In other words, one who intimidates, threatens, or coerces a voter, or even attempts to intimidate, threaten, or coerce him, may, under the provisions of this statute, be prosecuted. He may be prosecuted, not only if his purpose is to interfere with the right of such other person to vote, but also if his purpose is to interfere as to the person for whom such other person may wish to vote.

Mr. President, are there teeth in this statute? There certainly are. This statute provides that anyone who intimidates, threatens, or coerces, or attempts to intimidate, threaten, or coerce, any other person, or attempts to interfere with his voting for whomever he wishes to vote for, can be prosecuted in a Federal court and can be fined $1,000 or sentenced to a prison term of 1 year. Do not those provisions constitute teeth and strength in the existing law? Of course they do.

If there is in the United States, today, any person who is having any trouble in exercising his voting right, again I say that all he has to do is contact the Department of Justice or the district attorney in his home State, and action can be taken under this Federal law to punish any person who interferes with his right to vote.

Inasmuch as section 594 is an existing Federal statute on that subject, why is it necessary to enact another Federal statute dealing with the right to vote? It would be absolutely useless, unnecessary, and futile to enact another Federal statute on that subject; it would be a great mistake to do so, especially in view of the fact that such a statute would be unconstitutional.

Mr. President, please understand that I do not even concede that the Federal Government has a right to enter this field. Instead, I believe that these matters should be handled by the respective States. However, the Federal Government is already in this field—under the provisions of section 594, by means of which a person can be fined as much as $1,000 or put in jail for as long as one year, if he tries to interfere with the right of someone else to vote.

Since the Federal Government already is in this field, why should another Federal law on the same subject be enacted?

Mr. President, every day that passes, the Federal Government, here in Washington, D. C., is whittling away the rights of the States. It hurts me to see the Federal Government invade fields which are reserved to the States. I deeply regret that a bigger and more powerful Federal Government is being built up in Washington, D. C. This Central Government has become tremendously top-heavy. I should like to see the States have more power.

Since World War II, the Communists have taken over approximately 17 countries. In doing so, they did not invade by means of troops using bayonets and tanks; those countries were not taken over in that way by the Communists. Instead, the Communists proceeded by way of infiltration. Poland was taken over by the Communists with the aid of some of the Poles. Czechoslovakia was taken over by the Communists with the aid of some of the Czechs. China was taken over by the Communists with the aid of some of the Chinese. The Communists have been able to infiltrate into the central governments; they have been able to worm their way into the police systems, and then into the election systems. Then, before one could realize it, the countries were taken over by the Communists.

Mr. President, why have the Communists been able to take over those countries? Since the end of World War II, they have been able to take over 17 countries, with populations totaling between 600 million and 800 million. The Communists have been able to do that because each of those countries has had a strong central government; and when the Communists obtained control of that central government, they were able to take over control of the entire country.

Mr. President, the more we in the United States build up power in a strong central government, the more risk we run from the standpoint of subversive activities and infiltration. If the people of the United States have the vision to keep the 48 States strong—each with its own election laws and its own police system—there will be no way by means of which the United States can be taken over by subversion. But if more and more power is given to our Central Government, after a while the States will be nothing but territories, and will not have any power.

Mr. President, the so-called civil-rights bill which the Congress is about to pass would simply take power away from the States and would give it to the Federal Government.

A Senator might say, "I should vote for the bill because it will help me in the elections." Mr. President, Senators had better begin to think more about the welfare and safety of their country, and less about the elections.

Mr. President, I am convinced that we must protect the States. The Constitution now protects them; but the Supreme Court and the Congress and the executive branch of the Government have been taking steps—by handing down decisions, passing laws, and issuing regulations and edicts—which violate the rights of the States and take away from the States the power they have.

Mr. President, this development cannot continue to occur, if our country is to be safe. I am disturbed for the safety of my country.

I am a brigadier general in the Army Reserve and if our country becomes engaged in an armed conflict, I am ready to serve. But we must keep our country stronger, or we shall find it engaged in conflict.

One of the ways to weaken it is to weaken the States, as we are doing today, and to keep taking away the powers of the States and building up a powerful Central Government in Washington. It is the greatest mistake in the world. It was not contemplated when our Constitution was written.

Our forefathers decided they would delegate a few powers to the Federal Government, and they spelled them out in the Constitution. All one has to do is to get the Constitution and read it. It spells out just what powers the Congress has, what powers the Federal Government has, but all other powers are reserved to the States and to the people thereof. At the rate we are going now, we will not have any States after a while. The Federal Government will have all the power.

Mr. President, some time ago I read a book by a man by the name of James Jackson Kilpatrick, of Richmond, Va., printed by the Henry Regner Co., of Chicago, entitled "The Sovereign States."

I wish every American could read this book. I am going to read some excerpts from it today. I should like to have Senators listen to some of the passages in this book. This man is a great writer, a true patriot, and a great American.

First, I am going to read a passage by John C. Calhoun, one of the five alltime great Senators, recently selected to have his portrait placed in the Senate reception room. John C. Calhoun, I think, is one of the greatest men this country has produced. I nominated him to be selected to have his portrait placed here, and I am proud the committee selected it. He was a man who had keen vision and a proper conception of the Constitution.

There is one page in the beginning of the book by him that I want to read; it is very short.

This is what he says:

FOREWORD

> The great and leading principle is, that the General Government emanated from the people of the several States, forming distinct political communities, and acting in their separate and sovereign capacity, and not from all of the people forming one aggregate political community; that the Constitution of the United States is, in fact, a compact, to which each State is a party, in the character already described; and that the several States, or parties, have a right to judge of its infractions; and in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of power not delegated, they have the right, in the last resort, to use the language of the Virginia resolutions, "to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties appertaining to them."
>
> This right of interposition, thus solemnly asserted by the State of Virginia, be it called what it may—State right, veto, nullification, or by any other name—I conceive to be the fundamental principle of our system, resting on facts historically as certain as our revolution itself, and deductions as simple and demonstrative as that of any political or moral truth whatever; and I firmly believe that on its recognition depend the stability and safety of our political institutions.

> JOHN C. CALHOUN.
>
> FORT HILL, July 26, 1831.

This was John C. Calhoun.

He wrote that at Fort Hill, and if any Senators want to know where it is, it is at Simpson College. In fact, his home was at the college.

Mr. President, my statement was that Fort Hill is at Simpson College in South Carolina. Of course, that is the greatest college in the United States.

This book on the sovereign State was written, as I have said, by James J. Kilpatrick. First, I want to take up his introduction, and then I want to present some excerpts from the book:

INTRODUCTION

> Among the more melancholy aspects of the genteel world we live in is a slow decline in the enjoyment that men once found in the combat of ideas, free and unrestrained. Competition of any sort, indeed, seems to be regarded these days, in our schools and elsewhere, as somehow not in very good taste. Under the curious doctrines of the Fair Trade Act, vigorous salesmanship is unfair, and retailers are enjoined against discommoding their fellows. Mr. Stevenson's criticism of the administration's foreign policy, during the last presidential campaign, was not that the policies were so very wrong: they were not bipartisan. With a few robust exceptions, our writers paint in pastels; our political scholars write a sort of ruffled-sleeve, harpsichord prose. We duel with soft pillows, or with buttoned foils; our ideas have lace on them; we are importuned to steer, with moderation, down the middle of the road.
>
> These chamber music proprieties I acknowledge, simply to say, now, that the essay which follows should not be misunderstood. May it please the court, this is not a work of history; it is a work of advocacy. The intention is not primarily to inform, but to exhort. The aim is not to be objective; it is to be partisan.
>
> I plead the cause of States rights.
>
> My thesis is that our Union is a Union of States; that the meaning of this Union has been obscured, that its inherent value has been debased and all but lost.
>
> I hold this truth to be self-evident: That government is least evil when it is closest to the people. I submit that when effective control of government moves away from the people, it becomes a greater evil, a greater restraint upon liberty.
>
> My object is not to prove that the powers and functions of government have grown steadily more centralized, more remote from the people, for that proposition requires no proof; it requires only that one open one's eyes. Rather, my intention is to plead that the process of consolidation first be halted, then reversed, toward the end that our Federal Government may be strictly limited to its constitutional functions and the States may again be encouraged to look after their own affairs, for good or ill.
>
> A long time ago, the geometric mind of Edmund Pendleton offered a theorem. The State and Federal Governments, he said, must follow the path of parallel lines. Others have conceived the relationship in terms of spheres, separate but touching. The idea, when all this began, was that neither authority would encroach upon the other; and in the beginning, it was more feared that the States would usurp Federal powers than the other way around.
>
> Now the rights and powers of the States are being obliterated. The encroachments of the Federal Government have widened its road to a highway and narrowed the road of the States to a footpath. Having deceptively added a dimension to the Federal line, the broad constructionsts declare their faithful adherence to the plans of the original draftsmen. Soon, a geometry unknown to Pendleton can proclaim the apparent miracle of parallels that meet this side of infinity.
>
> I do not know that the sovereign powers of the States may be regained at all. Justice Salmon P. Chase once remarked, with great satisfaction, that State sovereignty died at Appomattox. But I do most earnestly believe that an effort must be made to regain these powers. The alternative is for American Government to grow steadily more centralized, steadily more remote from the people, steadily more monolithic and despotic.
>
> Only the States themselves can make the effort; which is to say, only the people of the States. Only if the citizens of Virginia, as Virginians; or of Texas, as Texans; or of Iowa, as Iowans, insist upon a strict obedience to the spirit of the 10th amendment, can the Federal juggernaut be slowed. Only if the people evidence a determination once more to do for themselves can the essential vitality of a responsible and resourceful society be restored.
>
> I do not despair. So long as the I-beams and rafters of the Constitution remain undisturbed, the ravages of Federal encroachment may be repaired. A latent yearning for personal liberty, an inherited resentment against the authoritarian state, a drowsing spirit of independence—these may yet be awakened.
>
> But again, the States, as States, will have to do it.
>
> It will not be easy. In many influential quarters, it will not be popular. It is a sweet narcotic that centralists sell.
>
> Yet there is high example to be found in what the States have done before to preserve their identity. They have not always been spineless. In times past they have resisted, now successfully, now unsuccessfully; but even in their failures, something has been gained merely in the assertion of State convictions.
>
> My purpose here is first to examine the bases of State sovereignty; then to follow the State and Federal relationship from its beginnings under the Articles of Confederation through its refinement in the Constitution; next to review some of the comment on the role the States were expected to play. The place of the States scarcely had been fixed, it will be submitted, before advocates of consolidation began to whittle it down—first in the Chisholm case, which led to the 11th amendment, and more memorably in the Alien and Sedition Acts, which led to the "Doctrine of '98" and the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of that year. It is proposed to follow this doctrine of the States' "right to interpose," in its various forms and applications down through the years, with particular emphasis upon the dangers of judicial encroachment and the need for State resistance against it. Finally, I have in mind to marshal some of the evidence which supports the case for the South in its immediate conflict with Federal authority, and to review other recent events that seem to me usurpations of the States' reserved powers.
>
> So much, then for the plan of this book. The political heirs of Alexander Hamilton and John Marshall will not care much for it.
>

> RICHMOND, VA., September 1956.

That was the introduction to the book The Sovereign States, by James J. Kilpatrick. James J. Kilpatrick is one of the greatest editors in the Nation today. I will read certain excerpts from the book, beginning on page 3. First I will read a quotation opposite page 3:

> The States within the limitations of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the 10th amendment, "reserved," are as independent of the General Government as the General Government, within its sphere, is > independent of the States. (Justice Samuel Nelson, Collector v. Day (1871).)

Mr. Kilpatrick has done a fine job and rendered a great service to this country in writing this book:

> "The true distinction," said Mr. Pendleton, with some irritation, "is that the two governments are established for different purposes, and act on different objects."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to here yield to the distinguished Senator from Louisiana, for a question.

Mr. LONG. Did I correctly understand the Senator to make the statement that, according to the preface or introduction to the book, the book would be displeasing to those who agreed with Alexander Hamilton, who was one of the authors of the Federalist Papers, the forerunner of the American Constitution?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct. The editor said that the political heirs of Alexander Hamilton and John Marshall would not care much for the book.

Alexander Hamilton was a great American, but his philosophy was different from that of Thomas Jefferson. They were both great Americans, but Alexander Hamilton believed more in the theory of a strong Central Government, with the power residing in Washington. Thomas Jefferson's idea was that the power should remain with the States, and that only so much power should be given to the Federal Government as was necessary to perform its functions as delineated in the Constitution.

The Senator has probably read many books about Hamilton. In one of such books his philosophy is described in this way:

> Speaking of education, Alexander Hamilton's thought was to select some of the brightest young men and educate them, to make them leaders. Thomas Jefferson's philosophy was to give all an opportunity, and let the leaders rise where they would.

So, when Kilpatrick wrote this statement I am confident that he was contrasting the philosophy of Hamilton more or less with that of Thomas Jefferson.

Hamilton was a very able man, one of the greatest Americans this country has produced; but his philosophy, as the Senator well knows from studying his life and history, was different from that of Thomas Jefferson.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Is it the view of the Senator that Alexander Hamilton would ever for a moment have approved of any proposal whereby an American accused of a crime would have been denied the right to present his case before a jury of impartial people who would hear the case, judge the evidence, and find him guilty or innocent?

Mr. THURMOND. In reply, I will say no. I think Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson both would have approved of trial by jury. They were both delegates to the Constitutional Convention, and they both rendered magnificent service in many ways.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator will further yield, I believe he will find that Thomas Jefferson was not a delegate to the Constitutional Convention.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, did the Senator yield for a question or a statement?

Mr. LONG. The Senator yielded for a question.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana for a question.

The Senator is correct about Thomas Jefferson. I had in mind Madison.

Mr. LONG. Does not the Senator realize that Thomas Jefferson was not a delegate to the Constitutional Convention? The Senator is perhaps confusing the Constitutional Convention with the convention which adopted the Declaration of Independence. Thomas Jefferson was the drafter of the American Declaration of Independence. Is not the Senator perhaps confusing the Constitutional Convention with the fact that Thomas Jefferson was one of those who participated in drafting the Declaration of Independence? Thomas Jefferson was the American Ambassador to France at the time the Constitution was drafted.

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct. Thomas Jefferson was Ambassador to France, but Alexander Hamilton was a delegate from New York State, and he signed the Constitution. In fact, he was the only delegate from New York State who signed the Constitution.

When I spoke a few minutes ago about Jefferson, I was thinking about Madison. Madison signed the Constitution, as did Blair. Both were from Virginia. George Washington presided over the Convention.

Mr. LONG. Is there any doubt in the Senator's mind that, so far as Alexander Hamilton was concerned, he would never for a moment have contested the right of any citizen to be tried before a jury if he were accused of a crime?

Mr. THURMOND. I agree. If he had taken any other position, he would not have signed the Constitution.

As I have stated, Alexander Hamilton was the only delegate from the State of New York who signed the Constitution as representing the State of New York. In the original Constitution, article III, section 2, provided for jury trial.

Mr. LONG. Is it not, therefore, true that insofar as the right of a citizen to be tried by jury for a crime is concerned, Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson would have agreed 100 percent that the freedoms guaranteed Americans under their form of government included the right to be tried by a jury of their own neighbors, in the area where the crime was committed, in the event they were accused of committing a crime?

Mr. THURMOND. I can yield only for a question. I shall be glad to express myself after the Senator has concluded. Let the Senator ask any question he wishes. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not correct to state that, although the book from which the Senator is reading may not reflect the views of Alexander Hamilton, it is nevertheless correct to state that Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson would both have agreed that anyone accused of a crime should have the right to be tried before a jury of his neighbors?

Mr. THURMOND. I thoroughly agree. In my judgment, if Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson were living today, and both were Members of the Senate, both would be fighting for the right to a jury trial, as provided in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be glad to yield for a further question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not correct to say that so far as we can determine there has never been a man who served in this body, and who was regarded as a great statesman, who has ever at any time advocated that American citizens should be denied their right to be tried by a jury in the event they were accused of committing a crime against the United States or against a State?

Mr. THURMOND. I think the able Senator is eminently correct. I do not know of a great man in our history, any man whom I would consider great, whose name is on the lips of the people—I cannot think of a single one in our history who would take a position in opposition to jury trials.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not correct to paraphrase more or less the words of Shakespeare, that those American politicians who have fought against the freedom of Americans to be tried by a jury when accused of a crime have been politicians who more or less strutted and strutted their brief hour on the stage to be heard from no more?

Mr. THURMOND. I do not think any man who takes a stand against giving a person a jury trial will be long remembered after he has gone or when his record is searched and it is found that he opposed a jury trial. I think we would immediately call for a reappraisal of his whole life in the event he had been considered a great man previous to that time.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not true that men like George Norris, William Borah, and Robert M. La Follette, who fought through the years for the right of trial by jury, have statues standing in the Hall of Fame in the Capitol Building?

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is eminently correct. In fact, there is a quotation from George Norris which I read last night. If I can put my hand on it I should like to read it to the Senator from Louisiana. I have never read a stronger statement in behalf of a jury trial. He said that in all cases a man should have a jury trial. The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and I introduced a bill in March to provide the very type of jury trial which Senator Norris recommended.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a further question.

Mr. LONG. The Senator from South Carolina having made a great study of all these matters involving jury trials, the freedom of Americans, and States rights, can he now name from memory a single one of those Senators who made a fight down through the years to deny American citizens of the right of trial by jury?

Mr. THURMOND. I could not name a single man whom I considered a great man or a great Senator who opposed jury trials.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator recall the names of any Americans who have served in this body and who have made a fight against the right of a man accused of a crime to be tried by a jury? Can the Senator offhand recall the name of any such person?

Mr. THURMOND. I cannot recall the name of any American of any stature within my recollection who has opposed jury trials.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a further question.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator aware of the fact that Senator Borah's statue is just outside the main entrance of the Senate Chamber, immediately outside the door?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct. I see it every time I go through the door.

Mr. LONG. Is the Senator aware of the fact that Senator William E. Borah, a great constitutional lawyer, even though he came from a very small Western State, population considered, was seriously considered by the Republican Party as its nominee for the Presidency of the United States?

Mr. THURMOND. I have been told that. I did not know the Senator personally; only through reputation. But I know he was a great American. He declared on April 8, 1930:

> I am not contending here that labor organizations can at any time employ threats, force, or violence or intimidation. They must keep within the law—

He was referring there to jury trials in labor cases.

I have a long report including a speech by Senator Norris on May 2, 1930. I read it last night——

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question at that point?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not true that those who oppose the right of jury trials are basically those who do not believe in the freedoms that Americans enjoy under the Constitution?

Mr. THURMOND. I certainly agree with the Senator. I think the jury trial is one of the greatest freedoms we have. I look upon it as the heart of the Bill of Rights.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not true that persons who fear that juries may not convict guilty persons are those who really have very little confidence in the determination of people to uphold free government?

Mr. THURMOND. It seems to me they could not have much confidence in human nature; otherwise they would favor jury trials. To be tried by a man's neighbors, his peers, his fellow men, is the fairest way a man could be tried. I sat on the bench for 8 years and tried many cases, but I always felt much better about it when a jury passed on the question. I watched closely the verdicts of juries. I was deeply impressed. I feel that juries come nearer to meting out justice to criminals than it can be done in any other way.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LONG. Recognizing the fact that it is possible for a jury to turn a guilty person free, is it not also true that the freedoms which Americans enjoy under their Constitution were calculated in such fashion as to express the philosophy that it is better to turn 9 guilty men free than to send 1 innocent man to the penitentiary or to his death?

Mr. THURMOND. I never did go on the theory of nine guilty ones being turned loose. There is no doubt that there is a common saying to that effect. If I had to make a decision as to whether I would turn 9 guilty ones loose, or put 1 innocent man in prison, I would turn the 9 loose. I think that would be the thinking and the feeling of the average American.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will be pleased to hear it.

Mr. LONG. Does not this logic become conclusively clear when we contemplate for a moment a capital punishment case where it is possible to put an innocent man to death? In such a situation, would it not be better for the court to turn 9 culprits loose rather than to kill 1 innocent man?

Mr. THURMOND. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. LONG. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. There is no question about it. Some juries make mistakes. Anybody in any kind of work makes mistakes. Everybody has weaknesses and there are bound to be errors. Judges make mistakes. Of course, often a judge's philosophy is different.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. LONG. In view of the fact that anyone can make mistakes, is it not somewhat better that the scales of justice should be weighted a little in favor of finding a person innocent when there is a considerable doubt as to whether the person is innocent or guilty?

Mr. THURMOND. Our law is based on the presumption that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. That is a common legal principle that any lawyer knows about who has practiced any criminal law. I do not know precisely what the Senator had in mind on that, though, for this reason: I do not think if a man is given a jury trial, a jury necessarily lets him go free. I think a jury is going to do what it thinks is right unless it is biased, or has been approached in some way, or influenced in some way. Of course, that happens sometimes. It does not happen often, but I think it does happen sometimes.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will be pleased to hear it.

Mr. LONG. Can the Senator imagine a judge who issues an order ordering the entire world to comply with his injunction as being as fair and impartial as a jury before which a case involving a violation of his order should be tried?

Mr. THURMOND. When a judge hears a contempt case he is the legislator, he is the prosecutor, he is the judge, and he is the jury. If I were a judge and if such a law as is here proposed were on the books, if I were back on the bench, and if I had to act under this type law, I would submit it to the jury anyway.

Mr. LONG. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will be pleased to hear it.

Mr. LONG. In view of the fact that it is contemplated that a judge makes a law by issuing the injunction and then cites the individuals whom he cares to cite, can the Senator think of anything any more inappropriate than the judge who makes the law, addressed to individuals, should be the same person to try the same individuals for violating his own order? Does the Senator not believe that any judge worthy of the name would at least want to have a jury to prove that justice is being done to people who violated his own order?

Mr. THURMOND. I think the Senator is eminently correct. It is unfortunate that a judge who issues an order of contempt has to try the case, because he has already made up his mind to a certain degree. Of course, that might be removed. But still he has made up his mind, or he would not issue the order.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a further question.

Mr. LONG. Is it not true that a person who is responsible for issuing the edict and commanding people to do certain things at his discretion should be the last person to make the final decision on who should be punished for not obeying his order?

Mr. THURMOND. I agree with the Senator. In fact, this is known as injunction-made law. That is what it is. It is injunction-made law, and it is bad law. It is much better to have a jury trial. That is the American way of doing things. That is one of the grievances complained of by those who signed the Declaration of Independence, as I have brought out, namely, that in a great many cases they were denied jury trials. Provisions for jury trial are embodied in several places in the Bill of Rights and the Constitution, so there is no question about the whole intent of our judicial system. Our administration of justice has been based upon jury trials. I think it is one of the most fundamental principles embodied in our type of government.

If this so-called compromise amendment were to go a little bit further, it would sound more like a Communist amendment.

I do not believe I read what Senator Norris said about jury trial. He said:

> I wonder if a suffering people, whose forefathers fought for liberty, are going to give up the idea of it in this day and age, in this civilized day, and are going to submit to injunction-made law.

He was wondering whether they were going to submit to it.

1. THE BEGINNINGS

"The true distinction," said Mr. Pendleton, with some irritation, "is that the two governments are established for different purposes, and act on different objects."

This was on the sunny afternoon of Thursday, June 12, 1788, in the New Academy on Shockoe Hill in Richmond. The Virginia Convention had been grappling for 10 days with the new Constitution, and Edmund Pendleton, aging and crippled, had been sitting in dignified silence for as long as he could stand it. Patrick Henry, who was a hard man to live with at any time, was being especially difficult. Once before, on the 5th, Pendleton had attempted to soothe him, but Henry was not to be soothed.

The State and Federal Governments would be at war with one another, Henry had predicted, and the State governments ultimately would be destroyed and consolidated into the General Government. One by one their powers would be snatched from them. A rapacious Federal authority, ever seeking to expand its grasp, could not be confined by the States.

"Notwithstanding what the worthy gentleman said," remarked Mr. Pendleton with some warmth, for there were times when he regarded Mr. Henry as neither worthy nor a gentleman. "I believe I am still correct, and insist that, if each power is confined within its proper bounds, and to its proper objects, an interference can never happen. Being for two different purposes, as long as they are limited to the different objects, they can no more clash than two parallel lines can meet. * * *"

They were big ifs that Edmund Pendleton, a judicious man, here used as qualifications. If the State and Federal Governments were each confined within its proper bounds, he said, the clash could never come. But the Federal Government could not be kept confined, even as Henry feared, and the clash did come. It continues to this day. Mr. Pendleton's geometry was fine, but his powers of prophecy (for he believed that each government could be kept in check) were sadly in error.

To understand how the parallel lines of State and Federal powers have turned awry, it is necessary to look back at the period before these lines were drawn. The acts of ratification by Virginia and her neighbors were acts of sovereign States. At stake was their consent to a written constitution. How, it may be inquired, did they come to be sovereign States? What is this concept of State sovereignty?

It would be possible, in any such review, to go back to the great roots of Runnymede, but it will suffice to begin much later, in the turbulent summer of 1776. The startling commitments of Lexington and Concord were behind us then; the bitter trials of White Plains, Vincennes, Camden, and Yorktown still lay ahead. March and April and May had passed—a time of bringing forth of newness, of fresh hope—and great human events had run their course. Now, in June, a resurgent people made the solemn decision to dissolve the political bands which had connected them with another. Thus Jefferson's draft began, thus the Continental Congress adopted it at Philadelphia; from this moment Americans unborn were to date the years of their independence.

The eloquent beginning of the Declaration—the assertion of truths self-evident and rights beyond alienation—is well known: It is a towering irony that Jefferson, whose convictions were cemented in the inequality of man, should have his precise phrase corrupted by the levelers of a bulldozer society. The Declaration's beginning is too much recited and too little read.

What counts, for our present purpose, is not the first paragraph, but the last. Let us inquire, What, precisely, was it that we declared ourselves to be that Fourth of July? Hitherto there had been colonies subject to the King. That form of government would now be abolished. We would now solemnly publish and declare to a candid world—what? That the people of the colonies had formed a free and independent nation? By no means. Or that they were henceforth a free and independent people? Still no.

This was the declaration: "That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." Not one State, or one Nation, but in the plural—States; and again, in the next breath, so this multiple birth could not be misunderstood, "that as free and independent States, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do."

It had opened, this Declaration, as an enunciation of what often are termed the "human rights," but it concluded, in the plainest terms, as a pronouncement of political powers—the political powers of newly created States. And these powers of war and peace, these powers of alliance and commerce, were published not as the powers of a national government, but as powers henceforth asserted by 13 free and independent States.

To be sure, the States were united. Their representatives styled themselves Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, but it was not the spokesmen of a nation who gathered in parliament. These were States in Congress. "One out of many," it is said. In a sense, yes. But the many remained—separate States, individual entities, each possessed, from that moment, of sovereign rights and powers.

Certainly Jefferson so understood our creation. "The several States," he was to write much later, "were, from their first establishment, separate and distinct societies, dependent on no other society of men whatever."

So Mr. Justice Samuel Chase comprehended it: He considered the Declaration of Independence, "as a declaration, not that the United Colonies jointly, in a collective capacity, were independent States, etc., but that each of them was a sovereign and independent State, that is, that each of them had a right to govern itself by its own authority, and its own laws without any control from any other power on earth." From the Fourth of July, said Chase, "the American States were de facto as well as de jure in the possession and actual exercise of all the rights of independent governments. * * * I have ever considered it as the established doctrine of the United States, that their independence originated from, and commenced with, the declaration of Congress, on the Fourth of July 1776; and that no other period can be fixed on for its commencement; and that all laws made by the legislatures of the several States, after the Declaration of Independence, were the laws of sovereign and independent governments."

So, too, the sage and cool-minded Mr. Justice Cushing: "The several States which composed this Union * * * became entitled, from the time when they declared themselves independent, to all the rights and powers of sovereign States."

Even Marshall himself had no doubts: In the beginning, "we were divided into independent States, united for some purposes, but in most respects sovereign." The lines which separate the States, he later remarked, were too clear ever to be misunderstood.

And for a contemporary authority, it is necessary only to turn to Mr. Justice Frankfurter, who some years ago fell to discussing the dual powers of taxation preserved under the Constitution: "The States," he said, "after they formed the Union"—not the people, but the States, "continued to have the same range of taxing power which they had before, barring only duties affecting exports, imports, and on tonnage." Regrettably, Mr. Justice Frankfurter appears in more recent times to have lost his concept of States forming a Union.

It is no matter. Evidence of the States' individual sovereignty is abundantly available. Consider for example, the powers asserted on the part of each State in the Declaration "to levy War, conclude Peace, and contract Alliances." Surely these are sovereign powers. The States exercised them, as States, in the Revolutionary War. But it is of value to note that New York also very nearly exercised her war powers to enter into formal hostilities with the State of Vermont. Tensions reached so grave a point that Massachusetts, in 1784, felt compelled to adopt a formal resolution of neutrality, enjoining her citizens to give "no aid or assistance to either party," and to send "no provisions, arms, or ammunition or other necessities to a fortress or garrison" besieged by either belligerent. When New York adopted a resolution avowing her readiness to "recur to force," Vermont's Governor Chittenden (whose son was to be heard from 30 years later in another row) observed that Vermont "does not wish to enter into a war with the State of New York." But should this unhappy contingency result, Vermont "expects that Congress and the 12 States will observe a strict neutrality, and let the contending States settle their own controversy."

They did settle it, of course. New York and Vermont concluded a peace. The point is that no one saw anything especially remarkable in two separate sovereignties arraying themselves against each other. Vermont was then an individual political entity, as remote at law as any France or Italy. And New York, though a member of the Confederation, and hence technically required to obtain the consent of Congress before waging war, had every right to maintain a standing army for her own defense.

The status of the individual States as separate sovereign powers was recognized on higher authority than the proclamations of Vermont and Massachusetts. It is worth our while to keep in mind the first article of the treaty of September 3, 1783, by which the War of the Revolution came to an end:

"His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent States; that he treats with them as such."

More than 5 years earlier, a treaty of amity and commerce with France had established the same sovereign status of the contracting parties. Louis XVI treated with the 13 American States, but he recognized each of them as a separate power. And it is interesting to note that Virginia, feeling some action desirable to complete the treaty, prior to action by Congress, on June 4, 1779, undertook solemnly to ratify this treaty with France on her own. By appropriate resolution, transmitted by Governor Jefferson to the French minister at Philadelphia, the sovereign Commonwealth of Virginia declared herself individually bound by the French treaty. In terms of international law, Virginia was a nation; in terms of domestic law, she was a sovereign State.

2. THE STATE

To review the process by which the colonies became States is not necessarily to answer the basic question, What is a State? It is a troublesome word. The standard definition is that a State is "a political body, or body politic; any body of people occupying a definite territory and politically organized under one government, especially one that is not subject to external control." Chief Justice Chase, in Texas v. White, put it this way: "A State, in the ordinary sense of the Constitution, is a political community of free citizens, occupying a territory of defined boundaries, and organized under a government sanctioned and limited by a written constitution, and established by the consent of the governed." In the Cherokee case, John Marshall described a State as "a distinct political society, separated from others, capable of managing its own affairs and governing itself."

Thus, variously, a State is defined as a body, a community, and a distinct society. Plainly, mere boundary lines are not enough; a tract of waste and uninhabited land cannot constitute a State. Nor are people, as such, sufficient to constitute a State. James Brown Scott once offered this clear and succinct definition:

"The State is an artificial person, representing and controlled by its members, but not synonymous or identical with them. Created for a political purpose, it is a body politic. It is a distinct body, an artificial person; it has a will distinct from its members, although its exercise is controlled by them; it has rights and duties distinct from its members, but subject to being changed by them; it may hold property distinct from its members, but in trust for them; it may act separately and distinctly from them and bind them by its acts, but only insofar as it is authorized by the law of its creation, and subject to being changed by the source of that power."

Thus the State is seen as a continuing political being, controlled by its citizens and yet controlling them. The State can be bound in ways that its own people cannot be bound; it can exercise powers that no citizen or group of citizens may exercise for themselves. The State may buy, sell, hold, grant, convey; it may tax and spend; it may sue, and if it consent, be sued; it exists to create law and to execute law, to punish crime, administer justice, regulate commerce, enter into compacts with other States. Yet there is no State until a community of human beings create a State; and no State may exist without the will and the power of human beings to preserve it.

It is this combination of will and power which lies at the essence of the State in being. This is sovereignty. In the crisp phrase of John Taylor, of Caroline, sovereignty is "the will to enact, the power to execute." Long books have been written on the nature of sovereignty, but they boil down to those necessities: The will to make, the power to unmake.

It was this power, this will, that the people as States claimed for themselves in 1776. Henceforth, they said, we are sovereign: The State government is not sovereign, nor is any citizen by himself sovereign. By the "sovereign State" we mean us citizens, the State; we collectively, within our established boundaries; this community of people; we alone who are possessed of the power to create or to abandon.

God knows it was a great, a priceless, power these people as States claimed for themselves. True, not everyone saw it that way. Mr. Justice Story, for one, never grasped the concept of States. Nor did Jackson. Albert J. Beveridge, in his biography of Marshall, refers sneeringly to the States as "these pompous sovereignties," but in a way, Beveridge's is perhaps a high acknowledgment of the simple truth: These infant States were sovereignties, and the people within them were proudly jealous of the fact. They saw themselves, in Blackstone's phrase, "a supreme, irresistible, absolute, uncontrolled authority." This, among other things, was the aim they had fought for. It cannot be imagined that they ever would have relinquished this high power of sovereignty except in the most explicit terms.

3. THE ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION

In time, the Continental Congress gave way to the Articles of Confederation. The articles merit examination with the utmost care; they are too little studied, and there is much to be learned from them.

First proposed in 1778, the articles became binding upon all the States with Maryland's ratification in 1781. Throughout this period, as the war ran on, each of the States was individually sovereign, each wholly autonomous. Mr. Justice Iredell was to observe, in 1795, that had the individual States decided not to unite together, each would have gone its own way, because each "possessed all the powers of sovereignty, internal and external * * * as completely as any of the ancient kingdoms or republics of the world, which never yet had formed, or thought of forming, any sort of Federal union whatever."

But they did form a Federal union—a "perpetual union between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island, and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia." They styled themselves, "The United States of America," and in the very second article of their compact, they put this down so no one might miss it:

"Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

The third article is almost equally brief, and may be quoted in less space than would be required to summarize it:

"The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever."

There will be seen, in these opening paragraphs, the genesis of constitutional provisions that were to follow in less than a decade. Here is the forerunner of the 10th amendment, with its reservation of undelegated powers to the State or to the people; here are the aims set forth of "common defense" and the "general welfare."

The fourth article advanced other phrases that have come down to us: The free inhabitants of each State ("paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted") were to be entitled to "all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." Here, too, one finds the provision, later to be inserted substantially verbatim in article IV of the Constitution of 1787, providing for the extradition of fugitives. Here the States mutually agreed that "full faith and credit shall be given in each of these States to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other State."

The fifth article provided for representation of the States in Congress. There were to be no less than 2, no more than 7 delegates from each State. They would assemble on the first Monday in November of every year. In this Congress, each State cast one vote; each State paid the salary and maintenance of its own delegates. These provisions, of course, were later abandoned; but we may note that the fifth article prohibited delegates to the Congress from "holding any office under the United States for which he or another for his benefit receives any salary, fees, or emolument of any kind," and also provided that "freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of Congress." Both provisions were to turn up later in article I, section 6, of the Constitution.

The sixth and seventh articles dealt generally with limitations upon the States in terms of foreign affairs and the waging of war. Again, many a familiar phrase leaps from this much-maligned compact of Confederation. No State, nor the Congress, was to grant a title of nobility; no two or more States were to enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance without the consent of the other States in Congress assembled; no State was to keep vessels of war in time of peace ("except such number as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in Congress assembled"), nor was any State to engaged in war without the consent of Congress "unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, or * * * the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay * * *."

The eighth article provided for defraying the expenses of war among the State "in proportion to the value of all land within each State," and the ninth article dealt with the powers of Congress. Once more, the origin of a dozen specific phrases in our present Constitution is evident. Congress was given the "sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war." It was to enter into treaties and alliances, establish certain courts, fix standard weights and measures, and establish post offices. But the Congress alone could do almost none of these things—it could exercise no important power—without the consent of nine of the member States.

The remaining 4 articles are of less interest and concern, although it may be noted that in 3 places, the framers of the Articles of Confederation provided that their union was a permanent union. The articles were to be inviolably observed by the States the delegates respectively represented, "and the union shall be perpetual."

4. WE, THE PEOPLE

Of course, it wasn't perpetual at all. Before 6 years had elapsed, the States came to recognize grave defects in the Articles of Confederation. And because they were sovereign States—because they had the will to enact and the power to execute, because they who had made could unmake—they set out to do the job again.

What they made, this time, was the Constitution of the United States. So much has been writen of the deliberations that summer of 1787 in Philadelphia—so many critics have examined every word of the great document which came forth—that probably no new light can be shed upon it here. Yet the constitutions of most States command their citizens to recur frequently to fundamental principles and the commandment is too valuable an admonition to be passed by. There is much of interest to be found if one examines the Constitution, the debates and the commentaries of the time, in terms of the relationship there established between the States and the new Federal Government they formed.

It may be inquired, was sovereignty here surrendered in whole or in part? What powers were delegated, what powers retained?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I do not want the Senator to strain his voice but I do have some responsibilities as minority leader. I do not think the Senator is making any motion, but I should at least like to know what is going on in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I yield for a question if the Senator has a question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. My question is, Would the Senator speak up? I do not want him to strain his voice, but I should like him to speak a little louder so I shall be sure no motions are being made or anything of that sort. I do have some responsibility here.

Mr. THURMOND. I suggest that the Senator move closer to me.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Under the rules of the Senate, which are now being strictly enforced, both Senators being in their respective seats, and this happening to be my seat as the minority leader, I urge my request of the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. We might get unanimous consent to allow the Senator to come closer to me if he wishes. I do not think my colleagues will raise any point. There is an excellent seat here, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am very well satisfied with the seat to which I am assigned.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I continue to read:

What were the functions to be performed by the States in the future? Was it ever intended that the States should be reduced to the weakling role thrust upon them in our own time? We must inquire whether this proud possession of State sovereignty, so eloquently proclaimed in 1776, so resolutely affirmed in the articles of 1781, so clearly recognized in the events of the time, somehow vanished, died, turned to dust, totally ceased to exist in the period of the next 6 years.

Now, the argument here advanced is this—it is the argument of John Taylor of Caroline and John Randolph of Roanoke—that sovereignty, like chastity, cannot be surrendered in part. This was the argument also of Calhoun: "I maintain that sovereignty is in its nature indivisible. It is the supreme power in a State, and we might just as well speak of half a square, or half a triangle, as of half a sovereignty." This was the position, too, of the bellicose George Troup of Georgia, of Alexander H. Stephens, of Jefferson Davis. It is the position of plain commonsense: Supreme and ultimate power must be precisely that. Finality knows no degrees. In law, as in mountain climbing, there comes a point at which the pinnacle is reached; nothing higher or greater remains. And so it is with the States of the American Union. In the last resort, it is their prerogative alone (not that of Congress, not that of the Supreme Court, not that of the whole people) to make or unmake our fundamental law. The argument here is that the States, in forming a new perpetual union to replace their old perpetual union, remained in essence what they had been before: Separate, free, and independent States. They surrendered nothing to the Federal Government they created. Some of their powers they delegated; all of their sovereignty they retained.

It is keenly important that this distinction be understood. There is a difference between sovereignty and sovereign power. The power to coin money, or to levy taxes, is a sovereign power, but it is not sovereignty. Powers can be delegated, limited, expanded, or withdrawn, but it is through the exercise of sovereignty that these changes take place. Sovereignty is the moving river, sovereign powers the stone at the mill. Only while the river flows can the inanimate stone revolve. To be sure, sovereignty can be lost—it can be lost by conquest, as in war; the extent or character of sovereignty can be changed, as in the acquisition or relinquishment of territory or the annexation of new peoples; sovereignty can be divided, when two States are created of one. But properly viewed, sovereignty is cause; sovereign powers, the effect: The wind that blows; the branches that move. Sovereignty is the essence, the life spirit, the soul: And in this Republic, sovereignty remains today where it was vested in 1776, in the people. But in the people as a whole? No. In the people as States.

The delusion that sovereignty is vested in the whole people of the United States is one of the strangest misconceptions of our public life. This hallucination has been encouraged, if not directly espoused, by such eminent figures as Marshall, Story, and Andrew Jackson. It is still embraced by excessively literal and unthinking fellows who read "we the people" in the preamble to the Constitution, and cry triumphantly, "that means everybody." It does not; it never did.

The preamble to the abandoned Articles of Confederation, it was noted, declared the articles "binding between the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York," and so forth. The preamble offered by the Convention of 1787, reads:

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

The opening few words were questioned repeatedly by Patrick Henry in the Virginia Convention of 1788. He kept asking querulously, what was meant by "we the people," but he got no very satisfactory answer for his pains. Governor Randolph ducked the question, and Pendleton missed the point. Pendleton asked, rhetorically, "who but the people have a right to form government?" and the answer, obviously, in America, is "no one." Then Pendleton said this:

"If the objection be, that the Union ought to be not of the people, but of the State governments, then I think the choice of the former very happy and proper. What have the State governments to do with it?"

Again, the obvious answer is, "The State governments have nothing to do with it," but that was not the question Henry asked. There is a plain distinction between "we the States" and "we the State governments," for States endure while governments fall. It was Madison who came closest to answering the insistent Henry. Who are the parties to the Constitution? The people, said Madison, to be sure, are the parties to it, but "not the people as composing one great body." Rather, it is "the people as composing 13 sovereignties." And he added:

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. I ask the distinguished Senator from South Carolina when he was a judge in South Carolina?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot hear. Will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. THURMOND. From 1938 to 1946, 8 years.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator was a circuit judge, was he not?

Mr. THURMOND. Yes; in the highest trial court in the State. About half that time I was in the Army, overseas.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. Continuing to quote from the Kilpatrick book:

"Were it * * * a consolidated government, the assent of a majority of the people would be sufficient for its establishment; and, as a majority have adopted it already, we remaining States would be bound by the act of the majority, even if they unanimously reprobated it * * * But, sir, no State is bound by it, as it is, without its own consent."

Col. Henry Lee took the same point of view in responding to Patrick Henry. Lighthorse Harry spoke as other proponents of the Constitution did, in irritation and perplexity. He could not comprehend why Henry's question should even be asked. Obviously, the "we the people" mentioned in the preamble—the "we the people" there and then engaged in ratifying the Constitution—were we "the people of Virginia." If the people of Virginia "do not adopt it, it will always be null and void as to us."

Here Lee touched and tossed aside what doubtless was so clear to others that they could not understand what Henry was quibbling about. Of course, "we the people" meant what Madison and Lee found so obvious: It meant "we the people of the States." Why argue the point? "I take this," said Randolph testily, "to be one of the least and most trivial objections that will be made to the Constitution."

The self-evident fact, as plain as the buttons on their coats, was that the whole people, the mass of people from Georgia to New Hampshire, obviously had nothing to do with the ratification of the Constitution. The basic charter of our Union never was submitted to popular referendum, taken simultaneously among the 3 million inhabitants of the country on some Tuesday in 1788. Ratification was achieved by the people of the States, acting in their sovereign capacity not as "Americans," for there is no "State of America," but in their sovereign capacity as citizens of the States of Massachusetts, New York, Virginia, and Georgia.

This was the sovereign power that sired the new Union, breathed upon it, gave it life—the power of the people of the States, acting as States, binding themselves as States, seeking to form a more perfect union not of people but of States. And if it be inquired, as a matter of drafting, why the preamble of the Articles of Confederation spelled out 13 States and the preamble of the Constitution referred only to "we the people," a simple, uncomplicated explanation may be advanced: The framers of the Constitution, in the summer of 1787, had no way of knowing how many States would assent to the compact.

Suppose they had begun the preamble, as they thought of doing, "We the people of New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island," etc., and the State of Rhode Island had refused to ratify? It very nearly did. It was not until May 29, 1790, by a vote of 34 to 32 that Rhode Island agreed to join a union that actually had been created with New Hampshire's ratification nearly 2 full years before. Given a switch of two votes, Rhode Island might have remained, to this day, as foreign to the United States (in terms of international law) as any Luxembourg or Switzerland.

Some of these forebodings clearly passed through the minds of the delegates at Philadelphia. When the preamble first appears in the notes, on August 6, it reads: "We the people of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts," etc., "do ordain, declare and establish the following Constitution." In that form it was tentatively approved on August 7. But the preamble, in that form, never is mentioned again. When the document came back from the Committee on Style in early September, the preamble had been amended to eliminate the spelled-out names of States, and to make it read simply that "we the people" ordain and establish. The change was not haggled over. No significance was attached to it. Why arouse antagonism in New York or North Carolina (where there was opposition enough already) by presuming to speak, in the preamble, as if it were unnecessary for New York or North Carolina even to debate the matter? The tactful and prudent thing was to name no States. Only the people as States could create the Union; only the people in ratifying States would be bound, as States, by its provisions.

5. THE STATES IN THE CONSTITUTION

In the end, that was the way the compact read. It bound States—"The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between"—between whom?—"between the States so ratifying the same." Not among people; it was "between States." And this proposal was put forward "by the unanimous consent," not of delegates assembled or of people gathered, but by "the unanimous consent of the States present the 17th day of September in the year of our Lord 1787 * * *."

On the plain evidence of the instrument itself, it is therefore clear: States consented to the drafting of the Constitution; States undertook to bind themselves by its provisions. If 9 States ratified, the Constitution would bind those 9; if 10, those 10. Rhode Island had not even attended the convention; "poor, despised Rhode Island," as Patrick Henry later was to describe her, could stay aloof if she chose. There was no thought here of people in the mass. There was thought only of people as States, and while the new Constitution would of course act directly upon people—that was to be its revolutionary change—it would reach those people only because they first were people of States.

The one essential prerequisite was for the State, as a State, to ratify; then the people of the State would become themselves subject to the Constitution. No individual human being, in his own capacity, possibly could assent to the new compact or bind himself to its provisions. Only as a citizen of Virginia or Georgia or Massachusetts could he become a citizen also of the United States.

Madison recognized this. He acknowledged in his famed Federalist 39 that ratification of the Constitution must come from the people "not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong." "Each State," he said, in ratifying the Constitution, "is considered as a sovereign body, independent of all others, and only to be bound by its own voluntary act." This fact lay at the essence of the Federal Union being formed. The States, and within them their local governments, were to be "no more subject, within their respective spheres, to the general authority, than the general authority is subject to them, within its own sphere." The jurisdiction of the Federal Government was to extend "to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects." Even the most casual reading of the Constitution, it may be submitted, abundantly supports Madison's comment here.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be glad to yield to the able Senator from North Dakota for a question.

Mr. LANGER. I should like to ask whether at any time in the history of South Carolina the courts permitted a defendant to be tried without a jury.

Mr. THURMOND. In South Carolina anyone who wishes a jury may have one. There are a few instances where both sides agree to be tried without a jury, by the court. But a defendant is entitled to a jury trial in my State, as is the case in other States which follow the Constitution.

Mr. LANGER. In what year was South Carolina admitted to the Union? It was one of the original colonies, was it not?

Mr. THURMOND. In 1789. It was the eighth State admitted to the Union.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield further for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. Even at that time in South Carolina a defendant had the right to a jury trial, did he not?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct.

Mr. LANGER. That has been the law continuously up to the present time?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct. A defendant in South Carolina is always entitled to a jury trial when charged with a crime.

Mr. LANGER. Is that also true in North Carolina?

Mr. THURMOND. I would not attempt to speak for North Carolina, but I feel quite certain that that is a fact. I believe nine States ratified the Constitution before North Carolina did. So North Carolina came in after the Union was formed. So did Rhode Island. Rhode Island was the only State that did not send representatives to the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia in 1787. The reason for that was that Rhode Island was in the hands of radicals at that time and it did not send any deputies.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Is it true that in every State in the United States under our Constitution a defendant has the right to a trial by jury in a criminal case?

Mr. THURMOND. In every State of the United States a defendant charged with a crime has the right of trial by jury. Some persons confuse magistrate courts or minor courts, but even there, although we may not see it, there is a jury box.

Most persons, unless they are lawyers, do not know that defendants are entitled to a jury trial in those courts. There is a jury box hidden somewhere. Nine out of ten do not ask for a jury trial; that is, in cases where the punishment is a fine of $100 or 30 days. But even there if a man says "Wait a minute, Mr. Recorder; I want a trial before a jury," it must be given to him.

Mr. LANGER. That is true, for example, if a man is arrested and charged with spitting on the sidewalk or with stealing one cent?

Mr. THURMOND. Any crime.

Mr. LANGER. In other words, trial by jury is fundamental?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct; and rightly so, because that was one of the grievances pointed out a little earlier today that our forefathers listed in the Declaration of Independence. That was one grievance charged against the King, that in many cases persons had been denied trial by jury. That is written definitely into the Constitution. The right of trial by jury was included in several places in the Bill of Rights. The sixth amendment provides that a man charged with a crime is entitled to a jury trial. That was because our forefathers were taking no chances on not having a jury trial assured to them under the Constitution.

In the seventh amendment it is provided, also, and there is another provision, I believe, in the fifth amendment, that a man must be indicted by a grand jury before he is tried.

Under the bill that came from the House a grand jury will not pass on the question at all. Under this so-called compromise, a man is taken before a judge and is tried. He is not even asked if he wants a trial by a jury. But in the usual procedure, when the Constitution is followed, a man has to be indicted by a grand jury. In my State 18 grand jurors have to agree to a true bill before a man can be brought up for trial. He has a trial before a petit jury. In Federal courts a man can be indicted by a grand jury or on information, but in State courts a man is indicted by a grand jury. But in all the history of judicial administration in this country it has been clear that the American people have been entitled to a jury trial, and it goes back even further than the Declaration of Independence. It goes back to the Magna Carta, when the citizens of England wrung from King John in the year 1215, at Runnymede, certain rights for the people. I presume you and I, Mr. President, would call them civil rights, more or less, or corresponding to our Bill of Rights. But the people wrung from King John certain rights, and one of those rights was that a man charged with a crime would be entitled to a jury trial. So, going back to the year 1215, on down to this time, our people have had a jury trial.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will yield for a further question.

Mr. LANGER. Is it the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina that of all the 10 amendments in the Bill of Rights the very heart and very core of the 10 amendments is the right of the defendant to be tried by a jury?

Mr. THURMOND. All the 10 amendments known as the Bill of Rights are important, but I think the trial-by-jury provision as generally spoken of is the heart of the Bill of Rights. That is the importance attached to it. It is generally spoken of as the heart of the Bill of Rights. In other words, if there should be cut out of the Bill of Rights the right of a trial by jury you have cut the heart of the Bill of Rights out; it would be excised.

What is it to have freedom of speech or freedom of religion or freedom of the press or right to petition the Government or the right to assemble, all of which are guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, or to keep troops from being quartered in our homes, or all the other things guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, if some tyrant, whether a Federal district judge, or any other kind of tyrant, can take a man and himself try him without a jury and put him in prison; and, of course, if a man is in prison he cannot enjoy his civil rights?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator. We have gotten down to the very core of this entire proposal.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator very much. I appreciate his deep interest in this matter. The able and distinguished Senator from North Dakota has manifested an unusual interest in the right of trial by jury. He has the vision to see the importance of trial by jury and to see how this proposed bill the House has passed is attempting to bypass the Constitution and in doing so, of course, is violating the Constitution and therefore is a bill the Congress ought to kill.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THURMOND. I will be pleased to yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. For 4 years I was attorney general of my State.

Mr. THURMOND. I understand the Senator made a very distinguished record as attorney general of the State of North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. During that time, of course, I had a great deal to do with juries.

Mr. THURMOND. I am sure the Senator did.

Mr. LANGER. And in every single case I submitted to a court a jury trial had been waived.

Mr. THURMOND. Every case the Senator tried I imagine was before a jury.

Mr. LANGER. That is correct.

I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from South Carolina whether in his experience in South Carolina it is true that the average defendant can get better justice from a jury than he can from a judge, no matter how honest and fair the judge may be?

Mr. THURMOND. Regardless of how fair and impartial the judge is or wants to be, it is my judgment from my experience on the bench for 8 years—and as I said for about half of that time I was in the Army during World War II—and from my practice of law before then, since 1930 when I was admitted to the bar—and after I left the Governor's office in January 1951, I practiced until I came to the Senate—I consider that juries give fair verdicts, and I think it would be destroying the administration of justice if we should take any step to hamper or injure or impair in any way the jury system of the United States.

Mr. LANGER. Again I want to thank the Senator.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I read further:

> But the Constitution ought not to be read casually. Viewed from the standpoint of State and Federal relations, what does the Constitution say and do? The rubrics do not demand, before an ordinary mortal may explore the question, that he be ordained a constitutional lawyer or put on the chasuble of the bench. Our Constitution is not the property of a juridical clergy only. The laity may read it too, and with equal acuity and understanding. The terms are not ambiguous.
>
> The first thing to note, perhaps, is that the words "State" or "States" appear no fewer than 94 times, either as proper nouns or pronominals, in the brief 6,000 words of the original 7 articles. The one theme that runs steadily through the whole of the instrument is the knitting together of States: It is a union that is being formed, and while the people are concerned for themselves and their posterity, the Constitution is to be established binding States.
>
> Legislative powers, to begin at the beginning, are vested not in one national parliament of the people, but in a Congress of the United States. The word "Congress" was chosen with precision; it repeated and confirmed the political relationship of the preceding 11 years, when there had been first a Continental Congress and then a Congress under the Articles of Confederation.
>
> This Congress is to consist of two Houses. The first is the House of Representatives, whose Members are to be chosen "by the people of the several States." And here, in the very second paragraph, the framers encountered and opportunity to choose between a "national" and a "federal" characteristic: They might have established uniform national qualifications for the franchise, but they did not. Electors qualified to vote for candidates for the House of Representatives are to have "the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature."
>
> Representatives and direct taxes are to be apportioned—how? "Among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers." How is this enumeration to be determined? The provision should be noted with care, for it is the first of four clauses that speaks eloquently of the plural nature of our Union: "The actual enumeration shall be made within 3 years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of 10 years, in such manner as they shall by law direct." Now, the antecedent of they is not "Congress." but "United States." Nowhere in the whole of the Constitution or in any of the subsequent amendments is the United States an "it." The singular never appears.
>
> What else sheds light in the second section of article I? We find that "each State shall have at least one Representative," whereupon follows a rollcall of the States themselves: "Until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse 3, Massachusetts 8," and so forth. And when vacancies happen "in the representation from any State," the Governor thereof is to issue a writ of election.
>
> The dignity and sovereignty of States are made still more evident in the composition of the Senate. It is to be composed "of two Senators from each State," and whereas Representatives are required to be inhabitants of the States "in which" they shall be chosen, Senators must be inhabitants of the States "for which" they shall be chosen.
>
> It is in section 4 that the first grant of authority to the Federal Government appears: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but"—and here the qualified concession—"the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of chusing Senators."
>
> The delegations of power to a federal government appear most fully, of course, in section 8, but it is worth noting that not all the powers delegated to Congress are exclusive and unqualified powers. Thus, the Congress may raise and support armies, "but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years." Thus, the Congress may provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of the militia as may be employed in the service of the United States, but there is reserved "to the States respectively" the appointment of officers and the authority to train their militia according to regulation established by Congress. Thus, too, Congress may exercise Federal authority over federally owned property within the States, but how is such property to be acquired? The authority of the Congress extends only to those places "purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be," and this applies not only to military and naval installations but also to "other needful buildings."
>
> Several provisions in section 9 merit attention. As a concession to the slave trade—one of the essential compromises without which the Constitution never would have come into being at all—it was provided that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit," shall not be prohibited prior to 1808. Then follow seven paragraphs of specific restrictions upon the powers of Congress. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended; no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed; no direct tax shall be levied except according to the census of the people as a whole; no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported "from any State"; and—again emphasizing the separateness of the member States forming the Union—no preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue of the ports of one State over those of another: nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another."
>
> In section 10, the States undertook to restrict themselves. No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; no State shall coin money or make anything but gold and silver legal tender; no State shall make any law impairing the obligation of contracts. Yet even here, the prohibitions are not without qualification.

> Thus, the States reserved to themselves the right to levy tariffs on imports or exports sufficient to execute their inspection laws; and though the fact is often forgotten, the States even reserved to themselves the solemn power they had claimed under the Articles of Confederation, to "engage in war," as States, if "actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay."

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ELLENDER in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. I am very curious. I ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he knows how the House of Representatives arrived at the decision to provide for a maximum of 45 days and $300 in this instance. Why did not the House of Representatives decide to make the maximum number of days 50, and why did it not choose, as the maximum amount of fine, $250 or $500?

Mr. THURMOND. I should like to answer the question the distinguished Senator asked, but I cannot do so. I was not consulted about this compromise. All I know about it is that I heard the majority leader make an announcement, following the taking of action in the House of Representatives. And then I read about it in the newspaper.

But I had understood—and the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] can correct me about this if I am mistaken—that there was an effort on the part of the Republicans to provide for 60 days. But, since the Senate had not voted for any provision of this sort, but had voted only for a straight jury-trial provision, 45 days was selected as a compromise. That is my understanding of the matter. I pass on to the Senator from North Dakota only what I heard. But perhaps the Senator from California can answer the question. At any rate, even if 60 days had been originally proposed, and finally 45 days was decided on, the Senate got the worst end of the bargain.

However, even if the provision had been for only 1 day, in my opinion the principle would be the same, because under the Constitution a citizen is entitled to a jury trial; and the Congress has no power to pass a law providing that a Federal judge or any other judge can deprive a citizen of a jury trial. However, under this proposal, a judge would be able, in two ways, to deprive a citizen of a jury trial. In the first place, the Federal judge could decide whether he wanted to allow the person to have a jury trial in the first instance. If the judge decided that there could be a jury trial, the citizen would have a jury trial. If the judge decided that there would not be a jury trial, the judge himself would try the case.

Next, if the judge decided to try the case himself, without a jury, the judge would proceed to try it. If, at the conclusion of the case, the judge were to determine that the punishment he would mete would be more than 45 days imprisonment or a fine of more than $300, the judge would then give the citizen another trial. In other words, this provision of the compromise would give the judge the option of trying the citizen in the first place, and it would give the judge the option of deciding how much punishment he would mete, and then the amount of punishment imposed would determine whether the citizen would receive still another trial.

All those exceptions are entirely foreign to the Constitution. The Constitution provides that a man charged with the commission of a crime is entitled to a jury trial. That provision is as plain as can be. Any child in the fifth grade in school can read it and understand it, and there should not be any difficulty in understanding it.

However, as I have understood in arriving at the compromise an attempt was made to get together on some provision; and the result was a monstrosity. It turned out to be an unconstitutional provision, in my opinion.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield again?

Mr. THURMOND. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LANGER. What I should like to know is this: Is there any precedent, anywhere in the entire United States, for a measure such as this, by means of which a defendant could be tried by a judge, if the sentence imposed were imprisonment for not more than 45 days, or any other number of days, or the imposition of a fine of any size; but that if the term of imprisonment were longer or the amount of the fine were greater, there must be a jury trial? Can the Senator from South Carolina name any precedent at all for such a provision?

Mr. THURMOND. I know of no place in the United States where a person charged with a crime does not have a jury trial. Even under the present criminal-contempt procedure, under existing law, if one is charged with criminal contempt, he is entitled to a jury trial. I know of no instance in any part of the United States, from Maine or the State of Washington on the north, to California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Louisiana, Florida, or any of the other States in the southern part of the Nation, in which one who is charged with the commission of a crime does not have a trial by jury. It seems to me that in the conference, some one or more of the conferees should have raised the point, "This provision would be contrary to the Constitution, and we cannot include such a provision." It seems to me some of the conferees would have suggested that the Constitution provides to the contrary. There is a decision which can be cited on that point; I think I have called it to the attention of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota. The decision in that case holds that criminal contempt is a crime; and, since it is a crime, one charged with criminal contempt is entitled to a jury trial. If there is to be passed a bill providing punishment for criminal contempt, it should provide for a jury trial. I know of no way to get around a jury trial in this matter because the Constitution has laid down the law. That is basic law.

The Constitution can be amended. Congress can submit an amendment to it. There are four ways to amend the Constitution, and it can be amended so as to provide that a Federal judge in his discretion can give a man a jury trial. Then the compromise would be legal, and what it proposes would be effective. It would be valid.

As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] said today, confirming my judgment, as it stands now it is not valid. I think it is unconstitutional. The Senator from Wyoming expressed his opinion likewise. We could amend the Constitution to provide for it. Congress could pass a law to provide that a Federal judge could punish a man for contempt, by so many days' imprisonment, or by a fine of so many dollars. We could do that, but it has not been done. Until the Constitution is amended in the manner provided in the Constitution itself, we must abide by it. I know that many people in this country would like to get around the Constitution, and it looks as if they have been doing so.

The Supreme Court has been rewriting the Constitution in some cases, and other branches of the Government at times have encroached upon the Constitution because there is divisional power between the Federal Government and the State governments. When we cross the line of the State government, as here, without constitutional authority, we violate the Constitution.

The States entered into this pact, the Constitution, about which we are talking so much, and in this pact they delegated to the Union only certain things, and they are just as plain as they can be. They are listed in the Constitution. I should like to read to the distinguished Senator what the Constitution says on that point.

Article I, section 1, provides:

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

I will not take the time to go through all that. I will skip to the pertinent portions.

Section 7 of article I provides:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.
>
> Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration, two-thirds—

I will skip to section 8. That is more pertinent. This is what the Congress has power to do. The powers are listed.

> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

To borrow money on credit of the United States;

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend to receive a message from the President of the United States?

Mr. THURMOND. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Edward L. McCarthy, to be United States marshal for the district of Rhode Island, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 2413) to clarify the authority of the President to fill the judgeship for the district of South Dakota authorized by the act of February 10, 1954, and to repeal the prohibition contained in such act against filling the next vacancy occurring in the office of district judge for such district.

The message also announced that the House had severally agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills and joint resolution of the House:

H. R. 2075. An act for the relief of Albert Heinze;

H. R. 2904. An act for the relief of the Knox Corp., of Thomson, Ga.;

H. R. 3468. An act for the relief of J. A. Ross & Co.; and

H. J. Res. 374. Joint resolution for the relief of certain aliens.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate amendments Nos. 7, and 15 to the bill (H. R. 6127) to provide means of further securing and protecting the civil rights of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. THURMOND. I continue to read from article 1, section 2:

> To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Congress would not have the power to pass bankruptcy laws, indeed Congress could not pass a law on any subject except for the power given to it by the Constitution. This provision I have read is the basis for our bankruptcy law.

> To coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.
>
> To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States.
>
> To establish post offices and post roads.

That is your authority for the Federal Government to act in that field.

> To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.
>
> To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court.

That gives authority to Congress to establish certain courts of appeals and district courts. They are inferior tribunals, that is inferior to the United States Supreme Court.

> To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations.
>
> To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.
>
> To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than 2 years.

But no appropriation of money for that purpose shall be for a longer term than 2 years. We cannot appropriate money for the Defense Establishment for more than 2 years because the Constitution limits it. If we should attempt to do that, we would go beyond the Constitution.

I think that is a suggestion which may apply to foreign aid. If we should commit ourselves for 5 years or 10 years, I think that would be unconstitutional. But some of the defense items are classified under the term "foreign aid."

> To provide and maintain a Navy;
>
> To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;
>
> To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.
>
> To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

I want to read that last part again. I wish to call attention to a point:

> Reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Do you not know, Mr. President, that if that section was not in the Constitution the Federal Government would be appointing the officers of the National Guard? That is the reason the Government cannot do it: the Constitution reserves that power to the States.

> To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings;

For that reason the Federal Government cannot go to Louisiana, North Dakota, South Carolina, or New Hampshire and buy a piece of land until the legislature passes an act approving such purchase. Under the provision the State must approve the transaction with respect to property within its borders, whether it owns the property or not, before the Federal Government can get it. Of course, the Government could condemn it; but if it followed the Constitution it would not be able to take it. The Constitution reserves that power to the States.

> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.
>
> SEC. 9. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to year 1808, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding $10 for each person.
>
> The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

Regardless of what a State wishes to do, the United States Constitution provides that a writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless—note the exception—"unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it."

> No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed.
>
> No capitation, or other direct, tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

We have the income-tax amendment to the Constitution. The 16th amendment to the Constitution provides that Congress can levy an income tax. That is the only authority in the Federal Government to levy an income tax. It does not inherently have that authority. The Federal Government can do only what the States gave it the authority to do when they entered into the compact in Philadelphia in 1787, and the amendments which have been adopted since then. Two years later, in 1789, the States adopted the 10 amendments known as the Bill of Rights, for which there was so much sentiment. I do not believe the Constitution would have been ratified if the delegates to the convention had not promised the Bill of Rights would be submitted, and it was submitted and adopted 2 years after the convention, in 1789.

> No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.
>
> No preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to, or from, one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.
>
> No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

That is the only reason the States do not impose duties on some articles; otherwise they would probably do it, but under the Constitution they cannot do it.

> No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.

In other words, if I were an ambassador in London and the Queen of England wished to confer on me a title or wished to give me extra compensation for some reason, I could not take the title or compensation unless Congress permitted it. Congress would have to pass an act to permit it.

> SEC. 10. No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility.

In other words, that goes right down the line to support the point I make. So the Constitution provides exactly what the Federal Government can do. What hurts me is to see some distinguished Members of Congress, able men who believe in the division of powers between the Federal and State Governments—or I always thought they did—going along with the bill, because this is a bill that takes power away from the States and gives it to the Federal Government.

The matter of elections is left up to each State. That power was not delegated. The qualifications for electors, the holding of elections, and all relevant matters were reserved to the States. There has been a movement, I understand, to get the Congress to pass a bill eliminating the poll tax. I believe I told the Senate this morning, or this afternoon, that when I was Governor, I recommended that the poll tax be removed in my State, and it was removed. But Congress may not pass a law to do it. It could do it, but it would be unconstitutional for the reason that there is a provision of the Constitution which states that the qualifications of electors shall be left to each State. Therefore, New Hampshire has qualifications and, if the people of that State wish to make as a qualification for voting in that State the payment of a poll tax, they have a right to do so. The only way such a measure could be enacted legally, if it were going to be the law nationwide, would be for Congress to submit an amendment to the Constitution eliminating the poll tax.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] has now pending a proposed constitutional amendment to eliminate the poll tax, amending the Constitution. To do that would be legal; it would be constitutional, and it would be proper. Personally I think it is better to leave to each State the power to fix the qualifications for voting of its citizens. In my State, as I have said, we have very low qualifications. We have heard much about people in my State not voting. I believe more people vote in my State than vote in New York, because New York has a much higher standard for voting. That State requires, I believe someone said, a high-school education. Someone else said it requires a grade-school education. It is certainly one of the two. In my State we require only that a man be able to read and write the Constitution, or that he own $300 worth of assessed property. So our requirements for voting are not stringent. They are not nearly as strict as they are in New York. I do not know about the requirements in the State of the Senator from North Dakota.

A few years ago I was Governor of South Carolina. At that time a bill was pending in Congress to remove the poll tax on a nationwide basis. Congress was to do it. It would have been just as unconstitutional as this so-called compromise, whose proponents are trying to get it through the Congress, to deprive the people of a jury trial.

Mr. LANGER. I thank my distinguished friend.

Mr. THURMOND. The Senator is welcome.

Mr. President, I do not believe that American history is taught sufficiently in our high schools and colleges. I do not believe that a course in government is taught in our high schools and colleges. I come in contact with a great many intelligent people, people who have been educated, big financiers who have made a great deal of money, and many others; yet they do not know the fundamentals of the Constitution. It is because they have not studied it. I think the people of the country would be wise to study the Constitution. I think it is more important today than ever before for the people to study it and be able to delineate the powers of the Federal Government, and learn what the Federal Government has not the power to do.

For example, the Congress has no power to abolish the poll tax as a prerequisite for voting, because the qualifications of voters are left to each State.

There are a great many things which Congress cannot do. Yet pressure is brought on Members of Congress, and they vote for certain measures anyway, because of the pressure.

Why do Senators think this so-called compromise on the civil rights bill is being pressed? Why is there any civil rights bill before us? Why call this measure a right-to-vote bill? It is a perfect farce. It is not a right-to-vote bill.

As I have stated, every State in the Union has statutes providing for the right to vote. The Federal Government has statutes providing for the right to vote.

Why is such a bill as this being considered at this time? Because there are pressures on Members of Congress to do so. Some Members of Congress attempted to do so, even though they were doubtful of the constitutionality of the measure. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] stated earlier in the day that he did not think the jury trial amendment which was put in the compromise bill in the House was constitutional. He said he would offer an amendment in January to correct it.

I would rather see him vote against it now. If the bill should pass anyway, he could later offer his amendment. But if a bill is unconstitutional, I think it is better for us not to vote for it. I think Members of Congress must develop stamina, fortitude, and courage to resist pressures, and to stand by the Constitution. If we do not do so, as I stated earlier in the day, we shall keep whittling away the rights of the States until, after a while, the States will not have any rights. There will be a powerful Central Government—and it will be a powerful monster, too. Everything will radiate from Washington.

I understand there is a movement on foot to establish a national police system. It is desired to convert the FBI, which is purely an investigative agency, into a law-enforcement agency. It is not a law-enforcement agency. Congress would not have the right to establish a national police agency, because under the Constitution the police power is reserved to the States.

However, this investigative agency, the FBI, is in a different situation. It does not do police work. It apprehends criminals and works with the States, and cooperates in the execution of Federal laws, apprehending violators and bringing them to trial. But it is not a police agency. I am glad that Mr. J. Edgar Hoover said that he was opposed to a national police system. I am sorry to see that the President has been recommending a bill to provide Federal aid to education by way of construction of school buildings. I have been amazed at the fact that so many people are not acquainted with the fact that in the entire Federal Constitution there is not a sentence which contains the word "education." The word "education" is not to be found in the United States Constitution. Therefore, since the States did not delegate the field of education to the Federal Government, the Federal Government has no jurisdiction in that field, unless we amend the Constitution and give the Federal Government jurisdiction in the field of education.

We can amend the Constitution. We can follow one of the four methods of amending the Constitution, and give the Federal Government authority in that field, if that is the wise thing to do, which I do not think it is. However, that is the way it must be done. We have no authority to appropriate money for Federal aid to education. I know that the President's intentions are good. However, at Columbia University several years ago he was against Federal aid to education. At any rate, it would be a great mistake for the Federal Government to enter the field of education.

After we begin giving money for Federal aid to education by way of construction, the next demand from the powerful National Education Association, which I understand is building a tremendous office building in Washington, will be for a supplement to the salaries of teachers. The National Education Association will bring pressure on Members of Congress, as do other pressure organizations, and will say, "We need supplements to teachers' salaries."

When we enact legislation for Federal aid to construct the buildings, and to provide supplements to teachers' salaries, the Federal Government will be asked to pay a larger share of such salaries, and there will be more and more control to go with it. Before we know it, there will be Federal control of education, and the parents of the Nation will find their children studying books selected in Washington, instead of by the people in Delaware, North Dakota, and South Carolina.

It is a great mistake for us not to follow the Constitution. If the Constitution needs amending, we can amend it. There is a provision for amending it, and it should be amended from time to time. There have been 22 amendments since it was adopted. In 1789 the first 10 amendments were adopted. Since then 12 other amendments have been adopted. There are now 22 amendments to the Constitution.

We were talking about the 16th amendment awhile ago, the income-tax amendment. I think most people feel that it is necessary, although the income tax appears high. Therefore there had to be a way to bring it about. Congress could not pass an income-tax law. It had no authority to do so until the Constitution had been amended to give Congress the power to do it.

I think it is important to understand what we mean by the division of powers between the Federal Government and the State governments. We have a compound Republic. It is a compound Republic because there are Federal powers and State powers. There are three branches in the Federal Government, each of which checks on the others, with the exception of the Supreme Court. It has practically no check on it, and it has gone wild.

There are three branches in the State governments. Each is supposed to be a check on the others.

There are two checks on the Supreme Court. In the first place, we can impeach Supreme Court justices. However, the House must do the impeaching, and the Senate sits as a jury to hear the case. So, there is not much the Senate can do from that standpoint.

The other one is that, under the Constitution, the appellate power of the Supreme Court can be controlled by the Congress, so that if Congress saw fit to pass a bill to limit the appelate power of the Supreme Court, Congress would have that right. The Constitution gives it the power to do that. Many persons think we have to amend the Constitution before we can do that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Would the Senator say that would be a form of cruel and inhuman punishment to impose upon his colleagues?

Mr. THURMOND. I would say it is cruel and inhuman punishment to impose on the citizens of America if we pass a bill without providing for a jury trial.

(Manifestations of applause in the galleries.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The galleries will be in order.

Mr. THURMOND. I have received letters from a number of States, and I have been in California. I spent a week there in the fall of 1953. Starting at Long Beach and ending up at San Francisco, I made addresses all the way up the coast. I even went to Bakersfield and saw an old friend of the Senator from California there. I talked with many persons there. Unless they have had a change in sentiment, they think, just as the people of South Carolina do, that there should be jury trials.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does not the distinguished Senator also think that the people of California are interested in the 15th amendment to the Constitution, assuring all American citizens the right to vote?

Mr. THURMOND. I am sure that the people of California are, and I am sure the people of South Carolina are. The people of South Carolina have done something about it, just as have the people of California. Last night, when the distinguished Senator from California was resting comfortably, I was speaking here and trying to rouse the people of America concerning the dangers of taking away their right of trial by jury. I placed in the RECORD the statutes of California on that subject, and here is what they provide:

> California: Unless otherwise designated, references are to Elections Code Annotated—West's—1955:
>
> "Hindering public meeting: Every person is guilty of a misdemeanor who, by threats, intimidation, or unlawful violence, willfully hinders or prevents electors from assembling in public meetings for consideration of public questions (sec. 5004).
>
> "Intimidating voter: Every person or corporation is guilty of a misdemeanor, who directly or indirectly uses or threatens to use force, violence, restraint, or inflicts or threatens to inflict any injury, damage, harm, or loss or other forms of intimidation to compel a person to vote or refrain from voting at any election (sec. 1158).
>
> "Interference with free exercise of elective franchise: Every person or corporation is guilty of a misdemeanor who, by abduction, duress, or any forcible or fraudulent means, impedes or prevents the free exercise of the elective franchise by any voter; or who compels or induces a voter either to give or refrain from giving his vote at any election or to vote or refrain from voting for a particular person (sec. 11582).
>
> "Election officers: Any election officer who induces or attempts to induce any voter either by menace or reward, to vote differently from the way he intended to vote, is guilty of a felony (sec. 11583).
>
> "Threat by employer: Any employer, whether a corporation or natural person, is guilty of a misdemeanor, if he encloses material in the pay envelopes containing threats, express or implied, intended to influence political opinions or actions of employees, or who within 90 days before an election exhibits any placard, etc., in the place of employment, containing such threats (secs. 11584, 11585).
>
> "Penalty: Any corporation guilty of intimidating a voter shall forfeit its charter (sec. 11586).
>
> "Misdemeanor: Unless a different penalty is prescribed, a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than 6 months or by fine of not over $500, or by both (Penal Code, sec. 19).
>
> "Scope of penalty provisions: All penalty provisions listed above apply to both final elections and primary elections (sec. 11500)."

Those are statutes of the State of California, and they are good statutes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a further question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does the Senator not recognize the fact that under the voting rights bill which the Senate is attempting to pass but which the Senator from South Carolina has, for the moment, successfully prevented the Senate from passing, there is not a single individual who can be cited for either civil or criminal contempt if another American citizen is deprived of his right to vote under the Constitution? So, if the Senator is correct in his statement that no person is deprived of his right to vote in his State—and I feel certain that no American citizen is denied the right to vote in my State—neither California nor South Carolina would cite any public official or other person criminally unless they were depriving people of their right to vote under the laws of the State.

Mr. THURMOND. I think some part of the Union could nullify the Constitution, just as I think some juries turn loose some defendants who are guilty. Some judges will make mistakes, too. But why do we not let the States alone and let them handle their own problems? I know the southern people and I know they are doing all they can for the Negro.

I see my friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] sitting next to the Senator from California. He feels that his State is doing all it can. I know the State of Mississippi, from which come my good friends, Senator EASTLAND and Senator STENNIS, is doing all it can. We cannot change customs overnight. We have to let the local people work these things out. But Congress did not care to let the local people work these things out.

All that is necessary is to have enforcement of the Federal statute. There is a Federal statute, to which I called attention today. For the benefit of Senators who were not here at the time, I may say that this statute provides that whoever intimidates, threatens, or coerces, or attempts to intimidate, threaten, or coerce, any person, for the purpose of interfering with the right of such other person to vote, or to vote as he may choose, is guilty of a crime, punishable by a $1,000 fine or by imprisonment of 1 year.

Mr. COOPER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER. Does the Senator know that there has never been any question, since the War Between the States, about the Negro population in Kentucky having the right to vote, and exercising that right?

Mr. THURMOND. I have never heard any question about it. I simply say that in my State the Negroes are voting in large numbers. They claimed the credit for carrying the election for Stevenson in 1952, and at that time there was a very close election. They claimed they cast more than 80,000 votes, which was about 25 percent of the total. Their own newspaper contained that information. I have a clipping from that newspaper, the Lighthouse and Informer. So they are certainly voting in my State, and I am sure they are voting in the Senator's State.

Is it not better to let the local people work out these problems, rather than to rush things on them, and try to change their customs overnight?

As a matter of fact, if you gentlemen want to take any action, however, if the proponents of this bill are not satisfied—I do not think the distinguished Senator is dissatisfied—with the enforcement by the governors of the States of the Nation—and the governors are the chief executive officers of the States and are responsible for enforcing the law—or if the Federal Government is not satisfied with the enforcement being given by the governors to the voting laws of the States to protect the rights of people to vote, then why do they not enforce the Federal statute, which is already on the books?

Mr. COOPER. Because of the Senator's kind reference, I should like to ask a question as follows: Does the Senator know that in Kentucky all citizens, including all Negroes, have had, since the War Between the States, the right to vote, have exercised that right, and that it has never been questioned?

Mr. THURMOND. I am sure that is the case, because I have heard that they vote there. They are voting in the South in larger numbers than ever before. No persons in my State are deprived of the right to vote. If they are qualified to vote, they are allowed to vote. Of course, no man who is not qualified ought to be allowed to vote. New York State has a much higher standard, as I said a while ago, than we have. If a person can merely read or write in my State, he can vote. In New York one has to be a high-school graduate, I believe or at least has to meet a literacy test. So we are not nearly so strict in South Carolina as they are in New York.

The Senator comes from a border State. Kentucky is a great State. I suggest to the Senator, however, since he is from a border State that went in part with the North and in part with the South, that the Senator stick with the South.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if it is not true that Kentucky had to make that choice almost a hundred years ago and they chose to stick with the Union?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if there is any Member in the Senate who is not satisfied with the voting protection given by the governors and the other officials of the States of the Nation, again I say that all they have to do is to call upon the Justice Department to enforce section 594. It is now against the Federal law to intimidate, threaten, or coerce, or to attempt to intimidate, threaten, or coerce, any voter, in any way, shape, or form. That is the Federal statute which is on the books now. Why not enforce that statute? What is the idea of coming here with a right-to-vote bill? That is a big, high-sounding word that does not mean anything. If we pass this bill, we will pass an unconstitutional bill. It will be all right if the Justice Department will enforce section 594. I believe they are enforcing it. Is there anyone that thinks they are not enforcing this law? Is there anyone who thinks the present administration is not enforcing section 594?

If the Justice Department are enforcing this law, they are protecting people in this matter now. If they are not enforcing this law, let them enforce it and that will protect them. Either the Justice Department are not enforcing this law, if they have had complaints, or they have not had any complaints.

Has the Justice Department had complaints, such as we have been hearing about, that many people have been denied the right to vote? We hear that in the South many people are denied the right to vote. What is there now; what has there been in the past 5 years to keep the Attorney General from going to any Southern State to enforce this statute? It is a Federal statute. The Attorney General not only has the right to enforce it, but he has the duty. If there have been any complaints about people in the South not voting, I have not heard of them. But if there have been any complaints about them not voting, then the Justice Department ought to do something about it. If the Justice Department has taken no action to enforce this statute, it shows one of two things: The Department has not had anybody objecting, or, if there were objections, it ignored them and did not do its duty by enforcing the statute. The point is there is a Federal statute now, so why pass another bill? All the Congress needs to do is to follow the Constitution. If we will follow the line of demarcation in the Constitution between the powers delegated to the Federal Government and the powers reserved to the States, we will not get into difficulties about all these different things.

If a bill were introduced to repeal the poll tax as a prerequisite to voting, there would not be any question but that the Congress would not consider it because it would be unconstitutional. The qualifications of voting are reserved to the States. Why can we not look at it from that viewpoint and not try to say whether it is a good bill or a bad bill? On the right to vote bill, should there be any question whether we are going to accept this compromise? I do not think there should be any question at all, because the Constitution says a man charged with a crime is entitled to a jury trial. The court decision which I have before me holds that criminal contempt is a crime.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Frear in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I will proceed now, if there are no further questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. THURMOND. Article III, defining the judicial power of the United States, contains several provisions of interest in this review.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I will yield to the able Senator for a question.

Mr. LANGER. Is it correct that under Federal statute 594 there can be imposed a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment of 1 year in jail?

Mr. THURMOND. That is correct.

Mr. LANGER. The compromise right to vote bill cuts it down to a fine of $300 and 45 days in jail. If the judge determines that the defendant ought to suffer a greater penalty than that, the case has to go to a jury.

Mr. THURMOND. In reply to the Senator, I will say if this bill is passed, of course I am expecting it to be held unconstitutional as soon as it can be tested. But until that is done, they will have a choice.

There could be a prosecution under the Federal statute, which is section 594; or such a person could be taken before a Federal judge, and the Federal judge could decide whether he wanted to try the case. If the judge decided he was in a hurry to take a vacation trip, he could simply say, "I will try the case myself." Then, under the provisions of the compromise measure, the judge would try the case; and the person being tried could not complain.

Let me ask the Senator from North Dakota what he would do. Suppose he were to find himself in such a situation; and suppose the judge were to say to him, "Mr. Langer, I will not give you a jury trial. I will try you myself"—and then the judge would rear back on his haunches and would grin.

What would the Senator from North Dakota do under those circumstances? There would be nothing he could do, because the judge would have a right to try him under the provisions of the compromise measure which has come to us from the House of Representatives.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Frear in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. Inasmuch as section 594 is on the statute books, why is not this right-to-vote bill entirely superfluous?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota has put his finger on exactly what I have been discussing in the Senate for—let me see, Mr. President, how long has it been?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-one hours.

Mr. THURMOND. No; Mr. President, it has been 22 hours and 10 minutes. [Laughter.] For 22 hours and 10 minutes I have been trying to emphasize that point—namely, why is this compromise necessary, when a Federal statute on this subject is already on the statute books? It provides for a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment of 1 year in jail.

If the Department of Justice is interested in the persons who are alleged to have been deprived of the right to vote—regardless of whether they are whites, Negroes, or others—why does not the Department of Justice take action to enforce section 594 and thus protect the right to vote? The Department of Justice can do that under section 594. That is up to the Department of Justice. I do not know what the Department will do; that is up to the Department of Justice.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for another question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. During the last 5 years, has anyone been arrested under section 594?

Mr. THURMOND. In reply to the question of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, I wish to say that I have never heard that anyone in my State has been tried under that statute. So there is no use in having the representatives of the Department of Justice come to South Carolina and say that people there are deprived of the right to vote, because if anyone representing the Department of Justice does come to South Carolina and does make such a statement, I will tell him that it is his own fault, for those in the Department of Justice have failed to do their duty; they have a law under which they can punish such persons, but they have not done so. Either no one in South Carolina is deprived of the right to vote, or else the Department of Justice has failed to do its duty.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator from South Carolina. I get the point very clearly.

Mr. THURMOND. Let me ask whether there are any more questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield the floor?

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I shall proceed. I am just trying to find a section of the Constitution to which I wish to refer.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, while the Senator from South Carolina is doing that, will he yield for another question?

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. LANGER. Can the Senator from South Carolina tell the Senate how many years ago section 594 was enacted into law?

Mr. THURMOND. I believe it was in 1939.

Mr. LANGER. Do I correctly understand that since that time, there has been no prosecution under that provision of law? Is that true, so far as the Senator from South Carolina knows?

Mr. THURMOND. I have not heard of a single prosecution in South Carolina under that statute.

Mr. LANGER. Has the Senator heard of one in any other State?

Mr. THURMOND. If there has been one, I have not heard of it. I would not say there has not been one in some other State, but I do not know of a case of that sort which has been tried in the Federal courts. Some have been tried in the State courts; we are enforcing our State laws.

But I have not heard of a case in which anyone has been tried under this Federal statute—which carries with it a heavy penalty, namely, a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment in jail for 1 year. I have never heard of anyone who has been tried under that law. But, Mr. President, of course I am not surprised at that, because in South Carolina, everyone who wishes to register to vote and to vote, does register and does vote, if he is qualified. So I do not think it likely that there would be any cases of that sort in South Carolina.

Mr. President, there have been insinuations to the effect that the Southern States are denying some people the right to vote. I think insinuations about any States should stop—whether that be Northern States, Southern States, Eastern States, or Western States. All of us are Americans. We have a great country. In all the wars the United States has ever fought, the United States has had brave soldiers from all sections of the country. It is very bad to have people in one section of the country try to snipe at people in another section of the country. That is the very thing George Washington warned against in his Farewell Address.

Mr. LANGER. Yes, I am familiar with that admonition by George Washington.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, if anyone in the South has been intimidated or coerced or threatened with regard to voting—if anyone in any Southern State has been treated in that way—the district attorney in the State can take action any day he wishes to; and if the Department of Justice does not do it, the Department is failing to perform its duty with respect to such violations; or else there are no violations of that sort. So evidently there have not been any violations of that sort in the State of South Carolina, or else no one has complained about them. As a matter of fact, I am quite sure that there have not been any violations of that sort in my State, because, as I have said, anyone in South Carolina who wishes to vote, and who is qualified to vote, and who registers, can vote.

Mr. President, I should like to read what George Washington said.

Sometimes, Mr. President, when I see the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] sitting in his seat in this Chamber—so able a judge and lawyer, and a fine soldier in World War II; and when I see in the Chamber the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. POTTER], who lost both of his legs in that war; and when I see my other fellow veterans who are distinguished Members of this body or are distinguished Members of the House of Representatives, and then when I see matters of a sectional nature brought up here, and when one group wishes to try to have enacted into law a measure aimed at punishing another section of the country, it makes my heart ache. My colleagues who are veterans did not feel that way when they were serving in the Armed Forces overseas; they did not feel that way when they were in uniform. If the Members of Congress from various sections of the United States would just accord to all the other States the same respect that they expect to have accorded to their own States I am sure that we would not be having this trouble; and then I would not have been speaking here on this subject for more than 22 hours in an effort to arouse the American people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For 22 hours and 10 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. No, Mr. President, for 22 hours and 20 minutes. [Laughter.]

I would not be trying to arouse the American people if it were not necessary. But why should the North want to pick on those of us who live in the South? Why do the people in New York want to pick on us? Why do the people in New Jersey want to pick on us? Or why do the people of any other section of the country want to pick on us? We think we are fairly good people. We think we are patriotic. The Members of Congress from the Southern States want to work together with all the other Members of Congress.

Mr. President, I want to extend every courtesy to every other Member of Congress, and I want to see those who live in any particular section of the country extend to the rest of the people of the country the same courtesy that they expect to have extended to themselves.

But, Mr. President, I can tell you this: This right-to-vote bill—and I say this because I know something about its history—is aimed at the South. It is aimed at the South; and it hurts me to see that done, because South Carolina is not guilty, and this bill should not be enacted. I do not believe the other Southern States are guilty. The Southern States have done their part in every way. As I have said, the people of the Southern States have fought for their country and have served in public office in every way. They have been honorable people.

Yet, in order to try to win the votes of certain minority blocs, some pressure groups are willing to punish us, to put us under the heel, and to grind and grind and grind us. I am getting tired of it.

(Manifestations of applause by the occupants of the galleries.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The doorkeepers must keep the galleries in order.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. A minute ago the Senator spoke very generously of our association and friendship during World War II. I know that he did not mean to intimate that there was any intention upon the part of the Senator from Kentucky, in his vote on the civil-rights bill, to show any bias or prejudice toward his own people in the South.

Mr. THURMOND. I am sure that there was not, Senator.

Mr. COOPER. Does the Senator remember?

Mr. THURMOND. I remember, and I say to the Senator from Kentucky he is one of the finest and most gracious gentlemen I have known.

The Senator from Kentucky is not one of those ardent proponents of the bill who is trying to ram the bill home. I do not know how he is going to vote, but he is a good constitutional lawyer. I hope he will not vote for it. I hope he will think over the jury trial issue and not vote for it.

He has not been one of those who has been baiting the South.

Mr. COOPER. The Senator from Kentucky is a good friend of the Senator from South Carolina, but the Senator from Kentucky will vote for civil rights. He intends to vote for the bill this evening or at some later time.

In the debate he said again and again that he believes in the juries in the South, and that the people of the South would respect the law and would follow the law. I am sure the Senator from South Carolina knows that the Senator from Kentucky said that.

Mr. THURMOND. I am sure he did say that.

The only thing is that if the Senator feels that the South obeys the law, I do not understand why he should want to have this bill passed.

I will get on with what George Washington said.

Mr. President, George Washington, in his Farewell Address, used his strongest language against those who would divide our country; he urged a unity of spirit. He said:

> In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection.

That was George Washington speaking.

George Washington wanted to see the people from the North to the South, and to the East and the West, bound together with a fraternal feeling. He wanted a fraternal attitude manifested.

Why should we not manifest a fraternal attitude on these matters? Why should we not try to help another section, and not sponsor legislation which is aimed at any particular section, merely to try to get votes to win an election?

I have said, and I repeat, that since every State in the United States from Alabama to Wyoming has laws on its books to protect the right to vote, and since the Federal Government has a statute on its books to protect the right to vote, there is no need for this bill.

I say, and I repeat, that I think the bill is purely political, and I think that both parties have been trying to grab the ball to see who could get the spotlight for the elections coming up in 1958.

Article III, defining the judicial power of the United States, contains several provisions of interest in this review. We may note, for example, two further uses of the plural: First, the judicial power is to extend "to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority." Second, treason against the United States is to consist "only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies." Because the authority of the Court will be considered at length in a later chapter, it will suffice here merely to point out that nowhere in article III is the Court given jurisdiction over controversies between a State and the United States. That proposal was specifically advanced during the convention, and specifically rejected.

Every section—indeed, every paragraph—of article IV touches upon the Federal nature of the Union. Full faith and credit are to be given, in each State, to the acts and judicial proceedings of every other State. If this were not a Federal Union, the provision would be nonsense. Beyond this, the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. A person charged in any State with crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall be delivered upon demand to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

Then comes the provision that Northern States were to flout over a period of 30 years: "No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered upon claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

Finally, we may note in article IV the provision for admitting new States into this Union (not this Nation, but this Union): "No new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

Article V had best be quoted in full. It has not been changed by so much as an apostrophe in the years since it came from Philadelphia in September of 1787. It still fixes and defines the sovereign power:

Pause for a moment over this article of the Constitution. We are dealing here with Taylor's "will to enact" and "power to execute"; we are dealing with Marshall's "power to make and unmake." It was plainly envisioned by the framers that their work would require amendment through the years. "That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not but be foreseen," Madison was to write. There was a double aim in the provision, even a triple aim. Aricle V, Madison tells us, was intended, first, to guard equally against too-easy amendment on the one hand and too-difficult amendment on the other. It was drafted, secondly, to permit amendments to originate both with the Federal and with the State Governments. But it was intended, finally, to leave the ultimate decision upon changing the Constitution to the sovereign States themselves—not to the people as a mass, nor even to a bare majority of the States as such. It was recognized that the great, overriding principle of protection for minorities should apply here as bindingly as it was to apply elsewhere. If one-fourth of the States plus one should object to a change in the Constitution—even if that change were desired by three-fourths minus one (and even if this larger fraction should include the great bulk of the total population)—the change could not be engrafted to the Constitution.

Article VI is brief. Its first provision covers debts and engagements entered into under the Articles of Confederation and continues these obligations under the proposed new Constitution; its third provision prohibits any religious test as a qualification for public office and requires an oath to support the Constitution of all public officers, both State and Federal.

It is the second provision that merits brief attention in this summary review:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Let us go back: What is to be supreme? Three things. First, "this Constitution." Secondly, "laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof." Third, treaties made "under the authority of the United States." That is all. Not Executive orders of the President. Not even judgments of the Supreme Court. The Constitution, the laws made in pursuance thereof, the treaties.

In passing, note the phrase "law of the land." It stems originally from the Magna Carta; but as it appears in the Constitution, "law of the land" was merely a substitution, proposed by the committee on style, for "law of the several States and their citizens and inhabitants." The object was to extend this new supreme law to Territories as well as to the States. And this phrase, "law of the land," is as close as the Constitution ever comes to suggesting a "nation." Actually the word "nation" or the word "national" never appears in the Constitution.

The aim, we will recall, was to form "a more perfect Union." Representatives and taxes were to be apportioned among the several States which may be included "within this Union." The militia may be called forth to execute "the laws of the Union." The President is to provide Congress with information on the "state of the Union." New States are to be admitted "into this Union." The guaranty of a republican form of government goes "to every State in this Union." But never, at any point, are the United States described, in the Constitution, as comprising a "nation."

This is not to contend, of course, that ours is not a Nation, or that the Federal Government does not operate nationally. It is only to suggest that the deliberate terms of the Constitution speak for themselves, and should be heeded: Our country is, first and foremost, originally and still, a Union of States. And when we speak of the law of the land, it should be kept steadily in mind that the land is a Federal Union, in which each of the States stands coequal with every other State. The Constitution is supreme not only in its authority over each State, but also in its protection over each State. And each State, each respective State, is entitled to rely upon the Constitution as embodying supreme law that all other States must adhere to with equal fidelity, like it or not, until the Constitution be changed by the States themselves.

Note, too, the careful qualification that defines laws enacted by the Congress. Just any laws of the United States are not enough: Laws, to be binding, must be laws made in pursuance of the Constitution. Any attempted statutes that invade the residuary authority of the States, Hamilton tells us, "will be merely acts of usurpation, and will deserve to be treated as such." And he adds, at another point, that:

"There is no position which depends on clearer principles than that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission under which it is exercised, is void. No legislative act, therefore, contrary to the Constitution, can be valid. To deny this, would be to affirm that the deputy is greater than his principal; that the servant is above his master; that the representatives of the people are superior to the people themselves; that men acting by virtue of powers, may do not only what their powers do not authorize, but what they forbid."

Surely, it may be urged that precisely the same standard must be applied to other branches of the Federal Government—the executive and judicial no less than the legislative. By extension, thus, judgments of the Court, to be supreme law of the land, must be made pursuant to the Constitution. A judgment of the Court, so violative of the clear terms and understandings of the Constitution as to invade the residuary authority of the States, must also be regarded as a usurpation, and should deserve to be treated as such. The argument will be pursued at greater length hereafter.

Finally, this brief examination of the Constitution from the standpoint of the States may be concluded with a second look at article VII. It should be read carefully, for this is the clause that binds: "The ratification of the conventions of 9 States"—not, again, the approval of a majority of the people in a popular referendum, but the ratification of 9 States—"shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

Thus, on September 17, the Convention concluded its work. George Washington, as President of the Convention, transmitted the document to the Congress. A prophetic sentence appeared in his letter, as he mentioned the compromises necessary for the surrender of sovereign powers: "It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved." The States had done the best they could through their delegates. Eager to consolidate their Union, each State had been disposed "to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude than might have been otherwise expected." They launched the ship.

"Well, Doctor," said the lady to Mr. Franklin, "what have we got, a republic or a monarchy?"

"A republic," replied the doctor, "if you can keep it."

It is pretty hard to keep when bills are introduced to violate the Constitution by chipping off and whittling away the rights of the States in an effort, it seems, to reduce them to colonial status.

Continuing the quotation from the Kilpatrick book:

6. THE PROPHETIC MR. HENRY

For the States' understanding of what the Constitution was to mean to them, as States, we can look not only to the internal evidence of the Constitution itself, but to the debates in the ratifying conventions and to some of the contemporary criticism, notably in the Federalist papers. We can look, also, to some of the pronouncements of the Supreme Court from time to time, and to the writings of scholars of our own day.

The evidence is overwhelming. By written compact, solemnly ratified, the States agreed mutually to delegate certain of their sovereign powers to a Federal Government. They enumerated these powers. All other powers they reserved to themselves, and these reserved powers did not need to be enumerated: the reserved powers constituted all inherent powers of sovereign States not specifically abridged.

So plain was this understanding that the feeling most frequently encountered, in reading comments of the period, is one of incredulity that anyone should doubt it.

"The proposed Constitution," said Hamilton, "so far from implying an abolition of the State governments, makes them constituent parts of the national sovereignty by allowing them a direct representation in the Senate, and leaves in their possession certain exclusive and very important portions of sovereign power."

So, too, said Madison:

"It is to be remembered that the General Government is not to be charged with the whole power of making and administering laws. Its jurisdiction is limited to certain enumerated objects which concern all the members of the Republic, but which are not to be attained by the separate provisions of any. The subordinate governments, which can extend their care to all other objects which can be separately provided for, will retain their due authority and activity."

Neither Hamilton nor Madison could quite imagine the Federal Government ever seriously encroaching upon the States.

"Allowing the utmost latitude to the love of power which any reasonable man can require," said Hamilton, "I confess I am at a loss to discover what temptation the persons intrusted with the administration of the General Government could ever feel to divest the States of the authorities of that description. The regulation of the mere domestic police of a State appears to me to hold out slender allurements to ambition. Commerce, finance, negotiation, and war seem to comprehend all the objects which have charms for minds governed by that passion; and all the powers necessary to those objects ought, in the first instance, to be lodged in the national depository."

Then he added, with a singular absence of prophecy:

"The administration of private justice between the citizens of the same State, the supervision of agriculture and of other concerns of a similar nature, all those things, in short, which are proper to be provided for by local legislation, can never be desirable cares of a general jurisdiction. It is therefore improbable that there should exist a disposition in the Federal councils to usurp the powers with which they are connected. * * *

"It will always be far more easy for the State governments to encroach upon the national authorities, than for the National Government to encroach upon the State authorities."

That is where he was wrong. In other words, Hamilton had no idea that the Federal Government would ever attempt to encroach on the rights of the States. In his day it looked to him as if it would be easier for the States to encroach on the rights of the Federal Government than for the Federal Government to encroach on the rights of the States. But in recent years do-gooders, welfare-staters, and left-wingers, and other pressure groups are trying to transform this Government. They are trying to make of it a national government. It is not a national government; it is a Federal Government. The States came together in a federation and formed this Government. That is the conception which I hope we can get over to the people of the Nation, that our Government is not a national government; it is a Federal Government made by the States coming together and forming a federation and signing the compact which became the Constitution. Therefore we have a Federal Government, not a national government. I hope we shall never have a national government. We must stop the Federal usurpation that is now going on and has been going on for some years.

Madison, also, imagined that the Federal Government would "be disinclined to invade the rights of the individual States, or the prerogatives of their governments." For his part, Hamilton thought it more probable that the States would encroach upon the Federal Government, and he imagined that in such contests the State governments, because they "will commonly possess most influence" over the people, would dominate Federal agencies "to the disadvantage of the Union." However, all such conjectures Hamilton viewed as "extremely vague and fallible." He preferred to assume that the people "will always take care to preserve the constitutional equilibrium between the general and the State governments."

In No. 45, Madison treated at considerable length the widespread apprehension that the States would be obliterated. Some of his comments have been outdated; what he has to say about the election of Senators, for example, unhappily has been superseded by the misfortune of the 17th amendment. Some of his other observations, dealing with functions of what was to become the Bureau of Internal Revenue, may occasion some wary reflection on the lengths by which even a Madison could miss his guess. But as contemporary evidence of the role guaranteed to the States, No. 45 justifies quotation at some length:

"The State governments will have the advantage of the Federal Government, whether we compare them in respect to the immediate dependence of the one on the other; to the weight of personal influence which each side will possess; to the powers respectively vested in them to the predilection and probable support of the people; to the disposition and faculty of resisting and frustrating the measures of each other.

"The State governments may be regarded as constituent and essential parts of the Federal Government; whilst the latter is nowise essential to the operation or organization of the former. Without the intervention of the State legislatures, the President of the United States cannot be elected at all. They must in all cases have a great share in his appointment, and will, perhaps, in most cases, of themselves determine it. The Senate will be elected absolutely and exclusively by the State legislatures. Even the House of Representatives, though drawn immediately from the people, will be chosen very much under the influence of that class of men, whose influence over the people obtains for themselves an election into the State legislatures. Thus, each of the principal branches of the Federal Government will owe its existence more or less to the favor of the State governments, and must consequently feel a dependence, which is much more likely to beget a disposition too obsequious than too overbearing toward them. On the other side, the component parts of the State governments will in no instance be indebted for their appointment to the direct agency of the Federal Government, and very little, if at all, to the local influence of its members.

"The number of individuals employed under the Constitution of the United States will be much smaller than the number employed under the particular States. There will consequently be less of personal influence on the side of the former than of the latter. The members of the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments of 13 and more States, the justices of peace, officers of militia, ministerial officers of justice, with all the county, corporation, and town officers, for 3 millions and more of people, intermixed, and having particular acquaintance with every class and circle of people, must exceed, beyond all proportion, both in number and influence, those of every description who will be employed in the administration of the Federal system. Compare the members of the three great departments of the 13 States, excluding from the judiciary department the justices of peace, with the members of the corresponding departments of the single government of the Union; compare the militia officers of 3 millions of people with the military and marine officers of any establishment which is within the compass of probability, or, I may add, of possibility, and in this view alone, we may pronounce the advantage of the States to be decisive.

"If the Federal Government is to have collectors of revenue, the State governments will have theirs also. And as those of the former will be principally on the seacoast, and not very numerous, whilst those of the latter will be spread over the face of the country, and will be very numerous, the advantage in this view also lies on the same side. It is true, that the confederacy is to possess, and may exercise, the power of collecting internal as well as external taxes throughout the States; but it is probable that this power will not be resorted to, except for supplemental purposes of revenue; that an option will then be given to the States to supply their quotas by previous collections of their own; and that the eventual collection, under the immediate authority of the Union, will generally be made by the officers, and according to the rules, appointed by the several States. * * *

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State.

"The operations of the Federal Government will be most extensive and important in times of war and danger; those of the State governments in times of peace and security. As the former periods will probably bear a small proportion to the latter, the State governments will here enjoy another advantage over the Federal Government. The more adequate, indeed, the Federal powers may be rendered to the national defense, the less frequent will be those scenes of danger which might favor their ascendancy over the governments of the particular States.

"If the new Constitution be examined with accuracy and candor, it will be found that the change which it proposes consists much less in the addition of new powers to the Union, than in the invigoration of its original powers. The regulation of commerce, it is true, is a new power; but that seems to be an addition which few oppose, and from which no apprehensions are entertained. The powers relating to war and peace, armies and fleets, treaties and finance, with the other more considerable powers, are all vested in the existing Congress by the Articles of Confederation. The proposed change does not enlarge these powers; it only substitutes a more effectual mode of administering them."

Even John Marshall, who did more than any man in our history to aggrandize the Federal Government and to weaken the States, never doubted the basic structure of divided powers. Consider, briefly, his comment in the famed case of McCulloch v. Maryland. The case arose when Congress established the Bank of the United States, and Maryland undertook to levy a tax upon the bank's Baltimore branch; James McCulloch, the cashier, refused to pay the tax, and Maryland sued.

The legal questions were two: Did Congress have power to incorporate the bank, and secondly, did Maryland have power to tax it? Marshall answered the first one "Yes," the second, "No." With the bulk of his reasoning, strict constructionists and apostles of States rights will disagree: Marshall's sophisticated mind did not boggle at stretching "necessary" to mean "convenient." In considering the actual act of ratification by which the Union was formed, Marshall was not much impressed by the fact, which he could not escape, that the people met in State conventions. "Where else should they have assembled?" he asked. But even here, a couple of sentences merit quotation as evidence from the States greatest detractor:

"It is true, [the people] assembled in their several States—and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their States."

Marshall went on in his opinion to confuse "States" and "State governments," thus setting up a convenient strawman to batter down. No one ever had contended that the Constitution was ratified by State governments, but Marshall, with a glittering display of intellectual swordsmanship, neatly skewered the nonexistent objection. Then he went on to say:

"This Government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle that it can exercise only the powers granted to it would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was pending before the people, found it necessary to urge. That principle is now universally admitted. But the question respecting the extent of the powers actually granted is perpetually arising, and will probably continue to arise, as long as our system shall exist."

True enough, the question of "the extent of powers" does continue to arise to this day, though the doctrines of Marshall have so pervaded public thinking that it often is forgotten that the Federal Government has any limitations whatever. But the separateness of the States and the nature of their delegated powers were clearly recognized when the Constitution was created. The prophets who foresaw the trend toward consolidation—notably Patrick Henry and George Mason—were told they were old women, seeing ghosts.

Consider, if you will, the debate on ratification in Virginia. The transcript offers some absorbing reading. If the clash of a Henry and a Mason with a Pendleton and a Madison does not prompt reflection upon subsequent corruption of the Constitution, at the very least their battle must lead to regrets at the decline in the quality of today's legislative debates. There were giants in those days. This was, to paraphrase Marshall, a Constitution they were debating. What was said of the relationship of the States and the Federal Government?

Go back in time. This was a sultry summer in Richmond. At least twice the brief convention was interrupted by thunder storms so severe the delegates were forced to recess. Tempers flared sharply. At one point Edmund Randolph, infuriated with Patrick Henry, was prepared to let their friendship "fall like Lucifer, never to rise again." They began on Monday, June 2; they adjourned sine die on Friday, June 27. Into those 4 weeks, the Virginians of 1788 packed a world of profound reflection upon the meaning and intention of the Constitution.

Edmund Pendleton served as president of the Virginia convention. He was a remarkable man: lawyer, scholar, statesman, thinker. In advocating ratification, Pendleton was joined by James Madison, John Marshall, Edmund Randolph, and Light Horse Harry Lee. They carried the day against Patrick Henry and George Mason, as leading opponents of the proposition.

The convention scarcely had begun before Henry established the broad spread of argument. He did not propose to abide by any parliamentary decision to debate one clause at a time. Before the convention in Philadelphia the previous summer, said Henry, a general peace and a universal tranquillity had prevailed. Now he was "extremely uneasy at the proposed change of government." He swept the room with a cold eye: "Be extremely cautious, watchful, jealous of your liberty. Instead of securing your rights, you may lose them forever."

George Mason came to his side. He charged that the new Constitution would create "a national government, and no longer a confederation." He especially denounced the authority proposed in the general government to levy direct taxes. This power, being at the discretion of Congress and unconfined, "and without any kind of control, must carry everything before it." "The idea of a consolidated government," he said, "is totally subversive of every principle which has hitherto governed us. This power is calculated to annihilate totally the State governments. * * * These two concurrent powers cannot exist long together; the one will destroy the other; the general government, being paramount to and in every respect more powerful than the State governments, the latter must give way to the former."

Then Mason voiced the argument that is as applicable in the mid-20th century as it was toward the end of the 18th:

"Is it to be supposed that one national government will suit so extensive a country, embracing so many climates, and containing inhabitants so very different in manners, habits, and customs? It is ascertained, by history, that there never was a government over a very extensive country without destroying the liberties of the people. * * * Popular governments can only exist in small territories."

On Thursday, June 5, Pendleton undertook to respond to Henry and to Mason. Was the proposed government, he inquired, truly a consolidated government? Of course not. "If this be such a government, I will confess, with my worthy friend, that it is inadmissible. * * *" The proposed Federal Government, he said, "extends to the general purposes of the Union. It does not intermeddle with the local, particular affairs of the States. * * * It is the interest of the Federal to preserve the State governments; upon the latter the existence of the former depends. * * * I wonder how any gentleman, reflecting on the subject, could have conceived an idea of the possibility of the latter."

Henry conceived it. He conceived it very clearly. The proposed Constitution, he felt, was "extremely pernicious, impolitic and dangerous." He saw no jeopardy to the people in the Articles of Confederation; he saw great jeopardy in this new Constitution. And he had this to say:

"We are descended from a people whose government was founded on liberty: Our glorious forefathers of Great Britain made liberty the foundation of every thing. That country is become a great, mighty, and splendid nation; not because their government is strong and energetic, but, sir, because liberty is its direct end and foundation. We drew the spirit of liberty from our British ancestors: By that spirit we have triumphed over every difficulty. But now, sir, the American spirit, assisted by the ropes and chains of consolidation, is about to convert this country into a powerful and mighty empire. If you make the citizens of this country agree to become the subjects of one great consolidated empire of America, your government will not have sufficient energy to keep them together. Such a government is incompatible with the genius of republicanism."

And note this prophetic observation:

"There will be no checks, no real balances, in this government. What can avail your specious, imaginary balances, your rope-dancing, chain-rattling, ridiculous ideal checks and contrivances?"

What indeed? What have these ideal checks and balances availed the States in the 20th century? Henry saw the empty prospect: "This Constitution is said to have beautiful features; but when I come to examine these features, sir, they appear to me horribly frightful. Among other deformities, it has an awful squinting; it squints toward monarchy; and does not this raise indignation in the breast of every true American?"

It was monarchy, per se, that Henry foresaw. And it was despotism at the hands of a general government that he feared.

"What are your checks in this Government?" he kept asking.

No one ever answered him accurately, though half a dozen members of the Convention undertook to refute Henry and to allay his apprehensions. Randolph, replying to the objection that the country soon would be too large for effective government from the capital, commented that "no extent on earth seems to me too great," but he added, "provided the laws be wisely made and executed." It has proved to be a large qualification.

Madison also responded to Henry's general objection that the liberty of the people was in danger: "Since the general civilization of mankind," he said, "I believe there are more instances of the abridgment of the freedom of the people by gradual and silent encroachments of those in power, than by violent and sudden usurpations."

Follow closely what Madison had to say next. He is expounding the relationship of the State and Federal Governments as he, above all men, understood it:

"Give me leave to say something of the nature of the Government. * * * There are a number of opinions; but the principal question is, whether it be a federal or consolidated government. In order to judge properly of the question before us, we must consider it minutely in its principal parts. I conceive myself that it is of a mixed nature; it is in a manner unprecedented; we cannot find one express example in the experience of the world. It stands by itself. In some respects it is a government of a federal nature; in others it is of a consolidated nature. * * * Who are parties to it?"

Note this, especially; it was quoted earlier but it bears repetition:

"The people—but not the people as composing one great body; but the people as composing 13 sovereignties."

Francis Corbin, one of the ablest political students of his time, then joined Madison in soothing the growing fear that the Federal Government might one day absorb the State Governments. "The powers of the General Government," he said, "are only of a general nature, and their object is to protect, defend, and strengthen the United States; but the internal administration of government is left to the State legislatures, who exclusively retain such powers as will give the States the advantages of small republics, without the danger commonly attendant on the weakness of such governments."

Henry, undaunted, straightened his red wig and returned to the debate. "That government is no more than a choice among evils," he remarked, "is acknowledged by the most intelligent among mankind, and has been a standing maxim for ages." He could not accept the idea that this new government would be "a mighty benefit to us."

"Sir, I am made of so incredulous materials, that assertions and declarations do not satisfy me. I must be convinced, sir. I shall retain my infidelity on that subject till I see our liberties secured in a manner perfectly satisfactory to my understanding."

This exchange occurred on Friday, June 16. The following Monday, Henry renewed his assault:

"A number of characters, of the greatest eminence in this country, object to this government for its consolidating tendency. This is not imaginary. It is a formidable reality. If consolidation proves to be as mischievous to this country as it has been to other countries, what will the poor inhabitants of this country do? This government will operate like an ambuscade. It will destroy the State governments, and swallow the liberties of the people, without giving previous notice."

Madison came back with fresh replies and new remonstrances. The States were safely protected, he assured the Virginia convention. And renewing the arguments he had advanced in the Federalist, "There will be an irresistible bias toward the State governments." It was utterly improbable—almost impossible—that the Federal Government ever would encroach upon the States. "The means of influence consist in having the disposal of gifts and emoluments, and in the number of persons employed by and dependent upon a government. Will any gentleman compare the number of persons which will be employed in the General Government with the number of those which will be in the State governments? The number of dependents upon the State governments will be infinitely greater than those on the General Government. I may say, with truth, that there never was a more economical government in any age or country, nor which will require fewer hands, or give less influence."

Pendleton again gained the floor to tackle Henry's objection. We are told, he said, "that there will be a war between the two bodies equally our representatives, and that the State government will be destroyed, and consolidated into the General Government. I stated before, that this could not be so. The two governments act in different manners, and for different purposes—the General Government in great national concerns, in which we are interested in common with other members of the Union; the State legislature in our mere local concerns. * * * Our dearest rights—life, liberty and property—as Virginians, are still in the hands of our State legislature."

Patrick Henry remained unconvinced. His opinion and Madison's were "diametrically opposite." The mild-mannered Madison said the States would prevail. Henry, a dramatic and eloquent speaker, feared the Federal Government would prevail. Bring forth the Federal allurements, he cried, "and compare them with the poor, contemptible things that the State legislatures can bring forth. * * * There are rich, fat, Federal emoluments. Your rich, smug, fine, fat, Federal officers—the number of collectors of taxes and excises—will outnumber anything from the States. Who can cope with the excise man and the tax men?"

Henry did not imagine that the dual governments could be kept each within its proper orbit. "I assert that there is danger of interference," he remarked, "because no line is drawn between the powers of the two governments, in many instances; and where there is a line, there is no check to prevent the one from encroaching upon the powers of the other. I therefore contend that they must interfere, and that this interference must subvert the State government as being less powerful. Unless your government have checks, it must inevitably terminate in the destruction of your privileges."

William Grayson, burly veteran of the Revolution, was another member of the Virginia convention who clearly perceived the absence of effective checks and balances. "Power ought to have such checks and limitations," he said, "as to prevent bad men from abusing it. It ought to be granted on a supposition that men will be bad; for it may be eventually so."

Grayson was here discussing his apprehensions toward the powers vested by article III in the Supreme Court of the United States. "This Court," he protested, "has more power than any court under heaven." The Court's appellate jurisdiction, especially, aroused his alarm: "What has it in view, unless to subvert the State governments?"

Mr. President, only in the past few months this Court rendered a decision which struck down the sedition statutes in 48 States and two Territories, merely because the Federal Government had a statute on sedition. The Supreme Court held that because of that fact, the Federal Government had preempted the whole field, and struck down the State statutes on sedition. Sedition means overthrowing the Government. That is the practical effect of it.

Steve Nelson, in Pennsylvania, was convicted under Pennsylvania law. He appealed his case to the United States Supreme Court, and the Court turned him loose, on the ground that when the Federal sedition statute was enacted, that statute preempted the field. Thus it struck down all the State statutes on the subject. Forty-two States and two Territories had statutes on the subject.

Judge Howard Smith in the House, who was the author of the bill, said there was no such intention on his part when he introduced the bill. There was even a provision in the bill that the State laws should not be affected. Yet the Supreme Court struck down the sedition statutes in 42 States and two Territories. Nine men overruled the legislatures of 42 States, and would have overruled the supreme courts in 42 States if their statutes had been tested.

In New York a man named Slochower was employed by the City College of New York. The charter of the City College provides that if any schoolteacher takes refuge behind the fifth amendment, upon being asked by an official body about his Communist connections, he shall be automatically dismissed. He was questioned by an official body. He was automatically dismissed. But what happened? The Supreme Court reinstated him in his job. City College of New York cannot control its own faculty because of these nine men in Washington. Forty-eight State legislatures cannot have sedition statutes because of these nine men in Washington.

Out in New Mexico a man applied for membership in the bar. A similar situation occurred in California. One of the men was admittedly a former Communist. The bar did not want him to become a member. Certainly the bar board should have discretion enough to determine whether a man had the character to be admitted. The board turned him down.

In the other case the man refused to answer questions about his Communist connections. Both of those men—one a former Communist, the other tied in with the Communists—were refused licenses to practice law, one in New Mexico and the other in California. But the nine men comprising the Supreme Court ordered those boards to give the applicants their licenses.

Also, in California there were 14 Communists convicted of actually organizing Communist cells. They were preaching the doctrine of communism. They were convicted in the California court. The case was appealed to the United States Supreme Court. What did that Court do? It turned five of them loose and gave the other nine a new trial. It virtually held, in fact, that one can preach communism all he wants to. So long as the organizing does not begin until a future day, it will be all right. In other words, there would have to be action to put it into effect immediately under the holding of the Court.

How are we going to protect this Government? How is the FBI going to protect it? How are the people of California going to protect it when they catch people who are actually organizing Communist cells and who are advocating communism and preaching communism, and then the Supreme Court turns them loose, laying down a dangerous doctrine—and it is a dangerous doctrine to which I just referred.

Then there is the Watkins case, Mr. President, which has hampered investigations by the Congress. The Supreme Court handed down a decision after Watkins had been convicted of contempt and turned him loose. The Court, in effect, held that a member of the counsel or someone who wanted to ask questions would have to explain the questions to the witness. A smart witness would never admit he understood or comprehended what was meant.

In the city of Washington, Mr. President, one of the most dangerous decisions, I think, that has ever been handed down involved the man Mallory, who raped a white woman. He was caught the next day. He was caught about 2 o'clock. Along about 8 or 9 o'clock he was given a lie-detector test, and he confessed the crime and admitted that he raped the white woman. The officers could not get hold of the United States Commissioner that night, and had to wait until the next morning, about 9 o'clock. They held the admitted criminal from about 2 o'clock one day to 9 o'clock the next day, and in the meantime he gave a confession to the police in Washington. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death. He had confessed his crime. But the case was appealed to the Supreme Court. What did those nine men do with it? They reversed the decision and said the police had held the man too long.

What is going to happen in this Nation if police officers cannot hold criminals from 2 o'clock one day to 9 o'clock the next day, especially when those criminals have confessed to their crimes?

Heretofore in judicial administration there has been no particular time fixed. A person could be held a reasonable time before arraignment. Under this decision the man would have to confess at just about the time he was arrested, because the Supreme Court held that after he is arrested he is under coercion; and because he was held that short time the Supreme Court reversed the case, and the district attorney said there would not be any use to try it again; that the evidence depended on the confession.

As a result of that case, the Chief of Police in Washington said it would be very difficult to apprehend and detect criminals and arrest them hereafter and be able to make the evidence stand up in court. He called it a terrible handicap to law enforcement in such cases.

Mr. President, there are other decisions the Supreme Court has handed down about which I should like to tell the Senate. The Court seems to get its greatest delight out of turning loose Communists.

The record is disgraceful. The FBI, the law-enforcement agencies, police officers chase down Communists and narcotic people—and they are hard to catch. Then the Supreme Court reverses decisions and turns them loose and they walk the streets, as did the confessed rapist who was sentenced on his own confession. It is a disgrace to this Nation.

Mr. President, I still think this compromise bill is unconstitutional, but with the present Supreme Court no one can predict what they will do about it.

It was John Marshall, who 15 years later would do so much to justify Mason's apprehensions, who undertook to allay his fears now. The Federal Government, he insisted, certainly would not have the power "to make laws on every subject." Could Members of the Congress make laws affecting the transfer of property, or contracts, or claims, between citizens of the same State?

"Can they go beyond the delegated powers? If they were to make a law not warranted by any of the powers enumerated, it would be considered by the judges as an infringement of the Constitution which they are to guard. They would not consider such a law as coming under their jurisdiction. They would declare it void."

Marshall saw no danger to the States from decrees of the Supreme Court: "I hope that no gentleman will think that a State will be called at the bar of the Federal court. * * * It is not rational to suppose that the sovereign power should be dragged before a court."

Madison, Monroe, and others joined Marshall in defending the third article. Their debate was long and detailed. Much of it was concerned with questions of pleading and practice. But after several days, they went on to other aspects of the Constitution: The prospect of judicial despotism was recognized by the few, and denied by the many.

7. THE STATES RATIFY

In the end, Virginia ratified. It was a close vote. A motion to postpone ratification until amendments, in the nature of a bill of rights, could be considered by "the other States in the American confederacy," failed by 88 to 80. Then the main question was put, and this was what Virginia agreed to. It merits careful reading:

"We, the delegates of the people of Virginia, * * * having fully and freely investigated and discussed the proceedings of the Federal Convention, and being prepared, as well as the most mature deliberation hath enabled us, to decide thereon, do, in the name and in behalf of the people of Virginia, declare and make known, that the powers granted under the Constitution, being derived from the people of the United States, be resumed by them whensoever the same shall be perverted to their injury or oppression, and that every power, not granted thereby, remains with them, and at their will; that, therefore, no right, of any denomination, can be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by the Congress, by the Senate or House of Representatives, acting in any capacity, by the President, or any department or officer of the United States, except in those instances in which power is given by the Constitution for those purposes; and that, among other essential rights, the liberty of conscience and of the press cannot be canceled, abridged, restrained, or modified, by any authority of the United States."

The vote on that main question was 89 to 79, but even that narrow margin of approval was predicated upon a gentlemen's agreement that the Virginia convention would recommend a number of amendments, in the form of a Bill of Rights, to be presented to the first Congress. And the first of these recommended amendments reads: "That each State in the Union shall respectively retain every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this Constitution delegated to the Congress of the United States, or to the departments of the Federal Government."

By the time Virginia completed ratification, of course her decision no longer carried compelling importance. The Virginia convention had opened on June 2, not quite 2 weeks after South Carolina, on May 23, had become the eighth State to ratify. But while the Virginians were debating the issue, New Hampshire, on June 21, had become No. 9: The new union had been formed, and the Constitution had become binding upon the nine States "ratifying the same." It has ever been Virginia's fate to make the right decisions, but to put off making them as long as possible.

In this consideration of State and Federal relationships, there is something to be learned from the other resolutions of ratification. The easy ones came first: Delaware came first, on December 7, 1787, "fully, freely, and entirely" approving and assenting to the Constitution; and then, in quick succession, Pennsylvania on December 12, after a bitter fight; New Jersey on December 18, and Georgia—Georgians had not even read the Constitution—on January 2, 1788. Connecticut followed a week later, with a comfortable vote of 128 to 40.

Then a month's hiatus set in. Massachusetts did not become No. 6 until February 7, and her approval of this "explicit and solemn compact" was not unqualified:

"It is the opinion of this convention that certain amendments and alterations in the said Constitution would remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions of many of the good people of this commonwealth, and more effectually guard against an undue administration of the Federal Government."

It will come as no surprise that the very first amendment recommended by Massachusetts was "that it be explicitly declared that all powers not expressly delegated by the aforesaid Constitution are reserved to the several States to be by them exercised."

Two months later, on April 28, Maryland ratified. Then there was another lapse of nearly a month before South Carolina, on May 23, became No. 8. South Carolina accompanied her resolution of ratification with a pointed statement that she considered it essential "to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States" and for the freedom of the people, that the State's right to prescribe the manner, time, and places of Congressional elections "be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States." Then South Carolina added:

"This convention doth also declare that no section or paragraph of the said Constitution warrants a construction that the > States do not retain every power not expressly relinquished by them and vested in the General Government of the Union."

>
> New Hampshire, in voting its approval on June 21, closely paralleled the action of Massachusetts, but New Hampshire's declaration as to reserved powers was even more explicit. The people of New Hampshire wanted it understood that all powers not "expressly and particularly delegated" were reserved.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. LANGER. Was the action of the South Carolina convention unanimous? [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMOND. I do not recall, from reading the history of that matter, whether it was unanimous or not. The action of the South Carolina convention was not unanimous when it acted on the question of adopting the resolution of ratification for the admission of South Carolina to the Union. South Carolina was the eighth State to be admitted to the Union. New Hampshire was the ninth. New Hampshire's action resulted in the formation of the Union; ratification by nine States was required in order to form the Union.

After that, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, and Rhode Island ratified the Constitution and became members of the Union.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I am not sure whether the action by the South Carolina convention was unanimous or not.

Mr. LANGER. I know the Senator from South Carolina, who has been a very distinguished governor of his State, is very well informed in regard to such matters.

Mr. THURMOND. As stated in the book, The Sovereign States—

> South Carolina accompanied her resolution of ratification with a pointed statement that she considered it essential "to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States" and for the freedom of the people, that the State's right to prescribe the manner, time, and places of Congressional elections "be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States."

Then South Carolina added:

> "This convention doth also declare that no section or paragraph of the said Constitution warrants a construction that the States do not retain every power not expressly relinquished by them and vested in the General Government of the Union.

I construe that declaration to be part of the resolution of ratification, which was not adopted unanimously.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I have been glad, Mr. President, to have the Senator from North Dakota ask these questions.

Mr. President, a few years ago, when I was a young State senator, I made a commencement address in another county, about 40 miles from my home. The commencement was held in a long school building in which the acoustics were very bad. People in the rear could not hear, and looked as if they were going to sleep—and maybe they were. So I raised my voice, and said, "Ladies and gentlemen, I want you to know that I am speaking for the future citizens of South Carolina." By raising my voice, I woke up the people in the rear of the room; and one fellow rose up, shook his head, and said, "Well, brother, if you speak much longer, they will soon be here, too." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I feel so good that I believe I could speak quite a long time. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I felt it my duty to make sure that I had not failed to exert every effort to emphasize the dangers of this bill.

I began speaking at 8:50 last night. It is now 5 minutes after 9. I shall conclude my remarks in a very few minutes.

Mr. President, in closing, I desire to remind the Senate that every State in the Nation has laws to protect the right to vote; and the Federal Government has a statute which protects the right to vote. In my opinion, Mr. President, this bill is unconstitutional, for the reasons I have stated during this debate.

This so-called compromise, which came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, permits a Federal judge to decide whether he will try one who is charged with criminal contempt, or whether he will permit him to be tried by a jury. The bill further provides a Federal judge with the discretionary power—if he does not try the person, without a jury—to decide what punishment he will impose. If he imposes a fine greater than $300 or imprisonment for more than 45 days, the defendant can then demand a jury trial. That process could result in two trials in the case of a defendant charged with criminal contempt. I believe that would be unconstitutional. Under our system of jurisprudence, a man can never be put in jeopardy more than once for the same offense. Furthermore, if a judge should find such a person guilty, as a result of the first trial, we can realize what effect that would have on the jury which would be used in the second trial.

Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senate of the decision I have cited today, which holds that criminal contempt is a crime. That decision says criminal contempt is a crime. The Constitution says a man charged with a crime is entitled to a jury trial. The Constitution makes no exceptions.

The pending bill, which has come to the Senate from the House of Representatives, has now been amended in such a way that it could not conform to the Constitution.

Mr. President, in spite of the great amount of debate and discussion which previously have taken place on the subject of House bill 6127, I felt that this bill was of such importance to the citizens of the United States that it was my duty to make sure that I had not failed to exert every effort again to emphasize the dangers of the bill. I have spoken several times on it before.

Mr. President, I wish to say that my action was taken entirely on my own volition. I believe that every Senator must follow the dictates of his own conscience, in connection with such matters. I do not believe that the action of any other Senator should be judged according to the action I have taken.

Mr. President, if I have helped to bring home to the American people, the citizens of this Nation, the heartfelt conviction which I hold, namely, that this bill is unwise, unnecessary, and unconstitutional, then I shall have done what I believe to be my duty.

I should like to believe that some have been convinced by my arguments, and that my arguments have been accepted on the basis on which I intended them to be accepted—as arguments against what I am convinced is bad proposed legislation, proposed legislation which never should have been introduced, and which never should be approved by the Senate.

Mr. President, I urge every Member of this body to consider this bill most carefully. I hope the Senate will see fit to kill it.

I expect to vote against the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I wish to extend my sincerest gratitude to the officials of the Senate, to those who have come in to listen to this debate, to the various Senators who have listened to this debate from time to time; to the clerks and the attachés, and to all who did everything they could to make me as comfortable as possible during the 24 hours and 22 minutes I have spoken.

Mr. President, I am deeply grateful for these courtesies, and again I want to thank the Presiding Officer and the others for their courtesies extended to me, and with this I now give up the floor, and suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the rollcall be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATOR FROM WISCONSIN

At 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m. Thursday, August 29, 1957, Mr. JOHNSON of Texas said: Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me, in accordance with the agreement previously reached, under the conditions previously stated, so the Senator-elect from Wisconsin may present himself?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield in accordance with that agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator-elect, Mr. WILLIAM PROXMIRE, of the State of Wisconsin, comes to the Senate today with an overwhelming mandate from the people of Wisconsin. His victory represents the unity which has been achieved in every part of the State, by people from every walk of life.

Mr. President, we are very happy to welcome the Senator-elect from Wisconsin and the entire State of Wisconsin into the ranks of the Senate majority.

Pursuant to the consent previously given, I ask unanimous consent that it now be in order for the Senator-elect to proceed to the desk and to have the oath of office administered, immediately following the conclusion of the reading of the two telegrams which are at the desk, one being from the board of State canvassers, and the other being from the Governor of Wisconsin.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams will now be read.

The telegrams were read, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator-elect from Wisconsin will come to the desk, the oath of office will be administered to him.

Mr. PROXMIRE, escorted by Mr. WILEY, advanced to the desk; and the oath of office prescribed by law was administered to him by the Vice President.

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The Senator-elect thereupon subscribed to the oath in the official oath book.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I should like to ask unanimous consent for leave to speak to the new Senator without my losing the floor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I did not hear the Senator's request for unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMOND. I ask unanimous consent for leave to speak to the new Senator, without my losing the floor, and without having another speech being counted against me.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have no objection.

Thereupon Mr. THURMOND greeted the new Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, may we have order, please?

CIVIL-RIGHTS ACT OF 1957

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate amendments Nos. seven and 15 to the bill (H. R. 6127) to provide means of further securing and protecting the civil rights of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, this morning I was aroused to come to the Senate at 10 o'clock to make the short speech I have to deliver. I have been sitting in my place now for 11 hours and 45 minutes awaiting my opportunity. While I am on my feet I wish to compliment the distinguished junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] for his great feat of endurance. I know what an ordeal he went through. I wish to say that I held title of the longest filibuster for about 2 or 3 years until another idiot, in the person of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] beat my record. [Laughter.]

But there is one record I hold which I do not believe anyone will ever exceed. It was established about a year after I became a Member of the Senate over 19 years ago, and I was successful in holding the floor for 6 successive days by unanimous consent, and speaking from 6 to 8 hours. So I know the ordeal through which my good friend from South Carolina went in the 24 hours he spoke.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the so-called compromise of H. R. 6127. As I have stated previously, the entire concept of the measure is repugnant to our Constitution and the separation of Federal and State powers provided under that Constitution. The bill, as it passed the Senate, was opposed by me and by a number of other Senators because it permits unwarranted and unjustified interference by the Federal Government of one of the most basic rights of the States, the right to fix qualifications of voters without interference from the Central Government. I am still opposed to it for that reason. Moreover, it still involves the creation of a super grand jury with nationwide jurisdiction, authorized and empowered to rove at will over the length and breadth of our country ferreting ways and means of injecting the heavy hand of the Federal judiciary into the electoral processes of our States.

But, Mr. President, the Senate bill provided one important safeguard against the exercise of tyrannical power by the Attorney General and the Federal judiciary: The right to trial by jury in all cases arising under it.

The Senate adopted the jury trial amendment by a substantial margin. Senators favoring it made logical and well-reasoned speeches urging its adoption. The Senate was convinced that guaranteeing trial by jury to all persons charged with what amounts to a criminal offense was the only proper thing to do.

Now, in the closing hours of this session of Congress, a small group of willful men in the House of Representatives, led by persons who have only minute numbers of Negroes in their Congressional districts, have determined to play politics once again with the so-called right-to-vote bill.

They, along with some Members of this body, have evidently forgotten the admonition of the distinguished junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], myself and others who warned that the Nation cannot afford to sacrifice the basic right of trial by jury in order to allegedly further safeguard another right, the right to vote.

I make that statement, Mr. President, because the jury trial amendment has not only been compromised, it has been brutally raped and almost nullified. The entire Constitution has been seduced and subverted by the sanctimonious sabotage of self-seeking pressure groups.

The Senate demonstrated, by voting overwhelmingly to adopt the jury trial amendment, that the right to trial by jury must remain equal to and as important as, the right to vote.

The so-called compromise amendment adopted by the House provides for jury trial as a matter of right only if the penalty to be imposed exceeds 45 days in jail or a fine of $300. This appears to be not only acceptable, but actually pleasing, to the so-called liberals in Congress.

Is it not strange now, Mr. President, that the very same Members of the Congress who cry in one breath that we must not encumber the right to vote with dollar qualifications, such as the poll tax, are now clamoring for and supporting an amendment which places a dollar value on jury trials?

This compromise is an abomination for no other reason than it puts a price tag on the right of trial by jury.

Of course, some of the membership of the other body would have our people believe that the alleged compromise merely brings the jury-trial feature of this bill into line with a District of Columbia law. This is not only poppycock; it is foolishness.

Here is the District of Columbia law from which the compromise was patterned and with which the jury trial would be alined. It is found in section 616 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code:

> Prosecutions in the police court shall be on information by the proper prosecuting officer. In all prosecutions within the Constitution of the United States, the accused would be entitled to a jury trial, the trial shall be by jury, unless the accused shall in open court expressly waive such trial by jury and request to be tried by the judge, in which case the trial shall be by such judge, and the judgment and sentence shall have the same force and effect in all respects as if the same had been entered and pronounced upon the verdict of a jury.
>
> In all cases where the accused would not by force of the Constitution of the United States be entitled to a trial by jury, the trial shall be by the court without a jury, unless in such of said last-named cases wherein the fine or penalty may be more than $300, or imprisonment as punishment for the offense may be more than 90 days, the accused shall demand a trial by jury, in which case the trial shall be by jury. In all cases where the said court shall impose a fine it may, in default of the payment of the fine imposed, commit the defendant for such a term as the court thinks right and proper, not to exceed 1 year. (June 17, 1870, 16 Stat. 153, ch. 133; Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 848, ch.

> 536; Mar. 3, 1901, 31 Stat. 1196, ch. 854, Sec. 44; Mar. 3, 1925, 43 Stat. 1120, ch. 443, sec. 4.)

Senators will note that this language is confined to prosecutions before the police court of the District of Columbia. The police court, incidentally, became part of the municipal court in 1942 under the Consolidation Act.

With this in mind, let us look at the jurisdiction of the police court, now part of the municipal court. Section 602 of title 11 of the District of Columbia Code enunciates that jurisdiction. It reads as follows:

> The said court shall have original jurisdiction concurrently with the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, except where otherwise expressly herein provided, of all crimes and offenses committed in the said District not capital or otherwise infamous and not punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary, except libel, conspiracy, and violation of the post-office and pension laws of the United States; and also of all offenses against municipal ordinances and regulations in force in the District of Columbia. The said court shall also have power to examine and commit or hold to bail, either for trial or further examination, in all cases, whether cognizable therein or in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia. (June 17, 1870, 16 Stat. 153, ch. 133; Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 848, ch. 536; Mar. 3, 1901, 31 Stat. 1196, ch. 854, sec. 43.) (District of Columbia Code.)

In other words, Mr. President, by adopting the so-called jury-trial compromise, the pattern of jury trials in contempt cases before Federal district courts has been cut from the same cloth as I have heretofore stated as that covering trials in the District of Columbia police court, now part of the District's municipal court system.

During initial Senate debate on this bill, I warned that one of its byproducts would be the conversion of our Federal district courts into police courts. Evidently proponents of this legislation have now come into agreement with me, in a somewhat devious fashion. I might suggest, however, that instead of adopting an amendment which would reduce our Federal district courts to the same level as the old police court of the District of Columbia, it would be wise and more prudent to elevate the District's police court, now part of the municipal court, to the same level as the district courts insofar as jury trials are concerned.

It is also interesting to note, Mr. President, that those who so magnanimously declare that the new language merely brings policy governing jury trials under the pending bill in line with Congressional policy governing the District of Columbia, overlook one important fact. The trials which the new language would govern in this bill would be conducted by district courts. The policy in the District of Columbia, to which I have referred, controls only the actions of the District of Columbia municipal courts, not the United States District Court for the District of Columbia. Thus, once again, we have concrete proof that the amendment drags our Federal district courts down to the same level as the municipal court of the District of Columbia insofar as trial by jury is concerned.

I remind Senators that the only reason jury trials are not guaranteed in some proceedings before the District of Columbia municipal court is because that court has jurisdiction only over a limited number of offenses, all of which are of minor significance, such as violations of traffic regulations.

The reason why such minor infractions as these are not within the classes of offenses for which trial by jury is guaranteed under the Constitution is not complex—it has its roots in the English common-law tradition that petty criminal acts were not triable before a jury.

Thus, it appears to me that the liberals have impaled themselves upon the horns of a dilemma in this regard. They state on one hand that the right to vote is so basic, so precious, that it must be protected at any cost. Hence, it must follow logically that a violation of that right is a criminal act of a serious nature. Yet, the Senate is almost being horsewhipped into following a jury-trial precedent which has its only applicability in one area of the law—that covering minor, petty offenses.

Is it not illogical, Mr. President, for the Senate to plunge headlong into the adoption of this obnoxious legislation under the prodding of those who claim that violation of the right to vote is a heinous act, yet, when we seek to erect basic safeguards against persons accused of perpetrating such vile deeds, we are told that those safeguards are not necessary because they do not apply to the minor crimes within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia's police court?

Let those who demand this compromise version decide whether this bill is fish or fowl.

If the right to vote is so basic that it must be protected as the measure before us proposes, then an act violating that right is a serious offense, and an accused should be accorded the right of trial by jury.

On the other hand, if the right to vote is to be relegated to the minor types of offenses within the jurisdiction of the District of Columbia police court, where there is no jury trial as a matter of right unless penalties imposed exceed certain dollar limits, then it is nothing less than constitutional larceny for the Senate to rob the States of their right to fix voter qualifications, under the guise of protecting the right to vote.

I would remind Senators again that the acts this bill would render punishable are not such that should be withdrawn from the protection of trial by jury. Senators will notice that one of the acts made grounds for seeking an injunction is a conspiracy to interfere with voting rights. Once an injunction issued, a conspiracy directed at that objective would be subject to punishment for contempt. In effect, the court could punish for conspiracy.

If the punishment meted out were less than the dollar limits or period of time recited in the pending bill, the accused would not be given a jury trial. Yet, in at least one case, the Supreme Court has ruled that the crime of conspiracy is an infamous crime within the meaning of the sixth amendment, and that an attempt to punish a conspiracy without trial by jury—no matter what the degree of punishment might be—was a violation of the Constitution.

I refer Senators to the case of Callan v. Wilson (127 U. S. 540), decided in 1888. In that case, several residents of the District of Columbia were charged with conspiring to deprive certain musicians of work by threatening to suspend them from a musicians union unless they paid their dues. The accused were convicted in the District of Columbia police court without a jury and fined $25. The petitioner, Callan, brought habeas corpus proceedings, and lost in the lower courts. However, he perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, claiming that the provision of District of Columbia law dispensing with a jury trial in prosecutions by an information before the District of Columbia police court were unconstitutional, and that he was being wrongfully detained.

In finding for Callan and ordering his discharge from custody, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, said:

> Without further reference to the authorities, and conceding, that there is a class of petty or minor offenses, not usually embraced in public criminal statutes and not of the class or grade triable at common law by a jury, and which, if committed in this District, may, under the authority of Congress, be tried by the court and without a jury, we are of opinion that the offense with which the appellant is charged does not belong to that class. A conspiracy such as is charged against him and his codefendants is by no means a petty or trivial offense (Callan v. Wilson, supra, at 555).

Later, the Court added:

> These authorities are sufficient to show the nature of the crime of conspiracy at common law. It is an offense of a grave character, affecting the public at large, and we are unable to hold that a person charged with having committed it in this District is not entitled to a jury, when put upon his trial. The jurisdiction of the police court, as defined by existing statutes, does not extend to the trial of infamous crimes or offenses punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. But the argument, made in behalf of the Government, implies that if Congress should provide the police court with a grand jury, and authorize that court to try, without a petit jury, all persons indicted, even for crimes punishable by confinement in the penitentiary, such legislation would not be an invasion of the constitutional right of trial by jury, provided the accused, after being tried and sentenced in the police court, is given an unobstructed right of appeal to, and trial by jury in, another court to which the case may be taken. We cannot assent to that interpretation of the Constitution.
>
> SYLLABUS
>
> Except in that class or grade of offenses called petty offenses, which, according to the common law, may be proceeded against summarily in any tribunal legally constituted for that purpose, the guaranty of an impartial jury to the accused in a criminal prosecution, conducted either in the name, or by or under the authority of, the United States, secures to him the right to enjoy that mode of trial from the first moment, and in whatever court, he is put on trial for the offense charged. In such cases a judgment of conviction, not based upon a verdict of guilty by a jury, is void.
>
> To accord to the accused a right to be tried by a jury, in an appellate court, after > he has been once fully tried otherwise than by a jury, in the court of original jurisdiction, and sentenced to pay a fine or be imprisoned for not paying it, does not satisfy the requirements of the Constitution. When, therefore, the appellant was brought before the Supreme Court of the District, and the fact was disclosed that he had been adjudged guilty of the crime of conspiracy charged in the information in this case, without ever having been tried by a jury, he should have been restored to his liberty (Callan v. Wilson, supra, at 556–557).

In other words, Mr. President, in the case just cited, the Supreme Court of the United States held that a conspiracy was a crime of such magnitude that it could not be withdrawn from the protection of trial by jury, even though the dollar amount of the fine imposed was within the maximum stated in the statute governing the District of Columbia police court.

The Senate should also realize the burden the new language places upon an individual charged with violating one of the injunctions issued under the authority of this bill. Instead of having to undergo the expense and trouble of only one trial, a defendant would have to pay for and endure two.

This would result simply because, after hearing the evidence, the judge could decide to impose a penalty exceeding $300 or 45 days in jail. If he did, the defendant would be entitled, as a matter of right, to demand a new trial, with a jury. Thus, in order to obtain the right of jury trial, as compromised in the pending bill, a defendant would have to subject himself to another trial. In effect, he would have to agree to be tried twice for the same offense.

Lawyers do not try cases for charity, Mr. President. Court costs are frequently not insignificant. Besides, the personal anguish to a defendant in having to be tried twice, the expense of supporting two trials would be most burdensome, to say nothing of the loss of time to an accused involved under such a procedure.

It is my considered judgment, Mr. President, that the compromise bill is no compromise at all. Rather, it is an abject yielding by the Senate—which inserted the jury-trial requirements as a matter of basic principle—of its judgment to that of a very few—a small group of men who desire to use the constitutional rights of American citizens as steppingstones to the political plum tree.

I emphasize with all the strength I have that the Senate will have assisted, aided, and abetted, the perpetration of a monstrous civil wrong under the guise of protecting civil rights if it passes this bill. I plead with Senators to vote down the so-called House compromise, to stand firm on the jury-trial amendment approved by the Senate. Senators who supported the jury-trial amendment did so, I am convinced, because a matter of principle was involved. Yet, now we are being asked, if not almost compelled, to abandon this position of principle and to temper it on the anvil of the almighty dollar. If the Senate felt a few weeks ago that the right to trial by jury in cases arising under this bill should be guaranteed as a matter of principle, then how can we now agree to pervert that principle by tying it to a sum of money, or a length of time?

I am going to vote against this so-called compromise, and I urge all my colleagues to do likewise. My only regret is that the pressure for adjournment is so great that those of us who seriously, conscientiously, and for good cause oppose this bill cannot obtain sufficient time to discuss it in detail—to lay its faults bare before the bar of public opinion.

I have on my desk in my office a speech covering over 1,500 pages. I had planned to make it should the necessity arise. I think the occasion for its delivery has arrived, and I am ready and willing to begin delivering it. However, I am a realist, Mr. President. I have discussed this matter with a number of my colleagues and it is obvious that proponents of the bill, as it has been compromised, are so numerous that they are able, and also willing and anxious, to choke off debate by invoking cloture at the earliest moment. Under the circumstances, it would be a futile gesture to attempt to obtain sufficient time to properly present the ugly picture of this bill to the American people.

I warn those who have been hypnotized by the legislative snake charmers who advocate this alleged compromise that they are making a bed of thorns for themselves. I urge all Senators to vote against this bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

During the delivery of Mr. THURMOND's speech,

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield for a question?

Mr. THURMOND. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the Senator yield under the same conditions under which he yielded earlier in the day, so that I may ask unanimous consent that the Senate concur in House amendments on minor bills, with the understanding that when he shall resume his remarks it shall not be counted as an extra speech on the part of the Senator, and with the further understanding that he shall not lose the floor?

Mr. THURMOND. I am pleased to yield with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that the request of the majority leader is that the Senator addressing the Senate be allowed to yield to him so that he may ask for action on minor bills, with the understanding that the Senator shall not lose his place on the floor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

IMPORT EXCISE TAX ON LEAD AND ZINC

During the delivery of Mr. THURMOND's speech,

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, as has been pointed out on this floor many times recently, the domestic lead and zinc producing industries are in dire straits as a result of dumping of these commodities on the American market by foreign producers.

On July 19 the administration recommended to the Congress that it impose an import excise tax on lead and zinc. Hearings were held both by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives and the Finance Committee of the Senate.

At the conclusion of the Ways and Means Committee hearings, Chairman JERE COOPER, of that committee, addressed a letter to President Eisenhower pointing out that the President, under the so-called escape-clause provision of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 and the national security amendment—section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955—had an avenue under which he, the President, could provide relief from import competition and suggested that such a course be followed.

Chairman COOPER stated in his letter to the President, and I now quote:

> It is clear that in this instance you have not made recourse to existing administrative procedures which are available to provide relief to these industries.

On August 23 President Eisenhower replied to Chairman COOPER's letter in which Mr. Eisenhower stated that in the event the involved industries initiated an escape-clause proceeding before the Tariff Commission and I quote from his letter:

> I would request the Tariff Commission to expedite its consideration of the matter.

Because of the importance of this correspondence, I ask unanimous consent that Chairman COOPER's letter to the President and the President's reply to that letter be carried in the body of the RECORD for today.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 16, 1957.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to you in connection with the proposal of the Honorable Fred A. Seaton, Secretary of the Interior, on behalf of the administration, for the enactment of sliding-scale import excise taxes on lead and zinc.

Although the communication from Secretary Seaton on this subject was not received by the Committee on Ways and Means until June 19, 1957, at a time when the session was far advanced and the committee was diligently following an agenda previously determined by it, due to the importance of the subject and due to conditions in the lead and zinc industry as depicted by the communication of the Secretary, the committee broke into its agenda and conducted hearings on August 1 and 2, 1957.

I have now had time to carefully review and study the testimony which was presented to the committee at the public hearing on this important subject. It is my sincere conviction that you already have authority, previously delegated to you by the Congress in the trade agreements legislation, to afford relief to domestic industries from import competition in appropriate cases. The testimony of your representatives at the public hearings, in conjunction with the written recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, indicates that the lead and zinc industries properly constitute such a case in the opinion of the administration. The testimony further shows that your present authority is adequate to afford the relief which you have recommended to the Congress.

As you will recall, one of the principal purposes of the so-called escape-clause provision (sec. 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951) and the national security amendment (sec. 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955) was to afford you an avenue under which you can provide relief from import competition to domestic industries according to the procedures and standards set forth therein. As may further be recalled, the committees of the Congress and the Congress in past years have devoted much time, thought, and attention to providing you with these powers so that our domestic industries can be afforded protection in appropriate cases and so that the national interest can be served by Presidential action without resort to further legislation.

It is clear that in this instance you have not made recourse to existing administrative procedures which are available to provide relief to these industries. In addition you have not advised the Congress that your existing authority under the escape clause and the national security amendment is inadequate in these matters generally, although a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means last fall specifically called upon the administration for any recommendations which it might have for modifying or strengthening these provisions of existing legislation.

The testimony presented to the Committee on Ways and Means during the course of the public hearings on August 1 and 2, 1957, indicated that the proposal for a sliding-scale import excise tax on lead and zinc is almost identical in major respects with the recommendations of the Tariff Commission made to you under the lead and zinc escape-clause proceeding in 1954. You rejected this recommendation, stating among other things, that the proposed relief did not meet the needs of these industries. The testimony of your representatives further indicated that the situation today in the lead and zinc industries is substantially the same as it was at the time of the escape-clause investigation by the Tariff Commission and your rejection of the unanimous finding of the Tariff Commission.

The testimony at the public hearings also clearly showed that the proposal which the Secretary of the Interior now recommends on behalf of the Administration is almost identical in effect to a proposal that was before the Committee on Ways and Means in 1953 and on which a strongly adverse report was submitted by the State Department. The State Department set forth ten reasons why this proposal was inadvisable and contrary to the national interest. This report was made a part of the recent public hearings.

The proposal which the Administration has now recommended would not become effective, in event of its enactment, until January 1, 1958. Yet, under the national security amendment any relief found appropriate could be put into effect by you almost immediately. Also, under the escape clause I see no reason why you cannot direct the Tariff Commission to report to you within a stated time as to measures which it may deem appropriate for relief of these industries, and I see no reason why you could not have done so on June 19, the date of the proposal, or even earlier for that matter. It is clear from the testimony presented to our committee, aside from the merits of the proposal, that relief can be afforded by you much more speedily than would be the case even with enactment of the proposal.

As you of course know, I have been a strong and consistent supporter of the reciprocal trade agreement program since the inception of the program in 1934. I have consistently supported and worked for proposals which you have made to continue our foreign trade policies, including, for example, your proposal during the last Congress and in this Congress for approval by the Congress for membership in O. T. C.

