Consumers received a break through the passage of a poultry inspection bill which will put fresher and better products on the market. We have had compulsory meat inspection, for the protection of the public health, for many years. Now we also have protection through inspection of poultry.

There was sufficient opposition among House Members to keep this bill from being considered in the first session of Congress.

TITO OF YUGOSLAVIA

I was one of the Members of Congress who signed the petition to keep Tito from visiting the United States this spring. As a result of this petition the State Department rescinded the invitation.

VETERANS AND SERVICEMEN

Laws were enacted increasing rates of compensation for disabled veterans, increasing and extending veterans' home loan program, consolidation and simplification of laws on veterans' benefits and liberalization of requirements for veterans' widows' benefits. I supported these measures.

MEMBER OF MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES COMMITTEE

I cannot end this report without reference to the committee upon which I serve—the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. It was at my request that I was assigned to this committee. I felt that because of the physical makeup of my district with its waterfront problems, this is where I could do the most good. It has been a happy experience to see the way the committee has worked so diligently as a group, and I am proud and privileged to be a member. I am sure it has given me a keener insight into the problems of our waterfront and has made me more capable of coping with them.

Questionnaire Submitted to the People of the 12th Congressional District of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. DORN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. DORN of New York. Mr. Speaker, each year it has been my custom to submit to the people of the 12th Congressional District of New York, whom I have the honor to serve, a questionnaire setting forth various questions which will be considered by the Congress of the United States in its deliberations.

I appreciate the fine response to the questionnaire and am gratified to say that the people of the 12th Congressional District of New York are intensely interested in their Government and are willing to take time to participate in it by expressing their opinions and advice to their Representative in the Congress.

The following is the questionnaire and the results in percentages:

	Percent
	Yes	No	No opinion
1. To promote the cause of world peace, President Eisenhower has said he believes it may be necessary for him to meet from time to time with foreign heads of state with whom he may not always agree. Do you favor such meetings between the President and foreign leaders?	84	14	2
2. Do you approve of President Eisenhower's general foreign policy?	52	43	5
Do you favor—
(a) Continuing foreign military aid?	51	44	5
(b) Continuing foreign economic aid?	51	45	4
3. Do you approve of Congress authorizing the admission of a greater number of immigrants from all countries?	42	52	6
4. Do you approve the sale of farm surpluses to Communist nations?	32	63	5
5. Do you favor reduction of the Federal debt before reducing taxes?	64	34	2
6. Do you approve Federal legislation to ease the supply of housing credit, including greater Federal support of the mortgage market?	58	39	3
7. Do you approve the Federal Government's encouragement of more liberal credit and lower interest rates for small business?	83	15	2
8. Do you approve controls by the Federal Government of rents, wages, and prices in peacetime?	47	51	2
9. The administration has proposed extending the present $1 an hour Federal minimum wage to groups not presently covered, mainly retail and service employees. Do you favor this proposal?	84	15	1
10. Do you favor requiring registration of pension and welfare funds of labor unions and disclosure of financial transactions involving them?	91	06	3
11. To put the Post Office Department on a pay-as-you-go basis, do you favor increasing postage rates, including a boost in the 1st-class mail from 3 to 4 cents, as proposed by the administration?	69	29	2
12. Do you approve direct Federal grants to States for education?	60	38	2
13. Do you favor Federal plans for reinsuring privately run voluntary hospitalization and surgical insurance?	52	46	2
14. Do you favor further reduction in the age at which persons shall be eligible for social security?	62	36	2
15. Do you favor the enactment of a strong civil rights program to enforce the voting rights of all citizens?	80	18	2

The response to the questionnaire by thousands of residents of our district has been of great assistance to me in carrying out their wishes. Many persons who answered the questions also submitted comments on other issues and suggestions for solutions to some of the problems of the day.

They are the people who elected me to represent them in the Congress of the United States. If there is any way in which I can be of service to them I hope they will not hesitate to call upon me. During recess both my Washington and Brooklyn offices remain open. I have a competent staff and my services and theirs are available to my constituents. I want them to know that even when Congress is not in session I am on the job.

Making Living Easier for the Housewife

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. AYRES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, American industry is to be credited with most of the laborsaving ideas and appliances that have given the housewife her freedom from drudgery and added hours of leisure time to enjoy her family.

The Bon-Ami Co. has come up with an idea in this connection which I believe will be of interest to all Members of the House. Bon Ami is sending a representative to every major city in the country this fall to lecture before women's groups on how to make living easier for the housewife. It is a good-will program of helpful hints.

A great deal of preparation and research have been done to make the lectures worth while and interesting and I hope that many thousands of American mothers will have the opportunity of attending.

Annual Report to Constituents by Hon. Stuyvesant Wainwright, of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STUYVESANT WAINWRIGHT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, this is my fifth annual report to my friends and constituents of Suffolk and Nassau Counties on Long Island.

As you are interested in what your Congressman does to earn his salary, please take a few minutes to read my personal accounting to you. As the taxpayer, homeowner, voter, and citizen, you are the "boss." As your Congressman, I am the employee. Our Government exists for service and protection alone. This is fundamental to the Republic. Should we breach this trust, the Government must change.

Actually, only a nominal percentage of congressional time is spent in floor debate and voting. The major portion is divided between two fields: committee work and personal service. However, it is well to review, briefly, the accomplishments—or lack of accomplishments—of this first session of the 85th Congress. The guide for legislation is set by the President of the United States in his state of the Union message delivered in early January. This year President Eisenhower laid principal stress on the rights and dignity of the individual, saying:

> "We have much reason to be proud of the progress our people are making in mutual understanding—the chief buttress of human and civil rights. Steadily we are moving closer to the goal of fair and equal treatment of citizens without regard to race or color. But, unhappily, much remains to be done."

Here we find the principal battleground of the first session. Unhappily, due to the efforts of a small band of men from a particular section of the land, this wonderful goal has been partially frustrated. It could never have happened if these men had not had support from the leaders of their political party. Partisanship nearly destroyed the objective.

The second great battle was over the Presidential budget. A figure of $72 billion was presented to the Congress. It was reduced to approximately $66 billion. Actual spending will be less. I supported the reductions recommended by the various congressional committees except in military preparedness and defense, especially in the missile field. The Republic must be vigilant and strong. The Communist empire is searching constantly for a weakness in our armor. Acute economy in this field would be false and wicked.

Your Congressman participated in two major debates: One, to raise postal salaries; and the other, to put the Federal Government in the field of education at the grassroots. It became obvious early in the session that postal employees should have a cost-of-living wage increase. However, the postal unions demanded an increase of 12 percent, across the board. The President made it clear that he would veto such a measure. Consequently I fought for—and voted for—a 5-percent increase. I opposed the larger amount, believing it would be an hypocrisy to try for an amount certain of eventual defeat.

The grave question as to whether the Federal Government should dip down into each and every school district of the Nation constituted the second major issue. I opposed the measure on the grounds that no State indicated inability to handle its own school problem; the truly needy States would get but a small handout, while the rich States would get the lion's share; the classroom deficit across the Nation had been reduced from 400,000 to less than 80,000 in 2 years without Federal interference; and, finally, it appeared to me unwise to risk placing the control of our school system in the hands of the Federal Government.

Little significant legislation was passed at this session. It is rather difficult to blame the President, for the Congress is and should be an independent body. At the present time, and for the past 3 years, it has been controlled by the Democratic Party. Naturally, it would not be enthusiastically inclined to act quickly and favorably on legislation recommended by a Republican President. The prospects for an improvement of this situation in 1958 are rather poor: The Congressional elections will be just around the corner.

Of a more personal nature, each week I have written a report to keep you current and familiar with the Washington work. The important weekly papers have presented this column regularly as a fine public service. So, too, have Suffolk's radio stations broadcast each Sunday my program from the Nation's Capital. All work of proper representation must be based on understanding and knowledge of the views of the persons represented. Therefore, each year I have sent out a poll to obtain the benefit of your thinking on the key issues of the day. Of equal importance is personal contact. Regular office meetings were held in my Huntington office and at Wainscott. They will continue to be held on a weekly basis through the fall until the next session of Congress convenes. Phone Hamilton 7–9400 for a personal appointment.

Nearly 100 young men took examinations for the service Academies: Annapolis, West Point, the Air Force, and Kings Point Merchant Marine. Nine nominations were made, all based on the abilities of the young men. In the 5 years I have served in Congress no man named to an Academy has failed. Each nominee has been a distinct credit to his community, Long Island, and his country. I shall continue this nonpartisan, nonpolitical method of selection.

This year the Senate confirmed 10 of our recommendations for postmaster; 8 more acting postmasters have been installed. City delivery has either been installed or improved for Bayport, Farmingdale, South Farmingdale, Oakdale, Wyandanch, Halesite, and East Brentwood. Rural free delivery routes have been established or extended for Ridge, Hampton Bays, and Bohemia. A route is under consideration for Wading River. The existing facilities have been improved in Brookhaven, Eastport, Farmingdale, and Lindenhurst. With the vast growth of our area it is essential that the postal facilities stay abreast of the increase.

The economic stability of our area is crucial. In my reports for 1954, 1955, and 1956 I predicted continued full employment and prosperity. This has proved highly accurate despite the fact that it was the most criticized statement in the reports. Unfortunately, I am not quite as optimistic for 1958. Stocks and supplies are at an alltime high. The housing industry has fallen off 25 percent. Military contracts have been cut back. A readjustment period is in progress rather than an overall economic recession. To counter this I recommended the reduction of downpayments on Federal housing. The Defense Department has been asked repeatedly to protect Long Island's extraordinary pool of skilled workers in the aircraft and allied industries by giving us our fair share of Federal contracts. I believe that 1958 should be a period for consolidation rather than large-scale expansion.

The necessity of preserving our natural heritage at Fire Island in the form of a national park has been a subject of constant conferences with the Department of the Interior. A citizens' committee was established which has done an extraordinary job. The economy drive kept the project out of the Federal budget, but it is hoped that it will be restored next year.

Long Island's housing industry, with the cooperation of the Long Island Home Builders Institute and the Federal Housing Administration, has made giant strides to provide better homes for our many new residents. This is a constant and continuing process.

Many minor projects were effected or instituted, such as an Army engineers' study of the harbor facilities at Port Jefferson and Sag Harbor; a foghorn at the Montauk breakwater; a radio beacon at Shinnecock Inlet has been promised; improved military housing at the Suffolk Airbase; attracting commercial use of MacArthur Airport; dredging of shoal areas in the Great South Bay Channel; farm group conferences, with special reference to disposing of potato surpluses; several hundred individual immigration cases; the expediting of innumerable passport applications, and the processing of nearly a thousand military cases, either hardship discharges or transfers or veterans' service matters.

In addition, I introduced legislation to keep former enemy assets from being turned over to Italy, Germany, and Japan—H. R. 7318. These funds constituted the only reparations ever received from these nations who declared war on us. They must be used as reparations for those who have legitimate claims against these governments. I introduced many other bills, such as H. R. 498, to provide a permanent home for the Vice President of the United States; H. R. 4842, to provide control of advertising on federally owned or controlled lands; House Concurrent Resolution 168, calling for the creation of a permanent United Nations police force, and H. R. 4532 and H. R. 7144, bills dealing with quality requirements for inspection, certification, and labeling of Irish potatoes.

It has been an honor and pleasure to be of service to you and to my country for another year. Your patience and tolerance where we have disagreed and your understanding where we have been unable to solve your problem completely are especially appreciated. Your comments, advice, and suggestions are always welcome.

Nigeria Looks Toward Independence

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I should like to call the attention of the House to a very significant event. Monday the 2d of September will mark a major step in Nigeria's resolute march toward independence. On that day the Honorable Abubakar Tafawa Balewa will take office as the first Prime Minister of the Nigerian Federation, and then convene the opening session of Nigeria's all-African Cabinet.

Mr. Balewa's appointment implements the decision of the Nigerian Constitutional Conference, held in London earlier this year, to grant a considerable measure of internal self-government to the Federation. The selection of Mr. Balewa, formerly Minister of Transport, as Prime Minister assures Nigerians a capable and dedicated leader, a man who is firmly committed to independence for his country in 1960. He is well prepared by temperament and training to form a national government, whose immediate task will be to coordinate the policies of the three regions and the cameroons.

In recent years, Mr. Speaker, there has been an ever-increasing sentiment within Nigeria for national independence. Conferences were held in 1953 and 1954 in London and Lagos, respectively, to determine the character of the Federal constitution, and to consider the question of self-government. Earlier this year the three regional premiers agreed upon 1959 as the target date for independence, and a resolution to that effect was passed unanimously by the house of representatives on March 26. With this background the London conference convened May 23 with nearly 100 delegates and advisers from Nigeria and Great Britain to "review the constitution and examine the question of self-government."

In commenting on this proposal, Mr. Lennox-Boyd stated that it would be very difficult for Her Majesty's Government to draw a blank check in favor of independence in 1959, as it was presently impossible to foretell what the structure of Nigeria would be by 1959. Two regions—the east and the west—were only just launching out on regional self-government, while the third and largest—the north—did not want independence until 1959. Consequently, Nigeria as a whole had not yet been in a position to feel the strain of regional self-government, and the British wanted some idea as to how that strain would be taken before finally settling the issue of independence. Furthermore, the conference had only just agreed to establish a commission to look into the position of minorities, and there was a possibility that recommendations of this commission might lead to the establishment of further states in Nigeria. While he expressed concern lest Nigeria move too quickly into an independence for which she might not be prepared, Mr. Lennox-Boyd alined himself squarely behind eventual self-government.

The decision of the conference to grant immediate self-government to the eastern and western regions, but to defer until 1960 setting a firm date for federal independence, indicates considerable qualities of statesmanship on the part of Nigerian leaders. Although disappointing to those who sought a fixed date for national independence, the decision will provide opportunity for exercising nearly complete self-government within regional spheres, and limited self-government within the Federation.

As regard the legislature, the conference recommended that a house of representatives and a senate be created. The senate would be coequal with the house, and be comprised of 12 members from each region and the southern Cameroons, 4 representatives from Lagos, 4 special members appointed by the Governor-General, members of the Council of Ministers who are also members of the house, and the President, if elected from outside the senate. It was agreed that the present house should run its full course; thereafter, it would consist of 320 members, elected on the basis of one member for approximately each 100,000 of the present population. Members of the house would be elected by universal adult suffrage in the eastern and western regions and the southern Cameroons, and by adult male suffrage in the northern region. The franchise in the northern region is to be reviewed from time to time.

The problem of minorities in each region was given considerable attention by the conference. A minorities commission was set up to go in detail into the fears of minorities, and to consider how these could best be met. The conference took a strong position against splitting up Nigeria into further states, but the commission was given authority to recommend the creation of additional states if no other solution seems practicable.

The decisions taken by the constitutional conference will do much to strengthen Nigeria's preparations for full self-government, and provide much of the transitional machinery that is so essential to establishing a viable constitutional and administrative structure. Much credit is due the British who are unselfishly devoting themselves to training Nigerians for the assumption of governmental responsibilities.

A land of some 30 million people, Nigeria is confronted with many problems as she moves toward independence. Yet I am confident that these problems will be surmounted, and Nigeria will prove herself equal to the responsibilities that lie ahead.

To Prime Minister Balewa and his compatriots may I offer heartiest congratulations, and assurances that we stand ever ready to assist him and his country to a responsible and durable independence.

Report of Congresswoman Coya Knutson to the 9th Congressional District of Minnesota on the 1st Session, 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. COYA KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mrs. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, this report will cover two groups of issues: national issues and matters of purely local or district interest and need. These are of equal importance in the sense that a sound and healthy national economy is the background and foundation of a sound and healthy local economy. A good national farm program and a healthy farm economy are essential to a good farm situation in the Ninth District. The opposite is equally true. If there is a weak spot in the national economy—as in the depressed farm income—the effect is felt not only in the Farm Belt but throughout the entire national economy. For this reason, the obligations of a Representative to the country as a whole are as great as to the congressional district he represents. The job of the Representative is to act with the greatest care, diligence, and judgment in the best interests of the country and in the best interests of the constituents whom he represents. These two interests are almost never at odds with each other.

APPROPRIATIONS

In the national picture, the most important issue is undoubtedly the problem of appropriations. The temper of the country since midsummer of 1956 has been one of complacency, and a feeling almost of normalcy—with a few notable exceptions—has prevailed throughout the country. Unquestionably, this atmosphere was largely responsible for the economy wave, the demand for across-the-board cuts in Federal expenditures which swept over the entire country. Congressmen felt the impact heavily and the greatest single influence in the consideration of the President's budget for the executive agencies was this tidal wave of grassroots demand for economy.

These executive agencies include the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, with its Office of Education, its Public Health Service which protects the health of the citizens against epidemics and scourges such as polio and Asian flu, the research in the fields of cancer, heart disease, mental health, neurological diseases and blindness, infectious diseases, arthritic, and metabolic diseases and dentistry, carried on by the National Institutes of Health; its Social Security Administration which assists the States in the administration of the program, old-age and survivors insurance; the Children's Bureau which provides the know-how in assisting the States in their problems of juvenile delinquency, training of nurses and technicians for the care of retarded children, and many other important State-administered children's programs; the Department of Labor with its Bureau of Employees Compensation, including disability and unemployment compensation, its apprenticeship and training section, and its Division of Prices and Cost of Living, among others; the Commerce Department with its Bureau of Standards, its Bureau of the Census, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Civil Aeronautics Board and Administration, the Bureau of Public Roads, and others; the Justice Department with its FBI, its Immigration and Naturalization Service; the Interior Department with its Bureau of Reclamation and its Bureau of Indian Affairs and others; the Treasury Department with the Coast Guard, the Internal Revenue Service, the Bureau of Customs, and all the financial operations of the Government; the Post Office Department; and so on and on through the Government, all the executive agencies, independent offices, and commissions.

Of the requested amount of over $73 billion in new appropriations, cuts of an estimated $4.9 billion were made. Of this total, the administration agreed to about half, although there was considerable disagreement within the administration itself and the various Cabinet officers of the administration, on the majority of the fiscal issues.

Each of these appropriations required minute study but the result was invariably the same—reduced budgets—many of them in essential functions and services, many of them with far-reaching and widespread effects. While there is probably no one who would question the principle that economy is a good thing wherever possible, there are obviously certain dangers inherent in economy for economy's sake. Carried to its logical conclusion, this theory could end up with the elimination of whole programs, good or bad according to one's view—and even of the Government itself. This is absurd, of course. But so is the thoughtless and indiscriminate slashing of essential Government programs and services. There are a number of such programs over which there should never have been any disagreement—programs which are essential to the Nation's health, or to its security, or to the normal conduct of its business and its agriculture.

These are programs which are of equal importance to citizens in my district and to the citizens of the southernmost districts of Florida and California. These are the programs over which there could be no possible quarrel on grounds of regional interests. Yet, because of the weight of the economy pressure wave, we had to spend valuable hours on the floor of the House when we should have been in committee conducting our studies or in our offices tending to our districts' business. We had to have rollcall after rollcall—14 in 1 day, estimated at 40 minutes each—in an effort to persuade our colleagues of the differences between cutting an appropriation where such a cut could be made with continued efficiency of the operation, and cutting an appropriation merely for the sake of cutting where the country's vital interests required the full requested amount. Just simply swinging the appropriations meat cleaver resulted in the elimination or drastic curtailment of some pretty essential services, not only to my own district, but the country as a whole.

There were some threats to essential programs which fortunately we were able to fight off by just simply digging in our heels and refusing to give in on. One of these was the sewage disposal aid to the States. Pressure to knock out the grants, which are the heart of the water pollution control program, was spearheaded by the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and trade associations representing certain polluting industries. The attack was mounted under the guise of economy. Conservationists in Congress were able to turn back this powerful attack on the year-old water pollution control program when, by a rollcall vote of 231 to 185, the House reversed a previous decision to eliminate the grants to stimulate the building of sewage-treatment plants.

Here is the perfect example of the parallel of national and local interests. I don't think anyone will question the need of our doing our utmost to halt the frightful and rapidly increasing pollution of our national streams and rivers which provide the water with which we bathe our babies and cook our food. Even the most economy minded States-righter will agree: First, that this is not an issue of State versus Government control—since, what good would it do if one State did something about water pollution and the next State, geographically speaking, through which a particular river flowed, did nothing; and second, that the increasing pollution, if unchecked, will have a devastating effect upon the health of our citizens. Manifestly, this is the perfect marriage of national and local interests. In my own district, any number of our cities have or will have sewage disposal problems—Fergus Falls, among them. I am glad to say that we can now see some hope for a solution of this problem.

In such an atmosphere as was created by this economy drive, there were, unfortunately, many measures of regional interest as well which "fell between the slats" and were eliminated altogether. Some of these affected my own district. The elimination of funds for provision of improved facilities for customs offices on our borders was accomplished despite our best efforts. In some cases such cuts were made because of lack of regional interest, as for example, eastern Members' disinterest in western Members' border problems, and southerners' in northerners' problems.

Other deep cuts were made in budgets of agencies such as the Weather Bureau, the importance of which is better known in such areas as Minnesota, where the forces of nature are alternately threat or boon, and where provision must be made in accordance with long-range forecasting. City constituents may be merely inconvenienced by faulty weather reporting. The farmer is not so fortunate.

ADMINISTRATION'S MONEY POLICY—TAXES

The work on appropriations is one of the most important functions of the House of Representatives provided in the Constitution. It requires the most conscientious and continuous study on the part of every Member. It is also one of the most interesting functions because it is here that we have an opportunity to study the vast functioning of our Government in all its relations to our people and to the world. It is here, also, that we find out exactly what the administration's policies are and how they are operating.

One of the interesting things about these fiscal matters is that the figures approved by Congress in the various appropriations measures do not include the permanent and indefinite appropriations of moneys to pay interest on public debt, interest on various trust funds and so forth. These amounted in fiscal year 1956 to nearly $7 billion. In short, Congress has no control over these outlays whatsoever. The Government must pay interest to the purchasers of its bonds from the sale of which the Treasury pays the costs of operating the Government. These purchasers are, principally, the large national banks, insurance companies and the Federal Reserve Board. On account of the hard money, high interest policy of this administration, and the inflation which these policies feed, this cost to the Government for money to pay for its operations has increased from 1952 to 1957 by approximately $5 per capita—roughly $850 million per year or over a 3-year period, more than $2 billion.

This huge sum alone would cover the appropriations for fiscal year 1958 for any one of the following Departments or Agencies—for combinations of a number of them: Commerce, $537 million; Agriculture, $1.59 billion; Interior, $456 million; Labor, $354 million; Treasury, $691 million; State, $189 million; Justice, $227 million; United States Information Agency, $96 million; all public works, $858 million—or any number of the independent offices and commissions put together. (These figures are approximate.)

The enormity of this loss of taxpayers' hard-earned money due to inflation can be better appreciated by comparison with other benefits which might have been purchased. With this $850 million per year, we could have met three-fifths of the cost of the proposed Federal aid for school construction; we could have paid 95 percent of the cost of an adequate slum-clearance and urban-renewal program—estimated at $900 million by the United States mayors' conference; we could have met the total cost of the drought-relief programs from 1954 to 1957 and still have close to $400 million to spend on needed soil- and water-conservation programs in the stricken areas; we could have built the high Hells Canyon Dam and had close to $500 million left over.

We are all, as individuals, keenly aware of the effects of the inflation and the hard money, high interest rate policies on our own pocketbooks. Since January 1953, the cost of living, according to the Consumer Price Index, has risen a full 6.1 percent; food—except for seasonal variations—generally up 3.8 percent; clothing up 1.8 percent; mortgage interest up 30 percent; local water rates up 35 percent; transportation up 20 percent, in many areas much more; rent up 12 percent. There are but a few of the increases in our basic expenditures. As I mentioned in the Capital Chat of August 29, the interest rates on Federal Housing Administration-insured loans have been increased by Administration order 16⅔ percent in just 8 months.

In addition, according to the former Secretary of the Treasury, George Humphrey, "State and municipal financing has increased by $18.8 billion in the past 4 years." This means that in February 1957, State and local governments had to pay 69.6 percent more in interest to carry their debts than in 1952. I leave it to you to think what your State and local governments could have done for you with that money.

Besides the effect on individual pocketbooks and on State and municipal financing, the exact figures of this increased cost to the Government of its own operations on account of the administration's fiscal policies were certainly an eye opener. It would be an interesting speculation to figure for this period, 1953–57, the excess funds Congress has had to appropriate for Government operation on account of the lower purchasing value of the dollar. Probably well within this vast sum lies the amount of money which might have gone for a substantial tax reduction for everyone—not just for the corporations and for individuals above the 42 percent income-tax bracket.

FOREIGN AID AND TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE

Our stature in the eyes of the world is dependent upon our international relations. The main part that the Congress plays in the conduct of foreign affairs, is in the approval of appropriations, and certain personnel. In the process, of course, we must examine the work of the various executive agencies which are engaged in the day-to-day conduct of these affairs with all other nations. Parallel and supplementary to the military and diplomatic negotiations, these operations include the contributions of know-how and personnel to the various specialized agencies of the United Nations: Among others, the World Health Organization, Food and Agriculture Organization, and the United Nations Education, Scientific, and Cultural Organization; the independent international service agencies, International Monetary Fund and World Bank, the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, and others.

Technical assistance is furnished in most of these areas to help other countries, principally the underdeveloped countries, to help themselves, to build up their native skills to productive levels, to eliminate the tremendous starvation areas of the world, and to build strong economies, widely based educational systems and democratic institutions. These agencies and those of our citizens who are engaged in this worthy work, are quietly making friends for us all over the world, in helping to eradicate the dreadful diseases bred of poverty and lack of sanitation—and by ignorance. These devoted and dedicated people are the 20th century missionaries of democracy and they are sent wherever they are needed. They are building the only effective and lasting barrier against the spread of the atheistic communism which breeds upon poverty, ignorance, suspicion, hate, and despair.

Despite the pressures of the economy wave, most of the little amount needed for this great democratic effort was saved. It amounts to only about one-seventh of the noncongressionally controlled interest payments paid out by the Government for fiscal year 1956, mentioned above. It is only about one one-hundredth of the yearly cost of World War II, not including the entire atomic bomb development project and the collateral "shooting war" expenditures, such as transportation of troops, hospitalization, veterans' benefits, and war claims. But the effect of this worldwide missionary work is inestimable in the cause of peace and in counteracting with the people, the threat to liberties throughout the world.

ORPHAN BILL

Important in this people-to-people relationship, is the question of immigration—particularly of orphans being sought for adoption by American couples. Next to the economy mail, and mail in support of Hells Canyon, one of the subjects about which the next greatest number of constituents has written is the adoption and immigration of orphans. I am happy to be able to report that through the combined efforts of like-minded Members, this legislation has been passed by the Congress. The language of the so-called orphan bill was incorporated in the omnibus refugee bill, which also made certain other desired changes to provide for the reuniting of families, and so forth. Adoption by proxy will be permitted, the age limit is raised to 14 and no restrictions were added except for the cutoff date of June 30, 1959. This is indeed good news for these American couples who have asked Congress to help them share their abundance and their way of life with young orphaned refugees.

SIGNIFICANT SETBACKS AND FAILURES: LOST RIVER AND RUFFY BROOK, SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

An important failure—although temporary—is the public works omnibus rivers and harbors bill, which among others, includes authorization for the Lost River and Ruffy Brook flood-control projects. As you will remember, the omnibus rivers and harbors bill of 1956—which also included the Lost River and Ruffy Brook projects—was vetoed by the President last year. There has been a real attempt this year to avoid another veto by eliminating several projects which, beside the purely political purpose, caused the veto last year. A number of these projects were eliminated. However, certain of those which came within this category, were not eliminated and reports have been requested on these from the Corps of Engineers.

These reports are not expected to be filed with the committee until this fall. If reported on favorably by a branch of the administration, there would be no reason for a Presidential veto. However, if the bill had been passed before the engineers' report was received, that alone might have provided an excuse for a Presidential veto. Members of the committee felt that rather than risk a veto of these important projects again, with very poor prospect of overriding, it would be better to hold the bill over until next year. If this bill had been passed, vetoed and the Congress had been unable to override, Congress would not have had another chance to consider these projects again until the 86th Congress convenes January of 1959. These projects in different parts of the country, for flood control, channel dredging, and other improvements of rivers and harbors required for the continued flow of commerce and the protection of those along their banks, are too important to waste again as political ammunition. We cannot waste an additional year. Unfortunately, for all our great need, we must consider the stark political realities of the situation.

A most unfortunate failure of legislation passage for lack of support by the President for his own bill, is the ill-fated, critically needed school-construction measure. The campaign to meet the growing crisis of classroom shortages has been stymied once more. A shift of three votes would have saved the bill. On January 28, 1957, the President told the Congress that classroom shortages are our most critical education problem—and he might have added that for lack of trained engineers, scientists, and other skilled persons in this highly technological age, we might very well lose the race against time in our cold war with the Russians. The proposal of the committee was a bill, H. R. 1, for $300 million a year for 5 years, compromising the distribution formula to allot half of the money to the States on the basis of need—the administration proposal—and half according to school population. In addition, the bill provided for $750 million to purchase school construction bonds and $150 million in advances to school financing agencies. In a last-minute effort to save the program, the Democrats threw their weight behind a proposal to substitute the original administration plan for the committee bill. They fought a delaying action, hoping that a White House call would line up the necessary support—but the call never came.

SUMMARY OF FARM SITUATION AND LEGISLATION

Of deepest concern to my district is the farm program and related legislation. There is very little I can add to what you already know. The facts are evident to you, to the consumer and to the country at large. Net farm income during the past 5 years has fallen 27 percent as a result of the administration's farm policy. Interest costs per acre have risen 67 percent since 1951 and taxes 33 percent. Since June 30, 1953, Commodity Credit Corporation stocks have more than doubled. In the same period, losses for supporting crops under this administration have been nearly three times more than the costs of its over two decades of existence. Early estimates of farm mortgage debt indicate that this figure will reach the highest point in 1957, since 1921—a huge total of $9,902,000,000. A further tragic estimate is the loss to the Nation annually of 100,000 farms—family farms.

In a February 12 press release, you may recall, I protested the steady downbeat on sliding scale parity price cuts. This downbeat is entirely consistent with the whole Republican program of the past 3 years which was interrupted during the election year. There is no question that price cuts in supports are intended to be lower than the market price and consequently of no value to the farmer. The drop in barley prices from June election-year prices of $1.02 to 94 cents, oats from 65 cents to 60 cents, rye from $1.27 to $1.15, sorghums from $1.97 to $1.83 a hundredweight, less freight costs, cuts the very threads out of the family farmer's net income. Not only is this a loss to the farmers but it is a $50,400,000 direct loss to the United States through the Commodity Credit Corporation, in the drop of prices that affect these commodities, the downbeat of prices is designed to confuse the consumer and abrogate the farmer's land tenure. There has been no cutback in farmer production on account of sliding-scale parity. The present cut in parity, subtracted from last year's election-year prices, means a loss of $57 million to farmers on oats, a $29 million loss to farmers on barley, a $3 million loss on rye, and a $17 million loss on grain sorghums.

As for legislation, we have a new compulsory poultry inspection law, a durum bonus acreage program extension for 1 year, a law making permanent the ACP, and the extension of Public Law 480 for disposal of surplus commodities abroad. There is in addition a new law to permit farmers to produce up to 30 acres of wheat for feed without penalty instead of the previous limit of 15 acres. And that is about that. Among the important measures we were not able to get through were the potato bill and the prohibition of futures trading on onions, although this year we were able to get the onions bill at least out of committee and ready for floor action.

Add to this summary, rumors of administration's efforts in the next session to get rid of Public Law 480 altogether, and Secretary Benson's request for authority to eliminate all price supports and return to the uncontrolled chaos of the 1930's, which would result in far greater farm production than ever known before. Last spring, in the hearings before the Agriculture Committee, Secretary Benson, who bases his recommendations on the idea that lower prices will naturally reduce production and thereby eliminate surpluses, made the amazing statement that he knew of no competent authority to indicate to the contrary. I was able to produce figures from his own Department's agriculture statistics of 1955, indicating that in some 30 cases—that is, over half the time in certain commodities—this theory has been proved wrong. In these 30 cases, lower support prices had increased production and higher support prices had decreased production. In other words, Secretary Benson is basing his recommendations on an idea that works only about 50 percent of the time. That is not good enough for Congress—or for the farmers.

Next session, armed with materials and testimony gathered in hearings this fall—and an election year—we will be prepared for the knockdown and dragout fight with Mr. Benson.

The Family Farm Subcommittee and the Consumer Study Subcommittee will be making investigations in the field this fall, following their preparatory hearings here in Washington during the session. These are the only two committees which will be working on agriculture during the period between the first and second sessions of this Congress. The family farm hearings will be held for the purpose of securing testimony on actual experiences of family farmers in order to develop a sound farm legislative program. One of the sites chosen for these important hearings is Fergus Falls, Minn., and one of the considerations in choosing this particular city was its location in Otter Tail County, which has the largest number of family farms of any county in the State of Minnesota, and is one of the top 20 counties in the number of family-operated farms in the Nation. Much may be learned from the farm families of this area on the shaping of Government policy to strengthen the basic family system of agriculture.

The Consumer Study Subcommittee, whose schedule is not yet firmly set, will continue with its study of food price trends and will probably hold its hearings principally in cities and food-processing centers.

MISCELLANEOUS NATIONAL ISSUES

Natural-gas legislation: Some 20 million consumers have more to fear from the latest version of the natural-gas bill than from the one vetoed during the 84th Congress on grounds of arrogant lobbying by oil interests. That earlier bill would have frankly and openly amended the Natural Gas Act of 1938 to free the field sales of natural gas to interstate pipelines from Federal regulations, thus permitting big producers to raise field prices to levels at just about all the traffic would bear. The new bill will do exactly the same thing by a camouflaged pretense at continued regulation of producer prices. By use of elaborate legalisms, a reasonable-market-value formula is devised which actually directs the Federal Power Commission to regulate on the basis of a general increase of producer prices in line with the rising market value of gas—all of which is to be arrived at by private arm's-length bargaining. The implications of such a bill are astounding. Through the concerted efforts of a small group of Representatives, the consumer interest in holding the line on natural-gas prices has been protected, and the bill held over until next year. The consumers of America, who stood to lose about $800 million annually out of their pockets to the already economically overfed oil-and-gas industry, can breathe a sigh of relief—but only until next session. The need for continued vigilance was never more clear, and my district can be assured of my continued opposition to this bad legislation.

Rural electrification: Riding on the outcome of the fight over REA are power costs to farmers served by REA co-ops and much more. REA's defenders are under fire from two fronts: the administration money managers who favor upping interest rates on new REA loans—now fixed by law at 2 percent—to no less than what the Treasury pays on its long-term debts—roughly 4 percent—and private power interests which plan an all-out effort to prevent further expansion by the co-ops.

Fish and game, duck stamp: In 1934, when ducks faced extinction, Congress passed the Duck Stamp Act. Duck hunters were to buy a Federal duck stamp for $1, with the proceeds going to buy and develop more land for the national waterfowl refuge system. The money was not coming in fast enough to do the huge job which sportsmen figured needed doing. So they came to Congress in 1949, asking that the price of the duck stamp be doubled. Congress went along.

Four years later, 1953, the money was rolling in. There were funds for a greatly expanded refuge acquisition and development program. It never got off the ground, because the new administration picked the duck hunters' pockets and used the money for current operating expenses of the Fish and Wildlife Service. This is one of the many means by which this administration has presented a balanced budget to the public. Even the Post Office Department got into the act. In 1954, the price which that Department charged for printing and distributing the stamps was almost five times what it was in 1953—for about the same number of stamps.

Once again it is proposed that Congress increase the fee. The preferred alternative is the Democratic proposal to earmark 65 percent of the receipts from the present $2 fee for the purchase, administration, maintenance, and development of refuges. Hearings on this last bill revealed that sale of duck stamps grossed almost $5 million last year. In the past 20 years, duck stamps have brought in nearly $50 million. Of that, only $4.5 million has been spent for land—the rest has gone for operating expenses in the past 4 years of the Fish and Wildlife Service. Another example of the need for vigilance.

Retirement security measures: Only relatively minor bills dealing with social security were considered by the 85th Congress during the 1st session. Public Law 109—H. R. 6191—extends until July 1, 1958, the time for disabled persons to file applications for disability freeze to preserve their rights to old-age, survivors, and disability insurance. An important section of this law prohibits deductions from social-security disability benefits of the service-connected disability compensation paid to veterans. This will permit a totally disabled veteran to receive the full amounts of both payments without any reduction.

Several bills authorizing various States to combine retirement systems with social security were enacted. Another bill, H. R. 1944, liberalized regulations relating to the payment of social-security benefits to alien survivors of certain members of the armed services. H. R. 8892 extends for 2 years the time within which a minister may elect coverage as a self-employed individual for social-security purposes.

