of carbon dioxide), such proof shall be deemed prima facie proof that defendant at such time was not under the influence of any intoxicating liquor;

(2) defendant's blood or urine contained more than five one-hundredths of 1 percent, but less than fifteeen one-hundredths of 1 percent, by weight, of alcohol, or that an equivalent quantity of alcohol was contained in 2,000 cubic centimeters of his breath (true breath or alveolar air having 5½ percent of carbon dioxide), such proof shall constitute relevant evidence, but shall not constitute prima facie proof that defendant was or was not at such time under the influence of any intoxicating liquor; and

(3) defendant's blood or urine contained fifteen one-hundredths of 1 percent or more, by weight, of alcohol, or that an equivalent quantity of alcohol was contained in 2,000 cubic centimeters of his breath (true breath or alveolar air having 5½ percent of carbon dioxide), such proof shall constitute prima facie proof that defendant at such time was under the influence of intoxicating liquor.

(b) Upon the request of the person who was tested, the results of such test shall be made available to him.

(c) Only a physician acting at the request of a police officer can withdraw blood for the purpose of determining the alcoholic content therein. This limitation shall not apply to the taking of a urine specimen or the breath test.

(d) The person tested shall be permitted to have a physician of his own choosing administer a chemical test in addition to the one administered at the direction of the police officer.

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall be construed to require any person to submit to the withdrawal of blood, the taking of a urine specimen, from him, or to a breath test.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. This bill is one that was recommended, I think, by the Senate, and it is a voluntary bill. The one which originated in the House was not voluntary. This bill goes further and permits the person tested to have his own physician administer the chemical test in addition to the one administered at the direction of the police officer. The bill, of course, sets up standards for determining the degree of intoxication.

Similar laws are in effect in 24 States, and I think it is time the District of Columbia adopted new and modern methods of determining the degree of intoxication of persons driving vehicles.

Mr. McMILLAN. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the Senate bill.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended to read "An act to prescribe the weight to be given to evidence of tests of alcohol in the blood, urine, or breath of persons tried in the District of Columbia for certain offenses committed while operating vehicles."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE CONSTRUCTION, MAINTENANCE, AND OPERATION BY THE ARMORY BOARD OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA OF A STADIUM IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 1937) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation by the Armory Board of the District of Columbia of a stadium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 1220)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1937) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation by the Armory Board of the District of Columbia of a stadium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1 and 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 and agree to the same.

JOHN L. MCMILLAN,
OREN HARRIS,
OLIN E. TEAGUE,
SID SIMPSON,
JOS. P. O'HARA,
Managers on the Part of the House.

ALAN BIBLE,

J. GLENN BEALL,
Managers on the Part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1937) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation by the Armory Board of the District of Columbia of a stadium in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Amendment No. 1: The House bill requires the Armory Board to issue bonds to provide for payment of the cost of the stadium and the land upon which the stadium is to be located. This Senate amendment requires the Armory Board to issue bonds for the payment of the cost of the stadium only. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 2: The House bill provides that the bonds to be issued by the Armory Board are to bear interest at a rate not more than that approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. This Senate amendment provides that the bonds shall bear interest at a rate of not more than 6 percent per annum. The Senate recedes.

Amendment No. 3: The House bill permits the Armory Board to operate or contract for the operation of concessions for the sale of nonalcoholic beverages at the stadium. This Senate amendment strikes out the word "nonalcoholic." The House recedes.

JOHN. L. MCMILLAN,
OREN HARRIS,
OLIN E. TEAGUE,
SID SIMPSON,
JOS. P. O'HARA,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, may I say to the Members of the House that the conferees of the House met with the Senate conferees again on this stadium bill. The Senate receded on the two amendments that the House adopted some weeks ago. At the present time the bill is exactly as it passed the House originally. The wishes that were expressed on the floor of the House when this bill was up for consideration last week were taken care of by the conferees.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. In other words, the Senate receded and accepted the House version, which provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall set the interest rate on these bonds?

Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GROSS. And the Stadium Corporation will pay for the land that it obtains from the Government for the purpose of this stadium?

Mr. McMILLAN. The gentleman is correct. That was the gentleman from Iowa's amendment when we brought the bill up originally and I accepted it when we approved the bill several weeks ago. The Senate has agreed to that language.

Mr. GROSS. Does this provide $35,000 for planning?

Mr. McMILLAN. It does not provide anything. It gives the Home and Housing Agency permission to grant that amount for a survey and study of a stadium here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GROSS. Another question I should like to ask the gentleman is this: The committee still has ample time, if they find something is not right with this bill, to make changes?

Mr. McMILLAN. I may say to the gentleman that there are a number of items in the original bill that I would like to have corrected when the study has been made. I would like to consider a number of amendments to the bill when it comes before the House again. I do not think, for instance, that they should require 180 acres of land for a site. They could get along with 50 acres. That is one item I shall call attention to at the proper time.

Mr. GROSS. The chairman of the committee will watch that situation very closely?

Mr. McMILLAN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. What actually occurred was that the first time the House agreed to the Senate version and the second time the Senate agreed to the House version?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is correct.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it should be made perfectly clear here that the purpose of this is to have authorizing legislation for a stadium in the District of Columbia. As a result of this, under the law the Home and Housing Agency then can approve an application which is presently pending before the agency for $35,000, which would permit an investigation to be made working out the economic justification and the details of a stadium that will suffice for the needs here for something that can be worked out and accomplished under private operation and management. Also it should be made perfectly clear that we recognize there will be some amendments to this in connection with the acreage involved, and so forth, as well as in connection with other parts of the program.

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. It also means that the Stadium Commission must come back to the United States Congress for further action?

Mr. HARRIS. That is contemplated. It is understood after this study is completed and as a result thereof another bill will come back with such amendments as may be needed?

Mr. SIMPSON of Illinois. It is written in the report that this bill must come back to the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience both in building and operating a municipal stadium. I find that it is extremely difficult, almost next to impossible, to operate a stadium on an economic basis, and to finance its construction and operation out of income. Therefore I want to make sure that this is merely an authorization for a study and not an authorization for construction of a stadium.

Mr. McMILLAN. I assure the gentleman that the bill will come back to the House for amendment after a study has been made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS. For the information and benefit of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] I might say that the Armory Board is authorized to make application now for this fund to make the study approving this legislation and has also told us that they want to look into further amendments. I may say in response to the gentleman's statement regarding the possible success of this operation that we have been advised that local people in Washington are interested in this project to the extent that a substantial part of the funds necessary for the construction of this stadium would be provided by these local people through the purchase of bonds. If they are for something for the Nation's Capital, I think it should strengthen what we are trying to do, in providing ample facilities which can be used successfully.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McMILLAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHENCK. In the matter of the operation of a stadium, the item of housekeeping is a very sizable expense. There is also the problem of securing sufficiently large crowds, the revenue from which would be used to retire the bonds. That is a very difficult problem. As long as this is to be a preliminary examination and not an authorization to build a stadium, I shall not have any objection to the proposed legislation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTESTED ELECTION, CARTER AGAINST LeCOMPTE—MESSAGE FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES (H. DOC. NO. 235)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on House Administration:

AUGUST 23, 1957.

The honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives from the Fourth Congressional District of the State of Iowa, Steven V. Carter versus Karl M. LeCompte, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House; and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases," the Clerk has opened and printed the testimony in the above case, and such portions of the testimony as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk, after giving the requisite notices, have been printed and indexed together with notice of contest, and the answer thereto and original papers and exhibits have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on House Administration.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed to the contestant, and the same number to the contestee, which, together with the briefs of the parties, when received, will be laid before the Committee on House Administration, to which the case shall be referred.

Very truly yours,
RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk, United States House of Representatives.

AMENDING SECTION 1733 OF TITLE 28, UNITED STATES CODE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 411, Rept. No. 1244), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7915) to amend section 1733 of title 28, United States Code. After general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

CONSENT CALENDAR AND SUSPENSIONS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order for the Consent Calendar to be called on Wednesday next, and that it also be in order for the Speaker to recognize on Wednesday next and the balance of the week for suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

CALLING UP OF CONFERENCE REPORTS AT ANY TIME

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I further ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for the Speaker to recognize for the calling up of conference reports at any time without their having been printed and without the necessity of complying with the rule relating thereto.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GROSS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, that means, then, that conference reports can come in and be presented to the House on a minute's notice?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, there would not be just a minute's notice. The gentleman knows that. But they could be called up without waiting over a day.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman not think that is moving pretty fast?

Mr. McCORMACK. No; not in the light of the present situation. I think that is a reasonable request.

Mr. GROSS. That would apply to the foreign handout bill; would it not?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman knows that responsible leadership would see that Members are alerted. There could be a quorum call to alert Members. I think in the light of the present situation the gentleman will realize this is a fair request to be made.

Mr. GROSS. I do not know why a unanimous-consent request could not be made in accordance with the circumstances that prevail at the time. I am rather unwilling at the moment to give unanimous consent for the calling up of conference reports under any and every circumstance regardless of content and time. I think the gentleman could very well obtain unanimous consent at the time the conference report is available for action. Let us deal with it on that basis.

Mr. McCORMACK. I will never put the gentleman or any other Member to the point of objecting on a question of this kind. If the gentleman indicates to me he is going to object—is that what the gentleman is doing?

Mr. GROSS. I have no desire to prolong this session. I simply want to know what is going on. Certainly, I would not object under reasonable circumstances, to the calling up of a conference report on very short notice, but I want the opportunity to know what any conference report contains before it hits the House floor. The distinguished majority leader well knows that we deal with conference reports under limited debate and the rules are strict and drastic in connection with the handling of conference reports. I think the gentleman will agree with me on that. I will say to the gentleman that I feel I should object if he persists in his unanimous-consent request.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. GROSS. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. In the first place, I am sure the gentleman from Iowa, and I hope the gentleman will not consider that this statement is presumptuous on my part, will agree that I have never taken advantage of the House or any Member of the House on any matter.

Mr. GROSS. I am sure the gentleman has knowingly done that.

Mr. McCORMACK. Or unknowingly, now. I will take it both ways now. I will put it to the gentleman: The gentleman knows or ought to know that the gentleman from Massachusetts would see that on an important conference report the rights of Members of the House are protected. The gentleman can rely on the gentleman from Massachusetts to see that the rights of the gentleman from Iowa and the rights of other Members are protected in the light of the circumstances. Instead of calling up a conference report suddenly, one such as the mutual security appropriations bill, of course the gentleman would see that there is a reasonable period of notice given to the Members.

Mr. GROSS. Not only that conference report but all conference reports. I recall that in the closing days of the session last year bills were put through the House so fast one could not keep track of them. I am glad to see there has not been a repetition exactly of the situation that occurred last year. I will go along with the gentleman one more time.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

AMENDING ATOMIC ENERGY ACT

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8994) to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, to increase the salaries of certain executives of the Atomic Energy Commission, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I assume the gentleman from North Carolina will, of course, explain the bill. There is no opposition to the bill from this side.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as set forth in the report of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy—House Report No. 977—is to equalize the salaries of the Atomic Energy Commission executives with those of other executives in the executive branch and in the independent agencies.

Last year Congress enacted the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956. This act raised the salaries of executives generally in the executive branch and in the independent agencies except for the Atomic Energy Commission.

The purpose of this bill is to provide equal treatment of the executives of the Atomic Energy Commission as has already been granted to other executives by the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956.

The background of this bill is set forth in the committee report—House Report No. 977.

Last year the Joint Committee unanimously recommended a salary bill for AEC executives, contingent upon passage of the Federal Executive Pay Act, but that act passed late in the session, and the AEC salary bill was not considered by the Congress. This year the Joint Committee again considered the question and has recommended unanimously this legislation to bring the AEC executives up to the same salary levels as those of other executives.

This bill raises the salary of the Chairman of the Commission from $20,000 per annum to $22,500 per annum, which is on the same level as the Under Secretary of State and the Deputy Secretary of Defense. Prior to the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956, the Chairman of the Commission was on the same level with those other offices, but he is now receiving a lesser salary. The purpose of this bill is to equalize this situation.

Other salaries of AEC executives are raised as follows:

The other four Commissioners of the Atomic Energy Commission, from $18,000 to $22,000; the general manager, who is the chief executive officer, from $20,000 to $22,000; the division directors from $16,000 to $19,000; the general counsel from $16,000 to $19,500. The bill also established the position of deputy general manager at maximum salary of $20,500; three assistant general managers or their equivalent at maximum salary of $20,000; and a maximum of six other executive manager positions at a salary not to exceed $19,000 per annum.

All of these increases are entirely consistent with the provisions of last year's Federal Executive Pay Act, and are only intended to provide fair and equal treatment to AEC executives.

I do not need to emphasize to the Members of the House the tremendous importance of the work of the Atomic Energy Commission. It must carry out enormous responsibilities for our military atomic and hydrogen weapons, and also in our expanding program for the peaceful uses of atomic energy, both at home and abroad. It is important that the Commission be able to obtain first rate executives and scientists to lead it. Some of its key employees, including the Director of the Division of Research, have left the Commission to respond to more attractive offers, from a financial standpoint, from private industry.

Also, the Commission is planning to move in about 6 months to new headquarters building near Germantown, Md., about 30 miles outside of Washington. I fear that they will lose many employees, including some of their top executives. In order to try to prevent this loss, and to provide fair treatment to AEC executives who are now receiving less than other executives in our Federal Government, I urge the House to favorably enact H. R. 8994, in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the members of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 22 a. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by striking out the figure "$18,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "$22,000"; and by striking out the figure "$20,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "$22,500."

SEC. 2. Section 24 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended, including appropriate amendment to the table of contents, by striking out the entire section and by substituting the following:

The General Manager shall be appointed by the Commission, shall serve at the pleasure of the Commission, shall be removable by the Commission, and shall receive compensation at a rate determined by the Commission, but not in excess of $22,000 per annum.

"b. a Deputy General Manager, who shall act in the stead of the General Manager during his absence when so directed by the General Manager, and who shall perform such other administrative and executive functions as the General Manager shall direct. The Deputy General Manager shall be appointed by the General Manager with the approval of the Commission, shall serve at the pleasure of the General Manager, shall be removable by the General Manager, and shall receive compensation at a rate determined by the General Manager, but not in excess of $20,500 per annum.

They shall be appointed by the General Manager with the approval of the Commission, shall serve at the pleasure of the General Manager, shall be removable by the General Manager and shall receive compensation at a rate determined by the General Manager, but not in excess of $20,000 per annum."

SEC. 3. Section 25 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended, is amended, including the appropriate amendment to the Table of Contents, by changing the title from "Divisions and Offices" to "Divisions, Offices, and Positions."

Subsection 25a. thereof is amended by striking therefrom the figure "$16,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "$19,000."

Subsection 25b. thereof is amended by striking therefrom the figure "$16,000" and inserting in lieu thereof the figure "$19,500."

Following subsection 25c. thereof, there is hereby inserted the following new subsection 25 d.:

"d. such other executive management positions (not to exceed six in number) as the Commission may determine to be necessary to the discharge of its responsibilities. Such positions shall be established by the General Manager with the approval of the Commission. They shall be appointed by the General Manager with the approval of the Commission, shall serve at the pleasure of the General Manager, shall be removable by the General Manager, and shall receive compensation at a rate determined by the General Manager, but not in excess of $19,000 per annum."

SEC. 4. Section 161d. of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, is amended by inserting after the words "scientific and technical personnel" the words: "up to a limit of $19,000)."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE FIRST AND SUPREME LAW OF THE REPUBLIC

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a little over a year ago a distinguished American and former Justice of the Supreme Court, James F. Byrnes of South Carolina, handed down an important opinion on the High Court which he once graced. This opinion, in the form of a documented article appeared in U. S. News and World Report for May 18, 1956.

Mr. Byrnes had served his State as Representative, Senator, and Governor. He had served the Nation as Secretary of State, Director of Economic Stabilization, and Director of War Mobilization. He was retired when he wrote this slashing indictment of the present Supreme Court. So it cannot be charged that he had any personal or political axes to grind.

Former Justice Byrnes concluded his bill of indictment by saying, "the Supreme Court must be curbed." He based this dictum solely on the court's own record—a record of unbroken and brazen usurpation of legislative functions. A record of stealthy erosion and leaching away of the Constitution without resort to the procedure of amendment provided for in the document itself.

Mr. Byrnes' exposure of the Supreme Court's unconstitutional invasions of legislative, executive, and States' powers as defined in the Constitution stunned and surprised many Americans. Most of us have been brought up to respect the highest Court in the land as above sordid power grabbing and narrow political partisanship. Former Justice Byrnes' warning however, was not unique or new. As far back as 1949 I repeatedly called attention to the Court's continued usurpation of legislative functions. Many American statesmen and patriots from Thomas Jefferson to the late Senator Pat McCarran had warned us against usurpation of authority by this branch of the Government not subject to control by the people.

If George Washington has been truly called the Father of his Country, Thomas Jefferson is the father and architect of our republican form of government. Surely no other Founding Father left a deeper impress of his genius on our form of government than our third President. Although he died in 1826, Jefferson's ability to see far into the future was uncanny. Consider the following which he wrote in his autobiography in 1821 on the Supreme Court:

> I would not indeed make them dependent on the executive authority, as they formerly were in England; but I deem it indispensable to the continuance of this Government that they should be submitted to some practical and impartial control: And that this, to be imparted, must be compounded of a mixture of State and Federal authority.
>
> It is not enough that honest men are appointed judges. All know the influence of interest on the mind of man, and how unconsciously his judgment is warped by that influence. To this bias add that esprit de corps, of their peculiar maxim and creed that "It is the office of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction," and the absence of responsibility, and how can we expect impartial decision between the general government of which they are themselves so eminent a part, and an individual state from which they have nothing to hope or fear. We have seen too that contrary to all correct example, they are in the habit of going out of the question before them, to throw an anchor ahead and grapple further hold for future advances of power.
>
> They are in fact the corps of sappers and miners, steadily working to undermine the independent rights of the States and to consolidate all power in the hands of that Government in which they have so important a freehold estate.

Jefferson foresaw only too clearly the fatal defect in our tripartite system of government of three separate and independent divisions of government if one, the judiciary, were allowed to arrogate the "right to prescribe rules for the government of the others, and to that one too, which is unelected and independent of the Nation." That arrogation by the Supreme Court of the "right to prescribe rules for the government" of the other two branches has finally culminated this year in a series of outrageous decisions which have finally aroused the whole Nation. We are today facing what eminent members of the bench and bar term a "constitutional crisis."

Congress now is once more trying to rush through an enormous mass of legislation in the last days of this session. Buried in this legislative logjam are several important bills drawn up to deal with the present constitutional crisis created by a runaway Supreme Court Are these bills, so vital to our national security and freedom, to be left stranded in committee or lost in the last minute rush to get out of town?

There is no question that the American people are thoroughly aroused by the Supreme Court's recent excesses. They expect Congress to take positive action in the premises. The American Bar Association, meeting in London this year, expects us to take action. The executive agencies, whose hands have now been most effectively tied in dealing with subversion by these pernicious decisions, look to Congress for help.

The American Bar Association's special committee on Communist tactics, strategy, and objectives placed before the ABA's house of delegates six recommendations which I feel are an absolute minimum for Congressional action in this session:

> 1. Safeguard the confidential nature of FBI files.
>
> 2. Give to Congresssional committees the same freedom to investigate Communists and pro-Communists that these committees have always had to investigate businessmen and labor leaders.
>
> 3. Sanction the right of the Federal Government to discharge security risks even though they occupy so-called nonsensitive positions.
>
> 4. Vest in the Department of Justice the right to question aliens awaiting deportation about any subversive associations and contacts.
>
> 5. Correct the notion that the Smith Act was not intended to prohibit advocacy and teaching of forcible overthrow as an abstract principle.
>
> 6. Permit schools, universities, bar associations, and other organizations to set standards of membership high enough to exclude those who refuse to testify frankly and fully about their past activities in furtherance of Communist plans to conquer the Free World by subversion.

The ABA's report concluded:

> It is traditional and right that our courts are zealous in protecting individual rights. It is equally necessary that the executive and legislative branches take effective action to gird our country against Communist infiltration and aggression.
>
> If the courts lean too far backward in the maintenance of theoretical individual rights, it may be that we have tied the hands of our country and have rendered it incapable of carrying out the first law of mankind—the right of self-preservation.

> Our committee concludes that legislation introduced to overcome the effect of Supreme Court decisions to be in the public interest.

I would say that "in the public interest" is an understatement. Rather it seems to me that such legislation is imperative and urgent at this time. Congress cannot continue to function with an unconstitutional third house composed of nine nonelected justices who arrogate to themselves the clearly illegal right to lay down rules as to how Congress shall operate.

Particularly is this so when this shadowy third house lifts itself over the fence of the Constitution by its own bootstraps and brazenly assumes powers and functions which cannot be found in that document. And further, which cannot be read into the Constitution even by torturing the English language into such extraordinary semantics as the Court displayed when it threw out the dictionary and created a new definition for the word "organize" in Yates and others against the United States. In this utterly fantastic decision the Supreme Court nullified the effect of the Smith Act of 1940 by slyly creating a new definition for the word "organize." It did this in the face of previous decisions upholding Smith Act convictions which sent Communists to prison for organizing a conspiracy under the accepted use of the word "organize."

The Government in prosecuting 14 top-ranking Communists in California had charged that organize meant the "recruiting of new members, forming of new units, regrouping or expansion of existing clubs, classes, and so forth." The Communists insisted that organize meant to establish, found, or bring into existence." It was their contention that the present Communist Party was "organized" in 1945 when the Communist Political Association changed its name back to the original Communist Party USA.

That inasmuch as they had not been indicted until 1951 that the 3-year statute of limitations had therefore expired. In other words, they should have been indicted not later than 1948 because the word "organize" meant to found or to set up, or to bring into being. Justice Harlan, speaking for the majority of the Supreme Court threw out Webster and all the dictionaries and accepted the Communist version of what the word "organize" meant. In fact the majority opinion brazenly stated:

> The statute does not define what is meant by "organize." Dictionary definitions are of little help, for as those offered us sufficiently show, the term is susceptible of both meanings attributed to it by the parties here.

In brief this opinion held that it was legal to advocate and teach and to conspire with others for the overthrow of the Government by force and violence so long as they did not presently engage in open violence and as long as they did not set a definite date for their seizure of power; that the Government can proceed against revolutionaries only after they have captured power and demonstrated by act that they used force and violence.

So the Supreme Court ordered 5 of the convicted Communists freed and new trials for the remaining 9. Top Department of Justice officials after studying the decision threw up their hands and doubted that it would be possible to prosecute Communists successfully after this decision. The Communists concurred by gloating in the Daily Worker of June 18, 1957, "This decision is the beginning of the end of the Smith Act." Two Justices, Black and Douglas, thought that all 14 should go free.

I want to discuss the Court's two decisions in the case of George I. Witkovich—April 28, 1957—and Mrs. Antonio Sentner—May 20, 1957. Lack of time compelled me to omit them from my last presentation of cases.

Witkovich is an alien Communist illegally in this country who had been ordered deported in 1953. When the Government undertook to deport him to his native Yugoslavia, that country refused to take him back. We have in this category not only Mr. Witkovich, but several hundred other Communists under unenforceable deportation writs because their Communist homelands laugh at us and tell us to keep them.

Under section 242 (D) of the Immigration Act of 1952 the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service is empowered to order any alien not deported within 6 months to report periodically to the proper authorities as to his activities. As behooves a dedicated Communist, Witkovich refused to give the Government the slightest cooperation. In October 1955, he was indicted "for refusing to answer questions about his activities, including whether he had attended Communist meetings since the deportation order was issued."

The Department of Justice contended that national security would be jeopardized and the Government's effort to control subversive aliens as required by statute would be nullified, if aliens refused to comply with the law. Particularly so, if they persisted in carrying on subversive activities after they had been ordered deported. The Government also added that some 3,000 other deportation cases would be affected by the Witkovich ruling.

The Supreme Court with only two Justices dissenting, held that the Immigration Act of 1952 must be "strictly construed." Notwithstanding the clear and unequivocal language of section 242 (D) the high court ruled that what Congress really meant when it wrote the law was merely that deportable aliens had to keep the authorities informed of their availability for deportation. This meant that an alien Communist illegally in this country could avail himself of every protection of the law, but on the other hand was under no obligation to obey the law with respect to ceasing further subversive activities.

The Sentner decision is pretty much of the same pattern except that it goes even further in protecting the "rights" of alien Communists with no legal right to be in this country. Mrs. Antonio Sentner was ordered deported, first, because she was in the country illegally; and second, because she had been proven to be a Communist after long-drawn-out hearings and Immigration Service proceedings. Under the law, the Attorney General ordered her to terminate her Communist Party membership while awaiting deportation. Again the Supreme Court with only two dissents ruled that the Government "lacked the authority to ban Communist activity by an alien who has been under a deportation order for 6 months."

I need not labor this point. An alien illegally in this country is ordered deported because she was a proven Communist. The Supreme Court rules in effect that while this may be a legal cause for her deportation, the Government has no right to ask her to cease and desist from such Communist activity.

As part of the picture of what the Supreme Court has done in the last few years to destroy countersubversive laws, administrative rulings, and other safeguards against internal subversion by a pattern of Communist-favoring decisions, I add two more cases.

Kendrick M. Cole was a Federal food and drug inspector in New York. He was suspended without pay in November 1953, "pending investigation to determine whether his employment should be terminated" under an Executive order on loyalty and security. Cole declined to answer charges made by his agency and he did not request a hearing. He was subsequently dropped from employment under an Executive order governing Federal employees whose retention was not clearly consistent with the interests of national security.

Cole appealed to the courts and in due time his case found its way to the Supreme Court. Again the result was the same except this time three justices dissented. The majority found that a Federal employee might be discharged as a security risk only if he "held a sensitive position." Here even a layman devoid of legal or judicial experience can see that the Supreme Court has boldly moved into an area of administrative policy. There are numerous decisions defining Government employment as a privilege and not a legal right and giving the Government the absolute right to lay down conditions of employment. All this has now been brazenly set aside by the Supreme Court.

What the Cole decision in effect says is that Communists are entitled by right to hold any Government position except those classified as sensitive. That Communists are sworn enemies of this country and dedicated to the overthrow of our form of government and the creation in its place of a Soviet despotism is blandly ignored in this Cole decision.