You have gone on record strongly supporting the reciprocal trade agreements program. At your request the Congress has provided three extensions of your authority during your Administration. An important consideration of the Congress in providing these extensions was the fact that should trade-agreements concessions result in such import competition that domestic industries are injured or are threatened with injury you would have the authority where it is in the national interest to relieve domestic industries of such injury.

I cannot refrain from expressing to you my very great concern as to the impact of a proposal such as the one which your administration has made concerning lead and zinc on the whole structure of the trade-agreements program. In stating this, I do not intend to imply that the lead and zinc industries may not need relief. My concern is due to the fact that this proposal would completely bypass existing authority given you in present trade-agreements legislation. You are asking the Congress to do that which you already have ample authority to do. The authority which you have is not selective, but broad and general, and applies to any and all industries which are injured or threatened with injury as a result of trade-agreements concessions. I am sure you are aware of the fact that there are many other industries that are asking for relief from import competition. Among these are textiles, velveteen, and ginghams; tunafish, hardwood-plywood, stainless-steel flatware, fluorspar, natural gas, petroleum, and many others. There are numerous bills now pending before the Committee on Ways and Means which would provide relief from import competition on the above specified items and many additional ones. I am confident that you would not want to see the Congress bypass and undermine your present authority under trade-agreements legislation by acting on individual items.

I sincerely urge you to personally review the situation in the lead and zinc industries and the proposal submitted to the Congress. Upon such a review, I am sure you will be convinced as I am that you do have ample authority to provide such relief as you deem necessary in the national interest to the lead and zinc industries. I am also confident that you will agree that to bypass the existing provisions of our trade-agreemnts law will undermine the trade-agreements program.

I can only observe in closing that there is considerable sentiment that, in the absence of your exercising such authority as you may have for an expansion of our foreign trade and the protection of domestic industries, the Congress will be forced to study again the delegation of authority made to you under the trade-agreements legislation. This is an eventuality which neither you nor I would contemplate with equanimity.

The other 14 Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means concur with me in this letter.

Very cordially yours,

Jere Cooper,
Chairman, Committee on Ways and Means.

The White House, August 23, 1957.

The Honorable Jere Cooper,
Chairman, Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. Chairman: I appreciate having your letter concerning the administration's proposal for sliding-scale import excise taxes on lead and zinc. It is gratifying to know that your committee is giving attention to the distressed condition of the lead and zinc mining industries.

In 1954, as you pointed out, the Tariff Commission recommended higher duties for lead and zinc under the escape clause of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951. But other means were available at that time both to meet the public need and afford the relief immediately necessary. Such means were found in the program of increased purchases of domestic ores for the stockpile and the barter of surplus agricultural commodities in exchange for foreign lead and zinc. These programs had the advantage of increasing our inventories of these materials as a security measure while, at the same time, removing price depressing excess supplies from the domestic and world markets. Recently, however, the attainment of our stockpile goals has necessitated adjustments in these programs, and the problem of distress has reappeared.

As I indicated in my press conference on August 21, my view with respect to maintaining the integrity of section 7 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 is as one with yours and, I am sure, with that of all the members of the House Ways and Means Committee. H. R. 6894, as you know, is the sole exception proposed by this administration in over 4½ years. In view of this fact, I think you will agree that such exceptions are not proposed lightly.

The special circumstances of this case that suggest the desirability of following the legislative route were set forth by administration witnesses before both your committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

It is understood, of course, that the initiation before the Tariff Commission of an escape-clause proceeding by the industry is available in the last instance. It is my understanding that the industry will take such course if the Congress does not pass the requested legislation. In that event, I would request the Tariff Commission to expedite its consideration of the matter.

You mentioned the possibility of relief through the national-security amendment of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1955. Although a continuously productive mining industry is of fundamental importance to the national security, it is deemed appropriate in present circumstances to invoke the relief afforded by the escape clause of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951 if the Congress does not enact H. R. 6894. The importance of this industry to a strong national defense should, however, not be overlooked.

I share your belief that expansion of foreign trade is in the best interests of the United States and I reiterate my conviction that such an objective can best be implemented by reciprocal trade agreements programs.

Sincerely,

Dwight D. Eisenhower.

NOMINATIONS OF GERARD C. SMITH AND DR. HENRY VAN ZILE HYDE

During the delivery of Mr. Thurmond's speech,

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, late yesterday afternoon the Senate received the nomination of Gerard C. Smith, of the District of Columbia, to be an Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Smith would be in charge of policy planning.

The rules of the Committee on Foreign Relations require that nominations lie over 6 days before they can be considered. The rules also require that public hearings be held on nominations to positions in this category.

In view of the apparently imminent adjournment of Congress, it would not be possible to act on the nomination unless these rules were waived. Although this could be done by a majority vote of the committee, it is my feeling—and the feeling of such members of the committee as I have been able to consult—that it would be unwise to do so. This nomination is to one of the most important positions in the Department of State, and it should not be considered in haste.

Failure of the Senate to act on the nomination will not appreciably interfere with the work of the Department of State. The President can give Mr. Smith a recess appointment. He can also send the nomination back to the Senate in the next session, and it can then be considered in orderly fashion.

I want to make it clear that lack of Senate action on the nomination in the current session is without prejudice to consideration of the matter next year.

Finally, I might say also, Mr. President, that there is also pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations the nomination of Dr. Henry Van Zile Hyde of Maryland to be the United States Representative on the Executive Board of the World Health Organization. This nomination was received subsequent to the last meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, and it is also being passed over without prejudice. I am informed that no meeting of the World Health Organization Executive Board is scheduled until January, so that there will be no embarrassment if the nomination is not confirmed at this session.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have just received from the Senate of the State of New Jersey a resolution which was adopted on August 19 with regard to the drought situation in our State.

I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the Record in connection with my remarks, and be appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Whereas the State of New Jersey has been visited with one of the most disastrous droughts which has occurred in many years; and

Whereas the farmers of the State have suffered and will continue to suffer tremendous losses by reason of damage to their crops occasioned thereby; and

Whereas the President of the United States has been requested to determine that the State is a disaster area, so that Federal aid may be made available to those suffering damage by reason of the drought and said request has been denied: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the New Jersey Senate, That—

1. The President of the United States is hereby respectfully requested to reconsider his determination that the farming areas of this State do not constitute disaster areas and to determine them as such disaster areas in order that Federal aid may be available to those persons who would be entitled thereto as a result of such determination.

2. The Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to forward a copy of this resolution, duly signed by the President and attested by the Secretary, to the President of the United States and to each of the United States Senators, and each Member of the House of Representatives, from New Jersey.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Resolutions Passed at 66th Annual Convention, Asheville, N. C., June 3-7, 1957

TELEVISION SERVICE

Whereas the consideration of the best interests of the greatest number of people has always been of paramount importance to the General Federation; and

Whereas television vitally affects the interest of all the general public: Therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1957, urges the Congress of the United States and/or governmental agencies, when evaluating and licensing any development in the use of television, to keep in the forefront of their thinking the necessity of assuring a freedom of choice in the selection of programs while at the same time insuring the maintenance of free television service as it now exists, and further improvement of such television service for all our people.

Mrs. Samuel J. McCartney,
Chairman, Communications Department.

Approved:

Mrs. J. Howard Hodge,
Chairman, Citizenship Division,
Public Affairs Department.

PREPAREDNESS DAY

Whereas the date, December 7, should be forever engraved upon the minds of the people of the United States as a day of supreme tragedy due to unpreparedness; and

Whereas there is much concern in the minds of our people and in the Congress of the United States that the lessons so dearly learned in the attack upon Pearl Harbor should not be forgotten, but should serve as incentives for an adequate national defense: Therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1957, expresses its approval and support of the proposed legislation by the Congress of the United States which names December 7 Preparedness Day, and asks that appropriate observance take place annually.

Mrs. GERALD WHITAKER,
Chairman, National Defense Division.
Approved:
Mrs. J. HOWARD HODGE,
Chairman, Public Affairs Department.

LIMITATION OF CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Whereas the disclosure of heavy expenditures in the recent national campaign has shocked the Nation and the situations so presented constitute a definite threat to the continuance of free elections in the United States: Therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1957, declares its conviction that—

1. Reforms in the laws governing political campaign spending are imperative;
2. There should be an enforceable and enforced ceiling placed upon campaign expenditures, both personal and total;
3. There should be a full public accounting of campaign funds;
4. A standardized system of reporting campaign funds should be established which will eliminate the loopholes existing in the law now governing such expenditures.

Mrs. J. HOWARD HODGE,
Chairman, Public Affairs Department.

POULTRY INSPECTION

Whereas poultry is a major item in the diet of the American public; and

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs is vitally concerned with the health of the family, and realizes that the health of our people is menaced by the fact that mandatory ante mortem and post mortem inspection is not required of poultry processed for human consumption: Therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled June 1957, urges Congress to enact legislation which will require that poultry placed on sale and intended for human consumption be inspected by the United States Meat Inspection Division of the United States Department of Agriculture under the same conditions as now obtain in the case of meat and meat products.

Mrs. J. R. PATTERSON,
Chairman, Health and Welfare Division.
Approved:
Mrs. WALTER V. MAGEE,
Chairman, Community Affairs Department.

PRISON REFORM

Whereas the concept of punishment alone as a deterrent to crime has been outmoded by statistics and by modern scientific studies of treatment of criminals which take into account the physical, sociological, mental and spiritual aspects of personality; and

Whereas use of enlightened modern methods often develops responsible, law abiding citizens with consequent reduction of repeated offenses and recommitments; and

Whereas incarceration usually demonstrates that the inmate did not adapt himself to an accepted pattern of behavior, and since it is an established fact that the vast majority of prisoners will return to the outside world to be absorbed by their communities: Therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled June 1957, urges its member clubs to continue to study, and to urge their legislators to study recent advances in the conservation of human resources through psychological evaluation and wise use of all available methods of rehabilitation, and further, to encourage prison boards and administrators to take advantage of every possible resource in order that prisoners may be provided with and make use of:

1. Psychological evaluation and psychiatric treatment when indicated;
2. Adequate health standards and correction of physical defects where possible;
3. Remedial education;
4. Suitable job training;
5. Opportunity for religious education and counseling;
6. Opportunity for development of latent abilities for better use of leisure time; and further

Resolved, That efforts be made to improve rehabilitative services through raising educational and training standards of prison personnel and to provide adequate followup services upon release of prisoners in order to assist them in their adjustment as productive members of society.

Chairman, Rehabilitation Division.

RESTRICTIVE ACTION IN MUSICAL ACTIVITIES

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs has consistently held that the cultural value of music and music study are integral parts of the educational experience, and should be available to the young people of America; and

Whereas the leadership of certain professional groups has opposed school bands and orchestras, musical instruction by radio, noncommercial radio programs by student musicians, and has interfered with the school activities involving music instruction to the detriment of the education and development of young people; and

Whereas there have been instances where interference with the conduct of music camps, a program with which the general federation has long been associated, has hampered activities in such camps, and seems to have as its purpose the destruction of such camps: Therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1957:

1. Protests restrictive action by any group or individual affecting the musical education of students or their participation in musical activities, including music camps;
2. Recommends that such legislation as is now in force be invoked;
3. Strongly urges that additional legislation be enacted which can control the situation.

Mrs. WM. H. HASEBROOCK,
Chairman, Fine Arts Department.

Amend resolution entitled "roads and roadside development," by rescinding and substituting the following:

"ROADS AND ROADSIDE DEVELOPMENT

"Whereas the demands of rapidly growing traffic necessitate vast roadbuilding programs; and

"Whereas the Federal Government is engaged in superhighway construction across the Nation at a cost of billions of dollars; and

"Whereas, the problems of highway safety and conservation in roadside development are a constant and immediate concern to motorists and to communities adjacent to the highways: Therefore

"Resolved that the general Federation of Women's Clubs, in convention assembled, June 1957, and its member clubs continue in the effort to preserve the natural beauties of the landscape and to keep the roadsides free of litter and disfiguring structures; and further

"Resolved that the General Federation of Women's Clubs records its support of strict controls of roadside development through zoning regulations and well-designed planting for safety, beauty, and economy of maintenance; and further

"Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs urges its member clubs to support legislation providing proper development of highway programs using the scientific skills of highway engineers, landscape architects, and planning boards.

"Mrs. B. V. TODD,
"Chairman, Safety Division, Public Affairs Department."

Amend resolution on self-determination of peoples by adding:

"Be it further resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs strongly condemns the use of mental or physical brutality and/or coercion on the part of an occupying power against a people seeking freedom.

"Mrs. ZAIO WOODFORD SCHROEDER,
"Chairman, International Affairs Department."

MAINTENANCE OF STRONG UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES

Whereas the deterrence of wars, and achieving victory in case wars are forced upon us, are basic national objectives demanding an every-ready system of adequate forces in all branches of the military system; and

Whereas it is obvious that the conditions of future warfare will render impossible systems of deliberate mobilization and unhurried training after an emergency situation has developed; and

Whereas it is the moral responsibility of the people and the Government of the United States to provide all members of the military service, every protection which physical fitness and adequate training in military science can give them;

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs in convention assembled, June 1957, declares its conviction that this Nation should maintain its military forces in adequate quality and numbers; in strength and equipment; and in organization and deployment so as to permit it to meet fully its obligation:

1. To deter war in all forms;
2. To achieve victory in waging either atomic or non-atomic war should such be forced upon us.

Mrs. GERALD WHITAKER,
Chairman, National Defense Division.

Mrs. J. HOWARD HODGE,
Chairman, Public Affairs Department.

ANNUAL NATIONAL TEACHERS DAY

Whereas the General Federation of Women's Clubs has shown continued interest in the educational progress of the United States; and

Whereas it further recognizes the need for a positive program to stimulate citizens' interest in educational problems; therefore

Resolved, That the General Federation of Women's Clubs, in convention assembled, June 1957, respectfully requests the President of the United States to issue a proclamation officially declaring the observance of a day during National Education Week each year to be known as Teachers' Day; and further

Resolved, That the General Federation adopt Teachers' Day as a nationwide project, for the purpose of giving recognition to the teaching profession for its great influence on the training and development of character of our children.

The General Federation of Women's Clubs recognizes and endorses the progress that has been made in establishing some special honor for teachers.

President, North Carolina Federation of Women's Clubs.

RESOLUTION OF BLINDED VETERANS ASSOCIATION, INC.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Blinded Veterans Association, Inc., of Washington, D. C., at its convention held at Hartford, Conn., on August 24, 1957, reaffirming their faith and trust in the basic rights guaranteed all citizens by the Constitution of the United States, and that no further legislation is needed to guarantee these rights to blind persons.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Resolution 9 Adopted by the Blinded Veterans Association, 12th Annual Convention, Hartford, Conn.

Whereas the Blinded Veterans Association, Inc., is a national membership organization composed entirely of blind individuals; and

Whereas this association has, since its inception in 1945, recognized its constitutional right to organize nationally and locally without restriction by any Federal or local laws; and

Whereas the association does, in fact, work closely with Federal, State, and local governmental and voluntary agencies serving blind persons, and has, in turn, been consulted by these agencies; and

Whereas the association, in its efforts to promote higher standards of service for all blind people in the United States, recognizes the value of a constructive approach to achieve this objective; and

Whereas S. 2411 and H. R. 8609, which have been introduced in the 85th Congress, appear redundant in the light of the above and would seem to serve no practical purpose, and, in fact, may be detrimental to the best interests of all blind persons: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the members of the Blinded Veterans Association in national convention assembled in the city of Hartford in the State of Connecticut on August 24, 1957, do hereby reaffirm their faith and trust in the basic rights guaranteed all citizens by the Constitution and Bill of Rights of the United States and believe no further legislation is needed to guarantee these rights to blind persons; and be it further

Resolved, That the members of the Blinded Veterans Association do hereby offer the full cooperation of the association and its members to Members of Congress interested in raising standards of services to blind persons; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States; to the executive directors of the American Association of Workers for the Blind, the American Association of Instructors of the Blind, the American Foundation for the Blind, the National Federation of the Blind, and the Council of State Agencies for the Blind; and to the officials of Government and voluntary agencies serving blind persons in the United States.

RESOLUTION OF LOWER YELLOWSTONE RURAL ELECTRIC ASSOCIATION, SIDNEY, MONT.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a resolution unanimously adopted at a special meeting of the board of trustees of the Lower Yellowstone Rural Electric Association, of Sidney, Mont., on August 14, 1957. The resolution expresses the trustees' wholehearted support of the REA Administrator, Dave Hamil.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Whereas Dave Hamil, REA Administrator is doing a first-rate job of administering the rural electrification and telephone program on a nonpartisan basis without being influenced by political, private or industrial factions; and

Whereas reports and rumors indicate the interference and pressure by the Secretary of Agriculture and others: Now, therefore,

Mr. President, we request that you give Dave Hamil a clean bill of health for the fine forthright job he has been and is doing in administrating the electric and telephone program for rural people and that you reprimand and stop the departmental heads of your administration (who are permitting themselves to be influenced against the REA Administrator) from interfering in any form.

Respectfully submitted.

C. R. Thiessen,
Secretary.

RESOLUTIONS OF DEPARTMENT OF NEVADA, THE AMERICAN LEGION, REGARDING PROPOSED INCREASES IN SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABILITY COMPENSATION

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, the 39th annual department convention of the department of Nevada, the American Legion at Elko, Nev., August 15 to 17, 1957, passed seven very pertinent and timely resolutions:

RESOLUTIONS

Service-connected disability compensation.

The veterans' employment service.

Foreign aid.

Status of forces agreement.

The Bricker amendment.

Red China.

The McCarran-Walter Immigration Act.

Our new department commander for 1957 and 1958 is Victor F. (Vic) Whittlesea.

The new president of the women's auxiliary is Mrs. Leona Smith.

I am glad to say that the service-connected compensation bill S. 52 was passed by both Houses of Congress and signed by the President.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous permission to have the resolutions appear at this point in the Record as a part of my remarks.

Mr. President, the resolutions passed by my department of Nevada, American Legion, correctly represents the thinking of Americans throughout the Nation.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Resolution, Service-Connected Disability Compensation

Whereas H. R. 52, a bill to provide increases in service-connected disability compensation and to increased dependency allowance, passed the House of Representatives May 13, 1957; and

Whereas on July 22, 1957, this bill was favorably reported by the Senate Committee on Finance for consideration of that body; and

Whereas since this action information has been given to the public that the Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget, under the signature of Percival Brundage, Director, opposes the enactment of this legislation which presages a possible Presidential veto, should the bill pass the Congress as seems possible at this session: Be it

Resolved by the 39th annual department convention of the Department of Nevada of the American Legion in convention assembled at Elko, Nev., August 15–17, 1957, Urge upon our Senators and Representative in Congress from Nevada that they support early action on this worthy measure before their respective Houses to the end that the measure may be passed at the present session of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That in the event of a Presidential veto of this measure they support a resolution to enact the legislation over such veto; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded immediately upon adoption to the Senators from Nevada and the Representative in Congress for their consideration at the present session of Congress.

Resolution, Supporting the Veterans' Employment Service

Whereas by the passage of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, Public Law 346 (better known as the GI bill of rights) Congress reaffirmed the will of the Nation to provide for the readjustment of veterans to civilian life; and

Whereas the American Legion has, and always will, be a strong voice in seeing to it that service to veterans for which they, by reason of wartime service, are entitled; and

Whereas with the inclusion of the Korean veteran under the GI bill, there is still a great need for service to this group; and

Whereas because of the age bracket of World War I veterans, and some World War II veterans, there is an ever-increasing need that emphasis be placed on an older-worker program, this need becoming more and more urgent each year: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the delegates assembled at this 39th American Legion convention held at Elko, Nev., August 15–17, 1957, That there be no cutback in appropriations to the Veterans Employment Service and the Bureau of Veterans' Reemployment Rights, Department of Labor, or curtailment of service to veterans by that agency thereby assuring that the programs as outlined under Public Law 346 be continued.

Resolution, Foreign Aid

Whereas the annual appropriations of this country for foreign aid are reaching stupendous proportions, this year higher than ever before, and the distribution of the tax dollar of American citizens is definitely without the approval of the majority of American citizens; and

Whereas much of the appropriations goes to countries that are not allies of the United States and in most cases are aiding and abetting the Communist cause throughout the world; and

Whereas economic and military aid to Yugoslavia and Poland, two Communist controlled countries which are now scheduled to receive millions of American tax dollars, as well as other Communist nations which will also be the recipients of our millions, cannot do anything but harm to the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the 39th department convention of the American Legion at Elko, Nev., August 15–17, 1957, That we are strenuously opposed to either economic or military foreign aid to any nation within the Communist sphere of influence, and especially opposed to supplying any such nations any arms, ammunition, or aircraft or other machinery of war and urgently request our Senators and Representatives in Congress to do all possible to prevent such aid or equipment to be supplied such nations. (This is particularly directed to present situations where we are contemplating such action with Poland and Yugoslavia the recipients.)

Resolution Re Status of Forces Agreement

Resolved, That it is the sense of the American Legion that the rights of our own citizens should not be sacrificed while the rights of freedom and self-government are secured to the peoples of other nations and that in order to insure justice, maintain the rights and privileges for our citizens who are serving with our Armed Forces in other countries, and to promote the general welfare, the President should forthwith address to the North Atlantic Council, as provided for by article XVII of the NATO Status of Forces Agreement, a request for revision of article VII of such agreement for the purpose of eliminating or modifying article VII so that the United States may exercise exclusive criminal jurisdiction over American military personnel stationed within the boundaries of parties to the treaty and that the President should take similar action with regard to the administrative agreement with Japan, as amended, and all other international agreements which give criminal jurisdiction over our Armed Forces to foreign governments which are parties thereto.

RESOLUTION, BRICKER AMENDMENT

Whereas: The American Legion, Department of Nevada, has previously gone on record as being in favor of the Bricker or a similar amendment limiting the treaty making powers of the executive branch of our Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the 39th department convention of the American Legion at Elko, Nev., August 15-17, 1957, That we reiterate our previous stand in favor of the Bricker or a similar amendment and again urge our Representatives in Congress to do whatever is possible to put same in effect.

RESOLUTION, RED CHINA

Whereas, many of our so-called allies are propagandizing and pressuring this country to recognize Communist Red China; and

Whereas, this Nation should never sacrifice its principles and admit to the United Nations Organization, and to our family of friends this murderous, traitorious nation that has cruelly tortured hundreds of American soldiers and civilians and has broken all the laws of decency in conducting war and has broken every agreement and treaty they have made with us; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, by the 39th department convention of the American Legion at Elko, Nev., August 15-17, 1957, That we reiterate our previous stand against admission of Communist Red China to the United Nations Organization or recognition of Red China by the United States and urge our Representatives in Congress to oppose any action by the United States of America that would allow this to happen.

RESOLUTION SUPPORTING MCCARRAN-WALTER IMMIGRATION ACT

Whereas there is now on the statute books of the United States the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act of 1952 which controls immigration to this country; and

Whereas this law establishes fair and just quotas for admittance of aliens desiring to come to this country and is a recodification of all previous immigration laws and regulations and has been endorsed by over 100 patriotic organizations, the FBI, the Department of Justice, and many other organizations and individuals conversant with the problems of immigration; and

Whereas again this year there is a movement on action to do away with many of the protective provisions of this law and allow an influx of possibly undesirable persons to enter this country without regard to the carefully thought-out safeguards established by this law, or any recognition of the fair quotas established by said law; and

Whereas these demands for revision of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act are mostly from vociferous minority groups, American do-gooders and anti-Communists and subversive and Communist groups who are against any safeguards that would prevent the admittance of subversives and Communists; and

Whereas indiscriminate entry of foreign aliens to our country would increase our problems of employment, housing, schools, and other problems caused by lowering the bars of the present national origins quota system: Be it

Resolved, by the 39th department convention of the American Legion at Elko, Nev., August 15-17, 1957, in regular meeting assembled, That we are strenuously opposed to any action of any kind that would destroy the efficacy of the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act and allow entry of aliens without any of the safeguards provided by said act and that we respectfully request our Senators and Congressmen in Washington to do all in their power to maintain the McCarran-Walter Immigration Act in its present form on the statute books of this country without any lowering of the various restrictions by special permit, Presidential decree, or otherwise.

INVESTIGATION OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS AT THE SANDIA CORP., NEW MEXICO

Mr. CHAVEZ submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 51), which was referred to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy:

Whereas the national security requires uninterrupted operations of vital atomic installations under contract with the Atomic Energy Commission;

Whereas disputes between labor unions and management at the Sandia Corp. atomic installation at Albuquerque, N. Mex., frequently require the intervention of the atomic energy labor-management panel:

Whereas the Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service has publicly criticized the Sandia Corp. at Albuquerque, N. Mex., for its inability to negotiate successfully collective bargaining agreements with labor unions representing its employees without the intervention of the atomic energy labor-management panel, and further has stated that labor-management negotiations at the Sandia Corp. have been referred to the atomic energy labor-management panel more often than those of any other atomic installation in the United States;

Whereas the revenues of the Sandia Corp., and hence the wages paid its employees, derive exclusively from public funds disbursed to it under contract by the Atomic Energy Commission; and

Whereas it is in the national interest that negotiation of collective bargaining agreements at atomic installations under contract with the Atomic Energy Commission should be conducted in a manner as to avoid work stoppages and consequent injury to the Nation's atomic energy program: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation and study of labor-management relations at the Sandia Corp., for the purpose of determining what action can be taken to improve such relations and thereby help assure continuity of operation of publicly financed atomic energy programs vital to the Nation's security.

The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations as may be desirable, to the Senate and to the House of Representatives at the earliest practicable date, but not later than February 1, 1958.

INVESTIGATION OF LOSSES TO PERSONS BY DEPREDATIONS OF WILDFOWL AND ANIMALS FROM FEDERAL WILDLIFE REFUGES

Mr. LANGER sudmitted the following resolution (S. Res. 196), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, consisting of three Senators appointed by the chairman, is authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to damage to crops and other losses sustained by persons living in the vicinity of Federal wildlife refuges and other Federal reservations, by reason of depredations by wildfowl and animals from such refuges or reservations, and (2) to recommend to the Committee on the Judiciary such measures as it may deem desirable for the relief of persons sustaining such damage or loss.

ELIMINATION OF REQUIREMENT FOR REMODELING OF CENTRAL PORTION OF CAPITOL BUILDING

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, my colleagues, the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to prevent the emasculation of this lovely Capitol Building.

During the 1st session of the 84th Congress, the Congress unfortunately added a provision to the Legislative Appropriation Act of 1956 which authorized an extension of the Capitol in order to provide for additional offices and restaurant facilities, but required such extension to conform with the so-called plan B which was submitted to the Congress in 1905. The substance of plan B provides that the east facade of the central block of the Capitol be torn down and extended 32 feet 6 inches to the east.

Mr. President, this scheme not only will cost the American taxpayers an exorbitant sum of money for the additional space which will be obtained, but it will also do violence to the architectural beauty of this grand structure. The plan has been roundly criticized by the American Institute of Architects at 5 of their annual conventions, including the last 3 meetings in 1955, 1956, and 1957. I cannot believe that there is any justification for proceeding to emasculate this building in such a manner.

The purpose of this bill is to repeal the restrictive language which binds the Architect of the Capitol to undertake the expansion of the Capitol facilities in accordance with this plan.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie open for a period of 24 hours for the purpose of permitting additional Senators to join in cosponsorship.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from New Jersey.

The bill (S. 2883) to amend the Legislative Appropriation Act, 1956, to eliminate the requirement that the extension, reconstruction, and replacement of the central portion of the United States Capitol be in substantial accord with scheme B of the architectural plan of March 3, 1905, introduced by Mr. SMITH of New Jersey (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

AIR TRAINING FACILITIES

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I have written a letter to the Secretary of the Air Force, and inasmuch as the subject matter of the letter has been discussed in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent that my letter to the Secretary be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 24, 1957.

Hon. JAMES H. DOUGLAS,
Secretary of the Air Force,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In a letter to you of August 20, Senator NEUBERGER said that on Wednesday, August 14, he "appeared before the Task Force on Air Training Facilities, a subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee under the chairmanship of Senator STUART SYMINGTON."

As I discussed with Senator NEUBERGER this morning, this was not a meeting of this task force. It was a conference, called at the request of Senator JACKSON, who asked that there be present members of the Air Force who knew about this matter and a representative of the General Accounting Office.

No stenographer was present, no record was kept of the conference, and therefore no conclusions were reached.

Sincerely yours,

STUART SYMINGTON.

LETTER OF GORDON GRAY, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION, TO CHAIRMAN OF MONOPOLY SUBCOMMITTEE OF SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, in the course of the hearings of the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee on the question of the issuance of tax amortization certificates to the Idaho Power Co., a colloquy developed when Mr. Gordon Gray, Director of the Office of Defense Mobilization, appeared before the committee, as result of which Mr. Gray, either expressly or by implication, was in effect charged with an attempt to conceal certain information from the subcommittee.

Speaking for myself, let me voice my complete confidence in the integrity of Mr. Gray, and his constant effort to disclose all information which the subcommittee requests.

Since the charges appeared, Mr. Gray submitted his views in a letter to Senator KEFAUVER under date of August 27, covering the question of the issuance of tax amortization certificates, and I requested that his letter be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1957.

The Honorable ESTES KEFAUVER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KEFAUVER: Because there have been public charges to the effect that I attempted to conceal evidence from the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly when I testified before the subcommittee on the issuance by ODM of accelerated tax amortization certificates to the Idaho Power Co., I should like to set forth the following facts which demonstrate why I could not produce Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton's letter of March 11, addressed to Dr. Flemming, at the time I appeared before the Byrd committee on May 9 and at my first appearance before your committee on May 21. These facts will also explain why Secretary Seaton's letter involved a serious question of executive privilege.

On October 25, 1955, the Department of the Interior through Assistant Secretary Aandahl, who was the customary channel for such communications, advised ODM that the application of the Idaho Power Co. for tax amortization with respect to Oxbow and Brownlee met the criteria then applicable and recommended that necessity certificates be issued covering 60 and 65 percent respectively, of the cost of the projects.

On March 13, 1957, Dr. Arthur S. Flemming, whom I was to succeed as ODM Director the next day, handed to me a letter and one carbon copy, dated March 11, 1957, that he had received from Secretary Seaton recommending against the issuance of the certificates to the Idaho Power Co. Dr. Flemming told me that he had examined carefully the arguments that had been advanced against issuing the certificates and had concluded that these applications, as far as the law and regulations were concerned, could not be differentiated from the other applications that had been granted. He stated that he felt that Secretary Seaton's recommendation grew out of a general disapproval of the basic criteria that had been applied to all cases under the electric power goal. He stated further, however, that he had not issued the certificates before leaving office because of his inability to explore the matter thoroughly with Secretary Seaton by reason of the latter's illness.

In due course I concluded on the basis of my own judgment that certificates of necessity should not be denied under the criteria obtaining at the time of the Idaho Power Co.'s applications. My studies confirmed that Secretary Seaton's objections were not germane to the question of whether the governing criteria warranted issuance of the certificates.

On April 10, I notified Mr. Elmer Bennett, then Assistant to the Secretary of the Interior (the Secretary still being in the hospital), that I had concluded that the certificates of necessity should not be denied to the Idaho Power Co. under the criteria obtaining at the time of the company's applications, and that in my opinion, Secretary Seaton's letter did not discuss whether the company's application met the governing criteria but whether the governing criteria were in fact wise. Mr. Bennett and I agreed that the governing regulations did not provide for this type of recommendation, and that the Secretary's letter, therefore, did not have any legal status under the regulations in this particular case. In view of this, it was agreed that the Secretary's March 11 letter could appropriately be withdrawn, the decision to issue the certificates having been made by ODM.

On April 17, following a telephone conversation between Mr. Bennett and Mr. Charles Kendall, General Counsel of ODM, the Secretary's letter, together with the carbon copy, was returned to the Department of the Interior and I believed that it had thereby been withdrawn for the reasons stated above.

On the same day, April 17, Mr. Bennett sent me a suggested change in the proposed ODM press release concerning the issuance of the certificates to the Idaho Power Co. which he stated had been cleared with the Secretary in the hospital. This suggested change was incorporated in the press release which was actually issued except that in a paragraph which read: "In accordance with then accepted procedures and criteria, established by the ODM, the Department of the Interior on October 25, 1955, recommended that necessity certificates be issued on both projects", the word "accepted" was changed to "applicable." While it was clear to me that Secretary Seaton continued to disapprove the criteria on which certificates within the electric power goal were based, I nevertheless believed, since his letter of March 11 had been withdrawn, and the press release with respect to the issuance of the certificates had been cleared with him, that the Secretary did not regard his letter as an official expression of the views of the Department in this respect and that he did not wish to make what I therefore believed to be his personal views, as set forth in the letter, a matter of record. Based on this belief (although subsequently the Secretary apprised me of the fact that my belief was incorrect) the Secretary's views were clearly privileged and I was under a duty not to discuss them.

At the time of my appearance before the Byrd committee and of my earlier appearance before your subcommittee, no one in ODM had the original or any copy of Secretary Seaton's letter. It was not until after Secretary Seaton returned to his desk and we met for the first time on this matter on May 25, that I learned that he considered his letter of March 11 to be an official expression of the position of his Department. Upon learning this, it was agreed on May 27 that Secretary Seaton's letter of March 11 would be returned to ODM, and that I would furnish the original of the letter to your subcommittee as soon as possible and that the Department of the Interior would furnish the subcommittee with a copy. This was done on Monday, May 27th.

I should appreciate your making this letter a part of the record of your investigation.

Sincerely,

GORDON GRAY,
Director.

THE FACTS ABOUT THE SENATE RESTAURANT

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, much has been said on the floor of the Senate over a period of time about the operation, management, prices, and service of the Senate restaurant. Some of this has been critical, and I believe the time has come, in the interest of truth, to place the facts before the people and before the Senate.

The Nationwide Food Service of Chicago, which operates the Senate restaurant and other food establishments for the benefit of the Senate and its employees and guests, carries on this operation. This includes the cafeteria in the Senate Office Building, the coffee shop in the Senate Office Building, the snack bar in the Capitol, and the dining room in the Capitol, including quite a number of rooms which are used for private dining purposes.

For the week of August 19 to August 24, 1957, these various facilities served 21,955 patrons or guests and the income derived therefrom was $13,303.40.

The Senate dining room is open from 8 in the morning until the Senate goes out of session and of particular importance in this connection is the fact that 89 percent of the business done is handled between the hours of 11 a. m. and 3 p. m., making it in fact a single-meal operation. In the hours from 8 until 11 in the morning and from 3 in the afternoon until closing time is a period of low income and consequently a losing period for the restaurant since it is necessary to carry a staff during these periods.

Since the restaurant management does not know when the dining room will close in the evening, it is always necessary to maintain a standby staff which is large enough to handle a heavy dinner business if the Senate stays in session until a late hour.

Senate Members are fully aware of the fact that the Senate may adjourn or recess at 5 o'clock, 7 o'clock, 10 o'clock or some hour in the early morning but no matter when it may close, the restaurant must maintain service during that period.

To secure employees on such an unpredictable basis, it is obviously necessary for management to pay for 5 hours of work even though they may work for a shorter period and it is also necessary to pay time and a half for overtime, whether it constitutes extra help which may be brought in or whether they be full-time employees. Consequently, the employees must be paid even though the Senate adjourns the session early in the day and no dinner business develops.

When the Senate is not in session, the food facilities are maintained for a 4- or 5-month period on a reduced basis. Here again, the restaurant income drops to less than half its normal volume and, while it can operate with a reduced staff, it is impossible to actually reduce the staff to the same proportion as the drop in income. Then, too, it is necessary as a practical matter to retain key employees during the months that the Senate is in adjournment, if management is to have ready an efficient and trained force when the Senate returns in January.

It is quite evident to any observer that the present dining area is entirely too small for the volume of business which develops during the lunch period, and this has provoked some criticism from Senate Members and others. The fact that it is difficult to use side stands in connection with restaurant service has manifestly prevented the use of certain available space and this in turn necessitates more frequent and longer trips to the service pantry in order to serve the patrons.

Let me point out also that the kitchen is located down two flights of stairs below the pantry and this requires the maintenance of a very considerable utility force to help bring trays of food to the service pantry. Since it is not feasible to hire these people for just the 2-hour period when they are needed, it becomes necessary to carry them on the payroll for a longer period in order to retain their services. Finally, let me say that here as elsewhere there has been an upward trend in overall food prices, which must be absorbed, and it is my considered opinion that the prices and the service of the restaurant facilities, when considered in the light of the tremendous handicaps with which they are confronted, is, indeed, outstanding.

One other bit of testimony might be of interest and that is that the Senate restaurant has steadily reduced the losses compared with other years. As an example, for the period July 1, 1957, to August 3, 1957, the loss on the entire food operation was $6,131.96. This is one-half of the loss which was sustained for a comparable period in 1956.

I believe that the management and the personnel of the Senate Restaurant deserve high commendation for the way they have performed under great difficulty.

THE MUTUAL-SECURITY PROGRAM

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, in connection with the mutual-security program, I want to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to my colleagues in the Senate. As my friends know, I have been deeply interested in our foreign policy ever since I came to the Senate 13 years ago and I have been particularly interested in helping, as best I could, in the development of our so-called foreign-aid program. I was one of those who worked continuously with the study we had made last year of the new approach to the mutual-security program and was most hopeful that the reports of the investigators whom we chose from among the most expert in the country would be accepted as a basis for the new approach. The results of these studies and the independent studies that the President had made gave us what might be called a new look on our mutual-security program. There was no difference of opinion by any of those who participated in the studies as to the need to continue the program and especially the need for the support of our military aid and defense assistance for our allies in various parts of the world.

Also it was felt that from the standpoint of the underdeveloped countries we should provide for a long-range revolving loan fund to enable those countries to secure their economic stability and to aid them in developing their own freedom, independence, and self-determination so that they could remain among the nations dedicated to freedom. This is a critical issue of our foreign policy and I believe is the strongest supporting pillar of the President's whole program.

Reviewing the action of the Senate, I call attention to the fact that the President originally asked for $3.8 billion. The Senate reported a bill authorizing $3.6 billion. The Senate vote on this authorization bill was 57 to 25. The Senate brought the House appropriation bill in conference up to $3.3 billion and finally, in the Appropriations Committee, the Senate restored $500 million of the House slash of $800 million bringing the appropriation up to $3,025 billion. The Senate vote on this appropriation was 62 to 25. We have now witnessed the most unfortunate development, namely the unwillingness of the House to go above $2.7 billion for the final appropriation for fiscal 1958. This is a devastating defeat not only for the President, but for the safety of America. However, I want to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to our Senate leadership—our majority leader, the Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON and our minority leader, the Honorable WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND. Their work was one of the finest evidences of bipartisan teamwork and last ditch fighting in support of the administration and the security of our country.

The only conclusion I can possibly draw from this development is that there are those in the House and especially on the House Appropriations Committee who are determined to destroy the mutual security program. The matter needs our immediate attention and at the beginning of next year we must press the fight vigorously to present to the American people the issue involved in these unfortunate developments this year.

MAJOR ISSUES FACING WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in the final edition of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD there be printed a statement by myself on the subject of the principal issues of interest to the people of Wisconsin and the Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FREAR in the chair). Without objection it is so ordered.

THE LEGISLATION OF THE 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that in the final edition of the RECORD it contain a statement which I am preparing on the subject of the legislation acted upon during the first session of the 85th Congress, and the subjects which await our attention in the second session, convening next January 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1957

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate amendments Nos. 7 and 15 to the bill (H. R. 6127) to provide means of further securing and protecting the civil rights of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, the civil rights bill compromise which has come over from the House for action in the Senate is not all that I had hoped for, but it is about all that can be expected under the circumstances. Most controversial legislation finally emerges as a result of compromises. The present bill is no exception. With jury trials limited to voting rights only, some of the major objections I had to the Senate bill have been eliminated.

I believe the bill as amended is one that will make for decided progress toward the objective of protecting the civil rights of the colored people of this Nation. Whether it will be effective will depend largely upon the attitude of the white people of the States where colored people have been essentially denied the right to vote. If white people in these areas act in good faith, the measure will be effective. Without their cooperation the law will be difficult to enforce. I have a very firm conviction that the people will act in good faith.

It was stated in Congressional debate that southern juries will convict in criminal contempt proceedings if a case has been made that the court's orders have, in fact, been violated. The proof of this claim, and the effectiveness of the new law, now is entirely up to the people of the States where it is claimed that voting rights of colored people have been denied.

With the passage of this measure, the eyes of the whole Nation will be upon the officials and the people of the States affected. The power of public opinion should go a long way to help correct a situation that has long been unfair to our colored citizens. Every American citizen should be allowed to vote, no matter what his color, creed, or economic status may be. The Constitution guarantees this right to all citizens of this land of the free.

Next year is an election year. The Civil Rights Commission provided for in the bill should be in operation well ahead of that election. It should throw some needed light on conditions affecting voting rights. Colored people will more than ever be interested in voting, and I hope that their constitutional rights will be preserved, as President Eisenhower has so vigorously insisted.

The American people will be watching to see what the response will be to the first civil rights law in more than 80 years. I sincerely hope that the compromise remedy, worked out in lengthy and difficult consideration in the Congress, will prove effective.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the compromise.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have already spoken at length in opposition to this proposed legislation, but I wish again to make very clear my strong opposition to this so-called civil-rights bill now pending.

When this bill was before the Senate previously, I enumerated all of the rules which were broken in its highly unorthodox consideration, and predicted that nothing but bad legislation would come of such rule-breaking procedure as was being used to force the bill into law.

After the bill was passed by the Senate, and sent back to the House of Representatives, it was subjected again to more unusual treatment.

In the ordinary routine the House would have accepted the Senate amendments, or called for a conference. But, did this bill get the ordinary routine? No. It was given a procedure unused in the House for years. It was submitted to the full House for amendment.

Personally, I believe the underlying purpose of this legislation was misguided and generally bad. The first House bill was greatly improved by Senate amendments, and the Senate is to be highly commended for the watering-down job it did under the harsh parliamentary circumstances which were forced upon it.

A victory for good government was won in knocking out the vicious part III which would have set up star-chamber proceedings for the very broad field of civil rights. In the Federal-election section of the Senate bill, we provided for jury trials in alleged criminal-contempt cases.

There is not adequate time for study of the provisions of the House amendments. But, I am advised that under the pending language a Federal judge, in his discretion, without trial by jury, may haul citizens before him on criminal-contempt charges, in civil-rights cases, and fine them up to $300 or put them in jail for 6 weeks.

It is true that trial by jury in such cases can be granted by Federal judges, and I assume that many Federal judges will grant jury trial; but jury trials in all criminal proceedings should be the inalienable right of every citizen.

Where the penalty is more than $300 fine, or jail sentence of a month and a half, the citizen is dealt with more magnanimously. He may request a trial by jury, at his own expense and before the same judge who has already prejudged his case and convicted him.

I have noted the majority leader's proposal for a thorough study of the question of trial by jury in criminal-contempt cases. I hope some good will come of it. I wish it had been made before the proposed procedure became such an important part of the pending bill.

The Senate cannot overlook the fact that the bill now before us would establish a snooping Commission authorized to go abroad in the land stirring up trouble; and provides, further, for a new Division in the Department of Justice, with a special Assistant Attorney General, fortified with all the investigation powers of the Department, for operations in this delicate field. It will be easy to foment strife through these activities in which allegations, supported and otherwise, will be made.

No good can come out of legislation characterized by the kind of consideration given this bill, and I am unwilling to carry acquiescence in any part of it on my conscience.

I can remember the reaction of shock which spread instantaneously across the country when the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] pointed out that the armed might of the military forces of the United States could be used under the infamous part III of the bill.

I remember the reaction of surprise, even by Members of Congress, when, during the previous Senate debate, equally iniquitous provisions were pointed out in other sections of the bill.

I am aware of a tremendous reaction at the moment to the so-called compromise adopted by the House.

What has been compromised is the right of an American to trial by jury in criminal cases.

I deny the publicized contention that this bill represents an improvement over the Senate bill. Nothing is improved under a statute which would allow innocent people to suffer severe punishment at the whim of a Federal judge without being able to submit proof of their innocence to a jury of their fellow citizens who owe no allegiance to a politically appointed Attorney General.

The Nation will regret enactment of this bill as it stands, just as it regrets the actions of a Supreme Court which hands down political-social decisions which undermine our fundamental principles of government, which preempts State laws, which lightly frees a felon guilty of horrible crime to roam the community, which opens up FBI confidential files, and which strikes down the will of a private citizen which has stood for decades.

I am opposed to this bill. It deserves the Senate's most vigorous rejection.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I voted for the Senate version of the civil-rights bill when it passed the Senate on August 7. I am prepared now to vote for—and would like to vote for—that bill again. I thought the Senate bill was a sensible civil-rights bill. It embodied two basic principles. It protected the right of qualified citizens to vote regardless of race, color, or creed, and it reaffirmed and strengthened the basic right of trial by jury for all citizens who are charged with criminal contempt or crime.

The House of Representatives has now sent us a compromise version of that bill. It retains all the provisions with respect to voting rights, but, in my judgment, it effectively destroys the protection of trial by jury in criminal-contempt cases which we in the Senate had put into the bill. In my opinion, the basic civil right of trial by jury is as fundamental and precious as is the right to vote. The Constitution of the United States mentions specifically in four separate instances the importance of trial by jury. It mentions voting rights in only one section.

I do not believe that we, as responsible legislators adhering to basic democratic principles, should be willing to sacrifice the basic right of trial by jury, even to get a provision which has as its purpose the protection of voting rights. I do not believe we should exchange one fundamental civil right in order to try to strengthen or improve another. I do not believe that it is judicious, nor wise, nor fair to try to give to one group of citizens the full enjoyment of one civil right, by taking away from other groups of our citizens other more fundamental civil rights.

For these reasons, I shall not support this compromise version of the so-called civil-rights bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, we have been through a long and laborious ordeal concerning the civil-rights bill that is now before us.

I will not dwell at any length, but there are 1 or 2 points that I would like to make concerning the bill.

Everybody, naturally, strives for the day when all sections of this Nation can come before the bar of public opinion with clean hands concerning their social, economic, and political problems.

I would be the last to say that there never has been a Negro in the South denied the right to vote, but the matter is not as serious and the problems are not as extensive as many people would try to lead the public to believe.

Of course, we have our soft spots in the South, and there are soft spots in the North, but we are fast reaching the day when demagogs dare not dabble in our race problems.

People everywhere are realizing that these are problems that must be settled man to man and neighbor to neighbor.

Once we realize this, once we face the facts about the workings of the social structure of democracy, then everyone will know that human relations is something the makers and molders of laws and orders had best leave to the hearts and minds of men.

With these thoughts as a background, I once again ask the Members of the Senate to search deep into their souls before casting a final vote on the bill before us. If this is done I think the Senate will defeat the bill.

There are a great many reasons why the Senate would be well advised to defeat the bill before it.

As I have said, the bill itself is not as harsh as it could be, but the important point is this: Its ultimate effect—be it damage or benefit—will depend upon how it is administered.

This, Mr. President, is the danger in this whole area of problems—in this whole business of the day-to-day relations between men.

If the bill becomes law, and is administered with restraint and reason, then that is one thing.

But if it is administered with the idea of getting mass blocks of votes in the big cities from minority groups, then those responsible will be guilty of the sorriest crime of our times.

This is the fear that is held in the hearts of the people of the South—this is the danger of this whole bill—because if it happens you will see violence and bloodshed.

Nobody will deny that we have made a great deal of progress in race relations in the South in the past generation. In recent years this progress has been frustrated to an extent by several decisions of the Supreme Court, but basically we are still people of good will and we want to keep it that way.

To pass this bill and have it administered by careless and reckless people would bring about complete chaos in the South. There is too much at stake to take such a chance.

The South, Mr. President, is on the move. We are rounding out our economy with industrial expansion and more diversified agriculture. We are building schools and hospitals and health centers and recreational facilities at a rate that is unbelievable under present conditions.

We of the South, Mr. President, are determined to continue our progress, and we resent the idea of outsiders trying to coach us from the sidelines.

I ask, therefore, that we not be hindered; that we not be interfered with; that we are left to solve our own problems.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I had concluded when the Senate adopted the jury-trial amendment on August 2 by the substantial vote of 51 to 42 that this body had acted with finality in rejecting the plea of advocates of civil-rights legislation that in the name of buttressing the right to vote it was necessary to deny the right to trial by jury. Today, however, we find ourselves once again fighting the same old battle for individual liberty. The most recent threat to personal freedom is presented to us under the banner of a compromise—a compromise that is held out to us as a constructive proposal, which comes halfway between the stand of the Senate in favor of jury trials and the insistence of the House of Representatives that this ancient bastion of human liberty be denied under this bill. I submit, Mr. President, that this proposal is not and cannot be regarded as a compromise. It is, rather, an abdication of principle.

I am categorically opposed to this strange proposal to give to the unfettered discretion of a Federal judge the power to determine whether a person shall or shall not be entitled to a trial by jury. I strongly believe that the proposal is unconstitutional, and if the proponents of the so-called compromise are successful in securing its enactment I should devoutly hope that the judiciary would strike the measure down. I am also opposed to the compromise because it would reverse a legislative history of 126 years' duration, in which the Congress has repeatedly expressed itself in favor of preserving and extending the right to trial by jury, as opposed to restricting it or abolishing it in the wake of powerful pressures arising out of the political issues of the day. The American people are innately contemptuous of despotic power whether it be exercised by king, dictator, or judge, and I believe that the arbitrary powers the compromise would grant to Federal judges might well bring the entire judiciary into disrepute.

In recent years the judiciary has evinced growing and thoughtful concern for the preservation and strengthening of the right to trial by jury. In the course of this debate there have been those who have argued that Congress has no legitimate concern to provide for jury trials in cases of criminal contempt. They have insisted that when we set a jury between an accused person in a contempt proceeding and summary punishment we question and affront the dignity of the court and the power of the court to vindicate its dignity. I submit, Mr. President, that in recent expressions of Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States there are voiced admonitions against those who would recklessly abandon such constitutional guaranties as the right to trial by jury in the name of preserving the dignity of the courts.

It certainly in no wise can be argued that the jury-trial amendment which the Senate adopted is either unconstitutional or an extension of statutory rights of which the courts themselves would disapprove. In the case of Michaelson v. United States (266 U. S. 42), the Supreme Court of the United States clearly disposed of any doubts in this regard. Justice Sutherland, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

> The simple question presented is whether Congress may require a trial by jury upon the demand of the accused in an independent proceeding at law for a criminal contempt which is also a crime. In criminal contempts, as in criminal cases, the presumption of innocence obtains. Proof of guilt must be beyond reasonable doubt and the defendant may not be compelled to be a witness against himself, Gompers v. Bucks Stove and Range Co. (221 U. S. 418). The fundamental characteristics of both are the same. Contempts of the kind within the terms of the statute partake of the nature of crimes in all essential particulars. "So truly are they crimes that it seems to be proved that in the early law they were punished only by the usual criminal procedure."

The Court further states:

> The statutory extension of this constitutional right to a class of contempts which are properly described as criminal offenses does not, in our opinion, invade the powers of the courts as intended by the Constitution or violate that instrument in any other way.

In the case of Sacher et al. v. United States (343 U. S. 1 (1952)), two Justices took the position that even in cases of direct criminal contempt an accused person is constitutionally entitled to a trial by jury.

The Sacher case grew out of a turbulent 9-month trial of 11 Communist leaders on charges of violating the Smith Act. Defendants' counsel in the presence of the trial judge and in the face of repeated warnings from him that their conduct was regarded as contemptuous persisted in a course of conduct that was highly contemptuous and that tended to disrupt and delay the trial and possibly cause a mistrial. When the verdict of the jury had been returned the trial judge, without further notice or hearing immediately filed a certificate under rule 42 (a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure summarily finding such counsel guilty of direct criminal contempt and sentenced them to imprisonment. Although the majority of the Court upheld the power of the trial judge under rule 42 (a) to impose such punishment, Justices Black, Frankfurter, and Douglas dissented.

In his dissenting opinion, Justice Black listed the reasons why the conviction ought to have been reversed, among which was:

> Petitioners were constitutionally entitled to have their guilt or innocence of criminal contempt decided by a jury.

The opinion further states:

> I would reverse on the further ground that petitioners are entitled to all the constitutional safeguards provided to protect persons charged wih crime, including a trial by jury.
>
> Article III, section 2, of the Constitution provides that "the trial of all crimes * * * shall be by jury." Not satisfied with this single protection for jury trial, the founders reemphasized the guaranty by declaring in the sixth amendment that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury * * *." And the fifth amendment provides that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury. * * *" These contempt proceedings are "criminal prosecutions" brought to avenge an alleged public wrong. Petitioners were imprisoned for terms up to 6 months, but these terms could have been longer. The Government's position in United States v. United Mine Workers of America (330 U. S. 258) was that the amount of punishment for the crime of contempt can be fixed at a judge's discretion, with no limit but the eighth amendment's prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment. Certainly, petitioners have been sentenced for crimes. Consequently, these lawyers have been wrongfully deprived of the jury benefits of the foregoing constitutional provisions unless they are inapplicable to the crime of contempt.
>
> There are, undoubtedly, sayings in some past opinions of this Court broad enough to justify what was done here. Indeed, judges and perhaps lawyers pretty generally subscribe to the doctrine that judicial institutions would be imperiled if judges were without power summarily to convict and punish for courtroom offenses. Our recent decisions, however, have expressed more cautious views about the judicial authority to punish for contempt. Returning to the early views of this Court, we have marked the limits of that authority as being "the least possible power adequate to the end proposed." In re Oliver (333 U. S. 257, 274), and cases there cited. The end proposed is power adequate in the court to preserve order and decorum and to compel obedience to valid court orders. To achieve these ends—decorum and obedience to orders—courts must have power to act immediately, and upon this need the power of contempt rests. Concurring opinion, United States v. United Mine Workers of America, supra (330 U. S. 331–332). Measured by this test, as Judge Charles Clark's dissenting opinion pointed out, there was no necessity here for Judge Medina's summary action, because the trial was over and the danger of obstructing it was passed. For the same reason there was no longer need, so far as that trial was concerned, to try petitioners for their courtroom conduct without benefit of the Bill of Rights procedural safeguards.
>
> A concurring judge in the court of appeals feared that it might bring about "demoralization of the court's authority" should any one other than Judge Medina try the case. The reason given was: "For instance, in all likelihood, at a trial of the lawyers, Sacher would introduce the testimony of himself and others in an effort to prove that he was not 'angrily shouting,' as charged in specification VII, and did not speak 'in an insolent manner,' as charged in specification VIII; Gladstein would similarly seek to prove there he did not 'angrily' advance 'toward the bench' or make remarks in a 'truculent manner,' as charged in specification VIII, and did not speak to the judge 'in a sarcastic and impertinent manner,' as charged in specification VI"; etc. (182 F. 2d 416, 461). What would be wrong with this? Are defendants accused by judges of being offensive to them to be conclusively presumed guilty on the theory that judges' observations and inferences must be accepted as infallible? There is always a possibility that a judge may be honestly mistaken. Unfortunately, history and the existence of our Bill of Rights indicate that judicial errors may be from worse causes.
>
> The historic power of summary contempt grew out of the need for judicial enforcement of order and decorum in the courtroom and to compel obedience to court orders. I believe the idea of judges having unrestricted power to bypass the Bill of Rights in relation to criminal trials and punishments is an illegitimate offspring of this historic coercive contempt power. It has been said that such a "summary process of the Star Chamber slipped into the common law courts," and that the alleged ancient history to support its existence is "fiction." With the specific reservation that I think summary contempt proceedings may be employed solely to enforce obedience and order, and not to impose unconditional criminal punishment. I agree with this statement by Mr. Justice Holmes: "I would go as far as any man in favor of the sharpest and most summary enforcement of order in Court and obedience to decrees, but when there is no need for immediate action, contempts are like any other breach of law and should be dealt with as the law deals with other illegal acts." (Toledo Newspaper Co. v. United States (247 U. S. 402, 425–426).)
>
> I believe these petitioners were entitled to a jury trial. I believe a jury is all the more necessary to obtain a fair trial when the alleged offense relates to conduct that has personally affronted a judge. The majority here and the majority below appear to have affirmed these convictions on the assumption that appellate review so fully guarantees a fair trial that it is an adequate substitute for trial by jury. While I agree that the power of lawyer-judges to set aside convictions deemed prejudicial or erroneous is one vital safeguard of liberty, I cannot agree that it affords the full measure of security which the Constitution has provided against unjust convictions. Preference for trial by a jury of laymen over trial by lawyer-judges lies behind the constitutional guaranty of trial by jury. I am among those who still believe in trial by jury as one of the indispensable safeguards of liberty.

Justice Douglas also declared:

> I also agree that petitioners were entitled by the Constitution to a trial by jury.

These opinions clearly reflect the growing emphasis in juridical thinking on the sanctity of the constitutional right of trial by jury in prosecutions for crimes and the insistence that a prosecution for a criminal contempt is a prosecution for a crime.

In a more recent case, Offutt v. United States (348 U. S. 11 (1954)), we find similar expressions of the Justices regarding the constitutional right to trial by jury in criminal contempt cases.

In the Offutt case during the course of a criminal trial in a United States district court the judge became personally embroiled with the defense counsel during which the judge displayed animosity and a lack of proper judicial restraint. At the close of the trial, acting under rule 42 (a) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, the judge summarily found the defense counsel guilty of criminal contempt for "contumacious, and unethical conduct during the trial" and ordered him imprisoned for 10 days. The court of appeals agreed that the counsel was guilty of reprehensible misconduct but found that "appellant's conduct cannot fairly be considered apart from that of the trial judge" and reduced the punishment to 48 hours.

The Supreme Court held that in the exercise of the Court's supervisory authority over the administration of criminal justice in the Federal court the contempt conviction should be set aside and the cause be remanded to the district court with a direction that the contempt charges be retried before a different judge, citing Cooke v. United States (267 U. S. 518).

Several Justices joined in the opinion of the Court and concurred in the reversal and remand of the case for hearing before another judge. They stated that "they would go further, however, and direct that petitioner be accorded a jury trial for reasons set out in the dissents in Sacher v. United States (343 U. S. 1, 14–23), and Isserman v. Ethics Committee (345 U. S. 927).

I wish to emphasize that these opinions go much further than the jury trial amendment the Senate adopted, first, because they state that an accused has a constitutional right to a jury trial in a criminal contempt proceeding, whereas the O'Mahoney amendment merely sought to provide a statutory right of trial by jury, and secondly, the opinions which I have quoted extend the constitutional right of trial by jury to cases of direct criminal contempt, whereas the O'Mahoney amendment would extend this cherished liberty only to cases involving indirect criminal contempt.

A recent expression of the Supreme Court of the United States was given in the jointly decided cases of Reid against Covert and Kinsella against Krueger, listed as Nos. 701 and 713 of the October term, 1955, decided on June 10, 1957. These were the famous cases involving the wives of servicemen who had been convicted by military tribunals of having murdered their husbands, who were serving in the armed services abroad. I need not recite all the facts in the cases but the Court had originally decided that the military trials of Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Covert were constitutional, 351st United States Reports, pages 470, 487. The majority in those cases held that the provisions of article III and the fifth and sixth amendments, which require that crimes be tried by a petit jury after indictment by a grand jury did not protect an American citizen when he was tried by the American Government in foreign lands for offenses committed there. The Supreme Court subsequently granted a petition for rehearing, 352d United States Reports, page 901.

I realize, of course, that these cases do not precisely involve the question of whether a person is constitutionally entitled to the right of trial by jury in a prosecution for criminal contempt. The decision in the combined cases, however, clearly shows the emphasis that the Supreme Court of the United States places upon the sanctity of the right to trial by jury and indicates that with the recently changed composition of the Court there was no hesitancy on the part of the majority of the members to upset even a recent case on the constitutional ground that the right to trial by jury had been denied.

Let us consider some of the passages from the majority opinion. The opinion declares:

> The rights and liberties which citizens of our country enjoy are not protected by custom and tradition alone, they have been jealously preserved from the encroachments of Government by express provisions of our written Constitution.
>
> Among those provisions, article III, section 2, and the fifth and sixth amendments are directly relevant to these cases. Article III, section 2, lays down the rule that:
>
> "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."
>
> The fifth amendment declares:
>
> "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."
>
> And the sixth amendment provides:
>
> "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed."
>
> The language of article III, section 2 manifests that constitutional protections for the individual were designed to restrict the United States Government when it acts outside of this country, as well as here at home. After declaring that all criminal trials must be by jury, the section states that when a crime is "not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed." If this language is permitted to have its obvious meaning, section 2 is applicable to criminal trials outside of the States as a group without regard to where the offense is committed or the trial held. From the very first Congress, Federal statutes have implemented the provisions of section 2 by providing for trial of murder and other crimes committed outside the jurisdiction of any State "in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may first be brought." The fifth and sixth amendments, like article III, section 2, are also all inclusive with their sweeping references to "no person" and to "all criminal prosecutions."
>
> This Court and other Federal courts have held or asserted that various constitutional limitations apply to the Government when it acts outside the continental United States. While it has been suggested that only those constitutional rights which are "fundamental" protect Americans abroad, we can find no warrant, in logic or otherwise, for picking and choosing among the remarkable collection of "Thou shalt not" which were explicitly fastened on all departments and agencies of the Federal Government by the Constitution and its amendments. Moreover, in view of our heritage and the history of the adoption of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, it seems peculiarly anomalous to say that trial before a civilian judge and by an independent jury picked from the common citizenry are not fundamental rights. As Blackstone wrote in his Commentaries:
>
> "The trial by jury ever has been, and I trust ever will be, looked upon as the glory of the English law. And if it has so great an advantage over others in regulating civil property, how much must that advantage be heightened when it is applied to criminal cases. * * * It is the most transcendent privilege which any subject can enjoy, or wish for, that he cannot be affected either in his property, his liberty, or his person, but by the unanimous consent of 12 of his neighbors and equals."
>
> Trial by jury in a court of law and in accordance with traditional modes of procedure after an indictment by grand jury has served and remains one of our most vital barriers to governmental arbitrariness. These elemental procedural safeguards were embedded in our Constitution to secure their inviolateness and sanctity against the passing demands of expediency or convenience.

Then at another point the opinion declares:

> Colonials had also seen the right to trial by jury subverted by acts of Parliament which authorized courts of admiralty to try alleged violations of the unpopular Molasses and Navigation Acts. This gave the admiralty courts jurisdiction over offenses historically triable only by a jury in a court of law and aroused great resentment throughout the Colonies. As early as 1765 delegates from nine colonies meeting in New York asserted in a declaration of rights that trial by jury was the inherent and invaluable right of every citizen in the Colonies.
> With this background it is not surprising that the Declaration of Independence protested that George III had "affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power" and that Americans had been deprived in many cases of "the benefits of trial by jury." And those who adopted the Constitution embodied their profound fear and distrust of military power, as well as their determination to protect trial by jury, in the Constitution and its amendments. Perhaps they were aware that memories fade and hoped that in this way they could keep the people of this Nation from having to fight again and again the same old battles for individual freedom.

Because of these and other Supreme Court opinions which could be cited, I assert that there is reason to believe that if we pass a law which gives to a Federal judge the authority to decide whether an accused person shall or shall not have the right to a trial by jury in cases of indirect criminal contempt the courts will strike the measure down and brand it as an unconstitutional infringement of the right guaranteed in article III, section 2 of the Constitution and in the sixth amendment.

Similarly, the adoption of the proposed compromise would reverse the 126-year history of public policy declared by Congress, which has been to extend rather than restrict the right to trial by jury. Following the impeachment trial of Judge Peck in 1831, Congress adopted the Buchanan-Webster amendment extending the jury trial right, which has been recodified as section 401 of title 18 of the Criminal Code. The long line of judicial abuses and aggressions in cases arising out of labor disputes lead to the enactment of a provision in the Clayton Act of 1914, which has been recodified as sections 402 and 3691 of title 18. These sections likewise extend rather than restrict the right to trial by jury. The Norris-La Guardia Act of 1932 was an additional recognition by Congress of the importance of extending the statutory right to jury trial. Even as late as 1948 a provision of the Norris-La Guardia Act was recodified and reenacted as section 3692 of title 18. There, again, it was declared by Congress to be the public policy of the United States to preserve and extend the right to trial by jury.

Despite these facts of legislative and judicial history of the United States, we are today told that in order to satisfy a majority in the House of Representatives we must compromise the constitutional principle guaranteed in article III, section 2 of the Constitution and in the sixth amendment. We are told that we must nullify and reverse the 126-year legislative history of extending the right to trial by jury. We are told that, despite the growing concern in modern juridical thinking in favor of broad extensions in the interpretation of the constitutional right to trial by jury, that precious right should be freely given or freely taken away upon the whim and caprice of a single man.

In addition to the fact that the proposal now before us is clearly an abdication of the principles embodied in our constitutional and statutory laws and judicial decisions, the proposal otherwise is bound to be productive of great evil and may well bring the entire judiciary into scorn, ridicule, and disrepute.

In the first place, despite the fact that the so-called compromise has been modified since its original presentation last week, it still requires a Federal district judge to prejudge the facts in a case before he can make a determination as to whether or not an accused person shall be entitled to the right to a trial by jury. It would invite a judge to make his decision upon the basis of hearsay, newspaper articles, and insinuations and unsubstantiated assertions whispered into the ear of the judge. I agree with those who assert that any good judge would grant the right to trial by jury, but we cannot assume such beneficence or wisdom on the part of all men having life tenure of office when we are considering granting them such broad and unlimited authority. As Senator ERVIN has stated regarding so many other features of the pending measure, this proposal gives to a single official broad powers which no bad man ought to have and no good man ought to want.

In the second place, the so-called compromise injects, for the first time, into our Anglo-American jurisprudence the strange and alien philosophy that the fundamental democratic process of trial by jury is not a matter of right but is rather a privilege which can be granted or denied on the basis of considerations other than legal—on the basis of financial or fiscal considerations. Such a fiscal determination by an economy-minded judge might be a fine of exactly $300, which means that the accused has been "$300 bad" and that he shall be denied his right to a trial by jury. If, on the other hand, a more free-spending judge regards the defendant as having been "$300.01 bad," then, lo and behold, 1 penny's difference assures him his constitutional right to trial by jury.

Under the so-called compromise, a judge with a bent more toward imposing imprisonment as punishment for criminal contempt, might order the defendant to be incarcerated. He might determine that the accused has been "45 days bad," to the very second, and thus there will be no jury trial for the likes of him. If, however, a judge should prescribe a sentence of 45 days and 1 minute, then the accused would be given his jury trial.

In other words, the strange and alien philosophy which prompted this latest proposal declares that if a man is a little bad he has no right to a jury trial, whereas if he is very bad he shall be given that right.

I contend, Mr. President, that it is patently ridiculous to assert that the safeguard of trial by jury should be granted or denied at the sufferance of a single man. It is ridiculous to assert that the right of trial by jury should be granted or denied on the basis of 1 cent in fines. It is ridiculous to assert that our basic democratic process of trial by jury should be granted or denied on the basis of 1 day, 1 hour, 1 minute, as part of a defendant's sentence to jail. Is a paltry sum or a fleeting moment to determine the precious right to trial by jury?

The compromise proposal, on the pretense of doing away with that which has ben so erroneously called second-class citizenship, is in fact providing for a second-class contempt—a contempt proceeding whereby the basic rights of a free people may arbitrarily be swept away and an accused person be left shorn of the basic safeguards that protect him from tyranny.

In the third place, in many instances it would strip from the Federal judge his right and duty to be a fair and impartial arbiter of the rights of an accused person. In cases where the judge decides to impose a fine in excess of $300 or a jail sentence in excess of 45 days, the accused person could demand a trial de novo before a jury. We would then behold the incredible spectacle of the judge who previously had made the law the defendant was accused of violating, who had indicted the accused, who had tried the accused, who had found the accused to be guilty, and who had affixed the sentence, presiding at the jury trial in which the accused would theoretically have a fair and impartial judgment rendered. Such a strange and indefensible procedure, I submit, Mr. President, can only be calculated to engender contempt in the minds and hearts of a free people for any man who possesses such powers.

As I have previously emphasized, the Founding Fathers embodied in the Constitution and the Bill of Rights their determination to protect trial by jury. Thus they sought to avert the necessity of having to fight again and again the same old, hard-won battles for individual freedom. They would never have dreamed, I am sure, that despite their efforts to secure forever cherished liberties such as the right to trial by jury, in the Senate today we would find ourselves fighting the battle for individual freedom. We are fighting that battle against those who seem to regard trial by jury as a thing of another day, another year, another age; as a ragged, old relic of bygone years that perhaps has served its purpose well, but has no place in the fast-moving, dynamic, modern America. Perhaps they are willing to shed a tear at its passing, in loving memory of its past greatness in protecting against tyranny. But they are not willing to let affection for tried and true institutions quell the tempest generated by powerful pressures or misguided zeal. Thus, they are willing to say to the constitutionally ordained institution of trial by jury: "Up to a point, you did your job well, and we are grateful. We shall always have sweet memories of you, and pay you our tribute whenever the opportunity conveniently presents itself. But when you do not serve our purposes, you must hie thee off to other realms, where people still cherish this ancient bastion of human liberty. And so we bid you a fond farewell."

Mr. President, the right to trial by jury in all criminal prosecutions is exactly what the Constitution says it is: It is a right—not a privilege, not special treatment, not an institution to be bargained away or to be granted or denied at the discretion of one man or any group of men. As Jeremiah Black said:

> I prove my right to a trial by jury as I would prove my title to an estate if I held in my hand a solemn deed conveying it to me, coupled with undeniable evidence of long and undisturbed possession under and according to the deed. There is the charter by which we claim to hold it. It is called the Constitution of the United States. It is signed by the sacred name of George Washington, and by 39 other names only less illustrious than his. They represent every independent State then upon this continent, and each State afterwards ratified their work by a separate convention of its own people. Every State that subsequently came in acknowledged that this was the great standard by which their rights were to be measured. Every man that has ever held office in the country from that time to this, has taken an oath that he would support and sustain it through good report and through evil.

Mr. President, I reiterate, for all those who will listen, that the sixth amendment to the Constitution provides:

> In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, * * *.

As Jeremiah Black further declared:

> Is there any ambiguity there? If that does not signify that a jury trial shall be the exclusive and only means of ascertaining guilt in criminal cases, then I demand to know what words or what collocation of words in the English language would have that effect? Does this mean that a fair, open, speedy, public trial by an impartial jury shall be given only to those persons against whom no special grudge is felt by the Attorney General, or the Judge Advocate, or the head of a department? Shall this inestimable privilege be extended only to men whom the administration does not care to convict? Is it confined to vulgar criminals, who commit ordinary crimes against society, and shall it be denied to men who are accused of other offences? * * * No; the words of the Constitution are all embracing "As broad and general as the casing air."

Mr. President, the sanctity of the tradition and guaranty of trial by jury were enshrined in these immortal words:

> I do not assert that the jury trial is an infallible mode of ascertaining truth. Like everything human, it has its imperfections. I only say, that it is the best protection for innocence and the surest mode of punishing guilt that has yet been discovered. It has borne the test of a longer experience, and borne it better, than any other legal institution that ever existed among men. England owes more of her freedom, her grandeur, and her prosperity, to that than to all other causes put together. It has had the approbation not only of those who lived under it, but of great thinkers who looked at it calmly from a distance, and judged it impartially * * * and no people ever adopted it once and were afterward willing to part with it.

Mr. President, I want the record to be abundantly clear that I was never counted among those who inherited that great safeguard of personal freedom, the institution of trial by jury, who enjoyed its benefits and its blessings, and who "were afterward willing to part with it."

In a moment of impatience for adjournment, let us not unadvisedly vote to have the Senate abdicate its historic role as the impregnable fortress of constitutional liberty. Let us strike this measure down, so that all the world shall know that the Senate will not compromise with principle, for compromise with principle is nothing more or less than surrender of principle. The Senate has already made its stand—I would hope, its irrevocable stand—in behalf of the principle of trial by jury. Let us neither retreat 1 inch nor surrender a single principle of justice where the rights and freedom of our people are at stake. Let us purge this legislation from the Halls of Congress, so that men may always say, "Here was the Senate in its finest hour, rendering its highest service to the American people."

Mr. President, some time ago, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the distinguished and able chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, requested the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] to undertake for this committee the important assignment of visiting the countries of the Far East and of southeast Asia, and making to the committee recommendations regarding these vital areas. The junior Senator from Alabama agreed to the assignment, and a date was set well beyond what was expected to be the date for the sine die adjournment of Congress.

The assignment called for an extensive itinerary throughout these great and vital areas of the world. The assignment was of such a nature that details had to be worked out in advance of departure from this country. Schedules and appointments had to be arranged and transportation planned.

Plans in connection with the assignment were completed last week, and Senator SPARKMAN's departure was scheduled for last Saturday night.

Senator SPARKMAN met with the southern Senators of our group in Senator RUSSELL's office on Saturday morning, and would not consent to leave on the assignment until he was assured by Senator GREEN of a live pair in connection with the vote to be taken on the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 7 and 15 to House bill 6127.

The junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] has been a bulwark in the fight to kill this politically inspired and unnecessary legislative proposal, or, failing that, to eliminate from the bill its worst and most dangerous provisions. We are all indebted to him for his contribution in this momentous fight.

Were he here today, he would speak out in opposition to the passage of this proposed legislation. He prepared a statement to be used as part of his planned speech. I ask unanimous consent that this statement be printed in the RECORD immediately following the comments I have just made.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT PREPARED BY SENATOR SPARKMAN IN OPPOSITION TO THE CIVIL RIGHTS BILL

We from the South have worked together from the very beginning in opposition to the so-called civil rights bill. We have felt completely justified in doing so because of the great harm the bill would do.

Many Democrats and Republicans outside the South agreed with us regarding some of the most vicious and most dangerous provisions of the original bill. With their help we have been able to eliminate many of the worst features of the bill.

It was clear to most Members of the Senate, to many Members of the House, and to Americans all over the Nation that the bill as originally drawn would have gone far toward destroying the authority of State and local governments, and also toward destroying the right of jury trial guaranteed by the Constitution. The results would have been calamitous.

The very foundations on which this country has grown to be great, and has become a beacon of democracy and individual freedom for all the nations of the world, would have been done irreparable harm. A sufficient number understood these dangers to help us from the South to make major changes in the bill and to remove much of its danger.

Now we have before us a compromise of the Senate version of the bill. We from the South—and I dare say the same is true of many outside the South—do not like this compromise. We recognize, though, the cold hard reality that majorities in both Houses of Congress are in a mood to pass the bill with the compromise, and to adjourn Congress. As strong as members of our southern group oppose this bill and as great as we believe the danger in the long run to be, we cannot but recognize and at the same time deplore the great odds against us.

I want to point out that none of us from the South who have opposed every word and every comma of this bill from the start was a party to working out the compromise.

The compromise goes far toward restoring to the bill one of the dangerous features removed in the Senate—the impairment of jury trials.

To me it came personally as a great surprise.

I have known all the Federal judges in Alabama for years. They are good friends of mine. They are all honorable men steeped deeply in the Constitution and in the desire to preserve the constitutional rights that have given to the people of this Nation the greatest protection ever accorded by any government to its people. I believe they recognize the importance of trial by jury. I have confidence in their acting to uphold and to preserve this great constitutional right.

Even should they do so, however, and even should the same be true of every judge in every state of this Nation, the compromise presented to the Senate is unwise.

Some, of course, will argue that where a man is to be imprisoned for 45 days or less and is not to be fined in excess of $300 in criminal contempt cases, there is no justification for grave concern. Some will contend that the penalty is too small to cause concern, that right of jury trial in cases in excess of these penalties gives sufficient protection to the jury principle.

I disagree wholeheartedly with any such claims. People receiving such penalties will rightfully consider them severe, and they will want jury trials.

I submit that the denial of one's liberty under such circumstances for even 1 day without a trial by jury of his peers is abhorrent to freemen and does great damage to our judicial system.

The important thing to remember is that this compromise will take away the absolute right to trial by jury secured by the constitution to every citizen accused of crime.

This is the right that we fought on the Senate floor for a period of several weeks to retain. This is the right that Senators from all parts of the country fought shoulder to shoulder to write into this legislation. This is the right that our forefathers struggled for centuries to establish. It was the abuse of this right by the King of England that caused the colonies to revolt, and our Founding Fathers to write into the Constitution the guaranty of jury trial.

The compromise is clearly unconstitutional. I cannot conceive of the members of the Supreme Court, once the matter is before them, taking any action other than to declare it unconstitutional.

I realize that the bill, even with the compromise provision in it, is a much less vicious and a much less dangerous bill than that originally drawn by the Attorney General and sent to the Congress by the President of the United States. Even so, it is still a bad bill and it should be given a permanent burial.

This bill was conceived in political iniquity. It will do the Negro more harm than good. It will serve to drive further apart the leaders of both races in the South where the problem is the greatest. It will create disunity among our people at a time when unity is sorely needed.

The bill is completely unnecessary. The Negro has made tremendous gains in the South during the last 25 years. As the economy of the South has improved so have the living standards of both our Negro and white citizens. Along with better living standards and an improved economy have come improved race relations.

As the education level of the Negro has improved he has registered and voted. The Southern Regional Council reported recently that during the last 10 years the percentage of Negro voters in the South has increased by 500 percent.

Negro teachers with similar training and experience receive the same salaries as do white teachers. School facilities for Negroes are rapidly being equalized with those of whites and in many cases far excel those of whites.

Until the Supreme Court decision on school desegregation and the agitation from outside sources thereafter, racial relations between the Negroes and whites of the South were on a friendly basis.

Since the Supreme Court decision, race relations have deteriorated. The leaders of the two races are no longer able to sit down together and work out problems to the mutual satisfaction and advantage of both races. Our people have grown fearful and resentful.

This bill will simply serve to create more hard feelings and more distrust among our people. It will further impair the progress our people have made. I repeat, it is completely unnecessary and the ills it will create will plague us in the years ahead.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, the House of Representatives has concurred in the amendments of the Senate with two amendments, which are amendments to Senate amendments Nos. 7 and 15.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate amendment No. 15 modifies the so-called trial-by-jury provisions which were adopted by the Senate. That has been discussed by others.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendement of the Senate No. 7 deals with the problem of protection for newspaper reporters, radio commentators, and others who might, without permission, publish information developed by the proposed Commission in executive sessions. I rise to speak on this other amendment.

The problem sought to be met by means of that amendment was brought out in comments made on the bill after it had been passed by the Senate. I speak, therefore, for the benefit of the legislative history of the amendment.

Subsection (g) of section 102 of the bill, as originally passed by the House of Representatives, and also as passed by the Senate, read, and reads, as follows:

> (g) No evidence or testimony taken in executive session may be released or used in public sessions without the consent of the Commission. Whoever releases or uses in public without the consent of the Commission evidence or testimony taken in executive session shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than 1 year.

Mr. President, some of the newspaper publishers of the country and members of the fourth estate generally feared that the last sentence of subsection (g) might imperil reporters who reported information, which they might obtain through their natural initiative, which paralleled or was identical to evidence developed in the executive sessions of the commission.

It will be noted that the subsection provides that—

> Whoever releases or uses in public without the consent of the Commission evidence or testimony taken in executive session shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than 1 year.

A parliamentary problem developed by reason of the fact that that language of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives was not disturbed by the amendments adopted in the Senate. The bill went back to the House with that paragraph untouched and hence not in disagreement. Under the rules pertaining to conferences, Mr. President, and under the House rules applicable to House bills returned from the Senate, sentences not disturbed or changed by amendment in Senate passage of a bill are not subject to direct change by conferees or by motions to concur with an amendment on the floor of the House.

Senate amendments may be accepted by the House or they may be accepted with a modification by concurrence with an amendment either on the floor or in connection with a conference report.

The problem of those concerned by the possible application of the penalty subsection to news reporters, however, was that paragraph (g), the penalty subsection of section 102, was not amended in any way—hence not in disagreement.

In thinking over that problem, after it developed, and in reading the amendments which had been adopted, however, it occurred to me that one of the amendments which was adopted by the Senate related to that subject matter, in a way, and that therefore, since that amendment which had been adopted by the Senate would be within the purview of conferees, it would also be within the power of the House to deal with by an amendment to the Senate amendment.

That is the course which has been followed in the bill as it is now before us for final action.

I now invite the attention of the Senate to amendment No. 7 of the Senate, which was a part of the amendment to section 105, offered by the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], dealing with the powers of the Commission.

Paragraph (b) of section 105, as it originally passed the House of Representatives, provided that the Commission could accept and utilize the services of voluntary and uncompensated personnel.

Objection was made to that by various Members of the Senate. I recall that the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], thought that would interfere with the proper functioning of the Commission, and, perhaps, make it a creature of some existing agency.

In any event, the Senator from California proposed an amendment to section (b) which struck out the language providing for the utilization of voluntary and uncompensated personnel, and proposed, instead, this amendment, which the Senate adopted:

> (b) The Commission shall not accept or utilize services of voluntary or uncompensated personnel.

In reading that amendment over, after the bill had passed the Senate, it occurred to me that it offered a way to meet the problem raised in the section to which I have previously alluded with regard to the unauthorized release of testimony.

Since the ban on the release or use of testimony was on testimony or evidence taken in executive session, it would naturally follow under the Knowland amendment that the only persons present in executive session would be members of the Commission or employees of the Commission, or persons employed or compensated by the United States to take the testimony, or transcribers of the testimony whose services would be compensated by the United States, or employees, perhaps, of the Government Printing Office whose services would also be compensated by the United States; and that news reporters would not be present in executive sessions of the Commission and would not be persons compensated by the United States.

Therefore on the 19th of August I made the suggestion on the floor of the Senate—and my remarks appear at pages 15131 and 15132 of the RECORD—that to the language of the Knowland amendment numbered 7 on page 7 of the bill, we could add certain words to define "whoever", as used in the section relating to the unauthorized use of evidence or testimony——

So I suggested that we add to the amendment offered by the Senator from California, and adopted by the Senate, certain language to define the word "whoever" as used in the section relating to the release or use of evidence or testimony without permission.

I suggested that the amendment might read, taking up the words of the Senator from California:

> The Commission shall not accept or utilize services of voluntary or uncompensated personnel—

And adding these additional words—> and the term "whoever" as used in section 2, subsection (g), hereof shall be construed to mean a person whose services are compensated by the United States.

In addition to bringing that to the attention of the Senate, in the morning hour, August 19, I supplied copies of it to the distinguished Senator from California, to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and to others, and to some of the leaders or possible conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, if the bill should go to conference.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I wish to say that the Senator from South Dakota has made an accurate statement of the situation. He not only made on the floor the statement to which he refers, but he sent letters together with copies of certain suggested language to me and to the majority leader and to a number of other Senators, and, as he pointed out, also, to some of the possible House conferees.

When this bill got to the House and had been delayed for some time, and then finally there were suggestions being made of a way whereby acceptable language might be worked out, and the other problems had been solved, at informal meetings I discussed with the distinguished majority leader and with some of the leadership in the House the question of solving this problem which had caused some concern to the press of the country. The language which was suggested was the language which the Senator from South Dakota had previously proposed and of which advised a number of other Senators. That language, after having been gone over by the majority leader and the minority leader and the leadership of the House was found to be acceptable, and the fact that the Senate had amended the section to which the Senator has alluded made it possible to make this correction when the House concurred with amendments. The Senator is to be thanked for developing this record; he has made an excellent contribution toward solving the problem which had existed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I deeply appreciate the remarks of the distinguished minority leader.

I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to join the majority leader in commendation of the Senator from South Dakota. I raised the question after the third reading of the bill. I stated that I could see no other way in which the correction could be made possible, although, if the Senate and the House had adopted the same language, a concurrent resolution might have been in order before the President signed any bill. The Senator from South Dakota made a very wise and a very resourceful suggestion. He solved that dilemma for all of us, and I think both the Senate and the press should be very grateful to him for having made this excellent contribution.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from New York. I did think it would be better to handle it directly in the bill itself than to try to do it by concurrent resolution, which might or might not be adopted before the President signed the bill. To try to take care of a situation by the adoption of a concurrent resolution, in an attempt to amend a bill which has not been enacted, has always seemed to me of dubious quality if direct amendment was possible.

By making the direct amendment in the bill itself before it is finally passed, we have taken care of the situation beyond doubt or question.

Mr. President, I should like to incorporate in my remarks at this point the remarks I made on the 19th of August, together with a brief colloquy I had with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Anderson] and the Senator from New York [Mr. Javits], in order that the entire history of the amendment might appear in the Record.

There being no objection, the material will be printed in the Record, as follows:

The Civil-Rights Bill

Mr. Case of South Dakota. Mr. President, there has been some reference in the press, and also some concern expressed, as to whether paragraph (g) of section 102 of the so-called civil-rights bill would imperil newspaper reporters who on their own initiative and by their own ability obtained information concerning evidence or testimony given at an executive session of the Civil Rights Commission. The difficulty arises under the rules of both the Senate and the House which provide that language in a bill which has not been changed by either House may not be altered by conferees.

I believe an answer can be found by an addition to the amendment which was adopted to section 105, relating to the powers of the Commission. That amendment of the Senate, which is numbered 7, struck out certain language and inserted the following:

(b) The Commission shall not accept or utilize services of voluntary or uncompensated personnel.

The problem which arises with respect to paragraph (g), and the $1,000 fine provided therein, to which fear is expressed that reporters may become liable, could be corrected by adding to the amendment numbered 7 which I have read, these words:

"And the term 'whoever' as used in paragraph (g) of section 102 hereof shall be construed to mean a person whose services are compensated by the United States."

Mr. President, the reason I believe that language would reach the problem is that paragraph (g) states:

"No evidence or testimony taken in executive session may be released or used in public sessions without the consent of the Commission. Whoever releases or uses in public without the consent of the Commission evidence or testimony taken in executive session shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned for not more than 1 year."

Since it is proposed by the amendment already adopted by the Senate to provide that "the Commission shall not accept or utilize services of voluntary or uncompensated personnel," the only persons who would be present at an executive session would be employees compensated by the United States.

Secondly, if we add to paragraph (b), which reads "The Commission shall not accept or utilize services of voluntary or uncompensated personnel," the words "and the term 'whoever' as used in paragraph (g) of section 102 hereof shall be construed to mean a person whose services are compensated by the United States," it would automatically exclude reporters of newspapers or radio or other media of public information.

Mr. Anderson. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. Case of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. Anderson. I merely wish to say that I am very anxious to have this difficulty resolved. I am glad the Senator from South Dakota has devoted his time in trying to resolve it. I hope it may be resolved so that the section in the bill will clearly make it possible for a newspaper reporter to develop a story without being in danger because he does so.

Mr. Case of South Dakota. Under a rule which the House sometimes adopts, the House takes a bill from the desk of the Speaker to the end—and the term "to the end" is used—that amendments of the Senate be concurred in, or that amendments of the Senate be agreed to with certain amendments.

The adoption of that rule takes the place of a conference. If it is a concurrence with an amendment, then the additional amendment would have to come to the Senate for concurrence in the modification.

That is why I am suggesting this procedure, since it has been suggested that the House is considering the possibility of a rule which would concur with certain amendments, presumably limiting the jury-trial provision to criminal contempt cases arising under the act itself.

Mr. Javits. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. Case of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. Javits. I am very glad to hear the suggestion made by the Senator from South Dakota. The Senator will remember that I called to the attention of the Senate this very grave problem. I hope it will be worked out in a way which will be permissible under the rules of the House. All of us should be very grateful to the Senator from South Dakota for making the suggestion, which is so obviously based on careful and considered judgment.

Mr. Case of South Dakota. I thank the Senator from New York. He is familiar with the rules of the House and knows the parliamentary problem which exists.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. In conclusion, I merely wish to say that there should be no doubt of any kind now that the press of the country and the reporters generally are exempted from any applicability of the penalty provided for unauthorized disclosure of evidence taken before the Commission in executive session. Members of the press could not be considered to be persons compensated by the United States, so that if they developed information in some way, they would not come under the penalty provisions.

In closing, I should like to recall, in essence, what I said earlier during the debate when the bill was before the Senate. That this Congress is to pass this civil-rights bill is due in large degree to the determined, unwavering, iron will of the distinguished minority leader, the senior Senator from California [Mr. Knowland]. It was his action that kept the bill before the Senate when it came over from the House of Representatives. It was his motion that made it the pending business of the Senate. He resisted every effort to sidetrack it. He worked steadily to improve the bill and to preserve it when others might have given up. In this he was joined by the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. Johnson].

The cooperation of others and the spirit of trying honestly to serve our common country, exhibited by Members on both sides of the aisle and on both extremes of the issue, so to speak, must also be credited for the enactment of this legislation. There has been debate. There has been difference of opinion. But there has not been blind, stubborn, unreasoning bitterness. So we come to this point of final voting on the amended bill as modified by House amendments to Senate amendments.

This bill, when enacted into law, will be an outstanding piece of legislation so far as the Eisenhower administration is concerned. Civil-rights legislation has been a part of the Eisenhower program. It is the first major legislation of this character in some eighty-odd years.

This bill will be an effective piece of legislation, in my judgment.

It provides for a Civil Rights Commission with powers to investigate and recommend. If it did nothing more than that, it would represent a great social advance without question.

Then there is the provision for an additional Assistant Attorney General.

There are the specific provisions of part IV to protect the right to vote.

This is a well-rounded piece of legislation. Possibly, it is not entirely satisfactory to every Member of the Senate but it has worked its way through the procedures of the House of Representatives and of the Senate in the best parliamentary traditions.

Changes may come with experience in operation, but I predict that this Civil Rights Act of 1957 will be a landmark in the legislative history and the social and political history of the United States.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, during the past 2 months my opposition to the so-called civil-rights bill has been made amply clear to the Senate and to the Nation. I urge the Senate to reject the so-called compromise bill.

The bill as it passed the Senate protected in his right to a jury trial every citizen who is charged with criminal contempt. That provision has been eliminated by the House. The bill before us makes it a matter of discretion with the judge. In other words, a citizen's right to a jury trial is made a matter of discretion at the whim of a Federal judge. A citizen's right in this Nation should not depend upon the caprice of a Federal judge appointed for life and beyond account to the electorate. If the measure is passed in its present form, Senators will live to regret voting for it. If it should pass, as I fear it will, I shall immediately start working to restore the right of citizens to a jury trial. I urge my southern friends as well as all Senators who voted for the jury-trial provision of the bill as passed by the Senate to join me at the beginning of the next session to stop and reverse the process of stripping citizens of their constitutional rights before it goes further.

Meanwhile, I expect to use my best efforts to persuade every judge in Louisiana to accord every citizen his right to a jury trial, as a judge may do if he desires. In that way I hope to prevent the evil in the bill from injuring citizens in Louisiana, in the event the bill should pass.

It would be a serious mistake for Congress to eliminate the due process of justice which citizens enjoy under the Constitution and replace it with the contempt powers of a Federal court. Government by contempt will achieve little more than contempt for Government.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House to Senate amendments Nos. 7 and 15.

Mr. KNOWLAND and Mr. MANSFIELD asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, H. R. 6127 was passed by the House of Representatives and reached the floor of the United States Senate without any significant change from the iniquitous version submitted to Congress by Attorney General Brownell.

As taken up initially by the Senate, it was a force bill of the rankest order. It would have conferred upon the Attorney General of the United States unlimited power to harass, intimidate, and control the thoughts and actions of all Americans in all areas of human conduct. It would have empowered the President of the United States—or the Attorney General acting for him—to use the full armed might of the Nation to force integration of the races in every facet of life, public and private, in the South. It would have repealed the constitutional right of trial by jury.

Seventeen determined southern Senators—with all odds against them—set out to do what their counterparts in the House of Representatives were unable to do: to eliminate the more vicious provisions of this monstrous legislation. The success of their skillful, courageous efforts and the effectiveness of their persuasive, dignified arguments speak for themselves.

The measure as the Senate returned it to the House of Representatives was an emaciated shadow of its former brute self.

The Senate version struck out those provisions which would have restored bayonet rule and authorized the use of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps to force racial integration in the South.

The Senate version eliminated those provisions which would have given the Attorney General dictatorial powers to regiment the thoughts and actions of the American people.

The Senate version contained an ironclad guaranty that the constitutional right of trial by jury would be respected and upheld in all cases of criminal contempt arising under it.

The success of the southern Senators in pyramiding their 17 votes to win these herculean victories for constitutional government and individual liberty was beyond their fondest original expectation. As repugnant as are the remaining provisions to constitutional principle and States rights, it nevertheless had to be admitted, even by advocates of the measure, that southern Senators gained far more than they lost.

It had been hoped that the House of Representatives would sustain the full gains made by the Senate.

Unfortunately, however—through a so-called compromise which compromises at best principle and at worst the Constitution of the United States—the jury-trial guaranty was sacrificed.

After only an hour's delay, the House returned the bill to the Senate.

The problem then confronting southern Senators was how best to protect the interests of their constituents.

Certain Members of the House of Representatives presumed to advocate that we conduct a filibuster against the bill.

I do not know why these men arrogated unto themselves greater wisdom than the combined intellect of 16 southern Senators. It could not possibly be because they were more successful in eliminating the more vicious and iniquitous provisions of the bill.

To be sure, the fact that a grandstand of long-winded speeches would be immediately popular with our constituents—who, like us, are unalterably opposed to this bill in any form—was not lost upon us.

But reason dictated that, in determining our course of action, we should measure the gains we had made against the potential losses.

The facts we had to face were these:

First. It would be impossible for 17 Senators to conduct a filibuster until the convening of the 86th Congress in January 1959. Debate in the Senate can be limited by 64 votes, and with 79 Members of the Senate favoring a civil-rights bill, there exist 15 votes more than the number necessary to impose gag rule at will.

Second. There is pending in a subcommittee of the Rules Committee of which I am chairman 7 different resolutions—Senate Resolutions 17, 19, 21, 28, 29, 30, and 32—to liberalize the provisions of Senate rule XXII, under which debate in the Senate can be limited. Those resolutions contain an aggregate of 54 signatures—5 more than necessary to pass any one of them.

As chairman of that subcommittee, I have been successful in my insistence upon full hearings on, and thorough study of, these resolutions before any action is taken on them. Because of the present complexion of the Rules Committee, it is well known that any filibuster attempt would result in the reporting of one or more of these pending resolutions and the imposition of a much stronger cloture rule, which would further limit the ability of individual Senators to protect their constituents.

Third. The majority of the Members of the Senate—by at least 3 to 1—favors a stronger bill than the one presently under consideration. This is evidenced by the fact that, in voting on amendments to parts III and IV of the bill, 12 to 15 Senators voted with the South on one amendment, only to vote against it on the other.

There is considerable sentiment on the part of the President and the majority of the Members of both Houses of Congress to add a new section III to this bill which would empower the Attorney General, without jury trial, to force complete integration of our society. During the course of prolonged debate, such action still could be taken.

Fourth. Next year is a Congressional election year. Both the Democratic and Republican Parties—aided and abetted by the White House and the Vice President—undoubtedly will demand next January that this same Congress pass a much stronger civil-rights bill, probably with FEPC provisions. These efforts will again require determined opposition on the part of southern Senators, and our success will depend in large measure upon the good will of Senators from other areas of our country.

Should we destroy what good will remains among independent Senators of this Congress, the passage of new, radical civil-rights legislation, with FEPC provisions, will be a foregone conclusion.

For these reasons, it was the unanimous opinion of the 16 dedicated southern Senators that no organized filibuster against the Brownell bill be conducted on the floor of the Senate.

Speaking for myself, Mr. President, I have represented, and will continue to represent, my constituents and our beloved State of Georgia to the best of my ability and according to the dictates of my conscience.

I have never compromised principle, and I never will.

But I declare to this Senate, the Nation, and the world, Mr. President, that neither will I allow those who are uninformed as to the facts and circumstances to stampede me into acts which I am convinced would, in the long run, wreak unspeakable havoc upon my people.

And it is to them, Mr. President, that I leave the judgment of my decision and action.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, during the course of this debate, I have differed on numerous occasions with the distinguished junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE]. He has thought that this approach to the pending bill was wrong, and I have thought that it was right. I respect him for his opinions, and I believe he respects me and those who have differed with him for our opinions.

Anyone who knows the Senate of the United States is aware of the fact that the overwhelming majority of the Senate desires to pass a voting rights bill. There can be no question that had the majority desired to do so, cloture could have been invoked to pass the bill in its present form, with votes to spare.

As one who has served in the Senate for over 12 years, I honor the Senate of the United States and its great tradition. One of these traditions is that of free debate.

During the entire debate up until yesterday, the discussion was both germane and helpful. Up until then, the debate had contributed to the working out of amendments and modification of the bill, some very substantial in character.

Because of the high standard of the general debate, the majority properly decided neither to circulate a cloture petition nor to attempt to invoke cloture. Had the Senate been blocked by dilatory tactics and obstructionism in debate, we would have had no other choice. That this condition did not come about is due to the restraint and the statesmanship of the opponents of the proposed legislation and to the reasonableness and the moderation of the proponents.

It has been a hard fight. I hope it leaves no scars that cannot be quickly healed.

We honor and we respect our colleagues from the South who have made an honorable and a determined fight against heavy odds. Their fight resulted in substantial amendments to the bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives. I hope and believe that the Commission that will be appointed by the President of the United States under this bill will be a fair and moderate one in its approach to the great problems involved.

I make this final plea tonight particularly addressed to our colleagues from the South. Let no gulf divide us. Let us close ranks as Americans and try for just solutions to our common problems.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, there are times when men must take a long, hard look at practicalities.

This is one of those occasions.

I agree with those of my colleagues who believe that the House amendment is inferior to the Senate's version of the jury trial. I do not agree with those who maintain that it is a compromise of principle which cannot be accepted.

In my view, the principles of the Senate's jury-trial amendment have been left intact. The deficiencies of the House version have been grossly exaggerated.

The House version is not a big bad wolf with sharpened fangs and steel-tipped claws ready to leap upon innocent people. The fears in this respect cannot, in my opinion, be justified.

Neither is the House amendment a plumed knight in shining armor ready to ride to the rescue of innocent maidens. The hopes of its backers, in my opinion, are somewhat premature.

Let us be frank with all our people. The House amendment is purely and simply compromise language—the price that must always be paid for the passage of effective legislation in a controversial field.

I am no lawyer. I am not going to make a constitutional argument. But I am capable of recognizing reason and practicality.

And the practicalities are that the chances of a criminal contempt trial without a jury under this amendment are extremely remote. When they occur, the offenses will be minor and petty—about on the level of a traffic court.

No prudent judge is going to undertake a case without a jury when he will probably have to try it twice. He will call for the jury the first time—and save himself and the community some headaches.

Let us look at the other side of the coin.

This is the first civil-rights bill to pass this Congress in 82 years. It was passed solely because the Senate debated the issue in an atmosphere of reason.

If this bill is not approved, the next one will be debated in the heat of partisan politics. And neither our country nor any of its parts will benefit.

Our choice is clear.

We can pass reasonable legislation which applies to our whole country now. Or we will find punitive, vengeful legislation passed in the not too distant future.

The bill before us is a positive step forward—constructive and not punitive. The House amendment, even though I believe it is inferior to the Senate version, is a reasonable price to pay in order to remove this question from the debates in the Halls of Congress.

Let us close out this issue now and pass the bill.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate for more than a few minutes, but I think it is absolutely necessary that I make a brief statement. I do not believe an adequate record has been made as to the constitutionality of the new jury-trial provision.

I also believe it is necessary to say something on the other side of the coin, in view of the fact that there are some here who will endeavor to overturn what we hope will be done tonight.

For myself, Mr. President, I should like to say that the civil-rights bill does not live up to what I though we would create in the way of our first civil-rights bill in 82 years, but it is an effective step forward in a key area, which is voting rights. The bill does contain a practical solution to the jury-trial amendment, which I consider to be constitutional.

However, I think it is only fair to say that in the days ahead, I shall seek other civil-rights legislation in company with other Senators who are similarly minded, which I believe is essential to our people and our time.

Certainly, I think the next step must encompass the civil rights given to our citizens under the equal protection clause of the Constitution. Whatever still remains to be done along that line, there should at least be full agreement on the bill before us.

This action tonight will represent an advance of law which we as a Nation should make at this time. This proposal to safeguard voting rights should meet all points of view except the point of view of those who would have no civil-rights legislation whatever on the Federal level, and even such persons have conceded the critical importance of protecting the sanctity of the voting right.

While this bill represents only the beginning, it is a good beginning. It is an historic step ahead to demonstrate the recognition by the Congress of a long-neglected duty to enact civil-rights legislation.

Mr. President, as to constitutionality, the bill which we have before us, with the House amendments to the Senate amendments 7 and 15, makes a distinction between civil and criminal contempt. That item has been pointed out as evidence of unconstitutionality, yet that very distinction is made in the Gompers against Bucks Stove and Range case, a leading Supreme Court case.

Second, it is said that a splitting point in the bill is on the ground of punishment or the amount of punishment, which would make the law unconstitutional. I do not believe that is so, because there is no constitutional right to a trial by jury in the Federal courts, and therefore we are considering, in effect, a right created by statute. The citation on that is Eilenbecker v. Plymouth County (134 U. S. 31).

Third, and very importantly, Mr. President, there has been much talk of double jeopardy. There is no double jeopardy involved in the acceptance of the House amendment, because a jury trial can come only on the request of the defendant himself. Only then can the defendant obtain a jury trial de novo. The fundamental Hornbook law is that double jeopardy is a personal privilege which can be waived. It will be waived when the jury trial is requested. I cite in this regard Brewster v. Swope (180 F. 2d 984), Himmelfarb v. United States (175 F. 2d 924), Brady v. United States (24 F. 2d 397, cert. den. 278 U. S. 603), and United States v. Harriman (130 F. Supp. 198).

For these reasons, Mr. President, I believe if the bill is enacted into law it will be entirely constitutional, and I think those statements should appear of record in our deliberations.

Finally, Mr. President, as the lowest-ranking Member here, I think, except for the Member sworn in today, I should like to pay my tribute to the indefatigable courage and determination of my own leader, the minority leader on this side [Mr. KNOWLAND] who brought this bill to the calendar and, to use a very ordinary phrase, which is very true in his case, bulled it through to this day. I should like to pay my tribute to the majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON of Texas] who, by the exercise of tactical brilliance, I think rarely seen in the history of our country, brought together the necessary marshaling of forces actually to enact the bill into law. I think the country owes both of these men a debt of very deep gratitude.

I have always had the conviction that civil-rights legislation had to be bipartisan. The majority leader and minority leader have certainly proved it.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas that the Senate agree to the House amendments to Senate amendments Nos. 7 and 15 to H. R. 6127, an act to provide means of further securing and protecting the civil rights of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). Mr. President, on this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. If he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. GREEN (when his name was called). On this vote, I have a pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN]. As I have said before, I asked Senator SPARKMAN to undertake for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee an assignment essential to the welfare and defense of the Nation.

He did so with the understanding that I would give him a live pair.

Were he here he would vote "nay." Were I at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. MANSFIELD (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. If the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] were present and voting, he would vote "nay." Were I at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

Mr. MURRAY (when his name was called). On this vote, I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON]. If the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] were present and voting, he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The rollcall was concluded.

The vote was recapitulated.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, let me ask whether the clerk announced that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] voted in the affirmative.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the clerk examine the vote.

The Chair is informed that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] is not recorded.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I understood the clerk to state, on the recapitulation of the vote, that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] had voted in the affirmative. I realize that that was not the case and that if he had been present, he would have voted in the negative, although, of course, if the Senator from South Carolina had been present and had voted, I would wish that he had voted in the affirmative.

However, the fact is that the senior Senator from South Carolina did not vote, being absent.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN], are absent on official business.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. CHAVEZ] and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] would each vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. PAYNE] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON] is detained on official business.

If present and voting, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BUTLER], the Senators from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART and Mr. JENNER], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MORTON], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. PAYNE] would each vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 60, nays 15, as follows:

So the motion that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate amendments Nos. 7 and 15 to H. R. 6127 was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the motion was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have inserted in the body of the RECORD a memorandum concerning the constitutionality of the provisions concerning trial with and without a jury contained in part V of the civil-rights bill.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE PROVISIONS CONCERNING TRIAL WITH AND WITHOUT A JURY CONTAINED IN PART V OF THE CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL

The contention that the provisions contained in part V of the civil-rights bill now embodied in House Resolution 410 relating to trial with and without a jury in cases of criminal contempt arising under its provisions conflict with the guaranties of the Federal Constitution are completely without merit. The questioned provisions of the bill read as follows:

"Provided further, That in any such proceeding for criminal contempt, at the discretion of the judge, the accused may be tried with or without a jury: Provided further, however, That in the event such proceeding for criminal contempt be tried before a judge without a jury and the sentence of the court upon conviction is a fine in excess of the sum of $300 or imprisonment in excess of 45 days, the accused in said proceeding, upon demand therefor, shall be entitled to a trial de novo before a jury, which shall conform as nearly as may be to the practice in other criminal cases."

It has long been established in both Federal and State courts that criminal contempts may be tried by the court without a jury, without conflicting with any constitutional guaranty of the right to jury trial in criminal cases. Eilenbecker v. Plymouth County (134 U. S. 31, 1890); Gompers v. Buck Stove and Range Company (221 U. S. 418, 1911). Congress itself has repeatedly enacted laws authorizing the United States to seek injunctive relief from the Federal courts while at the same time providing that criminal contempts committed in violation of court orders under such statutes should be tried by the court without a jury, and all such statutes have been held constitutional. Among them are the following:

Title 7 U. S. C., section 216, Packers and Stockyards Act; section 292, Associations of Agricultural Producers Restraining Trade; section 499h (d), Perishable Agriculture Commodities Act, 1930; section 608a (6), Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Title 7 United States Code, section 1600, Federal Seed Act.

Title 12 United States Code, section 1731b, National Housing Act.

Title 15 United States Code, sections 4, 9, Sherman Act; section 25, Clayton Act; section 53, Federal Trade Commission re False Advertising; section 68e, Wool Products Labeling Act; section 69g, Fur Products Labeling Act; section 77t (b), Securities Act of 1933; section 77uuu, Trust Indenture Act; section 78u (e), Securities Exchange Act of 1934; section 79r (f), Public Utilities Holding Company Act; section 80a–34, 35, 51 (e), Investment Co. Act; section 80b–9 (e), Investment Advisors Act; section 522, Associations monopolizing trade in aquatic products; section 715i, Interstate Transportation of Petroleum Products; section 717s, Natural Gas Act; section 1195 (a), Flammable Fabrics Act.

Title 16, United States Code, section 825m, Federal Power Act.

Title 27, United States Code, section 207, Federal Alcohol Administration Act.

Title 29, United States Code, section 160 (j) (1), National Labor Relations Board orders; section 178, National Emergency Strikes; section 217, Fair Labor Standards Act.

Title 33, United States Code, section 519, Bridges Over Navigable Waters; section 921, Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

Title 42, United States Code, section 2280, Atomic Energy Act.

Title 43, United States Code, section 1062, enclosures of public lands.

Title 47, United States Code, section 36, landing submarine cables; section 401 (b) Communications Act of 1934; section 5 (8), 16 (12), 43, Interstate Commerce Act.

Title 49, United States Code, section 322 (b), Federal Motor Carrier Act; section 647 (a), Civil Aeronautics Act; section 916 (b), Water Carriers Act; section 1011, 1017 (b), Freight Forwarders Act.

Title 50, United States Code Appendix 2156, Defense Production Act.

It is equally well established that minor criminal offenses may be tried without a jury. Callan v. Wilson (127 U. S. 540); Schick v. United States (195 U. S. 65); District of Columbia v. Colts (282 U. S. 63); District of Columbia v. Clawans (300 U. S. 617). State Ex Rel. Sellars v. Parker ((1924) 87 Fla. 181); Loeb v. Jennings (133 Ga. 797); Ex Parte Wooten ((1884) 62 Miss. 174); Ex Parte Garner (246 S. W. 371 (1922)), Texas Criminal Appeals.

Congress has provided for the trial of minor offenses without a jury in the District of Columbia by the enactment of section 11–616 of the District of Columbia Code, which provides: "where the accused would not by force of the Constitution of the United States, be entitled to a trial by jury, the trial shall be by the court without a jury, unless in such of said last-named cases wherein the fine or penalty may be more than $300 on imprisonment or punishment for the offense may be more than 90 days, the accused shall demand a trial by jury, in which case the trial shall be by jury." and that section has been held to be constitutional. District of Columbia v. Clawans (300 U. S. 617).

Laws have been enacted in many States to provide for the trial of minor criminal offenses without a jury and none of these laws has been held unconstitutional. Among such States are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Virginia.

The provision in the bill for a trial de novo before a jury upon demand of a defendant in the event the sentence after conviction by the court exceeds a fine of $300 or imprisonment in excess of 45 days is a privilege for the benefit of a defendant and therefore could not violate his personal rights. Furthermore, such a provision for trial de novo before a jury on demand of a defendant has historical precedents, the constitutionality of which has not been questioned. Examples are found in the laws of the following States:

ALABAMA

The Code of Alabama (1940), title 13, sections 326 and 423, provides that a misdemeanor trial in the county court and before a justice of the peace shall be without a jury, and that after conviction the defendant may demand by way of an appeal to the county court and secure as a matter of right a trial de novo before the circuit court with a jury.

ARKANSAS

The Arkansas Statutes (1947) Annotated, sections 44–115 and 44–116, provide that all trials before the police court and the mayor's court "for violation of the bylaws or ordinances of any city or incorporated town shall be before the mayor [police judge] without the intervention of a jury." These sections also provide that after conviction the defendant may demand and secure a trial de novo before a jury in the circuit court.

The provisions of the bill with respect to trial are, therefore, entirely consistent with constitutional principles and with legislative and judicial precedent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we must have order. We are going to transact a lot of public business before we finish this evening, and if Senators will give their attention and the Senate will remain in order, we will be able to do so.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the vote this evening was epochal in the annals of the Senate and of the country. We have completed legislating on one of the most important bills ever to come before the Senate of the United States. We have acted in a spirit of reason and logic. We have acted without rancor. We have acted with a minimum of emotion. I think the credit for the performance which this body has undertaken in the past two months should go to the distinguished minority leader, the senior Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] a man of great integrity, a fair-minded man, a reasonable man. Also sharing in that credit is the distinguished majority leader, the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], who has indicated, if there was ever any doubt in anyone's mind, that he is a political strategist of the highest order. He has been able to bring reason and understanding to divergent groups on this side, just as the minority leader has been able to do the same on the other side. In my opinion, the Senate of the United States and the United States of America can well be proud of the action which was taken in this body this evening; and I sincerely hope that the recognition, which is the just due of the distinguished minority leader and the distinguished majority leader, will be given to them not only in the press of the country today, but in the history books of the country in the future.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, from this side of the aisle I want to join with the distinguished Senator from Montana in what he has just said. I have always been proud to be a Member of this body. I have been prouder than ever to have been a Member the past few weeks. During that period of time I have watched our colleagues debate a matter that means much to every citizen, particularly to those in certain sections of this country. Yet, at all times the debate has been conducted without rancor, with great sincerity, and with great care to discuss the main question, the settlement of which meant so much to all of us, without undertaking to bring into the debate extraneous issues. That has been possible because of the leadership on both sides of the aisle.

I do not know of a time since I have been a Member of this body when Members on both sides of the aisle have to a greater extent turned to their leaders to give them guidance and help wherever they could. So the majority leader and the minority leader both deserve much commendation for the way in which this debate has proceeded. At the same time, I think every Member of this body deserves commendation when we consider the depth of the problem, what its solution means to so many people, and the spirit in which it has been discussed during the past few weeks. I am proud to join with my colleague from Montana in his most appropriate expressions.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I may say that while the House spent 2 days in considering this measure, the Senate of the United States spent 2 months. The Senate refined this measure, removed from it the bugs and the gimmicks, and brought into being a bill which is enforceable. There were great expectations that there would be a filibuster. There has been no filbuster. A record has been set. Every Senator has had an opportunity to speak freely and as long as he wanted to. I think that we have a right on this great evening in the history of our country to be proud of the record of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to identify myself with the remarks just made by the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Massachusetts. I have been a Member of this body for 13 years, and I feel that what has happened tonight is the greatest event in the entire time I have been here. I go further than that: I feel that we are on the road to one of the biggest forward steps since the Civil War, in that after a long debate, marked by a spirit of amity and friendship and affection on both sides of the aisle, there has been evolved a measure of paramount importance to the future of our country. I want to do all I can to join with the others in saying that we owe that result to our two leaders, the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] and the minority leader, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]. It is a great event in my life to have them here at this time, since there have been previous occasions when we were unable to deal with such a matter because we did not have the spirit that has been shown at this time in this debate. It has been a wonderful debate. The passage of the bill is a great victory for civil rights in the United States of America.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should like to say this evening that the bill which has just been passed as a result of the vote of the Senate is a good, effective, meaningful piece of legislation. If its enforcement is conducted in the same spirit of reason and reasonableness that has characterized its consideration and passage, this legislation will mean a better America. I have read many press reports about the tactics and the strategy which have been used in bringing about the passage of this measure.

Mr. President, the truth is that it takes a good deal of legislative skill and procedural knowledge to guide any piece of proposed legislation so highly controversial as this through the two Houses of Congress. It also takes something else. It takes more than cleverness. It takes more than tactics. It takes more than being smart. It takes a sense of conviction, and a deep respect for one's fellow man.

When the history of this period is written, I hope it will be forgotten that skill and strategy, and cleverness and legislative maneuvering were required to put the measure through the two Houses of Congress. I hope it will be remembered that there were men and women in both Houses of Congress who deeply believed in the purposes for which the legislation is designed. Because of that belief and that conviction they found the perseverance and strength to be able to see that the legislation was finally consummated.

As a Member of the Senate I have long looked forward to the day when we could say that Congress passed legislation which assures civil rights to all the people of this land. That day has arrived. I wish to say to my friends who were in opposition to the bill that those of us who supported it admire and respect the temperance and the reasonableness of their arguments. I know of many a Senator who restrained himself, and many a Senator who has literally taken his political life in his hands and placed it in jeopardy. I believe the future will underscore the fact that those Senators did what was right. By their reasonableness, by their good faith, in the days to come they will be enriched in spirit and in political strength because of the manner in which they conducted themselves. The Senate, during the weeks of debate on the bill, has fulfilled the promise of representative government. I am proud to have been a Member of the Senate during this historic period.

ESTABLISHING OF DATE OF 2D SESSION OF 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House Joint Resolution 453.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 453) to establish the date of the 2d regular session of the 85th Congress, which was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the 2d regular session of the 85th Congress shall begin at noon on Tuesday, January 7, 1958.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LET US BUILD SCHOOLS

Mr. McNAMARA. Mr. President, I feel it necessary to end this session of Congress as I began it—with a few remarks on the vital need for Federal assistance for school construction.

On January 7, I introduced on this floor the first bill of the 85th Congress—a bill proposing a $2 billion, 2-year emergency Federal program to assist States to build schools.

I said at the time, as I have since, that I was not insisting on my bill or my particular formula.

But I was insisting on Congressional action—already far too long delayed—to meet the shocking shortage of classrooms throughout the country.

Today, nearly 8 months later, the 1st session of the 85th Congress is about to end.

Before the final adjournment bell, we will have our usual few hours of self-congratulation over our modest accomplishments—and then we will go home.

But next week, Mr. President, another bell will ring.

That is the bell summoning some 39 million children to the Nation's elementary schools.

Their ranks have been swelled by roughly a million since the same bell rang last year.

What will they find this year, Mr. President, as they embark on another year of schooling?

Will they find that during the summer months, the builders have been constructing new monuments to education in the form of modern, uncrowded schoolhouses?

In some areas they will find these new buildings—in areas where the school districts are moderately wealthy or where the tight-money market has not yet quite closed its stranglehold on the economy.

But in far too many areas, they will find the same antiquated facilities, firetraps, and outgrown structures where the children will be stacked like cordwood in the classrooms.

No matter how good the teachers—or how spirited the will to learn—the serious overcrowding of classrooms cannot fail to have a negative effect on the quality of education.

In a great many sections of the country, the children have been—and will be again—on half-day school sessions.

This is a very serious drawback to the quality of education at any school level.

But many of the children just beginning their education next week—in kindergarten and the first few grades—will start out going only half days.

This is the really criminal part of Congress' failure to meet the crisis.

These children just starting school are in their formative years. They are supposed to be learning study and social habits that will stay with them throughout their school years and into adult life beyond.

By launching them into education on an abbreviated and crippled schedule we are doing them a tremendous amount of harm that may never be undone.

As we leave for our recess, I hope that the thought of these crowded schools will plague every Member of this Congress—and give him many uneasy moments until we meet here again next year.

A few statistics to keep in mind while they are glad-handing constituents in the coming months ahead are these:

Our refusal to act in the field of Federal aid for school construction means that the new school year will begin with a shortage of 159,000 classrooms—at the very least.

The school population has grown 5½ million in the past 5 years and it is expected to rise another 6 million in the next 5 years.

At the current rate of building, the classroom deficit will have grown to at least 179,000 by that time. And this does not include replacing obsolescent and destroyed schools.

These are weighty figures to ponder.

But high figures are not strangers to the Senate.

Just a few days ago, we voted around $3 billion for mutual security. We voted some $34 billion for national defense and almost $1 billion for public-works projects.

These are worthy undertakings. They will help us remain a strong and secure Nation.

Yes, we even voted nearly $100 million so that the United States Information Agency can tell the rest of the world what a great Nation we are.

What will USIA tell the world about America's schools? I don't envy the propagandists the job of answering that question.

Will they tell the world that America is the richest nation on earth—yet it is content to let its children learn the three R's in overcrowded, antiquated, and understaffed classrooms?

Will they tell the world that America can pass out $3 billion to other nations—and not spend one dollar to replace the firetraps that too often pass for schools?

Will USIA tell the world that we can spend nearly $34 billion for defense—and not one penny on our potentially greatest weapon—the education of our children and proper development of their brainpower?

And how will USIA explain our underpaid force of teachers—a force now understaffed by 135,000?

Foreigners often believe that the American mind is a bit odd—and they may be right, at that.

The Senate leaders were content this year—as in 1956—to let the House take the initiative on the school program.

What happened this year in the House? The bill was defeated by a vote of 208 to 203. Just three votes meant the difference between victory for the children and defeat.

I do not intend to pass on the motives of the Members of the House who could easily have salvaged victory from defeat.

I can, however, comment on the man who has displayed such a shocking lack of leadership in this field—the man who easily could have provided the necessary three votes and many more.

That man is the President of the United States.

I think we have all learned a great deal about him this year as a result of his activities on the budget, civil rights—and Federal aid for school construction.

We have learned not to rely on anything he says because when the time comes for action he will say something different—or nothing at all.

But while we can heap some well-earned abuse on the President, we as the Senate cannot ignore our responsibility.

After all, Congress must pass the laws.

Our lack of action should weigh heavily upon us.

It is growing late now, Mr. President, but it is not too late for the 85th Congress to meet its responsibility to the children of America.

We can do that when we meet here again next January—and I urge my colleagues to think about this during adjournment. We will not long continue to be the most powerful Nation in the world if we continue our neglect of our future leaders.

WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Congress will not be in session on September 15, I wish to comment briefly on the career of one of Ohio's great citizens, William Howard Taft, who was born on September 15, 1857.

Ohio has been the birthplace of several Presidents and its citizens have pointed with pride to the contributions to our national history made by William Howard Taft, both during his term as 27th President of these United States and during his fine service on the Supreme Court of the United States.

Successfully following his chosen profession of law, Taft was early recognized as a capable and efficient lawyer. As the prosecuting attorney of Hamilton County, as a judge on the State supreme court at the age of 32, as Solicitor General of the United States, and as a Federal circuit judge, the recognition of his judicial abilities was ably demonstrated.

His readiness to serve his country, and his ability to grasp new responsibilities was shown by his appointment to be president of the Philippine Commission, under President Theodore Roosevelt. His successful leadership in establishing democratic principles in the Philippines brought him personal acclaim and the admiration of the citizens of the Philippines.

In recognition of his talents, President Roosevelt named Taft as Secretary of War in his Cabinet and in 1909, the people elected him to the highest office in the land, the Presidency.

As President, Taft gave the Nation a conservative and sound administration. Legislation to control monopolies was enacted and the Department of Labor was established. His administration was one of peace and prosperity.

In 1921, he again was called to serve his country as Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court and in this office he found the climactic satisfaction of a mind devoted to the legal profession and dedicated to public service.

Citizens of Ohio, of all political persuasions are mindful of President Taft's life of service and along with the illustrious name of the late Senator Robert Taft, will long be remembered in Ohio as a name synonymous of public service and dedication to the common welfare of our beloved country.

It is my sincere hope that this centennial anniversary of President Taft's birth will be fittingly remembered by the citizens, not only of Ohio, but by all Americans.

MUTUAL SECURITY APPROPRIATIONS, 1958—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] has waited for some time to call up the conference report on the mutual security appropriation bill. I wish to congratulate him on his diligence and great effort to produce effective appropriation bills, and to curtail expenditures in our Government. I hope the report may be considered at this time, and that it may be adopted.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9302) making appropriations for mutual security for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report.

(For conference report, see House proceedings of August 30, 1957, p. 16743, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, some weeks ago I watched with some interest the panel discussion by Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce and Edward R. Murrow following Mr. Murrow's television interview with Tito.

Having served in the House of Representatives with Mrs. Luce, I wrote her my opinion of what I thought was a brilliant analysis of the Tito interview. Subsequently she wrote me and enclosed a copy of a letter which she had sent to the New York Times. That letter was published in the New York Times of Sunday, July 28, 1957. It is a very scintillating analysis of the Tito interview. Because of its application to our foreign aid policy and our relations with Yugoslavia, I ask unanimous consent that the letter of Mrs. Luce be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TITO'S POLICIES ASSESSED: THREAT TO SOVIET EMPIRE SEEN IN IDEOLOGICAL DIFFERENCES

(NOTE.—The writer of the following letter, playwright and former Member of Congress, served until recently as United States Ambassador to Italy.)

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

On June 30 I participated in the panel discussion which followed Edward R. Murrow's televised interview with Tito.

Since that time a steady stream of letters has crossed my desk, many commending the points I sought to make in the interview, some contending that any optimistic view of Tito's regime or any attempt to justify United States policy toward Yugoslavia constituted a complete endorsement of his dictatorship.

Nothing I said was meant to justify the persecution of Roman Catholicism in Yugoslavia, and of such leaders as Cardinal Stepinac, or Tito's suppression of free speech and the imprisonment of Djilas, which continue throughout history to be very black marks against Tito.

Rather, I sought to isolate those elements in Tito's policies which can give all freemen some hope that the Soviet imperium is breaking up, and that communism itself as an ideology is doomed to failure for the very simple reason that, put into practice, it must continuously lose out, especially in economic competition with free countries.

DIFFERENCES ABOUT COMMUNISM

As the interview unfolded, while Tito continued to play down the size of the ideological differences between communism in Yugoslavia and in the Soviet Union, it became more and more evident that they are not only big, they are tremendous, and that if Tito himself did not play them down he might be inviting a serious rupture with Moscow on the grounds of ideological heresies. For they are not only differences of a practical order between two Communist nations. They are theoretical differences about communism itself.

It also became evident during the interview that Tito was equally aware that if his heresies were to be too openly embraced and too swiftly put into action by the eastern satellites they could lead Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Rumania into open conflict with the Soviet Union, a conflict which would result either in their sharing the tragic fate of Hungary or in opening a third world war.

In the panel discussion that followed the interview, I sought to define Tito's ideological heresies:

First, the right of a Communist country to national independence from Moscow. It is the exercise of this right by any nation under Kremlin control that has come to be called Titoism. Tito's contention, that Communist states should be equal and sovereign, flies, if not in the face of classic Marxism, certainly in the face of Lenin communism, as interpreted by the Kremlin's ideological exegetes.

SATELLITES' INDEPENDENCE

Tito first raised it in 1948, when he insisted that he and the leaders he chose would run Yugoslavia and kicked all Russian stooges out of his country. Since that time Tito has been more or less continually raising the question not only of the independence of Yugoslavia but of all the satellites.

Speaking of recent events in Poland, Tito said, "I think Poland is striving to go along its own path. * * * Since the time when Gomulka came into power, Poland has succeeded in settling its internal problem * * * [this] has a positive influence on neighboring countries."

Tito then made it clear that what he feared during the Hungarian revolution was not that Hungary should acquire independence, but that the struggle if carried too far too fast (which happened) must result in Soviet armed intervention (which happened).

He repeatedly stressed that, while he was firmly for the independence of all the satellites, they must make haste slowly, since there was a real risk of a third world war if complete independence were sought too rapidly, and especially if the independence movement openly included the desire to get rid of not only the Soviet politicians but of communism as well, which happened in Hungary.

AGREEMENT WITH MAO'S VIEWS

His insistence on his own independence and the eventual independence of his satellite neighbors is the first great heresy of Tito. This heresy threatens Moscow with the breakup of its western empire.

Moreover, the interview made it plain that Tito is encouraging and applauding expressions of this same heresy in the Far East. Referring to Mao Tse-tung's recent speech, which struck a distinctly Titoist note or two, Tito said, "Mao Tse-tung said many things which could be classed as new. * * * I am pleased that our views * * * are to a great extent identical."

The second hersey of Tito is the assertion of the theoretical right of an independent Communist nation to create not only its own foreign policies but its own political and economic institutions. This right is, of course, the inescapable corollary of the right to national independence. But it strikes at the very heart of the Marx-Lenin dogma that communism must develop everywhere, in every nation, according to the party line as given by Moscow.

Consequently Titoism threatens to disrupt not only the physical control of the Soviet Union over the satellites, but its ideological control over Communist parties within every nation, including the capitalist nations. The denial of the Kremlin's teaching and the Kremlin's authority to teach is, by the standards of all Communists up to now, a heresy of a major order.

The last, and perhaps in the long run the most dangerous, heresy of Tito is the new emphasis he is giving to the decentralization of economic and political processes within his country.

In the practical application of his theoretical right to develop socialism according to the specific needs of his country Tito has already created economic and political institutions unique in the Communist world.

Collectivization of the farms was abandoned some years ago. And, "already a few years ago," said Tito, "we have passed to a * * * wide decentralization of government in the economic as well as the administrative field. One of the most pronounced characteristics of our system is the handing over of the factories to the workers' self-government. Then the creation of the communes * * * a new internal administrative organization."

TENET OF DEMOCRACY

These processes Tito defends as a new form of socialism. But whatever name Tito chooses to call these processes of decentralization, the Kremlin itself cannot be deceived: decentralization of political and economic power is the major tenet of political and economic democracy in capitalistic western countries.

Tito has far to go before he ranks as more than a very lukewarm fellow-traveler of capitalism. He will never, in his own time, willingly become less than a complete dictator.

But the real question decentralization raises is that Tito's present long-range aim, the diffusion of political power and economic wealth—is in fact if not in theory the very aim of what President Eisenhower calls "people's capitalism."

Both American idealism and American pragmatism should dictate to the United States to be patient with Tito when he insists on describing this slow Yugoslav evolution toward western-style sovereign political and economic democracy as communism. A rose by any other name will smell as sweet.

CLARE BOOTHE LUCE.

RIDGEFIELD, CONN., July 19, 1957.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to appeal to Members of the Senate to let us complete action on the conference report on the mutual security appropriation bill. I should like to ask for the yeas and nays on the conference report, so that Members will know that we will vote on it very shortly. I now ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I wish to ask the Senator from Arizona a very brief question. Amendment No. 17 in the conference report on the mutual security appropriation bill refers to section 102 of the bill, having to do with publicity and propaganda. It is my understanding there was no intent on the part of the conferees in redrafting the section to change the basic law concerning publicity and propaganda in the mutual security program. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct. The basic law on this subject, known as the Dworshak amendment, was adopted to the Mutual Security Act of 1952.

The conference report which referred to the Dworshak amendment contained a paragraph which I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD at this point.

Without objection, the paragraph was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> The committee of conference recognized the desirability of preventing any use of funds for propaganda in support of the mutual security program. At the same time there should not be any interference with the supplying of full information to the Congress and to the public concerning the operations of the mutual security program. The committee of conference believes that it is possible for those responsible for the administration of the Mutual Security Act to maintain a sharp distinction between propaganda and the supplying of information as to the results attained under the program, and that this section of the conference agreement should not interfere with the recognized procedures for keeping the public and the Congress informed.

Mr. HAYDEN. The new section 102 underlines the purpose of the Dworshak amendment that no funds shall be used for propaganda within the United States. It is not intended to prohibit and it does not prohibit the President or the International Cooperation Administration or the Departments of State and Defense from giving the American people information about the operations of those agencies or the uses to which they are putting the money appropriated for the mutual security program or what the American people are getting for their money.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMATHERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question. I notice from the report, amendment No. 14 eliminates the appropriation of $20 million by the Senate for the Latin American Economic Development Fund. As to amendment No. 12 it is stated, "The conferees are agreed that not less than $20 million of this appropriation shall be for Latin America." Was it the feeling of the conferees that the $20 million which was stricken in amendment No. 14 would be taken from the special assistance fund, as provided in section 400 (a)?

Mr. HAYDEN. Thereby even more than $20 million would be available, whereas originally not more than $20 million would be available.

Mr. SMATHERS. In view of the action of the conferees, is it the belief of the conferees and of the Senator that the $20 million can be used in the same fashion as originally contemplated by the provisions of section 400 (b)?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement I have prepared in connection with this amendment.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR SMATHERS

I cannot help but express a keen sense of disappointment over the conference report on the foreign aid appropriations bill, though I recognize that our Senate conferees fought valiantly for the measure as passed by the Senate.

In the mutual security authorization bill, I was successful in getting the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to recommend and the Senate to adopt an amendment which I proposed setting up a Special Economic Development Fund for Latin America in the amount of $25 million. The Senate Appropriations Committee recommended an appropriation of $20 million and the Senate agreed to the recommendation by giving it overwhelming support. The funds under this program were to be utilized for the purpose of promoting health, education, sanitation, and land resettlement projects in Latin America on a 90 percent loan basis. It was no give away or handout proposal. Last year the Congress provided $15 million for this purpose and the good will engendered by the program which was started is inestimable. It was a program which the Latin Americans long sought from its good neighbor, the United States. It was a program which made it possible for our Latin American friends to maintain their own self-respect.

The House, on the other hand, though it accepted the authorization measure, failed to appropriate any funds for this worthwhile constructive program. Though recognizing that the House was operating under an atmosphere of economy, I cannot help but believe that they failed to fully realize the full beneficial effect of this program in our relations with Latin America. Knowing of the many friends which Latin America has in the House of Representatives, I am still hopeful that in a future supplemental appropriations bill they will see fit to correct what I believe to be an unintentional and harmful mistake with respect to our relations with our good neighbors to the south.

From my understanding of the conference report, some ground was held by our conferees. I would now like to ask the distinguished chairman if I am correct in the understanding that under the special assistance program, that the conferees were in full agreement that no less than $20 million of the $226 million appropriated are to be earmarked for Latin America?

With this understanding, though I have serious reservations with respect to other items in the foreign-aid program, I will reluctantly support the conference report.

Since hope springs eternal, I trust that I am not being too optimistic in entertaining the hope that at a later date when supplemental appropriations are being considered, that both the Senate and the House will see fit to appropriate sufficient moneys to continue the program which I proposed and had adopted last year designed solely for the purpose of further improving our good neighbor relations and increased trade with Latin America.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from Arizona agree with me that the colloquy between us with respect to section 102 yesterday still represents the legislative history with respect to section 102, having to do with the right of the ICA to continue to inform the American people with respect to their programs?

Mr. HAYDEN. I stated that yesterday. I repeated it this evening. That understanding is correct.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, in connection with the mutual security program, I want to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to my colleagues in the Senate. As my friends know, I have been deeply interested in our foreign policy ever since I came to the Senate 13 years ago and I have been particularly interested in helping as best I could, in the development of our so-called foreign aid program. I was one of those who worked continuously with the study we had made last year of the new approach to the mutual security program and was most hopeful that the reports of the investigators whom we chose from among the most expert in the country would be accepted as a basis for the new approach. The results of these studies and the independent studies that the President had made gave us what might be called a new look on our mutual security program. There was no difference of opinion by any of those who participated in the studies as to the need to continue the program and especially the need for the support of our military aid and defense assistance for our allies in various parts of the world.

Also it was felt that from the standpoint of the underdeveloped countries we should provide for a long-range revolving loan fund to enable those countries to secure their economic stability and to aid them in developing their own freedom, independence, and self-determination so that they could remain among the nations dedicated to freedom. This is a critical issue of our foreign policy and I believe is the strongest supporting pillar of the President's whole program.

Reviewing the action of the Senate, I call attention to the fact that the President originally asked the $3.8 billion. The Senate reported a bill authorizing $3.6 billion. The Senate vote on this authorization bill was 57 to 25. The Senate brought the House appropriation bill in conference up to $3.3 billion and finally in the Appropriations Committee, the Senate restored $500 million of the House slash of $800 million bringing the appropriation up to $3.025 billion. The Senate vote on this appropriation was 62 to 25. We have now witnessed the most unfortunate development, namely the unwillingness of the House to go above $2.7 billion for the final appropriation for fiscal 1958. This is a devastating defeat not only for the President but for the safety of America. However, I want to take this opportunity to pay a tribute to our Senate leadership—our majority leader, the Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson and our minority leader, the Honorable William F. Knowland. Their work was one of the finest evidences of bipartisan teamwork and last ditch fighting in support of the administration and the security of our country.

The only conclusion I can possibly draw from this development is that there are those in the House and especially on the House Appropriations Committee who are determined to destroy the mutual security program. The matter needs our immediate attention and at the beginning of next year we must press the fight vigorously to present to the American people the issue involved in these unfortunate developments this year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendment numbered 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record at this point a table which reflects the action of the two Houses on the mutual security appropriation bill, as well as the final amounts agreed to in conference.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a summary table showing the budget estimates for 1958, the amounts passed by the House, the amounts passed by the Senate, the amount provided by the public law finally enacted, and the differences between the budget estimates and the public law.

The budget estimates or appropriation requests total $64 billion plus, the public law or the amount enacted total $59 billion, a reduction from the estimates in the amount of approximately $5 billion. This constitutes a reduction of 7.7 percent. There is also included a table which is designed to reconcile the amounts in the January budget of new obligational authority with the budget estimates considered by the two Committees on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

So the report was agreed to.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment numbered 15.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, this completes the consideration of the appropriation bill, and I should like to be recognized in order to pay tribute to the chairman, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. The chairman has been present at practically all the committee hearings and committee sessions. It is difficult to understand how he was able to devote so much time and to carry through in such a manner as he has during the lengthy hearings which were conducted and which were necessary in the development of the appropriation bills.

I simply want to invite attention of this Senate to the splendid service to his country the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, has rendered.

REDUCTION IN APPROPRIATION BELOW THE BUDGET REQUESTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, now that the Senate has acted upon the last of the appropriation bills, it is possible to get a picture of the accomplishments this year.

All of us, I believe, recall the statement by the Secretary of Treasury concerning the budget. The then Secretary said it would have to be cut to avoid a hair-curling depression.

I have before me figures which have been prepared by my staff. They show that when all the bills are taken into account, this Congress has reduced the President's budget by $5,927,495,584—9.1 percent.

I hope that is enough to avoid having our hair curled by former Secretary Humphrey. But in any event it is gratifying. It represents a substantial saving from the appropriations which were requested.

I ask unanimous consent that the table prepared by my staff be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

THE NEW AIR FORCE ACADEMY CHAPEL

Mr. FLANDERS. I have before me a drawing which shows the new chapel to be built at the Air Force Academy in Colorado Springs, Colo. It is a strange creation. I exhibit it to my colleagues.

I have written a letter to the Secretary of the Air Force on that subject, which I now read:

> August 28, 1957.
>
> Hon. James H. Douglas,
> Secretary of the Air Force,
> Washington, D. C.
>
> Dear Mr. Secretary: I have been astonished to find that the properly criticized design for the chapel at the Air Force Academy at Colorado Springs has been appropriated for in the supplemental appropriation bill. As a member of the Defense Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee I had an opportunity to look over the designs for the Academy 2 years ago and in my judgment they seemed satisfactory for their purposes throughout except for this chapel.
>
> A chapel building for the Air Force should inspire reverence and the spirit of worship. There isn't a scintilla of reverence or worship in this building. It is just something dreamed up by the architects to be as different as possible from any proper house of worship.
>
> A chapel for worship does not have to be a classical structure. It does not have to be Romanesque. It does not have to be Gothic. It does not have to be Renaissance. It does not have to be Baroque. It does not have to be Georgian. It can be as plain and simple as a Quaker meetinghouse. It can be as modern as is the rest of the design of the Academy.
>
> Any of these things it can be. But it cannot be the antithesis of reverence and worship. The proposed structure is a deliberate insult to God Almighty. I hope you will take a look at it yourself and pass judgment upon it.
>
> Please stop it.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> Ralph E. Flanders.

Mr. ALLOTT. I should like to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Flanders], on his letter to the Secretary of the Air Force respecting the Air Force Academy.

Despite the opinions of many Members of Congress, and many, many other people throughout the length and breadth of the United States, 2 years ago with respect to the construction of a chapel at the Air Force Academy, we are now faced with a design of that chapel which, I would say, in even modest language, is more atrocious than the first. I do not know what concept of worship the architects of the structure may have. I know that this chapel design resembles nothing that has ever been seen or dreamed of in the minds of sane men. It is my sincere hope that somewhere along the way the Secretary of the Air Force, and members of the Armed Services Committee and the Appropriations Committee will see fit to take another look at the designs for the Air Force Academy near Colorado Springs, particularly the so-called chapel bearing in mind the need for an edifice for worship which will more nearly approximate the ideas, the ideals, the concepts and the customs of this country.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Colorado for the remarks he has made with reference to the Air Force Academy chapel which is being constructed in the Senator's home State. This afternoon I saw a representation of what the chapel will be if built. I served on the subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services which approved the authorization for the chapel. We thought it would be more a cathedral than it would be a chapel, since they were asking $3,000,000 to build it, as I recall.

I was so shocked when I saw the representation this afternoon that I intend to protest to the Air Force. If the Air Force does not withhold action and have new plans prepared, I shall feel compelled to introduce a resolution to cancel the authorization for the chapel until it can be further considered.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. ALLOTT. I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield to the able Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I am quite familiar with the subject which has been discussed. We now have serving the third Secretary of the Air Force since this project was started.

When the project was begun the first Secretary of the Air Force to consider it assured me the chapel would not be built along the lines now indicated.

The second Secretary of the Air Force to serve assured me that the chapel would not be built in this manner.

We now have a report on the design, as the Senator from Colorado has said, which is worse than the array of wigwams, or whatever one might call the design, and it is planned to build the chapel along those lines. It is planned to build it of a combination of glass and aluminum.

As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Flanders] has stated, never in this country or abroad in any civilized land has anybody ever attempted to worship any known God in a building of such a character.

In spite of all the protests we have made for 3 consecutive years, the Chicago architects have been determined to go ahead with this chapel, and the third Secretary of the Air Force to consider it, we understand, has now O. K.'d the design, although it is going to be the most expensive church in the most expensive school this Nation has ever built.

The entire project is going to cost about twice what we had contemplated, and the initial cost of the project is more than all we have spent in its entire history on the United States Military Academy at West Point.

Mr. O'MAHONEY and Mr. NEUBERGER addressed the chair.

Mr. ALLOTT. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Colorado to yield to me for the purpose of presenting a conference report.

Mr. ALLOTT. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wyoming, with the understanding that I may retain the floor after the conference report is acted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLOTT. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we have an important conference report to consider. We are going to ask for the yeas and nays as soon as the conference report is called up. I should like all Senators to be on notice that it is a conference report relating to S. 2377, the bill providing procedures for the production of Government records.

When we conclude action on the conference report, we shall take up S. 2792, the immigration bill which recently passed the Senate, and to which the House has added some amendments. We will wish to ask concurrence in the House amendments.

I hope we will be able to have the yea-and-nay vote as soon as possible, so that Senators who may not be interested in participating in the other discussions can answer to their names when the roll is called, and afterward we can have consideration of some noncontroversial bills and discussion of other matters.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I desire to conclude in 30 seconds, if I may, and then I shall yield for the presentation of the conference report.

I consider the design of the chapel offensive to the inherent religious beliefs of the American people. It is my sincere hope that enough pressure will be brought to get this whole matter reconsidered, so that all Americans may then feel that this chapel is really a house of God.

I yield the floor.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLOTT. I have yielded the floor.

PROCEDURES FOR THE PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT RECORDS IN CRIMINAL CASES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2377) to amend chapter 223, title 18, United States Code, to provide for the production of statements and reports of witnesses. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2377) to amend chapter 223, title 18, United States Code, to provide for the production of statements and reports of witnesses, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That chapter 223 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding a new section 3500 which shall read as follows:

"'§ 3500. Demands for production of statements and reports of witnesses

"'(a) In any criminal prosecution brought by the United States, no statement or report in the possession of the United States which was made by a Government witness or prospective Government witness (other than the defendant) to an agent of the Government shall be the subject of subpena, discovery, or inspection until said witness has testified on direct examination in the trial of the case.

"'(b) After a witness called by the United States has testified on direct examination, the court shall, on motion of the defendant, order the United States to produce any statement (as hereinafter defined) of the witness in the possession of the United States which relates to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified. If the entire contents of any such statement relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order it to be delivered directly to the defendant for his examination and use.

"'(c) If the United States claims that any statement ordered to be produced under this section contains matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver such statement for the inspection of the court in camera. Upon such delivery the court shall excise the portions of such statement which do not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness. With such material excised, the court shall then direct delivery of such statement to the defendant for his use. If, pursuant to such procedure, any portion of such statement is withheld from the defendant and the defendant objects to such withholding, and the trial is continued to an adjudication of the guilt of the defendant, the entire text of such statement shall be preserved by the United States and, in the event the defendant appeals, shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge. Whenever any statement is delivered to a defendant pursuant to this section, the court in its discretion, upon application of said defendant, may recess proceedings in the trial for such time as it may determine to be reasonably required for the examination of such statement by said defendant and his preparation for its use in the trial.

"'(d) If the United States elects not to comply with an order of the court under paragraph (b) or (c) hereof to deliver to the defendant any such statement, or such portion thereof as the court may direct, the court shall strike from the record the testimony of the witness, and the trial shall proceed unless the court in its discretion shall determine that the interests of justice require that a mistrial be declared.

"'(e) The term "statement", as used in subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section in relation to any witness called by the United States, means—

"'(1) a written statement made by said witness and signed or otherwise adopted or approved by him; or

"'(2) a stenographic, mechanical, electrical, or other recording, or a transcription thereof, which is a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement made by said witness to an agent of the Government and recorded contemporaneously with the making of such oral statement.'

"The analysis of such chapter is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"'3500. Demands for production of statements and reports of witnesses.'"

And the House agree to the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the conference report has been unanimously signed. The conferees of the Senate and of the House all agreed to the report.

The purpose of the bill is to protect the files of the Government against unwarranted disclosure and at the same time to preserve due process of law for defendants in criminal cases. There was no objection to the measure in the conference. We completed the discussion in less than an hour. I believe this is a very excellent piece of legislation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been requested. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. REVERCOMB].

Mr. REVERCOMB. I appreciate the Senator's yielding to me so that I may ask a question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. REVERCOMB. I thank the Senator very much.

It is extremely important, I believe, that we know, Mr. President, what changes were made in the conference relating to the bill which was passed by the Senate on this subject. I should appreciate it if the Senator from Wyoming would state what changes were made in the bill as it now comes back for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am very happy to respond to that inquiry. The conference report is based upon the bill which was passed by the Senate. The House conferees agreed to substitute the principal text of the Senate report.

There were two views with respect to the language which was contained in the Senate bill. There was some fear upon the part of the Department of Justice that the Senate bill would create a greater latitude for the examination of irrelevant reports of agents. The language which was devised by the conferees has cleared up the doubts of the Department of Justice and the doubts which were expressed upon the floor of the Senate during the debate last Monday night.

The second matter had to do with the definition of the statements that were involved in the procedures for production. Instead of reciting it in the body of the bill, we wrote a new subsection on definitions. Perhaps it would be well for me to read the subsection, which is very brief:

> (e) The term "statement," as used in subsections (b), (c), and (d) of this section in relation to any witness called by the United States, means—
>
> (1) a written statement made by said witness and signed or otherwise adopted or approved by him; or
>
> (2) a stenographic, mechanical, electrical, or other recording, or a transcription thereof, which is substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement made by said witness to an agent of the Government and recorded contemporaneously with the making of such oral statement.

That is the new language which was added in the definitions for the bill. In subsection (a) there was no reference at all to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or to the contents of subsection (b), (c), and (d).

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield for a question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. When the bill was before the Senate, quite a discussion occurred as to the difference between "records" and "recordings." Is the definition which has been read by the Senator from Wyoming sufficiently comprehensive to deal with the records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It deals only with those records which relate to the testimony of a Government witness, and when the subject matter is testimony in a particular case in which a motion is made for the production of such records. They must be relevant. They must be competent. If there is any doubt about that on the part of the Government, the Government may ask that the records be presented to the trial judge, for his examination in chambers.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Will the Senator from Wyoming yield for another question?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Then I gather from the statement the Senator from Wyoming has made that the word "record", as used, means the record pertinent to the testimony of the witness.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The word "record" appears in the title. In the definition we speak of—

> (2) a stenographic, mechanical, electrical, or other recording, or a transcription thereof, which is a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement made by said witness to an agent of the Government and recorded contemporaneously with the making of such oral statement.

Instead of the noun "record," we have the verb "record" in the past tense, namely, "recorded," and also in the present tense.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield further to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. REVERCOMB. Does the definition of "records" which have been made or which must be produced, include memoranda made by an agent of the Government or any other statement which may have been obtained and signed?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think it would include a memorandum made by an agent of the Government of an oral statement made to him by a Government witness, but not by a third party.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to yield to the junior Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. As a practical matter, then, what has been done with the so-called records provision is to tie it down to those cases in which the agent actually purports to make a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement that the witness has made to him—not the agent's own comments or a recording of his own ideas, but a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement which the witness has made to him, and as transcribed by him; is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Precisely.

Mr. JAVITS. I note from the report that the reference to the Rules of Criminal Procedure has been eliminated. Does that leave the matter as follows: That when the Government has the document defined as a statement, and when it is in its possession, and has been made by a Government agent, then, no matter how it is produced—whether produced pursuant to the Rules of Criminal Procedure or produced pursuant to the rather precise rule in the decision in the Jencks case, or for any other reason—if it is that kind of a statement, the court acquires, with respect to that statement, rights which are specified in this measure; is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. So long as it is a relevant and competent statement and deals with the testimony of the Government witness.

Mr. JAVITS. That is to say, in the case of a Government witness who has testified.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Exactly.

Mr. JAVITS. Then the words, as the Senator from Wyoming has read them, must apply; is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; and I think it should be made clear that all the procedure must occur after the Government witness produced by the United States has testified, and not before.

Mr. JAVITS. Yes; but the amendment contains the safeguard provided by the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], namely, that in the interests of justice, there may be an adjournment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to say that both the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] on the floor of the Senate—which I accepted during the debate—and the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]—which I also accepted—are retained in the conference report.

Mr. JAVITS. One final question, which I think will button this up: If the Government chooses not to deliver the information, then the court has rather complete powers with respect to either declaring a mistrial or striking out the evidence, as the interests of justice may dictate, subject to appeals.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. All that is retained in the conference report.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes; and all that goes up on appeal, if the defendant asks for it.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I realize that the conference committee, operating under the pressure of time, has not had time to submit the report in the way in which it normally would be done—namely, by having a statement by the managers on the part of the House, and by having a printed report. I realize that there is a report, but that it was prepared on a duplicating machine.

I wonder whether the Senator from Wyoming intends to incorporate that copy of the report in the RECORD, preceding the taking of the vote this evening.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If I correctly understand the question the Senator from South Dakota asks—and my doubt regarding it arises only because of the difficulty of hearing what the Senator from South Dakota has said, inasmuch as while he has been asking the question, other Senators have been talking—his question can be answered, I believe, by a brief reading of the provision.

Let it be understood that we are trying to define what is meant by the term "statement" in the body of the measure.

First, it is—> a written statement made by said witness and signed or otherwise adopted or approved by him.

In addition to such statements, we have oral statements; and the type of oral statements referred to is defined in the second clause, which reads as follows:

> (2) a stenographic, mechanical, electrical, or other recording, or a transcription thereof, which is a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement made by said witness to an agent of the Government and recorded contemporaneously with the making of such oral statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from South Dakota repeat his inquiry?

Mr. MUNDT. Yes, Mr. President. I do not think the Senator from Wyoming quite understood my inquiry, although I am grateful for the information provided in his reply.

My question is this: In view of the fact that the conference report has come to us so late, so that the statement of the managers on the part of the House, which normally is printed, could not be sent to the Government Printing Office and printed in time for our inspection at this time, I believe the Senator from Wyoming has referred to a duplicated statement of the report, as signed by the conferees.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The written statement by the managers on the part of the House was not in my hands. It was not presented to me. It was presented in the House of Representatives. It is not here.

But I am stating to the Senate the understanding of all the conferees, both those of the House and those of the Senate.

Mr. MUNDT. I think a statement by the managers on the part of the House will appear in today's issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as a part of the action taken by the House. Is that correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think that is correct. I am expecting that to happen.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand the conference report, as explained to the Senate by the able Senator from Wyoming, who has worked so hard and so long to get a satisfactory report in this situation——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It was hammered out on the anvil of hard work.