LOCAL ISSUES

H. R. 8508, the two ASC county committee bill—Public Law 85-278: I introduced a bill to prevent the consolidation of the two ASC county committees which have been serving the large counties of Otter Tail and Polk in the Ninth District. These are 2 of the counties of the 4 in the United States which would have been affected by a recent ruling of the General Accounting Office that no county shall have more than 1 ASC committee and that those which have 2 must consolidate these 2 by the end of September. These 2 counties are in the group of 20 largest counties in the country and a much smaller group of large counties principally engaged in farming. The system of two ASC county committees grew out of a need for them—to give adequate service to the farmers in these widespread areas.

Despite the fact that this bill is noncontroversial—no one is injured by its passage—only local interests are involved and there is nothing but advantage to be gained by its passage, yet this bill encountered one of the peculiar obstacles, by coincidence, which sometimes befalls a bill in the legislative process. When the bill reached the Senate, it passed favorably through the subcommittee to the Committee on Agriculture and was reported favorably to the Senate for action on a calendar which is similar to the House's Consent Calendar. There, quite by coincidence, this bill at the time was the only bill having to do with agriculture and was picked by a Senator seeking to secure passage of a very important piece of watershed legislation by the customary method of attaching it as an amendment to another measure. When we on the House side got wind of this, we were perturbed because there was a deadline for passage of the ASC committee bill, and none, or at least no known deadline requirement for the watershed legislation. To this there was the added possibility of a Presidential veto of the bill in amended form. This we just could not risk, important as the watershed legislation might have been.

The minute we found out in a routine check with the Senate bill clerk, that this bill had been objected to—that is, put over for further debate on account of the proposed amendment, we immediately got in touch with Senator HUMPHREY and he, in turn, immediately went to work in the Senate to eliminate the amendment and secure passage of the bill without amendments. But for Senator HUMPHREY's valuable assistance in the Senate in giving the bill the final push without crippling amendment, this important deadline bill might have been lost. The bill was now gone to the President for signature and there is not any reason whatever for a veto. By the time this report goes to press, undoubtedly H. R. 8508 will be law.

In conclusion, I would like to discuss the ways in which your Representative can be of service to you, other than as a Member of Congress engaged in the legislative process. The additional services, largely advisory and representative of your interests with the various executive agencies and commissions, such as the Farmers' Home Administration, Defense Department, Social Security Administration and so forth, are limited to requests. Frequently, however, the very fact of expressed interest or protest on the part of the elected Representative is sufficient to make these agencies reconsider a hasty or an improper decision.

Warroad customs curtailment: An example of such a reaction is a reversal of its decision to curtail customs service in Warroad on the part of the Customs Bureau of the Treasury Department. As a result of vigorous protest based upon the potential damage to commerce and international interchange in the Warroad area, the threatened permanent curtailment of the service between the hours of 9 p. m. and midnight on Sundays and holidays, was removed and the service was restored in full.

Personal problems: Other and more common examples are the frequently successful solutions to personal problems which range all the way from compassionate transfers or hardship discharges for hard-pressed service people and their families, to pressing for improved loan servicing of our farmers by FHA.

Egg prices: A third type of service is the campaign to draw public attention to a given problem, such as the low egg prices, and in this a continuous flow of letters from you is of considerable assistance to your Representative. In the egg crusade as an example of this part of a Representative's work, there are several steps to be taken. The first, of course, is continuous letter protest to the offending agency—in this case, the Department of Agriculture. Immediately after the convening of Congress last January, I began this phase by writing letters to the Secretary of Agriculture, asking that he do something about the depression-low egg prices by support and by buying eggs. Receiving no satisfactory reply, other letters went to the Secretary, and still receiving no satisfaction, it appeared that national attention should be called to the problem. Here is where your good letters came into the picture. After July 1, as the second phase of the campaign, I started a series of insertions of your letters on low egg prices and the cost-price squeeze in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This was followed by the third phase, a floor speech in the House. This speech was picked up by the international wire services because of the buildup and through them was given a play in newspapers all over the country.

This is about the only way your Representative can influence the policies and operations of the administration—by securing the pressure of widespread public protest. In order to enlist the aid of an aroused public, attention must be focused on the problem. This is exactly what happened on the egg crusade and it has worked. The Secretary of Agriculture has begun to buy eggs in sufficient quantity to have an effect on the price—and prices to the farmer are going up, little by little.

Evaluation of the first session: Well, the first session of the 85th Congress is over. It was a Congress which might best be described as moderate—a balanced Congress. This is perfectly understandable because there were many instances of crossing party lines in different groupings, which was in turn, undoubtedly, the result of changing political patterns all over the country. The whole country is in a period of political transition. In many ways we who would have liked to see more vigorous and more liberal action on important issues had a feeling of frustration; however, much groundwork for constructive legislation in the second session has been laid.

I stayed until the last horn blew and the session was over August 30 with a rush of last-minute business. Many of my colleagues had been unable to stay the full term for personal reasons; sometimes in the last week or two it had been difficult to find a quorum in Washington. And, now that the Congressional children are back home and ready to go to school—in their overcrowded classrooms—their parents can finally take a few days vacation.

Increase Annuities for Retired Federal Employees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD P. BOLAND

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am very disappointed that action will not be taken by Congress in this session to increase the annuities of Federal employees who have retired after a record of devoted service to their Government. Many of these annuitants are elderly and they did not benefit from the liberalized retirement law which went into effect on October 1, 1956. I introduced a bill this year, H. R. 4085, which would have corrected this disparity between the annuities received by those who retired under the new liberalized law, and those who had retired prior to enactment of the law. My bill would have increased the annuity for these elderly persons, many of whom now require constant medical attention, by 25 percent. That increase is not large when you remember that many of these annuitants retired from Government when salaries were small in terms of today's dollars, and that 40 percent receive less than $100 a month. It seems to me that there is an obligation upon Congress to increase the annuities of these retired people who are facing the heavy burden of increased living costs on fixed incomes. I sincerely hope that this legislation will be one of the first items of business in the next session of Congress in January.

Address Delivered by Congressman Charles A. Wolverton at the 80th Anniversary of Camden Lodge, Brotherhood of Firemen and Enginemen, on Saturday, April 13, 1957, at Camden, N. J.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to address the membership of the Camden Lodge of Firemen and Enginemen on the 80th anniversary of the Camden Lodge held at Camden, N. J., on Saturday, April 13, 1957. In accordance with the unanimous consent granted to me by the House, I herewith include in my remarks the address I delivered on the above occasion. It is as follows:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen. I appreciate very much this opportunity to renew acquaintances with so many of my old friends. As you know, I have had a very pleasant relationship with your organization and your members that goes back a little bit longer than we might like to recall. This has been a fine association and I am proud to be invited here to talk with you on the occasion of your 80th birthday.

It is especially gratifying to address a meeting of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, in the light of the situation that we find in Washington today. The revelations of the Senate Committee on Improper Activities in the Field of Labor-Management Relations causes me to be even more respectful of a fine organization such as yours.

The revelations of the McClellan committee are indeed sobering. The leadership of the AFL–CIO is to be congratulated for the firm steps that they have taken to meet this challenge. I am sure that this challenge will be more than adequately met by the railroad brotherhoods. Your history has been a noble one and I am certain that your organizations will continue to remain as strong as ever.

I think it fitting that we discuss at least briefly some of the things that we are attempting to do in this Congress in which you are interested. I have introduced, along with Mr. Harris, of Arkansas, the chairman of our committee, H. R. 4353 and H. R. 4354. These bills, similar in every respect are known as the Harris-Wolverton bills. They are being strongly supported by all of the railway labor organizations. Mr. Harris and I introduced the bills after careful consideration and working with the leaders of your brotherhoods and others, as well as experts from the Railroad Retirement Board.

The objectives of our present legislation are threefold. First of all, we propose to increase by 10 percent the monthly checks of everyone covered by the Railroad Retirement Act. We intend that this increase be provided for widows—dependent children—old-age annuitants—pensioners—and those drawing spouse's benefits.

In considering improving benefits in the Railroad Retirement Act, Congress is constantly faced with requests from railroad people for assistance. Retired employees and their families throughout the Nation appeal to us time and again for assistance in meeting their problems. The plight of the widows and helpless children is indeed pitiful. Every day I receive letters from people who are trying to get by on incomes as small as $45 and $50 a month. I sometimes wonder how they keep body and soul together on these meager amounts. It is for this reason that we are determined that these senior citizens must be given relief.

With each succeeding month, the cost of living figures seem to go up. This means that all of the necessary staples of life increase in cost to those who live on fixed amounts. We all know that any time we increase benefits under the Railroad Retirement Act, we must necessarily provide the money. On the other hand, I am sure that you will all agree with me that our responsibility to these retired employees is so great that we must increase these benefits.

Secondly, our legislation provides for adequate financing to make sure that the railroad retirement system continues in a sound position. As you know, we adopted in the last Congress a bill which increased benefits by approximately 10 percent. Because of the legislative situation at that time, we were not able to provide the necessary financing for this increase. We are, therefore, in a position of being required to meet that obligation at this time.

We all know that increased taxes is not a pleasant subject to discuss. I have heard it said that no man in public life ought to go before a group of his constituents and talk about the need for increasing taxes. I am sure that our friendship is such that you would want me to talk frankly with you about this matter. In order to pay for the benefits we voted last year in Congress, we must have more income into the system. In order to pay for the benefits that we want to make now, we need more money. Therefore, it will be necessary to increase the tax rate and the tax base of railroad employees. On the other hand, the leaders of your brotherhood are asking Congress to exempt the amounts that you contribute into the railroad retirement system from income-tax coverage. The effect of both of these programs will be to increase your railroad retirement taxes, on the one hand, and to reduce your personal taxes, on the other hand. After it is all over, you will be contributing just about the same amount into the railroad retirement system that you now pay.

Thirdly, our legislation provides for substantial improvements in the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Probably no organization in the railroad field is more concerned with this problem than your brotherhood. You are faced with the extremely serious effects of automation and technical progress. This is a matter which all of you are deeply concerned with. As you know, there have been thousands and thousands of railroad firemen and enginemen who have lost their jobs in the last 15 years as a result of the dieselization program. Other forms of automation, such as calculating machines—automatic message transmitters—and electronic remote-control of switching facilities, are having a similar effect on other types of employment in your great industry.

It is for these reasons that I have been deeply concerned with doing something to soften the impact of these changes on the people who work on the railroads. The most regrettable phase of this problem is that, in a great many instances, the people who are losing their jobs because of these changes are considered too old for employment in other industries—at the same time they are not old enough to retire under railroad retirement.

We have provided in our bill for extended unemployment insurance coverage for persons who are affected by these changes. I am not sure that the proposals in our bill are perfect, nor am I positive that the periods of time that we allow for extended benefits are exactly what is needed. I am sure, however, that we have a responsibility to these long-time employees on the railroads who are finding themselves thrown out of work after devoting a lifetime to the industry. We must make some kind of an arrangement that is fair to everyone to cover this most serious problem.

As you know, the cost of the Railroad Unemployment Insurance System is paid for by the railroad companies. Therefore, the increased taxes that will be required as a result of these improvements in unemployment insurance will not affect the employees. Many years ago, when the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed, we established the tax rate at 3 percent of covered payroll. After a few years it developed, however, that it was possible to reduce the tax rate substantially below 3 percent. Our present bill simply provides that that tax rate go up again to 4 percent in consideration of the needs of these lifetime railroad employees who are being put out into the streets.

In connection with the Harris-Wolverton bills on railroad retirement, H. R. 4353 and H. R. 4354, there is pending before the Ways and Means Committee of the House another bill in which you are interested. This is H. R. 5551 by Mr. McCarthy of Minnesota. This bill would remove the tax on a tax which you now pay on the amounts that you are forced to contribute to the railroad retirement system. There are some who have described this proposal as being an effort to force the Federal Government to pay for the railroad retirement system. I do not believe that this is the case. It is a simple matter of eliminating a tax on a tax now being paid by railroad people. This is not a fair means of taxation. It is wrong in principle to regard as income, money taken out of your pay checks for taxes. You never see this money, nor do you use it. Every time that we pass a bill in Congress that increases the retirement benefits of people who are already retired, you who are now working are performing a social service. I believe that this ought to be recognized by the Government and that this tax on a tax should be eliminated.

In addition to the railroad-retirement matters that I have been discussing, your industry is faced with many other serious problems. The competitive position of the railroads in comparison with trucking and other forms of transportation is of great importance. There is a constant shifting of the freight haulage from the railroads to trucks. One of the reasons that the trucking industry has been able to get a larger share of this business is because it has been able to provide faster and more efficient service. The railroad industry must constantly search for ways of improving its service to the public. Faster through-freight service and more efficient methods of handling small shipments must be devised by your industry.

On the other hand, we in public life must be careful to make sure that your industry is not harmed by unfair competition. As you know, the railroad industry is pretty thoroughly regulated with regard to equipment safety and rate structure. On the other hand, it is generally known that the trucking industry is not nearly so well regulated. Undoubtedly this has contributed to the ability of the trucks to take over more freight business. To the extent that the trucking industry is getting business by using unsafe operating methods, we must make corrections.

We cannot afford to permit giant trucks to race up and down the Nation's highways with inadequate brakes, inadequate lights, inadequate weight limits, and overworked drivers. These are conditions that we have found in alarming proportion in the trucking industry. In my judgment, they have contributed heavily to the death tolls on our highways. We now have before our committee a bill which will correct some of these problems.

The history of World War II reveals that the railroad industry made a very important contribution. You will recall that at the time the war started in 1941 the railroad industry was in not too healthy a condition. The competition of the trucking industry was beginning to be felt and many, many railroads were in poor financial condition. The result was that the equipment of the railroads was not in the best condition. Despite this, however, when our country suddenly shifted to all-out war, the railroads assumed a staggering burden. All of the old equipment that had been laying on sidings for many years was pressed into service and almost overnight the railroad industry doubled its volume of business. Millions of troops were transported throughout the country for training in newly built military bases. Billions of tons of military equipment was moved rapidly and with very little loss. Everyone agrees that the railroad industry met the challenge of World War II in magnificent fashion.

I am wondering whether or not this industry is now in a position to meet the challenge of a new war should one develop. I am concerned with the failure of the Government and the railroads to provide an adequate pool of standby equipment for use in emergencies. I believe that extra freight cars, passenger cars, and locomotives ought to be distributed around the country strategically in case of an emergency. For example, if the great Altoona works of the Pennsylvania Railroad were to be destroyed in a bomb attack, we ought to have reserve supplies of equipment in other sections of the country. No matter what kind of an emergency we get into in the future, we will need the railroads and we will need railroad equipment. I hope that all of us can keep this problem in mind and do what is necessary to improve our ability to meet this situation.

Another problem that we are dealing with in Congress is a condition of employment in your particular craft or service. We are now considering legislation which will provide for more adequate power brakes on railroad locomotives. Studies of a long series of railroad accidents convince me that it is possible to improve railroad safety by insisting upon adequate power brake equipment. Only yesterday I had a visit with your president, Mr. H. E. Gilbert, and your vice president and national legislative representative, Mr. A. M. Lampley, about this bill. I am working closely with them in promoting this legislation.

The railroad industry has a long and a rich history. It was your industry that tied the Pacific coast to the Atlantic seaboard so many years ago. These lifelines of steel that went across mountains, rivers, and prairies provided the initial circulatory system for the great economic health that our Nation has grown to know. The great agricultural Middle West had its start and its development by the railroad builders of the 1800's. The mineral development of the Rocky Mountain area was encouraged and developed after the railroads had broken the trails. Golden California was only an isolated tropical paradise until the railroads made it possible to ship citrus fruits and other California products to the eastern markets.

There is still pioneering that the railroad industry is capable of doing. There are many things that you can do to further improve the welfare of our Nation. For example, in the congested Eastern States, the problem of commuting from a sprawling suburb to metropolitan centers has become increasingly difficult. No matter how many superhighways and turnpikes we build, they seem to be outmoded and overcrowded before they are completed. In my opinion, in the years to come we will have to return to the use of railroad facilities, perhaps of the monorail type, in commuting. We now have 170 million population in our great country. At the rate we are going, we are not too far away from owning and operating one or more automobiles for each family of these 170 million people. Obviously, when that day comes our streets, parking lots, and highways are just not going to be able to take care of the load. It is because of this that I am sure that in the next 20 or 30 years the railroads will again resume their very important function of moving large numbers of people over safe, private rights-of-way in the congested metropolitan areas.

The so-called piggyback freight service is, in my opinion, in its infancy. I am certain that in the future, this principle of mass movement of trucks on railroad freight cars will increase in great proportion. There are many other areas in which the railroad industry can meet the challenge of the times and I want to assure you that as always I shall be doing all that I can as a Member of Congress in dealing with the problems of your industry to make sure that your jobs are secure, your retirement is protected, and that your industry is healthy. Thank you.

Accomplishments of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, 85th Congress, 1st Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I desire to submit for the RECORD a statement on the activities of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, of which I have the honor to be chairman, during the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee approved 80 percent of the President's program coming within its jurisdiction during the first session of the 85th Congress. One Presidential recommendation is already law. Additionally, the committee approved scores of other bills, dozens of which are already law. Some of these are of major importance and benefit.

Here follows committee action on the five Presidential recommendations:

1. Legislation amending the Small Reclamation Projects Act of 1956, to restrict Congressional committee veto power over contracts, is now Public Law 47.

2. Authorization of the Fryingpan-Arkansas project was approved by the Senate June 27. The bill (S. 60) is at a stalemate in the House Interior Committee as a result of the opposition of certain Republican members to irrigation and reclamation in general and narrow partisanship with respect to Hells Canyon in particular.

3 and 4. Bills providing statehood for Alaska and Hawaii were favorably reported and are on the Senate Calendar.

5. The so-called long-range minerals program was not presented to the committee until June 4, several days after it had been released to the press and a full 3 years after the administration began promising that its submission was imminent. It contained realistic suggestions for only two minerals—lead and zinc. The Senate Finance Committee considered portions of the recommendations. The administration hedged and backed away from its own proposals. The Interior Committee promptly conducted hearings on other parts of the minerals program. Their weakness and defects were too great to permit reporting of a bill during the brief time between the unveiling of the recommendations and the end of the session.

In addition to the above-mentioned action on the President's program, the Interior Committee reported the following 16 major legislative proposals, 8 of which are now law:

1. S. 846: Provides for establishment of a National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission to study the outdoor recreation resources of the public lands and other land and water areas of the United States. Passed Senate.

2. Senate Joint Resolution 35: Provides for observance and commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the 1st conference of State governors for the protection, in the public interest, of the natural resources of the United States. In Senate-House conference.

3. S. 42: Provides for construction of San Angelo Federal reclamation project, Texas. Public Law 152.

4. S. 555: To authorize construction of a high Hells Canyon Dam. Passed Senate.

5. S. 1031: Authorizes construction of four units of the greater Wenatchee division, Chief Joseph project, Washington. Passed Senate.

6. Senate Joint Resolution 12: Provides for transfer of right-of-way for Yellowtail Dam, Mont., and payment to Crow Indians. Passed Senate. Companion measure reported to House.

7. S. 334: Increases acreage of phosphate leases or permits on public domain which persons may hold in any one State. Public Law 122.

8. S. 677: Permits States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington to use certain public lands granted them for construction, reconstruction, repair, renovation, etc., of public buildings in their capitals. Public Law 6.

9. H. R. 5538: Provides that withdrawals, reservations, or restrictions of more than 5,000 acres of public lands for certain military purposes shall not become effective until approved by act of Congress; and directs that hunting, fishing, and trapping at military installations or facilities be in accordance with fish and game laws of State or Territory where located. In conference.

10. S. 1556: Grants consent of Congress to States of Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact for the apportionment of the waters of the Little Missouri River and its tributaries. Public Law 184.

11. S. 2069: Promotes development of coal on public domain by permitting individuals, associations, or corporations to hold an additional 10,240 (present limitation is 5,120) acres of public lands if the Secretary of the Interior finds that the increased acreage is necessary for an economic business operation. Passed Senate.

12. S. 1086: Grants consent and approval of Congress to the Bear River compact entered into by States of Idaho, Utah, and Wyoming. Passed Senate.

13. S. 1996: Authorizes amendatory repayment contract to be executed with Casper-Alcova Irrigation District, the water-user organization on the Kendrick project in Wyoming. Public Law 283.

14. S. 1396: Broadens scope of land-grant provision in Act of Admission of the State of Wyoming. Public Law 97.

15. S. 1894: Amends law with respect to recoupment of funds expended in cooperation with school board of Klamath County, Oreg., because of attendance of Indian children. Public Law 72.

16. S. 977: Suspends and modifies application of excess-land provisions of the Federal reclamation laws to lands in East Bench unit of Missouri River Basin project. Public Law 112.

17. Senate Resolution 148: Requesting executive agencies to supply certain information in connection with water conservation and other public-works projects with a view to improving procedures in the consideration for authorization of new projects. On Senate Calendar for action in second session.

18. S. 2757: Authorizing Burns Creek project on upper Snake River in Idaho. Passed Senate.

19. S. 1426: Extending time in which Secretary of the Interior may enter into amendatory repayment contracts on reclamation projects. Senate substituted H. R. 5492 for S. 1426 having same purpose. Public Law 85-156.

20. S. 42: Authorizing San Angelo project, Texas. Public Law 85-152.

21. S. 2120: Authorizing rehabilitation of Mercedes division, Rio Grande rehabilitation project, Texas. Passed Senate.

22. Senate Joint Resolution 39: Authorizing certain water conservation projects and providing more adequate supply of irrigation water in Pecos River Basin, Tex.-N. Mex. Passed Senate.

23. Senate Joint Resolution 35: Providing for observance and commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the first conference of State governors for the protection, in the public interest, of the natural resources of the United States. Passed both Houses, but still in conference.

24. S. 77: Establishing the Chesapeake and Ohio National Historical Park, and providing for a scenic parkway. Reported to Senate.

25. S. 342: Implementing the 10-year mission 66 program for the national parks. Reported to Senate.

26. H. R. 5538: Limiting military withdrawals of public lands to not more than 5,000 acres without the consent of Congress. House has not yet concurred in Senate amendments.

27. S. 2363: Authorizing creation of national shrine symbolizing ideals of democracy to be paid for by public contributions. Passed Senate.

S. 2536: Granting to Alaska title to "tidelands" out to pierhead line in Alaskan municipalities. House bill, as amended by Senate, enacted as Public Law 85-303.

In addition, the Senate Interior Committee approved many other bills of considerable and perhaps even greater importance to particular sections of the country and Territories or to Indian tribes.

I believe the committee can take pride in its accomplishments during this first session. As chairman of the committee, I take this opportunity to extend my thanks to all members of the committee, of both parties, for their diligence and effort which has enabled me to present this record of accomplishment.

I desire to express my appreciation particularly to the chairmen of the subcommittees for their cooperation and the efficient and effective manner in which they handled measures referred to them. They are as follows:

Senator Richard L. Neuberger, chairman, Indian Affairs.

Senator Clinton P. Anderson, chairman, Irrigation and Reclamation.

Senator Joseph C. O'Mahoney, chairman, Public Lands.

Senator Henry M. Jackson, chairman, Territories and Insular Affairs.

I am chairman of the Subcommittee on Minerals, Materials, and Fuels.

Pay Raises for Postal and Other Classified Workers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM E. PROXMIRE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I feel very strongly the urgent necessity of increasing the pay of postal and other Federal classified workers to keep pace with the rapidly rising cost of living. I believe that the President is callous and thoughtless in his apparent belief that the workers are now receiving adequate compensation. In the coming session of Congress I will fully support a bill to grant these workers a decent living wage.

One of my first acts as a Member of the Senate was to send a telegram to President Eisenhower urging him to sign the pay-raise bills passed by the first session of the 85th Congress.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record the message I directed to the President.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

The Honorable Dwight D. Eisenhower,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. President: I most strongly urge you to sign the bills granting long overdue pay raises to postal and other classified Government workers. I am deeply concerned about the failure of salaries for Government workers to keep pace with the rapidly rising cost of living. The necessity for such an increase was a major issue in my campaign. In view of the large majority by which my policies were endorsed by the voters of Wisconsin, it is clear that the people of my State realize that a fair increase is justified and necessary.

Please do not let these Government workers down.

Sincerely,

William Proxmire,
United States Senator.

Voting and Attendance Record of Hon. Gerald R. Ford, Jr., of Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD R. FORD, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a report of my voting and attendance record during the first session of the 85th Congress.

The record includes all rollcall votes and all quorum calls. The description of bills is for the purpose of identification only; no attempt has been made to describe the bills completely or to elaborate upon the issues involved.

The purpose of this report is to collect in one place information which is scattered through thousands of pages of the Record. I want to be able to provide any interested constituent with a simple compilation of my voting and attendance record.

It will be noted that out of a total of 220 rollcalls I missed on only 7 occasions for an attendance record of 97 percent. The footnotes at the end of the compilation will indicate the reason for the absences and how I would have voted if present.

The report follows:

Voting and attendance record, Representative Gerald R. Ford, Jr., 5th District of Michigan, 85th Cong., 1st sess.

Report on Major Legislation of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. W. PAT JENNINGS

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. JENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, the first session of the 85th Congress ends today. I have prepared, for my constituents in the Ninth District of Virginia, a brief report on the major legislative actions of the session. I have stressed those actions of particular interest to the people of my district.

No attempt has been made in this report to cover all of the activities of the session. Neither do I try to assess the accomplishments of the Congress, preferring to wait until the second session has been completed and action taken on much important pending legislation. The work of this first session, however, is more than adequate to insure this Congress an appropriate niche in history—perhaps as one of the most responsible ever to serve the people of this Nation.

AGRICULTURE LEGISLATION

I have served as a member of the House Committee on Agriculture again in this Congress, having first been assigned to this committee in the 84th Congress. Since farming is of great importance in the Ninth District, service on this committee enables me to give close consideration to all agriculture legislation passed by the Congress.

The unwillingness of the Secretary of Agriculture to approve the bills referred to him for a report has limited, to a major degree, the agriculture legislation of this session. The committee's records show that the Members of the House concerned with the well-being of agriculture in the Nation have introduced more than 500 bills. After careful study, the bills considered most worthy of action were sent to the Secretary for consideration. He approved only 16 of the 125 bills submitted. He disapproved or proposed substantial changes in all others or did not express an opinion. We know from experience that unless the Secretary indicates to the President that he approves a bill, it is doomed to a veto—as the major farm bill passed in the last Congress was vetoed.

The farmers of this Nation, despite optimistic statements from Secretary of Agriculture Ezra T. Benson, are still in trouble. Prices are high on things purchased for the farm; prices have not improved on products sold from the farm. I hope that in the second session we will have more favorable comments from the Secretary on legislative proposals designed to bring a fair share of the Nation's prosperity to our farmers.

The Agriculture Committee has taken final action on more than 270 of the bills introduced in this session. The committee, with its 18 subcommittees, has conducted 176 hearings and study sessions and some are also planned during the recess.

Among the major agriculture actions of the session were: A 1-year, $1.3 billion extension of the Agricultural Trade and Development Assistance Act, under which our surplus farm commodities are disposed of at home and abroad; the approval of a deferred grazing program, providing assistance to the farmers in drought areas; establishment of a compulsory Federal poultry-inspection system to insure sanitary practices and correct labeling of poultry and poultry products; an improved program of control and eradication of plant pests, including a new threat to farmers, the imported fire ant; a change in law to exempt—for 1958 and later crops—up to 30 acres of wheat from marketing penalties when the entire crop is used on the farm where raised; and authority provided for a continuation of the agricultural conservation program—ACP.

Preliminary investigation and hearings on legislation referred to the Agriculture Committee are often done by one of its subcommittees. I am a member of the Subcommittees on Tobacco, Wheat, Livestock and Feed Grains, Research and Extension, Family Farms, and Consumers Study. These have been active in the first session. For example, the Consumers Study Subcommittee has undertaken a broad investigation into the reasons for increased food prices during a time of declining farm income. The Family Farms Subcommittee, which held a field hearing in the Ninth District last year at my invitation, will continue its work on ways and means to improve farm programs for the benefit of the small farm.

BUDGET REDUCTIONS

This has been an economy-minded Congress, effecting substantial cuts in the $71.8 billion recordbreaking peacetime budget for fiscal year 1958 announced by the President last January. When the final vote was taken on the appropriations bills, the budget had been reduced enough to give serious consideration to a tax cut next year.

Estimates of the budget cuts range from $4.9 billion, as tabulated by the House Appropriations Committee, to $6.5 billion totaled by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Expenditures. Whatever be the final figure, it is sufficient to illustrate the deep concern of the Congress over the proposal to increase Government spending.

I have voted for a majority of these budget cuts, including the billion-dollar reduction in foreign-aid funds. In some instances I did not vote for reduced funds because it was apparent they would have to be provided at some later date or essential Government services curtailed.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

The major actions in this important legislative field were the passage of the Middle East resolution to authorize economic and military cooperation with Middle East nations threatened by aggression; authority for the United States to participate in the International Atomic Energy Agency; and a much milder immigration bill than proposed by the administration.

A continuation of foreign-aid was approved, but plans to make it a permanent operation in some respects were curtailed and the funds requested for fiscal year 1958 reduced. When the authorization and appropriation bills were finally agreed upon, the $4.4 billion proposed in the budget estimates had been cut by a billion dollars. This action, in my opinion, will insure a more responsible and efficient administration of the foreign-aid operations.

VETERANS' LEGISLATION

We extended and improved the veterans direct home loan program to provide more opportunity for veterans seeking home loans in rural areas and small towns to secure financing, which has become more difficult under current tight money policies. Service-connected disability compensation payments were increased by an average of 10 percent with the degree of disability determining the amount of the increase. For example, a 10 percent disability monthly payment was raised from $17 to $19 while a total disability payment was increased from $181 to $225. Also, various veterans laws were consolidated into one volume and a House-passed bill to raise pensions for Spanish-American War widows is awaiting Senate action.

FINANCE, COMMERCE, INDUSTRY

The approval of tax legislation included extension of the present corporate income tax rate of 52 percent and the existing rate of certain excise taxes, and the curtailment of the authority to issue fast tax writeoff certificates for new plants. The House passed the first overall technical revision of the excise tax laws since 1932 and the bill is pending in the Senate. No income tax reduction bill was approved, but hearings on such legislation have now been scheduled for next January.

The Small Business Administration, which provides technical and managerial advice and credit to small business, was extended for a year and its loan funds increased. The Senate is expected to approve a House-passed bill next session to make this a permanent agency.

The Senate approved, and the House will probably do so next session, a revision and modification of all the Federal laws governing banks, savings and loan associations, and credit unions.

Also, interest rates payable on savings bonds were increased from 3 to 3¼ percent.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL

I opposed the passage of the so-called civil-rights bill, which occupied more time in the Congress this session than any other single piece of legislation. As passed, this measure empowers the Attorney General to use Federal injunctions to prevent alleged interference with voting rights, creates a Civil Rights Commission to investigate complaints and determine whether additional legislation should be recommended, and establishes a new section in the Justice Department, headed by an Assistant Attorney General, to be concerned with civil rights. An amendment to provide jury trials in criminal contempt cases growing out of this bill was added in the Senate and later modified by House-Senate agreement. The changes made during consideration of this bill made it less vicious to the sections of the country at which it was aimed than the original bill proposed by the administration.

IMPORTANT MISCELLANEOUS

Passage of a $1.9 billion housing bill, which included lower downpayments on FHA-insured homes, was the major piece of housing legislation of the first session. Funds were also provided for urban development and slum clearance.

The bill to begin a 5-year, $1.5 billion program of Federal aid to the States for school construction was killed in the House after an amendment was adopted to prevent the use of these funds in any State with segregated schools. Extended to June 30, 1959, however, was the assistance now provided school districts affected by Federal activities in their areas.

Pay raises were approved for postal and other Federal workers, but a veto is expected by the President. If action to disapprove these bills is taken by the President, further legislation will be required in the second session to increase pay for Government employees.

A bill to protect the files of the FBI was passed after it became apparent that a uniform procedure was needed for the production in court of statements by Government witnesses.

Also, an Airways Modernization Board was approved to assure a safe, efficient navigation system for all civilian and military aircraft.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Although we have not considered social-security amendments comparable to those of 1956, which reduced the retirement age for women and provided disability benefits at age 50, we have passed bills to make important technical and other changes in the program. The filing time for ministers to secure coverage under social security as self-employed individuals was extended for 2 years. Also, a bill was passed to insure further protection for the disabled by extending the time in which the disability freeze provisions of the Social Security Act could be made retroactive, and to allow a veteran to receive both his service-connected disability compensation and any social-security disability benefits to which he may be entitled.

FLOOD PROTECTION

Included in the public-works appropriation bill for flood control in several areas of the Nation was an initial allocation of $100,000 in planning funds for the proposed Pound River flood-control reservoir in Dickenson County. I will seek further planning funds for this project in the second session, in addition to authorization and planning funds for any other flood-protection dams found feasible under a survey now nearing completion by the Corps of Engineers. Since the flood in the Ninth District earlier this year, I have been exploring every possibility for flood control, such as local protection projects and reservoirs.

COAL RESEARCH

A special Subcommittee on Coal Research, established in the 84th Congress, has now concluded a 15-month study of the coal industry, its problems and needs. Broad recommendations for a greatly expanded program of coal research and development to insure a greater degree of stability for the industry and its workers have been made by the subcommittee. I intend to introduce legislation in the second session to carry out certain of the subcommittee's major recommendations. Coal production in Virginia is concentrated in the Ninth District and is the primary industry in several counties. Therefore, I have supported this subcommittee's work at every opportunity, including the arranging of a field hearing in Abingdon last spring to receive testimony from representatives of the industry in Virginia.

JENNINGS BILLS

I have introduced several bills in the first session and expect consideration of them by the appropriate committees of the Congress in the next session.

Two of my bills pertain to social security changes. The first would lower the retirement age for men to 62 as was done for women last year. The second would provide that a child shall be considered the adopted child of a deceased individual where adoption proceedings were commenced before such individual's death and are subsequently completed by the surviving spouse.

Pending before the Committee on Government Operations is my bill to authorize the donation of surplus Government property to community organizations, such as lifesaving crews and volunteer fire departments.

In the field of agriculture, I have introduced a bill to establish an Agricultural Research and Development Board to begin a research program to find new and increased industrial uses for agriculture products. Early this year I introduced legislation to improve the soil bank, especially to allow more participation by corn and wheat raisers outside the so-called commercial production areas of the Nation. Hearings were held and a bill similar to mine favorably reported. However, the House turned the bill down after amendments were added on the floor. Hearings have also been held on an amendment I have proposed for the soil bank to make grazing lands eligible for inclusion in this program.

Pending in the Agriculture Committee is my bill to establish an acreage-poundage quota system for burley tobacco. This bill would also increase allotments by at least 5 percent and provide adequate export tobacco.

As I stated, hearings will begin in the House Ways and Means Committee next January on tax legislation. I have two bills pending before the committee to increase personal exemptions from $600 to $800 and to allow a taxpayer an additional exemption for college students.

CUMBERLAND GAP PARK

Appropriated in this session were funds for the Cumberland Gap National Historical Park, which is being established on the Virginia-Kentucky-Tennessee border. Included in the appropriation, in addition to regular maintenance funds, was $325,000 for the construction of roads and trails, and $322,000 to construct buildings and utilities. Lee County residents have been very much interested in the development of this park on the county's border.

NEXT SESSION ACTIVITY

Among the major bills likely to be taken up at the second session are the postage rate increase bill, which was passed by the House; the natural gas bill, reported by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee; the TVA bond financing bill, which has passed the Senate; an extension or replacement with a direct appropriation plan, of the Lease-Purchase Act, under which Government buildings are awaiting construction; aid to areas of the Nation with excessive unemployment; trade and tariff bills; and the usual appropriation measures.

Both my district office in Marion, Va., and my Washington office will remain open, as usual, during the recess to serve the people of the district.

Review of the First Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLEVELAND M. BAILEY

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, as the first session of the 85th Congress closes, we can, I believe, look back upon it and its accomplishments with a degree of pride.

It is true that it had some disappointing features, but that could be said of each of its 84 predecessors.

The late adjournment date is evidence that it was a hard-working Congress.

The enactment of the civil-rights bill was an example of the American legislative process functioning in the highest order. In our deliberations the Congress sought and discovered the areas within which it could come to an agreement and concentrated upon those issues. While it is true that the bill, as enacted, may have disappointed some—and I will admit that I would have personally preferred the extension of the jury-trial processes to include all cases of criminal contempt—I firmly believe that we have strengthened the right of all citizens to vote and we have buttressed our judicial system.

On the debit side I was keenly disappointed when the President backed away from the school-construction program which was defeated in the House by the narrowest of margins.

I was also disappointed that various proposals to protect some of our domestic industries were not reported by committees and enacted by the Congress.

I think we can all be proud of the economies made in President Eisenhower's swollen budget. I trust we may be able to follow through in the next session with some tax relief for all the people.

It is good to realize that while we were curtailing Federal expenses, we provided sufficient funds to enable the continuation of some programs vital to the people.

Some examples of these include the provision of sufficient money to enable Hill-Burton grants to several hospitals in the Third Congressional District of West Virginia; to give continued life to the lease-purchase program which, if efficiently administered by the executive branch, will enable the construction of a research building for the Bureau of Mines in Mount Hope, W. Va.; the authorization of channel improvement work at Elizabeth, W. Va.; and for the orderly advance of the Sutton Dam.