I call your attention to the Warren opinion in John T. Watkins against United States and quote from page 14 of that decision:

> In the decade following World War II, there appeared a new kind of Congressional inquiry unknown in prior periods of American history. Principally this was the result of various investigations into the threat of subversion of the United States Government, but other subjects of Congressional interest also contributed to the changed > scene. This new phase of legislative inquiry involved broad scale intrusion into the lives and affairs of private citizens. It brought before the courts novel questions of the appropriate limits of Congressional inquiry.

This is a most erroneous and inaccurate statement. Whoever prepared this statement either distorted the facts or else did not know the facts. Senate Document No. 99 entitled "Congressional Power of Investigation" was published by the Senate Judiciary Committee in February 1954. This document was prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress. It sets forth in great detail with all citations and references, the entire history of Congressional investigations since the founding of our Government. The legal limitations, duties, responsibilities, methods of procedure, and decisions upholding them are all summarized in this excellent report.

The Watkins decision's reference to a new kind of Congressional inquiry unknown in prior periods of American history, and an alleged new phase of legislative inquiry involving broad-scale intrusion into the lives and affairs of private citizens is not supported by Senate Document No. 99. Why was a misstatement of historical fact written into Chief Justice Warren's decision?

Because the whole specious and tenuous Watkins decision depends for its foundation on the spurious contention that Congress has just recently, since World War II, entered upon a new phase of investigation heretofore unknown in our history.

Only the pseudo-liberal stereotypes "hysteria," "witch hunting," and "Red baiting" are omitted from the majority opinion but the implication is plain. The effort is made to portray Congress as presently being unduly concerned by a purely temporary and passing phase of internal subversion. Now what are the true facts which this decision deliberately or ignorantly omits?

The first Congressional inquiry into subversion in this country was not in the decade following World War II, but in 1918 within a year after the Bolshevik seizure of power in Russia. This is roughly 30 years before the Supreme Court claims Congress first entered this field. This investigation was held under the able chairmanship of Senator Lee S. Overman, of North Carolina. The printed record of these hearings required 4 large volumes totaling over 4,000 pages.

In 1920, 1921, and 1924 three more Senate committees, under the chairmanship of Senators George H. Moses, Henry Cabot Lodge, and William E. Borah, held lengthy hearings on the activities of Soviet agents in this country, and Americans carrying on pro-Soviet and Communist activities.

In 1930 the House of Representatives authorized a Special Committee To Investigate Communist Activities in the United States under the chairmanship of Congressman Hamilton Fish, of New York. This committee heard witnesses in a number of American cities from Washington to Los Angeles. The hearings extended from June to November 193[illegible] The printed hearings total some 22 volumes—this is just part I of volume 6.

Pursuant to House Resolution 282 the 75th Congress in 1938 set up what later became known as the Dies committee, the chairman of which is again a Member of this House. This special committee carried on an unremitting and highly effective investigation not only of Communists but also of Fascists, Nazis, and other subversives from 1938 to the end of 1944. With the beginning of the 79th Congress, this House set up the present standing committee on un-American activities.

I have gone into this long history of Congressional concern over subversion to show the falsity of the Supreme Court's allegation that Congress set up a new kind of inquiry only after World War II. This sort of completely groundless assertion makes one wonder how many more of its decisions were based on equally erroneous history.

From the decisions which I cited in a previous speech last June, and these which I have briefly outlined today, a complete picture emerges. The constitutional rights of the States to control their own subversive problems was struck down by the Supreme Court in the Steve Nelson, Slochower, and Sweezy decisions. The Smith Act has to all intents and purposes been rendered useless in Yates et al. against the United States. The Internal Security Act of 1950, and the legality of the Subversive Activities Control Board created under that statute has been rendered useless by the Court's decisions, Communist Party against the Subversive Activities Control Board. In this decision the alleged tainted testimony of 3 minor witnesses out of over 20 was used as a quibbling excuse to delay for several more years the question of the constitutionality of the act itself.

As I pointed out previously, the Communist Party still has not complied with the registration requirement of the law 7 years after Congress passed the legislation.

The Jencks decision in great measure destroyed the effectiveness of the Federal Bureau of Investigation by holding that that law enforcement agency must open its confidential files and records to Communists and criminals. In Cole against Philip Young, the High Court told the Government that it could not fire subversives except from "sensitive" positions. In Konigsberg against the State Bar of California and in a parallel case, Schware against the Board of Bar Examiners of New Mexico, the Supreme Court told State courts and bar examiners that they could not protect themselves against admitting Communists to the bar.

The Watkins decision struck a mortal blow at Congressional inquiries into communism. Minor and supporting decisions found microscopic pinholes and piddling technicalities enabling Communists and Soviet agents to escape the annoyance and inconvenience of going to prison after long drawn out, costly court trials had found them guilty.

As we stand back and survey all of these incredible decisions in toto a pattern emerges. These are not just "irresponsible" decisions. These are not just an unfortunate and passing series of errors and bad judgment.

I believe that no court and no group of men no matter how constituted could possibly achieve such a record of error by fortuitous chance. What the Supreme Court has said in this long chain of decisions involving Communists and matters of national security is in effect that Congress over a period of 40 years, that the lower trial and supreme courts of the several States, that State legislatures and investigating committees, the Federal and State prosecutors, that the FBI and all other Government security agencies, that the Subversive Activities Control Board and Federal Loyalty Review Boards, that State bar examiners and other State and municipal boards of education, as well as literally thousands of experts on communism, including former members of the Communist conspiracy, who publicly testified under oath, all were wrong. That these thousands of judges, Government agents, prosecutors, and other authorities did not know what they were doing when they ruled, decided, prosecuted, or testified that Communists were part of an international criminal conspiracy dedicated to the total destruction of our form of government and the overthrow of our form of society.

A handful of six or seven Supreme Court justices has set aside and declared null and void all the labor and the vast sum total of knowledge, study, and experience of literally thousands of legislators, FBI experts, and other authorities. The very audacity of this assumption of sole knowledge and wisdom is stunning and shocking.

This is more than usurpation of legislative power. This is more than tinkering and tampering with the Constitution. This is a monumental arrogation of authority by 6 or 7 men on a subject which strikes at the foundation of America and the whole Free World. This is audacious arrogation without precedent in history. Yet we sit here and do nothing.

We read recently about two Soviet spies, Alfred K. Stern and his wife, the former Martha Dodd, who fled Mexico to avoid extradition to this country. They changed their United States citizenship to that of Paraguayans and fled to Czechoslovakia. Interviewed in Prague the other day by American newspapermen, Mr. Stern had this to say about the Supreme Court after denouncing paid informers and the FBI for trying to subvert decisions of the Supreme Court:

> One of the most liberal bodies in recent times.

In closing I would like to recall for you some additional thoughts and comments by Jefferson on the Supreme Court. The architect of our Republic also saw its flaws and future dangers. He was a man of truly remarkable prescience. It is so apt today that one might almost assume that it was written by a contemporary:

> The Nation declared its will by dismissing functionaries of one principle and electing those of another, in the two branches, executive and legislative, submitted to their election. Over the judiciary department, the Constitution had deprived them of their > control. That, therefore, has continued the reprobated system, and although new matter has occasionally been incorporated into the old, yet the leaven of the old mass seems to assimilate to itself the new, and after 20 years' confirmation of the Federal system by the voice of the Nation, declared through the medium of elections, we find the judiciary on every occasion, still driving us into consolidation.

>
> * * * * *
>
> The Constitution on this hypothesis is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please.

In a letter to Thomas Ritchie in 1820, Jefferson wrote:

> An opinion is huddled up in conclave, perhaps by a majority of one, delivered as if unanimous, and with the silent acquiescence of the lazy and timid associates, by a crafty Chief Judge, who sophisticates the law to his mind, by the turn of his own reasoning. * * * A judiciary independent of a king or executive alone, is a good thing; but independence of the will of the Nation is a solecism at least in a republican government.

In his autobiography which he started in 1821 Jefferson expressed the following convictions on what should be done with the Supreme Court:

> I repeat that I do not charge the judges with willful or ill-intentioned error; but honest error must be arrested where its toleration leads to public ruin. As for the safety of society, we commit honest maniacs to Bedlam, so judges should be withdrawn from their bench, whose erroneous biases are leading us to dissolution. It may indeed injure them in fame or in fortune but it saves the Republic which is the first and supreme law.

On August 19, 1821, Jefferson wrote to Nathaniel Mason:

> There are two measure which if not taken we are undone. First to check these unconstitutional invasions of State rights by the Federal judiciary.
>
> How? Not by impeachment in the first instance, but by strong protestations of both Houses of Congress that such and such doctrines advanced by the Supreme Court are contrary to the Constitution; and if afterward they relapse into the same heresies, impeach and set the whole adrift.
>
> For what was the Government divided into three branches, but that each should watch over the others and oppose their usurpations?

I began to speak and warn the country against usurpations by the Court in 1949. Senator EASTLAND, Senator McCarran, and others likewise warned us against this stealthy and silent supersession of State functions by the Supreme Court that Jefferson first warned against 137 years ago. Yet nothing has been done. It is an axiom of history that tyranny and despotism inevitably encroach upon weakness, apathy, and indifference.

I say that something can and must be done. Paragraph 2, section 2, in article 3 of the Constitution reads as follows:

> The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as Congress shall make.

There is nothing hazy or foggy about these words. Even a Supreme Court which finds the dictionary unreliable can understand that language.

There are presently bills in committee in both Houses removing appellate jurisdiction from the Supreme Court, both as to law and fact, in certain areas where legislative interest is paramount or exclusive. I shall support such legislation, and I call for its earliest possible consideration. I urge all Americans concerned with maintaining the Constitution as handed down to us by our forefathers to work for early adoption of such vitally important legislation lest the dissolution and ruin of this Republic which Jefferson warned us against becomes a reality in the not too distant future.

Mr. McVEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McVEY. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Georgia on this most excellent discussion. The gentleman from Georgia has given us in a very revealing manner some of the difficulties we may encounter in the prosecution of subversive activities. I want the gentleman to know I fully agree with him. He has made a very fine address.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I thank the gentleman. I know of his concern over the inroads which have been made on our Constitution and I appreciate very much his contribution.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ANDREWS. I also would like to congratulate the gentleman for the fine statement he has made. I agree with him 100 percent and share with him the fears he entertains about the present Supreme Court. I regret only that more Members of the House were not present to hear his fine statement.

I think all Members of the House should become concerned with the danger that confronts this Nation from the Supreme Court. It looks as though it is impossible to get a Communist conviction to stick before the Supreme Court.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. The gentleman from Alabama has many times raised his voice on the floor of this House in support of the principles he has just enunciated, and I thank him for his remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to join my colleagues in congratulating the distinguished gentleman from Georgia on his outstanding presentation. I can honestly say that since I have been in Congress, I know of no man in or out of the Congress who has been more diligent, more energetic, more sincere, or more unyielding in his fight to preserve constitutional processes than has the gentleman from Georgia.

I hope that the words spoken today by the gentleman from Georgia will not fall upon deaf ears though I realize that what he has said is not politically popular among some elements of this country.

I think, as does the gentleman from Georgia, that it is a travesty upon the legislative integrity of this body that we should permit the legislation which he mentions, so sorely needed for the protection of our country, to lie idle and be passed over without action, at the same time the Congress concerns itself with political legislation designed specifically not only to destroy States rights, but also to deny to citizens of the United States the right to trial by jury they have enjoyed since the creation of this Republic.

Mr. Speaker, we are in an age, I am sure, of political transition. I hate to see that transition come about, because the trend is away from constitutional processes and toward the centralization of authority into the hands of the few. If we do not act, and act soon, to turn back this tide of centralization that threatens to engulf us, we will live to see the day when human liberty will be but a precious and cherished memory. I congratulate the gentleman again for the remarks he has made on the floor of this House and I just wish it were possible for every American citizen to be apprised of this speech and to have the opportunity to read it.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his remarks. He has many times warned this House and the Nation against the encroachment of the Supreme Court on our Constitution and on legislative jurisdiction. I appreciate very much his contribution.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Georgia for his very timely and remarkable address which he has just made. I hope every Member of Congress will read the remarks.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Georgia very much. He has a record of supporting States rights and constitutional government over the years, and I thank him very much for his contribution and concurrence in my remarks.

Mr. LANDRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LANDRUM. The gentleman's discussion has been one of the most scholarly that we have had the opportunity to listen to on the floor of the House of Representatives, but such is not unusual with the gentleman. There is not a Member of the Congress or an American outside the Congress who, as the gentleman from Mississippi suggested a moment ago, attacks the problems confronting us with more diligence and presents the facts with more accuracy than does the distinguished gentleman from the Fifth District of Georgia. Though I am always able to listen to the gentleman with extreme interest, I believe that this morning I have been able to develop more intense interest in what he has presented to us than at any other time if for no other reason than because of the fact I know the gentleman does not make such dissertations as he has delivered here this morning for purely political reasons. The gentleman has developed these facts and presented them because of the deep conviction he holds and because he is sincerely trying to warn all of the Members of the House and all Americans that unless we do act in the face of some of the problems confronting us from the Supreme Court, we may soon be faced with a complete dissolution of our system of government. I not only join wholeheartedly in what the gentleman has said but I congratulate him on the skill and the enthusiastic manner in which he has delivered it.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. I know that my distinguished colleague from Georgia shares the concern which I have expressed over this crisis and I appreciate very much his remarks.

FBI FILES

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KEOGH). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COLLIER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, let me preface my remarks by complimenting the gentleman from Georgia on a very fine discourse on a subject that certainly should be of interest to all of us. It happens that I am going to address myself to just one phase of this problem that he discussed so thoroughly. The press reports and persistent rumors during the last week would indicate that the Congress will terminate its first session sometime this week. Let me assure you there is no Member of this House more anxious to get home than I am. But belated as it is, I believe there is a vitally urgent matter which demands the action of Congress before its adjournment.

Certainly if concern over legislation deemed essential and immediate, warranted our staying throughout this summer, we should remain until we pass legislation to protect the files of the FBI, as provided in H. R. 7915 introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER]. This bill was recently voted out of the Judiciary Committee and I understand was granted a rule by the Rules Committee this morning. If a suspension of the rules to expedite action on the bill is necessary, then this should be the course. Actually, Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat ridiculous that Congress should find itself in the position of having to consider legislation of this nature at all. The fact remains that we do, the need of course was prompted by the Supreme Court ruling in the Jencks case in June which stirred the consternation of millions of Americans across the Nation.

While the Supreme Court pointed out that the question of national security was not raised in the matter covered by this ruling, the fact is that national security is directly involved. In the 60 days since the Jencks case decision there have been a series of conflicting interpretations in our courts which demands prompt correction and clarification by the Congress. Already the Justice Department has found itself unable to proceed with the prosecution of some criminals due to this decision. Others will necessarily hang fire because of it. I think it is eminently clear to the many Members of this body who have spent years in the legal profession that the ramifications of this decision open the door to a variation of dangerous interpretations.

But I should like to address myself to even more serious implications in this case. It is significant that the situation as it now stands could well aid and abet the perpetration of subversion. It is certainly significant that unless definite steps are taken by this Congress, the Federal Bureau of Investigation will be hamstrung in its effective battle against subversive activities. I do not believe there is a Member of this Congress who can deny that great danger still exists in many areas where Communists and their fellow travelers have infiltrated our society. The treachery of the means by which international Communism seeks to destroy from within through subversion and espionage is no secret. Rulers of the Kremlin have sometimes slyly and other times blatantly admitted to the philosophy of this conspiracy. We need only look at the nations now behind the Iron Curtain, and most recently, Syria, as evidence that the psychological, plotting internal warfare of the Soviet Union is as dangerous as its air force, marching armies or hydrogen bombs. Looking at the Nations behind the Iron Curtain today, the evidence of this communistic conspiracy is squarely before us. In each instance it is marked by the inability of these nations to cope with subversion from within which so rotted and so corrupted them that they slipped into the pitfall of communism. I know that this is not a new or enlightening observation, and I regret that it might be an obvious or repetitious warning in the face of the sad chapters that have been recently written into the history of the Free World.

Under the Jencks ruling, names and information of an essentially confidential nature would be opened and made available to criminals and conspirators. Obviously, it might be useful as a tipoff regarding the direction future investigations by the Bureau might take. Such confidential data might also provide other conspirators with information as to when to go underground and when to cover up their tracks. And what will become of the sources of information held in secret by the FBI as an effective counterespionage work? The Supreme Court held that there is undoubtedly some information in these files that might be of benefit to the defendant in preparing his own defense and, further, that if these files are kept absolutely secret, the rights of certain idividuals might be denied. I have no quarrel with either contention, though I prefer, in the interest of the security of the Nation and the American people, that we look at the broad aspect of the serious problem with which we are faced. I do not believe there is any Member of this body who dares minimize the need for the solution provided in H. R. 7915. Certainly it offers no fear to any sound freedom-loving American who cherishes the liberties of his citizenship. This bill will give the FBI files some shred of protection while also providing the defendant with the right to examine that part of the file which bears directly upon his case. Hence, he is not denied any basic individual right under the law. To accomplish these purposes, this bill transfers the final job of evaluating the evidence and material contained in the FBI files to the shoulders of responsible and patriotic men—the judges of Federal courts. Under this bill, by motion of the defense, the files must be surrendered by the United States Government to the court, and the judge, acting in chambers, may evaluate the information in the files to determine what parts should rightfully be turned over to the defense.

Those of you who watched and listened to Boris Morros on the Face the Nation program yesterday as I did must have felt a reaffirmation of the vigilance and dedication of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Mr. Morros, who devoted 10 years of his life working with this agency, so clearly and sincerely pointed up the duty before Congress at this time—that of protecting the tools of the FBI needs to continue its work. Certainly in the face of the billions which have and are being spent on international security projects, we cannot turn our heads away—not even for 4 or 5 months—from the job of strengthening the forces which guard our internal security at a time when we should deal more firmly than ever with the problem.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say Congress should not adjourn without taking some action to close the door which the Supreme Court ruling has opened. The legislation to correct it is here and the time to act on it is now. To wait until the second session of this Congress would be a gamble we cannot afford to take. Let us not adjourn leaving this responsibility unattended.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MOORE. I should like to take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from Illinois on his very keen interest in the subject he has discussed here today. As a member of the House Committee on the Judiciary and more particularly of the subcommittee that studied and recommended to the full committee the legislation about which the gentleman is speaking here today, may I say that he has brought to our attention more forcibly the need for this particular piece of legislation.

Also as a member of the special subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary that is studying the recent Supreme Court decisions, I want to express my appreciation to the gentleman from Illinois for bringing this matter to the attention of the Members of the House. I am certain the manner in which he has been working and in which he has manifested such interest in this subject has borne the fruit that we have seen in that the Committee on Rules this very day has reported this legislation to the floor for action. I think the gentleman from Illinois is to be commended. Certainly I would be remiss in not saying so at this time.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. The distinguished gentleman from Illinois has been very impressive in his presentation today both as to the content of his message and the way he has presented it. The gentleman from Illinois is one of the younger Members of our body with great potentialities. He is serious, sincere, and dedicated, and I predict that he will go far.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McVEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McVEY. I have been encouraged by the prospects which the gentleman from Illinois has cited in the matter of obtaining legislation to rectify this subject and which will provide further protection for FBI files. I am certain this is a subject which has given all of us the deepest of concern. I congratulate the gentleman from Illinois on his contribution to this subject.

Mr. TEWES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. TEWES. The gentleman from Illinois has given us here again a demonstration of why those of us who are proud to count ourselves as his friends are also proud of his counsel. Even though he is finishing his first session in the Congress of the United States, he is known by all of us for his keen and penetrating understanding of these issues. We are all the beneficiaries of his keen understanding of the country's problems and his willingness to devote his energies to them. The Congress and the people of his district are extremely fortunate to have him contribute his extraordinary talents and capabilities to his country.

Mr. BYRNE of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNE of Illinois. I desire to associate myself with the very sound remarks of my good friend, the gentleman from Illinois. As a former prosecutor in Cook County, which includes Chicago, and as one who has had some 25 years of experience on the defense side of the table, I think that the very fine document the gentleman has just presented to this honorable body is a sound one. I think, too, as he does, that the time has come when the rights of all the people, and that includes the defendants and in a broader scope the people of our country, should be conserved and everybody should have the consideration they are entitled to. The things that the gentleman is asking today are sound in law and it shows a fine reflection of research. I commend the gentleman from Illinois.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I, too, would like to express my deep appreciation of the gentleman's very fine statement and the study that he has made of the problem. I know the gentleman has shown that he thinks the FBI week by week and day by day is doing an even more important job than we realize. I am grateful to the gentleman from Illinois and I am delighted that he is here in the Congress with us.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I also wish to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois who has done such an outstanding job of research and preparation in presenting his statement today. It is a great service to all of us. I join with him in hoping and urging that this important legislation will be passed as soon as possible and before we adjourn.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the gentleman from Michigan for his kind remarks.

Mr. CRAMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. CRAMER. I, too, want to join my colleagues in congratulating the distinguished gentleman from Illinois for the very fine remarks he has made, and for bringing to the attention of the House again, as many of us have been doing for some time, the importance and the necessity of bringing this Jencks FBI bill to the floor of the House. I know the gentleman, as I am myself, is proud and happy that the bill is coming before the House tomorrow as a result of the action of the Committee on Rules this morning. I had the privilege as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary to introduce a resolution with regard to the Jencks case substantially in the form which was voted out of the committee. I appreciate, as I know the other Members of the House do, the very fine remarks of the gentleman on this subject. I know it has been his efforts along with those of many others of us that have resulted in this bill being brought to the floor and action on this legislation taking place with the necessity for it haveing been clearly shown by evidence before our committee and by statements of the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Attorney General and the interest shown by the administration in this legislation. I congratulate the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I join with those who have expressed their congratulations to the gentleman on the handling of this subject today. As one who has been closely associated with the gentlemen from Illinois who has made this fine address, during the first 8 months of the current year, I think it is most rewarding and certainly in keeping with the high ideals and intellectual studies of the various issues that the gentleman has presented on the floor of the House thus far this year. I associate myself with the thoughts the gentleman expressed on this legislation and feel especially as those from the Committee on the Judiciary that this most important bill should be acted upon before we adjourn this session.

Mr. COLLIER. I thank the gentleman from Connecticut.

ASIAN FLU

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KEOGH). Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include an article from the U. S. News & World Report, What the Asian Flu Will Do to the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the House has heard me speak many times of the importance of keeping the Army Hospital at Waltham, Mass., open. On Friday it was announced it would be deactivated in January. It is all the more distressing that it should be deactivated at this time with the Asian flu, which is likely to reach this country by midautumn or January.

Having been in an Army hospital trying to help take care of the flu cases, I know what it means not to have enough beds, not to have enough doctors, and not to have enough nurses. We lost many patients in 1918 because there were not enough people to feed even the patients that poured in from camp. I hope that such a situation will never take place again. I wish the House would join me in at least begging that that hospital be kept open a year. Several times the House went on record as behind the hospital being kept open and the money was in the appropriation bill to run it. The Public Health Service expects there will be 2 epidemics; 1 in autumn and 1 in January, and possibly 1 later on.

I see the gentleman from Louisiana, Dr. LONG, chairman of the Subcommittee on the Increased Pay Bill for Doctors and Nurses, is present. I am very much distressed that that bill has not come to the floor for action. I think if the gentleman from Louisiana expressed his own opinion he would feel the same way. The VA is losing many doctors and nurses. It is vital to have those doctors and nurses remain in our service. They are leaving now because they cannot afford to stay in, and other services are competing so vigorously with the VA medical service. We are going to need every bed in these hospitals, too, and all of the present staff. The VA medical service has been second to none.

Dr. Burney states that when the Asian flu hits our hospitals will be jammed and business disrupted.

The balance of the article is as follows:

What the Asian Flu Will Do to United States

(Interview with the United States Surgeon General, Dr. Leroy E. Burney)

Question. Dr. Burney, we have been hearing a great deal about Asian flu. Why do they call it Asian flu? Did it start in Asia?

Answer. It started, as far as we have been able to determine, in Hong Kong, although there has been some indication that it may have begun in Communist China. However, we do not receive good reports from China as to the occurrence of disease.

We call it Asian flu following the pattern of naming the viruses after the place where they were first isolated.

Question. Is there any possibility that the Communists have planted these germs? Could this be the beginning of germ warfare of some kind?

Answer. No; I don't believe that's a possibility. We have epidemics occasionally and have had them in the past.

Question. What is the cause of them; do you know?

Answer. No; we actually don't know. Every so often a virus mutates—a new strain splits off from an existing strain, and we are not protected against that new strain.

Question. Do you know that this thing is a germ?

Answer. Yes; it is a virus.

Question. Can you get it through the nose?

Answer. That is a way, through the nose, and through the throat. It's person-to-person spread similar to the common cold, for example.

Question. Is it possible to get it in the food we eat?

Answer. Oh, that's a remote possibility, but the vast majority—I would say certainly 99 percent of the cases—will result from direct spread—person to person.

Question. How does it differ from the ordinary flu?

Answer. In symptoms it differs not at all—in other words, headache, fever, sore throat, nonproductive cough, and severe muscle aches lasting about 4 to 5 days, and with about 4 to 5 days of feeling below par following that.

Question. When did the Public Health Service first hear of it?

Answer. The latter part of April was the first word we received of the epidemic in Hong Kong. And then it spread both ways, going into the Philippines, Indonesia, and Japan, and then going the other direction to Cambodia, Laos, Vietnam, Pakistan, and India.

Question. Is it in any way associated with cold weather?

Answer. Not particularly in those countries, but in this country it would be most unusual for us to have a large epidemic other than in cold weather.

Question. Argentina is in winter now and they have it——

Answer. Yes. I meant that in the United States and in temperate climates it is associated with cold weather.

Question. Then, as we approach cold weather we approach the season when we may expect it?

Answer. That's right, and the reason for that is not definitely known. We suspect that it's because people come indoors and are in closer association in cold weather.

Question. What month do you believe it is likely to hit us?

Answer. It would be impossible to say. It may come in October; it may wait until January. But we suspect that it will come in the very late fall or the early winter.

Question. Are you quite certain that it is going to come in epidemic proportions?

Answer. Yes, on the basis of our experiences with past epidemics and with its tremendous spread thus far throughout the world. It began in Hong Kong, but it is worldwide at the present time. The way it has spread in South America—several hundred thousands of cases have been reported there and millions of cases in the Far East—and the fact that we have had between 20,000 and 25,000 cases in many localized outbreaks in this country make us believe that there is a definite probability. I don't know that I can go any further than that.

Question. How do you know there isn't a good bit of Asian flu around the country in addition to the 25,000 cases that you are fairly sure of?