Mr. CLARK. Yes. As I understand, the elimination of the reference to the Federal rules, in the redraft presented by the conference committee, does not indicate, and is not intended in any way to indicate, that this measure is intended to amount to a change in any way of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are not dealing with the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. We are dealing only with the proceedures to be followed in the production of these reports.

Mr. CLARK. As I understand, the Senate is to vote on the conference report without having the benefit of any managers' written report as to what was decided in the conference. Therefore, I, for one, at least—and I think all my colleagues, too, must do likewise—must vote on this measure without having studied such a conference report. Therefore, the legislative history as regards the vote to be taken in the Senate, when the Senate votes on the report—and let me say that I shall vote for the report—will show that when the Senate votes on it, it will do so without having adopted, approved, or in any way considered the statement of the managers on the part of the House, which will be filed later on.

I should like to state——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me say this to the Senator from Pennsylvania, in order to keep the record straight: It is not the custom of conferees on the part of the Senate to prepare a written report. It is the custom of the conferees on the part of the House to file a statement of the views of the House managers.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I quite agree with the Senator from Wyoming. My only point is that those of us who are about to vote for this measure—and I shall vote for it—will vote for it on the understanding of what it contains, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming. For myself, I have some doubts as to whether this measure is constitutional; but I shall vote for it with the conviction that if it is unconstitutional, if it violates due process, we can leave that to the courts.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Let me inquire of the chairman of the subcommittee and the chairman of the conference committee whether the word "records" includes photostats of documents and pictures, all of which are very important in the presentation of a criminal case, and just where they fall within this definition?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are not dealing with records in the sense of the question asked by the Senator from Tennessee. We are dealing only with records which are included in the definition here, statements by the witness, which have been approved by him or signed by him or otherwise approved by him, and then oral statements which have been recorded—oral statements made by the witness to an agent of the Government. This is tied directly to statements made by a Government witness to an agent of the Government after the witness has testified, and not to any other records of the FBI or of any other Government bureau.

Mr. KEFAUVER. As I understood one part of Judge Brennan's opinion—and there is some language that might be considered in conflict—could be interpreted as justifying a requirement, for instance, that certain photostats of records or of pictures be submitted for examination by the defendant or his counsel. What happened in that regard?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not recall any language in the decision of Justice Brennan that deals with that. If the pictures have anything to do with the statement of the witness—with either the written statement or the oral statement—of course that would be part of it; but whatever is produced must be related to the evidence of the witness who has testified before the court in the criminal case.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I did not mean that his opinion specified pictures or photostats; but I thought that the general, broad statements of his opinion might include that kind of documentary evidence.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to my friend from Tennessee that the language submitted by the conference report covers every statement that was made in the opinion.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Very well; I think that is sufficient. I thank the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois, who was one of the conferees.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I want to be recorded as being in support of the general conclusion of this matter, and, having heretofore ventilated the anxiety of the Department of Justice concerning it, to state that the revised text has the concurrence of the Department of Justice.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. I do not desire to delay the vote on the conference report, but I want to say that the conference report does not say "due process." It will be remembered that when the Senate bill showed two lines of approach, there was an effort made by quite a number of courts to secure clarification. Yet, at the same time we were assured that a bill would be written or passed by the Senate which included "due process."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am confident that this bill does not invade "due process." I would not have signed the report if I had any conception that it had that effect.

Mr. COOPER. I am certain of that, but I should like to ask a specific question or two with relation to the legislative history, because in the debate on the floor other language was offered which was rejected by the Senate, upon the thesis that it did invade due process. Now there is new language in the bill regarding records which will be produced upon the request of a defendant, which differs from the language of the bill which was passed by the Senate. I have read the conference report, and it says, as I recall, that statements signed by the witness, and approved and adopted, or approved and adopted, shall be produced, and, second, that stenographic, mechanical, or electrical recordings——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Or other recordings.

Mr. COOPER. Of statements made by a witness, which are in essence verbatim statements, and which are made contemporaneously at the time of the oral statement, shall be admitted. I want to ask the distinguished Senator if, in his opinion, the conference report limits or narrows in any way the holding of the Jencks case as to the totality of the statements of a witness which must be produced.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In that part of the opinion of the majority of four of the Supreme Court in the Jencks case, which referred to the case of Gordon against the United States, and which defined the purpose of the production of the statements or the records, that part of the decision is completely sustained by this bill.

Mr. COOPER. I say that because I have great respect for the desire of the FBI to protect its records, and I said in the debate on the floor, when the Senate passed this bill, that we all wanted to assist so far as possible in that purpose. But, I say, overriding that aim is the objective and the right of every defendant to have due process. Whether it is the FBI, whether it is any other law agency, we know that due process must be accorded a defendant. I accept the statement of the distinguished Senator that, in his opinion—and I know that he is familiar with the Jencks case from one end to the other—the conference report does not limit the production of the records in such a way as to invade due process to a defendant.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am confident that it does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senators from New Mexico [Mr. Anderson and Mr. Chavez], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Ervin], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Green], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Johnston], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Kerr], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Morse], the Senator from Montana [Mr. Murray], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Neely], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Sparkman] are absent on official business.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. Chavez], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Ervin], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Green], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Johnston], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. Kerr], the Senator from Montana [Mr. Murray], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Neely], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Sparkman] would each vote "yea."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Bridges] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. Payne] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. Bricker], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Carlson], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Jenner] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. Butler], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Capehart], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Malone] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Flanders] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Martin] are absent on official business.

If present and voting, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Bricker], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Butler], the Senators from Indiana [Mr. Capehart and Mr. Jenner], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Malone], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Flanders], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Martin], and the Senator from Maine [Mr. Payne] would each vote "yea."

TRANSFER OF AMERICAN SHIPPING TO FOREIGN REGISTRY

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President on March 14, 1957, Congressman ZELENKO, of New York, raised a rather interesting question concerning the manner in which the Maritime Administration is permitting ships under American flags to be transferred to foreign registry, thereby resulting in a substantial windfall to the companies which had previously purchased these same ships at a greatly reduced price on the basis that they would be kept under the American flag.

The particular case to which he had reference on that date was their decision approving Mr. Onassis' transfer of 14 ships from American registry to foreign registry, thereby resulting in approximately $20 million windfall profit, the net proceeds of which were then used to establish a trust fund for his children.

Later I shall ask to incorporate in the body of the RECORD the Maritime Administration's report on this transaction along with a chart showing the original cost of the 14 ships involved to the Government and the net price for which they were sold by the Government at the end of the war.

This report will show the average price received by the Government for the tankers as being about $1½ million each and about $470,000 each for the two cargo ships.

The Maritime Administration in the same report confirms that the value of these ships when transferred to a foreign flag automatically increases based upon today's valuations to $3,400,000 each for the tankers and $1,500,000 each for the Liberty dry-cargo vessels.

This means that the permission granted by the Maritime Administration to Mr. Onassis to transfer these ships from American flag to foreign registry resulted in more than doubling their valuation as compared to the original cost of 10 years ago, or a windfall of approximately $20 million.

The Maritime Administration points out that in turn for this favorable concession the Onassis group have agreed to have constructed in this country three new tankers of not less than 198,450 deadweight tons with the proviso that should they not live up to this latter contract to construct these three ships they would pay a forfeit of approximately $8 million.

Even if they forfeit this last agreement the company still stands to win $12 million by the agreement. The company cannot lose; the American taxpayers can.

Last year Congress rejected the request of certain companies for permission to transfer their ships from American registry to foreign registry on the basis that the resulting windfall profits were not warranted. The ships had been sold at a greatly reduced price in order to keep them under American flag and the whole purpose of this policy would be defeated by making exemptions. If the ships were to be sold promiscuously under foreign registry then the American taxpayers should have reaped the benefits resulting from the greater world valuation. The Maritime Administration by executive decisions is granting these requests which were denied by Congressional action. Congress should give this new policy of the Maritime Administration their careful scrutiny.

At this point I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks the report of the Maritime Administration which shows hows Mr. Onassis, the Greek shipowner, created a trust fund for his children with the $20 million windfall profit resulting from these maritime rulings.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Department of Commerce,
Maritime Administration,
Washington, D. C., April 9, 1957.
Hon. John J. Williams,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator Williams: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of March 25, 1957 enclosing a copy of an article which appeared in the Wilmington Morning News of March 15, 1957, concerning a proposed arrangement between the Maritime Administration and Mr. Aristoteles Onassis involving the construction of new tankers. In connection therewith you request a complete report on the transaction, with particular reference to certain phases thereof, as listed in your letter.

On December 10, 1956, the Maritime Administrator granted approval in principle, pursuant to sections 9 and 37 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended of the transfer to Panamanian or Liberian ownership and Panamanian or Liberian registry and flag of 11 United States flag T–2 tankers, the tanker Olympic Games, and 2 Liberty dry-cargo ships, in consideration for the construction in the United States by United States Petroleum Carriers, Inc., or any United States affiliate or subsidiary thereof, for United States documentation and operation, of 3 new tankers aggregating not less than 198,450 deadweight tons, as follows: One to be 100,000 deadweight tons or more, with trial speed of 18.5 knots and service speed of 17.5 knots; and two of the World Glory type to be of 46,000 deadweight tons or more, with speed of 16.9 knots or more.

The above approval in principle was subject to the terms and conditions set forth in part I, paragraph B and part III, paragraph A of the notice of policy setting forth the Maritime Administration's foreign transfer policy, effective November 5, 1956 (copy attached).

On January 25, 1957, the Maritime Administration formalized the approval granted in principle on December 10, 1956, of the trade-out-and-build proposal described above, by the execution of appropriate contracts with respect to the new ships, and also with respect to the vessels to be transferred to Liberian registry and flag. The Maritime Administration's transfer orders, in evidence of its approval pursuant to sections 9 and 37 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, have been issued for 12 of the vessels—the remaining 2 orders, covering 2 Liberty dry-cargo vessels, are to be issued upon payment of the mortgage indebtedness due the Maritime Administration with respect to each ship. Attached is copy of executed contract No. MA–1439 dated January 25, 1957, between the Department of Commerce, Maritime Administration, and Victory Carriers, Inc., with respect to the construction of the three new tankers, namely builder's hulls Nos. 1671, 1672 and 1681. This contract contains the essence of the Maritime Administration's approval of the trade-out-and-build program of Victory Carriers, Inc. Your attention is called to paragraph 2 of said contract, which provides for the payment of liquidated damages to the Maritime Administration, in the event the new ships are not constructed and documented under United States laws within the time limit prescribed.

Listed hereunder are the answers to your specific points of inquiry concerning the subject proposal:

1. The name of the company, a list of the officers or directors, and the amount of actual paid-in capital by the stockholders.

A. The name of the corporation which has agreed to construct the three new vessels for United States documentation is Victory Carriers, Inc., which is a Delaware corporation with an authorized capital of 2,000 shares of no par value stock, all of which has been issued and is presently outstanding and is owned by United States Petroleum Carriers, Inc. The officers and directors of Victory Carriers, Inc., are: Granville Conway, president and director; Nicolas Cokkinis, vice president and director; Peter Spalding, vice president; Thomas R. Lincoln, vice president; Charles S. Cunningham, director; John C. Griswold, director; Edmond J. Moran, director.

United States Petroleum Carriers, Inc., is a Delaware corporation with an authorized capital of 1,000 shares of no par value stock, all of which has been issued and is presently outstanding. Seven hundred and fifty shares of the stock are held by Grace National Bank of New York, as trustee of the trust established under agreement dated August 10, 1956, between Aristoteles S. Onassis, an Argentine citizen, and said bank (referred to as the trustee of the Onassis trust). The remaining 250 shares are owned by Sociedad Industrial Maritima Financiera Ariona, Panama, S. A., a Panamanian corporation. The latter corporation is owned or controlled by Mr. Aristoteles S. Onassis and Messrs. N. Konialides, an Argentine citizen, and C. Konialides, a Uruguyan citizen.

2. The total expected cost of the tankers, broken down per ship:

A. On December 28, 1956, the Maritime Administration was furnished with an executed copy of construction contract dated December 13, 1956, by and between Bethlehem Steel Co. and Victory Carriers, Inc., which provides for the construction at Quincy, Mass., of 2 steel, single screw, steam turbine propelled, bulk oil tankers, builder's hulls Nos. 1671 and 1672, and 1 steel, twin screw, steam turbine propelled, bulk oil tanker, builder's hull No. 1681, the total of maximum designed deadweights of such vessels to be about 198,450 tons.

As of March 8, 1957, Victory Carriers, Inc, had already paid $1,795,500 on account of the construction of these ships.

Under the construction contract the construction cost is $51,300,000, the contract price for the three vessels to be constructed. The construction contract also provides for the completion and delivery of the vessels as follows:

Hull No. 1671, on or before August 31, 1959.

Hull No. 1672, on or before January 31, 1960.

Hull No. 1681, on or before June 30, 1960, which dates are subject to the force majeure clause.

3. The extent of the Government financing, either in the form of construction differential, subsidy, or Government guaranties of mortgages.

(a) The interest rate involved in the guaranteed mortgage and the terms of payment.

A. There has been no financial assistance granted by the Maritime Administration in connection with the construction of the three new tankers by Victory Carriers, Inc., either in the form of construction differential subsidy, or insured mortgage guaranty, or other forms of Government aid.

4. The name of each tanker, Liberty ship, or other ship which the Maritime Administration has authorized transferred from American flag to foreign flag.

A. The names, owners, and types of United States-flag vessels approved for transfer to Liberian registry and flag without change in United States citizen ownership, in connection with the new construction, are as follows:

United States, Petroleum Carriers, Inc., Arickaree, T–2 tanker; Battle Rock, T–2 tanker; Camp Namanu, T–2 tanker; Fort Bridger, T–2 tanker; Lake George, T–2 tanker; Stony Point, T–2 tanker.

Victory Carriers, Inc., Heywood Broun, Liberty cargo; Lewis Emery Jr., Liberty cargo.

Western Tankers, Inc., McKittrich Hills, T–2 tanker; Montebello Hills, T–2 tanker; William A. M. Burden, T–2 tanker; Olympic Games, tanker.

Trafalgar Steamship Corp., Federal, T–2 tanker; Republic, T–2 tanker.

4a. With the name of each tanker or other type of ship include information as to the date this ship was constructed, the total construction cost, the date the ship was sold to Mr. Onassis or his company, and the net amount after all allowances received by the Government for such ship.

A. See attachment 2.

4b. The estimated valuation of each of these ships if placed under foreign flag and eligible for resale in world markets.

A. Under foreign registry the estimated valuation on a restricted basis, of the 14 vessels will be: $3,400,000 for each T–2 tanker, and the Olympic Games, and $1,500,000 for each of the Liberty dry cargo vessels. However, these ships are not eligible for resale except with prior Maritime Administration approval.

5. If Mr. Onassis is merely transferring these tankers and Liberty ships to a foreign flag company of his own, then I want this information:

A. On January 29, 1957, the Maritime Administrator approved, in principle only, the transfer of the above-listed vessels, after their documentation under Liberian flag, to a Liberian corporation or corporations to be formed. The Maritime Administrator's approval in principle contemplated that the president and a majority of the directors of the said corporation or corporations would be citizens of the United States, that 75 percent of the stock in said corporation or corporations would be owned by a trustee for the benefit of the children (United States citizens) of Mr. A. S. Onassis, and that the trustee so appointed for the children would be an individual or corporation acceptable to the Maritime Administration.

5a. The amount of money involved in the transfer and the names of the companies being transferred from and to.

A. The approval granted in principle on January 29, 1957, as referred to above, has not yet been formalized and the amount of purchase price or other monetary consideration involved in the proposed transfer of ownership, as well as the name or names of the Liberian purchasers or transferees, has not yet been filed with the Maritime Administration.

5b. After being transferred to one of his foreign flag companies would he need any further permission from the Maritime Administration if he desired to sell them in the world market?

A. The Maritime Administration has statutory control, under section 37 of the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, so long as the present emergency exists, of the transfer to foreign ownership of the Liberian vessels. Pursuant to the terms of its formal approval of any transfer of these vessels to Liberian ownership, the Maritime Administration has contractual control over any subsequent changes in ownership of the vessels involved for the balance of the 20-year life of the ships, or for the duration of the national emergency, whichever is the longer period.

5c. The same information as to world market valuation as indicated in question 4b.

A. The answer to your question 5c would appear to be the same as the answer given to your question 4b.

Sincerely yours,
Clarence G. Morse,
Maritime Administrator.

LET THE LADY HOLD UP HER HEAD

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, on the day that we are scheduled to act on the conference report which reflects the enlightened immigration proposals of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], I should like to make available to my colleagues an eminent address on our national immigration policies which Senator KENNEDY delivered to the Washington chapter of the American Jewish Committee on June 4, 1957. The title of this able essay is "Let the Lady Hold Up Her Head," which symbolizes the desire of the Senator from Massachusetts to bring into living reality the great humanitarian promise inherent in the Statue of Liberty, which commands the entrance to New York Harbor. I am pleased to be a cosponsor of Senator KENNEDY'S bill (S. 2792).

I believe that any openminded citizen reading this address by Senator KENNEDY will come to realize that every one of us, except for fullblooded American Indians, is either an immigrant or the descendant of immigrants. Therefore, as the Senator from Massachusetts emphasizes, "our policy should be generous; it should be fair; it should be flexible." I ask unanimous consent that the address by Senator KENNEDY be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET THE LADY HOLD UP HER HEAD—REFLECTIONS ON AMERICAN IMMIGRATION POLICY

(By Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, of Massachusetts)

I've heard it said that one of the reasons Queen Isabella of Spain was so eager to support Columbus' voyage was to make certain that all the heathens beyond the horizon were converted to her own religion.

The story has it that Luis Santangel, Chancellor of the Spanish Exchequer, was having much difficulty persuading Ferdinand to finance Columbus' explorations, because the King's advisers had told him no gold would be found beyond the seas. So Santangel decided to appeal to other motives. Within earshot of the Queen, who was a devout Catholic, he asked the King: "Does your Grace feel no responsibility to convert the inhabitants beyond the sea of darkness to the true faith?"

"Madre de Dios," exclaimed the Queen. "I had never thought of that. If My Lord, the King, will not give the Italian the money he needs to save those poor lost souls, I will pawn my jewels and finance him myself."

The King who could not bear the thought of the royal jewels in a pawnshop, quickly agreed to advance the money.

Queen Isabella was not alone in her desire. In the years that followed, Sir Walter Raleigh, and later Governor Winthrop, also wanted these shores kept virgin for their own kind of people. But luckily for all of us, history decided differently. Columbus and the English were followed by waves of Germans, Irish, Italians, Slavs. And far from remaining a nation of one creed, this new land became an amalgamation such as had never before been created.

Each wave disliked and distrusted the next. The English said the Irish "kept the Sabbath and everything else they could lay their hands on." The English and the Irish distrusted the German who "worked too hard." The English and the Irish and the Germans disliked the Italians; and the Italians joined their predecessors in disparaging the Slavs. By the time Robert Louis Stevenson made his journey across the new land he found Americans united in only one thing—their distrust of the heathen Chinee whom he himself looked upon with wonder and awe, because "their forefathers," as he pointed out, "watched the stars before mine had begun to keep pigs."

E PLURIBUS UNUM

Fortunately for America, a few pioneers saw the value of accepting all races and faiths. When Roger Williams was expelled from the Puritan colonies, he founded Rhode Island as a polyglot refuge. William Penn made a point of welcoming all comers. In 1654 the first group of Jewish settlers landed in New Amsterdam. And by 1737 the Irish were already celebrating St. Patrick's Day in Boston.

The assimilation of this heterogeneous tide was not an easy accomplishment. As early as the Presidency of John Adams, the alien and sedition laws were passed. The Know-Nothing Party flourished before the Civil War; and for several generations thereafter the Ku Klux Klan rode furiously in the night. But today the Klan is more laughed at than feared. In 1916, one Madison Grant, official of the American Museum of Natural History, wrote a pseudoscientific, violently anti-immigrant book entitled "The Passing of the Great Race." But in 1952, a group of world renowned anthropologists reported unequivocally to UNESCO that there is no basis for ideas of racial purity or superiority.

Today, some few may try to maintain the fiction that they are of purer stock or superior breed, but their pretense is transparent. The Nation got a hearty chuckle when FDR addressed the Daughters of the American Revolution as "fellow immigrants." And Sinclair Lewis described Martin Arrowsmith as "a typical purebred Anglo-Saxon American—which means that he was a union of German, French, Scotch-Irish, perhaps a little Spanish, conceivably a little of the strains lumped together as Jewish, and a great deal of English, which is itself a combination of primitive Britain, Celt, Phoenician, Roman, German, Dane, and Swede."

America today is a product of its immigrants—and a product that is the envy of the world. We recognize that the new amalgamated man, a strictly made-in-America product, is the stronger and fresher because he has borrowed the best strains of many lands.

A STEP BACKWARD

But in spite of this knowledge, our Nation's attitude toward immigrants has changed considerably. If Emma Lazarus were writing today, her famous lines "give me your tired, your poor" would have to be amended to read "as long as they come from northern Europe, are not too tired or too poor or slightly ill, and can document all their activities for the past 2 years."

Our present immigration laws furnish a quota system of national origins with indefensible overtones of racial preference. The laws impose a ridiculous superstructure of regulations that lead to what Dostoevsky cunningly described as "administrative ecstasy." Walt Whitman's songs of the open gate have given way to the mournful strains of Gian Carlo Menotti's The Consul.

President Truman warned when he vetoed the McCarran Act that "the idea behind the discriminatory policy was, to put it baldly, that Americans with English or Irish names were better people and better citizens than Americans with Italian or Greek or Polish names. * * * Such a concept is utterly unworthy of our traditions and our ideals." And yet, as we well know, despite the veto, the law went into effect—ironically on Christmas Eve.

The inequities of this legislation have raised the number of private immigration bills from 100 in the 78th Congress to 2,000 in the 84th. Private immigration bills make up about half of our legislation today.

In my own office I have interceded on behalf of innumerable immigrants who bumped their heads against our barrier of regulations. An Italian immigrant, living with his small children in Massachusetts, could not bring his wife to the United States because she had stolen a pair of shoes in 1913, and a bundle of sticks for her fire in 1939. It took an act of Congress to reunite this family.

IMMIGRATION AND FOREIGN POLICY

As a member of the Foreign Relations Committee I am deeply disturbed by the frustrations and resentments created abroad by our immigration laws. Immigration policy, I maintain, is as integral a part of foreign policy as economic aid or propaganda broadcasts. Nothing is more personal, or translated more easily into terms of human understanding or misunderstanding. The alien rebuffed, the relative of an American citizen sweating out a quota, the refugee languishing in camp—all belie the picture we try to create of America. The foreign observer whom we hope to win to our way of thinking is likely to tell us that what we do speaks so loudly, he cannot hear what we say.

When the restrictive immigration laws of 1924 were drawn up, with their provisions for Japanese exclusion, the Japanese Ambassador warned they would create resentment in that country. Japanese intellectuals, in particular, were sensitive to the implication of racial inferiority inherent in such legislation. Twenty-eight years later, after a brutal, bitter war, a number of experts informed the President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization that the exclusion clause had indeed contributed to the growth of anti-American feeling in Japan and helped create the climate leading to Pearl Harbor.

On the other hand, immigration policy can also be used as a positive instrument of foreign affairs. The absence of quotas within the Western Hemisphere is an invaluable adjunct to the good-neighbor policy.

Whether we identify immigration policy with foreign policy or not, our friends do—including some of our own partners in NATO, against whom we discriminate. And our enemies so identify it also. In 1948 a number of Italian Americans wrote to relatives in Italy, urging them to vote against the Communists, and describing the American way as the route to abundance. The Reds countered with propaganda blasts pointing out that the Americans were not very willing to share their abundance. In a recent Korean broadcast, Radio Moscow emphasized that the McCarran Act was based on the Nazi theory of racial superiority. It pointed out that a person born of a Japanese mother and a British father was held by the United States to be Japanese for immigration purposes, regardless of where he was born—and that this was true only for orientals.

Consider that the Asia-Pacific Triangle, as it is called, contains 50 percent of the world's population, and America 6 percent. Is it wise foreign policy for 6 percent to hold 50 percent in contempt?

NEEDED: A NEW LOOK AT IMMIGRATION POLICY

In recent years we have undertaken a new look in military policy. I suggest that we also need a new look in immigration policy. In the 84th Congress I introduced a bill to establish a sort of Hoover Commission on immigration and naturalization policy, and I still think some such unemotional, nonpolitical study is necessary. Our immigration laws have devolved into such a tangled mess that nobody quite knows what they are. Yet the inequities and preference quotas they perpetuate are a national disgrace and a handicap abroad.

There are some immediate remedies which could be applied. For instance, the quotas should be based on the 1950 census instead of the 1920 census. This would allow 65,000 more immigrants per year. But we also need immediate revision of the quota system itself—under which England's quota is never filled while that of Greece is mortgaged into the 21st century. These mortgages should be wiped out, and the unused quotas of one country should be available for redistribution to other countries.

With respect to the specific problem of refugees, I am introducing legislation to admit some 89,000 emergency immigration cases. They include wives and children of refugees already admitted under the Refugee Relief Act of 1953. They include a number of aliens who secured assurances of jobs and homes under that act but were caught in the squeeze when the act expired. There is also provision for 20,000 refugees and escapees from communism now residing in Austria and the NATO countries; 4,000 orphans and 5,000 refugees—Jews, Italians, and Greeks expelled from Egypt. I do not pose this as a solution to all the problems of immigration, but only as a quick answer to the most urgent needs. I still hope that Congress in the near future will reexamine our whole immigration policy to adapt it to our role of world leadership.

This new policy should not only amend the unreasoned restrictions of the present law, it should shape immigration to foreign policy. It should provide, for instance, for some measure of flexibility to take care of sudden developments like the expulsion of Jews from Egypt or the revolt in Hungary.

The executive branch, it is true, does have a legal measure of flexibility now in the parole provision; but this was not designed to take care of the kind of emergency situation I have in mind. It has been used only in the case of the Hungarian escapees, and the Attorney General has declined to apply it equally to the Middle East.

A new, enlightened policy of immigration need not throw open the floodgates to a wave of immigrants we could not absorb or would not want for some valid reason of national interest. But we must avoid what the Massachusetts poet John Boyle O'Reilly once called, "organized charity, scrimped and iced, in the name of a cautious, statistical Christ."

Our policy should be generous; it should be fair; it should be flexible. With such a policy we could take up the other problems of the world with clean hands and a clean conscience. And the lady in the harbor could hold up her head as well as her lamp.

OREGON ECONOMIC PROBLEMS—EDITORIAL BY SENATOR NEUBERGER FROM PORTLAND JOURNAL

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the Oregon Daily Journal in my home city of Portland has been performing a public service in presenting a wide range of viewpoints and opinions as to how the economic difficulties confronting the State of Oregon may best be corrected and resolved.

Many statistics—as well as actual hardship among numerous people—have demonstrated that Oregon has not been sharing in the so-called nationwide prosperity. For example, average incomes in Oregon were $202 higher than the national average during 1947, but $10 below the national average in 1956.

In keeping with other brief Senate speeches which I have made to call to the attention of my colleagues some of the Federal policies which are urgently needed by our State of Oregon, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a guest editorial which I contributed to the Oregon Daily Journal of August 24, 1957, as one of a series, on this vital topic. The title of this guest editorial is "Oregon Must Let Mind Be Bold, Seek Industries."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OREGON MUST LET MIND BE BOLD, SEEK INDUSTRIES

(By RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, U. S. Senator from Oregon)

Every American region heavily reliant on lumber has had to produce some new form of permanent payrolls to take up the slack in saw-timber employment. This happened in New England, in the lake States and in the South. It explains why, for the last 4 years, I have been talking and writing about the growing crisis confronting our State. It tells why average incomes in Oregon were $202 above the national average in 1947 but $10 below in 1956.

Let me emphasize that Oregon is not gripped by depression. The whole country still responds to the vast $44 billion which the Government is pumping into the economy for armaments. But Oregon is a long way from sharing in the nationwide boom.

I should like to describe some of the things which a number of us have been attempting to do about this grave and urgent situation:

The administration's tight-credit policy has choked off new housing starts. Oregon lumber is geared to the housing market. After all, a home buyer must pay $8,760 in interest alone if he purchases a $15,000 house at 5 percent. To try to stimulate housing production, I joined with nine other Senators in a bipartisan plea directly to the President to lower FHA downpayments. We also have opposed the constant increase in interest rates.

Pulp mills could assure greater stability of employment in timber communities. That is why I risked political criticism to urge, as early as 1955, that subalpine stumpage be made available for this purpose. In British Columbia, for example, lumber production has risen 38 percent since 1939, but pulp has soared 180 percent. I have asked the Forest Service to determine the feasibility of small, community-financed pulp plants. Its technicians have informed me that mills with a daily capacity as small as 25 tons might be operated successfully in Oregon.

Low-cost power is the key to payrolls. That explains why we have fought for projects like John Day, Hells Canyon, and the Canadian storage. I have favored Federal dams not for political reasons, but because the Bonneville industrial rate of 2.1 mills a kilowatt-hour has never been matched by private utilities. With modern steam plants generating for 3.5 mills in the Ohio Valley, how can 6-mill private power bring new factories to distant Oregon?

If we develop further supplies of low-cost Columbia River power, much of that energy should be used primarily to create new industrial payrolls. That is why I have introduced an amendment to the preference clause to give industry a higher priority than household use when new power comes on the line.

High freight rates are throttling our ability to sell Oregon goods and produce in the major markets of the East. We have introduced legislation to repeal the 3 percent Federal freight tax. We also are seeking abandonment of the Pittsburgh-plus system of ratemaking, which discourages processing of raw materials in the Western States.

Only a small segment of Oregon agriculture qualifies for Federal price-support payments. We have worked for the two-price plan for wheat, for broadening of Public Law 480 to sell surplus Oregon fruits and grain abroad, for including row crops in soil-bank benefits, and for a basin account to underwrite irrigation projects like that on the Crooked River with a portion of power revenues. This would help to give Oregon farmers a measure of equality with those who raise favored commodities such as corn or tobacco.

There are other avenues of encouragement too numerous to cite here. Oregon, I think, must heed the vigorous wisdom of Justices Holmes and Brandeis when together they wrote: "If we would guide by the light of reason, we must let the mind be bold."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate the message from the House of Representatives on Senate bill 2792.

In the administration of section 301 (b) of the Immigration and Nationality Act, absences from the United States of less than twelve months in the aggregate, during the period for which continuous physical presence in the United States is required, shall not be considered to break the continuity of such physical presence.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, this is the immigration bill, which recently was passed by the Senate. It is an important piece of legislation in which I am deeply interested, and to which I have given much time and attention.

I call the message to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], who has been handling the bill.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the amendments which the House added improve the bill. They are all of a technical and clarifying nature. All of them improve the bill. I believe that is the opinion also of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], the chairman of the committee.

I am hopeful that the Senate will concur in the House amendments. I so move.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR CALL OF THE CALENDAR TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order on tomorrow, after the morning business, at a time to be announced, to call up bills on the calendar which are cleared for action but which have not been called up by motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

INVESTIGATION OF ANTITRUST AND ANTIMONOPOLY LAWS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order No. 1095, Senate Resolution 166.

I will say to Senators, so far as I am aware, there will be no rollcalls tonight. If anything controversial comes up, I will ask that it go over until tomorrow. There are 8 or 10 bills we would like to call. We have had them cleared by the majority and the minority policy groups. If a controversy develops, I will ask that they go over until tomorrow. Any Senator who desires may retire from the Chamber. I thank them for their cooperation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 166) amending Senate Resolution 57, 85th Congress, authorizing an investigation of antitrust and antimonopoly laws and their administration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I should like to inform the Senate that this is a resolution to continue the investigation of antitrust and antimonopoly laws. The minority leader has approved taking up the resolution by motion. It was held up on the last calendar call. Since then a study of the resolution has been made, and it has been included for action. I hope the Senate will adopt it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 166) was agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That Senate Resolution 57, 85th Congress, agreed to January 30, 1957 (authorizing an investigation of antitrust and antimonopoly laws and their administration), is hereby amended by striking out "$225,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$275,000."

ELECTION OF TWO COUNTY COMMITTEES IN CERTAIN COUNTIES UNDER SOIL CONSERVATION AND DOMESTIC ALLOTMENT ACT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of Calendar No. 1063, H. R. 8508.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8508) to provide that there shall be two county committees elected under the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act for certain counties.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a brief explanation of the bill.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> The Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act provides for the election of one county committee in each county, to be utilized in administering that act and other agricultural programs. For many years, without any apparent authority, two county committees have been elected in each of the four counties named in the bill. Due to geographic location, number of farms, and other factors, other agricultural agencies and the county governments, as well as the committees here concerned, have operated two offices in each of these counties; and this method of administration has worked out very well. Recently it was brought to the attention of the Department that this method was not in accordance with law, and the State committees have now been notified that only one committee should be elected.
>
> This bill would provide for two county committees in each of the four counties and thereby maintain the existing arrangement, which is the result of a need for two offices and which has worked very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I have an amendment——

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask that the amendments be read?

Mr. BEALL. I ask the clerk to read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the committee amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, may we have order in the Chamber?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments will be stated.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, reserving the right to object to the consideration of the bill, and not knowing what the amendment——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask that the bill go over. I ask the Senator from Maryland to confer with the Senator from South Dakota to see if he can clear the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota subsequently said: Mr. President, I wish to say I had objected to the consideration of Calendar No. 882 for the reason that it dealt with the tariff. I had heard that there was a possibility that an amendment would be offered to put mica on the free list. I do not know whether that was a committee amendment or not. I understand the amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] referred to putting wool on the free list. I would have objected to the consideration if it meant putting wool on the free list. Therefore, I respectfully request that Order No. 882, dealing with the Tariff Act, not be passed on a consent call.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. We are not passing anything on the Consent Calendar. Bills are being called up by motion. The fact that the Senator from South Dakota wants time to study it is sufficient to have the bill go over. I ask that the bill go over so that the Senator from South Dakota may discuss it with the Senator from Maryland.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

INCREASE IN SALARIES OF CERTAIN EXECUTIVES OF THE ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1185, H. R. 8994.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8994 to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, to increase the salaries of certain executives of the Atomic Energy Commission, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] has a brief explanation to make of the bill.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, the bill has the unanimous approval of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. It passed the House of Representatives unanimously. It will equalize salaries of all officials and top executives of the Atomic Energy Commission with those of other executives in the executive branch and in the independent agencies.

I ask unanimous consent that I may include in the RECORD at this point a statement on the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JACKSON

The purpose of this bill, as set forth in the report of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy (S. Rept. No. 790) is to equalize the salaries of the Commissioners and top executives of the Atomic Energy Commission with those of other executives in the executive branch and in the independent agencies.

Last year Congress enacted the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956. That act raised the salaries of executives generally in the executive branch and in the independent agencies, and it is the purpose of this bill to provide equal treatment for the executives of the Atomic Energy Commission.

The background of this bill is set forth in the committee report, Senate Report No. 790.

Last year the Joint Committee unanimously recommended a salary bill for AEC executives, contingent upon passage of the Federal Executive Pay Act, but that act passed late in the session, and the AEC salary bill was not considered by the Congress. This year the Joint Committee again considered the question and has recommended unanimously this legislation to bring the AEC executives up to the same salary levels as those of other executives.

This bill raises the salary of the Chairman of the Commission from $20,000 per annum to $22,500 per annum, which is on the same level as the Under Secretary of State and the Deputy Secretary of Defense. Prior to the Federal Executive Pay Act of 1956, the Chairman of the Commission was on the same level with those other offices, but he is now receiving a lesser salary. The purpose of this bill is to equalize this situation.

Other salaries of AEC executives are raised as follows:

The other four Commissioners of the Atomic Energy Commission, from $18,000 to $22,000; the General Manager, who is the chief executive officer, from $20,000 to $22,000; the division directors from $16,000 to $19,000; and the General Counsel from $16,000 to $19,500. The bill also establishes the position of Deputy General Manager at a maximum salary of $20,500; three Assistant General Managers or their equivalent at maximum salary of $20,000; and a maximum of six other Executive Manager positions at a salary not to exceed $19,000 per annum.

Thus the bill affects only the Commissioners and top executives in the AEC. The Joint Committee has studied this bill carefully, and all of these increases are consistent with the provisions of the Federal Executive Pay Act as applicable to other agencies, and are only intended to provide fair and equal treatment to AEC executives.

The executives of the Atomic Energy Commission are responsible for administering our entire atomic-energy program for both military and peaceful purposes. Just last week, the Congress authorized and appropriated more than $2 billion to run this program during the next fiscal year. If we are to have a well-run program, I think it is important that we have good executives to direct that program. The total investment of the taxpayers of our country in atomic energy is now more than $17 billion.

Only this month Dr. Tom Johnson, Director of the Division of Research, left the AEC to go with private industry. I am sure that many other executives in the Commission have received similar attractive financial offers to leave the AEC and go with private industry.

Also, late this year or early in 1958 the Commission will move to a new headquarters building near Germantown, Md., about 30 miles outside of Washington, D. C. It is a real possibility that they will lose many of their employees, including some of the top executives. In order to try to prevent this loss, and to equalize the salaries of AEC executives with executives in other agencies of the Federal Government, I urge the Senate to enact S. 2672, in accordance with the unanimous recommendation of the members of the Joint Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONVEYANCE OF LAKE OR BAYOU TO CITY OF COUNCIL BLUFFS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs be discharged from further consideration of H. R. 8928, and that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8928) to amend the act of June 9, 1880, entitled "An act to grant to the corporate authorities of the city of Council Bluffs, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake or bayou situated near said city."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PURTELL. Mr. President, what is the calendar number?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is not on the calendar. The bill just came over from the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs is discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONTINUATION OF PROVISIONS OF TITLE II OF THE FIRST WAR POWERS ACT OF 1941

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1186, H. R. 7536. I announce that this will be the last bill we shall take up tonight.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7536) to amend the act of January 12, 1951, as amended, to continue in effect the provisions of title II of the First War Powers Act of 1941.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar 1186, H. R. 7539. It was a motion, not a unanimous consent request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, this bill has been unanimously approved by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is an essential bill. The act which it extends expired on the 30th of June 1957. The Defense Department needs an extension of the act, as set forth in the report. Otherwise, there would be large claims against the United States if this relief were not granted.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I wish to say the bill has been approved by the Calendar Committee, and I believe that every objection to and every question about the bill have been cleared.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the RECORD a statement explaining the bill, together with letters from various departments affected, setting forth their interpretations.

There being no objection, the statement and letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This bill extends authority first conferred upon the President by the Congress at the outset of World War II. It was reactivated during the Korean conflict. It is essentially emergency legislation which has survived the periods of its creation and re-creation. The authority which it confers has been redelegated by the President to several agencies of the Government, among them the Departments of Defense, Army, Navy, Air Force, commerce, Agriculture and Interior, the Atomic Energy Commission, the Government Printing Office, the General Services Administration, the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Federal Civil Defense Administrator, and the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics. Under this authority these executive departments and agencies are empowered to amend or modify Government contracts without additional consideration, where, for example, an actual or threatened loss on a defense contract will impair the productive capacity of a contractor whose continued existence is necessary to the national defense. Officials likewise may make advance payments on contracts to be executed in the future or to extend delivery or completion dates in certain cases. Mistakes and ambiguities in contracts may be rectified and indemnity payments may be guaranteed for otherwise noninsurable risks. Oral agreements may be formalized. These are certainly extraordinary powers and their extension at a time when the United States is not engaged in any conflict should be permitted only upon a detailed showing of their necessity. Time, and the press of other matters, however, has not permitted such a detailed examination. However, the committee has secured certain commitments from the principal departments and agencies engaged in the use of this authority with respect to its use. It has been agreed, for example, that it will not be used for the purpose of avoiding competitive bidding. It has also been agreed that it will not be used as authorization for the waiver of any bid, payment, performance, or other bonds required by law. It is further agreed that it would not be used as authorization for the making of any progress payments, nor for the formalization of any informal commitment except where exigencies of time have made immediate formalization of the agreement impracticable. It also has been agreed that this authority shall not be used to increase the contract price beyond the lowest competitve bid previously submitted where the competitive bids were disregarded and contracts entered into by negotiation. These commitments do not, by all means, cover all the adverse possibilities which are inherent in the continued extension of this authority. However, such adverse possibilities as remain must be balanced against the need of the departments of Government to make arrangements vital to the national defense in periods of international uncertainty.

The committee sought to bring as nearly into balance, as possible, in the time remaining, the needs of the executive departments and the necessity for protection against possible abuses of authority.

While I would have preferred to examine this authority in detail by full and complete hearings, I recognize, as did the committee, that such a procedure late in the Congressional session was simply not possible. Consequently, the committee has chosen this course of extending the authority with certain commitments as the best avenue remaining by which to accomplish the desired ends of both the Senate and the executive departments.

UNITED STATES
ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1957.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: In your letter of August 26, 1957, you explained that if the Senate Judiciary Committee reported H. R. 7536, a bill to extend title II of the First War Powers Act, with an amendment, the bill might not be enacted this year. You also stated that if the principal agencies exercising the authority granted by this act agreed to apply such authority only to contracts entered into on or before June 30, 1957, the committee would report the bill without amendment.

The proposed limitation on the application of this authority would have the effect of preventing the Commission from using the authority of title II of the First War Powers Act when entering into contracts after June 30, 1957; in amending or modifying such contracts; and in making advances under such contracts.

This authority has been exercised only in a limited number of situations by the Commission because of other special authority available to the Commission. For example, the President may, pursuant to section 162 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, exempt the Commission from the provisions of law relating to contracts when he has determined that such action is essential in the interest of the common defense and security. In addition, authority to make advance payments under many contracts is provided in the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, and additional authority to indemnify contractors against nuclear hazards is contained in H. R. 7383, which has been enacted by the Congress and sent to the President.

In view of the fact that the other authority mentioned above that is available to the Commission appears adequate for most of the contingencies that may arise, we have no objection to limiting the application of title II of the First War Powers Act as desired by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

The Bureau of the Budget has informed us that there is no objection to the submission of these comments.

Sincerely yours,
K. E. FIELDS.
General Manager.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY,
Knoxville, Tenn., August 27, 1957.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: This is to advise you in response to your letter of August 26, that in the event H. R. 7536, to extend the authority of title II of the First War Powers Act, is approved in the present session of Congress, the Tennessee Valley Authority will use the authority granted thereunder only with respect to contracts entered into on or before June 30, 1957.

Sincerely yours,
HERBERT D. VOGEL,
Chairman of the Board.

GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1957.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: Your letter of August 26, 1957, advised us that your committee had voted to report H. R. 7536, a bill to extend the authority of title II of the First War Powers Act, on condition that the principal departments and agencies to which this authority has been delegated would agree in writing to restrict their use of that authority.

If H. R. 7536 is passed, this agency will not use title II of the First War Powers Act as authority for (1) negotiating contracts in order to avoid competitive bidding; (2) making progress payments; (3) waiving performance, payment, bid, or other bonds; (4) entering into informal commitments to be finalized at a subsequent date, except when a transaction is of such extreme urgency that there is not time for preparation of the formal contract; or (5) amending without consideration contracts entered into by negotiation after rejection of all bids (under section 302 (c) (13) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949) so as to increase the contract price above the amount of the low bid received.

We will also be prepared to report to your committee at the next session of Congress concerning all contracts entered into pursuant to the authority provided in title II.

I hope that these commitments will be satisfactory, and that H. R. 7536 may be enacted before the adjournment of the Congress, as we consider it most important that the title II authority be available for use in a limited number of cases arising out of our defense activities.

Sincerely yours,
FRANKLIN G. FLOETE,
Administrator.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE
FOR AERONAUTICS,
Washington, D. C., August 27, 1957.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: In accordance with your letter dated August 26, 1957, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics agrees that the authority of title II of the First War Powers Act, delegated to NACA by Executive Orders No. 10210 and 10216, dated February 2, 1951, and February 23, 1951, respectively, will be applied only to contracts entered into on or before June 30, 1957.

The authority under title II was last used by NACA on July 30, 1956.

Sincerely yours,
J. F. VICTORY, Acting Director.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, August 27, 1957.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: This is in reference to your letter of August 26, regarding H. R. 7356, a bill to extend the authority of title II of the First War Powers Act and the committee's agreement to report this bill upon the express condition that the principal departments and agencies to whom this authority has been delegated agree in writing to apply such authority only to contracts entered into on or before June 30, 1957.

This Department agrees to apply the authority of title II of the First War Powers Act only to contracts entered into on or before June 30, 1957.

Sincerely yours,
E. T. BENSON, Secretary.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
PRINTING OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1957.
Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: Receipt is acknowledged of your August 26 letter concerning the action of the Committee on the Judiciary on H. R. 7536.

I have been hopeful that the War Powers Act would be extended allowing the Government Printing Office to negotiate contracts when and if necessary subject, of course, to the review of the Congressional Joint Committee on Printing which approves all of our contracts.

Our use of the authority was under stringent control and has been held to the barest minimum to meet needs of the Government which could not be otherwise satisfied.

We have no contracts in force on or before June 30, 1957, which would require an extension of the authority.

In view of the presentation made by you in your August 26 letter, we agree to not use the authority for contracting after June 30, 1957.

Very truly yours,
RAYMOND BLATTENBERGER,
Public Printer.

GENERAL COUNSEL,
DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
August 27, 1957.

Hon. JAMES O. EASTLAND,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR EASTLAND: This letter is written in reply to yours of August 26, 1957, with respect to H. R. 7536, in which you stated that your committee at its meeting August 26, 1957, agreed to report favorably H. R. 7536 upon certain conditions.

The Secretary of Defense has requested that I advise you that the Department of Defense undertakes that the military departments will not use title II of the First War Powers Act, if extended by H. R. 7536, as the authority for any of the following actions:

1. For negotiation of contracts without formal competitive bidding or for the elimination of formal advertising requirements in connection with the letting of contracts;
2. For authorizing the waiver of any bid, payment, performance, or other bonds required by other laws;
3. For authorizing the making of any progress payment;
4. For increasing (in case after rejection of all competitive bids a contract has been entered into by negotiation under the authority of 10 U. S. C. 2304 (a) (15)) the amount of the contract price in such a case to a figure higher than the lowest competitive bid among those rejected;
5. For the formalization of informal commitments made hereafter, except in the case where exigencies of time requirements make formalization at the time impracticable.

I am sure you understand that in making the above undertakings we do not mean to indicate that the Department of Defense has in fact been following these practices, but we understand the desire of your committee to have these positive assurances.

We greatly appreciate the willingness of your committee to consider this means of meeting the situation created by the imminent adjournment of Congress. We shall, of course, keep careful records of any use at all of the authority under title II in the event that H. R. 7536 is passed and shall be prepared to report to you fully at the next session of Congress as to such use.

We shall send you for the information of yourself and your associates a separate memorandum which will indicate some of the most important situations which occasionally arise and which can be dealt with in the interests of defense under title II but which otherwise may be impossible to meet under other authority.

Sincerely,
ROBERT DECHERT,
General Counsel, Department of Defense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE MATTERS PERTAINING TO GROWTH AND EXPANSION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 172) to establish a joint Congressional committee to investigate matters pertaining to the growth and expansion of the District of Columbia and its metropolitan area, which was, in line 3 of the Senate matter, strike out all after the word "Senate," and insert "to be appointed by the chairman of such committee, and three members of the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreement to the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO 9 A. M. TOMORROW

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its deliberations today it stand in adjournment until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am not making a motion. I am asking that the order be entered.

Mr. WATKINS. I hope the Senator will, because I would like to get home and get cleaned up. Why not make the hour 10 o'clock?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I may say to the Senator from Utah that when the Senate convenes at 9 o'clock, there will be a morning hour, and he may come in at his convenience.

Mr. WATKINS. There is certain proposed legislation in which I am interested, and which I should like to have taken care of.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The Senator from Utah always takes care of legislation he is interested in. I do not know of any Senator who does a better job in the Senate in doing that. When the Senate convenes there will be a prayer, then there will be a morning hour. The Senator from Utah rarely occupies much of the Senate's time in the morning hour. There will be a number of insertions in the RECORD, a number of brief speeches, some for world consumption, some for national consumption, and some for home consumption. By the time that is completed, the Senator from Utah may get here and join us, so we may complete our business and go home.

Mr. President, I will revise my request. The Senator from Utah has made a good suggestion. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns today, it adjourn to convene at 9 o'clock today. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LAND BY THE SECRETARY OF THE ARMY TO THE COUNTY OF LOS ANGELES, CALIF.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1135, H. R. 230. This is a very important bill and it concerns the State of California, from which the Vice President and the minority leader come, and I am vitally interested in it myself. I should like to have the minority leader give a brief explanation of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 230) to require the Secretary of the Army to convey to the county of Los Angeles, Calif., certain portions of a tract of land heretofore conditionally conveyed to such county.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, this bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on Armed Services. The purpose of the bill is to require the Secretary of the Army to convey to the county of Los Angeles, Calif., all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to certain portions of a tract of land heretofore conditionally conveyed to such county. This is one of a series of relinquishments of residual rights of the United States in portions of this property.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be offered, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

Mr. WATKINS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR RUSSELL

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, sometimes I make mistakes of which I never have knowledge, but when I do make them and have them called to my attention, I am always glad to correct them.

On Tuesday, August 27, I made a lapsus lingua which caused me to be rather critical of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. I found I was entirely at fault. I arise for the purpose of correcting my mistake and apologizing to the Senator from Illinois. In undertaking to withdraw a quorum call, which already had been withdrawn, I inadvertently said I asked to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays. It was purely a slip of the tongue. I was not undertaking to withdraw the yeas and nays, which had been requested by the Senator from California and sufficiently seconded. If I had been aware of the fact that I had made the error, I certainly should not have spoken in the same sharpness to my distinguished friend from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RUSSELL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The statement of the Senator is only further testimony of the graciousness, spirit of fairness, and the honorable dealing of my distinguished friend from Georgia. I am deeply grateful to him.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not deserve the compliment.

MARTIN WUNDERLICH CO.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1187, H. R. 2654, a bill for the relief of the Martin Wunderlich Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 2654) for the relief of the Martin Wunderlich Co.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement of purpose of the bill.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The purpose of the proposed legislation is to pay the Martin Wunderlich Co., a partnership, of Omaha, Nebr., the sum of $111.539.59 in full settlement of all claims against the United States arising out of the company's contract with the Bureau of Reclamation for the construction of the Vallecito Dam on the Pine River in Colorado.

It is understood that this sum is not to be added to the costs allocable to water users, in accordance with the desires of the Department of Interior.

The Martin Wunderlich Co., a partnership, entered into a contract with the Bureau of Reclamation on March 14, 1938, for the construction of the Vallecito Dam on the Pine River in Colorado and completed this work to the satisfaction of the Bureau in 1941. During performance various disputes arose, the principal one concerning the amount of equitable adjustment due on acount of a change under the contract known as change order No. 3. The contracting officer and, on appeal, the Department head, allowed an increase of $44,208.85 on account of the said change.

The contract contained an article which provided that all disputes involving questions of fact were to be decided by the contracting officer with a right of appeal to the head of the Department whose decision was stated to be final and conclusive upon the parties. The language of that article was as follows:

"Article 15. Disputes: Except as otherwise specifically provided in this contract, all disputes concerning questions of fact arising under this contract shall be decided by the contracting officer subject to written appeal by the contractor within 30 days to the head of the Department concerned or his duly authorized representative, whose decision shall be final and conclusive upon the parties thereto. In the meantime the contractor shall diligently proceed with the work as directed."

The company would not accept this amount because it would not reimburse the company for its costs. (Ultimately the claimant did accept that amount when it was clear that acceptance would not prejudice its claim for a larger amount awarded it in a Court of Claims judgment.)

The case was promptly filed in the Court of Claims which held that the decision of the contract officer and the head of the Department was arbitrary, capricious, and grossly erroneous. Thus it was found that the Wunderlich claim was soundly based and in its judgment entered on June 5, 1950, the Court of Claims ruled that the plaintiff was entitled to recover $164,760.83 on the contested claim and $7,541.40 on the uncontested claim. The Government appealed to the Supreme Court which granted certiorari, and on November 26, 1951, reversed the decision of the Court of Claims, not upon the merits of the claim but upon the ground that the ruling of the Department could not be rejected "in the absence of fraud or such gross mistake as would necessarily imply bad faith, or a failure to exercise an honest judgment."

The issue, therefore, is whether the Wunderlich claimant should be denied its extra costs because, although the Court of Claims held that the action of the Department was "arbitrary, capricious, and grossly erroneous" it was not asserted to be fraudulent or in bad faith. This committee is of the opinion that in these circumstances, since Congress promptly amended the law so as to eliminate fraud or bad faith as a necessary element in a claim for an award, the effect upon the claimant is unduly harsh.

Shortly after the Supreme Court rendered its decision in 1951, several bills were introduced in both Houses of Congress to overcome the effect of the decision and cure the manifestly unjust situation. One bill, S. 2487, passed the Senate during the 82d Congress, but reached the House too late for action during that session. During the 83d Congress S. 24 was passed by both Houses and became Public Law 356. This law restored the earlier standards of judicial review, and permits the Court of Claims to set aside administrative decisions on the ground of fraud, including arbitrary or capricious action, and requires that administrative decisions must also be supported by substantial evidence. In the report of the House committee on S. 24, House Report 1380, 83d Congress, second session, the following observation was made concerning the need for corrective legislation:

"After extensive hearings it has been concluded that it is neither to the interests of the Government nor to the interests of any of the industry groups that are engaged in the performance of Government contracts to repose in Government officials such unbridled power of finally determining either disputed questions of law or disputed questions of fact arising under Government contracts, nor is the situation presently created by the Wunderlich decision consonant with tradition that everyone should have his day in court and that contracts should be mutually enforceable."

In the majority opinion of the Supreme Court reversing the decision of the Court of Claims in the Wunderlich case it was stated that "if the standard of fraud that we adhere to is too limited, that is a matter for Congress."

It is, therefore, apparent that the Supreme Court was well aware of the inflexibility of the narrowness of the grounds for review which were fixed by its decision.

It is contended that the Wunderlich Co. should not be entitled to the relief which H. R. 3274 asks, for the reason that its case has been finally disposed of by the decision of the Supreme Court in reversing the findings of the Court of Claims in its favor, prior to the passage of Public Law 356, which was approved on May 11, 1954 (68 Stat. 81); and further, because this law covered only "any suit now filed or to be filed."

It is noted that inasmuch as the language of Public Law 356 reads exactly upon the decision reached by the Court of Claims in the Wunderlich case, the claimant's problem falls squarely within that area of difficulty which the said public law sought to remedy.

In the aforementioned House report on S. 24, the House committee states:

"Many of the contracts upon which present disputes are pending were entered into prior to the time that the Wunderlich case was decided, and at a time when the persons involved therein understood that judicial review was available to them on a less restricted basis than that of fraud. The committee believes that all such persons should receive the protection which would be afforded by this proposed legislation, but it does not believe that it would be practicable to reopen cases which have heretofore been decided by the courts."

The reason for this limitation against retroactivity was apparently based upon the fear that if the bill were made retroactive it would bring about a flood of cases. The attorneys who represented the Wunderlich Co. in the courts testified at hearings held in connection with Public Law 356 but made no attempt to have the bill made retroactive so as to apply to the Wunderlich claim. Specifically, one of the attorneys testified that he was aware that the proposed legislation would not apply to the Wunderlich Co. and stated "I think possibly Mr. Wunderlich should ask for specific relief later."

The committee notes that in the legislative history of S. 24, the House committee struck all after the enacting clause and rewrote the bill, specifically using the language "any suit now filed or to be filed." The committee further notes that the House Judiciary Committee has, in this session of Congress, approved this and one other bill directly relating to the circumstances disclosed in the Wunderlich decision, and two other bills indirectly bearing upon this decision. The committee draws the following conclusions from this situation: (1) that although the House committee originally insisted upon having no retroactive provision in Public Law 356, that the House committee now feels that the equities involved in these cases are sufficient to warrant private relief; (2) the fear, that passage of S. 24 with a retroactive provision would bring about a large number of like claims, was groundless, in view of the limited number of private claim bills of this type filed in this and the preceding Congresses.

The Department of the Interior is opposed to the enactment of this bill unless the Congress decides first that the standards laid down by Public Law 356 shall be applied in a case which had been finally adjudicated before it became law, and, secondly, that those standards, including the burden of proof which they impliedly require a claimant to bear, are met in this case.

The Department of Justice is opposed to the enactment of this bill.

The amount of this claim is for the moneys determined by the Court of Claims to be due the claimant less the money which the claimant has already received from the Government.

After careful consideration of the foregoing facts, particularly in view of the fact that the Court of Claims found the moneys to be due the claimant on the precise grounds set out in Public Law 356, and further in view of the obvious inequity of this situation with regard to the claimant and the very limited number of other persons similarly situated, the committee recommends that this bill be favorably considered.

Attached hereto and made a part hereof is the report of the Department of the Interior, the Justice Department, House Report No. 1380, of the 83d Congress, and other pertinent material.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill (H. R. 2654) was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Texas to reconsider.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

LEASING OF SPACE FOR FEDERAL AGENCIES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 1180, S. 2533.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2533) to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, to authorize the Administrator of General Services to lease space for Federal agencies for periods not exceeding 15 years, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I desire to have this bill the unfinished business. We shall not act on it tonight. We shall call the calendar tomorrow and attempt to clear up all bills on it.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO INCREASE ANNUITIES FOR CIVIL SERVICE RETIREES AND WIDOWS

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, there is pending on the Senate Calendar proposed legislation to provide an increase in the annuities for our civil-service retirees and their widows. Proposed legislation is also pending on the House side, and though not as liberal as the proposed legislation reported out by the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee, would grant a 10-percent increase.

I strongly urge that action be taken to bring one or the other of the measures up for consideration, for I sincerely hope to be able to vote for an increase in benefits for those deserving senior citizens before the session ends.

We in the Congress have, in my opinion, a moral responsibility to these retirees who have spent the best part of their lives faithfully serving their Government. We know that they purchased their annuities with 100-cent dollars and that they are now being paid back in dollars which have decreased to 49 cents in value. Today many of them are finding it difficult to even exist due to the high cost of living. They were the victims of galloping inflation, and continue to be the victims of creeping inflation. Now, in their advanced years, many of them are sick and disabled and look to the Government which they have served well to render justice in the twilight years of their lives.

The economic plight in which many of these retirees now find themselves is a desperate one indeed. It is one which we in the Congress cannot and should not ignore. I am hopeful, therefore, that there is yet time to work out the parliamentary situation so that this Congress can adjourn sine die with a feeling of satisfaction and comfort that justice has been done to this deserving class of our citizens.

SUMMARY OF PROGRESS MADE IN HEARINGS BY SUBCOMMITTEE ON ANTITRUST AND MONOPOLY

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I wish to make at this time a limited summary of the progress made in the hearings on the steel industry which have been conducted by the Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly. At the very outset I wish to make it clear that what I have to say here represents my own personal interpretation and is not in the nature of a committee report, which will come later when the hearings on the steel industry have been completed. Owing to the press of business in the closing days of this session, it has not been possible for us to fulfill our original objective, which was to complete the hearings on the steel industry before Congress adjourned. It is our intention to resume the hearings some time early in October. Following the completion of our hearings on the steel industry it is our intention to make an inquiry into administered prices in the farm machinery industry.

In our hearings on the steel industry we have been concerned with three principal issues:

First. What is the cost of the recent price increases?

Second. Have these price increases exceeded the wage increase?

Third. How effective is competition in the steel industry in protecting the public interest?

As to the first, it is important to distinguish between the cost of the price increase to the steel-consuming industries from the ultimate cost to the consumer. The representative of the United Steelworkers Union pointed out that by the time an increase in the price of steel reaches the consumer in the form of consumer goods, it has been pyramided by the markups of successive manufacturers and distributors so that the ultimate cost to the consumer is substantially greater than the immediate cost to steel buyers.

But leaving this consideration aside, we have made a detailed, product-by-product, market-by-market tabulation of just the cost of the price increase to direct buyers of steel. To put it another way, this represents the increased gross revenue received by the steel industry as a result of the price increase. Our estimate of the annual cost of the $6-a-ton increase in the price of carbon steel on July 1 of this year is $460 million. This is an underestimate, however, since it does not include alloy steel—which was also increased in price—or tinplate—which had its price increased 2 months earlier. When allowance is made for alloy steel and tinplate, the total is increased to $540 million.

But this estimate is limited to the price increase occurring last month. There have been other price increases in the steel industry during the last 12 months. In August 1956, following the strike, the price was increased by $8.50 a ton. Then throughout the year there has been a series of increases in the so-called extras, which are charges for particular specifications as to size, dimensions, quality, and so forth. In its issue of July 8 of this year, the trade journal, Steel, estimated that the cost of these increases during the period December 1956 to March 1957, together with a few increases in base prices amounted to an average of $5 a ton. Thus, if we add to the $6 increase of last July, the $8.50 increase of the previous August and this $5 increase in extras, we arrive at a total average increase in the price of steel during the last 12 months of $19.50 a ton. If a $6-a-ton increase represents an increase in total costs to steel buyers of around $500 million, a price increase of $19.50 means a total increased cost of $1.6 billion. Inasmuch as the United States Steel Corp. accounts for approximately 30 percent of the industry, its increased revenues as a result of these price increases should be in the neighborhood of $500 million per year.

The arithmetic employed by both the United States Steel Corp. and the United Steelworkers Union is extremely simple. What is involved is a multiplication of the number of man-hours required to produce a ton of finished steel times the amount by which wages per man-hour were increased under the provisions of the second year of the wage contract. As to the former, three separate methods of estimation all arrive at roughly the same figure of around 15½ man-hours per ton of finished steel for the first half of 1957. These estimates are based upon figures issued by the American Iron and Steel Institute or supplied by the corporation itself. However, there is substantial disagreement on the other factor, the amount of the wage increase per man-hour. United States Steel holds that the figure is 21 cents; the union that it is only 16.4 cents. When each is multiplied by the factor of 15.5 man-hours per ton of finished steel, the increase in costs range from $3.25 per ton—according to the company's wage estimate—to $2.54 per ton—according to the union's estimate.

But whether one uses the steel company's estimate or that of the union, it is obvious that there is a substantial gap between the $6 price increase and the amount by which its wage costs were increased—the gap ranging from $2.75 to $3.50 per ton.

United States Steel contends that in addition to the wage increase, increases in prices were also necessitated by increases in materials, equipment and services which it has to purchase. This the union questions, pointing to the recent decreases in the price of steel scrap and other materials used by the steel industry.

This whole matter of costs and prices requires further investigation. But at this point I wish to make it clear that the extent to which the subcommittee will be able to get at the facts is limited by the refusal of the United States Steel Corp. to provide the subcommittee with its unit cost figures, broken down into materials, labor and the other principal elements of costs. Even though the subcommittee offered to combine these figures with those of other firms so that there would be no disclosure of any single firm, United States Steel persisted in its refusal.

The conclusion that the price increase of July 1957 is substantially in excess of the increase in costs resulting from the wage increase is supported by an analysis of what happened after the price increase of last year, as reflected in profit rates for the first half of this year. Charts were put into the record which indicate that the rate of profit on stockholders' investments, after taxes, for the first 6 months of 1957 was substantially above the levels that would have been anticipated on the basis of the historical relationship between percent of capacity operated and rate of profit. This was true of both the industry as a whole and the United States Steel Corporation alone. These showings strongly suggest that the increase in price following the wage settlement in August 1956 was substantially greater than the increase in costs.

The third and perhaps the most important question of concern to the subcommittee is whether competition in the steel industry is sufficiently effective to constitute an adequate protector of the public interest. The evidence which we have received on this issue bears on concentration and price identity. With respect to the former, the evidence indicates that not only is the steel industry highly concentrated but that the level of concentration has been rising during recent years. Between 1947 and 1954 the four largest companies increased their share of value added by manufacture from 50 to 55 percent in the blast furnace, steel works and rolling mills industry. Perhaps of even greater significance is the commanding position which United States Steel holds among the largest companies. Of the 33 steel products for which total capacity exceeds 500,000 tons, United States Steel has the largest capacity for 25 and the second largest capacity for 6. United States Steel has more than 40 percent of the capacity for 10 products, and more than 30 percent for 17. Moreover, there are 13 products for which United States Steel has both 33 percent or more of the total industry capacity and a lead of at least 10 percentage points over its nearest rival.

As to price identity, evidence was put into the record showing that the price increases made by the other major producers following the lead of United States Steel on July 1, 1957, were, with few exceptions, exactly the same as the increase by United States Steel.

In addition, the record includes instances of identical bidding in which United States Steel and at least one other major steel producer quoted prices to a Government purchasing agency which were precisely identical. For example, on November 19, 1954, the Springfield Armory at Springfield, Mass., opened bids on alloy steel bars, general purpose. One of the items for which bids were requested bore these specifications: alloy steel bars, FS-8620, HR, as rolled 7/16-inch diameter resulph. .035-.050 grain size 5-8ASTM, shall cold shear without cracking, in 10-12-foot lengths. Pricing on a delivered basis, that is, all transportation charges prepaid to destination—Springfield Armory—the bid of United States Steel per pound was 0.09305 cent. The bid of Bethlehem Steel was 0.09305 cent per pound.

When asked to explain how these identical bids occurred, Mr. Roger Blough, chairman of the board of United States Steel, replied:

> My concept is that a price that matches another price is a competitive price. If you don't choose to accept that concept, then, of course, you don't accept it. In the steel industry we know it is so.

Referring to a city where the price of a certain steel product was $5 a ton higher than the price of United States Steel, Mr. Blough stated:

> I would say that the buyer * * * in that situation has this choice. He chooses to buy from one company at $5 higher. He chooses to buy from our company at $5 lower. Now if you call that competition and a desirable form of competition, you may have it your way. I say that the buyer has more choice when the other's fellow's price matches our price" (tr., p. 778).

On this question of competition in the steel industry, the central fact is that when United States Steel raises its price, it does so with the almost certain knowledge, based on years of experience, that its so-called competitors will make the same increase. This raises the further question of whether there is any conceivable increase that United States Steel might put into effect which the other producers would not follow. And, if so, how much is it? How high can United States Steel raise its price and be reasonably certain that the other producers will follow along with identical increases?

During the investigation of the steel industry conducted by the Temporary National Economic Committee under the chairmanship of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], Mr. Eugene Grace, the longtime president of the Bethlehem Steel Corp. was asked, "Do you remember any instances where you didn't follow them—United States Steel—up?" Mr. Grace's answer was "No"—hearings before the TNEC, 76th Congress, 2d session, page 10603.

It is this issue of price leadership by United States Steel to which the subcommittee will devote its principal attention when hearings are resumed in October, at which time the first witness will be the Bethlehem Steel Corp.

In closing, I want to say that the hearings have thus far evoked a widespread response from people throughout the country. Letters have been received from persons in all walks of life—housewives, retired people on pensions, farmers, small businessmen, lawyers, members of the clergy, doctors, professors, schoolteachers, and others. They represent a virtual cross-section of the American populace at the grassroots level.

The majority of these letters are handwritten, and range from angry denunciations of the steel industry to reasoned refutations of its principal arguments. Many contain a moral overtone to the effect that it is simply not right for the managers of big business to raise their prices when by so doing they work such hardship on so many people. There is displayed here a mood and a sense of injustice which corporate managers will do well not to ignore when they are considering the extent of their next price increase.

With the thought that the views which they express might be of general interest to the various committees of Congress that are struggling to cope with this problem of inflation, I now ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD excerpts from a more or less representative group of these letters.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From Mr. John S. Campbell, Slater, Mo.:

"Chairman Blough says that you do not understand competitive enterprise and it must be a deep dark mystery. Ask him if he understands why United States Steel stocks are selling for 10 times the 1947 price, while No. 2 corn in Chicago is selling for two-thirds of the 1947 price. Ask him why farmers who produce 60 percent of the Nation's raw material are receiving less than 4 percent of the national income. Ask him what part of the remaining 40 percent is pig iron. There is much about competitive enterprise that the American consumer cannot understand."

From Mr. Fred Sondheim, Forest Hills, Long Island:

"United States Steel has split 6 for 1 in the last 10 years so that the old stock, which used to sell at 100 is equal to 420 at present price of 70. The per share earnings which were $5 to $8 per share on the old stock, are now at the rate of $36 to $40 per share on the old basis. In view of this terrific success, why must United States Steel raise prices continually? Surely they have beat the inflation, better than most of us."

From Dr. Arthur A. Calix, Decatur, Ala.:

"Thank you very much for instigating an investigation of the new price hike in steel prices. We cannot stand any more shrinkage of our dollar."

From Mr. I. Kremen, Palo Alto, Calif.:

"I applaud the intention of the Senate Anti-Monopoly Subcommittee to investigate the recent price increases instituted by the steel industry. I feel this investigation might also well be extended to other industries where, in my opinion, conditions approaching monopoly exist. These lead to suppression of competition and unwarranted and inflationary price increases.

"I feel the dangers of inflation are reaching the critical point and are a serious menace to our country. It seems to me that the causes of inflation are threefold: (1) excessive pricing by some business (2) excessive Federal spending (3) annual wage demands by labor.

"I wish your committee godspeed and good luck in your endeavors."

From Dean Fred J. Holly, department of economics, University of Tennessee, Knoxville, Tenn.:

"I hope that you will give some emphasis in your investigation of the steel industry to the use of 'plow-backs' for financing expansions. As you know, the steel industry uses plow-backs to the almost complete exclusion of external capital sources. Then, the industry stresses the need for price increases to permit further increases in earnings for plow-back purpose. This is a far cry from the theoretical workings of a private enterprise economy. It should be a fruitful field for investigation."

From Mr. H. H. McIntyre, Billings, Mont:

"Just a word to thank you for the excellent work you are doing in your investigation in connection with the terrible inflation we are all experiencing.

* * * * *

"I firmly believe in this highly mechanized age where we are all dependent on the products of steel, that the price of steel alone can materially affect the cost of nearly everything that we use. If this industry could be thoroughly investigated and made to show exactly where they are rigging prices, and such prices could be adjusted properly, we could all get along much better.

"I might cite for example a few years back when the average man made $10 a day, he could buy a very good car for $1,000. All right now that same man makes $20 per day, so he should be able to buy a good car for $2,000, but such is not the case, he must pay at least $3,000 and to buy the same quality he used to buy for $1,000, he must pay $4,000. This difference is too much and I firmly believe if properly investigated, they cannot prove to anyone's satisfaction where it is going except into excessive profits, labor and taxes notwithstanding."

From Mr. Logan B. English, Paris, Ky.:

"Allow me to voice my unreserved approval of the proposed investigation of the steel price raise. I know nothing of the ramifications of the causes and effects attending this hike. But I have a very definite feeling that there is a lot in this matter that is unspeakably reprehensible. Mr. Hood as a representative of United States Steel, has shown a scornful disregard of the President's courteous but urgent request that both management and unions assist in halting inflation. Apparently Mr. Hood has not only done nothing, and intends doing nothing, to help in this matter but will show a callous unconcern in the future of the catastrophic consequences most certainly precipitated. By accepting a hugh salary for himself * * * and for his many fellow executives he has inspired and encouraged the union to come and get 'its take.' * * * I am toughly committed to free enterprise but when management of any sort whatsoever uses free enterprise as a license to injure and jeopardize our whole economy I feel that something very decisive needs to be done.

"Mr. KEFAUVER, I am just a dirt farmer. I have done all right until the last 3 years of these 25 years. Even now we can stand the low prices we get for our products. But we cannot stand these spiraling costs together with low prices. In this respect conditions are worsening rather than improving. What is happening to the farmer most surely will happen to every segment of our economy as grass roots troubles gradually creep through and up our national welfare. So I want to wish you Godspeed as you undertake this difficult job in our national interest."

From Mr. H. A. Lomax, Jr., Orlando, Fla.:

"In your forthcoming investigation of the steel industry I hope you let the chips fall where they may and give them hell. The steel industry deserves a good investigation as they are flagrantly disregarding the public good and feeding the fires of inflation. This last $6 a ton raise was unnecessary. I hope you recommend wage and price controls.

"We the public (not the union members) are being viciously squeezed between higher prices and higher taxes. I hope you have the backbone to recommend price and wage controls for a period of time until we can stabilize inflation."

From Mr. A. W. Owens, Sr., Rock Hall, Md.:

"You will remember the I. G. Farben cartel that through secret agreements set prices that robbed the people. This is just what the steel companies and oil interests are doing to the Nation today. I am convinced there is collusion and secret agreement in the steel industry and also the oil companies.

"These companies have defied the Government, as witness a short time ago when the Government would not allow a quick writeoff for expansion, they said, if no quick writeoff we will raise the price of steel. Which they did.

"I also think there is collusion between these companies and labor. Labor has defied the antitrust laws."

From Mr. Joseph A. Kondash, Madison, N. J.:

"It was with great interest * * * to discover that the Senate Antimonopoly Committee is considering investigating price fixing and price rigging in the steel industry. Such a timely action is in the public interest and cannot be called partisan in nature since it was only a matter of a few days previous thereto that President Eisenhower had asked business to curb prices to stall any inflationary trend. Said action on the part of United States Steel discloses the monopolistic and dictatorial strata upon which such mammoth corporations operate in utter disregard for the public welfare and demonstrates a purely selfish interest of nest-feathering, in my opinion.

* * * * *

"Come what may, the monopolistic tendencies and mergers that have been taking place must be curbed and large industries must be forced, if they do not acquiesce, to allow competition, whether the industry be heavy or light, large in size or small."

From Mr. R. R. White, Detroit, Mich.:

"Note with interest you are going to investigate steel and copper. It's surely not only high time to investigate, but also to do something definite about it.

"Whenever there is a price change, firms are all the same to a fraction of a cent, and companies cannot guess identical prices."

From Mr. R. V. Zahner, Sewickley, Pa.:

"Though not in the habit of letter writing, I can't resist sending you a note of thanks for what you are doing for the millions in my state of life in investigating the arbitrary and needless increases in the cost of commodities and utilities such as metals, oils, natural gas, etc.

* * * * *

"From such of Blough's remarks as have reached the papers, either he never took any economics courses higher than grammar school, or thinks the public never did. Has he no conception of the vast ramifications of his business, not only with respect to consumers' goods, but also how it affects the cost of capital goods, new plants, etc., in every other industry, hence pyramids and doubles back into consumer prices almost ad infinitum, and is he really naive enough to think that we poor installment buyers will pay only the ton rate of increase for each ounce of steel that is in our paltry purchases?"

From the Reverend Hinson V. Howlett, South Dartmouth, Mass.:

"A release from President Walter P. Reuther, of the UAW, tells of deep satisfaction concerning your plans and those of your Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, to investigate 'price increases in "administered price" industries' including 'petroleum, steel, newsprint, many types of food, automobiles, and farm machinery.'

"Let us, too, rejoice.

"We are grateful for this promised undertaking, that, in our judgment, is so timely. And, we are grateful to President Reuther, and the UAW, for having us on the mailing list—and sending us the glad tidings.

"Would you be so kind as to have your office put us on the mailing list for any releases on the progress of the investigation, and copies of the proceedings of the hearings? (We shall always be grateful to you for the material on the juvenile delinquency investigations.) We should, also, be grateful for references to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, where there are speeches that you have made concerning this 'price investigation,' or speeches by others, and any account of the progress of the undertaking.

"Glad that you are so good as to represent so many of us in the Congress, outside of your immediate constituency."

From Mr. Wayne Ulbrecht, Rockford, Ill.:

"Read where you are checking price fixing. Thank God, it's about time someone started checking those companies to protect the buying public.

* * * * *

"Price fixing is all over. Just get someone to start enforcing the law."

From Miss Agnes Morris, Portland, Oreg.:

"Just last week I heard that you are the chairman of the committee to investigate means of halting this inflation. It is heartening that, at least, there is a beginning to attack this destroyer of our economic status.

"Here is the personal angle which we are facing, namely the pensioners and fixed-income groups. We are getting panicky when we shop for food. Here in a Nation where there is surplus, some people do not have enough of proper foods to eat. For no reason at all, except greed, prices rise from anywhere from a cent to 5 and 10 cents on an article. Is this reasonable and patriotic?

* * * * *

"Please do something."

From Mr. Harold Kumm, Vienna, Va.:

"I notice that you intend to look into the operation of administered price industries. In this connection, I believe that you would find a most interesting example in the conduct of the ——— company and its so-called competitors.

* * * * *

"But what does this company do when the President asks industry and labor to hold the price line? Their contribution is a price increase of 14 percent in the price of their leading product.

"This price increase is not presented openly. It is brought about by packing 2 pounds and 10 ounces in a 3-pound box. The price remains the same, but the amount is reduced. This device offers great success with the unwary. This was illustrated yesterday when we asked some friends whether they had noticed the change in weight. They had not. They certainly were surprised when they dug out some of the old boxes and compared them with the new and found that the weight had been changed."

From Mr. Alex Staber, Braddock, Pa:

"I'm sure you have many facts and much information to show that the steel companies continue to increase their profits by constantly increasing the price of steel.

"I am including some information about the cost of producing steel that may have been overlooked by your committee. I am referring to the price of the scrap that is used in making steel.

"At the present moment the price of scrap is between $10 and $20 less a ton than it was a year ago.

"It has been stated that the steel industry would use 40,000,000 tons of scrap in 1957. Of this amount the steel industry itself would return 40 to 50 percent of that amount from its own operations. But the other 20,000,000 tons bought at a saving of at least $10 a ton compared to 1956 would be an extra profit of at least $200,000,000.

"In addition the steel process uses large amounts of copper and aluminum. Copper a year ago was somewhere in the neighborhood of 45 cents a pound and today it is 28 cents a pound. The price of aluminum has also dropped.

"Despite these drops in the price of its raw materials the price of steel has not been cut.

"I am sure your committee can produce excellent results in proving that the steel companies contribute immensely to the inflation through their terrific profits."

From Miss Mary Boyd Ayer, Coronado, Calif.:

"Locally, prices increased immediately after it was announced that the price of steel was going to increase; no one waits until after the price of steel increases to raise prices.

* * * * *

"The steel representative appears to distort the truth as much as Hitler and the Russian leaders. I know what steel has done to inflation and have been personally affected by it since the early 1940's and steel prices have cause my savings to dwindle in value. Naturally the steel representatives would seek to justify his prices.

"Everyone knows that we have another round of inflation ever time there is an increase in steel prices; the steel representative knows it.

"Inflation is a disease, and price raising has become a habit. When is it going to stop?"

From Dr. Robert W. Rosen, market research director of Metalworking magazine:

"Enclosed is a special analysis of the relation between steel wage and price increases which would be of interest to you and Mr. Blair.

"Analysis of the data published by industry spokesmen clearly indicates that—

"1. Rising labor costs exerted only a modest upward push on steel prices;

"2. Increases in steel prices between 1940 and 1956 were 3.6 times larger than that required to cover wage increases;

"3. Labor has benefited far less from price increases than have other factors of production."

From Rabbi Elihu Kasten, Oceanside, N. Y.:

"My warmest congratulations to you on the pertinent facts your committee has revealed.

"I thought you would be interested in the enclosed which has been sent to all clergymen and religious institutions."

(NOTE.—The enclosure to which he refers is a printed copy of Mr. Roger Blough's opening statement to the subcommittee, sent out over the name of Phelps A. Adams, executive director, public relations department, United States Steel Corp.)

INFLATIONARY PRESSURES

Mr. MARTIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, in the course of his testimony during the recent hearings before the Finance Committee, William McChesney Martin, Jr., Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, made a statement which I think deserves the serious attention of every American.

Mr. Martin stated:

> We must never forget that the worst kind of slavery is the slavery under borrowed money.

At this point the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], observed:

> You have just made one of the wisest statements I have ever heard.

Mr. President, I am in complete agreement with the statement of Mr. Martin and the comment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

Excessive debt is one of the great dangers confronting our Nation, whether contracted by individuals, corporations, or Government. Debt is particularly damaging to Government. Money borrowed by individuals or corporations for investment in the expansion of productive capacity under private enterprise can earn money, but borrowing to support government spending is lost, so far as earning power is concerned. In addition, governmental debt increases the inflationary pressures which threaten our economic stability.

We are all aware that inflation is sweeping the world. It is stimulated when people feel that their medium of exchange will be lower in value in the future than at present, and that they had better convert their money into articles they can use.

A table prepared by U. S. News & World Report shows the drop in purchasing power of money from 1947 to 1957, in various countries of the world. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed, at this point, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Drop in purchasing power of money from 1947 to 1957

Mr. MARTIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a share of the blame for the current inflation can be placed on the great expansion that has taken place in the money supply, particularly in the 16 years since 1940.

On June 30, 1892, the money supply per capita was $59.32. At that time currency outside of banks was about 40 percent of the total money supply. Forty years later, or June 30, 1932, the per capita money supply was $161.99, but the currency outside of banks was only 30 percent of the total money supply. On June 29, 1940, the money supply per capita was $292.61, but the currency outside of banks was only about 20 percent of the total money supply. On June 30, 1956, the per capita money supply was $791.40. The demand deposits in 16 years had risen from $31 billion to $104 billion and the currency outside of banks had risen from $6,699,000,000 to $28,284,000,000. The per capita supply of dollars had increased more in 16 years than in the 38 years preceding 1940.

Mr. President, the figures I have given appear in a table furnished by the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and I ask unanimous consent that this table be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MARTIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, right now we should be using everything within our means to check the inflationary spiral. Inflation can destroy the strongest government. It inflicts, severe hardship upon everyone who has savings or a fixed income.

In a recent issue of my hometown newspaper, the Washington, Pa., Observer, there was published a fine editorial entitled "Only This Nation Can End Inflation." I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the body of the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONLY THIS NATION CAN END INFLATION

The dispute over inflation grows with every rise in the price of products.

Just now officials of big steel companies are defending their price increases as necessary and compelled by wage increases.

Labor and some other agencies dispute the claim, saying that the raises are not justified to their full extent by increased costs due to wage increases, or that they are not justified for the reason that the increased wages are balanced by increased production.

Robert C. Tyson, chairman of the finance committee of United States Steel, rejects arguments that the company's profits are big enough to absorb increased costs. He says:

"The records of United States Steel cumulatively and convincingly show that as long as nationwide wage inflation continued at rates exceeding the increases in productivity, price inflation will be compelled."

The public's interest is not so much whether price inflations are justified by wage inflation as in the fact that we have inflation and that it has reached the point where it constantly races ahead of wages and salaries. Americans want to find a way to keep up with inflation.

They do not object to such forms of inflation as raise the cost of living if their incomes are raised to balance inflationary increases in costs. In other words, if benefits are greater than the cost, inflation will not hurt.

But American inflation, as reflected in living costs for many months now, has reached the point where it does not bring proportionately increased buying income. Where it will go from there is something a bit uncertain, but all economists fear that it will lead to sudden deflation. Even Russia is in danger from inflation, but she could control deflation by enslavement of people.

The situation is not peculiar to the United States, but the dangers here are made worse by what is happening in other countries. Virtually all nations are in the throes of over-inflation. France has had to devalue her franc again. American money is less inflated than that of other countries.

And the world economic situation is such that a breakdown in the economy of any of a half dozen or more nations could bring a breakdown the world over.

Perhaps the cure for inflation is to be found in other parts of the world. Perhaps if the economy of France, or Britain, or Italy, Peru, or Argentina, or any of several others, could be straightened out it would help ours and that of the rest of the world.

But this Nation is still the world's economic leader. Other nations base their economy on ours; their money gains or loses its exchange value in relation to ours. We have it in our power to destroy almost any government in the world by manipulations of its monetary values.

Inflationary evils serious enough to wreck the world may come elsewhere, but it would seem that only this Nation has the power to end that inflation. That is, if we do have it.

And this Nation does not have that power unless labor and capital can come to some kind of agreement to end the wage-price-increase spiral which is steadily lifting inflation to the point that each increase in wages and each boost in prices simply adds danger.

This Nation has to find the cure for the cause, and thus end the inflation spiral. Otherwise the entire world may feel the effects of deflation someday.

PANAMA CANAL: TERMINAL LAKE MODERNIZATION PROGRAM DERIVED FROM WORLD WAR II EXPERIENCE

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, a special report of the General Board of the Navy to the Secretary of the Navy dated September 30, 1943, which summarizes preliminary naval studies on the terminal lake-third locks plan for the major operational improvement of the Panama Canal and gives its recommendation, together with a preliminary statement of my own.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement and the report will be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, both the statement and indicated General Board report were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT BY SENATOR MARTIN OF IOWA

In my statement to the Senate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 21, 1956, I quoted a previously classified preliminary report prepared at the request of the Secretary of War by Gov. Glen E. Edgerton of the Panama Canal dated January 17, 1944, relative to proposals for the elimination of the Pedro Miguel locks, which report was supplied at my request by the Assistant Secretary of the Army, Hon. George H. Roderick.

The report of Governor Edgerton approved in principle and recommended to the Secretary of War for thorough investigation a proposal for the major operational improvement of the Panama Canal known as the terminal lake-third locks plan, which had been developed during 1942 and 1943 in the Department of Operation and Maintenance of the Panama Canal as the result of experience in World War II. It warned, however, that sea-level advocates would oppose unjustifiably any expensive change in the present plans on the grounds that it would defer the time when conversion of the existing canal to a sea-level waterway might otherwise be authorized. Moreover, it revealed that the terminal-lake proposal had been transmitted to the Secretary of War by the Secretary of the Navy on September 7, 1943, with a request for study of the subject so that the practicability and advisability of the program might be discussed jointly and the President advised in the premises. The Secretary of the Navy at the same time also submitted the plan to the President.

The 1944 Edgerton report lists some of the key documents concerning the conception and study of the plan in the canal organization and its review in the Department of the Navy.

On my request to the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Thomas S. Gates, Jr., the Department of the Navy on July 3, 1957, transmitted to me copies of the principal 1943-44 naval documents concerning its initial review and study of terminal lake proposal, which have had their security classification removed.

The essentials of those naval views were summarized in a report by the Chairman of the General Board of the Navy to the Secretary of the Navy dated September 30, 1943, submitted after a visitation in the Canal Zone by a member of the Board and extensive consultations with Panama Canal and naval officials, and experienced canal pilots.

The indicated documents start with submission of the plan on June 17, 1943, to the Department of the Navy and end with an analysis of the indicated Edgerton report under the date of March 18, 1944. Notwithstanding their advisory and preliminary nature, certain information and principles concerning canal problems developed in these documents are fundamental. To that extent, they represent the considered opinions of some of the most distinguished naval officers of the 20th century, who, as members of the General Board or in administrative capacities in the Department of the Navy, participated in the naval review.

Based primarily on practical considerations of navigation and marine operations, the reports fully favored modification of the authorized third locks project to provide a summit-level terminal lake anchorage in the Pacific sector of the canal to serve as a traffic mobilization basin corresponding with that at Gatun in the Atlantic end. The General Board, in its report to the Secretary of the Navy on September 30, 1943, recommended that the Navy Department "strongly endorse the subject plan at the appropriate time."

Furthermore, after considering the relative merits of the types of canal, which has always been a subject of keen controversy for reasons not remotely related to navigation, the report expressed the following conclusion: "The General Board is much impressed by the great preponderance of evidence in favor of the lock type and considers that the opinions presented, supported as they are by experience, fully justify the abandonment of the idea of a sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama."

After receipt of the 1944 Edgerton report to the Secretary of War on elimination of the Pedro Miguel locks, previously mentioned, the Secretary of the Navy referred it to the General Board, where it was studied and summarized in a report to the Chairman of the Board dated March 18, 1944. This report reiterated the September 30, 1943, General Board recommendation that the Navy Department strongly support the terminal lake proposal at the appropriate time, which, it prophetically estimated would be "well into the future."

These 1943 and 1944 naval recommendations, it should be emphasized, were made prior to the advent of the atomic bomb, when the controlling considerations in canal planning were capacity, operational, engineering, and economic. Thus, the repeated suggestions by its advocates that the sea level project has had unqualified support in the past of the General Board is not only erroneous but definitely misleading.

Following the military use of the atomic bomb, Panama Canal officials, through administrative channels, sought and secured enactment of Public Law 280, 79th Congress, approved December 28, 1945, authorizing the Governor of the Panama Canal to make a comprehensive review and study of the means for increasing the capacity and security of the Panama Canal to meet the future needs of interoceanic commerce and national defense, including consideration of canals at other locations and a restudy of the authorized third lock project. It is, I believe, significant that this legislation was enacted after the death of President Franklin D. Roosevelt to whom the terminal lake proposal had been submitted in 1943 and who is reported to have been favorably disposed thereto.

The original third lock project, it should be noted, had been suspended in May 1942 after expenditure of $75 million mostly on lock site excavations at Gatun and Miraflores. These excavations, in event of resumption of construction, would be substantial contributions toward completion of the authorized project as improved through adaptation to the principles of the terminal lake proposal.

The hearings prior to the enactment of Public Law 280, 79th Congress, were held on November 15, 1945, in executive session; and maritime interests, including the Navy, were not represented. The only witness was the Governor of the Panama Canal (J. C. Mehaffey), who, it is noted, did not inform the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries about the official views of the Navy.

When questioned by a member of the committee as to whether he approved the terminal lake proposal in principle, Governor Mehaffey stated: "In general, yes; if the third locks were constructed, I believe we would recommend a modification of the original project to include the terminal lake." (See Executive Hearings on Panama Canal Facilities before Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, November 15, 1945, p. 9.) This was the second formal approval of the terminal lake proposal by a Governor of the Panama Canal for the major modification of the existing waterway.

Under an extreme interpretation of the security and national defense factors of the statute as paramount and controlling, the report of this governor's inquiry, which was transmitted to the Congress on December 1, 1947, and significantly, without Presidential approval, comment, or recommendation, advocated only the sea-level project for major construction at Panama.

Regardless of the official concurrences in the main premises of the report, security and national defense, that may have been made by certain executive agencies, the extensive and rigorous clarifications of these and other vitally important phases of the canal problem since its submission to the Congress and the subsequent tremendous advances in the destructive powers of modern weapons culminating in the H-bomb, have, in the opinion of many distinguished independent physicists, nuclear warfare engineering, and other experts, served to restore the canal situation to what it was in 1943, when the terminal lake-third locks plan, developed as the result of war experience, was first supported in principle by both Panama Canal and naval authorities and submitted to the President. Thus, the Panama Canal problem consists of a combination of capacity, engineering, marine operational, and constructional planning to secure the best operational canal for the transit of vessels practicable of economic attainment.

Hence, the views of the Department of the Navy, as developed in the September 30, 1943, report of the General Board, constitute a state paper of primary importance.

When judged by its consequences, which have been far reaching, the development of the terminal lake-third locks proposal was one of the great constructive projects to grow out of World War II. Its story forms an important chapter in Isthmian history which emphasizes further that questions of major interoceanic canal policy are not proper matters for exclusive control by ex parte or routine administrative groups, which, in the normal course of events, would expect to benefit from their own recommendations. The United States has had enough of organized drives for predetermined objectives at Panama that have disregarded costs and consequences.

As previously expressed in my statement to the Senate of June 21, 1956, all of these facts add up to indicate the absolute importance for prompt authorization by the Congress to secure an independent inquiry of the entire interoceanic canals problem along the line contemplated in the bipartisan measures now pending in both Houses. A series of crises affecting the operation of the canal, the latest of which are a shortage of water in the summit level coupled with the highest traffic volume in history, stress the necessity for timely legislation before an overwhelming crisis forces hasty action.

REPORT BY THE GENERAL BOARD OF THE NAVY ON THE TERMINAL LAKE-THIRD LOCKS PLAN, SEPTEMBER 30, 1943

From Chairman General Board.
To the Secretary of the Navy.
Subject: Panama Canal, Plan for improvement.
Reference: (a) ComFifteen letter 15 ND/HG/(03) of 17 June 1943, and enclosures.

1. By the fifth endorsement of the reference, the Secretary of the Navy has directed the General Board to study a proposed plan for the improvement of the operating features of the Panama Canal and to make recommendation. The plan and several alternative schemes for its accomplishment are now being considered by the Governor of the Panama Canal and until his investigations are completed neither the Secretary of War nor the Secretary of the Navy will have the benefit of the Governor's expert engineering and operating advice. Therefore, the Board assumes that studies of the subject by the Navy Department are now of a preliminary nature, with the view primarily of determining the Navy's special interest in the project as a whole, to be presented to the War Department when appropriate.

2. It is to be noted that there is now in existence an approved plan for the improvement of the canal, authorized by Congress and referred to hereinafter as the third lock program. The purpose of this program is to increase the capacity of the canal, to permit transit of large naval vessels, and to attain greater security from bombing attack. Work on this program was actually begun in 1940 but was suspended in 1942 in favor of projects deemed more essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

3. The controlling feature of the subject plan is the creation of a summit level anchorage in Miraflores Lake in order to provide a traffic expansion chamber at the Pacific terminal. By making provision for safe summit level anchorages for vessels as they emerge from the Gaillard Cut, the transit of the cut becomes independent of Pedro Miguel locks which now constitute the bottleneck of the canal. The purpose of the plan is to improve marine operating conditions, reduce accidents, reduce the time of transit, and reduce the wear on piloting personnel. Essential to its accomplishment are the removal of the Pedro Miguel locks and the construction of one or more sets of triple-lift locks on the general site of the Pacific entrance to the canal.

4. This plan is not a new concept but is, rather, an old one backed by the force of operating experience gained during the 29 years that the canal has been in operation. The need for capacious summit-level anchorages at both ends was early recognized but the canal, as it stands today, meets that need at Gatun only. Colonel Sibert, the builder of Gatun locks, wanted to place all Pacific locks in one structure as at Gatun but the Pacific locks had already been started and the change would have involved a delay in the opening of the canal. The President decided against the proposal because a change in plans might have been construed, by the proponents of a sea-level canal, as evidence of the weakness of a lock canal. Prior to this, in 1906, Mr. Stevens had recommended to Congress the combination of all Pacific locks into one structure. Going as far back as 1879, the French Engineer de Lepinay had proposed the creation of a large artificial summit-level lake at each terminal, to be connected with sea level by locks. Years later his proposal was adopted at the Atlantic terminal and took the form of Gatun Lake. But there is no equivalent at the Pacific terminal.

5. The present anchorage space at Gatun supplies a stopover station for both north and southbound vessels and permits unrestricted operation of Gatun locks. At Pedro Miguel there is no comparable anchorage space for ships as they emerge from Gaillard Cut. The Pedro Miguel locks are located squarely in the south end of the cut and they restrict passage through the cut to the capacity of the locks. While northbound traffic can and does enter the cut at lockage intervals, southbound vessels cannot arrive in the cut any faster than they can be received at the Pacific locks. Vessels have to approach the latter locks in a relatively narrow passage; they cannot anchor for they would swing into a rocky bank; they cannot slow too much or they will lose steerageway and drift ashore. The resulting dispatching problem causes delays, at times endangers the canal and ships, and wears out piloting personnel. The situation is aggravated because the canal between Pedro Miguel and Bohio is subject to dense fog. When there is fog in the cut, vessels, after leaving the locks, can only tieup to the north wall at Pedro Miguel. When the north wall is filled to capacity all northbound traffic must stop and Pedro Miguel lockages and Miraflores lockages must cease.

6. The facts presented in the preceding paragraphs have been extracted from the enclosures to the reference. The latter were prepared by the present port captain at Balboa, Comdr. Miles P. DuVal, United States Navy, as a result of his own experience and study, and in collaboration with other canal authorities as well as with the commandant, 15th Naval District. These enclosures present a well-rounded picture of present operating conditions, and their difficulties, together with alternative schemes for solving the major problems. Included therewith is an exhaustive discussion, ably presented, of the marine features of the sea-level type of canal, as compared with the lock type. The General Board is much impressed by the great preponderance of evidence in favor of the lock type an considers that the opinions presented, supported as they are by experience, fully justify the abandonment of the idea of a sea-level canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

7. That part of the third-lock program which has to do with the Pacific terminal locks is closely related to the subject under discussion. Adopted when war began to threaten, the third-lock program is, in principle, an acceptance of the present arrangement of the Pacific locks. Under this program the new and larger locks would be placed at a distance from the present locks in order to disperse the lock structures and lessen the chances of danger from bombing attack. There would be 1 new triple-lift lock at Gatun, 1 new two-lift lock at Miraflores, and a new single-lift lock at Pedro Miguel, the last named located on a new channel which, passing Cerro Paraiso on its south and west sides would connect Miraflores Lake with the entrance to the Gaillard Cut.

8. Suspension of work on this program has taken place at a stage in its completion that affords an opportunity to reexamine its features, some of which appear to introduce additional dangers and complications and others to continue present difficulties. If the program were to be carried through, the bottleneck of Pedro Miguel would be perpetuated and any chance of providing an essential traffic reservoir at Miraflores would be lost. The turns in the new channel (one of which amounts to 47°17′), and its intersection with Gaillard Cut, would become new foci of accidents. It has also been developed that the proposed new Pedro Miguel Lock would be on the worst foundation of all locks. But, fortunately, there has been no excavation along the line of the proposed new channel around Cerro Paraiso and the subject plan does not, therefore, call for the abandonment of any work already completed under the third-lock program. On the other hand, the excavation which has already been accomplished in anticipation of the erection of the new (third) Miraflores two-lift lock is available for use in connection with a set or sets of triple-lift locks as contemplated in the subject plan.

9. All of the schemes suggested as suitable for making effective the subject plan, include provision for maintaining traffic during the reconstruction period. Of the three schemes suggested by Commander DuVal, the papers submitted to the Board indicate preference for scheme C, an arrangement in which the present Miraflores Locks are abandoned, three new sets of triple-lift locks placed near the third lock site, and dispersion obtained by increasing the spacing between the locks. The Bureau of Yards and Docks in its (second) endorsement on the reference presents a fourth scheme which proposes the construction of a single set of triple-lift locks on the present Miraflores site and of two new sets of triple-lift locks near the third lock site. This plan offers advantages from the standpoint of maintenance of canal traffic at the expense of longer time to complete. Both of these latter schemes utilize the cut already excavated, although neither suggests the extent to which the new sets of locks should be separated from each other in order to attain greater security from bombing attacks.

10. Disability of the canal may be from damage at a single point, or from damage at several points through a large-scale attack. The extent of damage to a group of locks from a single hit is increased when one set of that group has any part of its structure, or operating equipment, in common with another set; this is the present situation, all existing locks being in pairs. It does not follow, however, that immunity from damage can be secured merely by increasing the space between the several sets of locks, or by separating the groups. Each set may be attacked separately and, if not successfully defended, all sets, even though widely separated, may be destroyed by a single large-scale attack. The breaching of all the gates (including the emergency gates), of only one upper lock, regardless of its location with respect to another set, would disable the entire canal by lowering the water level. The Pedro Miguel Locks provide a case in point; although they are located at some distance from Miraflores, the destruction of the gates of one set would render the Gaillard Cut unnavigable. When the restrictions imposed by the size and topography of the Canal Zone are taken fully into account, it seems apparent that the greatest dispersion possible does not render the canal secure against large-scale bombing attacks. The present locks are not dispersed; their security lies in their degree of invulnerability, their defense, and in the precautions taken to prevent surprise.

11. For these fundamental reasons the General Board, although not competent to base its opinions on technical grounds, believes that sound engineering, and safety and facility of marine operation, are the primary considerations to be balanced against questions of dispersion or separation of the locks. Above all, the latter should not be allowed to obscure the necessity for a traffic expansion chamber at the Pacific terminal, the controlling feature of the subject plan. The cut already excavated under the third-lock program establishes the distance between the new and the present Miraflores Lock sites. Assuming that this cut will be utilized, whatever plan is finally adopted, the Board believes that further questions of vulnerability and security from bombing attack should be left to those responsible for the design of the locks, and those charged with the defense of the canal.

12. Appendix A, attached hereto, summarizes the marine advantages claimed for the subject plan, regardless of the particular scheme adopted for its accomplishment. All of these advantages will accrue to the Navy in moving its ships quickly and in large numbers from one ocean to the other as strategic and tactical considerations may dictate. The General Board, itself strongly in favor of the basic idea, has been unable to detect, either in any correspondence, or in conversation, any opposition thereto. A member of the Board, during a recent visit to the Canal Zone, noted the same favorable reaction during all discussions, including those he had with Governor Edgerton. With the canal authorities, including experienced pilots, and the commandant, 15th Naval District, all favorably disposed, the project at present resolves itself into a question of practical ways and means which, as noted earlier herein, are being investigated by the Governor.

13. As a result of its study, the General Board recommends that the Navy Department strongly endorse the subject plan at the appropriate time.

A. J. HEPBURN.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, now that the civil rights bill has been passed and is on its way to the President, some of us are concerned as to how the Commission and the additional Assistant Attorney General will be financed.

I wonder it the distinguished minority leader would be able to give us some assurance that appropriations will be available from which the Commission, as well as the Assistant Attorney General, can be adequately financed, so that we can go home with a conviction that the members of the Commission can be appointed soon and go to work, without there being the necessity for any other appropriation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I cannot give a complete and categorical answer to his inquiry. I believe, however, that there are sufficient funds in the Department of Justice appropriations, in the case of the Assistant Attorney General. In the case of the Commission, if necessary there are sufficient funds in the President's special emergency funds at least to get the Commission started on its work.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator from California.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator inform us as to whether he thinks the work will be impeded by the need for getting confirmation of the Director of the Commission?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will say to the Senator, again I would not want to give a categorical answer to the Senator in that regard, but I hope, in the same spirit that the legislation was passed, that when the names are sent to the Senate and we have reconvened, there will be no unnecessary delay in having confirmation of the nominations.

Mr. JAVITS. Does the Senator believe these positions are subject to recess appointments?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I believe they are.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

ADDRESS BY LEWIS A. LAPHAM, PRESIDENT OF GRACE LINE, INC.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, in connection with the most recent developments in our maritime history, Mr. Lewis A. Lapham, president of Grace Line, Inc., delivered a constructive and interesting address which justifies the attention and reading of Members of the Congress and of the public generally. The speech was delivered at the christening of the steamship Santa Rosa on August 28, when interested supporters of the American merchant marine journeyed to Newport News to see two ships of the same name—one a replacement of the other, floating side by side. The modern ship just off the ways will replace the steamship Santa Rosa which for 25 years has transported thousands of Americans between our ports and ports of South America.

Mr. Lapham is one of the outstanding shipping officials of our country and has maintained the highest standards to which the Grace Line has adhered over decades of successful operations. In view of the importance of this ceremony and of the appropriateness of Mr. Lapham's remarks, I ask unanimous consent that the text of his address be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF LEWIS A. LAPHAM, PRESIDENT, GRACE LINE, INC.

It goes without saying that this day is a marvelously pleasant and memorable one for the Grace Line. Traditionally, I suspect, I should speak about the new ship, the new Santa Rosa, which looms above us. But like most ships, this one will speak for herself, and if you will forgive a certain prejudice, I think she will speak better than most, as has her predecessor, the old Santa Rosa, laying off in the James River before you and getting ready even now to whistle her namesake here hail and farewell.

But I would rather speak, briefly, of what is behind the ship and how she came to be.

She will be the first passenger vessel built and launched in the shipping industry's overall replacement program, and she marks as well the first building of the Grace Line's own construction program, the largest by far the line has undertaken in its hundred years of existence. But her building has not just happened in this year of 1957. Far from it.

She is part of a program that began, in essence, in 1936 with the passage of the Merchant Marine Act in that year. It is an act that has been most faithfully and intelligently administered by the responsible Government agency, and at no time, incidentally, better administered than under its present leadership. And it is an act that has been equally faithfully and intelligently complied with by the industry it serves.

This ship is the first of a program that will send down the ways some 300 United States flag vessels over the next 12 years or so, a fleet of the finest, safest, and most effective ships afloat. It is a joint program of the industry and the Government, planned to provide an oceangoing transportation service for the overseas trade and support of a nation that demands and should have, the best.

All these things can be planned, of course, and talked about, but someone has to transmit the plans to paper and the paper to ships, and that just doesn't happen either. And I go no further with these remarks before expressing the Grace Line's warm and deep appreciation to Mr. William Francis Gibbs, who designed this ship, and to Newport News, who built it. The superb talents and craftsmanship that have gone into this new Santa Rosa make themselves manifest without any added comment from me, or anyone else. The performance is even more impressive when you consider that it was a bare 7½ months ago that some of us were here to see the keel plate for this same ship swung into place.

As for our sponsor today, she bears the most famous name in United States shipping history and we are delighted to have her. And a special touch of history is additionally with us in the person of the young maid of honor, Miss Carolyn Flint, a descendant of one of the families whose firm, Chapman & Flint, many years ago in Bath, Maine, built the clipper ship forerunners of the present Grace Line fleet.

The line has a host of other friends here, from the Federal Maritime Administration and other Government agencies, from the shipping world and its related industries, and to them all may I say, many, many thanks—we are complimented by your presence and are happy to have you with us, I promise you.

But nothing perhaps more significantly emphasizes the continuity of the program I have been talking about, of this lengthy maritime tradition, past, present and future, than the presence out there in the James River of the old Santa Rosa. She has had a long, proud service, in peace and in war, under her country's flag. And this occasion, unique, I suspect in seagoing history, is a fine climax for her honorable career.

REPORT ON 85TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, under the heading of "85th Congress, 1st session, Final Report," I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a report of the happenings of this session of the Congress.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and will appear hereafter.

DEATH OF PETER K. MORSE, DEPUTY GENERAL COUNSEL, INTERNATIONAL COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, it was with profound regret that I learned of the untimely death of Peter K. Morse, Deputy General Counsel of the International Cooperation Administration. Mr. Morse was killed in an automobile accident on Monday near Sharon, Mass. Mr. Morse was well and favorably known to many members of the Committee on Foreign Relations because of his work during the past several years in the presentation of the executive branch position on the foreign-aid programs.

Mr. Morse, who was 38 years of age at the time of his death, was a native of Detroit, Mich. He had served in the United States Navy from 1942 to 1946. He was a graduate of the University of Michigan and the Harvard Law School, where he was case editor of the Harvard Law Review. After having been associated for 3 years with a New York law firm he joined the legal staff of the Economic Cooperation Administration in August 1949. He had been given progressively increasing responsibility in the administration of the mutual-security program in the 8 years since that time. He became Deputy General Counsel of ICA in 1956 and he had been serving as Acting General Counsel during the past 6 months.

The Government of the United States has lost a devoted public servant. It is my hope that Peter Morse's family and friends can take comfort from the widespread appreciation of this fact.

TRANSACTION OF ADDITIONAL ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following additional routine business was transacted:

RESOLUTIONS OF AMERICAN FEDERATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD three resolutions adopted by the delegates to the convention of the American Federation of Government Employees at the Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass., August 5–9, 1957, concerning Federal employees and employment conditions.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Resolution 15, Increased Benefits for Federal Employees in Hazardous Occupations

Whereas employees of United States naval and VA hospitals and United States penal and mental institutions are engaged in hazardous work; and

Whereas these Federal employees are engaged in hazardous occupations such as all types of employment involving the custody, care, and/or treatment of fellow humans and the protection of public properties are not receiving adequate compensation or retirement benefits; and

Whereas determination by Federal administrative officials is overly restrictive in allowing recognition of hazardous-type employment: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor urge the Congress of the United States of America to increase the compensation and retirement benefits of these Federal employees and provide for a more liberal interpretation of hazardous-type occupations.

Submitted by Delegate John S. Gannon, lodge 1088, American Federation of Government Employees, Boston, Mass.

Resolution 15 adopted by delegates in convention at Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass., August 5 to 9, 1957.

Resolution 16, Maintaining Watertown and Springfield Arsenals

Whereas the Watertown Arsenal and the Springfield Armory are Federal field establishments that have greatly contributed to the defense needs of the nation and the prosperity of the Commonwealth over the past century; and

Whereas both these traditional defense activities have been subjected to a series of adverse administrative actions which have curtailed their scope of operations; and

Whereas such curtailment of operation has unduly hurt the economic well-being of the Commonwealth and the defense readiness of the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor in Convention go on record and urge the Congress of the United States of America to provide for and insure the continued operation of the Watertown Arsenal and the Springfield Armory at a higher plain and wider scope of operations as an aid to bolster the economy of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and improve the defense preparedness of the Nation.

Submitted by delegate John S. Gannon, Lodge 1088, American Federation of Government Employees, Boston, Mass.

Resolution 16 adopted by delegates in convention at Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass., August 5 to 9, 1957.

Resolution 54, Maintaining Employment Levels at Boston Naval Shipyard

Whereas the Boston Naval Shipyard draws its employees from every part of the Commonwealth more particularly within a radius of 60 miles from the city of Boston; and

Whereas each city and town therein is greatly affected by the financial stability of these employees; and

Whereas any proposed layoff which will affect every trade and occupation and result in many professional and technical men and skilled mechanics seeking work in other States; and

Whereas the Navy has announced an economy cut of several fighting ships from the active fleet, that could mean diverting Boston repair work to other shipyards; and

Whereas any reduction in the appropriation for the Boston Naval Shipyard and any further cutback in work would increase unemployment in this area to an untenable degree: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Massachusetts State Federation of Labor delegates in convention urge the Congress of the United States to take action as may be necessary to compel the Department of Defense to maintain the present standard of employment and work at the Boston Naval Shipyard; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States, to each Member of the Massachusetts Congressional delegation, to the Secretary of Defense, to the Secretary of the Navy.

Submitted by delegate John S. Gannon, Lodge 1088, American Federation of Government Employees, Boston Naval Shipyard.

Resolution 54 adopted by delegates in convention at Hotel Statler, Boston, Mass., August 5-9, 1957.

Mr. President, the full Committee on Armed Services on August 22 approved the report of the Armed Services Subcommittee on the Operation of Article VII of the NATO Status of Forces Treaty and other foreign jurisdictional arrangements. This report covers a review of these arrangements from December 1, 1955, through November 30, 1956. Separate comment is also made on the Girard case.

Mr. President, I submit this report from the Committee on Armed Services and request unanimous consent that it be printed, with illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, by direction of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, I submit a report on the bill (S. 49) to provide for the admission of the State of Alaska into the Union, and also the bill (S. 50) to provide for the admission of the State of Hawaii into the Union. I ask unanimous consent that the minority may file a report during the present session of the Congress or during the adjournment of the Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be received, and the bills will be placed on the calendar; and, without objection, the reports will be printed, and the request of the Senator from Washington is granted.

ADDITIONAL BILLS INTRODUCED

By unanimous consent, Mr. Yarborough introduced the following bills, which were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

S. 2886. A bill to authorize continuing studies of the biology, propagation, catch, and abundance of species of fish and shrimp that are of interest to sport and commercial fishermen in waters adjacent to certain areas in the State of Texas so that appropriate measures for protecting the environment and increasing the abundance of such species of fish and shrimp may be taken; to protect the whooping crane and the lands upon which it is dependent by the establishment of a wildlife sanctuary in the State of Texas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. YARBOROUGH (for himself and Mr. Byrd):

S. 2887. A bill to amend title I of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 to provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall approve the acquisition of certain lands of national historical significance, or interests therein, for highway purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

CONSERVATION OF FISH AND WILDLIFE IN THE STATE OF TEXAS

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, there is a great need in the State of Texas and in the country to enlarge our program of fish and wildlife conservation. The extinction of the passenger pigeon, heath hen, Labrador duck, and numerous other American native birds of great economic and cultural value are pointed examples of our wastefulness with our natural resources in the past and our need for conservation now. The land is filling up with people and there is less and less natural habitat and unpolluted waters for our native animals and birds to rest upon, feed in, and drink.

We must move fast if we are to save many species of our beautiful wildlife. Many are threatened with extinction.

The fishermen of the gulf coast are interested in a program which will preserve and propagate the marine life that contribute to their livelihood.

All Americans and all Canadians have followed with close interest as the whooping crane population of the world dwindled. Only a handful of these beautiful birds are alive today, and unless further steps are taken to preserve and protect this species of fowl, we are likely soon to be without these fine and lovely creatures. They are the tallest wild birds in America today.

Mr. President, we also need additional study of the fish and marine life resources of this country.

Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill that would not only provide for protecting the environment and increasing the abundance of marine life, but would also establish a wildlife sanctuary in the State of Texas for whooping cranes and other wildlife.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2886) to authorize continuing studies of the biology, propagation, catch, and abundance of species of fish and shrimp that are of interest to sport and commercial fishermen in waters adjacent to certain areas in the State of Texas so that appropriate measures for protecting the environment and increasing the abundance of such species of fish and shrimp may be taken; to protect the whooping crane and the lands upon which it is dependent by the establishment of a wildlife sanctuary in the State of Texas, and for other purposes, introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. YARBOROUGH] was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRESERVATION OF CERTAIN LANDS OF NATIONAL HISTORICAL INTEREST

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, under the Federal interstate road program, certain historical shrines and monuments are in grave danger of being destroyed by the routing of Federal highways, and doubtless in the future, many other shrines of great cultural and historic value to our people will be destroyed unless laws are enacted to preserve them.

One such historic shrine which has been placed in jeopardy by the recently announced routing of an interstate highway in New Jersey is the Morristown National Historical Park and the Revolutionary War headquarters of Gen. George Washington. The National Park Service has protested the proposed new route for the highway.

In 1949 the Congress chartered the National Trust for Historic Preservation to further the national policy of preserving cultural or historic monuments and shrines, set forth in the Historic Sites Act of 1935, which act was sponsored by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and Representative Maury Maverick. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] has joined me in sponsoring a bill to amend the Federal Highway Act of 1956, to provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall give his written opinion that land sought for a highway right-of-way and paid for with Federal funds, will not adversely affect the national policy of preserving for public use historic sites, buildings, and objects of national significance for the inspiration and benefit of the people of the United States, before the land can be bought.

Therefore, on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend title I of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1956 to provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall approve the acquisition of certain lands of national historical significance, or interests therein, for highway purposes, and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2887) to amend title I of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956 to provide that the Secretary of the Interior shall approve the acquisition of certain lands of national historical significance, or interests therein, for highway purposes, introduced by Mr. YARBOROUGH (for himself and Mr. BYRD), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

CREATION OF A COAL RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. MARTIN of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] may be added as a cosponsor of the bill (S. 2877) to encourage and stimulate the production and conservation of coal in the United States through research and development by creating a Coal Research and Development Commission and for other purposes, introduced by me, for myself and my colleague, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TRIAL OF MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES FOR CRIMINAL OFFENSES COMMITTED IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF RESOLUTION

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that Senators BIBLE, BRIDGES, BUTLER, CURTIS, EASTLAND, GOLDWATER, HOLLAND, JOHNSTON of South Carolina, MALONE, MCCLELLAN, MUNDT, POTTER, ROBERTSON, STENNIS, TALMADGE, YOUNG, and ERVIN have indicated their desire to join me as cosponsors of the resolution (S. Res. 163) favoring trial by the United States, where primary jurisdiction is conferred upon it by treaty, of members of the Armed Forces for criminal offenses committed in foreign countries, submitted by me on July 15, 1957. I ask unanimous consent that their names be added as cosponsors of the resolution the next time it is printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO 9 A. M. TODAY

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in accordance with the order previously entered, I now move that the Senate be in adjournment until 9 o'clock this morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 12 o'clock and 59 minutes a. m. on Friday, August 30) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until 9 o'clock a. m. the same day.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, AUGUST 29, 1957

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, may we begin each new day with the unshakable confidence that our lives are in Thy divine keeping and control.

We thank Thee for the glad and glorious assurance that no needed blessing wilt Thou withhold from us if we do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with the Lord.

Inspire us with a strong and steadfast faith as we seek and strive continuously to achieve for ourselves and all mankind a larger measure of the more abundant life.

May we never become weary in welldoing and allow our energies to be depleted by fear and worry.

Grant that when we falter and fail we may not lose heart or hope for Thou art always ready to restore and rehabilitate us if we are willing to try again.

In Christ's name we offer our prayer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McBride, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8918. An act to further amend the act of August 7, 1946 (60 Stat. 896), as amended by the act of October 25, 1951 (65 Stat. 657), to provide for the exchange of lands of the United States as a site for the new Sibley Memorial Hospital; to provide for the transfer of the property of the Hahnemann Hospital of the District of Columbia, formerly the National Homeopathic Association, a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, to the Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School for Deaconesses and Missionaries, including Sibley Memorial Hospital, a corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2080. An act relating to the computation of annual income for the purpose of payment of pension for non-service-connected disability or death in certain cases.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. HON. STERLING COLE

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I, like most—perhaps all—of the Members on the floor today, have had the good fortune to know many good men—many kind men—and even perhaps a few great men.

In my own case, I have known few who have had all of these qualities at the same time. I have, however, been fortunate enough to know at least one man like this.

I am speaking of the gentleman who represents the 37th District of New York, Sterling Cole—Stub to most of us.

Stub and his lovely wife and his three sons have been close and dear friends of me and my family for many, many years. I have always thought that my feelings for Stub have been returned by him. I feel that this is so.

We all know that Stub will be the undoubted choice as Director General of the newly created International Atomic Energy Agency. His choice for this most important international position is one of the wisest selections made within my own personal memory, and that, in the Congress alone, goes back almost 30 years.

There is no need to review Stub's career. All of us are familiar with his long service on the Naval Affairs Committee and on its successor, the Armed Services Committee. We all know of his service since its creation on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, of which he was chairman during the 83d Congress.

To my mind—and I do not expect any disagreement from any Member of the House—Stub Cole possesses a peculiar genius for legislation. He has a precise and analytical mind which in many ways reminds us of philosophers of days gone by, who in their teachings and writings have formed the basis for the best things in the thinking of civilized peoples today.

But his genius is one that is tempered by a deep warmth, and a deep understanding of other men and of their problems. It is tempered also by a kindness which is almost inconsistent with his other great qualities.

Most of us can recall the days when the amendments to the Atomic Energy Act were on the floor, about 3 years ago. Most of us here in the House are not learned in the technology of atomic energy. Many of us are even unfamiliar with the terms which are used by the scientists in describing what they have done and what they hope to do. But can any one of us say that when Stub Cole completed his explanation of those amendments, and how they would affect the then Atomic Energy Act, he did not feel that he had had presented to him in the clearest and most understandable fashion one of the most complicated pieces of legislation which has ever been presented on the floor of this House?

While there is argument and disagreement among many Americans today as to what our role should be in international affairs, there can be no disagreement that we are irrevocably committed to a most important role in these affairs. If we must be so involved—and I am making no judgment at this time as to whether we should or not—must we not then arm ourselves in our international relations with the best minds, the broadest visions—and the most experienced people we can find?

The United States has done this in the selection of Stub Cole for Director General for the International Atomic Energy Agency. He will bring to that position the same qualities that have made him a great Member of Congress—and he will bring more than that. He will bring a broad culture, a wide and intelligent view of the atom in international affairs. And more than that, a sound technical background of our own and foreign nuclear energy programs.

The House of Representatives is losing Stub Cole. The country—and, indeed, the world—is gaining a leader of vision and courage.

He has my best wishes, and I am certain, the best wishes of all of the Members of the House of Representatives for success and happiness in his new undertaking.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana.

There was no objection.

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my good friend, the gentleman from Ohio, in pausing at this moment to pay tribute to the gentleman from New York, Sterling Cole. I feel certain that elaborate phrases and multiple superlatives would add little to the record which Sterling Cole has made as a Member of this body. The record which he himself has written and the affection which he holds in our hearts is beyond description.

Personally I have enjoyed a close friendship with Sterling Cole since I came to to this body. It is refreshing to know that he will be back with us in 4 years, because it is merely a leave of absence he is taking. I think when he leaves us for that 4 years he will go with the knowledge that he has the good wishes and well meaning of every Member of this House on both sides of the aisle.

To Sterling Cole may I say, continue to serve your country well, but come back as soon as you can.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I have just learned of this development in connection with our friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cole]. I want to add my word of appreciation for the outstanding service of an outstanding Member of this House, whom I have had the privilege to serve with these many years.

Stub Cole, as he is affectionately known to his friends, can well retire from this body with the knowledge and the consciousness of having well performed his duties to his constituency and to his country as a Member of this body. I along with other Members have long observed with approval the sterling conduct of our colleague.

While I am sure that like a limited number of others of us he leaves this Chamber with some misgivings as to his accomplishments during the years of his service for the perpetuation of this splendid Republic and its institutions, he may be assured that he leaves with the respect and confidence of all of us. Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in wishing him much success in his new field of endeavor, a job for which he is eminently qualified.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I have mixed emotions on our colleague, Sterling Cole, leaving the Congress. I rejoice in the fact that he will be Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency. It is a recognition of the man he is: One of character and great ability. He has few, if any, equals; and certainly no one is better qualified than he for the tremendously important work he will be undertaking.

At the same time, I have a feeling of deep distress that he is leaving the Congress. It stems, at least in part, from a personal selfishness, a realization that I will not have this more or less fraternal association with someone for whom I have such an affectionate regard as I have for Sterling Cole. I will miss him personally.

The Congress will miss him. He came here in the 74th Congress when I did. Over the years I have been privileged to sit next to him as a member of our Committee on Armed Services. His contribution to the work of our committee, and to the work of the Congress as a whole, is beyond measure. Without the slightest fanfare, but in his quiet, painstaking manner he applied the keen, analytical mind with which he is endowed to the problems to be solved and questions to be resolved.

And he did likewise as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. When that committee brought matters before us we all listened with respect to his views, well knowing his conclusions were based on facts, and they were facts that he gathered from painstaking study.

Yes, I rejoice in knowledge that such a competent man will head up such an important agency. I am also distressed that this Congress will be without him. I do not know how he can possibly be replaced. As a personal friend, I will miss my close association with him. As Members of Congress, we will miss him in our deliberations.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and also ask unanimous consent that all Members may be permitted to extend their remarks at this point in the Record with regard to Sterling Cole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I want to join with the other Members who have heretofore spoken with reference to my good friend Hon. Sterling Cole.

I am a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy of the House of Representatives. This is the committee upon which Mr. Cole has served for several years and this is the committee upon which he has demonstrated his great ability as a scholar and as a legislator.

I think that Mr. Cole knows more about atomic energy and its development than any man in America.

I am sorry to see him leave this Congress but he will enter a new field and I daresay that he will soon be considered as one of the most capable men in the world. We will always be proud of his ability and his accomplishments.

MUTUAL SECURITY APPROPRIATION ACT, 1958

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PASSMAN. Mr. Speaker, there have been some erroneous figures reported in the press as to what happened yesterday in the conference between the House and Senate on the foreign-aid appropriation bill. The House had reduced the authorizing legislation by $809,650,000. We changed only 3 items in the conference, those items totaling $244 million. The House receded on that amount. The Senate receded on $256,900,000. It was suggested that in order not to reflect unfavorably upon the prestige of the Senate, their conferees would like to indicate a higher figure, but we did not yield to the suggestion. However, the press indicated this morning that the Senate had yielded only on $225,900,000. This was either because an influential Member of the other body had misstated facts, or else because of erroneous reporting, which resulted in that inaccurate figure being published. I certainly hope the press will check into what actually happened and correct their earlier figures, which did not accurately reflect the factual results of the conference.

REDUCTION IN GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Speaker, I hope that in the months between now and reconvening of the Congress in January the administration will take to heart some of the lessons it should have learned during the present session.

I hope it has learned that the people of the United States and the Members of the Congress who reflect the will of the people want a Federal budget which is not a dollar larger than prudence and efficiency will bear.

The Budget Bureau and every department of the Government are now at work on the 1959 budget to be submitted to us next January. The administration has plenty of time between now and then to strip off all the fat and give us a budget of bone and muscle—and no more.

During this session this Congress has been engaged in a great struggle to reduce the swollen budget sent to us last January. With the Government so big it is difficult for Congress, in the time it has, to find all the places in which an excessive budget can prudently be cut. Actually, the reductions should be made in the agencies and departments. The cutting of the Federal budget for 1959 should be done right now—while it is in the making. It should be done by the administration itself.

I earnestly hope that President Eisenhower has given, or will now give, all the would-be spenders in the Government stern instructions to keep requests at the minimum. I also hope that news of the public demand for economy has seeped down into the agencies and that future requests for appropriations will contain no frills and no furbelows.

One thing can be promised for sure: If next January the Congress receives another inflated budget, the hue and cry which will be aroused from one end of this Nation to the other will be such that the budget-cutting efforts we have been forced to make this year will seem pale by comparison.

When the Eisenhower administration assumed power in 1953 it immediately set about reducing the budget which had been bequeathed it by President Truman. I was in sympathy with the Eisenhower administration's early efforts to get the cost of Government down. In fact, I supported the effort.

Since then a case of the creeps has infested the administration. It lost its desire for economical Government. From every department comes demands for more and more money. On every hand the demands have been creeping upward. The result, as we all know, was the highest peacetime budget in the history of this Nation.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the time to cut the 1959 budget is not next year. The time to cut it is right now while it is being put together in the departments and in the Bureau of the Budget.

I cannot say now to what level the fiscal 1959 spending bill can be reduced. I cannot give a figure and perhaps no man can. But I do know this, the reduction which the Nation is demanding will not be satisfied with a reduction measured in millions. It must be in billions.

The time to do it is right now, while the budget is in the making.

CIVIL FUNCTIONS APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon.

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the President's apparent determination to block unbudgeted new starts for the Corps of Engineers is more than a threat to the welfare of the Congressional Districts where such starts are now slated by law. It is an affront to Congress and to our system of government by law.

The President is not above the law. His sworn duty is to obey and carry out our laws.

The American Law Division of the Library of Congress has advised me that impounding such appropriations has no lawful basis. Indeed, this is obvious. Congress authorizes and makes the appropriations. The President signs the bills. He is not allowed to veto particular items, yet that is what we have reason to believe he will again try to do, indirectly, by orders to the Bureau of the Budget.

In my Congressional District only one unbudgeted new start is provided in the civil functions appropriations bill which just became law; namely, Fall Creek Reservoir, for which $150,000 has been appropriated to begin planning. This is an $18,800,000 flood control project, the need for which has been well established. The million dollars appropriated to start the great John Day Dam on the Columbia may also be held up, to the lasting detriment of the Pacific Northwest.

Is the President above the law? I do not believe he is.

THE TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. COFFIN] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to acquaint the House with a problem of deepening intensity and widening scope which should occupy its most serious efforts as soon as the next session convenes. I want also to spell out the parliamentary hurdles that prevent this matter from being acted on during this session.

The problem relates to the textile industry. It is a problem for both North and South, for cotton grower and consumer, for the broker, the manufacturer, the merchant, and the exchanges.

Recognizing the emergency facing our cotton mills, some of us sought to face one of these problems by introducing legislation which would make cotton available to our own mills at such prices as would enable them to regain their share of the world market.

This legislation, introduced by Senator SMITH of Maine, passed in the other body last Friday. Knowing the desperate need for immediate help, I and my colleagues from Maine have explored every possible means of gaining consideration of the bill, even at this late date. Congressman McINTIRE and I canvassed the leadership on both sides, including Speaker RAYBURN, Majority Leader McCORMACK, and Minority Leader MARTIN. We found that under the practice of the House, S. 314 could not legitimately be placed on the calendar under suspension of the rules, since we could not guarantee that the legislation was of noncontroversial character. Moreover, S. 314 had not been considered by the committee, which had in fact tabled all cotton legislation until January 1958.

We then conferred at length with the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY]. We found that it was, from a realistic viewpoint, impossible to convene the committee and expect quick agreement on S. 314, even if such agreement could bring the matter to the floor. In talking with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] and with members of the cotton subcommittee, we were assured that this matter would be again most seriously considered early in January with the objective of securing legislation which would end the present threat to our textile industry.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I urge that the distinguished Committee on Agriculture place the ever more serious cotton and textile problem first on its agenda next January.

RICE ACREAGE ALLOTMENTS

Mr. THOMPSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8490) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to rice acreage allotments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 353 (b) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, be amended (1) by inserting in the first sentence thereof the words "in the State" immediately following the words "persons who have produced rice", (2) by inserting in the second sentence thereof the words "in the State" immediately following the words "persons who will produce rice" and immediately following the words "but who have not produced rice", and (3) by adding at the end of subsection (b) a new sentence reading as follows: "The planting of rice in 1957 or any subsequent year on a farm for which no rice acreage allotment was established shall not make the farm eligible for an allotment as an old farm or the producers on the farm eligible for allotments as old producers under this section: Provided, however, That by reason of such planting the farm or the producers, as the case may be, shall not be considered as ineligible for a new farm allotment or new producer allotment, as the case may be, under the preceding sentence of this subsection."

SEC. 2. Section 353 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (f) reading as follows: "(f) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, the acreage allotment established, or which would have been established, for a farm or any part thereof which is removed from agricultural production because of acquisition in 1955 or thereafter by any Federal, State, or other agency having a right of eminent domain shall be placed in an allotment pool and shall be used only to establish allotments for other farms owned or acquired by the owner of the farm or any part thereof so acquired by such agency: Provided, That such owner must make application therefor within 3 years after the end of the calendar year in which such farm or any part thereof was removed from agricultural production: Provided further, That the allotment so made for any farm, including a farm on which rice has not been planted to any of the five crops of rice preceding the crop for which the allotment is made, after taking into consideration the allotment acreage which was placed in the pool from the farm or any part thereof acquired from the applicant, shall be comparable with the allotments established for other farms in the same area which are similar except for the past acreage of rice."

SEC. 3. Section 356 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended (1) by adding at the end of subsection (a) a new sentence reading as follows: "Effective beginning with the 1958 crop, the rate of penalty on rice shall be 65 percent of the parity price per pound for rice as of June 15 of the calendar year in which the crop is produced.", and (2) by adding at the end of such section a new subsection (h) reading as follows: "(h) Whenever, in any marketing year, marketing quotas are not in effect with respect to the crop of rice produced in the calendar year in which such marketing year begins, all marketing quotas applicable to previous crops of rice shall be terminated, effective as of the first day of such marketing year. Such termination shall not abate any penalty previously incurred by a producer or relieve any buyer of the duty to remit penalties previously collected by him."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

POSTAL RATE INCREASE

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to include a telegram.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have here a telegram sent by the Postmaster General to the majority leader of the United States Senate, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, which reads as follows:

> AUGUST 28, 1957.
>
> Hon. LYNDON JOHNSON, > Majority Leader, United States Senate,
> Washington, D. C.:
>
> In the public interest, I respectfully appeal to you and all Members of the United States Senate to take such measures as are necessary to secure the passage by the Senate at this session the postal rate increase bill that will yield approximately half a billion dollars a year in new revenues, thereby providing revenues to reduce the current $2 million a day operating loss to the Post Office Department. The anticipated $686 million postal deficit for this fiscal year will bring the total losses of the 12 postwar years to more than $6 billion. This amount, in most part, is an unconscionable subsidy to the large users of the mails at the expense of the American taxpayer. This legislation was passed by the House of Representatives weeks ago by the overwhelming vote of 256 to 129. Hearings have been held again and again and representatives of all affected groups have been heard in recent days. I respectfully urge the Congress to enact at this session this legislation, thereby contributing to the maintenance of a balanced Federal budget, providing an added safeguard against the necessity of an increase in the national debt ceiling and helping to bring about eventual tax relief for millions of taxpayers.

This telegram is signed by Arthur E. Summerfield, Postmaster General.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, for 20 years I have done very little quoting in my extensions of remarks. But this session has kept up so long I am entirely out of ideas of my own and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent to extend in three instances quotations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

RESOLUTIONS OF KANSAS DEPARTMENT OF AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include two resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to re request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I believe Members of the House will be interested in reading two resolutions adopted by the Kansas Department of the American Legion at its State convention held at Hutchinson, Kans., August 23–25, 1957. Here is what they say:

> Whereas the Armed Forces of the United States are continuing to discharge or release thousands of war veterans, many of whom are disabled and will need counseling, and employment assistance; and
>
> Whereas a majority of these war veterans are young and had no civilian employment experience before their service with the Armed Forces, and many of them will seek the help of the Veterans Employment Service to obtain gainful employment: Now, therefore, be it
>
> Resolved, That the Department of Kansas of the American Legion in regular convention in the city of Hutchinson, August 23–25, 1957, endorse this essential service and urge the Congress to appropriate sufficient funds to enable the Veterans Employment Service to do adequately the job so necessary to the security and welfare of the veterans; and be it further
>
> Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the national adjutant, the director of the economic commission of the American Legion, for appropriate action at the national convention in Atlantic City, N. J., September 16–19, 1957, and that copies be forwarded to our delegation in Congress, and to our United States Senators, urging them to give this resolution appropriate consideration.
>
> Whereas we are shocked by the announcement made by the United States Far East Command in Tokyo that Sp3c. William Girard of the United States Army will be surrendered to Japanese authorities for prosecution on a homicide charge while on duty on a military reservation occupied by the United States forces, and while discharging an assignment given him by his superior officers; and
>
> Whereas the ratification on July 15, 1953, of the Status of Forces Treaty of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and similar agreements with other nations, has deprived our servicemen of the traditional protection extended by our Constitution and enjoyed by United States servicemen on foreign soil, and now subjects our men to trial, imprisonment, and even the death penalty under foreign laws in foreign courts and prisons: Now, therefore, be it
>
> Resolved, That the American Legion, Department of Kansas, petition our representatives in the Congress of the United States to support legislation which will nullify that part of the NATO treaty and similar agreements referring to the status of forces and which deprives American servicemen of the protection of the United States Constitution, when serving in more than 50 countries in the world; and be it further
>
> Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent the Honorable ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL and the Honorable FRANK CARLSON, our United States Senators, and our Representatives in Congress.

HON. STERLING COLE

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, since our colleague, STERLING COLE, first came to the Congress I have watched his career with the greatest of interest. I know of his tremendous work in the Committee on Naval Affairs and at the time of unification how he helped save the naval station and how he saved and kept intact the Marine Corps. I have watched his most marvelous work in the atomic-energy field. I know everyone here rejoices that he has become such an outstanding expert in that field, and he will do much, I believe, to save the world from annihilation, and to develop industry and help in that field. I wish him Godspeed. I am grateful to him and to his wonderful family for what they have contributed to us here in Washington. He will take to his new international position a brilliant mind and dedicated service.

PERSONAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I was necessarily absent at the time of the following four rollcall votes, and that had I been present I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 202 of August 21, 1957, relating to the conference report on the supplemental appropriation bill for 1958. On a motion that the House recede and concur on Senate amendment No. 6, striking out funds for an additional airport in or near Washington, D. C., had I been present my vote would have been "nay."

Rollcall No. 203 of August 21, 1957, relating to the same conference report. On a motion that the House recede and concur with Senate amendment No. 54, providing an additional $475,000 for general construction under civil functions, Department of Defense, had I been present my vote would have been "nay."

Rollcall No. 204 of August 21, 1957, relating to the appropriation bill, 1958, for the Atomic Energy Commission. On final passage of the bill with an amendment, had I been present my vote would have been "yea."

ANTIDUMPING ACT, 1921

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 6006) to amend certain provisions of the Antidumping Act, 1921, to provide for greater certainty, speed, and efficiency in the enforcement thereof, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 201 of the Antidumping Act, 1921 (19 U. S. C. 160), is amended as follows:

(1) By striking out "he shall forthwith authorize" in subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "he shall forthwith publish notice of that fact in the Federal Register and shall authorize."

(2) By adding at the end of such section the following new subsection:

"(c) The Secretary, upon determining whether foreign merchandise is being, or is likely to be, sold in the United States at less than its fair value, and the United States Tariff Commission, upon making its determination under subsection (a) of this section, shall each publish such determination in the Federal Register, with a statement of the reasons therefor, whether such determination is in the affirmative or in the negative."

SEC. 2. Subsections (b) and (c) of section 202 of the Antidumping Act, 1921 (19 U. S. C. 161 (b) and (c)), are amended to read as follows:

"(b) In determining the foreign market value for the purposes of subsection (a), if it is established to the satisfaction of the Secretary or his delegate that the amount of any difference between the purchase price and the foreign market value (or that the fact that the purchase price is the same as the foreign market value) is wholly or partly due to—

"(1) the fact that the wholesale quantities, in which such or similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale for exportation to the United States in the ordinary course of trade, are less or are greater than the wholesale quantities in which such or similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale in the principal markets of the country of exportation in the ordinary course of trade for home consumption (or, if not so sold or offered for sale for home consumption, then for exportation to countries other than the United States).

"(2) other differences in circumstances of sale, or

"(3) the fact that merchandise described in subdivision (C), (D), (E), or (F) of section 212 (3) is used in determining foreign market value, then due allowance shall be made therefor.

"(c) In determining the foreign market value for the purposes of subsection (a), if it is established to the satisfaction of the Secretary or his delegate that the amount of any difference between the exporter's sales price and the foreign market value (or that the fact that the exporter's sales price is the same as the foreign market value) is wholly or partly due to—

"(1) the fact that the wholesale quantities in which such a similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale in the principal markets of the United States in the ordinary course of trade, are less or are greater than the wholesale quantities in which such or similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale in the principal markets of the country of exportation in the ordinary course of trade for home consumption (or, if not so sold or offered for sale for home consumption, then for exportation to countries other than the United States),

"(2) other differences in circumstances of sale, or

"(3) the fact that merchandise described in subdivision (C), (D), (E), or (F) of section 212 (3) is used in determining foreign market value,

then due allowance shall be made therefor."

SEC. 3. The heading and text of section 205 of the Antidumping Act, 1921 (19 U. S. C. 164), are amended to read as follows:

"FOREIGN MARKET VALUE

"SEC. 205. For the purposes of this title, the foreign market value of imported merchandise shall be the price, at the time of exportation of such merchandise to the United States, at which such or similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale in the principal markets of the country from which exported, in the usual wholesale quantities and in the ordinary course of trade for home consumption (or, if not so sold or offered for sale for home consumption, or if the Secretary determines that the quantity sold for home consumption is so small in relation to the quantity sold for exportation to countries other than the United States as to form an inadequate basis for comparison, then the price at which so sold or offered for sale for exportation to countries other than the United States), plus, when not included in such price, the cost of all containers and coverings and all other costs, charges, and expenses incident to placing the merchandise in condition packed ready for shipment to the United States, except that in the case of merchandise purchased or agreed to be purchased by the person by whom or for whose account the merchandise is imported, prior to the time of exportation, the foreign market value shall be ascertained as of the date of such purchase or agreement to purchase. In the ascertainment of foreign market value for the purposes of this title no pretended sale or offer for sale, and no sale or offer for sale intended to establish a fictitious market, shall be taken into account. If such or similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale through a sales agency or other organization related to the seller in any of the respects described in section 207, the prices at which such or similar merchandise is sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale by such sales agency or other organization may be used in determining the foreign market value."

SEC. 4. (a) The heading and text of section 203 of the Antidumping Act, 1921 (19 U. S. C. 165), are amended to read as follows:

"CONSTRUCTED VALUE

"SEC. 206. (a) For the purposes of this title, the constructed value of imported merchandise shall be the sum of—

"(1) the cost of materials (exclusive of any internal tax applicable in the country of exportation directly to such materials or their disposition, but remitted or refunded upon the exportation of the article in the production of which such materials are used) and of fabrication or other processing of any kind employed in producing such or similar merchandise, at a time preceding the date of exportation of the merchandise under consideration which would ordinarily permit the production of that particular merchandise in the ordinary course of business;

"(2) an amount for general expenses and profit equal to that usually reflected in sales of merchandise of the same general class or kind as the merchandise under consideration which are made by producers in the country of exportation, in the usual wholesale quantities and in the ordinary course of trade, except that (A) the amount for general expenses shall not be less than 10 percent of the cost as defined in paragraph (1), and (B) the amount for profit shall not be less than 8 percent of the sum of such general expenses and cost; and

"(3) the cost of all containers and coverings of whatever nature, and all other expenses incidental to placing the merchandise under consideration in condition, packed ready for shipment to the United States.

"(b) For the purposes of this section, a transaction directly or indirectly between persons specified in any one of the paragraphs in subsection (c) of this section may be disregarded if, in the case of any element of value required to be considered, the amount representing that element does not fairly reflect the amount usually reflected in sales in the market under consideration of merchandise of the same general class or kind as the merchandise under consideration. If a transaction is disregarded under the preceding sentence and there are no other transactions available for consideration, then the determination of the amount required to be considered shall be based on the best evidence available as to what the amount would have been if the transaction had occurred between persons not specified in any one of the paragraphs in subsection (c.).

"(c) The persons referred to in subsection (b) are:

"(1) Members of a family, including brothers and sisters (whether by the whole or half blood), spouse, ancestors, and lineal descendants;

"(2) Any officer or director of an organization and such organization;

"(3) Partners;

"(4) Employer and employee;

"(5) Any person directly or indirectly owning, controlling, or holding with power to vote, 5 per centum or more of the outstanding voting stock or shares of any organization and such organization; and

"(6) Two or more persons directly or indirectly controlling, controlled by, or under common control with, any person."

(b) Sections 201 (b), 202 (a), 209, and 210 of the Antidumping Act, 1921 (19 U. S. C., secs. 160 (b), 161 (a), 168, and 169), are amended by striking out "cost of production" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "constructed value."

SEC. 5. Section 212 of the Antidumping Act, 1921 (19 U. S. C. 171), is renumbered as section 213, and such act is amended by inserting after section 211 the following:

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 212. For the purposes of this title—

"(1) The term 'sold or, in the absence of sales, offered for sale' means sold or, in the absence of sales, offered—

"(A) to all purchasers at wholesale, or

"(B) in the ordinary course of trade to one or more selected purchasers at wholesale at a price which fairly reflects the market value of the merchandise.

without regard to restrictions as to the disposition or use of the merchandise by the purchaser except that, where such restrictions are found to affect the market value of the merchandise, adjustment shall be made therefor in calculating the price at which the merchandise is sold or offered for sale.

"(2) The term 'ordinary course of trade' means the conditions and practices which, for a reasonable time prior to the exportation of the merchandise under consideration, have been normal in the trade under consideration with respect to merchandise of the same class or kind as the merchandise under consideration.

"(3) The term 'such or similar merchandise' means merchandise in the first of the following categories in respect of which a determination for the purposes of this title can be satisfactorily made:

"(A) The merchandise under consideration and other merchandise which is identical in physical characteristics with, and was produced in the same country by the same person as, the merchandise under consideration.

"(B) Merchandise which is identical in physical characteristics with, and was produced by another person in the same country as, the merchandise under consideration.

"(C) Merchandise (i) produced in the same country and by the same person as the merchandise under consideration, (ii) like the merchandise under consideration in component material or materials and in the purposes for which used, and (iii) approximately equal in commercial value to the merchandise under consideration.

"(D) Merchandise which satisfies all the requirements of subdivision (C) except that it was produced by another person.

"(E) Merchandise (i) produced in the same country and by the same person and of the same general class or kind as the merchandise under consideration, (ii) like the merchandise under consideration in the purposes for which used, and (iii) which the Secretary or his delegate determines may reasonably be compared for the purposes of this title with the merchandise under consideration.

"(F) Merchandise which satisfies all the requirements of subdivision (E) except that it was produced by another person.

"(4) The term 'usual wholesale quantities,' in any case in which the merchandise in respect of which value is being determined is sold in the market under consideration at different prices for different quantities, means the quantities in which such merchandise is there sold at the price or prices for one quantity in an aggregate volume which is greater than the aggregate volume sold at the price or prices for any other quantity."

SEC. 6. The amendments made by this act shall apply with respect to all merchandise as to which no appraisement report has been made on or before the date of the enactment of this act; except that such amendments shall not apply with respect to any merchandise which—

(1) was exported from the country of exportation before the date of the enactment of this act, and

(2) is subject to a finding under the Antidumping Act, 1921, which (A) is outstanding on the date of enactment of this act, or (B) was revoked on or before the date of the enactment of this act, but is still applicable to such merchandise.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, H. R. 6006 is designed to amend the Antidumping Act so as to provide for greater certainty, speed, and efficiency in its enforcement. The bill was drafted by the Treasury Department in accordance with the directive of Congress contained in section 5 of the Customs Simplification Act of 1956—Public Law 927, 84th Congress—which called for a review of the operation and effectiveness of the Antidumping Act by the Secretary of the Treasury. A report was made pursuant to this provision of the law and was submitted on February 1, 1957. The Committee on Ways and Means recently conducted public hearings on the Treasury recommendations and other proposals to amend the Antidumping Act. The recommendations of the Treasury Department for amendment of the Antidumping Act, as further amended by your committee, constitute the bill now before the House.

H. R. 6006 has three principal features:

First. Assessment of dumping duties: Assessment of dumping duties is provided for in the present law if there are (a) sales at less than fair value of imported merchandise, and (b) injury to an industry in the United States resulting therefrom. Due to the wording of section 205 of the present law defining "foreign market value," and to Treasury rulings and court decisions construing this wording, it is possible to have situations arise where sales at less than fair value and injury are found, but where no duties can be collected. The bill would revise this wording and is thus designed to put an end to this type of situation which can now arise.

Second. Definitions: The new definitions of certain terms enacted in the Customs Simplification Act of 1956—Public Law 927, 84th Congress—would be incorporated into the Antidumping Act by the bill, with occasional modifications necessitated by the differences between the process of valuation for ordinary duties and the calculations of dumping duties. Customs officials would thereby be enabled in large measure to apply a similar set of definitions both in the calculations of ordinary duties and of dumping duties.

Third. Public notice and reports: Provision is made by the bill, as amended, for mandatory public notice when there is reason to believe or suspect sales of imported merchandise at a dumping price, and mandatory public notice by the Treasury Department and the Tariff Commission of their decisions in dumping cases, whether affirmative or negative, and the publication of reports containing the reasons therefor.

The present bill embodies all the amendments which the Treasury Department is prepared to recommend at the present time. The Treasury Department feels that no further amendment of the act is called for in the light of its experience in the administration of the act and that further amendment of the act should be made, if at all, at a future time when its probable results can be more clearly analyzed.

The Committee on Ways and Means received testimony and has had bills referred to it which would involve more extensive amendment to the Antidumping Act than is provided for in the present bill. Suggestions have been advanced for the amendment of the Antidumping Act to provide for a statutory definition of fair value, definition of the terms injury and industry to shift the burden of proof, for judicial review of the determinations of the Treasury Department and the Tariff Commission, Presidential review of dumping findings, and so forth. Consideration of these aspects of the act would involve reexamination of the basic policy issues involved in antidumping legislation. There is a wide divergence of views as to what the appropriate policy objectives of antidumping legislation should be and how they may best be implemented. Indeed, the views expressed to the Committee on Ways and Means on these matters were often diametrically opposed. Your committee is of the opinion that these matters require careful and detailed study and that amendment of the act in these respects at this time would be premature. The amendments to the Antidumping Act contained in H. R. 6006 are of a technical nature and do not involve any change in the basic policy of the act.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the bill by the House.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. What possible effect would this legislation have upon the dumping of Polish hams in this country?

Mr. COOPER. The same effect it would have on any other merchandise.

Mr. GROSS. Who determines whether a product is being dumped? Is that within the province of the Secretary of Commerce, the President, or whom?

Mr. COOPER. The Secretary of the Treasury. There are two important elements to bear in mind under the antidumping law which was enacted in 1921. The first is that the Secretary of the Treasury must find that there is dumping and the Tariff Commission must find injury to some American industry.

Mr. GROSS. Then is it discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. COOPER. It is discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury within the limits set out in the law.

Mr. GROSS. What is this language in the report which apparently gives discretion on the basis of "other circumstances of sale?" Is there wide discretionary power to take in other elements such as foreign policy?

Mr. COOPER. It is discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury to impose the dumping duties in proper cases. The present bill does not change existing law except to try to make it clearer and to add speed and efficiency to the administration of the present law.

Mr. GROSS. Is this language new—other circumstances of sale—or is that the present law?

Mr. COOPER. My recollection is that that is to conform the antidumping law to language in the customs provisions in the present law.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my objection to the enactment of H. R. 6006. To my mind it represents legislation advanced by the Treasury Department on the basis of inadequate consideration of the issues involved in the Antidumping Act. The Committee on Ways and Means acted in good faith in reporting out this legislation in an effort to accommodate the needs of the Treasury Department as these needs were expressed to the committee by that Department. The committee reports that the amendments to the Antidumping Act incorporated in H. R. 6006 simply constitute technical amendments to the act and do not represent an expression of opinion on the part of the committee as to the policy reflected in the administration of the act by the Treasury Department. I regard that as commendable caution on the part of the committee. Certainly the Treasury Department in its report on the administration of the Antidumping Act made pursuant to a provision of the Customs Simplification Act of 1956 did not provide any reasoned analysis of the Antidumping Act and the problems that have arisen in its administration. It construed its instructions in the Customs Simplification Act very narrowly. In the face of the controversy that has arisen over the Antidumping Act, it is entirely appropriate for the committee to reserve its judgment on any of the elements of this controversy.

I agree that the whole question of the policy represented by the Antidumping Act and the way in which it is to be implemented deserves the most careful and detailed study. The Treasury Department has not given the matter such study and our committee was not able to give the matter such study under the pressure of business of the first session and in the light of the complexities in the legislation that became apparent during the public hearings which our committee conducted in the last 3 days of July.

I would go further and say that it is even ill advised to enact the present legislation and to put into effect the amendments to the Antidumping Act contained in it. The amendments to the act contained in H. R. 6006 were not, I believe, adequately considered in terms of all their implications and ramifications. The Treasury Department contends that the major amendment contained in H. R. 6006—that is, the change in the definition of the term foreign market value—is required to correct an anomaly in the act. It is quite clear, and the Treasury does not deny it, that this so-called anomaly is of the Treasury Department's own creation and could be rectified by the Treasury Department on its own initiative. Moreover, this anomaly which has been in existence over 2 years as a result of certain Treasury regulations has not embarrassed the Treasury Department at all in the administration of the act to date and the Treasury Department admits that in the foreseeable future its correction will only serve the interest of one small segment of American industry. In this respect this bill constitutes special-interest legislation of the most narrow sort.