Headlines Cannot Hide Labor's Great Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL H. DOUGLAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record excerpts as printed in a recent issue of the Machinist from a timely radio interview given by the able and conscientious Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Kennedy] on the work of the Senate committee investigating improper activities in the labor-management field and on the constructive record of American labor.

There has been a welter of unfavorable and unfair publicity recently directed at labor generally. It is heartening, therefore, to have one who has sifted the evidence carefully, as Senator Kennedy has, present this well-balanced and thoughtful analysis of the abuses revealed on the part of a tiny fraction of labor leaders, the means of clearing them up, and the many positive contributions of labor to American life.

Senator Kennedy's warnings against shotgun legislation against all labor are timely. The complicity of businessmen in the abuses is also noted. He properly points out the responsibility of rank-and-file union members, employers, local government officials, and the public generally for helping to improve present conditions.

I hope many Members of Congress and citizens generally will study this helpful and informative interview.

There being no objection, the excerpts of the radio interview were ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

HEADLINES CAN'T HIDE LABOR'S GREAT WORK

Mr. Hamilton. Senator Kennedy, do you believe that the labor movement will benefit or suffer from these hearings?

Senator Kennedy. Well, I think the long-range objectives of our hearings, of course, should be, and I believe are, to help the labor movement. And I'm confident the trade-union movement as a whole will, in the long run, recognize that this investigation has been beneficial.

That certainly has been the position that the leadership of the AFL–CIO under George Meany has taken. They've given wonderful cooperation to our committee. They've taken steps with us to oust these corrupt officials. They have taken what I consider to be the most significant and admirable step in the history of the American trade-union movement by adopting an excellent hard-hitting set of ethical practices codes.

I don't think any other group in the country at any time in our history has gone so far as the labor movement has in setting up standards, fiduciary trusteeship standards, for labor-union officials.

And I think that it's an appropriate time, in considering where we're going in this investigation, for all of us in the Congress, particularly we in the Senate who serve on that committee, to remember that there is no basis for any general denunciation of labor based on these hearings.

There are, roughly, half a million local union officials in this country, another half a million business agents, lawyers, and other paid officials, and another 750,000 shop stewards and others employed in serving the labor movement. Of these nearly 2 million labor leaders, our committee has neither investigated nor received complaints about more than the tiniest fraction—considerably less than one one-hundredth of 1 percent.

The union movement, like any other part of American life—including political life—has its share of wrongdoers and corruption. When we hear about bankers who embezzle funds or financiers who use money entrusted to them in order to further their own interests, or politicians who betray the public trust, we don't condemn all bankers and all financiers and all politicians. So I hope the American people will keep a perspective about this investigation. It's a job that needs to be done, but it's a job that should be considered in the light of the great contribution that labor has made.

Mr. Conn. Senator Kennedy, you're highly regarded as a friend of organized labor. I would like to ask you whether you feel that there are others in addition to Congress who have, perhaps, the primary responsibility to help clean up this situation?

Senator KENNEDY. Very definitely. And I say that with well over 11 years in the Congress, over 6 years in the House and 5 in the Senate of being a member of the Labor Committee, I'm aware of what we can do and I'm aware of what we cannot do. And I think that this problem is not one for the Congress alone, or really even primarily.

First, I think that local union members have the most important responsibility of all to police their own operations and provide their own safeguards. They must attend their union meetings, insist upon their rights, review carefully the use of their dues, select wisely the leaders whom they will entrust with their union's good name and authority, and purge those leaders (however popular or powerful) who fail to live up to that trust.

When they do that, of course, it makes it easy for those of us who are friends of labor to say that there is no need for any repressive legislation; that labor itself is doing the job. And I think that's the theory that's activated the ethical practices committee of the AFL–CIO.

Of course it is true that in some of these cases we've looked into, it's not been the fault of the rank and file. These mobsters don't gain control through honest ballots and can't be ousted through honest ballots. In fact, under some union trusteeships, no ballots are ever cast. Officials are appointed from the outside and remain in office indefinitely.

And then I think it's important to realize that employers and businessmen also have a major responsibility in this field. We've seen cases where employers engaged in collusive deals with some of these racketeers to prevent unions from coming in, or in order to have a sweetheart contract in which an abnormally low wage is paid.

I think it's a shocking fact that so many employers, large and small, have collaborated in and benefited from these labor racketeering practices; obtaining monopolies for themselves and forcing their competitors in some cases out of business. I think these businessmen, too, must perform their civic responsibilities before this cancer of racketeering can be eliminated from our economic system.

And then, of course, local government has an important responsibility. Most of the things we've investigated have been against the law locally. If the local laws are administered effectively, then there's no need for overriding Federal laws.

And then I think, of course, the general public has the greatest responsibility of all to insist on the highest ethical standards by businessmen, by labor leaders, and by public officials.

Mr. HAMILTON. Senator KENNEDY, you're chairman of the permanent Labor Legislation Subcommittee, and I believe this committee will have the final responsibility for considering and sending to the Senate floor all the legislative proposals that may result from the McClellan hearings.

Well, now I wonder is there not a danger that some Members of Congress, including perhaps even some members of the investigation committee, will seek to use these hearings to justify unduly restrictive antilabor legislation.

Senator KENNEDY. Well, I think that there's obviously that danger that these hearings will be used for that purpose. I think there's a danger of injuring honest union leaders and members with legislation that's fired in a shotgun fashion to get rid of some racketeers, but, nevertheless, also limits the honest union activity of responsible union leaders.

For example, I don't see anything that we've looked into that justifies the passing of a national right-to-work law under which Congress would not permit employers and employees to bargain for a union shop, regardless of whether State law permits them to do so or not.

Nor has anything been disclosed by our investigation to justify the necessity of placing unions fully under the antitrust laws, as though union membership were a commodity bought and sold on the market. Union collusion with employers in order to restrain trade to obtain a monopoly, of course, is already covered by those laws.

Nor have the hearings disclosed any necessity of denying the right of union members to contribute voluntarily to candidates of their choice, Republicans or Democrats, since it's apparent that the racketeers have other means of obtaining their goals.

Mr. CONN. To sum it up, Senator KENNEDY, how do you think the reputation of the labor movement in general is emerging from this investigation? Isn't there a danger here, too, that some of the enemies of labor will seek to use these hearings to tarnish the whole labor movement and the leadership?

Senator KENNEDY. Yes, I think there is that danger, of course, against which responsible officials in the labor movement and in the Government and in the press and the general public must be on guard. These hearings have brought some sensational headlines, which some people will read as representing the whole picture. Others make sweeping statements generalizing from a few bad examples in order to prove their previous prejudices against the whole labor movement.

Moreover, these are sometimes complex matters, and there will inevitably be some who see extortion in every proper union attempt to bargain with employers, some who see conspiracies in every labor-union boycott permissible under the law and traditional in our history.

But these people don't belong in the labor movement and I think that we're helping the labor movement get rid of them. So this is a difficult period for the labor movement; but, of course, labor and the public and all of us will be much better off when these people who don't belong in the labor movement are thrown out.

After all, the labor movement has made a great contribution to the country, and its many members. It has raised the standard of living, brought beneficial legislation and the 40-hour week and all the rest of these things. And I think it's important that that movement continue, that it be free and honest and responsible; and I'm hopeful that this investigation will serve as a right arm to those great many hundreds of thousands of responsible union leaders who only want to serve their membership and advance the reasonable and responsible interests of the labor movement as a whole.

Doubletalk

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABRAHAM J. MULTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, this has been a most unusual legislative year. It started with much promise. The 1956 election had returned the people's hero to the Presidency with an unheard of popular vote.

At the same time, they showed their confidence in the Democratic Party by continuing it in control of both Houses of Congress.

Obviously, the American people agreed that control of the 84th Congress by the Democrats under a Republican President was indeed good for our country.

With the 1st session of the 85th Congress behind us, I believe we can demonstrate that the country would have been better off under a Democratic President. I, for one, am certain we would have had more real leadership and much less doubletalk.

Under our system of government we have a right to look to our President for leadership. Our Constitution requires him to send an annual message to Congress on the state of the Union. Traditionally, our Presidents have interpreted that to mean that they are required to submit a legislative program to the Congress.

Never before in our history have we experienced such a lack of leadership by the President, coupled with so much doubletalk.

Absenteeism is bad enough, of and in itself, in high places. Vacillation and indecision are much, much worse. I will concede that few persons reading the President's messages to the Congress can disagree with the fine, high-principled generalities contained therein. But, by the same token, his campaign speeches in 1952 and again in 1956 were in the same vein.

But what are the specifics? What about the implementation of these fine principles?

Some of the President's supporters, even some of the members of his Cabinet, have been brash enough to label his campaign addresses as merely campaign promises. But his messages to the Congress were not campaign speeches.

It is all well and good for our Republican friends to say, "Oh, this is a Democratic Congress, the Democrats are in control. They can pass any legislation they want to."

Such statements, too, are mere doubletalk. The hard, practical facts of political life are that, in a Congress where the majority party does not have an overwhelming majority in both Houses, neither party can pass legislation without the cooperation of at least some members of the other party.

Wise Congressional leadership avoids bringing to the floor of the Congress legislation that the leadership knows will be opposed by enough members of the opposition party to defeat the bills.

In all those spheres of activity where our party platforms are in agreement, the President should have been in a position to deliver enough Republican votes to offset the defections in Democratic ranks, so as to give the people of the country a working majority in the Congress.

Permit me now to document my case with some specifics.

PARTY PLATFORMS AGREE, BUT THE PRESIDENT IGNORES THEM

Both parties agree that the minimum wage laws should have wider application; that distressed labor areas require Government aid; that the Taft-Hartley law requires amendment; that all Federal employees and, more particularly, the postal employees, are entitled to increased compensation. In most of these instances the President talked gently and fairly but in generalities. As to the Federal employees and postal employees he spoke specifically. He said they were underpaid. He said they were entitled to increased wages.

In none of these instances, except as to the increase of salaries for Government employees, were we able to enact any legislation, because the President and his appointed officers in the executive departments not only refused to help but actually opposed Congressional action.

As to the increases of salaries for Government employees, the President signed the bill which gave those in the highest brackets, big increases and more pay.

As to the little fellows, the civil-service employees, the career employees, the post office workers, he sent word to us that if we dared so legislate he would veto the bills. Unfortunately, we couldn't get the bills to him in time to override a veto. As of today—the last day of this session—it seems certain that the President will veto these bills which do only what he said was fair and just; that is, to give to the little fellow, the civil-service worker and the post-office employee, a cost-of-living increase.

BIG BUSINESS GETS BIGGER AND SMALL BUSINESS GOES TO THE WALL

Other spheres of activity where we got the same kind of doubletalk involved monopolies, trusts, and big business. The mergers continue. Big business gets bigger. Their profits grow. The small-business man goes into bankruptcy. The big-business man gets more and bigger tax cuts by way of fast writeoffs and obsolescence and depletion allowances and Government giveaways, and the little fellow gets the tax bills.

The President is still advocating a natural gas bill. One day he advocated an amendment to that bill, to protect the consumer, and the next day he said he would take the bill without the amendment.

He opposes the development of public power and tries to give the natural resources of the country to the big utilities. By his appointment to various Government agencies and commissions, he does all within his power to destroy TVA, rural electrification, and the other important Government agencies.

HUMAN RIGHTS ARE FORGOTTEN

He says he is for statehood for Alaska and Hawaii but will not lift a finger to bring that about. He says he is for liberalization of our immigration laws and, instead of trying to liberalize them, he condones the action of his State Department and his Attorney General in keeping out immigrants clearly entitled to entry into this country under existing law.

The civil-rights muddle in the Congress was as much his doing as that of anyone else. He did not know from press conference to press conference what was in the bill labeled "the Eisenhower bill." It is surprising that we got a bill at all under the circumstances. Time will demonstrate, in my opinion, that the bill will accomplish very little except to give him and some of his supporters an excuse for new campaign doubletalk. And all the time, the demagogs will continue to rabble-rouse.

He talked big about Federal aid to education. When it came to a showdown in the House, the bill was lost on a very close vote. It could have been won if the President had made three telephone calls. He could have telephoned one of his erstwhile campaign supporters who left the Democratic Party to urge the people to reelect Mr. Eisenhower and who was absent on the day this important bill was defeated. The other 2 calls could surely have changed 2 opposition votes into 2 votes for the bill. These were not just two votes of Republican members of the House. These two men are the President's leaders of his party in the House. The three Members of the House referred to, Mr. Speaker, go unnamed as a matter of traditional Congressional courtesy. The record vote discloses who they are.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS CONTINUE TO BE BUNGLED AFFAIRS

The muddle in foreign affairs is the direct responsibility of the President and his Secretary of State. Those matters of maladministration have no direct bearing upon the legislative function of the Congress. I therefore make no further mention of them here, particularly since that subject alone would require much more time than I can devote today, and my remarks pertain merely to the legislative program.

Those who are interested may read my statements before the House Foreign Affairs Committee and on the floor of the House on this vital subject.

Suffice it to say, I foretold precisely what to expect with reference to the Middle East, including the recent events in Egypt and Syria. Although I did not pretend to set forth any time table, the sequence of events was exactly as I predicted.

The so-called Eisenhower doctrine is preventing the spread of communism and sovietism exactly nowhere.

THE HIGH COST OF EVERYTHING

The increase of interest rates on Government and private debt is the direct responsibility of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury. They have increased the cost of living of every man, woman, and child in the country by increasing the expense of operation of every business enterprise in the country.

The increase in cost of Government is staggering. At the same time, while telling us that the people should save more money and spend less, the President and his Secretary of the Treasury keep the interest rates on Government savings bonds under other interest rates, destroying the incentive of our citizens to save.

He insists that mortgage interest rates be raised and because Congress refuses to increase the interest rates on veterans' mortgages, he threatens to veto the extension of the GI mortgage bill.

I, and many of our colleagues, have been urging that the veterans are entitled to direct loans from the Government. This would not be using Government money but would be using their own life-insurance funds.

Banks, trust companies, life-insurance companies, pension funds, all invest their money in real-estate mortgages. But some shortsighted people urge that the veterans' life-insurance funds should be invested only in low-interest Government bonds instead of in 4-percent veterans' mortgages.

We could not prevail upon our colleagues to go that far. The bill we sent to the President, which he now threatens to veto, merely extends existing law, permitting veterans to get mortgages in those areas of the country where FHA is not operating and for reasons mainly of convenience, cannot or will not operate.

The President glibly talks about controlling inflation and urges voluntary restraint by labor and business to keep costs down.

Then he ridicules labor's promise to forego wage increases if big business will lower prices.

At the same time, he permits price increases in all Government restaurants serving the very employees whose wages he will not increase. He allows their rents and those of all others in FHA houses to be increased, thus setting the example for increased rents by all landlords.

That is not doubletalk; it is double-dealing.

SOME HOPE FOR SMALL BUSINESS

The House passed a Small Business Administration Act to make that agency permanent and to make it more effective in serving the small-business community of our Nation. Despite the fact that the President has not talked out in favor of this bill, we hope that in the next session of Congress, the Senate will pass the House version of that bill.

By that time, too, I hope we will have a good bill ready to give the small-business men some sorely needed tax relief.

FUNNY FIGURES MAKE PHONY BUDGETS

The worst example of doubletalk on the part of the administration, however, came with reference to the budget and the request for appropriations for defense, for foreign aid, and for operation of the Government.

In this field, too, no one knew where the President or his appointees stood from one day to the next. All sorts of ridiculous claims were submitted to the Congress for exaggerated sums. Probing by alert members of the Appropriations Committees showed how farcical some of these claims were.

Despite the disclosure of tremendous waste of money and property during the last 5 years, heads of the departments, aided and abetted by the President, came forth again urging more money than they needed and more money than they could spend.

After the money was appropriated and the bills approved into law by the President, he then directed the heads of various departments not to spend the sums appropriated.

I will refer to only two of the many instances of this heinous maladministration.

The United States Public Health Service has indicated its need for funds to prevent a yellow fever epidemic threatening the United States. The money was appropriated. The bill was signed. The Budget Bureau, under the direction of the President, has directed the department not to expend those moneys, the sole purpose of which was to control the disease.

This is the Government that is conservative where property is concerned and liberal where human values are concerned. That is not my language. That is the modern Republicanism of President Eisenhower.

One more instance of the same kind. After the appropriation for the Defense Department had been approved into law by signature of the President, he then directed that the money not be spent. Mind you, this is the very appropriation request, which when cut by the Congress, was declared by the President to be insufficient for our national security. Now he says to his department heads that they may not spend as much money as was appropriated.

Practically all of the Members of Congress from metropolitan New York attended a conference with Navy Department officials, urging them not to release skilled career employees. It was admitted that if these men were discharged their skills and services would probably be forever lost to the Government. It was further conceded that the full sum necessary to keep these men employed for the next year had been appropriated and that the men were being dismissed solely in order to come within the President's directive to spend less money than had been appropriated. The question of national defense and security was subordinated to the demand to save a few paltry dollars.

WASTE AND CORRUPTION

Congressional committees continue to uncover waste and corruption in every department of Government. At another time, I will discourse at length upon this subject, which continues to be ignored by our President, except on those occasions when he awards a medal or a certificate of merit to the head of the department whose misconduct is exposed.

All of these facts are borne out by the record.

Congressman John D. Dingell Reports to the People of the 15th District of Michigan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, it is my practice to report as often as possible to my people. Accordingly, I offer this report to my people on the first session of the 85th Congress.

The distinguished minority leader of the Senate, the Honorable WILLIAM KNOWLAND, said:

> The Congress worked hard and long. Of course, the number of bills passed ran into the hundreds.

Our own distinguished majority leader in the House, the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK said:

> One of the greatest Congresses this country has ever had.

I am certain that when history has judged this session we will find that this has been one of the great Congresses.

Last session I served my people on the Public Works Committee and on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. Since the legislative work on the road bill, the St. Lawrence Seaway, and projects of especial interest to my people have by and large been completed my service was no longer so valuable on the Public Works Committee. For that reason I changed from the Committee on Public Works to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce at the beginning of this session in order to oppose the gas consumers gouge bill.

I maintain two offices to serve the people of my district, one in Washington, and the other in Detroit at 7310 Grand River Avenue staffed by my able assistant, Mr. Charles S. Brown, and my Detroit secretary, Mrs. Theresa Tabin.

BILLS INTRODUCED

This is a short summary of the major bills I introduced.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Speaker, I devoted much time to improvement and extension of the Social Security Act to more classes of people with better benefits commensurate with the needs of our retirees. I introduced the following bills on this subject:

H. R. 4765, a bill guaranteeing up to 60 days free hospitalization each year to those eligible for social security benefits, including retirees, widows and dependent children.

H. R. 7669, a bill to raise the amount of annual earnings taken into account in computing benefits under the Social Security Act from $4,200 to $6,200. This bill would more adequately cover our social security retirees, raise the maximum benefit for a retired worker from $108.50 per month to around $140 per month. Under this bill widows who now receive a maximum of $81.40 would be entitled to benefits of over $100 a month. Combined family benefit of a retired husband and wife would be increased from $162.80 to around $200 a month.

This bill would not increase social security taxes for workers earning less than $4,200. The maximum increase to the employer and employee will amount to about $3.75 a month but will apply only to workers earning between $4,200 and $6,200 a year.

H. R. 5737, a bill to reduce the retirement age for men to 60 and for women to 55. The purpose of this bill is to permit our citizens to have the opportunity to receive the advantage of a more realistic retirement age where they desire to retire, or where forced to for health reasons, or because of inability to obtain jobs.

H. R. 6948, the humanitarian old-age rights bill, which I cosponsored with a number of other liberal Members of Congress. This bill establishes for the first time clear legislative intent by Congress that public assistance shall be administered promptly and humanely with due regard for preservation of family life. The bill requires that old-age assistance recipients shall receive benefits at the same age as old-age beneficiaries under title 2 of the Social Security Act. It permits earnings of up to $50 a month by aged and handicapped on public assistance instead of the present $30 a month. It also permits parents of needy children, and needy children thmeselves, to earn up to $30 a month to supplement their assistance checks without reduction in aid. This bill will permit recipients of old-age assistance to own a home of assessed value, less all encumbrances, of up to $5,000 free from imposition of lien as well as household furnishings and an insurance or burial policy up to $500. It would eliminate the practice of enforcing collections from relatives of recipients of old-age assistance. This bill also prohibits publishing of names of recipients of old-age assistance in the so-called pauper lists, and provides that the value of United States surplus food made available shall not be deducted from the recipient's aid.

CIVIL RIGHTS

I am proud to say that I was the author of the first bills introduced this session guaranteeing equal rights to all of our citizens. Those bills are:

H. R. 140, a comprehensive civil rights bill aimed at outlawing discrimination in employment, political participation, travel and accommodations; as well as protection of citizens from lynching; and to establish a civil rights division in the Department of Justice for the protection of the rights of all citizens. This included creation of a joint Congressional Committee on Civil Rights, the outlawing of poll tax in the several States, and other things.

H. R. 141, which was purely an anti-poll-tax bill aimed at outlawing the poll tax in the various States as a prerequisite to voting in a Federal election.

H. R. 142, a bill aimed at the creation of a Civil Rights Division in the Department of Justice to protect the rights of all American citizens.

H. R. 143, a statute outlawing lynching and offering Federal protection to all citizens from lynch mobs and lynch law.

H. R. 144, a bill aimed at outlawing discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, national origin or ancestry. This bill was a vigorous compulsory Federal fair employment practices bill.

Some of the features of these bills are included in the Civil Rights Act passed by this Congress.

HEALTH INSURANCE

I was cosponsor of H. R. 3764, a bill to provide a program of national contributory health insurance. This bill provides for a Federal program of contributory health insurance which is sustained by a contribution from an employer and employee into a fund like the social security trust fund. From this fund each citizen will be entitled to full payment of all hospital bills, doctor bills and medication. Thus for the first time the American people are offered a full and complete guaranty of effectual health protection. No longer would health and adequate medical care be the property only of the well-to-do.

URBAN REDEVELOPMENT

This is one of the most pressing problems facing the city of Detroit. As our people know, the city of Detroit is faced by continued obsolescence both of homes and of factories. Many of our fine residential areas are deteriorating into slums through the passage of time, and once thriving industrial areas are lapsing because of changes in factory requirements and needs. To help this problem I introduced two bills:

H. R. 6551, which would authorize the Federal Government to invest up to $1 billion of the social security trust fund, which today totals approximately $22 billion, in bonds or other obligations issued by local public agencies for urban renewal projects.

H. R. 5302, a comprehensive bill to permit Federal cooperation and funds for redevelopment of idle factory areas of the kind we have in Detroit which once employed thousands and thousands of men. This bill would make available to Detroit Federal funds for redeveloping blighted industrial areas for industrial purposes.

TAXATION

During this session, Mr. Speaker, I introduced and worked for three bills to amend the tax laws of this country:

H. R. 7065, providing for a raise in the exemptions for individuals from $600 to $700.

H. R. 7066, which provided for an increase in exemptions from $600 to $800.

I want to make it very clear that these two bills are aimed at benefiting low-income taxpayers and will offer a family of four, earning in the vicinity of $5,000, a tax reduction of about $120 to about $180 per annum. Under these bills a large number of low-income taxpayers will be removed from the rolls, especially those earning under $2,000 a year.

H. R. 2541, a bill to give all corporations with an income of under $525,000 a year a substantial reduction in taxes and offer corporations with incomes larger than that amount increased taxes at a very slight rate. The purpose of this bill was to give tax relief to small business and afford some help in their battle against the economic giants of this country, with no loss of revenue to the Treasury.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Speaker, during this session, I introduced two bills on the subject of immigration:

The first was H. R. 4908, an omnibus immigration bill to eliminate the inequities and harsh features of our present immigration law. This bill does away with the national origins quota system and substitutes for it a general quota system, based only on the ability of this country to absorb newcomers. It eliminates the type of second-class citizenship which is given our naturalized citizens under existing law.

H. R. 4909, a bill to grant permanent refuge to escapees who came into the United States under the parole provisions of the immigration law. The purpose of this bill is to permit the Hungarian escapees who have entered the United States to become eligible for permanent residence and ultimate citizenship.

THE RECORD OF THE 85TH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION

THE BUDGET AND APPROPRIATIONS

The first session of the 85th Congress cut the President's $71.8 billion budget to $66.5 billion.

The House actually voted to cut the President's budget by $6.5 billion. A slightly smaller cut results from the fact that the Senate insisted on higher expenditures for certain items.

I insert a breakdown of fiscal 1958 appropriation bills, and the action taken thereon by the Congress.

According to an earlier edition of the Congressional Quarterly I voted for economy only 13 percent of the time, but in that 13 percent of the time I voted to cut some $6.5 billion in nonessential items, almost the exact amount cut from the budget by the House of Representatives.

Yet I voted for the full amount of the social-security appropriation; the full amount of the Federal contribution for pollution abatement; the full amount of Federal grants to the States for schools, school lunches, old-age assistance, aid to dependent children; Federal research into cancer, heart disease, and mental illness; and Federal highway construction. I voted for the full amount requested for the Food and Drug Administration to protect the purity of this country's food and drugs, and other essential humanitarian and social programs.

I voted to pare $1.1 billion from the administration's request for $4.4 billion for foreign aid, which has been carelessly administered for the past several years. Waste has been so flagrant as to have been commented on on a number of occasions by House and Senate committees which investigated the program. The amount appropriated is in excess of the amount that the administration can justify. Today $5.5 billion is in the pipeline awaiting expenditure, and the $3.3 billion authorized by Congress gives a total of $8.8 billion available for expenditure. At present rates of expenditure that is enough for about 3 years.

In like manner I voted for reduction in the President's request for defense funds.

The Congressional committee which studied this matter said categorically after long hearings that the amount authorized was adequate for the needs of a sufficient defense for this country.

The President received as much as he was able to spend last year, and more than the amount the administration intends to spend this year.

THE SCHOOL BILL

I voted for the Federal School Construction Act this year, by voting against a motion to kill the enacting clause. The vote on that particular motion was very close, 208 to 203. It broke down into 97 Democrats and 111 Republicans voting to kill the bill and 126 Democrats and 77 Republicans voting against killing the bill. Thus a majority of Democrats voted to save the bill, and a majority of Republicans voted to kill the bill.

It is particularly interesting to note that at the time the bill was killed the Republican assistant minority leader and other prominent leaders on the Republican side were urging that the bill be killed and announcing that they intended to vote against it. The only substantial Republican leader who voted against killing the bill was the minority leader himself. It is also interesting to note that he made no significant effort to save the bill. It is equally important that the people be aware that at the time this bill was killed by Republican Members of the House, a maneuver was on to accept the few precise changes in the bill which the President wanted so as to enact a school bill now.

VETERANS

The House refused to raise interest on Veterans' Administration's direct and guaranteed home loans from 4½ to 5 percent, thus preserving low interest rates for veterans.

This Congress enacted a bill to extend the direct loan and guaranteed loan program for World War II veterans housing to July 25, 1959, and to raise the direct loan maximum from $10,000 to $13,500. Congress also passed H. R. 52, to authorize an increase in pensions for veterans with service-connected disability by approximately 10 percent and included higher increases for completely disabled veterans.

CIVIL RIGHTS

I was one of the backers and sponsors of the first civil-rights bill, H. R. 6127, enacted in over 80 years. This is a good bill, and is a long step toward full equality for all our people. It guarantees the right of all citizens to vote and sets up strong Federal injunctive procedures to protect that right. It creates a Civil Rights Division within the Office of the Attorney General headed by an Assistant Attorney General, charged with enforcement of this and several other existing civil-rights statutes. The bill creates a Commission on Civil Rights empowered to look into civil-rights problems.

THE JURY-TRIAL AMENDMENT

Since there is much confusion over the jury trial amendment, I want to explain what was done on that matter.

Two weakening changes were made in the Senate after we in the House had beaten off all attempts to weaken the bill. The first was striking of section III, which in effect narrowed the bill to a right-to-vote bill.

The second was the so-called jury-trial amendment. Opponents of the bill effectively spread the idea that they were protecting the right to jury trial by that amendment. However, it is long settled law that there is no right to jury trial in cases where civil or criminal contempt is the issue; that is, failure to obey lawful order of a court.

A successful compromise was effected very narrowly limiting the jury-trial amendment and guaranteeing the effectiveness of the courts to enforce the bill. The compromise made a new trial by jury available only in contempt cases when the sentence was more than $300 or 45 days imprisonment. There is no jury trial available in civil contempt proceedings at all.

THE GAS GOUGE BILL

During this session of Congress a bill to exempt gas producers from regulation was introduced and was finally reported by the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. This bill would guarantee $1 billion a year windfall to all producers of natural gas and to the pipelines who own their own reserves, and would mean a big rise in consumer prices for natural gas. I was among those who fought this bill in committee and before the House Rules Committee. We were able to slow the progress of the bill to such a point that its sponsors deemed it unwise to bring it before the Congress for final vote and passage. As said by Drew Pearson in his column of August 16, 1957:

> The reason for this (defeat of the gas bill) was the effort of some young, vigorous Congressmen, led by MACDONALD, of Boston; JOHN DINGELL, of Detroit; * * * all Democrats, all first- or second-term Congressmen.

PROTECTION OF THE FBI FILES

I voted for the legislation enacted which would protect FBI files from indiscriminate prying by defendants, yet which would offer to any person accused of crime adequate opportunity to secure sufficient entry into pertinent, relevant documents in the possession of the Government, including the FBI, to adequately prepare for his own defense and to cross-examine witnesses.

IMMIGRATION

I also voted in favor of the compromise immigration bill, S. 2792, which passed both the House and Senate. This bill, although substantially less than was embodied in my own immigration bill, was, nevertheless, a good bill. It permits reissuance of 18,656 visas for refugees, and provides for relief for certain classes of child immigrants, tuberculars, and certain classes of wives and dependents presently excludable.

PAY RAISE FOR FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Postal and classified Federal employees are shamefully underpaid. In order to help these people secure a fair and decent living standard I voted for H. R. 2474, a bill to give a $546 annual increase for each of the 500,000 postal workers, effective September 1, 1957. I also voted for H. R. 2462 to provide an 11-percent increase for Federal white-collar workers. It has been announced that the President will veto both of these bills. In that event I will not only vote for such bills again but will introduce them on the opening day of next year's Congress.

POSTAL RATE INCREASE

I voted against the administration's postal rate increase bill because it continued the several hundred million dollar yearly subsidy to magazines, newspapers, and periodicals at the expense of the individual users of first class and air mail. These last two classes of mail would be raised by up to 33 percent while now paying a profit. Other classes of mail which are losing money would be raised far less than the amount of the present loss to the taxpayer.

I have attempted to follow a good, constructive, liberal program for the benefit of all of the people of my district and of the country. I intend to continue this record as long as my people have me serve them.

Budget Estimates and Appropriations, 85th Congress, 1st Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE CANNON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend, I include herewith certain tabulations summarizing the work of the 1st session of the 85th Congress on appropriation bills. Comparisons are made with the budget estimates submitted by the President. Numerous pertinent related facts and tabulations are included.

The first tabulation is in the usual stereotyped form by bills, segregated as between deficiencies and supplementals for fiscal year 1957 and the bills for fiscal year 1958. Permanent appropriations—those which recur automatically under substantive law without annual action—are included for purpose of showing a more complete picture; they are, perforce, on an estimated basis at this time.

These summaries are necessarily confined to appropriation bills over which the Committee on Appropriations has original jurisdiction. The President recommended numerous authorities to take money out of the Treasury by means other than direct appropriation. Some legislation has ensued as a result. Other budgetary provisions contingent on passage of legislation recommended but failing of enactment, or differing from the President's budget, will affect final overall budgetary results, definitive tabulation of which is not presently available.

For example, Congress again exceeded the President's request for obligating authority for the housing program—to the extent of about $1.1 billion. This is the principal instance, dollarwise, where this was done. On the other hand, final tabulations will show that Congress reduced the 1958 budget through failure to enact legislation for which contingent provision was made in the budget. Principal examples are the $451 million obligational authority included for the school-construction program which failed of enactment and $477 million cut from the foreign-aid authorization request. Preliminary figures indicate that total new obligating authority written into law for fiscal year 1958, including direct appropriations in the following summary, will be somewhat more than $5 billion below the $73.3 billion recommended in the January budget submission.

The executive branch and the Congress in recent years have tended toward lodging more and more budgetary determinations outside the traditional annual appropriation bill procedure. Substantial amounts of the budget are passed upon or set in legislative bills. Various devices to get money out of the Treasury through the side door and the back door rather than the front door have gained in popularity. Action on these matters is often diffused. They all ought to go through one procedure, one system, under one set of rules, so that the Congress and the country can clearly see the whole picture at any given time or point. Present practices tend to undermine and impair effective determinations on the budget each year.

APPROPRIATIONS SUMMARY FOR THE SESSION

Budget estimates of appropriations submitted to the House during the session just concluded totaled $64,494,927,778. Against these requests, the Committee on Appropriations recommended $58,964,425,894, a net cut of $5,530,501,884. The House approved a total of $58,979,154,594, a cut of $5,515,773,184, or about 8.6 percent.

Budget estimates considered by the Senate aggregate $64,638,110,610, and bills passed by that body total $60,832,433,816, a reduction of $3,805,676,794, or 5.9 percent.

Final appropriations approved amount to $59,589,731,631, a reduction of $5,048,378,979, or 7.8 percent below budget estimates submitted by the President. As noted, this does not take into account actions outside the appropriations process with respect to 1953 budget recommendations.

These summaries attest to the determination of the House and the Congress to follow with action the declaration of the House on March 12 in resolution 190 that the public interest required "substantial reductions" in the President's recordbreaking 1958 budget. That budget has been substantially reduced. We have delivered on our promise. It should have been reduced even further. And as I shall shortly demonstrate, it has been reduced under the most extraordinary and anomalous cicumstances in memory. The executive branch first repudiated the budget and openly invited Congress to cut it, then failed to point out where it could be effectively reduced. Furthermore, it fought practically every cut made, then turned around and issued a general order to withhold use of substantial sums after they were appropriated.

THE BUDGET FOR 1958—GENERAL SUMMARY

Mr. Speaker, the story of the 1958 budget is in several respects one of the most remarkable within memory. It would consume pages and take hours to recount the details. I shall confine my remarks to a general summary of the budget and subsequent events.

The President submitted his budget for fiscal year 1958 on January 16. Measured in terms of both authority to obligate the Treasury, and proposed expenditures, it is the largest budget ever submitted in time of peace.

It proposed to initiate numerous new programs and to expand and extend others.

It called for spending $71.8 billion—$73.6 billion including the highway trust fund formerly carried in budget totals.

It called for enactment of $73.3 billion in appropriations and other authority to obligate—$76.4 billion including the highway item.

It proposed the highest tax take ever submitted in time of war or peace.

It specifically recommended another extension of Korean wartime tax rates—though the war ended 4 years ago. Otherwise, it would have proposed a deficit instead of a small surplus.

It proposed a public debt $3.1 billion higher after 5 years of the present administration.

It proposed a cumulative 5-year budget deficit of $1.4 billion counting the highway trust fund and $2.2 billion without it.

It proposed a 45-percent increase in nondefense spending over fiscal year 1954—the first full fiscal year of the present administration.

It proposed total spending on a comparable basis within 1 percent of fiscal year 1953, which was a war year—the last fiscal year of the previous administration.

Rather than reducing expenditures, it proposed to continue the unbroken chain of increased spending for the third straight year in time of peace.

Another measurement is to note that it omitted, for the first time in 4 years, pointed comparisons with spending in 1953 and President Truman's last budget, that for 1954. The reason seems obvious: the 1958 budget recommends authority to obligate $4.6 billion more than did the 1954 budget. Suggested 1958 peacetime spending was only 1 percent less than 1953 wartime spending. The budget for 1958 is so excessive that such unfair and unfavorable comparisons are no longer expedient.

The January budget for 1958 called for spending about $3 billion above 1957; between five and six billion dollars more than 1956; and between seven and eight billion dollars more than the year before that.

Finally, in terms of authority to obligate the Treasury—and this is the crux, because an obligation has to be paid—the January budget for 1958 called for $3.2 billion more than 1957; and $13.2 billion more than 1956.

REACTION TO THE BUDGET

Mr. Speaker, this is what the President submitted to us in the same message in which he expressed his "firm belief that tax rates are still too high" but so utterly failed to reduce spending that he was forced to urge another extension of Korean wartime tax rates in order to show a small budget surplus.

This is the message which advises that the Federal budget must contribute to stability of living costs and preservation of the purchasing power of the dollar, but simultaneously proposes higher spending which aggravates and feeds the fires of inflation and further reduces the buying power of the dollar.

This is the record peacetime budget submitted in time of record national income and it misses by billions—$12 billion to be exact—the President's promise in the fall of 1952 of a $60 billion budget. What is more serious, it proposes a steady trend upward, not downward.