Answer. Oh, I suspect that there are more individual cases. What we are talking about primarily now are the outbreaks that are of sufficient number to have been noticed and investigated.

Question. Is this to be compared with the "Spanish" flu that we had in 1918?

Answer. Not in severity or type. Perhaps in the fact that it is pandemic—it's worldwide—there is the same relationship. But the flu in 1918-19 was a much more severe, or more virulent, as we call it, type of influenza.

Question. The death toll was tremendous at that time, wasn't it?

Answer. There were about 850,000 deaths in this country and about 20 million cases.

Question. Did those people die of the flu itself, or did most of them die of complications, such as pneumonia?

Answer. They died of complications—usually pneumonia or other infections.

Question. Are we better prepared now to deal with those complications than we were at that time?

Answer. Undoubtedly. With the antibiotics—penicillin and all the other antibiotics—there is no question about that.

Question. Is this definitely a milder flu than the "Spanish" flu of 1918?

Answer. It is a milder flu, that's right. Up to the present time, at least, there have not been what we call "bacterial hitchhikers." In other words, the complications that you mentioned, such as pneumococcal, streptococcal infections and others, are not occurring.

Question. Then, is the real danger of this thing the fact that it is going to make a lot of people sick at the same time?

Answer. That's putting it exactly right.

Question. Do these pandemics sometimes become more severe as they go along?

Answer. That is always a possibility. It began in April and all of the cases have continued to be mild, but again, we have to be prepared for a change in virulence of the strain—a change in severity.

Question. Have you any estimates as to what percent of the population is going to be on its back?

Answer. We have estimated that the attack rate will be about 15 to 20 percent of the population.

Question. Fifteen percent of all men, women, and children?

Answer. That's right. It affects all age groups—that would be one-fifth of 170 million, or about 34 million people.

Question. Do you mean that number will be ill all at one time?

Answer. Not all at one time, but influenza does have this characteristic: It spreads extremely rapidly. In other words, if it begins, let's say, in Boston, it will spread in a wave and there will be only about 4 or 5 weeks' difference between the peak of the epidemic in Boston and the peak of the epidemic in San Francisco.

Question. In a particular community, over what length of time would the epidemic reach its height and then fall?

Answer. About 6 weeks.

Question. Six weeks to go through the whole thing for each community?

Answer. Yes, for each community.

Question. Does that mean that 20 percent of the population of that community is out that entire six weeks, or only at one period?

Answer. No, that is the approximate time it would take, for instance, to go through Washington. There may be a little variation, but within 6 weeks' time it would hit Washington and be over.

How Long You're Sick

Question. Is the individual sick about a week?

Answer. It's about 4 to 5 days plus about an equal amount of time of feeling weak when he may not be able to go back to work in many instances. That has been the experience with many cases.

Question. What's to prevent this epidemic from making a return trip and getting the other 80 percent?

Answer. There is no assurance that this may not come in a wave, let us say, in the fall, and then may return next February or March. Actually in 1918 there were three waves, I believe. A mild one came in the spring of 1918, and then a severe one in October of that year, and then a continued severe one in February of the next year.

Question. Is it your idea to warn the people to watch out for this Asian flu?

Answer. We want them to know about the possibilities and, No. 1, to avail themselves of the vaccine—which is the only preventive against the influenza that we know of—and, No. 2, we want the communities, through their physicians and hospitals and nurses, to be prepared to take care of large numbers of sick individuals.

Question. How do you know the vaccine will prevent Asian flu?

Answer. Influenza vaccines started getting onto the market in 1945. We know from experience in the military with past influenza vaccines, which were prepared to protect against other strains of the influenza virus, it is about 70 percent effective in preventing the disease.

Question. What about the general population? Has it been that good?

Answer. We don't know, because it is difficult to have well-controlled groups in the general population because there are other things that stimulate flu—a serious cold, for example, or one of the adenoviruses, or another type of flu.

Question. But where it has been tried out in the military, you say that it has been 70 percent effective?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Is that the original vaccine, not the new vaccine?

Answer. That's the old vaccine containing a combination of the other strains of virus.

Question. What assurance have you that the new vaccine is going to be as effective in this type of flu?

Answer. We only have the experience that we have had with the production and use of other influenza vaccines.

Question. How effective will it be in this case?

Answer. We think it will be about 70 percent effective against this one strain. Dr. Murray, Chief of our Division of Biologics Standards, and others have been testing the ability of this vaccine to produce antibodies—to produce protection within people. They have been giving it to volunteers to see whether it raises the antibody level in the person's body.

Question. Do you mean that out of the 34 million people—the 20 percent of the population who might be expected to become ill—70 percent who take the vaccine won't get it, but the other 30 percent will get it? That's about 10 million people who are going to get it even if they take the vaccine—

Question. How effective is the Salk vaccine in preventing polio?

Answer. That varies between 70 and 90 percent.

Question. When will this vaccine be available?

Answer. Some of it is already available—about 500,000 cubic centimeters. I would like to say definitely that the manufacturers merit some commendation for the very expeditious way that they have taken hold of this situation. We supplied them with samples of the virus on May 22, and they started the development of the vaccine before we had the first case of Asian flu in this country.

Question. Well, is there enough available now to treat everybody in the country?

Answer. No; only 500,000 cubic centimeters have been released, and we asked the manufacturers to produce 60 million cubic centimeters by February 1.

NOT ENOUGH VACCINE FOR ALL

Question. Will we have enough for this flu epidemic?

Answer. Not for every person.

Question. Is it entirely possible that a lot of people won't get the vaccine?

Answer. That's exactly right. But you have to remember another thing with reference to the manufacturers. They have been only producing about 3 million cubic centimeters of the old influenza vaccine and have been selling, I think, less than that; so when we ask them to step up their production thirtyfold without any Federal underwriting of the risk—only on the basis that the Public Health Service believed that this was enough of a threat so that we were going to promote a nationwide program of vaccination—the fact that they are coming through on the basis of reports we have in meeting this 60-million-cubic-centimeter goal, or even perhaps bettering it, I think they deserve some special mention.

Question. What about the people who don't like to take the strange substances into their body for fear that it may do more harm than good? What is this vaccine made of?

Answer. It's made by injecting some of the virus of the Asian flu into fertile eggs. It grows in fertile eggs and then is extracted from the embyronic sac, concentrated, killed with formaldehyde solution, and then diluted.

Question. Where do you get the virus?

Answer. From a human case. One sample can be maintained in eggs and used to make a lot of vaccine.

Question. What would you say in ordinary terms is the chemical composition of this vaccine? What kind of chemicals will an individual be taking into his body?

Answer. Some proteins and salts and a few of the substances that are present in the fluid of the egg.

Question. What would you say in ordinary terms is the chemical composition of this vaccine? What kind of chemicals will an individual be taking into his body?

Answer. No, except to those people who are sensitive to egg protein.

Question. Could the vast majority take it like vitamins? It might not do them any good, but it wouldn't do them any harm.

Answer. That's right.

REACTION TO THE SHOT

Question. Then there is no reaction?

Answer. Well, I wouldn't say that. Any time you inject a foreign protein into your body, you get a little reaction. Most people have had typhoid shots, and you know you get a little sore arm and occasionally a little fever. With the old polyvalent vaccines, in many cases you got a reaction of severe headache and maybe some fever.

Here you are dealing with one strain of virus in the vaccine which does not contain as much of the antigenic material. In the old vaccine you have five different strains, so you had many times the amount of substance and would cause more reaction.

Question. Would you say the reaction lasts a matter of hours—a couple of days?

Answer. With the vaccines that have been tried so far, is has been immediate, if there has been any reaction at all, and it may last a couple hours, but nobody has been away from work more than a day.

Question. How many shots does it take?

Answer. That is another question which we can't answer too positively at the present time. We believe that, on the basis of the testing Dr. Murray and others have been doing in human beings—volunteers—one injection will be sufficient. We can't say positively; however, from a practical standpoint, if we can get 60 million people to take 1 injection, that is all we hope for.

Question. Assuming that provides immunity for an individual, how long does that last?

Answer. It takes 10 to 14 days to acquire immunity after the injection has been given, and the immunity lasts from 12 to 18 months.

Question. Is that the same length of time that the person would have immunity if he contracted the flu?

Answer. The immunity is not as long-lasting as it is in many other diseases. The military has recommended revaccination at least once every year.

Question. Do doctors believe in this vaccine? Will most of them prescribe it?

Answer. I believe so. We have worked with the American Medical Association, both with reference to joining us in the educational program for the vaccine and also in preparing for the medical care that will be necessary following the illness. They are giving complete support to our whole program.

Question. Do you expect that most people will be hospitalized with this disease?

Answer. No, but I would suspect that, if our forecast is correct, the hospitals will be jammed, because it has been the experience so far that many who could secure hospitalization have availed themselves of it.

Question. Then it is pretty serious, isn't it?

Answer. I think there are a number of factors relating to that. The major effort will have to be in home-care services, even though hospitalization is now available to many people. The tendency to use hospitalization will tax existing facilities. We will have to rely heavily on home-care services, through physicians and health departments.

Question. How about nursing facilities?

Answer. Nursing care, both in the hospital and the community, is vital. Visiting nurses—public-health nurses—will have a particularly important responsibility in helping to provide home care.

Question. Couldn't this epidemic sweep whole households?

Answer. That's quite possible.

Question. What is the likelihood that the vaccine would disperse that to a certain extent?

Answer. If we had 60 million cubic centimeters, and got it into people's arms before the epidemic hit, then you would have 110 million people left who would be susceptible. Then you have to take out 30 percent of the 60 million because they would not be protected—so there's another 18 million. So you would have about 130 million people susceptible.

Question. Do you know if it leaves any permanent after effects?

Answer. It hasn't up to the present time, no. You will recall in the old flu we used to get encephalitis in some cases, which left some permanent mental damage. That has not been the experience in this epidemic. It has continued to be a mild infection.

Question. What is the prospect of fatalities out of these cases you expect to get?

Answer. In the other countries—and again understanding that reporting of cases and reporting of deaths are not very reliable—the death rate has been about two-tenths of 1 percent of the people who had the influenza.

But also one has to understand that this has been in countries where malnourishment, parasitic diseases, or other health conditions are less favorable than they are in this country, so we would suspect that the death rate will be much less than two-tenths of 1 percent in this country.

Question. Two-tenths of 1 percent of 34 million—which is the number we said might get it—gives about 68,000 people that are going to die of this thing in this country. Isn't that a high rate?

Answer. I qualified that two-tenths of 1 percent by saying I doubted, even though that had been the reported mortality rate in other countries, that we would have that rate. We have not had that large a rate in the outbreaks in this country so far. In fact, only three deaths have been reported, I believe.

Question. Out of how many cases?

Answer. Between 20,000 and 25,000 cases.

Question. Is the vaccine being used in other countries that are infected now?

Answer. Some countries are making vaccine, and they are about in the same stage that we are—in the production stage. They haven't had it long enough to have used very much of it. Australia is producing some of the vaccine and I think some of the European countries are—Great Britain and Denmark. None of them has quite as ambitious a program for vaccine production as the United States has.

FEVER: 102 TO 104

Question. In the typical case of Asian flu, how high does the temperature go? How much fever does the average person have?

Answer. About 102° to 104°. The temperature begins with the onset of the disease. It may rise and then gradually decline over a period of 4 or 5 days.

Question. Can Asian flu be readily diagnosed by the average physician?

Answer. Oh, yes, if he knows Asian flu is in his area.

Question. Can he tell it from any other kind of flu?

Answer. No, sir. And you can't tell it from a serious cold or any adenovirus, etc., except by laboratory diagnosis.

Question. Is your first advice to people to take the vaccine, if possible?

Answer. Right.

Question. What other advice would you give? Is there anything else people can do to protect themselves or to avoid this disease?

Answer. There is nothing else that can be done. As I say, it's a very contagious infection; it spreads like measles and the common cold.

Question. It's not a matter of sanitation or clothing?

Answer. No.

Question. Wouldn't it be wise to take more than normal precaution just to avoid colds?

Answer. I don't know how one takes more than the normal precautions to avoid colds. In our normal habits and working, it's impossible to avoid exposure since it is such an infectious agent.

Question. Could the presence of a cold in itself lead to Asian flu—weakened vitality?

Answer. I would doubt that that would have any effect on it.

Question. Do you have enough vaccine for the Government?

Answer. We might have enough for the Government if no one else received it, but I'm not sure that everyone would say that Government employees have the highest priority. No, the problem here is a rather simple one in a way: We will have—if our forecast is correct—a large outbreak involving many millions of cases in the United States.

If it continues as a mild infection, to the individual it is not such a serious problem. The mortality rate will be low and you will be sick for 4 to 5 days or a week.

The big problem will initially be the impact on industry and essential community services such as fire and police forces by having 15 to 20 percent of those people out of production or out of operation during that particular time.

Our job, we feel, is to try to minimize this impact by the use of the vaccine.

Question. Would you advise companies and industry, generally, to do everything they can to get their employees inoculated?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Is there a priority system for distributing the vaccine?

Answer. No, we believe that a national priority system is unnecessary since all age groups are equally susceptible.

Question. A part of the United States has a milder climate than other parts. In the southern part of the United States—Texas, Louisiana, Florida—will those areas be less likely to get Asian flu than the colder areas?

Answer. Not necessarily. For example, one of our largest civilian outbreaks so far has been in Louisiana, among school children. They have a strawberry season there which begins in the early spring; and, in order to have the children available for picking strawberries, they start their school during the summer months. They have had over a thousand cases, I think, in one parish [county].

Question. Can you say that this is likely to strike cities more intensively than the country districts?

Answer. I believe it would—yes.

Question. Isn't it typical of epidemics that they strike population centers?

Answer. Yes, that's true.

Question. How do you get the vaccine—just go to your doctor in the usual way?

Answer. That would be the ordinary way. However, if industry, for example, takes this up—General Motors, for example, or General Electric—they would purchase the vaccine and give it through their industrial-medical service, I imagine.

Question. What are the detecting signs of this? How do you know you've got it?

Answer. The sudden onset of the disease—in other words, you are feeling all right and in 2 or 3 hours you start feeling bad and then you feel worse within a very few hours. You have a headache, sore throat, fever, a nonproductive cough, and severe aching of your muscles. Within 24 hours' time you will have those symptoms.

Question. If it hits you at the office, can you drive your car home and get to bed?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What is the treatment, normally?

Answer. What we call symptomatic treatment. There is no specific treatment for influenza itself. Bed rest, aspirin or other analgesics to help relieve the muscle aches and headache; plenty of fluids. Antibiotics are not effective against influenza. They are effective against the complications, but they should not be given for the flu itself, because they should be saved for the possible complications.

Question. If you've had a vaccine and you get this, will another shot help you?

Answer. No, because then you've already got influenza and the vaccine is too late.

SECOND ATTACK POSSIBLE

Question. If you get this flu, can you get it again within a few months, or do you get an immunity from the attack itself for quite a period of time?

Answer. Ordinarily, you would have an immunity for a period of 6 to 12 months, but it doesn't confer an immunity such as when you've had polio, for example, or if you've had typhoid fever. That immunity lasts for several years, and maybe for a lifetime, in these diseases—but for influenza, the immunity is temporary.

Question. Could the entry of Asian flu into the United States have been prevented?

Answer. No. In the first place, there are many unapparent infections. In other words, you may have the influenza virus—carrying it round here now—and I couldn't detect it in you. That's No. 1. No. 2—there are about 1,800 people who disembark on the west coast from the Pacific areas every day from planes, ships, and otherwise. You can carry the virus and there's no way of detecting who has it and who doesn't have it.

Question. Does it affect digestion at all?

Answer. That isn't one of the usual symptoms—you mean nausea and vomiting. Of course, there's loss of appetite with anyone who has a fever, but ordinarily gastrointestinal symptoms—nausea and vomiting and diarrhea—are not present.

Question. What is going to be the impact of Asian flu on schools and colleges? Are the schools going to be able to remain open?

Answer. We have found, in past epidemics of such an infectious agent as influenza, or even polio, that closing schools, churches, and theaters has no effect whatsoever on limiting the spread of the epidemic.

Question. Do you see any advantage in wearing masks to keep from catching the virus?

Answer. No.

Question. If one member of the family gets it, are the other members of that family very like or almost sure to get it?

Answer. My feeling is that they would be a little more likely to get it, because of their close proximity in their living arrangements. In the outbreak in Singapore, one thing that was noted was that when the working member of the family came home with the flu, it spread through the rest of the family.

Question. It does spread through the family?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Then why doesn't everybody get it? There is always one working member in the family, and your contacts would be infinite.

Answer. Every working member doesn't get it.

COMPLICATIONS WITH AGE

Question. Does it strike more adults than it does children? Is there any immunity in the younger ages?

Answer. No; the attack rate is about the same in all groups. In other words, all age groups are susceptible to the infection. It is a little more severe in older age groups, because you get more complications in the older groups. If you get influenza on top of a heart disease or kidney infection, you have it more severely, and possibly with more complications. Infants under 1 year of age react much more unfavorably toward upper respiratory infections.

Question. Does alcohol help or hurt it?

Answer. I would know of no therapeutic reasons for giving alcohol during the attack, either for prevention or for treatment.

Question. How about smoking?

Answer. I would doubt that anyone who had fever or a sore throat would get much pleasure out of smoking, and my suggestion would be that it would certainly be undesirable to smoke during the period of the attack.

Question. Are people who suffer with allergies and bronchitis, and tend to be susceptible to colds more readily than others, more likely to get the flu?

Answer. They are probably no more likely to get the infection, but they are more likely to have complications afterward. That is why I say older people with heart disease, tuberculosis, and other chronic ailments should certainly be some of the first to have the influenza vaccine.

Question. Can you pinpoint a little bit more when this epidemic is likely to strike? For example, when would you expect it to strike Washington? When would it reach epidemic proportions?

Answer. I cannot say, and I don't believe anyone can say when it will reach epidemic proportions in Washington or in any other city throughout the country. What triggers the epidemic is not known except, as I say, we believe the cold weather which brings people together may be the trigger.

Whether it will strike Washington in October or November or December is anyone's guess. Once it strikes here, if it starts here first, it will spread in waves to the rest of the country, or we may get it as a final part of the wave from the west coast.

Question. Would it be more likely to start in Boston, say, or North Dakota—some of the colder areas of the country—as soon as cold weather comes around up there?

Answer. It is not more likely to start in the areas of the United States which have cold weather earlier than it is to start in some areas such as Texas.

Question. If an epidemic starts in the autumn, we won't begin to have enough vaccine by that time. Could you create a black-market demand for vaccine by urging people to get shots?

Answer. I doubt that. I am sure there will be tremendous demands for it when we get the epidemic. The point to remember is that it takes 10 to 14 days for immunity to develop, and once it hits Washington, for example, I am sure there will be a tremendous demand for vaccine. At that time, however, most of the vaccine will do little or no good, because it takes time to develop immunity.

Question. Would you say from that, if you would have an epidemic in October or November, all the production of the manufacturers is going to be surplus and nobody is going to want it?

Answer. That's a possibility, although, again, let me say this: If it struck in Washington, with the knowledge that it would pass through here in about 6 weeks, there would still be large numbers of people who could get some protection. Let us say they took their vaccine the 1st or 2d week of the epidemic and were fortunate enough not to contract the disease or to be exposed before they had a little time to get protection. There would be some effect there, plus the fact that we may have a second wave.

In other words, if it came in October, we could have a second wave of this type of influenza in February, so there would be some reason to go ahead and be vaccinated.

Question. Does the vaccine lose potency quickly?

Answer. No, it is not like the polio vaccine, which is only good for about 6 months. This is good for 18 months.

Question. How much will one shot cost?

Answer. The cost of the vaccine itself has varied a little. We don't have much experience with that, of course. The Department of Defense paid from 30 to 40 cents a cubic centimeter on the vaccine they purchased, but remember, they purchased in bulk porportions. Maryland State Health Department has bought some and I believe they paid 35 cents per cubic centimeter of the vaccine.

Question. Can you tell us whether any officials of the Government have taken the vaccine, and if there has been any objection to taking it?

Answer. I can report, with all honesty, that I do not know who has any vaccine in the Cabinet or subcabinet positions, or whether anyone in those positions has taken it.

Question. Have you heard any objections to it?

Answer. No.

Question. Have you taken the vaccine?

Answer. I have not. I do plan to take it when it becomes available, but I certainly don't want to take it ahead of anyone else.

Question. It is my understanding that no one has immunity to this virus because it has never been around before. Yet, even where you have epidemics, 4 out of 5 people don't get it. Is there any reason for that?

Answer. Here again we go back to Singapore experience. There the attack rate was between 20 and 30 percent of the population, and when they took the people who had apparently been well, they found about half had developed antibodies, though they were not ill.

PROBLEM FOR COMMUNITY

Question. Would you say an individual should be alarmed about the outlook of the Asian flu?

Answer. No. As long as the virulence of strain does not change—the disease does not become more severe—I think the individual does not have too much of a problem. I think the tremendous impact upon our community life and economy, by having a 15 to 20 percent attack rate, is the important part. Any way we can lower the disruption by inoculations with vaccine is a very desirable thing to do. We certainly don't want to alarm the country, but I think we want to alert the people as to the probable situation and what should be done about it.

Question. Are the companies committed to deliver any particular portion of their output to the Armed Forces or the Government?

Answer. To the Armed Forces, yes, on the basis that the Department of Defense contracted with the manufacturers at the beginning for about 3 to 3.5 million cubic centimeters for military personnel. I think we all understand the necessity of that.

We have suggested to the companies that they distribute their vaccine to the States on the basis of the proportion of each State's population to the country as a whole, and I believe most, if not all of them, have agreed to this voluntary allocation.

In other words, New York has 12 percent of the population; they will get 12 percent of the vaccine that is produced.

Question. Will the first 3.5 million doses, though, go to the Armed Forces as a result of their contracts?

Answer. Not necessarily, because in the first 500,000 cubic centimeters produced, one of the companies had 380,000 cubic centimeters but they had a contract with the Department of Defense, so their total 380,000 went to the Department of Defense. The other company did not have a military contract, and so their supply has gone out through normal commercial channels.

ASIAN FLU AT A GLANCE

Known cases now in United States: 20,000 to 25,000.

Cases expected: 25 million to 34 million if epidemic hits, which is considered probable in autumn or winter.

Duration of epidemic: About 6 weeks in each community affected.

Severity: Relatively mild, compared with flu of 1918–19. Patient usually is down 4 or 5 days; may be out of work another 4 or 5 days.

Spread: Highly contagious, passes from person to person like a common cold. Can spread across the country in 4 or 5 weeks.

Vaccine: Believed 70 percent effective in preventing disease. Takes 10 to 14 days to produce immunity, which then lasts 12 to 18 months.

Supply of vaccine: Limited. Relatively few will be able to get shots before midwinter or later winter. Target: Enough vaccine for 60 million Americans by February 1.

IKE—ON TAKING FLU VACCINE

From President Eisenhower's new conference on August 21, 1957:

"Question. Mr. President, with supplies of vaccine for the Asian flu becoming available now, there is some interest as to if and when you are going to be inoculated. Can you tell us about it?

"The PRESIDENT. I am going to take it just as soon as ordinary people like I am can get it. Now, that is when I will take it."

Two days after the President spoke, physicians reported that Dr. Gabriel Houge, special assistant to the President, was ill with Asian flu.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I remember so vividly trying to help take care of the sick in the Army hospital at Washington when there was a shortage of everything for the care of the patients. One of the doctors at the hospital asked me when I went home from the hospital to stop and take care of some of the cases in the homes, because people were afraid to go and see them and give them medicine and food and attention. People lived in fear of the disease. It amounted almost to terror. It was a most horrible experience. While Dr. Burney states this epidemic will be less severe, nobody knows. Hospital beds, nurses, doctors, and all hospital personnel, and civilians must be at hand 24 hours of the day.

It is a great scourge, and I know the Members will join with me in trying to see that everything is done to beat it.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF INDEPENDENCE OF REPUBLIC OF URUGUAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on this day commemorating the 132d anniversary of the independence of the Republic of Uruguay I know my colleagues join me in extending congratulations and best wishes to the people and the Government of our sister Republic. Tonight Uruguay's Independence Day will be celebrated at a large reception, where personally our felicitations may be voiced to Ambassador Julio A. Lacarte. It is in accord with the strong sentiment for hemispheric solidarity among the people of the States that also we in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States should pause in our deliberations to note the significance of this anniversary and to give expression of our warm and lasting friendship.

On the southeast coast of South America is situated one of the most politically and socially advanced republics in the world. This is the Republic of Uruguay, called the garden plot between two vast estates by the great English historian, James Bryce. However, its progress and singular achievements were not easily or rapidly accomplished, for many of its years were filled with battles for independence and national survival. Yet this struggle for self-determination and freedom, which occurred 132 years ago, could not have resulted in a more successful political system. In fact, Uruguay today is considered one of the most advanced democracies in the whole Western Hemisphere.

La República Oriental del Uruguay, the official name of the Republic, was named after words of the Guaraní Indians, the indigenous peoples of the Uruguayan Republic. Historically, however, these indigenes played little part in the formation of the Uruguayan democracy, since the vast majority of its people are largely of European descent. And politically it passed alternately from Spanish and Portuguese hands.

The man who led the first struggles for independence was José Gervasio Artigas, a bold, resourceful leader, the son of a rancher. In 1811 he led a small patriot army in a move for independence, routed the Spaniards in several battles—achieving successive victories over the enemy. Finally at Buenos Aires he and his group met defeat which led to a bitter armistice between the Spanish and Portuguese allies and Artigas. Artigas, in fact, would not accept the armistice, preferring voluntary exile outside the country. Then there occurred one of the most dramatic events in Uruguayan history: 16,000 of Artigas' followers chose to accompany him into exile. Sixteen thousand people was almost one-fourth of the entire population of Uruguay.

Nor was Artigas' self-imposed exile the last of the struggle for independence, for in 1825 Juan Antonio Lavelleja, a former associates of Artigas, returned to Uruguay secretly and issued its declaration of independence. An army of 2,000 men was organized, and in February 1827 it severely defeated a Brazilian Army in the battle of Ituzaingó. In 1828 the treaty of peace was signed, stipulating Uruguay's independence from both Argentina and Brazil. In 1830 Uruguay proclaimed and adopted its first constitution, launching Uruguay into independent statehood. But 1825, the year of Artigas' return to his native land, is the anniversary celebrated by Uruguay, for it was then when the forces of liberty were first victorious over the forces of oppression.