Let me say a word about this so-called anomaly that has arisen. It must be understood that in order to find dumping such as to warrant the imposition of dumping duties, the law provides that a class or kind of merchandise must be sold in the United States at less than its fair value and that such sales should be injurious to American industry. If such findings are made then dumping duties can be assessed equal to the difference between the foreign market value of the dumped goods and the price at which they are sold in the United States. The term fair value is nowhere defined in the act. For 34 years—from 1921 when the act was first enacted until early in 1955—the Treasury Department by regulation defined the term fair value as being identical with the term foreign market value as defined in the act. This definition was affirmed by the courts in several cases. Suddenly, in 1955, the Treasury Department decided to revise substantially the definition of fair value. To have done so after 34 years of established administration of the Act constituted an arrogation of legislative power on the part of the Treasury Department.

In order to bring the definition of foreign market value into conformity with the Treasury Department's definition of fair value the Congress is asked to amend the definition of foreign market value as it is presently and clearly defined in the law. This is what the Treasury asks us to do in H. R. 6006. It is in effect asking the Congress implicitly to approve of the Treasury Department's action in 1955 in redefining, by regulation, the term fair value. The Treasury Department has contended insistently that foreign market value had to be redefined by law to remove this anomalous situation. But since the anomaly arose because of the unilateral decision of the Treasury Department, why did not the Treasury Department remove this fictitious anomaly by withdrawing its redefinition of fair value? Cannot the situation arise again in the future where the Treasury Department will again, on its own discretion, revise the basic policy of the Antidumping Act by amending the definition of fair value once again and then come to Congress and ask that this anomalous situation be corrected once again?

Mr. Speaker, can the Congress be in a position of continually accommodating the legislation to the changes in policy in the administration of the Antidumping Act that the Secretary of the Treasury may wish to make at any time in the future? Can it do so without giving regard and attention and study to the question of what the appropriate policy for the Antidumping Act should be? Can it leave that to the Treasury Department and merely perform a cleanup function for that Department? I say it cannot and it should not. I say that the Congress must give careful attention to all the issues involved in the Antidumping Act and its administration and resolve these issues clearly and intelligently by legislation. We should not act on H. R. 6006 until we have done so. We should not accommodate the Treasury's so-called needs in the administration of the Antidumping Act until we have had an opportunity to assess and evaluate the administration of the act by the Treasury. Let me make myself clear. We need an Antidumping Act that will be effective in counteracting unfair and injurious price practices in international trade. But this basic policy objective is not spelled out in the act and the Treasury's administration of the act shows no clear and unambiguous recognition of what the basic policy of the act should be.

The Treasury Department has not been particularly helpful or constructive in identifying and evaluating the policy issues in this act. There are many features of this act about which the Committee on Ways and Means has received detailed comment and detailed suggestions. I am much disturbed, for example, by the absence of any provisions for judical review of the findings of the Treasury Department and the Tariff Commission under this act. I do not think that it is good procedure to permit the administrative agencies to exercise wide discretion in the administration of an act and to make decisions that can have far-reaching effects on American citizens and American business without the requirement that these decisions shall be subject to judical review. I am disturbed that there is no provision in the act such as that contained in the Trade Agreements Act with respect to other procedures for Presidential review of dumping findings. The administration of the Antidumping Act can have far-reaching effects on our international commerce and on our foreign trade relations with many countries. It is an important part of our foreign trade policy and therefore actions recommended under it are properly the subject for Presidential review.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that enactment of H. R. 6006 will reflect credit on the Congress. This legislation is not necessary. What is needed is a thoroughgoing review and study of the whole subject of our antidumping legislation and pending such a study no action would be the preferred and desirable course.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Speaker, the Customs Simplification Act of 1956 directed the Secretary of the Treasury after consultation with the United States Tariff Commission to conduct a review of the operation and effectiveness of the Antidumping Act of 1921, as amended, and report to the Congress with respect to his recommendations for amendments to the act which he considered desirable to provide for greater certainty, speed, and efficiency in the enforcement of the act. The legislation before this distinguished body today had its genesis in that study and essentially embodies the legislative recommendations of the Department of the Treasury. The Committee on Ways and Means has considered the legislation in public hearings and of course in executive session.

Mr. Speaker, before commenting on the legislation I would like to commend the Treasury Department for its work on this legislation and particularly commend the distinguished Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, the Honorable David W. Kendall, who directed the effective work done in the preparation of this legislation. Mr. Kendall and his associates who have worked to achieve this distinguished accomplishment can take justifiable pride in the development of this legislation.

The purpose of the Antidumping Act is to protect domestic producers from the injurious effects of the dumping of foreign merchandise in this country. Since its enactment the Antidumping Act has been the subject of little change until 1954 when it was amended to transfer some of the responsibility for the administration of the act to the Tariff Commission. Previous to that time the act had been administered under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Department of the Treasury.

The legislation before the House today can generally be said to make four principal changes in the basic law. These may be briefly enumerated as follows: First, the definition of the term foreign market value which is the basis for calculating the special dumping duty, would be amended so as to conform that definition to the definition of fair value set forth in the Treasury Department's regulation of April 8, 1957; second, the definition of certain terms contained in the Antidumping Act are changed so as to conform with the new definitions for these same terms which were provided for in the Customs Simplification Act of 1956; third, the adjustment allowed in the foreign market value taking account of quantity discounts would be changed so that considerations could be given to any difference in price due to differences in the quantities sold in the home and United States markets; and fourth, public notice and reports would be required by the Department of the Treasury and by the Tariff Commission of their decisions rendered with respect to dumping cases.

Mr. Speaker, during the work on this legislation by the Committee on Ways and Means in executive session two of the distinguished Republican members of the committee expressed an interest in offering further amendments to the legislation to improve the protection afforded domestic industry against dumping practices. My friends and colleagues, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIMPSON] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES], worked diligently and effectively to accomplish this purpose. Unfortunately time considerations were thought to preclude a thorough consideration of the amendments in which these members were interested. The Treasury Department has been made aware of the nature of these amendments and it is my hope and expectation that the Treasury Department in consultation with the United States Tariff Commission will make a careful study of these amendments during the adjournment period so that the Congress may receive the benefits of such a review when it next convenes.

In its broadest sense dumping is an operation in which a foreign producer temporarily offers his product well below the average market price. This may be done by a foreign producer to relieve him of a large inventory or it may be a planned program the purpose of which is to demoralize the market in a local area by selling below cost to drive out a competitor.

Experience demonstrates that even though the consumer may get a much lower price for an article dumped on our market this is only temporary until our domestic producer is destroyed, then the foreign price is advanced far higher than the domestic price. Many of our domestic industries are suffering destructive competition from abroad as a result of dumping. There are countries that resort to cartels as a means of dumping to kill competition. Tariffs are only partially effective in meeting the cartel threat to our domestic market. To really protect our market from the dumping of foreign goods requires an effective antidumping law, which I think we have before this House today.

Mr. Speaker, before I close I want to say this: I have been here about 40 years. In the First World War we tried to build up our chemical industry in this country. We did succeed in building it up. Then Germany, after it became rehabilitated after the war, started dumping chemicals here, with the result that it absolutely destroyed every chemical industry in this country. Then we had to start all over again. The result is that now we have a fine chemical industry all through the South and the North, yet we still have a threat from that and some other source. This act is to prevent anything happening such as did happen before.

You will find that that is true of your textiles, too. You will have dumping here in spite of the arrangements that have already been made with other countries. The textile mills of the South are going to be ruined by dumping unless legislation of this nature and some supplemental legislation is enacted to protect this country.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia briefly for a question.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it not true that the weakness in this legislation is that it fails to define injury and fails to provide any responsible department or individual to determine injury?

Mr. REED. I do not consider this or any other law that we enact as perfect law. It is about the best that could be worked out at the present time. It is something that will have to be studied all the time with changing conditions in the world and depending on what the countries do with their currencies and many other factors, of course. The other countries want to get into this market, the greatest market in the world. I want to say right here and now that our domestic market is the very heart of this Nation. When we surrender our domestic market, we throw our people out of employment. That is what brings on depressions. And it is bound to happen if we surrender our domestic market. These people have been rehabilitated at the expense of billions of dollars. Their machinery has been set up to compete with us and to cut our own throat. The time has come now when we must protect this market or we are going to go down under competition from abroad.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree with the gentleman's desire to protect our small American producers, but I fail to see anything in this legislation which will do that very thing. It does not do it and this legislation is not any better than the existing law.

Mr. REED. Well, I can only say to the gentleman that some people are natural pessimists and do not believe in anything. I do appreciate that my colleague is a strong protectionist.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. I, too, agree with the gentleman from New York in his desire to protect American industry and American production. At the moment, I am very much concerned with this trade deal that has been started with Poland. What are we going to get dumped on us from Communist Poland now by virtue of this $90 million to $100 million trade deal that the executive department is just embarking on?

Mr. REED. So far as that is concerned, we are going to have trouble from every country where they have cheaper labor than we have and where they have all this machinery which we have financed in those countries. This is only a step in the right direction to see if we cannot stop this. This will take care of your Polish ham situation.

Mr. GROSS. I am glad to take the gentleman's word for it. I regret that I am not better informed on the provisions of this bill, but I am glad to take the gentleman's word for it, that this is a step in the right direction. My concern is whether it even begins to go far enough to meet the situation that is presently before us, and the potential dangers of the situation.

Mr. REED. I agree with the gentleman that there is a dangerous situation developing all the time in this country. We have to protect this market. I have been in the Congress a long time. I have seen what has happened to industries in this country. I know what is happening to some of our industries now and not confined to any special part of the country, but all over the country. What we are trying to do is to protect our American industry. I have worked for protection here in the Congress for the full 40 years that I have been here. I have worked for protection every minute that I have been here. I have always worked to protect our markets.

Mr. GROSS. For instance, in this Polish trade deal, as I understand it, we ship the Poles machine tools, electronic equipment, and other products of our highly skilled industries. Apparently machine tools are no longer considered to be strategic. And in return for that, we get Polish hams and textiles and a long list of other products already in adequate or surplus supply from our own farms, industry, and labor.

Mr. REED. Well, I know that we have somebody to blame in this country for that. I remember in Italy seeing our tractors there which they could not use because the gasoline to run most of the tractors was about a dollar a gallon and they could not afford to use them. The tractors were rusting away and rotting away. That is what has been happening right along. I saw $10 million worth of machinery in a warehouse in Greece which they could not use. They bought back this machinery at a nominal sum and it was sold at a low price to people and it just sends the price up for our people here at home. I know something about these things that are going on.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have asked the gentleman from New York to yield simply because I want to say that having had the pleasure of serving with the gentleman from New York for 20 years, I have never seen a Member of this House who has worked more diligently throughout his career in the Congress to protect American labor and industry from unfair foreign competition. The gentleman from New York is the dean of Republicans in this House. He has served ably and well and I, as one Member of the Congress, am willing to accept the statements he has made here on the floor of the House with reference to this legislation being the best that we could get under the circumstances. I am happy to note that the gentleman from New York says there is still much to be done, and that he will be on the alert as usual to do whatever he can to protect us from foreign competition.

Mr. REED. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Ohio for his kind remarks.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I say amen, amen, and amen to the observation of the gentleman from Ohio. The work of the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] has been outstanding. He has worked ceaselessly. Not only for the protection of industry and labor in the United States but for the general welfare of the country. He is a great American and patriot, a man of great ability and integrity. The Congress can point with great pride that he is one of our Members.

Mr. REED. I thank the gentlewoman. I cannot plead guilty to all of these fine compliments, but they do sound pleasing to me.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I would like to express before the membership of the House of Representatives my compliments to the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER], on the manner in which he guided the committee's work on this subject and on the fairness and effectiveness which he has served as chairman during the 84th Congress and the 1st session of the 85th Congress. I am confident that I speak for the entire membership of the committee when I state that the leadership of the gentleman from Tennessee has been an inspiration to us all.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute simply in order to express my sincere appreciation to my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York, for his very kind and generous remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members desiring to do so may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as has just been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], this bill is a step in the right direction. I voted for the bill in the committee, and it is my intention to vote to suspend the rules and pass it at this time.

I believe the bill will aid somewhat in the making of determinations as to whether or not commodities are being offered for sale in this country at less than fair value. I believe it may speed up some of the determinations in that area as made by the Treasury Department.

But even though it is a step in the right direction, Mr. Speaker, it is a very small step, and there are some real long steps that should be taken if we are really going to afford American industry protection against discriminatory practices.

This bill does not have anything to do with the normal problems of the import and export trade, the problems that we normally try to correct by tariffs, such as the low cost of production in other countries as opposed to cost of production here; this bill deals with the subject of discriminatory prices. The antidumping law is supposed to protect domestic industry from the unfair practice of a foreign competitor offering a commodity for sale in this country at a price lower than he offers it in the markets of the world or in his home markets. This results in unfair competition with domestic industry. At times foreign-produced items are even offered for sale here below their cost of production.

That is the type of thing the antidumping act is supposed to attack and give protection against. But, Mr. Speaker, I say that even with this bill we are not going to give the industry of this country the protection it needs against discrimination of this kind and against unfair trade practices.

We are not asking in this bill, nor is anybody who asks for a stronger antidumping bill, seeking to have an advantage given to our domestic producers, even though we feel they are entitled to a certain advantage over foreign producers; we are just asking that by and large in the market place they be treated fairly and squarely, and that we protect them against unfair practices, one of which certainly is discriminatory prices.

Under present law there first must be a determination by the Treasury Department as to whether there is a sale at less than fair value. That in itself, however, does not give anybody any protection; they still have to go to the Tariff Commission and get a determination that an industry in this country is being injured. There is the crux of the matter, the difficulty of proving in many of these cases that injury actually is resulting or is likely to result. It is my view, Mr. Speaker, that corrective action must be taken in that area.

In the committee I offered an amendment to this bill to provide that dumping duties shall be applied unless there is a finding by the Tariff Commission that nobody would be injured. At the present time you start out with the assumption that even though a sale is being made below fair value, even though there is price discrimination, that no injury will result. The law requires that the matter must be referred to the Tariff Commission and no protection is afforded unless the commission makes an affirmative finding that an industry is being injured by the discriminatory practice. That is where you get into trouble.

I would suggest Mr. Speaker, that starting with the premise that price discrimination, sales here of foreign commodities at less than fair value, is bad, we should provide that antidumping duties should be imposed unless there is a showing that nobody is likely to be injured by the price discrimination. There is no purpose to be served in applying an antidumping duty if no domestic producer is likely to be injured by it. However, if we assume, as we certainly should, that the practice of offering foreign made goods for sale here in competition with domestic producers at less than fair value is unfair and practices that should be frowned upon, why should not corrective action be automatic rather than to be dependent upon the difficulties that result under the present law which requires a positive finding by the Tariff Commission that some industry is going to suffer injury.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin for his views. He has done much to enlighten the Members of the House on this legislation and I believe if his amendment had been adopted it would have been wholesome legislation.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman. I hope that we pass this bill today and I trust that the other body will try to attack this matter of making the injury test effective in the protection of our industries. Unless something is done in this regard the law will never be administered so as to carry out the basic intent of Congress which is that domestic industry shall not be injured by unfair practices.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

MODIFICATION AND EXTENSION OF PROGRAM OF GRANTS-IN-AID TO THE REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES FOR THE HOSPITALIZATION OF CERTAIN VETERANS

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 6908) to authorize modification and extension of the program of grants-in-aid to the Republic of the Philippines for the hospitalization of certain veterans, to restore eligibility for hospital and medical care to certain veterans of the Armed Forces of the United States residing in the Philippines, and for other purposes, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to assist by grants-in-aid the Republic of the Philippines in providing medical care and treatment for certain veterans", approved July 1, 1948 (50 App. U. S. C., secs.

1991–1996), is amended by striking out the first four sections therein and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That the President is authorized to assist the Republic of the Philippines in providing medical care and treatment for veterans in need of such care and treatment for service-connected disabilities through grants for a period of not more than 10 consecutive years, beginning with the year 1950, to reimburse the Republic of the Philippines for expenditures incident to the hospitalization of veterans in need thereof for service-connected disabilities. The total of such grants for any 1 calendar year shall not exceed the following amounts: For any year before 1955, $3,285,000; for 1955, $3 million; for 1956, $2,500,000; for 1957, $2 million; for 1958, $1,500,000; and for 1959, $1 million. If agreement is reached to modify the pain of assistance as provided for in paragraph (1) of section 2 of this act, the grants covering the first half of 1958 may be as much as $1 million.

"SEC. 2. The President, with the concurrence of the Republic of the Philippines, is authorized to modify the existing agreement between the United States and the Republic of the Philippines entered into to effectuate this act in either or both of the following respects:

"(1) To provide that in lieu of any grants being made after July 1, 1958, under section 1 of this act, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may enter into a contract with the Veterans' Memorial Hospital, with the approval of the appropriate department of the Government of the Republic of the Philippines under which the United States will pay for hospital care in the Republic of the Philippines of veterans determined by the Veterans' Administration to need such hospital care for service-connected disabilities. Such contract must be entered into before July 1, 1958, may be for a period of not more than 5 consecutive fiscal years beginning July 1, 1958, and shall provide for payments for such hospital care at a per diem rate to be jointly determined for each fiscal year by the two Governments to be fair and reasonable; but the total of such payments plus any payments for authorized travel expenses in connection with such hospital care shall not exceed $2 million for any one fiscal year. In addition, such modified agreement may provide that, during the period covered by such contract, outpatient treatment for veterans determined by the Veterans' Administration to be in need thereof for service-connected disabilities shall be provided by the Veterans' Administration under the conditions and subject to the limitations on outpatient treatment applicable generally to beneficiaries under Veterans Regulation No. 7 (a). In addition, such agreement may provide for the payment of travel expenses pursuant to the first section of the act of March 14, 1940 (54 Stat. 49; 48 U. S. C. 76), in connection with hospital care or outpatient treatment furnished them.

"(2) To provide for the use by the Republic of the Philippines of beds, equipment, and other facilities of the Veterans Memorial Hospital at Manila, not required for the hospitalization of veterans for service-connected disabilities, for the hospitalization of persons at the discretion of the Republic of the Philippines. If such agreement is modified in accordance with this paragraph, such agreement (A) shall specify that priority of admission and retention in such hospital shall be accorded veterans needing hospitalization for service-connected disabilities, and (B) shall not preclude the use of available facilities in the hospital on a contract basis for the hospitalization, examination, or outpatient treatment of persons eligible therefor from the Veterans' Administration.

"SEC. 3. The Veterans' Administration is authorized to provide the outpatient treatment specified in paragraph (1) of section 2 either through facilities maintained by the Veterans' Administration in the Republic of the Philippines or by contracting for such outpatient care.

"SEC. 4. For the purposes of this act the term—

"(1) 'veterans' means persons who served in the organized military forces of the Government of the Commonwealth of the Philippines while such forces were in the service of the Armed Forces of the United States pursuant to the military order of the President of the United States, dated July 26, 1941, including among such military forces organized guerrilla forces under commanders appointed, designated, or subsequently recognized by the Commander in Chief, Southwest Pacific Area, or other competent authority in the Army of the United States, and who were discharged or released from such service under conditions other than dishonorable;

"(2) 'service-connected disabilities' means disabilities determined by the Veterans' Administration under laws which it administers to be connected with the service described in paragraph (1) of this section."

SEC. 2. Such act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 7. The amendments made to the first four sections of this act by the act enacting this section shall not affect the availability and use of appropriations made before the date of enactment of this section for the purposes of this act as it then existed."

SEC. 3. (a) Paragraph IV of Veterans Regulation No. 6 (a), as amended (38 U. S. C. Ch. 12A), is hereby amended by inserting after "Provided, That" the following: "the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs may, in his discretion, furnish medical or hospital care, including treatment in the Republic of the Philippines for disabilities due to service in the Armed Forces of the United States to otherwise eligible veterans, irrespective of citizenship status or nature of residence: And provided further, That."

(b) Section 524 of the Veterans' Benefits Act of 1957 is amended to read as follows:

"Hospital care and medical services abroad

"SEC. 524. (a) Except as provided in subsections (b) and (c), the Administrator shall not furnish hospital or domiciliary care or medical services outside the continental limits of the United States, or a Territory, Commonwealth, or possession of the United States.

"(b) The Administrator may furnish necessary hospital care and medical services for any service-connected disability—

"(1) if incurred during a period of war, to any veteran who is a citizen of the United States temporarily sojourning or residing abroad except in the Republic of the Philippines; or

"(2) whenever incurred, to any otherwise eligible veteran in the Republic of the Philippines."

"(c) Within the limits of those facilities of the Veterans Memorial Hospital at Manila, Republic of the Philippines, for which the Administrator may contract, he may furnish necessary hospital care to a veteran of any war for any non-service-connected disability if such veteran is unable to defray the expenses of necessary hospital care. The Administrator may enter into contracts to carry out this section."

(c) Section 521 of the Veterans' Benefits Act of 1957 is amended by striking out "section 510 (a) (1) and section 510 (b) (2)" and inserting "sections 510 (a) (1), 510 (b) (2), and 524 (c)."

SEC. 4. (a) Title V of the Veterans' Benefits Act of 1957 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new part:

"PART D—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL CARE FOR COMMONWEALTH OF THE PHILIPPINES ARMY VETERANS

"Grants to the Republic of the Philippines

"SEC. 531. The President is authorized to assist the Republic of the Philippines in providing medical care and treatment for Commonwealth Army veterans in need of such care and treatment for service-connected disabilities through grants to reimburse the Republic of the Philippines for expenditures incident to hospital care of Commonwealth Army veterans in need thereof for such disabilities. The total of such grants shall not exceed $1,500,000 for the calendar year 1958, and $1,000,000 for the calendar year 1959. If agreement is reached to modify the plan of assistance as provided for in paragraph (1) of section 532, the total of grants for 1958 up to July 1 may be as much as $1,000,000.

"Modification of agreement with the Republic of the Philippines effectuating the act of July 1, 1948

"SEC. 532. The President, with the concurrence of the Republic of the Philippines, is authorized to modify the agreement between the United States and the Republic of the Philippines respecting hospitals and medical care for Commonwealth Army veterans (63 Stat. 2593) in either or both of the following respect:

"(1) To provide that in lieu of any grants being made after July 1, 1958, under section 531, the Administrator may enter into a contract with the Veterans Memorial Hospital, with the approval of the appropriate department of the Government of the Republic of the Philippines, under which the United States will pay for hospital care in the Republic of the Philippines of Commonwealth Army veterans determined by the administrator to need such hospital care for service-connected disabilities. Such contract must be entered into before July 1, 1958, may be for a period of not more than five consecutive fiscal years beginning July 1, 1958, and shall provide for payments for such hospital care at a per diem rate to be jointly determined for each fiscal year by the two governments to be fair and reasonable; but the total of such payments plus any payments for authorized travel expenses in connection with such hospital care shall not exceed $2,000,000 for any 1 fiscal year. In addition, such modified agreement may provide that, during the period covered by such contract, medical services for Commonwealth Army veterans determined by the administrator to be in need thereof for service-connected disabilities shall be provided either in Veterans' Administration facilities, or by contract, or otherwise, by the administrator in accordance with the conditions and limitations applicable generally to beneficiaries under section 512.

"(2) To provide for the use by the Republic of the Philippines of beds, equipment, and other facilities of the Veterans Memorial Hospital at Manila, not required for hospital care of Commonwealth Army veterans for service-connected disabilities, for hospital care of other persons in the discretion of the Republic of the Philippines. If such agreement is modified in accordance with this paragraph, such agreement (A) shall specify that priority of admission and retention in such hospital shall be accorded Commonwealth Army veterans needing hospital care for service-connected disabilities, and (B) shall not preclude the use of available facilities in such hospital on a contract basis for hospital care or medical services for persons eligible therefor from the Veterans' Administration.

In addition, such agreement may provide for the payment of travel expenses pursuant to section 2101 for Commonwealth Army veterans in connection with hospital care or medical services furnished them.

"Supervision of program by the President

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, in the 80th Congress, Public Law 865 was enacted to provide medical care for veterans who served in the organized military forces of the Commonwealth of the Philippines while such forces were in the service of the Armed Forces of the United States pursuant to the military order of the President on July 26, 1941. This law authorized an appropriation of $22,500,000 for the construction and equipping of a hospital in the Philippines to be known as the Veterans' Memorial Hospital. It was opened on November 20, 1955, and the construction cost was approximately $9,400,000.

The same act provided for an appropriation of not more than $3,285,000 as grants-in-aid during each of the ensuing 5 fiscal years for the operation of the hospital and the treatment of service-connected disabled veterans.

This hospital has operated well and has met a real need of these people who fought in behalf of the United States. In addition, it has served as a teaching hospital in a limited fashion for medical personnel in Southeast Asia. It is considered one of the best, if not the best, hospitals in that entire area.

While the American Government has a continuing responsibility in this field, the Philippine Government in fact and in theory controls this hospital and this is as it should be. The present bill is an effort to make the fact more abundantly clear by providing:

First. That the Veterans' Memorial Hospital may be used for cases other than those involving service-connected disabilities.

Second. Authorizing treatment of service-connected veterans on an outpatient basis.

Third. Extending the period of assistance from December 31, 1959, to June 30, 1963.

Fourth. Placing overall ceiling of $2 million for this purpose in any 1 year.

The bill also authorizes the treatment of American veterans who are in need of hospital care and who are residing, either temporarily or permanently, in the Philippines. Formerly such care was provided only for those residing there on a temporary basis. In this connection, the separate amendment which I have offered at the direction of the committee, provides that veterans suffering from non-service-connected disabilities who need medical care and who reside there shall be treated the same as veterans residing in the United States insofar as non-service-connected hospital care is concerned.

The bill is recommended by the Veterans Administration, as well as the Department of State and it is estimated that the maximum net cost of this bill will be approximately $8,500,000 over a 5-year period.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good bill and I shall support it, but I want to call the attention of the distinguished gentleman from Texas to the fact that we in these United States need some hospitals, too. I am sure he is well aware of the critical situation that we have in the State of Florida. I have had a bill before the committee for a long time providing for the building of a thousand-bed hospital in Florida. May I ask the chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs if he can give me any indication of what might happen to some of our servicemen who so badly need facilities of this kind?

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. The gentleman from Florida knows that the Administration today has the authority to build this hospital in Florida and I do not think any useful purpose could be gained by passing a bill to further authorize the construction when today the Administration has the authority to construct the hospital.

Mr. HALEY. The gentleman is well aware of the critical need for this facility in Florida. We need this hospital and I believe we are entitled to some consideration in this Congress for that hospital.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most excellent bill. It will help the United States, and it will also help our very best ally and our very best friend in all the world.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the previous speakers have said about the value and validity of this legislation. I have visited this hospital in the Philippines and I know its size and its qualities.

I think we are all anxious to see the utmost use made of it. Here is an institution which is designed for medical, beneficial use. It should be made as productive as possible. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think this is good legislation. I believe it will accomplish the ends outlined by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TEAGUE], and I recommend its passage.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I should like to add to that, that had we had such an institution heretofore, we could have saved a great many lives, because there were no suitable and adequate facilities for the veterans when they suffered so much for us. I am delighted that it is about to pass, Mr. Speaker.

A significant feature of this bill is the increased control the VA would have over admissions. At present VA determines service connection, but the Philippine Government determines medical need and actually admits. Under H. R. 6908, VA would make all determinations.

Some of those now hospitalized likely could have their medical needs met by outpatient treatment at a lesser expense if such were available. This would be provided for 5 years by H. R. 6908 for Philippine Army and guerrilla veterans.

Philippine Scouts—except those recruited under Public Law 190, 79th Congress for occupation duty—and other United States veterans with World War II service would be provided hospitalization and outpatient treatment for service-connected disabilities regardless of nature of residence or citizenship. The Scouts in this group served in Regular United States Army by voluntary enlistment while the Philippines were a possession of the United States. They suffered heavy casualties on Bataan in 1942, and only about 7,500 of the 12,000 serving in 1941 survived the fighting and the Japanese occupation.

The provision of medical care for the Scouts and other United States veterans residing in the Philippines would only restore benefits available before 1946 when the Philippines became independent and provisions restricting care in foreign countries to United States citizens temporarily residing there for service-connected disabilities applied.

A further significant feature of the bill is that the Philippine Government would be permitted to use for other purposes, at their expense, those beds in the veterans' hospital not required for the service-connected disability cases. Admission of such patients would afford a wider variety of clinical material and such utilization of the presently vacant beds should improve medical care through attraction of the best medical talent.

The bill contains a limitation of $2 million a year for hospitalization of the Philippine veterans presently eligible for treatment. The cost of this part of the bill for the first year and a half would be partially offset by the present authorization of $1,750,000 for reimbursement of the Philippine Government between July 1, 1958, and December 31, 1959.

As the New York Times says, in an editorial June 3, 1957, and I agree with every word they say, "most important, this Philippine memorial hospital could be made an invaluable place for research and training in the field of tropical medicine. The possibilities presented are enormous and the hospital and medical center could become the greatest and most useful memorial to the fruitful Philippine-American association. The background for such a project is almost ideal. The Philippines have been a magnificent laboratory in the field of tropical medicine for almost three generations. In addition to this scientific background, however, is the geographical background. Manila could become a training point for young men from Thailand, Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, and even Indonesia and Malaya. It could become a truly Asian health center. This is not an idle dream. It is a practical possibility."

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H. R. 6908, as amended?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PENSIONS FOR SERVICE IN MORO PROVINCE

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 73) placing certain individuals who served in the Armed Forces of the United States in the Moro Province, including Mindanao, and in the islands of Leyte and Samar after July 4, 1902, and their survivors, in the same status as those who served in the Armed Forces during the Philippine Insurrection and their survivors, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Philippine Insurrection was ended by the Presidential proclamation of July 4, 1902, in all parts of the Philippine Archipelago except in the country inhabited by the Moro tribes to which the proclamation did not apply; and

Whereas it was necessary for the Government of the United States to employ its Armed Forces, including insular forces, against numerous inhabitants of the country inhabited by the Moro tribes who were in armed insurrenction against the authority of the United States and/or political subdivisions thereof until in the year of 1913; and

Whereas notwithstanding the aforementioned proclamation, armed hostilities did continue in the islands of Leyte and Samar after July 4, 1902, necessitating the employment of the Armed Forces of the United States, including insular forces, against numerous inhabitants of the said islands who were also in armed insurrection against the authority of the United States and/or political subdivisions thereof; and

Whereas it has ever been the policy of the Congress to enact uniform and all-inclusive pension legislation for the relief of former members of the Armed Forces who were employed in upholding and/or enforcing the authority of the United States and its political subdivisions in the States, Territories, and insular possessions, thereof: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That (a) section 401 of the Veterans' Benefits Act of 1957 is amended to read as follows:

"DEFINITIONS

"SEC. 401. For the purposes of this title—

"(1) The term 'Spanish-American War' includes, in the case of any veteran, any period of service performed by him after July 15, 1903, and before January 1, 1914, if during such period of service such veteran served in the active military or naval service in the Moro Province, including Mindanao, and the islands of Leyte and Samar, before the first day following the last armed engagement between the military or naval forces of the United States and inhabitants of the Philippine Islands in the province or island in which he served.

"(2) The term 'World War I' includes, in the case of any veteran, any period of service performed by him after November 11, 1918, and before July 2, 1921, if such veteran served in the active military, naval, or air service after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918."

(b) The table of contents in the first section of such act is amended by striking out—and inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 401. Definition."

"SEC. 401. Definitions."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to provide pension at Spanish American War rates to veterans and their dependents who served in the Moro Province, including Mindanao and the islands of Leyte and Samar after July 4, 1902, and prior to January 1, 1914.

The rates of pension payable to Spanish American War veterans today vary from $68.73 to $135.45 per month. For widows the general pension is $54.18 monthly, or $67.73 if the widow was the wife of the veteran during his period of service.

This resolution is similar in purpose to bills which have been considered several times by the Congress in recent years. The last time that this legislation, or legislation similar to it, was reported was in the 84th Congress but it failed of final passage as was the case in the 83d Congress. The same situation prevailed during the 80th Congress. A slightly different proposal was passed by both Houses of the Congress in the 78th Congress and was vetoed by the President.

The bill will cover very few. The best estimate which the committee has been able to obtain is that approximately 500 veterans and 300 widows are involved. This is indeed a small group and in view of the average age of the veteran being estimated at 78, it is readily apparent that the legislation will have limited application.

The period of service is one in which there were considerable hostilities and over 15 Congressional Medals of Honor were awarded for service during this period.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA] the author of the resolution.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the fact that House Joint Resolution 73 was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, I wish to say that this comes only from the circumstance that I am the last veteran of the war with Spain in this body. I deeply appreciate the warm friendship accorded by the chairman and the members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and by my colleagues on both sides of the aisle.

I am filled with emotion for the understanding and the recognition in comradeship that so often in this body, composed of many veterans of later and larger wars, have been accorded to the just causes of a war so long ago and of which the gentleman from Illinois is the sole survivor in this chamber.

This bill is one of 10 measures of similar character. The authors of the other 9 all have worked diligently and devotedly and are jointly responsible, with the gracious approval of the leadership of both the majority and the minority, for bringing up this proposed legislation under suspension of the rules and before the final days of the 1st session of the 85th Congress have ended.

House Joint Resolution 73, while it bears the name of the gentleman from Illinois for the reason given, is equally the bill of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CUNNINGHAM], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DENTON], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT], the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MACK], the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SILER], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. VAN PELT], and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WIER].

It is a most representative array. Some are Democrats, some are Republicans. The East, the West, the North and the South all are represented. For all my comrades of the war with Spain, their families and their friends, from the bottom of my heart I voice our thanks.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. I am happy to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I think it is only fair that the record should show that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'Hara] has devoted himself untiringly to get this resolution out of committee and bring it into the House today. The gentleman has been most pleasantly and persuasively persistent and I might say that it would be most difficult for the leadership on both sides to resist not only the personality, but the charm and the logic of my friend from Illinois. It is only right that those who benefit from the passage of this resolution know of the great services rendered by my friend from Illinois [Mr. O'Hara].

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the sentiment of the majority leader. The gentleman from Massachusetts has been a tower of strength in times of need, blending the qualities of wise and firm leadership with the qualities of sweet and understanding friendship. I am deeply grateful to the leadership on both sides, to our beloved Speaker, and our beloved former Speaker, Minority Leader Martin, for the help that so unfailingly and with such gracious generosity they have extended not merely to me, but through me to my comrades in a war of more than half a century ago. I am deeply grateful, too, to the great and outstanding veteran of World War II, who is chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs [Mr. Teague], to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. Rogers], and to each and every member of the committee.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. I gladly yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, whose labors in many Congresses have enthroned her in the hearts of America's veterans.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the Spanish-American War veterans owe the gentleman from Illinois a debt of gratitude for getting this bill and a similar bill out of the committee and onto the floor and passed. As the gentleman knows, this same bill, practically, has passed the Congress several times. I know how hard the gentleman has worked for his colleagues, the veterans of the Spanish-American War, and for their widows. We hope the bill will pass the House and that it will pass the other body also.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. May I say to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts that I was deeply moved the other day when in the closing days of this session she took the well of the House to prod the other body into following our example in voting relief to the widows of the veterans of the Spanish-American War, who are struggling along on very little money and are greatly in need. The House in its generosity passed the bill early in the session giving this relief. We hope that in the remaining hours or days of the session favorable action will be taken in the other body.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman if 15 of the men covered by this bill were not Congressional Medal of Honor men?

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. That is the fact. Fifteen Congressional Medals of Honor were issued to American soldiers serving in the Philippines in the Moro Provinces after the 4th day of July 1902.

This bill should have been enacted a long, long time ago.

Many things happened in the period of the War With Spain that are difficult for later generations to grasp. It all came from our state of total unpreparedness. There were no records, except the scantiest, very little medicine, unfit food. Missions were executed without the formality of authorizing orders. Ships of war put to sea, and in some instances were actually in combat before members of their crews had been sworn in, the actual mustering in being delayed until the immediate emergency was over, a circumstance that has operated to deny to some of the naval veterans of the War With Spain the pension rights that they unquestionably had earned but which could not be shown by the records. I hope that this injustice can be corrected while the last Spanish-American War veteran yet remains in the Halls of Congress.

The bill now under consideration corrects the injustice from which the veterans of certain campaigns in the Philippines long have suffered. I will explain it briefly.

The Philippine Insurrection was officially ended July 4, 1902, by proclamation. But it actually continued very much longer in the Moro Province and on the islands of Leyte and Samar. From February 1903 to January 27, 1913, there were no less than 105 battles in which American troops were engaged. There were 1,514 deaths from battle wounds and disease. These are from the figures furnished by the Archivist of the United States.

If any further proof were necessary of the intense nature of this fighting, the conditions under which it was waged, and the sublime manner in which our troops met the challenge, it is furnished by the fact mentioned by Mr. Rogers that a total of 15 Congressional Medals of Honor were conferred upon its participants.

Yet, all during the years since the Congress voted pensions to the veterans of the war with Spain, the expedition into China, and the campaigns in the Philippines, the veterans in the Moro Province and on the islands of Leyte and Samar, who stood the brunt of 105 battles, suffered death casualties of 1,514, and won 15 Congressional Medals of Honor, have been left out in the cold. It is unthinkable that this should continue.

It must be borne in mind that the Spanish War pension list is intended to cover not only those who fought against Spain but, as well, those who were engaged in the resultant insurrection in the Philippines and in the Boxer Expedition. The plain fact is that the arbitrary fixing of July 4, 1902, in an official proclamation, by inadvertence cut out the veterans in that area of events and years who had done the hardest fighting sustained over a longer period of time when certainly the fighting and the dying went on, regardless of what the official proclamation said.

How did it happen? The answer is simple. The troops that remained in the Moro Province and on the islands of Leyte and Samar were regulars. The pay for a private was something like $14 a month, as I recall. The volunteers had gone home. Everyone of course was rejoicing at their return. No one was thinking of the regulars back in the Moro Province and in the islands of Leyte and Samar fighting and dying. When July 4, 1902, was set as the shutoff date they were so engrossed in the job at hand that they could do nothing about it. The fact is they were so busy in the job of fighting and dying that they did not even know that someone was issuing a proclamation that the fighting and dying had ended.

Now they are old men, those who survived the campaigns, and only a few are left. That which they earned by their service, their sacrifice, and their suffering, too long has been withheld. I hope and pray that before the last of the little band that remains has passed to his reward, a great injustice, springing from an inadvertence and the muddled conditions of the times, will have its remedy in the enactment of House Joint Resolution 73.

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Denton].

Mr. DENTON. Mr. Speaker, I am wholeheartedly in favor of House Joint Resolution 73, introduced by the gentleman from Illinois. I introduced a similar resolution, House Joint Resolution 178.

This resolution would extend pension benefits under the laws reenacted by Public Law 269, 74th Congress, August 13, 1935, as now or hereafter amended, to persons who served with the United States military or naval forces in Moro Province, or in the islands of Samar and Leyte, after July 4, 1902, and prior to January 1, 1914, and to their unremarried widows, child, or children. I have heard from a number of these veterans living in Indiana, and I am convinced that they have a good case.

This bill, as House Joint Resolution 110, passed the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress; but no action on the resolution was taken in the Senate. I introduced a similar bill, House Joint Resolution 249. A slightly different bill was passed by both Houses of Congress in the 78th Congress and vetoed by the President. In the 79th Congress an identical bill was passed by the House, but died in the Senate, and a like bill was reported favorably by the 80th Congress.

The bill covers a comparatively few individuals. The present estimate places the number at approximately 500 and approximately 300 widows. Assuming these figures to be correct, and considering the rates of pensions applicable to both veterans and widows, it appears the maximum first-year cost would be $798,000. Due to the advanced age of the veterans, the cost would drop sharply with each succeeding year. The average age of the veterans is estimated to be at least 80, and the death rate is rapid for this age group.

The hostilities in which these men were engaged were the very longest in which American troops were ever engaged. They lasted for nearly 12 years. During that time there were nearly 150 bloody engagements and the casualties are numbered in the thousands. The enemy was a formidable one. Our very best officers who were to become famous in World War I received much of their combat experience in these hostilities. The names of Pershing, Wood, Bliss, and March are indelibly inscribed upon the records of these hostilities. These troops under that leadership pacified more than 57,000 square miles of the Philippine Archipelago. They fought to uphold and/or enforce the authority of the United States on United States soil. Fifteen of them were awarded the very highest decoration within the gift of this Government—the Congressional Medal of Honor; and now, after a 43-year wait, they seek a reasonable measure of relief at the hands of the Government they served so long and so well.

My understanding is that this legislation has been opposed in previous years because the hostilities occurred after the official ending date of the Philippine Insurrection. The 150 engagements, therefore, are termed "peacetime police actions." However, since July 4, 1904—the official ending date of the Philippine Insurrection—we have cheerfully legislated war veteran benefits for the veterans of the peacetime police action in Korea, and we have pensioned the veterans of still another peacetime police action, known as the Boxer Rebellion. Likewise, in 1927, the Congress, following the long-established national policy of caring "for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow and orphan," pensioned the veterans of numerous undeclared Indian hostilities from the year of 1817 through 1898. These laws are still in force. The enactment of this House joint resolution, therefore, would be in line with traditional policy, instead of establishing a precedent. It would correct an inequality of some 34 years' duration. Actually, there is reason to believe that the Congress fully intended to include this group in Public Law 256, 66th Congress. That act includes all veterans of the Philippine Insurrection, as well as the veterans of the cited peacetime Boxer Rebellion, but that act did not fix beginning and ending dates for either of these conflicts, and it was not until after the enactment of this law that those who served after July 4, 1902, were denied veteran status. The War Department ruled them out on a weak technicality, but before so doing had awarded all veterans who participated in the Philippine hostilities from the official date of the insurrection, that is, April 12, 1899, through 1913, identical Philippine campaign medals.

As this House joint resolution recites, the Congress has heretofore wisely pensioned those who were engaged in similar hostilities to uphold and/or enforce the authority of the United States in its Territories and insular possessions; and since the average age of the veterans under consideration is now more than 80 years, I urge the House to leave no stone unturned to pension these old veterans before it is forever too late. Since there are so few of them living, the cost would be slight when compared with other Government expenditures.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House suspend the rules and pass House Joint Resolution 73 as amended?

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the joint resolution was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO DECLARE A RECESS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that for the balance of this session it may be in order for the Speaker to declare a recess at any time subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

KNOX CORP., THOMSON, GA.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 2904) for the relief of the Knox Corp., of Thomson, Ga., with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment as follows:

Page 2, lines 1 and 2, strike out "in excess of 10 per centum thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand the only change in this bill is to eliminate the 10-percent proviso as to legal fees.

Mr. LANE. That is the only change.

Mr. MARTIN. The reason you make the change is that no lawyer is connected with the case?

Mr. LANE. That is the right answer.

Mr. GROSS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is this bill all about?

Mr. LANE. The author of the bill is right here. It is a private claims bill. It has already passed the House. The Senate amended it by striking out the attorneys' fee proviso of the bill. We find that no attorney handled this bill, so we are willing to strike out the 10-percent clause.

Mr. GROSS. May I ask the gentleman handling the bill if this is going to cost the Federal Government any money?

Mr. LANE. Yes, it will; $7,809. It is a private claims bill. It has already passed the House.

Mr. GROSS. I guess that will not contribute too much to the necessity for raising the debt ceiling.

I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

J. A. ROSS & CO.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 3468) for the relief of J. A. Ross & Co., with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$34,624.64" and insert "$17,410.08."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the House passed the bill with the amount of about $34,000 in it and the other body reduced it to $17,000 and you are accepting the amendments of the other body.

Mr. LANE. The minority leader is quite right. The bill originally called for $34,624 and now the other body has reduced it to $17,410. The author of the bill, who is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SHEEHAN] is agreeable to accepting the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ALBERT HEINZE

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 2075) for the relief of Albert Heinze, with an amendment of the Senate thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out "in excess of 10 percent thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this is similar to the first bill that was presented and that the 10 percent is eliminated because there is no lawyer connected with the case.

Mr. LANE. Exactly so. This bill was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BETTS] and we find out now there is no attorney and we are quite agreeable to that proviso being stricken from the bill.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 374) for the relief of certain aliens, with an amendment of the Senate thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that this is an amendment to include one person who was left out.

Mr. FEIGHAN. Yes; this resolution was passed by the House and contained provision for permanent residence for about 10 aliens. When it went to the other body, the other body amended it on the floor and added the beneficiary provided for in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TALLE], which was passed by the House previously.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I was very much interested yesterday when the immigration bill was passed in the House by the statements of some of the sponsors of the bill that it would obviate the necessity for having bills on the private calendar to handle immigration cases in the future. I seem to recall that when the McCarran-Walter Act was passed, we heard similar statements from the sponsors of that legislation that it would obviate the necessity of having long Private Calendars handling immigration cases—admitting aliens into this country by that method. I am going to be very much interested with the passage of the bill yesterday to see what happens to the Private Calendars with respect to the admission of aliens in the next session of the Congress. Seeing will be believing.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would simply like to say to the gentleman from Iowa, it is true that both of these pieces of legislation would reduce the number of private bills, but we will never have a situation where they will all be eliminated.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JUDGESHIP FOR THE DISTRICT OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2413) to clarify the authority of the President to fill the judgeship for the district of South Dakota authorized by the act of February 10, 1954, and to repeal the prohibition contained in such act against filling the next vacancy occurring in the office of district judge for such district.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate an additional district judge for the district of South Dakota as authorized by paragraph (3) of section 2 (b) of the act of February 10, 1954. The second sentence of such paragraph, which prohibits the filling of the first vacancy occurring in the office of district judge for said district, is hereby repealed. In order that the table contained in section 133 of title 18 of the United States Code will reflect the change made by this act in the number of permanent judgeships for the district of South Dakota, such table is amended to read as follows with respect to said district:

"Districts	Judges
* * * * *
South Dakota	2
* * * * * * * *"

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING HOUSE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS TO CONDUCT STUDIES AND INVESTIGATIONS OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES DURING 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up the resolution (H. Res. 412) to authorize the House Committee on Government Operations to conduct studies and investigations outside the United States during the 85th Congress, and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

> Resolved, That in performing the duties set forth in clause 8 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, during the 85th Congress the Committee on Government Operations, or any subcommittee thereof when authorized by the committee, is authorized to conduct studies and investigations, and exercise the powers conferred by such clause 8, outside the United States.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up the resolution (H. Res. 384) to amend House Resolution 104 of the 85th Congress and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That section 2 of House Resolution 104 of the 85th Congress, authorizing the Committee on Ways and Means to conduct thorough studies and investigations of all matters coming within the jurisdiction of such committee, is amended by inserting on page 1, line 9, after the word "within" the words "or without."

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING HOUSE RESOLUTION 157, 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up the resolution (H. Res. 275) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That House Resolution 157, 85th Congress, is amended by striking out the words "within the United States" where they appear on page 3, line 6, of said engrossed resolution and inserting in lieu thereof the words "within or without the United States."

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING HOUSE RESOLUTION 149, 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up the resolution (H. Res. 395) to amend House Resolution 149, 85th Congress, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, That House Resolution 149, 85th Congress, 1st session, is amended by inserting on page 2, line 15, of the said resolution, after the word "possessions," the phrase "and elsewhere within the North American Continent,".

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may need.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, the three resolutions just adopted, and the present resolution, all authorize certain committees of the House to do such traveling in the performance of their duties as provided in the resolution.

There is some question in the minds of some people about these resolutions. Personally, I am not prepared either to justify or to criticize in any particular case. I do know that in many cases these missions are justified, and we must assume that they will be and are justified in the present instance.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the usual time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MEADER] and ask unanimous consent that he may speak out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend and to include certain tables in my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEADER. Mr. Speaker, I have just introduced a bill to provide payments in lieu of taxes to local units of government on certain industrial plants owned by the United States.

In the 84th Congress I introduced a similar bill which became Public Law 388, signed by the President August 12, 1955. That law, for a temporary period of 4 years, requires the Federal Government to make payments in lieu of taxes on property previously owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any of its subsidiaries. It has provided relief to many municipalities, school districts, counties, and townships hard pressed financially because of the costs of services they rendered for which the Federal Government made no contribution.

Mr. Speaker, the properties covered by the legislation are in the custody of the Department of Defense or the General Services Administration. I requested both to supply me with information on the plants covered by Public Law 388 and the amounts paid to local units of government under that law. I incorporate the results of this inquiry at this point in my remarks:

Mr. Speaker, Public Law 388 had two defects which were recognized at the time. First, the law was temporary, expiring January 1, 1959. Second, it was found necessary to employ an arbitrary formula for describing the type of Federal property to which it applied. Many federally owned industrial plants on which in equity and good conscience contributions should be made to localities do not come within the 4 corners of Public Law 388, either because they never were owned by Reconstruction Finance Corporation or any of its subsidiaries, or because the title had not remained continuously in the United States as was required by the terms of Public Law 388.

I am sure those who supported Public Law 388 with me recognize those defects and are as anxious as I to correct them by making the law permanent and by adopting a more equitable formula for the description of Federal property subject to payments in lieu of taxes.

Accordingly, over the past several months, I have conducted a study aimed at achieving the above objectives. I employed on my staff a legal assistant, Mr. James A. Flynn, who worked with me and with the legislative counsel and attorneys and others in the agencies having custody of the properties concerned. The result of that study is the bill I introduced today. I hope it will meet with the approval of my colleagues in the Congress and will be promptly enacted into law. I am confident that no justification exists for resistance to the legislation by any agency in the executive branch of the Government. I am introducing it at this time so that during the recess of the Congress the committee may have ample time to obtain the views and reports of the agencies in the executive branch. That will make it possible for action to be taken on the bill early in the 2d session of the 85th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the unique character of this legislation and its fundamental philosophy. It is not a grant-in-aid from the Federal Government to local governments. It is not based upon the principles of hardship or need. It is not a handout. It is recognition that local governments must pay out of their own treasuries money to provide services for the benefit of the Federal Government on property it owns in the jurisdiction of the local government. Local governments provide roads and streets, sewers and gutters, police protection, fire protection, school facilities, and a host of other benefits. The federally owned industrial plant receives those benefits equally with a privately owned industrial plant adjoining it. Yet, without the legislation, because of the Federal Government's immunity from taxation by local governments, Uncle Sam will be getting a free ride; and to the extent that local taxes are escaped, the Federal Government will be draining from the treasuries of financially hard pressed local governments an unjust enrichment for the Federal Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, we have all witnessed, particularly in the last three decades, the tremendous growth in the National Government at Washington and a comparative lessening of importance of State and local governments. The tremendous sums taken from the people of the United States by the Federal Government for the cost of its operations has absorbed a higher and higher percentage of the total tax base and have made it more and more difficult for local governments to raise the funds necessary for their operations.

The effect of Public Law 388 and the bill I have introduced today is to offset the trend toward concentration of power and aggrandizement of the Federal Government at the expense of local governments. It does this by establishing the principle that the Federal Government should pay its fair share of the cost of services rendered for its benefit by local governments. To the extent payments are made in lieu of taxes the strength and the financial stability of the localities covered by the legislation are enhanced. Thus, my legislation is a step, if only a minor one, in the direction of greater democracy and improved self-government by contributing to the vitality of those units of government which are closest to the people.

Mr. Speaker, we are all aware of the tendency of agencies in the executive branch of the Government, notably the Department of Defense, to hoard whatever they have, particularly when they can do so at no expense. Requiring Federal agencies to make payments in lieu of taxes on properties benefiting from services by local governments and justifying the amounts of those payments to Congressional committees in their budget presentations may tend to discourage executive agencies from hoarding property not needed for any legitimate Government purpose. Thus, properties which ought to be declared surplus may be liquidated and the capital investment they represent either used to reduce the public debt or to contribute to reduction in taxes.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the legislation I have introduced is in the public interest and ought promptly to be enacted.

The text of the bill is as follows:

"Payments in lieu of taxes on industrial manufacturing plants

"SEC. 803. "(2) unless such property (A) was acquired by the United States after December 31, 1945, or (B) was owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (as defined in section 702) after December 31, 1945, notwithstanding any subsequent transfer thereof from such corporation to any Government department or person.

"(c) Nothing contained in this title shall establish any liability of any Government department for the payment of any payment in lieu of taxes with respect to any real property for any period before January 1. 1959."

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GROSS. With the exception of the last resolution, these resolutions will enable other committees, some of which already have that authority, to travel abroad. Is that not correct?

Mr. COLMER. I am not sure I understood the question. The gentleman said they already had the authority.

Mr. GROSS. Some have the authority, do they not?

Mr. COLMER. They have limited authority. This is specific authority.

Mr. GROSS. Not limited as to the expenditure of funds. Is not that correct?

Mr. COLMER. That is something with which the Committee on Rules has nothing to do.

Mr. GROSS. At the rate of exodus already started I wonder if there will be any counterpart funds left by the end of the year.

Mr. COLMER. I am sorry, I cannot answer the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. I wonder if the gentleman agrees with me that it is about time these committees—their staffs and the Members of Congress, and that includes both this body and the other body, pay for their travel and other necessary expenses out of funds appropriated to the committees? In other words, if they use counterpart funds, buy the counterpart funds and pay for them in American dollars, and then come back here and submit full and public accounts. That is the way I think this thing should be done.

I say to the gentleman that at the rate this foreign travel is being expanded and in some cases abused, Congress is going to have a beautiful scandal in its collective lap. Some of this spending in the past has been for junketing on the part of Members of Congress.

I am not going to force the issue on these resolutions at this late date, but certainly something ought to be done next year by the Committee on Rules or whatever committee has the authority to regulate this thing.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman's statement, the gentleman is usually correct in his position here on this floor in looking after the interests of the taxpayers of this country. I am sure that wherever these funds are used they ought to be accounted for, and I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair declares the House in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.), the House stood in recess subject to the call of the Chair.

AFTER RECESS

(The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Speaker at 4 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.)

HOUR OF MEETING AUGUST 30

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SIGNIFICANCE OF WISCONSIN ELECTION

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, since the upset election in Wisconsin last Tuesday the question everybody asks is, "What happened in your State?"

The answer, as I see it, Mr. Speaker, is that the people in Wisconsin have rebelled against excessive and oppressive Government spending. This is a matter that transcends party lines.

Upon the election of President Eisenhower in 1952 there was great hope throughout the country that economy would be the order of the day in Washington, that in some way he would bring an end to the prolific spending policies that prevailed in previous administrations.

We have now reached a point midway in the term of the President and yet there is not less spending but more. I can hear the rejoinder, Mr. Speaker, that much of this spending is caused by the so-called cold war situation and this may be true to some degree. At this moment, however, the American people are discouraged and dismayed by the insistence of the President that he must have every cent he has asked for in the foreign-aid program and money for all the other items in his budget request.

In the State of Wisconsin, the people have been protesting and on last Tuesday—at the ballot box—they had an opportunity to register this protest and they did so with a vengeance. I daresay that if other elections were held today or tomorrow in various other States, the result would be the same.

Just today, Mr. Speaker, I received a post card in which a voter expressed his views, perhaps crudely, but he says and I quote:

> I take the liberty of writing to you in regard to restoring the cut in the foreign giveaway program. This is outrageous as many here think and it is hoped that Members of Congress will insist upon the cut.

To restore the cut in funds that the House made in the appropriation for foreign aid is indeed outrageous, Mr. Speaker. Why is it that Congress is so far behind the thinking of the people? They do not approach this matter in terms of political parties but in terms of their own welfare.

The result in the Wisconsin election should be a warning not only to Wisconsin and to Wisconsin Republicans but to both political parties through the Nation. This Wisconsin result can well be a barometer of what can happen in the next election to every incumbent, Democrat and Republican alike.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Wisconsin vote was a repudiation of the philosophy that we can go on eternally spending and giving our money away under the guise of national security. As has been said, "We cannot spend ourselves rich," nor can we spend ourselves secure. This the people seem to know even if our leaders do not.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE TOMORROW

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the distinguished majority leader, if I might have his attention, what it is that brings the House into session at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning? Can the gentleman state what the business of the House will be tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock?

Mr. McCORMACK. A meeting at 10 o'clock seemed to be advisable in the minds of the leadership because nobody knows what is likely to break. If the situation should develop where we can dispose of matters tomorrow——

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman is being "iffy."

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman asked me a question and I will answer. If we can dispose of matters tomorrow the meeting at 10 o'clock would enable this to be accomplished more effectively than if we met at 12 o'clock.

Mr. GROSS. Now, if, if, as the gentleman says, thus and so takes place, then we will accomplish something more effectively by coming in at 10 o'clock tomorrow. Let me ask the gentleman this question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair allowed the gentleman to take all the time he asked for.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman from Massachusetts took most of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked a question and the gentleman from Massachusetts tried to answer it. Does the gentleman insist on his point of no quorum?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES GROUP OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the provisions of Public Law 689, 84th Congress, the Chair appoints as members of the United States Group of the North Atlantic Treaty Parliamentary Conference the following Members on the part of the House: Mr. HAYS of Ohio; Mr. McCARTHY, of Minnesota; Mr. SMITH of Mississippi; Mr. DOLLINGER, of New York; Mr. SELDEN, of Alabama; Mr. LECOMPTE, of Iowa; Mr. BECKER, of New York; Mr. CANFIELD, of New Jersey; and Mr. CORBETT, of Pennsylvania.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE TOMORROW

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Now that the important business of appointing delegates to go to London on the annual junket, known as the Interparliamentary Union Conference has been consummated, the gentleman from Iowa would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, the distinguished majority leader, if things do not develop as the gentleman thinks they will or hopes they will in the other body, are we going to have indefinite recesses tomorrow and sit around waiting for the other body to make up its collective mind to send some legislation to the House? How much longer are we going to sit at the throne of the other body and wait?

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman from Iowa, I am sure, gives the gentleman from Massachusetts credit for advising the House as to any situation.

Mr. GROSS. Oh, well——

Mr. McCORMACK. One thing I have never been guilty of is trying to be coy with my associates. I have always been as frank as I could be. I cannot answer the gentleman's question, neither can anyone else. I am not going to be caustic with my friend, who has been unnecessarily caustic with me, and I can be if I want to be, but I am not going to be caustic because I am unable to answer the question except, in my judgment and the judgment of the leadership, it is in the interest of the membership of the House to meet tomorrow at 10 o'clock. What will happen, I do not know. I hope for the best.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF STATE GOVERNORS' CONFERENCE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 35) to provide for the observance and commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the 1st conference of State governors for the protection, in the public interest, of the natural resources of the United States, with House amendments thereto, insist upon the amendments of the House and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? (After a pause.) The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. FRAZIER, ASHMORE, and KEENEY.

SOVIET ICBM UPGRADES UNITED STATES NAVY ROLE

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, Soviet claims to development of a missile capable of striking any place in the world with destructive accuracy may or may not be true. If they are true, the Soviets still are faced with a production problem of considerable magnitude. The real significance of the Soviet announcement is to highlight the ever-increasing role the United States Navy must play in the Nation's slowly evolving new defense concept.

It is a concept which must be based on atomic armed seaplanes, self-guided missiles, and an atomic-powered fleet.

As long as the retaliatory mission of our Strategic Air Command is tied to land-based bombers or land-based intercontinental missiles, a large number of which must be based in the continental United States, American homes, cities, and factories remain prime targets for surprise destruction by such weapons as the Soviet ICBM. Sixteen million casualties were estimated during last year's Civil Defense Administration's mock nationwide drill based on surprise attack.

But exactly the same circumstances and conditions can be applied to any system of Soviet offense based on ICBM missiles to be fired against the world from Soviet territory. Any such weapons land based within Soviet domains simply invite destruction of Soviet home territory. The whole history of Soviet international relations since World War I reveals a paranoic fear of destruction of home territory. In the interval between the two World Wars, Communist ideology as expressed by Marx and Engles was second placed to Stalinist 5-year plans aimed almost exclusively at moving old industries and creating new ones behind the protective wall of the Caucasus out of the historic path of invaders of the Russian Empire. This precaution spelled ultimate defeat for Hitler's invaders. Since World War II the same pattern has been starkly evident, both under Stalin's final regime and those that have followed to the present moment.

Momentarily the United States will have developed the ideal weapons system effective against the precise Soviet fear that can contain its aggressive desires, and at the same time relieve the continental United States from the threat of the Red ICBM.

Polaris, the Navy's newest ballistic missile, is well toward final development. It will be capable of being fired from submarines at ranges up to 1,500 miles. Combined with the long-range, high-speed and stealthy surprise of the Navy's new atomic submarines, its striking range will place 90 percent of Soviet industry and warmaking capability under the positive threat of accurate United States retaliation. It will place all but the most remote Red ICBM missile-launching sites under the same threat of retaliation. These are the exact circumstances the Soviets least want to see brought about.

But our eggs are not all in this basket. Superrange, atomic-armed seaplanes are now being developed by the Glen L. Martin Co. These can be tendered by atomic-powered ships with unlimited cruising ranges. Like the submarine fleet, this fleet can move from place to place about the world on predetermined, but irregular schedules. It would be almost impossible for an enemy to locate and destroy either type fleets. Both would stand almost completely free from surprise attack and constantly capable of accomplishing the destruction of the Soviet homeland which the Red rulers most fear.

With our retaliatory defense machinery completely mobile and away from our homes and factories, there is no foreseeable way the Soviets could use their ICBM to make an effective surprise attack against it. Without assurance of first destroying our ability to inflict death and destruction behind the Iron Curtain there is little likelihood that the Soviet ICBM would be fired on American homes and factories, for there could be no possible chance of ultimately defeating us.

It is up to the Congress and to the responsible officials in the Department of Defense to recognize these changed circumstances of our defense and this imperative need to renovate our defense concepts.

Added together they mean a prime reliance on the modern United States Navy as the country's strongest arm of defense.

THE FOURTH INDIANA DISTRICT

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, it has been my custom, since being elected to the House of Representatives, to conduct an official tour of the eight counties in the Fourth Indiana District following the adjournment of the Congress.

Inasmuch as the Congress has been in such a long session this year, I am planning this official tour later than usual, but want very much to meet personally with constituents. This affords an excellent opportunity to learn, at first hand, the views and problems of our citizens. Also, we may exchange ideas on legislative and governmental matters to be given consideration during the next session of Congress.

For example, in reviewing some of the legislative actions of this session, it is my firm conviction that people generally wanted reduction of governmental expenditures. While the Congress did not reduce budget requests as much as I had hoped, I personally voted to cut appropriations by more than $7 billion. All of the cuts I voted for were not sustained by a majority in the House and Senate, but in the final analysis Congress did trim the budget about $5 billion.

Again, with respect to the mutual security program—better known as the foreign aid bill—I voted against this proposal. The people of the fourth district, generally, I believe, are strongly against giving away our American dollars for these purposes of doubful merit. I feel that we can accomplish far more through the voluntary programs like CROP or CARE, and missions established by our churches in foreign lands than by pouring out our taxpayers' money. It has been shown by overseas reactions among many of the foreign countries that we have not won friends nor influenced people as we wished and expected by doling out to them foreign aid funds.

In maintaining the peace, it seems to me that this Congress has upheld the arm of the President as a strong guard against communism and has also shown the free nations of the world that our greatest desire is to halt aggression and force.

Domestically, I have supported legislation to broaden benefits and help those who have been pressed by inflation. This includes those on pensions and retirement as well as those who have faced the need for public assistance even in our unprecedented prosperity.

Moreover, in my efforts to serve best the people of our district and our beloved country, I have consistently endeavored to see that the problems of veterans, farmers, labor, and business have received proper attention and consideration.

Even so, there is much unfinished business left behind by this first session of the 85th Congress. It is my feeling that when we return home and talk personally with the people, we will be in a better position next January to carry out their wishes in legislative and governmental matters.

That is why I am particularly pleased that I can announce this district tour. Also, to state that the Congressional office in the district will soon be opened in room 310 of the Federal Building at Fort Wayne where I welcome visits from constituents to discuss and assist them with any governmental problems they may have. During adjournment, of course, our Washington office also will be open to serve the public.

It is my plan to be present for consultations with constituents in the courthouse in each of the county seat cities of the following counties—Adams, Wells, Whitley, DeKalb, Noble, LaGrange, and Steuben. After the tour is completed, for the eighth county—Allen—the Congressional office will be open at Fort Wayne, as stated above.

Here are the dates, times, and places of the official tour:

Thursday, October 3: Wells County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Bluffton.

Friday, October 4: Adams County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Decatur.

Monday, October 7: Steuben County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Angola.

Tuesday, October 8: Lagrange County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Lagrange.

Wednesday, October 9: Noble County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Albion.

Thursday, October 10: Whitley County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Columbia City.

Friday, October 11: De Kalb County, 10 a. m. until 4 p. m., courthouse, Auburn.

WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESS. Mr. Speaker, 100 years ago on September 15, this year, William Howard Taft was born in Cincinnati, Ohio. As a native and lifelong resident of Cincinnati, I cannot permit to pass unnoticed, an anniversary which I am sure every Member will want to honor.

William Howard Taft was born in Cincinnati on September 15, 1857. This year, therefore, marks the centennial of his birth. It is entirely proper that his countrymen should mark the occasion by paying tribute to the memory of one of the best-loved Americans of his time—or any time. The only man thus far to hold, respectively, the offices of both President and Chief Justice of the United States, his career as we view it—a quarter of a century and more after its close—is as rich in contribution as it is unique in scope.

There is a certain comfortable reassurance, a fundamental rightness about that long and fruitful life so that, pondering over the history of those times, instinctively one realizes, "This was a good life. Here was a great public servant." One of the noblest human traits, to me known, is the average man's instinctive recognition of goodness and fundamental integrity encountered in another, and no man ever came into the presence of William Howard Taft without becoming instantly aware that here indeed was a man without malice or guile. He had absolute integrity. He was, in the words of a friend, "honest, simply honest, transparently honest." His character was like a highly polished crystal, reflecting and throwing off light, impervious to soil or stain.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, in the very brief time at my disposal, attempt even the barest outline of a life of public service which began soon after Taft's admission to the Ohio bar in 1880 at the age of 22, and continued almost uninterruptedly until the end, half a century later. His first public office was that of assistant prosecuting attorney for Hamilton County, Ohio—to which he was appointed the year after he was admitted to the bar. In the following year he was appointed collector or internal revenue for Cincinnati.

Taft's real public career began with his appointment to fill an unexpired term on the Superior Court of Ohio. In the judicial life Taft found his true vocation; he never ceased to long for it, and through all the long busy years as Solicitor General of the United States, Governor General of the Philippines, Secretary of War, and finally President of the United States, his heart turned ever toward the judicial bench.

It was, therefore, one of the most fitting and satisfactory conclusions in American public life that, after a lifetime of unselfish service to his country and to the little brown brothers, as he used to call the people of the Philippines; after the vicissitudes of the Presidency—the only shadowed chapter in a life otherwise singularly sunny—a great public servant at last came into his own, and William Howard Taft ascended the bench as Chief Justice of the United States.

Years before when, as President, Taft signed the commission of Edward Douglass White as Chief Justice, he sighed, "To think I am giving this commission for the office I wanted myself." And now Taft was Chief Justice—succeeding the very man he had himself appointed so long ago. I repeat, it was one of the happiest, most fitting conclusions of a great and noble life of which history bears record.

William Howard Taft brought to the great office of head of the most august judicial court on earth that broad and balancing serenity which had characterized his long and illustrious career. He brought more than that—he brought profound legal knowledge and rich experience in the world of affairs. More and greater than all of this, he brought to the supreme bench the sympathy and understanding of one who knew and loved his fellow men. He brought integrity.

The people of Cincinnati and the members of the William Howard Taft Memorial Association pay tribute on the centennial of his birth to William Howard Taft with pride and deep affection arising from the contemplation of an honorable, useful, and noble life.

POST OFFICE AND FEDERAL BUILDING FOR COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 14, 1957, I had inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, along with my own remarks, the unbelievable but true story about the long and futile fight for a new post office and Federal building for Council Bluffs, Iowa—a city of 50,000 people—by Frank M. Lane.

That story gives cause for those responsible to hang their heads in shame.

Here is a very short synopsis of the story:

In 1950 the old, but very serviceable and beautiful post office and Federal building was condemned, and in 1951 torn down. Had a few thousand dollars been spent on the underpinnings of that building, it would have served its purpose for at least another 50 years, but, no, it was torn down and the old material sold for a pittance—and mind you, that was done before any plans, or appropriations, were even in the making for a new building. An old unsuitable pavilion was then rented for the post office by Uncle Sam for $1,000 per month, and about a dozen Federal offices were scattered all over town, costing the Government an additional $800 per month, or thereabout, while the Federal court is housed in the county courthouse, and that situation still exists this very minute.

Now, I will bring this sad spectacle up to date.

As is general knowledge, in the session of the 1953 Congress passed the Lease-Purchase Act. Its purpose was to build such Federal buildings, financed by private capital and Uncle Sam to pay rent for a period up to 20 years on such a basis as to amortize the cost of the building, after which it would become the property of Uncle Sam. Congress approved many scores of such building projects in 1954 and 1955—in every State of the Union. The Council Bluffs building was placed No. 1 on that list because it was the place where such a building was most needed. Plans and specifications were drawn for our building, as was the case for a number of other buildings on the approved list. Bids were called for in 1956, but by that time interest rates had risen to a point where only one contract could be let—all the other bids were rejected, including the bids for the Council Bluffs building, because those bids were above the maximum costs as designated by Congress.

About 60 days ago, the Senate amended the original Lease-Purchase Act in such a way as to permit these buildings to be constructed under that act—but, lo and behold, another big monkey wrench was thrown into the machinery by the House Committee on Public Works. To the great surprise—and may I say the disgust—of a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives, the House Public Works Committee by a strict party vote turned thumbs down on the Senate-amended Lease-Purchase Act, and voted out a bill that is completely new, which provides for direct appropriation from the United States Treasury in the amount of $1,500,000,000 over a 5-year period, to build such Federal buildings.

Now, to show the inconsistency of their bill, the committee approved six large Federal buildings to be built here in the District of Columbia under the rental amortization plan—so, the lease-purchase plan is good for the District of Columbia, but bad for Council Bluffs, say they.

Now the facts are, the least informed Member of Congress knows full well that the next Congress, or any Congress in the foreseeable future, will not appropriate such a large sum of money for this purpose. So I daresay there can be but one answer—and only one answer—for the action taken by that committee on this matter; which is that, next year being an election year, they hope to pass some kind of a bill through Congress to build these buildings, and thereby make political hay while it is fresh on the voter's mind.

The bill which the committee voted out then had to go to the House Rules Committee, where it is buried deep for this session because, had the bill come to the floor of the House, the amended Senate bill could easily have been substituted for the committee bill, and the powers that be in the House know it only too well.

That completes the sad story up to date.

Where we go from here, only time can tell.

A BILL TO EXTEND THE NATIONAL WOOL ACT OF 1954

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMSON of Wyoming. Mr. Speaker, I am joining with several of my colleagues this date in introducing a bill to extend the National Wool Act of 1954 for an additional 4 years to March 31, 1963. The act is presently due to expire March 31, 1959. It is essential, however, that legislation be enacted early in the next session to extend the act, if we are to avoid the harmful effect of uncertainty within the industry.

Wool and sugar are two of the few, if not the only two, major agricultural crops which we produce in this country that are not produced in surplus or in excess of our rate of consumption. We produce in this country less than half the wool which we consume. Nevertheless, prior to enactment of the National Wool Act of 1954, the sheep and wool industry in the United States was in difficult straits and the situation was constantly becoming worse. The total number of sheep raised in the United States had dropped from 49,346,000 in 1942 to 27,079,000 in 1954. This drop can be attributed mainly to price ceilings during the war and increase in imports during the war and thereafter in the face of rising costs to domestic producers. Even so, the tariff on wool was further reduced by over 25 percent in 1948, or reduced from 35 cents a clean pound to 25½ cents. The American producer could simply not compete with the lower living standards and the lower wages and lower cost of production in other areas. The result was a shift in production from sheep to cattle. The result, in my opinion, was to depress the cattle market and to contribute substantially to our overall agricultural problem. By far the greatest portion of our farm income comes from livestock and livestock products. We were faced with another very real problem. Wool is an important strategic material. Our domestic production was far below the safe level for our national security and was continually decreasing.

In addition to that, under a conventional-type support program, the stockpile of wool was building up Government storage at taxpayers' expense, which further depressed the market price. This stockpile had grown to 150 million pounds. Faced with this situation, in 1954, on the recommendations of the administration, the National Wool Act of 1954 was passed. It does not provide for an agricultural payment in the conventional sense; it provides for payment in lieu of tariff, payable solely out of 70 percent of the tariff revenues on the wool that is imported, and is not payable from the revenues collected from general taxes. This is known as an incentive payment. The effect has been to strengthen our domestic wool industry and to strengthen domestic prices. The Government surplus stockpile has been reduced from 150 million pounds to about 20 million pounds. In the first years, payments ran much larger than expected. The effect of the act is now being reflected. Domestic prices are improved and the payment will be reduced to an estimated $21 million for the current clip, as compared to payments of $58 million in the initial year of operation. The decline in our sheep numbers has been slowed. The act is tending to achieve its goals. An extension, however, in the first part of the next session is essential to permit uninterrupted improvement. The improvement is not limited to the woolgrowers. It extends to the processers and manufacturers. The extension of this act is important to the Nation as a whole.

I urge that such be made the first order of business in the next session.

I personally believe that the true solution of this problem and the problems of an increasing number of our domestic industries is by adequate tariffs or import quotas. I do not believe that we can maintain the pay scale paid to our American workers, maintain our American industries and jobs, or preserve our American standard of living unless this is done. I believe that it is in the best interests of the Free World that such be done. In doing so we can still permit friendly nations to share in the growth of America and the expansion of our markets. I believe that such general legislation should be favorably considered. Until that is done, however, it is essential that we extend the National Wool Act of 1954.

THE UNITED STATES AND ITS ECONOMIC, POLITICAL, AND MILITARY POWER

Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, these closing weeks of this first session have produced a truly remarkable spectacle.

We have witnessed the birth, early adolescence and frightening maturity of a new faction of advocates of dollar-economy.

Against a background of the greatest economic, political, and military power ever amassed by a single nation—the United States—these new-found disciples of thrift have deliberately and consciously distorted the praiseworthy virtue of economy to undermine the principal bulwark against global communism.

At a time when the Soviet Union is announcing new and successful ventures into military strength, ill-advised cuts in our own budget have served only to weaken our own strength.

At a time when the United States is more prosperous than ever; when the grave Syrian crisis further establishes the dangerous instability of the Middle East; when every valid sign indicates an intensification of the struggle against Communism, these new architects of economy have deliberately chipped and hacked away—in the best manner of political vandalism—at the very keystone of the world's freedom loving nations.

The effects of these economies are fearsome, indeed.

Our Air Force must reduce its manpower and the number of its air groups.

It has, and it must continue to, slow down the production of supersonic fighters and the B-52 jet bombers.

When the full impact of this so-called economy wave has manifested itself, we may even perceive the absorption of our Tactical Air Command by the Strategic Air Command, simply because the richest nation in the world hasn't provided enough money to maintain both.

Our Navy is cutting back its personnel. Rather than building the fighting vessels every recognized authority says we need, we are in the process of deactivating ships.

At this moment the Navy is engaged in the drastic slowdown or total elimination of 64 stations or naval facilities.

Our Army must reduce its strength to 16 divisions by the end of this year.

Many installations are already scheduled for closing by the end of this year—and more next year.

No one—least of all, I—will quarrel with the concept of a balanced national economy.

No one recognizes more clearly than I that calculated risks are a part of all military planning.

No nation can—or should—attempt to achieve absolute security.

But I do question—and question closely—the wisdom and timing of the leaders of this House in the exercise of their recently discovered passion for pennypinching.

I go even further.

I see in this spectacle of the capricious dilution of our military strength a measure of mischief and political irresponsibility that is, to say the least, awful.

And I make this charge specifically in light of the fact that ways and means have been available to the leaders of this House for several months to bring about genuine savings in Federal expenditures—savings that could combat our other major foe, inflation, and still permit us to fight, at full strength, communism.

Last week—in fact, on August 22—I introduced a bill, H. R. 9415, to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide a revision of personal and corporate tax schedules.

My bill, which is identical to another, H. R. 6452, introduced by Mr. Sadlak, of Connecticut, last March, provides for a sensible reduction in individual income tax rates in each bracket and of corporate income tax rates over a period of 5 years, beginning January 1, 1958.

These downward adjustments in tax schedules, provided for in my bill, have a threefold goal:

First. To increase individuals' standard of living by allowing them to retain a larger portion of their real earnings.

Second. To encourage business—especially small business—to expand and grow, thereby enriching our national economy.

Third. To provide for a regular flow of revenues for the orderly retirement of our national debt each year.

But I must emphatically state that I do not now—nor shall I ever—sponsor or support any legislation to reduce taxes if such legislation carries as its price the foolhardy, Alice-in-Wonderland-type of tampering with our national functions, such as defense of this Nation and aid for our allies, bound to us in the common cause against communism.

With equal emphasis I state to the leaders of this House that if their burning interest in economy bore the stamp of authenticity, they could have achieved their savings in Federal expenditures long before this—and without jeopardizing our national welfare—by enacting into law a measure that has been before them since June 7, 1957.

I refer to a bill, H. R. 8002, introduced 3 months ago by Mr. Rogers of Florida, the companion bill to S. 434, known as the Kennedy-Payne bill.

This legislation, as every Member of this House is aware, implements one of the most far-reaching fiscal reforms proposed by the Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report.

It is devoid of political bias.

Its sponsors include Democratic and Republican leaders of the Senate.

The best known and most respected authorities on fiscal management of both parties have given this measure their unqualified endorsement.

That he who runs may read, I summarize here briefly the intent of H. R. 8002:

It provides that appropriations would be granted for the oncoming fiscal year instead of in a lump sum for an entire program as is now the case.

The advantages and attributes of this bill are myriad.

It permits Congress to adhere to its constitutional duty of custodian of the public funds with genuine realism.

It would provide Congress with the means of reviewing annually the spending activities and the programs of each of the spending agencies.

It would in no way hamper or curtail, executive agencies from entering into long-range programs, spanning several years, for it permits the authorization of long-range contracts, and limits only actual appropriations to 1 year.

The Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller General of the United States—indeed, every responsible official—has testified before committees of this House that as of today there exists some $70 billion in carryover appropriations—or roughly the equivalent of the budget for fiscal 1958.

The hard, cold fact of the matter is that it is possible that this $70 billion can be spent by the spending agencies without the Congress actually knowing where a single dollar of it goes—or why.

The record is replete with shocking instances of uncontrolled and unsupervised spending, as permitted under the present system of appropriating funds for executive agencies.

We know that in 1953 Congress appropriated $12.5 billion for guns and other weapons for use in the Korean war.

The war ended within a month of the new budget year.

Years later in May 1957, the Army was still spending this $12.5 billion—and Congress had not a single method or means of reviewing that spending.

I am not singling out just this one instance.

Every executive department of the Government, large or small, operates under the same loose, inexcusable system of gigantic grants without even cursory review of spending.

Apart from recapturing the $70 billion which I mentioned before, fiscal experts, irrespective of party, have uniformly stated that, were H. R. 8002 enacted into law, savings amounting to $3 billion a year could be achieved under our present or comparable rates of spending.

There is nothing complex or intricate in the system of accounting called for in H. R. 8002.

If appropriations are to be determined on an annual accrued expenditure basis, it means only two things:

First. The United States Government will buy only what it needs and pay only for what it gets.

Second. Congress will have at hand a constant means of fulfilling its role as watchdog over the needs of the Nation.

If there is anything revolutionary or dangerous in this philosophy I fail to see it.

And I am happy to know that in this conviction of mine I am joined by Americans such as former President Herbert Hoover, Joseph P. Kennedy, Solomon C. Hollister, Sidney A. Mitchell and Robert G. Storey—not forgetting for a moment the 47 Members of the Senate, including Democratic Senator Byrd, who sponsored and voted for S. 434.

In fact the only question in my mind today is "why have the leadership of this Congress, so recently imbued with an all-consuming fear of inflation that they would toy with the welfare of this Nation, failed to apply their talents for money-saving along the lines spelled out in H. R. 8002?"

Why are we subjected to economy measures that can only injure us, while those measures which can help us lie neglected in some pigeonhole?

Why is a dollar saved sensibly and rationally less valuable than one saved by foolhardiness?

Why must "economy" wear the cloak of politics, when the garb of fiscal prudence and intelligent planning is just as handy and certainly far better fitting to the needs and obligations of the United States?

I realize full well that too little time remains for deliberate and conscientious action on H. R. 8002, and the resulting bill which would grow out of such action—H. R. 9415.

But in the ensuing months between now and the opening of the second session of this Congress enough time does remain for my colleagues to do a bit of what we call in scholastic circles "outside reading."

I recommend to them most highly a farcical novel entitled "Brewster's Millions" by George McCutcheon.

This is not a facetious suggestion.

The analogy between the sorry Mr. Brewster and the present sorry plight of the United States Congress is too perfect for jokemaking.

Mr. Brewster, you will recall, was confronted with the problem of spending himself broke before he could be assured of receiving additional funds.

Whether we like it or not, we, by law, require the executive departments to spend themselves broke before they, too, can receive additional funds.

The greatest tragedy of all is that while, "Brewster's Millions" was a work of fiction, the millions with the allocation of which we are entrusted are the realistic fruits of the efforts of millions of hard-working, patriotic Americans, to whom this Congress and every Congress, owes an everlasting obligation.

REPORT ON THE 1ST SESSION OF THE 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the Record.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, as the 1st session of the 85th Congress draws to a close, I wish to make some observations with regard to what it has accomplished and what it has failed to accomplish, as well as to discuss the stand that I have taken on some of the more controversial measures which were considered here. We have been in Washington a long time this year in a session of unusual duration, and without some sort of a final report it is difficult to recall the important events which have transpired since last January 3.

One thing is notable. Although the number of bills which have been introduced in the House is nearly 10,000, with approximately 3,000 more in the Senate, the number of bills which have been approved and signed by the President—something more than 250—is a mere fraction of the total which were introduced. There have been very few measures which could be regarded as being of major legislative importance. In many ways that is a good record because I am firmly convinced that it is as essential for a Congress to resist wholesale enactment of bad or questionable legislation as it is to consider and pass beneficial legislation. Regimentation is one of the great problems facing America today—regimentation which has come from congressional anxiety that there might be some field of endeavor or activity which has not been controlled. Therefore, I repeat that the fact that few major bills were passed might well be generally characterized as an advantage for the citizens of America.

MIDDLE EAST RESOLUTION

When Congress convened on January 3, the world was in the midst of a crisis which had occurred because of the situation in Suez in which the Egyptian Government had seized the canal. France, Britain, and Israel had crossed the Egyptian frontier in a military engagement. From a small beginning, it was clear that the most serious consequences could have developed. As a result, President Eisenhower asked the Congress to propose a resolution of strength and to authorize him to move boldly both diplomatically and militarily in the Middle East to lessen the threat of general war. The President also requested that he be given power to expend for this program up to $200 million from funds which had been authorized by a previous Congress, but which had not yet been expended. In spite of the urgency of this legislation, Congress moved with shocking leisureliness. It was not until January 30 that the resolution passed the House. It was not agreed to by the Senate until March 5.

TAX REDUCTION

The taxpayers of America received no relief from the first session of the 85th Congress. No substantial tax reduction bills were enacted and few were given the courtesy of consideration. Yet the tax revenue under existing laws increased from $68,165,000,000 in fiscal 1956 to $70,989,000,000 in fiscal 1957 because of the economic growth of the Nation. Rather than a tax reduction, legislation was enacted to extend for another year the old emergency wartime excise taxes in order to maintain tax income at the present high level. The Tax Rate Extension Act of 1957, which extended these wartime tax rates, was approved by Congress on March 28 and by the President on the following day. This was the second important bill to become law during the year and, in fact, the 12th bill of any sort, important or trivial, to be passed in the first 3 months of 1957.

HOUSING ACT

The Housing Act of 1957 was the third major bill which the Congress considered and this was not approved until after the session was more than 6 months old. I think it fortunate that this bill did not authorize any additional public housing. The bill did amend the Housing Act with regard to units already authorized and, in addition, contained provisions with regard to college and military housing, FHA loans, reduced downpayment requirements, and other modifications of the FHA and FNMA activities to permit builders to provide, and homeowners to acquire, additional private housing.

GIVEAWAY

The Mutual Security Act, or foreign-aid bill, is a proposition which provides for the transfer of about $3 billion of wealth from this Nation to countries abroad. I opposed this bill because I believe foreign aid has become an ill-considered implement upon which too much foreign policy reliance has been placed. Funds used for this costly program could be applied at home in view of our national debt and the oppressive burden on our taxpayers. Too often, nations, though they may be in need, fail to appreciate the sacrifice we in America are making and continue to regard with suspicion the seemingly bountiful and inexhaustible pot of gold which our Government doles out. In many nations abroad, this has developed into outright enmity. It is a tragic commentary that in our well-meaning haste to spend money abroad, we find American administrators of the foreign-aid program zealously digging up projects that are not needed, wanted, or understood in the nation receiving the benefits.

VETERANS LEGISLATION

The final bill which is given a rating of "major" in this first session of Congress deals with veterans benefits. Few bills for veterans were considered by the 85th Congress. However, one such bill was approved by the House and Senate providing for a 10-percent increase in compensation for those disabled veterans with service-connected disabilities. Other veterans bills have been passed by the House, but are still to be considered by the Senate. These include an increase in pensions for widows of the Spanish-American War, the Boxer Rebellion, and the Philippine Insurrection. Another bill liberalized criteria under which the eligibility of widows of all wars are computed. Other measures of widespread importance to veterans are still to be considered next year.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Very few bills were killed during the session by action on the floor of the House. By and large, those measures which had stimulated considerable opposition were held in committee until a more propitious occasion. However, one bill, the School Construction Assistance Act of 1957, which sought to inaugurate a Federal spending program to supplement a purely local function of providing educational facilities, was substantially defeated. I opposed this measure.

POSTAL RATES

For the second successive year, the House passed a bill to provide for an increase in postage rates from 3 cents to 4 cents on first-class mail, from 6 cents to 7 cents on airmail, and a general overall increase on other types of mail. However, the Senate has not seen fit to act upon this legislation in 1957.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The major legislation incorporated in the civil-rights bill which provided for the protection of the voting rights of all Americans, received a mixed reaction. The House passed one version of this legislation, which I approved, and the Senate, after prolonged debate, voted a watered-down version. After weeks of waiting, bickering, and shuffling, a compromise was finally advanced which is acceptable to most Members of Congress. The jury-trial issue was resolved by permitting a defendant to obtain a jury trial if his initial trial before a judge resulted in a sentence in excess of $300 fine or 45 days in jail.

APPROPRIATION BILLS

Even though the Nation might endure without the enactment of new laws and, in fact, might be better off if none were enacted, one function—one painful function—of Congress requires action each year. That is the appropriation of money. Annually, Congress is required to appropriate sufficient funds from the tax revenues or other sources of Federal income to conduct the operation of the Government for the next fiscal year. This is accomplished by the enactment of appropriation bills. The following appropriations were made:

Appropriation bills for 1958	Amount originally proposed	Passed by House	Amount in final bill
Treasury-Post Office	$3,965,291,000	$3,884,927,000	$3,884,927,000
Interior	515,189,700	454,395,700	456,189,600
General Government matters	20,921,870	16,021,370	16,010,370
Independent offices	5,923,195,000	5,385,201,700	5,373,877,800
Labor-Health, Education, and Welfare	2,981,277,581	2,846,831,581	2,871,182,781
District of Columbia (Federal payment)	25,504,450	22,504,450	22,504,450
Commerce	871,513,000	653,685,060	597,790,225
State, Justice, Judiciary	665,649,802	563,799,793	562,891,293
Agriculture	3,965,446,617	3,692,889,757	3,666,543,757
Legislative	108,271,443	78,370,285	104,844,660
Defense	36,128,000,000	33,562,725,000	33,759,850,000
Public works (exclusive of AEC-TVA)	876,453,000	814,813,023	858,094,323
Supplemental (post office)	149,500,000	133,000,000	133,000,000
Supplemental, 1958	1,973,767,827	1,581,590,587	1,734,011,947
Mutual security	3,386,860,000	2,524,760,000	2,768,760,000
Atomic energy	2,491,625,000	2,299,718,500	2,323,632,500
Total	64,048,466,290	58,515,233,806	59,134,110,706

The totals above do not reflect certain other costs which the Nation's taxpayers are called upon to assume. One huge item is the fixed charge of approximately $7,360,000,000 which represents interest on our huge public debt. Happily, this debt, now in the neighborhood of $270 billion, has been reduced by $5,200,000,000 during the past 3 years.

Many Members had misgivings with regard to the amounts included in these appropriation bills. I shared many of those misgivings. In fact, in every instance in which there was a possibility of voting for responsible reductions, I am recorded as having favored such cuts.

In one of the appropriation bills, 14 amendments were voted upon with an aim of effecting a reduction. I am proud to have been one of those who voted in favor of each of those 14 amendments. Inasmuch as funds are necessary for the conduct of legitimate functions of the Government, I voted in favor of each of the appropriation bills in their final form except the supplemental appropriation bill for 1958 and mutual security appropriation bill. On the latter bill, I was recorded in opposition. I consider this function a most questionable one in view of the manner in which it has been conducted in the past.

FARM LEGISLATION

The session produced very few bills that might be considered helpful or beneficial to the farming industry. One bill of some note was similar to one I had introduced providing for the reduction of controls over grain production by making it possible for a farmer to raise up to 30 acres of wheat without regulation or without restraint so long as that wheat was used on the farmer's premises. My own provision proposed to lift the acreage restrictions entirely. I look foward expectantly to the day when farm controls and regimentation of all farm activities can be removed and I will work toward hastening that day in every way possible.

COMMITTEE WORK

During this session I have been a member of the Banking and Currency Committee which is charged with the responsibility of regulation of the Federal financial institutions and those institutions subject to Federal control and with many other fiscal and monetary considerations. Bills considered include measures to extend the life of the Small Business Administration, to increase the authority of the Export-Import Bank, to prevent the stagnation of the building and loan industry by holding companies, the Housing Act of 1957, and the Financial Institutions Act which is designed to recodify and up-date the laws with regard to the financial institutions of the country.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Legislative procedures being what they are and party control in Congress being what it is, usually few bills by Members of the minority party in Congress are privileged to be considered and enacted. Consequently, with the Democrat Party in power during the 85th Congress, few bills by Republicans were considered and approved. Nevertheless, all Members introduce bills to pave the way for future consideration and to add support to others who have introduced legislation as well as to put forward concepts which are believed to be advisable with regard to necessary legislation. As I mentioned at the outset of this report, it is my own belief that the Nation needs fewer, rather than more, laws. I introduced a very small number. One bill which I introduced received recognition and the philosophy behind it was considered as the House approved a Democrat-authored bill to permit farmers to raise up to 30 acres of wheat so long as the feed and seed was used on the premises. My own bill, which I would have preferred, was one which would have permitted unlimited acreage so long as the same purpose was observed.

Another one of my bills would have made the Small Business Administration a permanent agency. Under existing legislation the Small Business Administration was due to go out of existence in 1957. Although my Committee on Banking and Currency approved the provision for permanent status in a bill revamping the functions of the Small Business Administration, as finally enacted after a struggle with the Senate during its filibuster over civil rights, extension of the Small Business Administration was granted for only 1 year.

Earlier, I mentioned my criticism of the fact that no actual consideration was given to a tax reduction. I am firmly convinced that one of the serious threats to small business, to the independent grocer, to the small manufacturer, even to the farmer, lies in the tax structure of the Nation. Big business, large corporations, wealthy enterprises, can obtain tax advantages through the use of accounting procedures that the little fellow lacks the resources to duplicate. I, therefore, joined several other Members of Congress in introducing legislation designed to give a tax break to the small-business man by a reduction in taxes, slight as it might be, and also by permitting small enterprises to have a tax advantage in plowing back funds to be reinvested into their business for growth and development. I regret that the leadership in Congress did not permit bills of this type to be considered.

A problem of considerable concern to me and one which is in the minds of fully half of the residents of the 15th District and throughout the Nation is the difficulty of finding employment for older persons. I have introduced legislation which would provide a tax incentive for employers who would hire more than the normal amount of older people so that persons past middle age who enjoy good health, by reason of the tremendous strides that have been made in the fields of medicine and mental hygiene, could find useful and gainful employment. This bill joins those of other Members of Congress which would prohibit discrimination in employment of persons past 40 and these meritorious objectives are gathering dust in the legislative pigeonholes in the 85th Congress.

ECONOMY

It was not a wave of hysteria that swept through the hills of southeastern Ohio, but a rugged determination on the part of analytical constituents that economy in government is an urgent necessity. Ever since we deserted the philosophy of those who framed our Constitution, which limited our powers to tax ourselves, ever since the day that the 16th amendment was enacted providing for the levying of an income tax of unlimited amounts according to the whims of Congress and the prodding of pressure groups, this Nation has known little about the blessings of economy. The economy demand that was heard from the taxpayers in the early part of 1957 had most beneficial results upon Congress as will be noted from the fact that the total appropriations for the year are almost $5 billion or 7.7 percent less than had been originally proposed. In addition to supporting each of those cuts or reductions, I made it a part of my own program in voting to approve many measures which would lead to economy in the operation and cost of our Government and which could not endanger its security or efficient functioning. In fact, in February of 1957, I joined with my colleagues from Ohio in signing a declaration of economy which stated the following:

> The Ohio Republican delegation in the United States House of Representatives, after careful study and evaluation, has unanimously agreed that a substantial reduction of the $72 billion budget will be in the best interests of the people of the United States.
>
> It was further agreed that every proposed reduction in the budget, which does not curtail essential services or endanger the security of our country, will be supported.

It is my belief that I consistently followed that declaration of policy, in fact, my record of economy votes was noted in the Congressional Quarterly as being the second highest in the State of Ohio and among the highest for the entire Nation.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT YEAR

Predictions are difficult, of course, but with the second session of Congress coming just 4 short months from now, it is anticipated that some of the measures which will face Members of Congress will be those to augment postal rates, to decontrol the production of natural gas, to work out some of the problems in the National Highway Act, and I most sincerely hope, measures to provide for a tax reduction which will remove some of the oppressive burden from the shoulders of harassed taxpayers. I intend to work for that end, both to the point of obtaining a general tax reduction and toward obtaining an equitable tax responsibility.

THE LESSON OF KOREA BROUGHT HOME

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDMONDSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. EDMONDSON. Mr. Speaker, the Navy League has rendered a service to all Members of Congress by this week making available to each Member a copy of a historic book, The Sea War in Korea, by Comdr. Malcolm W. Cagle and Comdr.

Frank A. Manson, of the United States Navy.

The Manson-Cagle history of the Korean conflict, written from the standpoint of naval officers with outstanding combat records, is replete with significant lessons for this Nation in 1957.

Perhaps one of the most important lessons of the new publication is the strong case which it makes for balance in our Armed Forces, both between the services and within the services.

Although we had the atomic weapon throughout the Korean conflict, it was fought in its entirety with conventional weapons and conventional forces, and the Navy's mission in getting our troops to the battlefront and keeping them supplied was of critical importance.

Another lesson is the importance of amphibious warfare—and The Sea War in Korea emphasizes effectively the teamwork and coordination between and among the services which are essential to effective amphibious operations.

In an eloquent foreword to the book, the importance of readiness for what might be called a "limited war" in this year of 1957 is well stated by Adm. Arleigh A. Burke, Chief of Naval Operations. In Admiral Burke's own words, the first lesson of the Korean War is that—

> The military forces of the United States must be vigilant and ready to defeat aggression in any area and in any form, whether it be large or small, atomic or conventional.

And it is still true, as Admiral Burke states, that control of the sea is prerequisite to victory in modern war.

Perhaps the most timely lesson of all, as this Nation discusses the possibilities of disarmament with the Communist world, can be found in this quotation from Vice Adm. C. T. Joy, who was Chief of the U. N. Command Truce Delegation Team:

> During the last 10 months of my tour in the Far East I was fortunate, or unfortunate, enough to face our common enemy across the conference table. If there are still those in the Free World who believe that the enemy can be moved by logic, or that he is susceptible to moral appeal, or that he is willing to act in good faith, those remaining few should immediately disabuse themselves of that notion. It was a mistake to assume, or even hope, that the enemy was capable of acting in good faith. Future textbooks can set down the maxim that the speed with which agreement is reached with the Communists varies directly as the military pressure applied, and that the worth of any agreement is in proportion to the military strength you are able and willing to apply to enforce it.
>
> As for the future, it should be clear that there is nothing inevitable about the onward and upward progress of the United States or the United Nations. In fact there is nothing inevitable about our survival. History is littered with the graves of civilizations that assumed all is well. All is not well. We will survive and progress to the extent that we are aware of the enemy who threatens us, and to the extent that we stay strong enough to meet him in the arena of his choosing.

As this country moves today to reduce our military forces, to place fighting ships in mothballs, and to slow down the development of missiles, it is well indeed to ponder the words of Vice Admiral Joy, and the many lessons of the sea war in Korea.

It is especially gratifying to me that one of the authors of this book, the Sea War in Korea, is the young Oklahoman who has established one of the outstanding records in the Navy of any man from our State who has served in that great force. Commander Manson with this book has given to the Congress and to the country a message well worth pondering in this year of 1957.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITENER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma concerning Comdr. Frank A. Manson and the part Commander Manson had in writing The Sea War in Korea.

Commander Manson is a very close friend of mine, and I have been privileged to be associated with him in both an official and personal capacity. He is a profound student of history and has a very keen and analytical mind. His devotion to the Navy and its role in our struggle to preserve liberty is unsurpassed. Commander Manson's untiring efforts reflect great credit upon himself and are indicative of the very highest traditions of the United States Navy.

The Sea War in Korea should be read by every Member of this House. It is not a dull history. It is a stirring chronology of the valiant efforts made by our Navy in combating communism in the Far East. It points up the fact that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty and that this Nation must be prepared at all times on land, in the air, and on the high seas if we are to remain a free and independent people.

I commend Commander Manson for his part in bringing this vital message to the American people, and I hope that The Sea War in Korea will be read by everyone who has a part in the shaping of the destiny of this Nation.

RETIREMENT FOR CAPITOL PERSONNEL

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the House passed unanimously yesterday a very crippling amendment to the retirement bill affecting certain personnel here at the Capitol, H. R. 8424. I think it was because of an inadvertence or a misunderstanding of the provisions of the amendment. I believe that the Senate will rectify it later, because it should be rectified.

NATIONAL GRANGE HEADQUARTERS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Idaho [Mrs. PFOST] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. PFOST. Mr. Speaker, I want to add my voice to those of my colleagues who have spoken out on this floor against razing the National Grange headquarters, and the other structures on Jackson Place, to make way for a mammoth office building to house the swelling White House staff.

If ever there was an example of waste, inefficiency and sheer disregard for the rights of others, this is it. The National Grange headquarters is a beautiful, modern structure built with the pennies, dimes, and dollars of American farm families, and belongs to them. The other buildings scheduled to be torn down are either handsome, up-to-date office buildings which the Government could use as they are, or are interesting structures which are intimately tied in with 19th century Washington. A tasteful blend of the old and the new gives Jackson Place a flavor of its own, a flavor which is cherished not only by those who live here, but those who come to visit.

Yet, on July 17 of this year, the President transmitted to the Congress, with his blessing, the recommendations of his Advisory Commission on Presidential Office Space, that the entire row on Jackson Place be torn down, with the exception of the Decatur House at one end and a similar structure at the other, and that a gigantic new office building be thrown up in between.

And do you know how the ground on which the Grange building now stands would be used under this plan? For lawn. Lawn to show off the Decatur House.

Mr. Speaker, everyone agrees that the Decatur House should be preserved. The home of Commodore Stephen Decatur, who fought the Barbary pirates, is a showplace which has been little changed down through the years. But it is generally estimated that the Federal Government will have to pay $500,000 for the Grange property if it is acquired by the General Services Administration by condemnation. Add to this the cost of tearing it down, and the cost of clearing the site and putting it in grass, and you will have the most expensive lawn in America. I think the country can well do without this bit of grass at this time when we are trying so hard to cut our expenditures.

Many distinguished architects and the National Trust for Historic Preservations, which is congressionally chartered, have strongly recommended that the Jackson Place buildings be preserved, and that the new Federal office building be confined to that portion of square No. 167 which fronts on 17th and H Streets. This would give additional office space to the White House staff at a location which is just across the street from the wing now used for offices.

The President's Advisory Commission has also proposed razing the historic old State, War and Navy building, which stands across the street from the White House in another direction, to make way for another new office building. This is one of the most perfect examples of French Renaissance architecture in the United States. It is a Washington landmark.

It has been estimated that it would cost a cool $6 million just to tear down this well-built structure. It seems to me this $6 million might well be used to alter the interior of the present building and make a more useful arrangement of the rooms.

Because I feel that both the razing of the Jackson Place row of buildings, and the old State, War and Navy building, would be unforgivably wasteful and unwise, I have introduced a bill (H. R. 9323) to prohibit Government agencies from acquiring or using the National Grange headquarters' site without specific congressional approval, and to provide for the renovation of the old State Department building.

I am inclined to agree with my colleague, Congressman Frank Thompson, of New Jersey, principal sponsor of this bill, that "the President plans for 2 office buildings to house his expanded staff constitute a 48-carat, multimillion-dollar boondoggle."

THE 85TH CONGRESS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Vanik] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, as this 1st session of the 85th Congress draws to a close, it is fitting to analyze its record of accomplishments and shortcomings. Whether the record may afford proof or not, it has been a busy session of long hours and tense, hard work. A deep sense of purpose seemed to prevail throughout the sessions every day. This Congress vigorously worked to reduce Federal expenditures with a minimum loss of public service and with an alert respect for the national security. This Congress is distinguished for the scholarly debate on the civil-rights issue and the forging of the first "civil rights" bill in 82 years.

Since January 3, the House has been in session 138 days. Almost 1,200 bills were passed by the House which resulted in 179 public laws to date. Of 220 rollcalls, I missed only 6 of which only 2 were issue votes, an attendance record of 96 percent.

I want now to discuss vital questions which confronted this congressional session with particular emphasis on those issues substantially affecting my community, Cleveland's east side, the growing city of Garfield Heights and the village of Newburgh Heights, the finest congressional district in America.

THE BUDGET, FISCAL POLICY, AND TAX REDUCTION

Citizens everywhere have been clamoring for a reduction in our burdensome Federal taxes. Earlier this year tax reduction seemed possible. However, inflation had its most serious effect on Government itself. The same or even less military hardware would cost more money. The spiraling increase in the cost of handling the Federal debt induced by administration policies, in addition to the inflationary rise in the price of Government procurement, made futile the aggressive efforts by Congress to reduce the cost of Government. It was soon apparent that a tax cut was not in the picture this year.

In addition to inflation, the administration's policy of "tight money" and unrestrained interest rates has permitted inflation to invade the money markets at a brutal expense to the Government itself. In 1952 interest on the public debt was $5.9 billion, while in 1958 this interest cost has risen to $7.3 billion, an increase of $1.4 billion or a 24 percent increase in the interest charges on the public debt. Inflation and the skyrocketing cost of interest on the public debt have resulted in the regrettable fact that the public debt has risen from $259.2 billion at the end of 1952 to $270.6 billion at the end of fiscal 1957.

The President's budget estimate of $71.8 billion was under heavy assault in Congress. After vigilant efforts, approximately $5 billion have been pruned from contemplated Federal expenditures. Congress to date has appropriated $56.3 billion plus an estimated $3.4 billion for the mutual security program plus the sum of $7.4 billion as interest on the public debt or a total expenditure of approximately $67 billion.

America must attack its indebtedness with the same spirit and vigor with which it attacks other enemies of the national security. This struggle must take place on two fronts: Firstly, to reduce Federal expenditures, and secondly, to resist the tremendous pressures by special groups to work out tax saving advantages at the expense of the Federal Treasury.

The tremendous pressure for tax reduction has been generated by corporate enterprise and the higher income groups which seek more income after taxes for so-called investment in new enterprise. Some segments of this corporate enterprise have enjoyed tax depreciation benefits which deferred taxable income for a future time. A reduction in corporate taxes for these favored enterprises would result in a multiplied loss to the Federal Treasury from these sources.

Early this year and after an exhaustive study, I was the first Member of Congress to attack the tax avoidance practices of American corporations engaging in foreign oil exploitation. Our Government was spending millions and pledging American lives to resist Communist advances in the Middle East. For the same ostensible purposes our Government was providing weapons and support to guarantee the tenure of Middle East governments, including the protection of King Saud and the vital oil contracts into which he entered with American corporations. American men and money were pledged to defend King Saud from enemies without his nation and people from within who may have had some argument with his concept of social justice. It was indeed shocking, therefore, to learn that in spite of the tremendous contribution of the American people to the successful development of the Middle East oil industry, highly profitable to certain American corporations, taxes on income in excess of one-quarter billion dollars annually escaped the United States Treasury. The American corporations legalized this tax diversion by arranging with King Saud to convert their royalty obligations fixed by contract to a tax imposed by the foreign government and therefore exempt from United States taxation. This expressed the selfish contempt by profit-hungry corporations to the American people and their Government, which guaranteed the integrity of profitable oil contracts which would otherwise be meaningless paper.

It is morally unjust to permit such tax escapes to exist when so many individuals are overwhelmed with their tax burdens. Congress has become concerned with this problem, and the possibility of eliminating tax depletion allowances at least for American operators abroad is being considered.

If fiscal prudence were the test applied to our national affairs, the national indebtedness of this country should be attacked with as much vigor as any other enemy of the national security. If our Nation will insist on collecting the income taxes rightfully due and owing this country, if tax loopholes under which American corporations engaged in oil production at home and abroad will be required to pay taxes which they rightfully owe this country, if the use of the quick depreciation privilege is immediately terminated, and if the American people would support their representatives in Congress in an all-out struggle against national indebtedness, the job could be done in a remarkably short period of time. The advantage to the American people would far outweigh the temporary gains that might result from small tax reductions now. If apprised of all of the facts, I believe the American people would support policies to make our Government economically stronger.

In the final analysis, the greatest bulwark of strength which our Nation possesses in the event of contingent depression or war is the fiscal stability that only a reduced public indebtedness can produce. Our democracy must be economically sound to survive. Sound national credit is as important a weapon for the national security as any developed by modern research.

However, if the Congress next year feels that a distribution should be made of any accumulated surplus resulting from budget reduction and if our economy should prove to need the added stimulation of more disposable income, I will do everything in my power during the coming session of Congress to support a tax reduction which will redound to the benefit of the family by increasing exemptions. Dependency exemptions must be realistically adjusted to the real cost of supporting dependents before any other group receives tax-cut consideration. The family is the bulwark of American life, and family life must be given this help long overdue.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND MUTUAL SECURITY

The most costly item by far in the national budget was the appropriation of $33.7 billion for the security of the Nation. This was $2.3 billion less than the President had requested, and it was the considered judgment that if our Nation was to err in this item, it would be wiser to err on the side of more defense rather than less. The cost of more complex and intricate military equipment was increasing and economies would have to be brought about at the price of declaring obsolete many established activities of the national defense.

First it was the Navy declaring the Army methods obsolete because of immobility. Then the Air Force declared the basic techniques of both the Army and the Air Force obsolete and inadequate. Now the intercontinental ballistic missile with an atomic warhead, threatens the positions of all other established activities of national defense.

This is a time of radically changing concepts of national defense. The result will probably provide a valuable and important place for all defense activities with emphasis on missile warfare in the future which will require more expensive equipment and more highly trained personnel.

On the problems of our national security I deem it extremely important to take the counsel of our experts after discounting the factor of service rivalries. While service rivalries may be expensive, they may, in some way, compensate for their added cost by presenting constant competition of ideas as to which device or method will more adequately defend our Nation. It is obvious in any case that adequate defense can be brought about with fewer men in the military service. Those who remain must receive intense training and retraining. It is hoped that the draft of our young men may soon be terminated and that in keping with new policies in the Defense Department, incentive pay and other career incentives might end the draft and produce an adequate supply of men and women dedicated to serve in the armed services and keep up with its changing requirements.

The reduced appropriations for the Defense Department have already been felt throughout the Cleveland area. Many of our smaller plants and defense suppliers and subcontractors are already feeling the effect of defense cutbacks. While this will undoubtedly result in the displacement of many people from their jobs, it is far better that this changeover in production be experienced at a time of high productivity rather than in a recessive period, and it must be remembered that defense spending should be for the national defense rather than for the creation of job stability.

In the mutual security program the Congress agreed upon an appropriation of $3.4 billion, approximately $1 billion less than the President's request, and time can only tell whether this is an adequate amount. Uninformed people are opposed to our foreign aid program as a costly and useless expenditure of American funds. The disclosure of unwise expenditures and activities has not added to the popular support of this program. Our Congressional committees have made a vigilant effort to control and more effectively regulate activities included in the program.

The fact is that the mutual-security program has strengthened free Europe. In 1956, for example, when our contribution to the European NATO countries amounted to $1.7 billion, our NATO partners in Europe expended for defense $13 billion or almost 90 percent of their defense expenditures combined. In addition, the nations receiving military assistance from us have spent for defense about $5.50 for every dollar that we have put into such assistance. This essential mutuality in the defense activities of America and its Free World partners is a great source of strength in the effort to insure lasting peace and security. Without our mutual-security program the Governments of France, Italy, and West Germany may have been forced into unfortunate alliances with Soviet Russia. Without this program the Government of South Korea would be in precarious jeopardy, and without the support of governments of the Middle East, there would be no possible halt to aggression through the Middle East and into Africa.

While we recognize the importance of our mutual security program, we must at the same time convince cur friends abroad that there must be a determined and steady retrenchment in the spending of our Nation abroad. There is a limitation to our financial strength, and while we are happy to assist them in the reconstruction of their economies and in the rehabilitation of their national defense, they are rapidly approaching the time of self-reliance in these vital areas.

INFLATION AND THE SHRINKING DOLLAR

The flight of the dollar from value is the most pressing problem of our times. The administration blames the rise in spending over income, individual, corporate, and government. The figures show, however, that individual consumer spending is levelling off. Congress has made vigorous efforts to restrain Government spending. Corporate spending for expansion has continued without restraint, unaffected by rising money costs because these have been included in higher prices and the internal generation of capital through stock and debenture sales. In the Banking Committee, I extensively questioned William McChesney Martin on this issue and did not receive conclusive replies.

Through Congressional hearings, the process of "administered prices," those brought about by agreement rather than by completion, were brought to the light of day.

I took every opportunity to call Congressional attention to the effect of rising prices which came to my attention. Specifically, I protested the "administered" price increase in steel and called attention to the collusive nature of the cigarette price increases administered by five great tobacco companies. In addition, I protested the increases demanded by the Nation's airlines on the basis that passenger miles doubled since 1952 with the same equipment and schedules. It occurred to me that premium jet equipment should be paid for by the special travelers who demanded faster transportation. The great masses of American people are turning to air transport, frequently the only type available, and demand established safe planes rather than high-speed luxury jets designed for long distance expense-account travelers. The Government through the CAB administers airline prices and should grant only such price increases as can be clearly justified.

THE FARM PROBLEM

Most city residents consider themselves far removed from the problems of the farmer, but their welfare is more involved than they may believe. Farm prosperity is directly related to urban prosperity since the flow of farm produce to the market is rivaled by the movement of city products to the farm areas.

Something is drastically wrong with a national farm policy which results in a 5-year decline of 27 percent in net farm income. This is augmented by the fact that the Nation has been losing 100,000 farms annually. Farm net income of $11.5 billion in early 1957 is slightly more than one-half of the $5 billion farm-help budget request of the President. How much closer can America come to the state farms?

It was quite obvious that the soil bank program was a failure as administered. It failed to make a worthwhile contribution to the increase and stabilization of farm income. I opposed the continuance of this program as a dole to the farmer, producing nothing more than a half-billion dollar headache for the American people.

QUICK TAX WRITEOFFS

During my time in the Congress, I have taken the floor numerous times to criticize the unwarranted granting of quick tax-amortization writeoffs which were being made by the Office of Defense Mobilization to numerous industries throughout the Nation. The fast tax writeoffs were started during the Korean war to allow tax benefits to industry as an inducement to expand production of defense needs in short supply. My opposition was based upon the loss of considerable tax revenues and the discrimination which resulted in favor of those corporations favored for the tax-writeoff privilege.

When it was disclosed that the Government's loss in tax revenues in the form of postponed taxes would total $5 billion in addition to $3 billion in interest charges on necessary Treasury borrowings resulting from the tax postponement, the Congress acted and terminated the program as of December 1959. In the intervening period, writeoffs will be allowed only for specialized defense items or atomic-energy requirements. In any event, the long struggle against this form of tax giveaway was near a close.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

This session did not produce much legislative gain to the veteran. Service-connected compensation for veterans, less the total and additional allowances for dependents, would amount to 10 percent. The rate for total disability was increased 24 percent from $181 to $225 monthly. The legislation also increased certain statutory awards for specific disabilities.

The veterans' direct loan housing law does not apply in urban areas. The rising rates of interest have the effect of terminating the GI loan program in the Cleveland area after existing commitments are exhausted. Seventy-six percent of the veterans of the Cleveland area who have never exercised their GI loan rights may have permanently lost them.

ATOMIC-ENERGY DEVELOPMENT

One of the most serious discussions in the current session of Congress centered upon the position of America in the atomic development field. Progress in England was obviously more rapid. While it seemed obvious that our Nation was far out in front in the development of atomic weapons, possessed of horrid potentials of destruction, it was apparent also that we were trailing in the development of peacetime uses of atomic energy. To stimulate peacetime development in America, Congress enacted a program of insurance indemnification to protect against tremendous losses which might result from a nuclear accident.

The protection of our citizens from the hazards of nuclear accidents was as much an issue as our progress in nuclear research. In view of the fact that a nuclear-reactor powerplant of the so-called hot-breeder type was being constructed at Lagoona Beach, at the southwest corner of Lake Erie, I was especially concerned, particularly since the Atomic Energy Commission's own reports on theoretical possibilities and consequences of major accidents in large nuclear powerplants indicated that under adverse combinations of conditions people could be killed at distances up to 15 miles and injured at distances of about 45 miles with property damages ranging from a half million dollars to about seven billion dollars.

It was my view that the Lagoona Beach site was too close to major urban centers for the most dangerous type of nuclear reactor and that a more remote location should have been selected. I was first in the House to introduce legislation providing for the establishment of a Committee on Reactor Safeguards to review safety studies and report on the adequacy of proposed reactor safety standards. This legislation was incorporated into the legislation which passed the House and will serve in a considerable way to provide for safe atomic development.

It was also my view that our Nation should urge the termination of further "A" and "H" bomb tests. The scientific revelations on the harmful and disastrous effects of fallout were startling. On the floor of Congress I deplored the apparently deliberate suppression of available scientific data on the subject during last year's political campaign.

POSTAL RATES AND SALARY INCREASES

For many years I have felt that postal employees were subsidizing the postal service by wage scales far out of line with the rising cost of living and the highly regulated conditions of their employment. Because of this the families of postal workers were forced to supplemental work to avoid a plummeting standard of living.

Before the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I argued for a long-overdue adjustment in postal salaries to preserve the morale and to continue the tenure of trained and able workers. Subsequently, I joined in the signing of a discharge petition to force favorable action on this legislation by the House.

At the same time I exercised every effort to oppose the administration's desire to increase the cost of first-class mail from 3 cents to 4 cents. From all of the evidence submitted I was convinced that first-class mail was operating at a profit and that the postal deficit was brought about by the high costs of 2d-, 3d-, and 4th-class mail, otherwise known as junk mail. The magazine and newspaper publishers were attempting to push the burden of mail cost onto the user of ordinary first-class mail. It was my point of view that the only factors involved in mail rates were weight, time, and distance. While letters seldom arrived on an expected schedule, magazines always did. They should pay their proper share of costs.

I took the floor to speak out against the use of the mails to merchandise food and the so-called junk mail. I displayed to my colleagues a 6-ounce package of dog food and a 4-ounce package of salad dressing, which came to my home through the mails. Packages of this type multiplied by the multitude of homes on a postal home-delivery route must contribute to the postman's despair.

Notwithstanding this, if there was any promise that the postal service would improve and that postal salaries would be increased with a 4-cent stamp, I may have supported the proposal. My deep fear is that the President would approve a postal rate increase and veto a postal salary bill.

SOCIAL SECURITY AND WELFARE LEGISLATION

The 520,766 Ohioans receiving Federal Social Security benefits received no cost of living adjustment. Over nine million Americans are receiving social security benefits at a monthly rate of almost one-half billion. This is becoming a tremendous factor in providing funds for consumer goods consumption and the resulting employment created.

The only legislative change this session extends until July 1, 1958 the time for disabled persons to file applications to preserve their rights for old-age, survivor, and disability insurance.

During the House debate on the Welfare Department appropriations, I supported appropriations for adequate social security administration and took the floor to save the apprentice-training program from serious cutback.

IMMIGRATION

I introduced legislation to liberalize the immigration laws and to eliminate the discriminatory national origins concept. America must perpetuate its traditional place in world history as a place of refuge for the oppressed and as a citadel of hope and freedom. This cannot be achieved with arbitrary and discriminatory bars to immigration. This country must always maintain a sensible and humane policy toward those who hope for citizenship. Can those who are early settlers disclaim the quality of latter day pilgrims? In a recent television show which I saw, a young man whose parents were foreign born exclaimed indignantly to the proud old American stock parents of his finance, "My parents didn't come to America on the Mayflower. They came over much later, when the immigration laws were far more strict."

Since the world-shaking revolts of last October, I closely followed the Hungarian refugee problem. At Camp Kilmer I saw the first refugees arrive and since that time extensive efforts were made through my office to reconcile refugees with their Cleveland relatives. The Hungarian refugee program had two purposes, humanitarian and to provide relief to countries which provided refuge. Austria would have collapsed under refugee pressure. The almost 33,000 Hungarian parolees admitted to the United States are far less proportionate than those absorbed by Canada and the countries of free Europe.

Whether our country was fully aware of the consequences or not, we encouraged the people of Hungary to revolt against their oppressors, to leave their families, and to abandon their homes. They could not return to Hungary with any sense of security and they could not be expected to live out their lives in the refugee camps. It was only decent of America to do its share. It was only fitting that the parolee program be extended to a fair proportion of the Hungarian refugees in Yugoslavia who, through circumstances, found themselves fleeing to Yugoslavia instead of Austria.

The status of the Hungarian parolees in America is a problem which must be resolved in the next session of Congress. In the meanwhile, the refugees are marrying American citizens and giving birth to American children. If the law does not soon respond, the issue will become moot.

In the closing hours of this legislative session the Congress passed a stopgap immigration bill which, although weaker than hoped for, at least was aimed at alleviating hardship conditions arising out of the separated families occurring with the immigration of some of its members under the displaced persons and refugee relief programs. The mortgages imposed on various immigration quotas of Eastern European countries under the Displaced Persons Acts have been eliminated. It reallocates over 18,000 leftover immigrant visas which were not used by the time of the expiration of the Refugee Relief Act last December, with about 14,000 visas going to escapees from Iron Curtain countries. The bill permits a total of more than 60,000 aliens to enter the United States over the next 2 years.

The measure grants nonquota immigrant status until June 30, 1959, to alien children under 14 adopted by United States citizen abroad or coming to the United States for the purposes of adoption. In addition, the entry of certain immigrants afflicted with tuberculosis is permitted, provided they are close relatives of United States citizens or of aliens lawfully admitted for permanent residence and provided also that they are under bond and adequate medical safeguards are taken.

Finally, the Secretary of State and the Attorney General are granted joint discretionary authority to waive, on a basis of reciprocity, fingerprinting requirements in the case of nonimmigrant aliens. It was our Nation's fingerprinting requirements of cultural exchange visitors which resulted in the cancellation this year of the Cleveland Orchestra's appearance scheduled in Prague and threatened the conduct of the winter Olympics in California in 1960.

HOUSING AND URBAN RENEWAL

The housing pressures of the Cleveland area received very little relief by way of Federal legislation this year. The administration's tight money policy pressured interest rates upward and closed out the GI loan program for all practical purposes. Clevelanders, particularly those of the low and moderate income groups, were forced into secondary mortgage markets, with interest rates running close to usurious limits of 8 percent. Most hopeful buyers were forced to defer home purchase plans because of inability to meet high downpayment requirements of local banks and lending institutions. FHA loans were not abundant, and most builders scrapped extensive homebuilding plans depressing new home starts to postwar lows. In Cleveland the result was less housing for more people.

Some slight relief was provided in the Housing Act of 1957 which I have labeled the Not Much Housing Act. FHA downpayments were reduced from 5 percent on the first $9,000 and 25 percent of the excess to 3 percent of the first $10,000 of value, 15 percent of the value between $10,000 and $16,000, and 30 percent of the excess. These provisions tend to benefit higher cost home buyers rather than the multitudes of citizens needing low-cost housing.

When the administration slashed urban renewal allocations, I protested on the floor of the House. The Congress extended urban renewal and slum clearance for 1 additional year, and the administration about-faced and restored the slash in the program.

The housing problem in our community seems to worsen. New areas of blight develop more rapidly than community renewal and rehabilitation. This is a problem national in scope which can be resolved only with Federal leadership.

THE NATURAL-GAS BILL

Only the Clevelander who has compared natural-gas prices in other communities is in a position to really know the favorable conditions under which natural gas is made available in the Cleveland area. My winter gas bill for a 6-room house in Cleveland runs about $17 per month. In a smaller house in Washington, with milder weather, the natural gas charges exceed $41 per month. Gas is reasonably priced in Cleveland, and we must vigorously fight to preserve the Federal Natural Gas Act which insures Government vigilance in natural gas pricing. Otherwise we would be at the mercy of the Southwestern States gas producing interests who could impose their price demands on our gas-dependent community.

Early in June I testified before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee opposing legislation destroying Federal regulation of natural-gas pricing. It was my opinion that enactment of this legislation would impose higher gas charges on our citizens equivalent to the cost of 2½ extra months per year at winter-month price levels.

The legislation was passed out by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. Prior to the time it was considered by the powerful House Rules Committee, I prepared a petition which was signed by 58 Members of the House advising the Rules Committee of their desire to speak in opposition to the bill. Several weeks ago, proponents of the legislation announced their decision to defer further action on the bill until next year.

Drew Pearson recently reported that this decision was the result of the efforts of some young, vigorous Congressmen, led by TORBERT MACDONALD, of Massachusetts, JOHN DINGELL, of Michigan, and CHARLES VANIK, of Cleveland.

The gas-bill fight is not over. Next year the oil and gas industry will exert every effort to pass this legislation destroying effective Federal regulation of natural gas and which would result in a price increase for everyone.

WATER DIVERSION AND THE PORT OF CLEVELAND

In order to protect the interests of the port of Cleveland, I appeared before the Public Works Committee on March 27 and opposed the efforts of Chicago to increase withdrawal of water from 1,500 cubic feet per minute to 2,500, on a 3-year trial basis. Chicago needs this water to flush its sewage down the drainage canal. Such water diversions are seldom temporary and tend to defer the construction of necessary sewage treatment facilities.

On the same day Admiral Spencer, of the Lake Carriers Association, with headquarters in Cleveland, called attention to the lowering of lake levels. He stated that on the first day of navigation this year, the lakes were nearly 2 feet lower than they were in 1953. In view of that lowering the level of the lakes at this time by even 1 inch through the additional diversion of 1,000 cubic feet per second will affect the carrying capacity of nearly every vessel on nearly every trip, with a total annual reduction in carrying capacity of the Great Lakes fleet by about 1,200,000 tons. Chicago is already depressing the lakes by 3 inches below normal levels. This additional diversion will lower the lakes by another inch.

When we recognize that the entry channel into Cleveland Harbor is 25 feet deep, while the Cuyahoga River has a 23-foot depth, developed at a tremendous public expense, every inch of water is important.

When we look out over Lake Erie, it seems like a tremendous unlimited supply of water—but it is not enough to allow for extensive pollution or diversion by Great Lakes cities. We must plan for the days when new urban communities, miles from the water's edge, will look to the Great Lakes for lifegiving industry and agriculture-supporting fresh water.

This year Congress appropriated funds necessary to replace Cuyahoga River bridges with safe, modern structures to facilitate the movement of shipping as well as traffic. The next major effort will be directed to deepening the harbor and river channels in time to accomodate the St. Lawrence Seaway traffic.

CIVIL RIGHTS

In several respects the 85th Congress thus far promises to have a distinguished place in American Congressional history. It has been able to accomplish—in a limited way—what no other Congress since Civil War Reconstruction days could achieve—the enactment of a civil-rights bill. While the final product is a diluted version of the more liberal proposal passed by the House of Representatives, it nevertheless represents a step forward and provides a legal framework upon which future improvements can be made.

At the beginning of this session of Congress early in January, I was pleased to participate in an informal organization of some 80 northern and western liberals deeply concerned in the enactment of an adequate civil-rights bill. As one of the members of this liberal group, I was proud of the manner in which partisanship and personalities gave way in an effort to bring about the enactment of an effective civil-rights bill in the House of Representatives.

On January 28, 1957, I introduced H. R. 3793, a civil-rights bill patterned after the legislation introduced by the gentleman from New York, the Honorable EMANUEL CELLER, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, and on February 6, 1957, I testified before the House Judiciary Committee and urged the enactment of this vital legislation as a practical approach and constructive step forward in establishing better human relations in America. Although this proposal only partially fulfilled the need, it represented the very minimum that Congress could do to estabilsh uniform standards of human decency throughout America. Although this legislation left untouched vast areas of civil rights in America which remain the work of a future Congress, it represented only a moderate step forward.

I pointed out that the problem of integrating American life is not a local problem, that to the South it means the breakdown of separate social systems developed over the generations, that the universal dignity which will ultimately develop in the mainstream of southern life will increase productivity, develop a deeper sense of social responsibility, and preserve and protect the greatest asset with which the South is blessed—its people of all races and colors and creeds. I pointed out that the North has an abundance of prejudice problems which will probably provide more labor than the South for the Civil Rights Commission for the reason that prejudice can be seen to take effect at the city limits and that few areas in the new dominions of northern suburbia are feasibly and practically available to all Americans. The migration of city dwellers into the new confused outposts of suburbia are frequently motivated by a desire for a segregated community and segregated schools. Friendly, warm communities are not friendly and warm to everybody. Community clubs are designed for segregation by clubby covenants which blaspheme that dignified word. Their ostensible purpose is to preserve community life. Their practical purpose is to discriminate and segregate. Banks and lending institutions have had their part in isolating these communities from tolerance by a segregation loan policy.

The problems of the North are in many respects more difficult than those of the South. The difference is that the North tries where the South is inclined to despair.

After the legislation was reported out by the Judiciary Committee, civil-rights legislation appeared to be permanently suppressed by the Rules Committee, and in order to force the legislation from the Rules Committee, Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT filed a discharge petition to force the legislation to the floor. On April 29, 1957, I was the third Member of Congress to sign the discharge petition to expedite action on this vital and important legislation before the end of the current legislative session. On July 7, I took the floor to support the use of the injunctive process in civil-rights legislation on the basis that the use of injunction in this area would be creating a living law, facing up to the practicality of an existing situation and seeking to avoid injury to citizens threatened by deprivation of the right to vote before that injury occurs. On Monday, June 10, 1957, I took the floor in general debate on the civil-rights legislation and pointed out that the cause of civil rights and civil liberties received its first impetus in modern times in the administration of the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt and that these aims were revived and carried on by former President Harry Truman, who in 1948 listed civil-rights objectives and endeavored to carry them on.

On June 13 I took the floor again to oppose amendments which sought to destroy the legislation, while on June 17 it was necessary again to take the floor and argue against the so-called jury trial amendment on the basis that the injunctive power of our courts is a modern approach to the need for avoiding and eliminating injuries to the rights of persons before they develop, that the use of the injunctive power will grow rather than diminish. I argued that the injunctive process will undoubtedly prove a most useful device for protecting the rights and liberties of every American citizen.

As the civil-rights legislation left the House, it was a good, sound bill, and its purposes were seriously impaired by the amendments which were adopted by the Senate. Although my first reaction was that the legislation was fatally revised by the Senate, upon more considered judgment I came to realize that the legislative process seldom results in perfect legislation, that because of compromises which are wrought in the nature of the legislative process, it is essential to fight for the ideal by accepting the best that can be achieved on the theory that improvements to the law are a continuing process and the work of a future Congress. As a matter of fact, if Congress enacted only perfect laws, it would soon legislate itself out of business.

As finally drafted, the Civil Rights Act of 1957 provides for a bipartisan Commission with subpena powers to call witnesses and investigate civil-rights violations. A Civil Rights Division is established within the Justice Department under the supervision of an Assistant Attorney General who may institute injunctive proceedings in the name of the United States Government and on behalf of an aggrieved person to prevent acts designed to keep voters from the polls. This preventive action, as opposed to punitive action under present law, which is operative only after an act has been committed, is a new weapon of enforcement. It permits the Attorney General to bypass State local courts and go directly into Federal courts. It overcomes those State statutes which have been resurrected to prohibit organizations from filing suits on behalf of persons who are unable to do so themselves because of financial situation or intimidation.

The jury trial feature which has been made a part of the injunctive enforcement of voting rights applies only to criminal contempt proceedings designed to punish a person for willful disobedience of an injunction or other court order. Even there the judge may exercise discretion; the accused may be tried with or without a jury. However, if the judge tries the case without a jury, in the event of a conviction if the fine should exceed $300 or imprisonment of 45 days, the accused upon demand is entitled to a new trial before a jury. The accused is not entitled to jury trial if the fine does not exced this $300 or imprisonment, the maximum 45 days. If the accused does demand or is granted a jury trial, a conviction can draw maximum penalties of $1,000 or 6 months imprisonment. It is expected, however, that most voting cases will be disposed of through civil contempt proceedings aimed at securing compliance with a court order in which the accused is not entitled to a jury trial.

The significant fact is that for the first time in 82 years the Congress of the United States has placed itself on record in support of the civil rights of its citizens. The test of this legislation will not be in the convictions or imprisonment which it may produce. The test will be in the civil-rights violations it may discourage. It is to be hoped that the mandate of this legislation will fix itself clearly in the mind of every citizen to the end that he will not impair or interfere with the voting rights or civil liberties of his fellowmen.

If the spirit of this legislation is wholeheartedly accepted by the American people everywhere, no further legislation may be required. Our hope is that true tolerance will become habit and custom throughout the American scene.

AFTER ADJOURNMENT PLANS

After the close of this session of Congress, and until we reconvene in January, I will be available daily at my Cleveland office, 506 Federal Building on Cleveland's Public Square. The telephone number is Cherry 1-7900. A great many problems and inquiries were referred to my office during the course of the session which must be resolved. In addition, I want to personally meet as many constituents as possible. This is difficult but important work, but I consider it a Congressman's duty to courteously interpret the activities of the Federal Government to the individual citizen. The citizen is the root of all governmental authority, and he has the right to know the reasons behind the law or administrative act. He also has the right to express his opinions on public business to his elected representative. The individual citizen's sound and constructive ideas may well be the basis for writing new laws or rewriting the old.

THE LATE COL. THOMAS F. SULLIVAN

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, throughout our country there are many public officials in nonelective office, who have, and are rendering a lifetime of public service, honorable men and women devoted to their public trust. One of such fine public officials, who died a few days ago, was Col. Thomas F. Sullivan, police commissioner of the city of Boston. Tom Sullivan, as he was affectionately called, was well known throughout the country, numbering among his friends leaders from all walks of life. Among his close friends were Cardinal Spellman, Archbishop Cushing, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, President Harry S Truman, and countless others.

The respect held for Colonel Sullivan was deep and profound.

In time of war, in the Spanish-American War, Police Commissioner Sullivan served our country with fidelity and bravery.

Prior to his appointment as police commissioner of the city of Boston, in 1943, in which position he served until the time of his death, Colonel Sullivan served for a period of 20 years as chairman of the Boston Transit Commission. In this position he handled countless millions of dollars for the city of Boston without the slightest breath of criticism being directed at him. He was deeply respected for his ability, his honorableness and his devotion to duty. Above all, he was deeply respected for his honesty. He was a man of profound faith.

In addition, Colonel Sullivan held other public positions of trust and responsibility. His whole life was an active one, devoted to the public service of the city of Boston and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and, in time of war, to his country.

It can truly be said of Colonel Sullivan that he performed every duty in the best interest of the people he so unselfishly served.

Colonel Sullivan was a close and valued friend of Mrs. McCormack and myself. We respected him deeply. We valued his friendship.

During his lifetime Colonel Sullivan made marked contributions toward the preservation and strengthening of our country.

In Colonel Sullivan the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the city of Boston have lost one of their outstanding citizens.

Mrs. McCormack joins with me in extending to Mrs. Sullivan and her daughter our deep sympathy in their great loss and sorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

Mr. TABER. There was money put into the bill to cover that situation. I assume it was enough, because we have not heard anything more.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am delighted. I know the gentleman wants to take care of the life and health of the people of the country.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Libya Celebrates Sixth Anniversary of Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, when I came back from the Bandung Conference, I announced that I would address the United States Congress each time there was an anniversary of one of the 29 participating nations in the Asian-African Conference on friendly terms with the United States.

Congress will not be in session when Libya celebrates her sixth anniversary of independence on December 24, 1957, hence I wish to take this opportunity to send greetings to the people of Libya, His Majesty Mohamad Idris Al Mahdi Al Senussi, and His Excellency Saddigh Muntasser, Ambassador of Libya, in honor of this event.

On December 24, 1951, King Idris proclaimed "to the noble people of Libya that in fulfillment of their endeavors and of the United Nations resolutions of November 21, 1949, our beloved country has, with the help of God, attained independence." Both the League of Nations and the United Nations had proclaimed the concept of international responsibility for less fortunate peoples. Libyan independence became for many states the expression of this concept and of the assertion of the rights of nationalism.

Since 1951, Libya has been moving slowly but concretely in the direction of political maturity; its governmental institutions have assumed greater substance and authority; its economy has been bolstered by foreign grants and technical assistance; and its people have grown increasingly to accommodate themselves to the existence of national institutions which are somewhat more powerful and far more impersonal than those of the tribe or the family. In addition, the Libyan Government has enhanced its prestige and underlined the country's strategic importance in the Mediterranean area by concluding special agreements with the United States and United Kingdom permitting the establishment of western troops and bases in Libya. Libyan foreign policy has shown a marked friendliness to the United States and a growing understanding and appreciation of the threat of international communism.

We are proud of the progress being made by Libya and happy that we are able to assist. The orderly development of the new states of Africa to political stability and economic well-being is a source of gratification.

A Congressman Should Visit With His Constituents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM M. McCULLOCH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I believe that a Congressman should be in his district to confer and visit with his constituents whenever official duties do not require him to be in Washington.

When Congress adjourns in a few days, I expect to return home and to be available for conferences and visits with residents of the Fourth District in the courthouse of each county seat between 8 a. m. and 4 p. m., in accordance with the following schedule:

Allen County, Lima: Thursday, September 19.

Auglaize County, Wapakoneta: Tuesday, September 17.

Darke County, Greenville: Wednesday, September 18.

Mercer County, Celina: Monday, September 16.

Miami County, Troy: Tuesday, September 24.

Preble County, Eaton: Wednesday, September 25.

Shelby County, Sidney: Thursday, September 26.

No appointments will be necessary. Any problem with, or opinion concerning, the Federal Government will be proper subject for conference.

Of course, I will be glad to see residents of the district, in my Piqua office, any time that Congress is not in session, except on the days scheduled above.

Surplus Property for Worthy Agencies

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH B. KEATING

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to make certain welfare and recreation agencies eligible for Federal surplus property.

Under the present law, such surpluses can go only to medical institutions, health centers, schools, colleges, and related organizations. The proposed bill would broaden eligibility to include agencies such as the Salvation Army, YMCA, YWCA, Travelers Aid, and similar organizations.

The bill grew out of recommendations drawn up by a National Welfare Assembly Committee, which included members drawn from American Foundation for the Blind, Child Welfare League of America, Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds, Council on Social Work Education, Girl Scouts, National Council of Churches of Christ in America, National Federation of Settlements and Neighborhood Centers, National Jewish Welfare Board, National Recreation Association, Salvation Army, United Community Funds and Councils, Young Men's Christian Association, and Young Women's Christian Association. In addition, the following organizations also expressed their interest in this subject: American Hearing Society, Board of Hospitals and Homes of the Methodist Church, National Catholic Community Service, and United HIAS Service.

The present law, which limits eligibility for surplus Government property to educational and health organizations, should be expanded to include worthy welfare and recreational agencies. These include settlement houses, homes for the aged, youth centers, character building agencies, and adoption centers.

These agencies are doing a magnificent job of helping our young people, our aged, and many of our needy citizens. They need and can make good use of surplus property in their work.

Since the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare cooperated with the National Welfare Assembly Committee in drawing up the agreement out of which this bill grew, it deserves wide support and should be acted upon as soon as possible after Congress reconvenes in January.

We should leave no stone unturned in helping these fine organizations pursue their objectives, for in the end their success will mean a better America for all.

Hon. Samuel K. McConnell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STERLING COLE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. COLE. Mr. Speaker, it is my genuine regret that I was not present in the Chamber of the House on Tuesday last, when some Members, including yourself, gave expression of their high respect and esteem for our distinguished colleague of Pennsylvania, who is resigning from this body soon.

It was not long after Sam came to the Congress approximately 10 years ago that I became impressed with his high character and sound judgment. He was always of even temper, always friendly and gracious, always a gentleman with never an unkind word, always calm and deliberate. He was the kind of legislator who appeals to his colleagues and associates to a very high degree. We shall miss him in this Chamber.

His good advice will be needed in years to come and, personally, I will miss his friendship which I have treasured highly. In our regret, however, Mr. Speaker, there is consolation in the thought that Mr. McCONNELL is leaving us in order to render service to the unfortunate persons suffering from physical handicap. I am sure that he, too, must have some misgivings in leaving the Congress, but I am confident that he is motivated by the high sense of duty which has been characteristic of him, and his desire to be of genuine help to his fellow man, Mr. Speaker, we wish him God's speed and good health.

Retirement of Elton Layton

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH L. CARRIGG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. CARRIGG. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, may I note with a touch of personal sadness the resignation of Elton Layton as clerk of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House of Representatives.

Although Mr. Layton has resided in Virginia for many years, I still dispute Congressman BROYHILL's claim that Elton is his No. 1 constituent. I feel that because of the fact that Elton for many years was a resident of my own district I can also lay claim to him.

Since coming to Washington and particularly since he began his work on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, he has endeared himself to the members of that committee under whom he has served over the years and his gracious and courteous manner to those who have had dealings with the committee certainly has given him stature of such a nature that two Congressmen could claim him as their own.

Elton Layton comes from Matamoras, Pike County, Pa., where his twin sister, Mrs. Elda Lord, still resides. He is the son of the late Cora Layton Hine, of Matamoras and Orson, Pa.

Mr. Layton started work on his 16th birthday in 1906 as a stenographer with the Erie Railroad Co. in New York City and, after working 5 years with them, he accepted a better position with the Borden Condensed Milk Co. in New York City. Five years later he accepted a position in the Quartermaster General's Office of the War Department here in Washington. He was soon promoted to secretary to the Quartermaster General of the Army. In this position he came into contact with Members of Congress, one of whom, Hon. Samuel E. Winslow, had taken note of his ability and offered him his present position which he accepted at the beginning of the 67th Congress in 1921. It is believed that no one on Capitol Hill has ever continuously served as a clerk of any committee for that length of time.

It is my sincere hope and prayer that Almighty God will shower His choicest blessings upon Elton and his family during the years to come.

Cambodia Celebrates Its Fourth Anniversary of Independence, November 9, 1957

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, when I came back from the Bandung Conference, I announced that I would address the United States Congress each time there was an anniversary of one of the 29 participating nations in the Asian-African Conference on friendly terms with the United States.

Because the Congress will not be in seession at the time of the event, I wish to take this opportunity to congratulate the people of Cambodia, His Majesty King Norodom Sihanouk, and His Excellency Nong Kimmy, Ambassador of Cambodia on the occasion of the celebration of the fourth anniversary of independence of Cambodia, November 9, 1957.

The people of Cambodia have displayed courage and scored no small victories on their path to independence. Cambodia became an associated state within the French Union as a result of the French-Cambodian Treaty of November 8, 1949. Following additional arrangements with France, the Cambodian King proclaimed national independence on November 9, 1953. International recognition was accorded Cambodian sovereignty in the Geneva Declaration of July 21, 1954.

Cambodia and the United States have enjoyed close friendship and cooperation. According to Secretary Dulles:

> United States policy in Cambodia is based on a simple precept: That is, the United States through its military and economic aid programs seeks to assist the Cambodian Government in its endeavor to maintain the sovereign independence of the Kingdom. This assistance is extended only at the wish of the Royal Cambodian Government, which officially requested military aid on May 20, 1954, and military and economic aid on September 1, 1954.

The United States considers it to be in its national interest to help in the economic and social advancement of all free nations. The best way that we in America can maintain our own independence is to help other countries maintain their independence. Only by granting full independence to the Asiatic peoples can the Communists be deprived of the contention that they are liberating those peoples from colonial rule. Full sovereignty for all people is the only way to rally them at this hour to the cause of the West and to persuade them that it is in their own interests to fight to the death against the Communists.

As one who deeply believes in freedom, democracy, and the importance of achieving a better understanding among all nations, I want to again extend warm greetings to the people of Cambodia, and wish them every success.

Latin American Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. B. CARROLL REECE
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have on several occasions during the last few months, addressed the House indicating my concern over the campaign of the gentleman from Oregon against several Latin American republics. I honestly feel that his activities are contrary to the best interests of our national security and the welfare of amicable hemispheric relations. I have tried to be quite objective in my comments on the gentleman's activities and have raised numerous questions which he has seen fit either to evade or to leave unanswered. If these questions were fully and completely answered by the gentleman, the House might be in a better position to judge his actions in light of full disclosure. I would like to take this opportunity to repeat some of my questions posed on July 19, and August 9, 1957, in the fond hope that the gentleman will see the benefit of complete and candid replies in the interest of a full understanding of his objectives.

I have stated that the gentleman foments revolution and in support of this assertion, I quoted his words of June 13, 1957, on this floor. "Do I foment revolution against dictators? Yes; gladly, and until I die." I asked the gentleman if he still adheres to this position or has he seen the folly of an American representative fomenting revolution against friendly Allied countries.

I have asserted that from a reading of certain Costa Rican newspapers it would appear that the gentleman's statements and actions were an intrusion into the foreign policy prerogatives of the executive branch of the Government. In order to judge the correctness of my assertion I have, on several occasions, asked the gentleman to make available to the House all his public and private statements made in the Caribbean area. He has consistently refused to do so.

I have repeatedly questioned the gentleman concerning his weekend excursions to Costa Rica and Colombia in the company of a female employee of the Library of Congress. I have asked the gentleman to explain why this employee, Mrs. Bennett, was given equal pictorial and editorial billing by Costa Rican newspapers and why she was termed "a collaborator of the gentleman from Oregon." Also, I have asked that the gentleman make known the extent of the expenses defrayed by the Government of Costa Rica and a Colombian newspaper. I brought to the gentleman's attention the fact that the Associated Press, under dateline June 15, reported that Mr. and Mrs. Porter arrived in Costa Rica on that date. I asked the gentleman if the Associated Press had confused Mrs. Bennett with Mrs. Porter and, if not, were Mrs. Porter's expenses defrayed similarly. None of these questions have been answered.

As regards the gentleman's attitude toward the propriety of the Library of Congress providing the services of Mrs. Bennett, I have inquired of the gentleman if he believes that those services are proper. I raised the question of conflict of interest in Mrs. Bennett, a Federal employee of the United States, accepting emoluments from foreign governments. I ask the gentleman if he had sought a ruling on this question from the Attorney General of the United States. There has been no answer.

I felt that in light of my assertions concerning the improper actions of Mrs. Bennett, it would be helpful to judge their correctness if the gentleman from Oregon were to make available a summary of Mrs. Bennett's actions and public statements in the Caribbean. Such might explain her widespread press coverage in Costa Rica. No such information has been forthcoming from the gentleman.

The gentleman has stated that the military advantage of aid to certain Latin American countries is only fancied but he admits that the Department of Defense asserts that the military advantage gained thereby is very real. I have asked the gentleman if he considers himself a more qualified judge of military requirements than the Department of Defense. The question remains unanswered.

I agree with the gentleman that the Communist danger in Latin America can be more attributed to subversion than invasion but that there is no difference in the end result. I asked the gentleman if he is aware that the Red government of Guatemala established by subversion was overthrown by Castillo Armas just in time to prevent the arrival of Soviet arms in a Swedish ship.

The gentleman has stated on numerous occasions that everyone in the State Department below the post of Assistant Secretary for Inter-American Affairs agrees with his policies. In the interest of the continuation of our good-neighbor policy, I ask the gentleman to make public the names of those State Department officials who are not in sympathy with this long-established bipartisan policy. Again, the gentleman has failed to produce.

The gentleman has stated that he has been "lionized by the people of Costa Rica." In this regard, I asked the gentleman what connection there was between his fervent reception in Costa Rica and his introduction of an amendment to the mutual security bill which would have cut off aid to Costa Rica's archenemy, Nicaragua.

I ask the gentleman to explain the meaning of the overwhelming defeat of his amendment to the mutual security bill particularly in light of the fact that he had brought these amendments and his report thereon to the attention of every Member of this body 2 weeks before the vote was recorded.

I have asked the gentleman why he does not consult with the House Committee on Foreign Affairs or the Secretary of State before making his radical charges against the governments of allied countries. Again, no satisfactory answer was forthcoming.

These and many other questions designed to reach a better understanding of the objectives of the gentleman from Oregon remain unanswered. I have no means of knowing whether the gentleman will ever choose to reply but in the absence of any explanation from the gentleman, I conclude his silence is a tacit admission of the veracity of my assertions.

Courteous, Considerate, Efficient Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KATHRYN E. GRANAHAN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mrs. GRANAHAN. Mr. Speaker, as we come to the final hours of this session of Congress, I want to take this opportunity to express my personal appreciation to the fine group of young men who serve us here in the House as page boys, doorkeepers, messengers, and in a variety of other capacities.

They are uniformly courteous, considerate, helpful in a million ways, and provide us with very efficient service. When one considers that there are 435 Members of the House of Representatives, and that we are all on constant call when the House is in session—with messages from our offices, visits to the floor with friends and constituents who have come to see the House in action, and the constant summoning of the telephone—it is a wonder these House employees I mentioned can find the energy to carry back and forth all of the many messages and to run all of the many errands which are their duty during a day when the House meets.

I would like to pay particular tribute to the fine work of C. H. "Colonel" Emerson, and "Charlie" Hackney, in directing the work of the telephone pages in the Cloakroom, and "Art" Cameron, overseer of the group, as well as the boys themselves—particularly "Ken" Harding, "Dan" Corcoran, "Bob" Gandel, "Joe" Saunders, "Bill" Grotefeld, and John Larkin. They have been wonderful to me.

Mr. Turner Robertson, chief page, is one of the outstanding employees of the House, and I know I speak for all of the Members when I say how much we appreciate the fine way he directs the bench pages, the door pages, the phone pages—the entire group.

Professional Visual Care for War Veterans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. B. F. SISK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Veterans' Affairs has reported favorably to this House H. R. 6719, which we may anticipate will be before the House for action shortly after we convene in January. I would like to commend this legislation to the Members and urge that during the recess they take the opportunity to examine it. The bill would provide urgently needed salary adjustments to the professional personnel of the Veterans' Administration. I am convinced these adjustments are not only merited, but that they are most necessary if we are to secure for veterans the high caliber health and hospital services they deserve.

I would like particularly to address my remarks and draw the Members' attention to section 5 of H. R. 6719, which would provide a long overdue recognition of the services and accomplishments of the optometric profession and would enable the Veterans' Administration to make far better use of optometrists in providing visual care for veterans.

About 10 years ago the Congress directed that the armed services commission optometrists. As a consequence, more than 300 doctors of optometry are on active duty with professional status as commissioned officers of the military services, holding ranks as high as lieutenant colonel in the Army, captain in the Navy, and major in the Air Force. Under present regulations, doctors of optometry, graduates of accredited and recognized colleges requiring 5 or 6 years of college work leading to doctors' degrees, are classified as technicians, grades 5 to 7, by the Veterans' Administration and are paid and treated as such. As a consequence, fewer than 10 optometrists are employed by the Administration throughout the country. Unfortunately, the veterans and taxpayers are the ones who suffer through this inconsistent discrimination.

I do not think there can be any doubt of the ultimate economy and improved visual care which would result if the Congress enacts the authorizing provisions of section 5 of H. R. 6719 and if a strengthened program of visual care of veterans is conscientiously formulated by the Veterans' Administration. Doctors of optometry are providing about 75 percent of the visual care in the United States and it is unthinkable that we should deny this same visual attention to veterans.

Doctors of optometry are intensively trained to test and diagnose visual defects and to consider test results and prescribe appropriate corrective lenses and devices. This training to diagnose, to analyze, and to prescribe are the phases of their work in the visual health field which merit professional recognition, for they require the exercise of independent, trained judgment. Doctors of optometry are thus differentiated from nurses, laboratory workers, and other technicians who carry out orders given them by a doctor.

Doctors of optometry are also intensively trained to recognize diseases of the eyes, though treatment of diseases by medicine or surgery is outside their field. When a patient exhibits symptoms of disease, he is referred to a specialist in diseases of the eye in exactly the same manner as your family medical doctor refers patients to specialists when diagnosis and treatment are not in the medical field in which his services will provide the attention and expert handling required.

During committee consideration of this legislation, two objections were raised to the provisions of section 5 giving professional status to doctors of optometry. It was said this should not be done because the present professional staff of the Veterans' Administration is designated as the "Medical Service," and optometrists are not medical doctors. To me, such an argument completely lacks substance and is a quibbling over words. It would be far better to rename the division as "Health Service," than to deprive veterans of this care—if any recognition is to be given to such an argument.