Reaction to this excessive and burdensome budget was swift, widespread, and violent. Never has there been such severe condemnation, such deprecation of an Executive budget, by the press and the people generally. Both sides of the aisle repeatedly sounded a serious note of alarm at the size and direction of the President's budget. Taxpayers the length and breath of the land sounded a sustained crescendo of criticism, demanding that Congress cut the budget and reduce spending.

More significantly, we witnessed the unprecedented repudiation of the budget by the President and the key members of his official family who were its chief architects. On the same day it was submitted, Treasury Secretary Humphrey, conceded by all to have the ear of the President on fiscal matters, said in a lengthy statement to the press:

> The cost of living has recently moved up somewhat in spite of monetary measures to restrain it. Governmental expenditures and the number of Government employees are now increasing. This trend should promptly be stopped.

The President approved this statement. He concurred in it. In fact, he cleared the statement before the Secretary gave it out. But he failed to reflect it in his budget as the law clearly requires. The law, written in 1921, specifically instructs the President to send up a budget every year and to include in it such requests for appropriations and spending as are necessary "in his judgment" to run the Government. He has complete freedom to make such recommendations—and only such recommendations—as are in his judgment necessary. He is not directed to include new programs or expand existing programs. He could promptly have stopped this upward trend in his budget recommendations. But he did not. He asked for more than last year, more than any other year in peacetime history. And his recommendations clearly pointed to even higher spending in the future in that he asked for increased authority to commit the Treasury.

Everyone immediately realized the President and his chief fiscal officials had repudiated the 1958 budget. Apparently it did not represent, as the law states, what was necessary "in his judgment." It obviously represented something in excess of that.

Secretary Humphrey went further in his statement:

> I think there are a lot of places in this budget that can be cut.
>
> I think there is some hope you can reduce expenditures all along the line. I would certainly deplore the day that we thought we couldn't ever reduce expenditures of this terrific amount, the terrific tax take we are taking out of this country. If we don't over a long period of time, I will predict that you will have a depression that will curl your hair, because we are just taking too much money out of this economy that we need to make the jobs that you have to have as time goes on.

Coming from one so intimately in touch with the compilation of the budget and so close to the President, these are frank and startling statements. The Secretary especially deplored the ever-increasing trend of higher and higher budgets, more and more spending, repeated extension of near-record tax rates. He insisted that tax cuts were necessary, but should be considered only if the trend of spending was downward, not upward. But the trend is steadily upward, not downward, as I shall demonstrate. The Director of the Budget said he was "fearful" that spending in future years might go even higher. The record of the past 2 years corroborate his fears.

The President originally estimated fiscal 1956 spending at $62.4 billion but wound up spending $66.5 billion—$4.1 billion more. His original fiscal 1957 budget indicated spending of $65.9 billion but the year closed this past June 30 with actual spending of $69.4 billion without the highway trust fund item and $70.3 billion with it—over-runs of $3.5 billion or $4.4 billion, depending on how you want to figure it. In light of these facts—and every figure is documented—and events of the past 6 months, the budget as submitted is undoubtedly bigger than otherwise apparent from official totals.

REVIEW OF THE BUDGET

Alarmed by the 1958 record-breaking budget, its repudiation by the executive branch, and especially since it was apparent the budget did not comply either with the spirit or the letter of the law under which submitted, the Committee on Appropriations immediately invited the Secretary of the Treasury and the Budget Director to come up and discuss the budget with us. We took it for granted they would throw some light on the situation and offer information of assistance in processing the budget and the appropriation bills. We tried for 2 days, but received no concrete suggestions. They repeatedly expressed the hope—a fond hope, I would say—that Congress would make substantial cuts, but they refused to point out where we could cut a single dollar. They further advised that they were planning a concerted effort within the executive branch to cut both 1957 and 1958 spending, but they steadfastly refused to revise the budget pending before us. They proposed to revise it without telling Congress how and where. The Budget Director said:

> I would like to see you cut, but, frankly, I do not quite see where you can do it, either.

He could not see how we could cut the budget, but he already had undertaken to see that the executive branch cut it.

The outcry against the President's budget continued unabated. We were importuned from all sides to reduce it substantially. The Republican conference of the House, representing the entire Republican membership, significantly adopted a formal resolution calling for a "substantial" reduction in the budget of their administration. Rebellion was rampant.

Then came another volley of statements from high officials in the administration, going simultaneously in both directions. In some respects, the mystery of the budget was deepened, but the pronouncements also indicated belated administration recognition of the budget rebellion. Still no assistance in cutting was forthcoming. The departments defended every dollar of the budget in the official committee hearings. They could not—or would not—tell us where they could get along on less money.

On March 6 Secretary Humphrey had this to say:

> It is the size of this budget, even though balanced, that concerns us.

Who is "us," Mr. Speaker? Obviously, this includes the President. The Secretary, therefore, tells us that the President is concerned about the size of his budget—yet he made it big; he made it excessive. With wide discretion and power in his own hands, he could have made it smaller. But he did not.

Echoing his superior, Treasury Under Secretary Burgess on March 11 said:

> But, after all explanations, the budget is still too big for the future best good of the citizens of this country.

Also, on March 11 the Assistant Budget Director and the President's Special Economic Assistant made speeches of similar import. All these statements were critical of the size of the President's budget.

Then in a rather abrupt about-face, statements from the executive branch made it appear that this high budget was the sole doing of the Congress. In a widely publicized speech of March 6, Secretary Humphrey undertook to explain the division of responsibility for making the budget and for approving the budget. He quoted the law but failed to explain its meaning. As I indicated a little while ago, the law directs the President to request only those amounts which are "necessary in his judgment"—his judgment, not the judgment of Congress or anyone else. Speaking of various programs, the Secretary said:

> In these programs, after Congress passes the laws, the Executive has little opportunity to exercise any discretion, but merely administers the program and writes and distributes the checks which the various laws direct.

The import of this statement is that the President is confined to a routine, mechanical, ministerial role. Nothing could be further from the truth. The job of making the budget is his job. And he has a constitutional role in enactment of the laws. He is directed to confine his recommendations to what is "necessary in his judgment." The Congress did not compel him to budget for numerous and costly new programs. He did so voluntarily. He is the special pleader for them. And some of them are for purely local responsibilities, yet he has often urged that the Government should avoid assuming purely local burdens.

And the Secretary signally failed to point out that these laws are submitted for Presidential approval. If he approves, he signs them; if not, he vetoes them. When he signs a bill calling for expenditure of funds, he signifies approbation. He embraces it. And he has the duty not to provide for them in his budget if "in his judgment" he so determines.

So, Mr. Speaker, let no one be misled as to whose budget it is, although I must confess to some difficulty in determining just what budget the President recommended for 1958. That has never been clear.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 190

It was with view to securing some clarification on the firmness of the budget requests that on March 12 the House, faced with the highest budget in peacetime history and uncertain as to the President's support of it, took the unprecedented action of formally soliciting his advice as to how and where he thought substantial reductions could best be made. We were anxious to have all possible up-to-date information available. We needed to have the President tell us whether we had the right budget before us or if changing conditions warranted alterations. The departments were telling us we had the right budget—they were defending every dollar. But they did not seem to be in step with those who drew up the budget.

The Budget Director had said a resurvey was under way by order of the President.

The confusion got worse before it got better. Several agency heads announced through the press that their budgets could be revised. On March 15 the Housing Administrator announced a $200 million reduction in his 1958 budget. The Secretary of Commerce publicly stated that he knew where $50 million could be taken from his budget, but he failed to specify when the Committee on Appropriations asked him to cite line and page number. He indicated he had in mind projects approved by Congress last year which he had not requested—but I do not recall his pointing out that the President had approved the laws containing the projects.

Then on March 26 the President vigorously defended his budget, saying it had been drawn "carefully, intelligently." He took full responsibility for it. He said it was "futile" to talk about cutting the budget "severely."

RESPONSE TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 190

The President responded on April 18 to the request of the House for advice as to where and how the President thought his budget could best be substantially reduced. It was a disappointing message since it offered no suggestions for appreciable budget reductions of a durable character.

Referring to his $71.8 billion spending budget, he flatly told us that no substantial reduction could be made—that to do so, in his words, would "weaken the Nation's defenses, or cut back or eliminate programs now required by law or proposed in the public interest, or both. That forces the conclusion that a multibillion-dollar reduction in 1958 expenditures can be accomplished only at the expense of the national safety and interest."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the President in effect told us precisely what he told us when he submitted his budget in January. In sum and substance, he advised that the $71.8 billion spending estimate was in the public interest for one reason or the other, or both. That was repetitious—the House was looking for information and clarification.

As to his $73.3 billion obligational budget, involving thousands of budget items, the President suggested reductions in only 7 instances totaling $1.342 billion. They had told us earlier they were resurveying the whole budget, yet only 7 out of thousands of items were included. But there was a qualification. Much of this $1.342 billion was labeled "postponement," "delay," and "adjustment"—not genuine, lasting retrenchment. In fact, after offering the list, the President made this flat and amazing admission:

> Once again I remind the House that less than half of this reduction (this $1.342 billion) in new spending authority can be reflected in reductions in expenditures during the next fiscal year, and even a part of these expenditure reductions will have to be restored in the future.

It is truly a remarkable circumstance that the President would first submit this list—even though it only had 7 items on it—and then immediately discredit its validity by admitting it would have no real effect and that if adopted much of it would have to be restored. The House had every reason to expect more helpful information.

The President concluded his message with this promise:

> All elements of the budget, meanwhile, will remain under searching examination by the executive branch in its continuing effort to find additional savings, large or small, that are possible under existing law. Any additional reductions found possible in new spending authority will be promptly reported in the usual way to the Senate and House of Representatives.

Here the House was given an unequivocal promise that it would be advised promptly of any additional reductions found possible. The entire 1958 budget was still pending in Congress—not a single regular 1958 appropriation bill had then been sent to the President.

The Congress meanwhile continued to process the appropriation bills with the departments defending every dollar. But we made substantial reductions nonetheless. As noted, we have cut the budget estimates of appropriations by the substantial sum of $5,048,378,979. We should have cut deeper.

HOLDING AT OR BELOW THE 1957 RATE

Except for one or two items necessarily resubmitted, based on revised authorization legislation, we heard nothing further from the President as to additional reductions he had found possible in his 1958 budget. He had promised to promptly advise the Congress if and when he did. He had determined on additional cuts but we were not advised. The press obtained and published on July 12 a secret letter issued by the Budget Director in the last days of June to all agencies conveying the President's order to take "positive action" to "keep the rates of commitments, obligations, and expenditures for fiscal year 1958 at or below the level for the fiscal year 1957, to the extent feasible."

By way of emphasis, the order further provided:

> In most cases direct obligations should not rise above the level for the fiscal year 1957.

After listing some allowable exceptions, it went on:

> In the case of those appropriations that are for major capital outlay and development—construction, procurement, research, etc.—the requests for apportionment and the allotments should reflect the postponement of a significant part of the obligations planned in the budget for 1958.

> For all appropriations, however, there should be a critical analysis of all activities, and advantage should be taken of every possibility for reductions; apportionments in all cases should be consistent with "allowable" sums being used in planning the 1959 budget. The sums available in excess of minimum needs will be placed in reserves for contingencies.

We had been told throughout the session that every dollar requested was necessary—that all items had been "critically analyzed" before submission. The President had ordered one resurvey back in January and out of the thousands of budget items, he advised on April 18 of only 7 items we could cut—and as noted earlier—much of this was not of lasting quality. Then, in a secret order, he suddenly directed another resurvey after Congress had adopted several bills and was in the final stages of consideration on the others involving some $44 billion of his total budget. Why did he not hold the 1958 budget to the 1957 level when he sent it up in January? We have insisted all session long that he should have done that. Why did he not advise us, as promised, of this new order when we still had $44 billion of his budget under consideration? Why did they keep insisting on the 1958 budget when they had decided on a policy of cutting back to the 1957 level? Why was not Congress advised that it had obsolete information before it—that the policy had changed?

I am glad the administration is finally evidencing some concern. Spending has been running at such an unbridled rate that unless some effective action is taken we are headed farther down the road to full-blown inflation and possible financial disaster. But if we had been supplied with a budget at the 1957 level, instead of this recordbreaking 1958 budget, we could have made even deeper retrenchment with hope of hastening both tax relief and respectable payment on our staggering national debt.

The Committee on Appropriations promptly called the Budget Director to secure some light on this latest order. Unfortunately, he did not give us any information which would assist in disposing of the $44 billion still pending. He left us completely at sea. He first said he "had no plans"—those are his words—to withhold any of these funds but later advised they would be considered under the secret order along with appropriations already sent to the President.

We inquired specifically about the $34 billion defense bill because we were on the eve of conference with the other body which had raised the House amount by about $1 billion at the insistence of the President. This is the bill on which the President had accused the House of "needlessly gambling" with the national security. This is the principal bill the President had in mind when he advised the House in these words in responding to House Resolution 190:

> I most solemnly advise the House that in these times a cut of any appreciable consequence in current expenditures for national security and related programs would endanger our country and the peace of the world.

This is the bill as to which the President told the press and the Nation on May 22, referring to the item for military personnel strength:

> We had taken the figure of 2.8 million (personnel), as it now stands and, realizing that it was going to be very difficult to stay at that strength, had trimmed the budget down until we thought that it was the bare minimum.

After all these stern warnings, all this information to the contrary, they pulled the rug from under us. On the day before conference with the other body, we received official notice that the President had approved a 100,000-man reduction in military strength—2.8 million men sudden became 2.7 million. With this and other adjustments, we could cut the Senate amount by $142,249,000, they advised. Strange proceedings, Mr. Speaker.

But that is not half the story. When the President "solemnly advised" the House not to make any cut of "appreciable consequence in current expenditures for national security" the Department was running at an annual rate in excess of $40 billion. It actually spent $2.4 billion in excess of the $36 billion estimate for fiscal 1957. When the fiscal year 1958 began it was operating at a rate about $2 billion above the $38 billion estimate for 1958. Spending was completely out of control. They were desperate. Immediate and drastic action was necessary—and they knew it. All the while, right up to the eve of conference, they insisted they must have the budget. Possibly because without it even more drastic cuts would be necessary.

In consequence, almost daily in past weeks administrative orders have been issued to cut defense spending. Among them:

First. Reduction of 100,000 military personnel—with indications of additional cuts;

Second. Cut in number of Reserve drills;

Third. Cut in progress payments to defense contractors;

Fourth. Lay up of Navy ships;

Fifth. Five-percent cut in civilian personnel;

Sixth. Cancellation of major missile program;

Seventh. Cutback in several major procurement programs;

Eighth. Stretchout and slowdown in construction;

Ninth. Closing of installations.

Mr. Speaker, a strong, healthy economy is the wellspring of a strong defense. Without it, we could not long afford a defense adequate to our protection and survival in event of crisis. Substantial reduction in spending and substantial payments on our huge debt are indispensable essentials. These belated cuts ordered by the President should have been made before he asked for too much money, but they are nevertheless welcome. They are long overdue. They are indisputable evidence the administration has let spending get way out of control. In fiscal year 1956, the Government spent $4.1 billions more than its original estimate. In fiscal 1957, it spent $4.4 billion more than its original estimate.

Speaking of uncontrolled defense spending, they over-ran that estimate in fiscal 1957 by $2.4 billion—$38.4 billion as against the estimate of $36 billion. This over-run recalls the intriguing entry in the President's 1956 budget for defense. He estimated total spending at $35.7 billion but to get the total down to an even $34 billion, inserted a discount of $1.7 billion and called it an "unallocated reduction." Not specified. An unknown, said to represent savings to be picked up during the year. I have always suspected this was little more than an 11th hour decision and so inferred at the time. They not only did not save any of the $1.7 billion; they spent it and more besides. This beguiling entry did not show up in the 1957 budget, but they still understated defense spending—not by $1.7 billion, but $2.4 billion.

Mr. Speaker, these belated Presidential orders to cut spending and impound appropriations compel the question: Would the President say he is "needlessly gambling" with the national security in making them? He said the House was. Is he? Of course not, and neither was the House. On the contrary, it could be said to be "needless gambling" to keep on spending more and more and making no significant reduction in the debt.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, when this record-breaking budget was received in January, the administration could not see where it could be cut.

When the Treasury Secretary and the Budget Director came before the committee a week later, they wanted it cut but they said they could not see where it could be cut.

When the President responded to the House in April, he could not see where it could be cut—at least not in a durable, lasting way.

When the House cut the largest appropriation bill, the defense bill, we were accused of "needlessly gambling" with security. The President asked that our action be reversed. Still the budget could not be cut.

But suddenly, Mr. Speaker, on June 28 the secret letter was issued. At last, after many of the bills had been processed and sent to the President, after defending the budget as submitted, at last they could see where the budget could be cut. The general policy is to cut back to the 1957 level, which they should have done in the first place.

But they still would not tell us how this secret order would cut the bills still then pending in Congress. They wanted every dollar appropriated when they knew they were going to turn right around and cut spending. That is what they are doing right now in Defense. And they are doing it in other departments.

THE PUBLIC DEBT

Mr. Speaker, after all these years we still have a colossal national debt. In December 1955 the debt reached its highest point in history. Failure to control spending and make substantial payments on the debt resulted in 3 straight requests from the administration to raise the debt ceiling of $275 billion—twice to $281 billion and once to $278 billion. The executive branch is now engaged in belated, desperate efforts to delay spending in the ensuing months so as to be able to squeeze by within the $275 billion ceiling. Of course, this situation could have been avoided if spending had been controlled. Failure to do so is catching up with them.

The debt situation is summarized in the following table:

The public debt increase during 4 fiscal years of the present administration

[In billions]

	Beginning of year
Fiscal year 1954 (July 1953)	$266.1
Fiscal year 1955 (July 1954)	271.3
Fiscal year 1956 (July 1955)	274.4
Fiscal year 1957 (July 1956)	272.8
Fiscal year 1958 (July 1957)	270.5
Actual increase during last 4 years (July 1953–July 1957)	+4.4

This record of utter failure to hold the public debt at the level reached when the present administration assumed full fiscal responsiblity in July 1953 is in sharp contrast with the 4 preceding years of similar nonwar operation when it was reduced $12 billion, as shown:

The public debt decrease during 4 previous nonwar years

[In billions]

	Beginning of year
Fiscal year 1947 (July 1946)	$269.4
Fiscal year 1948 (July 1947)	258.3
Fiscal year 1949 (July 1948)	252.3
Fiscal year 1950 (July 1949)	252.8
Fiscal year 1951 (July 1950)	257.4
Actual decrease during the 4 years (July 1946–July 1950)	−12.0

These are the facts. They cannot be hidden. And they are distressing. We now owe $4.4 billion more than we did 4 years ago. This is the inevitable result of the succession of record peacetime budgets. Even the Korean wartime taxes still being levied in order to show a budget surplus have not been enough to overtake spiralling Federal expenditures sufficiently to make significant payment on the debt. And, Mr. Speaker, this record of failure is miles away from the promise when President Eisenhower said in 1952:

> Our children deserve a little better of us than to keep hanging bigger and better debts about their necks.

Failure to reduce the debt has contributed to substantially increased cost just to carry it. A significant but often unnoticed expenditure is the inescapable item of interest payments. We now spend as much for interest as we did to run the entire Government only 20 years ago. This item cost $6.4 billion in 1954. In 1957 it cost $7.3 billion. For fiscal 1958 it will undoubtedly exceed the President's estimate of $7.360 billion because recent refundings have been made at a much higher interest rate. We are now having to pay 4 percent on a sizable part of the debt. The average computed interest rate on the debt has consistently increased for several years past, as follows:

Fiscal year	Debt at end of year	Interest cost	Computed interest rate
1952	$259.1	$5.9	2.329
1953	266.1	6.5	2.438
1954	271.3	6.4	2.342
1955	274.4	6.4	2.351
1956	272.8	6.8	2.576
1957	[1] 270.5	[1] 7.3	[1] 2.7

[1] Preliminary.

At the present rate, it will take hundreds of years to pay off the debt. One calculation submitted several months ago shows that if we set about to pay it off by the year 2100—144 years from now—it would entail total payments of $1,205,078,709,686.40. This assumes a 3-percent interest rate which is probably low in light of recent experience, but the figure alone dramatizes the magnitude of the matter.

DEFICITS AND INFLATION

We received many pledges of economy. They assured us they would reduce spending. They said they would reduce the national debt. They would do away with inflation. They would balance the budget.

They have not reduced spending. Spending has been increased—and continues to increase. It increased $2.5 billion between 1954 and 1957. It increased $5.7 billion between 1955 and 1957.

They have not reduced the debt. They have increased the debt—to the tune of $4.4 billion in 4 years.

They have not banished inflation. The official cost-of-living index shows successive increases in each of the past 11 months. It has increased in 15 of the last 16 months. It stands at the highest point in history. The purchasing power of the dollar continues to shrink. Millions of families, especially those with fixed incomes, find it increasingly difficult to provide the necessities of life. Bonds, life insurance, savings accounts, and pensions continue to drop in real value.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, they have not balanced the budget. They are claiming they have. But they have not. They did not balance it—it balanced itself. It just happened—and by a precarious margin at that. It stands as an indisputable fact that the facade of budget surpluses in the fiscal years 1956 and 1957 has not been erected by economy and retrenchment, as I have shown. It is due solely to repeated extension of excessive wartime tax rates and the rising national income. Not a single American family can find any comfort or relief in that because they are still saddled with wartime tax rates. And this excessive spending contributes to their being robbed by unnecessarily high taxes and by inflation. Our taxes are so high that, together with State and local taxes—and, of course, they all come out of the same pocket—nearly 33 percent, one-third, of the national income goes for taxes.

The surplus of $1.6 billion for fiscal 1956 was immediately hailed in an official pronouncement a year ago as a great achievement. In sharp contrast, the tone of the recent announcement of a $1.6 billion surplus for fiscal 1957 was subdued. Possibly the reason can be found in the fact they slipped backward. The surplus was not as large as forecast only 6 months earlier. A recent issue of a national publication carried this story:

> The inside story is that payment was delayed beyond June 30 on more than $500 million worth of armament bills in order to make the 1957 budget year that ended June 30 look better than it actually was. The budget surplus of $1.6 billion otherwise would have been about $1 billion or less.

I had been closely following expenditures in the closing weeks of fiscal 1957. For defense military spending, the daily rate during June averaged $135 million, ranging from a low of $61 million to a high of $487 million, except on the last business day of June, when only $10 million was spent. Furthermore, through July 18—the first 18 days of the new fiscal year—the daily average was up to $164 million.

For the first month of fiscal 1958, budget expenditures exceeded the first month of fiscal 1957 by $800 million. Budget receipts were down $400 million.

This report brings to mind what they did on the last day of the fiscal year 1955, 2 years ago, when they reserved approximately $600 million, or over 21 percent of total reservations made during the whole year under the military assistance program. The effect was to continue the funds available into the following year.

Terming inflation "the most critical economic problem now facing this country," the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board recently said that larger budget surpluses are essential to stem rising prices. He admonished:

> It is clear that the present situation calls both for a larger budgetary surplus than we have had or have in prospect.

In similar vein, the Under Secretary of the Treasury recently said:

> A more anti-inflationary governmental fiscal policy is desirable. In the present high state of prosperity in this country, the Federal Government should have a larger surplus and should be retiring debt more rapidly.
>
> This is probably the most effective step which could be taken by the Federal Government.

The alarming thing, Mr. Speaker, is that we have no assurance of a larger surplus. Certainly not if needed tax relief is granted. As I indicated, the fiscal 1957 surplus was smaller than earlier forecast. And they are spending more and more. Revised executive estimates of spending and income for the current fiscal year 1958 are not yet available. The original estimate of $1.8 billion surplus will, I assume, be revised. It assumed passage of a postal-rate increase priced at $654 million which was not enacted. Full results of the secret order to hold to the 1957 level are unknown but will also affect the outcome.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, failure to achieve a substantial surplus and failure to make significant payments on the debt is not due to inadequate tax rates or insufficient taxable income. It is due to failure to control and reduce spending. That is an undeniable fact.

The following tabulation summarizes the income and spending record of the last 4 years:

Budget receipts, expenditures, deficit (—) or surplus (+)

[In billions]

3. Deficit or surplus	−3.1	−4.2	+1.6	+1.6	+2.2	−4.1	−3.5

Mr. Speaker, the country is gravely concerned over the steadily increasing cost of government. Throughout the Nation there is a constantly growing demand for reduction in public expenditures. It is confined to no one political party and to no one locality. Everywhere there is a rising clamor for retrenchment to stop the spreading conflagration of runaway inflation, to check the rising cost of living now in its 11th month of consecutive skyrocketing advances, to halt the successive sliding drops in the purchasing power of the dollar, to break the upward trend of taxes and permit the repeal of war taxes in time of peace, and really balance the budget. The budget has not been in actual balance the last 4 years through any act of economy or retrenchment or reduction in public expenditures but, on the contrary, has mounted until it now stands at the extreme high-water mark in the peacetime history of the American Republic.

This nationwide protest was intensified when after a presidential campaign based on promises of economy by both parties, the budget sent to the House in January was found to be in excess of any peacetime budget ever submitted to the Congress. Time has more than justified that protest. The price of food has consistently risen since that time while the farm parity index has lagged behind. Interest rates are higher while the Federal Reserve banks are tightening the supply of money and loans. The Government is faced with a possible decline in Federal revenues. Just the other day, August 19, stock prices on the New York exchange took the steepest drop in the last 2 years. Notwithstanding assurances of economy, the civilian payroll of the executive branch has increased for the third successive year and now exceeds $11 billion, the highest in the fiscal history of the Nation. Fixed incomes, insurance policies, and savings accounts are dwindling in value and frequently the widow finds today they will buy less than half they would have bought when contracted for. There are indications that the statutory ceiling of $275 billion on the national debt is in danger of being breached as the debt today approaches $274 billion. So instead of substantially reducing the debt, as promised in the campaign, it has increased with the inevitable results of more inflation, higher cost of living, further reduction in the buying power of the dollar, continuation of war taxes in time of peace, and serious complications in the national economy, with corporate profits, after taxes, and labor, agriculture, the small-business man, and every dinner table in the Nation penalized accordingly.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], at one time dubbed "The Meat Ax," today finds himself cast in the unenviable role of defender of big and reckless spending. He and other administration apologists would have us believe that $5 billion is not $5 billion when cut from the budget estimates of appropriations. Many devious and labored excuses have been advanced, and doubtless many more will be advanced to show that the magnificent record made by the Committee on Appropriations and the House and Senate, in cutting the appropriation bills of the session are "phony," "paper cuts," and "bookkeeping maneuvers." But the fact remains that our drive for economy and sane appropriations have turned back the big spenders with a saving of close to 8 percent below the specific appropriation requests from the White House. That means $5 billion and more the taxpayers will not have to turn over to the tax collectors. Of course, the Government will continue to spend money, money appropriated in former Congresses and carried over. But by the same rule, money denied this year in this budget, this session, will be saved the taxpayers in subsequent years. Practically every general appropriation bill carries money, not only for the current year but for next year and the next year as well. Savings of money denied on estimates and budgets for future spending are savings nevertheless of just that much cash left in the taxpayer's pockets. Eventually if not now.

And in addition, the economy sentiment which we created throughout the Congress and the country undoubtedly resulted in voluntary reductions by the administration of large sums in originally planned requests.

I also want to take advantage of the occasion to say to those disgruntled spenders, booted away from the public trough, who sarcastically assert that much of the money we have saved will "be put back next session in supplemental bills" that we now have an antideficiency law with teeth in it, and each department is required to apportion its appropriations by months or quarters. May I caution the departments that we have given them money to run their departments for 12 months, and we expect them to operate on that basis. To give a Government agency a definite amount for the year and let them spend the money in less than a year and come back and tell us their money is gone, and they will have to have a supplemental appropriation is to permit the departments to appropriate. The Constitution places that responsibility on the Congress and not on the departments, and we invite the entire executive branch to cooperate with us in supporting the Constitution. I trust no governmental employees from the Cabinet officers down to the janitors will labor under any misapprehension on that score. We expect to enforce the law.

Of course, there may be emergencies and unforeseen contingencies which rise unexpectedly. The antideficiency law makes provision for these. But they must come within the letter of the law. Congress, exercising its prerogative under the Constitution, has provided the amount of money it deems sufficient for the year. And Congress expects that amount to cover the year's expense of operation. If any governmental agency, in its superior wisdom, decides that it knows more about that than Congress, it is in for a rude awakening. The country is demanding economy, and it is high time someone in Washington gave heed to that very reasonable demand.

In closing may I say that the committee and the House expect to receive the complete budget estimates for fiscal 1959 much more promptly. For a number of years the foreign aid and the defense construction authorization estimates have been so delayed that the legislative committees could not process the authorizations in time to permit the Committee on Appropriations to complete consideration of the appropriation estimates before the beginning of the fiscal year. There is no tenable reason why all these estimates should not be ready in time to permit the Congress to dispose of its appropriations and avoid the inexcusable delay which has kept Members of the Congress in Washington when they should have been in their States and districts and discharging other engagements and commitments which they should have been free to meet.

May I also assure any who entertain any apprehensions in the matter that in making this much needed reduction in the estimates we have left no Government agency without adequate funds to carry them over the Congressional recess. We have cut the fat but not the muscle. As a matter of fact, we could have extracted another $5 billion without material interference with the legitimate functions of Government. That will be our goal in the future.

An Explanation of Provisions Contained in the Natural Gas Bill, Reported by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, That Protects the Consumer and the Public Interest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, after long and extensive hearings on the Harris natural gas bill, reported favorably a bill to regulate the production, distribution and sale of natural gas.

In order to give a clear understanding of the purpose and effect of the proposed bill as reported, it is my desire to make a summary explanation, setting forth the salient features of the bill intended to protect consumers in the price to be paid and to provide adequacy of supply.

The underlying conditions that must be considered in arriving at a proper decision as to character of legislation that is necessary and proper with respect to the production, distribution and sale of natural gas are numerous and important. The individual welfare of our people, as well as the economic and industrial welfare of our Nation and its progress, requires careful, sane and thoughtful consideration. To give the subject any less can result in harm that can be disastrous to our welfare.

The basic issues that exist with respect to natural gas legislation are such that they can readily lend themselves to appeals directed to the emotions rather than to reason. Consequently, we have statements being issued in many instances by individuals who have little or no knowledge or understanding of the basic facts, economic conditions and the many technical considerations that enter into and have a bearing on the issues and a correct decision.

It is regrettable that too often untrue, deceptive and misleading statements have been made by some who have improperly sought to create a feeling that all that has been done has been solely and entirely to the benefit of big interests and to the complete detriment of the consumer. For instance, the charge has been made that it will add millions of dollars to the cost of living and that every month the average consumer will be saddled with an extra cost and will mean an increase of gas charges to the consumers of upward of $800 million. There is no reasonable basis upon which any such claim can be justified if the provisions of this bill are properly administered.

The figure of $800 million that is being used is the same that was used against the bill which passed 2 years ago and which was vetoed by President Eisenhower. I fought against the enactment of that bill zealously and aggressively. I sought to have it recommitted to the committee for further study. Failing in that, I voted against its passage by Congress. In fact, I was a leader in the fight against its adoption.

I believed then, and I still believe, that the bill was so obnoxious that if its provisions had been carried out it could have meant in time the loss to consumers totaling $800 million. But, that was under the terms of the bill of 2 years ago. The same thing does not apply to the present bill.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION AND STATE UTILITY COMMISSIONS REGULATE PRICE

The present bill is entirely different from the above-mentioned bill. The very purpose of the bill is to provide against any unreasonable price increase. The Federal Power Commission, as the guardian of the public interest, was inaugurated during the Roosevelt administration to prevent unfair treatment of all interested parties. It was given strong regulatory powers to be exercised in the public interest. The pending bill does not seek to interfere with nor curtail such, and, is designed to meet existing conditions.

Of course, no one can say positively that future conditions of an economic character would not arise to affect the price structure, but, the bill is given definite power to regulate prices in the public interest. We are living in a period that the economic conditions are continually causing an increase in living costs. Today, for instance, railroad fares are greatly increased, but we have the Interstate Commerce Commission set up as a regulatory body to make certain that all rates shall be just and reasonable. The Federal Power Commission has been given power under this bill to likewise require that prices of gas to consumers shall be just and reasonable.

Furthermore, under the proposed bill, to insure this, every interested party, even to the humblest citizen and including city and State officials are given the right to oppose and be heard before there is any increase in price.

This is something that did not exist heretofore. It is all for the benefit of the consumer. There can be no increase of the price of gas unless the Federal Power Commission so orders and permits.

Furthermore, it should be realized that not only does the Federal Power Commission have the power to control the price of gas that enters into interstate commerce, but, also the rate that can be charged by the pipelines that convey it from the producing fields to the States where it is to be consumed. And, in addition to this, when the gas reaches the consuming State, New Jersey for instance, then the State utility commission has the power to fix the price that can be charged by the distributing company to the individual consumer.

Thus, from the time the gas leaves the producing State until it enters the homes of individual consumers, or, the furnaces of any industrial user, it is subject to regulations affecting the price to be charged the consumer.

The bill before Congress gives regulatory control to the Federal Power Commission while the gas is subject to Federal jurisdiction, and the State utility commissions have control when it reaches the consuming State. Thus, throughout its entire course the price of the gas is subject to the control of public bodies set up by the Congress and State legislatures to insure a fair and reasonable price. This is all done to protect the consumer and in the public interest. This is as it should be.

And, while I am of the opinion that the present bill does give every reasonable protection to the consumer consistent with our American way, yet, when the bill is under consideration in the Congress if it should appear that any amendment is necessary and proper to strengthen the bill, then such would certainly have my support.

I am anxious to provide the very best protection to the public interest. That was the purpose and intent of the committee in reporting this bill to the Congress.

It would have been unfair and undemocratic for the committee to have gagged Congressional consideration of this important matter by refusing to report a bill. The action of the committee now permits every Member of the House to express their views representing the different sections of the Nation with its differing viewpoints.

ADEQUATE SUPPLY OF GAS NECESSARY

In our consideration of this subject, we also must not overlook the importance and necessity of giving the consumer assurance of an adequate supply of gas. In our present day economy an adequate supply and reasonable price go hand in hand. Each is important to the consumer.

Of course, the consumer is interested in price and the public interest requires that such shall at all times be so regulated that it shall not exceed what is reasonable and fair. To make certain of this, the bill gives the Federal Power Commission the power to fix prices for gas in interstate commerce that is reasonable and just. However, while it is important and appropriate to emphasize a proper price to the consumer, yet, we cannot discount nor should we overlook the fact that it is also important to make certain that the consumer has an adequate supply of gas. Without such the facilities, that are now in use and that have cost millions of dollars, would go for naught and the consequences would be disastrous to consumers.

In considering the question of providing an adequate supply, I ask in all seriousness what happens if the gas producer is not satisfied with the price? What then can happen to the consumer? If the producer does not receive what he considers a fair price for his gas, then he can refuse to sell it in interstate commerce. He can retain it in the well or sell it only within the State where produced and thus avoid Federal regulation.

Under such circumstances, I ask again. What happens if the gas producer is not satisfied with the price? What becomes of the consumer who is depending upon the gas being sold in interstate commerce and thus finally reaching him in his home in a State that does not produce gas? There is no power existing in our Federal Government under our present system of Government that can compel the producer to sell. This could be done in Russia, but not in America.

The same principle applies here as applies to labor. No worker can be compelled to sell his labor for any price that he does not wish. He can refuse to work. So can the owner of natural-gas wells refuse to sell his gas for a price that he does not consider fair and just.

There is also a further possibility that can happen with results that are disastrous in nonproducing States, if and when the price is not fair and just to the producer. This situation was pointed out to the committee in a statement of the Federal Power Commission, namely:

> The present situation appears to encourage the use of natural gas within the States where produced rather than in the more populous areas where it has the greatest usefulness.

In this connection, we are all aware of the tendency of many industries to remove their plants to Southern and other States where the wage scale and taxes are less than in the North and Northeastern States. Already this tendency has caused many textile mills to move away from present and long-established locations.

This has left many towns dead industrially. Labor unions, CIO and AFL, through their representatives have held many conferences with Members of Congress from the affected areas to find ways and means of stopping this tendency from becoming general. The fact that seasonal conditions make living costs cheaper has also been an influence.

Now, if we add to this a moving of industry because of a more beneficial price structure for natural gas in the producing States, we can readily understand the force of the statement made by the Federal Power Commission, "that without some legislation such as that here proposed domestic and other natural-gas consumers may find themselves facing not only diminishing supply of such gas but the fact that some of the industries upon which the economy of their communities depend may have removed from their midst and gone to the producing areas." This is no idle fear when we realize that Federal jurisdiction does not extend into the producing State and only applies if and when the gas moves in interstate commerce.

And, then there is the further danger pointed out to the committee, "Nor does the present regulation—existing law—appear to encourage further exploration and development which are essential to continued supplies." And, then, the committee very wisely directs attention to the necessity for remedial legislation in these words, "It is certainly not beyond the bounds of reason, therefore, to believe that without some legislation such as that here proposed domestic and other natural-gas consumers may find themselves facing the situations above outlined."