Today, therefore, 132 years later, we warmly congratulate the Republic of Uruguay on its independence day.

OUR SACRIFICIAL SERVICEMEN IN FOREIGN LANDS

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOW. Mr. Speaker—

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

You recognize that, of course, as the preamble to the Constitution of the United States. But do not be alarmed, I am not going to discuss that document in all its aspects. I will only consider so much of the Constitution as furthers the intent to "provide for the common defense."

That burden is placed on the Congress, for section 8 of article I provides:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, * * *; to provide and maintain a navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Under these several powers the Congress has provided us with land and naval forces, and air forces as well, and has made rules for their government and regulation by enacting the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

As a corollary to the right of the Congress to make the rules for the government and regulation of our Armed Forces—there is the right of the members of those forces to be regulated and governed by the laws that Congress has enacted.

Now, section 2 of article 2 provides that the President shall be the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States. That merely means that he is the directing head of all our forces—the superior officer of the top brass, an admiral over admirals, a general over generals. He has no power given to him to make any laws respecting these forces. Although the President has power to make treaties, he is not given this power for the purpose of providing rules for the government and regulation of our Armed Forces. His duty is to see that the rules and regulations of Congress are carried out.

When a serviceman is denied this right and is surrendered to foreign jurisdiction, you also deny him the right to be tried by the rules of procedure contained in the Uniform Code of Military Justice provided by the Congress.

That is what has been done by the negotiation of the NATO Status of Forces Treaty and about 50 executive agreements with countries throughout the world, which attempt to provide for the status of our forces stationed in such countries.

The Uniform Code of Military Justice has had substituted for it as many different systems of law as there are countries with which we have agreements surrendering our servicemen to their jurisdiction for alleged criminal offenses.

We are justly proud of our Constitution. We are particularly proud of our Bill of Rights. There is an intense movement at present to protect the rights of all. We have the civil-rights measure pending in Congress. The Supreme Court has shown unusual concern for the rights of the individual; that is, all except the individual serviceman. He has been enlisted, inducted, or ordered into active service, and if sent to a foreign country he is deprived of many of the rights guaranteed by that Constitution he is sworn to defend.

Some of the defenders of the Status of Forces Agreement have said that a soldier doesn't have any rights under our Constitution anyway—that these are lost as soon as he enters military service. This is untrue. About the only rights it can be argued which are abbreviated for him are the right of indictment by a grand jury, and a jury trial. The power of Congress to make rules and regulations for government of the forces and the Uniform Code of Military Justice fully protects him in all other constitutional rights. In fact, trial by courts-martial closely follows trial by jury. A board of commissioned and enlisted men is substituted for the jury. An accused has challenges for cause, and a peremptory challenge against members of this panel. The proceedings are subject to several statutory reviews and a conviction can finally be appealed to the Military Court of Appeals, composed of three civilians, and in some cases, ultimately to the President.

A serviceman surrendered to foreign jurisdiction to all intents and purposes is no longer a citizen of the United States. He is entirely subject to foreign laws and penalties. No American intervention, not even by the President, can stop the process of foreign justice. After he is acquitted—or has been convicted and paid his penalty—our military authorities receive him back for the purpose of further punishment in the form of an undesirable discharge—only a shade less than dishonorable. It is important that we remember that conviction in a foreign court also carries with it this form of discharge, depriving the serviceman of the rights which he might otherwise have as a veteran.

I know that defenders of the status agreements will tell you that a serviceman will not lose any of his constitutional rights by trial in a foreign court.

They choose to ignore the reports of officers of the Judge Advocate's Department in the various services, which say that these are the rights which will almost certainly be lost in every case:

The right to a prompt and speedy trial.

The right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty.

The burden of proof on the Government to prove such guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

The right not to be compelled to testify against himself.

The right not to have involuntary confessions used against him.

They also ignore the opinion of the Court of Military Appeals in the United States v. Burney (21 C. M. R. 09) on the matter of foreign trials. The Court said:

> It was the intent of founders of our Constitution to insure basic guarantees of due process to each citizen. * * * The courts of foreign sovereigns, especially in civil law countries, are bound to follow traditions which are foreign to American standards of due process of law. Far better it is for an American accused to be tried by American court-martial, where he is entitled to representation, liberal rules of evidence, a presumption of innocence, and thorough review, than to be brought before a French, or Japanese, or German, or Moroccan, or even English civil court. In addition, because we are a nation of civilian soldiers, sailors, and airmen, many of the persons who now serve as court-martial members are the selfsame individuals who previously served on grand and petit juries, and their views of justice do not change with their garb.

The practice is growing in our executive departments of extolling the virtue of trial in a foreign court. The promise of a lesser penalty than might be received in a court-martial is held out as one advantage.

This adopts the presumption of guilt in every case and is a poor trade for the presumption of innocence upon which American prosecutions are based. All of our procedures are calculated to protect an innocent man. Foreign courts operate to convict the guilty—not to acquit the innocent.

The NATO Status of Forces Treaty and the Japanese agreement contain seven provisions which are said to be sufficient safeguards for an accused. These are deceptive because they apear similar to our Bill of Rights, but actually repeat only a few of its provisions. Furthermore, these safeguards are not often observed in a foreign trial.

In appraising forms of criminal procedure in foreign countries it is necessary that we know something about the actual application and observance of the phrases which read well in criminal codes. These provisions frequently suffer in actual practice.

Praise of Japanese justice reached a new high among our top executives when the final decision was made to surrender Girard. The American people were given all kinds of assurances by men who should have known better. Because the Japanese system of law is based on the same foundation as the laws of most of the NATO countries, and also because this is the eve of the opening of Girard's trial, I would like to review for you the Japanese Code of Criminal Procedure.

A study of Japanese criminal procedure was made by the Headquarters of the Air Force Far East Command and approved by the commander in chief of the United States Forces in the Far East. This study will support all the observations I am about to make.

In Japan, as in most European courts, the preliminary police investigation is most important.

Statements are accumulated from all witnesses and the accused, and made the subject of a report to the presiding judge, which he has before commencement of trial, and from which he frequently predetermines the guilt of the accused. In fact, a prosecutor is loath to go ahead with a criminal charge unless he can make it stick—which accounts partly for the large number of waivers of jurisdiction by foreign authorities. Another element in waivers is that they were probably ordinary trivial police complaints to start with—much as we have every morning in our police courts.

These preliminary statements are quite frequently used as evidence in the trial itself—instead of calling witnesses. Our Air Force study comments thus:

> The right of confrontation, although guaranteed by paragraph 9 (c) of article XVII of the administrative agreement and by article 37 of the Japanese Constitution, is not quite the same right of confrontation that exists in criminal trials in the United States.
>
> Thus pretrial statements of witnesses other than the accused may be admitted in evidence under certain circumstances, over the objection of the accused, despite the fact that such statements ordinarily would not be admissible in the State or Federal courts in the United States.

The principal advantage of an accused being confronted by witnesses against him lies in the right of cross-examination. All questions are asked by the judge in a Japanese court, after being requested by prosecution or defense—so, much of the benefit of cross-examination, as we know it, is lost, even with witnesses present.

The Air Force commentator says:

> It is discretionary with the judge whether he will issue compulsory process for a witness requested by the accused. The question whether he abused his discretion in this respect would, of course, be subject to appellate review.

Thus, even though a witness has been summoned at the request of the accused, it is still for the judge to determine whether he shall actually be examined in court, and if so, what questions shall be asked.

Japan's Supreme Court has ruled—in a case involving a United States serviceman—that it was not necessary to examine all the witnesses even if the accused requested them to be called.

There is no presumption of innocence of the accused. Neither is there any burden on the prosecution to prove the guilt of the accused by a preponderance of competent evidence. The Japanese Code of Criminal Procedure contains these provisions:

> ART. 318. The probative value of evidence shall be left to the free discretion of the judges.
>
> ART. 333. Where there is proof of guilt in regard to the case pending against the accused, a penalty must be pronounced by a judgment.
>
> ART. 336. If the case against the accused does not constitute an offense, or if the proof of guilt is lacking, the accused shall be pronounced not guilty by a judgment.

Quoting the law study again:

> There is no precise rule in Japan requiring the prosecution to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; further, other than as indicated in articles 333 and 336 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, there is no definition of the degree of proof required to convict.

Although Japanese law appears to protect an accused against self-incrimination, the actual practice nullified this right. He may be questioned throughout the trial by the judge, and the average accused is not aware what he may or may not refuse to answer. He is also fearful of receiving greater penalty if adjudged guilty, if he has antagonized the court by not answering. The Japanese make a distinction between his possible status as a witness or as an accused.

When two or more are tried jointly the law permits a severance of the cases long enough to compel each accused to appear as a witness against another accused and then rejoining the cases for final judgment. This was done in at least one case in Japan where the official observers said that the defendants had not received a fair trial and were unjustly convicted. Incidentally, the defects in this trial were not cured by appeal to higher jurisdiction, and at least one defendant served a sentence of four years imprisonment as a result. He was, also, discharged as undesirable afterward, as a direct result of the unfair trial.

Appeals can be precarious in Japan, and other foreign countries, where it is permissible for the prosecution to appeal an acquittal or join in an appeal of a conviction for the purpose of securing a greater penalty. This is common practice. The appeal amounts to a second trial, and in our viewpoint is double jeopardy.

News reports say that Girard's trial is scheduled to start on August 26, with four sessions scattered through September, and another in October. This obviously would not be a prompt and speedy trial, but does conform to the practice in Japan of having many brief sessions strung out over a period of time, with the court probably carrying on several trials during the period.

There will be an American observer present—but he is just that. He cannot restore any of Girard's rights under the United States Constitution.

I presume that Girard will also have competent interpreters furnished him, which was not always the case in the past. Interpreters, even the best, sometimes have trouble finding the right words in transposing phrases from one language to another. Of course, the United States will pay his attorney fees, and I hope that he will have a lawyer more dedicated to his defense than some which observers of other trials have commented on. The statement on this subject, made by the Air Force officer, is interesting. He said:

> Largely because of historical precedent and development, the tactics of Japanese attorneys in Japanese criminal cases are still to a large extent designed to bring the attention of the court to extenuating and mitigating circumstances with the view to reducing the punishment.

Now, I think it is quite likely that Girard will be treated exceptionally well in this case—much better and differently than many other Americans who have preceded him in Japanese courts, and who have already paid their fines or served their sentences.

Girard has been getting the headlines in recent months, but other Americans have already suffered just as much, and probably more, than he will. The reports of observers in cases which resulted in sentences of imprisonment to our servicemen have shown the failures of interpreters; copies of charges being furnished to the accused on the opening of the trial; proceedings drawn out in many sessions consuming weeks of time; a judge probably slumbering during the proceedings; the substitution of one judge for another during the trial; convictions on written statements of witnesses taken before trial without benefit of cross-examination; and conviction on evidence the observers said was not only preposterous and fantastic, but in some respects patently impossible. Probably most of the servicemen convicted under such conditions have served or are serving the sentences imposed. The glare of publicity gives the Japanese an extraordinary opportunity to use Girard's trial as a propaganda medium to wipe out or dull the memories of those other cases where observers had not reported conclusions so rosy as our top executives anticipate. There have been rumors of a deal having been made which will save the faces of both the Japanese and the supporters of the status of forces agreements.

Girard's is an isolated case. It has served, principally, to alert the American people to the fact that these status of forces agreements exist. And, also, that regardless of assurances given in the past that our soldiers are protected against foreign prosecution for occurrences while on duty, these status agreements actually afford a serviceman no protection against foreign justice at any time. If Girard had been guilty of half the actions of which our Defense and Justice Departments have publicly tried and convicted him, then he should have been subjected to United States court-martial immediately. It is a shameful thing to have a Japanese court trying Girard for claimed offenses against the United States, or violations of military discipline.

No wonder we can be kicked around in foreign countries.

In May 1956 the district court of Fukuoka, Japan, in a case involving an American officer, said:

> An armed force constitutes the fighting power of a country and is a symbol of its dignity. Consequently, it is a well established rule of international law that an armed force stationed in a foreign country in accordance with a treaty is not subject to civil or criminal jurisdiction of the receiving state.
>
> Neither are members of the Armed Forces subject to the jurisdiction thereof for acts performed in furtherance of official duty, that is, the acts done in the performance of official duty whether such acts were done within the area of their station (barracks) or outside such area.

Obviously there is no dignity left to our forces in Japan, and the kicking around that the Fukuoka court tried to give our American officer was possible because of the administrative agreement we made with Japan after being invited to keep our troops there for the protection of Japan.

During three sessions of Congress I have had pending in the House of Representatives a joint resolution which would direct the President to seek a modification of the NATO Status of Forces Treaty, and all similar executive agreements, so that criminal jurisdiction over our servicemen might be restored to the United States in all cases.

Some of my colleagues have filed identical resolutions, and resolutions have been filed in the Senate. On July 1, 1957, the House Foreign Affairs Committee reported out House Joint Resolution 16, but it is presently bottled up in the Rules Committee and will not be voted on this session.

It has been my idea that our diplomats, if they were as much concerned about the emotions of our people as they are about the emotions of foreign nationals, and had as much regard for American rights as they have for the sovereignty of other nations, should be willing to make an effort to right the wrong which they had done to our servicemen in negotiating these agreements.

However, it is not bureaucratic policy to admit an error. Consequently, they have spent the past 2 years in alerting other nations to the fact that they did not expect any sympathetic consideration from them, that the agreements are the best they can get and no nation should give more.

There has also been developed the scare argument—that if we were to insist on trying our own servicemen we would be thrown out of these countries. Their statements become somewhat contradictory because in one breath they take credit for the friendship that has been developed in many of these countries by our contributing to their economic and military welfare, and in the next breath claim that all this good feeling hangs on the slender thread of the right of other nations to prosecute our servicemen in their courts.

Anyone who advocates the recovery of criminal jurisdiction over our servicemen is now supposed to be hand in glove with the Kremlin and furthering their aims in the world. I am reminded that Stalin once said it would not be necessary to take the United States by force of arms because we would become natural prey for Communist doctrine after we had depleted our resources and spent ourselves into a great depression. Contributing over $130 billion in foreign aid the past 10 years and borrowing the money to do it should make the Soviets chortle with glee. But the internationalists will not get the point, I am sure.

We should find out now who our friends are.

If a nation is so unfriendly as to refuse us the right to try our own men, then they are too unfriendly to have the right to try our personnel in their courts. Also, it may be doubtful where they will stand in case of need. If a decade of lavish subsidization of our so-called allies has not made them self-sufficient and capable of defending themselves, the American forces now sharing in their defense will probably not be sufficient either. They will become another sacrifice on the altar already burdened with sacrifice in the name of diplomacy.

It ill becomes any member of this administration to support a continuance of our giveaway program of servicemen's rights, for in the platform of the Republican Party, adopted at the San Francisco convention, we find this pledge:

> We maintain that no treaty or international agreement can deprive any of our citizens of constitutional rights. We shall see to it that no treaty or agreement with other countries attempts to deprive our citizens of the rights guaranteed them by the Federal Constitution.

Our servicemen, stationed in foreign countries, are entitled to the full protection of our constitution, the same as any citizen in this country.

INCREASED PENSIONS FOR SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR WIDOWS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, it is my very deep concern that the other body—I hope some time it may be spoken of as the Senate, which it is—has not passed a bill providing a small increase in pensions for the Spanish-American War widows. There are few of them left and they will not be with us very much longer. Their cases are pathetic. I hope the Members will join with me in urging the other body to pass this legislation. The House passed it last year and again this year.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. Bailey (at the request of Mr. Byrd), until Thursday, on account of death in immediate family.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Spending Trend in Federal Government Must Be Controlled and Tax Relief Accomplished on a Fair Basis

OF
HON. HUGH SCOTT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced H. R. 9415, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 so as to provide for scheduled personal and corporate income tax reductions and for other purposes. After long consideration of various tax-relief proposals, I have come to the conclusion that H. R. 6452, a bill introduced by Mr. SADLAK of Connecticut, comes closest to a fair and equitable method of providing realistic and greatly needed tax relief, with particular reference to those persons on whom the tax impact has fallen with exceptional heaviness.

Since the House Ways and Means Committee has provided for hearings during the first week in January on certain tax revision proposals, I am requesting that my bill be heard at the time of the Sadlak proposal. It is my hope that those who are interested in bringing about some relief from the hardships of Federal taxation will support these proposals and that the Ways and Means Committee will include these provisions in an overall tax relief bill next year. Of course, to have tax relief we have got to balance the budget and reduce Federal expenditures. A substantial start has been made in this regard, but much more will have to be done in the second session of the 85th Congress, if we are to have a fair tax relief bill.

The time has come to enact a realistic program of forward scheduling of tax reductions for all income taxpayers, individual and corporate. I am convinced that achievement of a moderate schedule of income tax rates is necessary to the continued vitality and growth of our Nation's economy, and to the maximum advances in the standard of living of all our citizens.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I direct the attention of my colleagues to the bill I have introduced today, H. R. 9415, which schedules annual reductions of individual income-tax rates in each bracket, and of the corporate income tax over a period of 5 years, beginning January 1, 1958. These reductions can be granted to our citizens out of the increased revenues resulting from normal economic growth without increasing any other taxes. However, this can only be done if Government spending is brought under control. I believe that my bill would serve to restrain ever-increasing Government spending so that Americans can look forward to regularly scheduled tax reductions. H. R. 9415 further provides adequate safeguards, in the form of postponement procedures, to assure that none of the scheduled tax reductions will result in a return to deficit financing. In fact, if the economy continues to grow over the period when the reductions are scheduled as it has in recent years, there should also be sufficient growth in total revenue to provide for regular retirement of a portion of the national debt.

The legislation provides for coordinated reductions in all the progressive rates of individual tax, with the first bracket rate being reduced from 20 to 15 percent. The top rates of tax would be brought down to 42 percent, the individual tax from its present top of 91 percent, and the corporate tax from its present top of 52 percent. Specific examples of individual tax rate reductions, over the 5 years, follow: $4,000–$6,000 bracket, from 26 to 17 percent; $8,000–$10,000 bracket, from 34 to 19 percent; $12,000–$14,000 bracket, from 43 to 21 percent; $16,000–$18,000 bracket, from 50 to 23 percent; and $20,000–$22,000 bracket, from 56 to 25 percent. Appendix A shows the new individual rates for each year as proposed under my bill. Appendix B provides a means by which individual taxpayers can compute their tax liability at the end of the rate reduction period, as compared to their current tax liability. Appendix C illustrates for corporate taxpayers how the present normal tax would be reduced from 30 percent to 22 percent, and the surtax from 22 to 20 percent.

This legislation is primarily designed to moderate the tax impact on individuals and on small and growing business, and to eliminate the tax barrier to starting new businesses. The problem is entirely a matter of rates. Both as regards unincorporated businesses, which approximate 84 percent of the over 4 million business units in the country and the owners of incorporated small business, the major tax impediment is the system of steeply graduated rates of individual tax—the rates which begin with 22 percent on taxable income between $2,000 and $4,000, increase rapidly to a rate of 50 percent on taxable income between $16,000 and $18,000 and go on up to a top rate of 91 percent. The incorporated firms have the additional problem of the corporate tax, especially the combined top rate of 52 percent which applies to income over $25,000. None of the special devices previously suggested for aiding small business effectively deal with the real source of the problem. Any and all of them would set up new inequities and discriminations within the tax laws. Many of them would add greatly to the complexity of the laws. By contrast, a moderate scale of individual and corporate rates would solve the problem with fairness and equity for all. Especially, the 1 percentage-point difference between each rate bracket from 15 percent at the bottom to 34 percent at the $80,000–$90,000 bracket, and 2 percentage points thereafter would insure a minimum tax impediment to the beginning of small business and growth of all business.

Estimated individual tax savings under my bill, based on 1956 income levels, would be $10.6 billion, as shown in Appendix D. Nearly 60 percent of the total savings would fall in the taxable income brackets up to $6,000. 79 percent of the savings would come in the taxable brackets up through $16,000 to $18,000, where the 50-percent rate applies. Only 6.3 percent of the savings would accrue to the brackets above $50,000. Thus, the benefits of this legislation are heavily centered in the first bracket and the lower progressive brackets of the individual income tax.

The relatively small savings total in the brackets above $50,000 makes clear that revenue considerations are no barrier to the scheduled reductions in the higher rates. I have proceeded on the dual premise that, first, under a reformed rate structure there is no reason why an unincorporated business or other individual taxpayer should pay a higher top rate of tax than a corporate taxpayer and, second, the lower the top rate of individual tax the greater will be the protection for all middle bracket taxpayers. Proof of the latter point is found in other proposals for reducing the progressive rates which always link higher rates at the top with higher rates in the middle brackets. I cannot too strongly stress the point that concern for small-business and other middle-bracket taxpayers cannot be fully translated into a reasonable rate structure without a consistent contraction of the rates all up and down the line.

As to corporations, it is estimated that the total corporate-tax savings, based on 1956 income levels, would be about $4.2 billion.

Assuming continuance of prosperity and economic growth, it is reasonable to expect that the scheduled reductions would be fully realized without net revenue loss to the Federal Government, probably with some net gain. For example, under existing tax rates, budget revenues of the Federal Government have grown from $59.4 billion in fiscal year 1955 to an estimated $70.6 billion in fiscal year 1957, or a net gain of more than $11 billion. Some of this gain reflects the impact of inflation on revenues, but the major part of it has resulted from economic growth itself.

Based on 1956 income levels, it would take annual revenue growth of only about $3 billion a year to accomplish the scheduled rate reductions without net revenue loss to the Treasury. If the economy grows in step with the recent historic average, the revenue growth should average up to $4 billion a year without inflation. Moreover, less than one-half of the annual revenue effect of the individual tax cuts and none of the revenue effect of the corporate tax cut would be reflected in fiscal year 1958.

Mr. Speaker, my decision to introduce this bill at this time comes from study of two conflicting trends. On the one hand, there are strong pressures within and without the Government for spending the revenue increase resulting from economic growth instead of applying it to tax reduction. On the other hand, there is among our citizens and businesses a dangerous and growing dissatisfaction with the income tax rate structure as it now stands, most evident as regards the tax impact on new and small business, self-employed professional people, and the whole range of middle income families.

COUNTERING THE SPENDING TREND

By the nature of basic policy legislation, and of spending authorizations, commitments for Federal spending on many programs extend a number of years ahead. Thus, the introduction of new spending programs, and the enactment of new spending authorizations for old programs, have the effect of usurping tax reduction opportunities which otherwise would occur out of revenue growth over a period of years.

The primary purpose of forward scheduling of income-tax reduction is to set up competition for tax reduction in a potential amount which has significance for all income-tax payers, as against using revenue growth to expand old and undertake new Government spending programs.

Existing procedures result in a one-sided budget operation. Each year, there is thorough inquiry into Government expenditures, first by the Budget Bureau, then by the House Appropriations Committee, and finally by the Senate Appropriations Committee. There has been no such annual inquiry as regards the tax or revenue side of the budget.

In fact, there has been no general inquiry specifically directed to the excessiveness of income-tax rates by either the Ways and Means Committee or the Senate Finance Committee, since 1948, 9 years ago. Because of circumstances, beyond their control, these tax-writing committees have not been able to provide a continuing forum in which taxpayers, individually or through their representatives and voluntary organizations, could reflect their views or choices as to the advantages to be derived from a moderate and reasonable scale of rates, as compared to increased Federal spending on any and all programs.

During periods of war and readjustment, it was understandable that the committee should be looked upon essentially as the initiating body for tax collection. However, in my view it is now time for the committee to become the motivating force for tax saving.

Accordingly, the effect of my bill is to call upon the Ways and Means Committee to adopt a related role in budget making, that of a jealous guardian of taxpayer rights and interests. It is my conviction that this role can be best performed by the forward scheduling of tax reductions. Only in this way can there be equal competition as against the forward commitments for Federal spending.

Should essential needs arise for programs of increased spending, then tax reduction over 5 years of the amount scheduled could result in a return to deficit financing, except for the effective safeguards in the legislation.

POSTPONEMENT PROCEDURES

These legislative safeguards are in the form of postponement procedures whereby the scheduled rate reductions could be spread out to a maximum of 9 years without change in the basic law. The legislation places the initiative for postponement in the hands of the President, but a balance has been struck in the burden and exercise of postponement authority for final decision as between the Congress and the executive branch.

While the postponement procedures may be applied separately as between corporate and individual reductions every postponement of an individual tax rate cut must be accompanied by a postponement of a corporate tax cut. The only limitation on this "linkage" is where the result would be to postpone a corporation reduction for more than 1 year.

The bill further provides that each scheduled reduction in either the individual or corporate tax may be postponed for only 1 year with the schedule of subsequent reductions also being moved ahead 1 year. Thus, it is possible to phase these reductions over a maximum period of 9 years without new enabling legislation, should budget conditions require full resort to the postponement procedures.

Specifically, the President is empowered to make, by November 15, a postponement from January 1 to July 1 of an individual tax cut which, if permitted to go into effect as scheduled, would cause an imbalance in the Federal budget for the current fiscal year. This postponement would be accomplished by a postponement of the scheduled corporate tax cut from January 1 to July 1. However, if the President has not, by November 15, postponed a corporate tax cut because he did not postpone a cut in the individual tax, he would be empowered to review the scheduled corporate tax cut in relation to the prospective budget situation for the following fiscal year. If such review indicates that the scheduled reduction would cause an unbalanced budget in such following fiscal year, then he would postpone the scheduled corporate reduction from January 1 to July 1.

The legislation also provides that the President would in his annual budget message recommend to the Congress whether any postponed rate reduction should become effective on July 1, or whether such reduction should be further postponed to January 1 next. This procedure is designed to provide the Ways and Means Committee, the Senate Finance Committee, and the Congress as a whole, the opportunity to review the revenue needs in light of the budget situation, whenever the President recommends postponement of a scheduled January 1 reduction.

Acting on the basis of such review, the Congress may, by means of a joint resolution which has become law before May 15, make finally effective, as of July 1, any scheduled reduction in individual and corporate tax cuts which had by Presidential action first been postponed from January 1 to July 1, or further postpone such cuts until January 1. This action may include a further postponement of a corporate tax cut to January 1, while making an individual tax cut finally effective as of July 1. In the event the Congress has not so acted under these alternatives then the President may again act. By May 15 he may further postpone a corporate reduction or corporate and individual reductions until January 1, but this authority is limited to previously deferred reductions and may be invoked only if the July 1 scheduled cuts would cause budget imbalance in the coming fiscal year.