More serious was the allegation that optometrists are not professionally trained. I looked into this, because I certainly do not want to bring about unskilled or untrained visual care. I find that every college in this country giving a degree as doctor of optometry maintains a professional school of optometry with high requirements for admission, including at least 2 years of preprofessional training at the college level, with a minimum of 3 or 4 additional years of professional study, requiring 5 or 6 years of college training in all. This compares favorably with the requirements of other professions concerned with health care and exceeds a number of them.

I think the Members will agree that this requirement, together with the provisions of section 5 authorizing the Veterans' Administrator to determine requirements for eligibility, effectively insure the highest professional standards. I feel it is unfortunate that misleading statements were made to the committee in this regard.

There is a larger and perhaps a more important principle involved in the legislation we consider which bears on health care for veterans, servicemen, and others entitled to such care. I think it would be most unfortunate if we became so circumscribed and bound to the canons and beliefs and theories of any one school or branch of the healing art that we could not take advantage of the services offered by another branch. We all may suffer if we are blind to the advances of science and the formulation of new theories which, perhaps, do not fit into the thinking of older schools. We cannot afford to trust our health and well-being exclusively to a monopoly of thought.

Puerto Rico and Its Governor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. A. FERNÓS-ISERN

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM PUERTO RICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. FERNÓS-ISERN. Mr. Speaker, during the first session of this Congress there have appeared in the RECORD sundry statements with reference to various aspects of Latin American policy in general and to policies concerning the Caribbean area in particular. Although I am the only person in the Congress who represents a Caribbean community, I have not felt inclined to participate. However, in a spirit of fairness and justice to my constituents in general and to the chief executive of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Gov. Luis Muñoz-Marín, in particular, I must now make the present statement. But, before I proceed, may I say that it is not my intention to engage in debate with any of my colleagues who have preceded me. I merely wish to set the record straight in what concerns Puerto Rico and its Governor.

Many, if not most, of the Members know Governor Muñoz-Marín, and I know that those who do have always had a high respect for him. In this regard, I must express my deep appreciation for what our colleague from California [Mr. JACKSON], had to say in his remarks on Monday. Perhaps it is unnecessary that I may say anything on this subject, but men pass on while the printed word remains. The record might be confusing if the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico were to remain silent.

I shall begin by observing that the powers and functions of the government of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico are about the same as the functions and powers of the government of any State of the Union, and that the United States Government operates in Puerto Rico in the same way as it does in any State of the Union.

I observe, too, that there are only 65 miles of water between the Dominican Republic and Puerto Rico. Whatever the political conditions in the Dominican Republic may be, it is a fact that a substantial number of Dominican citizens have chosen to exile themselves from their native country, and that Puerto Rico, as well as New York, and certainly other places in the United States, have become their havens. Whether they live in Puerto Rico, New York, or Miami, they live under the same United States laws. I can understand that the feelings between these exiles and officials of their own government may be taut and tense. It does not require much imagination to conceive it. But no matter how strained those relations may be, I do not believe that such a situation should justify transgressions of the boundaries of propriety as to either of them in dealing with or referring to or passing judgment on the acts of officials of the United States Government or of the State governments, including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico.

There is an instance which I shall point out where I think such boundaries have been transgressed. In a letter recently inserted in the RECORD, accusations have been made by a Dominican official with respect to the Governor of Puerto Rico for the reason that the latter granted an interview in his office in San Juan to a gentleman of Dominican extraction, a resident of the city of New York, who was then visiting Puerto Rico. He was accompanied by a former president of the Dominican Senate who has been a resident of Puerto Rico for many years. These gentlemen are known to be opponents of the present Dominican administration. No evidence, whatever, except supposition and speculation, has been given to consider the visit of this gentleman to Puerto Rico as anything improper. But it seems that, in the opinion of the Dominican official, the officials of the government of Puerto Rico are under an affirmative obligation to refuse to receive callers, or in any way communicate with persons who happen to be opponents of the present Dominican administration.

We in Puerto Rico live under the laws of the Commonwealth and the laws of the United States and no other. It is not our concern what political habits in other countries may be.

The Governor of Puerto Rico would not refuse to confer at any time with his own political opponents. It seems absurd that he may be expected to refuse to confer with anyone merely because that person is somebody else's opponent.

Suppression of freedom of thought, expression and association in Puerto Rico cannot be imposed either by direction or indirection from within; less so, by indirection from without.

Rights and privileges recognized in the United States are as sacred in Puerto Rico as anywhere in the Union. The citizens of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico fully expect such rights always to be so maintained.

Iran Celebrates the Birthday of the Shah

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.

OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, when I came back from the Bandung Conference, I announced that I would address the United States Congress each time there was an anniversary of one of the 29 participating nations in the Asian-African Conference on friendly relations with the United States.

Congress will not be in session when Iran celebrates the birthday anniversary of the Shah on October 26, 1957; hence, I wish to take this opportunity to send greetings to His Imperial Majesty Mohammed Reza Shah Pahlavi and the people of Iran in honor of this event.

After a decade of almost continual foreign menace and internal strife, Iran today is experiencing recovery. Internal order, a pro-Western foreign policy, and a modest start on the profound economic and social reforms considered essential for long-term stability have been effected.

A major factor in the improvement of the country's position has been the cooperation extended through the United Nations and the United States technical assistance programs which have been operating in Iran since 1949 and 1950, respectively. These programs have met with much enthusiasm in Iran. Greater progress is still needed, and efforts are being exerted toward that end.

Although much remains to be done, there is much that is positive and satisfactory in the present Iranian situation. Iran has consistently demonstrated her confidence in the principle of collective security and helps to form a bulwark against communism. Menaced for centuries by the Soviet dreams of expansion, Iran has a life-and-death interest in the collective security aims of the Baghdad Pact and the Eisenhower doctrine.

As one who deeply believes in freedom, democracy, and the importance of achieving a better understanding among all nations, I want to take this opportunity to wish Iran every success.

Politics Stalemate Farm Legislation—Benson Exploits Disunity Among Farmers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. HAROLD D. COOLEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Speaker, as the 1st session of the 85th Congress draws to a close, it occurs to me that I should advise the Congress and the country concerning the work of the House Committee on Agriculture during the weeks and months of the present session. I also feel that I should discuss some of the problems with which the members of our committee have been confronted and say something about the present plight of American farmers.

Such a report, to convey to the Nation a true accounting, must bring forward at the outset the name of Mr. Ezra Taft Benson, Secretary of Agriculture.

BENSON RETURNS FROM THE WILDERNESS

In the closing weeks of this Congress, when the Secretary of Agriculture, under normal circumstances, would be in Washington eagerly pressing all matters vital to the well-being of farmers, everyone was wondering as to the whereabouts of Mr. Benson. His absence seemed to be shrouded in some sort of mystery. The President indicated at a news conference that the Secretary was out in the country getting grassroots opinion on a new farm program. Apparently the President did not know where the Secretary was nor did he know what he was doing. But now the veil of mystery has been lifted and we are told that the Secretary has been wandering in the wilderness for 50 days and nights. He says he was inspecting national forests. We, of course, hope that he found everything well in the wilderness. Actually, the farmers of America think that the Secretary has been in "a wilderness" since the beginning of his administration. Ever since he has been in public office we have been hoping that the Secretary would come up with some new idea, but to this good day he has neither presented a single new thought nor a single new idea. His one purpose has been to drive down farm prices and income.

CONGRESS ALERT TO FARMERS' NEEDS

Mr. Speaker, there has never been a session of Congress in which the Members who are interested in the well-being of agriculture have worked more diligently, more faithfully, or with a greater dedication, in behalf of those millions of our citizens who live and labor on the farms of our country. I commend those Members of both parties who have proven themselves to be devoted friends of agriculture.

PARTISAN POLITICS PLAYS A PART

Unfortunately, partisan politics has lifted its ugly head in our committee room. The problems of agriculture are paramount and should be considered in an atmosphere which is entirely free from partisan politics and political expediency. Members of our committee of both parties are devoted to the cause of agriculture and to the well-being of all the people of our Nation, but we are divided along party lines and in such a situation the farmers of the Nation are the ones who suffer.

When the 85th Congress convened in January the agricultural economy, after 4 long years of steady and devastating deterioration, was still growing progressively worse. Secretary Benson was winning the great battle to bring down prices and to lower farm income. Never on any occasion has he championed the cause of farmers. Many farm families, unable to make ends meet, have moved into towns and cities seeking jobs which were not available. Others were holding on to their land only by privation and by increasing their debts. Many operators of larger farms were hard-pressed. Meanwhile, other great segments of our economy continued to enjoy unparalleled prosperity.

SITUATION DEMANDED ACTION

This Congress immediately set to work to undo the damage that had been done to the farm program in the 4 years of Mr. Benson's reign; to take whatever legislative steps were needed to restore stability to agriculture—and thus to bring our farm people into equal partnership in the rewards of American free enterprise.

But, Mr. Speaker, our efforts have been nullified by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson.

The deep concern of the Members of this House for the well-being of agriculture is vividly spread in the records of our Committee on Agriculture, which it is my privilege and honor to serve as chairman. These records show that the Members of this body have introduced in this session 513 bills, intended to improve the conditions on our farms and our committee has taken final action on 272 of these bills.

Our committee, with its 18 subcommittees, has conducted 176 hearings and study sessions. We studied all the bills carefully and, as is the custom, selected those we deemed to be worthy of early action and submitted them to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, the House, the Congress, the farmers of America, should know this:

We sent 125 bills to the Secretary. Mr. Benson approved only 16 of these bills. He disapproved or proposed substantial changes in all the others or did not express an opinion at all. He rejected all legislation proposing fundamental improvements in the operation of farm laws to increase the income of farm families.

We sent to him bills proposing revisions in the present loan and acreage allotment program. We forwarded to him bills proposing two-price or domestic parity systems for various commodities which would let these crops move competitively into world markets while maintaining a reasonable price in our domestic markets. We sent to him proposals for production payments, compensatory payments, or marketing equalization payments to farmers. He returned them with the Department's stamp of disapproval.

BENSON WOULD DESTROY PARITY PRINCIPLE

Instead, Mr. Benson sent us his own proposal, that the flexible 75 to 90 percent of parity supports for the major crops, the sliding scale which he installed, now be discarded and that he be given absolute authority, at his own personal discretion, to fix the supports of major crops at zero to 90 percent, or to eliminate the program completely. In effect, Mr. Benson's program for agriculture is that we make him the czar of agriculture.

Needless to say, no Democrat would touch Mr. Benson's bill; and likewise, it is to the credit of the Republican Members of the Congress that they, too, have washed their hands of this new effort of the Secretary to destroy the parity principle which the farmers of America were so long in winning and which the Nation had come to accept as sound and fair. Agriculture is in the middle of a sad and sorry situation when the Secretary of Agriculture is not able to persuade and prevail upon any member of his own political party to introduce legislation which he proposes.

Mr. Speaker, although Mr. Benson cannot find support in the Congress for this new mischief he proposes, we have learned that when the Secretary disapproves a measure it is doomed. This is the lesson the President taught us last year when he vetoed H. R. 12, the bill which sought to stop the downward flexing of farm prices and to restore 90 percent of parity price supports.

Thus, the threat of veto, at Mr. Benson's signal, thwarts the Congress.

THE SECRETARY EXPLOITS DISUNITY

Moreover, the Secretary does not rely entirely upon the veto, nor upon the fortunes of his bills in the Congress, to accomplish his ends. He has a third design. It is the most crafty, and the most cunning, of all. It is contemptible and unforgivable. We have it from no less a source than the Wall Street Journal, which supports Mr. Benson's policies, that the administration is exploiting disunity among farmers to bring down farm prices. The following is from the front page of this newspaper's edition of August 2:

> Benson maneuvers to blunt opposition to his drive for lower price supports.
>
> He'll seek power to ease planting curbs right away if props drop. Aids figure fatter harvests would offset the initial pinch of lower prices on farm income. Benson will hold out hope that controls would die eventually. He'll promise to use prop-cutting power moderately, trim supports to world market levels in easy stages.
>
> Administration strategists aim to exploit splits within commodity groups. They play California cottongrowers against Dixie producers in the push for lower fiber props. Officials make the most of intercrop jealousy. Benson plans to ask authority to lower dairy support floors; spokesmen for major crops complain mandatory dairy props incur heavy losses.
>
> Benson's foes fail to agree on an alternative. Some Democrats plug hard for direct payments to farmers. Others refuse to swallow the idea. Benson's backers take cheer from the opposition's distress.

A BATTLE WON AND LOST

Mr. Speaker, only a few short years ago we were confident that a long, hard, and sometimes bitter struggle had been won. We thought that at long last agriculture had been accepted in equal partnership to share equitably in the rewards of free enterprise along with all other segments of our society.

Today we find ourselves embattled perhaps as never before.

Farmers are again the poor relations in the Nation's economy. The parity principle is under assault, and has been shaken to its very foundation. Crop is pitted against crop, region against region, organization against organization. This disunity is being exploited to rob the farmer of the rewards for his work.

The situation we confront today is strangely and ominously reminiscent of the state of agriculture 25 years ago.

There are many Members of this House who can remember—and some will never forget—the late 1920's when agriculture went into a devastating decline. Our farmers called for help. The rest of our economy—much as today—was preoccupied with prosperity, and the farmers' cries scarcely were heard.

Ultimately, in the early 1930's, the ruin of agriculture ran its inevitable course, and our whole economy tumbled into a great depression.

It was then that this country came to a realization of the importance of agriculture to the strength and prosperity of our whole economy. That was when our farm program was born.

Mr. Speaker, in a few days we shall be back home, in our districts among the good people who sent us here, and in our daily associations we shall be giving accounts of our stewardship. Our farmer friends will want to know why agriculture is depressed—why the farm program that operated so well so long and at so little expense is not now working to help them—why farm families are not sharing in the Nation's prosperity—why nothing has been done.

I am going to tell the truth. I am going to tell my farmer friends about Mr. Benson, and about those who hold his hand. My people are going to hear from me two stories: One, a 20-year story; the other, a 4-year story.

THE 20-YEAR STORY

The 20-year story, which began in 1933, is an account of the accomplishment of the parity principle—agriculture's magna carta. The income of agriculture multiplied sixfold, sevenfold, or eightfold in those two decades. For 11 consecutive years prior to 1953, the average prices paid to farmers were at or above 100 percent of parity. Rural people were able to buy the conveniences and comforts hitherto available only to those who resided in the cities and towns. The blessings of electricity were taken into the rural areas. Farmers became financially able to mechanize their farms and to apply the new sciences, to bring the blessings of abundance at low cost to this country. Farmers, with the means to do it, devoted their resources and energies to the restoration and conservation of their most precious resource, the soil. Better farm income created greater markets for industries in the cities, made jobs, and kept factory wheels turning.

During those 20 years the output per farm increased by 100 percent, so that now each farmworker feeds 20 persons. As a consequence of this new efficiency in agriculture American families have had available to them more and better food, for an expenditure of a smaller percentage of their total income, than in any other period of history. Although in recent years retail prices have increased as farm prices declined, even today the average hourly wage of industrial workers will buy twice as much food as in 1929.

Our accomplishments in agriculture were phenomenal. What did this 20-year program cost?

The Commodity Credit Corporation supported the prices of the major storable crops for the 20 years prior to 1953, not at a loss, not at a cost, but at an actual profit of $13 million. For these two decades the CCC price supports on basic crops, nonbasics, perishables and nonperishables, storables and nonstorables—potatoes, eggs, wool, and everything else—amounted to only $1,064,000,000.

The total losses on all price-support programs through the Commodity Credit Corporation on all commodities amounted to only $1,064,000,000. I emphasize the fact that this was a cumulative loss for 20 years; to show just how negligible this loss really was, and in fairness to farmers the cumulative losses should be related to cumulative gains for the same period of time. The cumulative farm marketings for the same 20 years, 1933–52 inclusive, amounted to more than $390 billion. The cumulative national income for the same 20 years amounted to over $3 trillion. So in fairness, we must relate price-support losses both to farm income and to national income to realize just how negligible the losses really are.

THE 4-YEAR STORY

Now let us look at the 4-year story which began in 1953, and which continues—though we pray that it may not be for long.

First, we recall that 1953 was the year in which the assault was launched upon the parity principle—the Secretary of Agriculture began shouting to the country: "The farmer is pricing himself out of his markets"—and here is the story:

Farm prices dropped in 1953 to 92 percent of parity, to 89 percent in 1954, 84 percent in 1955, to 82 percent in 1956, and prices in July 1957 were running below July of 1956 in terms of parity.

Farm net income dropped from $14,256,000,000 in 1952 to $11,800,000,000 in 1956.

Farm-mortgage debt has risen from $6,600,000,000 in 1952 to approximately $10 billion today.

Whereas the CCC price-support program for 20 years cost $1,064,000,000, the losses for the 4 years, 1953 through 1956, were 3 times the combined total of the previous 20 years—slightly over $1 billion in 20 years, and $3 billion in 4 years. Meanwhile, CCC investments in surpluses increased from $2,452,000,000 in 1952 to $8,211,000,000 as of January 1, 1957.

Briefly, in 4 years Mr. Benson has lost 3 times as much money in CCC price supports as this program cost in the previous 20 years; at the end of the 4 years he has 3 times more surplus on hand than he had when he started; farm prices are down 18 percent and farm income down 15 percent.

Mr. Speaker, thus is the dreary 4-year story of the farmer's income going down and the costs to the Government going up.

FACTS AND FIGURES

To aid the Members in pointing concisely to what has taken place, and what is taking place, in agriculture, I am inserting at this point certain facts and figures. But before submitting these facts and figures I want to emphasize that Secretary Benson has had more money, more personnel, and more power and authority than any other Secretary of Agriculture in the history of this Republic. He has had more committees, more commissions, and personal advisers than any other Secretary in history. When he took office our agricultural budget was only $1,817,000,000. The last Benson proposed was for approximately $5 billion, amounting to almost 50 percent of the total net income of all the farmers of America during the year 1956. Only a small part of this gigantic sum actually went into the pockets of farmers.

CCC PRICE SUPPORT LOSSES

As of January 1, 1953: $1,064,617,225.

As of January 1, 1957: $4,005,229,643.

(NOTE.—The losses in 4 years, from January 1953 through 1956, were about three times the total of losses during the previous 20-year history of CCC price support operations.)

Twenty-year loss (1933–52): $1,064,617,225.

Loss (1953 through 1956): $2,940,612,418.

CCC OPERATIONS IN BASIC CROPS ONLY (COTTON, WHEAT, TOBACCO, CORN, RICE, AND PEANUTS)

January 1, 1953 (at the end of 20 years): $13,011,290 profit.

January 1, 1957 (4 years later): $1,222,671,853 loss.

(NOTE.—A $13,011,290 profit over a 20-year period of CCC price supports on the basics turned into an $8 million loss within 4 months after Mr. Benson took office. In 4 years under Mr. Benson losses on the basics amounted to $1,235,683,243 compared to the $13 million plus profit in the previous 20 years. These losses have been piling higher since January 1, 1957.)

(NOTE.—The CCC support program for cotton, over 20 years, showed a profit of over $268 million. But this profit has been wiped out, by a cotton program loss of over a half billion dollars in the last 18 months.)

Mr. Speaker, these are the facts and the figures. I will tell my people the truth, that the 20-year story is the triumph of the parity principle and its meaning in a better life for farm families, more and better food for a smaller part of the paychecks of consumers and a modest cost to the Government; that the 4-year story is of the dismantling of this hard-won parity principle and what this has meant in new deprivations for farmers and huge costs to the Government.

MORE TROUBLE AHEAD

Now, where do we stand today?

I regret that I must tell my farmer friends that the worst seems yet to come.

Those who are tearing down the parity principle—the farmers' Magna Carta—thus far have accomplished their ends principally by destruction of the 90-percent of parity price supports and the substitution of a sliding, flexible, lower support system, down to 75 percent of parity for the major storable crops.

Now, as I have heretofore mentioned, the Secretary of Agriculture has sent to the Congress a proposal that he be given absolute power, in his own personal discretion, to support the basic crops at 0 to 90 percent of parity, or to eliminate supports completely. He evangelizes a free-market and free-price route for agriculture.

I can see nothing but farm bankruptcy in such a policy.

THE NATURE OF THE FARM PROBLEM

Agriculture alone cannot live under one system and the rest of the economy under another. Wages do not fluctuate with supply and demand. Labor has its minimum wage and collective bargaining laws. Supply and demand have little influence on the cost of transportation, electric power, and telephone service. Industry puts a price tag on what it produces.

Agriculture is the only major element of our total economy that has no device outside of Government, to pattern its production to market needs. Farmers have no way of measuring what should be their individual contributions to a balanced national supply of food and fiber, without Government help. Farmers have virtually no bargaining power in the commerce they conduct.

Shall we say to the farmers of America that you shall go into the market places with what you produce and, hat in hand, ask: "What will you give me?"

The farm families on these broad lands are the primary producers of the wealth of this Nation. Yet, in 1956, although they comprised 13.2 percent of our population, they received only 6.3 percent of our national income. Income of all farm workers last year averaged only 78 cents an hour, for their labor and their management. The average wage of industrial workers increased to $2.08 an hour. The per capita income of the 22,250,000 people living on farms amounted to only $889—and a third of this was from off-farm sources such as part-time jobs in town—while the per capita income of our nonfarm population soared to $2,010.

Yet we have before the Congress, directly from the Secretary of Agriculture, a proposition for the further dismantling of price supports—a proposition that would totally wreck the parity principle, which is agriculture's only recognized means of determining the inequity of its position in relation to the rest of our economy and society.

THE ANTIFARMER CAMPAIGN

Perhaps never in history, as in the last 4 years, has 1 segment of our society been singled out for such lambasting, such slander, and generally such cruel treatment as has been administered to the farmers of America.

Through every medium, through press releases, through radio and television, in speeches, thousands upon thousands of words have been beamed to city dwellers. With evil sounding overtones, such words as "surpluses," "controls," "subsidies," "waste," have been drummed into city ears. Our customers in town have been told that the farmer is pricing himself out of his markets, with a hint that he is living a high life on Government checks. The farmers have been denounced, ridiculed, and vilified from one end of the land to the other by people in high places.

Moreover, as I have pointed out to the House, a successful attempt has been made to divide farmers, to set one group, one region, one organization against another.

The great shibboleth of the exploiters of disunity is the one word: "Freedom."

Never has one word embracing a noble aspiration of a people been more soiled in its usage. The American farmer is the most independent, the most freedom-loving individual on earth. The question is: Shall we let the exploiters use this virtue to permanently repress our farm families and to make them content with a lesser share in the rewards of America's free enterprise?

Industry and business manage, adjust, and control production and the flow of goods offered for sale. We are told that if farmers enter into a program to pattern their production to the measure of their markets they are surrendering their freedom.

Industry and business put a price tag on the goods they produce and merchandise, but the farmer is propagandized that if he enters into an arrangement to use the pricing principles that are necessary to the success of any enterprise, he will lose his independence and his liberties.

The exploiters would deny to the farmers the recourse to their Government such as has been used to restrain the impact of the free play of supply and demand in industry and business and has mitigated and tempered the hazards of working and trading in industry and business.

Let me make my own position clear.

I shall work to the limit for the real independence of farmers, and of all Americans; but I shall never brood on the farmers' loss of their freedom to go bankrupt and their freedom to become again the paupers in this Nation's economy.

The free-market and free-price route that is now being preached for agriculture, while the farmers' production costs are fixed high by the protections afforded all others in our economy, will surely put our farmers at the mercy of a world price.

We shall not submit to reducing the American farmer to the rank of world peasant.

Many of us representing agricultural districts supported the laws that have brought a new era of prosperity to the laboring man. We supported the enactments that have created the economic climate for the greatest business prosperity in our history. I would not repeal these statutes.

We supported and fought for the laws that established the parity principle for agriculture. We shall not rest until the befuddled foes of equity for agriculture are routed out of administrative places in Washington and the farmers' position of due reward for enterprise is restored and secured.

PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN PLANNED

Mr. Speaker, I have information to the effect that officials of the Department of Agriculture are now preparing for perhaps the greatest program of propaganda that has yet been undertaken. I am advised that workers in the Department of Agriculture have been directed to prepare and to present facts and figures in such fashion as to indicate that all is well on the farm front, that farmers are not really hurting and are not in distress. Under the guise of summarizing accomplishments under the Eisenhower administration, officials of the Department will try to show that farmers are riding on a rosy road to prosperity.

Soon we may expect the entire propaganda potential of the Department of Agriculture to be beaming misleading information to the people of the country. Perhaps officials of the Department of Agriculture will indicate:

That farm prices have turned the corner, that they are higher than a year ago.

That farm income is headed up for the first time in a peacetime year since 1947; that farm assets are at an all-time high, and that only 1 out of 3 farms is burdened with a mortgage.

That exports are larger than ever before.

That surplus holdings of the Commodity Credit Corporation are being drawn down. That markets are returning and surpluses are disappearing.

Our farmers have learned that when Mr. Benson says things are getting better it is time for agriculture to get ready for something worse. Certainly, when Mr. Benson reports that farm prices have turned the corner, he will not mention the fact that farm costs are climbing faster than prices and that farm prices in July of this year were below the prices of July of last year in terms of parity. I am quite certain that the Secretary of Agriculture will not mention the hundreds of millions of dollars of losses incurred and the hundreds of millions of dollars paid out in subsidies which are responsible for increases in exports and some slight reduction in the inventories of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Actually Mr. Benson would probably do farmers a favor if he would withhold this new and bright presentation which he is planning, for we see and realize that in the past, whenever he talks up prices, parity has gone down. Here are some of the things Benson has said in the past and here is what has happened to parity every time he has talked of prices:

Date	Benson said—	Parity stood at (percent)—
Feb. 11, 1953	"Analysis leads us to expect no major changes (in farm price) during the next several months."	94
Apr. 7, 1953	"Our analysis * * * anticipate that prices of farm products during the spring and summer will be steady."	92
Oct. 21, 1953	"It's my belief that the major price declines are behind us."	90
June 30, 1954	"It (last month's 4-percent farm-price decline) does not indicate a general weakening in the farm-price structure."	88
Jan. 7, 1955	"I am convinced that for agriculture the road ahead will be smoother than the one we have been traveling."	86
June 15, 1955	"I am confident that we have seen the worst of the transition which agriculture goes through following every major war."	84

Mr. Benson talked some more in 1956 and the level of farm prices dropped to 82 percent of parity.

In reviewing the records and summarizing accomplishments, no doubt the Secretary will lay considerable stress on the achievements of the rural development program. The farmers will recall that this program was launched in the wake of searing criticism of the Secretary early in his administration when his aids made statements to the effect that "inefficient" farmers should stop trying to farm and find jobs in industry. By the operation of this program, Secretary Benson cannot kid small farmers into believing that he and his associates have had a change of heart.

Mr. Benson spoke a few weeks ago in Minnesota. Mrs. Margaret Terning of Cokato, Minn., daughter of one of the township's finest farmers and wife of another one of the area's finest farmers, asked the Secretary: "How is the farmer to meet his obligations in the face of lower farm prices and rising costs?" Mr. Benson's reply: "Seek other employment."

During the entire time that Mr. Benson has served as Secretary of Agriculture he has had in mind and has worked diligently to accomplish one goal, and that is to lower farm prices and bring down farm income. His sliding scale is sliding the farmers of America into bankruptcy.

FARMERS MUST STAND TOGETHER

Mr. Speaker, we shall never accomplish an equitable position for agriculture in Washington unless there is behind us, at the grassroots, a mobilization of purpose, understanding and action in a united agriculture.

Those of us in Washington who have the interest of agriculture at heart will never impose a program upon farmers. We shall not act until we know what farmers want.

Our weakness in the Congress at this moment is the disunity in the ranks of agriculture. The house of agriculture is divided. This is the work of the Secretary of Agriculture and those who support him. The exploiters are using the disunity they have created to tear down the parity principle.

There have been reports in the press that political overtones are evident, that the declining farm population may be a factor in the calculations, and the strategists, playing for political power by repressing farm prices, may reason that they will more than offset losses in the dwindling rural vote if they pick up additional support in the cities.

This is a sorry business, but I have no fear of it.

Our problem is to bring agriculture into one community of purpose and effort.

AMERICA'S STRENGTH

We may then convince the Nation that the interests of our great rural and urban populations are one and the same, that they are tied inextricably together.

We may then show America where her essential strength lies. We may point out that in America 1 farm worker feeds 20 persons, while in Russia agriculture requires the labor of fully one-half the total population. We shall emphasize that the efficiency of our farmers along with the moral fiber of a free people, is the basic difference in the stature of a democratic America and a communistic Russia. We shall sink home the fact that, while one-half Russia's total population works on farms and still cannot meet the Communists' need for food and fiber, in America the efficiency of our farmers releases 90 percent of our work for other employment—in factories, in mines, in shops, in transport, in all the other pursuits which—with the abundance of food and fiber from our farms—makes the United States standard of living the object of longing of peoples the world over.

We shall tell our story. We shall spread the truth about agriculture.

Once we in agriculture are united—once we put our house back together—I am supremely confident that our friends in the towns and the cities, and their representatives in the Congress, will insist—as a matter of self-interest and of simple American justice—that our parity principle be restored, that farm families share fairly in the rewards of enterprise, and that they enjoy a full partnership in the blessings of this capitalistic system which has made our abundance and our strength the envy of the world.

Saudi Arabia Celebrates King Saud's Anniversary of Accession to the Throne, November 12, 1957

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, when I came back from the Bandung Conference I announced that I would address the United States Congress each time there was an anniversary of one of the 29 participating nations in the Asian-African Conference on friendly terms with the United States.

Inasmuch as the Congress will not be in session at the time of the event, I wish to take this opportunity to extend greetings to the people of Saudi Arabia, His Majesty Saud Ibn Abdul Aziz al Saud, and His Excellency Sheikh Abdullah Al-Khayyal, Ambassador of Saudi Arabia, upon the occasion of the celebration of the fourth anniversary of King Saud's accession to the throne of Saudi Arabia, November 12, 1957.

The Arabian Peninsula is the cradle of the modern Arab people. Since the consolidation of the Saudi kingdom in 1925, Saudi Arabia has been the largest and in many ways the most important of the states of the peninsula. The United States has had relations of special importance with Saudi Arabia for over two decades and looks forward to continued cooperation. Firmly committed against communism, King Saud follows his father's traditional policy of close friendship with the United States.

Upon this occasion of the celebration of the fourth anniversary of the accession of King Saud, I pray for divine guidance of the leaders and people of this noble country. May they discover what is basically just within the vexing issues upon which they are called upon to make their decisions. And may love fill the hearts of citizen of Saudi Arabia so that peace may be more surely secured and brotherhood helped to come alive for the peoples of the world.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, these are the closing moments of the first session of the 85th Congress. There is some pressing business still to come before the House prior to adjournment. The important items of business on our agenda are well known to all of us in Congress, as they are to the Nation. Only a matter of the utmost urgency should be brought up on the floor if it is a departure from the specific issues that await our consideration.

I am convinced that the irresponsible and arbitrary actions of the Bureau of the Budget—actions which reverse the considered judgment of Congress and flout the expressed will of the American people—constitute a matter of such urgency.

I am talking about the apparently deliberate refusal of the Executive Office of the President's Bureau of the Budget to permit the executive agencies to spend, or even to plan to spend, the sums of money appropriated by Congress and approved by the President as the necessary and proper expenditures for these agencies and departments.

I will not generalize. Let me be specific.

On June 27 of this year, the Congress voted an appropriation bill for the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Two days later, the President signed this bill into the law of the land. Among other vitally important programs for which this bill provided—programs which affect all Americans in a very direct and personal way, like social security, education, vocational rehabilitation, and food and drug regulations—there were eight appropriations totaling $211 million for research against cancer, heart disease, mental illness, and the other diseases that kill and cripple millions of Americans each year.

I do not need to tell my colleagues that this year, perhaps more than any other year in recent history, appropriation bills have been considered with great care; nor do I need to tell my colleagues why this has been true. In most instances, the administration's appropriation requests have been cut back, reflecting the commitment of Congress to reduce unnecessary Federal spending and stop the threatening upward spiral of inflation.

In some individual instances, however, the Congress voted more funds than the administration requested. This is one of its responsibilities, in the final analysis—to review these requests for funds, to evaluate them, and to act on them—to cut them, approve them, or increase them, according to the considered best judgment of the Congress in session. A cornerstone of our constitutional system rests on this authority and responsibility of Congress to set the fiscal and legislative base for the programs of the executive branch of the Federal Government.

In the case of the medical research programs of the National Institutes of Health—after weeks of hearings and discussions involving literally hundreds of witnesses before both Houses of Congress—we provided a modest increase in the requested funds from $190 million to $211 million. I will highlight the importance of these appropriations with four simple statements of fact: First, these funds support more than one-third of all the medical research done in this country today; second, many of the great recent advances against disease have resulted from research supported by these appropriations; third, the experience of both Houses of Congress over a period of many years has been that these programs have been accorded, because they have merited, the confidence and respect of our country's scientific institutions and of people everywhere; and fourth, the effect of denying a large part of the needed funds for these programs, or of creating a feeling of uncertainty as to their availability, is sure to be seriously damaging and may be catastrophic.

Despite these facts, and despite their knowledge of the conviction of Congress that these programs should receive sustained and farsighted support, a handful of the President's advisers have apparently decided that the full amount of the funds appropriated for the National Institutes of Health shall not be spent—although Congress, and the President want it to be available if needed. Even today, nearly 2 months after President Eisenhower signed the bill into law, and after an incredible series of contradictory and delaying acts, the situation is far from clear. Those who direct these programs have been told they are permitted to spend—and this only after some extreme pressure on the Bureau of the Budget from Congress and from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Mr. Folsom—most, but still not all, of what they need in the first quarter of fiscal year 1958. They still do not know, and Secretary Folsom does not know, what they will be permitted to spend for the rest of the fiscal year by those omniscient and omnipotent manipulators of the Federal fiscal processes who advise the President but do not feel compelled to carry out his orders after he has appraised their advice and made his decision.

I will not go into any of the harrowing details. A simple chronology of the events related to the National Institutes of Health appropriation since June 27 will make my point.

On that date, their bill, which increased the President's appropriation request by $21 million, was passed and sent to the White House.

On June 29, the President signed the bill into law.

Yet the day before, June 28, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget had issued instructions which not only forbade spending at the level approved by the President the next day, but—incredible as it sounds—directed a pattern of spending which for the National Institutes of Health would be actually below what the President had asked Congress to appropriate in the first place.

On August 7, the Bureau of the Budget advised Secretary Folsom that it could not make up its mind about the full year, but that he would have to cut roughly $17 million out of the first quarter's spending for the eight appropriations.

On August 13, Secretary Folsom asked the Bureau of the Budget to reconsider, and they yielded a little bit.

On August 20 Secretary Folsom again asked them to reconsider, and they yielded a little bit more.

It is not for me to say how much effect was made by the inquiries of Congress as to the status of these matters during the time they were in negotiation. A committee of the Senate chaired by the distinguished Senator from Alabama, LISTER HILL, looked into it. A committee of the House, which I am privileged to chair, looked into it twice. I cannot feel that it was a very rewarding experience for any of us. Certainly there has been no clarification either as to general policy or as to specific intent on the part of the Bureau of the Budget. The National Institutes of Health are still nearly $800,000 short of their needs for research in their own laboratories in Bethesda during the first quarter. And they still have no idea how much, during the remainder of the year, they will be permitted to spend of the total of $211 million appropriated for the medical research they conduct and the research and training they support among the Nation's medical schools and universities.

I am sure it must be apparent, even to the uninitiated, that medical research cannot go forward in the face of these fiscal uncertainties. Those who do research and those who foster environments where creative research can thrive have every right to expect stability and continuity in that part of their support derived from the Federal Government. They do not expect arbitrary and capricious action of the kind that has characterized the Bureau of the Budget's handling of these appropriations this year. Such actions sow seeds of uncertainty and indecision among the scientific community and do irreparable damage of a deep and lasting nature.

I want to emphasize what I mean by the National Institutes of Health. It is not, as some may think, just a group of laboratories in Bethesda, Md. They are part of it, and they do splendid work, and they must be supported at adequate levels so their scientists can continue to make the outstanding contributions to the Nation's health that they have made in the past.

Much more important, however, is the fact that through the National Institutes of Health a large segment of all the medical research in this country is supported. Thus we are not concerned here with the simple maintenance of a Government bureau. When doubt and uncertainty creep into the fiscal picture, it shakes the entire medical school and university world by undermining their confidence in the stability of Government support. The Congress by its actions and the Public Health Service by its wise and careful administrative leadership have gradually built up this confidence as these programs have come into being and developed in size and in stature since World War II. I am sure it is the intention of every Member of Congress that the scientists and scientific institutions who are part of this national research effort against disease should not feel insecure in this support. Yet we find that all of the confidence that has been built up through the years can be undermined by a few people in the Budget Bureau who do not understand the significance of stable support and apparently do not care if our medical research effort is strong or weak, as long as they can juggle figures to what they think to be their own advantage.

Last year, nearly 7,000 research projects in 700 research institutions all over the country were supported by these funds. More than 3,000 people were being trained for careers in medical science and related fields. These are not statistics. They are people, and they are the people who are and will be the producers of new knowledge which will benefit all mankind. They know, as you and I know, and as all thoughtful people know, that medical research cannot be turned on and off like a faucet under the hand of some master planner.

Yet not 2 weeks ago, I had a desperate call from a distinguished scientist. He had trained for a career in medical research and teaching—long, hard years of specialized work in which the only rewards were those satisfactions that come to a scientist in the accomplishment of the progressive steps of his career. He had submitted an application for research grant support from the National Institutes of Health. That application was reviewed by the groups of non-Federal scientists and laymen who advise the Surgeon General on the scientific merits of each application. The project was recommended highly, and the Surgeon General approved it. The scientist was notified of this action, but at the same time he was told that it was dependent on the availability of funds. So far so good. But now came the impact of the Bureau of the Budget. The scientist wants to make the study, his institution supports him, the project is found worthy of support by an outstanding scientific review panel, the Surgeon General wants to support the study, the Congress appropriates funds which permit such support, the President signifies his assent—and yet there follows a period of shilly-shallying, of backing and filling, of delay and confusion. The weeks pass. The scientist is uncertain. He wants to think everything is all right. To do the study, he has to make his plans, hire technical staff, arrange for laboratory space, reapportion part of his teaching load. These things must be done in the spring and early summer if they are to meet the needs of the academic year. Yet Public Health Service officials are not permitted to definitely commit the funds to him. There was something in one of the Bureau of the Budget's directives about not approving any new grants. Other bureaucratic phrases fly thick and fast. They add up to the fact that the scientific administrator in Washington cannot tell the scientist in the university that the funds are on their way. And so he, having once had confidence in the stability and leadership of this federally supported research program, has to call me, his Congressman, to see if I can help resolve his bewilderment.

I must say, with a great deal of chagrin, that I was not able to give him, nor was I even able to find out, the answers.

I am disturbed to think what might have happened on these apportionments had Congress not happened to be in session during the period of time when this sequence of contradictions and equivocations took place.

Let me remind you, too, that this is not an isolated instance. Last year, for example, and in connection with these same appropriations I have been discussing, the techniques were different but the apparent intent was the same. Again the Bureau of the Budget withheld the right to spend appropriated funds. They said, in effect, spend at a curtailed rate until you have justified to our satisfaction that you can spend the newly appropriated amount wisely—and then made sure they were not satisfied until the year was more than one-quarter gone, thus assuring themselves of savings which were in fact forced by these delaying tactics and resulted in a shrunken program.

I have talked about this issue in terms of medical research not because it is unique, but because it so clearly makes the point. Other Public Health Service programs have been similarly affected, as have other important functions throughout the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, whose programs are so intensively scrutinized by the appropriation committee of the House which it is my privilege to chair.

I cannot say from firsthand experience whether the same situation prevails among other agencies. I doubt, however, if there are many whose appointed heads are as forthright and as consistent as Secretary Folsom. Although he must have been subjected to tremendous pressures from the President's budget intermediaries, he has steadfastly refused to compromise his principles or the Department's program. It is ironic indeed that he must make such fights within his own family, but he is the more to be praised for standing up for what he thinks is right.

It is altogether inappropriate and perhaps impolitic for me to interpret his position. I would have to guess from his actions, however, that he believes in careful budget formulation and thoughtful budget defense, followed by prudent administration of appropriated funds so that if there are savings, they are the product of economical administration rather than the arbitrary prejudgment of a group of slide-rule experts whose calculations totally ignore the substance of the programs involved and their present and potential meaning to the American people.

It is my conviction, gentlemen, that if this trend is permitted to continue, it will make a mockery of the established and proved appropriation processes of Congress. We can hold all the hearings we want, and render the most considered judgment of which we are capable in the public interest, but it has no meaning if the Bureau of the Budget—with or without Presidential instruction or that of the assistant President—interferes with the orderly processes of government by imposing fiscal restraints in direct contravention of the will of Congress. And they do this on the slender pretext of the Antideficiency Act, which was designed to prevent overspending by executive agencies, and not to superimpose their judgment on that of Congress.

I do not suggest that there is any grand strategy behind this series of moves. It would be unthinkable that—having capitalized on the plans for extending traditional and creating new programs which the public wants—this administration could now abandon them and deliberately contrive enforced savings so that there can be a possibility of a tax reduction in an election year at the expense of the health of the American people. I would rather think that it is merely shortsighted budget maneuvering on the part of a handful of misguided people that underlies these events.

For I know, as you my colleagues know, what is at stake. It is not merely an issue between the legislative and executive branches—although preservation of our respective roles is of the utmost importance. Just as important, however, is the fact that those who direct the affected programs cannot do what clearly needs to be done in the public interest.

Let me illustrate, again, from the National Institutes of Health.

During the first quarter of the fiscal year, the Bureau of the Budget—after first trying to withhold $17 million for these programs—finally withheld just over $700,000 appropriated by Congress for laboratory research and clinical investigations at Bethesda. This is still under appeal, but even if the appeal is won, a great deal has been lost—confidence and morale, to be sure, but also definitive studies of the kind not one of us would wish to see curtailed. Let me cite a few: research on the Asian influenza vaccine and on the disease itself; marked expansion of studies of radiation as part of the broad field of physical biology; a new study centered in Panama and dealing, among other things, with the continuing threat of yellow fever; a new project which initiates a program of research against mental illness within expanded clinical facilities at St. Elizabeths; a comprehensive, multidiscipline study of the biological aspects of aging; an expansion of the promising research field represented by viruses and cancer; establishment of studies in both metabolic and infectious diseases, using animals in germ-free environments as the research tools.

The successful conduct of research of this kind is certain to yield important advances in medical science and may mean the difference for many Americans between health and productivity on the one hand, and death and disability on the other.

It is not, of course, only the research programs of the Institutes that are affected. In combination, the restrictions placed on initial spending and the uncertainties over how much can be spent during the full year are certain to inflict damage on all of the major programs of the Department, including other activities of the Public Health Service.

The Department, as you know, is fairly young. But it is composed of a number of established activities. Grouping them together as the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare was a great forward step. In addition to giving the individual programs a frame of reference, it also permits and encourages a coherent and unified attack on certain major problems with which the Department is faced. And now these complex programs are also impeded by false economy and threatened by budgetary confusion.

A typical example is in the work of the Department related to our older citizens—the aged and infirm. I have pressed the Department hard for 3 years to assert more leadership in this field. Finally they have at least made a good beginning. Elements of the Department's new and promising program are found in the Social Security Administration, the Office of Education, the Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, and all three bureaus of the Public Health Service, as well as in the Secretary's own office. And now even this good start is being cut back. Does the Bureau of the Budget really think they know better than the whole Department how appropriated funds for these programs can most effectively be spent? Is there any one of them who knows anything at all concerning the substance of these programs which they so casually reduce or destroy?

The same thing can be said for mental health and mental retardation. I have discussed and studied this field in general and in specific for almost all of my 17 years in Congress. This does not qualify me as an expert. But I know that this is a problem of immediate and alarming proportions. The mentally ill, the severely disturbed, the psychologically or physically handicapped children—I am convinced that we cannot and must not fail to do whatever we can on their behalf. And yet we find research and study in this field being forbidden even though Congress has made money available—even to the unbelievable point of impeding the small beginning made by the Office of Education in studies of how better to teach the mentally retarded up to their optimum educational level.

I say we cannot permit a handful of numbers experts in the Bureau of the Budget to decide whether such studies should or should not be undertaken. With me, this is both a practical matter and a matter of principle.

I call upon the administration to cease these confusing, delaying, and damaging practices. I shall watch the fiscal events of this year with a great deal of interest. If there is no improvement during the next budget and appropriation cycle, I will most certainly seek full discussion and appropriate action to assure Congress and the American people that this disturbing threat to our system of government is remedied.

But this is not enough, because this is remedial and not immediate action. I also call upon the President of the United States to take steps now to untie the hands of the program people in his executive branch. I cannot believe that he knows what is happening in his name. He has gone on record many times to confirm his belief in and support of medical research. He cannot be aware that his own staff is undercutting programs which reflect his own convictions.

I am sure that the remarks I make here to alert the House of Representatives will be brought to his personal attention. I feel sure that when he knows the facts, he will order the Bureau of the Budget to stop this highhanded and destructive practice at once.

Keenotes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELIZABETH KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following:

KEENOTES

(By Representative ELIZABETH KEE)

I am writing Keenotes this week slightly ahead of my usual schedule. The House of Representatives is momentarily expecting the fall of the gavel denoting adjournment of the 1st session of the 85th Congress. Should this occur before the weekend, I plan to leave Washington immediately to return to the fifth district and a prolonged round of visits with all my good friends and constituents back home. It will be good to see the hills of West Virginia again.

Meanwhile my time is divided between trying to complete bits of unfinished business at my desk and scurrying through the subway to the Capitol in answer to the quorum bells summoning Members to the floor to vote on the spate of bills—the unfinished business—which always seems to flood Congress in the final days of any session.

It is, of course, much too early to pass judgment on the record which the 85th Congress has written for itself thus far. Many political writers will, however, attempt to do so, using as a basis the extent to which the administration's recommendations and program have been enacted into law. This is hardly a sound appraisal.

Both the administration and the Congress are answerable to the people and no Congress can acquit itself of its grave responsibilities by becoming a rubber stamp of approval for anything and everything an administration might propose. In this respect, the 85th Congress has, I feel, acted with wisdom and restraint. It has considered each of the President's legislative recommendations with great thoroughness and in terms of the national interests. It has not permitted itself to be coerced into hasty decisions by the pressures of political expediency and it has maintained an attentive ear for the wishes of the people rather than for the whimsies of the White House.

I use the word "whimsies" purposefully for I know of no better way to describe the administration's constantly shifting position on its own legislative proposals. Every effort to pin the administration down to a firm stand on any given issue, at any given moment, has proved a frustrating experience for both its most ardent supporters and its most vigorous opponents, alike. Take the very important matter of the budget, for example.

After severely criticizing the spending policies of his predecessors in office, the President in January submitted to Congress a budget calling for the greatest peacetime spending in the history of the country, a record of $7.8 billion. In July, he issued instructions to his Cabinet members to hold expenditures in their departments down to the $70 billion level of the preceding (1957) fiscal year.

When his own Secretary of the Treasury denounced the 1958 budget as too large, the President, gravely agreeing that this was so, invited the Congress to cut it. But hardly had Congress settled down to this challenging task, than the President appeared on television to warn the American people that any cuts in the appropriations he had requested for his defense and foreign-aid programs would seriously imperil the national security.

The administration has been equally vague and indecisive about other of the long list of recommendations in its program. The need for school construction legislation was pointed up as urgent and then when the bill was before the House, the something less than lukewarm enthusiasm for it emanating from the White House, helped its opponents to defeat the bill.

Passage of the first civil-rights bill to get through Congress in 80 years also had legislators going around in circles. The administration would compromise. It wouldn't compromise. It insisted upon section III. It didn't care about section III. No bill at all was better than enactment of the Senate version. With modifications, it would accept the Senate version. Small wonder, then, that many Members of Congress were hard put to know just where the administration stood on this most critical legislation.

Reviewing the events of this session in my own mind as I write this, I am more than satisfied that the 85th Congress, in its first session, has dealt conscientiously and responsibly with the problems and the affairs of the Nation. Where no emergencies existed, it has wisely refrained from hasty action. It has delved beneath the surface of each legislative proposal, cautiously exploring what far-reaching effects it might have upon our people.

Above all, it has responded notably to the public demand for economies in government. It has known how to be generous where generosity was called for, as witness the pay raises voted the hard-pressed postal and classified employees of the Federal Government. But it has also known how to eliminate nonessential spending when the benefits received were not equal to the dollars spent.

In fact, a major portion of the 85th Congress' time so far has been devoted to the budgetary and bookkeeping problems of the Nation, and in the years ahead the American taxpayer may be very happy that it was.

And now, wishing everyone in the Fifth District a very pleasant Labor Day, I look forward to seeing all of you in person shortly.

Vietnam Celebrates Second Anniversary of Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADAM C. POWELL, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, because Congress will not be in session on the occasion of the celebration of the second anniversary of the proclamation of the Republic of Vietnam on October 26, 1957, I wish to take this opportunity to send warm greetings to the people of Vietnam, President Ngo Dinh Diem, and His Excellency Tran Van Chuong, Ambassador of Vietnam, in honor of this event.

In 2 short years of independence free Vietnam has made commendable progress toward stability, security, and strength. Vietnam can justly take pride in her notable accomplishments. They have laid the foundation for even more satisfying development in the future. Among the factors that explain the remarkable rise of free Vietnam from the shambles created by many years of murderous civil and international war, the division of the country at Geneva, and the continuing menace of predatory communism, there is the dedication, courage, and resourcefulness of President Diem himself. In him, his country has found a truly worthy leader whose integrity and devotion to his country's welfare have become generally recognized among his people. Asia has given us in President Diem another great figure, and the entire Free World has become the richer for his example of determination and moral fortitude.

The United States is proud to be on the side of the effort of the Vietnamese people under President Diem to establish freedom, peace, and the good life. The United States wishes to continue to assist and to be a loyal and trusted friend of Vietnam. President Diem during his recent visit to the United States said on May 13, 1957:

> You all know what we have achieved during the last 2 years. Most people know that we could not have succeeded as we did without American material aid. But not many know that equally important for our survival was your moral aid, a kind of aid that usually does not come from governments but from the people directly. * * *
>
> Recently, we and our friends talked much about our need for leadership on other levels than the political—for leadership in the cultural, technical, and economic fields. In order to build a stable economy, which is the necessary basis for democracy, we do indeed need such leaders whom we now so desperately lack. This is why we welcome your technical advisers, whether they come from your Government, from private industry, from universities, or from foundations.
>
> We welcome such help, but even more we would welcome support for our efforts to train our own technicians. Although we want your advisers in our country, we aspire also in this effect toward fuller independence. We must multiply our efforts to educate our youth for these great new tasks.

Vietnam is a great temptation for the Communists. Vietnam is the gateway to the invasion of southeast Asia and to its immense resources in manpower and raw materials. President Diem has said:

> We all still live in great peril of losing out to a determined enemy who is active along a front line that circles the whole globe. Fate has put us at a crucial spot on the border between democratic freedom and Communist tyranny. Your aid enables us to hold this crucial line, and to hold it at less expense to you, and at less danger to the world than you could have done it yourselves. * * * We need you. * * * Our people hate war, but they also hate to be slaves.
>
> If attacked, we shall fight again. Your aid and your friendship will help us fight well and, we hope, successfuly. We will then surely not fight for Vietnam alone. And if we, as we pray, are spared such a conflict, it may well be because the enemy is afraid of our determination and strength. In any case, and whatever the future will bring, we shall repay the debt we owe to the Free World.

We are proud of the progress being made by Vietnam and happy that we are able to assist. The orderly development of the new states of southeast Asia to political stability and economic well-being is a source of gratification. As one who deeply believes in freedom, democracy, and the importance of achieving a better understanding among all nations, I wish Vietnam every success which she so richly deserves.

Serious Problems in Agriculture

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM S. HILL

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, this first session of the 85th Congress is at an end. For more than 7 months we have been in session wrestling with the problems facing our country. Millions of words have been recorded on the floor and in the committee hearings of the House, but very little in the way of constructive legislation has been enacted. It is not my purpose to find fault with the inaction of the Congress. It is a normal thing for the first session of a Congress to produce less in the way of final legislation than does the second session, but I wonder if it is normal to spend thousands of hours in session in committee and on the floor and produce but a fraction of the program that has been suggested by the President or by the Members who have introduced more than 10,000 bills embodying their ideas of needed legislation.

My primary interest in the Congress for many years has been in the fields of small business and agriculture. On occasion I have taken the floor to outline suggestions which my thinking and study in these fields have convinced me are needed to solve some of the serious problems facing these two segments of our economy.

In agriculture particularly are we facing serious difficulties about which little is being done. When we close the books on this session of Congress, we will have to conclude that no major farm legislation will have been enacted by the Congress. However, the Committee on Agriculture, on which I have the honor to serve, has done a world of work in committee, and many hearings have been held. Much testimony has been heard on major agricultural problems, and certainly during the 2d session of the 85th Congress this House will have an opportunity to consider fundamental changes in the approach toward the solution of the difficulties. As I said in an address on this floor last year, changes must be made in our basic agricultural legislation to bring it in conformance with the era in which we live. Our present price and production control legislation had its genesis in the postwar depression following World War I. The skid of prices received for farm products in 1919 and 1920 brought home sharply the importance of our agricultural economy to the economy of our Nation as a whole. Failure to solve or ease the problem at that time, in my opinion, paved the way for the depression of the early thirties.

In 1933 a determined effort to bolster the farm economy saw a movement toward managed prices and production that resulted in the Agriculture Act of 1938. This act, with minor amendments, is still the basic agricultural act under which most of our farm programs are operated.

These programs were depression born and geared to an emergency that had little or no relation to present-day economic factors. I find no fault with the attempt to help the farmer at that time, but I am certain that experience has shown that the type of programs devised would not solve the problems that arose when the tremendous energies of our agricultural producers met the challenge to feed the Free World during World War II, the Korean war, and the immediate postwar period.

Agriculture is not like most production processes where adjustment can be made by shutting down an assembly line or abandoning a line of production when the demand has slackened or ceased. The success with which the challenge of the war years was met is to be commended, but the gradual readjustment of world markets to improved local conditions without a corresponding adjustment of our own production and marketing has led to a disjointed imbalance which has caused much of the serious difficulty into which agriculture has been plunged. It is to the credit of this administration that the problem has not achieved disastrous proportions.

The specter of ever-increasing surpluses and ever-increasing production was met with increased production controls while the price support program attempted to compensate the farmer for reduced plantings. How inefficient this process really is can best be illustrated by what is happening to our basic crops under the basic Agriculture Act of 1938, as amended. Cotton is probably the best, or perhaps I should say the worst, example of outmoded programs attempting to aid a crop and by this assistance practically ruining the cotton producers.

It is abundantly clear that high-level rigid price supports are not good for the cotton industry. Our cotton loses out in markets both at home and abroad. Stiff competition from synthetic fibers and from expanding foreign cotton production abroad means that our growers cannot find a market and cotton is piled in Government warehouses.

By our own actions we are pricing our cotton out of important market outlets. Our rigid high supports for cotton enable competitors—the synthetic fiber producers and foreign cotton growers—to expand their production and take over an increasing number of our cotton customers. As the saying goes, we "hold an umbrella over our competition." All of this happens because we were unwilling to recognize the basic fact that competitive prices for cotton are still highly important in holding and broadening domestic and foreign markets for the output of our efficient cotton farms.

High, rigid price supports, which discourage domestic consumption and exports, are largely responsible for cotton backing up into the hands of the Federal Government. When that happens, severe acreage curtailment is necessary.

There is a growing realization today that we must be able to sell our cotton to people—not to the Commodity Credit Corporation via the price-support route. The CCC itself consumes no cotton; it is people who do. People—not the CCC—make up the lasting and permanently profitable market that cotton must have.

Official reports of the Department of Agriculture reveal some very interesting facts about plantings and production of cotton. In the 1934–38 period the average of cotton acreage in the United States was more than 29 million acres a year. For 1957 the acreage is down to 14.2 million acres. Despite these drastic reductions in acreage, the United States had 60 percent of the world's accumulated cotton stocks on August 1, 1956.

During the same periods that domestic producers were being forced to reduce their cotton acreage drastically, foreign countries, spurred on by our price support umbrella over the world market, increased their cotton acreage by leaps and bounds.

During the 1934–38 period Syria planted 74,000 acres of cotton. In 1956 their cotton acreage was 675,000 acres—nine acres for every one planted prior to World War II.

Mexico increased its plantings from 680,000 acres in the 1934–38 period to more than 2,690,000 acres in 1955—nearly 4 times as many acres as in the prewar period.

Prior to World War II Turkey planted approximately 621,000 acres. By 1955 plantings were nearly 2½ times as large, or more than 1,500,000 acres.

Production yields kept pace with these increased plantings, and American producers have been producing for storage instead of consumption. The price umbrella made it possible for foreign countries to undersell United States price supported cotton. The obvious result is the loss of actual and potential foreign markets.

Certainly what is true concerning the loss of markets for cotton will positively apply to every other type and kind of farm commodity that depends on foreign consumption for the disposition of the surplus.

The failure of the price-support programs as provided for under the basic act of 1938 is not so much the failure of inactivity—we have attempted with patchwork amendments to bolster the act on a hit-and-miss basis—but the failure to proceed vigorously with corollary programs to keep it modern.

In the face of outmoded programs that need changing, we have made some progress. Last year, net realized farm income was 4 percent above 1955—the first peacetime year in which net farm income increased since 1947. Computed on a per farm basis the increase amounts to 7 percent.

For the first half of this year, realized net farm income was at the rate of about $12.1 billion, 2½ percent higher than in the first half of 1956.

Prices which farmers received for crops and livestock in the month ending July 15 rose 1 percent. At the same time, farmers' costs of production and living supplies fell one-third of 1 percent during the same month.

Market prices for cattle and hogs have been running $2 to $3 per 100 pounds above a year ago. Meat consumption last year averaged 167 pounds per person—the highest in more than 50 years.

Milk prices received by farmers have averaged higher, above the previous year at this time, for the third consecutive year.

Exports in farm commodities in fiscal 1957 were the highest in history. Most of this was due to increased activity made possible by the administration sponsored Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954 (Public Law 480).

Government-owned surpluses are being reduced. Commodity Credit Corporation investments in price supported commodities were about $7.6 billion on May 31, 1957, a net reduction of about $900 million since May 31 of 1956, and a reduction of about $1.3 billion below the peak holdings of February 1956.

Farm values reached an alltime high in March of this year, up 7 percent over the previous year.

An alltime high of $176 billion in total agricultural assets was again set January 1, 1957. Farmers have only about $12 in debts for each $100 of assets they own. Only about 1 farm of each 3 has a mortgage. Farm ownership is at an alltime high. There are fewer tenants as compared to farm owners than ever before.

Over 94 percent of all farms have electricity.

Despite cries about the plight of the family farm and its disappearance from the scene, we find that large-scale farms are only about 4 percent of all farms—the same as 30 years ago.

Most of this strengthening in agriculture has been due to the reduction of surpluses. The results of the soil bank and surplus disposal programs are serving to halt the trend of lowered farm net income.

Address by the Honorable Frank M. Coffin, of Maine, to the Maine Soil Conservation District Supervisors Association Annual Meeting, Thorndike Hotel, Rockland, Maine, August 29, 1957

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. METCALF. Mr. Speaker, one of the most critical, and most challenging issues before this Congress is the great need for more adequate conservation legislation. As the demands on our land and water resources increase, our responsibility to conserve and use wisely the resources we have is more imperative than ever.

Our distinguished colleague from Maine, Mr. COFFIN, has made some pertinent and imaginative suggestions on this subject. In a speech to the Maine soil conservation district supervisors, Mr. COFFIN outlined an approach to improving our program for tree planting and land utilization. This is a subject of considerable interest to the people of Maine, of course, but his suggestions in the following speech merit the attention of conservationists in the entire Nation:

President Sanborn, Chairman Harriman, Commissioner Newdick, supervisors, and friends, having emerged from the heat and humidity of Washington and the last frantic days of the Congressional session, I welcome the opportunity to be with you in this pleasant Maine setting tonight. I am not sure that my function should be that of a speaker in your program, but rather that I should be playing a more appropriate role as a listener.

One of the great pleasures and satisfactions of my first months in Congress has been the opportunity to learn more about the problems and programs of agriculture. I confess that my joy would be more complete if I had all the answers to the problems, but for the present I shall content myself with learning and some tentative explorations in the fields of agricultural policy. From what I have observed of the battles raging among the so-called farm bloc in Congress, caution seems the better part of valor.

I am not here, tonight, to tell you how to solve the problem of surpluses, the increasing squeeze of lower farm prices and higher costs of operation, and the gigantic challenge of our productive capacity. I am here as a layman who must weigh in the balance the conflicting proposals which appear in Congress and vote for legislation which will benefit you and the consuming public. I am here to examine one phase of agriculture, to stimulate some inquiry in an area which is of great importance to our entire Nation, and particularly to the State of Maine. That area lies in the great field of conservation and land utilization.

I would like to call to your attention tonight a little bit of the past, a larger chunk of the present, and a glimpse of the future.

The first settlers on this continent found an abundant land waiting for tillage, presenting vast opportunities for the production of food and fiber. As the eastern seaboard was settled, and as land—once rich—was depleted, the pioneers moved westward for richer soil. The land has been cultivated, bared, and in many areas of the country stripped of its productive capacity.

The political emphasis in the last few years has been on the problem of surpluses in certain commodities, but the day is coming when we may be plagued—not with surpluses—but with a shortage of arable land on which to produce enough food and fiber for ourselves and others.

Fortunately, the warnings of the early conservationists have been heeded, and since the thirties we have been making great strides in correcting some of the abuses which have been so wasteful of land and water resources in the past.

We in Maine can be proud of the record we are building in the field of conservation. The work which you and your fellow agriculturists are doing is an inspiration to anyone who takes the time to study the results of your work.

Approximately 95 percent of the farms and farmland in Maine are within the boundaries of the State's 15 farmer-organized soil conservation districts. Maine's high-ranking position so close behind the 16 States that are 100 percent covered by such districts is doubly significant.

It reflects the progressive manner in which the State's landowners and operators have taken advantage of the district machinery provided by the 1941 State law for local, democratic organizations to deal more effectively with individual and community soil and water conservation problems. In addition, it points up the tremendous responsibilities of local leadership in advancing the State's basic agricultural economy. These responsibilities rest upon the shoulders of the 45 locally chosen soil conservation district supervisors and the State Soil Conservation Committee.

Agricultural production represents a better than $200 million annual cash business in Maine. Nothing can be more important to the longtime health of this or any other State's agricultural productive capacity than the protection and improvement of its basic soil and water resources.

Maine's soil conservation districts—with 15 years of progressively successful experience and accomplishment behind them—are looked to for continued effective leadership, through their elected supervisors, in maintaining our productive agricultural resources for continuing use. The 10 years of effective work in the Knox-Lincoln district are a challenge to the future, as is the experience in the other districts of the State.

Maine's soil and water conservation program has been built on sound foundations, since the original establishment of the erosion control demonstration project in the Aroostook County potato area in the midthirties. It has advanced through the teamwork of local farm and business community leaders, the college of agriculture, experiment station, and extension service at the university, and various other local, State, and Federal agencies, including the Soil Conservation Service, and other divisions of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The statistics showing the present level of activity in the soil conservation districts of Maine are most impressive. Nearly 8,000 cooperators, with a million and a half acres are participating in your program. Two thousand six hundred of these cooperators are located in my own Congressional District. In the Second District alone over one and a quarter million acres of soil surveys have been completed, and basic plans for 1,543 farms have been drawn up.

Conservation applied on the land is the physical measure of success of the soil and water conservation effort to which the Nation has addressed itself during the last quarter of a century. Another dependable yardstick of our advancement in basic resources preservation is the unprecedented public concern over the conservation, development, and most efficient use of our water, timber, grass, and wildlife resources.

The soil conservation district program has, with the cooperation of local, State, and Federal interests, given us a great democratic experiment and an adventure in initiating and implementing practical conservation action. Under the watchwords "conservation, development, self-government" this program provides an outstanding example of democracy in action.

Congress, meanwhile, has a continuing history of providing broadened soil and water conservation authorizations as need has dictated, and of making necessary appropriations to carry them out. Admittedly, the funds made available for the Federal share of technical and other conservation participation have not always been as much as were desired or could be used effectively by local soil conservation districts or other conservation users and assisting agencies. But these appropriations have been increased year by year in an attempt to keep up as nearly as possible with obviously growing district and other needs and demands.

Technical assistance under the 1935 Soil Conservation Act, through the Department of Agriculture's Soil Conservation Service, remains, of course, the backbone of the Federal contribution to the national action program of soil and water conservation, supplemented by the important cost-sharing assistance of the agricultural conservation program. Both have stood the test of soundness in purpose and results through more than two decades of operation.

Of similar promise in a broader field of conservation need is the opportunity opened up by the 1954 Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act for still wider cooperative action in dealing with water supply and management problems extending beyond agricultural lands and individual properties to entire communities or metropolitan areas.

So far, no immediate appropriate watersheds for use of the new Watershed Act apparently have been programed in Maine; but undoubtedly further study of likely watershed areas, as local community interest develops, will confirm the need and the opportunities for small watershed projects similar to those getting under way in neighboring Northeastern States.

Particularly as it was broadened in 1956 to include more multiple-purpose municipal and industrial water supply needs, drainage and other purposes, the Watershed Act has a place in the overall soil and water conservation potential of the southeastern area and other parts of the State.

We do not have as serious flood-prevention situations to cope with as are found in other parts of the country, but there is always a need for conserving the moisture in the soil for crop and pasture production, for streambank protection—especially in handling snow-melt runoff—drainage rehabilitation of wetter croplands, and so on. Land use treatments with the practices being used in the soil conservation districts are basic to any watershed treatment; and the Watershed Act may well operate to facilitate and strengthen the soil conservation districts' going programs.

There have been, of course, other important conservation measures provided by recent Congresses.

There is the Water Facilities Act for making direct or insured loans through private banking sources and the Farmers Home Administration for soil and water conserving or drainage facilities and reforestation.

In addition, a provision has been inserted in the revised Internal Revenue Code, making it possible for farmers to treat expenditures for a number of soil conservation measures as current expenses that may be deducted from farm income for income tax purposes.

Another, the Great Plains conservation program, ties together more closely Federal, State, and local technical, financial, and other conservation efforts on a primarily conservation land-use basis. It is, at present, limited to the Great Plains area, but it could suggest similar application in principle elsewhere.

There is the newer Soil Bank Act with its conservation reserve features for helping landowners to get less productive acreage into permanent trees or grass crops, or into use for water storage. It is regrettable that more emphasis has not been placed on the soil conservation features of this act, rather than the present public stress on getting crops out of production.

The very circumstances of such broadened conservation authorizations and programs point up the fact that the resources conservation job, though well advanced in general, is not finished anywhere, and it is only well begun elsewhere. The fine accomplishment in erosion control and conservation land-use methods in the Maine potato country, for example, by no means indicate that the whole task is finished even there, much less in the State as a whole.

There are comparatively new-found problems coming into focus. Good agricultural land is being withdrawn from production and taken over for suburban building and industrial sites, highways, airfields, and various other nonagricultural uses. Conservationists, agricultural interests, and planning authorities alike have been growing more and more conscious of the vast, so-called strip cities spreading over the countryside before the onrush of fast increasing populations and urban concentrations—and of the land and water problems developing in their wake.

Even in Maine, areas like those around Portland and Bangor, especially with the influx of summer residents, have not escaped this trend. Now is the time for us to act.

Now is the time to make sure we do not waste the resources of this verdant State. We must treasure our two jewels of great price—our unsurpassed 85 percent forest cover and our unequalled annual rainfall. Now is the time to put our minds and hands to the task of preserving our land and water resources before they are lost forever.

Faced with the problems of our peculiar soil conditions, confronted with changing market patterns, we should adapt ourselves to the most useful and productive use of our land.

To me, one of the great opportunities presented to us is the potential development of our forest resources to meet the ever increasing demand for wood and wood products. New uses are being found for wood. As long ago as 1947 I was impressed with a challenging book entitled "The Coming Age of Wood."

Greater demands are being placed on the available supply of wood and lumber products. With forest development we can preserve our land and water resources and provide greater economic opportunities for our farmers and for our manufacturers and workers.

A start has been made in this area, but it is only the beginning. The problems of long-term investment, the hazards of fire, the steady drain of taxes, and the delayed return on tree planting make it almost impossible for many of our farmers to consider going into tree farming on the scale which is necessary if we are to meet this challenge.

Under the Soil Bank Act, for example, a relatively small acreage of land can be planted to trees, with Government assistance for planting and land rental payments. We have substantial acreages of land that were cropped at one time, but which are not qualified for soil-bank payments under existing requirements of the act because they are not cultivated at the present time.

In the current session of Congress I drafted a bill which I introduced with Representative MCINTIRE, seeking to amend the Soil Bank Act by providing for participation by those who "plant and maintain trees for the contract period on specifically designated acreage of land on the farm which was once used in the production of such crops and is still suitable therefor."

This problem of land that has been abandoned to cropping use is particularly challenging from the standpoint of getting more needed conservation planting done in Maine. The need for some workable incentive or other solution persists beyond the present facilities of the soil-conservation districts themselves for expanding this part of their regular soil-conservation program.

We cannot afford to have our former croplands grow up to useless hardwood brush. We cannot allow the opportunity of wood utilization and supply to pass us by.

My soil bank bill, H. R. 6303, offered a tentative approach to the problem. The Agriculture Department has not looked on this suggestion with a kindly eye. Before we can arrive at a practical solution it will be necessary for us to explore the possibilities of some pilot projects similar to those pursued under the original Soil Conservation Act of the 74th Congress, which later developed into the very effective watershed program.

Several possibilities suggest themselves. Some require Federal action, some State participation, and all demand the cooperative effort of farmers and farm leaders like yourselves.

There is the possibility of expanded Federal-State participation and cost-sharing in actual tree planting. There is the suggestion of long-term Federal loans for tree farming, where conservation practices are followed. There is the proposal for deferred taxation on land planted to trees under such a program. And, there is the thought of cooperative tree farming by groups of farmers, where the resources of a single farmer are not sufficient to carry the load. There may be other avenues which can be followed in approaching this challenge.

This, to me, is one of the soundest ways in which we can help to preserve the identity of our family farmers. This, to me, is one of the most effective means of preserving the beauty and productive grandeur of our State—it is a means of preserving a way of life that is dear to us all.

Soil conservation districts offer the logical means through which we can deal with these farm and watershed programs locally. No one knows the problems better than the district supervisors and the district cooperators, or has had more sound experience in the field of resource conservation, in Maine and throughout the country.

There are today 2,770 soil conservation districts, including 93 percent of the Nation's farms and ranches, and 88 percent of its farmland. As of January 1, 1957, nearly 1,140,000 district cooperators had basic conservation plans on nearly 320 million acres. Soil surveys, on which are based the conservation farm plans that guide the application of soil and water conservation practices on the land, had been made on more than 500 million acres in the districts.

Applications for Federal assistance on projects through the Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act, meanwhile, totaled 742 to August 26, 1957. That many had been made by local communities, approved by their States and forwarded to Washington. A total of 278 of these had been authorized for planning assistance. Fifty-five already were approved for operations. Conservation and land-treatment and flood-prevention work is well along, also, in the 58 pilot small-watershed projects, along with similar flood-prevention work on subwatersheds in 11 major authorized watersheds under the 1944 Flood Control Act.

This progress and accomplishment is made possible by bringing to bear the human and physical resources of many individuals and many communities on the common problem, from Maine to California, from Florida to Washington State. The results obtained stem from the initiative, leadership and hard work of nearly 14,000 soil conservation district supervisors and one and three-quarter million district cooperators—like those in the 15 soil conservation districts of our own State of Maine.

In January I hope to implement some of the suggestions I have made tonight with further legislation to encourage the expansion of our tree planting program. I hope you will give considerable thought to the tentative proposals I have made with a view to advising me on the wisdom and practicability of these or other approaches.

I am therefore seeking your assistance during the next 4 months to discuss various kinds of pilot projects that might well be incorporated in such legislation. This process of analysis and creative thinking on your part will contribute immeasurably to our chances of success. I say this with such experience as I have gained in the legislative process. Over 15,000 bills are filed each session. Only a few reach final passage. Those bills which contain not only a fruitful idea but which are accompanied by the down-to-earth support of citizens who know the problems which the legislation aims to solve have the best chance of success.

You have the experience and the knowledge necessary for sound recommendations. The success of any such program will depend on your contributions. As a Representative in Congress I can help you with enabling legislation.

I can think of nothing more appropriate than a new and needed approach to land stewardship originating in the State of Maine.

Department of State Historical Division

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. HENDERSON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, before this session ends, I wish to comment upon a matter which has been of long-standing concern to me—the operation of the Department of State Historical Division, particularly as it relates to the publication of the records of our recent diplomatic history. The place of Dr. Donald Dozer in the controversy which has arisen over this question is well known. For those who are not aware of his part in the argument, I believe it can be stated fairly and briefly that this gentleman was summarily fired, without a hearing, from the Historical Division as a result of his honest belief that it is the proper function of a historian and scholar to insist that the people be apprised of such facts as exist when the divulgence of such information does not compromise our national security.

Dr. Dozer is an Ohioan and a native of the 15th Congressional District which I have the honor to represent here. His career as a scholar has been a most distinguished one and, through my friendship with him, I know that his integrity is beyond reproach. He has a long and brilliant record as a teacher of American diplomatic history, inter-American relations and other subjects in the historical field at Boston University, the University of Maryland, the American University, and the strategic Intelligence School of our Armed Forces. He has achieved membership in Phi Beta Kappa and other societies as a result of his outstanding scholarship.

After wartime service in several Federal agencies, Dr. Dozer joined the Latin American Division of the Department of State. For that position, he was recommended by Dr. James P. Baxter III, formerly of Harvard University and now president of Williams College, and by Mr. John C. Dreier, who is now our ambassador to the Organization of American States. From 1944 through 1947, Dr. Dozer's high competence was rewarded by steady advancement. In 1947, he was placed in charge of the Division of Research for American Republics in the intelligence organization of the State Department. Four years later, Dr. Dozer transferred to the Historical Division as assistant to the Chief of the Division, Mr. G. Bernard Noble. In this position his duties were defined as follows:

> Under general supervision, serves as adviser to the Chief of the Division of Historical Policy Research, GS-170-15-4476, on new historical research problems and projects which initially require consideration by the Chief of the Division. In this connection, provides technical advice and assistance in studying and analyzing such projects, particularly those which cut across branch lines.
>
> Deals with assignments involving the planning and assimilation by the Division of projects arising as a result of recent developments and happenings in our foreign relations such as the war in Korea, our relationships with the countries of Europe under the Atlantic Pact and the historical issues leading up to its establishment, and similar events in our foreign relations, as well as special historical background papers which require special and expeditious handling. Advises and assists the Chief of the Division in regard to the planning, objectives, approach, content, analysis and conclusions to be developed with respect to such problems and projects as they relate to the historical aspects of our foreign relations.
>
> As an expert in the field of intelligence research, reviews completed projects and studies for the purpose of assuring the proper treatment and integration of both historical and intelligence aspects; and assures that top policy officials of the Department are apprised of any problems which require special treatment and interpretation because of the unique and complex intelligence and historical issues involved in our foreign relations.

During Dr. Dozer's more than 15 years of Government service, including more than 11 years in the State Department, all of his performance ratings were either very good, satisfactory, or excellent. They commended him particularly for his industry, cooperativeness, and subject competence. These commendations were signed by all his supervisors including Dr. Roland D. Hussey, now professor of Latin American history at the University of California at Los Angeles, Mr. Ellis O. Briggs, now American Ambassador to Brazil, and Dr. Allan Evans, Director of the Office of Intelligence Research.

Dr. Evans, who knows Dr. Dozer well, has praised him as a meticulous scholar by training, anxious to avoid any danger of falling into prejudiced or distorted judgment, and abiding carefully by established evidence.

Prof. William L. Langer, Coolidge professor of history at Harvard University, who became well acquainted professionally with Dr. Dozer while he was serving as Chief of the Research and Analysis Branch of the Office of Strategic Services and later as special assistant to the Secretary of State in charge of intelligence work, says that he formed a high regard for Dr. Dozer both as a man and as a scholar. He adds that Dr. Dozer was highly esteemed by his colleagues as an able, hard-working, and devoted analyst. Col. William A. Eddy, who replaced Professor Langer as special assistant to the Secretary of State for intelligence in 1946 and who, like Dr. Dozer, was a former student at Wooster College, knows Dr. Dozer well as a friend and former colleague and has indicated his high opinion of his work and his administrative activities. Mr. Park Armstrong, Colonel Eddy's successor as special assistant to the Secretary of State for intelligence from 1947 until his resignation early this year, has written that Dr. Dozer is, in his opinion, an outstanding figure in the Latin American field:

> He possesses a profound knowledge of the historical, sociological, and economic background of the area and, as well, a thorough understanding of the current scene. He has a unique intellectual aptitude for the interpretation of present conditions and developments and a decided facility for its expression.

Dr. Dozer, as assistant to the Chief of the Historical Division, Mr. Noble, was commended by his chief in November 1951 as follows:

> Performance very satisfactory in all assignments thus far undertaken. Has shown great interest, initiative, competence, and cooperative spirit in work.

In his performance rating a year later in December 1952 Dr. Dozer was commended as follows by the same chief:

> Overall work performance is very satisfactory in all assignments within the range of his interest. This applies particularly to the field of United States relations with Latin America in which he has special competence.

All of Dr. Dozer's performance ratings up to the last one, dated May 22, 1955, were similarly laudatory.

In his State Department work Dr. Dozer, while still in the intelligence organization, qualified for and received civil-service status on the GS–15 register. Throughout his State Department service he possessed top-secret clearance; that is, he was authorized to see all documents having the highest security classifications "top secret" and "eyes only" needed for his work. He was designated as the sole representative of the State Department in Washington to attend the second Latin American Intelligence Conference at Quarry Heights in the Panama Canal Zone in 1948. In the same year he was included as a member of the United States delegation to the Ninth International Conference of American States and attended that conference at Bogotá, Colombia, as assistant technical secretary of the American delegation.

Dr. Dozer's association with the State Department ended in January 1956 as a result of differences precipitated by his insistence upon the prompt, careful, and unexpurgated publication of diplomatic papers in fulfillment of the commitments publicly assumed by the Department in 1953 and 1954.

I believe it is advisable to recapitulate the record of events which led to this disagreement. In 1953 when the Eisenhower administration came into office the Historical Division in the State Department, which was responsible for the publication of the diplomatic papers of this Government, had allowed them to fall 18 years in arrears. These papers had been published only through 1934 and thus covered only the first 2 years of the Roosevelt administration.

In May 1953 the State Department under a new administration proposed to expedite the publication of these records. Assistant Secretary of State Mr. Carl McArdle promised in a letter which was published in the Supplemental Hearing on Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce appropriations for 1954, first, that the Department of State would bring the publication of these volumes as up to date as possible; second, that if additional funds could be made available the State Department would give priority to the full story of the United States relations with China, 1941–50; and, third, that the documents on the wartime conferences among the heads of the Allied Governments in World War II would be ready for publication within a year; that is, by June 30, 1954. The Department of State thus offered to break the long silence of the previous 18 years and inform the American people of the negotiations that had been carried on with foreign nations in their name by their responsible officials during the crucial periods before, during, and immediately after World War II.

This broad program of publication was entrusted to the Historical Division, which had been headed by Mr. G. Bernard Noble since 1946. His assistant was Dr. Donald M. Dozer. Dr. Dozer has publicly asserted that from the beginning this program of publication was subjected there to delays, sabotage, and expurgation of records. In fact, Dr. Dozer and other members of the division were not even assigned to the compilation of the wartime conferences until nearly 6 months later although those records had been promised to be ready for publication within a year. The assignment of one member of the division to this urgent project was postponed because priority was given to three other projects: These so-called priority projects were the great seal of the United States, buildings occupied by the Department of State, and portraits of the Secretaries of State.

Leads to material indispensable for the completion of the project, as, for example, the John Paton Davies notes of the Cairo Conference, papers in the Franklin D. Roosevelt Library at Hyde Park, and papers of Alger Hiss and Secretary Stettinius, were either not followed up or were followed up ineffectually by the responsible officials of the Division. After Dr. Bozer was finally given responsibility in October 1953 for compiling the records of the Cairo-Teheran Conferences of 1943, he met his deadline and had his compilation ready for publication by June 30, 1954.

Meanwhile at the congressional hearings on the State Department in April 1954, the Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs reiterated the commitments made a year earlier that the historical division would finish the compilation of papers of all 12 of the wartime conferences by June 30, 1954. In addition, he promised specifically that the Malta-Yalta, Potsdam, and Cairo-Teheran volumes would be published by June 30, 1955. He promised also that within 4 years, that is by June 30, 1957, the Historical Division would publish a total of 41 volumes, including the annual volumes of foreign relations, at the rate of 8 volumes for fiscal 1954, 11 volumes for fiscal 1955, 11 volumes for fiscal 1956, and 11 volumes for fiscal 1957. Congress thereupon appropriated a quarter of a million dollars for this specific purpose, during the fiscal year 1955.

In the 4 years 1953–57 Congress has appropriated close to a million dollars to the Historical Division of the State Department for this program. What has been accomplished? Where are the diplomatic papers that the State Department explicitly promised to lay before the American people? Most of them still remain hidden behind the iron curtain of the Historical Division. Of the five volumes of papers on the wartime conferences which were promised, only one—the Malta-Yalta volume, compiled originally in uncensored form by Mr. Bryton Barron and later censored prior to publication—has been published. Four years and a million dollars after the launching of this speedup program the Historical Division is still 18 years in arrears in the publication of the annual volumes of the diplomatic papers of this Government.

If a decision was ever made at top levels in the Government to kill this program and to continue to withhold from the American people the secret diplomatic record of their Government during the war and postwar periods, that decision was never made known either to Dr. Dozer or to the Congress, which has continued for 4 years to appropriate all the money requested for it by the State Department.

On the contrary, the Historical Division was told officially in 1953 that this program was strongly backed by the White House. President Eisenhower himself publicly endorsed it in a press conference in April 1955.

It seems apparent that the forces in the State Department which have succeeded in delaying the overdue publication of these diplomatic papers have fully succeeded in ridding the Historical Division of both Dr. Dozer and Mr. Bryton Barron. These gentlemen were the two spokesmen within the Department whose insistence upon full and honest reporting caused an internal argument which culminated in their dismissal.

I believe that my colleagues here will agree that it is a most anomalous situation when trained, professional men such as Dr. Dozer and Mr. Barron are pilloried for their insistence that a department of Government carry out its stated commitments. We find such developments hard to imagine when they occur in Government. When such arbitrary action takes place, it is possible that the Department has discharged the wrong men. Although harmony may now prevail in the State Department's Historical Division, the problems which this incident discloses lead only to the conclusion that overhauling of the Division is needed and is, in fact, very long overdue.

The release of Dr. Dozer under the guise of inefficiency is a transparent ruse which hardly needs comment here in view of his services to the Department over many years. The unfortunate aspect of this affair is that it casts a cloud over the professional ability and standing of this fine and able gentleman. It is ironic indeed that this should occur to a fine scholar whose only fault was to pursue too diligently the ethics of his profession—namely, the objective reporting of facts. If the Historical Division wishes to rewrite history or to suppress information for narrowly political reasons, I feel certain that no scholar wishes to be associated with this process of "doublethink."

In this sense, Dr. Dozer's experience has been a service to the Nation. The fact that the unfortunate conditions it showed to exist in an important agency of Government are uncorrected is tragic indeed. Although objective scholarship is obviously persona non grata in the State Department, we can rejoice that Dr. Dozer's refusal to distort the truth about the conduct of our foreign affairs represents the kind of scholarship which is in the best tradition of American principles. I congratulate this gentleman and I feel certain that my feelings in this regard are shared throughout his profession and by those many public figures and newspapers who have spoken out in Dr. Dozer's cause.

Congressional Investigation of International Labor Organization Imperative

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GORDON H. SCHERER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 29, 1957

Mr. SCHERER. Mr. Speaker, the Senate recently considered a resolution (S. J. Res. 73) to raise the ceiling on United States contributions to the International Labor Organization from $1,750,000 a year to $3,000,000 a year.

The Senate approved an increase of $250,000, which would raise the ceiling to $2,000,000 a year.

The resolution has now been referred to the House Foreign Affairs Committee. It will come up for discussion and action at the next session. It would be most constructive, therefore, to give the questions raised by this resolution some study in the meantime—and I therefore propose to go into it today, with the hope and expectation that what I have to say may lead to a closer examination of the advisability of the ILO budget increase.

Just what is the ILO?

Most of us know that it is a holdover from the League of Nations, and that it is now one of the agencies of the United Nations.

We know that it holds an annual conference every June in Geneva, attended by representatives of labor, employers, and government from each of its 78 member countries.

We know that the ILO is presumed to concern itself with the welfare and the standards of living of the workingman, all over the world.

We are told by the Labor Department, the State Department, and various international idealists, that the ILO is a vital instrument for the preservation of world peace.

But all of this still leaves us in the dark. I repeat—just what is the ILO, and what does it do?

Fortunately, we have available factual information on this subject, gathered from people who have had ample experience in ILO conferences. I refer in particular to William L. McGrath, of my own city of Cincinnati, who served for 6 years as a member of the United States employer delegation to the ILO, and has also served a 3-year term as a member of its governing body.

Mr. McGrath's reports on the actual workings of the ILO have aroused the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce, which nominate the employer delegation to the ILO, to the point that these two organizations have seriously questioned the advisability of further participation in the ILO. They sent a delegation this year practically under protest, at the urgent insistence of the Government, and have recommended that the Congress of the United States conduct a searching joint investigation as to the advisability of the United States continuing to remain a member of the ILO.

The concern of the NAM and the United States Chamber of Commerce lies in the fact that the ILO has long since ceased to be a body devoted to the affairs of labor, and has instead become a political forum and propaganda agency devoted chiefly to fostering the philosophy of socialism, communism, and nationalization of industry.

To further its purposes the ILO uses the convention device. As you know, a convention is, in effect, a draft of a basic law which, when ratified by member countries, stands as a treaty among the nations which have ratified it.

ILO conventions can be, and are, used as the framework for specific legislation in countries all over the world. Left-wing political orators use them to lend support to their campaign proposals. From the standpoint of ideologies the ILO is probably the most influential propaganda organization in the world today; and this propaganda is in the main absolutely contrary to the beliefs and principles of the United States.

We, that is, the great majority of us, believe in freedom for the individual; the ILO is dedicated to mastery by government. The underlying intent of practically every ILO proposal put forward in recent years has been along the lines of more power for government, more control by government, more regimentation by government, more regulation by government—until the state would be the complete master of human destinies and affairs.

In its earlier days the ILO devoted itself to subjects concerned directly with labor. But then, in 1944, the ILO passed the so-called Declaration of Philadelphia, which said, among other things, that it was a responsibility of the ILO to examine and consider all international economic policies and measures in the light of the attainment of conditions under which human beings pursue their material well-being and their spiritual development.

By incorporating this declaration in its constitution, the ILO assumed the presumed right to draft proposed international laws on any subject under the sun; and that is exactly what it has proceeded to do. Let me give you some examples:

The ILO has drafted a proposed international law to the effect that government should give people money for illness, injury, childbirth, unemployment, old age, invalidity, which is defined as the inability to engage in any gainful activity, and a morbid condition. Interwoven in the provisions of this convention is a complete system of socialized medicine.

The ILO has drafted a proposed international law to the effect that all private employment agencies should be put out of business, and all employment placement should be concentrated in the hands of government. If government can tell people where they must go for jobs, government can direct the destiny of mankind.

The ILO has drafted a proposed international law to the effect that government should pay benefits to employed women at the time of childbirth, that the children should be put into a government-run nursery, and that interruptions of mothers' working time for purposes of nursing the baby should be counted as working hours and paid for as such by the employer. I am told that when this convention was being drafted, an argument arose as to whether the convention should prescribe that a woman should nurse her baby for 1 hour during the working day, or for 2½ hours.

The ILO enacts recommendations as well as conventions—and in its recommendations it can give its socialistic ambitions full sway, for recommendations are pure propaganda, and do not have to be held within bounds which are practical for ratification purposes.

In 1955 the ILO passed a recommendation to the effect that in each country the public authorities, meaning government, should take over the education of all youngsters on the farm, providing them with textbooks, and teachers, prescribing examination requirements, and providing buildings, transportation, equipment, and so forth. This was a blueprint for the Communist technique of forcing young minds into the pattern prescribed by government.

In that same year the ILO recommended that the competent authority—meaning government—should prepare suggestions and guidance for the operation of canteens and cafeterias in industrial plants, subject to legal enforcement. In short, government is going to prescribe what people shall eat.

The ILO also enacts resolutions. One of its resolutions, passed under the pretext of dealing with unemployment, prescribed that government should take over production, allocation of markets, distribution of products, price fixing, wage fixing, financing—in fact, all phases of the economic system—and in addition, prescribed how workers should use their leisure time.

The ILO has what it calls a program of technical assistance. Theoretically, the ILO is supposed to send out experts to underdeveloped countries to help them increase productivity. But a large share of the technical assistance projects undertaken by the ILO turn out to be projects having to do with giving government a greater voice in the affairs of men.

For instance, the ILO calls the setting up of a social security system, the organization of a labor department, the establishment of a cooperative, the undertaking of a manpower survey, technical assistance. It is my suspicion that the technical assistance of the ILO consists largely of providing assistance in the promotion of socialism.

The Socialists took control of the ILO some years ago, when socialism took a firm hold in Europe. The underdeveloped countries of the Far East, impressed with Socialist ideas, followed the European pattern. Then in 1954 the Communists came back into the ILO in a big way. Russia returned as three nations—the U. S. S. R., the Ukraine, and Byelorussia—and began to bring its satellites back in full strength.

Today the Soviet countries have a solid block of 36 potential votes in the ILO, as compared to 4 for the United States.

The recent Communist invasion of the ILO has operated to push the nature of its proposals further to the left. While the Socialists and the Communists compete for followers, they nevertheless agree on certain basic theories such as nationalization of industry and government regimentation.

The net result is that today, as I said before, the ILO is spreading the doctrines of socialism and collectivism all over the world.

The Labor Department and the State Department say that the ILO represents an opportunity to sell the American way of life and the competitive system to the rest of the world. But have our Government delegates ever stood up at an ILO conference and made such an attempt? The answer is "No."

The employer and worker delegates from the free countries of the world have tried to have the so-called employer and worker delegates from the Soviet nations disqualified, on the ground that they cannot possibly represent free associations of employers and workers, and are merely stooges of their governments and the Communist Party. But has the United States Government helped in this effort? Again, the answer is "No." Our Government's policy has been simply to accept the doctrine of coexistence.

In short, the Socialists and the Communists have been gaining increasing headway in the ILO, and the influence of the United States has been growing less and less.

Hour after hour, in the plenary sessions, I am told, the Reds condemn our way of life and make frequent abusive reference to the United States—and for the most part we just sit and take it.

And is an international forum in which free enterprise is damned by a continuous flow of leftwing and Communist oratory of any possible help in selling the philosophy of the United States or in the preservation of world peace?

This brings me to the question of the proposed increase in our annual contribution to the ILO. We are asked to give more money to an organization in which our influence has been growing steadily less, and which is becoming increasingly successful in selling the rest of the world the very principles to which we are most opposed.

But that is just the beginning of the budget story. The detailed facts are almost incredible.

The United States pays 25 percent of the ILO budget; the other 77 nations pay the rest. This means that we bear one-fourth of the cost, and have one-seventy-eighth of the votes.

Sixty-four member nations of the ILO pay a total of 24.07 percent of its budget. In short, 64 nations, all rolled together, pay less than the United States; and yet those 64 nations, which include the smaller, underdeveloped and Socialist nations, can completely outvote the United States on any issue.

In 1955 the budget was apportioned among 66 member nations. But then the three Russian nations, the U. S. S. R., the Ukraine, and Byelorussia, came back in, and Honduras also joined. These 4 new members contributed 11.5 percent of the ILO budget. As a result, 41 nations got reductions in percentage allocations of ILO expense. But did the United States get a reduction? The answer is "No." For some years there has been a persistent drive within the ILO to get an even higher percentage from the United States of America.

The 1958 budget for the ILO contemplates a further percentage reduction for 27 member nations.

Now, in the face of the facts I have previously given you, let me ask this simple question—why should our country provide additional financing to an organization which is dedicated to the destruction of the very principles for which our country stands?

Of course, there are people who gaily assume that everything is for the good and that the ILO must be a noble enterprise because of its announced intentions. There are also people who may feel that the interests of the United States are well protected in the ILO because Mr. David Morse, Director General of the ILO, is an American citizen.

I would like to say a few words about Mr. Morse. Back in the Roosevelt era he was General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, and then became Under Secretary of Labor. He headed the Government delegation to the ILO, and then in 1948 was elected its Director General. This was a natural progression, the implications of which you can judge for yourselves.

When the Russians came back into the ILO, bringing their satellites with them in full force, Mr. Morse took a very factual view of the situation. After all, they represented a substantial increase in the ILO budget.

At the May meeting of the governing body this year, the question arose as to the reelection of Mr. Morse as Director General. His term was to expire in 1958. The governing body voted to extend his term for 5 more years.

Speaking in support of that proposal, Mr. Arutiunian, representing the Government of the U. S. S. R., said that he wished to stress the fact that Mr. Morse had been personally responsible to a very large extent for "certain developments in ILO activities in recent years"; that during his directorship it had become a universal organization, which made it possible to organize cooperation between countries which had different social and economic systems.

Following his reelection, Mr. Morse "hinted"—according to the Christian Science Monitor of June 27—that he would submit formal proposals soon for full ILO recognition of employer delegates for Communist countries.

I draw no implications and make no criticism of Mr. Morse. The executive head of an international organization owes his allegiance to that organization, and must shape his policies in line with majority opinion of its membership.

When he assumed his office, Mr. Morse took the following oath:

> I solemnly undertake to exercise in all loyalty, discretion, and conscience the functions that have been entrusted to me as Director General of the International Labor Office, to discharge these functions and regulate my conduct with the interests of the International Labor Organization alone in view, not to seek or accept instructions in regard to the performance of my duties from any government or other authority external to the International Labor Organization, and at all times to uphold the constitution of the International Labor Organization.

It is my understanding that Mr. Morse is an exceptionally able man, which he must be to hold the position he does. I simply wish to point out that the fact that Mr. Morse is an American citizen does not make him, in the ILO, an official representative of the interests of the United States. To carry through his job with honesty and integrity, he must follow the thinking of majority ILO membership, and such thinking is contrary to the philosophy of the United States.

I would like to mention another individual currently in the limelight in connection with ILO affairs, Joseph E. Johnson, president of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Last year, when the NAM and the United States chamber launched a serious blast of criticism of the ILO, the administrative branch of the Government set up an independent committee composed of college professors to look into the matter. Mr. Johnson was the chairman.

The Johnson committee came up with a report to the effect that, although there were many things wrong with the ILO, it was nevertheless a glorious institution. I have always been intrigued by the unfailing instinct of people in Government to select a committee chairman who will come up with a report which suits their purposes.

Mr. Johnson showed up this June as one of the advisors on the United States Government delegation to the ILO Conference in Geneva. No doubt this is merely a singular coincidence.

I think it is high time that the Congress of the United States turned the spotlight on the ILO.

The Congress has not been in the least backward in turning the spotlight on organized labor. Why should we hesitate as far as the ILO is concerned? It is rather interesting that, when Dave Beck was wanted by Senator McCLELLAN's committee, the first story was that he could not come because he was on his way to attend an ILO meeting in Hamburg. I believe the time has come for the Congress to take a new look at this whole ILO proposition.

I should like to explore this pertinent question—can anyone from the Labor or State Department, or any place else, point specifically to any particular advantage or accomplishment gained for the people of the United States as a result of our participation in the ILO?

I say that either the United States should be more effective in the ILO than it is now, or we should get out of it—one or the other.

But the correct answer can only be obtained by really digging into the subject. That is why I think we should have a joint Congressional investigation.

Mr. McGrath, who has devoted many months of time and effort to the ILO, was once told by a member of the State Department that as to ILO matters there were "global considerations which no mere businessman could be expected to understand." Perhaps there are global considerations which no mere Congressman can be expected to understand. If so, I would like to know what they are.

It is my present intention to introduce at the next session of the Congress a joint resolution calling for a complete investigation of the International Labor Organization.

SENATE

FRIDAY, AUGUST 30, 1957

The Senate met at 9 o'clock a. m.

Rev. Albert P. Shirkey, D. D., minister, Mount Vernon Place Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

God of our fathers, the alpha and omega, the beginning and the end, we call upon Thee for Thy benediction upon our President, every Member of the Senate, and all members of our Government. Take these weary servants of the people and refresh them by Thy grace. Enlighten them for these closing hours of decision. May God's presence protect them on their homeward journey, and make their hearts glad in the thanks of a grateful nation for their unselfish service.

What has been done in this Chamber that is weak make strong, overrule all things done in error, and forgive that which has been done for political profit at the cost of a nation's integrity and strength. Bless without measure the good things that have been undertaken for God and humanity.

Gracious God, save us from our enemies without who seek our destruction, and help us to overcome by faith the enemies within of fear and confusion, to the end that we may become a wiser and stronger Nation and a better leader in the world.

In the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

RECOMMENDATION OF APPOINTMENT OF SENATOR PASTORE TO THE UNITED STATES DELEGATION TO THE FIRST GENERAL CONFERENCE OF THE INTERNATIONAL ATOMIC ENERGY AGENCY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, there are few Americans who have devoted their talents to the problems involved in atomic energy with more energy and more selflessness than has the distinguished junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Pastore].

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Pastore] is one of the ablest and hardest working Members of the United States Senate; and he is an effective legislator, with the tenacity and the determination that get things done.

One of his special projects has been the International Atomic Energy Agency, recently approved by the Senate. He has given it careful thought and careful study, and has contributed to the understanding of its meaning.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I take a great deal of personal pleasure in recommending his appointment to the United States delegation to the First General Conference of the International Atomic Energy Agency. I know that all Members of the Senate will have complete confidence in the high quality of the service the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Pastore] will perform.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield to my friend.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I should like to join the distinguished majority leader in the recognition being given to our colleague, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Pastore].

There is no Member of this body who is more assiduous in his application to duty, no Member of this body who has taken a greater interest in the affairs of his State, and no one who has applied himself more thoroughly, in a detailed manner, to the questions relative to the development of the atom and hydrogen weapons, as well as to the experiments which take place in the area of the peaceful development in this new scientific field.

I would say that the State of Rhode Island is indeed fortunate to have a man of Senator Pastore's ability representing it in the Senate, and the Nation is indeed blessed that we have in him a man who will represent all of us so conscientiously and capably at the forthcoming conference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thank the Senator from Montana very much.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. In accordance with the order entered on yesterday, there is a limitation of 3 minutes on statements made during the morning hour today. Morning business is now in order.

REPORT OF NATIONAL TRUST FOR HISTORIC PRESERVATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the secretary, National Trust for Historic Preservation, Washington, D. C., transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of that trust for the calendar year 1956, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

RESOLUTION OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF ARKANSAS BAR ASSOCIATION

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Arkansas Bar Association, relating to the appointment of a judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF ARKANSAS BAR ASSOCIATION

Whereas the retirement of Judge Thomas C. Trimble of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas has produced a very substantial backlog of cases, both criminal and civil, which are urgently in need of disposition; and

Whereas the normal volume of judicial work handled by Chief Judge Harry J. Lemley of the United States District Courts for the Eastern and Western Districts of Arkansas and by Judge John E. Miller of the United States District Court for the Western District of Arkansas occupies the full time of these judges so that they cannot take over and dispose of the volume of litigation heretofore handled by Judge Trimble's court; and

Whereas there are many lawyers in Arkansas qualified by training, experience, temperament, and character to be fit and outstanding members of the Federal judiciary; and

Whereas great injustice to the public has been worked because of the absence of a full-time judge for the eastern district of Arkansas, whether the problem is viewed from social, civic, or economic point of view; and

Whereas the truism that "Justice delayed is justice denied" has been abundantly demonstrated in the eastern district of Arkansas since January 14, 1957: It is therefore

Resolved by the executive committee of the Arkansas Bar Association in meeting assembled this date at the office of the association in Little Rock, That:

1. The Attorney General of the United States be urged to recommend to the President of the United States the name or names of a suitable person or persons to be appointed judge of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas, and that the President of the United States promptly act thereon;

2. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted immediately to the Attorney General of the United States, the President of the United States, to the American Bar Association committee on Federal judiciary, and to all Members of the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives from Arkansas.

Dated this August 28, 1957.

STATEHOOD FOR ALASKA AND HAWAII—MINORITY VIEWS (PT. 2 OF S. REPTS. 1163 AND 1164)

Under authority of the order of the Senate of August 29, 1957,

AMENDMENT OF RULE RELATING TO REFERENCE OF CERTAIN HOUSE BILLS TO COMMITTEES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I am submitting for appropriate reference a resolution amending rule XIV of the Senate rules. My purpose in doing so is to invite thoughtful consideration of a change to settle the conflict between rule XIV and rule XXV. Rule XXV, as amended by the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, provides that all bills, resolutions, and so forth, "shall be referred" to the appropriate legislative committee. Rule XIV, on the other hand, establishes a procedure for placing a House-passed bill on the calendar upon objection to further proceedings on the bill by one Senator after the second reading, but prior to reference of the bill to a committee.

When rule XXV was adopted, apparently no consideration was given to the conflict with rule XIV. The conflict has arisen several times, however, and always on matters in which there was great divergence of opinion.

On May 3, 1948—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 4, pages 5168–5169, of the 80th Congress, 2d session, former Senator Downey, of California, objected to further proceedings on the tidelands bill after the second reading. The Chair ruled that the bill should be placed on the calendar and it was. On the very next day the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT]—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 4, pages 5219–5229 of the 80th Congress, 2d session—attempted to have the same procedure carried out with relation to the oleomargarine tax repeal bill. An objection was made to this procedure, and a debate followed on the point of order raised by the Senator from Arkansas relating to the priority of rules XIV and XXV. The late Senator Vandenberg, as Presiding Officer, submitted to the Senate the question on the point of order. The bill was referred to committee.

Recently when H. R. 6127, the civil-rights bill, was received from the House, the same conflict arose when the minority leader, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], objected to further proceedings after second reading. A point of order objecting to this procedure was overruled by the Vice President, and the bill was placed on the calendar—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 85th Congress, 1st session, pages 9778–9828.

I have taken part in all of these discussions and participated in the procedural debate over the interpretation of the rules; as a result, I believe that this conflict should be resolved and language offered to the Senate which will settle the difference of opinion over the interpretation of rules. The need for clarification of these rules was ably pointed out as long ago as 1948 by the late Senator Vandenberg, when he was President pro tempore, during the debates of that year—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 94, part 4, page 5223, of the 80th Congress, 2d session.

The clarification which my resolution suggests provides that if objection is made to further proceedings after the second reading of any measure that comes over from the House, the question shall be put by the Presiding Officer to the Senate whether the bill should be referred to a committee or placed on the calendar. By majority vote and without debate, the Senate shall determine the disposition of the measure.

I have conferred with both the Parliamentarian and legislative counsel, and I believe the suggestion is in a satisfactory form for the consideration of the Committee on Rules and Administration.

This conflict does not arise often, but when it does arise, it is generally on a matter of national interest. For this reason, I believe that if the amendment is considered worthy, it may avoid in the future a debate on questions of procedure rather than merit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The resolution (S. Res. 197) submitted by Mr. SALTONSTALL, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That rule XIV of the Standing Rules of the Senate is amended—

(a) by renumbering sections 5 and 6 as 6 and 7, and

(b) by striking out section 4 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"4. Every bill and joint resolution reported from a committee not having previously been read, shall be read once, and twice, if not objected to, on the same day, and placed on the calendar in the order of their reading when reported.

"5. In the case of any bill or joint resolution of the House of Representatives, if objection is made to the second reading of such bill or joint resolution on the same day as the first reading thereof, such bill or joint resolution shall be laid before the Senate on the next legislative day by the Presiding Officer and shall be read the second time. The Presiding Officer shall then submit to the Senate the question, 'Shall this bill (or joint resolution, as the case may be) be referred to the committee having legislative jurisdiction thereof?' which shall be determined without debate. If the question is decided in the affirmative, the bill or joint resolution shall be referred to the committee having legislative jurisdiction. If the question is decided in the negative, the bill or joint resolution shall be placed on the calendar."

EXTENSION OF GREETINGS TO THE PEOPLE OF THE FEDERATION OF MALAYA ON THEIR INDEPENDENCE

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on August 31, the Government of the Federation of Malaya will achieve its independence as a sovereign nation within the British Commonwealth. This action will bring to seven the number of nations, now free, which before World War II were under British control.

We in America congratulate the people of the Government of the Federation of Malaya on this historic occasion, and are proud to welcome them into the ranks of the free nations.

Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], and myself, I submit a resolution, for the immediate consideration of which I request unanimous consent. The resolution extends the most cordial greetings of the Senate to the Legislative Assembly of the Government of the Federation of Malaya, on the occasion of the independence of the Government of the Federation of Malaya.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 198) as follows:

Whereas it is the policy of the Government of the United States to encourage the orderly evolution of peoples throughout the world toward self-government or independence; and

Whereas the people of the United States support the concept that other peoples should have an opportunity freely to choose their own national destiny under circumstances which will enable them to assume and maintain an equal station among the free nations of the world; and

Whereas the Government of the Federation of Malaya is achieving independence on August 31, 1957: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States extend its most cordial greetings to the Legislative Assembly of the Government of the Federation of Malaya on the occasion of the independence of the Government of the Federation of Malaya, express the earnest hope that the Assembly and the people of the Government of the Federation of Malaya will enjoy continuing success in the development of a sovereign democratic state, and reaffirm the friendship of the people of the United States for the people of the Government of the Federation of Malaya.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, it gives me great satisfaction to join with my distinguished colleague from New Jersey in welcoming this new nation to the family of nations, and I do so with particular pride because this welcome comes from two of the smallest States in the United States. Representing Rhode Island, as I do, I can speak for the oldest sovereign State in the Western Hemisphere greeting the newest State on the other side of the world.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution is agreed to.

STUDY OF ACTIVITIES IN CERTAIN CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN COUNTRIES INIMICAL TO INTERESTS OF COUNTRIES FRIENDLY TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 200), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas activities directed toward the removal of heads of governments in certain Central American and South American countries seek to depose leaders of governments friendly to the United States; and

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, or a subcommittee thereof, make appropriate studies of these activities for the purpose of advising the Senate whether the Monroe Doctrine is being violated and whether existing statutes and treaties enable the United States to take any actions that may be necessary or desirable to avoid encroachment upon governments of Western Hemispheric countries who seek to resist international communism.

WELFARE AND PENSION PLANS DISCLOSURE ACT

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill entitled "Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act."

This proposed legislation is the result of several years' study by various subcommittees of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The investigation of welfare and pension plans was begun in 1954 under the chairmanship of the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], and continued with three sets of hearings in 1955 and 1956 by the subcommittee of which I was chairman. The bill drafted by that subcommittee was reintroduced in this Congress as S. 1122 and furnished the basic framework for this new bill.

The present proposed legislation is specifically the work of the Special Subcommittee on Welfare and Pension Plans Legislation, of which the able junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] is chairman. After extensive legislative hearings, this clean bill was drafted and has been reported favorably from the special subcommittee, and it is expected that action will be taken by the full Labor and Public Welfare Committee early in the next session of Congress. The chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. KENNEDY, has graciously invited me to introduce the revised bill, although I am no longer on the committee, and I am very glad to continue to be associated with the efforts to secure favorable consideration for it.

The bill provides for the registration and annual reporting to the Federal Government of specified financial and other information covering the operation of employee welfare and pension benefit plans and the disclosure of such information to the public and to interested parties.

The administration of the act would be placed in the Department of Labor.

The bill covers virtually all welfare and pension benefit plans except those administered by a governmental instrumentality. However, during the first 2 years following the enactment of this legislation, plans covering fewer than 100 employees are not required to file annual reports. In addition, should the Secretary find that compliance with the act would be burdensome on certain categories of plans covering fewer than 100 employees—classified on the basis of the number of employees covered—he could exempt them from both the registration or reporting requirements of the act for such period as he deems desirable.

The bill provides for an advisory council to assist and advise the Secretary in carrying out the purposes of this act.

The bill provides penalties for making false entries or statements and for embezzlement or other violations. It also provides penalties for kickbacks and other forms of self-dealing.

Provisions are made in the legislation for cooperation with States having employee welfare and pension benefit statutes with a view to the establishment of standards reporting forms and to assist the States in the discharge of their responsibilities in this area. In the case of multi-State plans the act provides that no person shall be required to file with agencies of States having disclosure statutes except those of the State in which the plan has its principal office.

The requirements of the act would be in force for 4 years following the date of enactment.

I want to congratulate the special subcommittee which has been working on this bill and particularly its chairman, Senator KENNEDY, for the constructive steps it has taken to advance the favorable consideration of this needed measure. The changes made in the new bill have clarified and strengthened it in many respects, and I hope the measure will have the broad support which this thoughtful work of the subcommittee deserves.

On two points, however, I believe the present bill may be further improved by the Labor Committee.

The first and most serious of these matters is in the disclosure provisions in section 7 (2), where the persons responsible for the management of the plans are required to provide information only to those participants or beneficiaries who request it. Limiting disclosure in this section to those who request the information, in my judgment, would make the bill fall far short of its basic objectives, to keep all participants and beneficiaries fully informed about the status of their welfare and pension plans, to let so much daylight into the operation of the plans that potential wrongdoers may be deterred, and to provide the greatest possible assistance to the self-policing of the operation of such plans.

My doubt about the present draft of the bill is that the very plans which may be most in need of the fullest disclosure and most careful scrutiny by their covered workers may also be the ones in which because of intimidation or other reasons, the workers are most reluctant or fearful about requesting financial information on the plans. If disclosure on the other hand is automatic, the participants and beneficiaries do not have to face the dangers of economic reprisals to secure information. And workers who may have been both uninformed and apathetic about the status of their welfare and pension plans may develop a greater interest in their operation and negotiation and be stimulated to greater participation in the affairs of their union or of the company by which they are employed.

The second point on which I have a question is whether the figure of $50,000 in section 6 (e) (1) (D) may not be too large. In small funded plans it might permit a fairly heavy concentration of the fund in one security without the necessity of reporting it.

I hope both of these matters may have the full committee's careful consideration before its final action on the bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill, together with a section-by-section analysis of its provisions, may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and section-by-section analysis will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2888) to provide for registration, reporting, and disclosure of employee welfare and pension benefit plans, introduced by Mr. DOUGLAS (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. IVES, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. McNAMARA), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2888

A bill to provide for registration, reporting, and disclosure of employee welfare and pension benefit plans

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act."

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that the growth in size, scope, and numbers of employee welfare and pension benefit plans in recent years has been rapid and substantial; that the continued well-being and security of millions of employees and their dependents are directly affected by these plans; that they are affected with a national public interest; that they have become an important factor affecting the stability of employment and the successful development of industrial relations; that they have become an important factor in commerce because of the interstate character of their activities, and of the activities of their participants, and the employers, employee organizations, and other entities by which they are established or maintained; that they substantially affect the revenues of the United States because of the billions of dollars involved in these plans and the fact that their income in many cases is exempt from taxation under the income tax laws, and a great percentage of the costs of and contributions to these programs are deductible in computing taxable income for the purposes of such laws; that owing to the lack of public and employee information concerning their operation, gross abuses and opportunities for abuses have developed in the management and operation of some of these plans to the detriment of the beneficiaries, and without uniform minimum legislative safeguards may gravely threaten the soundness and stability of these plans, undermine public confidence in them, endanger responsible management-labor relations, and result in loss of revenue to the United States; and that it is therefore desirable in the interests of employees and their beneficiaries, for the protection of the revenue of the United States, and to provide for the general welfare and the free flow of commerce, that disclosure be made with respect to the operation and administration of such plans.

(b) It is hereby declared to be the policy of this act to protect interstate commerce, the revenue of the United States, and the interests of participants in employee welfare and pension benefit plans and their beneficiaries and the interests of employers and the public in such plans, to conserve the moneys involved in such plans so as to assure that they are utilized for their intended purposes, and to provide adequate safeguarding thereof, by requiring the registration and reporting to the Federal Government of financial and other information with respect thereto, and disclosure of such information.

(b) The Secretary may exempt from the requirements of section 5, relating to registration, or section 6, relating to annual reports, or of both such sections, for such indefinite or other period or periods as he may determine, any category or categories of employee welfare or pension benefit plans (classified on the basis of the number of employees covered) which together with any related plans cover fewer than 100 employees, if he finds that compliance would be unduly burdensome to such plans or, because of the number of such plans, would place an undue administrative burden on the Department.

(c) During any period for which an employee welfare or pension benefit plans is exempt under subsection (a) or subsection (b) from the requirements of section 5 or section 6 it shall not be required to make disclosure as required by section 7, but in lieu thereof the person or persons having responsibility for the overall management of such plan shall make available for inspection by any participant or beneficiary or other interested person at the principal offices of the plan or such other place as may be prescribed by the Secretary such of the information specified by section 6 as may be requested, except that the information specified by subsection (b) (2) of such section shall not be required to be certified to by an independent public accountant as provided in such subsection unless the Secretary deems such certification necessary to carry out the policy of this act and so provides in his regulations.

(c) The Secretary shall furnish to the Advisory Council an executive secretary and such secretarial, clerical, and other services as are deemed necessary to the conduct of its business. The Secretary may call upon other agencies of the Government for statistical data, reports, and other information which will assist the Council in the performance of its duties.

(d) Appointed members of the Council shall be paid compensation at the rate of $50 per diem when engaged in the work of the Council, including travel time, and shall be allowed travel expenses and per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized by law (5 U. S. C. 73b–2) for persons in the Government service employed intermittently and receiving compensation on a per diem when actually employed basis.

SEC. 10. (a) The Secretary is authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(b) The Secretary is authorized to utilize any information submitted under the provisions of this act for statistical and research purposes and to compile and publish such studies, analyses, reports, and surveys as he deems appropriate.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to make such studies as he deems necessary to serve as a basis for making recommendations for further legislation concerning matters to which this act relates.

(d) The Secretary is authorized to make such expenditures and, subject to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel, including attorneys, as may be necessary to perform the functions imposed by this act. (e) All pertinent accounts, correspondence, memorandums, papers, books, and other records of any employee welfare or pension benefit plan shall be subject at any time or from time to time to such reasonable, periodic, special, or other examinations by representatives of the Department of Labor as the Department may deem necessary to accomplish the policy of this act.

STUDIES WITH RESPECT TO STANDARDS OF CONDUCT AND CIVIL SUITS

SEC. 11. The Secretary shall cause to be conducted a study for the purpose of determining the desirability and feasibility (1) of establishing and requiring compliance with standards of conduct in matters concerning the management and operation of employee welfare and pension benefit plans by persons serving as officers, agents, employees, trustees, or custodians of such plans or otherwise occupying positions of responsibility in, or exercising authority or control over, the management or operation of such plans or having a fiduciary relationship to such plans or their participants or their beneficiaries, and (2) of authorizing the Secretary to institute civil suits against any such persons who have been guilty of gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust in respect of any employee welfare or pension benefit plan for the purpose of enjoining such persons from further serving in such capacities, or for the purpose of recovering from them on behalf of the plan the amounts of any financial losses suffered by the plan or its participants or their beneficiaries by reason of such misconduct or abuse of trust. Upon the conclusion of such studies the Secretary shall transmit to the Congress his conclusions and recommendations with respect thereto.

INVESTIGATIONS; INJUNCTIONS

SEC. 12. (a) The Secretary may, in his discretion, make such investigations as he deems necessary to determine whether any person has violated or is about to violate any provision of this act or any rule or regulation thereunder, and may require or permit any person to file with it a statement in writing, under oath or otherwise as the Secretary shall determine, as to all the facts and circumstances concerning the matter to be investigated. The Secretary is authorized, in his discretion, to publish information concerning any such violations, and to investigate any facts, conditions, practices, or matters which he may deem necessary or proper to aid in the enforcement of the provisions of this act or in the prescribing of rules and regulations thereunder.

S. C. 49, 50), are hereby made applicable to the jurisdiction, powers, and duties of the Secretary of Labor or any officers designated by him.

The Secretary may transmit such evidence as may be available concerning such acts or practices to the Attorney General, who may, in his discretion, institute the necessary investigations and criminal proceedings.

(d) The district courts of the United States, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, to restrain violations of, to enforce any duty created by, or to compel disclosure of any information required to be submitted to the Secretary in accordance with this act or the rules and regulations thereunder. All actions under this subsection shall be brought on behalf of the Secretary.

Nothing contained in this subsection shall be construed to prohibit the payment to or acceptance by any person of usual salary or compensation for necessary services performed in the regular course of his duties as such an officer or employee.

TERMINAL DATE

Sec. 14. This act shall be effective for a period of 4 calendar years from the date of its enactment. On or before January 1 of each year, the Secretary shall make a complete and comprehensive report to the Congress of his operations under this act. The report filed on or before January 1, 1961, shall include the recommendations of the Secretary as to the continuance, simplification, or modification of this act.

COOPERATION WITH OTHER FEDERAL AGENCIES

Sec. 15. (a) The heads of other Federal departments and agencies shall cooperate with the Secretary in furnishing information, data, reports, and such other material as may be necessary to the effective administration and enforcement of this act. The Secretary shall make available to the Internal Revenue Service such of the information furnished to or obtained by the Department of Labor under this act as the Secretary of the Treasury may need for the purpose of enabling such Service to administer more effectively the Federal income tax laws. The Secretary shall also provide for the making available of information furnished by employee welfare and pension benefit plans pursuant to this act to other departments and agencies of the Government to assist in the performance of the functions of such departments and agencies. The secretary shall cooperate and consult with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, the Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and with the heads of such other departments and agencies as he deems appropriate regarding the administration of this act, and with the consent of the respective heads of such departments and agencies may utilize the facilities of such departments and agencies for such research and other purposes as the Secretary deems appropriate.

(b) In order to avoid burdensome and unnecessary effort and expense to employee welfare and pension benefit plans and to the Government resulting from a multiplicity of forms, the Secretary shall consult and cooperate with the heads of the various departments and agencies of the Government with a view to developing standardized forms for use in the reporting of information relating to such plans required by this act, the internal revenue laws, or other laws of the United States, or regulations promulgated thereunder.

COOPERATION WITH STATES

Sec. 16. (a) The Secretary shall consult and cooperate with any State officers or agencies having responsibility for the administration of State laws requiring the disclosure of information concerning employee welfare and pension benefit plans, with a view to developing standardized forms for such purpose, developing means of facilitating compliance with such laws, and avoiding burdensome and unnecessary effort and expense resulting from a multiplicity of forms. Before prescribing forms under this act for registration and reporting, and for summaries which may be required for distribution to participants and beneficiaries, the Secretary shall obtain information with respect to the format and content of forms employed in connection with such State laws, and shall have in mind the requirements of such State laws in prescribing forms under this act.

(b) In order to assist the States to discharge such responsibilities as they may have with respect to employee welfare and pension benefit plans, the Secretary shall by regulation require the persons responsible for the registration, reporting, and summaries required by this act to file copies of such documents, or any portions thereof, with a State agency upon its request.

(c) In the case of an employee welfare or pension benefit plan providing benefits to employees employed in two or more States, no person shall be required by reason of any law of any such State to file with any State agency (other than an agency of the State in which such plan has its principal office) any information included within a registration, report, summary, or other document filed pursuant to this act if copies of such registration, report, summary, or other document are filed with the State agency, and if copies of such summary or such portions of the registration, report, or other document, as may be required by the State agency, are distributed to participants and beneficiaries in accordance with the requirements of such State law with respect to scope of distribution. Nothing contained in this subsection shall be construed to prevent any State from obtaining such additional information relating to any such plan as it may desire, or from otherwise regulating such plan.

EFFECT OF OTHER LAWS

Sec. 17. The provisions of this act, except section 12 (d) and section 16 (c), and any action taken thereunder shall not be held to exempt or relieve any person from any liability, duty, penalty, or punishment provided by any present or future law of the United States or of any State affecting the operation or administration of employee welfare or pension benefit plans, or in any manner to authorize the operation or administration of any such plan contrary to any such law.

SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

Sec. 18. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the remainder of this act and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected.

The section-by-section analysis presented by Mr. Douglas is as follows:

Section-by-Section Analysis of the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

This section provides that the act may be cited as the "Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act."

SECTION 2. FINDINGS AND POLICY

(a) The findings recognize the tremendous growth of these plans, the millions of employees and dependents affected, the billions of dollars involved, the preferential tax treatment given the plans, their effect upon commerce, the unavailability of information to participants with respect to their operation, and the abuses which have developed in some of them in the absence of legislative safeguards.

(b) The policy is to protect the interests of the participants, the beneficiaries, and the public by requiring registration, reporting, and disclosure of information concerning the operation of such plans.

SECTION 3. DEFINITIONS

Section 3 (a) (1), "Employee Welfare Benefit Plans," and (2) "Employee Pension Benefit Plans": The plan must be established by an employer or by an employee organization, or by both, and the plan, or the benefits which it provides, must be communicated to the employees in writing.

Section 3 (a) (3), "Employee Organization": The definition includes any employee benefit association.

Section 3 (a) (9): The "Secretary," who is charged with the administration of the act, is the Secretary of Labor.

Other terms defined include "employer," "employee," "participant," "beneficiary," "person," "Secretary," "State," "commerce," "related plans.'

SECTION 4. COVERAGE

The act applies to all plans which actually operate in interstate commerce (subsec. (a) (1) and (2)); or are established or maintained by employers or by employee organizations representing employees who are engaged in interstate commerce or are in an industry or activity affecting interstate commerce (subsec. (a) (3)). The act also applies to any plan where the income of the plan is claimed to be exempt from tax, or where the cost of or contributions to any such plan are claimed as deductions from income under the Internal Revenue Code. Subsections (a) (1) and (2) base jurisdiction on the actual interstate activities of the plan. Subsection (a) (3) employs the National Labor Relations Act and Taft-Hartley Act jurisdictional concepts, and subsection (a) (4) is based upon the tax treatment of the plans and of the employer contributions thereto.

Section 4 (b) exempts plans if (1) they are administered by Federal or State government, or by a political subdivision or instrumentality thereof; (2) they are established for the purpose of complying 'with workmen's compensation laws; or (3) they are administered as a corollary to membership in fraternal benefit societies exempt under section 501 (c) (8) of the Internal Revenue Code or by an educational or eleemosynary organization exempt under 501 (c) (3) of the IRC. Compulsory temporary disability insurance would not be included if administered by a State agency, but if self-insured or insured through a commercial carrier, they are included.

SECTION 5. REGISTRATION

All plans are required to register with the Department of Labor, except that the Secretary may exempt plans covering fewer than 100 employees as provided in section 8 (b). The registration requires information with respect to the identity, type, and size of the plan and such related information as the Secretary may deem necessary.

SECTION 6. REPORTING

All plans must report annually to the Department of Labor, except that plans of fewer than 100 employees are exempted for 2 years by section 8 (a) and for any such additional period as the Secretary may deem necessary under section 8 (b).

The annual reports require a description of the plan and its benefits and information with respect to its financial operation which is to be based upon a certified audit.

If the plan is insured, additional pertinent information relating to premiums, claims, commissions, fees, etc., is to be certified to by the insurance or other organization. If a pension plan is funded, in addition to information relating to receipts, disbursements, and financial position, actuarial information is required.

In a trusteed plan, a summary statement as to the composition of the investment portfolio is also required, except that full details are required with respect to investments in securities or property of and/or loans to employers, sponsors, or other parties in interest, or if the investment in any one security or property amounts to more than 5 percent of the fund or 10 percent of the current value of the securities of any one issuer. Profit-sharing plans with pension features are treated the same as trusteed pension plans.

Unfunded pension plans are also required to file actuarial information and information with respect to the operation of the plan.

SECTION 7. DISCLOSURE

It is the intent of the act to permit public disclosure of the information filed in the registration, annual report or other document furnished under the act at the principal offices of the plan and in the public document rooms of the Department of Labor, and to provide information to each beneficiary requesting it in as brief summary form as the Secretary shall prescribe to carry out the policy of the act.

SECTION 8. PLANS COVERING LESS THAN 100 EMPLOYEES

The bill gives a 2-year moratorium to all plans covering less than 100 employees from the reporting provisions, and gives the Secretary of Labor discretionary authority to exempt such small plans from either the registration or the reporting requirements for such further periods as he deems necessary, if he determines that such registration or reporting would be too burdensome on such plans or if the administration of them would be too burdensome on the Department. However, such exempted plans are otherwise required to comply with the act and the beneficiaries thereof may, upon request, obtain the same information at the plan headquarters that would be required in the registration and report.

SECTION 9. ADVISORY COUNCIL

The council consists of 13 members appointed by the Secretary and includes 2 members from management, 1 from insurance, 1 from banking, 4 from labor, 2 from other interested groups, and 3 public members.

SECTION 10. POWERS OF THE SECRETARY

This section grants various powers to the Secretary such as the power to make rules and regulations, the authority to make studies and to recommend legislation, the authority to hire employees and the authority to make examinations of records of employee welfare and pension benefit plans.

SECTION 11. STUDIES WITH RESPECT TO STANDARDS OF CONDUCT AND CIVIL SUITS

The Secretary is charged with the responsibility of conducting a study and making recommendations deemed feasible with respect to standards of conduct in matters concerning the management and operation of employee welfare and pension benefit plans and with respect to the advisability of authorizing the Secretary to institute civil suits against plan officials for gross misconduct or gross abuse of trust for the purpose of removing or disbarring such officials and recovering losses from them on behalf of the plan or beneficiaries.

SECTION 12. INVESTIGATIONS AND INJUNCTIONS

This section gives the Secretary the usual authority to make investigations necessary to determine whether the act has been or is being violated, to apply to Federal courts for subpenas, and to apply to the appropriate Federal court for injunctive relief to prevent violations of the act.

SECTION 13. PENALTIES

Section 13 provides criminal sanctions for violations of the act, perjury in registration or report statements, false entries in books or records, embezzlement from welfare or pension funds, and for paying or receiving kickbacks, commissions, or anything of value for influencing the procurement of insurance or other services or property incident to the operation of an employee benefit plan.

SECTION 14. TERMINAL DATE

Section 14 provides that the act shall be effective for a period of 4 calendar years from the date of its enactment and requires the Secretary to make an annual report to the Congress.

SECTION 15. COOPERATION WITH OTHER FEDERAL AGENCIES

Section 15 (a) provides for general cooperation between Federal agencies and particularly with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Section 15 (b) requires the Secretary to consult and cooperate with the heads of the various Government agencies with a view toward developing standardized forms.

SECTION 16. COOPERATION WITH THE STATES

Section 16 would supersede State laws with respect to employee benefit plan registration, reporting and disclosure, in the case of multi-State plans, except in the State of the plan's home office, if copies of the information required by the Federal act are supplied the State agency and the State requirements with respect to scope of distribution of information to beneficiaries are met.

SECTION 17. EFFECT OF OTHER LAWS

This section provides that (except as provided under section 12 (d) and section 16 (c)) any action taken under this act shall not exempt or relieve persons from liabilities or duties provided by any laws of the United States or of any State affecting the operation or administration of employee welfare or pension benefit plans.

PUNISHMENT FOR CONTEMPT OF CONGRESS

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, on behalf of my very distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the statute relating to the punishment of contempt of Congress. I ask unanimous consent that a statement prepared by my colleague in reference to the proposed legislation, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2891) to amend the statute relating to the punishment of contempt of Congress, introduced by Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. HRUSKA), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The statement presented by Mr. CURTIS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HRUSKA

I have today requested my colleage, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] to introduce on my behalf, a bill which has for its purpose an amendment of the contempt of Congress statute made necessary by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the so-called Watkins case.

One of the most troublesome features of the Supreme Court decision in the Watkins case was the apparent holding that the pertinency of a question must be explained to the witness so that he understands it, before he can be required to answer. This rule would be, of course, administratively impossible.

By amendment of the statute governing Congressional contempt (2 U. S. C. 192) it is believed this problem can be overcome.

My bill seeks to accomplish this result. It would operate to restore the right of Congress to judge the pertinency of its questions.

It should be noted that in the Watkins decision, the court did not rule that the committee had no right to ask a question for lack of pertinency, or had no right to judge the pertinency of its own questions; but only that, under the contempt statute, and in a criminal prosecution, the witness (the defendant-to-be) was entitled to have the pertinency of the question as certain as any other element of the case against him.

This proposed amendment will meet the court's requirement by specifically providing that the question is pertinent unless the witness objects, and that if the witness objects and the committee rules the question is pertinent, that ruling is controlling.

Of course, no statute could give the committee the right to make a wholly unreasonable ruling, and, therefore, no legislation could take away from the court a right of review including the right to review the question of pertinency. However, it is believed that enactment of the amendment here proposed would change the basis of such review, so that whereas the court now looks to the substantive question of pertinency, after enactment of this proposed amendment, the court would look to the reasonableness of the committee's ruling. In effect, this amounts to a prima facie presumption of pertinency where the committee has ruled that a question is pertinent, and a defendant claiming that a question was not pertinent would have to bring forth evidence to show that it was not.

In order that the full import of the amendment may be more readily understood, section 192 of the United States Code, if this amendment is approved, will read in full as follows:

"Every person who having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any joint committee established by a joint or concurrent resolution of the two Houses of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100 and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than 1 month nor more than 12 months: Provided, That for the purposes of this section any question shall be deemed pertinent unless timely objection is made thereto on the ground that such question lacks pertinency, or when such objection is made, if such question is ruled pertinent by the body conducting the hearing; and on any question of pertinency, the ruling of the presiding officer shall stand as the ruling of the body unless reversed on appeal."

LIMITATION OF PERCENTAGE OF DEPLETION ALLOWANCE FOR OIL AND GAS WELLS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. On behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Carroll] and myself, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to limit the percentage-depletion allowance for oil and gas wells to the United States, its Territories and possessions. The purpose of this bill is to repeal the depletion allowance which, I think, now is rather recklessly allowed to the producers of foreign oil, to the great disadvantage of the domestic producers of oil.

The report recently filed by myself with the Judiciary Committee on the petroleum investigation, Investigation No. 19, reads as follows:

> It is recommended that the 27½-percent depletion allowance granted petroleum producers be limited to production within the United States and its Territories.

I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Record, as part of my remarks, an extract from the report which was filed. The extract refers to depletion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the extract will be printed in the Record.

The bill (S. 2895) to limit the percentage-depletion allowance for oil and gas wells to oil and gas wells located in the United States and its Territories and possessions, introduced by Mr. O'Mahoney (for himself and Mr. Carroll), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The extract from the report presented by Mr. O'Mahoney is as follows:

[From Statement by Garith M. Nevill, assistant counsel, appendix to report]

Depletion

During the course of the oil hearings considerable testimony was developed concerning depletion allowances granted American oil companies on foreign crude production. At one point Senator Carroll developed that such costs as dry holes, terminal facilities, exploration and development, depreciation, losses, royalties, and rentals are all deductible expense items. Then, in addition, the producing companies can take a further deduction for percentage depletion based on 27½ percent of gross income.[1]

The concept of a depletion allowance or special tax deduction [2] for the exhaustion of oil and gas properties was originated in 1913 as a domestic measure aimed at obtaining greater domestic production during a period of world crisis. The history of cost and subsequently percentage depletion, shows that originally it was adopted by the Congress as a formula permitting a more rapid recovery of investment, as an inducement to obtain greater production of oil and gas at a time when foreign production by American companies was of little importance to the overall economy.

As first approved by Congress, depletion allowance on oil and gas was a tax exempt deduction from operating income granted to cover capital consumed in the operation of the oil or gas well. The capital in question was the value of the property as of March 1, 1913, or the cost, if acquired after this date. Once this capital investment had been recovered, the allowance was no longer available. In 1918, the base was enlarged to cover the value of the property at the time of the discovery or within 30 days thereafter. Then, to overcome administrative difficulties from the use of discovery value, percentage depletion was introduced in 1926. A figure of 27½ percent of gross income was selected to give approximately equal dollar deductions as had been allowed under the 1918 statute. This method, unlike the cost and discovery value methods, has no overall limit so that deductions continue as long as the property is producing income.

The effort and concern today, as it was just prior to World War I and in 1918 when the basic concept of depletion allowance on oil and gas was introduced into the tax structure, is to encourage exploration and development of new oil reserves within the continental United States to assure a safe productive capacity and supply of petroleum in time of war or national emergency. That this concept of aiding domestic production of oil and gas is the currently accepted justification for depletion allowance is borne out by Congressional action taken during World War II when percentage depletion was extended in 1942 to 3 nonmetals and in 1943 to 10 additional nonmetallic minerals. Furthermore, the 1942 and 1943 expansions of percentage depletion were limited in the enabling legislation to the period of the war emergency to encourage domestic production of minerals needed to meet wartime demands.

In February 1955, the Cabinet Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy issued a report in which the following statement is found:

"Present tax provisions on coal, oil, and gas production have been an important factor in encouraging development of energy sources at a pace about in keeping with demand. Any changes which may be proposed in the future must be analyzed in terms of their probable effect on development of domestic resources needed for economic progress and national defense as well as the fiscal and tax policies of the Government."

Although the domestic industry is finding more oil and gas than it produces, the rate of this increase in proven reserves has been declining in the past several years. Hence, as pointed out by the Cabinet Committee, every inducement should be given to encourage domestic exploration as against overseas development. This approach is clearly within past Congressional intent, as expressed in the tax legislation affecting depletion allowances and national defense considerations.

Assuming justification for the 27½-percent foreign percentage depletion allowance formula in 1926, such depletion allowance is inconsistent with the original legislation to encourage domestic discovery, since yields, costs, and producing areas are so different today from what they then were. It would seem that today percentage depletion on foreign oil gives the foreign operator a special tax advantage over the domestic producer.[3] This condition in itself could result in some inducement to an American company to select foreign development over domestic. For example, where the costs of extraction abroad are low relative to the value of the oil and gas produced, the 27½-percent depletion allowance, when translated into dollars, is much greater on the oil produced than when applied to high-cost domestic production. The amount of the deduction, under the present law, cannot exceed 50 percent of net in any one year. This may result in the domestic producer not being able to take advantage of the full 27½-percent depletion allowance unlike the low-cost foreign producer who is not apt to be affected by this 50-percent limitation. A high net return possible on low-cost Middle East production could result in a much greater dollar allowance on a barrel-for-barrel basis to the producing company than would be possible under a lower net return realized on high-cost domestic oil.

Mr. W. A. Delaney at one point in his testimony compared an average daily production per well in Oklahoma of 9 barrels with that of Kuwait of around 7,600 barrels.[4] There is a tremendous dollar advantage of percentage depletion allowance of Kuwait production as compared to Oklahoma. Thus, foreign depletion has the effect of needlessly widening the profit spread between domestic and foreign oil. This increases the commercial advantage of importing, thus further limiting the domestic market.

As the domestic market is cut back the cost of the reduced production is increased on a per barrel basis. Mr. Delaney, when describing in his testimony such costs, stated:

"The cost of producing oil is related to the number of barrels of oil produced over the man-hours involved plus the cost of material and supplies that are required to furnish and service the wells."[5]

The present system of percentage depletion conceived to increase domestic exploration and production is actually weighted in favor of foreign investment. Full depletion allowance on foreign production results in increased exploration for foreign oil. As foreign production is increased, the economic survival of the small, independent domestic producer is further jeopardized by loss of both domestic and foreign markets. Mr. Whiteford of Gulf Oil, during his appearance before this subcommittee, testified that:

"No country develops oil reserves except to the extent that it may have prospective markets." [6]

Subsidized foreign oil is one of the most direct of all ways to reduce market prospects for the domestic product.

As pointed out above, the economic defense of generous percentage depletion results from national policy to provide an incentive or subsidy for certain selected minerals for reasons of national defense and domestic economic advancement. The incentive value of percentage depletion for domestic production of oil and gas has been blunted by extending the favors to all the world, thus defeating the original concept. At one point in the record Senator KEFAUVER elicited a statement from Mr. Rathbone, of Jersey, that foreign operations were much more profitable than domestic but cost savings on foreign production could not be passed on to the domestic consumer without putting domestic independents out of business. Mr. Rathbone stated that domestic producers are not in a sound economic position:

"He has not been so far the last several years, and the evidence on that, I believe, is indisputable. It is perfectly true that profits from our foreign operations * * * are very large and, as I said to you, I certainly would not want in any way to ever be accused of trying to utilize profits from foreign operations to destroy anything in the United States."

If the consumer cannot obtain the foreign product at a lower price [7] and the domestic industry is endangered by a restriction of markets,, why should the taxpayer be asked to continue to subsidize foreign production only to make profits for the foreign operator?

A discontinuance of foreign depletion would, at least in the short run, result in the payment of more tax dollars to the United States Treasury. A tabulation placed in the record by Aramco during the hearings [8] shows that on the present tax base the United States Treasury would obtain from Aramco $61 million plus in 1955 and an estimated $63 million plus in 1956 if the foreign depletion allowance was removed from the tax statutes. The schedule submitted by Aramco is as follows:

SCHEDULE II.—Effect of percentage depletion on aggregate United States taxes

[Thousands of dollars]

	1955	1956 estimated
1. Taxable net income	339, 831	353, 178
2. Percentage depletion	148, 167	152, 006
3. Taxable net income without percentage depletion	487, 998	505, 184
4. United States income tax without percentage depletion	61, 010	63, 233

For the above reasons, it is suggested that this subcommittee may wish to recommend that the 27½ percent depletion allowance granted petroleum producers be limited to production within the United States and its Territories.

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT RELATING TO ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend section 132 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, relating to Congressional adjournment. The bill is identical to one which I introduced on August 2, 1955, the purpose of which was to end the midsummer madness in which we indulge at almost every session of the Congress. The purpose of the bill was to enable the Congress to adjourn during the heat of summer, and return later in the fall.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the remarks which I made on August 2, 1955.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the remarks will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2904) to amend section 132 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, relating to Congressional adjournment, introduced by Mr. O'MAHONEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The remarks presented by Mr. O'MAHONEY are as follows:

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT RELATING TO ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Legislative Reorganization Act, in the hope that it may afford the Committee on Rules and Administration in the next session an opportunity to bring an end to this midsummer madness in which we indulge about this time every session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2752) to amend section 132 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, relating to Congressional adjournment, introduced by Mr. O'MAHONEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

LET US END THIS MIDSUMMER MADNESS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The logjam in which this session of Congress is coming to an end dramatically illustrates the necessity for an amendment of the Legislative Reorganization Act which requires adjournment on July 31. Although this is a requirement which is more honored in the breach than in the observance, and although the leadership has made every effort to complete the work of Congress in an orderly manner, the plain fact is that the work is not completed and cannot be completed when so many Members of Congress are in a rush to go to Russia, to Europe, to Asia, and sometimes home. The acting majority leader [Mr. Clements] has been particularly effective, but procedural reform is overdue.

The result of the present system is that the advocates of immensely important legislation are clamoring for last-minute action and seeking to push through bills even though the Members as a whole, including even the members of the committees to which the bills are assigned, have not had the opportunity to read the measures or the reports thereon which have been hastily prepared.

The sad fact is that this method of legislating can only result in undermining the legislative powers of Congress. We have more business affecting everybody in the Nation than ever before in history. Witness, for example, the housing bill. This program was initiated during the Roosevelt-Truman administrations. It has been adopted by President Eisenhower. It is opposed by substantial numbers of his own party. The House, in order to effect a compromise, struck all public housing from the bill. The conference restored 45,000 units of the 135,000 President Eisenhower wanted. The Wherry housing law, which allowed private construction of dwellings at airbases and military stations of all kinds, has been repealed, and all of this has been transferred to the Department of Defense. Members of the Armed Services Committee themselves were doubtful of the wisdom of the change.

Whatever may be the merits about this measure, it illustrates the haste in which legislation is being pushed through in the last days of a midsummer session, when, because of the heat, Members are physically worn out by prolonged sessions of both the committees and the two Houses. It may truthfully be called a midsummer's madness, for neither the committees nor either House can properly legislate in the atmosphere which here exists.

The theory of the Legislative Reorganization Act was that committees should never be permitted to meet during a session of either House. They have been meeting day and night during these closing sessions.

The remedy is to revise the Legislative Reorganization Act so that Congress may recess during the hot summer days and Members may take their vacations in their homes or wherever the essential investigatory duty of Congress calls. I am, therefore, introducing a bill to amend the law by providing that both Houses shall be in recess from the middle of July to the second Monday in September of each year unless otherwise provided by Congress. This would eliminate the mad rush in the heat of July and August, and would enable Congress to give intelligent and orderly attention to the legislation before it during the fall, with ample time to adjourn for Christmas.

I hope the Committee on Rules and Administration in the next session will hold hearings on this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That (a), section 132, of the Legislative Reorganization Act is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 132. The two Houses of Congress shall be in recess during the period beginning on July 15 and ending on the second Monday in September, in each year, unless otherwise provided by the Congress.'

"(b) The amendment made by this act shall be effective beginning with the 2d session of the 84th Congress."

HEADQUARTERS SITE FOR MOUNT RAINIER NATIONAL PARK

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, and my colleague, the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to provide a headquarters site for Mount Rainier National Park in the general vicinity of Ashford, Wash. The transfer of the National Park Service headquarters from Longmire to Ashford, just outside the park, is part of the National Park Service's mission 66 plans for Mount Rainier National Park.

It is necessitated by the fact that the present headquarters site and equipment storage area at Longmire is subject to annual flooding, and that the condition of buildings at the existing headquarters is such that they will very soon have to be replaced.

The Park Service has advised us that the cost of replacing the existing buildings at their present location and providing adequate protection against spring floods will be at least as costly as moving the headquarters outside the park where not only will the headquarters be free from flood threat, but also it will be comparatively free from heavy snow.

ing the summer season when the flood

The move also will enable the Park Service to turn the existing headquarters site at Longmire into a picnic area dur- threat each year has ended, thus making available a badly needed additional large picnic area.

The purpose of introducing this proposed legislation at this time is so that the Congress may act on it early in the next session and the Park Service may have authority to acquire the land it requires for its new headquarters before the land is taken for other purposes or before the land value increases greatly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2905) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to provide a headquarters site for Mount Rainier National Park in the general vicinity of Ashford, Wash., and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON (for himself and Mr. JACKSON), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PROPOSED RAILROAD EQUIPMENT ADMINISTRATION ACT

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to create a governmental agency for financing railroad equipment. I ask unanimous consent that a statement, prepared by me, relating to the bill, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2906) to provide for the increase, modernization, and stockpiling of railroad equipment in order to meet the needs of the commerce of the United States, of the postal service, and of the national defense; to create and establish a public agency with powers to carry out the provisions of this act; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. FREAR, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce

The statement presented by Mr. FREAR is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR FREAR—PROPOSAL COVERING CREATION OF GOVERNMENTAL AGENCY FOR FINANCING RAILROAD EQUIPMENT

PLAN

1. A new Government agency shall be created, to be known as the Railway Equipment Agency, or with some similar nomenclature, with initial capital of $500 million, with the understanding that more will be advanced by the Government from time to time as may be needed.

2. The railroads shall have the right to apply to this Equipment Agency for long-term net leases for such new equipment as they may desire. The exact length of such leases shall be on the same basis for all companies, but shall be varied in term, taking into consideration, the true economic life of the type of equipment in question. For example, diesels probably should be leased for 15 years and freight cars for 20 years, and passenger equipment perhaps on a 10-year basis.

3. The basic rental shall be determined in accordance with the following principles:

(a) During the term of the lease, the rental shall be sufficient to completely amortize the cost of the equipment, less the estimated scrap value of the equipment at present-day prices.

(b) The interest factor shall be one-quarter of 1 percent above the estimated cost of money to the Agency for the length of period involved.

(c) Interest shall be calculated on the declining balance with respect to that portion of the cost which is amortized, and on a straight line basis with respect to the portion that is not amortized, that is, estimated scrap value.

(d) The rental shall be absolutely net and all repairs of whatsoever nature shall be made by the leasing railroad.

4. The agency shall have the right to borrow up to four times its capital; in other words, up to 80 percent of the cost of the equipment. At the end of the lease for any equipment, the governmental body having control over the stockpiling of strategic materials for national-defense purposes shall have the option of purchasing any equipment it desires from the transportation agency at the fair value of the equipment, to be determined at that time. Any equipment not thus purchased for stockpiling for defense purposes shall be sold for scrap by the transportation agency, with the proceeds recaptured by the transportation agency.

5. Any lessee, subject to the approval of the Equipment Agency, may assign its lease to any other railroad in the event it no longer has a demand for the equipment, but in no event shall the new lessee receive a lease other than for the balance of the period remaining to the original lessee. Also, in the event that any lessee defaults under the terms of its lease, the Equipment Agency may recapture the equipment and re-lease it to another railroad for the remaining balance of the term, but in no event for a longer period.

6. In the event there are more applications for equipment than can be handled expeditiously (this is particularly likely to be true not only at the outset but in the event of emergencies or in periods of an upsurge in traffic), the principle of allocation shall apply.

ADVANTAGES OF PLAN

A. From the standpoint of the Government:

1. The plan as outlined will not cost the Government anything, as contrasted to the subsidies handed out to other segments of the transportation industry. In addition, it is probable that the one-fourth of 1 percent interest differential, plus the differential between the current estimated scrap value and the ultimate scrap value or proceeds realized from sale to the Government stockpiling agency, should be sufficient to pay the costs of administration, give the Government a return on its funds, and ultimately the return of its initial capital.

2. The Government will be assured that the railroad industry will be maintained in first-class condition, prepared for any emergency, and with adequate capacity.

3. The Government will have an opportunity to stockpile a substantial amount of equipment against a war emergency at a relatively low cost.

4. The Government will be assured of protection of the capacity of the railway equipment industry, so vital in the event of an emergency.

5. Maintenance of the physical condition of the railroads at a high level will serve as a stimulant to the peacetime economy and should bring in additional revenues in the form of income.

B. From the standpoint of the railroad industry:

1. It should be possible for the railroad industry to put its entire plant in first-class condition without damaging its credit. This is true not only with respect to rolling stock but road as well, since funds thus released from the equipment budget will be available for modernization of yards, signal control, and the roadway generally.

2. Such a program should make it possible for the industry to expand its capacity, thus insuring its participation in the expanding economy and stimulating the latter by providing a modern, efficient, low-cost transportation system to serve its needs properly, and also further aiding the economy through its increased purchases, and on a more regularized basis, from the whole railroad equipment industry.

3. With a modernized, efficient plant, the industry should operate more efficiently, thereby keeping costs of transportation at the lowest practicable level and at the same time earning profits.

4. As a result of the Government agency placing the orders for much of the equipment, a far greater degree of standardization of equipment should be possible, thus reducing the overall cost of equipment and thus holding down the cost of transportation.

5. Through the program outlined, the railway equipment industry should be able to put its production on much more of a mass-production basis, expand its capacity and strengthen its position.

6. If the Government finds itself in the position of leasing equipment to the railroads, then obviously, because of its financial stake in the railroad industry, it will naturally have an interest in the railroads' welfare.

7. This plan embraces the principle of the user paying full cost for Government services rendered. Therefore, if it goes through, it should strikingly point up by comparison the fact that certain other segments of the transportation industry are not paying their way.

8. By virtue of the fact that the proposed lease arrangement would be with a Government agency rather than a private corporation, all tax questions are automatically resolved. The lease arrangement would provide what is tantamount to realistic depreciation geared to the actual econmic life of the equipment. Of course, in this connection we would get the depreciation in the form of tax deductible rental.

9. An additional objection to the present pattern of leasing equipment from a private corporation is that it is costly by reason of the loss of the residual value. Under this plan the railroad at least gets credit for the estimated scrap value of the equipment.

C. From the standpoint of the public:

1. The public in general, both individually and through industries, will thus be assured of the finest in low-cost mass transportation at the lowest possible cost.

2. This is adopting 100 percent the Eisenhower administration policy that industry should pay as it goes for services rendered by the Government.

Overall, the simplicity of the plan itself has much to recommend it, together with one other important fact, namely, that it is possible to work it out on a completely voluntary basis. It is not necessary for all railroads in the industry to approve of the plan or to participate in it, but it would be available to all, and over a period of time it would appear almost a certainty that the industry as a whole would utilize it.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1957

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide assistance to communities, industries, business enterprises, and individuals to facilitate adjustments made necessary by the trade policy of the United States. I ask unanimous consent that a statement, prepared by me, relating to the bill, be printed in the Record.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the Record.

The bill (S. 2907) to provide assistance to communities, industries, business enterprises, and individuals to facilitate adjustments made necessary by the trade policy of the United States, introduced by Mr. Kennedy, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The statement presented by Mr. Kennedy is as follows:

Statement by Senator Kennedy

The reciprocal trade agreements which this country has maintained with other nations have always had my fullest support. It is evident that if the United States is to carry out its role of world leadership, economically as well as politically, the lowering of tariff barriers must be systematically pursued.

At the same time, it is unfair to expect a certain few industries in this country to bear the brunt of our international trade policies. The sudden economic reversal which these industries suffer is the result of governmental action in lowering tariffs. It is therefore the responsibility of the Government to at least lighten the blow.

When imports reach the peril point and threaten domestic industry, great pressure is brought to bear upon the Federal Tariff Commission and upon the President to restore tariffs or impose quotas. It is my belief that the President should be provided with another alternative—namely, to assist the businesses, individuals, and communities affected to convert to new areas of production.