Under the circumstances as outlined by the Federal Power Commission, whose duty it is to study the question from every standpoint and report to Congress, would it not be foolish to cast aside its recommendations and ignore its warnings? The duty of the committee was clear and impelling. It met its obligation by reporting to the Congress what was considered by a majority of the committee as the most effectual way to solve the problem in the public interest.

Therefore, the purpose of the bill, as reported by the committee, in providing that the Federal Power Commission shall have regulatory powers to fix a reasonable price and transportation charges is intended not only to protect the consumer against unreasonable prices, but also to make certain that a fair and reasonable price is made available to the producer as an incentive to supply gas and make explorations for additional gas to meet the ever-growing demand in consuming States.

Thus, the fixing of a fair and reasonable price has its advantages to both parties—the producer and consumer. It thereupon becomes the duty of the Federal Power Commission and the local State utility commission at all times in fixing the price to be paid by the eventual consumer to do so with the thought in mind that the public interest must in all respects be kept paramount.

CAREFUL CONSIDERATION GIVEN BY COMMITTEE

In its effort to solve the important issue involved in this matter, the committee held extensive hearings. Witnesses to the number of 171 appeared and testified or submitted statements for the consideration of the committee. These covered wide and varied interests, including individuals, Federal, State, municipal, and other groups, each expressing their viewpoint and recommendations.

Agencies of government supplied much factual information, as well as conclusions, based upon experience gained in this and other regulatory matters. Altogether this testimony covered 1,742 printed pages. All of this was studied carefully and analyzed. The bill as reported to the Congress for its consideration is the result. Certainly, there could not have been a more careful, conscientious, and sincere effort to reach a proper solution even though there may be differing viewpoints in some particulars.

NECESSITY FOR LEGISLATION

In recent years as a result of decisions made by our Federal courts, many complications have arisen. As a result of this, the Federal Power Commission has requested Congress to rectify and improve the situation so as to make the Natural Gas Act more adaptable to the regulation of gas producers and for the benefit of consumers.

The committee in complying with this respect has had at all times in mind the underlying policy of the Natural Gas Act, reading as follows:

> It is hereby declared that the business of transporting and selling gas for ultimate distribution to the public interest and that Federal regulation in matters relating to the transportation of natural gas and the sale thereof in interstate and foreign commerce is necessary to the public interest.

I actively participated in the adoption of that statement of policy, believing as I do that the public interest is paramount.

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION APPROVES COMMITTEE BILL

It seems to me that there is great significance and importance to be attached to the fact that the Federal Power Commission has given its approval to the bill as reported by the committee.

This is the Commission that since its inauguration in 1938 has been charged with protecting the public interest in the transportation and distribution of natural gas. This is the Commission that has had the experience of regulating that industry for approximately 20 years. It is to be assumed that the members of the Commission and its talented staff have gained much knowledge of what is necessary and proper for effectual regulation in all the varied phases of the natural-gas industry. It is with this background of experience that it has made its study, presented its recommendations and given its approval to the committee bill.

CONCLUSION

The Federal Power Commission in its report to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce concerning this legislation has very properly said: "While the public is interested in reasonable rates, it is equally concerned with the continued maintenance of adequate gas service to all of the ultimate consumers who have invested in the aggregate millions of dollars in gas furnaces, stoves, and other gas-using equipment."

Thus, the Commission points out that there must be a dual objective which legislation on the subject should achieve. To accomplish this purpose the Commission set forth five basic considerations that in its opinion were necessary to accomplish this purpose. These recommendations or suggestions have been incorporated in the pending bill. Whereupon, the Commission after a study of the proposed bill has reported to the committee its approval in these words:

> The Commission favors the basic principles and objectives of the bill and believes that such legislation is necessary for practicable, workable, and efficient regulation of gas producers in the national interest. Early enactment is recommended.

In coming to this final decision it is appropriate to emphasize, and it cannot be emphasized too often or too strongly, the importance of having a regulatory law that will not only protect the price to the consumer, which is in itself a very important matter, but will also make certain an adequate supply to the consumer. Each is important and must be given consideration. I remember when—the time was a few years ago—the local distributing company in the Camden, N. J., locality had to refuse any more customers because of the insufficiency of supply. We certainly do not want this to happen again with a resulting disastrous effect on the millions of dollars of gas equipment our people now have and depend upon. Nor do we want to have to resort again to manufactured gas which would be prohibitive in price.

It has been, and will continue to be, my aim to protect in every way that is within my power the public interest in this or any other legislation that comes before the Congress during my membership in that body. This has always been, and will continue to be, my first and only consideration in the performance of my public duty.

Activities of the House Committee on Government Operations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE M. KILGORE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present the following interim report on the activities of the Committee on Government Operations in the first 8 months of the 85th Congress.

JURISDICTION

The jurisdiction and duties of the Committee on Government Operations are set forth in rule XI (8) of the House of Representatives as follows:

> All proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, and other matters relating to * * * (a) budget and accounting measures, other than appropriations, and (b) reorganizations in the executive branch of the Government shall be referred to the Committee on Government Operations.
>
> The Committee on Government Operations shall have the duty of—
>
> (1) receiving and examining reports of the Comptroller General of the United States and of submitting such recommendations to the House as it deems necessary or desirable in connection with the subject matter of such reports;
>
> (2) studying the operation of Government activities at all levels with a view to determining its economy and efficiency;
>
> (3) evaluating the effects of laws enacted to reorganize the legislative and executive branches of the Government;
>
> (4) studying intergovernmental relationships between the United States and the States and municipalities and between the United States and international organizations of which the United States is a member.

ORGANIZATION

In order to perform its functions and to carry out its duties as fully and as effectively as possible, the committee, under the leadership of its chairman, the Honorable WILLIAM L. DAWSON, of Illinois, at the beginning of the 84th Congress established seven regular subcommittees having agency and functional jurisdiction similar to corresponding subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations. These seven regular subcommittees, which cover the entire field of executive expenditures, were continued in the 85th Congress. Their names and chairmen are as follows:

Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee, Hon. WILLIAM L. DAWSON, chairman.

Military Operations Subcommittee, Hon. CHET HOLIFIELD, chairman.

Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee, Hon. L. H. FOUNTAIN, chairman.

Public Works and Resources Subcommittee, Hon. EARL CHUDOFF, chairman.

International Operations Subcommittee, Hon. PORTER HARDY, Jr., chairman.

Legal and Monetary Affairs Subcommittee, Hon. JOHN A. BLATNIK, chairman.

General Government Activities Subcommittee, Hon. JACK BROOKS, chairman.

In addition, three special subcommittees were organized to handle special problems. The first two listed are continuing their studies, and the last has almost completed work on the report of its investigations. The special subcommittees and their chairmen are:

Special Donable Property Subcommittee, Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK, chairman.

Special Government Information Subcommittee, Hon. JOHN E. MOSS, chairman.

Special Subcommittee on Water Resources and Power, Hon. ROBERT E. JONES, chairman.

REPORTS

In the first 8 months of the 85th Congress, the Committee on Government Operations approved and submitted to the Congress 16 reports of an investigative nature. In addition, five committee prints consisting of staff studies or compilations were published. At the close of the first session a considerable number of reports and staff studies were under preparation. These will be considered by the subcommittees and the full committee early in the second session. A substantial number of hearings covering a wide range of subjects have been programed for the recess between sessions.

For convenience the published reports and committee prints are listed here with the name of the originating subcommittee. A more detailed discussion of the material will be found below in the breakdown of the committee's activities by subcommittee. In all cases where the hearings were held the transcripts have been printed.

COMMITTEE PRINTS

Questionnaire on administrative organization for public information activities.

Economic appraisal of the sugar operations of the Virgin Islands Corporation.

Reorganization by plan and by statute, 1946–56.

The budget process in the Federal Government.

Actions taken by departments and agencies on the lending agencies recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

LEGISLATION

The legislative jurisdiction of the Committee on Government Operations encompasses a wide range of very important governmental operations. It includes all matters relating to budgeting and accounting measures other than appropriations and all matters relating to reorganizations in the executive branch of the Government. In addition, property disposals and matters relating to Federal property and administrative services are referred to the committee. The committee studied a large number of legislative proposals and reported 15 favorably to the House. These are discussed more fully under the subcommittee breakdown below, but those reported are listed here for convenience, with the name of the subcommittee which initially considered them:

H. R. 3028, to provide for the relief of certain female members of the Air Force, and for other purposes. Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee.

H. R. 4945, providing for the conveyance of certain real property in West Palm Beach, Fla., to the Port of Palm Beach District. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

H. R. 5110, Public Law 85-51, amending the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

H. R. 6182, to provide for the conveyance of certain real property of the United States to the former owners thereof. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

H. R. 6900, amending section 206 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, so as to enable the Comptroller General to make certain examinations of expenditures and more effectively to assist the Appropriations Committees in considering the budget. Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee.

H. R. 7081, providing for the removal of a cloud on the title to certain real property located in the State of Illinois. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

H. R. 7390, to amend the Administrative Expenses Act of 1946, and for other purposes. Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee.

H. R. 7964, removing the limitation on the use of certain real property heretofore conveyed to the city of Austin, Tex., by the United States. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

H. R. 8002, to provide for improved methods of stating budget estimates and estimates for deficiency and supplemental appropriations. Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee.

H. R. 8195, to facilitate the payment of Government checks, and for other purposes. Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee.

H. R. 8364, further amending the Reorganization Act of 1949, as amended, so that such act will apply to reorganization plans transmitted to the Congress at any time before June 1, 1959. Executive and Legislative Reorganization Subcommittee.

H. R. 8795, amending section 507 and subsection 602 (a) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended. Special Donable Property Subcommittee.

S. 806, Public Law 85-100, authorizing the Administrator of General Services to quitclaim all interest of the United States in and to a certain parcel of land in Indiana to the board of trustees for the Vincennes University, Vincennes, Ind. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

S. 1141, Public Law 85-81, authorizing and directing the Administrator of General Services to donate to the Philippine Republic certain records captured from insurrectors during 1899-1903. General Government Activities Subcommittee.

REORGANIZATION PLAN

Only one reorganization plan was transmitted to the first session of the 85th Congress by the President. This, Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1957, made a further distribution of the functions and assets of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and abolished the corporation.

No resolutions of disapproval were introduced in the House and the plan was allowed to take effect after study by the committee staff and consideration by committee members indicated no serious objection to the measure.

STUDY ON ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANIZATION, PROCEDURE AND PRACTICE

A comprehensive study of the administrative organization, procedure and practice of the Federal departments and agencies was commenced at the beginning of the 85th Congress. The committee staff had prepared a searching questionnaire on procedure and practice and asked 42 Federal departments and agencies to respond. The questionnaire was designed to provide an accurate and up-to-date picture of the status of administrative practice and procedural reform within the Federal agencies.

The staff has undertaken thorough and minute analysis of the responses. In addition, preparations have been made for hearings which will throw additional light on the current problems and suggested reforms in administrative procedure. A major product of the study will be making available in a single, authoritative source an evaluation of the effects of earlier proposals for administrative reform and the current status of administrative practice.

In the course of analyzing the responses to the questionnaire and preparing for hearings, the staff has conferred with interested persons and experts in administrative procedure. These include law professors, former and current Government officials, private practitioners, and members of the staff of the Office of Administrative Procedure in the Department of Justice. A succinct and complete report encompassing all phases of the study will be ready by January 1958.

REVIEW OF AUDIT REPORTS BY THE GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

Pursuant to the duty and responsibility of the Committee on Government Operations as set forth in the rules of the House and by statute, the committee has established a procedure of review and analysis of the audit reports referred to it by the Comptroller General. Upon the direction of the chairman, a program of conferences between members of the committee staff and representatives from the General Accounting Office was established. These conferences were held after the staff had an opportunity to review, analyze, and study the audit reports. Staff conferences and other communications with agency officials were accomplished where it was deemed necessary or desirable to develop more fully the General Accounting Office findings and recommendations, or to assure proper compliance by the agency involved.

During the first 6½ months of this session the staff held conferences with representatives of the General Accounting Office on 20 different occasions discussing a total of 40 audit reports, involving a great many different and varied governmental activities and establishments. A report to the Congress on these audit reports is being prepared.

In addition members of the committee staff have undertaken advance work on a study and investigation of the European branch of the General Accounting Office and its audit reports. A report will be submitted to the Congress upon the completion of that study.

COMPILATION OF LEGISLATIVE ACTION ON THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMISSION ON ORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH OF THE GOVERNMENT (HOOVER COMMISSION)

The committee has prepared an up-to-date and simplified compilation of all bills introduced in the House and Senate and of legislative action to carry out the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government—Hoover Commission—in the 84th Congress and in the first session of the 85th. This document will be published in the form of a committee print in the very near future.

SUBCOMMITTEE BREAKDOWN

Following is a more detailed description of the committee's activities arranged according to the subcommittees primarily interested in the subject matter involved:

EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION SUBCOMMITTEE, WILLIAM L. DAWSON, CHAIRMAN

First. Legislation: Seventy-four bills were referred to this subcommittee for consideration. Twenty-five dealt with budget and accounting matters. Fourteen proposed the creation of new departments or agencies of the Federal Government. Eleven dealt with Government competition with private enterprise. The other bills involved various matters under the jurisdiction of the subcommittee. All of these measures were carefully studied by the members and the staff and reports were requested and obtained from the various departments affected. Background material of various types was collected from proper outside sources where necessary for the information of the subcommittee and the proper evaluation of the measures.

(a) Improving Federal budgeting and appropriations procedures: After careful study and extensive hearings on all of the bills on this subject which provided a variety of approaches the subcommittee acted favorably on H. R. 8002 and H. R. 6900. Both of these measures were subsequently reported by the full committee with recommendations that they be passed by the House. H. R. 8002 would place Federal budgeting and appropriations on an annual accrued expenditures basis. It was based on a recommendation of the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government and supported by the Bureau of the Budget and the Comptroller General—see printed hearings and House Report No. 572. H. R. 6900 would enable the Comptroller General to make certain examinations of expenditures and more effectively assist the Appropriations Committees in considering the budget. This bill was approved by the Comptroller who recommended an amendment that was accepted by the subcommittee—see printed hearings and House Report No. 567.

(b) Standards for Government advisory committees: During the 84th Congress this subcommittee made an extensive inquiry into the operations of advisory committees to the various departments and agencies—see House Report No. 2894, 84th Congress, 2d session. The subcommittee's recommendations were put in the form of a bill, H. R. 7390, which established certain definite standards for the creation and functioning of such committees. The bill was approved after hearings and passed the House on July 10, 1957—see printed hearings and House Report No. 576.

(c) Validating certain improper payments to female Air Force personnel: At the request of the Department of Defense, Chairman DAWSON introduced and the subcommittee considered a bill, H. R. 3028, to validate certain payments made to female Air Force personnel by the Department of the Air Force and which were subsequently ruled illegal by the Comptroller General. The subcommittee recommended approval of the measure because of (a) the hardship which otherwise would be put on those who received the payments and (b) the expense of recoupment to the United States Government. The bill was reported favorably by the full committee and passed the House—see House Report No. 144. The House subsequently concurred in a Senate amendment designed to further insure that the situation could not arise again—Public Law No. 85-272.

(d) Procedures in the payment of Government checks: At the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, Chairman DAWSON introduced H. R. 8195, a bill to facilitate the payment of Government checks, and for other purposes. This measure, a part of the joint accounting program, will produce economies in both the Treasury Department and the General Accounting Office. It will simplify and improve the accounting methods and procedures incident to the payment of Government checks which are lost, stolen, or destroyed, and related accounting operations now prescribed by law. Upon the subcommittee's recommendation, the bill was reported favorably by the full committee and passed the House—see House Report No. 666.

(e) Extending Reorganization Act of 1949: At the request of the President, the chairman introduced a bill, H. R. 6711, to extend the authority of the President to submit reorganization plans to the Congress. Prior authority expired on June 1, 1957. After hearings and deliberations, the subcommittee recommended that this authority be extended for 2 years and that the Reorganization Act of 1949 be amended to provide that reorganization plans could be disapproved by a simple majority vote of either House rather than by a constitutional majority.

H. R. 8364, a clean bill was reported favorably by the full committee and passed the House—see printed hearings and House Report No. 657. The Senate agreed to the House amendment and the bill became law—Public Law No. 85.

Second. Hoover Commission reports: The subcommittee has continued its study of the reports of the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch referred to the Committee on Government Operations by the Speaker of the House. In the committee report on the Hoover report on food and clothing—House Report No. 2013, 84th Congress, 2d session—released on April 18, 1956, the recommendation was made that semiannual reports be made to the Congress by the Secretary of Defense on the integration of supply management. These reports have been referred to this subcommittee and are being studied to see if the intent of Congress is being carried out.

The subcommittee sent a questionnaire to the various departments and agencies affected by the Hoover Commission recommendations on lending agencies for information on what steps had been taken, if any, to put these recommendations into effect. The replies have been put into the form of a committee print and made available to Members of the House.

A similar questionnaire was circulated on the recommendations of the Hoover Report on Transportation. Replies have been received and are being studied.

Third. Budget procedures: The subcommittee has been making an intensive study of budget procedures in the executive branch in connection with the large number of bills before it. A committee print, The Budget Process in the Federal Government, was prepared and made available to the Members of the House.

Fourth. Federal real and personal property inventory report:

In December 1956, the committee issued a committee print entitled "Supplementary Real and Personal Property Inventory Report, Civilian and Military, of the United States Government—Located in the Continental United States, in the Territories, and Overseas, as of July 30, 1956." This report was refined and broadened in scope from an earlier Federal property inventory report—House Report No. 1930, 84th Congress, 2d session—in that it listed a realistic value for public domain lands, heretofore listed on the books of the Government at no value. Public domain lands were appraised by the individual departments and agencies and an estimated present-day value was placed on them. In some instances, estimated present-day values were placed on buildings, structures, and facilities located on these lands, but these values were not included in the overall totals used in the report; rather, they were included merely for information purposes. Acquisition cost figures were used for all Federal realty—exclusive of public domain lands—buildings, structures, and facilities.

Personal property inventory figures of the Federal Government were increased as a result of refinements brought about by improved accounting procedures employed within the Government. The Treasury Department was instrumental in furnishing the committee with refinements in this area. Also, the latest report reflects additional figures in areas of construction-in-progress, leasehold improvements, and real estate collateral acquired.

The committee expects to issue in December of this year another Federal property inventory report, covering real and personal property inventories as of June 30, 1957. The report will be prepared along the same lines and in the same manner as the report issued last year. Further refinements in personalty and realty inventories will be reflected in this year's report, particularly in inventories of the Department of Defense.

Fifth. Reorganization plans: Only one reorganization plan was submitted to the Congress during the first session. This constituted a further liquidation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The subject matter was carefully studied by the staff and members of the subcommittee. No objections were registered to the plan and it was permitted to take effect.

Sixth. Other matters: The subcommittee continued its study of past reorganization plans; advisory committees, w. o. c. personnel practices and management contracts; the curtailment of Government functions and the feasibility of the creation of a Federal Department of Urban Affairs.

Hearings were also held on H. R. 7694, introduced by Congressman McCORMACK, to constitute the General Services Administration a Federal department.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE,
L. H. FOUNTAIN, CHAIRMAN

The Committee on Government Operations delegated to its Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee responsibility for studying intergovernmental relationships between the United States and the States and municipalities. Since July 1955, the subcommittee has also had before it for study the report of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations—the Kestnbaum Commission; this Commission had been established by Congress in 1953, at the request of the President, to study and clearly define the proper role of the National Government in relation to the States and their political subdivisions. In addition, the subcommittee has been delegated responsibility for studying the operation of the Departments of Agriculture, Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare and their related agencies at all levels with respect to economy and efficiency. This report on the activities of the subcommittee during the first session of the 85th Congress will, for convenience, separately state the work of the subcommittee in each of these areas of responsibility.

First. Intergovernmental relations:

During the first 7 months of 1957 the subcommittee continued and intensified a comprehensive study of intergovernmental relationships begun in 1955.

From the beginning, the subcommittee's activities in this field have been planned with two objectives in mind: First, to carry out the subcommittee's general responsibility for studying Federal-State-local relationships, and second, to evaluate the recommendations of the Kestnbaum Commission.

In December 1955, each Federal department and agency was asked to provide a detailed description of its programs and activities involving intergovernmental relationships. Each department and agency was also asked to list all recommendations of the Kestnbaum Commission which applied to it, and to describe any action taken to adopt such recommendations. A 776-page staff report on these replies was published in August 1956. A compilation of the recommendations and major statements of the Kestnbaum Commission identifying the Federal agency and program concerned was also prepared at the request of the subcommittee and published in 1956, as was a selected bibliography on intergovernmental relations in the United States.

In 1956, all State governors and a large number of major and county officials were asked to give their views on a series of broad questions relating to Federal programs of an intergovernmental nature. Replies from 42 of the 48 States, from 53 cities, and from 44 counties were received and analyzed in 1956 and early 1957. A 542-page report was prepared by the subcommittee containing the complete replies from all State and local officials and an analysis of the views they expressed; however, this report did not attempt to render any judgment as to the merits of such views.

The Report on Replies from State and Local Governments was unanimously adopted by the Committee on Government Operations on June 13, 1957, as its sixth report to the 85th Congress—House Report No. 575. The subcommittee has filled a large number of requests for this document from Federal, State, and local officials, educators, libraries, and other interested organizations and individuals. These same sources are continuing to send in a substantial number of requests for the subcommittee's earlier documents. The subcommittee is filling these requests, to the extent permitted by its limited supply, and has received a number of letters from recipients commenting on the usefulness of the subcommittee's series of documents on intergovernmental relations.

Much of the subcommittee's time and effort duringg the first session of the 85th Congress was devoted to preparing for a series of nine regional hearings on intergovernmental relations to be held throughout the country in October, November, and December. At these hearings, the subcommittee will seek particularly to obtain evidence bearing on two broad questions: First, whether the existing division of responsibility between the national and other levels of government is satisfactory, and second, whether intergovernmental cooperation can be improved in existing grant-in-aid programs in order to make their operation more efficient and economical. Governors of all 48 States will be invited to testify, as will a number of mayors, county officials, and State legislators.

The subcommittee's series of documents on intergovernmental relations is expected to serve as extremely valuable background material for its regional hearings. Further information useful in planning regional hearings was obtained during 3 days of public hearings in Washington on July 29, 30, and 31. Witnesses at these hearings included Meyer Kestnbaum, who served as chairman of the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, and Representatives BROOKS HAYS and HAROLD OSTERTAG, former members of that Commission. Other witnesses included representatives of the United States Conference of Mayors, the American Municipal Association, the International City Managers' Association, and the National Association of County Officials. The subcommittee also heard testimony from representatives of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, and the AFL–CIO.

Second. Department of Agriculture:

(a) Cheese and butter transactions: As a direct result of the subcommittee's investigation of cheese and butter purchase resale transactions of the Department of Agriculture, a Federal court in Baltimore, Md., on July 3, 1957, ordered three companies to repay more than $252,000 to the taxpayers. The decision was the first in a series of lawsuits filed by the Justice Department; it is expected that other pending actions, if successful, will eventually lead to the recovery of an additional $2 million. The court cases were brought after the Comptroller General, at the request of the subcommittee and on the basis of its investigation, ruled that the 1954 purchase and simultaneous resale of 85 million pounds of cheese and 5 million pounds of butter was unauthorized and improper. The cheese and butter involved was never moved from the warehouses in which it was stored, but the Department of Agriculture paid the owners the difference between the purchase and resale prices.

(b) Wheat storage: On July 22, 23, and 24 the subcommittee held public hearings concerning transactions involving storage of Government-owned wheat by the Burrus Mills Co., of Dallas, Tex. Beginning in 1954, this company stored 37 million bushels of wheat in huge plastic tents at St. Joseph, Mo., and Fort Worth, Tex. As a result of spoilage of a large percentage of this wheat, millions of dollars in claims by the Department of Agriculture's Commodity Credit Corporation are being made against the Burrus Co. Because of the extremely complicated nature of these transactions, the subcommittee's investigation is only partially finished; it is expected that several more months will be required to complete it.

(c) Agricultural drainage: On August 15, the subcommittee held a public hearing concerning drainage activities of the Department of Agriculture in the pothole or wetland areas of North and South Dakota and Minnesota in order to determine whether these activities, as presently carried on, conflict with or are inconsistent with other Federal activities relating to reduction of surpluses in agricultural commodities or wildlife conservation. Testimony was received from witnesses from the Department of Agriculture, the Fish and Wildlife Service of the Department of Interior, and from the director of the Department of Game, Fish, and Parks of the State of South Dakota and the former fish and game commissioner of North Dakota. The subcommittee has not yet made any findings with respect to this matter; however, at the conclusion of the hearings the chairman requested the representatives of the Departments of Interior and Agriculture to meet with each other and, insofar as possible, to resolve their policy differences.

(d) Other agricultural matters: Within the limitations necessarily imposed by the size of its staff and the time available, the subcommittee has conducted a continuing study of many other activities of the Department of Agriculture. The subcommittee has been particularly interested in the operation of the soil bank program and in transactions involving export of surplus agricultural commodities.

Third. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare:

(a) Polio vaccine: On October 11 and 12, 1956, the subcommittee held public hearings concerning expenditure of Federal funds for polio vaccine. Witnesses from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Public Health Service, and the Justice Department were called to testify. Disclosures at these hearings led to a Federal grand jury investigation, now in progress at Trenton, N. J., of a possible price-fixing conspiracy in the sale of polio vaccine. If such a conspiracy is shown to exist, Federal and State Governments could recover any excessive charges which were paid for polio vaccine as a result of the conspiracy.

On March 21, 1957, an additional public hearing was held at which witnesses from the Public Health Service testified concerning activities relating to assisting State and local governments in the prevention of polio; the supply of, demand for, and distribution of vaccine; and the collection and dissemination of information concerning polio vaccine.

A report on activities of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare relating to polio vaccine was prepared by the subcommittee and, on August 14, unanimously adopted by the full committee as its 15th report to the 85th Congress—House Report No. 1175. The subcommittee is continuing to study further developments relating to polio vaccine activities of the Department and will hold further hearings and make a further report if necessary.

(b) Other matters: The subcommittee is studying a number of other activities of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It is particularly interested in those activities relating to air pollution control and to Asian influenza.

Fourth. Department of Labor: The subcommittee staff studied activities of the Department of Labor during the first session of the 85th Congress. It is expected that this phase of the subcommittee's work will be expanded during the second session.

PUBLIC WORKS AND RESOURCES SUBCOMMITTEE, HON. EARL CHUDOFF, CHAIRMAN

A. Investigations: A brief outline of the subject matter of the investigations and public hearings in connection therewith follows:

First. The Virgin Islands Government and the Virgin Islands Corporation:

The subcommittee held comprehensive hearings on the operations of the Virgin Islands Government and the Virgin Islands Corporation. These hearings took place in the Virgin Islands during November and December of 1956 and in Washington, D. C., during March and May of 1957. A wide range of problems were investigated and a number of serious deficiencies were uncovered. The subcommittee's findings were adopted by the full committee in its ninth report, entitled "Operations of the Virgin Islands Government and the Virgin Islands Corporation."

The subcommittee looked into the problem of the recurring grave water shortage on the Island of St. Thomas and found that the Interior Department's and the island Governor's approach to solving the problem has been one of delay, indecision, and waste. No new water facilities have been constructed there since 1949.

Among other important findings of the subcommittee are:

(a) Accounting and budget controls have not yet been set up by any of the island Governors, this despite statutory requirements for such controls.

(b) The office of the island's government comptroller suffers from basic organizational flaws which seriously impede its effectiveness.

(c) Major inadequacies exist in local procedures and records affecting taxation and assessment.

(d) The office of the government secretary could, if properly established, provide the key to sound management of the operations of the island's government.

With respect to the Virgin Islands Corporation, the subcommittee's chief findings are:

(a) While the Corporation appears on the verge now of bringing its sugar operations out of the red, a test period of 3 to 5 years should be used to gage the ultimate trend and to determine whether the sugar operations should be disposed of to private industry or closed down altogether.

(b) The Corporation, in effect, subsidizes the rum industry by selling molasses to the distilleries at less than market value.

(c) Certain apparent conflict-of-interest situations exist involving officials of the Corporation.

At the request of the subcommittee chairman, the Commodity Stabilization Service prepared an Economic Appraisal of the Sugar Operations of the Virgin Islands Corporation, which was published as a committee print.

Second. Army-Interior reservoir land-acquisition policy:

The subcommittee held hearings during June and July of 1957 into the matter of the joint-reservoir land-acquisition policy adopted in October of 1953 by the Army and Interior Departments. Under the new policy much of the reservoir area subject to periodic inundation is now acquired as a mere flowage easement instead of the full fee simple interest generally acquired under the previous policy. The subcommittee's findings were adopted by the full committee in its 16th report, entitled "Army-Interior Reservoir Land Acquisition Policy."

The report concluded that the change in policy has not been in the best interest of the Government and the people of the United States. More specifically, it was found that—

(a) Contrary to the claims of the Departments, there is little if any monetary saving to the acquiring agency when it acquires flowage easements instead of fee simple title.

(b) Contrary to the claims of the Departments, there is no overall loss of tax revenue to the local units of government when the Government acquires the fee interest.

(c) There is less flexibility in reservoir operations when much of the land subject to inundation by the reservoir is held by the Government in easement rather than fee.

(d) The need for conservational and recreational use of reservoir lands is skyrocketing. Congress has recognized both uses. Nevertheless, the easement-taking policy markedly restricts such uses.

(e) The policy was adopted despite contrary advice of top officials of the Corps of Engineers.

Third. Morningside Hospital, Portland, Oreg.: As a result of extensive investigations by the staff, the subcommittee will hold hearings in Portland, Oreg., during the week of September 16, 1957, into the operations of the Morningside Hospital in connection with the care and treatment of mental patients committed there from the Territory of Alaska. The major problems to be examined are allegations as to improper care and treatment of mental patients, including the use of patient-labor; the relationships between the Department of the Interior, the Territory of Alaska, and the Sanitarium Company of Portland (which operates the hospital); and the financial aspects of the operating contract between the company and the Government.

Fourth. Alaska native loan program: The subcommittee will hold hearings in Juneau, Alaska, during the week of September 23, 1957, on the operations of the Bureau of Indian Affairs loan program as it affects Alaska native associations and individuals. The loans are authorized by the Wheeler-Howard Act, as amended—title 25, United States Code, sections 470, 473. The subcommittee is primarily concerned with the policy back of the making and administering of loans to native associations for the acquisition and operation of fish canneries and for relending to association members for purchase or repair of fishing boats. This inquiry stems from a memorial of the Alaska Territorial Senate, passed February 15, 1957, and addressed to, among others, the House Committee on Government Operations, which urges the correction of certain alleged practices and attitudes on the part of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the handling and administration of the loan program.

Fifth. Federal Power Commission's report that utilities have improperly charged propaganda expenses: After formal notification by the chairman of the subcommittee of Recommendation No. 4 of House Report No. 231, 85th Congress, on private electric utilities' organized efforts to influence the Secretary of the Interior—Ebasco Services, Inc., and Rocky Mountain group—the Chairman of the Federal Power Commission reported to the subcommittee on May 17, 1957, that 59 major electric utility companies had improperly accounted for expenditures to publish either one or both of two anti-public-power propaganda booklets. In fact, not one company had properly accounted for the expenditure. In his report, the FPC Chairman held the private- against public-power question to be a political controversy and the propaganda booklets to represent political expenditures not properly chargeable to operating expenses. All future expenditures of similar nature must be excluded from the utility companies' operating expense accounts. Another far-reaching implication of the report is that the many millions of dollars spent by the industry in the past for political propaganda purposes may also have been improper deductions for income-tax purposes.

Sixth. Bonneville Power Administration claim against Alcoa for defective Chukar conductor: In response to a request by the subcommittee, the Comptroller General of the United States investigated allegations that the Aluminum Company of America had furnished defective high-voltage Chukar conductor to the Bonneville Power Administration. Thereafter, a supplemental agreement dated February 6, 1957, was entered into under which the Bonneville Power Administration received a consideration of approximately $330,000 for waiving its claims against the company.

Seventh. Proposed repayment contract with Kings River Conservation District, Pine Flat Dam, Calif.: The subcommittee has continued its study of developments in the Department of the Interior surrounding a proposed repayment contract between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Kings River Conservation District in California. Under the proposed contract it was sought to permit the district, and also any corporation or individual to pay out in not more than 10 years—instead of the normal 40 years—and thereby escape the restrictions of the provisions of law which limit land eligible for project water to a maximum of 160 acres for any one landowner. Investigation had revealed that such a proposed contract had been negotiated in the field with approval of former Secretary of the Interior Douglas McKay and Assistant Secretary Aandahl. After the committee and the subcommittee communicated their interest in the subject to the Department, final approval of the proposed contract in Washington was held up for some 19 months. On July 12, 1957, Secretary of the Interior Fred Seaton announced that he had determined not to approve the proposed contract in its present form because to permit individuals or corporations to escape the 160-acre limitation provisions by prepayment would be contrary to reclamation law.

Eighth. Rural telephone cooperative loan requirements: The subcommittee recently inquired of the Rural Electrification Administration for an explanation as to why equity requirements for telephone loans have been liberalized for commercial borrowers without a corresponding liberalization for rural telephone cooperatives. A subsequent announcement by REA indicates that this discrimination has now been removed.

B. Legislation: The subcommittee had referred to it the following bill:

H. R. 83, to provide for a survey of the production of fertilizer by the Tennessee Valley Authority, and for other purposes.

The committee has received adverse reports from the two of the three Government agencies most immediately concerned, and a partially adverse report from the third. In a letter to the committee dated January 28, 1957, the Comptroller General of the United States stated that he did not recommend favorable consideration of the bill. Likewise, in a letter to the committee dated February 6, 1957, the Chairman of the TVA declared that enactment of the bill would not be in the public interest. The Secretary of Agriculture advised by letter April 11, 1957, that only that portion of the bill be considered at this time which would authorize a Comptroller General's study of the cost of fertilizer production.

INTERNATIONAL OPERATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE, PORTER HARDY, JR., CHAIRMAN

First. United States aid operations in Iran:

The first report approved by the Committee on Government Operations in the 85th Congress was one submitted by this subcommittee. The report, United States Aid Operations in Iran, House Report No. 10, was based on hearings conducted by the subcommittee in the 84th Congress. It analyzes the economy and efficiency with which technical and economic assistance was furnished to Iran in the period 1951 through 1955. A number of serious defects in the formulation and administration of this program are discussed, some of which reflect certain weaknesses in the general handling of the United States aid program. The report includes recommendations designed to strengthen the administration of the program and to prevent recurrence of the defects.

Second. International Cooperation Administration's budget practices:

Beginning in February, the subcommittee conducted an inquiry into the budget formulation and presentation practices of the International Cooperation Administration. Hearings were held on April 4, 5, and 10 to receive testimony from the Director of ICA, the Comptroller General, and members of their staffs. On the basis of these hearings, study of a number of audit reports made by the Comptroller General, and of past studies made by the subcommittee with respect to specific areas—Latin America and Iran—the subcommittee submitted and the full committee approved the report entitled "Review of the Budget Formulation and Presentation Practices of the International Cooperation Administration," House Report No. 449.

This report discusses the existing budget practices of ICA and recommends a number of changes to improve the administration of the program and to provide better information regarding control of appropriations by Congress.

Third. State Department public opinion polls:

In May, the subcommittee initiated an inquiry into the conduct of public opinion polls by the Department of State. Five days of open hearings were held in July. A hearing in executive session on June 21 was subsequently included in the published hearings.

This inquiry resulted in the 11th report of the Committee on Government Operations, entitled "State Department Public Opinion Polls," House Report No. 1166. The report concluded that the polls were illegally financed with funds from the appropriation entitled "Emergencies in the Diplomatic and Consular Service." The report raised serious questions regarding the selection of questions and the validity of the sampling in connection with the polls, and regarding the possibility that violations of law had occurred when the poll results were released.

Fourth. Other investigations:

The subcommittee has been and is currently engaged in an investigation of the operations of certain projects of the foreign aid program in the Middle East and Indochina areas.

The subcommittee has been engaged in a continuing study of the administrative management of the Department of State, with particular emphasis on its personnel and budgetary operations. The subcommittee has made inquiries concerning the implementation of the recommendations contained in its report, No. 1663, 84th Congress, regarding Foreign Service promotions under the Wriston program.

Fifth. Legislation: No legislation was referred to this subcommittee during the first session.

First. Interstate Commerce Commission:

The subcommittee investigated charges that ICC-prescribed railroad accounting procedures resulted in overstatement of rail earnings and that the ICC was protecting the investing public by leading them to a shearing. Also at issue were other ICC prescribed accounting practices allegedly at variance with generally accepted accounting principles. Witnesses at the subcommittee hearings included accountants, representatives of the railroad industry, the American Institute of Accountants, New York Stock Exchange, investment analysts from member firms of the New York Stock Exchange, as well as Interstate Commerce Commission officials.

As a result of its investigation, the committee recommended that railroad reports to stockholders conform to generally accepted accounting principles and particularly that savings resulting from tax amortization be incorporated in the body of such reports—not tucked away in footnotes.