In the event of postponement until January 1, either by joint resolution or in its absence by action of the President, the schedule of subsequent reductions is moved ahead 1 year, but with the limitation that each reduction may be put off only 1 year by use of the postponement procedures. This means that the first scheduled reductions could not be put off more than 1 year and that subsequent reductions must come within 2 years of each other.

The Presidential postponement authority may be questioned as a delegation of the tax-levying responsibility to the executive branch of the Government. Such, however, would not be the result, as the President would have no authority to increase taxes, or to change any scheduled reduction after the effective dates set forth.

In fact, the present procedure—or lack of it—actually makes available to the executive branch increased taxation—the revenue growth—without having to recommend increased levies. Under the procedures in my bill, in the event of a postponement of a scheduled tax cut, the Executive would only be reimposing for a 6-month period that which, in the absence of the legislation, would exist for an indefinite period. Thereafter, the Congress would have adequate opportunity to decide whether the reduction should be postponed a further 6 months. If the Congress did not act, the presumption would be that it intended at that time to let the President make the next decision, based on the statutory factors.

THE CASE FOR INCOME-TAX RATE REFORM

The growing dissatisfaction with the income-tax rate structure goes much deeper than normal taxpayer irritation with a heavy tax load. It reflects a growing recognition that there is something fundamentally wrong with a tax structure which penalizes hard work, risk-taking, and achievement.

The basic source of the complaint is the steeply graduated rates, which start after only $2,000 of taxable income, reach 30 percent at the $6,000 to $8,000 bracket, 50 percent at the $16,000 to $18,000 bracket, and go on up to a top rate of 91 percent.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to emphasize to my colleagues in the House that the present rates increase with particular severity over the range of income received by such important elements of our society as small-business men, professional people, and farmers, salesmen, technicians, supervisors, and skilled craftsmen. If such individuals by their own enterprise and hard work advance their income, they find that the Government lets them keep only a rapidly declining proportion of it.

There can be no doubt that both the present high combined corporate-tax rate and the steeply progressive individual rates are serving to prevent an adequate flow of investment funds, and especially venture capital, into new and expanding business. In fact, it may be stated flatly that this Nation has a severe shortage of new capital, and especially venture capital, because the tax laws are designed to produce such a shortage. The extremely severe rates in the middle and higher income brackets are an especially limiting factor on the accumulation of new capital for investment in new and growing enterprises.

When this situation is considered in relation to the needs of a rapidly growing population, and millions of new workers coming into the labor force, it becomes clear that the time has come to bring an orderly plan for reducing the rates which discourage individual effort, prohibit adequate savings, and threaten the industrial vitality and supremacy of our Nation. Even under a fair and moderate rate structure, our economy may be hard pressed to generate all the savings needed to meet all opportunities to advance production and living standards without inflation.

To narrow the range of rate graduation, it is necessary that relatively more relief, percentagewise, be given to the graduated part of the rates than to the basic rate. The rates above the basic rate of 20 percent are the graduated part. These range from 2 percent in the $2,000 to $4,000 taxable income bracket, to 71 percent at the top, all on top of the basic rate of 20 percent. Note, however, this graduated part is of least importance from a revenue-producing standpoint. The graduated part of the rate structure actually provides only about 17 percent of the revenue derived from the individual tax, or about $5.5 billion out of about $33 billion. The remainder, or 83 percent, comes from the basic rate of 20 percent paid on all taxable income. Thus, the higher percentage reductions in the rate ranges above 20 percent will have considerably less revenue effect than the smaller percentage reduction applying to the first bracket rate.

My bill provides a focal point for the expression of taxpayer interest in using revenue growth to reduce excessive income tax rates instead of to support increased Government spending. I feel certain that many taxpayers, both individually and through various groups to which they belong, will express their views on this legislation to their representatives in Government.

As a final point, I urge taxpayers to relate the advantages to themselves and to their businesses of achieving the moderate scale of tax rates at the end of 5 years, as set out in appendixes B and C, as against postponing or perhaps even foregoing ultimate achievement of such rates to accommodate higher Federal spending on any and all programs. We cannot have both the tax reductions and the spending. It is up to the taxpayers to make a choice and, Mr. Speaker, I believe that as elected Representatives of the people we already know with certainty what that choice will be—tax reduction.

H. Earl Cook, Chairman, FDIC, To Retire September 6

OF

HON. JACKSON E. BETTS

OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. BETTS. Mr. Speaker, H. Earl Cook, Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, has announced that he is retiring at the end of his present term on September 6 of this year.

Mr. Cook brought to this position a lifetime of experience. Originally a banker in Bucyrus, Ohio, he was at one time president of the Ohio Bankers Association. He later served as superintendent of the Department of Banks of Ohio under governors of both political parties.

On April 10, 1947, he was appointed by President Truman to be a Director of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and on May 9, 1953, President Eisenhower designated him as Chairman of the Board.

This bipartisan demand for his services was, of course, a recognition of merit and ability. As Mr. Cook leaves his present position, I wish to pay tribute to the outstanding service he has contributed to his State and Nation. The Eighth Congressional District of Ohio, which I have the honor to represent, is justly proud of Earl Cook as one of its native sons who rose to national prominence as a distinguished public servant. I know I speak for all of his many friends who wish him well.

Remarks of Congressman Wolverton, Broadcast From Geneva, Switzerland, on May 17, 1957, on United Nations Radio on the Subject of the World Health Organization and International Understanding

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, as I have previously expressed, it was a great privilege for me to attend the sessions of the 10th World Health Assembly, held during the month of May 1957 at Geneva, Switzerland.

During my attendance at the sessions of the Assembly I was struck with the sincerity that pervaded the entire Assembly. The representatives from the several countries talked and acted like men dedicated to a high calling. Their evident sincerity was contagious. I felt that as I listened to the expression of views and the definite objectives sought to be attained, that health and the work done to bring its blessings to mankind throughout the world could well be a connecting link to bind the nations of the world together in a common endeavor for peace.

Because of these views, I considered it an honor to be invited to broadcast an address over the United Nations Radio, at Geneva, Switzerland, on May 17, 1957, on the subject of the World Health Organization and international understanding. It was as follows:

REMARKS BY REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES A. WOLVERTON, MEMBER, UNITED STATES DELEGATION TO 10TH WORLD HEALTH ASSEMBLY, ON UNITED NATIONS RADIO, MAY 17, 1957, GENEVA, SWITZERLAND

This World Health Assembly has impressed me forcefully. My foremost impression is of the atmosphere which exists of warm good will and friendship among the delegates. It is clear that health is a common denominator which brings all people together. Eighty member countries of the World Health Organization have sent delegations consisting of physicians, administrators, public health experts, and others to this assembly. Despite their highly varied national and political backgrounds, these delegates speak the same language on health matters. They all share a determination to work through WHO to help all countries improve the health of their people.

They know that health is truly international, that disease knows no frontiers, that for half of mankind poor health is still the normal condition of life, that so long as major diseases exist anywhere they are a threat to people everywhere.

I have stressed this aspect of WHO, that it provides a means through which the Governments and people of nearly all countries work together on a constructive and friendly basis with the common aim of better health. The splendid work of WHO is not nearly as well known as it should be, and in particular, this aspect of it—that here in this organization there is a very large measure of international understanding. Over the years I am convinced that this characteristic of WHO will contribute to the building in other fields also of the more peaceful and better relations between countries which are essential for our survival.

The health programs of the World Health Organization also deserve to be much better known. I do not believe that any international organization is accomplishing more for the welfare of mankind in relation to the funds which it expends. Characteristic of the farsighted leadership which WHO exercises on health programs throughout the world is the present drive to eradicate malaria from the world. Two hundred million people a year still suffer from malaria—more than the total population of the United States. Working through WHO, and with stimulation and technical guidance from WHO, many countries are now working together to wipe out malaria. Since mosquitoes and airplanes cross frontiers, this must be done on an international basis. WHO is able to provide the necessary coordination of plans. I am very happy that the International Cooperation Administration of the United States is cooperating fully with WHO in this drive to remove malaria for good.

The fight against malaria and other infectious diseases is, of course, only one phase of the wide-ranging WHO activities for better health. By sending health experts to aid countries to build health programs, and by providing fellowships, WHO is helping to lower the number of deaths among infants and small children, which have been appallingly high in many parts of the world. The Organization is helping to improve the health of mothers, of the working population and of older people. The activities of the World Health Organization are almost universal in geographical scope and respond to a universal human need. In the Constitution of WHO the nations have declared that all peoples have the right to the highest possible level of health. WHO is helping them to achieve this rightful condition and in so doing it is bringing mankind closer together.

FTC Action Against Chainstores

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, on August 22, 1957, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD carried my remarks of August 15, 1957, with reference to the Federal Trade Commission proceeding against the Giant Stores. In those comments I erroneously referred to the fact that the complaint against that company had been dismissed by the FTC. I should have said that the hearing examiner had recommended that the complaint be dismissed, and that the matter is awaiting final decision by the Commission.

I certainly hope that the Commission will overrule the examiner and refuse to dismiss the proceeding.

In my opinion, it is being hypertechnical to pretend that because a retail merchant, big or small, engages in a minuscule operation of meat preparation, it can thereby avoid regulation by the FTC. Such a decision flies in the face of all logic and reason as well as the clear Congressional intent as expressed in the law.

In this case, the hearing examiner recommends that the proceeding be dismissed on the ground that only the Department of Agriculture has jurisdiction over this retail outlet. With an operation running into millions and millions of dollars through some 36 supermarkets, and with the finding that the percentage of meat preparation is minuscule, the examiner nevertheless says that because of that meat preparation operation, the Federal Trade Commission has no jurisdiction and the company has subjected itself only to regulation under the Packers Act. If that is the law, then General Motors, or any other big company, need only put in a thousand-dollar operation for the preparation of meat and the Federal Trade Commission will lose jurisdiction over it.

I cannot believe that the law is entitled to any such ridiculous interpretation, but, if it is, we had better change the law and do it quickly.

If the law is subject to any such absurd interpretation, the FTC should be the first to recommend to the Congress that the law be corrected.

Judy Letson of Bessemer, Ala., Named "Miss National Junior Achiever"

OF

HON. GEORGE HUDDLESTON, JR.

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, practicing the motto, Learning by Doing, high-school youngsters today are receiving practical business training through the nationwide junior achievement program. This worthwhile organization has as its objective to engender the characteristic American freedom, incentive and opportunity which private enterprise and private ownership offers.

It is with a great deal of pride and pleasure that I take this occasion to salute the outstanding young lady who has just been chosen Miss National Junior Achiever. She is Miss Judy Letson, a vivacious and energetic young citizen of my district. I am very happy to join with her townspeople in Bessemer and throughout Jefferson County, Ala., in paying tribute to Miss Letson on receiving this national honor.

She was winner of the county contest and in March she was chosen as Miss SOJAC at the southern junior achievers conference in New Orleans, La. Miss Letson is a member of the E-Pip-Su Co., a junior achievement project sponsored by the United States Pipe & Foundry Co. at Bessemer, Ala. Junior achievement work has already paid off for her, as it will some day for all its deserving participants.

Miss Letson has eagerly learned the fundamentals of business although she does not plan to be a businesswoman. She hopes to become an actress and with her brunette beauty she is bound to go far toward achieving her goal Last December she was Queen Merry Christmas at the annual Bessemer Christmas carnival and she will be head majorette this fall at Bessemer High School, where she is in her senior year. She is the daughter of Dr. and Mrs. J. W. Leston of Bessemer. Her father is superintendent of Bessemer schools. Her parents, I am sure, must be extremely proud of her, as all of us are.

Industrial Development in Illinois

OF

HON. LESLIE C. ARENDS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, at the governors' conference recently President Eisenhower emphasized the great need for the individual State governments to assume major social and economic responsibilities rather than making constant demands upon the Federal Government. An important part of this administration's program is to return to the States and local communities duties and responsibilities rightfully theirs under our system of Government.

In this connection I take pride in calling your attention to the program for industrial development being carried on in my home State of Illinois. Local groups, such as chambers of commerce, industrial councils, and various civic organizations, have assumed the initiative for local improvements and progress as a coordinated effort, free from Federal aid or assistance.

Through a national advertising program, made possible by a pooling of their financial resources and help of the Illinois State Division of Industrial Planning and Development, the industrial leaders learn of possible site locations for plants and new business opportunities. James H. Stupka, of Kankakee, Ill., a personal friend of mine of long standing and a prominent leader in Illinois, heads up this program. He is the man who developed this idea of a coordinate advertising program for those communities who want to help themselves. He has put into effect a program of teamwork between the State and local governments.

I believe that Mr. Stupka and his board of outstanding civic leaders deserve a great deal of credit and real commendation for what they have undertaken, entirely without pay, and for what they have accomplished. I also believe those communities who have been participating in this program, and not looking to the State or to the Federal Government to do the job for them, deserve commendation. They are Murphysboro, Pinckneyville, DuQuoin, Benton, West Frankfort, Zeigler, Mount Vernon, Kankakee, Savanna, Galesburg, Hillsboro, Monmouth, Gibson City, Belleville, Canton, Beardstown, Rantoul, Carterville, and Chicago. These are communities worth visiting. You will see for yourself the spirit of self-reliance and all that is being accomplished in this coordinate effort for self-improvement.

Closing Days of the Session

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, a good many years ago the Government built a dam on the Little Kanawha River in West Virginia, which was equipped with locks for river navigation. The navigation came to an end and the dam deteriorated. The Government decided to abandon it, but the people of that area found that it raised their water level and sought to have it fixed up for water and recreation. The Army engineers thought the dam could be cleaned out for $50,000 and the committee having the bill in charge favored the plan of the local people to make use of a dam that was already there, and recommended an appropriation of $112,000. The bill was debated here yesterday afternoon and the only opposition to it was that the time had arrived for the Government to economize. A heated debate continued until finally a motion was made to recommit it. The economy-minded Members made this motion, but the majority said "No." Looking around, I found these present economizers on $112,000 for local people to be the same Members who voted over $3 billion for foreign aid. This looked a trifle inconsistent to me, as it did to the others who saved the project.

You can see what Congress is busying itself with these days, waiting for a chance to take a final vote on the civil-rights bill. I do not know how long this seesaw battle on civil rights is going to keep on, but one thing certain is that I am not going to sit around here till Christmas, waiting for HOWARD SMITH of Virginia, to call a meeting of the Rules Committee. The sentiment of the people is unsettled on the side of the workers for the bill, but there is not an unsettled condition among those who oppose it. Some of the proponents say that any bill would be better than no bill, while many of the Negro organizations want a bill with teeth in it, or no bill at all.

We are merely dangling on a string attached to the civil-rights bill. For example, today, Wednesday, there will be no voting—nothing in sight for tomorrow or Friday, and probably nothing before Monday. After Monday, it looks like another week of waiting, the same as this week. One of these days I am going to adjourn Congress as far as I am concerned, and beat it for home. I should have done that 2 weeks ago—but did not realize it was possible to waste the time of Congress for weeks, on political jockeying for the elections in 1958. Many bills are stuck in the Rules Committee, and they are important, but the committee refuses to act, or even meet, for fear that the civil-rights bill might be voted out on the floor. The Congress is supposed to be a deliberating body, but just now it appears to be a deliberate body, refusing to move either way on the civil-rights bill.

A Resolution To Amend the Constitution With Respect to the Power of Treaties

OF

HON. NOAH M. MASON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a joint resolution to amend the Constitution with respect to the power of treaties. This resolution is House Joint Resolution 375, and it reads as follows:

ARTICLE —

SECTION 1. Clause 2 of article VI of the Constitution is amended to read as follows:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding; except that no treaty shall have greater effect within the United States than if it were a law of the United States, and any international agreement, other than a treaty, shall have effect within the United States only to the extent provided by a law of the United States."

I want the RECORD to show the reason for proposing this text, and to contain a brief explanation of its terms.

The adoption of this amendment is vitally necessary to the preservation of the constitutional rights of every American citizen. It has long been evident that some amendment to curb the power of treaties is needed.

At the same time it is necessary to act responsibly. The baby ought not to be thrown out with the bath water. It is not the statesmanlike thing to insist that because international agreements can be abused they ought to be narrowly restricted or be abolished altogether.

I have sought rather to propose an amendment to the Constitution which will redefine and limit the power of treaties, as opposed to the treatymaking power. House Joint Resolution 375 cuts down and limits the power of treaties only to the extent that if an appropriately negotiated treaty or executive agreement is ever found to conflict with a constitutional right of an American, the treaty must give way.

The treatymaking power is, on the other hand, not affected. All the capability for good inherent in these forms of international compact has been retained. Neither the representatives of the President in negotiating an agreement nor the Senate in ratifying need fear that the scope of matters subject to adjustment by such means has been limited. On the contrary, they can be assured that no unintended application of their efforts can operate to deprive an American of his rights.

In addition, this amendment to the Constitution will, for the first time, give formal recognition in that document to the executive agreement.

The sixth article of the Constitution sets up three classes of legal mandates which shall be the "supreme law of the land": the Constitution itself, laws made "in pursuance of" the Constitution, and treaties made "under the authority of" the United States.

It will be seen that if a conflict should arise between the Constitution and a law, the mandate of the Constitution must prevail, for only laws made "in pursuance of" the Constitution are the supreme law of the land. The Supreme Court has so held from the beginning of the last century.

But this is not so in the case of treaties. A treaty need only be made by the President and Senate to be the supreme law of the land. Which is to prevail when it is repugnant to the Constitution? Three times in this century—in the Holland, Pink, and Girard cases—the Supreme Court has ruled, in effect, that the treaty is supreme over the Constitution.

My amendment will check this damaging interpretation. Since it is already established that a law is subordinate to the Constitution, a treaty cannot be superior to the Constitution if it has no greater effect than if it were a law.

The effect of this statement is limited to "within the United States" because there are matters outside that limit with which a law would not be able to deal, while a treaty can. To tie the effect of a treaty to that of a law outside the United States might seriously impair the function of one of our instruments of foreign policy, and such a result would be far from my purpose of improving the protection given this country and its citizens.

It would be impossible to achieve the result of subordinating treaties to the Constitution by adding a clause requiring them to be made "in pursuance of" the Constitution, because, as appears from Justice Holmes' opinion in the Holland case, a treaty made by the President and the Senate is now made "in pursuance of" the Constitution.

It might make matters worse to attempt to overcome this difficulty by deleting the existing phrase "under the authority of the United States" and adding a pursuance clause. The courts might still decide no change had been made except to cast doubt on the continuing validity of treaties made before the Constitution was adopted.

The second part of my amendment to article VI of the Constitution is intended to limit the effect of executive agreements. These agreements, which are made by the President or one of his subordinates with a foreign power, are not mentioned in the Constitution. However the Supreme Court has decided that they, too, are "the supreme law of the land," and can be mandates superior to the Constitution itself.

Whether or not an executive agreement is secretly made, and whether or not its provisions are good, I am convinced that one-man law has no place in America. If the provisions of an executive agreement should be effective legal mandates within the United States, they should be made so because they are embodied in a treaty or in a law.

To make that necessarily so is the purpose of the second clause of my amendment.

Let me also point out that this clause will not curb the effect of executive agreements abroad. The power of the President to carry on the legitimate foreign affairs of this country will, as it should, remain unabridged.

It is not necessary to have an additional clause requiring the provisions of an executive agreement to conform to the Constitution, because they will have effect in the United States only insofar as enacted into law—and a law must be made in pursuance of the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, this amendment speaks in simple words to answer a great need. It will not hobble Executive power in the exercise of its legitimate responsibilities in the conduct of our Nation's foreign affairs, but it will assure to our citizens those cherished safeguards of the Constitution which are now in jeopardy. I earnestly solicit support for House Joint Resolution 375.

Governor Muñoz-Marín, of Puerto Rico

OF

HON. DONALD L. JACKSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, during last week several members of the House took occasion to mention the name of Governor Muñoz-Marín, of Puerto Rico. In several of the comments it was suggested that Governor Muñoz might be playing fast and loose with Communist agents and revolutionary provocateurs in his official capacity. These comments appear to me to be most unfortunate and not at all in keeping with the actual record of achievement in Puerto Rico which must be credited, in large part, to Governor Muñoz.

Perhaps no Latin leader in the Western Hemisphere has demonstrated a greater understanding of the value of free enterprise and personal initiative than has the Governor of Puerto Rico.

In an effort to raise the standard of living of the island's people, he has embarked upon a program marked with vision and determination. Incentives have been offered to investors, taxes have been waived or greatly reduced for foreign capital, and because of these things, new industries and businesses have sought out Puerto Rico as the site for new manufacturing and processing facilities.

Communism wants no part of the American system of free initiative, and no Communist could ever approve what Governor Muñoz is doing. Puerto Rico is literally the "show case for freedom of action" in the Caribbean area, and upon its progress the eyes of all Latin America are centered. What happens in Puerto Rico is not only of importance to its own residents, but to millions of United States citizens here on the mainland. Our own stake in the success of Governor Muñoz' program is no small one. If it succeeds it will demonstrate to reluctant Latin Republics that foreign investment is a good thing for all concerned. If it fails, it will only reinforce the nationalist premises that capital investment is a bad thing—per se.

Governor Muñoz is a political liberal—I am a political conservative. But he and I have a joint stake and a common birthright in human freedom. The gentleman from California is engaged in a day-to-day and face-to-face struggle with the forces of communism as a member of the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The Governor of Puerto Rico is also waging the same fight on a different front, and with different techniques and tactics. His task is not an easy one, and it is made even more complex when charges of a loose nature are made on the floor of the Congress of the United States.

I have met with the Governor of Puerto Rico on many occasions, both at Forteleza and here in the United States. We have discussed programs and projects of mutual interest and concern. In company with the Governor I have visited housing projects, new factories, and have seen him among the people he governs discussing their problems with them in their homes and in their fields. I have disagreed frankly and, on occasion, vehemently, in friendly debate, but I can report that in no instance did I discern in Governor Muñoz any predilection to any form of government save that which encompasses and protects the people he has the honor to govern. To infer that this honorable and able administrator would betray the sacred trust that is his, or knowingly confer with the enemies of the United States, is to level a charge that cannot be borne out on the record.

I have never discussed the political makeup of other Latin Republics with Governor Muñoz, and I have no way of knowing in what quarter lie his sympathies in the present loud controversy over certain governments and personalities in the Western Hemisphere. But I will say that his administration of the high office he holds has been marked by judicial conduct and fair play.

If foreign policy amateurs will permit the conduct of foreign policy to be conducted in what appears to be the best interests of the United States and by men trained to the job we may expect to see continued improvement in political, economic, and social affairs throughout our hemisphere. By the same token, no good service is being rendered by those who sow the seeds of violence, misunderstanding, and bitterness.

Juvenile Delinquency

OF

HON. ELIZABETH KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newsletter which I released today:

K-E-E-N-O-T-E-S

(By Representative ELIZABETH KEE, of West Virginia)

The Washington newspapers reported the incident this past week of three teen-age boys living in this area who deliberately set fire to a friendly dog. The animal, a valuable boxer belonging to a neighbor, had incurred the youngsters' displeasure because, allegedly "it followed them around and broke some shrubbery." So they coated its back with a paint solvent and set it afire.

The incident—even if it were an isolated one—would be alarming enough as an example of juvenile sadism and savagery loose in a civilized society, but it is not isolated. If memory serves me correctly, a similar occurrence was reported as having happened in the area of Charleston, W. Va., within recent months. Wanton cruelty of this nature is but a step away from the kind of depravity that led to the Richard Nathan-Leopold Loeb crime which rocked the Nation a generation or so ago. The next victim of these young sadists—or some others—may not be a hapless dumb brute—but a helpless child.

What is happening in our present-day society to produce the juvenile criminals and delinquents whose hardened crimes are reported daily in the press throughout the Nation? In New York City an entire neighborhood is terrorized by gangs of young hoodlums whose criminal records include armed robbery, mayhem, rape, and murder. In other metropolitan areas, the same pattern is repeated, while in smaller communities one hears of patricide, kidnapings, holdups on the open road, vandalism, and violence.

This is not, believe me, an indictment of modern youth. To offset the grim picture of juvenile delinquency in America, we have such child wonders as the young physicists, atomic scientists, and financial wizards as have recently electrified TV audiences from coast to coast. We have innumerable fine youth organizations—the 4-H Clubs, the Boy Scouts and the Campfire Girls, the Future Farmers of America, the Boys Clubs of America, and others too numerous to mention. In fact, throughout the Nation, we have a preponderance of fine, upstanding young Americans eagerly knocking on the doors of our schools and colleges and preparing themselves for their future responsibilities as homemakers, earners, and good citizens of the United States.

But we also have persistent and serious juvenile delinquency over which PTA's, law-enforcement bodies and Congress itself have been deeply concerned during the past few years. To cope with the problem, juvenile courts have been established at the local level, and nationally, Congress set up a Special Committee To Investigate Juvenile Delinquency. Still the rolls of youthful lawbreakers grow longer. Reform schools and receiving homes for teen-agers and even younger children awaiting trial or sentence, are filled and overflowing.

Where have we failed these children?

Poverty, deprivation and slums are, of course, fertile breeding beds of crime. But many of our youthful criminals come from better than average homes. The three boys, 14, 15, and 16 years old, who committed the atrocity upon the unfortunate boxer—who, incidentally, is reported to be recovering from his wounds—reside in a prosperous suburban community just outside of Washington. What is wrong then with their families, their schools, their community, that they could commit an act of such deliberate cruelty with no other qualms, presumably, than the fear of being caught?

To find the answers to these questions, we must, I feel, examine our own consciences. What kinds of example have we set for them? What moral standards do we uphold, what ideals do we cherish and strive to achieve? What sort of world have we created for them to live in and do we live in it ourselves in accordance with the precepts that we preach?

The mirror, I am sorry to say, does not reflect back a very flattering image of today's adult world.

Every school, every classroom in the Washington area is hopelessly overcrowded. But the school aid bill was defeated by petty, partisan politics. There is a critical teacher shortage, but the teaching profession attracts fewer followers each year because we refuse to pay our teachers an adequate living wage—much less what they are worth.

Still thinking of that tortured dog, how humane have we grown-ups shown ourselves to be? Not very, I fear. After years of trying, animal protective leagues have finally pressured a House committee to report out a bill, H. R. 8308, providing for the humane slaughter of the animals that feed the Nation's dinner tables. The bill is now before the Rules Committee awaiting the granting of a rule before it can be acted upon by the House. In these closing days of the session, it has only a slim change of passage.