A bill which I am introducing today, to be known as the Trade Adjustment Act of 1957, would afford the Federal Government a means of helping businesses and individuals to help themselves. Briefly, it would extend for a limited period of time such help as the Federal Government is able to render to retrain individuals to new jobs, render technical and financial assistance for conversion of plants to other items of production, and assist communities in their efforts to attract new types of industry.

This proposed legislation would be triggered by the invoking of the escape clause of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1951. When the Tariff Commission recommended to the President that a particular industry was being seriously affected, the President could either restore tariffs, impose quotas, or do nothing. In the latter event, he would turn the case over to a Trade Adjustment Board which would invoke the provisions of this act to aid the injured parties.

The Board would determine whether the benefits applicable should be extended to the business, worker, or community organization applying.

What type of assistance could the Government extend? For a company, the Government could give technical assistance to determine what new lines of production would be profitable; rapid amortization benefits for building new plants; or loans through the Small Business Administration for capitalizing new equipment. For individual workers, there would be extension of unemployment compensation to supplement that provided by the State; eligibility for social security at age 60; and for workers young enough to be retrained to new jobs, assistance for a limited period of retraining. For community redevelopment corporations, there would be technical information and advice plus loans to implement their plans.

These measures were first recommended by the so-called Bell Commission, which was set up to study trade and tariff policy and made its report to the President in 1953. The Commission was organized under the able leadership of Daniel W. Bell, president of the American Security and Trust Co., of Washington, D. C. The Commission concluded that while there was no basis for compensating industries for lost trade in a free-enterprise system, there is good reason for helping industries faced with keener import competition to adjust their production to a more diversified line of products which they can produce without the need of tariffs. United Steelworkers President David J. McDonald, a leading member of the so-called Randall Commission which reported on foreign economic policy in 1954, endorsed this proposal. He pointed out that unemployment of any magnitude is of concern to the Government and that unemployment caused by Government action, as in the lowering of tariffs, should be of particular concern to the Government.

If all the industries affected by lowered tariffs were located in industrial centers where workers could find new jobs on their own, the problem would not be so severe. Unfortunately, many of these plants are located in small towns or one-industry communities where dislocated workers cannot find new work. Retraining to new skills will be of great help to the younger workers. For those 60 and over, new jobs are almost impossible to find as anyone who has faced the problems of the senior workers knows only too well. The Government, when it is responsible for their unemployment, has an obligation to see that they are adequately provided for. The provision to make them eligible for social security at 60 would accomplish this.

The effectiveness of community redevelopment corporations, when they can muster enough resources, has been demonstrated in my home State of Massachusetts (Lawrence, Mass.).

But these redevelopment corporations, particularly in today's tight-money market, are hard put to borrow the necessary funds without help from the Federal Government.

It must be emphasized that this bill creates no new bureaucracy. The services for the large part already exist in scattered agencies. Rather, this bill provides a coordinating board, made up of officials within these agencies, to direct toward tariff adjustment relief whatever capacities lie within the Federal Government. The services within the Labor Department, the Department of Commerce, and the Small Business Administration, for instance, would be coordinated and stepped up, utilizing existing personnel and technical facilities. The costs would thus be minimal; but the benefits to the economy in preventing unemployment and wastage of industrial equipment and manpower, would be considerable.

The intent of Congress, in writing reciprocal trade legislation, was clearly to prevent ruinous competition to any one industry from import trade. Inclusion of "peril point" and "escape clause provisions," authorizing increased tariffs or quotas when an industry is seriously threatened, makes that clear. But to date, out of 82 applications for relief by "injured" parties, the Tariff Commission recommended 25 for approval, but only 7 have been granted by the President—fur felt hats, hatter's fur, dried figs, alsike clover seed, watches, bicycles and toweling. I am not berating the reluctance to use the escape clause; the President should not, of course, use the "escape clause" too liberally if we are to be consistent in our stated objective of gradually reducing trade barriers throughout the world. I only point out that as far as providing relief for affected industries it has been of very little utility.

It is our hope in presenting this bill that the President will be given an instrument whereby our trade policies can be vigorously pursued, and at the same time whatever detrimental effects may result within our own boundaries can be spread over the whole economy. The whole economy benefits from freer trade. The whole economy, then, and not individual businesses and workers should help bear the burden of the transition of trade policies.

This measure would make the most of American industry's demonstrated flexibility. The rapid conversion and reconversion of plants in World War II showed the resiliency of our industry. But this was not accomplished without substantial Government assistance and governmental measures to make the transitions more smooth. It is particularly true of small industries that assistance is required during the conversion period.

In a free enterprise system, businesses and workers must be prepared to accept dislocations which result from changes in the market, new technology, or changing tastes. But when their dislocation is caused by governmental action, the Government cannot ignore its responsibility to help industries, workers and communities adjust to the new economic conditions.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A GREAT PLAINS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, a distinguished Colorado publisher and veteran newspaperman, who is also the State chairman of the Democratic Party of Colorado, Mr. Fred Betz, has been serving, at a great personal sacrifice, as my administrative assistant during the past 8 months. It is appropriate at this time that I commend Mr. Betz for the extraordinary, selfless, and invaluable service he has rendered me. I am grateful to him for many things, but especially am I grateful for the dogged attention he gave one of the most critical natural problems of our region—the recurrent drought cycle in the Great Plains. Largely through Mr. Betz' creative efforts and his diligent research, I am now about to introduce a bill to establish a Great Plains Administration. This bill is designed to furnish an instrumentality with which the people of the semiarid areas of the Great Plains may constantly study, assess, and review the programs now in operation, programs established to meet the recurrent drought cycle. This bill is concerned with drought control and flood control.

I especially call the attention of the Members of the Senate, and also the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives, to this important piece of proposed legislation, because it has a broad concept embracing hundreds of counties located in 10 States of the Great Plains region.

Over 20 years ago, a very great President, the late Franklin D. Roosevelt, began to take steps to treat seriously the problem of recurrent drought in the Great Plains area. On July 22, 1936, President Roosevelt appointed a Great Plains Drought Area Committee to carry on a study looking toward the most efficient utilization of the natural resources of the Great Plains area. On February 10, 1937, he transmitted to the Congress the report of the committee, entitled "The Future of the Great Plains." President Roosevelt also recommended the establishment of a Great Plains territorial agency.

Early this year the present President of the United States, Dwight D. Eisenhower, made an airplane trip to that great Middle Western area of this Nation. He, too, recognized and acknowledged the importance of meeting the challenging problems which affect the Great Plains.

Mr. President, as a result of months of work, during which contacts have been made with numerous farmers, scientists, educators, and agricultural leaders in the Great Plains States, and after we had assembled the recommendations from noted farm authors and others who have lived with and studied the problems indigenous to the Great Plains region, we have drafted a comprehensive Great Plains bill.

I now introduce the Great Plains bill, and ask that this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Works. I also ask that a statement I have prepared describing the purpose of the bill, together with a section-by-section analysis of it, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and will be appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Works.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inform the Senator from Colorado that the reference to the bill is for the Chair to decide, after consultation with the Parliamentarian.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. President, before I made the request, I conferred with the Parliamentarian.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well; the bill will be received and referred to the Committee on Public Works; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2908) to establish a Great Plains Administration; to provide for the control of floods and the alleviation and control of drought conditions in the Great Plains region; to provide for the more effective conservation, development, and use of the resources of the Great Plains; to provide for the administration of Federal programs in such region so as to meet more effectively the distinctive needs and problems of the region; and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. Carroll, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.

FINDINGS AND DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 3. (a) The Congress hereby finds—

(1) the Great Plains region has distinctive characteristics in respect of climate, topography, and resource use which are substantially different from those prevailing in adjacent regions, and which are particularly marked by alternating extremes of floods and drought;

(2) these characteristics are of fundamental importance in shaping living and employment conditions within the region and in fixing the pattern of its economy and its culture;

(3) these special characteristics require special plans and programs to meet the distinctive needs and problems of the region;

(4) these plans and programs must be developed and carried out on a comprehensive basis to meet the needs of the region and its people as a whole;

(5) heretofore there have been no adequate means for developing and administering the special plans and programs which are required to meet the distinctive needs of the region; and the lack of such plans and programs has resulted in a failure to use the resources of the region most advantageously, and particularly has contributed to the excessive damage from recurring flood and drought conditions within the region;

(6) excessive damage which has resulted from recurring disasters from both floods and drought in the past has cost the region and the Nation far more than would adequate and comprehensive measures to prevent and control such damage.

(7) the development and carrying out of comprehensive plans and programs designed especially to enable the region to meet the special needs and problems arising from its distinctive characteristics in respect of climate, topography, resources, and economic and living conditions will increase the prosperity of the region, will promote the general welfare of its inhabitants, will conserve its resources, will foster trade and commerce among the States within the region and between these States and other States as well as foreign countries, will increase the revenues of and strengthen State and local governments within the region, and will contribute to the economic strength, well-being, and defense of the Nation.

(8) the first and most urgent phase of plans and programs for the region should be directed especially toward the alleviation of and relief from conditions resulting from the devastating floods and the extreme drought, both of which have recently occurred or now prevail within the region.

(b) It is the purpose and policy of this Act to provide means for the development and carrying out of comprehensive plans and programs designed especially to meet the distinctive needs and problems of the Great Plains region; to provide for the administration of Federal programs in such region so as to meet more effectively its distinctive needs and problems; to provide for the more effective conservation, development, and use of the resources of the region; to assist in improving economic conditions within the region and in promoting the general welfare of its inhabitants; and especially to provide for the alleviation and control of flood and drought conditions in the region. It is the policy of this Act to attain these objectives (1) in a manner which will encourage people within the region to engage in agriculture and other pursuits in a manner properly adapted to the distinctive conditions of the region, and (2) in a manner which will foster suitable development and support for urban communities and trading centers within the region and adequate to meet its needs. It is the policy of this Act that its objectives shall be carried out with the fullest possible participation by the people of the region and by their State and local governments.

(c) The Congress finds that the purposes and policies of this Act can best be accomplished by establishing a regional agency of the Federal Government, to be located in the region, which will devote its full time and attention to plans and programs for meeting the distinctive needs and problems of the Great Plains.

GREAT PLAINS ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 4. (a) To assist in carrying out the purposes of this Act, there is hereby created a body corporate which shall be known as the "Great Plains Administration" (referred to in this Act as the "Administration") and which shall be an instrumentality of the United States.

(b) The Administration shall maintain its principal office at a convenient place in the region.

(c) The Administration shall be held to be an inhabitant and resident, within the meaning of the laws of the United States relating to the venue of civil suits, of any judicial district, in whole or in part, within the region in which the Administration carries on activities at the time of the commencement of suit: Provided, That the Administration may be sued in the district court of the United States for any such district without regard to the amount in controversy. Any proceeding brought against the Administration in a court of any State may be removed by the Administration to the district court of the United States for the district in which such proceeding is pending, and, to effect such removal, it shall not be necessary that any other party or parties defendant join in the petition for removal.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS

SEC. 5. (a) The management of the Administration shall be vested in a board of five full-time Directors, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Chairman of the Board shall be designated by the President. Each of the Directors shall be a bona fide resident of the region at the time of appointment, and each Director shall maintain his residence in the region. No two Directors shall be appointed from the same State to serve on the Board at the same time. Not more than three Directors shall be members of the same political party. The Board shall be responsible for policy, directive, and general supervisory functions. The Board shall appoint a chief executive officer who shall be responsible to the Board and shall perform such functions as the Board may determine.

(b) The terms of office of the Directors first taking office after the enactment of this Act shall expire as designated by the President at the time of nomination, two at the end of the second year, two at the end of the fourth year, and one at the end of the sixth year after the date of enactment of this Act. A successor to a Director shall be appointed in the same manner as the original Directors and shall have a term expiring six years after the expiration date of the term for which his predecessor was appointed, except that a Director appointed to fill a vacancy in the Board occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was appointed shall be appointed for the remainder of such term.

(c) Vacancies in the Board, so long as there be two Directors in office, shall not impair the powers of the Board to act, and two Directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of the business of the Board.

(d) Each Director shall be a citizen of the United States and shall receive a salary at the rate of $20,000 a year. When required by their official duties to be away from their official headquarters, Directors may be paid their actual traveling expenses and a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence.

(e) All members of the Board shall be persons who profess a belief in the feasibility and wisdom of this Act. No Director shall, during his continuance in office, be engaged in any other business.

(f) In December of each year, the Board shall submit to the Congress a report covering the activities of the Administration during the preceding fiscal year.

STATE AND LOCAL PARTICIPATION

SEC. 6. (a) The Administration shall seek the advice, assistance, and participation of the people of the region and their State and local governments and organizations, public and private, to the fullest practicable extent, in the formulation and execution of programs designed to carry out the purposes of this Act. To this end, the Administration shall make arrangements for consultation and interchange of views with appropriate representatives of State and local governments, of the educational, agricultural, labor, and business interests, and of the general public of the region. The Administration shall make arrangements for such consultation and interchange of views with respect to all phases of its activities and at all appropriate places throughout the region, and shall establish such advisory boards and councils as may be necessary or appropriate to achieve the objectives of this section. Any advisory board or council may submit for inclusion in the annual report of the Board its comments in summary form on those policies of the Administration with which it is concerned, and such comments or a summary thereof shall be included in the annual report. For the periods during which they consult with the Administration away from their regular places of work, such representatives and members of such boards and councils may, in the discretion of the Administration, receive their actual traveling expenses and a per diem allowance in lieu of subsistence.

(b) The Administration shall furnish to interested individuals, groups, organizations, and enterprises within the region any technical information, research, or other forms of assistance, information, or advice which are obtainable from the various departments, agencies, and instrumentalities of the Federal Government and which would be useful in carrying out the purposes and policies of this Act.

(c) The Administration is authorized to provide technical assistance to State and local governments, and other groups and organizations, within the region to assist in accomplishing the purposes and policies of this Act. Such assistance shall include studies evaluating the needs of, and developing potentialities for, the economic and cultural growth of the localities within the region. Such assistance may be provided by the Administration through members of its staff or through the employment of private individuals, partnerships, firms, corporations, or suitable institutions, under contracts entered into for such purpose.

(b) Such plans and programs shall, among other things, provide for—

(1) the control of floods and the conservation and use of the waters of the region;

(6) the conservation, management, and rehabilitation of birds, fish, and other wildlife through the development, protection, and management of such wildlife and their habitat, and the control of losses from disease or other causes;

(7) with special regard for depletable resources and for the great fluctuations that are characteristic of the region, fostering the use of the mineral, forest land, water, fish, and other resources of the region, and fostering other projects and activities and the development of industries, to assure a balanced and stable economic development, and to preserve and enhance social and cultural values;

(8) fostering the study of the region's problems by its citizens and the dissemination of the results of such study;

(9) the establishment and maintenance of recreational areas and facilities, including wilderness areas, and the protection of scenic and scientific values.

(c) Such plans and programs shall, among other things, set forth—

(1) the nature, extent, general location, sequence, and timing of major projects and activities recommended;

(2) the method by which such major projects and activities are proposed to be undertaken, including the arrangements recommended or agreed to for joint and cooperative action by the Administration, other Federal agencies, and State, local, and other agencies;

(3) with respect to each major proposed Federal project or activity, information as to the economic aspects and effects of such project or activity, including, where appropriate, estimates of costs and benefits, of the allocation of costs to the various purposes to be served, and of amounts to be repaid by the beneficiaries.

(d) The Administration shall, in cooperation with other Federal agencies concerned, prepare and submit annually to the President in connection with its budget program, and to the Congress in its annual report, a statement and explanation of the anticipated program, for the next succeeding fiscal year and such ensuing periods as the Administration may determine, for the initiation and prosecution by the Administration and other Federal agencies of all major Federal projects and activities having to do with the conservation, development, and use of the natural resources of the region, or otherwise affecting the purposes of this Act.

The Administration is authorized to use its funds in carrying out such joint and cooperative arrangements. Departments and agencies of the United States are hereby authorized to participate in the construction or operation of such projects or the conduct of such activities on terms mutually agreeable to the department or agency involved and the Administration.

(e) The Administration shall carry out its construction work by contract so far as practicable: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prevent the Administration from undertaking construction work directly in case of emergency or unusual circumstances, in cases where no reasonable bids are received from contractors, or where necessary to provide steady employment for maintenance crews.

(f) Title to all property, with the exception of that owned by the United States and entrusted to the Administration as agent of the United States, shall be taken in the name of the Administration: Provided, That the title to real property acquired in the name of the Administration shall be subject to approval by the Attorney General, but the Administration may prior to approval of title by the Attorney General use such property for any purpose or in any manner permitted by the provisions of this Act. PAYMENTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

SEC. 11. (a) It is the policy of this Act that the finances of the State governments and subdivisions thereof shall not be impaired through the removal of taxable property from their tax rolls or through the creation of special requirements for State and local government services. In administering this section the Administration shall be guided by the general objective of avoiding, insofar as feasible, inequities between State and local taxpayers on the one hand, and Federal taxpayers on the other, in the distribution of governmental costs and burdens.

(b) The Administration, upon application made on behalf of any State or subdivision thereof, shall make payments in lieu of State and local property taxes ad valorem with respect to its real property and its tangible personal property with fixed situs: Provided, however, That such payments shall not be made with respect to property, or any improvements thereon, which has never been subject to such taxes, unless the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof has been required, prior to the acquisition of such property by the Administration, under any statute, or agreement authorized by any statute, to make payments in lieu of taxes thereon or to pay any portion of the revenue derived therefrom or from its use or products, in which case payments as required by this section shall be made on such property, but not on any improvements thereon made subsequent to acquisition by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof. In determining the amount of any payment to a State or subdivision thereof, the Administration shall be guided by (1) the average amount of such taxes, if any, levied upon the property in the last two years during which the property was privately owned; (2) the current level of property tax rates and assessed valuations; (3) the average amount of the last two annual payments, if any, under the provisions of any statute, or agreement authorized by any statute, previously applicable, which required the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof to make any payments in lieu of taxes thereon or to pay any portion of the revenue derived therefrom or from its use or products; (4) the amount of increases in taxable values and other benefits arising from the activities of the Administration; (5) the special requirements for State and local government services arising from the activities of the Administration; (6) the provision by the Administration, as an incident to its activities, of any services usually provided by State or local governments; and (7) any other relevant facts.

The payments provided for in this section shall be paid to the respective officers or agencies of the taxing authorities to which taxes would be paid had the property remained in private ownership, or to which payments would be made pursuant to law except for enactment of this Act, for distribution in the same manner and in the same proportions as the taxes or other payments in lieu of which the payments herein required are made or in such other manner or proportion as may be determined pursuant to State law.

(c) The Administration may make payments to State or local governments to help defray the expense of any special requirements for State and local government services arising from the activities of the Administration. In determining the necessity for and amount of any such payment, the Administration shall take into account (1) the amount of additional expense incurred by the State or local government in meeting these special requirements, (2) any payments in lieu of taxes made pursuant to paragraph (b) hereof, (3) the provision by the Administration, as an incident to its activities, of any services usually provided by State or local governments, and (4) any other relevant facts.

(d) The provisions of any other statute requiring the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof to make any payments in lieu of taxes on property or improvements thereon, or to pay any portion of the revenue derived from such property, or its use or products, shall be inapplicable to any property or activities of the Administration after the date of acquisition of such property by the Administration.

(e) For the purposes of this section, property owned or acquired by the United States and used or held by the Administration shall be deemed to have been acquired by the Administration.

(f) The payments authorized under this section are in lieu of taxation and the Administration, its property, franchises, and income are hereby expressly exempted from taxation in any manner or form by any State, county, municipality, or any subdivision or district thereof. The determination by the Administration of the necessity of making any payments under this section and of the amounts thereof shall be final.

(g) The Administration shall, not later than five years after the enactment of this Act, submit to the Congress a report on the operation of the provisions of this section, including (1) a statement of the amount and distribution of payments made hereunder; (2) an appraisal of the effect of the operation of the provisions of this section on State and local finances, the benefits of the program of the Administration to the States receiving payments hereunder, and the effect of such benefits in increasing taxable values within such States; and (3) such other data, information, and recommendations as may be pertinent to future legislation.

In the determination of such prevailing rate or rates, due regard shall be given to those rates which have been secured through collective agreement by representatives of employers and employees.

(f) The Administration is authorized to request the assistance and advice of any officer, agent, or employee of any executive department, independent office, or agency of the United States to enable the Administration the better to carry out its powers successfully. The statement presented by Mr. CARROLL is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CARROLL—SUMMARY OF GREAT PLAINS ADMINISTRATION BILL

PURPOSE

The purpose of this bill is to provide regional plans and policies and a regional agency of the Federal Government to deal with the distinctive problems of the Great Plains.

The people of the Great Plains have been caught in the grip of devastating floods and drought from time to time. Floods and drought are the result of the forces of nature, but much of the damage is the result of the shortsightedness of man. We may not be able to prevent floods and drought, but we can do a much better job of preparing for them. Indeed we can and we must do a much better job of utilizing the resources of the Plains in normal times as well as times of extreme weather conditions.

The fact is that the Plains area is different from other parts of the country and requires different treatment. There is rarely enough water, although the shortage is worse at some times than at others. Then at other times the region is swept by terrible floods. Life in the Plains and the use of their resources have to be adapted to control floods and to make the most of the rainfall in the years when it comes and to hold down the damage in years of drought. It is possible to do this, but it will require foresight and intelligent planning for the future. That is what this bill is designed to provide.

In the past, the Great Plains region has never had the kind of planning that is necessary to meet the special problems arising from its varying and normally semi-arid climate. Instead, the region has been dominated by policies and customs framed to meet the needs of more humid areas, which are quite different. The result has been a tragic waste of both human and natural resources. Disaster has struck the Plains time and again, and the people have been prepared neither to prevent it nor to weather it. The havoc of the recent drought and floods is only the latest example.

It is only common sense to develop plans which will prevent such excessive waste in the future. These plans must be properly adapted to the region's semi-arid and unpredictable climate, because it is this distinctive climate which largely determines the living conditions and the economic status of the people who live in the Great Plains region.

The reasons for failure to develop programs adapted to the special needs of the Plains are many. Basically, the difficulty stems from the fact that no one has felt the primary responsibility for developing such programs. In a sense, the Plains areas have been in the position of stepchildren. The reasons for this are in large part geographical.

The Great Plains region consists of a part of 10 different States (North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana). In each case, it is a sparsely inhabited part of the State, containing a minority of the population. The area does not contain a single State capital, a single State university, and only one State agricultural college. It contains no large cities and few medium sized ones. It simply has not been the prime interest and the first concern of the instruments of either State or Federal governments. When this fact is coupled with the additional fact that the needs of the region are quite distinctive and different from those of other areas, it can be seen why the special programs required for the best use of the plain's resources have not been developed.

It is true that the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior have taken some steps to adapt their programs to the conditions of the Great Plains. And the Great Plains Council has provided a measure of coordination among the agencies concerned with the problems of the Plains. However, this machinery has not proved adequate to provide the really concentrated and comprehensive attack on the special problems of the Plains which the circumstances require.

While the special needs and problems of the Plains portion of each State are quite different from those of the other portion of the same State, they are very similar to those of the Plains portions of the other States. This very strongly indicates that the sensible approach to these special needs and problems is a regional one covering as a whole those portions of the 10 States which comprise the Great Plains. This would in no way interfere with the jurisdiction of the States over the areas in question, but rather it would aid them in finding common solutions to common problems.

It should be noted that this bill will not interfere with the comprehensive development of the Missouri River Basin or the other river basins which contains parts of the Plains. What it will do, within the framework of the comprehensive river basin development, is to provide for the more effective treatment of the distinctive problems of the semiarid areas comprising the Plains.

The basic approach of the bill is to provide for the preparation and execution of long range plans and programs to develop the region and its resources. The primary responsibility for the Federal aspects of this task would be vested in a five-man Great Plains Administration ("Administration") created by the bill. This Administration would work closely wth the Senate and local governments and with private groups within the region. It would also cooperate with other Federal agencies administering programs within the region, and help to coordinate their programs so that they will be adapted to the region's special requirements. Insofar as practicable, the objective would be to have the necessary Federal programs carried out through other agencies; but the Administration would be authorized to administer programs itself when necessary to accomplish the bill's objectives.

The bill also recognizes that the most pressing problems of the Great Plains arise from the terrible drought and floods which afflict it. Accordingly, the bill provides that first priority shall be given to programs of flood and drought relief and the prevention of damage from floods and drought.

DIGEST BY SECTIONS

Section 1 contains a short title and table of contents.

Section 2 defines the geograhpical boundaries of the Great Plains region.

Section 3 contains Congressional findings that the Great Plains have distinctive characteristics in respect of climate, topography, and resource use which require special plans and programs. This section also declares the policy of Congress to provide these special plans and programs on a comprehensive regional basis.

Section 4 creates the Great Plains Administration and provides that it shall be located within the region.

Section 5 provides that the Administration shall have a bipartisan Board of five Directors, with staggered 6-year terms, all of whom must be residents of the Great Plains.

Section 6 provides for full cooperation with State and local governments, and private groups, in the administration of the bill. It also provides for furnishing them with information and technical assistance to help accomplish the purposes and policies of the bill.

Section 7 provides that the Administration shall develop plans and programs for meeting the special problems of the Plains. These plans and programs will be made available to State and local governments and private persons where appropriate, and will be submitted to the President and the Congress as a basis for guiding Federal activities within the region.

Section 8 provides that the administration shall give first priority to plans and programs for flood and drought relief and protection against future damage from floods and drought.

Section 9 contains the general powers of the Administration. These include the normal powers of Government corporations and, within the limits of future Congressional appropriations, include authority to engage in projects and activities for resource development, to acquire and dispose of property, to make conservation payments, to make loans for agricultural, industrial, and commercial purposes, to hold hearings and conduct research, to make research grants, and to disseminate information. This section also authorizes the Administration to conduct its activities through or in cooperation with other Federal agencies, State and local agencies, and private groups.

Section 10 provides for full protection of existing water rights.

Section 11 provides for payments to State and local governments in lieu of taxes with respect to property held by the Administration.

Section 12 provides that the Administration shall be subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act.

Section 13 contains personnel provisions which authorize the Administration to set up a personnel system for its employees on a merit basis comparable to the regular Federal civil service.

Section 14 authorizes the appropriation of $7,500,000 to carry out the purposes of the bill during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, and the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary to carry out such purposes thereafter.

Section 15 contains the regular separability provision.

Mr. CARROLL. The reason I have requested that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Works is that it is so comprehensive it involves flood-control programs, drought-control programs, soil-conservation programs, credit programs; it involves the whole field of agriculture and public works.

As I have stated, the purpose of the bill is to provide studies and analysis and coordination of regional plans and policies in the Great Plains area. It establishes a regional agency of the Federal Government to deal with the distinctive cyclical drought problems of the Great Plains. The history of the people of the Great Plains is a repetition of devastating floods and burning droughts. Flood and drought are the works of nature, but much of the damage is the result of the shortsightedness of man. We may not be able to prevent floods and droughts, but we can do a much better job of preparing for them.

Indeed, we can and must do a much better job of utilizing the resources of the Plains in normal times, in order that we properly prepare for the periods of extreme weather conditions.

The Great Plains region consists of parts or all of 10 different States: Colorado, Kansas, Montana, Wyoming, Oklahoma, Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, New Mexico, and Texas.

I have set forth in my statement a digest of the sections of the comprehensive bill, and I direct attention to section 9, which contains the general powers of administration. What the bill proposes is the appointment of a Great Plains Administration with a bipartisan board of five directors who will come from the area and who will be selected by the President of the United States. It is important to note that this Great Plains Administration will be located in the Great Plains region, will be directed by Great Plains residents and will devote itself solely to the problems growing out of the recurrent Great Plains drought.

Under section 14, the bill asks for a very small appropriation of $7½ million for the establishment and operation of the Great Plains Administration.

Mr. President, I make one more unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD the text of the bill, as well as the statement outlining its purposes, so all Senators, Representatives, staffs of universities, and people of the entire area may have access to it. At the beginning of the next session of Congress, I hope we shall be able to hold extensive hearings and bring before the committees of Congress distinguished authorities of the Great Plains area, including farmers, farm experts, educators, scientists from the universities, as well as authors and public leaders who have made extensive studies of this subject over many years.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 9 OF THE AIR FORCE ACADEMY ACT

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I feel compelled to introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill which, in effect, removes the $3 million authorization for the Air Force Academy Chapel previously authorized by the Senate and agreed to in conference in the consideration of H. R. 8240.

Earlier this year, the Air Force requested an additional $21,341,000 for further development of the Air Force Academy. This amount, had it been authorized, would have given the Air Force better than $147 million for its Academy. The Armed Services Committee reduced this $21 million to a sum slightly less than $10 million, but included in the amount authorized and appropriated was $3 million to construct the chapel, an edifice which, in my mind, should be more appropriately called a cathedral.

Subsequent to this action, I had occasion to see a model of the planned chapel. As I said here on the floor yesterday, I was shocked. There can be no doubt that the Air Force must have a facility for religious services at the Academy and it must have a good one, but I cannot acquiesce to the construction of one predicated on the design contemplated.

Mr. President, this bill reduces the authorization previously recommended by the Armed Services Committee and granted by the Senate and House conferees by $3 million—the amount the Air Force says it needs to construct a chapel. It is not the intent to forever deny the Air Force authorization or funds for such a facility, but rather cause that Department to withhold action until a new design predicated on good taste can again be presented to Congress.

Religious worship is an absolute necessity in our way of life and especially at military installations, and I believe it is also true that belief and faith come first. The place of worship comes second. We shall expect the Department of the Air Force to provide the opportunity for religious worship in the various faiths and to eventually construct an edifice which will do honor to these faiths.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2909) to amend section 9 of the Air Force Academy Act, introduced by Mr. STENNIS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

PREPARATION OF COMPILATION OF EDUCATIONAL MATERIAL CONCERNING COMMUNISM

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference, a bill to provide for the preparation of a compilation of educational material concerning communism, as contrasted with Americanism and for other purposes.

Our Congressional committees have produced, as is well known, a considerable body of literature in various forms dealing not only with the Communist conspiracy but also with the ideology, the objectives, and the strategy and tactics of this oldest modern form of totalitarianism.

The very profusion and total volume of Congressional productions has made it difficult for them to register in the vicinity even of a single target. The situation so far as the public mind is concerned is that the impression created is one of shots being scattered more or less at random in various directions. A carefully selected and well-edited and annotated collection of the Congressional documents bearing on the subject of communism would strengthen the hands of the Congress and enable the vast amount of time, energy, and money that various committees have expended to achieve a maximum impact in informing and educating the American people.

In addition to the need of an annotated collection from the standpoint of the general public, there is particular need of such a volume or volumes in relation to the schools of America and the growing conviction that the facts about communism and totalitarianism must be communicated to our youth as a part of the regular school curriculum. In this connection it is notable that the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania has already taken steps to institute such instruction throughout the school system and that the Senators from Pennsylvania have requested the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress to prepare an annotated bibliography for the use of pupils and teachers in Pennsylvania.

Other States have a similar program under consideration and there is a committee of prominent educators and other representative Americans called the Committee on American Education and Communism which has undertaken to foster a program of this kind throughout our country. Prof. William Yandell Elliott, of Harvard, is the chairman of this committee and Dr. Charles Wesley Lowry, chairman and executive director of the Foundation for Religious Action in the Social and Civil Order, is its secretary. A conference was held last July at the Harvard University Summer School on Teaching the Nature of Communism in the American School Curriculum. A number of superintendents of schools from various parts of the United States and several State commissioners of education were present at this conference. The headline speaker at the conference was the Honorable James B. Conant, ex-president of Harvard and former Ambassador to the Federal Republic of Germany.

PRECEDENTS

Two precedents which it may be useful to have in mind in connection with the project of an annotated collection of Congressional documents dealing with communism in theory and practice are (a) Documents of the Foundation of the Union—House Document No. 398, 69th Congress; and (b) the admirable and elaborate volume on our Federal Constitution, prepared by the Legislative Reference Service, under the direction of Dr. Edward S. Corwin, of Princeton University. In addition, it should be noted that an annotated collection, such as is proposed, would be a useful supplement to the bibliography which the Legislative Reference Service has already prepared and is about to make available at the request of the Senators from Pennsylvania.

BACKGROUND

Communism in its modern form made its appearance 109 years ago, with the publication of the Communist Manifesto. Leninism was born 60 years ago. On November 8, 1957, it will be 40 years since the Bolshevik counterrevolution in Russia.

This movement, communism, is much more than a specter haunting Europe or even our whole globe. It is a fearsome reality—a totalitarian empire which holds in its iron grip one-third of the world.

The strength of this ideology from the beginning has been that it concentrated first on intellectuals. It cannot go on to its strategy of getting hold of the masses unless it has first gained ardent and fanatical converts among potential leaders. These leaders must have the ability to handle ideas. An immediate example of this that is well worth noting is our neighbor to the south, British Guiana.

It is surely clear by now that the chief weapons which we have for meeting the challenge of communism, apart from necessary but essentially negative deterrent military power, are weapons of the mind and spirit. It is ideas which ultimately rule the world. In addition, there must be clear and full knowledge of the basic facts of our world as a whole, including the nature of communism in all its phases. The purpose of our educational system is to communicate to the youth of the land the facts and ideas necessary both for abundant living and for meeting the issues of life and death in today's dangerous world.

If this reasoning is sound, then it is most urgent that the American educational system tackle in earnest the task of teaching American youth to confront the reality of totalitarianism in its toughest, most militant form, which is communism, with the facts and values of our American heritage.

It was to meet this challenge and to do it in a practical and realistic way that the Committee on American Education and Communism was established in September 1956. The organization which was inspired to establish this special, autonomous committee was the now-well-known Foundation for Religious Action in the Social and Civil Order, an all-faith group established in 1953 with Dr. Charles Wesley Lowry as chairman and with Dr. Edward L. R. Elson, minister of the National Presbyterian Church in Washington, as cochairman. The purpose of Frasco was and is to unite men and women of all faiths in meeting with the resources of religious faith the great issues and challenges that arise in the social and civil order. It is a nonsectarian movement practical in aim, and for this reason has been able to gain wide support among leaders of all faiths.

The objectives of the Committee on American Education and Communism, headed by Dr. William Yandell Elliott and Dr. Lowry, are more limited. They are special educational objectives. These objectives are to advise and guide on an entirely voluntary basis the superintendents, principals, teachers, and school board members of our American schools and to promote in addition a general public awareness of the need for specific instruction in the facts about communism and totalitarianism in the general framework of a comparison of social and political systems in standard courses in the American school curriculum, especially at the high school and junior high school levels. It is felt also that there is a great and crying need for specific courses which will train our teachers, both those who are now teaching but do go to summer school or could be persuaded to attend institutes and workshops for credit in approved summer sessions, and the young people now in teachers colleges and other colleges preparing to be the teachers of tomorrow.

Such is the suggestive and significant background of the annotated collection of Congressional documents proposed in this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 2911) to provide for the preparation of a compilation of educational material concerning communism, as contrasted with Americanism, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION RELATING TO ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of the President and Vice President. The purpose of the proposed legislation is to amend the Constitution so that the electoral college will be abolished, while retaining the present system of electoral votes and the existing allocation of such votes to each State. Furthermore, the amendment will not change the present system of counting all of the electoral votes for the candidate who received the greatest number of votes in any State.

The proposal would also prevent the election of a President and Vice President from different political parties and retain the present provision which discourages nomination of presidential and vice-presidential candidates from the same State. In the event that no candidate receives a majority of the electoral vote, the election would be decided by a joint meeting of all Senators and Representatives voting as individuals in a public rollcall.

I commend this joint resolution to the Senate for study and consideration. Last year, the Senate considered at length various proposals to change our present electoral college system of choosing the President and Vice President of the United States. At the conclusion of this debate, the Senate returned to committees for further study the proposals which had been placed before it.

The extended and incisive debate last year showed lack of agreement on the proposals, all of which would have altered the existing balance of electoral votes among the States. I believe that the Senate can agree on the following propositions:

First. The Electoral College, a confusing and potentially dangerous anachronism, should be abolished.

Second. In presidential elections where no candidate receives a majority of the electoral votes the choice should be by the Congress as a whole, and should be by open rollcall vote, and not by secret ballot.

Third. Provision should be made to preclude election of a President and Vice President from different political parties.

It is my earnest hope that this joint resolution will be the subject of complete hearings in the near future and that it may be reported out for consideration by the Senate in the next session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of President and Vice President, introduced by Mr. KENNEDY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON SENATE BILL 1870, TO MAKE PERFORMANCES OF COPYRIGHTED MUSIC IN JUKEBOXES PUBLIC PERFORMANCES FOR PROFIT

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice with respect to Senate bill 1870—to amend section 1 (c) of title 17 of the United States Code with regard to the rendition of musical compositions on coin-operated machines, a bill now before the Congress, which amends the Copyright Act so as to make performance of copyrighted music in jukeboxes public performances for profit. A hearing will be held on the bill later in the year. The exact date of the hearing I cannot fix at the present time; but I want those who are interested in the proposed legislation—and many persons from coast to coast are interested in it—to know that the bill has not been forgotten, but that hearings will be held on it by the Judiciary Committee's Subcommittee on Patents, Trademarks, and Copyrights.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, to consider the nominations on the Executive Calendar. On the Executive Calendar there are two postmaster nominations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further reports of committees, the nominations on the calendar will be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF THE 1ST SESSION OF THE 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President later in the day, I shall have a brief statement to make on the constructive work of this 1st session of the 85th Congress. But at this time I wish to call the attention of my friends on the other side of the aisle to the fact that, at various times and upon various occasions during this session, while they have been in the minority, and with a Republican administration in the White House, the Senate has confirmed more than 44,000 nominations which have been sent to this body by the President. The Senate has just completed action on the last two nominations on the Executive Calendar.

Later in the day, I shall place in the RECORD a tabulation of the number of days the Senate has been in session, the number of hours it has been in session, the total number of measures passed, and the total number of nominations acted upon. I believe the tabulation will be extremely revealing and enlightening even to my colleagues.

Until yesterday, the Senate had been in session 846 hours, on 142 days, had passed 1,130 bills, and had acted on a little more than 44,000 nominations.

At this session the Senate has not passed as many public laws as those which have been passed during some first sessions of the Congress; but I would remind my colleagues that dozens and dozens and dozens of bills have cleared both bodies and are awaiting reports from the departments and signature by the President. I know that action will be taken at an early date, and that none of us will be disappointed in the way the President handles his duties.

THE FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is the Senate still proceeding in the morning hour?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, one of the most pressing problems which the New England economy faces involves the present predicament of our fishing industry, particularly the groundfish industry. Through the years, the industry has experienced a steady decline in terms of employment, plant facilities, fishing fleet, and annual catch. Five reasons have been assigned for the difficulties of the industry.

First, the industry is required to build its ships in this country under existing statutes. Competitor nations enjoy construction costs greatly reduced from those our industry must pay in this country. Second, all the forms of insurance which fishing-vessel owners must carry for a variety of reasons are extremely expensive, and in many cases the cost is prohibitive. Third, our industry competes with foreign industries which in almost all cases are heavily subsidized by their own governments. Fourth, some of our mutual-aid spending for the technical and economic development of friendly allies has been used to assist their fishing industries, and thereby gives them an added advantage over our own industry. Finally, for reasons of international relations and our national security, the fishing industry has twice been denied the tariff relief which, after full investigation, the Tariff Commission felt was economically completely justified.

While in many instances it might be possible to suggest that an industry proceed on its own to seek solutions to its own problems, it is difficult for the Federal Government to overlook its responsibility to the fishing industry, in view of the governmental actions which have contributed heavily to its present economic dilemma. Its economic decline in recent months has been so sharp that possible sources of credit have dried up and chances for expansion are practically nonexistent. With heavy costs of their own and with low-cost import competition, the industry has reached a point where it must have immediate assistance.

A committee was formed in New England to aid and assist the groundfish industry. The committee has made a number of recommendations. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the body of the RECORD the four points which have been suggested by the industry as possible means of Federal assistance.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FOUR RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE FISHING INDUSTRY

1. Government aid in a program aimed at equalizing the cost of vessel insurance with that of foreign competitors.
2. Long-term loan programs for shore plants for working capital, plant modernization, and expansion.
3. Government aid in a program designed to equalize cost of vessels with that of foreign competitors.
4. An equalization program designed to eliminate the differential between cost of domestic production and selling price of foreign imports in the domestic market. This program to include provision for minimum operating price to fishermen and vessel owners.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, regardless of whether these possible remedies hold the key to relief for the industry, some Congressional attention must be devoted to this problem in the early days of the next session. I have asked the Department of Interior to conduct a study during the recess of Congress, and to submit recommendations which may be offered in the form of proposed legislation at the start of the next session. It is imperative that we devote our best thinking and our most expert judgment to this problem, lest we lose an industry which has made great contributions to our national welfare and security, and has been a great and dependable source of domestic food supply.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to take a few minutes this morning to bring to the attention of the Senate certain developments affecting our American merchant marine.

For a good part of my life, I have been very much interested—both as a public official and as a private citizen—in the maritime industry. It has been my privilege to follow the industry—its problems and its prospects—from the vantage points of both the Senate Appropriations Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee. I gained a modest knowledge of the shipbuilding industry through a close association with our Massachusetts shipyards — important segments of the economy of the Commonwealth.

I have been very much encouraged by the progress which the Maritime Administration, under the able leadership of Clarence Morse, has made, with the active cooperation of ship operators, in initiating a long-range ship-replacement program. The program is an essential one, as I see it, since so many of the vessels in our merchant fleet which were built during World War II will be obsolete in just a few years. The problem of replacement is one which had to be faced, and both the industry and the Government can be proud that they have met it head on.

Because I do not want unnecessarily to take the time of my colleagues this morning, I shall not elaborate on the essentiality of an American merchant fleet and American shipbuilding, both in peace and in war. The alternative to a strong, healthy industry is total dependence on foreign skills, foreign construction, and foreign shipping. The adoption of such an alternative would, I am sure all will agree, seriously jeopardize the American economy and seriously impair our Nation's security.

So, recognizing the indispensability of a strong American maritime industry, I wish to congratulate both the Government and the industry for going forward with plans for the replacement of our merchant fleet. Rather than wait until the total need is upon us—a course which would have imposed a tremendous demand on our shipbuilding capacity and on the National Treasury—the administration sat down with the industry and developed a phased program involving long-term contracts with the ship operators and the gradual replacement of their ships over a period of 10 or 15 years. This makes sense. It is sound business. It is economical. It is prudent. It will provide stable workloads for our shipyards, and will maintain them at the levels adequate for mobilization purposes—this in contrast to the peaks and valleys which in the past have plagued our shipbuilding industry.

All of us are cognizant of the dependence of our Nation on merchant shipping in time of emergency, but sometimes we overlook the contribution it makes to our peacetime economy. I am informed, for example, that over 300,000 employees in the State of Wisconsin depend upon American merchant ships to carry a substantial portion of their products to foreign ports. I am told that over 1 million jobs in the State of Texas depend in part on foreign trade and the need for American shipping. The automobile industry, so important to Michigan and nearby States, depends on 250 or 300 materials which must be brought in by ship from over 50 foreign countries.

We need a strong merchant marine, and it is vital that the ship-replacement program now underway be continued on a scheduled basis. Any interruption would be expensive and, in a real sense, perilous.

It is my understanding that ship-construction contracts soon to be awarded will exhaust the funds currently available for ship replacement. Those who have responsibility for the program must come to the Congress in the next session to present plans for sustained activity which will insure a satisfactory level of shipbuilding employment and—equally important—guarantee the gradual replacement of our merchant fleet in the years ahead. It cannot be done piecemeal. The Congress must have a realistic appraisal of our needs and the costs.

I am confident that the Congress of the United States will give its careful and sympathetic attention to a well presented program for vessel replacement on a sound, stable, economical basis.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

THE COTTON TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, a number of responsible persons in Massachusetts who are engaged in the cotton-textile industry have been very much concerned with the effect of our national cotton policy on the economy of New England and, indeed, on the economy of the entire country, as well.

For many years we have had a policy which supports the prices of several of our important agricultural products—among them, cotton. I certainly am not an expert on agricultural matters, but I should like to pass on to my colleagues in the Senate some of the reports I have been receiving as to the present situation of our cotton-textile industry.

Our people are concerned primarily because of the fact that, under the national policy, they are required to pay high prices for raw materials. This, in itself, places them at a serious competitive disadvantage with respect to competition from beyond our shores—competition made very much more difficult because of lower wage rates abroad. But, unfortunately, the problem does not stop there. It is compounded by the law which was passed by the Congress last year, which permits the sale of American raw cotton in foreign markets at current world prices—prices which are considerably below the supported domestic price. The inevitable result has been that competitors from other nations have an additional benefit, in that because of import restrictions they can purchase the same American cotton which our domestic textile manufacturers are compelled to buy at several cents a pound greater than the world price.

The net result is that while domestic textile manufacturers must purchase their raw materials at the higher prices, and are precluded by law from purchasing cheaper foreign cotton, their competitors are permitted to manufacture goods from raw materials, even American cotton, which they can buy at the lower world price and can fabricate at wage rates far below American standards.

The competitors from other countries, with the single exception of Japan, with whom we have a voluntary agreement, can bring unlimited quantities of cotton-textile products into American markets.

I am afraid that the entire situation is an unhealthy one, not only for the domestic manufacturer, but also for our cotton farmers. I believe that both of these groups have a common interest in a sound, stable market for finished cotton products; and I fear that the policy which we now follow is having a damaging effect on that market. I hope the Federal Government, which developed the policy, and therefore must bear the responsibility for its results, will reexamine the entire situation in the very near future.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR SMITH OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, on this, the final day of the 1st session of the 85th Congress, and before the oratory begins, which I assume will come a little later, I rise informally at this time to express my personal appreciation for the accomplishment which the leadership on both sides of the aisle have achieved this session and the courtesies they have constantly extended to all of us. I address myself to the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], who is sitting to my left, and also the able whip on the Democratic side, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], two very dear friends of mine, for whom I have the deepest affection. I also refer, of course, to my beloved minority leader, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], who is not present in the Chamber at the moment. I feel we have had a spirit of friendly cooperation. We have had differences at times, but there has been a spirit of amity which I have not experienced before in all the time I have been a Member of the Senate. I desire to record that statement publicly, and thank them very much for all they have done for us who are toiling in the vineyard.

I also wish to express my gratitude to those who have served at the front desk, in the performance of their many tasks, for the many courtesies they have extended to me.

I did not feel I could leave today without expressing my very deep appreciation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratitude to my beloved friend from New Jersey, who always has a complete understanding and a constructive approach to the many problems we face each day. I believe him to be one of the great patriots I have known, and I feel it has been a privilege and an honor to serve with him.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the statement of the able majority leader, and thank the Senator from New Jersey for his kind remarks this morning. It has been a pleasure to work with him. He has always placed the interests of the country ahead of the interests of party. So long as we can operate the affairs of the country on that basis, the country is in good hands.

THE MAJORITY LEADER OF THE SENATE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a column written by Roscoe Drummond, which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune of today. Mr. Drummond makes some interesting comments concerning the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEEP YOUR EYE ON LYNDON JOHNSON

(By Roscoe Drummond)

The most enhanced political figure to emerge from this 1st session of the 85th Congress is the Democratic majority leader, Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, of Texas.

It is no more than stating the facts to say that Senator JOHNSON:

Increased greatly his influence in Congress.

Enhanced his standing in the country.

Expanded his control of his own party.

Rescued the two most critical parts of the President's program—the Eisenhower Middle East doctrine and foreign aid.

Shaped the right-to-vote law as it finally emerged more than any other leader of the Senate, Democratic or Republican.

Emerged as an outstanding challenger for the next Democratic presidential nomination.

That's something. It's more than something and I think I am not overstating it.

Senator JOHNSON's political achievements during the past 8 months have been varied and decisive and substantial.

He saved the Eisenhower doctrine from debilitating delay in the Senate. He did it by biding his time and then coming forward with a revision of the Dulles draft which both improved the resolution and made Congress a participant instead of a rubber stamp. Then he marshaled most of his own party behind the result and contributed to the 72-to-19 vote which passed it—after which Mr. Eisenhower was on the telephone to express his appreciation.

That was the first significant action of this session of Congress. Its last significant action found Senator JOHNSON in the same role. The House of Representatives hacked the President's mutual security appropriations to bits. Would the Senate repair the damage? This week Mr. Eisenhower bid the Texas Senator to the White House for a private conference after which the Senate Appropriation Committee restored $500 million in mutual security funds. Whatever is ultimately salvaged will be due in large part to Mr. JOHNSON's influence and resourcefulness.

In the right-to-vote law Senator JOHNSON played a part which the most earnest civil-rights advocates would criticize. They would say—and they are right—that more than anyone else he brought about the dilution of the bill and the ultimate compromise.

But it was also Senator JOHNSON's generalship which averted a southern filibuster, which kept in the bill the maximum the Senate was prepared to accept, and which contributed so much to its final passage.

If you think the Senate did wrong in cutting back the civil-rights bill, much of the blame goes to JOHNSON. If you think the Senate acted responsibly and usefully in passing a compromise bill, much of the credit goes to JOHNSON.

* * * * *

The full meaning of what Senator JOHNSON did in behalf of his own party in the right-to-vote fight is widely realized.

He saved the Democratic Party from tearing itself apart over this issue.

He shaped a law which drew five southern Senators to its support.

He prevented the Republican Party from walking off the field with all the honors, held their political gains to the minimum.

He proved himself the ascendant leader of the whole Democratic Party in Congress, northern and western liberals as well as southern conservatives.

He is no longer just the leader of the Democratic Party in Congress. He is a—if not the—principal spokesman of the Democratic Party in the country.

Because he voted for and is an architect of the right-to-vote law, he is the first southern Democratic leader since the Civil War to be a serious candidate for presidential nomination and, if nominated, to have a fair chance of winning.

Senator JOHNSON may or may not want the nomination, may or may not get it. If he doesn't get it, no one will have more to say about who does get it.

TOLL AND WIRE TELEVISION

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have studied with considerable interest the remarks made in the Senate last Friday, August 23, by the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. POTTER] on toll or pay television. I commend the Senator from Michigan for his forthright statements on this important subject, and I agree wholeheartedly with his observations. I do not favor pay television.

The Senator from Michigan cautioned that the Federal Communications Commission should not even authorize a pilot test of toll television. I am informed that some Senators have had informal assurances from members of the Federal Communications Commission that no action will be taken without Congressional authorization. In that regard, I believe it absolutely essential that the Federal Communications Commission make no decision until Congress has had an opportunity to thoroughly and carefully consider proposed legislation; and until the American public, through their elected representatives, have had a chance to voice their opinions.

Congress should take cognizance of the reality of television as it exists today: its unprecedented growth in the span of a few short years; its social, political, and economic impact; its existence as a new dimension in America in which over 35 million families have a multi-billion-dollar investment. Television has long been regarded as a national medium—a public property that belongs to no group or individual. If this property is to be preempted, the consent of those most affected should be sought. The decision should be that which will best serve the public interest.

Another problem now appears on the horizon, equally serious and important, equally deserving of serious Congressional consideration. That is the matter of wire television. I am informed that wire television is about to come into being without so much as one iota of control by the Federal Communications Commission. There simply is no jurisdiction by which the Federal Communications Commission can regulate this medium of transmission.

This raises several questions. Should wire television be regulated, and, if so, to what extent? A second question is whether broadcasters should be permitted in the field of wire television. Clearly, legislative hearings should be held to decide these issues.

It is now clear that the Federal Communications Commission has assumed jurisdiction of toll television, in spite of the fact that considerable doubt has been expressed as to the legality of that assumption of authority. Admonitions against ill-advised action have been voiced repeatedly. If the Federal Communications Commission ignores the warnings and caution expressed in the Senate by many of my colleagues, I think it should be made abundantly clear that a pilot test—no matter where or for how long—gives no individuals or groups the right or privilege to continue, provides no foot in the door, and the voice of the people is eventually heard through its Congress.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

THE DIGNITY OF LABOR DAY

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is very fitting that next Monday, the Nation will observe Labor Day, a day set aside to honor the men and women who toil. We must never lose sight of the true significance of that day. The working people of America are in every sense, and in the finest sense, individuals, possessed of individual rights, interested in their families and in the growth and prosperity of the country. They are interested in our prized institutions, in their communities, in their churches and schools. They are fine, upright, outstanding, patriotic citizens—our very best.

I make this statement because in this day when an investigation involving labor and management relationships is in progress, the impression must never be given that we are pointing a finger at labor. No such thing is happening. It may be that certain union organizations are on trial. It very definitely is true that some union leaders are on trial, and it is very definitely true that all the major union leaders have a responsibility that they may or may not live up to.

It is also very true that perhaps the Congress has not enacted all the laws that it should have enacted for the benefit of the men and women who work, and for the protection of their rights, and for the protection and benefit of the public.

With that in mind, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "The Dignity of Labor Day," appearing in the August 1957 issue of the Labor Digest, published in Indianapolis, Ind., together with the editor's note that precedes the editorial.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE DIGNITY OF LABOR DAY

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—A man in his late eighties, a retired union official whose name once was well known in every American city, came into our office one day recently, carrying the Labor Digest editorial which is reprinted below. He had had it framed under glass and had taken it from the wall of his home. It was, he explained, our Labor Day editorial of 1946. He suggested that it be reprinted because, he said, it was as timely today as it was 5 years ago. Our friend was a pioneer of the labor movement. More than half a century ago he toured the country as an organizer, traveling in freight trains and day coaches, often sleeping in livery barns. "Unionism was and still is well nigh a religion with me," he said. "But I am an American first. I hate the proposal that America contains a working class and I dread the socialistic aims of present-day union leaders which would reduce free men to slavery under a supergovernment. The fathers of the labor movement recognized this evil threat and steered clear of politics.")

Twenty thousand marched in New York's first Labor Day parade held on the first Monday in September 1887. New York State had made this date a legal holiday.

A New York morning paper said: "And another good thing was that the legal holiday left many businessmen at leisure to look on, and the dignity of the parade made a good impression on them, an impression that will be remembered when discussion of the attitude of the unions comes up again."

Lots of water has gone under the bridge since that day in 1887.

Today, if a proportionate number of union members marched in a Labor Day parade, more than 800,000 would be in line. But they would not march with dignity as patriotic Americans. Many would wear sneers and carry banners attacking the Nation which has given them an incomparably better life than they knew in the lands abroad which gave many of them birth. There would be slogans demanding the destruction of American freedom and the substitution therefor of regimentation managed by roughnecks with outlandish accents and no love for the land which nourishes them. Some would shout praises of Soviet Russian dictatorship and curses on the democratic nations who are alert to Red ambitions.

BLAME FOR SHORTAGES

The public which once looked with respect and sympathy on labor's aspirations, would view the demonstration with sullen disapproval—a disapproval which will one day turn to active hostility. The public vastly outnumbers the organized and organizable workers. On the public's side are hundreds of thousands of union members who were dragooned into outfits for which they have no sympathy and at whose hands they have suffered.

We are supposed to rejoice on this holiday and eulogize the sons of toil. But usurping leaders, unaccustomed and unfit for power, have made that impossible. We will take no holiday from blasting the evils of political unionism until a balance of justice between unions and public is established.

FATHERS OF UNIONISM

We yearn for the leadership of Sam Gompers, John Mitchell, Jim Lynch, and Owen Miller—men who would fight hard but honorably for a better life for the worker while still prizing the privilege of living in a land of freedom and opportunity. They and their fellows laid the foundation of American unionism and won for it the respect that enabled its growth.

They viewed unionism as purely economic and opportunistic. They demanded fair wages, reasonable hours, decent working conditions, and respect for the rights of producers. They rejected the idea that any system which would anchor a man to his trade or economic status could increase his happiness. Gompers fought off all attempts to involve unions in partisan politics. "A man's social and philosophic views are his own," he said. He tossed aside suggestions for laws that would compel men to join unions and invented the term "voluntarism" to designate his doctrine. That is why the Labor Digest has always fought the closed shop and the union shop and fought for the principles of the right-to-work laws in the various States.

If Gompers and his like could have survived, or if their true followers had remained at the helm of labor, the growth of the movement would have been as great numerically as it has been under present-day leaders. It would also have been sound and productive instead of causing the world's greatest and richest nation to flounder in a mire of economic confusion.

> We greet Labor Day, 1957, not with rejoicing but with hope—hope nourished by the belief that the patience of the public and of the Nation's statesmen with the vandalism of radical and dishonest labor leadership is nearing its limit.
>
> When this happens all of us—unionists, enterprisers, and the public—will then find richer, happier lives.
>
> May labor soon again march with dignity and Labor Day again take on its true significance.

WASTE IN NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, the United States has fallen behind Russia in development of the intercontinental ballistic missile because of this administration's policy of "false security to justify false economy."

We are properly indignant because a young warrant officer in a far northern outpost caused the waste of $33,000 of surplus equipment.

But we are comfortably complacent about the fact that in effect the present administration is directing the management of the Department of Defense to throw away $33,000 every 3 minutes, 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, through waste in manpower alone.

These figures can be computed by anyone, on the back of an envelope, from the testimony of the chairman of the Defense Department's own manpower committee.

If this enormous waste caused us no sacrifice of national security it would still be outrageous. As it is, the manner in which our defense superiority has been dribbled away is nothing short of tragic; and we have no savings to show for it.

Mr. President, we have both the right and the duty to ask, What is the administration going to do about it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair.) Is the Senator from Oregon seeking recognition?

Mr. NEUBERGER. I should like to be recognized, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon is recognized.

MODIFICATION OF RULE XXII

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement released today by me on behalf of myself, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCNAMARA], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLARK], dealing with rule XXII of the Senate.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Recent events in the Senate have strengthened our determination to exert maximum efforts during 1958 to modify rule XXII of this body.
>
> When debate becomes not an instrument for information or education, but merely for the purpose of obstructionism or exhibitionism, then unlimited debate has ceased to fulfill a useful function.
>
> There has taken place on the Senate floor an episode which demonstrates that rule XXII can be used to prolong debate which serves no essential legislative function. Such events confirm our long-standing view that rule XXII is in need of drastic modification. A majority of Senators should have the opportunity to act when they are ready to act.

EFFECT ON GOVERNMENT PROJECTS AND AGENCIES OF BUDGET DIRECTIVE OF JUNE 28, 1957

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, the 1st session of the 85th Congress soon will adjourn and many of us will return to our home States believing that Congress has provided adequately for carrying on essential functions of the Federal Government for the remaining months of the 1958 fiscal year. I fear, however, that a little-noted directive of the Bureau of the Budget to various departments and agencies may nullify some of this session's achievements in providing funds for programs consistent with the needs of the Nation.

I base this forecast on information I have received in response to inquiries about the first effects of a letter from Budget Bureau Director Percival Brundage to department heads of June 28, 1957, instructing them to take positive action to keep expenditures for fiscal 1958 at or below the level for the fiscal year 1957. Mr. Brundage said in his letter that this was the request of the President to all agencies.

In addition, the Budget Bureau's directive said that appropriation action in connection with appropriations for major capital outlay and development—construction, procurement, research, and so forth—should reflect the postponement of a significant part of the obligations planned in the budget for 1958. In my opinion, this instruction for postponement means that the administration may be planning to delay construction of major projects in the Pacific Northwest and elsewhere in the Nation or defer programs in defiance of congressional approval.

This directive was first brought to public attention in a story in the Washington Post and Times Herald of July 12, 1957, and some of its implications were developed at a hearing before the House Subcommittee on Appropriations, under the able interrogation of its chairman, Representative CLARENCE CANNON, of Missouri.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks the Budget Bureau letter of directions for allotment of funds during 1958, which had not been a matter of public knowledge until Mr. CANNON obtained its insertion in the hearing record last month.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
> BUREAU OF THE BUDGET,
> Washington, D. C., June 28, 1957.
>
> Hon. LEWIS L. STRAUSS,
> Chairman, United States Atomic Energy Commission, Washington, D. C.
>
> MY DEAR MR. STRAUSS: The President has requested that all agencies in the executive branch keep the rates of commitments, obligations, and expenditures for fiscal year 1958 at or below the level for the fiscal year 1957, to the extent feasible, and that I inform you of the necessary procedures for achieving this purpose. This task can best be accomplished by positive action on the part of each agency head. The apportionment and allotment system offers an existing administrative channel for each agency head to accomplish these purposes. Therefore, appropriate action along these lines should be reflected in the initial request for apportionment for 1958 appropriations and in requests for subsequent revisions of apportionments, as well as in allotment action within the agency, following these guidelines:
>
> 1. As a general rule, requests for apportionment and the allotments of funds shall be based upon holding obligations to absolute minimum levels. In most cases direct obligations should not rise above the level for the fiscal year 1957. Exceptions may be made with respect to that portion of appropriations which is for cash payments not controllable by administrative action (certain grants, annuities, indemnities, insurance losses, etc.), and with respect to uncontrollable workload and new legislation specifically endorsed as a part of the President's program. In any case where special circumstances (including those referred to above) prevent the agency from operating at or below the 1957 levels, the agency head shall submit a statement of reasons therefor to accompany the apportionment requests. For all appropriations, however, there should be a critical analysis of all activities, and advantage should be taken of every possibility for reductions; apportionments in all cases should be consistent with allowable sums being used in planning the 1959 budget. The sums available in excess of minimum needs will be placed in reserves for contingencies.
>
> 2. In the case of those appropriations that are for major capital outlay and development—construction, procurement, research, etc.—the requests for apportionment and the allotments should reflect the postponement of a significant part of the obligations planned in the budget for 1958.
>
> 3. In general, separate quarterly apportionments and allotments will be made for object class "01 Personal services." Exceptions will be made on a selective basis where regular apportionments and allotments, or other administrative arrangements, will effectively control the numbers of personnel.
>
> 4. Apportionments and allotments shall be revised throughout the year to provide for additional savings. After the close of each of the first three quarters, subsequent apportionments and allotments for operating programs will be reviewed in the light of program progress and costs, and action taken wherever possible, both to reserve unobligated balances remaining from the quarter just closed and to adjust subsequent quarters' figures to take into account lower rates of obligations actually achieved in the preceding period. Also, those savings which are made a matter of record in public statements on the basis of agency claims of such savings will be specifically identified and reserved.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> PERCIVAL BRUNDAGE,
> Director.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, subsequent information coming before the Senate indicates that letters of identical context were distributed generally by the Bureau of the Budget to other agencies.

The full meaning of this directive and its impact on operation of the machinery of Federal Government has not been fully recognized, in my opinion. It has made the President's 1958 budget meaningless. Its net effect seems to be a complete circumvention of congressional directives, as represented by action on appropriations, and a direct contradiction of the administration's viewpoint, expressed earlier this year by Mr. Brundage, that there was no specific area in which the budget could be reduced. Despite the lack of information on possible avenues for reduction of the largest peacetime budget in history, the Congress subsequently reduced the allocations in many categories.

It was not until a few days ago that the first effects of Mr. Brundage's directive to reduce fund allotments to or below 1957 levels—in spite of action taken by Congress—were indicated by reports received from my home State of Oregon. The State of Oregon has few military installations, but one of these is the Ordnance Ammunition Depot in Umatilla County. I was told that the curtailment of maintenance and operation funds during the first quarter of fiscal 1958 might seriously affect employment levels at the depot. Upon inquiry to the Department of the Army. I was informed that a cut in funds had indeed been ordered. In a letter from the Department of the Army, I was advised that—

> In this case, 21 percent of the fiscal year 1959 appropriation is the limit for the first quarter. The reduction at Umatilla appears to be about $125,000 rather than $300,000 in the first quarter, fiscal year 1958.

The letter further stated:

> Reductions in the maintenance and operation funds frequently result in a requirement for the reduction in force of personnel. A reduction in force action has not yet been submitted to the Army staff by the technical service, although this does not preclude such action in the near future. The Department of the Army realizes the sensitivity of Umatilla County as a surplus labor area and will attempt to place as many personnel as possible if reduction in force does take place.

I have no doubt that similar results are being felt elsewhere in the country where military installations exist. However, the implications for the State of Oregon are particularly ominous because of business doldrums which clutch our State's economy. Total employment in Oregon in all nonagricultural lines was 511,800 in July 1956. A year later—in July 1957—it had dropped to 505,900. Further reduction in activities in business, industry, agriculture, or Government is not favorable to the State's prosperity.

As a result of this disturbing report, I have made a preliminary check with other Federal agencies operating in Oregon to determine what effect the reduction in allotments will bring. On August 22, 1957, a letter was sent to Mr. Marling Ankeny, Director of the United States Bureau of Mines, expressing concern over the indicated curtailments. The Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, has devoted considerable time to a study of long-range minerals program proposals. I asked Mr. Ankeny about the curtailment of funds and whether this will result in reduction of personnel and what programs of the Bureau would be immediately affected.

Mr. Ankeny replied that the Bureau in company with all other Federal agencies, is under instruction to effect savings in current appropriations. In applying an apportionment for the first quarter of the current year, the Bureau of the Budget suggested totals that were approximately 12 percent below the current rate of expenditure within the appropriation for conservation and development of mineral resources and 6 percent in health and safety.

He added:

> Having intensified all activities in accordance with increases in appropriations for the current fiscal year, the subsequent advice on reduced apportionment required abrupt curtailment of activity at many sites. The ultimate effect of this reduction cannot be fully assessed until we are advised with regard to possible limitations of a similar nature during any of the remaining quarters of this year. As of now, we assume that we can support our programs at the fiscal year 1957 rate.
>
> We are attempting to accomplish this without reducing personnel or closing any facilities. However, rigid limitations are going to have to be applied to all operating expenditures. The new activities, for which increases were approved in the current budget, will be deferred.

It is evident that the Budget Bureau order has resulted in much confusion in program planning. Mr. Ankeny's disclosure that new activities approved by Congress will be deferred is a signal of what may be expected in other spheres of Government where Congress—recognizing the need for new undertakings—has authorized their start during the current year, not at some future date fixed by the Budget Bureau. Comparatively speaking, the Bureau of Mines is not a large Government agency, but its contribution to advancement of technology and the Nation's economy and to its defenses has certainly justified its existence. For instance, the process for manufacture of the new metal of the atomic age, zirconium, was first developed at a Bureau of Mines laboratory in Albany, Oreg. Only 12 years ago the first 90 grams of zirconium was produced at the Bureau of Mines laboratory, but in that brief span its value to our atomic energy defense program has become so great that production goals have been set at many hundreds of thousands of pounds annually. It was zirconium from the Albany Bureau of Mines plant which cloaked the atomic charge in the submarine Nautilus when it made its historic 60,000-mile voyage.

Can such scientific and engineering advances be achieved for our Nation on 12 percent cuts in funds? Likewise, what happens to health and safety inspection which affects men working underground in all parts of the Nation when allotments are reduced by 6 percent? And what of the contemplated deferral of new activities authorized by Congress? Economy in Government is a commendable objective, but I question its attainment at the expense of national progress.

Funds for United States Forest Service and Bureau of Land Management activities in my State also were affected by the order. This is an especially crucial matter in my home State of Oregon because more than 50 percent of the land area is federally owned, much of it in forested slopes administered by the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management. Reductions in the programs of these two agencies would have serious repercussions on Oregon's economy. Lumber is our No. 1 industry, and now suffers from effects of the administration's tight-money policy. Restricting the work of the agencies would merely add to the industry's burdens. Moreover, the Federal funds expended on some Forest Service and Bureau of Land Management programs return profit to the Federal Treasury. What kind of economy is achieved by cutting funds for agency programs that more than pay for themselves and enhance Federal income?

I think the Senate may be interested in knowing the profitable financial results which have been achieved in recent years by Bureau of Land Management programs for the controverted Oregon & California Railroad lands in my State. In fiscal 1956, BLM revenues from timber sales on Oregon & California land totaled $21,605,000. Of this total, $11,909,000 was returned to county governments for their use, cost of administration was $1,584,000, reimbursement to the Treasury for access-road funds advanced was $4,295,000, leaving a sum of $3,817,000 covered to the Federal Treasury as net profit. In 1957, revenues from Oregon & California lands were $19,067,000, administrative expenses were $2,247,000, and net profit to the Treasury was $2,519,840.

In regard to Forest Service apportionments, I have been informed by Acting Secretary of Agriculture, True D. Morse, that "Forest Service items do not involve reductions which would result in serious impairment of programs planned for 1958." I hope that his belief is proven by subsequent events, although I have doubts as to how this may be done in view of the approved apportionment cutting the vital forest roads and trails program by $1,570,770 below the 1957 level. This is one phase of Forest Service activity that pays off to the Federal Treasury because the existence of access roads increases competitive bidding in Federal timber sales and results in higher prices for stumpage in the national forests. It is difficult for me to understand why a Forest Service activity which returns profit to the Federal Treasury was thus curtailed. The only possible effects will be to make it more difficult to harvest mature timber and to reduce competition in sales bidding. I hope that steps will be taken to restore these profitable activities of the Forest Service and Bureau of Land Management to the full scale approved by Congress through the fiscal 1958 appropriations.

Mr. President, the possible impact of reduction in BLM allotments is detailed in a copy of a telegram to Budget Director Brundage which was sent to me by Mr. Joseph W. McCracken, executive vice president of Western Forest Industries Association. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks Mr. McCracken's telegram of August 22, 1957, which cogently explains lumber industry objections to reduction of allotments. Other Senators will understand, I am sure, why this organization would object to curtailment of programs which are profitable to the Government and also essential to the operating ability of many timber and logging companies.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., August 22, 1957.
Hon. PERCIVAL BRUNDAGE,
Director, Bureau of the Budget,
Washington, D. C.:

Western Forest Industries Association, composed of numerous timber operators who are critically dependent upon Federal timber for their raw material, are gravely concerned at report that current quarterly apportionment of appropriation for Oregon and California forestry and road construction is below amount for last year's corresponding quarter even though both budget and appropriation were increased for current year.

This is season of year when large part of fieldwork is done preparing timber sales for next calendar year. Inadequate funds and personnel during first and second quarter will seriously curtail sale offerings next year, disrupt businesses and numerous timber operators, and deprive Government of substantial revenue.

In addition prosecution of intensive forest inventory as recommended both by the Congress and administration will be seriously hampered and completion further delayed. In turn this will delay recalculation and increase of allowable cuts and result in further loss to Government of timber values from overripe stumpage which under sound yield should be harvested now.

If Oregon and California program is to be operated on sound basis comparable to operation of private forestry lands it requires continuity and expansion of program. Money expended is quickly returned with profit to Treasury.

Failure to invest money allocated by Oregon and California counties to road construction and replanting programs constitutes no gain for Treasury. Such funds will either be expended later or ultimately returned to counties. Moreover, failure of the Government to invest county funds for such purposes constitutes loss to Government in that access to stands of deteriorating timber is not achieved and unproductive lands remain barren. There also seems moral question whether Federal Government should retain for interest-earning purposes funds contributed by Oregon and California counties for construction and acquisition of roads.

WESTERN FOREST INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION,
JOSEPH W. MCCRACKEN,
Executive Vice President.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I am particularly concerned, Mr. President, with the section of the administration's directive which calls for postponement of construction on new projects. First construction funds for the 1,100,000-kilowatt John Day power, navigation, and flood-control dam on the Columbia River was provided by Congress at this session. Power from this dam is vitally needed in the Pacific Northwest States. Evidence of this is found in the fact that the Bonneville Power Administration will halt all deliveries of interruptible power at midnight on August 31, owing to continued low floods in the river. Every hour that passes without delivery of this power to industries of my region will cost the Federal Treasury money. It means loss of revenue to the Treasury because sale of interruptible power is an important factor in the revenues of the Bonneville system, and is vital to operations of some 17 industrial plants in Pacific Northwest States. Yet, if the start of construction is delayed on the John Day Dam prospects for a more adequate power supply will go glimmering.

Mr. President, other implications of the administration's curtailment of appropriations which represent unsound and unwise so-called economy could be described at length. But I think the instances which I have cited illustrate that the application of across-the-board cuts proposed by the Bureau of the Budget may have far-reaching effects on operations of the Federal Government. I hope that before the adjournment of Congress, the appropriate committees of the Senate will have an opportunity to determine the overall impact of Mr. Brundage's directive. If such committee action is possible, I am sure that one thing will be made obvious—the Bureau of the Budget directive has made a mockery out of the congressional appropriation process.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed with my remarks letters from the Bureau of Mines and from the Department of the Army, both dated August 26, 1957, describing the effects of the allotment reductions.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF MINES,
Washington, D. C., August 26, 1957.
Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: Reference is made to your letter of August 22, 1957 requesting information on a report that funds for Bureau of Mines operations had been curtailed.

The Bureau, in company with all other Federal agencies, is under instruction to effect savings in current appropriations. In applying an apportionment for the first quarter of the current year, the Bureau of the Budget suggested totals that were approximately 12 percent below the current rate of expenditure within the appropriation for conservation and development of mineral resources and 6 percent in health and safety. However, the rate proposed by the Bureau of the Budget was in no case lower than that maintained during the last fiscal year.

Having intensified all activities in accordance with increases in appropriations for the current fiscal year, the subsequent advice on reduced apportionment required abrupt curtailment of activity at many sites. The ultimate effect of this reduction cannot be fully assessed until we are advised with regard to possible limitations of a similar nature during any of the remaining quarters of this year. As of now, we assume that we can support our programs at the fiscal year 1957 rate.

We are attempting to accomplish this without reducing personnel or closing any facilities. However, rigid limitations are going to have to be applied to all operating expenditures. The new activities, for which increases were approved in the current budget, will be deferred.

We are in the process of seeking an adjustment in the apportionment figure using the events cited in your letter as justification.

Sincerely yours,
MARLING J. ANKENY,
Director.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE ARMY,
Washington, D. C., August 26, 1957.
Hon. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR NEUBERGER: This is in reply to your recent inquiry regarding prospects at Ordnance Ammunition Depot, Ordnance (Umatilla County), Oreg. You have inquired specifically as to curtailment of maintenance and operation funds during the first quarter of fiscal year 1958, and the effect such a reduction may have on employment levels.

A cut in the maintenance and operation funds has become necessary as a result of a Secretary of Defense directive requiring limitation of expenditure ceilings. In this case, 21 percent of the fiscal year 1958 appropriation, is the limit for the first quarter. The reduction at Umatilla appears to be about $125,000 rather than $300,000 in the first quarter, fiscal year 1958.

Reductions in the maintenance and operation funds frequently result in a requirement for the reduction in force of personnel. A reduction in force action has not yet been submitted to the Army staff by the technical service, although this does not preclude such action in the near future. The Department of the Army realizes the sensitivity of Umatilla County as a surplus labor area and will attempt to place as many personnel as possible if a reduction in force does take place.

You will be advised prior to public announcement if a reduction in force occurs.

Sincerely,
DONALD T. KELLETT,
Lieutenant Colonel, GS, Office, Chief of Legislative Liaison.

REPORT ON ACTIVITIES OF THE CONSULTATIVE SUBCOMMITTEE ON STATE DEPARTMENT ORGANIZATION AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS OF THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, before this session comes to a close I should like to make a brief report to the Senate on the activities of the Consultative Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I have had the honor to be chairman of this subcommittee during the 1st and 2d sessions of the 84th Congress and this 1st session of the 85th Congress. During this time the membership of the subcommittee has remained constant. The other members of the subcommittee are the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART].

The terms of reference of the subcommittee are as follows:

This subcommittee is concerned with the management and administration of the State Department, including the International Cooperation Administration, the formulation of policy, and the coordination of foreign policy actions within the executive branch. It is likewise concerned with the operations of the United States Information Agency and with the State Department's liaison with public organizations in the United States concerned with foreign policy.

Problems of interest to this subcommittee include such matters as Foreign Service and departmental personnel, relations between the State Department and other Government agencies, personnel security, the educational exchange program, and the overseas information program.

Problems of personnel, administration, and organization of agencies of the executive branch are usually intricate and difficult. For most people it is a time-consuming subject if one is to be a master of the necessary details. A consultative subcommittee can therefore be especially useful in this field in sifting out the major policy issues in legislation for consideration by the standing committee. A consultative subcommittee can also be useful in holding off-the-record discussions from time to time with representatives of the agencies whose responsibilities fall under the jurisdiction of the committee. These informal discussions always increase mutual understanding of the issues. Very often a consultative meeting of our subcommittee has made possible the solving of small problems before they became big problems, and has prevented misunderstandings.

The Consultative Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs over the last 3 years has held a series of informal meetings with representatives of the Department of State and the United States Information Agency. These meetings have proved very worthwhile, certainly from the point of view of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I think, also in the opinion of the executive branch.

I should like to mention a few of the subjects which we have discussed with representatives of the executive branch. One main topic has been the reorganization of the Department of State personnel system, which has been underway since 1954. Members of this body are familiar in general with the recommendations of the so-called Wriston Committee with respect to the integration of the Foreign Service of the United States and a large portion of the employees of the departmental service. The Wriston Committee also made important recommendations with respect to training and recruitment for the Department of State. From time to time the consultative subcommittee has discussed with representatives of the Department of State the progress which has been made in improving the administration of the Department.

A second subject for discussion in the consultative subcommittee has been a series of actions to improve the Foreign Service of the United States. I am happy to say that during the period while I have been chairman of the subcommittee the organization of the Foreign Service has been improved and the benefits to which Foreign Service personnel are entitled have increased, so that the Foreign Service is now much better able to attract and hold people of high quality and dedication to the public service.

A third area of concern to the consultative subcommittee in its discussions with representatives of the executive branch has been the operation of the new United States Information Agency. Since the USIA is a relatively new agency and has expanded substantially in recent years it has had more than the usual number of growing pains and problems. Several meetings of the subcommittee have been occupied with discussions of the need for increased career opportunities for the personnel of the United States Information Agency.

I turn now, Mr. President, to several of the legislative measures to which I believe the Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs has made a contribution. Most of these measures were formally referred to the subcommittee, but in some of them subcommittee members have taken an active interest without formal reference to the subcommittee or meetings of the subcommittee.

First, I shall mention a subject which is still active and on which no legislative conclusion has been reached. The able senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] on May 25, 1956, introduced Senate Resolution 272, which was referred to the subcommittee on June 22, 1956. This resolution called for a study to be made of recruitment and training in the Foreign Service of the United States. The able minority leader, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and I have recently introduced S. 2749, which would provide for the establishment of a United States Foreign Service Academy. This whole subject has been under study since the end of the 2d session of the 84th Congress by the staff of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Department of State has prepared a great deal of useful material for the use of the committee. The heavy pressure of business of the Committee on Foreign Relations this year has prevented completion of the study, but I anticipate that a report will be made to the Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs prior to the opening of the 2d session of the 85th Congress.

Perhaps the first act to which the consultative subcommittee gave consideration was Public Law 250 of the 84th Congress. This act amended the basic legislation of the Department of State by adding three additional posts of Deputy Under Secretary of State. The subject was discussed by the subcommittee early in June 1955 and a bill to carry out the new policy was introduced on June 14, 1955, and passed the Senate on June 17, 1955. The bill became law on August 3, 1955. I believe there is general agreement that the increased responsibilities of the United States in world affairs demanded this provision of additional top-level positions in the Department, and that the work of the Department has been facilitated by this strengthening of the organizational structure.

I shall next refer to Public Law 555 of the 84th Congress, which was approved on June 4, 1956. This act amended the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 to require a person who is admitted to the United States as an exchange visitor to return to his own country and live there for a period of 2 years before he can become eligible for permanent reentry into the United States. On the initiative of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] this problem was explored at a subcommittee meeting on July 20, 1955, at which it was agreed that the practice of exchange visitors obtaining authorization to remain in the United States tended to defeat a primary objective of the exchange program. This objective is the return to their own country of exchangees in order that they might impart to their friends and associates their impressions of the United States and its culture. The bill, S. 2562, to curtail this practice, was passed by the Senate on May 3, 1956.

Public Law 828 of the 84th Congress, which was approved on July 28, 1956, is an important product of the subcommittee's work. This act made a number of changes in the Foreign Service Act of 1946, which, I think, have made service in foreign posts more attractive to capable American men and women. The act increased salaries of chiefs of mission, added two new classes to the Foreign Service schedule and adjusted the salaries of all classes in the Foreign Service, and authorized improved commissary service, medical benefits, and recreational facilities for our overseas employees. The bill, S. 3481, to accomplish this purpose was introduced by the distinguished Senator Walter George on March 19, 1956 and was referred to the subcommittee the following day. After a hearing by the subcommittee, the bill was approved by the full committee and it passed the Senate on April 12, 1956. I believe the changes in the Foreign Service Act brought about by Public Law 828 of the 84th Congress have made possible a better administration of the Foreign Service and the maintenance of adequate career incentives.

I shall now mention a bill which although passed by the Senate in the last Congress and reintroduced in both Houses again this session, has not yet become law. I refer to S. 3638 of the last Congress and S. 1583 of this Congress, both of which propose amendments to the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948. The amendments relate to administrative matters, methods of operation, and requirements for reporting to the Congress affecting the United States Information Agency and the educational exchange program operated by the Department of State. These bills include the substance of two other bills, S. 631 and S. 2410 of the last Congress. The Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs has held two extensive hearings on the subject, first on July 20, 1955 and again on April 17, 1956. The controversial portion of the bill is the authorization for the Director of the United States Information Agency to establish a career category of officers to be known as United States information officers. These officers would have substantially the same status as Foreign Service officers with respect to pay, job security, benefits and retirement, although they would be in a separate service. This subject will, I am sure, be given further study in the 2d session of the 85th Congress.

I should like to close this report, Mr. President, by referring briefly to a topic closely related to the bills which I have just discussed; namely, the question whether the International Cooperation Administration and the United States Information Agency should be made integral parts of the Department of State, rather than being semiautonomous and separate agencies as they are today. I shall not discuss the merits of the arguments today, and I realize that there are legitimate differences of opinion on this subject. I think that I have made my own position clear from time to time, and that is that ICA and USIA should be much more closely tied in with the Department of State. In line with the recommendations of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, I hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations, and its Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs in particular, will give some special attention to this subject in the next session of the Congress.

Mr. President, I would be remiss in my duty as chairman of the Consultative Subcommittee on State Department Organization and Public Affairs if I did not in this report commend Secretary of State Dulles for his wholehearted cooperation; Mr. Loy Henderson, for the many hours he spent with the subcommittee answering questions and giving us information concerning the workings of the Department of State; and Assistant Secretary of State, I. W. Carpenter, Jr., who has been a tower of strength, and who has helped to keep the committee informed on all developments within the State Department which were within the purview of the subcommittee. These men have done a good job for the State Department. They have worked closely with Congress, and they should be given much of the credit for the improvements which have been made in the Department with which they are associated.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the public laws to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the texts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, there is pending before the Committee on Public Works, Senate Joint Resolution 123, a measure for the preservation of Rock Creek Park which I introduced for myself and for Senators NEUBERGER, HUMPHREY, KUCHEL, and MALONE. This measure is similar to Senate Joint Resolution 36 of the 84th Congress on which the Interior Committee held exhaustive hearings.

It is my hope that the Public Works Committee will be able to act on this measure early in the next session of the Congress. Meanwhile, I ask that there be included as a part of my remarks the text of a press release pertinent to the subject matter of Senate Joint Resolution 123, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Commerce Secretary and Commissioners' President Oppose Rock Creek Route for U. S. 240

Secretary of the Interior Fred A. Seaton has received assurance of the full support of the Interior Department's position opposing the extension of United States Route 240 through Rock Creek Park from Secretary of Commerce Sinclair Weeks and Commissioner Robert E. McLaughlin, President, Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Department of the Interior announced today.

In a letter addressed to Secretary Seaton, Secretary of Commerce Sinclair Weeks states: "A top-level meeting of highway officials of Maryland and the District of Columbia was held at the Statler Hotel on Friday, July 19. Mr. Robert O. Bonnell, chairman of the Maryland State Roads Commission, Gen. Thomas A. Lane, Engineer Commissioner of the District, Mr. J. N. Robertson, Director of the District Department of Highways and members of his staff, were present. All disclaimed any thoughts of bringing United States Route 240 Interstate Highway through Rock Creek Park. I am as pleased, as I am sure you are, at these assurances for protecting the character of Rock Creek Park." The Bureau of Public Roads, which acts for the Federal Government in the planning and construction of interstate highway systems, is an agency of the Department of Commerce.

In a similar letter to Secretary Seaton, Commissioner McLaughlin emphasized his opposition to the extension of United States Route 240 through Rock Creek Park, saying: "This park is unique. Its value to the Capital City is inestimable. We should all work to save its beauty and integrity."

Secretary Seaton, who previously has stated unequivocal opposition to the use of Rock Creek Park as a location for United States Route 240, expressed his gratification at the cooperation being extended by the Federal, Maryland, and District of Columbia highway authorities in their support of the Department of the Interior's stand for the preservation of Rock Creek Park.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the final edition of the RECORD contain a statement which I am preparing with regard to the legislative measures which I have introduced, and other activities on my part during the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FLORIDA'S TIES WITH LATIN AMERICA

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I have before me the text of an address which I delivered at the annual banquet of the Miami Springs-Hialeah Chamber of Commerce on July 13, 1957, on the subject Florida's Ties With Latin America. I believe this address should be printed in the body of the RECORD, inasmuch as it relates directly to our strong ties with Latin America. It discusses the cogent reasons why we should include Latin American nations and Latin American peoples, all of whom are our friends, in the foreign-aid program.

Therefore I ask unanimous consent to have the address entitled "Florida's Ties With Latin America," which I delivered at the annual banquet of the Miami Springs-Hialeah Chamber of Commerce on Saturday, July 13, 1957, printed in the body of the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Florida's Ties With Latin America

From the discovery of Florida by Ponce de Leon in 1513 to the founding of St. Augustine, our Nation's oldest continuously existing city, by the Spanish in 1565, and on down through the centuries to this very day, the romantic history of our great State has been plainly marked by the Latin influence.

Throughout the length and breadth of Florida our place names reflect our Spanish background. To illustrate, the Perdido River forms our westernmost boundary—the St. Mary's the northernmost. From there down the east coast and up the west, Florida is bounded by cities, passes, bays, keys, and islands whose Latin names remind us of our Latin background—for just a few I mention Fernandina, St. Augustine, Anastasia, Boca Raton, Key Vaca, Tortugas, Marco, Punta Rassa, Boca Grande, Anna Maria, St. Marks, St. Joseph, and Santa Rosa.

The oustanding landmark of the Spanish influence in North America is, of course, our ancient city of St. Augustine whose approaching 400th anniversary in 1965 will afford to all Florida a wonderful opportunity to renew and strengthen the closeness of our historic ties with the people of Latin America and of Spain.

A glance at a map shows clearly that metropolitan Miami is near the geographic and population centers of the Western Hemisphere. It is the nearest point of contact by established transportation pattern, between the United States and Latin America. The map also shows that Miami lies due north of the Panama Canal, and that a line dropped straight south from this area will, contrary to the common conception, run west of almost all of the South American continent, which fans out south and southeasterly from Florida, while the rest of the United States and Canada lie mainly to the north and northwest of us. Therefore, we find the Miami area standing squarely in the geographic center of the great populations of the United States and Canada on the one hand, and the equally large population of Latin America on the other.

The enormous increase in airtravel in recent years has brought us and our Latin American neighbors even closer together, and has made our nearest neighbor, Cuba, only minutes away. Such rapidity of communication has brought about an unprecedented familiarity with each other's lands, customs, and people and has generated a new era of social, cultural, and commercial intercourse.

For many years, first in Key West and later in Tampa, the seat of our great cigar industry, there has been a heavy concentration of Latin American citizens—Floridians of whom we are proud. Miami, too, has its own large numbers of splendid Latin American citizens who have joined you here—many of them outstanding persons in the business world whose varied interests extend to banking, sugar, livestock, hotels, housing, sports, and many other phases of our commercial and industrial life. The same is true in lesser degree in other cities and town throughout Florida. In general, Latin American family names are almost as frequently found as Smith or Johnson.

Furthermore, our personal ties with Latin America, aside from the historical, geographic, and commercial connections, are almost as easy and natural as are our personal ties with close neighbors, next to whom we have dwelt and grown up in the normal course of family and community life. Your goodwill missions to Latin America from this area and similar missions from Tampa have done much to cement the highly cordial social relations which now prevail—and to add materially to the development of closer business contacts which are helpful both to them and to us. I shall continue to hope for the creation right here in Miami, of the proposed Inter-American Cultural and Trade Center, as the hub around which our friendly relations of every sort with Latin America may came to an impressive focus.

All of the Americas are known as nations of people with a common zeal for freedom and independence. As we in this Nation fought for our own right to self-government, the nations of Latin America likewise. with great determination, sacrifice and suffering threw off the yoke of foreign oppression and established for themselves national lives of their own choice and direction.

Even though the United States has historically been the strongest military power in the Western Hemisphere, the people of Latin America have not the slightest cause for concern because of our nearness—no fear whatever of invasion or of being taken over by our country.

We meticulously kept our word to help Cuba obtain freedom and independence. After the Spanish-American War, and in 1907 when we were again in Cuba, many urged that we annex the island or at least establish a protectorate. President Theodore Roosevelt emphatically rejected such proposals, stating in his famous letter to his Secretary of War, William Howard Taft that, and I quote his unforgettable words:

"Our business is to establish peace and order on a satisfactory basis, start the new government, and then leave the island. I will not even consider the plan of a protectorate, on any plan which would imply our breaking our explicit promise. The good faith of the United States is a mighty valuable asset and must not be impaired."

This is ordinary decency, applied to international relations, and it has been the cardinal principle of United States foreign policy with countries and peoples over whom we may have acquired temporary control in order to keep the peace and establish stability.

In times past the United States on several occasions assumed the self-appointed role of keeper of the peace in its effort to insure the stability of the governments of a number of our southern neighbors. The ill-will which this course of action generated is only now disappearing. The sole purpose of that action was our sincere desire to help those countries to insure their own permanence and stability. I believe that fact is now well understood throughout Latin America.

For today, in the Organization of American States, to which we belong and which we support unreservedly, the hemispheric police power is vested where it should be, that is, in all of the 21 republics which make up that splendid organization. Maintaining peace in the Americas is now a joint regional responsibility, in full accord with the U. N. Charter.

The Organization of American States is the community structure within which the 21 American republics have worked to make this hemisphere a better and safer home for all our peoples. It is strongly established and has on more than one occasion in recent years demonstrated its ability to find solutions for urgent problems which the individual countries involved could not find.

The population of Latin America is expanding more rapidly than that of any other major area of the world today. We in Florida know something of the stringencies of such a situation. Such a vast upsurge in population demands the rapid development of the natural resources, industry, and commerce of those countries. To help meet this requirement we are assisting them in many practical ways.

There is nothing particularly sensational about our programs of cooperation in the development of our sister republics. The inter-American community is a close-knit organization characterized by mutual faith and partnership. That this understanding pervades our relations with Latin America may be the reason why the headlines of our newspapers are seldom concerned with these relationships. This apparent lack of editorial concern can be, and has been misconstrued sometimes as a lack of sympathy, or even as disinterest. I am sure that it is neither. It is rather that in the fast moving and turbulent world of today we in the Americas live in such an intimate and peaceful relationship as to seldom call for sensational news treatment.

In this period of their rapid growth we are making a real and useful contribution to the efforts of our sister republics to build stronger national economies, to raise the standards of living of their people. We, too, have sectors of our own people who are living on substandard levels. It is important to every one of our nations that these underprivileged groups be given an opportunity to help themselves to house, clothe, and feed themselves better, to provide better opportunity and higher health standards for their children.

The people of the United States, as investors, are playing an important part in the economic development of Latin America. We have private direct investments there totaling over $7 billion which are increasing at the rate of $500 million a year. This is of great mutual benefit. Earnings on these investments are rewarding to the investors, and they also provide payrolls for thousands of Latin American employees. Substantial sums also go to pay local taxes. These private investments will continue to increase where conditions are favorable and where stable national governments exist.

The contribution made by our private citizens is complemented by our Government through Export-Import Bank loans which in the past 4 years totaled well over $1 billion for Latin American projects; by our technical assistance programs, by emergency grant aid in three instances, and by our sale to them of surplus agricultural commodities which are paid for in the currencies of the purchasing countries.

Just 2 weeks ago the new International Finance Corporation, an offspring of the World Bank, which is supported by contributions from 50 nations, made its first loan to a West German-owned electrical equipment plant in Brazil. This will spur Brazilian power development and sustain a more rapid industrial growth. Many other projects of helpful nature will undoubtedly spring from this same source.

Members of our Florida Congressional delegation have worked diligently toward the advancement of warm, friendly relations with Latin America, and for the advancement of our programs of cooperation with our sister republics. My distinguished colleague, your own GEORGE SMATHERS, has made a specialty of this activity and his extensive contacts with and effective assistance on many Latin American problems has been outstanding in the Senate. Likewise, good work has been done in this same field by your able Congressman DANTE FASCELL, who, among many other activities, represented our Government at Managua at the recent inauguration of the younger Somoza to succeed his father as president of Nicaragua. As a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee his major assignment is to the Subcommittee on Inter-American Affairs.

Senator SMATHERS and Congressman FASCELL were prime movers in the successful effort last year to repeal the excise tax on travel to the Caribbean area which tax had not only deterred tourism in that important nearby area but also had produced some natural resentment by those friends of ours who were adversely affected.

There are many other areas of cooperation between us and our Latin American friends which are helpful both to them and to us.

That they are productive of worthwhile results can best be shown from a brief report on some of my personal observations during the five official visits to nearby Latin American Nations which I have been privileged to make as a representative of the people of the United States.

I went to Mexico in 1951 as a member of the Senate Agriculture Committee and at the urgent invitation of the Mexican Government which was concerned over several outbreaks of violence which had occurred in the affected areas, to look into our joint campaign with that country to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease among cattle and other livestock and to give assurance of our vital interest and our willingness to see the project to completion. I found there real appreciation of our efforts and much progress being made on that most serious problem. You know, of course, that eradication was completed, and that our own money, men and scientific know-how all made great contributions to that success.

I returned to Mexico in 1952 as a representative of the United States Congress at a special session of the Pan-American Highway Congress. On every hand I noticed the kindly feeling of the Mexicans and other Latin American participants.

On both trips to Mexico I found at our Embassy and various other places numerous evidences of our cooperation with Mexico on worthwhile objectives. For instance, Dr. Baker and Dr. Stone, who were two of the principal scientists of our Department of Agriculture in the field of Entomology, had a very valuable joint operation underway with various Mexican scientists at Mexico City and also in the field, which was doing experimental work with the blackfly and the Mexican fruitfly, both of which are pests for citrus fruit and other important fruits. Already this work has proved of great value both to Mexico and ourselves. Likewise, I heard of important cooperative work in the fields of public health and education which was underway not only in Mexico but in all the other areas of Latin America which I have visited since that time.

In 1954, I went to Caracas as an official observer to the third Pan-American Highway Congress where, as was stated so kindly by your President in his introduction, I received an award for my work on the development of the Inter-American Highway. In that beautiful Venezuelan city I observed many evidences of the tremendous boom they were enjoying from American development of their oil and mineral resources.

In 1955 I was in all of the Central American countries as a member of the United States delegation to attend the dedication of two new links on the Inter-American Highway, one on the Nicaragua-Costa Rica border, which had been closed due to the bloody fighting that had taken place there only a few months before, and the other in Guatemala, marking the completion of the first project of the then new Castilla Armas administration which had unseated the Communist, Arbenz. The first ceremony was but a few yards away from the bullet-ridden remains of the Costa Rican Customs House where nine men had been killed in the border fighting. What a contrast it was to see the large number of cars lined up in each direction on the new highway awaiting the official opening before beginning a new era of travel and communication between the two countries. Results like this surely justify our interest in the establishment of modern communication facilities and our payment of two-thirds of the cost of the 1,600 miles of highway in Central America. The other 1,600 miles of the highway—that in Mexico—has been completed by the Mexicans at their own expense.

In Nicaragua I found the United States Corps of Army Engineers mapping by helicopter difficult and uncharted terrain. I was most happy to fly with two young officers from Jacksonville who were piloting the helicopters from which we inspected the work on the Rama road, which will give the first modern access in that country from the Caribbean to the Pacific.

In Costa Rica I found Dr. W. G. Kirk, a Floridian, director of our range cattle experiment station, on assignment from our State board of control to aid them. With him was a veterinarian to help the local livestock people, sent by the State livestock sanitary board to teach new animal husbandry practices to the Costa Ricans. Our Dr. Harold Mowrer, former head of our experiment station, was employed there as principal official adviser on agriculture in Costa Rica.

Later in 1955 I went to Panama in pursuance of my duties as chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations which handles Panama Canal matters. Aside from the great benefit the Panamanians derive from the operation of the canal, we now will undertake to build a high-level bridge over the Pacific end of the canal, which we are committed to do under our latest treaty with them. This bridge will be of great value both to the Panamanians and to us, and will be the final link of the Inter-American Highway.

In each of these countries I found many other evidences of progress and real constructive help accomplished through our cooperation. Also I found the greatest possible interest on the part of the Latin American people in our country and our people. The friendliest of attitudes toward us was abundantly displayed everywhere.

The completion of the Inter-American Highway to the Panama Canal, and the improvement of travel and hotel facilities along the way will undoubtedly attract in the future a large portion of the thousands of Americans who annually travel abroad. In riding by car over a considerable portion of the highway I observed many things of interest to be seen there, active volcanoes, fascinating terrain of rugged beauty; numerous birds and animals and much colorful vegetation that are strange to North American eyes. Besides all these the natural pride of American people in the Panama Canal, one of our greatest achievements in the fields of engineering and public health, will lure many of our people there.

It is well known to all of your here that plans are underway for linking Florida with the Inter-American Highway by the existing ferry service from Key West to Cuba, the Cuban highways to a port near Cape San Antonio, and a second ferry across the 110 miles of the Yucatan Channel to Yucatan. The Mexicans are building the several hundred miles of road required to complete the junction with the Inter-American Highway. This will provide a fabulous loop for tourism.

The economic and political stability of a number of our sister Republics depends upon their continued access to United States markets for the goods they produce. The industries that produce these products are usually basic in the various countries. They represent the livelihood of thousands of people. They produce a substantial part, at times the majority of the Government tax income.

Coffee occupies a unique position in inter-American trade. It is by far the most important commodity in our trade relations with the other American Republics. It, therefore, has great significance in our relations with the coffee-producing countries and in economic, social, and political conditions within those countries.

Twice, as a member of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, I have participated in conferences on coffee problems with representatives of Brazil, Colombia, and other Latin American countries, which resulted successfully in easing tensions and the renewal of cordial and uninterrupted trade. I found them delightful gentlemen, but well informed on every aspect of the coffee trade, and properly aggressive in the advancement of the interests of their people.

Sugar is vital to the stability of the Cuban economy. Aside from our normal commercial intercourse we have made Cuba our preferred supplier of sugar. Also we receive heavy imports of their fruits and vegetables and a large portion of their tobacco crop finds its way to Tampa, where more clear Habana cigars are manufactured than are made in Habana itself. Bananas are a major crop in several countries, particularly in Central America.

Venezuela earns 95 percent of its foreign exchange through the sale of petroleum products, about 40 percent of which are sold to us. These conditions can be extended to include the importance of copper to Chile, tin to Bolivia, lumber to Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico, and other similar examples.

The greatest opportunity for mutual benefit for the people of this hemisphere is through economic development of Latin America and the expansion of inter-American trade. In this, however, we must bear in mind that trade is always a two-way proposition. We cannot only sell our manufactured goods and other products—we must also buy, and the channels of trade must be kept reasonably open so that trade may flow in both directions. Live and let live, give and take, must be our motto and our practice.

The fields in which private enterprise and initiative can expand and develop the Latin American economic opportunities are indeed challenging and it would be difficult to overstate the importance of these economic possibilities to the people of our country and the other American Republics. While the governments of the hemisphere can make and are making many contributions toward this development, the course which our countries will follow in this mutually beneficial undertaking will be determined mainly by the attitude of the people themselves.

Sixteen years ago, in my inaugural address as Governor of Florida, I referred to Florida as "this index finger of North America which points southward to the lands whose future is so intimately linked with ours." That concept was sound then—it is just as sound today. With each passing year it becomes increasingly important that much of our time, our attention, our planning, and our sympathetic understanding shall be given to those ways and means by which this hemisphere can be developed more uniformly and on a basis which shall always be joint and mutual.

The people of Florida and of every State in the United States have reason to have faith in and friendship for our fellow Americans, our allies with whom we share this new world, as they—our Latin American neighbors—are entitled to have faith in us. United in this faith, we peoples of the Americas have an obligation to work together with each other in bringing to the rest of the world a shining example in this hemisphere of how peace, justice, material wellbeing, and spiritual progress can exist on this earth.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Members of the Senate some recent developments in the unemployment picture which emphasizes again the importance of passing the area redevelopment bill, S. 964, which the eminent senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] has introduced with a number of other Senators, including myself, as cosponsors.

The Bureau of Employment Security has announced that seven more areas in the United States have been added to the list of those with substantial unemployment—which is defined as over 6 percent of the labor force. Two areas have been removed from the list, making a net increase of five. One of the areas added is Erie, in my State of Pennsylvania. Two other major areas, one of them Altoona, Pa., have been added to the list of those with unemployment over 9 percent; while one has been removed.

In looking at the statistics which show that the Nation as a whole has a moderately high level of employment and a high level of production and income, we must always keep in mind the fact that our prosperity is uneven and that localized depressions can exist and have existed over long periods of time in the midst of general prosperity. These communities are doing everything they can to lift themselves up by their own bootstraps, but they have exhausted their local resources and desperately need Federal assistance.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks the following excerpts from the Area Classification Summary in the July 1957 edition of the Bimonthly Summary of Labor Market Developments in Major Areas, published by the Bureau of Employment Security, with an explanatory note, which shows that the problem of severe localized unemployment is still with us and getting worse.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT A

AREAS CHANGED FROM C TO D

Detroit, Mich.: Unemployment reaches substantial levels as auto payrolls continue to edge downward during the late spring. Joblessness still below year-ago levels, however, despite recent rise. Little overall improvement expected until after changeover to 1958 models gets under way.

Erie, Pa.: Reductions in electrical, nonelectrical machinery (air conditioners), primary metals and railroad equipment boost unemployment to substantial proportions. Cutbacks in nonelectrical machinery scheduled to continue to early autumn. Joblessness likely to remain high to year end.

Knoxville, Tenn.: Employment downtrend, under way since turn of year, boosts unemployment to substantial levels. Recent losses heaviest in primary metals (aluminum), instruments; completion of Government contracts cuts apparel. Unemployment expected to remain near current levels through early autumn.

AREAS CHANGED FROM D TO E

Flint, Mich.: Sharp rise in area's already substantial labor surplus results from continuing layoffs in dominant autos and in auto-related electrical machinery and fabricated metals. Joblessness now double early spring level. Further, temporary layoffs expected during auto model changeover period.

Altoona, Pa.: Unemployment, already high in early spring, shows further rise as area's dominant railroad-equipment industry cuts local payrolls. Joblessness now about two-fifths above year-ago mark. Additional curtailments scheduled in railroad equipment, with very little improvement likely in other industries.

AREAS CHANGED FROM E TO D

Terre Haute, Ind.: Gains in electrical equipment and supplies, construction, pace recent employment uptrend. Rise in latter industry spurred by work on large new brass plant. Unemployment, although still substantial, almost one-fourth below year-ago level. Further improvement expected to early autumn, with principal gain likely in construction; some factory increases also scheduled.

SMALLER AREAS—DELETION FROM LABOR SURPLUS LIST

Lexington, Ky.: Joblessness drops to moderate proportion as new industrial growth spurs sizable payroll advances. Metals and machinery group nearly doubles its workforce over the year; construction and service also score substantial increases. Scheduled additional hires for several new manufacturing plants, pickups in construction, farm and trade presage further improvement in area situation to early autumn.

Richlands-Bluefield, Va.: Sizable expansion in key coal mining hires at new furniture plant lead over-the-year employment uptrend. Unemployment now one-third below year-ago levels. Further job gains in prospect to September; staffing of new apparel plant, increases in electrical machinery due to spearhead rise.

SMALLER AREAS—ADDITIONS TO SUBSTANTIAL LABOR SURPLUS LIST

Bay City, Mich.: Sizable cutbacks in auto parts manufacturing and shipbuilding primarily responsible for recent unemployment increases; losses in fabricated metals, foundries and machinery also contribute. Some plants operating on reduced work-week schedules. No basic improvement in area situation is expected over the next few months, although food processing, building materials, construction, and trade may rise seasonally.

Rutherfordton-Forest City, N. C.: Area's substantial unemployment due principally to long-term weakness in dominant textile industry. Construction, trade, service payrolls also down since year ago; joblessness up one-fourth since last December. Further unemployment rise averted by outmigration, out-commuting, and withdrawals from labor force. Only minor changes anticipated over next few months.

Portsmouth-Chillicothe, Ohio: Recent shutdown of large local shoe factory boosts joblessness above substantial levels. Primary metals, railroad transportoation, construction, trade and coal mining among other important industries reporting payroll losses since year ago. Light hiring in paper, atomic energy provides only partial offset to these declines. Little prospect for significant change during the next few months.

Springfield, Ill.: Sizable layoffs in important nonelectrical machinery, smaller over-the-year losses in electrical machinery, food processing cut factory employment to 7-year low; boost unemployment to substantial level. Joblessness now some 70 percent above year-ago level. Little basic improvement likely in next few months; factory employment may dip further.

THE FREDRIC R. MANN AUDITORIUM AT TEL AVIV, ISRAEL

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on October 2, in Tel Aviv, Israel, there will be dedicated a new home for the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. It will be called the Fredric R. Mann Auditorium.

The name it bears is that of an old friend and associate, a Philadelphia business and civic leader and patron of the arts. Its opening is the fruition of a dream born some 6 years ago in the City of Brotherly Love. Fredric R. Mann is the city representative and director of commerce of the city of Philadelphia, and president of the Robin Hood Dell. Each summer, the Friends of the Dell, headed by Mr. Mann, join with the city's Department of Recreation in presenting a free summer series of concerts featuring the Robin Hood Dell Symphony—substantially the famous Philadelphia Orchestra—and great stars of the concert world in the sylvan setting of Robin Hood Dell in Philadelphia's famed Fairmount Park. These concerts are attended annually by almost half a million Philadelphians. I am happy to note that they were made a free service to the people of Philadelphia while I was mayor of that city and while Mr. Mann was commissioner of recreation.

In 1951 the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra made a goodwill tour of the United States as a means of showing the people of this country the cultural attainments of an infant State born 3 years before. They played at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia and in their tour of that historic city visited the Robin Hood Dell. They told Mr. Mann that throughout Israel there was no concert hall adequate for performing before the music-hungry people of that country. The Israel Philharmonic is composed of the greatest musicians of Europe, most of whom were rescued from the Hitler terror that drove them from their countries and exterminated so many of their people.

This need for a concert hall fell upon the ears of a man whose love for music is almost an obsession. He is chairman of the board of the America-Israel Cultural Foundation, an agency dedicated to the cultural interchange between the two countries. Through that agency, he rallied his friends and gave generously of his own funds and raised the money to build this home which will be one of the finest music structures anywhere in the world.

On Wednesday evening, October 2, the Fredric R. Mann Auditorium will formally be given to the people of Israel with a concert featuring some of the greatest musical stars that America has to offer: Leonard Bernstein, America's great young composer-conductor; Artur Rubinstein, the distinguished pianist; Isaac Stern, the world-renowned violin virtuoso: and Gregor Piatigorsky, the world's premier cellist. Coming from all over the world will be the great names of music and government. A large delegation of Americans will be present as guests of the Prime Minister of Israel, the Honorable David Ben Gurion.

As a Pennsylvanian and a Philadelphian, I take great pride in the fact that Fredric Mann will be so singly honored in the new city in the age-old land of the Bible. His name, engraved on this hall, will stand as a reminder of the friendship between the people of the United States and the heroic people of the world's newest democracy.

REPORT OF ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished, and I may say revered, Senator from the State of West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I am most pleased to present to the Senate a report of the activity of that committee during the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

The Committee on the District of Columbia is somewhat unique among Senate committees in that to it are brought a great variety of problems and a broad gamut of legislative proposals. It acts not only as a Senate committee on problems of national import, but in addition as the equivalent of the upper house of a State legislature and as a city council. Due to the many conflicting interests that stem from the fact that the city of Washington is the National Capital, and a voteless National Capital without representative self-government, these duties must necessarily devolve upon us. Service upon the District of Columbia Committee is, however, a most rewarding assignment in that it enables a Senator so chosen an admirable opportunity to learn at firsthand of the many pressing problems that the Capital shares with the other great metropolitan areas of our country. It serves as an excellent discipline to a Senator in the difficult art of mastering with speed and accuracy many detailed and technical aspects of modern municipal management, and it provides an insight into some of the problems faced in every State by State authorities.

These are the reasons Mr. President, which motivate those of us who are fortunate enough to be selected to serve on the committee to attempt to carry on our assignment to the best of our ability. It is for these reasons, Mr. President, that we are proud of the record that the committee makes in the field of constructive legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report I submit herewith be printed in the body of the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. It consists of a summary statement of committee activity and a statistical table of committee action on matters referred to it for consideration.

In connection with this activity report, Mr. President, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to one overall statistic. The committee had referred to it in this session 105 matters. These matters included Senate bills, House acts, resolutions from both bodies, and nominations. I submit that for the committee to have given active consideration to all but 33 of these matters is a commendable record.

I should also like to point out that 10 of the 33 matters to which no active consideration has as yet been given were received by the committee subsequent to August 1 of this year.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, 85TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION, AUGUST 30, 1957

The Committee on the District of Columbia received for consideration in the 85th Congress, 1st session, the following:

Senate bills	71
House bills	25
Senate resolutions	2
Senate joint resolution	1
Senate concurrent resolution	1
House concurrent resolution	1
Nominations	4
Grand total	105

Hearings were held by subcommittees on 38 Senate bills and 11 House bills. The full committee held hearings on four nominations, all of which were favorably reported by the committee.

The full committee met nine times.

Of the 23 Senate bills reported to the Senate, 18 were passed by the Senate and four were indefinitely postponed and companion House bills were considered and passed in lieu thereof. One Senate bill was recommitted and a companion House bill was reported in lieu thereof. Of the 14 House bills reported to the Senate, 13 were passed by the Senate. One House concurrent resolution has been approved by both bodies.

As of this date, one House bill is pending on the Senate Calendar.

Conference committees were appointed on two bills, and Senate conferees have been appointed on one bill. Three conference committee meetings were held. The Senate acted favorably on the three conference reports.

In addition to the foregoing, extensive hearings were conducted on the problems of hungry children in the District of Columbia, home-rule proposals for the District of Columbia, Potomac River crossings, Sibley Memorial Hospital site, and police and firemen retirement legislation. Two subcommittee field trips of an investigatory nature were made in addition to the formal hearings.

The following is a statistical summary of committee action:

Number of bills, acts, resolutions, and nominations referred to committee	105
Number of bills, acts, resolutions, and nominations reported to Senate	42
Number of bills, acts, and resolutions in process (hearings held or other action taken)	9
Number of bills, acts, and resolutions disposed of through consolidation with other Senate bills or House acts	18
Number of bills, acts, and resolutions indefinitely postponed within committee	3
Number of bills, acts, and resolutions awaiting initial action	[1] 33

[1] Of this number, six Senate and four House bills were received by the committee subsequent to Aug. 2, 1957.

The following is a list, by title and number, of all bills and acts passed by the Senate. Those that became law are indicated by the public or private law number.

THE TUNGSTEN MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, many times during the past session I have called the attention of the Senate to the critical situation of the mining industry of the West. My colleagues will remember that during this session we passed a bill to provide $30 million for the American tungsten mining industry, only to see that item struck from the appropriation bill in the House of Representatives.

It seems ironical to me that we on one hand give nearly the same amount of money to assist a mining industry in a foreign nation, when we fail to consider the needs of our own mining industry. This is just one specific instance; I am sure there are many more. I sincerely hope the Congress and executive department of this Nation will awaken to the disastrous policy we are now following before it is too late.

Production of tungsten, as well as other minerals, has practically ceased in Nevada. The tungsten industry now has fewer than 100 employees in my own State. Many miners are out of work. In all fairness I ask the question: "Is it good policy to let our American miners' breadbaskets go empty while we take our tax dollars and build a mining industry in a foreign country?" An industry which will, and which does, import cheaply mined minerals to our American shores to compete with our own labor. Somewhere we must draw the line.

I should like to call attention to the last two paragraphs of an editorial which was published recently in one of Nevada's leading newspapers, the Nevada State Journal.

The editorial calls attention to the 16-page supplement inserted by the Government of Korea in the August 11 issue of the New York Times. It points out one line in this supplement which says: "Korea will spend 29.8 millions of American dollars for rebuilding Korean mining industry." Photos show that many of these are tungsten mines.

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the Record at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

[From the Nevada State Journal of August 25, 1957]

Which Should Come First, the Far West or Far East?

While the tungsten, copper, and lead-zinc mines in Nevada, and throughout the West, wallow in the doldrums, the United States House of Representatives sailed along last week toward adjournment, seemingly oblivious of the plight of thousands of miners thrown out of work and the imminent danger of a complete shutdown of the industry producing these vitally needed metals.

The lower House of Congress en masse, of course, is not really unaware of the critical mining situation. It only appears to be so. Walter S. Baring, Nevada's Representative in the House, for instance, made it plain to his colleagues that the tungsten mines would close without a Federal purchase plan. Many other Members of the lower House have done the same, and both of Nevada's Senators, too, have continually hammered the point.

But the House, composed mainly of easteners to whom the Far West is only a place "out there," are concerned not with where metals are produced, nor the "at home" economic repercussions resulting therefrom. The vast majority, if they have given the metals market any thought at all, only seek to make certain the product is on hand. Where the tungsten, lead and zinc or copper comes from does not concern them. Of if they are one whit worried about it they prefer the mining be done in Latin America or the Orient, fearing protection for this lifeblood industry of the Western United States will disrupt public relations abroad.

The United States Senate must be exempted specifically from this dereliction, having given mining more than adequate support. Other divisions of Government, however, are in the same category as the lower House of Congress, as well as some individuals whose sole reason for throttling down the industry is personal gain.

In the latter category is a man named Phillip McKenna, head of Kennemetal, Inc., the parent company of the Nevada Scheelite, which closed when the Federal tungsten purchase program was discontinued. Mr. McKenna was not worried about that development, though, because he stood to gain much more by the discontinuance than through this comparatively small Nevada industry. Representative Baring, in a letter to this newspaper last spring, said McKenna was the one man responsible for the House Appropriations Committee's turning down the tungsten subsidy.

The committee chairman relied almost solely on McKenna's testimony. And McKenna said the purchase program was unnecessary. McKenna is principally a fabricator, not a producer. When tungsten purchases were discontinued, 110,000 units were then scheduled for sale on the open market, forcing the price down under distress selling. It was estimated by the Nevada Congressman that McKenna, buying under this situation, would stand to gain about $30,000 a month. But the lower House listened, and the subsidy died.

It is all very well to harangue about free trade and open competition, but the Government is now engaged in a policy, as far as metal is concerned at least, in which money is loaned to foreign nations to put our own workers out of work and our own businessmen out of business.

An excellent illustration of the truth of such an assertion is that found in the New York Times of Sunday, August 11. Included in the issue is a 16-page advertisement inserted by the Government of Korea, which explained in the main how a generous American Government was helping rebuild that nation. Among the statistics was one sentence pointing out that Korea will spend 29.8 millions of American dollars for rebuilding Korean mining and industry. The advertisement, in itself a very costly piece of propaganda, was dotted with photos of Korean tungsten properties, all of which are being reactivated with that 29.8 million dollars—almost the exact sum which would have kept our own tungsten mines going for the fiscal year, and kept American miners employed.

Giving succor to downtrodden nations cannot be too highly commended. But if the Congressmen and others who consider themselves international philanthropists will turn their eyes, for just a little while, to the Western United States they might become persuaded that their own countrymen are in need of an even break too, at least once in a while.

CLOTURE IN THE SENATE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I wish to read into the Record this morning a statement issued by six Senators, as follows:

Joint Statement

We have felt right along that the threat of a filibuster was overhanging the debate and influencing the Senate's action on the civil-rights bill. Also, we have seen a sample of what the filibuster means to civil-rights measures and how it can block the public business in such critical times. We wish to state therefore that this demonstration strengthens our determination to work for reasonable amendments to rule XXII to make it more practical to invoke cloture in appropriate situations. In this way discussion may finally be brought to a close after full and fair debate, not obstruction, and we may perform our constitutional duty to vote on the issue. We propose to forward vigorously the efforts to attain that objective.

CLIFFORD P. CASE, New Jersey.
IRVING M. IVES, New York.
JACOB K. JAVITS, New York.
THOMAS H. KUCHEL, California.
CHARLES E. POTTER, Michigan.
EDWARD J. THYE, Minnesota.

Mr. President, for the information of the Senate I wish to state that the subcommittee on which I had the honor to serve with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. TALMADGE] has concluded its hearings, and the proceedings are being printed. During the recess I expect that each of us will file a report. I look forward with real expectation that early in the next session of Congress some action will be taken on the subject upon which a number of resolutions are pending, and upon which we have had a very important case history made.

USED CAR DEALERS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, the attention of the Subcommittee on Automobile Marketing Practices has been called to what appears to be improper practices by some used-car dealers in the District of Columbia, by which they have succeeded in making collection agents of the armed services on installment sales of used automobiles to servicemen—all directly contrary to armed services regulations. I respectfully request that the Secretary of Defense make a thorough investigation of this matter, with the view of making necessary revisions in the regulations relating to allotments by servicemen.

Armed services regulations limit the purposes for which an allotment may be registered by a serviceman, but quite properly provide that allotments from their pay may be made to savings institutions. Certainly, we will all commend this method of encouraging thrift among members of the Armed Forces.

However, it now comes to the attention of the Subcommittee that these provisions of the armed services regulations are being exploited by some unscrupulous used-car dealers in the District of Columbia. These dealers have persuaded members of the armed services to arrange for monthly payments on used automobiles by allotting part of their pay to an unlicensed saving institution. The used-car dealer then arranges for the serviceman to open a joint account with the dealer—joint only in the sense that the serviceman puts the money in and the dealer promptly takes the money out.

Several examples of this practice have come to our attention.

I would like to submit for the RECORD at this point, a letter to the Pittsburgh Sun Telegraph from the mother of a 23-year-old Army private stationed at Fort Benning. This young man contracted with a District of Columbia used car dealer to pay $75 a month for a 1953 used car. His monthly pay is $80. The car payments were to be deducted by the Army from his pay as an allotment. Incidentally, the finance rate was nearly 40 percent simple interest on the unpaid balance. This soldier paid $400 down and then the car was repossessed from his mother's yard without warning although the car was left locked while the boy was on furlough in Pittsburgh.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the letter from the serviceman's mother.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AUGUST 14, 1957.

SUN-TELEGRAPH PAPER:

I read your paper every day especially the part where people speak their minds. I have never had an occasion to write a letter to that column but I do enjoy it, and I think I have a very good reason to write one now. It may help some soldier boy that has a little money saved up and is thinking of buying a car in Washington, D. C. Here is a racket right in your Capital that is doing a great business with our boys. Their ads in Army papers about the wonderful buys they can get—for Army personnel only—no others can buy them. They even pay the fare from any place in United States to the District of Columbia, if some poor kid happens to be in the market for a car and calls on one of the dealers when he sees their ad.

Now this is no hearsay or lies because it happened to my son who is stationed in Fort Benning, Ga. On June 28 he was one of the unlucky ones to read about the wonderful deal he could get on cars in the District of Columbia. So he called a dealer and they made a deal with him to fly to the District of Columbia, all expenses paid, and on June 29 he bought a car.

My kid is not very smart about cars as he is only 23 years old and the only thing he could see was the red upholstery and a speaker in the rear. Now this car is a 1953 Olds and he paid $1,500 for it and paid $400 cash of which he had been saving for a long time to buy a car.

He brought the car home on leave. His Dad took one look at it and knew it was worth no more than the $400 cash money he paid for it. No brakes, power steering gone, power brakes worn thin. So he got in touch with the dealer. Nothing was done. My son couldn't even drive it back to camp, he had to go by bus. He wrote after he was back in camp and told the finance company that he wouldn't pay another cent until they either changed the car or fixed this one.

By the way, the payments run the kid $75 a month which he was supposed to make out of an allotment of his pay to the finance company. He makes $80 a month.

Now this all happened on June 29. Yesterday (August 13) I was away and the car was locked when I left. I came home last night, no car. The finance company towed it away. Now he has no car and is out $400.

So do you blame me for exposing a racket like this? Are they so money hungry in the District of Columbia that our boys in the United States Army have to be made suckers out of? They only sell cars to Army kids because they know no other person would fall for a line like that. If there is any way at all I am going to get his $400 back.

Oh yes, I forgot to mention that he is stationed in Georgia and has been there since December and will be there for quite a long time but the car salesman gave him a break on his license. He had them issued from Virginia. He told my kid he would do that because there was no sales tax on licenses from there. Some joke, isn't it? Isn't there some protection of any kind to the kids in the service from a racket like this? Thank you.

P. S.—If you print this letter, sign it a mother of a soldier. I can't use my name as I am employed as a State worker.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, last month there came to my attention a similar situation in which a 19-year-old Air Force private stationed at Griffiss Air Force Base in Rome, N. Y., was lured into the clutches of a District of Columbia used-car dealer under the most shameful circumstances. This young man was promised that the expenses of his trip from his base would be deducted from the cost of the car. As finally signed the contract carried interest of more than 35 percent. The car broke down four times at a cost of $113.45 on the way home.

Responsible people tell us that these practices are creating a real problem to the Armed Forces because of the effect which it has on the morale of servicemen and their families when they fall into the hands of some of these loan companies and are subjected to the harassment to which they resort. Furthermore, the armed services are being forced to devote a great deal of time and money to maintain accounting facilities to handle these allotments, which are in fact nothing but disguised automobile payments.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter from the Military District of Washington be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS,
MILITARY DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON,
Washington, D. C., August 13, 1957.

Subject: Usury and fraud complaints.

1. There has been an increased number of complaints received from service personnel regarding fraudulent sales on the part of car dealers in the District of Columbia area. These normally are cases of misrepresentation and unscrupulous business dealings on the part of the car dealer which often result in economic loss to the serviceman as well as additional administrative work for the services.

2. The absence of usury or small-loan laws in the District of Columbia makes it desirable that detailed accounts of such activities or places be assembled if effective preventive and remedial measures are to be undertaken. The marshaling of complaints will permit a determination at the proper time whether the current practices of certain automobile dealers justify and require appropriate action under AR 600–10 in order to safeguard the welfare of the military personnel.

3. The Armed Services Police, the action agency for the Washington Armed Services Disciplinary Control Board, has been designated as the office of record for all service cases involving sales frauds or the unreasonable exploitation of the serviceman by elements of the civil economy. Commanders will refer all such cases coming to their attention of the armed services police for appropriate action.

For the commander:

T. M. KOBAYASHI,
Lieutenant Colonel, Adjutant General's Corps, Assistant Adjutant General.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. President, I want to make it clear that I do not criticize the Army, Navy, or Air Force because some of our young servicemen get stung by "new-car-itis" and trapped in the web of usury. This happens to millions of civilians as well as Army people because of the total lack of any regulation on time sales except in the handful of enlightened States that have dealt with this problem and have recognized that people who buy merchandise on time need the same kind of protection as those who borrow money under small-loan laws.

Nor do I blame the services for unwittingly allowing themselves to become agents for automobile finance companies. This came about as the result of an Armed Forces regulation designed to encourage thrift by allowing servicemen to allot part of their pay to legitimate savings institutions.

As with most regulations the smart operators just figured a way around it. The automobile finance companies have the allotment made out to a local unlicensed savings institution which turns it over to the finance company.

However, now that this racket has been called to the attention of both the military departments and this subcommittee, I am today requesting that the Secretary of Defense make a thorough investigation of the methods used and the extent of this practice and report his findings to this body upon our return in January. I want to assure the Secretary of Defense that he may expect the fullest cooperation of the subcommittee members and its staff.

DEVELOPMENT OF NATION'S WATER RESOURCES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, high on the list of constructive accomplishments of this session of Congress is the action taken to develop our Nation's water resources.

We have authorized and made appropriations for the construction of flood control and water conservation projects of the utmost importance.

We have approved reclamation projects that will pay for themselves in the increased productivity they will make possible.

We have made further progress in the development of our inland waterways, which are a vastly significant factor in our economy.

We have authorized river basin surveys that will lay the foundation for the water development projects of tomorrow.

Mr. President, I am frank to say I feel a personal pride in these accomplishments. The pride is personal, because to me the water problem is deeply personal.

Nowhere does that problem loom larger than in my own State of Texas.

In Texas we are 25 years behind other States in the development of our water resources. Action taken during this session of Congress, when combined with action being taken by the State government of Texas, will take us a long way toward an adequate solution of our water problem. The groundwork has been laid for Texas to catch up with other States.

When the President signed the public works appropriation bill enacted by the Congress, he said he did so with reluctance because it contained projects not approved by the Bureau of the Budget.

Mr. President, I am glad we added those projects.

The Congress has consistently refused to give the President the item veto power. Why should we permit an executive agency, the Budget Bureau, to exercise such power?

The Congress has the clearcut responsibility for developing and carrying out an adequate water program for the Nation. We have met that responsibility during this session, and I congratulate my colleagues for their refusal to allow themselves to be bound by policies that are both restrictive and repressive.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF CONGRESS DURING THE 1ST SESSION OF THE 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, we are approaching the closing hours of the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

Adjournment sine die always touches off a vast wave of speculation. Some analysts pore over the record with a fine tooth comb. Others write their summaries off the nearest wall.

All this in an effort to judge the merits of the work of the Congress.

Usually, the analyses are based upon some kind of predetermined list of bills. The Congress is considered successful if it passes a high percentage of bills on the list; a failure if the percentage is low.

Personally, I have always been skeptical of the value of such judgments. It is possible to measure the percentage of bills passed on such a basis. But just how can the value of the measures on the list be determined?

It is not completely out of the question for those who make the list to pad them with legislation of a certain variety. I cannot avoid the suspicion that this is something that may be done even by Presidents—of both parties.

Sometimes recommendations are made with an air that suggests somebody's tongue is in somebody's cheek. For example, this year the President recommended tax relief for small business but did not send us a bill providing for that relief.

Members of the majority party introduced several bills along those lines. But the Secretary of the Treasury testified against each one of those Democratic bills. The result was an inability to get together, and no tax relief for small business.

It is possible to give Congress a low box score by sending it legislative recommendations made up like a laundry list. It is possible to give Congress a high box score by making the original list low and compact. Either way, the box score has little meaning.

Another way to find a standard for judgment of a Congress is to use as the basis the amount of controversy which was created. Again, I have strong doubts as to the value of this standard.

There have been many controversies, in my experience, which have generated considerable heat, but little power. Other actions of historic importance have created hardly a ripple—because there was little controversy.

Recently, a national publication scoffed at the inclusion of a poultry-inspection bill on a list of important measures passed by Congress. It is, of course, simple to succumb to the temptation to make a wisecrack about a chicken-feed bill.

But I wonder whether the housewife—who must worry about the health and welfare of her family—would consider this measure unimportant. How much does it mean to her to know that the food which her family is getting has been inspected for purity by competent Federal inspectors? And how many housewives are there in this country?

Mr. President, it seems to me that both the tests I have described previously are inadequate. It also seems to me that there are very clear tests which give a true picture of whether a Congress has performed well.

Has it met the real problems of our times?

Has it passed legislation that our people need?

Has it resolved—rather than created—controversies?

Has it rejected unwise proposals, as well as accepted wise proposals?

On the basis of those tests, the 1st session of the 85th Congress can go to the American people. And I believe its record will meet with the approval of the people.

Had this Congress passed no other measure, its passage of the voting-rights bill would entitle it to a place in history.

I realize that honorable men disagree over the merits of the measure. But no one can argue that it is meaningless. And no one can avoid the fact that it is the first such measure passed by Congress in 82 years.

During four generations, this controversy has divided our people and inflamed passions; and there was no action—just more fuel to pour on the flames of hatred.

Mr. President, no one pretends that the problem has been solved. But the mere fact of action is a long step toward an ultimate solution.

And when we have acted strongly to protect voting rights, that step is a long one indeed. The voting-rights bill means that we are passing from the stage of partisan oratory into reasonable consideration.

There is never any legitimate fear of measures which men consider in the light of reason.

There were other actions of this Congress, however, which can be considered historic, without abusing that too-much-used word.

One was the Middle East doctrine, sent to this Congress in the opening days of the session. I believe we can all be frank to admit that in its original form, it could not have been approved.

But a need existed for action. There was a vacuum to be filled. The Senate departed from a longstanding custom of either accepting—in toto—or rejecting—in toto—an executive recommendation.

Instead, we worked with the executive department to produce a measure which bore the stamp of both branches of our Government. The result was a joint product of which all Americans can jointly be proud.

The responsibility for this doctrine—whether for good or for bad—must be shared by both branches of our Government. And since the fundamental need of our country was unity, this is far to be preferred to partisan advantage.

Another far-reaching step was the approval of the International Atomic Energy Treaty. It is perhaps unfortunate that we did not stage the debate on it in a boxing arena. Had there been blood on the floor, the Nation might have been forcefully reminded that we were taking one of the most important steps in foreign policy in many years.

This treaty promises to convert the atom from an instrument of war to an implement of peace. Furthermore, it is the only step that has been taken toward international control of the atom since atomic power was unleashed.

Mr. President, we have had speeches, plans, and debates. But the only positive step—under adequate safeguards—has been the negotiation of the treaty and its approval by the Senate.

This measure did not wind up in blazing heat, simply because careful and prudent men studied it from every angle, in advance. There was little controversy—but that was due to the fact that every aspect had been thought out in advance. The committee, under the distinguished chairmanship of the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. Green], had done a thorough, an adequate, and a remarkable job, along with the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and along with the distinguished minority leader and other Members who are interested in the problem of world relations and the future of mankind.

In the long view of history, this treaty may turn out to be a turning point in the affairs of mankind.

In the field of mutual security, another forward step was taken. The emphasis was shifted from direct grants—giveaways—to substantial and respectable loans.

I do not think the shift in emphasis was sufficient. But I recognize that the legislative process requires accommodation. We do not all get all we want. But then it is probably best for the country that no one point of view can dominate.

In the course of this debate, we found it possible to make substantial savings.

The original request from the President amounted to $4,400 million. The President voluntarily reduced the request by $500 million; and in passing the authorization bill, the Congress dropped it another $500 million.

The final appropriation was $2,768,760,000—a 37 percent reduction from the original request.

Another significant aspect of this Congress was that it met the demand of our people for economy.

At the beginning of this year, the President sent us a recordbreaking budget for peacetime—$71,800 million. That budget was accompanied by a warning from the Secretary of the Treasury that it must be cut, to avoid a hair-curling depression.

That warning stirred our people deeply. Congress went to work. We searched the budget dollar by dollar, comma by comma, line by line.

Some parts of it could not be touched. We must pay the interest on the national debt; and if it costs as much to refinance the last part of it as it did to refinance the first part of it, under this administration, the cost will ultimately be $11 billion in interest, instead of $7 billion in interest.

We must meet the solemn obligations of our Government to our veterans. We cannot repudiate contracts made in good faith.

But from the part of the budget which was subject to the control of reasonable men, we took $5,927,495,584—a reduction of 9.1 percent.

I have heard the argument that this does not represent real savings because some of it might not effect spending this year. Those arguments are not very impressive.

The reductions represent savings somewhere along the line. And no amount of debate over the technicalities of accounting can conceal that fact.

We kept the faith with our people. And we kept it without cutting down on such vital services as health research and water conservation.

The list of constructive measures approved by this Senate can be continued indefinitely. They may not all be as dramatic as some which have been cited. But they were solid, substantial achievements.

We passed an immigration bill—not one that went as far as I think we should go, but one that still provides genuine relief.

We passed an Agricultural Trade Development Act—another far-reaching step which benefits both our domestic economy and our foreign policy.

We passed the Niagara River power bill, and increased the borrowing authority of the St. Lawrence Seaway Corporation.

We authorized a TVA expansion program and an Atomic Energy Commission construction program.

Mr. President, at the conclusion of these remarks, I shall place in the Record a list of a number of the public bills the Senate has passed at the first session of this Congress. And I shall also place in the Record a statistical summary of our activities, if I may have permission to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Cotton in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I do not believe that such a summary is an adequate basis for judging the merits of a Congress. But, Mr. President, it is a basis for determining the effort that went into a Congress.

And I assure my colleagues that the figures compare favorably with those of any other Congress in recent years.

I shall also add a complete breakdown of the bills which have been passed.

But it is not my purpose today to go into details. We have plenty of time for such an analysis in the future.

For the present, I merely wish to thank all my colleagues—on both sides of the aisle—for the cooperation and patience which made this record possible. It is one of which all of us can be proud.

There are some who will be disappointed because of the things we did not pass.

But some of the proposals were—in our collective judgment—unwise. Some could be postponed—and postponement does not mean death.

The Congress of the United States has existed for nearly 170 years. Our Union will not collapse because we do not pass upon every conceivable proposal in one session.

There will be another session and other sessions and Congresses beyond that. I expect our form of government will endure—and the Congress will endure with it.

The President need not be disappointed. He submitted 155 recommendations.

The Senate has already passed more than half of them, and others are still on the calendar.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Record in connection with my remarks a table in connection with those recommendations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I seriously doubt whether the President really knows and understands how many days and how many long hours members of both parties that make up this Congress have spent in hard, arduous, and difficult work. I hope that after the Congress shall have adjourned the President will have an opportunity, in the quiet of his home, to study the actual facts of what the Congress has done. He will find the record of this session of Congress was as fine as any he can recall, and that it passed more substantial bills than were passed even in the first session of his administration.

Mr. President, this session acted responsibly. This session acted courageously. This session acted constructively. I give full and complete credit for the part they played in this action to the distinguished, able, and wise minority leader [Mr. Knowland] and the Senators who have followed his leadership on the other side of the aisle.

Of course, I am grateful to the Democrats who have participated in formulating the majority program.

We can leave it to the historians to determine the rank of this Congress in history. For the present I think it is sufficient to say it was a job well done.

Individuals may have been disappointed. But the country was not disappointed, as was demonstrated in Wisconsin earlier this week. And when the adjournment bells ring, the record of this Democratic session I think will compare with any.

PRINTING AS A SENATE DOCUMENT LEGISLATIVE RECORD OF 1ST SESSION OF 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement and accompanying legislative review of the legislative record of the 1st session of the 85th Congress be printed in today's RECORD, and that the same material be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement and review were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF THE LEGISLATIVE RECORD, 85TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION, JANUARY 3, 1957, TO AUGUST 30, 1957

Statement by the Honorable LYNDON B. JOHNSON, United States Senator from TEXAS, together with digests of legislation passed by the Senate

DIGEST OF LEGISLATION PASSED BY THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES DURING THE 1ST SESSION OF THE 85TH CONGRESS (CONVENED JANUARY 3, 1957, ADJOURNED AUGUST 30, 1957)

Agriculture

Agricultural Trade Development Act

S. 1314:

This measure extends to June 30, 1958, the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act passed in 1954 to expand international trade between the United States and friendly nations; to promote the economic stability of American agriculture; to make maximum efficient use of surplus agricultural commodities; and to facilitate the expansion of foreign trade.

This extension provided for increasing to $4 billion (from $3 billion) the authorization for sale of farm surpluses to friendly countries for their currencies; and for increasing to $800 million (from $500 million) the authorization for foreign relief grants.

Provision was also made for bartering transactions with European satellites on a selective basis, to permit us to furnish commodities quickly to distressed peoples in satellite countries under circumstances such as those existing during the Hungarian revolt. The act, however, specifically prohibits barter with Russia, Red China, or any area controlled by the Chinese Communists. It also prohibits sales of surpluses to Red satellites for the currency of those nations.

Public Law 128, approved August 13, 1957.

Drought—Deferred Grazing Program

H. R. 2367:

This act requires the Secretary of Agriculture to set up a deferred grazing program to provide aid to drought-stricken areas. It establishes a 5-year Federal program and provides payment to farmers and ranchers in designated disaster counties who withhold their livestock, either partly or completely, from grazing lands for less than 1 year, at rates equal to the fair rental value of the land during periods of adequate rainfall.

This measure is effective only in counties in which native rangeland grazing is a substantial factor in agricultural production, and then only if a limitation of grazing is necessary to reestablish or conserve grass for grazing. The program provides for limited use as well as nonuse and, in these cases, partial use will mean lower Federal payments.

Payments would not be made under the program if livestock were shifted from the deferred areas to other lands if the shift results in overgrazing in the nondeferred areas. Payment to any person for deferred grazing on land in any county, or on land in more than one county if operated as a single unit, is limited to $5,000 for any one year.

Public Law 25, approved April 25, 1957.

Poultry Inspection

S. 1747:

This measure, a Hoover Commission recommendation, provides for compulsory poultry inspection, maintenance of sanitary poultry processing and practices, and correct and informative labeling of poultry and poultry products. The act in effect extends to poultry products the same safeguards which apply to meat and meat products. The inspection provision relates to all poultry and poultry products processed for sale in interstate commerce or in designated major consuming areas. Poultry, as defined in this measure, is restricted to domesticated birds and does not include commercially produced game birds. A consuming area can be designated for regulation only if the volume of poultry or products marketed is such as to affect, burden, or obstruct the movement of inspected poultry in interstate commerce, and then only after public hearing.

Authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to exempt from specific provisions of the measure poultry producers who sell directly to household consumers; retail dealers who cut up poultry products; any person where inspection is impracticable; and persons slaughtering in accordance with religious dietary laws.

Provides penalties for violations. Compulsory features effective January 1, 1959.

Public Law 172, approved August 28, 1957.

Agricultural Conservation Program—Extension

H. R. 1045:

This act extends to December 31, 1962, a democratic program established in 1936 which authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to administer as a Federal program the soil conservation payments to farmers who carry out certain specified conservation practices.

The ACP program has become established as one of the soundest elements of our agricultural program and its operation as a direct Federal program administered by the Secretary of Agriculture (rather than as a State administered program) meets with almost universal approval.

Passed House April 15, 1957.

Passed Senate July 8, 1957.

Plant Pest Eradication

S. 1442:

This measure grants to the Department of Agriculture additional authority to cooperate with the States and localities in an effort to control, eradicate, and prevent the spread of pest and plant diseases by specifically including insect pests, plant diseases, and nematodes, such as the imported fire ant, soybean cyst nematode, witchweed and others.

Public Law 36, approved May 23, 1957.

Wheat Producers—Liability

S. 959:

This measure exempts up to 30 acres from marketing penalties those who produce wheat in excess of their quotas if the entire crop is used for feed, seed, or food on the farm where grown. It covers the 1958 and future crop years.

Farmers who obtain exemptions from marketing penalties are permitted to qualify for payments under the acreage reserve and conservation reserve program.

Public Law 203, approved August 28, 1957.

Wheat Acreage Allotments

S. 606:

This measure permits a redistribution of wheat acreage lost to any Federal project or to any governmental unit having the right of eminent domain. Any farm which has a 4-year rotation system will not lose wheat acres by reason of not planting once every 3 years as is the case at present. Wheat is placed in the same position as other basic commodities by establishing that there will not be an increase in acreage history for wheat farmers who overseed their allotted acres.

Passed Senate, June 24, 1957.

Peanut Marketing Quota

H. R. 6570:

Exempts green peanuts from the acreage allotments and marketing quotas if they are marketed for consumption as boiled peanuts, which will increase the production of a commodity now in short supply.

This measure recognizes that peanuts for boiling are an entirely different commodity from other peanuts and should not be included in the programs designed to regulate the production of peanuts for conventional use.

This exemption will be effective for the 1957, 1958, and 1959 crops.

Public Law 127, approved August 13, 1957.

Tobacco—Marketing Quotas

H. R. 7259:

This measure treats Virginia fire-cured tobacco, type 21, as a separate kind of tobacco for marketing quota purposes, and limits price support for fire-cured, dark air-cured, and Virginia sun-cured tobacco to an amount not greater than the higher of the 1957 support level or 90 percent of parity.

Price supports for these tobaccos are now fixed at a percentage of the burley loan rate. This provision would eliminate any future increases in support levels for the tobacco's concerned arising out of increases in the 10-year moving average price of burley tobacco.

Public Law 92, approved July 10, 1957.

Puerto Rican Crop Insurance

H. R. 632:

This measure provides standby authority for the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation to reinsure the crop insurance on Puerto Rican coffee if private insurance should become unavailable.

Public Law 111, approved July 23, 1957.

Long Staple Cotton—Stockpile

House Joint Resolution 172:

This resolution provides for the transfer to and sale by the Commodity Credit Corporation of 50,000 bales of extra long staple cotton, not in the stockpile.

Extra long staple cotton is in short supply due, in part, to Egypt's decision to sell a substantial portion of its crop to Russia. Producers of this cotton feel that a short supply will so increase the market price that textile millers and consumers will substitute other fabrics for extra long staple cotton.

Public Law 96, approved July 10, 1957.

Durum Wheat Allotments

S. 323:

As a further inducement to the durum wheat growers of Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and California, this legislation extends section 334 (e) of the Agriculture Adjustment Act to the 1957 durum wheat crop. In 1954 durum wheat was in such short supply that Congress authorized additional acreage allotments to those farmers of Montana, North Dakota, and South Dakota who were willing to plant durum wheat. In 1956, at the time Congress extended the durum wheat program, California was added as a participant. Due to a present temporary surplus, this legislation increases the 1957 allotments by only one acre of durum (now two) for each acre of the original allotment devoted to durum, and limits the increase for any farm to 60 acres. It also limits the extent to which farmers receiving increased allotments may participate in the wheat acreage reserve. No part of the increase, nor that part of the original allotment on which the increase is based, may be put in the acreage reserve.

Public Law 13, approved April 2, 1957.

Desert Land Entries on Disconnected Tracts

S. 359:

Amends the Desert Lands Act removing the requirement that a 320-acre tract acquired by a desert-land entryman be an undivided unit. This will permit entry on disconnected tracts provided the aggregate acreage does not exceed 320 acres and provided the various tracts, when taken together, are reasonably compact in form.

This measure, in essence, will allow the development of scattered tracts too small for proper exploitation, but which are close enough to be farmed as a unit.

Passed Senate May 8, 1957.

Farm Income Data

S. 405:

Directs the Secretary of Agriculture to collect, annually, farm income data by economic class of farm. This information will supply important data on low-income farms as an aid to Congress in drafting agricultural legislation.

Passed Senate May 8, 1957.

Peanut Statistics

S. 609:

Removes a statutory requirement for reports from owners or operators of peanut picking or threshing machines. These reports were originally required from owners of threshing and picking machines for hire, in order to give a complete picture of the total amount of peanuts picked and threshed.

At present most peanut farmers own their threshing machines, and the reports of those who rent the machines are of no substantial value to the Department of Agriculture.

Public Law 105, approved July 17, 1957.

Extra Long Staple Cotton

S. 812:

This measure provides that the level of price support for 1957 and succeeding crops of extra long staple cotton be the same as for the 1956 crop which, in effect, freezes the parity price at 75 percent.

Public Law 28, approved April 25, 1957.

Experimental Work

S. 1034:

This measure authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to convey the Midwest Claypan Experiment Station in Missouri, to the University of Missouri, for joint use by the Department of Agriculture and the State of Missouri in a cooperative effort to increase agricultural experimental work.

Public Law 59, approved June 27, 1957.

Feed Grain Study

Senate Resolution 125:

As requested by Congress on May 8, 1957, the Secretary of Agriculture conducted a study of possible methods of improving the feed grain program which could be effective, as far as posible, with the 1958 crop. The Secretary made his report of the study and recommendations to the Senate on July 15, 1957.

Surplus Cotton—Sale

S. 314:

This measure is designed to assist the United States cotton textile industry in regaining its equitable share of the world market by requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to sell not less than 750,000 bales of surplus cotton to domestic textile mills annually for 5 years, beginning with the current fiscal year. Prices would be such as to enable domestic mills to return to the cotton product export level maintained between 1947 to 1952. The cotton may be used only for the manufacture of products for export.

Sale in the United States of products of cotton sold under this act would be punishable by fine of up to $5,000 and imprisonment up to 5 years.

Passed Senate August 26, 1957.

Unused Acreage Allotments

H. R. 8030:

This measure eliminates the requirement that notice of intention not to plant the full acreage allotment must be filed with the county committee in order for the farmer to receive credit for future allotment purposes under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It does not change the provision, however, that the full allotment need not be planted in order to preserve the allotment history for the farm, but merely eliminates the requirement that the farmer must notify the county committee of his intention not to plant his whole allotment. This will relieve the county committee of handling and recording these notices.

The exemption period during which acreage not planted will still be counted for history purposes is limited to the period 1957 to 1959.

Public Law 266, approved September 2, 1957.

Budget Estimates—Improved Procedure

S. 434:

This measure, a Hoover Commission recommendation, provides for an improved method of submitting budget estimates to Congress by the executive branch. The objective of the proposal is that the executive agencies present their budget estimates for a fiscal year on the basis of expenditures to be made or accrued that fiscal year only. In appropriating on this basis, the appropriations committees will grant authority for each fiscal year for expenditures actually to be made or accrued during that fiscal year only—and not for expenditures to be made in future fiscal years, as is done at the present. Authority, however, is given the Appropriations Committees to permit agencies to enter into contracts in advance of appropriations for forward planning of long lead-time programs in subsequent fiscal years.

Passed Senate June 5, 1957.

Joint Committee on the Budget

S. 1585:

This measure, a Hoover Commission recommendation, creates a Joint Committee on the Budget, composed of 7 Senate Appropriations Committee members, and 7 House Appropriations Committee members.

This commmittee will make continuing studies of the Federal budget, and of the anticipated expenditures of Federal agencies during the coming years, and will report this information to the Appropriations Committees.

It will recommend, to the appropriate standing committees of Congress, such changes in existing laws as may effect greater efficiency and economy in Government.

It will also study the original authorizations for appropriations, with a view toward eliminating those authorizations no longer considered necessary; and it will examine the amounts and nature of unused appropriated funds, and of moneys appropriated for expenditure in subsequent fiscal years.

Requires the inclusion in any authorization bill of an estimate of the first 5-year cost of the authorized program.

Passed Senate April 4, 1957.

District of Columbia

Police-Firemen Retirement

H. R. 6517:

This measure provides a new retirement system for District of Columbia Police and Firemen, for Park Police, White House Police, and certain Secret Service members.

Benefits under this act are substantially similar to those available to persons engaged in hazardous occupations under the Civil Service Retirement Act Amendments of 1956 and the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

Credit is allowed for prior Federal and District government service in computing total police or fire department service for pension eligibility. Credit is also allowed for military service unless the military service was subject to social-security deductions.

Deducts from each member's basic salary a 6½-percent contribution to be deposited to the credit of the District in the Treasury. Any member separated from his department, except for retirement, will receive a refund.

Provides for medical and hospital service for any member who becomes temporarily disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the performance of duty.

Provides non-service-connected disability benefits of 2 percent of the basic salary at the time of retirement after 5 years' service as a policeman or fireman, with a maximum limitation of 70 percent.

Provides for disability benefits for service-connected injuries or diseases from a present permissible maximum of 50 percent to a minimum of 66⅔ percent with a maximum of 70 percent. Provides that the minimum age at which a policeman or fireman may be eligible to retire after 20 years service is 50.

Provides increased survivor annuities to widows, dependent widowers, and children of members or former members.

Public Law 157, approved August 21, 1957.

Schoolteachers' Retirement

H. R. 6454:

Amends the act for the retirement of District of Columbia schoolteachers, in order to give them substantially the same benefits as are now available to employees of the Federal and District Governments under the Civil Service Retirement Act.

The effect of this measure is to increase annuities for school employees and widows about 25 percent, and for surviving children from about 50 to 100 percent. Employee's contribution rate is increased from 6 to 6½ percent.

Optional retirement at 62 is permitted after 5, rather than 15 years of service; the reduction factor for retirement before 60, is changed from 3 percent to 1 percent for each year the retiree is under 60, and to 2 percent for each year the retiree is under 55.

Annuities are to be based on the following scale: 1½ percent for the first 5 years of service, 1¾ percent for the next 5 years, and 2 percent for the remainder, multiplied by the years of service.

The benefit provisions are to be retroactive to October 1, 1956. Increased contributions from employees will take effect on the 1st day of the 2d month following enactment.

Public Law 46, approved June 4, 1957.

Solicitations

H. R. 3400:

This act provides for a system of registration in the District of persons and organizations soliciting contributions for charitable purposes.

By requiring charitable solicitors to register with the Commission, to carry identification, and by limiting the period in which contributions may be solicited, the measure seeks to provide protection for the public from unscrupulous solicitors.

The Red Cross and religious organizations are exempt from the provisions.

Public Law 87, approved July 10, 1957.

National Cultural Center—Commission

H. R. 4813:

In 1955, Congress created a Federal commission to formulate plans for construction in the District of Columbia of a civic auditorium, including an Inaugural Hall of Presidents, and a music, fine arts, and a mass-communications center. This measure extends the life of the Commission and changes its name from the District of Columbia Auditorium Commission to a Commission for a National Cultural Center. The Commission will be continued in existence until the National Cultural Center has been completed.

In Conference.

District of Columbia Stadium

H. R. 1937:

This measure authorizes the District of Columbia Armory Board to construct and maintain a stadium with a seating capacity of 50,000.

The overall cost is not to exceed $6 million.

The Board is authorized to issue 30-year tax-exempt bonds, secured by a mortgage on the stadium. The bonds may be redeemed before maturity at not to exceed 105 percent of face value and accrued interest, or refinanced by the issue of refunding bonds.