The subcommittee also commended the ICC for instituting rulemaking procedures concerning replacement accounting for rail and track structure; rejected a suggestion to transfer jurisdiction over railroad securities from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Securities and Exchange Commission; recommended that the Civil Service Commission take early action to reappraise the salary structure for critically needed ICC accountants; recommended that the District of Columbia Committee inquire into the failure of the District of Columbia to accord credit to Government experience for accountants' certificates.

Subsequent to the commencement of the subcommittee's hearings, the Interstate Commerce Commission commenced rulemaking procedures on correction of six accounting variances. These corrections are scheduled to become effective as of January 1, 1958.

Rulemaking procedures were also instituted to determine whether replacement or depreciation accounting is more appropriate for track structure.

The subcommittee's report and recommendations are contained in House Report No. 1167, 85th Congress, 1st session.

Second. False and misleading advertising: The subcommittee initiated its investigations into false and misleading advertising with studies of filter-tip cigarettes and weight-reducing remedies. Hearings were held on the above matters, to gage the effectiveness of enforcement actions of the Post Office Department and the Federal Trade Commission in the field of false and misleading advertising. Time did not permit the submission of reports on these matters as hearings were held during late July and in August.

(a) Cigarettes: The subcommittee heard testimony from leading medical and scientific experts on the casual relationship of cigarette smoking and lung cancer, as a background to evaluating advertising claims of filter cigarettes. Experts heard on this phase of the hearings included representatives of the American Cancer Society, the Surgeon General of the United States, the director of the National Cancer Institute, and medical and technical researchers.

On the issue of false and misleading cigarette advertising, the subcommittee heard from representatives of Consumers' Union, Reader's Digest, and the Federal Trade Commission.

The subcommittee's report will be submitted to the full committee at the earliest opportunity.

(b) Weight reducing remedies:

The subcommittee investigated nodiet reducing claims of widely advertised alleged reducing remedies and the effectiveness of enforcement and policing of this advertising by the Post Office Department, Federal Trade Commission, and the Food and Drug Administration.

Testimony was received from leading medical experts on obesity, from the National Better Business Bureau, as well as officials of the above Federal agencies.

The subcommittee's report will be submitted to the full committee at the earliest opportunity.

Third. Legislation:

A report on S. 916—H. R. 4499—has been prepared following subcommittee resolution to report on this bill favorably to the full committee. This report will be presented to the full committee at the earliest opportunity.

This bill would permit continuation of Post Office Department accounts in the name of the deceased, resigned, separated, or discharged disbursing officer for a limited period pending the appointment of a successor.

GENERAL GOVERNMENT ACTIVITIES SUBCOMMITTEE, HON. JACK BROOKS, CHAIRMAN

First. Review of negotiated sales:

The subcommittee reviewed 54 proposed negotiated sales of surplus property set to sell for a total of $7,798,611, largely emanating from the General Services Administration.

(a) Exhaustive examination was made of 14 of these proposed sales, set to sell for a total of $7,071,389, and the proposed prices in five instances were disapproved. It is anticipated that subsequent public auctions of these five properties will bring in a possible $500,000 more than would have the negotiated prices.

(b) A striking example of how persistent vigilance by the subcommittee has resulted in cash gains for the Nation is evident in the case of the so-called Haster property at Garden Grove, Calif. The subcommittee thrice thwarted efforts to sell this surplus land to the former owners for as little as $400 an acre, or as much as $1,800 an acre, and GSA finally sold it at public auction, at the subcommittee's urging, on August 29, 1957, for $5,350 an acre.

The subcommittee stopped proposals to sell the land at negotiated prices of some $1,800 an acre during both the first and second sessions of the 84th Congress, recommending that fair market value be sought via public auction. During the 85th Congress, the subcommittee held a hearing June 18 and 19, 1957, on H. R. 2519, which would have permitted the former owners to buy the tract for as little as $400 an acre, and recommended instead that the GSA go ahead with plans to sell it at public auction. This auction found 59 acres bringing $5,350 each, a total of $315,650. This sum is $209,450 more than the same tract would have brought at the proposed negotiated sale prices.

Second. Legislative matters:

On legislative matters during the session, the subcommittee has had for consideration 55 House bills and 3 Senate bills. All bills were reviewed in detail and hearings were held on 18 of the House bills and 3 of the Senate bills. A major portion of the remaining House bills were determined to be inconsistent with subcommittee views and, after explanation to the authors, were not scheduled for hearings. Of those bills on which hearings were held, the subcommittee reported favorably on 7 of the House bills and 3 of the Senate bills. Study on some recently submitted bills is continuing.

(a) In the case of the proposed negotiated sale of the surplus aircraft facility at Chula Vista, Calif., to the Rohr Aircraft Corp., the subcommittee recommended to the General Services Administration that, contrary to the terms of the proposed sale, the Government receive rentals from the lessee-proposed buyer until the date the sale is consummated—means whereby the revenue in the matter would be increased by at least $130,000 from the rental, whether or not a recommended higher sale price was obtained.

(b) A hearing on the proposed negotiated sale of a communications system at the naval station in Newport, R. I., raised various facets of the question whether a Government agency can lawfully and properly, under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, report property to the GSA as excess to its needs when, in fact, such property is vital to its operations and is continued to be used after being reported as excess. The subcommittee halted the proposed Newport sale and the Comptroller General has now interpreted the definition of "excess" and "surplus" property, under the aforesaid act, as within the purview of the head of the Federal agency concerned. A positive sales price was not included in the negotiated sale proposal and the subcommittee still has the proposed sale under examination.

Third. Federal Housing Administration:

(a) The subcommittee surveyed leasehold practices of the Honolulu office of the Federal Housing Administration and recommended changes in procedure which may result in a repeated saving to the Government of several hundred thousand dollars a year. The FHA officially welcomed the subcommittee's recommendations, dubbing them very useful, and has made resulting special studies of the situation, leading to a proposed revision in the method of appraising leased fees in Hawaii. The FHA is presently investigating the possibility of immediately putting the new method into actual practice.

(b) Alleged irregularities in the Federal Housing Administration office in Kansas City, Mo., have been investigated extensively with a view to a possible public hearing on the matter when the investigating phase is completed.

Fourth. Metal program:

(a) The subcommittee has continued studies on the expansion, operation, and disposition of the Government-owned nickel plant at Nicaro, Cuba, and has begun to check into the recent GAO audit of the neighboring Cuban-American Nickel Co., subsidiary of Freeport Sulphur Co.

(b) Information and material collected on the procurement of tungsten in California and other Western States has been reviewed and is being evaluated.

MILITARY OPERATIONS SUBCOMMITTEE, HON. CHET HOLIFIELD, CHAIRMAN

First. Subcommittee reports on investigations and studies:

(a) Defense standardization program:

On July 17, 1957, a subcommittee report on the defense standardization program was approved as the seventh report of the Committee on Government Operations, House Report No. 822.

The report was based on hearings held by the subcommittee on cataloging and standardization in the Department of Defense on January 30, 31, and March 12, 1957. Major emphasis was given to standardization because this area has received less attention from the Congress than cataloging and because systematic progress of standardization is much less evident.

The report, which was unanimously approved by the full committee, was submitted to the Department of Defense and other interested Government agencies. It contained 11 recommendations for speeding up the standardization program and for achieving greater economy and efficiency in military supply management. The Department of Defense has acknowledged the basic validity of the subcommittee's findings and recommendations and has promised to give special attention to improvements in defense standardization. The Department of Defense will submit to the subcommittee a report within 6 months showing where improvements will have been made.

The verbatim transcripts of the hearings have been printed and are available for the public.

The General Services Administration, which has standardization responsibilities for civilian government agencies, also has commended the report.

The Bureau of the Budget and the General Accounting Office have likewise studied the report and have promised to give close attention to the defense standardization program.

(b) Status of civil-defense legislation:

On July 22, 1957, the subcommittee's report on the status of civil-defense legislation was approved as the eighth report of the committee, House Report No. 839.

Following the comprehensive investigation of civil defense and the subcommittee report which was approved by the full committee in 1956—House Report No. 2946, 84th Congress, 2d session—legislation was prepared embodying the subcommittee's recommendations on civil defense. All members of the subcommittee and several other Members of Congress introduced identical bills—H. R. 2125 and others.

Continuing its study and investigation of civil defense, the subcommittee held hearings on the proposed new civil defense legislation on February 5, 6, 8, 13, 14, 18, March 5, 6, and 7, 1957.

The verbatim transcripts of the hearings have been printed and are available for the public.

The objectives of the proposed legislation were widely endorsed by national organizations and civic associations interested in civil defense. Numerous minor amendments were suggested. These are the subject of subcommittee staff study. In the meantime the subcommittee decided to make an interim report, as identified above.

The subcommittee also is investigating certain features of Federal Civil Defense Administration management and operations and is studying atomic-weapons test data relating to civil-defense shelters.

(c) Military-tank procurement:

On July 31, 1957, the subcommittee's report entitled "Military Tank Procurement" was unanimously approved as the 10th report of the committee, House Report No. 958.

This report, which reviewed the development of the heavy-tank program and specific procurement contracts, was the subject of hearings in public and executive session on March 21 and 22, 1957.

The verbatim transcripts of the public hearings have been printed and are available for the public.

In view of the complex contractual matters involved, the subcommittee recommended that the General Accounting Office audit the tank procurement under inquiry with specific attention to the matters designated by the subcommittee.

The report has been submitted to the Department of Defense for comment.

(d) Military-clothing procurement:

On August 14, 1957, the subcommittee's report on military-clothing procurement was unanimously approved as the 13th report of the committee, House Report No. 1168.

This report covered military-clothing contracts let by the military agencies to companies owned or controlled by Herman D. Wynn. It examined also the specific contract let to Wynn Enterprises, Inc., headed by the wife of Robert Tripp Ross when he was Assistant Secretary of Defense for Legislative and Public Affairs.

Public hearings were held on April 3, 4, 5, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, 1957.

The verbatim transcripts of the hearings have been printed and are available for the public.

The subcommittee made 30 recommendations for improving military procurement in clothing and related fields. The report has been submitted to the Department of Defense and other interested agencies for analysis and comment.

(e) Letter contracts and contract terminations in military procurement:

On August 14, 1957, the subcommittee's report on letter contracts and contract terminations was unanimously approved as the 14th report of the committee, House Report No. 1169.

This report embodied three surveys made by the General Accounting Office at the request of the subcommittee at the conclusion of its investigation, during the 84th Congress, of the Navy procurement of Demon aircraft. The surveys covered the use of letter contracts and the termination of procurement contracts by the three military departments for the fiscal years 1954, 1955, and 1956.

The subcommittee's work in this field has been noted by the House Committee on Appropriations in its own procurement studies. As a result of the subcommittee's earlier investigations into Navy procurement, the Comptroller General has decided to examine letter contracts and contract terminations as a regular part of his defense audit program.

(f) Air Force and Navy rocket launcher procurement:

The report of these matters is being prepared and will be submitted at the next session of Congress.

Public hearings were held February 8, 11, 12; March 26, 27, 28, 29; and April 1, 1957.

The verbatim transcript of the hearings is being published and will be available for the public.

Second. Miscellaneous investigations and studies: The subcommittee conducted numerous inquiries into military procurement and other matters referred to it by Members of Congress. It also conducted followup inquiries into projects which were the subject of investigation and report during the 84th Congress. Some of these projects may be identified as follows:

(a) Surplus property:

The subcommittee staff examined military surplus disposal actions, investigating more closely those which indicate dissipation of valuable Government resources.

In several cases the subcommittee was instrumental in calling attention of the Federal Civil Defense Administration to military surplus items needed for civil-defense purposes which would otherwise be sold for a small fraction of acquisition cost. Use of such surplus property for civil-defense purposes was authorized by Public Law 655 of the 84th Congress. The subcommittee also was instrumental in getting the Department of Defense to change its demilitarization policy which required the scrapping of military goods, such as aircraft, even though they have considerable commercial utility. Many thousands of dollars are being saved the Government by disposal of usable aircraft to commercial outlets.

(b) Followup on Navy jetplane procurement: Following up its investigation and report of Navy procurement of Demon aircraft—84th Congress, 2d session, House Report No. 1891—the subcommittee inquired into recent developments concerning that program. The Navy replied to a detailed list of questions by the subcommittee. The information, which is classified, is under study by the subcommittee staff.

(c) Missile programs: The subcommittee is studying developments in the missile field in connection with its civil-defense inquiries and in terms of competing activities among the military services from the standpoint of economy and efficiency.

Third. Legislative matters:

(a) Civil-defense bills: The following bills relating to civil defense were referred to the subcommittee: H. R. 2125, H. R. 2149, H. R. 2159, H. R. 2213, H. R. 2214, H. R. 2223, H. R. 2239, H. R. 4219, H. R. 4295, H. R. 4415, H. R. 4418, H. R. 6313, H. R. 6467, House Joint Resolution 78, and House Joint Resolution 88. H. R. 2125 and identical bills were the subject of hearings and an interim report, as described in part I.

(b) Other bills: H. R. 84, providing for a survey by the Comptroller General of the operation by the Department of Defense of commissary stores and post exchanges, was referred to the subcommittee. The bill was considered by the subcommittee but was not reported out.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON DONABLE PROPERTY, HON. JOHN W. M'CORMACK, CHAIRMAN

First. Bills referred and investigated—not reported out:

H. R. 242, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus property to certain community organizations.

H. R. 543, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation and other disposal of property to tax-supported public-recreation agencies.

H. R. 737, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the disposal of certain surplus property to State defense forces.

H. R. 2504, to provide that Government surplus property may be donated to 4-H Clubs for the construction, equipment, and operation of camps and centers.

H. R. 2552, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus property to volunteer fire-fighting organizations.

H. R. 3406, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus property to volunteer fire-fighting organizations.

H. R. 4007, to amend section 203 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the disposal of surplus property to publicly owned water districts and publicly owned sewer districts.

H. R. 4107, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus property to volunteer fire-fighting organizations, volunteer reserve services, squads, and first-aid crews.

H. R. 5448, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to make rehabilitation facilities and sheltered workshops eligible for donations of surplus real personal property.

H. R. 5451, to amend section 203 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the disposal of surplus property to municipalities.

H. R. 5460, to amend section 203 (j) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to provide that surplus property which is not used in the donable property program shall be offered for sale to States and political subdivisions thereof.

H. R. 5470, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to make municipalities eligible for donations of surplus real and personal property.

H. R. 6316, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus property to volunteer fire-fighting organizations, volunteer reserve services, squads, and first-aid crews.

H. R. 6537, to authorize the disposition of certain obsolete and excess property to the United States Volunteer Life Saving Corps.

H. R. 7067, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation and other disposal of property to tax-supported public recreation agencies.

H. R. 7929, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to permit the donation of surplus property to volunteer fire-fighting organizations.

The above mentioned bills were carefully studied in conjunction with the interested executive agencies. Each bill would have had added to the list of eligible donees for surplus property and accordingly would have increased the administrative expense for the donable surplus property program and would also have reduced the amount of property available for education, health, and civil defense purposes as provided by Public Law 61 of the 84th Congress, 1st session, and Public Law 655 of the 84th Congress, 2d session.

The responsible executive agencies, namely, the Bureau of the Budget, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the General Services Administration opposed extension of the benefits of the donable act to other donees at the present time. Accordingly, hearings were not held on any of the bills but the matter will be kept under strict surveillance for the next year or so.

Second. Bills referred and investigated—reported out:

H. R. 8795, to amend section 507 and subsection 602 (a) of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended.

This bill would place the Franklin D. Roosevelt Library at Hyde Park, New York, under the provisions of the Presidential Libraries Act. Hearings were held by the subcommittee on July 29, 1957, and the bill was reported to the full committee which approved it on July 31, 1957—see report No. 957. The Senate has not acted on the bill to date.

Third. Donable surplus property program:

The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare reports surplus personal property amounting to $234,862,274 at acquisition cost was allocated to education, health, and civil defense agencies during the fiscal year 1957. Real property valued at $6,729,682, acquisition cost, was likewise transferred to these activities. It is agreed that the program will continue at this volume for some time to come.

Several problems arose in the operation of the donable program during the fiscal year, 1957. Through the cooperation of the interested Federal and State agencies they were satisfactorily resolved to the mutual satisfaction of all parties.

Fourth. Foreign excess property: The subcommittee was also successful in having the Department of Defense issue instructions pursuant to section 402 of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 making foreign excess personal property available for donations to specified agencies. In many instances executive agencies operating in foreign countries have excess property which has no commercial value or the estimated cost of care and handling of which would exceed estimated proceeds from its sale. Such property will be eligible for donation to meritorious organizations.

Fifth. Sale of TBM planes:

Through subcommittee action 87 TBM planes which had been scheduled for sale as scrap were made available as commercial flyable planes. This resulted in a direct saving to the Government of $184,984.87.

In addition 10 TBM planes were transferred to the United States Forest Service for fire-protection purposes and the military regulations dealing with demilitarization were amended to make additional property available for sale for its original utility rather than for scrap purposes.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT INFORMATION, HON. JOHN E. MOSS, JR., CHAIRMAN

During 1957, the Special Subcommittee on Government Information has held 9 hearings with 24 witnesses to carry out the instructions from Congressman WILLIAM L. DAWSON, who chartered the subcommittee on June 9, 1955. At that time, Congressman DAWSON instructed the subcommittee to determine the restrictions placed on information from Federal executive and independent agencies and to suggest remedies for the unjustifiable restrictions.

First. Legislation:

(a) In January 1957, bills were introduced as an amendment to title 5, United States Code, section 22, by Congressman JOHN E. MOSS, H. R. 2767; Congressman DANTE B. FASCELL, H. R. 2768; and Congressman WILLIAM L. DAWSON, H. R. 2769. Title 5, United States Code, section 22, is the executive department's basic housekeeping statute which has been twisted into a claim of authority to withhold information from the public. Similar legislation was introduced by Congressman CLARE E. HOFFMAN—H. R. 2810.

On July 22, 1957, the initial hearing on the proposed amendment was held and although each of the 10 executive departments filed statements objecting to the amendment, representatives of only two executive departments attended the hearing. Plans have been made to permit other executive departments to testify and to hear proponents of the legislation.

In addition to the hearing on the proposed amendment, questions were asked of the executive departments by letter and numerous civic organizations were contacted for their opinions on the legislation. Among those organizations supporting the principle set forth in the Dawson-Moss-Fascell bills is the American Society of Newspaper Editors.

(b) Other legislative developments include cooperation with the staff of the Ways and Means Committee of the House to work out legislation opening to the public the applications for tax-exempt status of nonprofit, nonpolitical organizations. Although this legislation was included in a general tax revision bill approved by the committee, there has been no final House action.

(c) A major development affecting the availability of information from the Federal Government was House approval of H. R. 7390, by Congressman DANTE B. FASCELL, a subcommittee member. The report on this bill includes the statement that minutes of meetings of the myriad governmental advisory committees shall be available to the public, subject only to security and other restrictions specifically provided by law.

(d) In April 1957, Congressmen DAWSON, MOSS, and FASCELL introduced legislation to amend the public-information section of the Administrative Procedure Act, removing many of the objectionable phrases which have been misused to refuse information to the public, the Congress, and the press. This legislation has been referred to the House Judiciary Committee. These bills are: H. R. 7172, DAWSON; H. R. 7173, FASCELL; and H. R. 7174, MOSS.

(e) Another important legislative development in the information field was action by both the House and Senate, abolishing the Office of Strategic Information in the Department of Commerce. Funds for this agency—found to be uneconomical and inefficient by the House Government Operations Committee following hearings by the Special Subcommittee on Government Information—were deleted from the Department of Commerce budget by the House and Senate Appropriations Committees.

(f) An important part of the subcommittee's effort during 1957 has been devoted to legislative matters and to a continuation of the study of the Defense Department's information practices and policies.

On March 11 and 12, 1957, the subcommittee held hearings to discuss the report of the so-called Coolidge Committee—the Defense Department's Committee on Classified Information. On April 10, 11, and 12, the subcommittee held hearings to discuss directives which the Defense Department had issued to put into effect some of the Coolidge Committee's recommendations. On July 1 and 8, hearings were held with the public-information chiefs of the Army, Navy, and Air Force. On July 22, the initial hearing was held on the proposed amendment to title 5, United States Code, section 22.

Second. Elimination of restrictions on information: In addition to developments as a result of these hearings, however, the subcommittee has, by letters and staff contacts, followed up a number of complaints against unjustifiable restrictions on information. The following are some of the results of the hearings and of the additional contact work:

(a) The Department of Agriculture revised a regulation which permitted censorship of television films, news releases, and similar information items prepared by private groups through cooperation with the Department. The objectionable features have been deleted from the new regulation.

(b) The Defense Department has made available information about concessionaires' rented space in the Pentagon. Contracts for such space previously were not made public.

(c) The Defense Department revised a verbal classification of a weather broadcast which was available through an unclassified telephone number.

(d) The General Services Administration withdrew a proposed form which all resigning employees would have had to sign, stating they would never divulge administratively controlled information.

(e) The Foreign Claims Settlement Commission also has stopped using a form prohibiting the dissemination of administratively controlled information.

(f) The Defense Department reversed an earlier decision to prohibit reporters from the launching of the first earth satellite.

(g) The Defense Department took action to declassify a roomful of World War II scientific documents at Harvard University's Widener Library.

(h) The Department of Justice declassified portions of a report on trips by border patrol inspectors to rifle and pistol matches and made classified sections of the report available to the appropriate House Government Operations Subcommittee.

(i) The General Services Administration revised an administrative order which restricted contacts by Congressmen, their staffs, and Congressional committees' staffs with GSA employees.

(j) The Treasury Department issued Treasury Decision 5421—August 27, 1957, Federal Register, Document 57-7099—permitting the disclosure of statistical data on exports from United States ports which has been restricted since World War II.

(k) The General Services Administration clarified a regulation on photographic access to Federal buildings so that the Federal district court in Denver, Colo., would not impose restrictions on photographers in public corridors in the Denver Federal Building.

(l) An initial investigation disclosed that many of the so-called leaks by the press of security information cited by the Coolidge Committee came from properly cleared Defense Department statements.

(m) An initial investigation of charges by the Commission on Government Security that the press was guilty of using purloined documents and of frequent unauthorized disclosure indicates that this charge is unsubstantiated and unwarranted.

(n) The Department of Defense has undertaken a general revision of regulations affecting the flow of information from the Department, including a complete rewriting of the Department's regulations on classification of information and eliminating the requirement that all Defense Department information must make a constructive contribution to the primary mission of the Department.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON WATER RESOURCES AND POWER, HON. ROBERT E. JONES, CHAIRMAN

This special subcommittee was established to review the recommendations of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government—Hoover Commission—with respect to water resources and power. During the 84th Congress, the subcommittee held hearings in 15 different cities, compiling a record of over 5,500 pages. The subcommittee completed work on a proposed report as the first session of the 85th Congress closed which it is expected will be presented to the full committee for consideration early in the second session.

A Report to My Constituents

OF

HON. SAMUEL N. FRIEDEL

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, because I have the honor and great privilege of serving the people of the Seventh Congressional District of Maryland, I feel it is only fitting and proper that the voters have an accounting of my record in Congress. I have always believed that a Member should be truly representative of the people who sent him to Washington, and, as such, he should endeavor to do his utmost on their behalf and act on measures that promote and further the best interest of his city, State, and Nation.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I am including a report of my voting record on the major legislative actions taken during the 1st session of the 85th Congress, together with my views on some of the important issues considered this year.

BUDGET AND TAXES

The budget submitted by the President proposed that the Federal Government spend $71.8 billion during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1957. This is the highest peacetime budget in American history and such a tremendous rate of spending would, unquestionably, add to inflationary pressures in the country's economy. Since I deemed it essential that this huge budget be brought under control, I voted in favor of cutting the requested appropriation for many items which I believed warranted such action.

I favor a reduction in Federal income taxes, and a repeal of all the so-called wartime excise taxes. I have introduced legislation to increase personal exemptions, for income-tax purposes from the present $600 to $800 per person. Federal budgets which require huge taxes naturally consume the savings which are required to finance private industry. Also high tax rates, which take such a large share of income, undermine the incentive to save and invest in normal business enterprises.

ESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

In attempting to hold Government spending within reasonable bounds, we should not hold back on essential defense programs in the interest of national safety during the present world tension caused by the Russians in their ever-widening spheres of influence. Unfortunately, it is clear that the Communists are bent on world conquest and our Nation must be ready to cope with this growing menace to world peace by having the very best and newest weapons of defense and bolstering and aiding our friends across the seas through mutual security authorizations.

In like manner, we should not hold back on needed civilian programs. The heavy demands now being urged at all levels of government for roads and schools, for instance, are largely the result of failure to keep pace with the growth of the country. I believe in paying Federal and postal employees proper salaries commensurate with the increased cost of living. Such expenditures also help to keep up the general prosperity of America and provide essential facilities and services. Therefore, I favor appropriations for adequate defense to keep our country strong and reasonable appropriations for civilian programs to keep our economy healthy.

CIVIL RIGHTS

I voted in favor of the civil-rights bill, because I do not believe any citizen in the United States should be deprived of his right to vote.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

As an American, I am unalterably opposed to the admission of Red China as a member of the United Nations, because I believe such action would further the cause of international communism. For the same reason, I am opposed to trading with Red China.

NATURAL-GAS BILL

During the last session of Congress, as well as during the present one, I registered my emphatic protest against the passage of any measure that would exempt the producers of natural gas from Federal control, because the removal of such controls might lead to increased cost to the millions of consumers of gas who use it not only for cooking but also for heating. I shall always continue to be vigilant and oppose legislation which is against the interest of the public at large.

TRAFFIC SAFETY

I take considerable pride in the fact that I was the first Member of the Congress to introduce a resolution calling for the creation of a committee to investigate traffic safety on our Nation's streets and highways, in order to find means to reduce the toll of lives and countless damage caused by traffic accidents. This matter is now under active investigation by the Congress, and it is hoped that it will be productive of results to accomplish the desired end.

BALTIMORE AND MARYLAND

I have endeavored to promote the interest of Baltimore and the State of Maryland at all times, in all matters on the Federal Government level. I am happy to report that the prospects for full utilization of Baltimore's Friendship Airport are brighter than ever before. Although funds have been provided to start construction of another airport in the Baltimore-Washington area, assurances have been given that the Civil Aeronautics Board will divert some of the Washington traffic to Friendship.

Construction of the new Social Security Building at Woodlawn will begin in the near future, as a result of an amendment to an appropriation bill, which was adopted at my request.

Baltimore is America's second largest port, providing employment for hundreds of people, and it is important that its interests be guarded, particularly in view of the fact that it will face formidable competition from the St. Lawrence Seaway project. For this reason, I worked diligently to have legislation enacted permitting 24-hour quarantine service, in the port of Baltimore. I am pleased to report that my efforts were successful and as a result of this legislation, a saving of more than $1 million a year will be realized.

I also supported legislation providing for widening and deepening of the harbor and several other measures which will aid commerce and redound to Baltimore's lasting benefit.

Ever since the Secretary of the Navy announced the closing of the Office of the Supervisor of Shipbuilding and Assistant Industrial Manager, I have exerted every effort to have this order rescinded. Although my efforts did not meet with success, I have received assurance that the employees now working at that installation will be offered comparable positions at Newport News and Portsmouth.

Likewise, I have worked diligently to preserve the Recruit Training Command at Bainbridge, and the Curtis Bay storage facility.

IN GENERAL

At all times I have considered the best interest of my district and the Nation as being paramount, therefore, I have avoided blind partisanship. My rec l clearly reflects that I have supported the President many times when I deemed his recommendations right, such as my affirmative vote for the Middle East resolution. On other occasions when I did not agree with the Chief Executive's recommendations, I did not hesitate to raise my voice in opposition and vote against proposals which I considered contrary to the best interest of the Nation as a whole.

VOTING RECORD

In order that the people of my district may be informed as to how I voted on major legislation which was presented during the past session of Congress, I submit the following detailed record:

Date	Measure, question, and result	Vote
Jan. 30	H. J. Res. 117, authorizing the President to undertake economic and military cooperation with nations in the general area of the Middle East. On passage. (Passed 355 to 61.)	Yea.

Status of Railroad Retirement and Unemployment Insurance Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, many Members of the House have asked me, as chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, about the present status of legislation to amend the Railroad Retirement Act and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act pending before this committee. I should, therefore, like to take this opportunity to explain the status of this legislation in some detail.

At the close of the first session of this Congress there were pending before the committee 65 bills to amend the Railroad Retirement Act. Some of these bills, like H. R. 4353 and 20 other bills identical to it, also proposed to amend the Railroad Retirement Tax Act and the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. There were only two bills to amend the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act proper.

The committee proceeded to hold hearings on this legislation very promptly in this session of the Congres. A subcommittee under the chairmanship of Hon. Peter F. Mack, Jr., opened hearings on March 11, 1957, at which time only Members of Congress who had introduced bills on this subject were given the opportunity to testify. Then the entire Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce opened public hearings on March 14, 1957, and continued these hearings for 5 additional days in March. More than 50 bills which were pending before the committee at that time were the subject of these hearings.

The committee was confronted with a serious problem right at the outset of the hearings. Most Members of the House will recall that during the closing days of the 2d session of the 84th Congress, legislation was adopted granting generally a 10-percent increase in benefits. It became Public Law 1013, of the 84th Congress. The principal exceptions to this 10-percent increase were those widows, spouses, and survivors who were then receiving benefits under the social security minimum guaranty provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act.

There was no provision made for the financing of the cost of these benefits which amounted to $83 million a year on a net level cost. The Congress was told that enactment of this legislation was an emergency measure and was necessary to help thousands of retired railroad employees, their wives, and the widows of such employees to meet their day-to-day living expenses. The Congress was assured that legislation would be considered promptly during the 1st session of the 85th Congress to finance the cost of these benefits. Representatives of railroad labor organizations also gave firm assurances that they would propose, at the opening of the 85th Congress, a legislative program to assure adequate financing of the railroad retirement system. The President, in a statement accompanying the signing of this bill, S. 3616, stated in part:

> It is imperative that satisfactory legislation for this purpose—to assure adequate financing of the railroad retirement system—be proposed and enacted.

As you know, the railroad retirement system is financed entirely by employee and employer payroll contributions. The employees pay 6¼ percent on taxable compensation up to $350 a month and employers pay an equal amount. Immediately prior to the enactment of Public Law 1013, 84th Congress, an actuarial valuation of the assets and liabilities of the railroad retirement system showed that the net level cost of the system was 14.13 percent of taxable payroll, assuming a level taxable payroll of $5.3 billion annually. That is to say, a combined employer-employee tax rate of 14.13 percent of taxable payroll was required to finance indefinitely the benefits payable under the Railroad Retirement Act as of that time. Since the combined employer-employee tax rate was only 12.5 percent of taxable payroll, there was an indicated deficiency of 1.63 percent of taxable payroll, or $86,390,000 a year on a level cost basis. Enactment of Public Law 1013, 84th Congress, therefore, increased this deficiency to approximately 3.20 percent of taxable payroll, or $169,390,000 a year on a level cost basis. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was acutely aware of this fact at the time of the hearings on railroad-retirement legislation in March of this year.

The principal interest during these hearings centered around H. R. 4353 and 18 other bills identical to it which were pending before the committee at that time. These bills were sponsored by all the standard railway-labor organizations. The principal provisions of these bills are as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT ACT

First. Annuities, pensions, and lump-sum payments—other than the residual lump sum—would be increased generally by 10 percent.

Second. The maximum amount of compensation creditable under this act would be increased from $350 to $400 a month.

Third. Women employees having 10 years of service could elect to retire on a reduced annuity at age 62 instead of waiting until age 65. The same privilege is provided for wives of annuitants.

Fourth. The earnings test now applicable to disability annuitants, under which any disability annuitant under age 65 does not receive an annuity for any month in which he is paid more than $100 in earnings, would be modified by the addition of a provision that, if the annuitant's earnings in any calendar year do not exceed $1,200, the annuity otherwise not payable because of his earnings in any month in that year would become payable.

Fifth. The insurance lump sum now payable on the death of an employee only if no annuity is payable, on application, to a survivor, would be payable irrespective of this circumstance, but would be subject to a maximum of $750.

Sixth. The formula for computing the residual lump sum would be amended in conformity with the amendments proposed to the Railroad Retirement Tax Act by increasing the percentage factor applicable to compensation after 1956 to 7½ percent and to 8 percent after 1957, and increasing the maximum amount of compensation for any month to which such factors are applicable from $350 to $400 for any month after June 30, 1957.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD RETIREMENT TAX ACT

The tax rate on employees and employers would be increased from 6¼ percent to 7½ percent and the tax would be applicable to $400 instead of $350 of the employee's compensation earned in any month after June 1957. The tax rate would be increased with respect to compensation paid after 1969 by the same number of percentage points by which the then current social-security-tax rate exceed 2¾ percent, which is scheduled to be increased in 1965.

AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

First. A new schedule of daily benefit rates would increase the present daily benefits from 50 cents to $1.70. The alternative rate, which is now 50 percent of the employee's daily rate of pay in his last employment with an employer in the base year, would be increased to 60 percent of such daily rate of pay. The maximum daily benefit rate would be increased from $8.50 to $10.20.

Second. The maximum amount of compensation for a month for which credit would be given and contributions required would be increased from $350 to $400, effective with respect to compensation paid for service rendered in calendar months after June 1957.

Third. The minimum amount of earnings in a base year which would qualify an employee for benefits would be increased from $400 to $500, effective with respect to base years after 1956.

Fourth. An employee with 5 years or more of railroad service who is out of work through no fault of his own and has exhausted current rights to normal unemployment benefits, would receive additional benefits during an extended benefit period. The duration of such extended benefit period would vary in accordance with the length of the employee's previous railroad employment, so that an unemployed man with 20 years or more of service could receive benefits, under special conditions, for as much as 4½ years longer than he might under present law.

Fifth. The maximum number of days of unemployment in the first registration period in a benefit year for which benefits may be paid would be increased from 7 to 10 days, the same as it is now with respect to all subsequent registration periods.

Sixth. Sundays and holidays would be treated the same as other days for unemployment benefit purposes.

Seventh. The additional funds necessary to finance these benefits would be raised by increasing the taxable earnings from $350 to $400 a month and by providing for a tax rate of not less than 2 percent when the balance in the railroad unemployment insurance account is $450 million or more; and this rate would be increased, by steps, to 4 percent when the balance in the account falls below $300 million.

The additional cost of the railroad retirement benefits proposed by H. R. 4353 is estimated at 2.81 percent of taxable payroll or $162 million a year on a level cost basis, assuming a level taxable payroll of $5.75 billion annually, based on the increase in tax rate and tax base proposed by the bill. One-half of this amount would be paid by the railroads and one-half by the railroad employees. The additional revenue for the support of the railroad retirement system, to be derived by increasing the combined employer-employee tax rate from 12.5 percent to 15 percent of taxable payroll, and by increasing the taxable base from $350 to $400 a month, would amount to 5.42 percent of taxable payroll, or $312 million a year on a level cost basis. Hence, the added revenue proposed by the bill would exceed the cost of the additional benefits by 2.61 percent of taxable payroll, or $150 million a year on a level cost basis. Since the actuarial deficiency of the retirement system for the present law would be 2.98 percent of taxable payroll, assuming a level taxable payroll of $5.75 billion annually based on the increase in the tax rate and tax base proposed in H. R. 4353, the enactment of the retirement benefits and tax provisions of this bill would leave the railroad retirement system with an actuarial deficiency of only 0.37 percent of taxable payroll, or approximately $21 million a year on a level cost basis.

The additional cost of unemployment insurance benefits proposed by H. R. 4353, as nearly as can be ascertained, is estimated at $83 million a year on a level cost basis, all of which would be payable by the railroad industry. A witness for the railroad industry stated that the immediate additional cost of the proposed unemployment benefits would be $100 million a year.

However, H. R. 4353 does not embody the complete program of recommendations which the standard railway labor organizations are asking the Congress to pass in the field of railroad retirement benefits. An integral part of this program is a separate bill, H. R. 5551, pending before the Committee on Ways and Means, which provides for the exclusion of employee retirement contributions from gross income for purposes of the employee's income tax and from withholdings at the source. A spokesman for the standard railway labor organizations advised the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that these organizations would not support H. R. 4353 unless they got favorable action on H. R. 5551. These organizations felt that they could not justify to their membership an increase in the tax rate from 6¼ percent to 7½ percent of taxable payroll, and an increase in the tax base from $350 to $400 a month, unless the employees got some offsetting income-tax relief. Failure to get such relief, this spokesman stated, would mean that these organizations would have to reconsider the whole benefit program. He, however, assured the committee that these organizations would keep the commitment they made last year that they would recommend a program for putting the railroad retirement system on a sound financial basis, irrespective of what happens to the program they are recommending in H. R. 4353.

As I have stated, H. R. 5551 is the complementary part of the program recommended in H. R. 4353. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has been waiting to see what action the Committee on Ways and Means might take with respect to H. R. 5551 before proceeding with the further consideration of pending railroad retirement bills. No action was taken on H. R. 5551 at the time the Congress adjourned this year.