Last year 40,000 human beings were killed in car accidents in the United States. Yet the automobile industry continues to turn out faster and faster cars—practically anyone can possess something on wheels so long as he can keep up the payments to the finance companies—teen-agers dash about the roads in hot rods, jeopardizing the lives and limbs of citizens—and the sale of intoxicants, tranquilizers and drug stimulants steadily rises.

When the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima in World War II, a gasp of dismay and moral indignation went up from the American people. Even though we realized that it would shorten the war and save precious American lives, we still had moral scruples over using this horrible weapon against defenseless civilians. Today, we casually debate whether radioactive fallout will cause sterility and deformity in future generations and gamble the future happiness of our children in the mad race to develop still more hideous weapons of destruction.

And then there is the foreign-aid program and our relations with other peoples of the world. At the close of World War II, first UNRRA and then the Marshall plan came into existence to help friend and conquered foe, alike, to recover from the devastation of the conflict. Incidental to our warmhearted desire to save starving children, to resettle displaced peoples, to repair the havoc and ruin, to comfort and solace war-torn lives, was the thought of our own security and of halting the spread of communism.

True to our traditions as a great and generous people, we won friends because we cared first about human beings. We became world leaders—not because of our power—but because of our kindness. When on March 12, 1947, President Truman went before a joint session of Congress to ask for a military and economic aid program to preserve the independence of Turkey and Greece, the sum he requested was $400 million. It was not how much we gave, but how we gave it.

Today, foreign aid has become solely a tool of our diplomats and the State Department. The justification for the billions of dollars requested for military and foreign aid in this fiscal year is that any reduction in the amounts of money requested would be dangerously eroding to our own security policies—to our own interests.

Perhaps so. But Americans, who are openhanded when their hearts are appealed to, can become mighty tightfisted when they think they are buying something. We are more than willing to help people—not to buy them.

It is, I feel, because of this change of attitude in our foreign policies and in our foreign relations—it is because our selfish interests are being stressed—that we have lost our moral influence and friends abroad and dimmed the idealism and altruism which have heretofore always characterized us as a nation. In their place we have substituted cynicism, skepticism, and pursuit of the almighty dollar.

If some of our children are misled into following in our own footsteps, the best way to set them back in the paths of righteousness is by first mending our own ways.

Federal Grants to States

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I wonder how many folks realize that Federal grants to States and Federal-aid payments to individuals total $56,237,000 in Nebraska and more than $5 billion for the Nation as a whole? Those amounts are for the fiscal year 1956.

I want to sound this warning: Federal grants-in-aid may be threatening the strength of the States.

Here is a statement from a prominent educator:

> If present trends in Federal-State relations continue for another quarter century, the States may be left hollow shells, operating primarily as the field districts of Federal departments and dependent upon the Federal Treasury for their support.

Then consider this statement by Senator KNOWLAND, of California:

> I have never seen the Federal Government contribute money without wanting to exercise control.

I wonder if you realize that since 1947 Federal aid to States has reached the amazing total of $35 billion.

Nebraska has received Federal funds in 65 of the 95 programs available to States and Territories. Last year many more new welfare programs were suggested by the President but got nowhere in Congress. They will be suggested again and again. Some of them may be adopted.

I believe it is time that we sat down and took stock. Where are we traveling?

I warn you we are on a course that leads to the main track of socialism and we had better do something about it.

I believe that most of you are acquainted with my philosophy. It is my firm conviction that the Federal Government should not do for the people what the people can do for themselves. I further believe that when there is a worthy and needed cause, that the Federal Government should step in and provide the funds.

In this group I would place irrigation and reclamation districts, power projects, flood control and other worthy units. Private money is usually not available to construct such projects and the Federal Government, in effect, loans the money. The Treasury gets that money back. That is not an expense. It is an investment in America.

Grants-in-aid projects are something else. They are direct grants from the Federal Treasury. They have no relation to reclamation and similar projects which are in an entirely different category.

Now I agree that many of the grants-in-aid programs we have in Nebraska are highly worthy. They are needed. Many of them do untold good and I am not speaking against them. We must keep most of them through either Federal or State funds.

What I am doing is urging you to take another look to see if these programs cannot be done better on the State and local level than on the Federal level.

The cause of my worry is the mounting billions of dollars which the Federal Government collects from the American taxpayer and then doles back to the States and communities in the form of aid. Too many States and too many people are running to the Government for help.

Now let us take a typical year for which I have some figures, July 1, 1953, to June 30, 1954. Federal-tax collections including social security amounted to $411,706,000 in Nebraska. Federal payments back to Nebraska totaled $98,919,000. In other words, for every dollar that came back to Nebraska we paid for with $4.16.

Naturally, most of the tax goes for our defense and other operations of Government but we more than paid the Government for that $56 million we got back in grants.

Some people seem to have the idea that a grant from the Government is free money. My friends, there is no such thing as free money. The Federal Treasury gets its money from you—whether by taxes or borrowing. The taxpayer pays the bill.

It is only commonsense to assume that part of each dollar you send to Washington is lost along the way to, in, and from the Nation's capital. Administration costs money.

Now I pose this question: "Would it not be better to tax our people on the local level and administer our own programs than depend on the Federal Government when we know full well that it is going to cost more money if the money is routed through Washington?"

More taxes? Certainly not. If grants to the States can be reduced the Federal income tax can be reduced. Perhaps a rebate of 10 to 20 percent to the States would serve the purpose.

Now, I am not saying that the States should forthwith refuse Federal grants in aid. I am merely suggesting the time has come to think the matter over at greater length and determine which grants can be assumed by the States and which should remain in the province of the Federal Government.

As the years pass, more and more suggestions for Federal aid will be advanced. In this session we had to take up the issue of Federal aid to education through construction of schools. The bill was barely defeated or we would have been saddled with a new $2 billion idea. I voted against this bill because I do not believe the Federal Government should be building schools. That is in the province of the communities and the States. Schools should be built, maintained, and operated at the local level under State standards.

NEBRASKA GRANTS

Now let us examine some of the grants in aid programs in Nebraska—many of them laudable. Here are a few of them:

Agriculture experiment stations	$405, 535
Cooperative agricultural extension	711, 383
School lunch program	631, 867
Special school milk program	303, 088
Federal airport program	129, 541
Roads	16, 717, 118

Then we have numerous other grants to States and communities—hospital construction, public assistance, aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, and many others that bring the total in this bracket to $34,742,311.

Then there are the Federal aid payments to individuals in health, training, awards, benefits to veterans and others for a subtotal of $21,495,580. The grant total, I repeat, is $56,237,891 for Nebraska.

Back in 1920 the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury carried 13 appropriation accounts from which payments were made for grants to or within States. In 1930 there were 25; in 1940 there were 44; in 1950 there were 36; last year there were 59 with grants in 95 fields, some closely allied, of course.

Through the years these programs have grown. It is a common statement on Capitol Hill that once a program starts, it is very difficult if not impossible to stop.

I hope you will always bear in mind this statement of former Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey: "The people must come to understand that any program, if financed by Washington, can only be paid for by local tax money going to Washington, where some is used up for Washington overhead expense and what is left goes back to the local community which provided some or all of the money in the first place."

I repeat, there is no such thing as free money.

Now what are the principal dangers of Federal grants?

Let me repeat the words of Senator Knowland, "I have never seen the Federal Government contribute money without wanting to exercise control."

It does tend to centralize control of State and local situations in Washington.

It fosters the growth of larger and larger bureaucracy and its attendant problems of bigness.

It stifles initiative at the State and local level.

Now I am not suggesting any immediate and overall cure. I am suggesting some intense study of the problem. I am suggesting we forgo further new programs until we get the problem settled. I am suggesting that we make a new evaluation.

I am not opposed to our present fine grants-in-aid programs in Nebraska. I am only asking if we are depending too much on the Federal Government, with a resultant expense that is higher in cost than if we did the job ourselves.

The governors' conference, of which Nebraska's Gov. Victor Anderson is a member, has brought up this subject. I trust it will be given diligent attention with a view to greater economy to the State and Nation.

Nebraska was molded by men and women who carved an empire out of the prairies, people of vision who wanted independence. We built a pay-as-you-go philosophy with no bonded indebtedness.

I believe the people of Nebraska today want that same independence, that they do not want to go too far down the path toward socialism.

OF

HON. HUGH SCOTT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am enclosing an article of mine that appeared in the June 1957 issue of the magazine Lithuanian Days.

The article follows:

HIGHLIGHTS OF THE LIBERATION OF THE SOVIET-ENSLAVED NATIONS

(By HUGH SCOTT, Representative from Pennsylvania)

After the Presidential and Congressional elections last fall, it became known from election results in the predominantly American-Lithuanian-inhabited polling districts that the Republican nominee for the high offices of the President and Vice President, as well as for both Houses of the Congress, had received overwhelming support there.

Draugas, commenting on election results, observed that the Republicans ought to be deeply satisfied with the way the American-Lithuanians had voted in Chicago, the largest American-Lithuanian settlement in the United States, because as Chicago goes, so goes all the country.

Time magazine did not fail either to note the pro-Republican trend in what it called Little Lithuania; namely, the American-Lithuanian-inhabited wards in Chicago.

If this is so, our Lithuanian voters must have approved wholeheartedly of the 1956 Republican platform adopted in San Francisco last summer and serving as a guide for the President, the Vice President, the Senators, and the Congressmen.

Let us briefly recall its highlights, as far as it has to do with the liberation of the Soviet-enslaved nations. It is self-understood, of course, that the Lithuanian problem is identical with the Latvian and with the Estonian problem. Solutions must develop in the same manner and at the same time.

"We rededicate ourselves to the pursuit of a just peace and the defense of human liberty and national independence," the platform reads. "We shall continue to seek * * * the liberation of the satellite states—Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Latvia, Estonia, and other once-free countries now behind the Iron Curtain. The Republican Party stands firmly with the peoples of those countries in their just quest for freedom. We are confident that our peaceful purposes, resolutely pursued, will finally restore national independence to oppressed peoples and nations."

And with obvious reference to the uprisings in East Germany in 1955 and Poland in 1956, the platform goes on: "For the first time, we see positive evidence that forces of freedom and liberation will inevitably prevail if the free nations maintain their strength, unity, and resolution."

Hardly were these words spelled out when the revolt broke out in Hungary and shook the Soviet Empire to its very depths. Although the revolt was mercilessly crushed by a ruthless Soviet military machine, it is as sure as that the day follows the night that there will be more spontaneous revolts which in the unfolding of history will ultimately bring freedom to all the captive peoples, including the Lithuanians, the Latvians, and the Estonians.

In drafting the above liberation principles as a constituent part of the 1956 platform, the executive committee of the Republican National Committee, of which this writer was a member at that time (and still is), was guided by what President Eisenhower had said in Cincinnati, on September 22, 1953:

"These principles demand that we use every political, every economic, every psychological tactic to see that the liberating spirit, in the nations conquered by communism, shall never perish. Thus, we shall help each captive nation to maintain an outward strain against the Moscow bond. The lands closed in behind the Iron Curtain will seethe with discontent; their peoples, not servants under the Soviet master, but ardent patriots yearning to be free again. Nothing is so damaging to a tyrant's war machine as the steadfast spirit of an unhappy people."

There was another more recent statement by President Eisenhower confirming his views expressed in 1953, on which the executive committee of the Republican National Committee relied in drafting the 1956 platform.

"The Free World," President Eisenhower said in a message to the American Friends of Captive Nations rally held in New York on May 1956, "has not been reconciled to the fate of captive peoples behind the Iron Curtain. We shall keep these wrongs and injustices at the forefront of human consciousness until they are corrected."

This message was one of the reasons why the 1956 platform did not refer at all to any Lithuanian, Latvian, and Estonian Soviet Republics; it spoke of Soviet satellites, a term loosely applied to independent states which closely follow their master's dictates. Such is the case with Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, and other European states in the Soviet orbit.

There were many more similar pronouncements made by various influential persons and organizations which the executive committee of the Republican National Committee took into serious consideration while drafting the 1956 platform.

The statement and the accompanying resolution which I submitted for the American Friends of Captive Nations to the Republican platform committee deserves special attention. The reasons are twofold:

Firstly, there was contained a program of certain concrete steps toward the liberation of the captive peoples; secondly, the membership of the American Friends of Captive Nations is distinguished and well represents a cross section of American public opinion. As an illustration, its members include Senators MUNDT, DOUGLAS, and KENNEDY. Senator KNOWLAND likewise approved the statement and the resolution submitted in San Francisco and addressed the rally in New York attended by Representatives Anfuso, Bentley, Dodd, Judd, Murray, McCarthy, Poling, St. George, Tumulty, and myself; the president of the International Rescue Committee Angier Biddle Duke, and a host of renowned professors, writers, journalists, and leaders in religious and civic life. The Reverend Monsignor Balkunas represented the fine American-Lithuanian organization.

The general interest in AFCN activities was well attested to by the fact that its rally in New York was sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Catholic War Veterans, the Jewish War Veterans, and leading organizations of American citizens from the captive nations. President Eisenhower, Vice President NIXON, and many more political leaders sent their encouraging message.

True to its purpose of coordinating the efforts aimed at the information of the American people concerning the tragic plight of the Communist-enslaved nations and of suggesting concrete measures to achieve this purpose, the AFCN's statement and resolution boiled down to the following: (1) To declare our solidarity with the captive nations; (2) to make their liberation the first and major subject on the agenda of any negotiations with the Soviets; (3) to refuse to relax trade restrictions, or to accept the so-called cultural delegations or to agree to any security pacts, until freedom has been accorded to the enslaved peoples.

Today, as in San Francisco at the Republican convention, I fully subscribe to the foregoing suggestions. I firmly believe that mere statements of our desire to see the captive nations liberated is not enough. We must prove that this is our foremost goal through a dynamic foreign policy. Liberation of captive nations must not be forgotten for a moment, in all of our negotiations with the Soviets. It is certain that the rulers of the Kremlin never lose sight of their objectives.

Perhaps we may, someday, agree upon a demilitarized zone in Europe, but we must never agree to it if the Baltic States are included in the demilitarized zone and are not afforded an opportunity to hold free elections and to decide for themselves their own way of life.

It would be unrealistic to assume that the United States will or should declare war in pursuance of its policies of liberation. Any future thermonuclear war would be so terrible and would cause so many millions of deaths among all nations and particularly in the immediate area of combat actions that the question justly arises whether there would be anyone left to liberate after the victorious freedom forces took possession of the territory to be liberated. So the thermonuclear way is not the way to liberation.

Hence, we are forced to seek liberation by peaceful means only. We can, however, widen the area of freedom by refusing to recognize the finality of the present territorial arrangement in Europe. This is not an empty dream. Poland seems to have won peacefully at least a degree of limited freedom; perhaps she will be able to maintain it. Hungary had to resort to a revolt, and for a brief period of time she managed to get complete freedom. Another spark may start a new revolt somewhere, and possibly with greater and lasting success. There is a great ferment and the Soviet can never rest easy where its suppression continues.

Above all we must never bargain with the Soviets for the price of freedom of the Baltic peoples and of all the captive peoples of the Soviet regime. We must keep on hammering, through our communication outlets upon the idea of eventual liberation. We must, however, be careful not to incite to premature uprisings. We must wait: no dictatorship in history has been permanent. They breed the germs of their own ultimate disintegration.

The present administration has shown by its deeds that it had not abandoned the liberation principles embodied in the 1956 Republican platform. It has furnished sufficient proofs that it does not share the views of those pessimists who believe that there is a finality, for better or for worse, about what has now occurred in Eastern Europe. (Former United States Ambassador to Moscow George F. Kennan). The United States representatives to the U. N. have been constantly on the alert for a good chance to remind the delegates of other states, including the Soviet Union, about the plight of the Baltic Nations.

As for both Houses of Congress, their unwavering attitude was clearly demonstrated on the occasion of Lithuanian Independence Day this year. Never before have so many Senators and Representatives taken the floor to denounce the enslavement of Lithuania and express hopes that the day of her liberation will not be far away. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 14, 1957, is an eloquent testimony to this effect.

The executive committee of the Republican National Committee has already begun discussing the strategy for the 1958 Congressional and gubernatorial elections. It is a sure bet that the Republican candidates will express themselves next year with greater vigor than ever before in favor of liberation policies as stated in the 1956 Republican platform. We do not share the pessimistic spirit of surrender of many in the party of opposition, whose regrettable policies failed in the time of their testing.

The Santa Monica Sheltered Workshop

OF

HON. DONALD L. JACKSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the most difficult things in the world to whip is personal discouragement. The conflict is compounded when one suffers a physical handicap which militates against regular employment and takes from one the self-respect which flows from independence. It is a simple matter for one so afflicted to give up the struggle and become a willing victim of what appears to be the inevitability of life's unthinking forces. In such cases, the name of the depressed and unhappy human shows up on the rolls of those receiving public assistance in one form or another. All incentive is lost, as is all desire to seek and achieve the sense of well-being attaching to honest reward for honest labor.

Santa Monica is a booming California city. During the past decade, it has shared in the phenomenal growth which is adding a new permanent resident for California every 55 seconds. Together with its stories of growth, industrial progress, high employment, and general well-being, there were, and are, many good people who for one reason or another found themselves unable to keep the pace required by modern technology and the demands of business and industry. These were the handicapped—those in wheelchairs, in braces, missing one or more members, the blind, the halt. But, one thing they shared in common was the desire to be self-supporting. They wanted an opportunity to learn and to put their sound intelligences to constructive purposes. They desired deeply to work and to have the quality of their workmanship known and appreciated. Mostly, they had no skills, but in depriving these citizens of sight, or hearing, or a limb, nature had followed the immutable law of compensation. For everything taken from each, something new had been added. The blind developed a deftness of fingers and a keener hearing. The eyes of the deaf were as good, or better, than average. Twisted fingers could be made to perform a useful function, and wheelchairs proved no obstacle to perfect workmanship when the occupant brought determination to the job at hand.

And, out of a welter of disability was born the Santa Monica Sheltered Workshop. In spite of doubts, hardships, heartaches, and financial droughts, a few men and women of vision and determination embarked upon what has become a model operation in vocational rehabilitation. What started as a hesitant venture in 1951, has turned out to be, in 1957, a success in every way. Nor, has the success been limited to those who initiated the sheltered workshop, nor to those who have found a new life because of its activities.

The handicapped who comprise the working force of the workshop have demonstrated that physical drawbacks can be overcome. Those who ventured timidly through the office door of the original shack, stayed to gain not only knowledge, but comradeship, confidence, and a new spirit. They defeated not only their own problem, but became, in turn, part of the answer to those who have followed them. The pay check became a reality to many who could previously have hoped for nothing but a meager subsistence check, labeled "Department of Charities, County of Los Angeles."

Out of day-to-day association with others equally handicapped, came a new sense of belonging, a new spirit, a new challenge, and for many, a new life.

The contractors and subcontractors who utilize the skills of the Sheltered Workshop have saved on capital investments. Wrapping, mailing, shipping, addressing, and assembly of complex electronic devices in the shop have saved valuable plant floor space for more urgent needs. Taxes, labor turnover, supervision, have all benefited by the presence in the community of a work force willing and able to tackle any job, no matter how big or small, on an instant's notice. To this time, the Sheltered Workshop has performed work for a long list of industrial and business organizations, including Acme Press; Aircraft Valve Manufacturing Co.; Air Transport Manufacturing Co.; Albin Enterprises; American Sample Co.; Athearn, I. R. Co.; Bay Cities Engineering Co.; Betwill Co.; Boulevard Camera Shop; Braunson Electronics, Inc.; Burton, John Originals, Inc.; Carruthers & Fernandez, Inc.; Celco Corp.; Consolidated Precision Products; Dixon Ceramics; Douglas Aircraft Co.; Ed's Micro Service; Evans Supply Co.; Fisher, John Lumber Co.; Forrest Stationers; Frantz Industries; Ferro Cast Corp.; Heinley Mastercraft Products; Henshey Co.; Highland Engineering Co.; H M Chemical Co., Ltd.; Jellins Co.; J. W. Robinson Co.; Kaye & Miller Machine Co.; Lear, Inc.; Magna Books, Inc.; Masters Printing & Stationery Co.; Michael's Car Washer; Midway Stamping & Die Works; Mission Packing Co.; Monarch Die Casting Corp.; M R M Enamelers; North American Aviation, Inc.; North American Piston Co.; Pacific Business Forms; Pastorius, F. R. & Co.; Pacific Jewelry Manufacturing; Propulsion Research Corp.; R & E Engineering Co.; Reynolds Industries; Riker Laboratories, Inc.; Sanford Aircraft, Inc.; Santa Monica Products Co.; Santasox; Scott & Scott; Seeco Tool Co., Inc.; Semco Research, Inc.; Seward & Flood Printing Co.; Shamban Co.; Standard Paper Box Corp.; Statham Laboratories; Summers Gyroscope Co.; Swissomatic Products; Tapoo Hawes Originals; Transco Products, Inc.; United Products Manufacturing Co.; United States Plywood Corp.; Universal Tool Co.; Wefco Manufacturing Co.; Weaning Cup Corp.; and Wolfe, Franklin C. Co., Inc.

Santa Monica and southern California are justly proud of the Sheltered Workshop. It has become much more than an adventure in sociology and rehabilitation. It has become a demonstrated and living fact that where there is vision, understanding, and cooperation lives of the physically handicapped can be turned into lives of useful productivity, marked by self respect and ingenuity. Much of the credit for the success of the workshop must go to Mr. J. E. Anthony, the general manager, whose determination, initiative, and faith made a transient dream into a living reality. His dedication has changed the course of lives, previously marked by frustration and desolation. Today, the witnesses to his personal enthusiasm are those whose deft hands spin a portion of the gigantic web of American industry. Joe Anthony combined idealism with practical reality, and out of this cloth was cut the pattern for the Sheltered Workshop. Standing behind Mr. Anthony have been many of the farsighted citizens of the community who have brought to the undertaking technological knowledge, sound business management, and public relations and advertising skills. The Sheltered Workshop represents a classic refutation of human hopelessness, and it constitutes a challenge to all who would achieve an independence of mind and body. It is a program which could and should be expanded throughout the Nation to the end that many hundreds of thousands of handicapped citizens might achieve the measure of economic independence so necessary to the enjoyment of the blessings of citizenship in a free land.

It is a privilege, Mr. Speaker, to be able to pay tribute to the Santa Monica Bay Sheltered Workshop for the great job being done, and to pay a personal word of tribute to the handicapped who constitute the work force. I have visited the workshop, and look forward to doing so again within the very near future. I share the pride of the people I represent in this unique and worthwhile undertaking.

OF

HON. EDWARD MARTIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. MARTIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I had hoped to speak at the civil liberties meeting of the grand lodge convention, Improved Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in South Philadelphia, this afternoon, but work here in the Senate prevented.

The man in charge of this meeting is a very outstanding Pennsylvanian, the Honorable Hobson R. Reynolds, whose patriotism and leadership have been recognized over the years.

I ask unanimous consent that my proposed address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF UNITED STATES SENATOR EDWARD MARTIN OF PENNSYLVANIA, PREPARED FOR DELIVERY AT THE CIVIL LIBERTIES MEETING OF THE GRAND LODGE CONVENTION, IMPROVED BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS OF THE WORLD, IN THE SOUTH PHILADELPHIA HIGH SCHOOL, MONDAY AFTERNOON, AUGUST 26, 1957

I am highly honored by your invitation to address this important convention.

Your organization has grown great by loyal adherence to American ideals. Throughout its history the Improved Order of Elks has been a powerful influence in the moral and spiritual advancement of our Nation. Belief in Almighty God and loyalty to the flag are the fundamental principles of its doctrine.

You have attained a high place of honor and prestige because you practice and preach brotherhood, good will, tolerance, and helpfulness to the less fortunate. You serve America by your example of good citizenship, civic responsibility, and obedience to the laws of God and man.

I am happy to bid you welcome to this great and historic city of Philadelphia, the center of patriotic inspiration for every American. Here the Liberty Bell is enshrined in honored glory, the sacred symbol of liberty and independence.

To those of you who have come here from distant places, I would humbly offer a suggestion. Be sure to visit Independence Hall. Stand before the Liberty Bell and read its exalted message from the Old Testament:

"Proclaim liberty throughout the land, unto all the inhabitants thereof."

I promise you it will be a most rewarding experience. It will renew and strengthen your faith in the true spirit of America.

Here is the birthplace of the United States of America, where the Founding Fathers pledged "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor" in adopting the Declaration of Independence. In this greatest document of freedom ever written they gave the world a new concept of human worth and dignity, based on the divine truths of the Holy Bible.

The courageous patriots who built the foundation of American freedom believed that each human being is created in the image and likeness of God. This belief was so eloquently expressed when they proclaimed:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

Here, in the city of Philadelphia, the Constitution was adopted to safeguard the citizen in his freedom and to protect this God-given rights against tyranny and oppression by government.

The framers of the Constitution were the wisest men of their day.

They wanted a government operated for the moral, spiritual, and material advancement of all the people, not for the special benefit of any class or section. That means a government of the law and not of men. The American Constitution was planned to extend equal protection to every citizen, rich or poor, great or humble. That protection is one of the bulwarks of our national strength. It is not dependent upon the opinion of any individual or group, no matter how powerful.

Under that plan of government, in less than 200 years of freedom, the American people have transformed a savage wilderness into the greatest Nation the world has ever known.

Under that plan of government the Negro, in spite of difficulties and handicaps, has achieved greater progress in a shorter span of years than any people in all world history.

Your people have succeeded as educators, lawyers, physicians, and clergymen. You have achieved greatness in science, art, and music. You have won a place of increasing importance in business, insurance, and banking. You are represented by outstanding figures in diplomacy and government. As craftsmen and industrial workers you have contributed to the productive strength of our country in peace and war.

The Negroes of America have proven their loyalty and patriotism in every war in which our country has been engaged. From the first shots fired in the Revolution to the conflict in Korea they have given their lives to preserve the ideals of freedom. The loyalty of the Negro has never been questioned.

The great names of Negro achievement are known to all and are honored by every true American—Booker T. Washington, in education, George W. Carver, in science, Ralph J. Bunche in diplomacy and law, to mention a few.

But equal in importance, if less known to fame, are thousands of modest, hard-working, self-respecting Negro men and women who are serving their fellow men with outstanding ability and the highest integrity in many fields.

In every city and town, in every community, their example is an inspiration to their fellow citizens, regardless of color, creed or national origin.

It would serve no useful purpose to discuss at length the details of the legislative battle that has been waged in the Senate on the civil-rights issue.