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to acquire suitable land (total land affected is estimated to about 180 acres) in the area known as the East Capitol Street site.

Approval of this act permits the Armory Board to apply to the Housing and Home Finance Agency for an advance of $35,000 to cover the preliminary planning and survey of the proposed stadium.

Public Law 300, approved September 7, 1957.

District of Columbia Board of Education

H. R. 192:

Amends the act of June 20, 1906, to authorize judges of the District of Columbia district courts to remove any member of the District of Columbia Board of Education for adequate cause affecting his character and efficiency as a member.

Members of the Board are, under present law, appointed for terms of 3 years. There is no provision for removal for cause.

Proceedings would be initiated by a verified complaint filed by the United States attorney for the District of Columbia.

Public Law 119, approved August 2, 1957.

Property—Uniform Succession Law

H. R. 6508:

This act modifies the Code of Law for the District of Columbia to provide for the uniform succession of real and personal property in case of intestacy, to abolish dower and curtesy, and to grant to the surviving spouse a statutory share in the other's real estate owned at time of death.

A similar law is now in existence in all except three States of the Union.

Public Law 244, approved August 31, 1957.

H. R. 7249:

This measure creates a new civil remedy for the District of Columbia whereby a person entitled to receive support, who is not in the District, may bring an action in the place where he or she is, and may have the claim litigated in the District of the person owing the duty of support.

Public Law 94, approved July 10, 1957.

Hospital Center—Increased Authorization

H. R. 7835:

This measure increases the authorization for the District of Columbia Hospital Center to $36,710,000 from $35 million, and extends the period of the authorization from June 30, 1957, to June 30, 1958.

Public Law 73, approved June 29, 1957.

Hospital Center—Additional Increase

S. 1908:

This measure provides that grants under the District of Columbia Hospital Center Act may be made to certain groups organized to construct and operate hospitals in the District, including the Greater Southeast Community Hospital Foundation, Inc., organized to construct a hospital in southeast Washington.

It amends the existing ratio for participation in hospital grants by providing that the District contribute 15 percent and the Federal Government 35 percent, to be matched by private funds.

Increases the authorization for appropriations under the act by $3 million, or from $36,710,000 to $39,710,000.

Passed Senate August 8, 1957.

Substitute Teachers

S. 1841:

This measure authorizes the District of Columbia Board of Education to employ retired teachers as substitute teachers.

Difficulty has been experienced by the schools in maintaining a sufficient list of substitute teachers in the District. An average of 131 substitute teachers are used daily in the District of Columbia public schools.

The act provides that the retirement annuities of such substitute teachers will not be interrupted by becoming employed in this capacity.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

School Attendance

S. 1842:

Amends the act of February 4, 1925, to provide that all children below the age of 18 (and not merely those between 3 and 18) be listed in the District of Columbia school census.

Provides that a census shall be taken as often as the Superintendent of Schools and the Board of Education feel that it is desirable, instead of annually, as now required.

Passed Senate May 22, 1957.

District of Columbia Teacher's College—Degrees

S. 1906:

Authorizes the District of Columbia Board of Education to make rules and regulations for the establishment of a graduate program at the District of Columbia Teachers College, and to prescribe the terms and conditions for admission to the college and for graduation.

The graduate program is desired in order that undergraduate students may remain at the college and earn the postgraduate degrees required of teachers in the District of Columbia public school system.

Passed Senate May 22, 1957.

Alcohol Tests

S. 969:

This measure establishes certain statutory presumptions to be given to a chemical analysis of the amount of alcohol in the blood or urine of any person tried for the offense of operating a motor vehicle while under the influence of liquor.

It will permit the District of Columbia government to dispense with the service of an expert witness who, under present practice, must interpret the results of a chemical analysis on trial. There is only one such expert witness available in the District and, frequently, trials must be delayed because of his absence from the city.

Passed Senate June 26, 1957.

Passed House August 26, 1957.

Bridges—Potomac River

H. R. 6306:

Amends the act of July 16, 1946, to increase to $16 million (from $7 million) the authorized appropriations for two bridges across the Potomac River at 14th Street.

Approximately all of the $7 million has been spent on the one completed bridge, and the second bridge carrying southbound traffic and replacing the present southbound will cost $9,200,000.

Passed House April 8, 1957.

Passed Senate June 26, 1957.

Woodrow Wilson Memorial Bridge

S. 78:

This measure provides that a bridge authorized (in 1954) to be constructed over the Potomac River from Jones Point, Va., to Maryland, be maintained and operated by and at the expense of the States of Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia. The 1954 act provided for maintenance and operation by the States of Virginia and Maryland only.

Passed Senate March 29, 1957.

Revenue Act

H. R. 6258:

Amends the District of Columbia Revenue Act to reduce the license fee for a small trailer from a minimum of $12 and a maximum of $28 to a minimum of $8 and a maximum of $12. This is designed to relieve the inequity by which a small trailer used to transport personal belongings is frequently taxed at a rate comparable to that of a small automobile.

Designates a flat fee of $5 for any ancient automobile (manufactured before 1930) owned solely as a collector's item and not used in general transportation.

Public Law 273, approved September 2, 1957.

American Historical Association

S. 1586:

Removes the $500,000 limitation on real and personal property which may be owned by the American Historical Association, and exempts from the District of Columbia property tax a lot occupied by the association. The $500,000 limitation was set in 1889 when Congress approved the charter of the association. Inflation has rendered this limitation impractical; currently the association owns stock valued at $650,000, and real estate valued at $40,000.

Public Law 83, approved July 3, 1957.

War Memorials

S. 1576:

Under the present law no provision is made for exemption from this tax on sales between two nonexempt parties because the transaction takes place on Government ground, or because the property involved may be located on Government ground.

Public Law 82, approved July 3, 1957.

National Trust for Historic Preservation

S. 1264:

Potomac River Tunnel

S. 944:

This measure authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to construct a four-lane tunnel under the Potomac River north of Memorial Bridge and south of, or under Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Island, at a cost of approximately $25.5 million. Public Law 218, approved August 29, 1957.

B'nai B'rith Henry Monsky Foundation

H. R. 7825:

This measure exempts from taxation the national headquarters of B'nai B'rith located in the District of Columbia. This property contains a library, museum, and exhibit hall of the history of Jews and Judaism in the United States and is open daily to the public without charge.

Tax exemptons of this same nature are now granted to various veterans' organizations, American Red Cross, General Federation of Womens' Clubs, National Society of Colonial Dames, DAR's, YMCA, and YWCA.

Public Law 220, approved August 28, 1957.

District of Columbia Public Assistance

S. 1849:

This measure incorporates into 1 act all 5 of the public-assistance programs administered in the District of Columbia.

At present only three of these programs (aid to dependent children, aid to the aged, and aid to the blind) are covered by substantive legislation. The remainder (aid to the disabled and general public assistance) exist by virtue of language contained in the annual appropriation acts.

This act will provide for more uniform requirements and procedures for determining eligibility for public assistance, and the amount of assistance granted in terms of the needs of the recipient.

Passed Senate August 23, 1957.

District of Columbia Public School Food Services Act

S. 1764:

Passed Senate August 23, 1957.

Income and Franchise Taxes

H. R. 8256:

This measure amends the District of Columbia Income and Franchise Tax Act of 1947 and certain provisions of law pertaining to taxation of personal property in the District:

1. To exclude from gross income for individual income-tax purposes insurance benefit payments received by a taxpayer under the Social Security Act.
2. To add to the exemptions to which a taxpayer is entitled, $500 for taxpayers and their spouses when those individuals have reached 65; and $500 will be allowed to taxpayers and their spouses who are blind.
3. To change existing exemption allowed a head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife. Under present law, a husband and wife living together receive one personal exemption of $2,000 but, if they make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either or divided between them. Under this measure, the exemption of $2,000 would be retained but, if the husband or wife, makes separate returns, the personal exemption of $2,000 shall be divided equally between them.
4. To exclude from gross income for individual tax purposes amounts received as a pension, annuity, or similar allowance for personal injuries or sickness resulting from active service in the armed forces of any country or in the Coast and Geodetic Survey or the Public Health Service to the extent such amounts are excluded from gross income under the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.
5. To increase the maximum amount allowed to taxpayers who elect to take an optional standard deduction, rather than to itemize their deductions, from the present $500 to $1,000.
6. To limit taxpayers using a tax table to persons whose income from specified sources does not exceed $5,000. Present law is $10,000.
7. To eliminate, from personal-property taxation, boats used solely for pleasure purposes.
8. To exempt from licensing tax, under certain circumstances, individuals who engage in a trade, business, or profession, but whose gross receipts during a calendar year are less than $5,000.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA STUDY COMMITTEE

The committee is to report its findings by January 31, 1958.

Amending Life and Fire and Casualty Insurance Acts

S. 1040:

This measure corrects a situation arising from a recent decision of the United States court of appeals in the case of Atlantic Insurance Agency, Inc., a Corporation, et al., v. Albert F. Jordan, Superintendent of Insurance, and brings related sections of law applicable to the business of life insurance into conformity with corresponding sections applicable to the business of fire and casualty insurance.

It also deals with related problems pertaining to issuing and revoking insurance licenses. It permits the Department of Insurance of the District of Columbia to continue to protect the public by issuing or revoking licenses in accordance with standards previously established by Congress.

The provisions which would be added to the insurance acts by these amendments are comparable to provisions usually found in State laws.

Provides the Superintendent with the power to act in cases where insurance companies or persons, who apply for license renewals, are found to be persons having a criminal or otherwise unsavory background; the Superintendent may in such an instance refuse to renew certain licenses.

Passed Senate August 26, 1957.

New Sibley Memorial Hospital

H. R. 8918:

This measure authorizes GSA to exchange, at fair market value, land now occupied by the Hahnemann Hospital for land on the Dalecarlia Reservoir tract (12 acres). Provides for the orderly dissolution of the Hahnemann Hospital and its merger with the Sibley Memorial Hospital. Permits the lien that was attached to the Hahnemann Hospital land to be transferred to the new Sibley Memorial Hospital which will be constructed on the Dalecarlia site and consolidated with the lien to be established as the result of this new construction.

Extends to other hospitals constructed under the Hospital Center Act the privilege of transferring to their new sites any liens in favor of the United States against the lands such hospitals formerly occupied.

Public Law 285, approved September 4, 1957.

Federal employees

Employee Training

S. 385:

This measure, in recognition of the Hoover recommendations as well as Congress' own interest, authorizes the training of Federal employees at public or private facilities. Training is an essential element in all personnel programs so Congress, for the first time, has passed legislation to—

Provide general statutory authority for employee training required to further Federal programs;

Make it possible for all agencies to use whatever facilities can best and most economically serve their training needs;

Provide the President a management tool essential to efficient operation of the departments and agencies;

Establish a central point of responsibility for and control of employee training programs; and Consolidate a variety of existing training authorities of limited scope and applicability.

The Government departments are enthusiastic in support of the measure and have agreed that the small cost could be absorbed by each agency and department.

Passed Senate April 12, 1957.

Civil Service Retirement

S. 601:

This legislation amends Public Law 854, 84th Congress, to make prospective (from October 1, 1956) the requirement that interest be paid on a refund of retirement payments during the entire period of an employee's separation from Federal service.

Under Public Law 854, an employee who receives a refund of his retirement payments on leaving Federal service, and who later reenters Federal service, must repay the refund with interest if he is to obtain credit for his prior years of service. This interest extends for the entire period of the employee's separation from Federal service; under previous law, no interest on this period was charged. To remove any inequities, this measure provides that the law will be applicable only to separations occurring after October 1, 1956.

Public Law 65, approved June 29, 1957.

Disbursing Officer—Postal Department

S. 916:

Permits the assistant disbursing officer of the Post Office Department, or any official designated by the Postmaster General, to continue the accounts and issue checks in the name of the disbursing officer, when that officer dies, resigns, or is otherwise separated from office.

This measure would permit such authority to extend to the last day of the second month following the death, or resignation, of the disbursing officer.

The estate of the disbursing officer is protected from liability arising from the activity of the acting officer, and the acting officer is held responsible.

Passed May 22, 1957.

Lighthouse Service—Retirement Increase

S. 235:

Increases to $75 (now $50) a month the benefits payable to unremarried widows for former Lighthouse Service employees in an effort to bring their annuity more in line with the increased cost of living.

Passed Senate March 8, 1957.

Wage-Board Employees

S. 25:

This measure requires that whenever an increase in compensation is granted to wage-board employees in accordance with local prevailing rates, the increase is to become effective not later than the beginning of the first pay period beginning on or after 30 days following the date on which a wage survey was ordered.

In effect, this will make wage increases retroactive, to some extent, in order that the employees concerned will not be forced to wait several months after comparable wages have increased before receiving a similar increase.

Passed Senate August 22, 1957.

Unscheduled Overtime Duty

S. 1901:

This measure requires the payment of overtime at the usual rate of time and one-half to fire fighters and other standby employees for irregular and unscheduled overtime duty in proportion to the amount they are required to perform.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Security Program

S. 1411:

This measure amends the act of August 26, 1950, which established procedure for the Federal employees security program. The act now provides that in all cases arising under it the officer or employee concerned who is accused of security violations must be suspended without pay before he may be given a hearing.

This amendment makes suspension a discretionary matter. The head of the executive agency concerned may determine that the national security does not require suspension of the employee prior to his hearing, or he may transfer the employee to a nonsensitive position.

Passed Senate August 8, 1957.

Group Life Act—Expenses

S. 1740:

Authorizes the Civil Service Commission to draw on the employees' life-insurance fund for expenses incurred in assuming the assets and liabilities of nine employees' beneficial associations.

The 1954 Employees Group Life Insurance Act was amended in 1955 to permit the Commission to assume the assets and liabilities of approximately 25 benevolent associations, which the act virtually drove out of business. This was done to assure the continuation and protection of insurance policies held by both former and present employees.

The Commission has taken over 16 associations with some 50,000 policyholders; the assets and liabilities of 9 more associations, with 90,000 policyholders, remain to be assumed.

Since the Commission under the amendment of 1955 has only until August 17, 1957, to complete the assumption of the remaining companies, and as it has no funds remaining with which to assume these companies, this bill makes available the reserve fund for the purpose of completing the assumption of the beneficial associations.

Passed Senate June 3, 1957.

Presidential Appointees

S. 1903:

This measure amends the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946, which provides for the payment of transportation expenses to Federal employees and their immediate families serving abroad when they travel to and from their domestic residences on leave or prior to a new tour of duty.

The 1946 act inadvertently failed to cover certain officers or employees appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate to serve a term fixed by law. This amendment includes such persons and their immediate families among those eligible for travel benefits.

Passed Senate August 9, 1957.

Federal Highway Employees—Expenses

S. 1941:

This measure authorizes the Bureau of Public Roads to pay transportation and subsistence to temporary employees on direct Federal highway projects. It had been the Bureau's policy to pay the cost of transportation of these employees from point of hire to project location and return, as well as subsistence cost, or a per diem allowance, during the period of project assignment on the basis of an employment contract. A recent decision of the Comptroller General, however, precludes the payment of transportation and subsistence expenses to temporary employees on the basis of an employment contract and holds that such allowance should be paid as wages.

Public Law 143, approved August 14, 1957.

War-Risk Hazard—Detention Benefits

H. R. 6523:

Extends for 1 year, to July 1, 1958, compensation benefits for employees of the United States or of contractors with the United States for injury or death resulting from a war-risk hazard. Extends for the same period workmen's compensation benefits to Federal civilian employees who suffer injury or death during a period of detention by an enemy force.

Public Law 71, approved June 29, 1957.

Armed Forces—Medical Career Opportunities

H. R. 2460:

This measure is designed to make a regular military career more attractive to nurses and medical specialists of the Army, Navy, and Air Force.

It raises by one grade the career expectancy of the average nurse so that over the course of a career she may expect to become a major or a lieutenant commander and to be retired in this grade. It also expands the number of allowable lieutenant colonels and authorizes a few permanent colonels to provide further incentives for a career as a nurse or a medical specialist.

Initiates a new system of compulsory retirement for nurses who complete specified years of service. This system conforms generally to the provisions covering retirement of women members of the Armed Forces who are not nurses or medical specialists and it follows principles that control compulsory retirement of male officers.

Public Law 155, approved August 21, 1957.

Marine Employees

S. 1412:

Exempts the marine employees of the Departments of the Army and Navy from the Performance Rating Act of 1950. Most of the employees concerned are with the Military Sea Transportation Service. Turnover in this Service is very high and, in most cases, employees must be rated on the strength of their performance in 15- to 45-day tours of duty. This permits no adequate assessment of their proficiency and results in unnecessary burdens being placed on their rating officers.

Public Law 101, approved July 11, 1957.

Coast Guard—Warrant Officers

S. 1489:

This measure corrects an oversight in the Warrant Officer Act of 1954. Its primary purpose is to restore to warrant officers of the Coast Guard the right, which they had prior to the 1954 act, to be retired in the highest grade in which they have satisfactorily served with corresponding retired pay.

Public Law 144, approved August 14, 1957.

Panama Canal Ship Pilots—Retirement

S. 821:

Passed Senate August 9, 1957.

Women's Army Auxiliary Corps

S. 2305:

This measure provides that service in the Women's Army Auxiliary Corps (WAAC) shall be credited to any person who subsequently served on active duty in any of the Armed Forces.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

Merchant Marine Officers

S. 1728:

This measure provides assistance to State and Territorial maritime academies or colleges by:

1. Authorizing the Department of Commerce to make contracts for annual payments with each academy or college for periods up to 4 years, but keeping the actual appropriations on an annual basis.
2. Providing an increase in the level of assistance up to $75,000 a year, or $25,000 if the institution does not meet the requirement regarding admission of out-of-State students.
3. Providing subsistence allowances for cadets at a rate not in excess of $600 per academic year per student.
4. Authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to loan and keep in repair suitable vessels for training purposes.

Passed Senate August 26, 1957.

United States Commissioners—Fees

This measure validates payments totaling about $440,000 to approximately 1,500 female members and former members of the Air Force whose husbands were also members of the uniformed services.

Public Law 272, approved September 2, 1957.

Commissioned Services—Losses in Pay

H. R. 293:

This measure authorizes settlement for certain inequitable losses in pay sustained by officers of the commissioned services under the emergency economy legislation.

These payments were denied because of the application and interpretation of section 201 of the Economy Act of 1932. The act was applied so as to bar increases in pay as a result of promotions. These officers not only failed to receive the increased pay of the higher rank to which they were promoted, but were actually compelled to continue under the pay scale of their old rank, together with a 15-percent reduction of the old pay scale.

Total number of persons affected by this measure is approximately 2,381.

Public Law 255, approved September 2, 1957.

Classified Pay Increase

H. R. 2462:

This measure provides an across-the-board increase of 11 percent, effective at the beginning of the first pay period starting after September 1, 1957, for employees in the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government including court reporters for Federal district counts and for the secretaries and law clerks of Federal judges. The average increase will amount to $515 a year.

The following limitations were imposed:

1. No salary will be increased by more than $1,000 a year.
2. No salary will be increased to above $16,000 a year.
3. No increase for those presently receiving $16,000 or more a year.

Pocket veto, September 7, 1957.

Postal Pay Increase

H. R. 2474:

S. 1732:

This act permits persons receiving retired pay on the emergency officers' retired list, who served satisfactorily in World War II for 6 months or more as a commissioned officer of one of the Armed Forces in a higher grade than that held on the emergency officers' retired list, to be advanced to the higher grade and to have his retired pay computed on the basis of the higher grade.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

Hazardous Duty Pay

H. R. 7914:

This measure amends the Career Compensation Act of 1949, by adding a new category of personnel for hazardous-duty pay. This new category consists of military personnel who serve as human test subjects in thermal stress experiments. For those who qualify, the rate of pay will be $110 a month for officers and $55 a month for enlisted personnel, which is comparable to that now paid for parachute jumping, experimental diving, and low-pressure chamber observing.

The services, however, will expose only volunteer test subjects who are engaged in field test or research under laboratory supervision.

Public Law 208, approved August 28, 1957.

Naval Academy Instructors—Retirement

H. R. 5832:

Increases the retirement annuities of 25 persons (22 former civilian instructors at Annapolis and 3 widows) to the same degree as is now provided for similar retirees.

Naval Academy instructors retiring after October 1, 1956, receive the benefits of the Civil Service Retirement Act. This measure will include the 22 instructors and 3 widows of instructors, who retired prior to this date, under the civil service retirement program.

Public Law 40, approved May 31, 1957.

Finance, commerce, industry

Tax Extension—Excise and Corporate

H. R. 4090:

This measure provides for an extension of the present corporate income tax rate at 52 percent, and the existing rates of certain excises for 15 months, or until July 1, 1958. The rates of these taxes would otherwise have been reduced on April 1, 1957—the corporate rate to 47 percent; the excise taxes subject to reduction were those on alcoholic beverages, cigarettes, automobiles, and automobile parts and accessories.

The extension of these rates for the past 4 years has been required in order to maintain the level of defense spending necessary to insure an adequate defense.

Public Law 12, approved March 29, 1957.

Metal Scrap

H. R. 5686:

Extends to June 30, 1958, the existing suspension of duties and import taxes on metal scrap. Suspension applies to scrap iron and steel, aluminum, magnesium, nickel, but not to lead or zinc scrap.

Public Law 27, approved April 25, 1957.

Small Business—Loan Authority

S. 637:

Increases by $80 million, or from $150 million to $230 million, the business loan authorization of the Small Business Administration. This increase is an emergency measure designed to keep the Small Business Administration in a position to make loans at its present rate and under its present policy until the end of the fiscal year.

Public Law 4, approved February 11, 1957.

Small Business—Extension

S. 2504:

Extends the Small Business Administration from July 31, 1957, to July 31, 1958, and increases its business loan revolving fund by $75 million, or from $230 million to $305 million. This increase automatically raises the SBA's total authorization from $455 million to $530 million.

Small Business Administration, since 1953, has made some 7,000 loans, totaling approximately $350 million. These loans have been to aid small businesses, to supply technical and managerial advice to small businesses throughout the country, and to lend aid in disaster areas.

This present act is intended only as a stopgap measure to keep the Small Business Administration operating until consideration can be given to a House-passed measure providing for a permanent agency.

Public Law 120, approved August 3, 1957.

Financial Institutions Act of 1957

S. 1451:

This measure provides for a revision and modification of all the Federal laws governing banks, savings and loan associations, and credit unions.

It permits banks, upon approval by Comptroller of Currency, to issue preferred stock which, in effect, makes it easier for them to obtain necessary capital.

It simplifies and makes uniform bank reports.

It permits banks to modernize lending policies by making loans on frozen foods, dairy cattle, consumer installment paper, construction loans and working capital loans where the chief security is general credit instead of a mortgage on real property.

It strengthens conflict-of-interest provisions by authorizing agencies to regulate job acceptance by former employees with institutions supervised by them.

It requires disclosure of bank stock ownership.

It requires annual audit of the Federal Reserve Board and examination of Federal Reserve banks with reports to Banking and Currency Committees of Senate and House.

It restricts establishment of branches by Federal savings and loan associations to States where that privilege is given to State savings and loan associations and mutual savings banks.

It provides for regulation of savings and loan holding companies.

It requires annual audit of credit unions if there is evidence that such audits are needed.

It makes cumulative voting for directors of banks permissive instead of mandatory.

It provides for regulation of bank mergers by bank supervisory agencies.

It permits Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to deal with small insolvencies by acting as conservator instead of requiring that banks in this condition be placed in receivership or have their assets taken over by another bank.

Passed Senate March 21, 1957.

Securities Act—Exemption

S. 2299:

This measure increases from $300,000 to $500,000 the permissive limit for issuing securities under regulations of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Under existing law the Securities Exchange Commission may exempt any class of securities if it finds that because of the small amount involved, enforcement of the act is not necessary in the public interest and for the protection of investors.

The permissive increase in this measure, while available to any issuer, is most useful to small businesses seeking a relatively small amount of capital by floating securities.

Passed Senate June 26, 1957.

Securities Exchange—Registration

S. 2520:

This measure increases the registration fee charged against national securities exchanges, and payable to the Securities and Exchange Commission on March 15 of every year, from 2 cents per $1,000 worth of transactions to 5 cents per $1,000.

Includes over-the-counter transactions among those for which a fee is chargeable, and provides that the same 5-cents-per-$1,000 rate will be charged against covered transactions sold by a registered broker-dealer. Seven hundred eighty-five thousand two hundred and fourteen dollars was collected last year in fees from national securities exchanges, all of which goes into the Treasury's general fund.

The fee charged against over-the-counter transactions will fall when the actual transfer of ownership occurs, from the underwriter to the purchaser, unless the underwriter retains a portion of the shares unsold; then the fee would be payable on transfer from the issuer to the underwriter. Only one fee attaches to an issuer-underwriter-broker-purchaser transaction.

Passed Senate August 8, 1957.

Internal Revenue Code, Amendment

H. R. 232:

This measure provides that a taxpayer, who receives or accrues an award in a civil action for breach of contract or breach of trust duty or relationship, may spread the amount over the period during which it would have been received (excludes the breach) if this results in a lesser tax than would otherwise be the case.

It also allows all credits or deductions the taxpayer would have received had he received the income in the absence of a breach.

This act further provides that certificates for 5-year amortization can be issued after August 22, 1957, only for new or specialized defense facilities, and for research and development facilities for defense. The authority to issue rapid amortization certificates is terminated after December 31, 1959. This provision will prevent any future extension of the program to investments with only indirect defense connections or to investments of an ordinary character even though defense-connected.

Public Law 165, approved August 26, 1957.

Tanning Extracts and Coconut Oil—Duty-Free

H. R. 2842:

H. R. 5924:

To implement an International Convention on importing commercial samples and advertising matter ratified in 1956, this measure provides duty-free entry for catalogs, price lists, and trade notices relating to sale or rental of foreign goods or services to United States residents.

Certain samples to be used in the United States only for soliciting orders for products of foreign countries may enter duty-free. These samples, however, must be valued at less than $1 each, or have been mutilated in such a way as to leave them useful only as samples. Motion-picture advertising films will be permitted duty-free entry under bond.

Public Law 211, approved August 28, 1957.

Savings Bonds—Interest Rate Increase

H. R. 5520:

Public Law 17, approved April 20, 1957.

Furlough Travel Tax Exemption

H. R. 7954:

Under present law a 10-percent excise tax is levied on transportation. The Congress, in 1950, voted an exemption from this tax for personnel of the United States Army, Air Force, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, including authorized cadets and midshipmen, traveling in uniform at their own expense while on official leave, furlough, or pass, if they are traveling on round-trip tickets sold to them under special tariffs providing for fares of not more than 2.025 cents per mile.

To continue the effectiveness of this exemption after July 1, 1957, this measure sets the mileage rate limit on fares eligible for the exemption at 2.5 cents per mile.

Public Law 74, approved June 29, 1957.

AEC Indemnity Act

H. R. 7383:

This measure provides for Federal indemnity against atomic reactor hazards for protection of the public. Briefly the act provides:

As a condition for a reactor license, the AEC will require the licensee to take out and maintain financial protection. Each such licensee is also required to maintain an indemnity contract with the Federal Government, by which the Government will indemnify the licensee up to $500 million, including damages and costs of investigating and settling claims. This $500 million is the maximum amount the Government will be required to pay in connection with any nuclear incident.

Both the financial protection and indemnification by the Government are to be made for the benefit of any person who might be found liable for a reactor incident, both contractors and subcontractors.

AEC is authorized to use this indemnification procedure with its own contractors and subcontractors. Should the damages in any instance exceed the amount of the financial protection, together with the $500 million sum, the Commission, or any person interested, can apply to the district court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy over the site of the nuclear incident and have the available funds prorated among all those to whom liability is owed.

The Commission is required to make full reports to the Joint Committee whenever there is a nuclear incident which might require use of this act.

The Reactor Safeguards Committee is made statutory, and is required to pass on applications for reactor licenses which, by their nature, are hazardous.

Statutory protection is provided for property of indemnified persons which may be damaged because of a runaway reactor—the property which is located away from the reactor. Up to this time, this type property has not been covered by the liability insurance policies.

Foreign relations

Middle East Resolution

House Joint Resolution 117:

The Congress, on March 7, 1957, completed action on the President's request of January 5, 1957, urging immediate consideration of a proposal to authorize the use of troops in the Middle East to assist any nation attacked by Communist forces requesting such aid, and to authorize the use of mutual security funds without regard to existing limitations. The urgency was based upon the critical situation in the Middle East which erupted in August of 1956 with the seizure of the Suez Canal by Egypt.

Congress, within 2 months, sent to the President House Joint Resolution 117, which differed somewhat from the proposal as originally presented. A major area of difference was that the Congress substituted, for the troop authorization, a statement that the United States is prepared to use its Armed Forces if the President deems it necessary, and if consistent with its treaty obligations and Constitution. The resolution further provides:

Authority for the President to cooperate with any nation in the Middle East desiring assistance in developing its economic strength. Authority for the President to undertake, in the Middle East, military assistance programs with any nation desiring such assistance. Authority for the President to use during the remainder of 1957, for economic and military assistance wherever he believes necessary in the Middle East, up to $200 million from funds already appropriated.

That the President should continue United Nations multilateral support in the Middle East.

That the President, twice yearly, report to Congress any actions taken under this resolution.

That the joint resolution will expire whenever the President determines the authority granted is no longer necessary, or by concurrent action of Congress.

Public Law 7, approved March 9, 1957.

International Atomic Energy Agency

Executive I:

The Senate, by a vote of 67 to 19, ratified Executive I, 85th Congress, 1st session, on June 18, 1957, the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency signed at New York City by the United States and 79 other nations.

The purpose of this treaty is to establish an International Atomic Energy Agency charged with responsibility for advancing the peaceful uses of atomic energy, and for developing methods for its application to industry, agriculture, and medicine for the benefit and general welfare of mankind through a cooperative effort. The treaty authorizes the Agency to assist in research, to make provision for services and materials needed for such research, to act as an intermediary to secure performance of services and the supply of material and facilities by one member to another, to foster the exchange of scientific and technical information, and to establish and administer safeguards to prevent misuse of materials for military purposes.

Activities of the Agency are to be conducted in accordance with the principles and purposes of the United Nations. Annual reports on the Agency's activities must be submitted to the General Assembly of the United Nations, to the Security Council, and to the Economic and Social Council.

A 23-member Board of Governors is established as the principal policymaking body of the Agency.

The treaty provides that a general conference, consisting of representatives of all members, meet in regular annual session, or in special sessions if convened by the Director General at the request of the Board or a majority of the members.

Members may make available to the Agency any quantity of special fissionable materials they believe advisable, and under such terms as they and the Agency agree to. The Agency, in accepting these materials, must assume responsibility for safeguards against weather hazards, unauthorized removal, damage or destruction, including sabotage, and forcible seizure.

Cost to the United States for participation in the Agency will be approximately 33⅓ percent of the administrative expenses which, in the first year, will be in the neighborhood of two to two and one-half million dollars.

The United States was the 22d nation to ratify the 80-nation "atoms for peace" Agency on July 29, 1957. This action of the United States actually brought the International Atomic Energy Agency into being. Britain and Russia had already signed, and 3 of the 5 major powers were needed before the International Atomic Energy Agency could begin operation.

International Atomic Energy Agency—United States Participation

H. R. 8992:

This act implements the International Atomic Energy Agency Treaty ratified by the Senate on June 18, 1957, by authorizing the President to appoint and the Senate to confirm representatives and deputies of the United States to the International Atomic Energy Agency. The President is required to report once a year to the Congress on the Agency's activities and on American representation.

The United States is authorized to pay its share of the annual budget which will be about one-third or approximately two to two and a half million dollars.

In order to encourage Federal employees to go with the Agency, they are given 3 years protection on civil service retirement, life insurance, and reinstatement rights in their positions.

Provides that uranium distributed abroad by the Atomic Energy Commission through the Agency must be paid for at no less than the charges established for domestic use; however, an exception is made for materials to be used in research and medical therapy.

The measure requires that the Commission obtain approval for the contribution of materials to the International Atomic Energy Agency above and beyond the President's offer of 5,000 kilograms of uranium 235.

Public Law 177, approved August 28, 1957.

Mutual Security Authorization of 1957

S. 2130:

This measure authorizes an appropriation of $3,367,083,000 for the mutual security program. This amount represents a reduction of $477,560,000 below the budget request as modified.

Authorizations are as follows:

Military assistance, $1,600,000,000 for fiscal 1958.

Defense support, $750 million for fiscal 1958.

Development loan fund, $625 million in fiscal 1959 in addition to an authorization for a current appropriation of $500 million—neither authorization is subject to fiscal year limitation and both will remain available until expended.

Technical cooperation:

Bilateral, $151,900,000 to be available until expended.

Multilateral:

United Nations, $15,500,000.

Organization of American States, $1,500,000.

Other programs:

Special assistance, $250 million.

Latin American economic development, $25 million.

Joint control area, $11,500,000.

U. N. refugee fund, $2,233,000.

Escapee program, $5,500,000.

U. N. children's fund, $11 million.

Ocean freight on voluntary relief shipments, $2,200,000.

Battle Act administration, $2,200,000.

ICA administration, $32,750,000.

Atoms for peace, $7 billion.

This measure authorizes a program of malaria eradication. It divides foreign aid into two categories—defense assistance including related economic support, and economic development assistance. The economic development assistance is placed on a repayable basis through the establishment of the development loan fund.

The development loan fund is established within the International Cooperation Administration on a loan basis. The basic purpose of the fund is to assist, on a basis of self-help and mutual cooperation, the efforts of free peoples to develop their economic resources and to increase their productive capacities.

Public Law 141, approved August 14, 1957.

Export-Import Bank Act—Extension

H. R. 4136:

Extends for a period of 5 years from June 30, 1958, to June 30, 1963, the time within which the Export-Import Bank of Washington may make loans.

As a general rule, the bank extends credit to finance only purchases of materials and equipment produced or manufactured in the United States and of technical services of United States firms and individuals which carries into effect one of its chief purposes—to facilitate United States exports.

Public Law 55, approved June 17, 1957.

Hungary-U. N. Consideration

House Concurrent Resolution 204:

The Senate unanimously adopted this resolution expressing as the sense of Congress that the United States Government should take urgent steps to recommend reconvening of the United Nations General Assembly now to seek immediate consideration and adoption of the report of the United Nations Special Committee on the Problem of Hungary. In order to advance the objectives of the United Nations, the representatives should join actively in seeking the most effective way of dealing with the Soviet Union to prevent further acts of aggression and to seek practical redress of the wrongs committed in violation of the principles of the U. N.

In dealing with the broader question of other captive nations, the resolution declares the United States should implement policies in cooperation with the U. N. and the peoples of the Free World that will guarantee the freedom and independence of the captive nations so that the Hungarian tragedy should not be repeated elsewhere in the world.

Following the Hungarian revolt the United Nations General Assembly adopted a resolution establishing the special committee, composed of representatives of Australia, Ceylon, Denmark, Tunisia, and Uruguay. The special committee was to investigate, take testimony, collect evidence, and present a report of its findings.

The principal conclusion of the report, made public on June 20, 1957, and adopted unanimously by the Senate as the preamble of House Concurrent Resolution 204 reads: "That which took place in Hungary in the latter part of 1956 was a spontaneous national uprising caused by long-standing grievances engendered by the oppressive way of life under Communist rule and by the state of captivity of Hungary under control of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Since the next regular meeting of the General Assembly will not take place until September, Congress adopted this resolution to urge the reconvening of the General Assembly now to seek adoption of the special committee's findings.

Anglo-American Financial Agreement

Senate Joint Resolution 72:

Approves the signature by the Secretary of the Treasury to an agreement amending the Anglo-American Financial Agreement of 1945. The amendment allows postponement until December 31, 2001, of any 7 of the annual British payments of $138.4 million toward principal and interest on loans from the United States.

The Anglo-American Financial Agreement was signed on December 6, 1945, and was approved by Congress on July 15, 1946. The agreement, authorizing the 50-year loan to the United Kingdom of $3,750 million at 2 percent interest, contained certain waiver provisions. Repayment was to be made in equal annual installments of about $119,336,250, covering both principal and interest, beginning December 31, 1951. A settlement of lend-lease and surplus-property obligations amounting to approximately $650 million on the same terms was also made in the 1945 agreement, with annual installments of about $19 million. The total annual installment of principal and interest is $138.4 million. To date the United Kingdom has paid $384.4 million in principal and $424.6 million in interest, representing payment in full of installments due in 1951–55, and the principal installment for 1956.

This amendment merely replaces the interest waiver provisions to which they were entitled under the agreement and authorizes the United Kingdom to postpone payments until the year 2001 if so desired in an effort to get their economy on a sounder footing.

Public Law 21, approved April 20, 1957.

Financial Assistance Loans

S. 747:

This measure permits the Secretary of State, with the approval of the Comptroller General, to evaluate and cancel, in whole or part, certain claims of the Government against citizens of the United States growing out of personal loans and other advances made to them in emergency situations abroad.

The United States has made loans for many years to Americans abroad, helping them to return to America, and to survive in wartime. In the latter case, gross inequities were perpetrated by enemy countries in setting artificial exchange rates on American money.

Since the beginning of this operation about 150,000 loans have been made totaling some $12 million; of this total $7.5 million has been repaid.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

International Labor Organizations—Contributions

Senate Joint Resolution 73:

This resolution increases the ceiling on the United States annual contribution to the International Labor Organization from $1,750,000 to $2 million.

The budget of the International Labor Organization has been gradually increasing over the years as the workload of the Organization increased, due to some extent to a shift in the emphasis of its work toward research, studies, and technical services.

Passed Senate June 27, 1957.

International Claims Settlement Act—Amendment

S. 979:

This measure amends the International Claims Settlement Act of 1949 by extending the time limit for filing claims against the Governments of Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, Italy, and the U. S. S. R., until the date of enactment of this act.

It provides for the reduction of any awards, recoverable under the act, by an amount equal to the tax benefits a claimant may have obtained in a prior tax year from writing off war losses upon which his award is based; however, no award may be reduced to less than $5,000 by the tax benefit.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Denmark—Ship Payment

S. 2448:

Authorizes $5,296,302 as a final settlement of the claims of Danish shipowners whose vessels were requisitioned by the United States Government in 1941. During the early days of World War II, 40 vessels of Danish ownership were lying in United States ports. With the aid of the Danish Minister the United States requisitioned these ships—24 of which were later lost at sea. Settlement for 35 of the ships was made some years ago. This serves as a compromise settlement for the remaining vessels.

Passed Senate July 3, 1957.

Interparliamentary Union—Increased Contributions

S. 2515:

This act increases the ceiling on United States contributions to the Interparliamentary Union from $15,000 to $18,000.

All member nations are contributing an amount in Swiss francs equal to 150 percent of their 1931 contribution and, making allowance for the interim devaluation of the dollar, $18,000 represents a 150 percent increase over the 1931 United States contribution.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Executive Agreements—Transmission to Senate

S. 603:

This measure amends the United States Code to require the Secretary of State to transmit to the Senate the text of any international agreement, other than a treaty, to which the United States is a party as soon as practicable after such agreement has entered into force with respect to the United States but in no event later than 60 days after execution.

In cases where the President has reason to believe that public disclosure would be prejudicial to the national security, the agreement is to be transmitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations in a cloak of secrecy to be removed only by the President.

Supporters of this measure feel that it will provide the basis for keeping the Senate informed on a variety of matters dealt with by executive agreements and which have, in the past, escaped its attention.

Passed Senate June 27, 1957.

Implementing Treaty With Panama

H. R. 6709:

To implement the 1955 Treaty of Mutual Understanding and Cooperation between the United States and the Republic of Panama, this measure authorizes the Secretary of State to convey to Panama, free of cost, all title and interest held by the United States in various lands and improvements in the Canal Zone.

Public Law 223, approved August 30, 1957.

Geneva Conventions—Red Cross

S. 1779:

This measure amends title 18, United States Code, to provide criminal penalties for the violation of certain misuses of Red Cross insignia.

Provides a punishment of $250, or 6 months imprisonment, for the unlawful use of the Red Cross emblem, or any colorable emblem thereof. The use of "PW," "PG," or "IC" during wartime, in a manner recognizable from the air, and for any purpose other than to designate prisoner of war or internment camps, is prohibited.

Exception to the prohibition against use of the Red Cross emblem is provided for the Red Cross itself, for hospitals and ambulances, and for "the same purpose and for the same class of goods as was lawful on the date of enactment of this title."

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Metallurgical Congress

House Joint Resolution 404:

The Congress, which will be attended by metal scientists and engineers from all parts of the world, is primarily for an exchange of scientific and technical information directed toward improving and expanding the world's metallurgical resources.

The loan of the 2 submarines to the Netherlands was authorized by the act of July 11, 1952, and would have expired early in 1958.

Public Law 220, approved August 29, 1957.

Canal Zone—Employment

S. 1850:

Implements the treaty agreed to by the United States and Panama in 1955, by providing (a) a system of classification and pay for all positions in the Canal Zone without regard to nationality; this plan will result in increased payroll costs of $1,213,000; (b) that a minimum of 2,900 out of 3,500 positions currently held by United States citizens should be reserved for the employment of United States citizens for reasons of security; (c) that United States and Panamanian employees will receive the same base rates for the same positions, with, however, the United States employee receiving a tax allowance and the usual zone differential; (d) that the general provisions of the Civil Service Retirement Act shall be uniformly applicable to United States citizen and noncitizen employees in the Canal Zone. This provision brings under the act some 7,942 regular full-time employees and about 800 part-time employees, heretofore excluded.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

North Pacific Fisheries

S. 2212:

This measure extends Federal responsibility for fishing conservation regulations from the present southern limit of 54 degrees, 40 minutes, to as far south as 48 degrees, 30 minutes.

The authorization is necessary in order to comply with the terms of the North Pacific Fisheries Convention of 1952.

Fishing interests are concerned over the sudden expansion of salmon fisheries, on the high seas off the coasts of Washington, British Columbia, and Alaska. It was feared that if this high seas net fishing was not quickly brought under control, the Pacific salmon fisheries would be seriously endangered.

Public Law 114, approved July 24, 1957.

United Nations Emergency Force

Senate Resolution 15:

Assistant Secretary—African Affairs

General Government

RFC—Abolished

Reorganization Plan No. 1:

This plan, a Hoover Commission recommendation which became effective June 30, 1957, abolished the Reconstruction Finance

Corporation and transferred its functions to other agencies.

Functions relating to those programs which provided assistance to States, municipalities, and other public agencies in financing various public projects, were transferred to Housing and Home Finance Administration.

Functions relating to liquidation matters arising from national defense, war, and reconversion activities, as well as the liquidation of Small War Plants Corporation, were transferred to General Services Administration.

The plan transfers to the Small Business Administration all of the remaining disaster loan functions and all matters arising out of financial-assistance programs to business enterprises except those relating to assistance to railroads, financial institutions, and insurance companies.

The remaining functions such as business loans with outstanding principal balances in excess of $250,000, and financial assistance to railroad companies, financial institutions, and insurance companies were transferred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Reorganization Plans—Extension

S. 1791:

This measure, a Hoover Commission recommendation, extends to June 1, 1959, the termination date for the submission of reorganization plans to Congress. This measure carries on an established policy of Congress, in delegating to the President authority to reorganize the executive branch of the Government. The President submits the plans to Congress which become law unless disapproved by a majority of the membership of either House within 60 calendar days following the date of submission.

Public Law 286, approved September 4, 1957.

Witnesses—Statements

S. 2377:

Amends chapter 223, entitled "Witnesses and Evidence" of title 18, United States Code, by adding a new section 3500, to be entitled "Demands for Production of Statements and Reports of Witnesses." The purpose of this amendment is to clarify the principle of law in the United States Supreme Court's decision of June 3, 1957, in the case of Clinton E. Jencks, petitioner v. United States of America, and to implement that principle by establishing an orderly procedure to regulate the demand for, and production of, statements and reports of witnesses in Government files.

This measure provides that the only statements subject to production under this section are written statements previously made by the witness which are in the possession of the United States, signed by the witness or otherwise adopted or approved by him, and any transcriptions or recordings of oral statements made by the witness to a Federal law officer, relating to the subject matter of the witness' testimony. Such statements and reports shall be produced only after the Government witness has testified on direct examination during the trial. If the entire contents of the statements or reports relate to the subject matter of the witness' testimony, the court shall order them delivered direct to the defendant for his examination and use. If, however, the United States claims that the statement or report ordered to be produced contain matter which does not relate to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order the United States to deliver only for the court's inspection.

Upon delivery to the court, the court is authorized to remove any portions not relating to the testimony of the witness and then deliver the statement or report direct to the defendant for his use. In the event any portion is withheld from the defendant, the entire text is to be preserved by the United States and, on appeal, it shall be made available to the appellate court for the purpose of determining the correctness of the ruling of the trial judge. Should the United States fail to comply with a court order to deliver to the defendant such statements or reports, or portions thereof, the court shall strike from the record the testimony of the witness and the trial court shall proceed, or declare a mistrial, or take such other action as the court believes appropriate.

(The issue in the Jencks case involved the procedure under which a defendant may inspect a statement of a Government witness in order to impeach the credibility of the witness. Jencks was charged with having filed in 1950 a sworn affidavit with the National Labor Relations Board declaring that he was not a member of the Communist Party. Subsequently he was indicted under title 18, United States Code, which makes the willful filing of a false statement a crime punishable by a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both. The case centered around whether it was necessary for the defendant to establish inconsistency between the testimony of the witness and the statement, before the statement was made available to the defense. The court held that numerous lower court cases, holding that inconsistency was necessary, were wrong and that statements which relate to the testimony of the witnesses must be made available to the defense without requiring the defense to establish an inconsistency.)

Public Law 269, approved September 2, 1957.

Former Presidents—Recognition

S. 607:

In recognition of the great public service given to this country by our Presidents, a service which does not cease when out of office, the Congress has enacted legislation providing former Presidents with a $25,000-a-year allowance, an office staff paid on the basis of a sum not to exceed the allotment to a Senator from the least populous State of the Union, a suitable office space in a Federal building, the franking privilege, and a pension of $10,000 a year for the widow of any former President.

Passed Senate February 4, 1957.

Land Disposal—Aliens

H. R. 8929:

This act authorizes the International Boundary and Water Commission, United States and Mexico, to dispose of any surplus lands to aliens as well as to citizens of the United States.

The Commission was established to carry out flood control, conservation, sanitation, and other projects on the international boundary between the United States and Mexico. Under existing law, the Secretary of State is authorized to dispose of any land acquired in connection with these projects to citizens of the United States when the land is no longer needed. Other Government agencies, such as General Services Administration and the Bureau of Reclamation, may dispose of surplus lands under authority which does not distinguish between citizens and aliens.

Public Law 210, approved August 28, 1957.

Military Public Land Withdrawals

H. R. 5538:

This measure provides for the acquisition and use of public lands for defense purposes. Except for certain public land already in use by the various branches of the military services, all withdrawals, reservations, or restrictions for defense purposes of more than 5,000 acres will require congressional approval.

The act also provides:

1. For a determination, at local level, for congressional consideration of the resources impact of the proposed withdrawal.

2. For clarification of the conflict between States, Territories, and military commanders with respect to game management and enforcement of game laws on the military reservations.

3. That the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 shall be amended to clarify operations under that act with respect to the disposition of the mineral estate in withdrawn or reserved public lands and to redefine the responsibilities of the Secretary of the Interior with respect to excess reserved or withdrawn public land.

4. For a revision of the mineral leasing laws which would clarify the laws relating to leasing mineral and oil lands withdrawn or reserved for use of defense agencies.

Passed House April 11, 1957.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

Roster of Senior Judges

H. R. 3818:

This act provides for the maintenance of a roster of retired judges of the United States courts to be known as the roster of senior judges and from which assignment for special judicial duty may be made by the Chief Justice of the United States.

It is provided, however, that no retired judge denominated as a senior judge may be assigned to perform judicial duties in any court except upon presenting a certificate by the chief judge of the court to which he is assigned that there is a necessity for his services.

Public Law 219, approved August 29, 1957.

Mineral Interests

S. 268:

This measure authorizes the Secretary of the Army to return, to former owners, mineral interests underlying the Arkabutla, Sardis, Enid, and Grenada Reservoir projects in Mississippi, when he determines that (a) exploration for, or exploitation of, such mineral interests will not interfere with the development and operations of the projects; and that (b) return of the mineral interests will be in the public interest.

The return is conditioned upon the payment of the fair market value of the mineral interests, as determined by the Secretary. These lands were acquired in fee simple, without consideration of mineral interests, and before the Army adopted its policy of acquiring only flowage easements, where possible, instead of fee simple title.

Former owners must apply for return of the interests within 3 years of the enactment of this act.

Public Law 245, approved August 31, 1957.

Desert-Land Entrymen—Loans

S. 1002:

This measure permits the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to desert-land entrymen, in the same way that loans are made to homestead entrymen, and prior to the issuance of a patent to a desert-land entryman.

Under present law, a desert-land entryman does not receive a patent to his land until he has made improvements on it, generally consisting of irrigation facilities. During the period before he receives his patent, his claim is virtually worthless for mortgage purposes. Consequently FHA and other Federal loan agencies have been unable to extend loans for improvement purposes.

Passed Senate April 12, 1957.

Passed House July 29, 1957.

Washington State—Federal Property

S. 1574:

This legislation provides for the disposal of certain real property in the towns of Grand Coulee and Coulee Dam, Washington.

The town of Coulee Dam is almost wholly federally owned, having been built to house workers on Grand Coulee Dam. Because its property is tax-exempt, the town has been unable to grow and has remained a substantial Federal liability. The purpose of this measure, so far as it relates to Coulee Dam, is to turn over its development to private enterprise and to permit the town to be incorporated under the laws of the State of Washington.

The town of Grand Coulee, which is largely privately owned, has been hampered because of Federal restrictions regarding rights-of-way and public utilities. This act transfers the operation and ownership of any federally owned municipal-type property and facilities to the town of Grand Coulee.

Residential and other properties are to be sold by the Secretary of the Interior at fair market value, giving priority to occupants. The Secretary is authorized to accept a downpayment and to extend time on property purchased, if private finances and FHA loans are not available to priority purchasers. The terms will be similar to those available under the National Housing Act.

The Secretary is authorized to assist Coulee Dam in becoming an independent municipality by a grant of up to $80,000, and by a contribution to a sewage-treatment plant of up to $130,000.

Public Law 240, approved August 30, 1957.

Wyoming State Capitol Buildings

S. 1396:

Broadens the scope of the land-grant provision in the Act of Admission of the State of Wyoming, passed in 1890. This provision gave Wyoming 50 sections of unappropriated public lands to be used in financing the erection of public buildings at the State capitol.

A 1956 Wyoming Supreme Court decision held that the revenues derived from this grant could not be used for the reconstruction and renovation of the State capitol buildings, but only for the erection of such buildings.

This measure corrects the restrictive language of the 1890 act by including reconstruction, renovation, and repair among the permissible purposes for which land-grant revenues may be used.

Public Law 97, approved July 11, 1957.

Additional Judges

H. R. 110:

This measure authorizes the President, under specified conditions, to appoint an additional judge of court when an incumbent judge is unable to discharge officially all the duties of his office by reason of permanent mental or physical disability, and the appointment of an additional judge is necessary for the efficient operation of business.

Applies to all judges who are appointed to hold office during good behavior, including not only circuit and district judges but also judges of special courts such as the Court of Claims, Customs Court, the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, who are eligible to retire on account of permanent disability as well as those eligible on account of age and length of service.

Public Law 261, approved September 2, 1957.

Nevada—Industrial Development

S. 1568:

Permits the Colorado River Commission of Nevada, acting for and in behalf of the States of Nevada, to purchase 126,775 acres of land from the Federal Government. This land lies 25 miles southeast of Las Vegas and is desired by the Commission for the purpose of encouraging industrial development.

The conveyance is to be made at fair market value as determined by the Secretary of the Interior. The State is given a 5-year option to purchase the land in segments of 10,000 acres.

The Department of the Interior advised that this land was not included in any proposed plans for development by the Federal Government. Nevada plans an extensive program of development, including farming, urban and suburban construction.

Passed Senate May 8, 1957.

Census Activities

S. 1631:

This measure amends the census laws to provide greater procedural facility and accuracy.

One of the most important changes is in the agricultural census regulations. This census would be made in October of a "9" year instead of in April of an "0" year. By taking the census at the end of a harvest season, a more reasonable estimate of farm labor could be had than in the spring, when many thousands of laborers have moved to other areas.

Geographical differences are removed, so that all types of censuses may be taken during the same period in all of the United States and in the Territories and possessions.

Public Law 207, approved August 28, 1957.

Lease-Purchase Act Amendment

S. 2261:

This measure amends and extends the Public Buildings Purchase Contract Act and the Post Office Department Property Act, of 1954. It extends the period for approving projects for approximately 3 years, or until June 30, 1960, and recommends changes in the funding and financial aspects of the acts to alleviate problems encountered in carrying out the program. This measure also provides greater flexibility and permits the program to proceed in a more organized manner, in order to provide the much-needed space for carrying out the many functions of the Federal Government.

Passed Senate July 3, 1957.

Altar of the Nation

House Concurrent Resolution 91:

Expresses the sense of Congress that the Altar of the Nation, a memorial built by the parents of an airman killed in World War II, has been dedicated to the glory of God as a memorial to all American war dead.

The altar is located in the Cathedral of the Pines, Rindge, N. H. It is supported by unsolicited contributions.

House adopted March 19, 1957; Senate adopted May 8, 1957.

Vinson Memorial

House Joint Resolution 279:

To memorialize the late Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson, the Congress has authorized the marshal of the Supreme Court to procure an oil portrait and marble bust of him to be placed in the United States Supreme Court Building.

Public Law 20, approved April 20, 1957.

Presidential Papers

H. R. 7813:

Provides for organizing, indexing, and microfilming the major collections of Presidential papers now in the Library of Congress.

The purpose is to preserve these invaluable papers, now in various locations in the Library and in the main unbound, by the production of a master negative and copies made from the negative.

Public Law 147, approved August 16, 1957.

Housing

Housing Act of 1957

H. R. 6659:

This measure provides for a $1.740-billion housing program with numerous liberalizing changes in an effort to ease the tight-money market which has been threatening the building industry for months. Following are the major changes:

Downpayment: Decreases the minimum downpayment under FHA-sales housing and urban-renewal-housing programs to 3 percent of first $10,000, 15 percent of next $6,000, and 30 percent of excess. In establishing the lower downpayments, the FHA Commissioner must determine they are in the public interest, taking into account the national economy and conditions in the building industry and availability of GI loans.

Elderly persons program: Increases from $8,100 to $8,400 maximum mortgage amount per family unit for FHA elevator structures for elderly persons. Makes clear that single persons as well as families are eligible for occupancy.

Rental housing: Permits the high-cost-area allowance ($1,000 per room) to be applicable without regard to the number of rooms in the unit in FHA's rental-housing program.

FNMA

Increases by $650 million FNMA's total borrowing authority under its secondary-market operations.

Increases to $2.25 billion (now $1.35 billion) the maximum amount of FNMA's secondary-market-operation obligations which the Secretary of the Treasury may acquire.

Requires FNMA to purchase special-assistance mortgages at par until August 7, 1958; limits to a maximum of 1½ percent FNMA's fees and charges on special-assistance mortgages.

Increases to $450 million (from $200 million) the amount of purchases and commitments of special-assistance mortgages subject to the discretion of the President.

Cooperative housing: Increases to $200 million (from $100 million) the special-assistance revolving funds for the purchase of FHA cooperative-housing mortgages. Reserves $50 million for consumer cooperatives. Increases the present limitation of $10 million on outstanding commitments per State to $20 million, of which $5 million is reserved for consumer cooperatives.

Urban renewal and slum clearance: Increases the present $900-million capital-grant contract authorization by $350 million; establishes an alternate formula for computing Federal capital grants—three-fourths of a reduced net project cost instead of two-thirds of present net project cost—and provides that the city may elect which formula to use. Increases from 10 percent to 12½ percent the proportion of urban-renewal capital-grant authorization that can be allocated to one State. Permits the Urban Renewal Administrator to establish maximum payments for moving expenses up to $100 without requiring proof of the actual costs by individuals and families. Increases the maximum relocation payments to business concerns from $2,000 to $2,500.

Public housing: Increases income exemptions for admission to and continued occupancy of public housing.

Military housing: Extends this program for 1 year, to June 30, 1959. Increases military-housing revolving funds to $450 million (from $200 million) and earmarks up to 7.5 percent of the fund for mortgages insured under section 809, which relates to sales housing for essential civilians at military research and development centers.

College housing: Increases the college-housing loan authorization to $925 million, which includes $25 million for loans to hospitals for housing student nurses or interns.

Voluntary home-mortgage-credit program: Extends this program to July 31, 1959.

Farm-housing research: Provides for a 2-year program of farm-housing research and authorizes $300,000 for grants in each of fiscal 1958 and 1959.

Discount control: Requires the FHA Commissioner and the VA Administrator to issue regulations relating to control of discounts on Government-supported mortgages.

Urban planning grants: Authorizes HHFA to make urban planning grants to official Government planning agencies for areas threatened with rapid urbanization by the establishment or expansion of Federal installations.

Public Law 104, approved July 12, 1957.

FNMA—Authorization Increase

House Joint Resolution 209:

This measure provides immediate assistance on an interim basis, through the secondary market operation of Federal National Mortgage Agency, in relieving the shortage of funds for home loans. The secondary market facilities of FNMA provide an essential backstop to the private secondary market for FHA-insured and VA-guaranteed home mortgage loans. FNMA's supplemental role in the secondary market for these VA and FHA loans is of particular importance during this present period when the shortage of private funds for loans is so acute.

Under this legislation, FNMA's capitalization is increased by $50 million to approximately $159 million which, in turn, raises the borrowing authority by $500 million or to $1.6 billion. The amount of FNMA secondary-market obligations which the Treasury may acquire is increased by $350 million or to a maximum of more than 10 percent of the funds available. FNMA's authorization for the purchase of cooperative mortgages is increased by $50 million or to a total of $100 million, and the per-State dollar limit on outstanding commitments is increased from $5 million to $10 million.

Public Law 10, approved March 27, 1957.

FNMA—Increased Authorization

S. 1679:

Increases by $50 million the present special assistance authorization of $200 million available to the Federal National Mortgage Association to purchase military housing mortgages and selected home mortgages. The selected home mortgages, which originated under special housing programs, are those designed to provide housing of acceptable standards at full economic costs for those who are unable to obtain adequate housing under established home financing programs.

This additional authorization was felt to be necessary as a means of retarding or stopping a decline in mortgage lending and home-building activities which threaten materially the stability of a high-level national economy.

Passed Senate March 29, 1957.

Immigration and naturalization

Immigration—liberalization

S. 2792:

This measure is designed to relieve certain hardship conditions existing in present immigration laws by:

1. Permitting for a 2-year period, through June 30, 1959, unlimited entry of alien orphans under 14 years of age, whether legitimate or illegitimate, who have been adopted by United States citizens or who are coming to the United States to be adopted; however, not more than two such special nonquota visas may be issued to orphans adopted by any one United States citizen unless it is to prevent separation of brothers and sisters.

2. Granting first preference status to the spouses and children who are "following to join" one who has been admitted under a preference quota for special skills.

3. Vesting discretionary authority in the Attorney General to waive criminal and immoral grounds of exclusion in behalf of certain spouses and children or parents of United States citizens and aliens otherwise admissible for permanent residence.

4. Permitting the Attorney General, after consultation with the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, to admit the spouses, children, or parents of United States citizens or aliens otherwise admissible for permanent residence who are afflicted with tuberculosis, however, cases must be reported to Congress and no visa shall issue after June 30, 1959.

5. Authorizing permanent status for specialists who have misrepresented their nationality or place of birth to avoid repatriation to Communist-controlled countries; also permits a similar adjustment in hardship cases of spouses, parents, or children of United States citizens or lawful resident aliens, who have procured or sought to procure visas or entry into the United States by fraud or misrepresentation.

6. Granting to the Secretary of State and Attorney General discretionary authority to waive fingerprinting requirements for aliens seeking to enter the United States temporarily as nonimmigrants.

7. Authorizing the Attorney General to adjust to that of permanent residence the status of certain highly skilled specialists who are in the United States temporarily and whose services have been determined to be urgently needed in the United States; however, the alien must have been physically present in the United States on July 1, 1957. Spouses and children of these specialists who were in the United States on July 1, 1957, may have their status similarly adjusted.

8. Removing mortgages on quotas of certain countries imposed under the Displaced Persons Act effective July 1, 1957. It is estimated that lifting these mortgages will result in approximately 8,000 quota numbers being made available each year, particularly in countries such as Latvia, Lithuania, Estonia, and others whose quotas were heavily mortgaged.

9. Providing for naturalization of certain adopted children of United States citizens employed abroad.

10. Permitting the adjustment of status of certain diplomats and semidiplomats who have been granted political asylum.

11. Providing that approximately 18,000 nonquota visas which were authorized under the Refugee Relief Act of 1953 but which remained unused when that act expired in December of 1956 would be available to bona fide refugee-escapees who have fled because of persecution on account of race, religion, or political opinion. These nonquota visas would be available for refugees throughout the world, including refugees from Egypt and North Africa, those located in Spain, the NATO countries, Austria, and the Far East. Under this provision, Egyptian refugees who are in Western Europe could enter the United States.

12. Providing that a period of less than 12 months overseas residence by a child admitted for permanent residence shall not constitute a break in United States residence for purposes of naturalization.

Public Law 316, approved September 11, 1957.

National Defense

Military Construction Act of 1957

H. R. 8240:

This measure authorizes military construction projects at home and abroad, classified and unclassified, amounting to $1,232,495,000, which is a reduction of approximately 30 percent from the budget request.

New authorization granted for each military department is as follows:

Army:
Inside continental United States	$115, 624, 000
Outside continental United States	34, 477, 000
Classified	143, 002, 000
Total	293, 103, 000
Navy:
Inside continental United States	230, 356, 000
Outside continental United States	48, 199, 000
Classified	59, 056, 000
Total	337, 611, 000
Air Force:
Inside continental United States	394, 076, 000
Outside continental United States	160, 705, 000
Classified	47, 000, 000
Total	601, 781, 000
Grand total	1, 232, 495, 000

Installations provided for by this new authorization include replacement of irreparable facilities, chapels, community and recreational facilities, housing, and key-service schools.

This measure also provides that members of the Armed Forces, the Coast Guard, Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service who occupy substantial quarters (where adequate quarters are not available) on a rental basis will do so without losing their basic allowances for quarters. In other words, this personnel will receive their quarters' allowance and from it, pay the necessary rent.

Public Law 241, approved August 30, 1957.

AEC—Office Building

S. 1918:

Increases to $13,300,000 (from $10 million) the authorization for the AEC office building in the District of Columbia.

The increase will provide for the construction of an additional wing on the building for headquarters personnel as well as military and civilian personnel assigned from other agencies.

Public Law 107, approved July 17, 1957.

Atomic Power Program—Congressional Review

S. 2243:

This measure provides for more extensive congressional review of the AEC atomic power program. For some time there has been concern over the extent and scope of review which the Joint Committee and the Congress should give each year to the AEC budget, particularly as to the civilian atomic-power program.

Congress felt that all Government financed experimental reactors, except very small ones, should be authorized as facilities, and also that cooperative arrangements wherein AEC provides Government funds for assistance to industry in the development and construction of reactors, should be scrutinized more closely.

To carry out this intent, AEC is required to obtain congressional authorization before using its appropriations for Government atomic plants, other than military or small experimental reactors. AEC is also required to submit to the committee any proposed price schedule for the purchase of plutonium produced as a byproduct in atomic reactors.

Public Law 79, approved July 3, 1957.

AEC Authorization

H. R. 8996:

This measure authorizes an overall total of $352,145,000 for the Atomic Energy Commission. Of this amount $222,230,000 is for new projects under the AEC's regular plant and facility authorization. $129,915,000 is for AEC research assistance to private and public power groups for construction of atomic powerplants; with an estimated $149,915,000 upper limit for this total program which includes waiver of use charges for private projects. Of the funds included in the $129 million figure, $40 million have already been authorized as construction items which include plants and facilities relating to the production of special nuclear materials, the manufacture of atomic weapons for physical research, biology and medicine, training education and information, AEC communities and general plant projects.

$58 million of the $222 million authorization is to cover the design of 1 large prototype reactor, design and construction of 1 intermediate size prototype reactor, and 1 small experimental reactor.

Public Law 162, approved August 21, 1957.

Aliens—Enlistment

S. 2420:

This measure extends for 2 years the authority for enlistment of aliens in the Regular Army, and suspends the prohibition against peacetime enlistment of nondeclarant aliens. The suspension is retroactive to June 30, 1955.

The act of June 30, 1950 authorized the Secretary of Army to accept enlistments or reenlistments in the Regular Army for 5-year periods of not more than 12,500 unmarried male aliens between the ages of 18 and 35. This suspension has made it possible to procure valuable enlistees for the Regular Army from among the displaced alien populations in Western Europe. Their native fluency in foreign languages and their knowledge of both the geography and peoples of their homeland provide the Army with a resource of talent that is difficult to find in native Americans. High standards have been set for enlistment under this program and, accordingly, only those aliens who were regarded as having the potential to become officers and noncommissioned officers have been accepted for enlistment.

Public Law 116, approved July 24, 1957.

Atomic Energy—Cooperation With Berlin

H. R. 5866:

Includes Berlin (the United States, British, and French sectors) as an area in which the Atomic Energy Commission is authorized to undertake agreements regarding international cooperation in nonmilitary applications of atomic energy.

Under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, an agreement for cooperation relating to the construction and operation of a reactor can only be entered into with another nation. It has been found desirable as part of the international program of the United States to enter into an agreement with West Berlin so that a reactor could be built in that city; however, because of the status of West Berlin as an occupied city and because West Germany is not one of the occupying powers, an agreement for cooperation with West Germany could not be entered into without an amendment to the 1954 act.

It is believed that the erection of a United States reactor in West Berlin will do much to offset any psychological advantage that might be derived from the new research center being established in East Germany through the aid of the Soviet Union. West Berlin is providing all necessary funds for the reactor.

Public Law 14, approved April 12, 1957.

Specialists—Military Training

H. R. 6548:

Extends to July 1, 1959, the President's authority to issue special calls for physicians, dentists, and other allied specialists to meet the needs of the Armed Forces.

This measure reenacts a provision of the existing doctor draft law relating only to physicians and dentists which requires that where these persons meet the qualifications for Reserve commissions in the military departments and where there is a need for their services they will be permitted to volunteer for a period of active duty for not less than 24 months.

Provides that physicians and dentists may be appointed or promoted under Presidential regulations to a rank commensurate with their professional education and ability. Persons in the medical or dental categories may be used in a professional capacity in an enlisted grade if they refuse to accept or fail to qualify for a commission.

Public Law 62, approved June 27, 1957.

Troop Ceiling—Suspension

H. R. 7143:

This measure continues to July 1, 1959 (from July 31, 1957), the suspension of ceilings on the authorized personnel strengths of the Armed Forces.

In 1950 Congress enacted a measure establishing the authorized strength at slightly more than 2 million. In 1951, because of Korea, it was necessary to amend the 1950 act and suspend the ceiling, imposing a secondary ceiling of 5 million on the active-duty personnel strength of the Armed Forces during the period that the permanent personnel strength limitations are suspended. This secondary ceiling will remain in effect during this extension.

Public Law 63, approved June 27, 1957.

Air Force Academy

H. R. 8531:

This measure provides for an interim system of appointments to the Air Force Academy on the Military Academy system, but on an annual, rather than a cumulative basis for the 4-year period beginning with class of July 1959. It will allow one appointment each year for each Member of Congress, including Delegates and the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico. In addition, each Member will be authorized to appoint 10 alternates.

During the 4-year period only qualified alternates nominated by Members of Congress including the Territorial Delegates and the Resident Commissioner of Puerto Rico may be nominated for appointment.

Authorized appointments from 1959 through 1962 will be as follows:

Each United States Senator: 1 cadet a year.

Each United States Representative: 1 cadet a year.

Each Delegate in Congress: 1 cadet a year.

Puerto Rican Resident Commissioner: 1 cadet a year.

District of Columbia Commissioner: 2 cadets in 1959 and 1961, 1 in 1960 and 1962.

Governor of Canal Zone: 1 cadet each 2 years.

President of United States: 22 in 1959, 1960, and 1961; 23 in 1962.

Vice President: 1 in 1959, 1960, and 1961.

Secretary of Air Force: 10 a year from honor graduates of honor military or naval schools; 10 a year from the sons of deceased veterans; 45 cadets a year from enlisted members of Army and Air Force, 23 from Regular Army and Regular Air Force in 1959 and 1961, and 22 in 1960 and 1962; 22 from members of Reserve components of Army and Air Force in 1959 and 1961, and 23 in 1960 and 1962.

Public Law 182, approved August 28, 1957.

Missing Persons Act

H. R. 5807:

This measure makes permanent the Missing Persons Act. The original act, approved in 1942, remained in effect until 1947. It was reactivated by the Selective Service Act of 1948 and has been extended for periods of 1 year by several subsequent enactments. Instead of another 1-year extension, this measure makes the act permanent.

Because of the size of the Armed Forces, the stationing of our troops in many foreign countries, and the extensive utilization of aircraft, the Congress is making this act permanent. Under this act the heads of executive departments are authorized to continue to credit the pay accounts of persons within the scope of the statute who are missing, missing in action, interned, captured, or in a similar status. If allotments to dependents are not in effect when the person is placed in a missing category, the head of the department can initiate an allotment to provide for the dependents.

New language has been added to the original act, directing that entitlement to pay and allowances shall not be denied to any member of the Philippine Scouts who was captured in the Philippine Islands by the enemy during World War II solely on the ground that the member was paroled or permitted to return to his home prior to the termination of Japanese occupation of the Philippine Islands.

Public Law 217, approved August 29, 1957.

Reserves—Facilities

H. R. 7697:

This measure authorizes an additional $80 million for the acquisition, construction, and expansion of facilities for the several Reserve components of the Armed Forces; and clarifies existing law to specifically include bachelor-type housing for officers and enlisted men for so-called permanent party or station keepers, including necessary messing facilities for this personnel. Necessity for this type facility usually occurs at the naval aviation training stations of the Reserves.

Public Law 215, approved August 29, 1957.

National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics—Construction

H. R. 3377:

This measure authorizes construction, installation of equipment, and acquisition of land at installations of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics.

The purpose of the committee is to assess the current stage of development of aircraft, both civil and military; to anticipate the research needs of aeronautics; to build the scientific staff and unique research facilities required for these research needs; and to acquire the needed new knowledge as rapidly as the national interest requires.

Natural resources

Hells Canyon Dam

S. 555:

This measure authorizes continuation of full comprehensive development of the Columbia River and its tributaries to prevent the wasteful underdevelopment of the greatest and most economic dam site remaining undeveloped in the United States. The major feature, the high Hells Canyon Dam, is the only method ever proposed to harness the enormous potential of the middle Snake River for maximum multipurpose use in the national interest. It also authorizes construction of the Scriver Creek power facilities of the Payette unit of the Mountain Home reclamation project in Idaho.

The dam, when completed, will provide flood control through regulation of the middle reach of the Snake River for the protection of lives and property ravaged by flood resulting from inadequate upstream storage facilities. It will benefit farmers from the Midwest to the Pacific coast by providing the only available source of low-cost power for the production of less expensive phosphate fertilizers from the phosphate bed of southeast Idaho and Utah, which contain nearly two-thirds of the Nation's phosphate resources. It will assist the economic growth of the Pacific Northwest, including Idaho, by providing power for continuing industrial growth. It will aid the growth of irrigation in the agricultural economy of southern Idaho by providing financial aid for future irrigation projects.

The dam is to be 722 feet high; length 1,733 feet; total capacity of the reservoir will be 4,400,000 acre-feet; and ultimate power capacity will be 1,250,000 kilowatts. Total construction cost will be approximately $489,540,000. Eighty-five percent of this cost will be repaid with interest by the power users of the Pacific Northwest. The primary assistance provided by the Federal Government is the temporary use of its credit.

Passed Senate June 21, 1957 by a vote of 45 to 38.

Fryingpan-Arkansas Project, Colorado

S. 60:

This measure authorizes the construction, operation, and maintenance by the Secretary of Interior of the Fryingpan-Arkansas project, Colorado. The project is designed to import water from the Colorado River Basin to the Arkansas River Basin and to regulate flows in the latter basin so they can be used to greater advantage than under existing operational practices. It will furnish a partial supply of water to approximately 322,000 acres of land; will supplement a number of expanding municipalities in the Arkansas River Valley; will generate approximately 470 million kilowatt-hours of salable electric energy annually; and will provide flood control, recreation, fish, and wildlife protection.

It is estimated that the construction cost will be $159,287,000; however, a total of $139,905,000 is reimbursable.

Passed Senate June 27, 1957.

Omnibus Rivers and Harbors and Flood Control

S. 497:

This measure authorizes $1,540,840,000 for river and harbor, beach-erosion control, and flood control totaling 102 projects as follows:

Rivers and harbors:
Navigation projects (36)	$102,997,000
Beach-erosion projects (8)	5,290,000
Eradication of water-hyacinths	$5,063,000
Upper Fox River, Wis	300,000
Calumet-Sag project, Illinois	9,884,000
Illinois and Mississippi Canal	2,000,000
Total	125,534,000
Flood control:
New projects (46); project modifications (12)	386,261,000
Increased basin authorization (13)	633,300,000
Lower Mississippi River Basin	145,745,000
Oroville Dam, Calif	50,000,000
Missouri River Basin, Department of Interior	200,000,000
Total	1,415,306,000
Grand total	1,540,840,000

A new feature in the bill was section 205 declaring that Congress recognizes the responsibilities of local entities in developing water supplies, and that Congress should participate and cooperate in such development. The effect of this section is (1) to permit the Federal agencies to incorporate storage in reservoirs for low-flow augmentation under certain conditions; (2) to provide for inclusion of planned storage in Federal reservoir projects; and (3) to provide for reimbursement to the United States when a contract is made for the use of water.

A similar measure was pocket vetoed August 10, 1956.

Passed Senate, March 28, 1957.

Columbia Basin Project—Modifications

S. 1482:

This measure modifies the acreage limitation in the Columbia Basin Project Act to meet the changing agricultural and economic conditions and, at the same time, to reaffirm the major objectives of the Columbia Basin reclamation project, the largest single irrigation development ever undertaken in the United States or elsewhere.

Removes the limitation that water may be delivered to only 1 farm unit in the ownership of an individual family, and permits delivery to more than 1 farm unit held by any individual, corporation, or joint-stock association provided the total irrigable area held does not exceed 160 acres.

Permits water to be delivered to more than 1 farm unit held by the members of a family provided the total irrigable area held by all members of the family does not exceed 320 acres. Thus the members of a family may not receive water for more than 320 acres through the device of placing additional units in the names of minor children as is permitted by the interpretations of the reclamation law applying to reclamation projects generally. Water may be delivered whether the units held by members of the family stand in the name of one or more of the members of the family, or whether the land is the separate property of the husband or the wife or the community property of both under the community property laws of the State of Washington.

Ultimately the Columbia Basin project is to include 1,029,000 acres of irrigable land and, at present, nearly one-third of the facilities have been constructed.

Public Law 264, approved September 2, 1957.

TVA—Bonds

S. 1869:

This measure authorizes the Tennessee Valley Authority to issue and sell revenue bonds, up to an aggregate of $750 million outstanding at any one time, to assist in financing its power program. Proceeds of these bonds may be used for construction, acquisition, enlargement, improvement, or replacement of any plant or other facility used or to be used for the generation or transmission of electric power, or in connection with lease-purchase transactions.

This legislation does not change the basic administrative premise of the TVA Act. The TVA Board will continue to be held fully responsible by the Congress for the results of its operations, and will have corresponding administrative authority in the discharge of this responsibility. The actions of the Board will be subject to annual review by the Congress.

TVA is required to apply power proceeds, during each successive 5-year period, either to reduce its capital obligations or to reinvest in power facilities in an amount not less than the amount of depreciation accruals plus net proceeds realized from the sale of any power facilities. This provision protects the investment of both the Government and the bondholders.

Passed Senate August 9, 1957.

Niagara Power Development Act of 1957

H. R. 8643:

This measure authorizes the development of hydroelectric power on the Niagara River at Niagara Falls, N. Y., by the New York Power Authority under the terms of the United States-Canadian Treaty of 1950. The multipurpose project is to be financed by the State of New York without aid from the Federal Government.

The Federal Power Commission is directed to issue a license to the power authority requiring that 50 percent of the power developed at Niagara Falls be made available at the lowest rates reasonably possible to public bodies and nonprofit organizations within economic transmission distance. If the power, subject to the preference clause, is sold to utility companies, this measure requires that flexible arrangements be made to withdraw, on reasonable notice and fair terms, enough power to meet the reasonably foreseeable needs of the preference customers.

Provides also that a reasonable portion of the power subject to the preference provisions be made available to neighboring States within reasonable economic transmission distance, in an amount not to exceed 20 percent of the power subject to the preference clause.

The New York Power Authority contemplates a project with a total installed capacity of 2,190,000 kilowatts, at an estimated construction cost of $532 million.

Public Law 159, approved August 21, 1957.

Yellowtail Dam and Reservoir

Senate Joint Resolution 12:

This joint resolution provides for the transfer of right-of-way of approximately 7,000 acres of land for Yellowtail Dam and Reservoir and a settlement of $5 million to the Crow Indian Tribe as an outright purchase of the land, and for Federal benefits derived therefrom.

This measure removes the one remaining obstacle to the development of this multipurpose project in Montana and Wyoming. The project is designed to provide power in an area where power demands exceed production; it will bring arid lands under irrigation; and it will provide flood control as well as recreational benefits.

Passed Senate April 16, 1957.

Natural Conservation Anniversary Commission

Senate Joint Resolution 35:

This resolution provides for the establishment of a commission to arrange for the observance and commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the first conference of State governors on conservation in the United States and, generally, promote a realization among citizens of the importance of protecting and conserving our natural resources.

The Commission will include representatives of the executive and legislative branches, and is to expand itself to 35 members by the appointment of 15 representatives of groups interested in conservation and 10 citizens at large from private life.

The conference of governors called by the late President Theodore Roosevelt in 1908 was the first official Federal recognition of conservation—the protection and wise use of all our resources to achieve optimum values for all the people of the Nation—as a broad national problem involving all citizens and all levels of government.

Passed Senate February 4, 1957.

Passed House August 28, 1957.

Pecos River Basin, N. Mex. and Tex.

Senate Joint Resolution 39:

This joint resolution authorizes the construction of water-conservation projects to provide for a more adequate water supply for irrigation in the Pecos River Basin, in New Mexico and Texas.

The purpose of the projects is to salvage greatly needed irrigation-water supplies in the Pecos River for the existing reclamation project at Carlsbad, and the Red Bluffs project in Texas, as well as other irrigated lands in both States. In addition, an important feature is to alleviate salinity conditions in the Malaga Bend area in New Mexico, which will make available for irrigation purposes additional supplies of water in that section.

The principal works of the project are:

(1) A channel to convey flows of the Pecos River below Alamogordo Dam in New Mexico through the delta at the head of McMillan Reservoir of the Carlsbad reclamation project, a levee and cleared floodway through the delta, and spur drains leading from the delta;

(2) Works for the alleviation of salinity in the Malaga Bend area of the Pecos River drain in New Mexico.

Passed Senate March 29, 1957.

San Angelo Federal Reclamation Project, Tex.

S. 42:

This measure provides for the construction of the San Angelo project, a multiple-purpose water resource development in the Concho River Basin in central Texas, located in Tom Green County.

The project is to provide additional storage capacity in the Concho River system for irrigation, municipal water supply, flood control, recreation, and fish and wildlife benefits.

Principal features of the project include the Twin Buttes Dam and Reservoir with a maximum capacity of 810,000 acre-feet to span both Middle and South Concho Rivers. The controlled storage will be approximately 600,000 acre-feet. Of the total capacity, 150,000 acre-feet will be allocated to conservation; 430,000 acre-feet to flood control, 214,000 to surcharge capacity, and 16,000 for other purposes. Operations of the existing San Angelo and Nasworthy Dams and Reservoirs will be coordinated with the Twin Buttes facility. The irrigation system will include a main canal, laterals and drainage works to serve 10,000 acres of highly productive land.

Cost allocations are as follows:

	Nonreimbursable	Reimbursable	Total
Municipal supply	0	$6,100,000	$6,100,000
Irrigation	0	9,900,000	9,900,000
Flood control	$10,500,000	0	10,500,000
Recreation	60,000	0	60,000
Fish and wildlife	3,440,000	0	3,440,000
Total	14,000,000	16,000,000	30,000,000

Public Law 152, approved August 16, 1957.

St. Lawrence Seaway—Increase Borrowing Authority

H. R. 5728:

This measure, to make possible the completion of the St. Lawrence Seaway, increases the borrowing authority of the Seaway Development Corporation to $140 million (from $105 million) and authorizes the deferment of interest. Deferred interest is to be compounded after June 30, 1960.

Expands the powers of the corporation to include the provision of services and facilities necessary in the operation and maintenance of the seaway, and the ownership and operation of a toll bridge company in conjunction with the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority of Canada, or its designee.

The increased costs provided for in this act are attributable in part to general price increases, in part to basic planning and design changes, and in part to additional construction.

Public Law 108, approved July 17, 1957.

Amendatory Repayment Contracts

H. R. 5492:

This measure extends to December 31, 1960, the discretionary authority of the Secretary of Interior to enter into amendatory repayment contracts under the Federal reclamation laws. This authority was first given the Secretary in the Reclamation Project Act of 1939. It has been extended, first by the act of March 6, 1952, and then by the act of August 31, 1954.

The Congress has given the Secretary this authority to grant relief to irrigation districts in special hardship cases. With this extension, the Secretary can adjust the original terms to permit a longer period of repayment by deferring the repayments due to the Government.

Public Law 156, approved August 21, 1957.

Phosphate Development

S. 334:

Removes the present restrictions that no individual, corporation, or association may lease more than 5,120 acres of phosphate-bearing lands on the public domain in any one State.

The measure does not affect the present provision that not more than 10,240 acres of phosphate lands on the public domain may be leased to any individual, corporation, or association; it merely removes the present restriction by which the State line serves as a barrier to the effective development of phosphate reserves.

Public Law 122, approved August 13, 1957.

Irrigation Systems

S. 413:

This measure authorizes the Secretary of Interior to transfer title to distribution systems of Federal reclamation projects to local water users' organizations provided (1) the organization representing the water users concerned requests the transfer; and (2) the Secretary determines that the water users or the organization have completed repayment of all construction and other charges, with the exception of operation and maintenance charges not yet due.

Passed Senate May 16, 1957.

Outdoor Recreation Resources—Study

S. 846:

Establishes a National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission to study the outdoor recreation resources of the public lands.

The Commission is to be composed of 15 members, including 8 congressional members, and will report by December 31, 1959 on outdoor recreation requirements indicated for 1976 and 2000 together with the recommendations of the Commission on meeting those requirements.

Passed Senate June 26, 1957.

Missouri River Basin

S. 977:

This measure exempts approximately 21,300 acres of farmland in the East Bench unit of the Missouri River Basin project from the 160-acre limitation per farm set by the Federal reclamation laws.

This exemption will permit establishment of irrigated farms of adequate size to provide suitable family livelihood, and to meet the costs of water service pursuant to contract with the United States. The East Bench unit is an area of moderate income-producing potential and the standard 160-acre limitation is not sufficient for a family to make a living. Irrigation farming experience in the area has demonstrated that family-type farms will be successful only with combination livestock and feed-hay production. Because of the relatively short growing season at the project elevation of over 5,000 feet, and because of soil conditions, crop yields require somewhat more than 160 acres for family-sized operations. The exemption applies solely to the East Bench unit.

Public Law 112, approved July 24, 1957.

Little Missouri River Compact

S. 1556:

This act grants the consent of Congress to the States of Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact for the apportionment of the waters of the Little Missouri River and its tributaries.

The compact will undertake to apportion the waters of the Little Missouri and its tributaries in a fair and equitable manner so as to assure maximum beneficial use of the limited supply in the area.

Public Law 184, approved August 28, 1957.

Coal Development

S. 2069:

To promote the development of coal on the public domain, this act will permit individuals, associations, or corporations to hold an additional 10,240 (present limitation is 5,120) acres of public lands if the Secretary of the Interior finds that the increased acreage is necessary for an economic business operation in distressed power areas.

Passed Senate July 8, 1957.

Rio Grande Rehabilitation Project

S. 2120:

Authorizes the Secretary of Interior to proceed with the rehabilitation of the irrigation and drainage works of the Mercedes division of the lower Rio Grande rehabilitation project.

This project serves about 68,000 acres of richly diversified farmland. It was constructed in 1905–21, and is in a state of deterioration owing to its age. The plan for rehabilitation, submitted by the Interior Department, involves work on pumping stations, canals, and storage basins.

The authorized cost of the plan is $10,100,000, which is entirely repayable over a 40-year period. The excess-lands provision of the Small Reclamation Projects Act of 1956 applies to holdings of more than 160 acres, so far as interest is concerned. No water will be delivered for the production of basic agricultural commodities for a period of 10 years.

The benefit-cost ratio is 2 to 1.

Passed Senate August 9, 1957.

Virgin Islands National Park

S. 2183:

This measure amends the act establishing the Virgin Islands National Park by removing the limitations on expenditure of funds for the capital improvement of the park (now $60,000) and for annual operating expenses (now $30,000).

These limitations have placed severe and uneconomic restrictions on the development of an adequate national park in the Virgin Islands.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Burns Creek Project

S. 2757:

This measure authorizes the Federal construction of a reregulating reservoir and other works at Burns Creek in the upper Snake River Valley, Idaho.

Burns Creek Dam will be located about 30 miles below Palisades and will be a rolled earth-filled dam 170 feet above stream bed. Reservoir capacity will be 234,000 acre-feet, of which 117,000 acre-feet will be inactive capacity for powerhead, recreation, and fish conservation, 100,000 acre-feet will be used as long-term holdover irrigation storage, and 17,000 acre-feet will be available for pondage.

It is estimated that the project complete with a 90,000-kilowatt powerplant will cost $44,240,000.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

Emergency Flood-Control Work

S. 2228:

This measure amends section 5 of the Flood Control Act of 1941, to clarify the extent and nature of the work that may be done by the Corps of Engineers.

This act, in effect, is a composite, with additions, of several other laws on the books. It provides a $15 million emergency fund which may be used for preflood planning and supply, emergency repair and strengthening of flood-control works threatened by floodwaters, flood fighting and rescue, restoration of destroyed flood-control works, and removal of debris from waterways.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Shoshone Project, Wyoming

House Joint Resolution 287:

This measure authorizes the Bureau of Reclamation to continue to deliver water to the Heart Mountain division, Shoshone Federal reclamation project, during the 1957 and 1958 seasons.

Federal reclamation law prohibits the delivery of water for land irrigation unless a repayment contract is executed. An exception is made for the development period which, in the Heart Mountain division, was set at 10 years (1946–56). This period having expired, this act is necessary to continue deliveries.

Public Law 33, approved May 16, 1957.

Small Reclamation Projects—Amendment

H. R. 2146:

Amends the Small Reclamation Projects Act of 1956 to meet certain objections to the act raised by the President in his message of approval dated August 6, 1956.

The original act provided that no contract might be executed between the Secretary of the Interior and State or local agencies, by which Federal loans or grants are made to the cost of reclamation projects begun by such agencies, until the expiration of 60 days after submission of the contract to the Congress. The President felt that this provision violated the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers.

The act is amended to read that—

(a) The Secretary will transmit to the Congress his finding that a small reclamation project constitutes a reasonable risk and is financially feasible;

(b) No appropriation for financial participation in the project will be made prior to the expiration of 60 calendar days, exclusive of adjournments in excess of 3 days, following the Secretary's submission of findings; and

(c) No appropriation will be made if either the Senate or House Interior Committee disapproves the project, and so notifies the proper Appropriations Committee.

If a project is disapproved, authorization and appropriation for Federal participation will follow the ordinary processes in the Congress.

Public Law 47, approved June 5, 1957.

Chief Joseph Project—Washington

S. 1031:

This measure authorizes Federal construction of four units of the Great Wenatchee Division, Chief Joseph project, in Washington State.

The 4 units authorized are Howard Flat, Brays Landing, East and Moses Coulee, which encompasses an irrigable acreage of 8,661 acres. Approximately 1,440 of this acreage is now irrigated.

It is estimated that the cost of construction will be approximately $10,279,800, of which $10,185,000 is allocated to irrigation and reimbursable to the Federal Government over a 50-year repayment period.

Passed Senate August 10, 1957.

Mineral Lands—Alaska

H. R. 3477:

This measure amends the act of October 20, 1914, to provide that 90 percent of the net profits, bonuses, royalties, and rentals, realized from the operation of Government coal mines in Alaska, shall go to Alaska for disposition by the Territorial legislature, and that 10 percent shall go to the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts. Under present law, this money goes first to the United States to reimburse the Federal Government for railroad construction expenditures, and second to the Alaska fund for education and public relief. In practice the Alaska fund gets none of the money.

Amends the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, which determines the disposition of sales, bonuses, and royalties of minerals on the public lands, to provide that 52½ percent of the money received under that act will go to the Territory for disposition by the Territorial legislature. The Territory would continue to receive 37½ percent for the support of roads and educational institutions. The other States and Territories operate under a provision of the act which pays in 52½ percent of their public land mineral-leasing revenues to the reclamation fund. The reclamation laws have not been extended to Alaska.

Public Law 88, Approved July 10, 1957

Unpatented Mining Claims

H. R. 4748:

Extends to July 1, 1958, the time during which annual assessment work may be performed on unpatented mining claims based on the discovery of uraniferous lignite.

This extension will permit Atomic Energy Commission to continue its studies in an effort to develop an economic process for the recovery of uranium from the lignites. Extensive investigations are also being conducted by private organizations for the same purpose.

Public Law 68, approved June 29, 1957.

Merrimack River Flood-Control Compact

H. R. 6092:

Grants the consent of Congress to the Merrimack River flood-control compact entered into between the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, creating the Merrimack River Valley Flood Control Commission.

The compact will provide effective cooperation between the States in matters relating to flood-control and water-resources utilization in the Merrimack River Basin and have the effect of facilitating construction of many of the urgently needed flood-control projects.

Approval of the compact does not make the United States a party to it, nor does it require the appropriation of any Federal funds.

Public Law 23, approved April 23, 1957.

Bear River Compact

S. 1086:

This measure grants the consent and approval of Congress to the Bear River compact entered into by the States of Idaho, Utah, and Wyoming.

Bear River and its tributaries now supply irrigation water for approximately a half-million acres of land; however, nearly a million acre-feet of water a year still flows into Great Salt Lake where it becomes salty and evaporates.

This compact, which allocates the available water among these States, will make possible the developments of this million acre-feet for beneficial purposes in this semiarid area.

Passed Senate August 12, 1957.

Mirage Flats Irrigation District, Nebraska

H. R. 5679:

This act authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to amend the existing repayment contract with the Mirage Flats Irrigation District, Nebraska, to take care of a current deficit by extending the repayment period by an additional year.

It also permits the present schedule of required annual payments to be supplemented by applying a variable payment formula.

Public Law 160, approved August 21, 1957.

Kendrick Project, Wyoming

S. 1996:

This act authorizes an amendatory repayment contract to be executed with the Casper-Alcova Irrigation District, the water-user organization on the Kendrick project in Wyoming.

In 1935, Casper-Alcova, by contract, agreed to repay $2.8 million in 80 semiannual installments on the reimbursable irrigation portion of the Kendrick project. The remainder was to be returned to the Treasury from net power revenues.

The project was planned primarily to ease the unemployment situation in Casper in the 1930's.

Experience has shown the land will not produce sufficient for the irrigation district to repay at the rate established in the original contract.

This act extends the repayment period and lowers the repayment to approximately 4 percent of the irrigation investment cost.

Public Law 283, approved September 4, 1957.

National Science Foundation—Weather Study

S. 86:

Authorizes the National Science Foundation to undertake a study and research program in the field of weather modification, including methods of increasing rainfall, suppressing hail, windstorms and lightning.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Whitney Dam and Reservoir

H. R. 2580:

This act authorizes an allocation of 50,000 acre-feet of storage capacity in the Whitney Dam and Reservoir in Texas to provide water for domestic and industrial purposes. It also authorizes the Secretary of the Army to enter into agreements with local interests for reimbursement to the Federal Government for the costs of the water supply storage and other related costs.

Public Law 230, approved August 30, 1957.

Alaska Tidelands

H. R. 6760:

This act grants to the Territory of Alaska title to certain tidelands, filled lands, and submerged lands lying offshore of townsites in the Territory. The lands to be granted are those lying to the seaward of the meander line as it was established in the past by Government survey or, if there is no such surveyed meander line, to the seaward of the present line of mean high tide; and the grant extends only to the pierhead line.

The pierhead line is a line parallel to the line of mean low tide which will enclose within the granted area all stationary man-made structures which were occupying or supported by submerged lands as of February, 1, 1957.

Retains in the United States all of the Federal rights and servitudes which apply to similar areas of the United States, and retains the Federal right of first refusal to purchase natural resources which may be required for national defense.

Public Law 303, approved September 7, 1957.

Narragansett Bay Area

S. 1726:

This act authorizes the Federal construction of Fox Point barrier on the Providence River, for protection of Providence, R. I., against hurricane tidal floods. It is estimated that the cost to the Federal Government will be approximately $16,180,000. The Fox Point barrier will provide protection for the city of Providence where 35 percent of the total hurricane damages occur.

The barrier will be approximately 1,100 feet long across the Providence River at Fox Point to a grade of about 22.5 feet above mean sea level with accessory pump, sluices, cooling-water inlet facilities, and seawalls at each end with stop-long structures.

Passed Senate August 23, 1957.

Social Welfare

Civil Rights

H. R. 6127:

The Senate, on August 7, passed a civil-rights measure, the first, in 82 years, to be acted on by both Houses.

This measure establishes a six-member bipartisan executive Commission on Civil Rights to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The Commission is authorized to investigate written allegations that citizens are being deprived of their right to vote. Any evidence or testimony which may tend to defame, degrade, or incriminate a person must be received in executive session; and any person releasing such testimony, without the consent of the Commission, will be fined up to $1,000, or imprisioned for 1 year. The Commission may not issue any subpena which would require the presence of the party subpenaed at a hearing to be held outside of the party's own State. The Commission is required to submit interim reports to the President and to Congress, and a final report of its activities not later than 2 years from date of enactment.

The President is authorized to appoint, subject to Senate confirmation, an additional Assistant Attorney General in the Department of Justice to handle civil-rights matters.

Extends the jurisdiction of the district courts to include any civil action begun to recover damages or to secure equitable or other relief under any act of Congress providing for the protection of civil rights, including the right to vote.

Repealed an 1866 reconstruction statute giving President power to use troops to enforce existing civil-rights law.

Prohibits attempts to intimidate, threaten, or coerce persons from voting in general or primary elections for Federal offices. Authorizes the Attorney General to seek an injunction if an individual is deprived or about to be deprived of his right to vote. Provides that the district courts shall have jurisdiction over such proceedings without regard to whether the party aggrieved has exhausted administrative or other remedies. Any person cited for an alleged contempt under this act shall be defended by counsel and permitted to produce witnesses.

Provides that any person, corporation, or association willfully disobeying or obstructing any order, rule, decree or command of any United States or District of Columbia court issued under this act may be prosecuted for criminal contempt, and places the fine under these proceedings at not more than $1,000 or 6 months in jail. In any criminal contempt proceedings, the judge may proceed upon his discretion with or without a jury, but if he proceeds without a jury and imposes upon conviction a sentence in excess of $300 or 45 days in prison, a new trial with a jury must be accorded upon demand. Contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near as to obstruct the administration of justice or by an officer of the court are excepted.

Retains the right of the courts to act without a jury in civil-contempt cases to secure compliance with or to prevent obstruction of a court order as distinguished from punishment for violations of an order.

Establishes uniform standards for qualifications of Federal jurors by providing that any United States citizen over 21 who has resided in the judicial district is competent to serve as a grand or petit juror unless: (1) he has been convicted of a crime and his civil rights have not been restored; (2) he is unable to read, write, speak, and understand the English language; (3) he is incapable either physically or mentally to render efficient jury service.

Public Law 315, approved September 9, 1957.

Vocational Rehabilitation Act

S. 1971:

Extends to 3 years (from 2) the time for training doctors under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act. The 2-year limitation as provided for in the 1954 act has proved unrealistic as a training period for physicians in the field of physical medicine and rehabilitation. These physicians are the key people in the rehabilitation program and to become thoroughly proficient in this field a minimum of 3 years of specialized training is required, after a doctor of medicine degree has been earned.

Public Law 198, approved August 28, 1957.

National Mental Health Week

Senate Joint Resolution 70:

In recognition of the progress being made in one of the Nation's health problems—mental illness—the Congress adopted unanimously a joint resolution requesting the President to proclaim as National Mental Health Week, April 28 through May 4, 1957.

This year the slogan for Mental Health Week is: "The mentally ill can come back—help them." This appeal is made to the entire Nation and calls for participation by all citizens.

Public Law 18, approved April 20, 1957.

Aid to the Blind

H. R. 3035:

This measure continues to June 30, 1959, the authority for Federal contributions for aid to the blind in the States of Pennsylvania and Missouri pending approval of their plans by the Secretary of HEW.

Under the Social Security Amendments of 1950, it is required that all State plans for aid to the blind be approved by the Secretary of HEW and that such plans conform to certain standard requirements. All but the above two States have complied with the requirement, and this extension is merely to permit the Federal Government and the States of Pennsylvania and Missouri to negotiate.

Public Law 26, approved April 25, 1957.

Books in Braille

S. 2434:

This measure removes the present $1,125,000 limitation on the amount which may be annually appropriated for expenditure to provide Library of Congress materials for the use of the blind, and removes the $200,000 limitation on amounts which may be spent annually for books in braille.

The act provides that such sums as may be necessary may be spent for these purposes, in order to enable the Library of Congress to maintain an effective program for blind readers.

Public Law 308, approved September 7, 1957.

Medical Care—Payments

H. R. 7238:

This measure amends the public assistance provisions of the Social Security Act to provide for a more effective distribution of Federal funds for medical and other remedial care.

Under this act, the State has the option of continuing to receive its Federal matching vendor payments for medical care under the provisions of the 1950 act in effect prior to July 1, 1957, which established individual maximums on money payments for medical care; or the State may receive its Federal funds under the separate matching provisions of the 1956 amendments which became effective July 1, 1957.

Under the 1950 act, Federal financial participation in State expenditures for old-age assistance, aid to the blind, aid to dependent children, and aid to the permanently and totally disabled has been available for unrestricted money payments to needy recipients and for payments made directly to suppliers of medical care on behalf of these recipients. The Federal Government has not participated, however, in that part of the total assistance to an individual, including both the money payment to the individual and any medical care vendor payments made on his behalf for any month, which exceeded a specified maximum. Under the provisions of the 1956 amendments this maximum has been $60 in all of the programs except aid to dependent children.

The 1956 amendments, effective July 1, 1957, provided for separate matching of vendor payments for medical care and excluded vendor payments for medical care from the formulas applicable with respect to unrestricted money payments made to the recipients. Under these separate matching provisions the total amount of vendor payments for medical care in which the Federal Government will participate is $6 times the number of adult recipients and $3 times the number of child recipients. The Federal Government's share within these limits is one-half; therefore, under the 1956 amendments, no State may receive in Federal funds more than an average of $3 per adult recipient and $1.50 per child recipient with respect to its vendor medical-care payments.

Under this act, the State may make its choice of formula once a year or less frequently, as it desires.

Public Law 110, approved July 17, 1957.

Social Security—Disability Applications

H. R. 6191:

Amends title II of the Social Security Act to extend for 1 year (through June 30, 1958) the time within which disabled workers may file applications permitting the period of disability to be established as early as the actual onset of their illness.

Under present law, if an application is filed after June 30, 1957, the period of disability that is established cannot begin earlier than 1 year before the application is filed.

This measure also extends, from July 1, 1957, through June 30, 1958, the time within which application may be made for a freeze of an individual's social security earnings record. Under a 1954 provision the earnings record can be frozen in the case of a disabled worker, so that his inability to work during a period of disablement does not result in a reduction in, or loss of, his old-age, survivors, and disability insurance rights. Because the provision is relatively new, many people qualified to make such an application did not do so, and this act will grant them a further opportunity to apply.

Public Law 109, approved July 17, 1957.

School Construction—Wake Island

H. R. 7540:

Extends the defense-impacted school construction provisions of Public Law 815, 81st Congress, and Public Law 949, 84th Congress, to Wake Island.

The island was not originally included within recipients of Public Law 815 aid because it had a sufficient school, however it was destroyed in a hurricane, and a new one is urgently needed.

It is estimated that a 3-room schoolhouse capable of caring for the anticipated 70 elementary school-age children will cost $110,000.

Upward of 90 percent of the island's employees are directly employed by the United States.

Public Law 161, approved August 21, 1957.

Indians—Hospital Facilities

H. R. 8053:

Authorizes the Surgeon General to grant financial assistance to public or other nonprofit agencies for the construction of community hospitals serving Indians, where he finds that this method would be more effective than direct Federal assistance to such construction.

No additional funds are authorized by the legislation, but an additional means is provided for constructing hospitals which will provide care for both Indians and non-Indians. The amount of assistance the Surgeon General may provide, in cooperation with other public funds, may not exceed the amount necessary to insure care for the Indians in the community.

Public Law 151, approved August 16, 1957.

Klamath Tribe Indians

S. 469:

Primary purpose of this measure is to delay the sales of tribal timberlands belonging to the Klamath Indians (Oregon) until Congress has had an opportunity to determine whether all or any part of the lands should be acquired by the Federal or State Government for public conservation purposes, or whether other alternative steps may be needed to protect the economy and to preserve good conservation practices in the region. Extends the final termination date from August 13, 1958, to August 13, 1960, and provides for Federal payment of the costs of termination up to a maximum of $550,000.

In addition this measure makes several technical amendments to the present law such as permitting the withdrawal of minors and incompetents from the tribe; specifies that an opportunity to elect to withdraw shall be afforded only after the apprisal of tribal assets are approved by the Secretary; gives the Indians who stay in the tribe the same rights as those who withdraw to purchase any tribal land that is offered for sale; and makes it clear that the provisions for terminating restrictions on individually owned Indian land apply both to allotted and to purchased land.

Public Law 132, approved August 14, 1957.

Navaho and Hopi Indian Lands

S. 692:

Described in the Executive order of December 16, 1892, for the Indians entitled to this acreage, and authorizes adjudication of conflicting claims of the Navaho and Hopi by a three-judge district court.

The Executive order of 1882 set aside the land for the use of the Hopi and other Indians as designated by the Secretary of Interior. At present the land is completely surrounded by Navaho territory and the Navahos claim right of entry.

The court's order will determine the part to be exclusively Hopi and the part to be exclusively Navaho. The tribal members are authorized to sell, buy, or exchange land where litigation displaced members of either tribe, the sales to be subject to approval of Secretary of Interior.

Passed Senate May 8, 1957.

Indian Lands

S. 998:

Amends the act of June 4, 1953, which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to convey lands and improvements, formerly used for Federal Indian school purposes, to local governments, when the lands and improvements are no longer needed for Indian school purposes.

Under the 1953 act the Secretary could declare a forfeiture of such conveyance if (a) the consent of the beneficial owners, the Indians, had not been obtained; or if (b) the property was not used for public purposes; or if (c) it was not made available to Indians on a nondiscriminatory basis; and if any one of these conditions had been breached for at least a year.

This amendment would grant the Indians the right to go into Federal court to demand forfeiture themselves, if the above conditions have been breached for at least a year. In effect, the amendment provides a more complete protection of Indian interests.

Public Law 31, approved May 16, 1957.

Osage Indian Tribal Government

S. 1417:

Extends the tribal government of the Osage Indians from January 1, 1959, to January 1, 1984.

The principal function of the tribal government is to participate with the Secretary of Interior in the execution of mineral leases covering the minerals that were reserved to the tribe. Those minerals are reserved and held in trust by the United States until April 8, 1983. Accordingly the life of the tribal government should be extended until that date in order for the tribe to continue to participate in leasing the minerals.

Public Law 192, approved August 28, 1957.

Colorado River Indian Reservation

S. 2161:

This measure extends to August 14, 1959, the act of August 14, 1955, which granted the Secretary of the Interior authority to lease unassigned lands in the Colorado River Indian Reservation for periods of 25 years. The Secretary was given this authority only for a 2-year period; it was thought that by the expiration of that time separate legislation would have been enacted settling the controversy over ownership of the lands. During the 2-year period, revenues received from leases on the northern reserve were to be expended for the benefit of tribal members on the northern reserve; revenues from the southern reserve were to go to the development of lands in the southern reserve.

The Indians of the reservation have not been able to agree on the ownership of the lands, and have taken the controversy to the Indian Claims Commission. No results are expected in the case by the expiration of the original period, and tribal members have requested an extension of the Secretary's authority.

Passed Senate June 26, 1957.

Bureau of Indian Affairs—Educational Leave

H. R. 3837:

This act extends to teachers in schools operated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, in addition to annual leave, a period not in excess of 30 working days a year or 60 working days in every alternate year, for attendance at educational meetings and summer school.

Public Law 89, approved July 10, 1957.

Indians—Control of Livestock

H. R. 3836:

Section 1157 of title 18 originally prohibited the sale of livestock issued to or purchased in trust for Indians by the United States, without the consent of the superintendent or other person in charge of the tribe. The section was amended to restrict its applicability to livestock acquired with loans from a Federal revolving fund or tribal loan fund, and to livestock loans repayable in kind; it was also made inapplicable when the loan was repaid. The purchaser of Indian livestock was given the burden of determining whether it is subject to an unpaid loan.

The Bureau of Indian Affairs has in practice obtained chattel mortgages on its livestock loans, instead of relying on the trust status of the property or on section 1157. The section is, therefore, no longer needed, and it imposes an undue burden on purchasers of Indian livestock. Its repeal will permit livestock buyers to deal with Indians in the same manner as they deal with non-Indian owners.

Public Law 86, approved July 10, 1957.

Cherokee Indians—Tribal Roll

H. R. 4830:

This measure authorizes a revision of the roll of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians in North Carolina.

In an act of June 4, 1924, provision was made for the preparation of the final disposition of the affairs of the Eastern Band of Cherokees. Among the provisions of the 1924 act was one stating that no person born after that date would be entitled to enrollment. By an act of March 4, 1931, the earlier act was amended to provide that that roll should be a final roll of these Indians only for the purposes of showing the membership of the band as it existed on June 4, 1924.

During the past 24 years many of the enrolled members are deceased and many Cherokees have been born but, since the roll is closed there is no authority to remove names, nor to add those who can meet the membership requirements for enrollment. This measure will permit such enrollment.

Public Law 154, approved August 21, 1957.

Social Security Retirement System

H. R. 8755:

This measure makes applicable to all interstate instrumentalities the provision of present law which permits specified States to divide a retirement system into two parts and provide social-security coverage for the part consisting of the positions of those employees who desire coverage.

This act also provides that an agreement or modification extending OASI coverage to services performed in the employ of any State or any interstate instrumentality may be made effective as early as January 1, 1956, if the coverage agreement or modification is entered into prior to 1960.

Optional coverage is extended to policemen and firemen in the States of Alabama, Georgia, New York, and Tennessee.

Public Law 226, approved August 30, 1957.

Social Security Act Amendment

H. R. 8753:

This measure amends the Social Security Act to include the States of California, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Minnesota under the provision of present law which permits specified States to divide a retirement system into two parts and provide social-security coverage for the part consisting of those employees who desire to come under social-security coverage and the other group to be comprised of those who do not want to come into the OASI system.

In order to assure sufficient time for the four States to make arrangements for covering employees, this measure provides a 2-year extension of the time within which a retroactive coverage agreement may be entered into.

Public Law 227, approved August 30, 1957.

Social Security Coverage—State and Local Employees

H. R. 8821:

This measure amends the Social Security Act to expedite the completion of an old-age and survivors insurance coverage referendum in conjunction with the special provision of the Social Security Amendments of 1956 which permits certain specified States to divide a retirement system for purposes of extending old-age and survivors insurance coverage to those members of the system who desire coverage.

Under present law, after a retirement system in any of the specified States has been divided between those members who desire old-age and survivors insurance coverage and those who do not, a referendum must be conducted among the members who indicated a desire for coverage before their coverage could be effected. This measure permits the specified States to provide this coverage without a subsequent coverage referendum for those retirement system members desiring coverage, provided certain safeguards, similar to those applying under the existing referendum provisions, were followed in the process of dividing the system into the two parts.

Public Law 229, approved August 30, 1957.

Social Security Benefits—Alien Survivors

H. R. 1944:

This measure amends the Social Security Act to make inapplicable, in the case of the survivors of certain members of the Armed Forces, the provisions which presently prevent the payment of benefits to aliens who are outside the United States.

The existing law includes a provision which suspends the payments of old-age and survivors insurance benefits to any individual not a citizen or national of the United States who first becomes eligible for benefits after December 1956, if such person remains out of the country for 6 consecutive months. Payment of benefits will not be suspended, however, if either (1) he is a citizen of a foreign country which has in effect a social insurance or pension system of general application which would permit benefit payments to United States citizens in the event they left the foreign country without regard to the duration of their absence; or (2) he has 40 quarters of coverage (10 years); or (3) he has resided in the United States for 10 years; or (4) he is serving outside the country in the Armed Forces of the United States; or (5) application of the provision would violate a treaty obligation of the United States.

This amendment allows the benefits to be paid to the survivors of individuals who die while on active duty or inactive duty training as members of a uniformed service, as the result of a disease or injury which the Veterans' Administration determines was incurred or aggravated in line of active duty; or an injury which was incurred or aggravated in line of duty while on inactive duty training and the individual was honorably discharged or released. This provision is retroactive to January 1, 1957.

Public Law 238, approved August 30, 1957.

Social-Security Coverage—Ministers

H. R. 8892:

This measure amends the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to extend for 2 years, through April 15, 1959, the time within which ministers, including certain members of religious orders and Christian Science practitioners, may file waiver certificates to elect coverage under the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program as self-employed persons.

Each minister who files a waiver certificate during the extended period would be covered under old-age, survivors, and disability insurance for each year, beginning with his first taxable year ending after 1955, in which he had net earnings from self-employment of $400 or more, provided some part of this amount is from his duties as a minister.

Public Law 239, approved August 30, 1957.

Condemned Imports

H. R. 6456:

This measure provides that foods, drugs, cosmetics, or devices which have been imported from foreign countries and entered through customs into the United States, if subsequently seized under domestic provisions of the law as violative of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, may, under certain conditions, be reexported.

Public Law 250, approved August 31, 1957.

Education—Mentally Retarded Children

S. 395:

This measure authorizes the Commissioner of Education to make grants to public or other nonprofit institutions of higher learning to assist them in providing training of professional personnel to conduct research in, or conduct training of teachers in, fields related to education of mentally retarded children.

These grants may be used to assist in covering the cost of training courses or study for such personnel and for establishing and maintaining fellowships.

These grants may also be made to State educational agencies to assist them in establishing and maintaining fellowships or traineeships for training personnel.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

Fair Labor Standards Act in Overseas Areas

H. R. 7467.

This measure excludes from any possible coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act work performed by employees in a workplace within a foreign country (such as employees on overseas military bases and establishments or in an airline or steamship ticket office in a foreign port) by limiting the coverage of the act to those who perform work within a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, outer Continental Shelf lands, American Samoa, Guam, Wake Island, and the Canal Zone.

It also eliminates the possibility of retroactive liability under the act for work performed in the past on either the overseas bases or on Guam, Wake Island, or in the Canal Zone.

Public Law 199, approved August 28, 1957.

National Junior Achievement Week

House Concurrent Resolution 73:

In recognition of junior achievers and their volunteer adult advisers, the Congress unanimously approved a resolution requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the week of January 27, 1957 through February 2, 1957, as National Junior Achievement Week, and urging all citizens to salute these young people by participating in ceremonies honoring this group.

Interested American youth, through Junior Achievement, Inc., are greatly assisted in setting up and operating their own small-scale business enterprises which, ultimately, better prepares them in assuming the responsibilities of community leadership.

Senate and House adopted January 17, 1957.

Jurors—Use of Certified Mail

H. R. 3367:

This measure authorizes the use of certified mail as well as registered mail for summoning jurors for service in Federal courts.

Certified mail insures delivery of a letter, furnishes proof of its delivery, and is less than one-half as expensive as registered mail.

Public Law 259, approved September 2, 1957.

Loan Service of Captioned Films for the Deaf

S. 1889:

This measure establishes in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare a loan service of captioned films for the deaf and severely hard of hearing. The service is designed to bring to deaf persons understanding and appreciation of those films which play such an important part in the general and cultural advancement of hearing persons. It will provide enriched educational and cultural experiences through which deaf persons can be brought into better touch with the realities of their environment.

These captioned films will be distributed through State schools for the deaf and other agencies designated as regional centers for distribution purposes.

Passed Senate August 23, 1957.

School Construction in Federally Affected Areas

H. R. 8679:

This measure provides a 1-year extension of the programs of financial assistance in the construction of schools in areas affected by Federal activities, under the provisions of Public Law 815, 81st Congress.

Under existing law, funds may be provided to local school districts only for children living on Federal property on June 30, 1958. Because of the delay in the various housing programs and to avoid severe hardships, it is necessary to enact this 1-year extension beyond June 30, 1958.

Public Law 267, approved September 2, 1957.

Union Financial Reports

Senate Joint Resolution 94:

This measure authorizes public disclosure of financial reports and statements filed with the Secretary of Labor under section 9 (f) and (g) of the National Labor Relations Act.

Under this section information relating to the financial statements and the constitutions and bylaws of labor organizations must be filed with the Secretary of Labor, in the form prescribed by him, and kept up to date annually before those organizations can avail themselves of the procedures of the National Labor Relations Board. These reports must show all of the filing unions' receipts; assets and liabilities as of the end of the fiscal year; and disbursements made during the fiscal year.

Passed Senate August 23, 1957.

Civil Copyright Actions

H. R. 277:

This measure provides a uniform statute of limitations of 3 years for civil actions relating to copyrights.

Under existing law in copyright cases, the courts apply the law of the State in which the litigation is brought with respect to the limitation on commencement of action. This leads to a diversity of statutes of limitations. Some courts have applied the State statute of limitations pertaining to torts to civil suits brought under the copyright statutes; other courts have applied the statutes pertaining to conversions, injuries to personal rights, injuries to property rights, trover, etc.

This legislation takes effect 1 year following enactment. It applies not only to prospective claims but retrospective to prior claims, whether or not barred on the effective date by previously existing law in the State in which the Federal court is located.

Public Law 313, approved September 7, 1957.

Transportation and Communications

Airways Modernization Board

S. 1856:

This measure establishes an Airways Modernization Board of three members; a chairman, appointed by the President and approved by the Senate, the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of Commerce.

It will be the duty of the board to develop, test, and evaluate systems and devices to meet the need for efficient control of air traffic, except for those needs of military agencies which are peculiar to air warfare and primarily under military cognizance.

The Board will function until June 30, 1960.

Public Law 133, approved August 14, 1957.

Motor Vehicles

S. 375:

This measure amends the Interstate Commerce Act to provide that any mortgage, conditional sales agreement, or bailment of a motor vehicle to a carrier subject to ICC regulations shall, when filed in the State where the purchaser of the vehicle is domiciled, be enforceable in other States as if the mortgage or sales agreement had been filed in such other State.

The purpose is to alleviate the conditions arising out of conflicting State statutes regarding the validity of vehicle mortgages and conditional sales agreements. Since an agreement valid under the laws of one State may be invalid in another State, or the time of its validity may have expired in another State, banks and lending agencies are reluctant to finance the purchase of trucks. This act provides a kind of universal validity to the original agreement.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Common Carriers—Government Contracts

S. 377:

This measures amends section 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act under which the United States is allowed free or reduced rates for carriage, storage, or handling of property, and transportation of persons or property at free or reduced rates.

This amendment provides that offers, or tenders, to the Government under section 22 by carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act shall be conclusively presumed to be lawful and not subject to attack 2 years after date of acceptance by a properly authorized official of the United States. Such arrangements may be canceled or terminated only upon 90 days' written notice.

Passed Senate August 8, 1957.

Great Lakes Shipyards

S. 534:

Amends the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, to include Great Lakes shipyards among those eligible to bid for construction and remodeling of vessels under the act. The act provides that when the Secretary of Commerce finds that implementation of the national maritime policy so requires, he is authorized to have new vessels constructed, and old vessels rehabilitated, "in domestic yards, on the Atlantic Gulf and Pacific coasts." This measure amends the language to read "in shipyards of the continental United States," thereby including the Great Lakes shipyards.

Public Law 191, approved August 28, 1957.

Canadian Vessels—Alaska

S. 886:

Extends for another year (until June 30, 1958) a waiver of the statutory requirement that vessels of the United States registry be used in passenger or freight transportation between the United States and Alaska.

Permits Canadian-flag vessels to carry passengers and freight between Hyder, Alaska, and other ports in southeastern Alaska, or the continental United States, and passengers only between southeastern Alaska and foreign ports.

The waiver is necessary because the Alaska Steamship Co., an American concern, has suspended those operations described in the waiver, leaving the southeastern Alaska ports without available American transportation.

Public Law 103, approved July 11, 1957.

Common Carriers—Rates for Circuitous Routes

S. 937:

This measure allows railroads and other carriers under part I of the Interstate Commerce Act, and water carriers under part III of the act, to establish rates over circuitous routes, regardless of length, so as to meet competition of the same type over direct routes, without first filing requests for relief from the ICC.

These carriers are permitted to act without applying to the ICC because no substantial benefits to regulatory control have accrued in this area to offset the expenditure of time and money involved in the application. Regulatory control is still assured, as it is in the case of other rate establishments, by the availability of the complaint procedure before the ICC. During the year ending October 31, 1956, 1,573 applications for circuitous-route rates were made, and only 87 denied.

Public Law 99, approved July 11, 1957.

Common Carriers—Rates

S. 939:

This measure amends section 22 of the Interstate Commerce Act which permits the United States Government and State or municipal governments free or reduced rates from carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act for carriage, storage, or handling property; this section also allows the United States Government transportation of persons at free or reduced rates.

This measure provides that quotations or tenders by carriers to the Government must be submitted to the ICC and be open to public inspection. If, however, such inspection might involve national security it would not be permitted.

Public Law 246, approved August 31, 1957.

Contract Motor Carriers—Rates

S. 943:

This measure requires motor vehicle contract carriers, subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, to file with the Commission the actual rates which they maintain and charge for transportation services, rather than their actual minimum rates and charges as presently required by the ICC.

The present system of filing the lowest rates and charges places the common carriers, on whom the vast majority of shippers rely, especially the small shippers, at a distinct competitive disadvantage because they are unable to determine whether the minimum rate filed is the rate charged to all shippers for the same service.

This measure, in effect, will establish quality in rate publication since a rate can be changed only upon 30 days' notice. Those carriers, however, who are not in competition with common carriers by serving only one shipper (and have served him for at least a year) are relieved from filing at all. This provides relief and also gives greater stability to contract carriers.

Public Law 124, approved August 13, 1957.

Freight Forwarder Permit

S. 1383:

This measure amends the Interstate Commerce Act to change the requirements for obtaining a freight forwarder permit.

Extends to freight forwarder applicants the present power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to deny permits solely on the ground of existing adequate facilities which now apply only to motor and water carrier applicants.

Public Law 176, approved August 28, 1957.

Contract Motor Carriers

S. 1384:

This measure revises the definition of "contract carrier" to read, "one who conducts its business other than as a common carrier and under continuing contracts with one person or a limited number of persons for the furnishing of transportation services through the assignment of motor vehicles for a continuing period for the exclusive use of each person served, or for the furnishing of transportation services designed to meet the distinct need of each individual customer."

Under the present definition contract carriers are permitted to acquire virtually unlimited contracts, and are actually performing common carrier service.

This act provides that, with certain exceptions, no person shall engage in any for-hire transportation business by motor vehicle in interstate commerce without a certificate or permit from the ICC.

Provides that, upon its own motion or upon the complaint of an interested party, the ICC may institute proceedings to determine whether or not a contract carrier is actually operating within the definition of "contract carrier"; if it is determined that he is not, the ICC may revoke his permit and issue him a common carrier certificate.

Public Law 163, approved August 22, 1957.

Contract Carriers—Antitrust Laws

S. 1385:

This measure amends section 11 of the Clayton Act to give the ICC authority under the section over contract carriers, as well as common carriers.

The effect of the act is to transfer from the Federal Trade Commission to the ICC authority to enforce compliance with sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of the Clayton Act, in respect to contract carriers. These sections deal with the acquisition by one corporation of stock in another corporation where the effect would be to substantially lessen competition. The ICC, under section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, presently has jurisdiction where common control is established over two or more contract carriers. This will complete ICC's jurisdiction in the contract carrier field.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

ICC—Power Brakes

S. 1386:

This measure provides that the rules, standards, and regulations of the Association of American Railroads, governing the inspection and maintenance of power or train brakes, shall be adopted and put into effect by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Provision is made for amendment of these rules after hearings before the ICC.

Administration of the rules by the ICC was proposed as important to better safety conditions on American railroads.

Passed Senate August 13, 1957.

CAB—Foreign Air Commerce

S. 1423:

This measure amends the Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938 by withdrawing from the President the power to review CAB certifications in foreign air transportation matters. In effect, this limits the President's power in overruling the Board's decisions in foreign air matters to those cases involving United States foreign policy and national defense.

This amendment will relieve the President of the burden of examining and passing upon complex economic matters which logically should be the responsibility of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

Passed Senate April 4, 1957.

Common Carriers—Charter Service

S. 1459:

This measure requires future applicants, for common carrier authority to transport passengers by motor vehicle in interstate commerce, to show a need for transporting special or charter parties, instead of obtaining charter transportation rights upon showing only a need for transportation over a regular route.

At the present time the right to transport charter parties is gained as an incident to a regular route authorization. In many instances it appears that regular route authorization by the ICC is sought only as a device to perform charter service from or to points in the regular route area.

Inasmuch as the regular existing bus lines are experiencing great difficulties in maintaining their financial security, it is felt that the lucrative charter business should be preserved for those lines, and extended only where a need for charter service can be demonstrated.

Passed Senate June 27, 1957.

Motor Carriers—Operating Rights

S. 1461:

This measure amends the Interstate Commerce Act to make motor carrier operating authorities subject to suspension, change, or revocation for willful failure to comply with any rule or regulation lawfully promulgated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It also serves to make the revocation procedure for motor carriers conform to the procedure applicable to freight forwarders.

It further provides that the Commission may, upon reasonable notice, suspend motor carrier operating authorities for failure to comply with insurance regulations issued by the Commission.

Passed Senate July 3, 1957.

Medals of Honor—Motor Vehicle Disasters

S. 1463:

Authorizes the President to issue medals of honor to persons who, by extreme daring, endanger their own lives in saving, or endeavoring to save, victims of an accident or disaster on the public roads.

Similar authority is in effect for persons performing courageous acts in connection with train wrecks.

Public Law 50, approved June 13, 1957.

Air Cargo Carriers Certification

S. 1474:

Amends the Civil Aeronautics Act to provide for permanent certification by the Civil Aeronautics Board of domestic all-cargo (including mail) services which have been operated continuously since November 15, 1956, under temporary certificates. Mail carriage under the permanent certificate will continue to be on a nonsubsidy basis.

The four carriers affected are: AAXICO, Inc. (American Air Export Import Co.); the Flying Tiger Line, Inc.; Riddle Airlines, Inc.; Slick Airways, Inc.

Two of these airlines, Slick and the Riddle Line, have been operating for 11 years on temporary certificates. This measure is designed to provide stability and permanence which will permit them to plan and develop their service.

Passed Senate May 1, 1957.

United States Vessels—High Seas

S. 1483:

This measure amends a 1954 act relating to the rights of United States vessels on the high seas and in the territorial waters of foreign countries.

The 1954 act authorizes the Secretary of State to reimburse American fishing vessels for fines paid to foreign nations which were illegally levied and contrary to international law, when they were seized on the high seas. The majority of the seizures occurred on the west coast of South America, some of them 200 miles out in the Pacific, and involved American tuna boats fishing in the South Pacific.

This amendment provides that in addition to the fines, the fishing boat owners shall be reimbursed by the Secretary of Treasury for their losses, including reasonable expenses for fishing gear, equipment, and catch resulting from such seizure, if certified by the Secretary of State. The amendment also requires the Secretary of State to take action to collect authorized claims from the foreign governments.

Passed Senate August 9, 1957.

Explosives—Transportation

S. 1491:

Amends the Transportation of Explosives Act, to bring certain provisions up to date, and to provide more careful controls of the transportation of dangerous materials.

Includes radioactive materials, and etiologic agents (live viruses, bacteria, etc.) within the purview of the act, thereby conferring on the ICC the power of regulating their shipment.

Provides the same punishment for violation of the act by private carriers as by common carriers.

Extends the ICC's regulatory authority under the act to shipments in intrastate commerce, where the carrier is engaged in interstate commerce or where his vehicles will be commingled with interstate traffic. The shipper who tenders such articles to an interstate carrier must comply with the packing and marking provisions of the act, whether or not the particular shipment is to move across State lines.

Prohibits the transportation of nitroglycerin by either common or private carriers except under such regulations as ICC may prescribe.

Changes the punitive requirements of the act, to provide that any person "being aware that the ICC has formulated regulations for the safe transportation of explosives and other dangerous materials," and who violates such regulations shall be subject to the act's penalties. Thus absolute liability is not imposed, but a higher standard of care is established than the former requirement that one must "knowledgeably violate such regulations" in order to be punished.

Passed Senate May 9, 1957.

Bankruptcy Act Amendment—Aircraft

S. 2205:

This measure places beyond the jurisdiction of the court, under certain conditions, the title of any owner to specified property relating to aircraft leased, subleased, or conditionally sold to any air carrier. It will permit holders of leases, or conditional sales contracts on such aircraft property a specific statutory protection or immunity from chapter X similar to that now accorded to rolling-stock equipment of railroads but not accorded to holders of leases or conditional sales contracts on other property.

This amendment, in brief, will make it possible for certificated air carriers, like railroads, to obtain equipment trust financing.

Passed Senate August 26, 1957.

Postal Laws—Penal Provisions

H. R. 4193:

This measure adjusts the penal provisions of the postal laws by:

1. Providing the death penalty or life imprisonment where death results from mailing nonmailable articles such as explosives.
2. Increasing the present penalty from 10 to 20 years where nonmailable matter is mailed with intent to kill or injure another or injure the mails or other property but where death does not result.
3. Reducing the penalty from 2 years to 1 year (from a felony to a misdemeanor) for mailing anything declared nonmailable.

Public Law 268, approved September 2, 1957.

Railroads—Safety Violations

S. 1492:

Increases the amount of penalty fines for violation of certain statutes administered by the ICC. The statutes involved are:

The Safety Appliance Act: This act requires the use of power brakes, automatic couplers, etc., on railroad trains. The fine is increased from $100 to $250.

The Hours of Service Act: This act prohibits railroads from keeping employees on duty for such periods of time as would cause serious impairment of their reflexes and alertness. The fine is increased from $100 to $200.

The Locomotive Inspection Act: This act requires periodic inspection of bad reports concerning operating locomotives. The fine is increased from $100 to $250.

Sections 222 (a) and 222 (c) of the Interstate Commerce Act: These sections deal with motor carrier safety regulations, and with the giving of rebates by motor carriers, and other unlawful practices. Fines are increased from $100 for the first offense and $500 for subsequent offenses, to $500 for the first offense and not more than $2,000 for subsequent offenses.

Public Law 135, approved August 14, 1957.

CAB, Members—Tenure

S. 1718:

Amends the Civil Aeronautics Act to provide that the term of office of members of the CAB will expire on March 31 instead of December 31 of each year, and that the members hold office until their successor is appointed and qualified—but not beyond a period of 120 days.

This measure will assist CAB in avoiding situations where the Board is at less than its full statutory strength during the period between the time a member's term expires and the time his successor is confirmed and takes his oath of office.

Passed Senate June 26, 1957.

Freight Vessels—Alaska-Washington

S. 1798:

This measure amends existing law to permit merchants of southeastern Alaska to form associations or groups for the purpose of acquiring vessels (not to exceed 150 gross tons) to transfer merchandise owned by any one or more of them to the following places: To or from places within the inland waters of southeastern Alaska and Prince Rupert, British Columbia; to or from places within the inland waters in the State of Washington; and from all places located within inland waters of southeastern Alaska to places within inland waters of the State of Washington via sheltered waters.

This amendment was considered necessary since most of these merchants are small-business men unable to finance shipments in large quantities; and the communities themselves are towns built on stilts over the water or on the sides of mountains, where there are no warehousing facilities or cold-storage facilities, hence these short-hauls and small tonnage will prove best for their economic situations.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Vessel Inspection

S. 1866:

Postpones the effective date of Public Law 519, 84th Congress, until at least January 1, 1959. Public Law 519 requires the inspection and certification of certain vessels carrying passengers. Coast Guard regulations are to be issued relating to the design, construction, and repair of these vessels. The law responded to a series of sinkings resulting from improper construction and maintenance of passenger vessels.

The Coast Guard issued proposed regulations between June and October 1956, and shipowners and builders were invited to make comments on the regulations. A revised body of regulations was issued on March 15, 1957; comments were invited by April 15.

This extension was found to be necessary when many shipowners and builders felt they had insufficient opportunity to examine the proposed regulations, and to prepare replies, before the cutoff date.

Public Law 210, approved August 28, 1957.

Air Carriers—Private Loans

S. 2229:

The purpose of this measure is to provide loans for the purchase of suitable aircraft to replace the old DC–3's used by local, feeder, and short-haul airlines. The airlines covered are 21 local airline carriers, 2 Alaskan lines that are intra- and inter-Alaskan and United States service, 2 in the Caribbean, and 3 helicopter carriers.

Authorizes the United States to guarantee a lender against loss of principal or interest on any aircraft-purchase loan made to any 1 of the 28 eligible carriers, if the loan has CAB approval. The guaranty may not be for more than the unpaid interest and 90 percent of the unpaid principal of any loan, or for more than 90 percent of the purchase price of the aircraft, including spare parts. The guaranty may run for no more than 10 years and cannot exceed $5 million per carrier. In order to guarantee a loan, the Civil Aeronautics Board must find that the carrier is unable to obtain the necessary funds for the purchase of aircraft on reasonable terms, and the loans can be made only for the purchase of suitable-type aircraft.

This measure will enable the feeder- and short-haul-type carrier to purchase equipment that will result in an economical and profitable operation and will encourage the development of a suitable aircraft designed for that purpose.

Public Law 307, approved September 7, 1957.

Surveying Ships

S. 2250:

This measure amends the act of August 5, 1955, to increase the limit of cost for the construction of 2 surveying ships for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, from $3,700,000 to $6,793,243 for each ship. The increase is needed solely to meet the increased cost of shipbuilding and adjustments of estimates.

The 1955 act authorized the construction of these two 2,500-ton vessels as part of a replacement program begun in 1938, but halted by the war after two vessels were constructed. The new vessels are to be placed in service in Alaska, where work is under way for the Defense Department.

Public Law 115, approved July 24, 1957.

Federal Services to Steamship Companies

H. R. 2797:

Authorizes the Department of Defense to furnish stevedoring and terminal services to commercial shipping companies who are carrying Department of Defense cargoes.

Under present practice the companies deposit, in advance of docking, funds for paying stevedoring services which the Department furnishes at Government piers. These services are taken as part of the company's costs in transporting Government cargoes, and are considered in arriving at rate schedules.

In some instances ships are delayed, and arrive at Navy piers during weekends, after provision has been made for weekday arrivals. Weekend work is paid at overtime rates. The advance deposit, figured at regular rates, proves insufficient to pay for the required weekend work, and further service must cease pending the opening of the steamship company's administrative office on Monday.

The bill would allow the Department to offer stevedoring services without an advance from the company, and would permit payments for such services to be reimbursed to the appropriation or fund initially charged.

Public Law 44, approved June 1, 1957.

Motor Carrier Securities

H. R. 3625:

This measure amends the Interstate Commerce Act to prevent the use, by motor carriers, of arbitrary par values in issuing capital stock as a means of evading the jurisdiction of the ICC over the issuance of such securities.

The ICC assumes regulatory control over stock issues where the par value of the securities to be issued, together with the par value of the securities then outstanding, exceeds $1 million. In the case of no-par stock, the fair market value of the stock on the date of its issue determines the amounts of the issue.

This act assigns a value to par value stock of par value, or fair market price on the date of issue.

Public Law 309, approved September 7, 1957.

Railroad Stock—Modification Plans

H. R. 2775:

This measure makes changes in the regulations by which the ICC may approve any plan of a railroad to modify or alter its shares of stock.

Presently, 75 percent of the holders of outstanding stock must assent to the modification. A proviso makes those shares held by the railroad, or by any person controlling the railroad, not outstanding shares whose holders may give their assent to the modification. This results in the necessity of obtaining 75 percent assent from the holders of the remaining outstanding shares, and hence deposits in the control of a very small minority the power to deny the modification plan.

The act provides that the holders of any class of shares, whether or not in the control of the railroad or of one who controls the railroad, may vote their assent to a stock modification.

The ICC is also permitted to prescribe rules for railroads in requesting assent; at present such requests must be filed with the ICC.

Public Law 150, approved August 16, 1957.

Alaska International Rail and Highway Commission

H. R. 4271:

The purpose of this measure is to provide that the Delegate from Alaska in the House of Representatives may be a member of the Alaska International Rail and Highway Commission. The Commission was created by Congress in 1956 to study the economic and military advantages of additional highway and rail-transportation facilities between the United States and Alaska.

The earlier legislation contemplated that the Delegate from Alaska would be a member, however, since technically the Delegate is not a Member of Congress and the resolution provided that 5 Members of Congress make up a part of the 12-member Commission, this amendment is necessary.

Public Law 16, approved April 20, 1957.

Degaussing Equipment—Private Ships

H. R. 4285:

Authorizes the Navy to sell degaussing equipment (electrical and magnetic devices used to detect magnetic mines) to owners of private vessels of United States registry.

Degaussing equipment was aboard many ships purchased from the Government by private owners after the war. Several owners decided to keep the equipment in operating condition. To do this, spare parts are necessary, and can be obtained only from Navy stores.

In order to protect the existing fleet, and to have fully equipped vessels in operation in case of war, this measure would permit the Navy to sell degaussing equipment to private owners at prices which reflect their replacement cost to the Navy, the proceeds to go to the current fund concerned.

Public Law 43, approved May 31, 1957.

Air Carriers—United States and Alaska

H. R. 4520:

This measure provides for the permanent certification of three United States-Alaska carriers. To qualify, these carriers must make application to CAB within 120 days from the date of enactment of this legislation, and show that on January 1, 1957, and until the date of enactment, they were continuously operating under a temporary certificate of public convenience and necessity.

This act will enable each of the carriers to provide air service more economically, efficiently, and satisfactorily, and will aid in the development of Alaska.

Public Law 166, approved August 26, 1957.

Treaties

Pink Salmon—Protocol

Executive C:

The Senate unanimously ratified Executive C, 85th Congress, 1st session, a protocol between the United States and Canada to the 1930 convention for the protection, preservation, and extension of the sockeye salmon fisheries in the Fraser River system.

The principal purpose of the protocol is to institute a program for the conservation of pink salmon in the Fraser River system, coordinate with that which has been in effect for sockeye salmon since the 1930 convention.

The International Pacific Salmon Fisheries Commission, established by the 1930 convention and composed of 3 United States and 3 Canadian members, is responsible for regulating the seasons, the removal or bypassing of obstructions to the river ascent, the natural history and spawning-ground conditions, and the improvement of conditions of the area concerned with sockeye salmon. The Commission will now assume a similar responsibility for protecting pink salmon.

Ratified.

Northwest Atlantic Fisheries—Protocol

Executive F:

The Senate unanimously ratified Executive F, 85th Congress, 1st session, a protocol to the International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries, signed at Washington under date of February 8, 1949; the protocol was signed at Washington under date of June 25, 1956, for the United States and nine other organizations.

Purpose of the protocol is to permit the Commission, established by the 1949 convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries, to hold its annual meeting elsewhere than in North America, as now required by article II, paragraph 5, of the convention. Inasmuch as 8 of the 10 parties to the convention are not North American countries, attendance at the annual meeting has imposed a disproportionate burden and expense upon the other governments. Ratification of the protocol corrects the inequity.

Austrian Bonds

Executive H:

The Senate unanimously ratified Executive H, 85th Congress, 1st session, an agreement and protocol between the United States and Austria, signed in Washington on November 21, 1956.

The agreement and protocol creates a procedure under which holders of certain dollar bonds, issued by the Government of Austria prior to the Second World War, may establish the validity of their bonds. The necessity for validation arose from the fact that a great many bonds which had been acquired by the issuing authority for eventual retirement were looted by Soviet military forces after the occupation of Austria. Because of such seizures, quantities of these bonds are believed to have come into the hands of individuals who may seek either to negotiate them or to claim payment from the issuing authorities. By the terms of the bond indentures, these retired bonds could only be canceled by the trustees or paying agents in the United States. This procedure was found impracticable by the disruption of transportation facilities during the war. Since they could not be canceled as paid in Austria, they appear, on their face, as valid securities. From this arose the possibility that the issuing authority might be compelled to make a double payment on the bonds. To protect itself against this contingency, the Austrian Government published the numbers of the looted bonds, declaring them to be invalid under Austria law of December 15, 1953. No payments are being made by the issuers to any holders of bonds, including those owned by residents of the United States, pending a solution of the problem.

This agreement permits bondholders, who believe their securities to have been erroneously included on the lists published by Austria, to present their claims within a reasonable period of time to an American-Austrian tribunal sitting in New York City. Should the tribunal find against the bondholder, he may have the question considered by a United States district court. In the event of a decision by that court favorable to the bondholder, he will be given valid bonds in exchange for those erroneously listed. Entire cost of implementing the procedure will be paid by the Austrian Government. Legal expenses of holders whose bonds are validated will be reimbursed on the basis of 10 percent of the face value of the bonds.

Korea—Treaty of Friendship

Executive D:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, ratified, by a unanimous vote, the Treaty of Friendship between the United States and Korea, together with a protocol signed at Seoul on November 28, 1956.

The objective of the treaty is to protect the personal security, rights, and property of Americans in Korea, to facilitate their travel and business activities, and emphasizes certain measures designed to promote private investment by United States citizens in Korea.

The two governments (United States and Korea) agree to provide, within its territories to citizens and corporations of the other country, treatment no less favorable than it accords to its own citizens and corporations relating to (1) entry, travel, and residence; (2) basic personal freedoms; (3) property rights guaranty; (4) conduct and control of business enterprises; (5) taxation; (6) exchange restrictions; (7) import and export of goods; and (8) navigation.

The treaty enters into force 1 month after the day of exchange of ratifications and continues in force for 10 years and indefinitely thereafter, subject to termination on 1-year's written notice by either government to the other government.

Inter-American Cultural Relations

Executive C:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified the Convention for the Promotion of Inter-American Cultural Relations, signed at Caracas March 28, 1954, by the United States and all of the American Republics except Costa Rica, which signed the instrument on June 16, 1954.

The objective of the convention is to promote the exchange of graduate students, teachers, professors, specialists, and others of equivalent qualifications among the American Republics, to foster a greater understanding of the peoples and institutions of countries belonging to the Organization of American States.

The convention contemplates awarding annual exchange fellowships by each government, and makes provision for allocating the expenses for study and travel between the host country, the nominating country, and the recipient of the award.

This convention, formulated at the 10th International Conference of American States at Caracas, is a revision of the Buenos Aires convention of 1936 and will replace that convention for the states which adopt it.

Austria, Tax Convention

Executive J:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified this convention with the Republic of Austria, signed October 25, 1956, relating to income taxes.

The purpose of the convention is to prevent American citizens, living in Austria, from being taxed by both the United States and Austria on profits made abroad. The convention is reciprocal.

This convention is similar to income-tax conventions previously ratified with Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the Union of South Africa, and the United Kingdom.

The provisions of this convention, as to the United States, apply only to Federal income tax; they do not apply to taxes imposed by the various States, the District of Columbia, or the Territories or possessions of the United States. As to Austria, the convention applies only to national taxes, such as income tax, corporation tax, and housing reconstruction and family allowance contribution.

The convention adopts the principle of permanent establishment. Under this principle an enterprise of one of the contracting states will not be subject to tax by the other on its business profits unless it has a permanent establishment in the other state. The major differences in this convention and those with other countries are: (1) Motion picture film rentals are expressly excluded from the reciprocal exemption of royalties; in the case of film rentals, the tax is reduced to 50 percent of the statutory rate of tax on these rentals, with the maximum tax not exceeding 10 percent. Most of the other tax treaties provide a complete exemption from film rentals. (2) No prohibition against profits being attributed to a mere purchase; hence, an American enterprise making purchases in Austria and sales in the United States may still be subject to double tax. (3) Exempts salaries received by professional or business trainees from their foreign employers, if the period of training does not exceed 1 year and the annual salary does not exceed $10,000.

Convention enters into force on January 1 of the calendar year in which the exchange of instruments of ratification takes place.

Canada, Tax Convention

Executive B:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified this convention with Canada, signed on August 8, 1956, further modifying and supplementing the income-tax convention and protocol of March 4, 1942, as modified by the supplementary convention of June 12, 1950.

This modification extends the application of the double-taxation principle on a reciprocal basis to income derived from trucking, and to income from personal services received by employees of the Canadian branch of an American enterprise. The convention also reduces the tax on dividends paid by a subsidiary corporation to a parent corporation from 15 to 5 percent where certain stockownership conditions are met.

Japan, Tax Convention

Executive K:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified a protocol with Japan, signed March 23, 1957, supplementing the convention of April 16, 1954, relating to taxes on income.

This protocol supplements the convention now in effect. It contains only one substantive article which provides that the Export-Import Bank of Japan will be exempt from tax by the United States on interest on loans or investments received by the bank from sources within the United States. Reciprocally, the Export-Import Bank of Washington will be exempt from tax by Japan on interest or loans or investments received by the bank from sources within Japan.

International Sugar—Protocol

Executive L:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified a protocol to the International Sugar Agreement of 1953, dated at London December 1, 1956.

The protocol permits a revision of the quotas among exporting countries who are parties to the 1953 agreement, provides greater flexibility in their adjustment to changing market conditions, and revises the price objectives of the agreement. Under the protocol the participating countries will seek to keep the world price of sugar in a range of 3.15 to 4 cents a pound as compared to 3.25 to 4.35 cents a pound in the original agreement. World prices are presently in excess of 6 cents a pound, and the agreement is on a standby basis.

The protocol has no significant effect on the obligations which the United States assumed under the International Agreement of 1953, which is in effect until December 31, 1958. The import, distribution, and price of sugar in this country is governed by the provisions of the Sugar Act of 1948. This protocol is of particular interest to countries exporting substantial amounts of sugar, such as the Caribbean area.

International Convention for Safety at Sea

Executive M:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified this amendment to the International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea which entered into force November 19, 1952. The amendment was recommended by the President on July 1, 1957.

The convention of 1952 establishes uniform principles and rules for the promotion of maritime safety. The convention provides that amendments to it, proposed by any party, may be circulated to the others and, if unanimously accepted, shall become part of the convention. The United Kingdom proposed this amendment to permit the use of inflatable liferafts on vessels as an alternative to the conventional buoyant apparatus and noninflatable liferafts, the only types now permitted under the convention. Approximately 30 nations have agreed to the amendment.

North Pacific Fur Seals—Interim Convention

Executive J:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified this Interim Convention for the Conservation of North Pacific Fur Seals signed at Washington February 9, 1957, on behalf of the Governments of Canada, Japan, the Soviet Union, and the United States.

This interim convention, to be in effect for 6 years, has a dual purpose: (1) to continue the prohibition now being observed by the four signatory governments relating to pelagic sealing—which is hunting fur seals on the open seas as distinguished from taking seals on land; and (2) to provide a joint research program designed to accumulate sufficient factual data to prepare the groundwork for a permanent arrangement among the parties to conserve the valuable fur seal herds of the North Pacific Ocean.

Under the terms of the convention, the parties will establish the North Pacific Fur Seal Commission to be composed of one member from each party. The Commission will be charged with the responsibility for formulating and coordinating research programs, for studying the data obtained from the programs, and for recommending appropriate measures to the parties on the basis of the findings.

The convention will enter into force on the date of the deposit of the fourth instrument of ratification.

International Whaling Convention, Protocol

Executive E:

The Senate, on August 8, 1957, unanimously ratified a protocol to the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling signed at Washington December 2, 1946; the protocol was signed at Washington on behalf of the United States and 16 other governments November 16, 1956.

The purpose of the protocol is to vest in the International Whaling Commission additional powers so that it may effectively deal with problems not anticipated at the time of convention negotiations. The protocol provides (1) that the convention embrace the helicopter within the scope of whale-catching devices for regulation by the Commission; (2) a more effective system for enforcing whaling regulations; and (3) for an international inspection system.

The protocol will enter into force when all the parties to the 1946 convention have deposited ratifications or have given notice of adherence.

Veterans

Pensions—Non-Service-Connected Disabilities

S. 2080:

This measure excludes from computation as annual income for purposes of non-service-connected disability or death pension payments of veterans' bonus paid by a State, Territory, possession, or Commonwealth of the United States, or the District of Columbia, to persons who have served in the Armed Forces of the United States, and to their widows and children.

Prior to this act, payments of pensions for non-service-connected disability could not be paid to veterans or widows and children of deceased veterans of World War I, World War II, and the Korean conflict where the annual income exceeds $1,400 if unmarried, or $2,700 if married or with minor children.

These non-service-connected disability pensions range from $66.15 to $78.75 a month. A rate of $135.45 a month is authorized for persons who need or require the regular aid and attendance of another person.

Public Law 311, approved September 7, 1957.

Service-Connected Disability

H. R. 52:

This measure provides increases in the service-connected disability compensation and dependency allowances for veterans suffering from disabilities incurred in or aggravated by service in one of the branches of the Armed Forces. It applies to all war and peacetime veterans.

In general, these increases will amount to 10 percent. The rate for total disability, however, would be increased from $181 to $225 monthly, or approximately 24 percent.

The range is as follows: 10 percent disability, from $17 to $19; 20 percent disability, from $33 to $36; 30 percent disability, from $50 to $55; 40 percent disability, from $66 to $73; 50 percent disability, from $91 to $100; 60 percent disability, from $100 to $120; 70 percent disability, from $127 to $140; 80 percent disability, from $145 to $160; 90 percent disability, from $163 to $179; total disability, from $181 to $225.

Public Law 168, approved August 27, 1957.

Pensions

H. R. 71:

This measure provides that an individual who has been imprisoned in a Federal, State, or local penal institution for a felony or a misdemeanor, and who is receiving a non-service-connected pension under public or private laws administered by the Veterans' Administration, will be denied the pension beginning on the 61st day of imprisonment and for the balance of his incarceration.

Provision is made, however, for the Veterans' Administration to apportion and pay to the veteran's wife and children the pension which the veteran would have been eligible to receive had he not been incarcerated.

Disability compensation and retirement pay are not affected by this legislation.

Public Law 24, approved April 25, 1957.

Veterans' Benefits Act of 1957

H. R. 53:

This measure, a Hoover Commission recommendation, simplifies and makes more uniform certain laws administered by the Veterans' Administration by incorporating into a single act the subject matter of the extensive body of existing legislation authorizing and governing payment of compensation for service-connected disability or death to persons who served in the military, naval, or air force of the United States during wartime, armed conflict, or peacetime service, and to their widows, children and dependent parents.

It provides a similar consolidation of laws relating to pension, hospitalization, medical and domiciliary care, and burial benefits. It consolidates into one act all the administrative provisions relating to these benefits, as well as those common to all benefits administered by the Veterans' Administration. It incorporates the provisions of existing law relating to the ancillary benefits of financial assistance for specially adopted housing and automobiles for disabled veterans. It repeals all obsolete substance and executed matter.

Public Law 56, approved June 17, 1957.

Housing—Direct Loans

H. R. 4602:

Raises the maximum amount in which direct loans for veterans' rural housing may be made, from $10,000 to $13,500.

The VA is authorized to make these direct loans in rural or small town areas where there is a housing credit shortage—that is, where the veteran is unable to get a private loan at an interest rate not in excess of the guaranteed loan rate (4½ percent).

Interest rate on the direct loan will be 4½ percent.

Authorizes additional funds for the program of $50 million.

The expiration date of the program is moved from June 30, 1958, to July 25, 1958, to coincide with the ending of the guaranteed home loan program for World War II veterans.

Pocket veto September 2, 1957.

Prisoner of War Claims

S. 883:

Extends from August 1, 1955, to August 1, 1956, the time during which former prisoners of war may file claims for benefits.

Public Law 615 of the 83d Congress gave Korean war prisoners an opportunity to file benefit claims in the same manner as was provided for World War II prisoners. The cutoff date was August 1, 1955. Subsequent to that time upwards of 50 claims were filed. By extending the period until August 1, 1956, these claims will be in line for favorable action.

Passed Senate August 5, 1957.

Coast Guard Retirement

S. 1446:

Grants certain retirement benefits to veterans of the Coast Guard Reserve. Until 1949 members of the Coast Guard Reserve were afforded no voluntary retirement benefits; in that year they were brought under the same provisions as those governing members of the Naval Reserve.