The railroads have strongly opposed favorable action on H. R. 4353 principally because of the increased taxes that this bill would impose on the industry. The industry urged favorable action instead on H. R. 6016, which would substantially revise the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act. Railway labor organizations opposed H. R. 6016.

That is how matters stood at the close of the 1st session of the 85th Congress. The fundamental problem of how to make up the existing deficiency in the railroad retirement account of $169,390,000 annually on a level cost basis remained unresolved. Until this deficit can be made up, it would be imprudent to enact legislation providing for additional retirement and survivor benefits. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is unanimously of the opinion that regardless of the desirability of certain proposals for the liberalization of benefits payable under the Railroad Retirement Act, no amendments should be made to this law which would jeopardize the financial soundness of this retirement system. This principle is accepted by all the standard railway labor organizations as well as by railroad management.

In conclusion, I should like to remind my colleagues that benefits payable under the railroad retirement system have improved continuously in recent years, and will continue to improve within the limits of the funds available. When the Railroad Retirement Act was passed in 1937, the maximum retirement annuity was $120 a month. Today the maximum is $184.30, and this maximum is scheduled to rise to $191.90 by January 1967, and to $260.30 by January 1977, without any further changes in the law. The present maximum for a retired employee and his eligible spouse is $238.60, and this maximum is scheduled to rise to $246.20 by January 1967, and to $314.60 by January 1977, without any further changes in the law. Since 1937, the following additional benefits have been provided: Survivor benefits to widows, widowers, parents and children, spouses' benefits, more liberal disability annuities, lowering of the age requirements for survivor benefits from age 65 to age 60; benefits to widowed mothers or wives with disabled children over 18 years of age; repealing the dual benefit restriction on retirement and survivor annuities; increasing the permissible earnings for disability annuitants and for survivors, and so forth. In other words, benefits have been improved wherever possible to the maximum level possible without endangering the financial soundness of the railroad retirement system.

Every member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and every Member of the Congress, I am sure, has every desire to be helpful to retired railroad workers and their families. However, we must also be mindful of our grave responsibilities toward the currently active railroad workers and future railroad workers who will retire many years hence. We must make certain that when they retire the financial status of the railroad retirement system will be sound and that they will receive the benefits accruing to them, their dependents, and survivors. With these objectives in mind, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce will proceed early during the next session of the Congress to reconsider the retirement and unemployment-insurance bills pending before it, and I am confident that we can make progress in solving some of the problems which I have outlined.

A Report to the People of the Fourth Congressional District of Oregon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES O. PORTER

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I intend to comment today on the work of the 1st session of the 85th Congress which in some way affects the residents of Oregon's fourth Congressional District.

There are areas in which I believe this Congress could have dealt more effectively.

Certainly the problems of inadequate school construction continue to plague us. Inadequate farm legislation is a monument to a kind man's tragic inability to see that the modern farm family is being cast adrift.

The small-business man, and there are thousands in my district, continues to suffer. He is thwarted by a law which limits to $250,000 the money he may borrow for firm improvements or expansion.

Congressional pressure and lusty howls from citizens did force the President to follow Congressional direction and lower Federal Housing Administration downpayment loans. This will bolster the economy of the fourth district. The Housing Act of 1957 falls far short of the legislation I introduced, which would have decreased interest rates, expanded the lending facilities of the Federal National Mortgage Association and speeded public housing starts previously authorized by Congress.

Statehood bills for Alaska and Hawaii once again failed to reach the floor.

An Alaskan bill was reported favorably from committee, but was bottled up in the Rules Committee. Hawaiian legislation is pending in the Interior and Insular Affairs Territories Subcommittee.

Inequities in our social-security laws have not been corrected. That will be a major problem facing Congress next session.

A postal rate-increase bill passed by the House was held up in the Senate.

The House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, of which I am a member, approved legislation increasing first-class mail to 4 cents, airmail to 7 cents, and the once penny post card to 3 cents. Costs in second- and third-class mail were increased. More than 100 persons testified before the committee during the session.

Like most of the people who write to me, I oppose the suggested increases until thorough study is made. I agree that first-class mail, which is nearly self-sufficient, should not have to bear the burden of second- and third-class mail.

I have introduced legislation—H. R. 7138—which asks that Congressional policy for the determination of postal rates and fees be established. The bill is pending before the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

WAR, PEACE, AND THE HYDROGEN BOMB

Beyond the boundaries of the fourth district, yet directly affecting every resident, are the problems of war and peace and nuclear energy. Joint Atomic Energy Committee hearings definitely established that no one really knows the good and bad aspects of nuclear testing. Atomic Energy Commission experts disagree with other leading physicists as to fallout hazards. It is difficult for citizen or Congressman to know what to believe.

Early this session Senator NEUBERGER and I introduced identical legislation which would provide for research, study, and prevention and treatment of effects of atomic and nuclear radiation on human health, development, and living conditions. The bill—H. R. 4820 in the House—calls for the establishment of a radiation health institute.

Later I introduced H. R. 8269, which would prohibit further testing by explosion of nuclear devices as long as all other countries refrain. This proposal is supported by such world citizens as Dwight Eisenhower, Adlai Stevenson, and Albert Schweitzer.

MAJOR LEGISLATION

Among the more important issues to face the House this year were the following:

First. The President's Mideast doctrine authorizing him to undertake a program of military and economic cooperation with Middle Eastern nations in order to counteract communism. Agreed to, 355 to 61, January 30, 1957—Democrats, 188 to 35; Republicans, 167 to 26. A yea vote supported the President's position. I voted "yea."

Second. Patman resolution authorizing an investigation of national monetary and credit policies by the House Banking and Currency Committee. Rejected, 174 to 225—Democrats, 172 to 38; Republicans, 2 to 185—March 27, 1957. President opposed resolution by Representative PATMAN, of Texas. I approved the resolution.

Third. Civil-rights bill: Passed the House June 18, 1957, 286 to 126—Democrats, 118 to 107; Republicans, 168 to 19. I voted "yea."

Fourth. Legislation to amend the Small Business Act of 1953 and make the Small Business Administration a permanent agency—H. R. 7963—passed House, 392 to 2, June 25, 1957—Democrats, 205 to 1; Republicans, 187 to 1. I voted "yea."

Fifth. Mutual Security Act of 1957—S. 2130—passed House, 254 to 154, July 19, 1957—Democrats, 135 to 78; Republicans, 119 to 76. I approved passage.

Sixth. Postal pay-increase bill passed House, 379 to 38, on July 23, 1957—Democrats, 217 to 9; Republicans, 162 to 29. I voted for passage. President opposed.

Seventh. School Construction Assistance Act of 1957—H. R. 1—killed when enacting clause struck by vote of 208 to 203—Democrats, 97 to 126; Republicans, 111 to 77. I voted "nay"; that is, against killing bill.

Eighth. Postal Rate Increase Act of 1957—H. R. 5836—raising first-, second-, and third-class mail rates. I opposed passage of bill, which passed, 256 to 129—Democrats, 85 to 125; Republicans, 171 to 4. President supported bill.

SECURITY, NOT WASTE

Before continuing to less-controversial matters, I want to comment on the so-called loyalty-security bill, S. 1411. As passed by the Senate, the legislation was noncontroversial and clarified suspension provisions relative to Government employees. As amended in the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, it became a threat to every Government worker.

Because Representative HOLIFIELD and I believe this is an attempt, for no good reason, to create a security interest where none exists, we have filed a minority report against the bill as amended. We believe it is an unreasonable attempt to reverse the Supreme Court and is spite legislation. We urge full hearings on it.

BUILDING THE FUTURE

Too many promising students drop out of college or never have an opportunity to further their study because of inadequate finances. A need for Federal study in this field is evident. The question is: Should aid be in the form of self-sustaining loans or as outright gifts based on ability?

My H. R. 6212 would provide for national scholarships for college and university undergraduate study. It is pending before the Education and Labor Special Education Subcommittee. Hearings on this subject are scheduled, including one in Portland this fall. The Soviet Union provides higher education for capable scholars free of charge. This sort of assistance is pushing the Soviets ahead of the United States in such fields as science and engineering.

HELP FOR TODAY

Throughout the world thousands of orphans are neglected, spurned and even disliked by their countrymen. They are children of mixed blood, and the homes they need and seek seem to be waiting in the United States.

I introduced H. R. 3783 on January 28, 1957, which would amend the existing immigration laws and permit entry into the United States of 10,000 orphans who are under 12 years of age. This was identical to legislation originated and introduced by Senator NEUBERGER. Our bills became the basis for a section of the Immigration Subcommittee chairman's bill which passed Congress. In its final form it permits entry of an unlimited number of orphans under age 14 until June 30, 1959. Proxy adoptions are permitted.

FEDERAL-STATE COOPERATION—WATER POLLUTION CONTROL

The Federal Government and individual States join forces in many areas to improve living conditions and boost living standards.

For example, more than $300,000 in Federal assistance went to the cities of Albany, Lebanon, North Bend, and Roseburg in fiscal 1957 under provisions of the Water Pollution Control Act. Congress has appropriated $45 million for fiscal 1958 and Oregon's share is $651,575. Communities interested should contact the Oregon State Board of Health, Portland.

The fourth district's share last fiscal year was $387,241.59 of the State's $1,080,054, distributed as follows:

Albany, $18,060 of $60,200 for sewage-treatment plant.

Lebanon, $13,300.09 of $44,334 for sewage-treatment plant.

North Bend, $5,881.50 of $19,605, raw sewage pump station.

Roseburg, $250,000 of $995,915 for sewage-treatment plant.

Drain, $19,781.40 of $65,938 for treatment plant and outfall sewer.

LIBRARY SERVICES ACT

Another area in Federal aid in rural library development. By July 1, 1958, Oregon will receive $116,941 from the Library Services Act, designed by the 84th Congress in 1956. Fourth district benefits include services of a consultant field worker, bookmobile exhibits in Josephine and Coos Counties and bookmobile sampling and cooperative cataloging in Jackson County. Congress authorized maximum $7,500,000 for each of the 5 years the program is to run. This Congress appropriated $5 million, double the fiscal 1957 amount. Oregon's EDITH GREEN helped draft initial legislation.

HOUSING AND HOME FINANCE AGENCY

Existing housing legislation makes possible urban planning assistance and the urban renewal programs which benefit the district. Under the former at least $10,400 has come to fourth district cities whose planning programs were approved. A lump sum is awarded the State and then used by the University of Oregon's bureau of municipal research to aid in providing planning assistance. Urban planning goals aid smaller cities and help prevent slum conditions. 1957 grants in the district are as follows:

Albany, $3,000, February 21; one pending.

Grants Pass, Medford, North Bend, pending.

Sutherlin, $6,400, February 21.

Sweet Home, $1,000, February 21, one pending.

Eugene-Springfield, continuing project underway, $12,000 application pending.

Urban renewal, a second program, was initiated in the 1949 Housing Act, and provides for city improvement. Springfield has qualified and a sum of $445,757 has been reserved for that city's Third Street project. To date $65,975 approved by URA for preliminaries. Last March 31, the city received $18,900. Communities interested must display initiative and interest. Contact point in region is Housing and Home Finance Agency office: Flood Building, Ninth Floor, 870 Market Street, San Francisco, Mr. M. Justin Herman.

HOUSING LEGISLATION

The new housing legislation contains these major provisions:

First. Authorizes lowering of down payments on FHA-insured home loans to 3 percent on the first $10,000 of appraised value, 15 percent of the next $6,000, and 30 percent of the excess up to a maximum of $20,000 for a 1- or 2-family residence.

Second. Increases Federal National Mortgage Association authority to borrow from the public by $650 million to finance its purchase of FHA and VA-backed mortgages in the secondary market.

Third. Authorizes an additional $360 million in capital grants for slum clearance and urban renewal for 1 fiscal year.

Fourth. Directs the FHA and VA to impose discount controls, but permits them to vary in accordance with mortgage terms, geographical area, and other pertinent factors.

The conference report eliminated Senate proposals to allow over-income tenants to remain in public housing projects and to abolish the workable program requirement for such projects, but it also killed the House-approved amendment restricting future public housing units to those necessary to house families displaced by governmental action.

There are many areas which should be improved. However, there is, in the legislation as approved, considerable hope for the improvement of the slowed-down housing industry.

I believe that my bill, H. R. 4821, prepared after considerable work on the part of many persons, would have been more helpful. I intend to press for its enactment. It contains six major points:

First. Better the field of sales housing mortgage insurance by increasing the maximum mortgage amount to be insured by FHA and to decrease the required down payment. It would boost the mortgage loan insurance provision from the single-family residence maximum of $20,000 to $30,000 and decrease the FHA loan rate from 5 to 4½ percent.

Second. Benefit middle-income housing by replacing present inadequate programs for middle-income housing.

Third. Amend the National Housing Act by authorizing the Commissioner to make direct loans to eligible borrowers up to $10,000.

Fourth. Release for construction as needed 810,000 low-rent public-housing units authorized by Housing Act of 1949.

Fifth. Make direct supplemental veterans' loans available in urban areas as well as rural areas, and make $1 billion available for direct loans to veterans.

Sixth. Use money now in trust funds of SSA by VA through its national service life insurance operation and make money available to eligible borrowers to correct the tight-money problem in home-loan field, create general increase in borrowing for home construction, and a following upsurge in the use of lumber and lumber products.

DISTRICT ECONOMY

Army civil works functions and a big Bureau of Reclamation project will bring $13,062,000 in Federal funds to the Fourth Congressional District in fiscal year 1958.

Each project is aimed at developing the district to a point where maximum usage of natural resources is possible. It should be noted that the nearly $20 million my district receives is a portion of the United States total of $858 million. The following chart provides a summary of appropriations and their use in the district:

Summary—Appropriations, Army civil functions and Bureau of Reclamation

SUMMARY

It is difficult to describe in the few words available here all of the things that a Congressman does to represent his constituents. One of his biggest, and in many ways most rewarding, jobs is reading and answering the mail from the district, providing information on specific subjects, giving advice on problems involving legislation, smoothing the way in contacts by constituents with Federal agencies, agreeing—and sometimes disagreeing—with correspondents regarding certain bills up for action.

I estimate that my office staff and myself spend at least half of our time answering mail from the seven counties of southwestern Oregon. The office receives between 40 and 60 letters on an average day, most of them from the Fourth District of Oregon, nearly all of them requiring answers, and many of them requiring considerable time and effort to gather the information necessary for an intelligent reply.

It has been my intention to answer every inquiry received from my constituents. I believe that I have accomplished that goal.

It seems to me that the people I represent may be interested in what I consider to have been the major events, the highlights, of the past 8 months of operation of my Washington, D. C., office. Therefore, I am including in the RECORD the following outline report:

MONTHLY HIGHLIGHTS—JANUARY

Congress urged to increase Cougar Dam appropriation to $6,720,000, $150,000 above President's request. United States Corps of Engineers asked to consider $400,000 for flood-control project protecting Oakridge and Willamette City from further flood threats. Legislation introduced to authorize Florence harbor improvement—$1,693,100 to extend north jetty at Siuslaw mouth and deepen channel entrance to 18 feet at bar and provide 16-foot inner channel 200 feet wide. Engineers say not feasible to undertake emergency flood-control works to protect Willamette City from high water on the Middle Fork of Willamette, say Hills Creek Dam will do job 3 years hence. Mysterious disappearance of Gerald Lester Murphy, Eugene, linked with disappearance of famed Basque scholar, Jesus de Galindez, New York City. Eugene Water Board asked to explain publicly future plans for Beaver Marsh. Green Peter Dam listed for only $225,000 in President's budget, Oregon delegation Democrats fight for increase. Engineers budget $21,000 for Rogue River harbor for fiscal 1958 and list Chetco River proposed construction at $200,000. Talent project becomes economy victim, sliced $1 million by Bureau of Budget to $6,041,000.

FEBRUARY

Life magazine says Gerry Murphy piloted plane carrying Professor Galindez to Dominican Republic. I introduce legislation to reinvest portion of yearly profits from national forests in forest maintenance and development. I am named to Post Office and Civil Service Committee and to Subcommittee on Civil Service. Senator NEUBERGER and I introduce National Radiation Health Institute bill. I push for installation of Navy oceanographic installation near Coos Bay. Navy announces it will place installation at Coos Head. Keith Skelton, my district office manager, initiates Congressional clinics. Army engineers approve $200,000 to start improvements on Siuslaw Harbor in work to open port eventually to oceangoing trade. I ask House Appropriation Subcommittee to increase funds for access roads in national forests, ask that $2,664,000 be added; I note that Department of Interior this year has requested full authorized amount for timber access roads in the O. and C. lands under their jurisdiction but that Department of Agriculture did not for national forests. Senators MORSE and NEUBERGER and I term United States Department of Agriculture decision to reduce Three Sisters Wilderness Area by 53,000 acres hasty, point out a wiser decision would have resulted when land use and scientific studies in progress are completed. I join Representatives ULLMAN and GREEN in fight against limitation to public assistance administration funds placed in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I introduce housing legislation—described in detail above.

MARCH

Intention of introducing bill to authorize construction of remaining structures proposed in Rogue Basin project announced. Ways and Means Chairman JERE COOPER tells me excise tax on transportation will command our most serious attention. Oregon Democratic delegation works for $500,000 to complete reconstruction engineering and design work on Green Peter Dam project. Sum is more than twice that requested in budget and would speed actual construction by 1 year. I press for appropriations for review survey looking to development of deepwater channel at mouth of Umpqua. Effort to get Port Chicago Navy ammunition supply depot relocated in Coos Bay area nixed by Navy. Legislation introduced to provide 100,000 national scholarships. EWEB indicates continuing interest in Beaver Marsh hydroelectric project. Oregon Representatives and Senators introduce legislation asking for special stamp to honor Oregon's 100th anniversary in 1959. Hawaiian Delegate JOHN BURNS and I propose U. S. S. Arizona memorial at Pearl Harbor, funds to be raised by public subscription. I ask Federal Power Commission to cancel EWEB license extension to build Beaver Marsh project on upper McKenzie. Roseburg receives $250,000 Federal grant for pollution control.

APRIL

I demand Postmaster General Summerfield resign on grounds he has acted as a poor businessman and in bad faith in connection with deficiency appropriation request. Conference with United States Department of Agriculture officials on need for aid to Croft Easter-lily bulbgrowers in Curry County where symphylids did $100,000 damage in 1956. Medford receives $48,750 grant-in-aid from Civil Aeronautics Board for municipal airport under 1958 Federal-aid airport program. Grants Pass receives $56,611 under Federal aid airport program. Eugene receives $137,403 under Federal-aid airport program. EWEB withdraws FPC application for preliminary permit to build power features at Cougar Dam. I visit district during Easter recess and attend more than 20 meetings. Introduction of legislation to give Lillie Moore property in Roseburg to Douglas County Historical Society.

MAY

Federal assistance authorized in preparation of works plan on Lynx Hollow watershed near Cottage Grove under authority of Watershed Protection and Flood Prevention Act. I introduce legislation to establish National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission, calling for genuine examination and appraisal of recreation values. I testify before House Small Business Committee, say high interest, tight-credit policies have not helped Oregon economy; point out need to increase loan ceiling of $250,000. National Park Service Director Conrad L. Wirth writes me that recreation survey of McKenzie River headwaters will be made at earliest opportunity "in accordance with your request." Vote against soil-bank program. Testimony before Public Works Committee for increased Green Peter appropriation, pointing out project will prevent annual damages of $1,589,700. Receive special recognition from Jackson County Young Farmers for attempting to obtain adequate recreation, irrigation, and flood-control program in Rogue Basin. Oregon Democratic delegation ask House Appropriations Subcommittee to add $14,118,880 to funds proposed by administration for Oregon water-resources development. National Rivers and Harbors Congress meeting in Washington, D. C., recommends United States Congress speed studies of Rogue River flood-control project and navigation project at Florence. I voice opposition to first-class mail price increases. Press for $19,000 Federal grant to get Coos-Millicoma Rivers dredging project under way; project removed from budget in economy move.

JUNE

I visit on different weekends Puerto Rico, Costa Rica, Colombia in effort to gain further information on Gerald Murphy case and return convinced United States policy in Latin America is ruining United States prestige. Introduce legislation to wipe out all fast tax writeoffs, except for new weapons, retroactive to January 1, 1957. Regretfully decline invitations to visit other Latin American countries opposing dictatorships until after session ends. Receive letter from Regional Forester J. Herbert Stone, Portland, stating that Beaver Marsh project on McKenzie would detract in a substantial way from upper river beauty. I write that public works projects are seed corn rather than pork barrel. House subcommittee does not increase Green Peter funds. Substantial increase in allowable cut in Siuslaw Forest predicted by me. Testimony before public works subcommittee of House Committee on Appropriations to call for $20 million for Army Civil Works and Bureau of Reclamation projects in fourth district. Tentative Rogue bill redrafted; bill calls for construction of Lewis Creek Dam, Reservoir, and powerplant, and so forth, but could be amended if engineers' survey report deems necessary. AFL–CIO requests Congress to initiate full-scale investigation of Galindez-Murphy case and all its ramifications. I move for permanent subcommittees on Federal salaries, pensions, civil-service matters, and postal affairs to spread work of Post Office and Civil Service Committee and reduce control of chairman, lose in 11 to 11 tie vote in committee session. I introduced resolutions requesting study of Canada's family allowance program. Inquiry by me reveals that a nylonlike fiber may be manufactured from lignin, a substance which binds wood fibers in a tree. Harry Holt brings to Washington information regarding need for passage of orphan legislation. Learn Federal grand jury started study of Gerald Murphy case in March.

JULY

Dominican Republic hires New York State attorneys to conduct investigation into death of Dr. Galindez. My amendment banning aid to Latin American dictators overwhelmingly defeated. Coos-Curry Cooperative receives $702,000 REA loan for expansion. Nickel Corporation of America executive praises me for sincere concern with anything which will build up the economy of the area he represents in the national legislature. I ask investigation of Southern Pacific log hauling rates, after terming them discriminatory. Suggest Southern Pacific try diesel car passenger service for 1 year between Eugene and Ashland; Southern Pacific says no. Public works projects in fourth district uncut by Senate Appropriations Committee; Willamette River bank protection increased $150,000; Fall Creek Dam allocated $150,000. Bill introduced to rescind authorization for Waldo Lake tunnel in eastern Lane County to preserve lake in natural state. I inspect prefabrication plant in Lafayette, Ind., learn plant managers need lumber of specified lengths. I suggest Organization of American States investigate disappearances of Murphy and Galindez. Save the McKenzie River Association expresses appreciation for my work on behalf of Beaver Marsh. Rogue River bill introduced, $66 million would be authorized for completion.

AUGUST

Jose Figueres, President of Republic of Costa Rica, writes me about my antidictator stand: "destiny placed you in a position to do a great deal of good for democracy in the American Hemisphere, and fitted you with the appropriate qualifications for the job." Southern Pacific sees no serious boxcar shortage to hamper late summer shipping demands for lumber and harvested grain in western Oregon. Meet the Press has me as guest. Western Congressmen urge more Federal contracts for west coast shipyards. Introduction of legislation to use Railroad Retirement Act funds for investment in FHA mortgages to boost interest for the pension fund and help the building industry. Funds tentatively available for Army engineer surveys for six proposed projects in southwestern Oregon for about $105,000: $40,000 for report on Rogue River and tributaries; $7,000 to complete the Umpqua harbor and river report; $2,500 for Coquille River report to determine advisability of extending north jetty and deepening entrance channel; $27,100 for Umpqua River flood control report; $25,000 to complete flood control survey of Coquille River and tributaries; $2,800 for survey at Salmon Harbor, Winchester Bay. House passes U. S. S. Arizona memorial legislation. Subcommittee unanimously okays transfer of part of Lillie Moore property to Douglas County Historical Society; House to act on measure next session. Resolution to authorize survey on feasibility of small boat basin for Siuslaw Harbor delayed until next year. I introduce legislation to save National Grange headquarters.

POST SESSION

In September the President signed orphan legislation into law, vetoed Federal employees' pay raise legislation.

Congressman Tewes Has 100 Percent Voting Record on Legislative Rollcalls

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DONALD E. TEWES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. TEWES. Mr. Speaker, with the adjournment of the 1st session of the 85th Congress, I have compiled a report to the people I am privileged to represent. Included is my complete voting record on rollcalls and quorum calls. Nothing has been omitted, and I have exercised no censorship of any kind.

At the risk of sacrificing technical accuracy, I have eliminated all parliamentary terms such as recommit and recede from disagreement from the Senate. Instead I have attempted to phrase briefly and impartially the question which was at issue when my vote was cast.

The accompanying tables show that I was present and signified my position on every rollcall for a voting record of 100 percent. I was absent from the Chamber on 3 days when there were quorum calls not involving legislative issues. Including these unavoidable absences, my general attendance for the session was about 97 percent.

Because brief summaries cannot reflect the full significance of each vote, I invite my constituents to write me or contact me personally on any matters on which they desire additional information.

The report follows:

Roll-call No.	Date	Explanation	Vote
1	Jan. 3	Call of the House	Present.
2	Jan. 3	Election of Speaker	MARTIN.
3	Jan. 29	Quorum call	Present.
4	Jan. 29	H. R. 123: Shall the House consider the Middle East resolution under "closed" rule which limits debate? (262 yea to 146)	Nay.
5	Jan. 30	H. J. Res. 117: Shall the President be authorized to undertake military and economic cooperation with nations in the general area of the Middle East? (355 yea to 61.)	Yea.
6	Feb. 5	H. R. 4249: Shall there be a $15,728,000 limit on the amount which States can spend for administration of public assistance grants? (20 yea to 167.)	Yea.

Mutual Security Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT B. CHIPERFIELD

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, during the last several months committees of Congress as well as Congress itself have been looking into the mutual security program in great detail. Their efforts are reflected in the Authorization Act and in the Appropriation Act passed at the end of August. I know that much has been written and spoken on this subject. But I think it timely to highlight some of the major features of the program for this year.

As to the amounts involved, in January the President's budget message referred to a program of $4.4 billion. By the time the Committee on Foreign Affairs began its consideration of the measure last spring that sum had been reduced to $3.8 billion as a result of various savings effected by the administration. As the authorization bill emerged from the Senate it carried a sum of $3.6 billion. The House reduced this to $3.1 billion. The compromise that resulted was an authorization of $3.3 billion. The appropriations made pursuant to this authorization were $2.7 billion. Thus the reduction made by Congress from the President's request was almost 29 percent.

Economic aid has been drastically reduced. Such economic aid as is given now extends only to a few countries in the Near and Far East that need such assistance to support the forces our military authorities believe essential for the Free World's defense.

An innovation in this year's law is the development loan fund. The fund has been established with a capital of $300 million to extend assistance in the form of loans and credits to the underdeveloped nations of the world, particularly the newer governments of Asia and Africa. There is a popular demand in those countries for improved living conditions. No government can remain in power in any of those nations if its people do not believe that it is dedicated to bringing them better living conditions.

Many of those nations know little about the Soviet Union. They believe that the Soviet system has brought great improvement in the standard of living of the people in Russia and in Communist China. At the same time, they regard their national sovereignty and independence as more important than anything else.

Events of the last year have made it clear that the future welfare and security of the United States are bound up to an increasing extent with the nations of Asia and Africa. If, in that period, we can maintain the confidence and respect of these nations, we can expect that the lives of our children will be more peaceful and secure than they are today. On the other hand, if these people believe us to be uninterested in their development, we may expect to live in a world of increasing international tension.

The development loan fund offers the underdeveloped people a reasonable expectation that the United States will extend them assistance if they come forward with feasible plans for their own development. Many of the projects necessary for their economic improvement may take several years to complete. It is important that, if we extend credit to start a project such as land reclamation, we follow through. Otherwise it would be better that we never start it. We want nations to feel confident that if they do their part of the job, they can count on us to carry out our commitments. I think the inclusion of the development loan fund is one of the most far-reaching steps we have taken in our foreign aid program. This is much better than outright grants from which we could expect no return.

The technical cooperation program, originally called point 4, has been continued although at a level below that planned by the administration. Those programs are almost entirely demonstration-type programs designed to impart our skills and information to other peoples in basic fields such as education, public health, agriculture, and public administration. By their very nature they have made a deep impress on many peoples in the underdeveloped countries and have garnered for us an important measure of good will and understanding at the grassroots level.

It is easy to be critical of parts of a program that is global in scope. I have no doubt that there is some waste, some inefficiency, some poor personnel, and some unwise programing. But these defects must always be weighed against the benefits that we Americans derive from a stronger world of free people.

Accomplishments of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a report on the accomplishments of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of which I am chairman.

There being no objection, the report was ordered and printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, I am proud to report to the Senate today that your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I am chairman, accomplished more business this year than we did in the 1st session of the 84th Congress, with more legislation referred to us, more reported to you, more bills passed by the Senate, and more of our bills signed by the President than in the session 2 years ago.

This year our committee had referred to it 199 Senate and House bills, resolutions, and amendments as compared to 155 such pieces of legislation 2 years ago.

We reported 54 of them to the Senate, of which 52 were passed. This was nine more than was approved in the 1st session of the 84th Congress. House committees reported 10 of the bills to the House and passed a total of 19 Senate bills, since 9 of our approved measures were substituted for House bills when the legislation reached the House floor.

The President signed 30 of our bills this year as compared to twenty-three 2 years ago. Sixteen of our bills remained in the House committee this year as compared to 13 in 1955.

We had 506 routine nominations referred to us in 1957, all of which were approved by us and confirmed by the Senate. We handled 14 major nominations which were approved and confirmed.

Our full committee held 30 days of open hearings this year as compared to 21 days of open hearings in 1955, while our subcommittees held 34 days of open hearings compared to thirty 2 years ago.

Our full committee held 18 executive sessions the same as 2 years ago, but I want to emphasize that all except a very few were short sessions following open hearings to vote upon matters discussed at the open hearings. I recall only three full executive sessions and each of these were called at the request of Government officials.

Our subcommittees held 9 executive sessions the same as 2 years ago.

The tabulation of our record follows:

1st sess. of 84th Cong. as compared to 1st sess. of 85th Cong.

	1955	1957
Number of Senate and House bills, resolutions, and amendments referred to committee	155	199
Number of bills reported by committee (Senate and House)	46	54
Number of bills passed by Senate (Senate and House)	43	52

Aviation Subcommittee	3	2
Merchant Marine and Fisheries Subcommittee	1	----
Auto Marketing Subcommittee	2	----
S. 86	------	1
Operations of Petroleum Industry Subcommittee	------	1
Total	27	27

This record was made possible by the wholehearted cooperation of every one of the 15 members of our committee. Members of both the majority and minority worked shoulder to shoulder to move legislation which was referred to us.

I have appreciated the willing help of the Honorable JOHN W. BRICKER, ranking Republican on our committee, and the willing hard work put in by other minority members.

I want to express my gratitude to the chairman and members of our subcommittees who put in long hours holding public hearings to gather testimony on proposed legislation.

Our Surface Transportation Subcommittee, headed by the Honorable GEORGE A. SMATHERS, held 11 days of hearings on transportation subjects and reported the transportation bills the committee eventually sent to you.

Our Aviation Subcommittee, headed by Hon. A. S. MIKE MONRONEY held 10 days of public hearings and worked long hours preparing such legislation for the committee. My Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries put in 6 days on public hearings.

During the year we created a Subcommittee on Foreign Commerce which intends to go thoroughly into the question of the Nation's foreign commerce during the 2d session of the 85th Congress. We also created a special subcommittee which will investigate the operations of the Military Air Transport Service and the Military Sea Transportation Service to determine how their operations affect the operations of our commercial sea and air services.

Mr. President, the work of our committee covered a wide range of important subjects, from establishment of a 3-man Airways Modernization Board which will develop and test plans for safe navigation and traffic control of all civil and military aircraft, to 9 changes in our transportation laws which will have important effect upon the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The Airways Modernization Board is required to submit to Congress by January 1959 a plan for general reorganization of Federal aviation functions, looking to the establishment of an independent aviation authority. The committee looks to this report to lay down the plan for legislation to get away from the hit-and-miss aviation program now followed in the handling of our civilian and military aviation.

The committee also reported favorably S. 1423, a bill to amend the Civil Aeronautics Act by limiting the President's authority to overrule CAB certification decisions involving foreign air transportation. The measure requires that Government agencies permit a greater participation by a representative of domestic airlines in negotiations with foreign governments, and that such a representative be designated as a member of the United States negotiating delegation.

We also reported favorably a bill granting permanent certification to airlines operating in the States-Alaska service. These are the Alaska Airlines, Inc., Pacific Northern Airlines, and 1 of the 2 routes operated to Alaska by Northwest Airlines.

Upon the recommendation of your committee the Congress enacted Public Law 163, which redefines contract carriage under the Interstate Commerce Act. This is considered one of the most important steps taken regarding our interstate traffic laws. This, and the seven other amendments made to the Interstate Commerce Act, did much to meet the Cabinet Committee recommendations for revision of our transportation laws.

We held hearings on many other proposed amendments to the ICC Act and work on those bills will be resumed when Congress returns in January.

One of our aviation bills, S. 1753, to exclude from other income computations in determining subsidy needs the amount of [illegible] gains realized by air carriers from the disposal of obsolete flight equipment was made the pending business when Congress reconvenes in January.

Another bill to aid air carriers to rejuvenate their equipment was S. 2229, a bill to provide Government guaranty of private loans to certain local air carriers, territorial airlines, and certificated helicopter companies. The guaranty would be for 90 percent of the loan and would enable the carriers to replace their obsolete equipment, modernize their fleets in interest of national defense, and increase comfort for the traveling public.

Our Subcommittee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported favorably 14 bills that became laws. These included legislation to implement the 1955 treaty with Panama, repeal the 50-50 escapement of salmon in Alaska limitation contained in the White law; authorize construction of vessels in United States shipyards; authorize additional funds for Coast and Geodetic Survey vessels and to postpone for 2 years the Coast Guard regulations appyling to small boats carrying 6 or more passengers for hire.

During the year we held extended hearings on proposals to restrict transfers of vessels from United States registry to foreign registry. We also held hearings on some 20 bills calling for the sale of ships from the national defense reserve fleet to foreign governments or foreign nationals.

Reports on these measures are being prepared and will be taken up by the committee in the 2d session of the 85th Congress.

G. H. (Wad) Williamson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH W. YARBOROUGH

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, Erath County, Tex., and the Nation have suffered a great loss in the recent death of G. H. (Wad) Williamson, of Stephenville. His life was one in keeping with the traditions and democratic faith of his pioneer family. His courage and forthright battle against the forces of corruption and vilification which threaten the democratic ideals which he upheld have served and will continue to serve for years to come, as an inspiration to all who believe in the American heritage of freedom.

Wad Williamson served as my campaign manager throughout the cross timbers area of Texas during three long campaigns. His deep devotion to democratic ideals and his outstanding leadership was a responsible factor in the ultimate victory.

Mr. President, the May 17, 1957, issue of the Stephenville Empire-Tribune paid tribute to this great man.

"Mr. Williamson was known for his many deeds of kindness to those in distress. In a quiet way he extended a helping hand to scores of elderly people in Erath County. Frequently he made no charge for his legal service. However, as a prosecutor he was vigorous and unyielding to those who violated the rule of principle and the laws of the State."

In this same paper, 1 week later, the sterling character of Wad Williamson again was reflected in editorial comment:

"The night was never too dark for Wad to come to the relief of one of his friends, regardless of what the circumstances were."

Mr. President, Wad Williamson has left a heritage worthy of guarding because he was courageous and steadfast in fighting for the preservation of that heritage of freedom which was his. I shall always cherish his memory as I did his friendship.

Montana and the REA's

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, the farms and rural communities of America today enjoy the use of the same modern equipment and conveniences that are enjoyed by urban areas. These include the many necessities and luxuries operated by electric current. In the past 20 years we have witnessed a vast transformation in the mode of rural living due largely to electricity—electricity brought to farms and communities at reasonable rates.

This could have been done only with the cooperation of the Federal Government. The job of bringing electricity to the isolated areas of this Nation has been a tremendous one and the accomplishments have been great. I commend the many rural-electric cooperatives who in cooperation with the Rural Electrification Administration have made all of this possible.

Farm electrification advanced very slowly in the United States during the period after 1882, when the first central generating system went into service, until 1935 when the Rural Electrification Administration was created. In 1944 Congress extended for an indefinite period of time the life of this lending agency.

It is quite important that we distinguish between the REA and the individual rural-electric cooperative. The REA is an arm of the Federal Government empowered to make loans to qualified borrowers, with preference to nonprofit and cooperative organizations and to public bodies. The REA is not in the power business. It does not operate rural-electric facilities and makes no grants or subsidies. Its loans are repaid from the operating revenues of the locally owned, locally managed cooperative, the other partner in this program of rural electrification. The REA serves principally as a banker to the local system and contributes technical advice. The rural cooperative constructs the power lines and other electric facilities to serve persons in rural areas who are without central-station electric service. The loans the cooperatives receive bear a 2-percent interest rate and are repaid over a maximum period of 35 years.