I agree with the statement of President Eisenhower when he said:

"Rarely in our entire legislative history have so many extraneous issues been introduced into the debate in order to confuse both legislators and the public."

However, the basic principles stand out clear through the fog of confusion which some tried to create. These principles are the foundation of the American way of life, which cannot be fully realized until the blessings of America are open to every citizen who abides by her rules. I have repeatedly asserted my faith in Americanism which, in my opinion, is the right of everyone to enjoy the benefits and opportunities of this great country as long as he obeys its laws. I have always voted in accordance with that firm conviction and shall continue to do so.

The broad general purposes of civil-rights legislation should be:

1. To wipe out the political inequalities that exist because of racial differences.
2. To establish beyond all doubt that we have only one class of citizenship here in the United States.
3. That under our form of Government all citizens have equal rights and equal obligations.
4. That educational and economic opportunities should be shared equally, with no distinction as to color, creed, or national origin.
5. That no force, in or out of Government, can deprive any citizen of those rights which we hold to be of divine origin.
6. That the right to participate in government by the free exercise of the ballot is an inherent right of every law-abiding citizen because here in the United States we, the people, are the Government.

That seems to me to cover the legal aspects of the issue but the moral side embraces many more considerations.

You cannot legislate brotherhood, righteousness, tolerance, and good will into the hearts of men.

Those qualities must be created by a deeper understanding of man's relationship to God. They must be strengthened by adherence to the principles of religion.

Brotherhood springs from the heart. It is a quality that enobles the spirit. It does not thrive under compulsion but flourishes where freemen meet on common ground, equal in prestige and equal in dignity, and stand together for the common good.

The fundamental truths of human progress are everlasting and unchanging. They apply equally to all races of mankind. They are firmly established on the Golden Rule, the Sermon on the Mount, and the teachings of the Holy Bible.

The United States has been called by destiny to leadership for peace, justice, and freedom in the world.

To serve that noble cause we must set before the other nations an example of decency and righteousness.

To go forward in leadership we must first protect the rights and liberties of our own citizens.

Let us hope and pray that our land may be cleansed of bitterness, hate, and prejudice. Then, we can stand together in fellowship and understanding, respecting the rights of each other, and reaching upward for the finer things of life that bring peace, harmony, and friendship.

Opening United States Statements at 10th World Health Assembly Delivered by Dr. Leroy E. Burney, Chairman, United States Delegation, and Representative John E. Fogarty

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the 10th World Health Assembly convened at Geneva, Switzerland, during the month of May 1957. It was a conference that brought together representatives from more than 80 nations. Great and lasting good resulted from the meeting together of this distinguished and outstanding group of men and women interested in promoting the health of the world.

It was a privilege for me to have the opportunity of attending this World Assembly as a Congressional representative with the United States delegation, together with the Honorable JOHN E. FOGARTY. It is a pleasure to report that the United States delegation took a leading and important part in the deliberations of the assembly under the leadership of Dr. Leroy E. Burney, Surgeon General of the United States, as chairman of the delegation.

I wish that every Member of Congress—indeed every citizen of the United States—could have had the close view of this great organization that I had. No one could come away from such an experience without a sense of deep satisfaction in what we Americans are doing through this organization to relieve misery and suffering among hundreds of millions of our fellow men. And one could not help being astounded at how much is being accomplished with so little money. Hundreds and hundreds of important health projects are being carried out even in the remotest corners of the world under the stimulus and technical guidance of this organization. I know of no money that is being spent with greater effect than the small resources of the WHO. Truly, it is changing the world for the better, building a strong and more resourceful human race.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the unanimous consent granted, I hereby include as part of my remarks the statements delivered by Dr. Burney and Representative FOGARTY at the opening of the Assembly, as follows:

Statement by Dr. Leroy E. Burney

Mr. President and distinguished delegates, it is a pleasure for me to come again to the World Health Assembly, the truly impressive annual meeting of the health leaders of the world. I had the opportunity to be a member of the United States delegation to the World Health Assembly in Mexico in 1955. I am now having the pleasant and rewarding experience of renewing many old friendships and of making new ones.

The World Health Assembly is a unique meeting, and uniquely important. President Eisenhower has, on several occasions, emphasized the great value of the work of the World Health Organization in lifting the burden of disease which still afflicts mankind. The President has pointed to the World Health Organization as one of the highly successful specialized agencies of the United Nations in which international cooperations has truly benefited mankind. We who are members of national health administrations in our own countries are necessarily concerned for much of the time with health programs and problems within our borders, yet we have all found that health is essentially international, perhaps one of the most international of all fields of human endeavor. To leave Washington, D. C., on one afternoon and to be in Geneva the next brings home in an immediate personal way the closeness of countries. Even more basically, we in the United States are grateful for the opportunity to cooperate with other countries to help raise the levels of health, including those of our own people and of all peoples. These annual World Health Assemblies demonstrate the serious wish of nations to pool the necessary resources for this purpose. In the World Health Organization we have, by working together, built an effective means for fighting for better health. The annual report which the director general has put before us is, as usual, an interesting and a most stimulating document. Perhaps this year it is more than usually instructive, reporting as it does the activities of the World Health Organization in the 10th year from the founding of the Interim Commission for WHO. It demonstrates that the Organization has become a successfully established institution. It can still mature, but it has thrived through the early years of trial and conclusively proved its worth as an agency for international cooperation in health. Its potentialities for helping to improve health levels further are great.

I am proud that our United States delegation to this Assembly includes two distinguished Members of the United States Congress. They have both shown great insight into health needs and programs in the United States. Likewise, they have played a leading part in the passage of the legislation which has enabled the United States to support the steady, orderly growth of this Organization. They come to this Assembly as good friends of WHO of long standing. At this time I am privileged to be able to call on one of these distinguished gentleman, Congressmen JOHN FOGARTY, a longtime friend and supporter of public health and medical research. Congressman FOGARTY will make a statement on behalf of the United States delegation.

The PRESIDENT. Thank you, Dr. Burney. May I call on Congressman FOGARTY? You have the floor, sir.

Statement by John E. Fogarty

Mr. President, distinguished delegates, ladies and gentlemen, I am grateful for Dr. Burney's kind words applying to Congressman WOLVERTON and myself. At the same time, I can claim no special virtue in being in favor of good health. We in the United States Congress are all in favor of better health for the people of our country and for all peoples. Our Congress has shown by its actions its realization that improving world health conditions is a basic part of building a more peaceful and stable world, the goal for which we all strive and pray.

We have watched with the greatest interest and satisfaction the steady growth of the World Health Organization. Its constructive work now reaches into every corner of the world. No international organization is doing more important work day in and day out. The growth of WHO has been continuous and orderly, in pace with the increasing experience and competence of its excellent staff. It is our feeling that its orderly growth should be continued. I feel that I can assure you quite confidently that the people of the United States and their representatives in Congress will continue to support orderly expansion of this great work. On the other hand, as one who believes deeply in the importance of your mission, I feel I should let you know that in my personal view there would be some real concern among my colleagues in the Congress of the United States if the Organization attempted to expand too rapidly, beyond its demonstrated ability to maintain high levels of accomplishment. Orderly growth provides for sound growth, and it is sound growth we all want in WHO.

Next year, 1958, will be the 10th anniversary of the coming-into-force of the Constitution of the 10th World Health Organization. With this in mind, the United States Congress last year on its own initiative prepared and adopted a joint resolution of the United States Senate and House of Representatives. With your permission, Mr. President, I should like to read parts of this resolution. The Congress declared among other things, that "the year 1958 is considered particularly appropriate for holding the Assembly in the United States since that year will mark the decennial anniversary of the entry-into-force of the constitution of the World Health Organization, which was originally drawn up and signed in New York City"; and that "the Assembly will focus public attention in the United States on the important work of the World Health Organization as an integral part of the economic and social program of the United Nations and as a constructive work contributing to better international appreciation and world peace." The Congress therefore authorized an appropriation to enable the United States to invite the World Health Organization to hold the 11th World Health Assembly, in 1958, in the United States of America.

I am happy to inform you that this invitation has gone from our Secretary of State to your Director-General of WHO, and that the matter will therefore come before you for your consideration. The United States will be highly honored if it is decided to hold the 11th World Health Assembly in our country, and we shall do all we can to make the occasion an auspicious and most successful one.

Senator Yarborough Demands End to Bungling, Resignation of Dulles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JACK BROOKS
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, August 26, 1957

Mr. BROOKS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that many Members of the House have seen or heard news reports of the stirring address delivered by our colleague Senator RALPH YARBOROUGH, of Texas, before the convention of the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York City on August 22.

In his speech Senator YARBOROUGH summarized the accomplishments of the 1st session of the 85th Congress for all the people of our country on the one hand, and in calling for the resignation of Secretary of State Dulles he outlined in bold detail the bungling of the administration's foreign policy on the other.

I have received reports that the press in the Free World around the globe has praised Senator YARBOROUGH's ringing declaration of friendship for our allies who are fighting the growing influence of communism and to make his comments available for every Member of Congress, under unanimous consent I include his address in today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The address follows:

Text of an Address by Senator Ralph Yarborough at New York City to the Convention of Affiliated Young Democrats of New York City, at Hotel Picadilly, August 22, 1957

Mr. President, fellow Democrats, fellow Americans, I want to thank you for your kind words. Your generosity of words is exceeded only by your generosity in deeds, in inviting me to speak here tonight.

Returning to New York is always a thrill.

I well remember my first trip here 38 years ago, when, as a cadet at West Point, we came down the Hudson on a cold, gray November Saturday to tangle with the Navy at the Polo Grounds in the annual Army-Navy game. And twice in my life, I have been thrilled by seeing the Statue of Liberty from the deck of an incoming ship, once in my teens as I worked my way back from Europe on a cattle boat, and again at the end of the great crusade for liberty in World War II, when the infantry division in which I served came up the harbor for redeployment to the Pacific before the A-bomb had ended the war. And in those and all other trips when I have been back here, New York is always an inspiration. It always has a quality of the sameness and yet it is never the same. It is always different. These changing moods of the leading city in the history of mankind inspire the visitor whether he come in winter's cold or the heat of summer.

This is my first time to talk with a group in New York City since I became a United States Senator 110 days ago. But the short 110 days that I've served in the Senate is plenty of time to learn that things are not always what they seem, and that many really significant acts are too unspectacular to attract much attention at the moment.

Much has been written in the press of the budget cuts. Little has been written of the increased appropriations for things that really touch the greatest of human needs.

On coming to the Senate, I reflected on the many avenues of service open to a Senator and I wondered what I should devote most of my time to. The lessons of a third-grade geography class came back to me. My teacher taught us that the three basic needs of mankind were food, clothing, and shelter. Modern man has added a fourth need: health; so I decided I would devote most of my time to those measures dealing with the need of man for food, clothing, shelter, and health.

On the health problem, we have made progress in this session of Congress. The Democratic Party is the party with a heart. We voted nearly $200 million for research, which we hope will help find a cure for six diseases—cancer, heart disease, arthritis, mental disease, allergy and neurology, and blindness. We increased the cancer research appropriation from $48 million in 1956 to $56 million in 1957, an increase of 16 percent. Similiarly, we increased the appropriations for heart disease, mental health, arthritis, allergy and neurology, and blindness studies.

And in the fields of dental research, public health, research in tuberculosis, and other communicable diseases, we have voted substantially higher appropriations than for last year.

In the enforcement of the pure food and drug law, we voted an increase of 37 percent in funds for enforcement over the 1956 appropriation. This will allow the employment of 162 additional personnel, 115 of them as field inspectors to help stop the adulteration and pollution of food.

For food and clothing needs, we have voted a 10-percent increase in disabled veterans pensions. We are working on pension increases for retired Government personnel and retired railway workers. And I have voted for and helped bring out of the subcommittee and the full committee the bills for an increase in the postal workers' pay and in the Federal classified employees' pay. Those bills for pay increases are pending on the floor of the Senate. We Democrats are working hard for their passage.

We have done something about housing, too. The Housing Act of 1957 lowers the downpayment on FHA Government-insured loans so that people in the modest-income brackets can build or buy a $10,000 home with a $300 downpayment and they can build or buy a $12,000 home with $600 downpayment, and so on up the scale.

Unfortunately, the administration has crippled the efforts of Congress by raising the interest rates on FHA loans after Congress had passed the bill. And the Housing Act of 1957 had other provisions, too. It carried provisions for urban renewal or slum clearance and I voted for expanded Federal participation in these programs. We Democrats fought for liberalized urban renewal or slum clearance, but the Republicans voted liberalization down. Urban renewal is included in the bill, but not in the higher percentage we Democrats sought. I voted, also, for the Gore amendment to increase the amount of the Federal National Mortgage Association secondary mortgage money for home loans. We Democrats worked hard in the past and will continue to work for these necessary measures; for better homes, better pay, better health. These are the goals of the new democracy.

I believe more gains are ahead on the domestic front. After 4 years of high interest rates and hard-money policy, at last Secretary of Treasury Humphrey has returned to private industry to see whether he can make money faster there than he did as Secretary of the Treasury. While in the Government, his holdings increased in value threefold.

You have probably heard the new song, I Lost My Head Over John Foster Dulles. What is needed now is a song for the farmer entitled "I Lost My Shirt Under Ezra Taft Benson," and one for the small-business man called I Lost My Shoes to George M. Humphrey Humphrey is gone and we hope that Mr. Benson and Mr. Dulles are going, going.

The Democrats in Congress are working for improvement, but there are many fields where our influence is being thwarted. Such a field is in the conduct of foreign policy.

In this field, we Democrats have acted with restraint and with responsibility, something I am sure the Republicans find it difficult to understand.

Last December, the Democrats in the Senate gave thought to a complete and searching investigation of the bungling in the Middle East. However, after some reflection, the Democrats decided not to conduct this investigation. We decided to give Mr. Dulles an opportunity.

We tried to bury the past in the hope of restoring vigor to the westeran alliance.

Unfortunately, the State Department, in its conduct of affairs, not only failed to restore vigor; it permitted, and even unconsciously aided, the erosion of good will with our neighbors. Alliances, unless they evolve and grow stronger, tend to drift to dissolution.

Today, our relations with our natural and traditional ally, Britain, are distant and formal. We have lost North Vietnam to the Communists. India is a neutral at best. Egypt is playing footsie with the Soviets.

France, which has been unable to achieve a strong and stable government, has shown distrust of American policy. Germany is still divided. Yugoslavia shows signs of drifting back into the Soviet sphere.

Failure of the Dulles policy to develop creative and determined leadership has permitted the initiative to pass to the forces of iniquity. This abdication, as one Britisher observed, produced inertia, muddle, misunderstanding, and disorientation. My distinguished Democratic colleague, Senator FULBRIGHT, has stated that not since the turn of the century have our relations with the other people of the free world been so strained.

John Foster Dulles, the cocksure rather than the humble, the clever but not wise, Secretary of State, has been at the helm during this period. His irregular policy, if indeed it can be called that, has been marked with recklessness, forced withdrawals, suave boastfulness, and short-term compromises.

Let's take a brief look at Mr. Dulles' record:

He told Europeans that unless they enacted the European Defense Community, Congress might abandon foreign aid. He thereby seemed to use our money as a weapon against our allies.

He told the Germans the defeat of Adenauer by voters would be disastrous, thereby adding to the impression that the United States unblushingly interferes in the internal politics of other nations.

He suggested revision of our pro-Italian Trieste policy, thereby angering Italy without appreciably pleasing Yugoslavia.

He canceled aid to Israel and then, after a visit from a Republican candidate for mayor of New York City, reinstated it, thereby appearing to tie United States policy to the needs of local politics.

He called the city of Goa a province, thereby siding with the Portuguese and colonialists and deeply angering India's 400 million proud people. By denying them union with their own people, he denied us their friendship.

He gave Egypt's General Naguib a silver pistol from President Eisenhower, the fatal symbolism of which could not be missed by every other nation in the world.

In Karachi he spoke of the need for building up local forces to resist aggression, thereby antagonizing India.

In New Delhi he guaranteed that India would find the United States on India's side if Pakistan attacked, thereby antagonizing Pakistan.

He led such a fantastic, zigzag course in the tragic Aswan Dam policy that he permitted Russia to walk through to the Suez Canal.

He invented the Baghdad Treaty presumably to frustrate Russian intervention. But instead of including Afghanistan, already allied with Iran, Iraq, and Turkey in the ineffective Saadabab Pact, we chose Pakistan. This irked India as well as Afghanistan, encouraging both to neutralism.

He allowed a situation to develop in the Egyptian crisis that caused Britain and France, our oldest and best friends, to act secretly and desperately.

He lined up with Communist Russia in the United Nations in condemning our oldest friends and demanding they withdraw their troops from Egypt to save a dictator's neck.

He did not, however, see fit to demand and insist that Russian troops withdraw from Hungary and be replaced by U. N. forces to conduct a free election.

He and President Eisenhower handed over the initiative of power threats to Moscow by telling Bulganin at the Geneva Big Four summit conference: "I believe Russia wants peace as sincerely as we do." This certificate of good conduct was beyond estimate of value to Moscow. At this conference, America and the Soviets reached a mutual recognition that atomic war was not to be a solution of our differences. Moscow, however, was prepared to risk the gamble of smaller wars, and we were not.

From Geneva in July until Geneva in October 1956, while we basked in bland phrases of coexistence, the Soviets took this certificate of good conduct and went to town. When the Big Four gathered in October, the Soviets had:

First, established diplomatic relations with West Germany so as to negotiate directly with Bonn instead of through Washington.

Second, launched a new so-called peace offensive to undermine the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Third, made an arms deal with Egypt.

Thus, at the second meeting, NATO was weaker, a Russian ambassador was on the Rhine and Russian technicians were on the Nile.

We could go on and on with this rollcall of bungling. But Americans—and unfortunately Russians too—are well aware of these failures. My friends, this is not policy. This is a course of stupidity—dynamic, massive, instant, and agonizing stupidity.

In recent days we have witnessed the latest blunder.

Here, mind you, is what Mr. Dulles, this world figure, the symbol of American foreign policy, said recently:

"Not for one minute do I think the purpose of the State Department is to make friends. The purpose of the State Department is to look out for the interests of the United States. Whether we make friends, I do not care."

Is it any wonder that already the nations that do not like us are screaming these words around the world?

It is a good thing for Mr. Dulles' personal feelings that he does not care whether he makes friends. Because in the entire period since he has been Secretary of State he has not made one friend in all this world.

Joseph Alsop, writing from Paris the other day, said Mr. Dulles is now the most disliked man in Europe since Joseph Stalin.

I want to give this message to the other nations of the world tonight:

Mr. Dulles does not represent the attitude of the American people. We say this to our friends around the world. The people of America certainly do care about your friendship.

We Americans do not try to buy the friendship of people with money, with gifts, or loans. Such precious things of the spirit as friendship, are not commodities for sale, vended like loaves of bread in the market place.

The Book of Books teaches that of faith, hope, and charity, the greatest is charity. But the gift without the giver is bare and foreign aid without a true spirit of friendship is no aid at all.

We need friends and we want friends in all of the four corners of the earth. I believe that the future of the human race on this planet lies not in belligerency, not in combat, not in mutual misunderstanding and hatred, but in friendship between all peoples.

I think that we should cultivate friendship abroad with all the peoples who are friendly with us and with some who are not too friendly. Courtesy is its own reward and friendship begets friendship. Fair treatment may bring fair treatment in return, but a cold, heartless, unfriendly treatment is certain to breed resentment in any portion of the world.

As the Proverbs say, "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall."

The latest manifestation of the utter collapse of the Dulles' policy is Syria. The effects of this coup in Syria are tragic. The devilishly clever Communist policy of selling low-cost weapons to nations astride petroleum delivery routes—Egypt which controls cheap waterborne transit and Syria which controls overland pipelines—has completely outwitted Mr. Dulles.

Last Sunday, America received the word that the Communists have taken over the Syrian Army, which is the principal power in that Arab State.

It will be interesting to see how Life and the other Republican news magazines translate this crushing defeat into another smashing victory for Mr. Dulles' bold brand of diplomacy.

Syria's alliance with the Reds means the Communists now outflank Turkey and the Baghdad Pact.

Jordan is further endangered.

The entire Middle East is in peril of falling to the Communists.

We Democrats have been gentle in our criticism of the foreign policy. Although we have been locked out of policy decisions by the Dulles refusal to reinstate bipartisan foreign policy, the Democrats have tried to cooperate where possible.

But with Syria's tragic fall, we have no choice but to call for the only reasonable step. America cannot afford to lose her friends across the world. America cannot afford the disintegration of NATO. America cannot afford loud but hollow bluffs followed by timid backdowns. America, my friends, cannot afford John Foster Dulles.

I demand, for the sake of the Nation and mankind, that Mr. Dulles resign.

We do not question, as the Republicans did, the loyalty or the desire for peace of a Secretary of State. Mr. Dulles is loyal but he is a bungler. He wants peace, but does not have a policy to achieve it. He is, in short, a tragic failure as Secretary of State.

We recall with sadness his empty and cynical campaign phrases. He would roll back the Iron Curtain. He would liberate the captive peoples. He would unleash Chiang Kai-shek; he would seize the initiative; he would agonizingly reappraise; he would instantly retaliate; he would have a dynamic, as opposed to static, policy.

The heroes of Hungary, crushed in blood, are mute testimony to the emptiness of Dulles' cynical, vote-getting boasts about liberating the captive peoples. Mr. Dulles insulted Israel and dissolved the grand alliance.

Mr. Dulles' timid, tiptoeing, retreating actions have proved the hollowness of every other slogan he has used.

The Communist menace is greater than ever today. The times call for greatness, not slogans.

We must get rid of this symbol of defeat, frustration, boastfulness, selfishness, and exasperation.

There stands here in New York Harbor the greatest beacon light to liberty in all this earth. The Statue of Liberty is a gift from the people of France to the people of the United States. We have fought four wars with the French people as our allies; our Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, and both World Wars. Does this ancient friendship mean nothing? Does the comradeship of Lafayette and Washington mean nothing? Do the French fleet and two French armies at Yorktown mean nothing? Do all the American boys sleeping on French soil mean nothing? No, Mr. Dulles, your formula of the unimportance of friendship is not the American formula. It is repugnant to our way of life. We are a friendly, gregarious people, liking each other and other people, and wanting them to like us in return.

We are a people of action, not vainglorious, not a boastful, arrogant people. The one word that characterizes an American above any other single word is "friendliness." Mr. Dulles' declaration would destroy our national character. We are not a sullen, surly, angry, unfriendly people.

Let us, then, extend anew the hand of genuine friendship and affection to all our old friends and allies, and to all our new friends, too. Let us make friendship the keystone of our foreign policy, as it is now of our national character.

Mr. Dulles is out of step with America; he must step out. Under new leadership, we will make American good will our frontline of defense. We will so treat our neighbors as to cause all the Free World to glow again with the old warmth; we will make American kindness and friendship the true mark of the new democracy. In that faith let us face the future unafraid. With love and hope and friendship in our hearts, the future is America's.

SENATE

Tuesday, August 27, 1957

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, strong to save, we lift our hearts to Thee in amazing wonder that Thou hast ordained for Thyself no completion without us, and for us no peace, no lasting joy, apart from Thee. In these convulsive days, when so many hopes are being dashed to the ground, so many dreams shattered, help us to rest our minds in Thee and in the strength of the everlasting values which nothing can destroy.

As we play our part in this age on ages telling, make us largehearted in helping and cautious in criticizing. Keep us from unkind words and from unkind silences, yet sure and strong in the faith that is in us, whenever and wherever we are called to stand. In this epic hour, may we strike our blow for the truth of God and the freedom of man. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

CHAMPION MEXICAN BASEBALL TEAM

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, on Friday, August 24, the Jack-the-giant-killer team from Monterrey, Mexico, won the Little League world series.

Angel Macias, a star performer who throws with either hand, pitched a perfect no-hit, no-run game against La Mesa, Calif. I might add that Angel can play any position on his team.

The odds against Angel and his fellow ball players were terrific. They were outweighed 35 pounds per man, and their average height was 5 inches less per man. When they left Monterrey 4 weeks ago, they were not conceded a chance.

But in the wonderful world of sports, victory does not always go to strength and size. There are other factors, which cannot be measured—stamina, inspiration, and the will to win.

The victory was an honor to the team, to Monterrey, and to the Republic of Mexico. But it was also an honor to the ideal that sports transcend national boundaries.

The United States is as proud of the winners as are the citizens of our sister Republic of Mexico.

This fine group of young men are in Washington today. They are here—without even intending to fulfill that role—as ambassadors of mutual good will and understanding.

Our heartiest congratulations go to them, to their fine outstanding coach, Cesar Faz, a native of San Antonio, Tex., and to the people of their country. This is international understanding at its best.

To commemorate this occasion, I ask unanimous consent that an article in the New York Times by Michael Strauss be printed in the Record as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Macias Hurls Perfect No Hitter as Monterrey Captures Series—Ambidextrous Mexican Stops La Mesa, 4–0, Striking Out 11 Batters in Little League Title Game

(By Michael Strauss)

Williamsport, Pa., August 23.—The final episode of a story that has the earmarks of a fairy tale was enacted at Memorial Park today. Monterrey, of Mexico, the Jack-the-giant-killer team, captured the Little League world series.

Beaten in today's final, played before a crowd of 10,000 that included Rear Adm. William R. Smedburg, Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy, was the La Mesa (Calif.) nine. The final count for the 6-inning fray was 4–0.

Adding luster to the almost unbelievable finish by the pint-sized band of Mexican boys was a perfect no hitter pitched by Angel Macias. The 5-foot, 88-pounder, who is ambidextrous, has demonstrated prowess at all positions.

A shortstop yesterday as the Mexicans were easing past Bridgeport, Conn., 2–1, Macias was nominated as today's hurler by Coach Cesar Faz. Pitching with his right hand, Macias stopped the Californians cold.

BATTERS DWARF MACIAS

Faced by batters who dwarfed his teammates and himself by 35 pounds and 5 inches per man, Macias breezed through in amazing style. Not a single ball was hit out of the infield as the Monterrey star personally took care of 11 of the 18 putouts via strikeouts.

The Mexicans, who showed signs of uprisings in several earlier innings, finally broke through in the fifth. All four runs crossed the plate in this frame. A ringing single off Enreque Suarez' bat was the key blow.

Today's victory by the Mexicans was the Little League organization's greatest success story in its 11-year history. Four weeks ago, when the Monterrey players began the dusty, 150-mile trip by bus to McAllen, Tex., for the opening playoff game, they weren't conceded a chance.