This bill extends retirement benefits to those Coast Guard reservists who were honorably discharged from the Reserve between February 18, 1941, and January 1, 1949, and who had completed at least 30 years of service in the Armed Forces (exclusive of active duty for training) or at least 20 years of service, the last 10 of which fell within the 11-year period immediately prior to his discharge from the Reserve.

Public Law 149, approved August 16, 1956.

Lighthouse Service—Pensions

S. 236:

This legislation gives former Lighthouse Service employees the same right, as now enjoyed by many civil-service employees, to waive all or any part of their retirement pay. Under present law, lighthouse veterans with incomes of more than $2,700 yearly in retirement pay may not receive a non-service-connected pension. This measure permits these veterans to receive the pensions by waiving that portion of their pay which exceeds $2,700.

Public Law 142, approved August 14, 1957.

Missing Persons Act—Extension

S. 2449:

This law extends the effectiveness of the Missing Persons Act from July 1, 1957, to April 1, 1958. The Missing Persons Act provides authority for the heads of executive departments to continue to credit the pay accounts of persons within the scope of the statute who are missing, missing in action, interned, captured, or in a similar status, and to initiate, continue, or modify allotments to dependents of persons who are in a missing status.

Public Law 121, approved August 7, 1957.

VA Benefits—Widow Eligibility

H. R. 3658:

This measure provides a new eligibility requirement for payment of non-service-connected death pensions or service-connected death compensation for widows of veterans, and is applicable to all wars. If the legal widow was not married to the veteran within the delimiting married date, under existing law, she would, nevertheless, be eligible for pension if she met one of the following requirements: (1) was married to the veterans for 5 years or more, or (2) for any period if a child was born of the marriage. Similar provisions are now in effect for widows who draw compensation for service-connected death cases.

Permits a claimant to receive a pension even though there was a legal impediment to her marriage if she entered into the marriage in good faith.

Public Law 209, approved August 28, 1957.

Veterans' Education Appeals Board—Termination

H. R. 8076:

This measure provides for the termination of the Veterans' Education Appeals Board, which was established to review certain determinations and actions of the Veterans' Administration in connection with education and training for World War II veterans.

In recent years the number of disputes that have arisen between the schools and the Veterans' Administration over the operation of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act has diminished, and it is believed that the few remaining disputes which might arise can be handled expeditiously by the courts.

The measure also provides for the transfer of the Board's records to the National Archives and Records Service of GSA.

The Board will be terminated 60 days after enactment of this measure.

Public Law 200, approved August 28, 1957.

Education Benefits—Extension

S. 166:

The purpose of this legislation is to restore educational and vocational training benefits to veterans whose rights have been denied by reason of an improper type of discharge, where the discharge is subsequently corrected or modified by competent authority. Similar relief has already been granted disabled veterans.

To remedy inequities resulting from fixed statutory delimiting dates or deadlines for commencement and completion of training, this measure creates exceptions to the delimiting dates and deadlines for the initiation of training under the programs so that veterans with corrected discharge may participate. World War II veterans, within the permitted class, would be granted an additional 4 years beyond the date of correction of discharge. Korean veterans, within the permitted class, would be allowed to initiate a program within 3 years after date of correction of discharge.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

Mustering-Out Payments—Time Extension

S. 1698:

This measure extends the time for Korean veterans to file claims for mustering-out pay under the Veterans Readjustment Assistance Act of 1952. Title V of the act provides mustering-out payments for veterans of the Korean conflict in amounts of $100, $200, or $300, depending upon length and type of service. Under provisions of title V, applications were required to be filed within 2 years after enactment which, in effect, set July 16, 1954, as the cutoff date.

Veterans discharged before the enactment of title V have encountered problems—first, that of learning about their rights, and second, that of making formal application within the time limit. For this reason the cutoff date was extended to July 16, 1956.

It has been determined that there are approximately 1,000 outstanding claims so this measure extends the period to July 16, 1959.

Passed Senate August 20, 1957.

AUTHORIZATION FOR INSERTIONS IN RECORD FOLLOWING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators may be permitted to make insertions in the RECORD following the adjournment of Congress until the last edition authorized by the Joint Committee on Printing is published; but this order shall not apply to any subject matter which may have occurred or to any speech delivered subsequent to the adjournment of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ACTIONS ON RECOMMENDATIONS BY EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this place in the Record various letters I have received from chairmen of standing committees with regard to the recommendations made by the executive department, the action taken on those recommendations, and the action contemplated on those which have not yet been acted upon.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

United States Senate,
Committee on Foreign Relations,
August 26, 1957.

The Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson,
The Majority Leader,
United States Senate.

Dear Lyndon: This will acknowledge your letter of August 22, referring to the President's press conference remarks of August 21 about the record of Congress.

You enclosed a list of all Presidential recommendations in fields over which the Foreign Relations Committee has jurisdiction. There are 22 items on this list. Congress has completed favorable action on 18 of these items as follows:

1. Approve Middle East doctrine: Public Law 7; approved March 9, 1957.
2. Authorize United States participation in International Atomic Energy Agency: Ratified, June 18, 1957.
3. Extend, revise, and clarify the mutual security program: Public Law 141; approved August 14, 1957.
4. Ratify protocol to International Convention for Northwest Atlantic Fisheries: Ratified, May 13, 1957.
5. Ratify protocol between United States and Austria, double taxation: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
6. Ratify convention between United States and Canada, income tax: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
7. Ratify treaty of friendship with Korea: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
8. Ratify protocol to international whaling convention: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
9. Ratify agreement with Austria regarding Austrian bond issue: Ratified, July 2, 1957.
10. Ratify interim convention on North Pacific fur seals: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
11. Ratify treaty of friendship with Haiti: Executive H (84th Cong., 1st sess.). Withdrawn August 7, 1957.
12. Ratify convention for protection of inter-American cultural relations: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
13. Ratify protocol with Japan to avoid double taxation: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
14. Ratify protocol amending International Sugar Agreement: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
15. Ratify amendment to International Convention for Safety of Life at Sea: Ratified, August 8, 1957.
16. Avoid unfair tax duplication on business overseas: Handled by tax treaties.
17. Authorize $35 million increased borrowing authority for St. Lawrence Seaway Authority: Public Law 108, approved July 17, 1957.
18. Ratify protocol between United States and Canada to protect sockeye salmon: Ratified, June 6, 1957.

The four items which are still pending are:

The radio broadcasting agreement between the United States and Mexico: This agreement was referred on June 4 to a subcommittee consisting of Senator Fulbright, chairman, and Senators Mansfield, Morse, Knowland, and Aiken. The subcommitee held a public hearing July 11 but has not yet reported to the full committee.

The International Plant Protection Convention: The full committee held a public hearing on this convention March 19, 1957. The commitee was not satisfied with the case made for ratification of the convention by representatives of the executive branch and referred the matter to Senator Aiken as a subcommittee of one to obtain additional information. Senator Aiken has not yet reported back to the full committee.

Tax convention between the United States and Pakistan: This is erroneously shown on your list as having been ratified August 8. The convention was referred to the committee July 12, 1957. On July 30, the committee held a public hearing on the convention and ordered it favorably reported. Before the report was filed, the committee held a further public hearing August 9, and on August 13 it reconsidered its previous action and decided to postpone further consideration of the convention, pending receipt of certain additional information from the Departments of State and the Treasury. This information was requested by me in letters to the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury August 22. When it is received the committee will give further consideration to the convention.

Establishment of a career service for overseas officers of the United States Information Agency: A similar bill was passed by the Senate in the 84th Congress, but was not acted on by the House. In view of the heavy workload of the Committee on Foreign Relations, it seems more productive for the committee to devote its limited time to measures which stand some chance of passage than to pass this bill again.

To sum up the above, there were 22 cases sent to the committee. Eighteen of these have been disposed of. Only four remain, which have not been disposed of for the respective reasons stated above, and nothing would be gained by calling an extra meeting of the committee now.

I am at a loss to understand the basis of the President's statement that he was tremendously disappointed in the record of Congress.

The record plainly indicates that the recommendations of the President receive serious—and in most cases, sympathetic—consideration from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Sincerely yours,
Theodore Francis Green,
Chairman.

United States Senate,
Committee on Banking and Currency,
August 26, 1957.

Hon. Lyndon B. Johnson,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Lyndon: This is in reply to your letter of August 22, 1957, requesting a compilation of the actions of the Committee on Banking and Currency on legislative recommendations made by the President in the first session of the 85th Congress.

As noted on the list attached to your letter, of the 19 Presidential recommendations, this committee has acted upon all but No. 18—legislation concerning a program for area redevelopment. Of the recommendations acted upon (18 out of 19), the action in all but 2 was in accord with or exceeded the request of the President. The two exceptions are the actions on the President's requests to increase interest rates on college housing loans and on direct housing loans made by the Veterans' Administration.

Both the committee and the Senate expressed themselves in opposition to an increased interest rate on college housing loans. The Congress modified the interest rate on VA direct housing loans to enable this rate to automatically follow the rate established for housing loans guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration. The guaranty loan program is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in the Senate, and as noted in your letter, an increase in the guaranteed loan interest rate was decisively defeated in the House of Representatives.

In the field of area redevelopment, the President's program is expressed by the bill S. 1433. Additional bills in this field are S. 104 (Dirksen), S. 964 (Douglas), and S. 1854 (Flanders). These bills were referred to the Subcommittee on Production and Stabilization which held extensive hearings. The subcommittee took no action on any of the bills.

Area redevelopment legislation involves substantial issues. The administration strongly opposed a number of features in S. 964, the Douglas bill, which provided additional assistance over and above the limited assistance provided in the administration bill; for example, the provision for loans to rural areas suffering from substantial unemployement, the provision for loans and grants for public facilities to redevelopment areas, and the provision for payments to persons being trained or retrained to undertake new types of employment.

Because of the extremely complex nature of these proposals and the substantial unresolved issues, the committee was unable to complete action during the 1st session of the 85th Congress and will continue its consideration of these bills in the next session.

Sincerely yours,
J. W. Fulbright,
Chairman.

United States Senate,
Committee on the
District of Columbia,
August 27, 1957.

Hon. Lyndon B. Johnson,
Office of the Democratic Leader,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

Dear Lyndon: Please let me acknowledge your letter and enclosure of August 22, 1957, addressed to the chairman of the committee, pertaining to suggestions made by the President in legislative fields over which this committee has jurisdiction.

Presidential recommendation No. 1: To establish benefits for workers temporarily disabled from nonoccupational causes.

No bill has been submitted or referred to this committee to carry out this recommendation.

Presidential recommendation No. 2: Provide home rule for District of Columbia.

Home rule legislation for the District of Columbia is a hardy legislative perennial. Bills seeking to extend home rule to the District have passed the Senate three times, in 1949, 1952, and in 1955. The House of Representatives has not seen fit to accept legislation dealing with true home rule up to this point. Two bills on the subject, S. 1289 and S. 1846, were introduced this session on February 19 and April 10, 1957, respectively. Planning sessions with District officials and authorities in the field of municipal administration were held in preparation for the 6 days of public hearings that have been held. As a result of the testimony that has been already taken, it has been deemed advisable to continue working on these proposals between the sessions and it is planned that the hearings will be concluded early in the second session. The committee is confident that, as in the past, a true home rule bill will receive the sanction of the Senate.

Presidential recommendation No. 3: Improve the unemployment insurance law.

S. 1214, to amend the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act, as amended, is presently pending before the Subcommittee on Public Health, Education, Welfare, and Safety. The bill was introduced on February 14, 1957, and on February 15, 1957, the Board of Commissioners for the District of Columbia were requested to provide the committee with recommendations and suggestions.

The Commissioners, through the Corporation Counsel, have advised the committee that it is their understanding that the Department of Labor has under current consideration a comprehensive review of the subject matter of the bill with the end in view of preparing draft legislation on the subject which will permit a model-law bill to be submitted to the Congress. Under these circumstances the Commissioners have been reluctant to forward a report to the committee until they can include within it the draft revision as suggested by the Department of Labor.

The Committee on the District of Columbia, conscious of its responsibility to the people of the National Capital, and conscious also of the impact of District legislation when it is used as a model for the States, believe that the Commissioners are fully justified in their position and will await the conclusion of the present study before proceeding to active consideration of the bill.

Cordially,

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS,
August 27, 1957.

Hon. LYNDON B. JOHNSON,
Office of the Democratic Leader, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: In response to your letter of August 22, 1957, I submit herewith the following report relative to the eight designated Presidential recommendations for legislative action which are set forth in the attachment to your communication as coming within the jurisdiction of this committee.

The committee has not considered bills covering recommendations Nos. 1 and 4, as covered by H. R. 8332 relating to fiscal and budgetary controls, which is pending before the House of Representatives, since no comparable bill was introduced in the Senate.

S. 931 (No. 2), to provide for the reorganization of the safety functions of the Federal Government, was reported by this committee on June 5, 1957, and is presently pending on the Senate Calendar (Order No. 415).

The committee has a number of bills authorizing payments in lieu of taxes to local governments in areas where recent Federal acquisition of commercial and industrial type properties create financial difficulties (No. 3), but, in view of opposition that has arisen on the part of some of the minority members, no final action has been taken on any of these bills. It is understood these members of the committee will consult with representatives of the Bureau of the Budget during the recess period relative to amending the committee bill, S. 967, in order to enable the committee to report a measure in the next session of Congress.

S. 434, providing for the submission of budget estimates on an annual accrued expenditure basis (No. 5), was reported by this committee and passed the Senate on June 5, 1957. The bill is presently pending before the House of Representatives.

The bill (S. 1791) to extend the reorganization act to June 1, 1959 (No. 6), passed the Senate on June 5, 1957, and was amended in the House of Representatives. The conferees of the House and Senate are scheduled to meet on Thursday morning, August 28, to consider the House amendment, which was objected to by the President.

Reorganization Plan No. 1, abolishing the RFC (No. 7), became effective on June 30, 1957, as indicated in your summary.

The bill (S. 2752) to modify and improve the procedure for submitting to the Attorney General certain proposed surplus property disposals for his advice as to whether they would be inconsistent with the antitrust laws (No. 8), was introduced in the Senate by request of the Administrator of General Services on August 10, 1957. Although there appears to be no objection to the bill, and it is pending on the active agenda of the committee, no opportunity has been afforded to give it consideration. There appears to be no particular urgency in this matter, and the committee proposes to defer action until the next session of Congress.

Trusting this information will conform to your requirements, I am,

Sincerely yours,

JOHN L. MCCLELLAN,
Chairman.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
August 27, 1957.

Hon. LYNDON B. JOHNSON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR LYNDON: In response to your letter of August 22, I enclose you a memorandum from the clerk of the Senate Finance Committee.

With kindest regards, I am

Faithfully yours,

HARRY F. BYRD.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FINANCE,
August 26, 1957.

SENATOR BYRD: The only Senate bills under the jurisdiction of the Senate Finance Committee on the President's recommended list for enactment are S. 150, S. 348, S. 349, S. 351, S. 352, S. 1563, and S. 1820.

S. 150, S. 348, S. 349, S. 351, and S. 352 were all proposed as amendments to the corporate and excise rate extension bill, H. R. 4090. Hearings were held on the bill and amendments.

In regard to S. 150, Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey made the following remarks on page 60 of the hearings:

"About 80 percent of small-business firms are proprietorships and partnerships and are not taxed as corporations. This amendment provides tax relief for only 15 percent of small-business concerns which are organized as corporations.

"Special tax relief of the sort contemplated by S. 150 therefore directly discriminates against the overwhelming majority of small businesses which are not conducted as corporations, and most importantly, discriminates against individual taxpayers generally.

"In view of the very high rates now in effect, it would be unfortunate to increase the relative tax burden on such a large group of taxpayers as would be done by S. 150, especially for the benefit of such a comparatively small favored few."

In regard to S. 352, Secretary of the Treasury Humphrey testified on page 60 of the hearings as follows:

"S. 352, which is Mr. Sparkman's proposal, would make the corporate tax generally progressive, starting at 5 percent on the first $5,000 of income and rising by 5 and 10 percent steps to 55 percent on income over $100,000.

"There is no justification for a progressive corporate tax. The analogy with the progressive individual income tax is not correct.

"Smaller and medium sized corporations may be, and in fact often are, owned by a few individuals each of whom has a sizable individual income, while the larger corporations are most likely to be owned by a great many individuals, large numbers of whom have quite modest incomes.

"The most recent figures on the ownership of companies listed on the New York Stock Exchange show that two-thirds of the 8,000,630-odd shareowners of listed securities have incomes of less than $7,500 a year. Almost 38 percent of all shareowners have incomes of less than $5,000 a year.

"The effect of a progressive corporate tax thus in many respects would be altogether unfair in that it would indirectly impose a disproportionately large tax burden on the small investors who buy stock in large companies."

All of these amendments were given serious consideration by the committee in a subsequent executive session. Amendments incorporating the context of S. 150 and S. 352 were rejected by the Finance Committee. Action on amendments containing the context of S. 348, S. 349, and S. 351 was referred for further study.

S. 1563 would permit a taxpayer carrying on a trade or business in the conduct of which 10 or less persons are engaged to elect to take a standard deduction, in lieu of itemized deductions, for expenses attributable to such trade or business. Departmental reports were requested from the Bureau of the Budget and the Department of the Treasury on March 19, 1957, but have not been received thus far. Under the Constitution we cannot initiate action on this tax bill.

S. 1820 would provide for deduction from taxable income of investments in depreciable assets or inventory during taxable year up to 20 percent of net income, or $30,000, whichever is lower. Applies to individuals, proprietorships, partnerships, and self-employed persons, as well as corporations. It also permits installment payment of estate taxes over a 10-year period. Departmental reports were requested from the Bureau of the Budget and the Department of the Treasury on April 9, 1957, but have not been received thus far. The committee cannot initiate action on this tax bill.

The only House-passed bill before the Finance Committee which was on the President's recommended list for enactment was H. R. 8888 which broadens the coverage under the unemployment compensation system by (1) extending the Federal Unemployment Tax Act to employees (a) of certain Federal instrumentalities neither wholly nor partially owned by the United States, now exempted by reason of a general tax exemption, (b) on American aircraft while outside the United States, (c) of organizations operated primarily for carrying on a trade or business for profit even though all the profits are payable to certain nonprofit organizations, and (2) by extending the program of unemployment compensation for Federal employees to employees of partially owned Federal instrumentalities. This bill was received too late for adequate hearings and full consideration by the committee.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR
AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
August 27, 1957.

Hon. LYNDON B. JOHNSON,
Majority Leader, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: I am pleased to reply to your letter of the 22d regarding action by the Interior Committee on that part of the President's program coming within our jurisdiction. My pleasure derives from the fact that we have done so well.

It will be noted that of the measures listed, 80 percent have been the subject of favorable action by the committee.

The Fryingpan-Arkansas measure, S. 60, is at a stalemate in the House Interior Committee as a result of the opposition of certain Republican members to irrigation and reclamation in general, and narrow partisanship with respect to Hells Canyon in particular.

The Small Projects Act amendments are public law.

The long-range minerals policy, so-called, was not presented to the committee until June 4 of this year after a full 3 years or more of promises that its submission was imminent. It had been released to the press several days before I was able to get a copy, despite direct appeal to the Secretary of the Interior.

What was presented was not worthy of the name "policy". It is not a program, but rather a hodge-podge of pious sentiments and wishful thinking. It had realistic suggestions for only two minerals, lead and zinc. Very intensive efforts were made to implement these recommendations before the Senate Finance Committee, since the administration declined to support them with any enthusiasm before the House Ways and Means Committee. However, even when success appeared within our grasp with the Finance Committee, the administration characteristically hedged and backed away, with the result that the measure that was reported is wholly ineffective and does not have the support of any substantial segment of the mining industry.

In the Interior Committee, we held a hearing promptly on the other parts of the minerals program, but its weakness and defects are so great that we have been unable to do anything with it in the brief time between its unveiling and the end of this session of Congress.

As to statehood for Alaska and Hawaii, the committee held extensive hearings and labored long and earnestly over the administration's proposal, new this year, for a sort of never-never land north and west of the Yukon in Alaska. We came up with workable legislative provisions, I believe. The measures were ordered reported on July 30, but at the request of the ranking minority member, we have delayed the filing of the report to give him opportunity to prepare his minority views. The new deadline for filing, with or without the minority report, is Thursday, August 29.

In summary, then, the Interior Committee has taken favorable action on a full 80 percent of that part of the President's program that was before it, and is still trying to bring meaning and realism to the remaining 20 percent.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY, Chairman.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE,
August 27, 1957.

LEGISLATIVE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PRESIDENT WHICH FALL WITHIN THE PURVIEW OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE

The recommendations, action taken thereon, and the present status of each recommendation may be summarized as follows:

1. Implementation of treaty and agreement with Panama: The requested implementing legislation was promptly introduced and considered by the committee; it passed both Houses and has been on the President's desk since August 22 awaiting his signature.

2. Establishment of an Airways Modernization Board: The requested legislation to establish this Board was introduced promptly, expeditiously considered by the committee and both Houses, and has been enacted into law (Public Law 85–133).

3. Exemption of gas producers from public-utility-type regulations: There has been no action on this recommendation for the simple reason that to date the President has not submitted a draft of legislation to carry out his recommendation.

4. Authorize Federal payments to non-Federal owners of water resources projects when Federal power developments benefit from projects: There has been no action on this recommendation for the reason that the President, so far, has failed to submit draft legislation to implement it, and the chairman of the committee is opposed to it. (Similar legislation was introduced in the Republican-controlled 83d Congress and died in committee.)

5. Strengthen transportation system by revising Federal rate-making procedures and regulatory policies: Legislation to effectuate this recommendation has been introduced (S. 1457) and referred to the Surface Transportation Subcommittee. Action has not been completed on S. 1457 for the simple reason that this proposal makes sweeping changes in our transportation regulatory laws, many of which are extremely controversial. It is vigorously opposed by the trucking industry, by substantial segments of the other modes of transportation and by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. In addition, the committee held hearings on 26 legislative proposals submitted by the Interstate Commerce Commission and has acted upon 14 of them. These encompass much that is contained in S. 1457.

THE WORK OF THE SESSION—EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, the close of every session of Congress is always an occasion of reflection for me, as I am certain it is for all of my colleagues.

With Federal legislation now touching every citizen's life and interests, the adjournment of a session turns a page in our Nation's history.

We have been in session 8 months. A sense of duty of things to be accomplished kept us on the job through a long summer. Those who know the pressing pace of a workday in Congress realize that we have labored long and hard. We have struggled with many of the Nation's problems. We are the first to concede that we have not achieved all that is expected of us.

We have acted upon some of the President's recommendations, but consideration of the greater part of his program has been postponed until next year. I feel confident, however, that we have done much spadework in this first session which should lead to a further record of accomplishment in the second half of this Congress.

It is not my purpose to discuss the achievements of this session at this time. I will today offer a detailed appraisal of our record, and it will be a Senate document available to all who are interested.

My purpose now is a more personal one. I know the entire Senate joins me in tribute to our presiding officers, the distinguished Vice President, RICHARD NIXON, and the President pro tempore, our colleague, CARL HAYDEN, of Arizona.

I take this occasion also to speak of my good friend across the aisle, the majority leader, LYNDON JOHNSON, and his good right arm, MIKE MANSFIELD. Lyndon's patience, fairness, and superb skill in this session rank him among the outstanding leaders of the legislative process in our history. Although he and I differ at times, we have worked well in harness to help pull the legislative load. I am sure my colleagues agree with me that one cannot help but like LYNDON JOHNSON. His talents command our respect.

I know this session has been a trying one for the Senate staff officials and for the Official Reporters who record our proceedings. It takes a lot of work behind the scenes to operate a session of Congress. Without the help of these officials I doubt if we Senators could carry it through.

The prayers of our Chaplain, the Reverend Frederick Brown Harris, are always an inspiration. Quite often, I feel sure, they work more than a spiritual influence on what we do here. Without these influences on our minds and hearts, our good Dr. George Calver would have a tough time keeping us fit for the fray. All of us are in constant debt to these two understanding and capable men who so ideally complement each other.

This whole Chamber joins with me, I know, in paying tribute to our venerated Parliamentarian, Charley Watkins, and to his able assistant, Floyd Riddick, for their patient and impartial assistance, often under trying conditions. They are members of an able staff, headed by Secretary of the Senate Felton Johnston, and including Emery Frazier, Ed Hickey, Edward Mansur, Lewis Bailey, and a score of assistants who keep the complicated machinery of the Senate in good repair and working smoothly. In the many problems we present to them, we know we can go to them without any partisan worries whatever.

Not the least among those whose help is indispensable are Legislative Counsel John Simms, Charles Boots, and a capable corps of legal counsel. And once again I have the honor of paying tribute to James W. Murphy and his corps of able reporters who work miracles in capturing our vagrant words and rendering them respectable to posterity. We also owe a debt to Frank Brodie, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk, and Fred Green, who produces the Daily Digest.

I wish also to thank, for service diligently and faithfully performed on behalf of all Senators, the superintendents of the press, radio-TV, periodical, and press photographers' galleries, Joe Wills, Bob Hough, Bill Perry, and Bill Forsythe. Another who has served us expertly and devotedly in the communications field is Bob Coar, director of the Senate recording studio.

My thanks go out, too, to our very able Sergeant at Arms, Joe Duke, and his corps of deputies, including the Capitol police, who watch over our safety and comfort while they guide hundreds of thousands of visitors from all parts of the Nation to these galleries.

I want all these officials, and those behind them—Theron Marshall and his staff in the Document Room, Dick Hupman and the staff of the Library, Bob Brenkworth and his assistants in the Disbursing Office, John (Buck) Chambers, our superintendent of the Service Department, and other aids—down to the last messenger and page boy—to know that I am grateful to them for their helpful advice and service. I know the entire Senate is grateful to them.

Most, if not all, of us soon will owe a heavy debt to our good friend, George Stewart, Architect of the Capitol, for the fine new building we hope to occupy before another session passes.

Ours is a party system, but some of my colleagues must have heard the rumor—which I cannot in good faith deny—that in California I have enjoyed the warm rays of friendship from both ends of the political spectrum. So it is in perfect propriety for me to cross the aisle in this Chamber to say that I have enjoyed the courtesy and cooperation of Robert Baker, secretary for the majority, and his assistant, Jessop McDonell, and Gerry Siegel, the able assistant of the majority leader, with whom I come in contact on numerous occasions.

At the same time I think I speak the deep appreciation of all Members on my side of the aisle for the devoted and competent service we have received from our own minority secretary, Mark Trice, and his capable assistants, Bill Reed, Bill Brownrigg, and the Republican cloakroom assistants, Russ Call, Lee Lovett, and Bill Martin. We could not carry on our work half so well without them.

I have said that my purpose on this occasion was personal. I am sure, then, I will have the indulgence of this body for a public recognition of my wise and capable personal assistant, Oliver Dompierre. Dom, as we call him, has had more than a score of years of service to Members both in the House and Senate. He first came here, I believe, with the late great Arthur Vandenberg of the State of Michigan. He later served with Homer Ferguson. I was fortunate enough to get him to be my assistant as first the majority and later the minority leader of the Senate. Any and all of these Members would gladly support me in a testimonial to his capabilities and devoted service.

In the deeply regrettable absence, because of illness, of our good friend STYLES BRIDGES, who is not only an able leader but is my close personal friend, I have had the full service of the staff of the Republican policy committee. This staff, under the cooperative direction of Senator BRIDGES and our good friend and colleague, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, chairman of the Republican conference, serves all Republican Members of the Senate. They do not need me to tell them of the valuable services they receive from this staff.

Headed by the capable and energetic Lloyd Jones, secretary and staff director of the policy committee, and his administrative assistant, Winnie Sanborn, this staff renders indispensable services on the entire range of legislative functions and interests. George H. E. Smith, who originally established these services under our late colleague, the distinguished Senator Robert A. Taft, continues to serve the committee in the capacity of consultant.

Another professional member of the staff is David Kammerman, the very able counsel of our calendar committee. I want particularly at this time to pay tribute to Dave Kammerman and to the Senators who serve on the calendar committee, for without their work this legislative body would not function as well as it does. Professional staff member Arthur Burgess, a former Associated Press correspondent, is doing a first-rate job of preparing a weekly information report for all Republican Senators. Other professional staff members, George Leighton, Thomas MacCaulty, Charles Lombard, and Zane Thurston, are each responsible for important phases of policy committee operations.

And I am glad to report that we have very capable women on this staff. Mrs. Alyce Thompson has given invaluable assistance to our colleague, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, in connection with the defense and mutual security bills. Cordelia Makarius is a versatile writer, and Attorney Peggy Kletchka is responsible for the very important digest of public laws which our policy committee, alone of all agencies in the Capitol, prepares as a Senate document. In keeping track of the progress of all bills, House and Senate, and all legislative requests of the President, Miss Jeannie Gilcrest renders constant and valuable service to all Republican Senators. The policy committee office also has a very efficient staff of secretaries, Rita Peine, Colleen Carroll, Doris Shakeshaft, and Betty Murphy.

In closing, I wish to pay a special tribute to EVERETT DIRKSEN, Republican whip, whose energy and persuasive skill is attested by the high degree of harmony and unity Republican Members of the Senate have achieved on controversial issues during this session. He worked to compose our differences. He strengthened our leadership. He has been a close and able assistant to me.

My colleagues, this is our first session of Congress without benefit of the brilliant intellect, wit, and charm of our beloved friend, former Senator from Colorado, Eugene Millikin. He was compelled to retire from this body to conserve his failing health. If I may be permitted to have the word go out of this Chamber, I want Gene to know how much we miss his pungent humor and wise counsel. I want him to know that Members on both sides of the aisle have spoken of him often and in salutary terms; and we all heartily wish that he is free from pain and enjoying a well-deserved rest.

Mr. President, when we act here on matters of national and international interest we are less conscious of party lines than we are during the heat of political campaigns. Our deepest desire is to make those decisions which serve the best interests of our country. Only occasionally does bitter partisan spirit break out, but even then it is buttressed by our sincere convictions, according to our principles, of what is good for the Nation.

This is what the Founding Fathers hoped the Senate would do. Those who have studied the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention and the Federalist Papers know that the Fathers planned it this way. And so long as we serve the Nation in the spirit of what is best for all our people, America will remain strong and free.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California.

REPUBLICAN REVIEW OF THE 1ST SESSION, 85TH CONGRESS

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, customarily both the majority leader and the minority leader make statements concerning the record of Congress at the close of each session. After insertion into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, these statements are then printed as Senate documents.

Accordingly, I ask unanimous consent that the minority statement be now printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Further, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document following adjournment this statement with necessary revisions and corrections, together with an appendix of laws and treaties of general interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

REPUBLICAN REVIEW OF THE 1ST SESSION, 85TH CONGRESS

It has been the custom for many years for the majority and minority leaders to appraise the record at the close of each session of Congress. The fact that we have two such reports instead of one stems from our two-party system. While our two parties have many similarities in the broad goals we seek, we differ considerably in the methods we propose to attain them. The system reflects these differences—particularly in Congress where each party tries to translate its beliefs and programs into specific legislation. From this it follows that our parties will hold different views about the achievements of each session of Congress.

Measures of international and national importance, proposed by President Eisenhower, were enacted in this session. The two parties in both Houses of the Congress share credit for these. However, the list of major bills—underscore major—on which action was not completed or on which there was little or no action at all is long.

The Democratic leadership will contend that this was a hard-working Congress, that it was in session for more days and hours than were some previous Congresses in a single year, and that it processed a heavy volume of legislation.

Of course, the Congress worked hard and long. Of course, the number of bills passed ran into the hundreds. These claims can be made for every Congress of modern times.

But the people do not judge a Congress on how long it labored or on the sheer volume of its output. They judge, and properly so, on the results in terms of legislation enacted which meet the needs of the Nation.

This was the first session of Congress to follow the reelection of the Republican administration of President Eisenhower by an overwhelming majority. By this expression of confidence in a Republican President and administration at the polls last November, the people had a right to expect that a substantial part of the President's recommendations to Congress would receive favorable consideration. President Eisenhower submitted some 200 proposals in this session. For the most part they were major in character, and designed to deal with problems requiring legislative action if the public interest were not to suffer.

To be sure, Congress is not expected to rubberstamp all recommendations coming from the President or the executive branch. Congress is a coordinate branch of Government, not an arm of the executive. It has functions and powers of its own. Under the Constitution it is charged with the duty of legislating according to its own judgment of what is in the best interests of the Nation.

Nevertheless, we cannot live up to our full responsibilities if we fail to act upon a substantial part of the matters laid before us by the President whose information about the Nation's needs is often broader than our own. And the record of the first session of this Congress, under Democratic control, is that it enacted only a part of the President's proposals into law, and not always in keeping with his recommendations. For that matter, the Democrats, having control of the Congress and all of the legislative committees, passed but little legislation which fulfills the platform pledges of their own party.

The President gave his own appraisal of this record at a news conference last August 21 when he said he was tremendously disappointed that so many of his recommendations had not been acted on, and not even hearings held on some.

MAJOR LEGISLATION

Legislation of significant national interest enacted in this session was as follows:

Foreign policy

In the field of foreign policy the Middle East resolution and provision for United States participation in the International Atomic Energy Agency were the most important developments of this session.

Middle East Resolution

The Middle East resolution authorizes the President to assist Middle East nations upon their request to defend themselves against armed aggression or threat of aggression from any country controlled by international communism. It also authorized the President to use up to $200 million from prior mutual security appropriations for economic and military assistance in the Middle East area.

Atoms for Peace

The statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, a treaty signed by the United States and 79 other nations, grew out of President Eisenhower's historic atoms-for-peace proposal at the United Nations in December 1953. The Senate approved this treaty and joined with the House in passing an act for United States participation in the agency.

Anglo-American Treaty of 1945 Revised

By joint resolution, Congress also approved an amendment to the Anglo-American Financial Agreement of 1945 permitting deferred payments on the British loan.

Domestic affairs

An Economy-Minded Congress

This was an economy-minded Congress and that attitude was reflected in the appropriation bills and other legislation. The President last January submitted an expenditure budget for fiscal year 1958 of $71.8 billion. As the session advanced, however, he made revisions downward in this estimate and also in his original estimate of $73.3 billion in new obligational authority for fiscal 1958. Members of both parties joined in reducing requests for new appropriations by close to $5 billion.

Civil Rights

After prolonged consideration, Congress enacted a civil-rights measure which promises some progress in the long struggle for equality and elimination of race and color discriminations in American life.

Immigration

During the closing days of the session, Congress enacted a bill of limited scope in the field of immigration, in place of the comprehensive program of the President calling for revision of the McCarran-Walter Act, including its national origins system, and for permanent residence of Hungarian freedom fighters now in the United States.

The bill affects an estimated 60,000 aliens. It is directed principally to providing relief in hardship cases involving relatives of United States citizens or permanent United States residents, and reviving over 18,000 visas that had expired last year with the Refugee Relief Act.

Taxes—Public Works—Housing

Congress also extended existing rates on corporate income taxes and certain excise taxes until July 1, 1958. It enacted a new housing law and provided for an extensive program of public works and reclamation projects.

Small Business Administration

The Small Business Administration established in 1953 by the Republican 83d Congress was continued for another year and its lending authority increased.

Atomic Energy

An atomic energy bill was passed authorizing Federal Government participation in a number of atomic energy projects, including authority for the AEC to build reactors for five municipal power groups and rural electric cooperatives.

Niagara Power

The Federal Power Commission was authorized to permit the New York State Power Authority to develop the American share of Niagara River power under the Canadian-American Treaty of 1950.

Armed Forces

The suspension of the limits on the size of the Armed Forces, and provisions for the induction of doctors, dentists, and other specialists into the Armed Forces, were continued until July 1, 1959.

Veterans

Congress consolidated into one act the laws relating to veterans' compensation, pensions, service-connected disability, hospitalization, and burial benefits. Also, it approved a 10-percent increase in service-connected disability compensation payments.

MAJOR LEGISLATION NOT ENACTED OR POSTPONED TO 1958

Among important measures recommended by the President which failed of enactment in this session were Hawaii and Alaska statehood, legislation permitting TVA to issue and sell its own revenue bonds, an increase in postal rates, the Fryingpan-Arkansas project, emergency corn bill, appropriations for flood insurance, extension of the minimum-wage law to additional workers, amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, Federal aid for school construction, certain efficiency-in-government proposals of the Hoover Commission submitted by the President, the program for the lease-purchase of post office and other Federal buildings, tax relief and other measures for the aid of small business, aid to economically depressed areas, provisions for United States participation in the Organization for Trade Cooperation, and regulation of lobbying and campaign funds and expenditures.

Section-by-section details on the record of Congress during this session follow:

Foreign affairs

In the period from August 1956 to August 1957, the world witnessed dramatic events in the Middle East and Hungary. Everywhere freedom was under either direct or covert assault by the insidious forces of international communism. The United States reacted boldly to fulfill her obligations under the United Nations Charter and under her treaties with friendly nations.

Middle East Doctrine

During the Middle East crisis last January, President Eisenhower asked Congress for authority to use American Armed Forces for maintaining the independence of any Middle East nation which requested help from us under threat of Communist aggression. In addition, he requested authority to use $200 million from prior mutual security appropriations for assistance in the area.

The urgently needed resolution was delayed in the Senate for almost 2 months because some Democrats insisted upon an investigation into the conduct of our Middle East policy. On March 5, the Eisenhower doctrine finally passed the Senate by a vote of 72 to 19, with 15 Democrats and only 4 Republicans voting against it.

The President was given substantially what he asked for. With this authority he took firm action, including a rapid movement of the Sixth Fleet in support of the Jordanian Government when it was threatened by Communist aggression.

The policy investigation continued into July, but produced no committee recommendations or criticisms.

Atoms for Peace

Another significant accomplishment of this session of Congress was the approval of the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency, a treaty signed by the United States and 79 other nations. The statute grew out of President Eisenhower's historic atoms-for-peace proposal at the United Nations in December 1953.

This Agency is designed to advance peaceful uses of atomic energy and its application to industry, agriculture, and medicine.

The Agency will administer a pool of basic nuclear fuels for use in research and power reactors. It is expected to take a leading part in the exchange of information on peaceful uses of atomic energy, exchange and training of scientists and experts, and the holding of international scientific meetings.

Recommending treaty approval, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee declared this "is one of the most important instruments to be passed upon by the Senate in recent years. It is a treaty which could have far-reaching consequences for humanity, in hastening the development of peaceful uses of atomic energy for the benefit of our own Nation and for people everywhere." At the suggestion of the minority leader, WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, and Senator BOURKE HICKENLOOPER, the following understanding was approved in the instrument of ratification: "(1) Any amendment to the statute shall be submitted to the Senate for its advice and consent, as in the case of the statute itself; and (2) the United States will not remain a member of the Agency in the event of an amendment to the statute being adopted to which the Senate by a formal vote shall refuse its advice and consent."

After the Senate gave its approval to the statute, Congress subsequently passed an enabling act for the treaty which provides that the United States is not obligated to provide fissionable material for Agency projects. Our contributions will be voluntary, paid for by the Agency, and made available when the safeguard system is put in effect.

In the participation act, Senator BRICKER'S amendment protecting the authority of Congress to pass upon sales of nuclear fuels to the International Agency was approved.

Congress Condemns Soviet Repression in Hungary

Senate Republicans and Democrats joined in condemning Russia for barbaric action and brutal forms of armed subjugation during the revolt of the Hungarian freedom fighters. Approving House Concurrent Resolution 35, the Congress asked that the President's representatives to the United Nations work to prevent further repressive action and to seek all practical redress of the wrong which grew out of Soviet Russia's infamous attack on Hungary.

Mutual Security

Collective security has become vital to the Free World's resistance to Communist aggression. The Congress has consistently recognized the importance of our mutual security pacts by appropriating money to provide our allies with military hardware and economic assistance. This aid has permitted anti-Communist nations to maintain armed forces which their economies would not otherwise sustain and has permitted us to reduce the size of our draft call.

The Mutual Security Act of 1957 contains two important innovations. First, economic aid, which up to now has consisted largely of gifts, is placed on a repayable basis through the creation of a development loan fund. Second, the definition of defense support has been tightened to preclude the use of these dollars for any other purpose than to help friendly countries keep a maximum amount of men under arms.

Last January, President Eisenhower transmitted a mutual security program for fiscal year 1958 of $4.4 billion. Subsequent estimates and legislation revised this figure downward, so that the President finally requested an appropriation for new funds of $3.386 billion plus a reappropriation of $614 million that had not been spent.

After the Senate and House versions of the mutual security appropriation had been reconciled, the amount finally approved was $3.435 billion, including reappropriation of $667 million.

Treaties

By joint resolution Congress approved an amendment to the Anglo-American Financial Agreement of 1945 to provide a more flexible formula for repayment of the $3.750 million loan when the United Kingdom is confronted with a financial emergency.

The Senate also gave its advice and consent to a number of treaties concerning fisheries, commerce, navigation, double taxation, and cultural affairs.

National defense

The 85th Congress devoted continuing attention to the Nation's defenses. Legislative committees held many hearings as part of their responsibility to assure the American people military strength suited to the needs of the times.

These times present difficult problems involving careful judgment while the Nation makes the changeover from conventional to nuclear defenses.

As the latest electronic and atomic weapons and equipment are brought into operational use, we must be careful not to deplete our strength-in-being to the point where it endangers our security before we have the newer, more powerful devices in hand. We must not diminish our combat strength on the mere hope of getting something that may only be on the drawing board.

In other words, because of the military threat posed by world Communism, we must continue to maintain conventional forces as we phase in advanced weapons, so that we preserve or increase our deterrent power compared with the strength of a potential enemy.

Such defense forces cannot be bought at bargain rates. New equipment entering the inventory is expensive, not only because of rising prices but also because of the very complexity of the equipment.

The Defense Department has already experienced a sharp rise in spending as a result of these factors. In the last half of fiscal year 1957, defense spending, projected on a yearly basis, was at a rate of $40 billion-plus. This is higher than the $38 billion yearly level the administration estimates the Nation can sustain over the next several years without upsetting the Government's fiscal applecart.

This situation has compelled a reassessment of the many components of our total defense strength. To bring military spending down while maintaining combat strength, the Defense Department has already taken a number of steps. Other measures are under consideration.

Headquarters personnel in Washington have been reduced. The authorized force levels of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Force were lowered by 100,000 to a revised authorized total strength of 2,700,000. Part of the military manpower cutback was possible because we have been able to withdraw troops from Japan; part from a reduction of overhead personnel in Europe.

Our vast overseas base network is under review to determine whether, in light of today's military capabilities, any of them can be closed. Our military missions abroad are being reduced.

Overtime pay by military contractors has been curtailed and progress payments limited in an effort to hold down costs. Production of certain aircraft and ships has been stretched out somewhat. Operations and maintenance and other overhead activities are being tightened.

All these moves are designed to maintain adequate defense at a cost of about $38 billion a year. We must continue to find ways and means of providing for our national security within the Nation's ability to pay.

Probably the most important enactment of this Congress on defense was the military appropriations bill. To carry on the activities of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Department of Defense, this Congress approved a total of $33,759,850,000 in new funds, reappropriated $10 million and permitted transfer of $590 million from various Armed Forces stock and industrial funds to the military personnel accounts of the Army and Navy.

In addition, this Congress provided $1,475,000,000 for military construction of airplane hangars, guided missile facilities, shore installations, and other necessary facilities.

New funds granted by the Congress for the regular military departments exclusive of military construction were $2.4 billion lower than the President's January budget request of $36,128,000,000—but this statement by itself is misleading.

As a matter of fact, the administration was able to scale down its request in the subsequent months and in mid-July presented a revised Defense Department budget totaling $34,391,980,000. Congress reduced this by $632,130,000.

Other enactments by this Congress in the field of defense include a law granting the President authority to issue special draft calls for physicians, dentists, and like specialists who are otherwise liable for induction under the regular draft (Public Law 85–62); and an act suspending for another 2 years the legal ceiling of some 2 million men on United States active duty in the Armed Forces (Public Law 85–63).

Finance and Taxation

Budget

For the third consecutive year the administration presented a balanced budget to the Congress. In fiscal year 1956, the surplus totaled $1.626 billion; in 1957, $1.645 billion, and in 1958, the surplus estimated is $1.8 billion.

Surpluses actually realized were applied to the Federal debt.

In January the President presented his requests for $73.3 billion in new obligational authority and his spending plans totaling $71.8 billion for the year ending June 30, 1958. At that time, the President indicated he would welcome the help of Congress in finding ways and means to reduce the size of the budget.

The entire Republican delegation in both House and Senate responded by formally approving resolutions pledging efforts to reduce Federal spending.

Among the recommendations for economy adopted by the Senate Republican conference was a proposal that legislative committees of the Senate include in all reports on bills approved for Senate action a statement of the estimated initial and projected cost of any activity requiring Federal spending. With Republican sponsorship this proposal was introduced as a Senate resolution and was later reported to the Senate by unanimous vote of the Rules and Administration Committee.

Meanwhile, President Eisenhower ordered all Government agencies to undertake a continuing look to see where savings could be made. From time to time, the President proposed savings in his 1958 budget which would neither hurt our defense strength nor jeopardize essential Government functions.

Congress, too, in its review of budget requests pruned various items in an effort toward economy and efficiency. Out of the total $64 billion in 1958 appropriation requests considered, Congress approved $59 billion-plus, a reduction of almost $5 billion.

The battle to hold Government spending within the limits of Government income is never ending. On the eve of the 1958 fiscal year, all agency heads were informed of the President's request that commitments, obligations, and expenditures be kept at or below the level for 1957 to the extent feasible.

Other steps to improve the budget system and to assist in controlling Government expenditures were taken in the Congress. The Senate passed a bill to provide that estimates for proposed appropriations of executive agencies, shall, where appropriate, be determined on an annual accrued expenditure basis. To provide expert staff facilities and detailed technical information for the Appropriations Committees of Congress, a bill was passed by the Senate creating a Joint Committee on the Budget. Neither bill has received House action.

Fiscal and Monetary Inquiry

In his state of the Union address, January 10, 1957, President Eisenhower called upon Congress to create a commission of able and qualified citizens to conduct a broad inquiry into the Nation's financial system.

Congress did not enact this suggestion, however, nor did it approve Republican Congressional proposals to set up a bipartisan commission composed of Members of Congress and Presidential appointees from civilian life.

Instead, the Subcommittee on Fiscal Policy of the Joint Economic Committee conducted hearings in June on the economic outlook and budget developments particularly as related to fiscal years 1957 and 1958. And the Senate Finance Committee on June 18 undertook an inquiry into the financial condition of the United States.

The occasion for the study, according to the chairman, was the "existing credit and interest situation and, more important, inflation which has started again with its ominous threat to fiscal solvency, sound money, and individual welfare."

As of August 19, when the committee recessed subject to call of the Chair, the committee had heard three witnesses: George M. Humphrey, then Secretary of the Treasury; W. Randolph Burgess, Under Secretary of the Treasury; and William McChesney Martin, Jr., Chairman of the Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System.

From the testimony it is clear the goal of the administration has been to avoid sharp ups and downs in the economy—to do whatever was prudent to curb inflation and to prevent deflation.

Administration Aims for Stability

Among the policies adopted were those ending budget deficits, applying budget surpluses to reducing the Federal debt, reducing Government spending, holding down the bank-held debt, reducing the floating debt, selling more E and H savings bonds, encouraging individual savings, and keeping the Federal Reserve independent from the Treasury.

Republican Administration's Economic Achievements

Secretary Humphrey summarized the achievements resulting from the administration's policies in his lead-off testimony:

Federal debt proportionately lower: "When we took office in 1953, the Federal debt was equal to 89 percent of our national income—in December 1956, it was 79 percent.

"For the fiscal year 1953, budget expenditures were $74.3 billion, and for the year 1957, they are estimated at $68.9 billion, and $71.8 billion for 1958."

Budget deficits ended: "For the fiscal year 1953, the budget resulted in a deficit of $9.4 billion—for 1957, it will result in a surplus."

Cost-of-living increase held to narrow margin: "From 1939 through 1952, the cost of living increased an average of 7 percent a year—for the past 4 years, the average increase has been only six-tenths of 1 percent."

Employment and wages increased: "In the past 4 years, civilian employment has risen 6 percent, average weekly earnings of production workers in manufacturing have risen 18 percent, and, after allowance for the 2.4-percent increase in consumer prices which occurred between 1952 and 1956, the gain in workers' earnings, after taxes, amounted to about $10 per week, or more than 15 percent."

Individual incomes higher: "Personal income of individuals has risen every year, from $272 billion in 1952, to $325 billon in 1956, a gain of 20 percent, and an estimated $340 billion for 1957."

Labor receives larger share of national income: "Labor income has not only risen in dollars, it has increased from 67.2 percent of national income in 1952, to 69.8 percent in 1956 (while corporate profits declined from 12.7 percent of national income, to 11.9 percent)."

More housing and home ownership: "The 5 million dwelling units that were constructed exceeded the number built in any previous 4-year period and substantially enlarged the housing stock available to the American people. * * * A growing proportion of our homes were owner-occupied—60 percent in 1956, compared with 55 percent in 1950."

Administration Employs General Fiscal and Monetary Policies Instead of Direct Wage, Price, and Other Controls

Despite clamor from some sources, the administration has refused to impose direct wage and price controls, relying instead on general fiscal and monetary restraints.

In its report of June 26, the Joint Economic Subcommittee states "public policies to cope with increases in the price level must take the form of general fiscal and monetary restraints on the expansion of total spending.

"It is recognized that the burden of such restraints may not be evenly distributed throughout the economy. The burden of inflation, however, is far more inequitably distributed.

"The alternative to general fiscal and credit controls is some form of direct Government control over wage and price determination.

"The use of this type of control would produce results as bad, if not worse, than the inflation against which it would be directed, and should be avoided."

The Federal Reserve Chairman pointed out in his testimony before the Finance Committee that in the current inflation the demand for borrowed funds is outrunning the supply of financial savings. "In such circumstances," he said, "interest rates are bound to rise."

Higher interest rates benefit savers as well as lenders and, in fact, are an incentive to save. Mr. Martin emphasized we need more savings by individuals and less Government spending to help bring the supply of money in line with demand.

Congress itself took action to raise interest rates of United States savings bonds and certificates by increasing the maximum rate to 3.26 percent, compounded semiannually (Public Law 85–17).

Export-Import Bank Lending Powers Extended 5 Years

Among other legislation enacted by the Congress in the field of finance, was the 5-year extension of lending authority of the Export-Import Bank, which serves to facilitate United States export and import trade with other countries (Public Law 85–55).

Banking Law Revision Postponed

The Senate passed a measure designed to overhaul the Nation's banking laws. Known as the Financial Institutions Act of 1957, the bill did not come to the House floor before Congress adjourned.

Taxes

The 85th Congress and the administration were agreed no general income-tax cuts should be made this year. President Eisenhower expressed himself on July 15, as follows:

"It now appears that the excess of income over disbursements in the fiscal year 1958 will be so small that no action should be taken by the Congress at this time which will involve any substantial tax reduction for anyone.

"In the economic conditions that prevail currently and can be expected during the next fiscal year, all the income which the present tax laws provide should be reserved in order to maintain the balance between income and outgo as now estimated and to make modest reductions in our national debt.

* * * * *

"I earnestly look forward to reductions in tax rates for all taxpayers as soon as that becomes possible."

To prevent a deficit of some half-billion dollars to the Treasury, Congress found it necessary to extend to July 1, 1958, the 52 percent corporate income-tax rate and existing excise taxes on such items as alcoholic beverages, cigarettes, automobiles, and auto parts and accessories (Public Law 85–12).

Tax Writeoff Law Amended

Congress also took action on the rapid tax amortization feature of Federal law. Designed to stimulate building of defense facilities, the 5-year fast writeoff has resulted in an estimated net postponement of $5 billion in Federal tax revenue over the period 1950–60, at an interest cost to the Government of about $3 billion.

First enacted during World War II, reenacted during the Korean war and continued thereafter, the law was amended by this Congress to restrict issuance of rapid tax amortization certificates to new or specialized defense facilities and to research and development facilities for defense. As enacted, the new provisions (Public Law 85–165) are similar to policies the administration had already adopted. By law, authority for the program terminates December 31, 1959.

Civil rights

This session of Congress will go down in history for its achievement in civil-rights legislation. This was the leadership furnished by Republican Members and a small band of Democrats to bring a meaningful civil-rights bill to the floor of the Senate and to keep it there until the Senate voted final passage. Without this determined effort there would have been no civil-rights bill at this session.

First Civil-Rights Bill Enacted in 82 Years

Only those who realize that not a single bill dealing with color and racial discrimination has been passed by the Congress in 82 years can appreciate the passage of a bill in this session.

If we look only at the last 25 years, the measure of our achievement is remarkable. In that period Democrats controlled Congress 21 years and Republicans 4. In that period hundreds of bills were filed to deal with problems of racial discrimination. All but a few of these bills were buried in committees. None was enacted into law.

Since 1933 the House passed civil-rights bills nine times. There were seven times when these House-passed bills reached the Senate Calendar, and there were five times when Senate bills on civil rights also reached the Senate Calendar. The Senate took up and debated four of the nine House-passed bills and one of the five Senate bills.

None of these civil-rights measures ever got to the point of Senate passage. The bills and the debates came to nothing because of threatened filibuster, or actual filibuster, or because they were left to die on the calendar at the close of the Congress.

In the light of this experience it seemed impossible to break this dismal legislative record on civil rights. The Senate Judiciary Committee in the 84th and 85th Congresses, under Democratic chairmanship, continued to be the graveyard for civil-rights measures.

Only a determined Republican effort could possibly alter the situation, and it could only succeed with some Democratic help, because Republicans were in the minority in both Houses of Congress. The effort was made and how it succeeded is a story worth telling.

House Passes Administration Bill

After many months of delay in the House where every known device was used in committees and on the floor to obstruct and cripple the bill, the House passed a civil-rights bill, H. R. 6127, by a vote of 286 to 126, and sent it to the Senate. Republicans furnished the great majority of votes, 168, for the bill as compared with only 19 against. Democrats split almost evenly with 118 for the bill and 107 against it. As passed by the House the civil-rights bill included substantially the main recommendations made by the Republican administration.

Republican Leader Assures Senate Consideration by Rare Proceeding

Aware that the House bill could be referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee and buried there, the Senate Republican leader used a rare parliamentary procedure permissible under rule XIV to carry the House bill directly to the Senate Calendar. The vote accomplishing this result was 45 to 39, with Republicans furnishing 34 of the 45 votes, while 34 Democrats and five Republicans voted against the procedure.

No heavy opposition developed to the minority leader's subsequent motion to take up the bill which carried 71 to 18. All 18 of the negative votes were cast by Democrats.

A second attempt to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee with instructions to report back in 7 days was defeated 54 to 35, with only four Republicans voting for the motion to refer.

Historic Debate Alters Administration Bill

The debate that followed was historic and in the finest traditions of the Senate. Members who strongly held opposing convictions debated them searchingly in the spirit of sincerity, fairness, and tolerance. This had much to do with the alterations the Senate made in the House bill.

By vote of 90 to 0, the Knowland-Humphrey amendment repealed section 1989 (42 U. S. C. 1993), a provision dating back to the post-Civil War reconstruction era, which might have been construed to authorize enforcement of civil rights by Federal troops.

Restriction of Voting Rights

One of the major alterations on the bill was the elimination of a section in part III which would have extended enforcement powers beyond the protection of voting rights to a variety of civil rights. An amendment narrowing the scope of the bill to the protection of voting rights only was one of the significant compromises in the debate and was approved 52 to 38.

Jury Trial Provided

The other major alteration involved the provision of jury trial in cases of criminal contempt. Members in the Senate of both parties were deeply concerned that the injunctive proceedings permitted by the bill would result in enforcing the right to vote by a sacrifice of the right of trial by jury in cases of criminal contempt. Serious questions of constitutionality as well as denial of fundamental, historic rights were raised.

To resolve these questions an amendment was offered providing different remedies in civil and criminal contempt in all Federal cases. The power of the court, sitting without a jury, to secure compliance with its orders in cases of civil contempt was retained. But where the purpose of the court is to punish for violations of court orders, as in criminal contempt, the amendment specified a jury trial. The amendment applied these distinctions and proceedings not only to voting rights cases, but to all Federal cases involving injunctions.

Reflecting sincere differences of opinion which cut across and obliterated party lines, the amendment was adopted 51 to 42.

After making several other less important changes in the House bill, the Senate passed it 72 to 18, all 18 being Democrats.

At this point both the House and Senate had passed civil rights bills, but the House version contained no jury trial provision, while the Senate version provided for jury trials in all Federal criminal contempt cases, not just voting rights cases.

When the Senate sent its bill to the House a deadlock ensued over conflicting requests made to the House Committee on Rules, through which the bill had to clear. A Republican request asked that the House and Senate differences be reconciled through a conference committee. A Democratic request asked that jury trial provisions similar to those in the Senate bill be accepted by the House, but that they apply only in voting rights cases.

A compromise was necessary to force a meeting of the Rules Committee, whose Democratic chairman refused to act, and to bring to the floor of the House a bill that could become law.

Such a compromise was offered by the Republican leadership of the House who proposed that jury trial rights be provided in criminal contempt cases growing out of voting rights incidents only where the penalty to be imposed is a fine of more than $300 or imprisonment of more than 90 days.

A bipartisan modification of this Republican compromise offer was worked out and the civil-rights bill moved toward passage in both Houses.

The vote on final passage in the Senate was 60 to 15.

Provisions of New Civil Rights Law

What did we get and is it a step forward? The bill as sent to the President provides for several things of great value in dealing with civil-rights cases. This is what it does:

It establishes in the executive branch a six-member bipartisan Commission on Civil Rights, with subpena powers, to investigate alleged deprivation of voting rights because of color, race, religion, or national origin; to study legal developments constituting denial of equal protection of the laws; and to appraise Federal laws and policies regarding equal protection of the laws. The Commission is directed to make a final report to the President and to Congress within 2 years.

It provides for an additional Assistant Attorney General.

It makes interference with the right to vote in Federal elections actionable at the discretion of the Attorney General under injunctive proceedings in United States district courts, which will have jurisdiction without regard to whether other lawful remedies have been exhausted.

It permits Federal judges to issue injunctions or other orders to protect the right to vote. It maintains the courts' power through civil contempt proceedings, without a jury, to secure compliance with, as distinguished from punishment for violations of, such orders.

It says that in criminal contempt cases, involving punishment for willful disobedience of court orders in voting rights cases, the defendant may be tried with or without a jury. It says that if in such a trial without a jury the judge imposes a fine greater than $300 or a jail term longer than 45 days, the defendant can demand and get a new trial before a jury.

It also sets qualifications for Federal jurors independent of State laws, stating that any 21-year-old citizen who has resided one year within the judicial district is competent to serve as a juror, unless he is illiterate, a criminal, or physically or mentally incapable.

These are substantial steps forward in protecting rights. Many people who know the difficult problems involved in civil-rights cases, would say that this is about as far as we can go at this time.

National economy

As Republicans we are proud of the continuing prosperity of the Nation, with more people working than ever before and at the highest wages in our history. The policies and operations of the Republican administration have not been perfect, but they have kept us at peace with the world in stormy times and they have greatly advanced the welfare of our people at home. Completed figures for the period 1952–56 point up the remarkable progress we have made.

The gross national product—the aggregate of goods and services produced—increased from $345.4 billion to $414.7 billion. Although some of this increase was accounted for by higher prices, it reflects a substantially enlarged national output of goods and services. Disposable personal income, which is what we have to spend after taxes, increased from $243 billion to $287.2 billion. Although this income was shared among a greater number of individuals, it shows a per capita rise from $1,548 in 1952 to $1,708 in 1956.

Industrial plant and equipment increased by an investment of $35.1 billion in 1956 compared to $26.5 billion in 1952. Over the same period our civilian labor force grew from 62 million to 67.5 million. Income from wages, salaries, and related payments increased from $195.1 billion to $241.4 billion. The longtime decline in farm income was finally checked in 1956 and began to improve.

Every year since 1952 saw well over a million housing starts which reached a peak of 1,328,900 in 1955. The number of homes owned by their occupants increased from 22,200,000 to 25,300,000. Families owning automobiles have increased from 31 million to 37 million. Life insurance protection, which is a measure of the security of our people, shows an increase in policyholders from 88 million to 106 million. In our foreign trade, merchandise exports in 1956 totaled $17.3 billion compared to $13.3 billion in 1952.

Prosperity Continues Into 1957

This remarkable peacetime prosperity continued into the first half of 1957. By the second quarter of the year, gross national product reached an annual rate of $433.5 billion. Investment in plant and equipment increased to an annual rate of $37.3 billion. Disposable personal income in 1956 prices reached an annual rate of $291.3 billion. Salaries, wages, and other compensation reached $253.6 billion. For the first half of 1957, realized net farm income was at a rate of approximately $12½ billion—2½ percent higher than in the first half of 1956. In the second quarter of 1957, consumer expenditures rose to an annual rate of $277.8 billion compared with $265 billion for the same period in 1956, and $218.3 billion in 1952. While housing starts dropped to an annual rate of 970,000 in June 1957, construction expenditures as a whole are higher than ever before, running at an annual rate of $47.3 billion.

Legislation Pertaining to Business

A few items of legislation pertaining to business were passed, and several more, some of an urgent character, were put aside. The highlights of Congressional performance or the lack thereof in this field are as follows:

Small Business Administration extended

The Small Business Administration, established in 1953 by the Republican 83d Congress to advise and assist all types of business concerns, was continued for another year to July 31, 1958. Its busines loan fund was first increased in February 1957 by $80 million to a total of $230 million, and by the extension act from $230 million to $305 million. This raised the total authorization of the agency from $455 million to $530 million. An effort to make the Small Business Administration a permanent agency did not succeed this year, but there are indications in both Houses of Congress that it will next year.

Proposed tax relief for small business

President Eisenhower asked that Congress give early consideration to changes in tax laws which would help small business but with only minimum loss of revenue. He stated that any changes involving substantial loss of revenue should be considered at a later time when a general tax reduction is possible. No action was taken in this session on the President's recommendations, which were:

That business be given the right to utilize, for purchases of used property not exceeding $50,000 in any one year, the formulas of accelerated depreciation that were made available to purchasers of new property by the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

That corporations with, say, 10 or fewer stockholders be given the option of being taxed as if they were partnerships.

That the taxpayer be given the option of paying the estate tax over a period of up to 10 years in cases where the estate consists largely of investments in closely held business concerns.

To permit an original investor in small business the right to deduct from his income, up to some maximum amount prescribed by Congress, a loss, if any, realized on a stock investment in such business.

Other small business recommendations

The Congress also took no action in this session on other recommendations by President Eisenhower to protect and foster the initiative of the small-business man. In order that small business may have a better opportunity to secure adequate financing, he proposed that issues of securities up to $500,000 be exempted from the regular registration provisions of the Securities Act of 1933. He proposed, too, that Congress enact legislation providing for notification to the Federal Government of proposed business mergers, and amend the procedural provisions of the antitrust laws to facilitate their enforcement. Another proposal was that wage reporting by employers for purposes of social security records and income tax withholding be simplified.

Patent Office Fees

A bill intended to carry out the President's request for an adjustment of Patent Office fees to make the Office more nearly self-supporting was reported by the House Judiciary Committee August 1, but was not taken up in the House.

Area Redevelopment Program

Despite continuing high levels of employment and income, pockets of unemployment persist in some communities. To provide loans and other aids to economically depressed areas, the President again this year sought legislation for an area redevelopment program. There was no action, however, in either House of Congress.

Transportation

Fulfilling a special request of the President, Congress approved the Airways Modernization Act of 1957, first legislative step toward creation of a single system of aviation facilities capable of meeting the needs of civil and military aviation.

The new law creates an interim Airways Modernization Board as a forerunner of a permanent independent Federal Aviation Agency into which will be consolidated all the essential management functions necessary to support the common needs of the military and civil aviation of the United States.

Another new measure, also in the air transportation field, deserves special mention among a number of transportation bills passed by this Congress. This bill allows the Government to guarantee loans to a limited number of small air carriers and helicopter lines to help them buy better aircraft and improve the economy of their operations. This in turn, is expected to reduce or eliminate present Government subsidy payments to these so-called feeder lines.

Agriculture

In the field of agriculture, our problems continued to be those of surplus and price, not problems of shortage and hunger.

The two most important legislative acts to lower surpluses and control production in order to protect farmers' income were extension of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and continuance of the full soil-bank program—the latter only after the Democratic-controlled House reversed its vote to kill the acreage reserve part of the program.

Trade Development and Assistance Act Continued

Congress fulfilled a Presidential request when it authorized a 1-year, $1.3 billion expansion of Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act that permits barter for strategic materials, but not sales, of surplus farm crops to Iron Curtain countries. This highly successful program was extended to June 30, 1958. Authorization for sales of American farm surpluses for foreign currencies was raised from $3 billion to $4 billion, and gifts to needy nations from $500 million to $800 million. The new provision permitting barter with European satellite countries, but not with Russia or any area dominated by Communist China, is designed to contain and minimize international communism while adding to America's supply of strategic materials. Another new provision permits up to 25 percent of the foreign currencies received in surplus sales to be loaned to American or foreign companies to promote expanded markets for American products. These and other provisions show that the act is both an effective domestic surplus disposal law and a sound foreign relations program.

Soil Bank Program Continued

Continuation of the administration's soil-bank program was provided under the Agriculture Department and Farm Credit Administration appropriations bill. For a time there appeared a serious danger that the soil-bank program, which seeks to hold production more nearly in line with consumption while protecting farmers' income and guarding future productivity of America's soil, would be severely—perhaps disastrously—curtailed. This happened when the Democratic-controlled House voted 192 to 187 to kill the acreage reserve part of the program. Of those Representatives who voted to kill the acreage reserve, 154 were Democrats and 38 were Republicans. Opposed to the ill-advised move were 141 Republicans and 46 Democrats. Fortunately for America's farmers, the House later reversed its position on the soil bank when it approved a Senate-House compromise agriculture appropriations bill.

Agriculture Appropriations

This agriculture appropriations law provides about $299 million less than the President's revised request, but puts almost three and two-thirds billion dollars into the Nation's far-reaching farm program.

Congress failed to protect the best interest of the Nation's corngrowers when Democratic majorities in both the House and the Senate defeated several Republican-sponsored bills designed to head off overproduction by setting more realistic acreage restrictions and encouraging participation in the soil bank.

Wheat and Livestock Growers Aided

On the other hand, Congress did act in the best interest of another segment of American farmers—those who plant no more than 30 acres of wheat and use all the wheat they grow right on their own farms. Fulfilling a Presidential request, Congress exempted such wheatgrowers from marketing quotas and penalties. Similarly, Congress authorized payments to livestock growers in severe drought areas for withholding their acreage from grazing until it can be restored to productivity. This new deferred grazing program fulfills another specific request of the President.

Increased acreage allotments for Durum wheatgrowers also were provided by this Congress, and an important new law providing compulsory Government inspection of poultry and poultry products was passed.

Housing

The Congress passed a number of housing bills, based on administration requests, but President Eisenhower observed when signing the omnibus housing bill on July 15 that it contained a number of serious defects.

The omnibus measure, authorizing $1.99 billion, permitted lower down payments on FHA-insured home loans as the administration requested. However, the President pointed out that the total of authorizations for all programs was nearly double that requested by the Republican administration.

The new law permits a reduction in FHA down payments on FHA-insured home mortgages by as much as $1,000 on a $16,000 home, and small wage earners now can purchase a $10,000 home for as little as $300 down.

The administration ordered the new down payment schedule soon after the law was signed, but in order to attract more construction money so more homes would be built it raised interest rates one-quarter of 1 percent.

The omnibus bill also provides authorizations for urban renewal or slum clearance grants to cities, new lending authority for a secondary market for home mortgages, and funds for certain military and cooperative housing mortgages. The measure needed no provision for more public housing facilities as present law provides for 35,000 units in each of the next 2 years.

In other legislation, the Veterans' Administration guaranteed home mortgage program was continued and $200 million was added to the $825 million previously authorized for the VA's direct loan program in rural areas. Additional military housing was also authorized and provided for in other laws.

The Congress also appropriated $150,000 for a special study of farm housing.

Resource development—Public works

Republican policy in this session of Congress on the development of natural resources and public works continued to be based, wherever feasible, on the partnership concept—with responsibilities and costs shared among the Federal Government, the States, municipalities, and individuals.

Some Republican-supported proposals met congressional approval; others were either delayed, defeated, or postponed; but all either saved, or would have saved the money of taxpayers while improving our public works and conserving our natural resources.

Cooperative Action Saves the Money of Taxpayers

The Congress enacted a law authorizing and directing the Federal Power Commission to issue a license for construction by the State of New York of a public power project on the Niagara River near Niagara Falls. State construction will save between $500 million and $650 million of Federal Treasury funds. The Niagara project measure provides a public power preference clause, a guaranty for supply of power to a private utility destroyed by a landslide, and up to 20 percent of the preference power for nearby States.

The administration's proposal for issuance by the Tennessee Valley Authority of revenue bonds to finance additional facilities was designed to save the Treasury another $500 million while keeping TVA operations under Congressional control and within their present geographical area. Included in President Eisenhower's budget request was a recommendation for a $30 million authorization for construction of new TVA steam plant units. This was to be financed under the revenue bond plan. However, funds for these new units were included in the 1958 supplemental appropriation bill when the Congress delayed passage of the bond plan.

Fifty Million Dollars Saved in California Partnership Project

The Republican-supported $100 million Oroville Dam and Reservoir project on the Feather River was authorized by Congress to be a partnership project between the Federal Government and the State of California with a saving of about $50 million through State participation.

Congressional consideration of a big public power project in the Pacific Northwest was made unnecessary when the Federal Power Commission granted a partnership franchise for the Rocky Reach Power Dam on the Columbia River. This permitted a public power body in a Washington State county to join with an aluminum company to build the project, with a consequent saving to the United States Treasury of the $225.8 million cost of the dam.

Still another type of partnership project in another section of the Nation was approved by Congress. The San Angelo Irrigation-Municipal Water project in Texas was authorized as a partnership plan involving the Federal Government, farmers, and the residents of the city of San Angelo. The citizens voted to pay $6.7 million of the $32.3 million cost of the irrigation project in exchange for city water.

No action was taken on legislation proposed by the administration and introduced in the House for a partnership plan involving the Trinity River Dam project. The Congress appropriated $25 million for the $747 million Central Valley project. Included in this appropriation was $17 million to continue construction of the Trinity River Dam.

Taxpayers Saved an Estimated $500 Million on Hells Canyon Dam

The action of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs in voting down legislation for construction of a Federal dam in Hells Canyon on the Snake River between Idaho and Oregon saved taxpayers an estimated $500 million. The effect of this action also was to uphold the Federal Power Commission's granting of a license for a three-dam private development of the river's power potential in that area.

Production of power from the three, privately built dams will almost equal that of the proposed Federal dam. More important, power from the private development program will be coming on the line next year, 5 to 7 years before power could be produced by a single, higher Federal dam.

Democratic Congresses in the Past Defeated Hells Canyon Dam

Proposals for Federal construction of one big dam previously had been defeated by the Democratic-controlled Senate in 1950, by a Democratic-controlled House Committee in 1952, and in 1956 the Democratic-controlled Senate rejected the Federal plan while at the same time the Democratic-controlled House Rules Committee killed the bill.

The Federal Power Commission held the longest hearings in its history for such a project. After awarding the license to the private company the FPC was upheld by the Supreme Court when the Court declined to review a lower-court decision supporting the FPC. Federal public-power advocates had appealed the lower-court decision.

Yet, despite this background the issue was brought up again by the Democratic leadership in the Congress at this session. The Senate passed the bill by a vote of 45 to 38 for a Federal Hells Canyon Dam, but then a Democratic-controlled House subcommittee, and next the full Democratic-controlled House Interior Committee, killed not only the Senate bill but also a similar House bill.

Some Democratic Senators Noted as Changing Their Votes in Past Year

Senate passage of the Federal Hells Canyon bill was obtained when certain Democratic Senators, who in past years were recorded as voting against the measure, changed their votes in this session. Significantly related to this was the fact that shortly after, the House-approved civil-rights bill came up in the Senate.

At the time the Hells Canyon bill was being considered by the House Interior Committee, President Eisenhower said:

"It is inconceivable to me that serious consideration is being given in some quarters to stopping this [private] development, depriving the Northwest of power which is badly needed now, and throwing an additional burden on the already heavily burdened taxpayers of the Nation."

Tax Writeoff Was Subsidy Issue

A tax writeoff was a subsidiary issue of the Hells Canyon controversy. Supporters of the public power project raised a hue and cry against the granting of a tax writeoff to the private company which would have enabled the company to pay less taxes in the first 5 years but make up for it in later years. The writeoff was legally granted—under a law originally placed on the statute books by Democratic administrations. Thousands of other tax writeoffs previously had been granted to hundreds of firms throughout the country, but one for the company engaged in private development of Hells Canyon was lustily disputed by advocates of a Hells Canyon public power project. The company later rejected the writeoff and that ended the matter.

Fryingpan-Arkansas Power Project Remains in House Committee

Republicans strongly backed Congressional authorization of Federal construction of the important $155 million Fryingpan-Arkansas power and irrigation project in Colorado. This was a type of project which it was felt only the Federal Government could handle. The Republican administration did not hesitate to recommend it. The Senate approved, but no action was taken in the House.

The President proposed Congressional authorization on a partnership basis of the $44 million Bruces Eddy power and flood-control project on the Clearwater River in Idaho. It remained in committee. The Congress also did not act upon legislation which would have authorized Federal construction of the $80 million Auburn unit of the American River division of the Central Valley project, but additional engineering reports may speed action next year.

One and One-Half Billion Dollar Rivers, Harbors, and Flood Control Authorization Bill Held Up

The bill to authorize funds for possible Congressional appropriation for rivers and harbors was passed by the Senate but held up in the House until next year. Total authorizations ran to $1.5 billion, but strong objections were registered that full engineering surveys on some of the proposed projects had not been received. Also, it was pointed out that some $8 billion of previously authorized projects still await appropriations for either a start or completion.

Public Works Appropriations for Projects in Every State

The public works appropriation bill provided $858.9 million to carry on the conservation of our natural resources of every nature. The measure carried $449 million for 323 named locks, dams, channels, harbors, dredging and deepening of harbors, levees, reservoirs, drainage systems, dikes, bridges, breakwaters, and seawalls in every State and in Alaska and Hawaii.

Reclamation and irrigation projects received $116.7 million plus $20.1 million in carryover funds. The administration made it clear to all that its reclamation program was geared to taking areas out of a one-crop economy, permitting diversification and shifting away from crops in surplus.

Fish and Wildlife Resources

The administration was partly successful in obtaining an expansion of its program to conserve fish and wildlife resources. Expenditures were increased by Congress for fishery research to aid commercial fishermen and plant operators who face stiff competition from foreign sources of supply. The newly established Republican-sponsored fisheries loan fund received additional authorizations. Additional measures for conservation were taken, and the Bureau of Sport Fisheries and Wildlife received funds to aid in the administration's conservation and restoration program.

Mining and Minerals Legislation

Republicans submitted broad basic research programs designed to develop instruments, equipment, and methods for more efficient mining and substantially higher recovery of ore and coal. The recommended tariff protection for lead and zinc industries did not pass, but the administration's program for conservation and development of mineral resources received additional Congressional appropriations.

Recreational Resources Important to Growing Population

It was officially estimated this year that some 80 million visitors would be visiting our national parks each year by 1966. With this in view, legislation passed the Senate for establishment of a National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission. This was needed for the administration's two major 10-year development programs, called Mission 66 and Operation Outdoors, under the National Park Service and the Forest Service, respectively.

Forestry Resources Program of Immense Scope

The Government is responsible for a forestry program of a scope that is little realized, administering more than 161 million acres of forest and woodlands—all outside the National Forests which contain 46 million more acres of commercial-type forest lands and 115 million acres of noncommercial woodlands. For this the administration succeeded in obtaining an expanded reforestation program, an enlarged forest fire suppression program, and additional forest trails, roads, and other improvements.

Weather Control and Saline Water Experiments

A Republican proposal for weather modification experiments, including cloud seeding and other possible weather control methods, passed the Senate but still awaits action in the House. The Congress approved the administration's enlarged program for research and pilot-plant operations for converting saline water into fresh water for municipal, industrial, and agricultural uses.

Lease-Purchase and Flood Insurance Programs

Two important programs failed to be continued by Congress in this past session. The lease-purchase program was designed to have private firms use their own money to build needed post offices and other Federal office buildings and lease them to the Government. After a period of years, ownership of the buildings would revert to the Government. The Government pays rent for many years for many buildings without ever owning them. Construction of all needed post offices is not within budget limitations, but use of rent money for eventual ownership was considered a way to obtain more buildings. Continuance of this program was not approved although Congressional committees had approved lease-purchase contracts for 98 combined post office-courthouse-custom house structures and 48 post offices.

The Federal Flood Insurance Program, designed to help areas which might be badly damaged by hurricanes and other disasters, was authorized a year ago but money for the program was not approved although private insurance firms testified they were unable to participate alone in such a large-scale insurance program.

Atomic energy: at home and abroad

The Congress in this session dealt with nuclear energy developments of great significance.

Guidelines for United States in Atomic Matters

On a world basis, the guidelines for United States action were set forth by the President's 1953 atoms-for-peace plans. (See Foreign Affairs section.)

On a national basis, the guidelines were set forth by the Republican-sponsored revisions of 1954 in the original Atomic Energy Act. These revisions eliminated Government monopoly, except for national defense, and for the first time permitted individuals, public, and private groups to explore, develop, experiment, construct, and finance atomic facilities for the peacetime use of our citizens in the fields of power, biology, medicine, agriculture, commerce, and industry. Partnership between groups, public or private, or in partnership with the Federal Government, also was permitted.

Atomic Energy Appropriations for National Defense

The Congress provided in the 1958 Atomic Energy Appropriation bill a total of $2.32 billion, of which more than half was for the weapons and raw materials program. Funds also were provided for naval and air atomic propulsion plants, test sites, various experimental programs, and other defense projects, most of them of a classified nature.

Atomic Energy Appropriations for the Welfare of Our Citizens

The Congress provided, in the same appropriation measure, money to continue construction of the 22,000 horsepower, nuclear-powered passenger-cargo merchant ship and funds for a joint Commerce Department-Atomic Energy Commission program aimed at development of atomic powerplants for commercially competitive merchant ships.

The estimated $400 million program to stimulate production by purchase of uranium concentrate milled from raw ore was continued. This involved 12 uranium mills operating within the United States, all but one privately constructed at a total cost of nearly $75 million. Funds for purchase of the concentrate from either other mills, nearing construction at a cost to private investors of about $40 million, also were approved.

Funds were appropriated for the AEC's technical training program in colleges and universities all over the country; money also was made available for biological and medical research and experiments, and research into the use of atomic energy for conserving food without refrigeration.

Authorized Appropriations for National Defense

In the measure to authorize the Congress to make appropriations for approved projects, the Congress allowed $222.23 million for national defense purposes in addition to projects and funds authorized in previous years.

Among the new authorizations were: $8 million for an aircraft nuclear propulsion ground test plant in Idaho; funds for a naval destroyer reactor development plant; $8.5 million for a new type boiling reactor plant; $17.5 million for a liquid metal fuel reactor; $2.1 million for the start of an AEC development plant at Livermore, Calif.; $7.9 million more for the Eniwetok Proving Ground; and funds for various projects at Los Alamos, N. Mex., Sandia Base, N. Mex., Hanford, Wash., Nevada and Idaho test sites or stations, and AEC facilities extending from points in South Carolina to California.

Authorized Appropriations for the Welfare of Our Citizens

The same authorization bill also carried $149.91 million. This, for the most part, was for what the bill termed a cooperative power reactor demonstration program. Some Members of Congress declared on the Senate floor that this program, not requested by the AEC or the administration, was not a demonstration program but the beginning of a Federal atomic public-power program. The administration favored a program of partnership with local public power groups, cooperatives, or cooperatives formed by companies willing to invest large sums of money. As compromised, the bill provides for contracts between the AEC and cooperative or public bodies. Such contracts must be submitted to the Congressional Joint Atomic Energy Committee with a 45-day waiting period before becoming effective. Also, authorized appropriations "* * * shall be * * * for research and development purposes." The money authorized is only for a start of such projects. The reactors would be constructed, operated, and maintained by the Government, but steam would be sold to the cooperatives or public bodies to use in generating and then selling electricity. The bill also authorized two other types of reactors, with appropriations to be used for design work.

President Eisenhower, in signing the authorization measure August 21, indirectly warned of the economic dangers of atomic public power. He said:

"While I am not opposed to such projects as studies by the Commission I wish to make it clear that I will oppose the expenditure of public money for the construction and operation by the Government of any large-scale power reactor, or any prototype thereof, unless private enterprise has first received reasonable opportunity to bear or share the cost."

Another nuclear bill of the session, as approved by Congress, provided authorization of up to $500 million of Government insurance to private reactor builders against atomic accidents. The Government would take over insurance risks where private firms left off. This measure was designed to stimulate large-scale financing by private industry of reactor plants which industry might hesitate to undertake because of either tremendous insurance costs or lack of such insurance in the market.

Labor

In his annual budget message the President requested Congressional action in five specific areas with respect to labor. He asked for (1) extension of the minimum-wage law to additional workers; (2) clarification and strengthening of the Federal eight-hour law; (3) approval of equal pay for equal work; (4) enactment of a new program providing grants to States to promote occupation safety; and (5) statutory requirement for the Federal registration of private pension and welfare funds. None of these requests received favorable consideration this year.

In addition, there was no action on proposed changes in the Taft-Hartley Act affecting the building and construction industry recommended this year by the Eisenhower administration. This legislation, approved by both management and labor, provides that the National Labor Relations Board may certify unions in the building and construction industry as exclusive bargaining representatives without a prior election; that employers may contribute to apprenticeship and training trust funds in the building and construction industry which are jointly administered by the employer and the unions; and that multiemployer groups, such as employer associations, may engage in collective bargaining to the same extent as individual employers in the industry.

Labor Rackets Investigation

Republicans fully cooperated in setting up a Select Senate Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor and Management Field. Examination of witnesses to date has uncovered flagrant misuse of labor union funds by some labor leaders for their self-enrichment and for political purposes; instances of tieups between certain labor leaders and racketeers; the setting up of "paper" unions as a device to shake down employers; and labor boss control of unions without proper accounting to rank-and-file members and without rank-and-file members having a voice in union affairs. Corrective legislation is expected to be proposed by the select committee at the next session of Congress.

Union Reports To Be Made Public

One helpful item of legislation which did pass was recommended by the Secretary of Labor and provided affirmative authority to make public the financial reports filed by labor unions with the Department of Labor under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Health, education, and welfare

Federal Aid for School Construction

The question of Federal aid for school construction was a controversial one in this session, as before. The President proposed an emergency program providing for Federal aid over a period of 4 years at the rate of $325 million per year, with authorization of $750 million over the same period for Federal purchase of school bonds in cases where school districts could not market them at reasonable interest rates. The President's plan would have channeled aid to the neediest areas.

A compromise measure was reported from the House Education and Labor Committee. It called for $1½ billion in Federal funds for new schools over a 5-year period plus $900 million to aid in the selling of local and State bond issues. It provided that half of the Federal grant funds would be distributed on the basis of school-age population, and the other half on a need basis.

Before the House acted on the bill itself, it adopted, by a 136 to 105 teller vote, an amendment to prohibit the use of Federal funds in any school district operating segregated schools in violation of the Supreme Court's integration ruling.

The legislation was then defeated when the House, by a vote of 208 yeas to 203 nays, struck out the enactment clause.

Debate in the House cut across party lines in both instances on the basic issues involved. These included such factors as whether it has been adequately shown that the problem cannot be handled at the local or State level, having in mind (1) that State and local responsibility for education has been traditional; and (2) that relative financial ability of the States as compared with that of the Federal Government (in view of the national debt) to undertake such a program; and whether such participation can be provided with adequate safeguards against ultimate Federal control of education.

The issue was complicated, in addition, by House adoption (with strong Republican support) of the antisegregration amendment. The House rejection of this legislation, coupled with failure of the Senate to act at all, reflects the fact that there is continued and traditionally strong grassroots opposition, both Democratic and Republican, to a program of Federal aid to education, despite its support from the White House.

Federal Assistance to Schools in Special Areas Continued

Congress, however, did continue the program of Federal assistance to school districts, for school operation and construction, in areas affected by Federal activities.

An increase was voted, too, in grants for rural library services.

No Actions Taken on Other Major Proposals

In Public Law 813 of the 84th Congress, Federal funds were authorized to assist the States in establishing committees on education beyond high school, as recommended by the President's committee on this subject, but no appropriation was made. The President sought an appropriation again this year for this purpose, but no money was provided.

Little or no progress was made in this session on other major legislative proposals of President Eisenhower in the health, education, and welfare field. These included the program of Federal grants-in-aid to combat juvenile delinquency, grants for the construction of medical and dental schools for training facilities, and legislation making it possible for small insurance companies and nonprofit associations to pool their resources in order that a greater number of people in the Nation may be able to obtain the benefits of voluntary health insurance.

The Senate passed a bill to encourage expansion of teaching and research in the education of mentally retarded children through grants to nonprofit institutions of higher learning and to State educational agencies. This awaits House action, however.

Nothing was done except for House committee hearings on an administration request for legislation requiring advance testing of chemicals to be used in foods to assure their safety for human consumption. Another administration proposal not acted upon in this session was a bill to create a 21-member temporary Presidential study commission on problems of the blind. The study outlined by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare covers such areas as prevention of blindness and restoration of sight, utilization of limited sight, and employment opportunities for the blind.

Funds Voted To Combat Asiatic Flu

Funds were appropriated in response to a Presidential request to enable the Public Health Service to be prepared for any large-scale outbreak of Asiatic flu. Congress also authorized the transfer of $2 million of Public Health funds for use against any large epidemic of the disease which the Surgeon General has warned "is a very definite possibility."

Social Security

The extended coverage of those under social security has brought to more than 73 million the number of persons now under the system. This year saw the passing of the 10-million mark in those receiving benefits. Nine out of ten mothers and their children are protected by social security in the event the breadwinner dies. Congress, in Public Law 85–109, extended to July 1, 1958, the time for disabled persons to file applications to preserve their rights to old-age, survivors, and disability insurance. The same law permits veterans with service-connected disability to receive both social-security and veterans' benefits.

Immigration

Late in the session the Congress enacted a bobtail version of the President's immigration program which would benefit about 60,000 aliens.

Described by Senator WATKINS, Republican, of Utah, as a quarter loaf, the bill ignores such basic requests in the President's program as those for the up-dating of the census date of the national origins quota system in the McCarran-Walter Act, authority to transfer unused quotas under that system, and provision for permanent residence to over 27,000 Hungarian escapees who have been paroled into the United States under existing provisions of law.

Among other things the bill as passed would:

(a) Eliminate the mortgages which were placed on quotas under prior legislation;

(b) Revive over 18,000 visas that expired last December with the Refugee Relief Act, of which approximately 14,000 would be available to refugees from Communist territory or from the Middle East; authorize for a 2-year period the entry of an unlimited number of adopted children;

(c) Provide relief in certain hardship cases involving children, spouses, or parents of United States citizens or permanent United States residents;

(d) Give nonquota status to certain preference quota immigrants (including skilled specialists) for whom petitions have been approved by the Attorney General prior to July 1, 1957;

(e) Validate the entry of certain aliens who misrepresented the fact that they came from behind the Iron Curtain in order to avoid forcible repatriation; and

(f) Give the Government authority to waive the requirement of fingerprinting of nonimmigrant aliens on a reciprocal basis, to waive grounds of exclusion of certain aliens because they committed crimes involving moral turpitude or because they are suffering from tuberculosis, and to adjust the status of certain skilled specialists and their families.

Veterans

Veterans' Disability Allowances Increased

The only action thus far taken by the 85th Congress on major legislation directly affecting veterans—exclusive of housing benefits mentioned in another part of this report—is the passage of H. R. 52 and H. R. 53. H. R. 52 is an act which increases the basic rates of compensation for service-connected disability and allowances for dependents of disabled veterans. The increase is 10 percent where the disability ranges between 10 and 90 percent, and about 24 percent for total disability. In addition, the act provides that statutory awards for certain specific disabilities shall be increased 10 percent.

Veterans' Laws Codified

H. R. 53 consolidates into one act certain laws administered by the Veterans' Administration on compensation, pensions, administration, hospitalization, and burial benefits.

Government administration

Improvement of Government became an issue in the 1st session of the 85th Congress in the form of much needed legislation concerning the Supreme Court's Jencks case decision, Presidential disability, and enactment of the Hoover Commission's recommendations.

Jencks Case Legislation

The Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case resulted in a number of criminal court actions being terminated because the FBI and other agencies refused to permit defendants to go on indiscriminate fishing expeditions into Government files. By dropping these cases, the Government was seeking to protect its intelligence sources, methods of operation, and the identity of informers. In subversive and narcotic cases, informers are often very important to law enforcement agencies, and their protection is therefore a necessity.

Some trial judges, whether correctly or not, began interpreting broadly the Supreme Court's decision in the Jencks case with the result that some alleged criminals went free. Congress felt that remedial legislation was needed to provide methods for safeguarding both the rights of the public and the security of Government files.

With this in mind, bills were introduced in the Senate making Federal judges responsible for deciding what information is pertinent to the defense in the impeachment of witnesses. As a guaranty against trial judge error, appellate courts under this legislation receive Government files in the event of an appeal. The higher court then decides whether or not the lower court was correct in determining what information should be granted the defense and what should be withheld on grounds of national security.

The final bill, combining features of Senate and House versions, attempts to protect both the rights of individuals and the sanctity of Government files.

Presidential Disability

Presidential disability became a much discussed issue as a result of President Eisenhower's heart attack and subsequent ileitis operation.

The Constitution provides that the Vice President shall become President when the latter is removed from office, dies, resigns, or when he is unable to discharge his duties. In the last instance, neither the Constitution nor Federal statutes provide methods or standards for determining Presidential disability. Accordingly, a situation could arise in which a President was so ill or injured that he would not be able to inform anyone that he was incapable of performing his duties. In this set of circumstances, the United States might well find itself without a President during a moment of crisis. As a remedy, President Eisenhower last March suggested a constitutional amendment granting the Cabinet authority to determine when a President is unable to perform his duties. Several resolutions intended to cope with this problem were introduced in both Houses, but the Congress took no action.

Hoover Commission Proposals

President Eisenhower asked the Congress to enact legislation placing Government accounts on an annual accrued expenditure basis so as to eliminate carryovers of large funds and give Congress an annual look at long-range expenditures. In addition, he asked for discontinuance of the outmoded postal savings system, provisions for training Federal workers, an authorization to release the armed services from having to clear real estate transactions with the Senate and House Armed Services Committees, and finally, extension of the Reorganization Act of 1949.

Congress enacted only one of the President's efficiency-in-Government proposals, namely, an extension of the Reorganization Act of 1949.

Overcrowded Courts

The administration asked for, but did not get, an increase in the number of Federal judgeships sorely needed to cope with overcrowded dockets.

The administration also asked for, but did not get, legislation to provide voluntary retirement for judges at the age of 70, or to relieve them of certain administrative duties at that age.

Statehood and District of Columbia Home Rule

In their 1956 platforms, both the Republican and Democratic Parties went on record as advocating statehood for Alaska and Hawaii and home rule for the District of Columbia. President Eisenhower has called for enacting these three suffrage proposals into law. Despite the support of the President and the avowed remarks by each party's convention, the Democratic-controlled 85th Congress took no action giving residents of these three places the right to have a voice in the Federal Government when taxed by it.

Post Office Deficits

Several times this year President Eisenhower requested higher postal rates to offset mounting Post Office Department deficits. Expert testimony in the House and Senate proved that these deficits will increase next year unless postal rates are increased.

Legislation was passed in the House providing for rate increases so that an additional $500 million of revenue would be provided. Unfortunately, this measure, which would have put the Post Office on a more nearly pay-as-you-go basis, was not acted upon in the Senate.

Federal employee legislation

Employee Pay Bills Passed

Despite the President's position against any general pay raises for Federal employees this year on grounds of economy, Congress passed two separate measures providing pay increases for postal and classified Federal employees.

One measure provided a flat $546 increase, averaging 12½ percent, for approximately 524,000 postal employees at an estimated cost, including effect on fringe benefits, of $317,500,000 per year.

The other measure provided an 11 percent increase for about 1 million executive, departmental, judicial, and legislative employees at an estimated cost of $532 million per year, including effect on fringe benefits. Individual salary increases were limited to not over $1,000 with the present $ 6,000 maximum annual salary (the top figure for classified employees) being retained.

Administration opposed to pay increases now

The administration had stated on several occasions its opposition to general pay increases at this time. The President, in a letter June 14, 1957, to Representative TOM MURRAY, Democratic chairman of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, expressed the views of the administration in this way:

"Recent actions of the Congress and the executive branch have demonstrated the Government's continuing concern for proper and just compensation for its workers and have benefited those workers in a number of ways. These include low-cost group life insurance, more liberal retirement and survivorship provisions, uniform allowances, and unemployment compensation. Administration-sponsored legislation is now pending to establish a voluntary health and medical insurance program and to authorize the training of Government employees outside as well as within the employing agencies. As all of us know, the present difficulty in harnessing the Federal budget is attributable in part to increased personnel costs. Incidentally, it was only 2 years ago that general pay increases were approved.

"In view of the tax, budgetary, and economic implications, and in view of my several appeals this year to private citizens to observe restraint in everything that could add to the inflationary pressures on our economy, I cannot at this time, in keeping this the national interest, recommend enactment of legislation for pay increases for postal workers which, as you point out, would lead to a pay increase throughout the Federal Government."

Most Congressional observers anticipate a Presidential veto of these pay bills.

Administration's Legislative Requests Fail of Enactment

Five legislative requests which were made by the administration on behalf of Government employees and an improved Federal civil service received no consideration.

The President's 1958 budget message to Congress again requested legislation to establish a system of voluntary health and medical insurance for civilian employees. Also requested in the budget message was a provision that Government employees be trained outside as well as within the employing agency; that better safety measures be provided in Federal agencies; and that each Federal agency bear the cost of accident compensation benefits paid its employees.

Although bills were introduced for each of these administration requests, none of the 4 was enacted into law in the first session of the 85th Congress. Similarly, no action was taken by the Congress with respect to the President's request, in his state of the Union message, to establish a career service for overseas foreign service officers of the United States Information Agency. The President stated this legislation was necessary so that the USIA would be better able to cope with its new and greater responsibilities throughout the world.

Administration Improvements in Civil Service

As part of the administration's continuing program to better working conditions and to increase efficiency of Federal employees, the President, in his budget message for 1957, announced that plans were to be put into effect to renovate and improve Government buildings, and to provide additional office space for overcrowded Government workers. Also, Government agencies were directed by the President to renew their efforts to hold to a minimum any increase in Government personnel.

Prudent management of Government personnel has resulted during the past 4 years in a reduction of approximately 240,000 in the civilian work force. For the month of June 1957, civilian employment of the Federal Government was 2,416,044. Although this figure represented an increase in personnel between May and June 1957 in all three branches of the Government, the increase was less than half the increase reported between May and June 1956.

Campaign funds and lobbying

Congress enacted no legislation in this session on the subjects of lobbying and Federal election campaign funds and expenditures although the urgent need for more effective laws has been pointed out by many committees over several years. Two Senate committees made extended studies in this field over the last 2 years; and although a bill was reported from the Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections of the Senate Rules Committee, Congress as a whole has postponed action for another year.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to my good friend, the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to pay tribute to the employees who have made it possible for the Members of the Senate to do as good a job as they have done in the past session, but we ought not forget the Capitol telephone operators. Even though at times they find us when we think we are safely hidden away somewhere, that is compensated for by the fact that they also find the people we are looking for when we do not have much of an idea where to look for them. I think the ability of the telephone operators of the Capitol to get their man equals, if it does not excel, that of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I quite agree with the distinguished Senator from Vermont. I would, of course, like to add—and I know I can speak on behalf of all Members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle—that while my remarks today were directed primarily to those who operate the Senate in its entirety, or on the majority or minority side, I am sure we also would want to pay tribute to our individual staffs as Senators, because without the burdens they carry and the long hours they toil it would not be possible for any Senator to continue to perform his public duties and have the tremendous volume of work and mail and other details taken care of. It is a loyal service which we receive from each of our personal staffs.

REPORT BY THE ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL RELATIVE TO CHANGES IN THE CAPITOL BUILDING

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the body of the RECORD the report rendered by Mr. J. George Stewart, Architect of the Capitol, to the Commission relative to changes in the Capitol, which report has been made available.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., August 1957.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Chairman, Commission for Extension of the United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I respectfully submit herewith, report of the Architect of the Capitol on preliminary plans and estimates of cost for the extension of the United States Capitol, authorized by Public Laws 242 and 406, 84th Congress.

For the convenience of the Commission, I have broken my report down into five parts, as follows:

Part I gives the legislative and related background of the project, detailing, for purposes of record, the authorization of the project; the scope of the project, limitation of cost, and appropriations to date: actions taken at previous meeting of the Commission for Extension of the United States Capitol; directives issued by the Commission to date: actions taken by the Architect of the Capitol under directives, to date; and a financial statement of expenditures and obligations incurred to June 30, 1957.

Part II is subdivided into four sections. Section 1 gives an account of preliminary investigations, surveys and studies conducted, to date, with respect to assembling and developing of basic architectural and engineering data; topographic survey made of the Capitol Grounds; detailed measurements taken and measured drawings made of the central portion of the Capitol; detailed survey made of present space usage and present and future space requirements for functions which must operate within the Capitol in serving the Congress; structural survey and examination made of the Capitol dome; analysis made of the Aquia Creek sandstone facing the walls of the east and west central portion of the Capitol; and examination made of the foundations of the Capitol and subsoil conditions.

Section 2 of Part II presents to the Commission the changes and improvements recommended to be made in carrying out the extension of the Capitol project. This section of the report is presented in considerable detail in order that the Commission members may have before them a comprehensive picture of the changes and improvements recommended. In accordance with the Commission's instruction to the Archtect of the Capitol at meeting of March 26, 1956, the preliminary plans and estimates of cost have been developed in such a manner that each of the components parts of the proposed program is presented with its own description and own preliminary estimate of cost.

Section 3 of Part II presents a consolidated table of the estimated costs of the proposed changes and improvements.

Section 4 of Part II contains the recommendations and comments of the Architect of the Capitol, concurred in by the Associate Architects and Engineers and by the Advisory Group of Architects.

Part III of the report presents three schedules—one showing the proposed staging of the construction work; one showing the proposed schedule of obligations; and one showing the proposed schedule of expenditures.

Part IV of the report presents the views of the Associate Architects and Advisory Group of Architects with respect to the possibilities for further future expansion, after changes and improvements authroized by Public Laws 242 and 406, 84th Congress, have been accomplished. This part has been included in the record for possible future guidance.

Part V of the report is captioned "Conclusions" and presents those matters on which the Architect of the Capitol requires the direction of the Commission with respect to the proposals contained in this report.

Respectfully yours,

J. George Stewart,
Architect of the Capitol.

Part I

SECTION 1. AUTHORIZATION FOR EXTENSION OF THE CAPITOL PROJECT

Congress, by Act of August 5, 1955, Public Law 242, 84th Congress, as amended by Public Law 406, 84th Congress, authorized the extension of the Capitol project, as follows:

"The Architect of the Capitol is hereby authorized, under the direction of a Commission for Extension of the United States Capitol, to be composed of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the minority leader of the Senate, the minority leader of the House of Representatives, and the Architect of the Capitol, to provide for the extension, reconstruction, and replacement of the central portion of the United States Capitol in substantial accordance with scheme B of the architectural plan submitted by a joint commission of Congress and reported to Congress on March 3, 1905 (House Doc. No. 385, 58th Cong.), but with such modifications and additions, including provisions for restaurant facilities, and such other facilities in the Capitol Grounds, together with utilities, equipment, approaches, and other appurtenant or necessary items, as may be approved by said Commission, and for such purposes there is hereby appropriated $5 million, to remain available until expended, and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such additional sums as may be determined by said Commission to be required for the purposes hereof: Provided, That the Architect of the Capitol under the direction of said Commission and without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is authorized to enter into contracts and to make such other expenditures, including expenditures for personal and other services, as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act and to obligate the additional sums herein authorized prior to the actual appropriation therof."

SECTION 2. SCOPE OF PROJECT, LIMITATION OF COST, APPROPRIATIONS TO DATE

The legislation governing this project, as indicated, provides that all work in connection with the project shall be performed under the direction of a Commission to be composed of the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the minority leader of the Senate, the minority leader of the House of Representatives, and the Architect of the Capitol.

The authorizing legislation not only provides for extension of the Capitol under the direction of this Commission, but also provides for the construction of such other additions and facilities in the Capitol Grounds as may be approved by such Commission, such as an underground garage, security vaults, and underground transportation system; provides the Architect of the Capitol with the necessary contract authority to carry out any plans and construction approved by the Commission, in such total amount as the Commission may approve; permits selective competition in the performance of any part of the work deemed necessary by the Commission to be contracted in such manner, in the best interest of the Government.

The authorizing legislation provides an initial appropriation of $5 million for the project; authorizes the appropriation of such additional sums as may be determined by the Commission to be required for the project; and authorizes the obligation of such additional sums prior to the actual appropriation thereof.

In addition to the $5 million appropriated in the authorization act, an appropriation of $12 million was provided in the Legislative Branch Appropriation Act, 1957.

Under the legislation, it is therefore necessary for the Commission to determine the scope and limit of cost of the project.

SECTION 3. PREVIOUS MEETING OF COMMISSION FOR EXTENSION OF THE CAPITOL

On March 26, 1956, the Commission for Extension of the United States Capitol held its first meeting. At that meeting, the Architect of the Capitol was authorized to proceed with the development of preliminary plans and estimates of cost for the project and to report back to the Commission his findings and recommendations. The Commission agreed that the preliminary plans and estimates of cost should be developed in such a manner that the Commission would be in a position to approve the program, either in whole or in part, in view of the fact that the language of the Authorization Act was broad enough to embrace not only the extension of the east front, but also such other additions and facilities as underground security vaults, underground garage and underground transportation systems.

At that meeting, the Commission selected Arthur Brown, Jr., architect of San Francisco, John F. Harbeson, architect of Philadelphia, and Henry R. Shepley, architect of Boston, as a consulting and advisory group to assist the Architect of the Capitol in determining the proper architectural treatment of the east front of the Capitol and other necessary changes to be made on the exterior and interior of the building.

The Commission also selected Roscoe DeWitt and Fred L. Hardison of Dallas, Tex.; Alfred Easton Poor and Albert Homer Swanke of New York City; and Jesse M. Shelton and Alan G. Stanford of Robert & Co. Associates, Atlanta, Ga., as the Associate Architects and Engineers for the extension of the Capitol and other improvements and changes authorized by the act of August 5, 1955, as amended.

The Architect of the Capitol was authorized to enter into contracts for these services.

The Commission agreed to issue directives to the Architect of the Capitol, from time to time during the life of the project, providing him with the necessary authority to carry out actions agreed upon at meetings of the Commission, and authorized the Speaker of the House and the minority leader of the Senate to sign the directives on behalf of the Commission.

It was further agreed that in preparing the directive covering actions approved at the March 26, 1956, meeting, the Architect of the Capitol should include therein authorization not only for the employment of architects and engineers, but also for the incurring of the necessary obligations and expenditures for such items as surveys, test borings, test pits, blueprints, personal and other services, and administrative expenses and contingencies.

SECTION 4. DIRECTIVES OF THE COMMISSION

PART II

SECTION 1. PRELIMINARY INVESTIGATIONS, SURVEYS, AND STUDIES

Immediately after the adjournment of Congress in 1955, the Architect of the Capitol began assembling and developing the extensive basic data necessary for the preparation of preliminary plans for the extension of the Capitol.

All engineering and architectural data available were assembled from the files of the Architect of the Capitol, the National Archives, the Treasury Department, the War Department, and the Library of Congress.

Topographic survey of Capitol grounds

In the spring and summer of 1956, at the request of the Architect of the Capitol, a complete, coordinated, topographic survey was made of the Capitol grounds, as they exist today, by the Surveyor's Office of the District of Columbia. This information was necessary in developing studies for underground utilities, underground structures, and landscaping.

Measured drawings

Detailed measurements of the central portion of the Capitol were taken by the associate architects and engineers and measured drawings were prepared. This was necessary for the purpose of developing accurate information with respect to room sizes, wall thicknesses, elevations of floors, and other items, which information was not recorded on the drawings available in the office of the Architect of the Capitol.

Space survey

The associate architects also made a detailed survey of present space usage and present and future space requirements for functions which must operate within the Capitol in serving the Congress. This information was necessary as a criterion for the orderly development of preliminary plans in accordance with space and usage requirements.

The study made by the associate architects developed the need for 139,250 additional square feet of floor space to accommodate present needs, with some allowance for future growth. Of the 139,250 additional square feet of space required, 33,318 square feet represent additional space for restaurants. The present Senate and House restaurant facilities occupy 22,162 square feet of floor space.

The shortage of office and committee space was found to be acute, particularly in areas close to the House and Senate Chambers, as was also the shortage of space for House and Senate Document Room use.

Inspection of the dome

Before proceeding with plans for the extension of the east front, the Architect of the Capitol considered it essential to have a thorough investigation made of the physical condition and strength of the dome and its supporting structure. The last inspection of the Capitol dome had been made by Thomas W. Marshall, civil engineer, in 1933.

On June 11, 1956, a contract was entered into with Seelye, Stevenson, Value & Knecht for furnishing all engineering services necessary for a complete structural engineering study and survey of the dome of the Capitol and submitting to the Architect of the Capitol a report describing the exact conditions disclosed, including an opinion as to the safety of the structure and recommendations as to measures to improve its stability.

Before work was started under this contract, Allyn Cox, the artist who had previously completed the rotunda frieze, was requested to submit a report to the Architect of the Capitol with respect to the condition of the fresco in the canopy of the dome. Mr. Cox reported that the fresco appears to be in a good state of preservation, but that this can only be finally determined by an inspection made at close range from a scaffold.

Seelye, Stevenson, Value & Knecht, upon completion of their inspection of the Capitol dome, reported that it was basically safe, but recommended that certain repairs and improvements be made. Their report is on file in the architect's office.

Analysis of sandstone

During the summer of 1956, in order to determine the exact condition of the deteriorating sandstone in the exterior walls of the central portion of the Capitol, nine sample core borings were taken from selected spots in the walls and submitted to the National Bureau of Standards for petrographic and chemical analysis. The results of their studies revealed a wide range in the quality of the stone. Only 3 of the 9 samples could be regarded as good quality stone; the other 6 ranged from medium to poor.

Because of the general deterioration of the sandstone, the Bureau of Standards recommended either the removal of the exterior surface of the stone and a continuation of frequent painting or, preferably, since it would be less costly over a period of years, the refacing of the present walls with durable stone. Their report is on file in the Architect's office.

Examination of foundations and subsoil

There was very little information available on the foundations of the Capitol and the subsoil conditions on Capitol Hill. In view of this, in September of 1956, the Architect of the Capitol engaged the firm of Moran, Proctor, Mueser & Rutledge, consulting engineers, to conduct an investigation of subsoil conditions in the old area of the Capitol Grounds, and at the building and in the areas immediately adjacent thereto. The engineers were also asked to investigate the foundations of the building and the possibility of underpinning any part of the Capitol if it should be required in carrying out proposed extensions.

Moran, Proctor, Mueser & Rutledge reported that the bearing capacity of underlying strata was satisfactory, that the structural condition of the foundations was basically sound, and that it would be practical and safe to do any underpinning of the Capitol which might be required. Their report is on file in the Architect's office.

SECTION 2. PROPOSED CHANGES AND IMPROVEMENTS

1. Scheme B: Extension of east central front of Capitol, architectural plan, 1905, House Document 385, 58th Congress:

Extension of the east central portion of the Capitol, approximately 32 feet 6 inches, and construction of new extension in marble—in substantial accordance with scheme B of the 1905 architectural plan—authorized by Public Laws 242 and 406, 84th Congress: $10,100,000.

Congress, in enacting Public Law 242, 84th Congress, as amended by Public Law 406, 84th Congress, approved the adoption of scheme B of the architectural plan developed by Carrere and Hastings in 1904 and submitted to Congress by Joint Commission of Congress in 1905, House Document 385, 58th Congress. This scheme provides for extending the eastern central portion of the Capitol approximately 32 feet 6 inches to the east and construction of the new extension in marble to harmonize with the Senate and House wings. This scheme having been approved by Congress, it became the duty of the Architect of the Capitol, the advisory architects, and the associate architects and engineers to study the most effective way of accomplishing the proposed extension.

Scheme B, as recommended by the Architect of the Capitol, the advisory architects, and the associate architects and engineers, provides for the extension of the east central front of the Capitol approximately 32 feet 6 inches and preserves the architectural details of the building as they now exist. It is proposed to reproduce in marble, in substantially the same detail, all present architectural features of the central portion, such as cornices, pilasters, columns, bases, pedestals, and pediments. Marble will be selected of a color and texture to harmonize with the Senate and House wings. Extension of the east front of the Capitol will eliminate the necessity of removing the sandstone facing from the east walls of the Capitol and refacing the walls with marble. Granite will be used for base course and steps.

The adoption of scheme B will provide 44,930 square feet of additional primary and secondary space, not counting space used for circulation and mechanical equipment.

It provides for additional restaurant facilities seating 115 persons in the House, and a like number in the Senate, but provides no additional restaurant facilities for employees or visitors. Existing House restaurant facilities provide accommodations for 353 persons and existing Senate restaurant facilities provide accommodations for 269 persons.

If scheme B only is adopted, unbroken private circulation from end to end of the building cannot be provided for Members of Congress except on the gallery floor.

Under Scheme B, it is estimated that the following additional, or comparable, accommodations can be obtained: 54 office rooms, 8 rooms for House and Senate document room use, 2 dining rooms (1 House, 1 Senate), 9 storage rooms.

2. Refacing west front of Capitol: Architectural plan, 1905, House Document 385, 58th Congress:

Removal of sandstone facing from the west central portion of the Capitol between the House and Senate wings, and replacing the sandstone facing with marble—in substantial accordance with the 1905 architectural plan—authorized by Public Laws 242 and 406, 84th Congress, $4,065,000.

The architectural plan submitted to Congress in 1905 in House Document 385, 58th Congress, included, in addition to scheme B, the removal of the sandstone facing from the west central portion of the Capitol between the House and Senate wings and replacing of the sandstone facing with marble.

The deterioration of the sandstone on both the east and west fronts has progressed to a point where pieces of stone now drop off with the paint, as the paint scales off. The deterioration each year is becoming progressively worse.

Should the Commission decide to approve extension of the west central portion of the Capitol, as hereinafter proposed in this report, then the only portion of the west front which would have to be refaced with marble is the central section between the original north and south wings. Refacing of the original north and south wings with marble should be done only if such wings are not eventually to be extended. Because of the deteriorated condition of the sandstone on the west front, a decision with respect to its replacement is necessary.

If only the central section between the original north and south wings is refaced with marble at this time, the estimated cost of $4,065,000 would be reduced to $1,595,000.

ADDITIONS TO AND MODIFICATIONS OF 1905 ARCHITECTURAL PLAN—TO BE EFFECTED AT THE EAST SIDE OF THE CAPITOL—AUTHORIZED BY PUBLIC LAWS 242 AND 406, 84TH CONGRESS

3. Transportation terminals at the Capitol for the new Senate and House Office Buildings subway: $4,025,000.

Under funds provided for the additional Senate Office Building, a new subway and underground transportation system are about to be constructed between the Senate Office Buildings and the Capitol. This work is being performed under the direction of the Senate Office Building Commission.

Under funds provided for the additional House Office Building project, new subways and underground transportation systems are to be constructed in the next several years between the three House Office Buildings and the Capitol. This work will be performed under the direction of the House Office Building Commission.

New terminals for these subways will have to be constructed in or adjacent to the Capitol and this work must be done under extension of the Capitol project funds.

The estimated cost of the proposed terminals is $4,025,000—of which, $1,900,000 are for the Senate terminal and $2,125,000 are for the House terminal.

4. Four-level, underground garage, providing parking accommodations for approximately 1,900 automobiles—to be constructed under the east plaza; also, vehicular tunnels providing entrance and exit to the garage from the north, south, and west: $41,970,000.

The serious problem of insufficient parking space and inadequate service facilities can best be solved by taking advantage of space underground. The architects recommend that the present use of the Capitol plaza as a parking lot, which mars the beauty of the eastern approach, be discontinued and that the plaza be replaced with landscaping suitable to the grandeur of the building.

There is an urgent need for adequate and modern service facilities. For more than 75 years, the Capitol has depended on two small sidewalk lifts at the east front of the Capitol for the conveyance of supplies, materials, and equipment into the building. The continued use of these service facilities is unsatisfactory from the standpoint of adequacy and efficiency.

It is recommended that a four-level underground garage, providing parking accommodations for approximately 1,900 cars be constructed under the East Plaza. It is also recommended that vehicular tunnels be provided, affording entry and exit to the garage from the north, south, and west.

With respect to the vehicular tunnels, it is proposed that a two-lane, one-way traffic tunnel enter the garage from the southwest to the second level down on the south end and exit to the northwest on the north end; that a two-lane, two-way traffic tunnel enter from D Street NE., under Delaware Avenue, to the north end of the third level down; and that a two-lane, two-way traffic tunnel, originating at D Street SE., under New Jersey Avenue SE., enter the garage at the south end of the third level down.

All three tunnels would serve as entrances and exits for automobiles of Members of Congress and their employees. Visitors' automobiles and taxi traffic would be restricted to the west tunnel, and service traffic would be restricted to the north and south tunnels.

If it should be desired by the Commission to provide an entrance and exit to the garage from the east, a two-lane, two-way tunnel can be constructed under East Capitol Street, entering the east end of the garage on the first level down, at an additional cost of $6 million.

Construction of this garage will not only eliminate parking on the Plaza and in other areas of the old Capitol grounds, but will eliminate the sidewalk lifts and provide in lieu thereof adequate modern and efficient underground service facilities.

Should it be desired not to construct the easterly portion of the garage, reducing parking accommodations from 1,900 to 1,100 cars, the estimated cost of the garage would be reduced by $8,243,000—or from $41,970,000 to $33,727,000.

5. Pedestrian tunnels connecting the Capitol with the Supreme Court Building and the Library of Congress buildings, $960,000.

It is proposed that pedestrian tunnels be constructed from the underground garage to the Supreme Court Building and the Library of Congress buildings in order to provide underground access to those buildings from the Capitol.

6. Scheme C: Includes scheme B and additions to and modifications of the 1905 architectural plan—to be effected at both the east and west sides of the Capitol.

Total, 1905 architectural plan modified to include additional improvements at the east side of the Capitol, $61,120,000.

Deduct the cost of the following work included under Item 2. 1905 Architectural Plan, not required under scheme C: Under scheme C, due to proposed extensions on the west side, the sandstone facing will not have to be removed from any part of the west central portion of the Capitol and replaced with marble, except the west wall of the portion of the central building located between the original north and south wings.

For work omitted under scheme C: Deduct $2,470,000.

Total: $58,650,000.

Extension of the basement story of the west central portion of the Capitol across the courtyards to the west terrace structure; also partial extension of the west terrace structure and relocation of west steps and approaches.

Extension of the original north and south wings of the west central portion of the Capitol and extension of the House and Senate connections—by erection of additions to these portions of the central structure, from the first floor to the attic floor, inclusive; also enlargement of the west portico—the new structures to be constructed of marble: $16,625,000.

Total, 1905 architectural plan modified to include additional improvements at both the east and west sides of the Capitol: $75,275,000.

General description, scheme C

In view of the fact that the extension of the east central front under scheme B will provide only 44,930 square feet of additional space out of a total of 139,250 square feet of additional space required, the associate architects studied the advisability of making extensions on the west side of the Capitol to provide the additional needed space.

There have been no additions to the Capitol since construction of the terraces in 1884–1892. With the vast growth that has occurred in the Nation, the National Capital, and the work of the Congress since that time, adequate relief from existing deficiencies in office, committee, and other facilities cannot be provided simply through the extension of the east front.

It is proposed to extend the basement story of the west central portion of the Capitol, across the courtyards, to the west terrace structure. It is also proposed to partially extend the west terrace structure and to relocate the west steps and approaches. It is further proposed to extend the original north and south wings of the west central portion of the Capitol, and the House and Senate connections, by erection of additions to these portions of the central structure, from the first floor to the attic floor, inclusive; also, to enlarge the west portico.

The new extensions would be constructed of marble on a base of granite, in keeping with the Senate and House wings.

As the west central section between the original north and south wings would be retained in its present location, from the first floor level up, the present sandstone facing of this portion of the building would be replaced with marble.

The proposed additions to the original north and south wings will not extend westward beyond the undisturbed central portion between the wings.

Extension of the west front will provide the following or comparable additional space: 55 office rooms and 8 committee rooms with anterooms (or in lieu thereof, 79 office rooms), 2 document rooms, 7 storage rooms, increased accommodations for the Senate Library, increased accommodations for the Senate and House restaurants.

Scheme C provides not only additional office, committee, and other related space, but also provides private unbroken circulation on each floor, from end to end of the building, for Members of Congress; more efficient underground service to the building and the kitchens; and a satisfactory solution to the problem of mechanical transportation to the floors of the House and Senate Chambers.

Under scheme C, it is proposed to install in the west side of the Capitol, 2 elevators and an ascending and descending escalator in the extended Senate connection; 2 elevators and an ascending and descending escalator in the extended House connection; and 2 elevators and an ascending and descending escalator in the central portion west of the rotunda. In addition, 2 service elevators are to be provided—1 for the House and 1 for the Senate.

Restaurant facilities, scheme C

Under scheme C, it is proposed to relocate the House and Senate restaurant facilities to the west terrace; and to provide, in lieu of present accommodations, Senate restaurant dining facilities with seating accommodations for 330 persons; House restaurant dining facilities with 440 seating accommodations; and joint restaurant facilities for 535 employees and visitors—a grand total seating accommodation for 1,305 persons. This compares with present total seating accommodations for 622 persons.

The new restaurant facilities will be provided by relocating the west central steps from their present position to a position on the axis of the House and Senate connections and by extending to the line of the relocated steps the central marble section of the terrace, already provided with windows, and relocating the restaurant in this part of the terrace structure. Relocation of the restaurant in this section of the terrace will provide diners with an outlook over the Mall.

Recapitulation, scheme C

A summary of proposed additional accommodations to be provided on the east and west sides of the Capitol under scheme C follows:

Additional accommodations	East	West	Total
Office rooms	54	55	[1] 109
Committee rooms with anterooms		8	[1] 8
Document rooms (House and Senate)	10		10
Storage rooms	9	7	16
Dining rooms:
Senate facilities, seating accommodations for 330 persons.
House facilities, seating accommodations for 440 persons.
Joint facilities for employees and visitors, seating accommodations for 535 persons.
Increased accommodations for Senate Library.

[1] If the 8 committee rooms with anterooms are eliminated, a total of 133 office rooms can be provided.

The interior arrangements proposed are subject to further study and the subdivisions are indicated merely as a possible guide to the use of the space. The architects realize that assignment of space in the Capitol can only be accomplished by the Congress through its officers and committees. When a final scheme is decided upon, the architects would expect to work very closely with the Commission of Congress in charge of the project and the Architect of the Capitol, in order to arrive at the best subdivision of the interior space to fulfill the requirements of the Senate, the House, and the public.

ADDITIONS TO AND MODIFICATIONS OF 1905 ARCHITECTURAL PLAN—TO BE EFFECTED AT THE EAST SIDE OF THE CAPITOL—AUTHORIZED BY PUBLIC LAWS 242 AND 406, 84TH CONGRESS—FOR WHICH ESTIMATES OF COSTS ARE NOT PRESENTLY AVAILABLE

1. Communications center

Studies have been made providing for the construction of an underground vault, adjacent to the Capitol and under the east central steps extended, to serve as a communications center for Capitol Hill, with sufficient space for present and anticipated future needs. In planning the east front improvements, space has been reserved for such a vault, but plans and estimates of cost have not been sufficiently developed to submit to the Commission at this time.

This vault, if not required for use as a communications center, could be effectively used for storage purposes by the House and Senate.

2. Underpinning

The contemplated extensions of the Capitol have been so planned as to minimize the disturbance of existing foundations. The project will have to be studied further before requirements for underpinning can be ascertained. Underpinning will necessarily be affected to some extent by the staging and manner of performance of the construction work.

3. Landscape treatment of the Capitol Grounds

Since a decision with respect to a particular scheme for the landscape treatment of the grounds is not imperative at this time, it is proposed to submit to the Commission at a later date, plans for the landscape treatment of the grounds, after they have been agreed upon by the Architect of the Capitol, the landscape architects, and the advisory group of architects.

Two preliminary studies have been developed by the landscape architects for the landscape treatment of the Capitol Grounds to effect a redesign of the grounds made necessary by the proposed extension of the east front of the Capitol. It is estimated that either of these redesigns would cost approximately $5 million.

The preliminary studies propose the construction of a large paved plaza to the east of the building, extending from the north side of the Senate wing to the south side of the House wing, with a fountain or fountains as a feature of the plaza. It is proposed that this new plaza area be restricted to pedestrian traffic. It will be so designed, however, that on emergency or other occasions, the weight of vehicular traffic may be sustained and access by fire apparatus and other emergency equipment will be possible. The plans for the new plaza provide for the preservation of the historic trees in the Capitol Grounds.

4. Repairs to Capitol dome

As a result of the survey and examination of the Capitol dome made by the engineering firm of Seelye, Stevenson, Value & Knecht, under contract of June 11, 1956, repairs to improve the stability of the Capitol dome have been recommended.

Plans and specifications for such repairs are now being prepared by Seelye, Stevenson, Value & Knecht under contract of July 2, 1957.

It is proposed to erect interior scaffolding to inspect the Brumidi fresco painting in the eye of the dome; to remove the copper covering from above the painting and to examine the condition of the plaster and iron frame structure containing the painting; and to make any repairs found necessary.

In addition to other necessary interior and exterior repairs, it is proposed to scaffold the exterior of the dome and to remove the rib covering from the upper exterior portion of the dome; to examine the ironwork beneath the rib covering and to make repairs to such ironwork as may be found necessary.

This work may cost in the neighborhood of $300,000, due largely to the costliness of the exterior and interior scaffolding of the dome required for these repairs.

This work should be coordinated with other east front improvements proposed under the extension of the Capitol project.

5. Replacement of lighting fixtures and wiring in existing Capitol Building

Under funds allowed in the Second Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1955, a survey and study were made of the existing illumination of the Capitol Building, by Willard W. Thompson, lighting consultant, under contract of May 23, 1955, with a view to improving the illumination of the Capitol.

The findings made under this report should now be coordinated with the lighting and power requirements of the proposed extensions of the Capitol; also, with the plans for converting the Capitol from 25-cycle alternating and direct current to 60-cycle alternating current under the Capitol Power Plant changes and improvements projects.

It is proposed to have such further studies made under the extension of the Capitol program; and when coordinated preliminary plans and estimates of cost are completed, recommendations will be submitted to the Extension of the Capitol Commission for improving the illumination of the lighting of the Capitol through replacement of existing lighting fixtures and wiring with properly designed fixtures.

SECTION 3. CONSOLIDATED TABLE OF ESTIMATED COSTS OF PROPOSED CHANGES AND IMPROVEMENTS

Brought forward: Total, 1905 architectural plan modified to include additional improvements at the east side of the Capitol: $61,120,000.

Deduct the cost of the following work included under item 2—1905 architectural plan—not required under scheme C:

Under scheme C, due to proposed extensions on the west side, the sandstone facing will not have to be removed from any part of the west central portion of the Capitol and replaced with marble, except the west wall of the portion of the central building located between the original north and south wings.

For work omitted under scheme C, deduct: $2,470,000.

Total: $58,650,000.

Extension of the basement story of the west central portion of the Capitol across the courtyards to the west terrace structure; also partial extension of the west terrace structure and relocation of west steps and approaches.

Total, 1905 architectural plan modified to include additional improvements at both the east and west sides of the Capitol: $75,275,000.[3] [4]

SECTION 4. RECOMMENDATIONS AND COMMENTS

The Architect of the Capitol, in submitting to the Commission the foregoing proposals of the associate architects for the accomplishment of the extension of the Capitol project, recommends the adoption of scheme C, embracing all improvements proposed for both the east and west sides of the Capitol, at an estimated cost of $75,275,000 on the basis of preliminary plans completed to date.

The Architect of the Capitol also recommends approval, as an integral part of the project, of the items of underground vault for communications center, underpinning of the Capitol, landscape treatment of the Capitol Grounds, repairs to the Capitol dome, and replacement of lighting fixtures and wiring in the existing Capitol Building, including additional fees, administrative and contingent expenses, for which preliminary plans and estimates of cost have not yet been completed—expected to bring the total estimated cost of the project to $110 million.

This recommendation is concurred in by the associate architects and by the advisory group of architects. Mr. Arthur Brown, Jr., a member of the advisory group, died July 7, 1957, but concurred in these recommendations before his death.

Thomas U. Walter, the fourth Architect of the Capitol, who designed and supervised the construction of the Senate and House Wings and the present cast iron dome, strongly urged the extension of the central portion of the Capitol eastward in 1863. Since that time, such extension has been recommended by every Architect of the Capitol who has succeeded Mr. Walter; also, by consulting architects retained to study and report upon the problem.

The present Architect of the Capitol feels that he may aptly express his opinion with respect to the proposed extension in these words, uttered by Speaker Joe Cannon in ad-

---

[1] If the easterly portion of the four-level underground garage is not constructed, reducing parking accommodations from 1,900 to 1,100 automobiles, deduct $8,243,000 from the $41,970,000 estimated cost of the garage and vehicular tunnels.

[2] If additional vehicular tunnel is constructed, providing entrance and exit to garage from the east, add $6,000,000 to the $41,970,000 estimated cost of the garage and vehicular tunnels.

[3] In addition to the total of $75,275,000 proposed to be obligated, an amount of $2,161,426 has already been obligated for architectural, engineering, and consulting services, administrative expenses, test borings and test pits.

[4] The total of $75,275,000 proposed to be obligated, does not include the following items for which preliminary plans and estimates of cost have not yet been fully developed, which are expected to bring the total estimated cost of the project to $110,000,000: Underground vault for communications center (alternate use: House and Senate storage); underpinning of Capitol; landscape treatment of Capitol grounds; repairs to Capitol dome; replacement of lighting fixtures and wiring in existing Capitol building; additional architectural, engineering and consultant fees, dependent upon the scope of the project approved; miscellaneous administrative expenses and contingencies until completion of project.

NOTE.—No plans and estimates of cost are presently available with respect to a large storage vault proposed to be constructed under the east plaza, in addition to the above improvements, and accordingly no amount has been included for this item in the grand total estimated project cost of $110,000,000. The most estimates used in this report are preliminary estimates, based on preliminary drawings and on such information as now available concerning existing building and site conditions and on prices as of April 1957, and are subject to further adjustment upon completion of contract drawings and specifications developed in accordance with approved scope of project and approved sequence and staging of construction work.

dessing the House of Representatives on February 10, 1903:

"The intelligent and patriotic and industrious service by every Congress for two years, well equipped from every standpoint and with every aid, would more than save the cost of the Capitol extension. * * * So it is really economy instead of extravagance."

When the Architect of the Capitol engaged the services of the advisory group of architects and of the associate architects and engineers, he emphasized that the individual thinking of each architect and engineer was needed in studying the most effective manner in which to accomplish the proposed extension of the Capitol as directed by the Congress, and that there would be no restrictions imposed on their approach in attaining such accomplishment.

The recommendations of the associate architects and engineers and of the advisory group of architects, as submitted in this report, represent the coordination, development and refinement of the thinking of the various architects and engineers, attained through collaboration, study and conference over a long period. Their recommendations represent the work of men dedicated to the preservation of the architectural dignity and majesty of the United States Capitol, while carrying out their commission to accomplish authorized changes and improvements in a manner to serve effectively the needs of the Congress, now and in the future.

The architects and engineers formulated their plans with a view to providing improvements that would directly benefit the membership of the House and the Senate with respect to their space needs, and particularly with a view to supplying space shortage needs in areas close to the House and Senate Chambers.

Perhaps the sentiment of the architects and engineers may be expressed in the words of Dr. Charles Moore, in his introduction to Glenn Brown's History of the United States Capitol:

"Historically the Capitol at Washington is the most important structure in the United States. Other buildings, such as the Old South Church in Boston and Independence Hall in Philadelphia, are connected with important episodes in the history of this country. The Capitol is unique in that it both typifies the beginning and also marks the growth of the Nation. Like the great Gothic cathedrals of Europe, its surpassing merit is not its completeness, but its aspirations. Like them, too, the Capitol is not a creation, but a growth, and its highest value lies in the fact that it never was, and it never will be, finished."

The architects and engineers have all given their time and interests, wholeheartedly, to this project; have worked as a team; and have striven through their combined efforts to attain the best possible results in the interest of the Congress and the Nation.

The Architect of the Capitol highly commends to the Commission the work of the Associate Architects and Engineers, the Advisory Group of Architects, the Landscape Architects, and of all others engaged in connection with this project; and, in expressing appreciation of their work, commends them as an outstanding group of professional men.

In recommending these improvements, the Architect of the Capitol is confident that when the proposed extensions of the Capitol are completed, the dome of the Capitol, which has for so many years served as a symbol of freedom throughout the world, will be, as it always has been, the dominant and inspiring feature of this great building.

PART IV

SECTION 1. POSSIBILITIES FOR FURTHER FUTURE EXPANSION, AFTER CHANGES AND IMPROVEMENTS AUTHORIZED BY PUBLIC LAWS 242 AND 406, 84TH CONGRESS, HAVE BEEN ACCOMPLISHED

Recognizing that in the years to come further extensions of the Capitol may be necessary to meet future needs of the Congress, the associate architects and engineers and the advisory group, at the request of the Architect of the Capitol, have planned the changes and improvements authorized by Public Law 242 and Public Law 406, 84th Congress, in such a manner as to permit such future extensions.

Just as the first Architect of the Capitol in 1793 could not foresee the growth of the Capitol that would be necessary in the next 60 years; and Thomas U. Walter, during the Civil War, could not foresee that in the next 100 years, despite the removal of the Supreme Court, the Library of Congress and the congressional offices from the Capitol, more space would be desperately needed; even so in 1957 the associate architects cannot foresee all the needs of the next 100 years. The present extensions have been planned so that future architects are not prevented from extending the Capitol in a logical manner to meet the needs of future generations and in a manner to preserve its architectural dignity.

The associate architects suggest the following as possible solutions to future needs for expansion:

1. Extension of the present Senate and House wings to the east a distance approximately equal to eastward extension of the east front.[1]

2. Wings extended north from the north portico of the Senate wing, and south from the south portico of the House wing.[1]

3. An extension north and south of the present terrace on the east side.

4. An extension northwest and southwest of the present terrace on the west side.

5. The addition of a lower level in the present terrace by changing the grade to permit windows.

The advisory group of architects strongly recommends that, when further extensions of the Capitol become necessary in the future, such extensions be accomplished by extending the Senate and House wings eastward, approximately the same distance as the east central front is extended—as such extension, in their judgment, will result in a contribution to the beauty and dignity of the Capitol.

PART V

CONCLUSIONS

The Architect of the Capitol has now proceeded with work under the extension of the Capitol project as far as he may feasibly do so without further direction from the Commission for the Extension of the Capitol.

The Architect of the Capitol therefore respectfully requests the decision of the Commission with respect to the following:

1. Approval of program, criteria, and scope of project.

2. Approval of preliminary plans and estimates of cost.

3. Authorization for the Architect of the Capitol to direct the associate architects and Engineers to proceed with the preparation of contract drawings and specifications in substantial accordance with the preliminary plans.

4. Authorization for the Architect of the Capitol to enter into such contracts as may be necessary for the accomplishment of the construction work—such contracts to be on a cost-plus-a-fixed-fee basis, selective bidding basis, or open competitive bidding basis—dependent upon which type of contract will best serve the interests of the Government in the performance of the particular work involved.

5. The extent to which the Commission wishes the Architect of the Capitol to confer with members of the Commission in the letting of construction contracts.

6. Approval of the staging of the work, in general, as proposed.

7. Approval of proposed obligations and expenditures.

8. Approval of use of $110 million as the present estimated total cost of the project—for purposes of the 1959 budget, which requires a total projected cost to be shown.

9. Authorization to request an additional appropriation of $5 million for the fiscal year in the 1959 budget.

10. Approval of marble to be used in the east and west extensions.

11. Disposition of the old Aquia Creek sandstone to be removed from the east and west central fronts.

12. Authorization to proceed with the work of repairs to the dome—both interior and exterior.

13. Authorization to continue with the development of preliminary plans and estimates of cost for the proposed communications center, landscape treatment of the Capitol Grounds, and replacement of lighting fixtures and other items required for the improved illumination of the Capitol.

14. Authorization to prepare a directive, or directives, for the signatures of Speaker RAYBURN and Senate Minority Leader KNOWLAND, on behalf of the Commission, as agreed to at meeting of the Commission on March 26, 1956, to carry out decisions reached with respect to present report.

15. Issuance of press releases—also, release of present report to the press.

As indicated to the Commission in this report, the estimates of cost are preliminary estimates of cost based on preliminary drawings completed to date and on such other information as now available concerning existing building and site conditions, and on prices as of April 1957, and are subject to further adjustment upon completion of contract drawings and specifications developed in accordance with the approved scope of the project and the approved sequence and staging of construction work.

In this connection, it may be stated that the improvements have been so programed as to permit the holding of the 1961 inaugural ceremonies at the west front of the Capitol, should such ceremonies be desired to be held at the Capitol for the next inauguration.

Staging of the construction work constitutes a major problem, in view of the fact that the proposed construction work must be performed while the building continues to be occupied, that functions now operating in the building must continue to operate in the Capitol, that adequate means of access to the building must be maintained at all times, that provision must be made for delivery of supplies, materials, and equipment to the building, that traffic to and from the Capitol must be regulated, and that emergency vehicles must have ready access to the building at all times.

Performance of the proposed construction work at the Capitol does not present the simple solution that exists in cases where activities and functions may be transferred, temporarily, in whole or part, to other quarters—such as in the case of the remodeling of the White House.

The staging of the work has been so planned that contracts for the construction work would be let progressively during the next 5 years as contract drawings and specifications for the various parts of the project are completed; performance of the construction work would extend over a period of the next 6 or 7 years, and expenditures for construction work would be prorated accordingly over a similar period. Appropriations would be requested, based on expenditures proposed during such 7-year period. The work, as programed, will require an additional appropriation of $5 million to be requested in the 1959 budget.

JAMES W. MURPHY AND THE CORPS OF OFFICIAL REPORTERS OF DEBATES OF THE SENATE

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, during the course of my official duties as chairman of the Legislative Subcommittee on Appropriations, I had occasion to examine into and learn more, in particular,

---

[1] These extensions individually or in combination would make possible an enlargement of the present Senate and House Chambers and adjacent supporting space.

about the marvelous work of the Official Reporters of debates of the Senate. I was so greatly impressed with their very fine record of service, the volume of their work, their devoted attention to their professional duties, and their professional pride that I determined to make special note of their work and make some comments on it in the Senate.

Without going into detail, these gentlemen, headed by our esteemed Chief Reporter, Hon. James W. Murphy, render us a service which is partly unnoticed. However, it is extremely important and far reaching. Their service is of the very highest quality.

It was a special pleasure to our subcommittee to hear, from the lips of Mr. Murphy, the very fine outline which he presented relating to the work of the Official Reporters' Office. He submitted a modest request for some small increases in the salaries of the Official Reporters of debates, not including himself.

I have never seen a finer example of professional pride, professional honor, and a consuming desire to serve in his profession those by whom he is employed than was manifested in the heart-to-heart talk with Mr. Murphy.

I also know that he was reflecting the sentiments, the ideals, the responsibilities, and the oldtime sense of personal pride in their work of the other reporters on the staff.

They not only do a marvelous quality of work, but the volume of it in the course of the year is astonishing. The number of hours of service required of them is almost double the time required by the service performed by comparable officers in the House of Representatives—and they are a very fine group, indeed. Not only does their service require them to be on duty for many hours, but at times the continuity of that service is not broken for days on end. They work day and night, day after day. I wish to commend them highly.

I believe I speak the sentiments of all Senators, especially those who have come in close contact with the corps of reporters, and who have some conception of the total of the services which they render. I emphasize again their very high personal quality, their professional skill, and their effort.

TRIBUTE TO SENATOR KNOWLAND, MINORITY LEADER

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, some years ago a father sent a letter to the president of a girls' college in the East, making application for the enrollment of his charming daughter. In due course he forwarded the application blank. There was a line in the application blank which raised this question: "Is your daughter a good leader?"

When the father filled out the blank, he wrote: "I do not know whether my daughter is a good leader, but I know she is a good follower."

It was not very long before the father received a letter from the president of the college in which he said: "We are delighted to have your daughter as a student in this college. In going over all the applications for enrollment in the new class, we find that we are to have 299 leaders and 1 follower." [Laughter.]

I think of that anecdote often in terms of the responsibilities of the majority leader, and particularly the minority leader, who is, in truth and fact, the administration's spokesman on this floor, and the diversity of interests with which those leaders must be familiar.

It is indeed a difficult thing for the minority leader always to summon and command the maximum vote for a given administration policy. I am satisfied that in his experience there are moments of frustration. We have our individual viewpoints, our problems at home, our convictions on policies, our differences of opinion. Such moments afford a real test of leadership.

By that standard, the Senator from California has been, in every sense, one of the great leaders who have graced this body. His integrity and character have impressed themselves upon the membership of the Senate, upon the staff, and upon all those who are a part of the senatorial family. He has had a constant appreciation of the views and problems of those for whom he speaks as leader of the minority. His boundless energy has always caused me to be somewhat envious. I thought I was endowed with a reasonable amount of physical energy. However, I have never encountered his superior in the stamina and the vigor which he brings to his job. He is skilled and resourceful in the best sense of the word. He is competent and able and has the broad perspective of a true leader. The discharge of his responsibilities requires him to endure long hours of service and to make many sacrifices.

I think I speak the sentiments of all Senators on this side of the aisle, as well as all those on the other side of the aisle, when I say that we salute and pay tribute to a great and indomitable minority leader for the magnificent, able, and sturdy job he has done in carrying the flag for this administration, and for his matchless courage in asserting those deep convictions which are prompted by but one interest, and that is the present and future well-being of this Republic.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I wish to join the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in his words of commendation of the minority leader.

I am a few years older than is the Senator from California, but I stand in awe of his wisdom and ability. He has devoted many hours to the tasks involved in serving the Republican Party in this capacity. He has devoted himself to his duty winter and summer, spring and fall. He was able to be present at the wedding of his charming daughter, but he denied himself the pleasure of attending the many receptions and parties given in her honor, in order to be present on the floor of the Senate to look after the affairs of our beloved Nation.

I commend him for the fine service he has rendered as minority leader of the Republican Party.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as the newest Member on the Republican side, I had a rare opportunity to observe our minority leader in action in connection with the consideration of the civil-rights bill, a historic development in this Chamber.

In addition to paying tribute to the minority leader, I should like to state a few facts. I have participated in many negotiating conferences; but never, in all my experience, professionally, as a State official, as a Member of Congress, and as a trial lawyer, have I seen conferences so full of drama and real tension as the Republican conferences which dealt with the particular problem of the civil-rights bill.

A man less honorable or less fully accepted as possessing complete integrity would have found every one of those conferences breaking up in complete discord and confusion. However, because of the great respect which the minority leader commands from Members on this side of the aisle, as well as those on the other side of the aisle, whether they agree with him or not, it was possible to keep the conferences together, and, what is even more remarkable, to arrive at a result. I think this is a signal achievement of the first order.

Second, the handling of the civil-rights measure on the floor of the Senate required the kind of fortitude which the minority leader showed, and the kind of stick-to-it-iveness which he exhibited in getting the bill on the calendar and finally having action upon it completed.

Often the situation seemed hopeless and frustrating. Often the minority leader took what would have been to a lesser man crushing defeats. I think our reverse in connection with part III was a very serious defeat. The fact that the bill as it passed the Senate did not contain that part, although the House version included it, would have made a lesser man quit; but not the minority leader.

The profound integrity of the minority leader and the great degree of fortitude exhibited by him command my deep respect and sincere affection.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, on Rochambeau's monument opposite the White House, there is engraved a quotation:

> We have been contemporaries and fellow laborers in the cause of liberty and we have lived together as brothers should do, in harmonious friendship.

There is a quotation taken from a letter written by George Washington to Rochambeau.

I was a veteran in the Senate when BILL KNOWLAND came along. Now he is a veteran, and I am a youngster. Of course he has had all the worries and fears and doubts. I remember when he came to the Senate. I can still see him: he was a little slenderer than he is now, and full of vim and energy, and radiating the sunshine of the west coast. He brought with him his delightful wife.

Through the years, sitting here as I have been, watching the interchange—the play, if you please—between these two men, the majority leader and the minority leader, I have been kept young by observing them in their efforts to forward the business of the Senate, and by noting how they get along in spite of conflict of interest at times. Yes, I agree that BILL KNOWLAND is a great "guy," a man who has control of himself. That is probably the test of whether a man grows through the years. I have seen the blood flush to his temples and I have heard his tongue say nothing; until he cooled off, and then it was a calm voice that spoke.

I have seen him make the Republican Senators one group in furthering effective programs; I have heard him in caucus meetings, always clear. I know that the President has had the benefit of his wise judgment.

What more can be said, except that he is a good fellow? We know that up ahead there is great adventure for him, because he has the mentality that balances facts. He is not a lawyer, and yet in many respects he is a better lawyer than some of us who practice law, because he can see the issue and apply the legal principles involved.

Now, just a word about the majority leader. He has intrigued me. As I say, I have sat back and watched these two contemporaries, fellow laborers in the cause of liberty. I am glad to know that the majority leader has recovered his health. As I say, I have been intrigued by the way he can whip his group into line, and he does a grand job. I am happy that I can call both of these distinguished commoners of America my friends.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, apropos the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin, I must admit that after one all-night session and another one running until 1 o'clock in the morning, I feel more like a contemporary of Rochambeau than of BILL KNOWLAND. [Laughter.]

Nevertheless, I still have enough energy left to say that this has been one of the most satisfactory sessions of the Senate in which I have been privileged to sit—and I believe this in my ninth Congress in which I have served. Although the length of the session has disturbed some of us, I believe its accomplishments have justified the extra weeks.

I, too, should like to say that the satisfactory results of the session have been due largely to the splendid and determined efforts of the minority leader, Senator KNOWLAND.

I have seldom seen such astute handling of legislation as has been displayed by the majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], particularly in the last major bit of legislation, the civil-rights bill. I do not know of any session of which I have been a Member when there have been fewer unkind words spoken by Members of the Senate. I hope the example we have set this year will continue not only through next year, but into the future.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my colleagues this morning with respect to the leadership of the Senate. I believe it would be improper to mention one without mentioning the other, because the leadership has been outstanding on both sides of the aisle.

I particularly wish to pay my tribute to Senator KNOWLAND, who has guided the Republican side of the Senate through a very difficult session of Congress. I am sure that all the things which a leader does are not appreciated. I am sure that they are not rewarded.

I want to say to you, Bill, that in the hearts of all your colleagues on this side of the aisle we know you have done a wonderful job, and that at least this once we want to thank you for your devotion to it.

Mr. BIBLE. Mr. President, before I suggest the absence of a quorum, I wish to associate myself with all the wonderful things that have been said about the leadership on both sides of the aisle. I had the distinct privilege during the fall of having my State of Nevada honored by the presence of both the majority and minority leaders. In Nevada we think a great deal of both of them. The Vice President of the United States and the minority leader, both from my sister State of California, showed the rare good judgment in picking for their helpmates, their wives, two Nevada girls. That is a real tribute to their respective sagacity.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to say that they both happened to have been born in the same town in Nevada.

Mr. BIBLE. That is correct. They were both born in Ely, Nev.

Mr. WILEY. And both wanted to emigrate. [Laughter.]

Mr. BIBLE. I am sure both want to come back to Nevada. After these tributes to the able leadership on both sides of the aisle—and I know it has been strong and excellent leadership—I now suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROPOSED INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD a statement I have prepared regarding proposed postal-increase legislation recommended by the President and the Postmaster General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR COOPER

The Senate is faced with a grave responsibility and has an obligation to consider immediately the postal rate-increase legislation recommended by President Eisenhower and Postmaster General Summerfield.

I am informed that about 12 congressional committees are engaged in investigating the Post Office Department. While I am sure that their objective is to be helpful and to make suggestions for the improvement of the postal service, I submit that the greatest need of the postal service of our Nation is a modernized postal-rate structure.

Recently I have received much correspondence criticizing the so-called subsidy which is received by individuals using third-class mail. Doubtless some of this mail is desirable to maintain our economy because it encourages business. However, much of this third-class mail has been characterized as mail not used for or desired by the recipient. For the reason that third-class mailers enjoy a subsidy of about $250 million annually, I believe a reasonable postal-rate increase as proposed by the Postmaster General is not only desirable but necessary. Correspondence I have received indicates that the taxpayers do not wish to support this subsidy for the users of third-class mail, many of whom are enjoying today the greatest prosperity and the highest profits they have ever received.

A cent increase for individual mailings of third-class mail or an increase of 1 cent over a year period for bulk mailings of third-class mail is fair and reasonable. This modest increase will produce about $112 million in additional postal revenues.

THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION AND THE FLOOD CRISIS IN KENTUCKY

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement of the work of the Small Business Administration during the flood crisis in Kentucky.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Flood waters during the period January 29-31, 1957, ravaged eastern Kentucky. There was some loss of life, and property losses ran into the millions. Government as well as private forces promptly moved to mobilize for reconstruction purposes.

The Small Business Administration moved immediately to make available, directly and in cooperation with banks, disaster loans for rehabilitation of losses sustained, whether real or personal, to business and the individual home owner. Mr. James G. Garwick, Regional Director of the Cleveland, Ohio office, James C. Daniels, Manager of the Louisville branch office, and Mr. Anton Dick, Coordinator of Disaster Loan Activities, Washington, D. C., office made a number of personal visits into the stricken areas, to ascertain the extent of needed financial assistance. Mr. John A. Pucel, Disaster Loan Specialist of the Cleveland regional office collaborating with Mr. Anton Dick, arranged all details for opening of field offices in strategic and convenient locations. Field offices were opened in Pikeville, Hazard, and Barbourville, Ky., on or about February 11, 1957. A suboffice was also opened in Prestonburg, Ky.

Mr. Garwick, Mr. Dick, and Mr. Pucel conferred with the leading bankers in Louisville and Lexington, Ky. and solicited their aid in furnishing qualified bank credit personnel, on a rotation basis, to assist in the rehabilitation program. Meetings were also held in the field with the bankers in the affected areas for the purpose of explaining in detail the disaster loan participation program from the Washington level as well as the regional office level, and with few exceptions the banks cooperated wholeheartedly. Qualified credit men were made available from the banks in Louisville and Lexington to serve in the field offices and the banks in the affected areas not only participated but also made and disbursed rehabilitation loans in most instances at a 3 percent interest rate, under the rules and regulations of Small Business Administration.

Mr. Ralph Fontaine, Secretary of the Kentucky Bankers Association, Louisville, Ky., worked closely with Mr. Dick and Mr. Pucel and he not only arranged all of the meetings with the bankers, but also participated in all such meetings, both in the Louisville area and strategic locations in the disaster areas. American Red Cross officials attended some of these meetings. His untiring efforts substantially contributed to the success of the program in that through mutual cooperation and understanding it was possible for Small Business Administration to close the offices at Hazard and Barbourville within 60 days and the Pikeville office within 90 days, with any unfinished business to be processed through the Louisville and Cleveland offices. Mr. Dick and Mr. Pucel orientated the bank credit personnel in the processing of direct and participation loans, under the rules and regulations of Small Business Administration.

In summary, the rehabilitation of the disaster areas was effected expeditiously and with tremendous success, which could not have been possible without the full and wholehearted cooperation of the banking industry through the good offices of Mr. Fontaine of the Kentucky Bankers Association, evidenced by the fact that the banks in the disaster areas made about 464 loans or commitments for the aggregate of approximately $4 million and Small Business Administration accepted around 380 applications for direct loans involving approximately $2,500,000, making an overall total of around 844 cases involving approximately $6,500,000.

The outstanding success of the rehabilitation program conclusively presents a classic example of what can be accomplished when Government and private industry fully cooperate and join forces on the basis of mutual understanding and trust.

I particularly pay tribute to the Small Business Administration.

THE TOBACCO PRODUCTION AND PRICE PROGRAM

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I had intended to speak on the subject of tobacco production and the support and price program for tobacco, but because the session is drawing to a close I shall not do so. However, I ask unanimous consent that my prepared address on tobacco production be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TOBACCO PROGRAM: WHY IT IS NEEDED—HOW IT IS WORKING

The welfare of my State, which is an agricultural State, rests very largely on the productivity and economic well-being of her farmers. Most of these farmers raise tobacco—for Kentucky is one of the great tobacco States, and supplies high-quality burley, as well as dark-fired and dark air-cured tobaccos, to the entire world. The price of tobacco is a matter of vital concern to some 200,000 rural Kentucky families, because it directly affects their income, their standard of living, and their future opportunities.

That price is determined, not alone by the well-established demand for quality cigarette tobaccos, but also by the effective operation of the production control, or marketing quota, program for tobacco—through which growers cooperate with their Department of Agriculture to maintain a balanced supply in line with that demand. The necessity of keeping supply and demand in balance, in order to avoid ruinous price fluctuations, is generally recognized—as is the function of Government in providing for farmers the legislative and administrative means to do this job.