But the Monterrey boys fooled everyone. Their triumphant tour covered stops for playoffs in Corpus Christi, Fort Worth, and Louisville. When they arrived here Monday, a weary lot, they boasted a string of 11 victories.

The Mexicans averaged 92 pounds and 4 feet 11 inches. One of their regulars, Gerardo Gonzales, a key batter during the two-game series here, scaled only 64 pounds. This was in contrast to the 5 feet 4 inches and 127 pounds averaged by the California team.

Today the victors' task was surprisingly simple. Macias stopped such California sluggers as Joe McKirhan, who blasted two homers yesterday, and Frank Vogel. He retired the side in the final inning on strikes.

The game's only rally was begun when Lew Riley walked Ricardo Trevino to open the bottom half of the fifth. Before Riley could retire the side, nine more batters had paraded to the plate.

In addition to Suarez' important single and the base on balls to Trevino, the Mexicans put together another walk, a bunt single, a sacrifice, and two fielder's choice. Two errors added to the damage.

To celebrate the start of the game, all work ceased in the City of Monterrey (population 500,000) at 1 p. m. Whistles blew, sirens screamed, and citizens paraded through the streets. Loud speakers installed in the public squares kept the crowds apprised of the game's progress via a play-by-play telephoned from here.

The pregame celebration, according to the telephone report here, was minor compared to the tumult that broke loose when the final out was made. Fire engines raced through the streets with sirens roaring while crowds milled about the squares singing exultantly. To cap it all, Mexico's president, Adolfo Ruiz Cortines, said he was going to receive the team in the national palace in Mexico City.

Bridgeport won the third-place playoff this morning by defeating Escanaba (Mich.), 4 to 3.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend, the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to join the distinguished majority leader in extending congratulations to the Monterrey Little League baseball team. As the majority leader has pointed out, in the face of tremendous odds and great difficulties, the team was able to work its way into the finals, and then to defeat the La Mesa, Calif., team for the championship.

It is indeed heartening that we have such ambassadors in our midst today, and I express the hope that the good will these youngsters have emphasized in this country will be repeated many times over.

I express the further hope that because of the inspiration these courageous boys have given, it will not be too long before the major leagues in this country will consider extending into the Republic of Mexico.

As the majority leader has said, these youngsters are the best type of ambassadors, and what they have done has been to cement the good relations between the two sister republics, the United States of America and Mexico.

More power to them. To the Monterrey team and to their coach, Cesar Faz, I extend my best wishes and congratulations. I hope they come back again. I hope they win many, many more victories. We are proud of them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank my distinguished friend for his remarks.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the able and beloved acting minority leader.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator from Texas for yielding.

I merely wish to say that the distinguished minority leader, the senior Senator from California [Mr. Knowland], has been delayed by necessary business, and cannot be in his seat at this time. Were he here, I know he would join most heartily with the distinguished majority leader in congratulating and bidding welcome to the fine group from Mexico. On his behalf, as well as on behalf of all Members on this side of the aisle, I join the majority leader in the congratulations and welcome. I understand that the distinguished Vice President, now presiding, is entertaining this outstanding group for lunch and they have already been received by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank my distinguished friend, the acting minority leader.

Mr. SMATHERS subsequently said:

Mr. President, I wish to join with the distinguished majority leader in congratulating the Little League baseball team, from Monterrey, Mexico, which recently won the world championship. I think the fact that they have taken what is essentially a North American game, one which used to be played almost exclusively by the people of the United States, and not only adopted it, but perfected it to such an extent that they could defeat our very best teams is a great accomplishment in itself. It demonstrates again that our Latin friends have great ability, not the least of which is athletic ability.

I think the fact that the Mexico Little Leaguers won the championship foretells great things for the Washington Senators baseball team. For many years the Washington Senators have relied on Latin ballplayers. The team obviously has not had as many as it has needed. The team this year has not done so well as we would have liked. The team has had many distinguished Latin American players, and today has such as Camilo Pascual, Washington's top pitcher from Cuba, Pedro Ramos, another fine pitcher from Cuba, and Julio Bequer, first-base man, who I believe is from Mexico. If all the Washington Senators' baseball players were as good as these Latins, the Washington Senators would not be in the cellar today. The fact that the Little League team from Mexico could someday be transported en toto to Washington to represent us in the American League, I think, holds great hope for us. It may be that, through this means the development of young Latin players, the Washington Senators baseball team can come out of the cellar and once again achieve the rarified atmosphere of a first-division team, and who knows if we could get all these Monterrey boys, we might even win the championship.

THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, this can well be one of the most historic sessions of the Congress.

We anticipate that within a few hours the Senate will receive from the House of Representatives the compromise version of the civil-rights bill. Mr. President, it will be brought to the floor of the Senate with little delay.

The compromise which was reached in the House of Representatives is not completely satisfactory to anyone. It is a compromise which was reached because there had to be some give and take, and that is something which cannot be considered as just a one-way street.

Personally, Mr. President, I believe that the House version of the bill has less strength than the Senate version. The jury-trial version passed by this body was the product of great care and great precision. But it would be a great mistake to exaggerate the shortcomings of the House version of the bill. This is not the first time that I have agreed to accept proposed legislation less than completely satisfactory, and it will not be the last time. Every one of my colleagues has had that experience. We realize that none of us can pick up his marbles and walk away and expect to get exactly what he wants.

The House bill, in the form which I believe will finally be passed by both Houses, retains the Senate jury-trial provision intact, with a minor amendment. The allowable exceptions under the compromise would represent minor offenses, such as are handled without juries in local courts. It is my belief that under the provisions of the amendment no judge would lightly decide to hold a criminal-contempt trial without a jury. And, when we are dealing with realities, that is a factor of the greatest importance.

Mr. President, I believe it is of vital importance that a civil-rights bill be passed by the Congress this year. The Congress is acting in a mood of reason. But the atmosphere could easily be changed. If this bill dies, it is my firm belief and my deep-seated conviction that it will be many years before once again we can approach this question in a spirit of give and take. The result of superheated partisanship—and it would be inevitable, if this bill were killed—could be disastrous to this country and to every section of our beloved land.

Mr. President, all of us must realize that men have strong convictions on this issue. All of us must bow a bit if we are to have a reasonable solution, rather than a burning issue.

For that reason, I hope the House version of the bill will be considered intelligently and coolly, in the light of merit and justice to all.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to add a few words on my own to what the distinguished majority leader has just stated.

What appeals to me in the proposed civil-rights legislation which soon is to come before the Senate is that for the first time since I have been a Member of the Senate, and, in fact, for the first time since shortly after the Civil War, the Congress has been approaching the subject in a sincere attempt to find a way to cooperate in connection with one of the most important civil rights which exists, namely, the right to vote.

I believe that emphasis on the right to vote is the correct emphasis, instead of on the question of how to deal with those who interfere with the right to vote.

I was not in accord with the jury-trial amendment, but that aspect has now been worked out in a way that reflects an approach of friendly cooperation, in an effort to solve this problem, which for so long has divided our country, and this spirit of cooperation is the most encouraging sign we have had since my service in the Senate.

In the past endeavors have been made to do things by force. Mr. President, the attainment of ends of this type cannot be accomplished by force. It is essential to act through laws, but we cannot coerce a large section of the people to do that with which they do not thoroughly agree. The approach must be made from the point of view of give and take, and that is what I believe this bill involves.

From my own contacts with my distinguished friends who come from the South, I know they believe in the right to vote, and I know they believe this move is inevitable. I believe they will cooperate in seeing to it that the right to vote is possessed by all the American people.

I give great credit to the President of the United States for insisting from the beginning on the right to vote as the basic civil right. The Congress has heard arguments about other civil rights; but I was one of those who insisted upon having the bill limited to the right to vote. I think it is going to be one of the greatest accomplishments since the Civil War, for which credit is due to the leadership on both sides, in bringing about a new understanding and a new feeling of cooperation as between the two sections of the country affected by this issue.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I would be less than human if I did not express to the Senator my deep gratitude and tell him how affected I am by his generous expressions and his constant understanding and tolerance, as well as recognition of the grave problems which confront all the people of this country, instead of just the people of the State he represents.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator very much for his kind comments.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

LOY HENDERSON AND PROBLEMS IN THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, when the present Syrian crisis arose some days ago and we were all concerned about possible repercussions throughout the Middle East, it was certainly a source of great gratification to us all that the State Department saw fit to send one of our most distinguished career men, Mr. Loy W. Henderson, to keep close watch of the situation in the area.

Mr. Loy Henderson, Deputy Under Secretary for Administration in the Department of State, is now in the Near East attending a series of conferences on the Syrian situation. Secretary Henderson is one of the most experienced members of the Department, and one whose friendship I have cherished for many years.

In the Evening Star of August 26, there appeared an excellent article about Secretary Henderson and the outstanding service which he has rendered to the Department and to his country. I wish to add my own commendations and congratulations to others which Secretary Henderson has so richly merited.

I ask unanimous consent that the article from the Evening Star entitled "Loy Henderson Rates Toga of High Priest" be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOY HENDERSON RATES TOGA OF HIGH PRIEST

The high priest of the United States foreign service, Loy W. Henderson, is in Turkey today. His claque in Foggy Bottom and around the world is confident that the national interest is in good hands.

Mr. Henderson, whose foreign service status automatically expired when he became 65 last June 28, has remained on as Deputy Under Secretary of State for Administration by virtue of a Presidential appointment, another of an imposing list of honors.

For all his virtuosity in diplomacy, Mr. Henderson has managed to stay in the background for most of his career, while many men whom he launched on their careers have now come to be regarded as virtual patriarchs of the American diplomatic corps.

IN DEPARTMENT 35 YEARS

Experts on the Soviet Union, like George Kennan and Charles (Chip) Bohlen, for instance, are proteges of Mr. Henderson, who was Chargé d'Affaires in Moscow during much of World War II and also served on the policymaking level in Washington as Chief of the Office of East European Affairs during part of that period.

Mr. Henderson speaks Russian. He also is fluent in German.

He has been with the Department so long, 35 years last May, that he has had an opportunity to become truly expert in more than one general area. Assistant Secretaries now specializing in East European, Middle East, and Soviet affairs, are regular callers in Mr. Henderson's office, even though his job now concentrates on the administrative affairs of the State Department, the selection of personnel, the formation of budget requests for Congress, and other housekeeping chores.

TALENT FOR TRAINING MEN

Most Department men who know him attribute to Mr. Henderson an unobtrusive charm and a quality for getting the most and best out of other men, besides the capacity for prodigious work and long hours.

A great many of the United States ambassadors and Assistant Secretaries were brought up from obscurity by the Administrative Under Secretary. This is partly inescapable, because of Mr. Henderson's early ascendancy in the Department and his long service.

But those who know him best believe that he has a special talent for training new men of ability.

It is typical of his self-effacing nature—a deliberately cultivated quality which he thinks all Foreign Service officers serving the Secretary of State and President should develop, that newsmen did not even learn of his important trip to Istanbul last weekend until he had been out of the country more than 24 hours.

He eschews the flamboyant.

MENTOR TO TRUMAN

Ambassadors are the conductors for American policy, not its makers, he believes. And he has a pervading suspicion of ambassadors who project themselves into the limelight while they are negotiating in the United States interest abroad.

Mr. Henderson, for instance, is at least as much responsible for the Truman doctrine's formulation as any other American. He was in the top operating job which devised the American response when Great Britain decided it could no longer continue the burden. But he gets little of the credit today.

When Iran was torn by its difficulties with Britain over oil interests there, Mr. Henderson spent long, patient hours at the bedside of the then Premier Mohammed Mossadegh, the sick man of many tears, working out a formula to get Iran's oil flowing again—and to hold the Communist Tudeh party at arm's length.

With all his human traits Mr. Henderson is a formal type. He seldom calls people by their first name, even those many decades his junior. Others call him "Loy," to which he does not object.

FREQUENTLY CONSULTED

His associates do resent one of his most consistent habits. When they bring problems to him for decision after days and weeks of research, they have come almost to expect him to make suggestions for American action which often come closer to meeting all the demands of American policy than their own.

The administrative job he now holds restricts his effectiveness as a policymaker. But when trouble breaks—almost anywhere in the Eurasian land mass—Mr. Henderson is consulted at great length. If a special emissary is needed, the Assistant Secretaries bring up his name first, especially if the Middle East is involved.

Since becoming administrative chief he has represented President Eisenhower at two Baghdad pact conferences, at the Cairo conference following the Suez seizure, and now in the consultations on Syria.

Although he is past 65 and compulsorily retired from the foreign service, State Department officials expect the hardy Mr. Henderson to be available for special jobs for many years to come.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I should like to join in what the distinguished senior Senator from New Jersey has said about Loy Henderson. He is a great diplomat and certainly a credit to this country. If anyone is to find a solution to the situation in the Near East, especially as it appertains to the Arabic countries, that man is Loy Henderson. I think Secretary of State Dulles is to be commended for having the foresight to send Mr. Henderson to the Middle East to see what can be done to alleviate the situation as it exists at the present time. We know the Middle East is an area of great danger. We are extremely fortunate in having a man of Loy Henderson's ability looking into the situation at firsthand at this time and I commend the Senator from New Jersey for his remarks and the Secretary of State for his wisdom in dispatching this able diplomat to this particular hot spot.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator for his kind remarks.

DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENT—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT REGARDING FORMER AMBASSADOR TO LUXEMBOURG

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on yesterday I made a speech about ambassadorial appointments. In my remarks I said, in part:

> The travail of Ambassador Gluck has also focused attention on the problem of absences from duty of our ambassadors. It took me several months this year to get from the Department of State figures on absences from posts. I became interested in this matter because a former Ambassador to Luxembourg spent 264 days away from his post over a period of 2 years, for reasons which had nothing to do with foreign relations or illness.

Mr. President, I was mistaken in my remarks. I find now on the basis of information I have just received, that nonduty time to be attributed to our former Ambassador to Luxembourg is only one-half of the period I referred to on yesterday. I find that Ambassador Buchanan did not use 41 days of this home leave in 1956, and that in 1955 he returned to the United States for 16 days because of the illness and death of his father-in-law.

I wish to take this means to apologize to Ambassador Buchanan for any hurt or inconvenience I may have caused him. I am glad, in fairness to Mr. Buchanan, to make this statement in the Senate and thus rectify the error I made on yesterday.

INTERCONTINENTAL BALLISTIC MISSILE

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I desire to comment briefly on the announcement by the Soviet Union that it has successfully tested an intercontinental ballistic missile. Regardless of how accurate the Soviet claim may be in detail, it should still cause us grave concern.

I would remind the Senate just why we cannot discount this latest revelation of Russian progress in weapons development. The simple fact is that similar announcements on the A-bomb and H-bomb were promptly confirmed in fact.

We know that the Soviets have made amazing progress in the ballistic missile field. Our own officials concede this. The statement yesterday by the Soviet Union confirms once again the warning some of us have been sounding for a long time—the Soviets are ahead of this country in the race for the intermediate range or 1,500-mile ballistic missile. At best, they are in a neck and neck race with us for the intercontinental ballistic or 5,500-mile missile.

Mr. President, this is a good time to bring home to the American people something they have a right to know. Despite the highest priority that has been given the ballistic missile program, the target dates for our achievement of operational missiles, both the 1,500 mile and the 5,500 mile, have been postponed. We will not be getting these weapons nearly as early as had been previously anticipated. There has been a substantial slippage in the progress of our research and development on these weapons.

As we all know, the Defense Department is now engaged in a general cutback of defense programs. In this cutback even the ballistic missile program—despite its priority—has not been spared. Whatever the accuracy of the Russian claim, I hope it will arouse the Defense Department to put the ballistic missile program back on the track and give it once again the all-out effort it demands.

Perhaps the Russians have rendered us something of a service—that is, if the Defense Department will take heed of the danger. The Soviet announcement should be the signal to the defense administrators to reverse the missile slowdown. It should spur the administration to maintain a resolute effort to win the races for discovery of vital new weapons.

CHICAGO TO GET ENLARGED, MODERN PASSPORT OFFICE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I am delighted by the announcement there will be a new up-to-date passport office in Chicago, and in that connection I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record an article from the Chicago Sunday Tribune which relates to this matter.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Chicago Sunday Tribune of August 25, 1957]

Chicago To Get Enlarged, Modern Passport Office—New Streamlined Quarters To Be Ready by October 1

(By William W. Yates)

Chicagoans are in for a surprise come October 1. On that date a new passport office should be operating in the United States courthouse—an office as attractive and modern as an airline ticket office. Deep coral, rose, beige, warm gray and ciel blue will combine with natural blonde, platinum or gray driftwood to provide an atmosphere in sharp contrast to the rest of the Federal building, and start the traveler on his way in an atmosphere in keeping with modern transportation.

The present crowded quarters in room 252—tucked neatly away in a corridor extremely difficult to find—will be enlarged more than 100 percent. Of course, if you've been there before, you can always follow your nose, for the passport agency is directly beyond the lunchroom from which emanate the odors of cooking food throughout the day.

But once inside the new offices you'll forget about this, for they'll be air conditioned.

The present jampacked quarters will give way to a public area that will permit seating, provide writing tables and a modern, zigzag counter for applicants and witnesses, each space separated in such a way that privacy will be provided each applicant.

There will be a seating area for 20 persons and a sitdown writing area for 26 persons. Tables will be spotted between every third or fourth seat. A large world map and murals will be worked into the wall decorative scheme.

Upright columns will be of deep coral, walls tinted a rose beige, the floor tile a warm gray flecked with coral, ceilings a light tint of the basic color. Formica tops on the counters and tables will be blond or platinum. Upholstery will be coral and ciel blue plastics, replacing the traditional heavy and more expensive leather used in most Government offices. Adequate work areas for the agency staff will replace present crowded quarters that barely enable people to move around.

The force behind all this change is a chic, strawberry blond. She is Frances G. Knight, a career Government employee since 1936 who became chief of the State Department's passport division in 1955. She believes that Government should be as forward thinking as modern business—not wait until a crisis has developed—and that it should sell itself just as business does.

Things haven't been the same since she took over. First change came when this slender, blue-eyed miss succeeded in moving the Passport Office out of its dilapidated and antiquated Civil War Washington headquarters into a modern, streamlined department in new quarters. Then she streamlined and modernized the New York agency and moved on to Los Angeles, where now you might suspect you were in the office of a plush travel agency instead of a Government bureau. Chicago is now undergoing a transformation, and New Orleans and Boston are next on the list.

Lest you think this is all another burden on the taxpayer, dispel the idea at once. She's accomplishing the changes within her budget allotted by Congress. And in addition, her agency is one of the few that returns a profit to the Federal Government—about $2½ million annually.

"Every time you suggest something new in government it is like dropping a bomb," Miss Knight said in Chicago last week. "I've run into a lot of opposition but I've also had a lot of help. Many people regard Congress as an ogre which constantly opposes improvements. That isn't so. Congress has only to be shown a justified need and it will willingly provide money for the remedy."

It could be this pretty gal's appearance disarms the Budget Bureau and the Civil Service Commission, but her theories work out, for she's been given funds to get adequate new quarters, buy modern machinery, consolidate files into a modern system, and increase her working force.

A great deal of her present program springs from a woman's distaste for the drab and from outmoded systems. But more than that is her belief that the passport division must be ready for the jet age, a phrase which she didn't coin but which she popularized around Washington in her appearances before Congressional committees.

We're entering a new age of travel and speed which is going to make it possible for almost everyone in the country to visit places and see things never dreamed about. It won't be long before we will need a million passports a year to handle America's travel needs.

This year the passport agency has issued 560,000 of the little green books. Ten years ago the figure was 202,000. And concerning those little green books, she's even thinking now of a more attractive passport, done in plastic, where the glycerin in the ink won't rub off. But that is at least several hurdles and a couple of years ahead.

April was the heaviest month in the agency's history, with 82,000 applications filed. Despite widespread publicity on cases of persons whose passport rights were challenged on security grounds, this lady, who has virtually the final word on issuance or denial of passports, said there has been only one turndown for security reasons this year.

She said no place in the world will be more than 20 hours away with the new jet transports that will travel up to 600 miles an hour, expected in 1960. They will carry 150 passengers and will be able to make three transatlantic crossings in the time it now takes to make two.

Women are her best customers and biggest headaches, she admits wryly. They get 56 percent of all passports issued. They also nullify their passports with amazing regularity with nail polish, cigarette burns and mutilations, that lodge with amazing frequency across the year of their birth. Men aren't wholly innocent. "They keep copious notes including dress sizes, telephone numbers, and sure-fire systems for beating roulette in their passports," she added.

She gets many a chuckle out of her work. A young woman sent in a passport photo of herself in a WAC uniform. When it was returned with a request for a photograph out of uniform, she submitted a picture of herself in the nude.

Miss Knight is widely traveled. She has visited the 48 States and Hawaii and made business or pleasure trips to 34 foreign countries. She's a graduate of the New York University School of Journalism and speaks French, German, and Czechoslovakian in addition to English. She is married to Wayne W. Parrish, publisher of aviation magazines. Her Government career dates back to 1936 when she became a division chief of the old National Recovery Administration.

Despite the sweeping changes for good she has effected in her department, her most startling thinking to many was a comment some time ago that the law doesn't require that a passport picture make you look like a thug.

"I was well acquainted with the gag that if you looked like your passport picture you needed a trip, but I was unprepared for the preponderance of thug-like pictures I've had to process," she continued.

"People needn't smile or look slaphappy, but if they want to smile naturally, why not? A normal, relaxed photograph is a far better identification of a passport holder than a scowling mug shot."

Meanwhile, if you want to see what this energetic lady is doing, drop into the passport agency after October 1 and you'll find out.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Smathers in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

William Francis Quinn, of Hawaii, to be Governor of the Territory of Hawaii; and

Ordered, That when the Senate proceeds to the consideration of H. R. 2474, the postal field service employees pay-increase bill, debate on any amendment, motion, or appeal, except a motion to lay on the table, shall be limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the mover of any such amendment, motion, or appeal and the majority leader: Provided, That in the event the majority leader is in favor of any such amendment, motion, or appeal, the time in opposition thereto shall be controlled by the minority leader or some Senator designated by him: Provided further, That no amendment that is not germane to the provisions of the said bill shall be received, with the following exception, namely, that it may be in order to offer as an amendment to the said bill the language embraced in H. R. 2462, the Federal Employees Salary Increase Act of 1957, to which germane amendments may be offered under the same limitation of debate and control of time applicable in the case of H. R. 2474.

Ordered further, That on the question of the final passage of the said bill debate shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled, respectively, by the majority and minority leaders: Provided, That the said leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the said bill, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, motion, or appeal.

I should like to make it abundantly clear that if this is agreed to and unanimous consent is given, the order would take effect when and if we called up the postal pay increase bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered.

CRITICISM OF THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in these times, when, someone has said, there is a tendency for some people to become irrational and really fly off on a tangent, we have to remember that if history teaches us anything it is the need to have issues of political power settled by legal rather than physical coercion. By now we should surely be able to see that there can be no Constitution without law administered through the Highest Court. This necessarily presupposes respect for and compliance with the law declared by the Court. In a real controversy, an appeal is made to law, and the issue must be left entirely to the judgment of the High Tribunal, not to the personal judgments of those interested.

At the present time, Mr. President, the Damascus coup points clearly to the essence of Soviet policy in the Middle East. This is another reason why we should keep our balance. We know the Eisenhower doctrine was not made to fit into the facts as they exist in that situation. Nevertheless, the facts are clear that we are not surrendering our principles.

I shall place in the RECORD shortly a statement in relation to the new Russian development of the intercontinental missile, which also calls for us to think and think clearly on these matters.

Mr. President, I was very much interested in an article in the magazine of the New York Times entitled, "Is The Criticism of the High Court Valid?" written by Bernard Schwartz. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS THE CRITICISM OF THE HIGH COURT VALID?

(By Bernard Schwartz)

WASHINGTON.—During the past generation, there has been a profound change in the manner in which Americans have tended to regard the Supreme Court. Until recently, the attitude of most of us toward our highest judicial institution recalled with singular fidelity that with which, according to Burke, Englishmen of a century and a half ago should have looked upon the political system of their country: "We ought to understand it according to our measure; and to venerate where we are not able to understand."

Yet, if to our grandfathers and our fathers the functioning of the Supreme Court was a sacred mystery of American statesmanship, in our own day the pendulum has swung all the way to the opposite extreme. Veneration has, all too often, given way to vituperation, and the high tribunal has been subject to more than its share of purely partisan censure and attack.

In this current atmosphere of criticism, it should be noted that it is one thing to censure specific Court decisions as unduly extreme and quite another to denounce the Justices on purely personal grounds and to seek to destroy the effectiveness of the Court itself as an institution. To be sure, no governmental organ in a democratic society should be above and beyond criticism. Yet criticism to be fruitful should be based upon understanding. In the case of the Supreme Court, there has been all too little comprehension among its extreme critics of the vital role which the Court has to play in a constitutional system such as ours.

Bryce tells the story an intelligent Englishman, who, having heard that our Supreme Court was created to protect the Constitution, and had authority given it to annul unconstitutional laws, spent 2 days in hunting up and down our organic document for the provisions he had been told to admire. It is no wonder that he did not find them, for there is not a single word in the Constitution on the subject.

Yet, though the Founding Fathers did not speak specifically about the cardinal function of the High Court in guarding the ark of the Constitution, their intent is actually as clear as though they had such express provision. This results from the very theory of a written organic instrument.

The whole purpose of the Constitution, it should not be forgotten, is to establish limits which are not to be transcended by the departments of Government. Its restrictions may often seem to many as undue restraints upon the popular will at a given time. But that is the very essence of constitutionalism. It is the peculiar purpose of a written constitution to classify certain things as legal fundamentals; these fundamentals may not be changed except by the slow and cumbersome process of constitutional amendment.

The people themselves have decided, in constitutional convention assembled, to limit themselves in the exercise of the complete sovereign power which they would otherwise possess in a representative democracy. And it is precisely these limitations that enable those subject to governmental authority to appeal from the people drunk to the people sober in periods of excitement and hysteria.

If the limitations contained in the Constitution are to be given full effect, their enforcement must not be controlled by every shift in popular whims. A system such as ours, based upon a written Constitution, can hardly be effective in practice without an authoritative judicial arbiter of constitutional issues.

Addressing the court in one of the great state trials of Stuart England, the attorney general of Charles I asked, "Shall any say, the King cannot do this? No, we may only say, he will not do this." It was precisely to insure that, in our system, we would be able to say, "The State cannot do this," that we enacted a written Constitution containing basic limitations upon the powers of government.