Few farmers were connected to central-station power prior to World War I. The early twenties saw a short-lived spurt in which the progress made in electrical engineering was reflected by a small increase in the number of farms served.

However, only 10.9 percent of all farms in the United States were receiving central-station electric service by 1935. Few power lines had been built beyond the immediate vicinities of cities and towns.

Farmers and farm organizations, chafing at the slow rate of progress, increased their demands for Government action in the field of rural electrification. The result was the establishment of REA, with an action program designed primarily to make electric service available to those farm people who were without electricity.

REA estimated as of June 30, 1956, that approximately 95 percent of the Nation's farms were electrified.

Many of the remaining unelectrified farms are situated in isolated areas, or in areas of relatively low farm income. Consequently, the most difficult part of the rural electrification job remains to be completed. However, the REA program has succeeded in establishing a pattern which eventually can provide virtually every unserved farm in the country with electric service.

Membership in rural electric cooperatives is not confined to farmers. It is open to all people in a rural area who can be reached and who want electric service. More than three-fourths of all consumers on REA-financed cooperative lines are farms. But also included are many thousands of rural nonfarm dwellings, schools, churches, stores, community buildings, and similar facilities. REA borrowers also serve thousands of rural industries and other commercial enterprises. Many of these rural industries themselves are operating on a cooperative plan.

Rural electric cooperatives have proved the most effective instrument for carrying out the REA program because of their advantages as a method of making reasonable cost electric service available to farmers in rural areas. These advantages include:

First, REA-financed cooperatives operate on a nonprofit basis. This enables them to provide electric service at cost to their members.

Second, directors of REA-financed cooperatives are elected because of their known interest in making electric service available to rural people at reasonable rates. They serve without compensation and keep operating expense at the lowest possible level consistent with good service.

Third, members of REA-financed cooperatives also are interested in electric service at reasonable cost. For example, they help reduce operating expense by voluntarily reporting potential causes of service interruptions such as tree limbs touching the lines. Most of them read their own meters, and many make out their own bills.

Fourth, previous experience of farmers with other types of cooperatives helps them to organize and operate rural electric cooperatives on a sound basis with a minimum of effort and expense.

Lines constructed by REA borrowers are built to serve entire areas, including less densely settled sections as well as those of greater population. This is known as area coverage. The test is no longer whether an individual line or section will be self-supporting, but whether the entire system as a whole is feasible. This policy has become increasingly important as the rural electrification job has progressed. Only through area coverage can electric service be extended to many of the more isolated farms, and to others which are remotely situated in pocketed areas far removed from any established source of power.

In every region in the United States rural electric cooperatives have demonstrated that farm electrification, far from constituting an additional cash drain on low-farm incomes, actually brings about a higher real-farm income and better farm living. It brings more business into rural communities. It encourages new local enterprises which come about when low-cost power is available. It stimulates private business, both locally and nationally. Surveys indicate that for every dollar invested in rural power facilities the farmer invests an additional $4.50 in wiring, plumbing, and electrical appliances.

The use of electric power in farm production and processing is constantly expanding. To date about 400 farm uses for electricity have been reported. Electric power on the farm is an economic necessity which can pay its way with handsome profits for the farmer. Guidance is given consumers on REA-financed lines as to which uses are the most efficient and the most profitable in these times of power shortages.

In the State of Montana, at the time REA was established in 1935, only 2,768 farms, or 5.5 percent, were receiving central station electric service. REA estimated as of June 30, 1956, that 28,450 farms, or 86.1 percent of all farms in the State, were served. An estimated 4,600 farms in the State still were without service.

The first REA loan in Montana was approved in May 1936, and the first REA-financed line placed in operation on December 5, 1937, by the Lower Yellowstone Rural Electric Association at Sidney, Mont.

As of September 19, 1957, REA had approved $56,828,109 in loans in the State to 25 borrowers, all of them cooperatives. The loans will enable these borrowers to finance the construction of 28,774 miles of line and other rural electric facilities to serve 41,459 rural consumers. Most of these facilities already are in operation and additional lines are being built.

As of July 1, 1957, REA had advanced $45,915,174 as loans in Montana, and the State's borrowers were operating 27,554 miles of line serving 40,322 farms and other rural consumers.

The average monthly consumption on REA-financed lines in this State increased from 238 kilowatt-hours per farm in 1949 to 501 kilowatt-hours in 1956.

This increase reflects greater use of electrical equipment to save time and labor in performing farm and household tasks to help bring about a more comfortable rural living.

REA's latest debt-service summary, covering all transactions to July 1, 1957, shows that the Montana borrowers have paid $3,854,122 interest on their Government loans, and repaid $5,855,291 of the principal on their Government loans. In addition, they had paid $3,128,118 ahead of schedule—for a total repayment record of $12,837,531.

No payments are overdue.

This is a great record for a great program in a great State. It is my hope that the day is not too far distant when every farm in Montana is electrified.

If the rural areas of Montana are to continue to enjoy the benefits of electric power purchased at reasonable rates there are several things which we must do:

First, we must be assured of an adequate supply of cheap electric power. This is the basis of the entire program. We must fight for equal rights in the purchase of wholesale power from such great projects as Hungry Horse, Canyon Ferry and Fort Peck. Public power and private power development must keep pace with one another.

Second, the preservation of the preference clause as it was written into the Reclamation Act of 1906 is essential to the continued success of the program. The preference clause is not discriminatory in any sense; to the contrary it injects an element of competition in the business of selling electricity.

It is essential that each electric cooperative in Montana and the Nation maintain control of its own electric business. Those of you here in Montana have worked hard to enjoy the benefits of electric service and you must make sure that it is not taken away.

During the recent session of Congress, the one word which would summarize its activities would be "economy." The most dominant issue of the session was inflation. One way is not to increase rates. Higher interest rates help only the bankers. Rates have gone up on various Government loans and there is going to be a concerted effort to double the REA interest rate in the next session of Congress.

The REA program in Montana is paying off with adequate and dependable service, with an orderly and economical construction pattern. We want to continue this pattern of progress. Increased interest rates will place an obstruction in your way. You can be assured that the Montana Congressional delegation will act in the interests of Montana's rural electric cooperatives.

It was a distinct pleasure to work with Senator James E. Murray, Congressmen Lee Metcalf and LeRoy Anderson. We worked together—held periodic conferences—in connection with all matters affecting Montana's welfare and endeavored at all times to work as a unit in furthering the development and best interests of our State.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record a tabulation of each Montana electric cooperative, their loans, repayments, the number of consumers served, and the counties in Montana served by each. The time covered is from 1953 to date. I use this period to include the term I have served as a United States Senator from Montana.

There being no objection, the tabulations were ordered to be printed in the Record.

Nationalized Tin Properties in Bolivia

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by me with respect to the nationalized tin properties in Bolivia.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GREEN

Mr. President, for some time I have been concerned with respect to the situation of the nationalized tin properties in Bolivia. At this particular time I would like to call to the attention of my Senate colleagues an exchange of correspondence between myself and the Department of State with respect to our Government's policy toward the present Government of Bolivia:

JUNE 6, 1957.

The SECRETARY OF STATE,
Department of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: With reference to my previous communication of March 13 and subsequent replies from the Department of State on March 19 and April 3, I am writing to request further information in regard to the situation of the nationalized tin properties in Bolivia.

I am particularly interested in knowing if the Department has available any information as to when the Bolivian Government will dispose of the mining properties which were confiscated and nationalized almost 5 years ago. As you know, one of the mining companies whose mines were nationalized is an American firm with many American stockholders. Over the years, more and more Americans have invested in the development of industry abroad, particularly in Latin America. Therefore, I know you will agree that this matter has special significance because the very foundations of our economic free enterprise are endangered when private property is confiscated and not compensated for fairly and properly.

There have been many press reports from Bolivia regarding this problem, but the current facts are unmistakable—namely, that the Bolivians have done little to compensate for the property they have confiscated. According to these press reports, the Bolivians have studiously avoided an agreement as to the value of these nationalized properties, even though they have discussed the matter many times at meetings with interested parties.

I am not writing to discuss whether the Bolivians were wise in confiscating these properties or whether they have been successful in the operation of them. It has been reported that the mining properties have been dissipated and that there is a very serious drop in production. Those factors have been reported by various United States agencies of the Government and also by the Bolivian Government. It is believed, however, that, if the Bolivians have failed in the operation of these properties, there is still no reason for the owners and stockholders of confiscated properties to suffer financially.

As the United States has extended assistance to Bolivia in the form of loans, it does seem that the American taxpayer who is a stockholder in companies located in that country should be entitled to a fair accounting of the operation and value of these properties.

I trust that you can favor me with a complete, detailed report on the matter in question.

Yours sincerely,
THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D. C., June 21, 1957.

Hon. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR GREEN: I refer to your letter of June 6, 1957, in which you requested further information in regard to the situation of the nationalized tin properties in Bolivia.

The background of this situation and recent significant developments, as well as the views of the Department of State, have already been covered in my letter to Senator George of May 25, 1956, and in my letter to you of April 3, 1957.

Since I last wrote you, the Bolivian Government has continued to make the periodic payments to the former owners of the nationalized mines. These payments are based on percentages of the sales proceeds of minerals extracted from the property. Payments are currently being made to the former mine owners in accordance with the higher rate schedule which was agreed upon in December of last year. According to the latest information available to the Department, the total of payments made to Patino Mines & Enterprises Consolidated, Inc., from 1953 through March 31, 1957, was $1,624,043. The combined total of payments to all the former owners of expropriated mining properties is understood to be slightly over $12 million. Patino Mines & Enterprises Consolidated, Inc., is the only one of the mining companies involved in which it is understood there is any American ownership. Unfortunately, the commission composed of representatives of the Bolivian Government and of the Patino group which was organized for the purpose of establishing the bases of a final settlement has made little progress since the first meeting in March 1957.

The Department heartily concurs in your view that free enterprise is in danger when private property is confiscated and not compensated for, fairly and properly. The Department considers that when United States citizens are deprived of their properties in another country by nationalization or by other governmental acts they should have prompt, adequate, and effective compensation for that property in conformity with international law. The Department and our Embassy at La Paz have continued to urge upon the Government of Bolivia an early resolution of this problem.

United States economic assistance to Bolivia was initiated at a time when there was an imminent threat of economic and political collapse in Bolivia which could adversely affect our interest in this hemisphere. The aid we have extended has been designed to avert this collapse and to make possible a diversified economy stable enough to achieve a self-supporting status. At the end of 1956, the Government of Bolivia, at our urging and with our technical and financial support, embarked upon an economic stabilization program designed to arrest the extreme inflation which had existed and to create conditions conducive to orderly development of the Bolivian economy. Although there are still many problems to be overcome, much progress toward stabilization has been made. Bolivia's ability to effect a final settlement with the former owners of the nationalized mining properties will depend in good part on further progress of the stabilization program.

I can assure you that the need for prompt and adequate compensation for the American stockholders in the company whose mining properties were nationalized by the Government of Bolivia is uppermost in our minds, and the Department is continuing to exert its efforts toward that end.

Sincerely yours,
ROBERT C. HILL,
Assistant Secretary
(For the Secretary of State).

The reasons why I have made this inquiry regarding Bolivia are based upon growing doubts and concern over the policy which we have adopted for dealing with the continuing Bolivian crisis. My study of the situation convinces me that the United States has acted toward Bolivia as a good neighbor must: First, by nonintervention in the conduct or policy of the Bolivian Government and by respecting that Government's self-determination. This is important because the present national revolutionary movement Government of Bolivia has adopted some practices which may be considered socialistic and which are alien to our concept of government.

Secondly, when Bolivia indicated that it needed massive help, the United States responded to this appeal in the most humanitarian manner. Since 1953 we have expended more than $67 million in loans, grants, and other types of direct aid. My committee and the Senate have been prompt in responding to all of the President's requests for help for Bolivia, and we have passed the legislation which has made this help possible.

Now, let us view this question conversely, or from the viewpoint of whether or not Bolivia has been faithful in discharging its obligations to the United States.

On the basis of the volume and intensity of the criticism which has been leveled at our Government's policy in Bolivia, and which has come from many responsible, respectable sources in the United States and South America, I have become increasingly concerned as to whether the Bolivian Government is justifying our faith in its willingness to satisfy its obligations.

The most important reason for this concern is the fact that Bolivia, which nationalized its large privately owned mining properties in 1952, has thus far not fulfilled its obligation to compensate fully and justly the owners of these properties.

In less tense and troublesome times, this failure of a nation in a democratic bloc to meet an obligation to compensate after it has nationalized properties might be considered a minor problem. But, we are living in perhaps the most revolutionary period in recent history. One of the most disturbing phenomena of our times is the spread of the type of nationalism which believes that the nationalization of private property and the adoption of Socialist economic policy are the basic solutions for all economic ills.

The political philosophy of the United States is firmly rooted in the concept that the individual is entitled to enjoy and hold private property. We, therefore, cannot be indifferent to the growth of this problem.

I believe that the United States through its Government is obliged to take a positive stand on this matter of Bolivia's seizure of its large mines. There is no question that the world is looking to us for guidance in these troubled times and that socialistically inclined politicians in many countries will interpret the actions of the United States for their own purposes if we fail to take a firm stand.

The Department of State has established as a principle that an acceptable compensation is only that compensation which is prompt, adequate, and effective.

The President has established also as a principle that the Government of the United States requires respect for international obligations in all questions of nationalization, whether the financial interests involved are those of our friends or those only of American nationals.

With regard to Bolivia, I believe that it has now been clearly established that the action of the present government has not led to prompt, adequate, and effective compensation, nor has it fulfilled its international obligations with respect to American investors.

As time goes on, and as the United States continues to expend large sums to help the Bolivian Government to support itself, we have been identified more and more openly with the policy of the present Government of Bolivia. This is most unfortunate, because it has led to misinterpretation of United States Government policy with respect to nationalization. The time has come, it seems to me, for clarification of this anomalous situation.

We owe this, not merely to the people of the United States who support Bolivia as taxpayers, but also to our many friends in countries in the Western Hemisphere, in Europe and Asia who look to the United States for clear and intelligent guidance in these troubled times.

When Congress reconvenes I shall propose that my committee look into all the facts with a view to making sound recommendations for the future conduct of our foreign policy toward the Government of Bolivia.

Accomplishments of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, During 1st Session, 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLAIR ENGLE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, which I have again been honored to serve as chairman, has established during the 1st session of the 85th Congress just ended what I believe to be an outstanding record of performance of its legislative responsibilities, and I take this opportunity to summarize for my colleagues the major accomplishments of the committee. The achievements of the committee were made possible through the cooperation and diligence of all members of the committee. I especially want to recognize the energy and leadership of the subcommittee chairmen and the continuing cooperation of Dr. Miller, the ranking minority member. I am particularly pleased, too, with the work of the committee staff which has again met a high standard of performance in committee activities and in service to members.

First, I wish to comment briefly on the statistical aspects of the committee's functions; and, second, I want to comment on the legislative activity of the committee, breaking down the legislation under the five categories reflecting the basic jurisdiction of the subcommittees.

STATISTICAL ASPECTS WITH RESPECT TO COMMITTEE'S WORKLOAD AND PERFORMANCE

During the 141 legislative days of the 1st session of the 85th Congress, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House convened a total of 157 separate meetings—125 subcommittee meetings and 32 full committee meetings. Of the 572 House and Senate bills, resolutions, joint resolutions, and concurrent resolutions referred to the committee, 257 were disposed of through reporting or tabling. A total of 78 bills or resolutions were reported to the House by the committee, of which 54 were enacted into law, two concurrent resolutions were approved, three bills are pending before conference committees, 12 have passed the House and are pending in the Senate, and seven are pending in the Rules Committee or in the House.

With respect to subcommittee responsibilities, 15 of the 78 bills and resolutions reported by the committee fall into the category of irrigation and reclamation, 18 in Territories and insular affairs, three in mineral resources, 25 in public lands, and 17 in Indian affairs. Of the 315 bills pending before the committee at the end of the session, 23 are Senate-passed bills.

LEGISLATIVE ACTIVITY OF THE COMMITTEE

The Interior and Insular Affairs Committee is responsible for legislative measures, first, providing for maximum development, utilization, disposition, management, and conservation of the natural resources of the United States, its Territories and possessions; second, involving the government and the administration of our Territories and possessions; third, affecting the Indians, Indian tribes, trust lands, and claims of Indians of the United States and Alaska, including Alaska natives. This legislative responsibility is divided among five standing subcommittees and the summary of legislative activity of the committee which follows reflects the basic jurisdiction of such subcommittees.

I. IRRIGATION AND RECLAMATION

The Irrigation and Reclamation Subcommittee, chairmaned by Hon. Wayne N. Aspinall, of Colorado, has jurisdiction over all legislation relating to the Federal reclamation program and over other legislation relating to the development of the Nation's water resources. During the 1st session of the 85th Congress, 115 bills and resolutions were referred to the Irrigation and Reclamation Subcommittee, of which 15 were reported, 43 were tabled, and 57 remain as pending business of the subcommittee. Of the 15 reclamation bills reported by the committee, 12 were enacted into law. Of the three bills not enacted, one is pending in the Senate and two are pending in the House Rules Committee. The legislation enacted into law includes the authorization of one new reclamation project, two amendments to general reclamation law, seven acts relating to specific irrigation districts or projects, and two acts relating to interstate compacts.

NEW PROJECT AUTHORIZED

The new reclamation project authorized—Public Law 85-152; S. 42; H. R. 2147, Fisher—is the San Angelo reclamation project in Texas. This is a $32.2 million multiple-purpose project for irrigation, municipal and industrial water supply, flood control, the protection and enhancement of fish and wildlife, and recreation.

AMENDMENTS TO GENERAL RECLAMATION LAW

The two changes in general reclamation law are an amendment to the Small Reclamation Projects Act—Public Law 85-47; H. R. 2146, Engle—and an amendment to the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 relating to amendatory repayment contracts—Public Law 85-156; H. R. 5492, Rutherford. Enactment of the amendment to the Small Reclamation Projects Act makes it possible for the much-needed small-projects program to get underway. The basic act was enacted in the 84th Congress but the President objected to certain language and the program had not been initiated by the administration. The amendment to the Reclamation Project Act of 1939 continues through December 31, 1960, the authorities given the Secretary of the Interior to enter into amendatory repayment contracts and, more important, makes it possible for the Secretary to continue to grant deferments of construction charges in special hardship cases.

SPECIFIC PROJECT LEGISLATION

Seven measures relating to specific irrigation districts or projects were enacted, including two relating to the Columbia Basin project, three relating to repayment contracts with irrigation districts, one relating to the East Bench unit of the Missouri Basin project, and one relating to the Shoshone reclamation project. The first act—Public Law 85-264; S. 1482; H. R. 4802, MAGNUSON; H. R. 4919, HOLMES—relating to the Columbia Basin project amends the Columbia Basin Project Act by modifying the rigid ownership restrictions, thereby bringing this project more in line with other similar Federal reclamation projects. It permits delivery of water to ownerships of 160 acres in the case of an individual or 320 acres for a family. While modifying the ownership limitation, this amendment does not change the Federal settlement program whereby only one farm unit can be sold to an individual or family. The second act—Public Law 85-240; S. 1574; H. R. 3389, HORAN—relating to the Columbia Basin project provides for disposal of certain Federal property in the vicinity of Grand Coulee Dam and provides assistance in the establishment of the town of Coulee Dam as a municipality incorporated under the laws of the State of Washington.

The acts approving amendatory repayment contracts are Public Law 85-123—H. R. 3071, MILLER of Nebraska—authorizing an amendatory repayment contract with the Northport Irrigation District, Nebraska, Public Law 85-160—H. R. 5679, MILLER of Nebraska—authorizing an amendment to an existing repayment contract with the Mirage Flats Irrigation District, Nebraska, and Public Law 85-283—S. 1996; H. R. 7254, THOMSON of Wyoming—authorizing an amendatory repayment contract with the Casper-Alcova Irrigation District, Wyoming.

The act relating to the East Bench unit of the Missouri River Basin project is Public Law 85-112—S. 977; H. R. 4410, METCALF—which modifies the excess land provisions of Federal reclamation law as they apply to this unit. The act relating to the Shoshone project is Public Law 85-33—House Joint Resolution 287, THOMSON of Wyoming—which authorizes temporary delivery of water to the Heart Mountain division of that project while a long-term repayment contract is being negotiated.

INTERSTATE COMPACTS

The two acts relating to interstate compacts are Public Law 85-222—S. 2431; H. R. 8465, ENGLE; H. R. 8472, ULLMAN—which gives congressional consent to the completed Klamath River compact, and Public Law 85-184—S. 1556; H. R. 5878, KRUEGER—which gives Congressional consent to the States of Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming to negotiate and enter into a compact with respect to the waters of the Little Missouri River.

LEGISLATION REPORTED BUT NOT ENACTED

In addition to the measures enacted, the committee reported a bill—H. R. 6940, ENGLE—to supplement general reclamation law by authorizing reimbursement for moving expenses to owners of lands acquired for public-works projects. This bill passed the House and is pending in the Senate. The committee also reported two bills which are pending in the House Rules Committee. One of these—Senate Joint Resolution 39; House Joint Resolution 179, RUTHERFORD—provides for salvaging additional water for irrigation purposes and for salinity reduction in the Pecos River Basin in New Mexico and Texas. The other bill—H. R. 5309, KILGORE—would authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, rehabilitate, operate, and maintain the Mercedes rehabilitation project, Texas.

OTHER LEGISLATION CONSIDERED BY THE COMMITTEE

Other legislation considered by the committee but not finally acted upon includes the Hells Canyon, Fryingpan-Arkansas, Greater Wenatchee and Burns Creek reclamation projects.

II. TERRITORIAL AND INSULAR AFFAIRS

The Subcommittee on Territorial and Insular Affairs, chairmaned by Hon. LEO W. O'BRIEN, of New York, is responsible for legislation affecting Alaska, Hawaii, Guam, American Samoa, the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, and for exercising a continuing oversight of the administration of these areas by the Department of the Interior.

Of the 101 bills referred to the Subcommittee on Territorial and Insular Affairs, 18 were reported by the committee, 24 were tabled, and 59 remain as pending business before the subcommittee. Of the 18 reported, 10 were enacted into law, six are pending in the Senate, and two in the House.

STATEHOOD LEGISLATION

While statehood for neither Alaska nor Hawaii was approved in the first session, this legislation received major attention in the committee. Alaska statehood legislation—H. R. 7999, O'BRIEN of New York—was reported to the House following 18 days of hearings and is presently pending in the Rules Committee. Three days of hearings were completed on Hawaiian statehood legislation—H. R. 629, ENGLE; H. R. 848, O'BRIEN of New York; H. R. 1243, SAYLOR; H. R. 339, MACK of Washington; H. R. 8739, DELLAY; and H. R. 49, BURNS—but consideration was not completed and the bills remain as pending business in the subcommittee.

REVISION OF ORGANIC ACTS

As usual, a considerable portion of the subcommittee's time was taken up with legislation to revise the various organic acts. Legislation was enacted—Public Law 85-224; H. R. 8126, O'BRIEN of New York—which amends the Virgin Islands Organic Act with respect to the establishment of boards, authorities, or commissions. This act gives the electorate of the Virgin Islands the maximum degree of responsibility, home-rule authority, and self-government consistent with and equal to the demonstrated capacity and willingness of the persons affected.

The committee reported a bill—H. R. 8673, BURNS—which would delete language in the Hawaiian Organic Act requiring semiannual reports covering the executive proceedings of the Territory. Experience over the years has demonstrated that the semiannual reports serve no useful purpose. This bill is pending in the Senate. The committee also reported a bill—H. R. 4215, O'BRIEN of New York—which would amend the Organic Act of Guam by increasing the salary of the district judge. This bill is pending in the House.

ALASKA DEVELOPMENT MEASURES

Consonant with its desire to accelerate resource and economic development of Alaska, the committee approved 12 measures to achieve that purpose. Of these 12 bills, 7 were enacted into law. One act—Public Law 85-11; H. R. 4939, MILLER of Nebraska—conveys a 10-acre tidal flat area, including improvements, to the Territory of Alaska. Two measures relate to the area along the Chilkat River—one of these was enacted—Public Law 85-271; H. R. 6562, BARTLETT. This act enlarges the Klukwan Reservation for the use of the Indians residing thereon, including lease for mining purposes. The other measure—H. R. 6785, BARTLETT—amends existing statutes by permitting mining for gold and other precious minerals in certain parts of the Chilkat River. Another measure enacted—Public Law 85-303; H. R. 6760, BARTLETT—grants the Territory of Alaska title to certain lands beneath tidal waters in or near Juneau, Ketchikan, Cordova, and Valdez.

The committee reported two bills relating to Alaska financial matters, one of which was enacted. The measure enacted—Public Law 85-88; H. R. 3477, BARTLETT—increases the Territory's share of mineral royalties and places the responsibility for the disposition thereof in the Alaska Legislature. The other measure—H. R. 4183, BARTLETT—amends existing municipal corporation or public-utility bonding laws in Alaska. H. R. 4183 is pending in the Senate.

With respect to public recreational facilities in Alaska, legislation was approved—Public Law 85-225; H. R. 7864, BARTLETT—amending the act of May 4, 1956, by providing specific authority for the Secretary to convey public recreational facilities, including lands, to the Territory.

Two bills reported by the committee, passed by the House, and presently pending in the Senate concern mineral deposits in Alaska. One of these—H. R. 4635, BARTLETT—would amend existing statutes by permitting entry on public lands which may contain oil, gas, or coal for homesites, headquarter sites, trade or manufacturing sites, or for a serviceman's additional homestead entry. The other bill—H. R. 8054, BARTLETT—would provide for the leasing of oil and gas deposits in lands beneath inland navigable waters of Alaska.

The committee reported two measures relating to Alaska land grants, one of which was enacted. The measure enacted—Public Law 85–265; H. R. 3940, BARTLETT—grants to the Territory 640 acres of public-school lands in Anchorage. The other bill—H. R. 3358, BARTLETT—supplements the land-grant provisions of the Alaska Mental Health Enabling Act of 1956. This bill is pending in the Senate.

The last of the Alaska development measures enacted into law—Public Law 85–233; H. R. 8646, BARTLETT—amends the Alaska Public Works Act of 1949 to clarify the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the Territory federally owned land utilized in the construction of public works.

MISCELLANEOUS

Miscellaneous Alaska legislation enacted into law includes one measure—Public Law 85–16; H. R. 4271, ENGLE—providing that the Delegate from Alaska be a member of the Alaska International Rail and Highway Commission, and another measure—Private Law 85–287; H. R. 3877, BARTLETT—clarifying the title of Carl E. Robinson to 160 acres of land at Anchor Point, Alaska.

With respect to Antarctica, hearings were held on 10 bills providing for the creation of the Richard E. Byrd Antarctic Commission which would assemble, catalog, and diffuse knowledge and information with respect to Antarctica. No final action was taken by the committee on this legislation.

III. MINES AND MINING RESOURCES

The Subcommittee on Mines and Mining, chairmaned by Hon. WALTER ROGERS, of Texas, has jurisdiction over mining interests generally, mineral resources of the public lands, mineral-land laws, and claims and entries thereunder, geological survey, mining schools and experimental stations, and petroleum conservation on the public lands, and conservation of the radium supply in the United States.

The committee reported three measures relating to mining and mineral resources which were enacted into law. In addition, hearings were held on several other matters of concern to the mining industry. Also, the Special Subcommittee on Coal Research, chairmaned by Hon. ED EDMONDSON, of Oklahoma, concluded a coal study which was started in the 84th Congress.

MINERAL LEASING ACT AMENDMENTS

One of the measures enacted—Public Law 85–122; S. 334; H. R. 2131, BARING; H. R. 4787, METCALF—amends the Mineral Leasing Act by removing the State acreage limitation—5,120 acres—on Federal phosphate leases. Public Law 85–122 permits the leasing of 10,420 acres of phosphate-bearing lands without regard to State boundaries.

The committee held hearings on additional legislation—H. R. 8204, THOMSON; H. R. 7496, EDMONDSON; H. R. 7497, ALBERT; H. R. 7498, PATMAN—to amend the Mineral Leasing Act but took no final action. This legislation would amend the Mineral Leasing Act so as to, first, increase the basic limitation on the aggregate acreage of coal leases which may be held by one person in any one State to twice the present limitation of 5,120 acres; second, permit the Secretary of the Interior to increase the acreage by an additional 10,240 acres under certain circumstances; and, third, repeal section two (c) of the existing act, thereby putting railroad companies, on the same footing as other companies with respect to coal leases.

TIME EXTENSION FOR ASSESSMENT WORK

One other measure reported by the committee and enacted into law—Public Law 85–68; H. R. 4748, BERRY—extends for one additional year the time during which annual assessment work may be performed on unpatented mining claims based on the discovery of uraniferous lignite.

PRIVATE LEGISLATION

One private measure enacted—Private Law 85–168; H. R. 5341, ASPINALL—directs the Secretary to grant to an individual extensions with respect to certain oil and gas leases.

MULTIPLE-USE MINING LAW

The committee held hearings on the administration and operation of section 5 of the multiple-use mining law, which relates to title uncertainties and surface rights on mining claims. The hearings were printed and contain valuable information for those interested in or affected by section 5 of this act.

DOMESTIC TUNGSTEN PURCHASE PROGRAM

The committee also held hearings to review the matter of appropriations to implement the domestic tungsten, asbestos, fluorspar, and columbium-tantalum purchase program and adopted a resolution urging the House of Representatives to make available in the third supplemental appropriation bill, 1957, $30 million to implement this program. These funds, however, were not appropriated.

COAL STUDY

A special Subcommittee on Coal Research concluded its study on the need and possibilities of a research and development program for the coal industry of the United States. The findings and recommendations of the subcommittee are contained in a 91-page report printed as House Report No. 1263.

IV. PUBLIC LANDS AND NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM

Through the Public Lands Subcommittee, under the chairmanship of Hon. GRACIE PFOST, of Idaho, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs has legislative responsibility for utilization, conservation, and development, including entry, easements and grazing thereon, of more than 459 million acres of public lands and associated resources in the United States and Alaska, together with more than 24 million acres embraced within some 180 units of the national park system and nearly 160 million additional acres of land within national forests created from the public domain.

One hundred and ninety-five bills and resolutions were referred to the Public Lands Subcommittee of which 25 bills were reported, 67 were tabled, and 103 remain as pending business of the committee. Of the 25 bills and resolutions reported by the committee, 15 were enacted into law—10 public and five private laws—two concurrent resolutions were approved by Congress, and the remainder await further action either in the House or in the Senate. In addition, hearings were held on several other measures on which no committee action was taken and which are now pending before the subcommittee or the full committee.

NATIONAL PARK SYSTEM AND CEMETERIES

The committee considered several measures relating to the National Park System and national cemeteries, two of which were enacted into law. One of these acts—Public Law 85–5; H. R. 3845, MCCORMACK—extends for one year the time which the Boston National Historic Sites Commission has to complete its work. This Commission is investigating the feasibility of establishing a coordinated program in the vicinity of Boston for preserving historic properties, objects, and buildings. The other act—Public Law 85–41; S. 1274; H. R. 5687, PFOST—amends the act of March 3, 1911, by removing restrictions on the use of 3.58 acres of the Springfield Confederate Cemetery which are excess to its needs.

Eight other measures relating to the National Park System were considered by the committee, 4 of which were reported and are pending either in the House or in the Senate. Legislation to authorize the appropriation of $7,250,000 for development of the Independence National Historical Park—H. R. 1244, SAYLOR; H. R. 694, JAMES; H. R. 1925, BYRNE of Pennsylvania; H. R. 9141, FULTON—was reported by the committee and is pending before the House Rules Committee. The specific bill reported was H. R. 1244—SAYLOR.

H. R. 4115—MURRAY—relating to the Shiloh National Military Park passed the House and is pending in the Senate. This bill would authorize the conveyance to the State of Tennessee of about 202 acres of land at Shiloh Military Park for highway relocation purposes and would assure use for recreational purposes of lands abutting the relocated highways.

H. R. 2170—REECE—would authorize exchange of not more than 200 acres within the Great Smoky National Park for privately owned land within the park. This legislation to facilitate park administration passed the House and is pending in the Senate.

Several bills—H. R. 8290, ASPINALL; H. R. 8301, WESTLAND; H. R. 8296, JONES of Alabama; H. R. 8300, SMITH of Wisconsin—to grant authority to the National Freedom Shrine Foundation to erect a national monument to the five freedoms were considered by the committee and H. R. 8290—ASPINALL—was reported and is pending in the House. The monument would be located in Virginia, just south of the Iwo Jima Monument. Funds for the construction, estimated at about $24 million, would be raised by public subscription.

Other bills relating to national parks which the committee considered but took no final action on are H. R. 5450—BENNETT of Michigan—to authorize the enlargement of the administrative headquarters site for the Isle Royale National Park in Michigan, H. R. 6641—FASCELL—and H. R. 6653—ROGERS of Florida—to fix the boundary of Everglades National Park, Fla., and to authorize the acquisition of land therein, H. R. 4964—MAGNUSON—and H. R. 5421—WESTLAND—to authorize the exchange of approximately 6,609 acres of land adjacent to the Olympic National Park for lands and interest in lands within the boundaries of the park, and H. R. 2549—HOLMES—to authorize the acquisition of an additional 50 acres of land for the Whitman National Monument in Washington.

LAND, TITLE AND RESOURCE CONVEYANCES

Several measures relating to land title and resource conveyances were considered by the committee. Of these, 4 were enacted into public law and 5 into private law. Public Law 85–35—H. R. 2401, BERRY—reconveys to the city of Spearfish, S. Dak., 1 acre of land adjacent to the city's park, which was transferred to the Federal Government in 1936 for expansion of a fish hatchery and is no longer needed. Public Law 85–193—S. 556—directs the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the State of Nevada something less than 2 acres located in the city of Las Vegas for use of the Nevada Fish and Game Commission. Public Law 85–139—S. 1773; H. R. 6519, BARING—validates the conveyance of certain railroad right-of-way land in Reno, Nev., to the State of Nevada to use for hospital purposes. Public Law 85–153—H. R. 3473, UTT—provides for the sale at public auction of about 172 acres of public domain land near Plaster City, Calif., to use as a construction site for a portland cement plant.

The private laws enacted were Private Law 85–57—S. 1352; H. R. 5297, KRUEGER; H. R. 5570, BURDICK—to direct the Secretary to convey a 20-acre tract of acquired lands in Richland County, N. Dak., to the Fairview Cemetery Association, Inc., of Wahpeton, N. Dak.; Private Law 85–208—H. R. 1826, THOMSON of Wyoming—to permit Mr. Bud E. Burnaugh, of Green River, Wyo., because of a land classification error, to purchase a 5-acre tract of public land in Wyoming under the Small Tract Act; Private Law 85–38—S. 1319—renouncing Federal interest in certain lands in Harlowton, Mont., to remove any possible cloud on the title of such lands; Private Law 85–285—H. R. 1394, FASCELL—to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Interior to sell 11 tracts of land aggregating 13.82 acres in the Florida Keys area to individuals who previously purchased the tracts from the State believing that title to the lands was in the State; and Private Law 85–116—H. R. 7522, ENGLE—to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend for a 2-year period the right of the McCloud River Lumber Co. to cut and remove certain timber which it owns on a 160-acre tract of land within the Shasta National Forest, Calif.

Two measures relating to land title and resource conveyances were reported by the committee but were not enacted. One of these bills—H. R. 8928, JENSEN—would delete from an 1880 act language imposing certain public use conditions on a title conveyance by the United States to the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and thereby remove a cloud on the city's title to about 375 to 400 acres of land. This bill passed the House and is pending in the Senate.

The other measure—S. 1568; H. R. 2393, BARING—has passed both the House and the Senate and is pending in conference committee. This legislation would authorize conveyance, under certain conditions, to the State of Nevada of approximately 126,775 acres of land owned by the United States in southern Nevada. The area is desert in nature but large portions are suitable for agricultural purposes and for homesites and suburban developments, provided water can be made available. It is the State's intention to use a portion of its allotted share of the Colorado River water for development in this area.

PUBLIC LAND CONTROL AND UTILIZATION

One of the most important land and associated resources policy measures in many years is the socalled military land withdrawal legislation—H. R. 5538, ENGLE; H. R. 608, DAWSON of Utah; H. R. 931, SAYLOR; H. R. 1148, JOHNSON; H. R. 3403, METCALF; H. R. 3661, THOMPSON of Wyoming; H. R. 3788, UDALL; H. R. 3799, BARING; H. R. 3860, PFOST; H. R. 5739, DIXON. The committee reported H. R. 5538—ENGLE—and this bill passed both the House and the Senate and is awaiting agreement between the two with respect to Senate amendments. This legislation would accomplish two principal purposes—first, it would require that no single area embracing more than 5,000 acres of public domain lands can be withdrawn for exclusive military use without approval by Congress; second, it would make applicable within all military reservations the hunting and fishing laws of the States or Territories in which such reservations are located.

In addition to the military land withdrawal legislation, the committee has requested a temporary halt to nonmilitary land withdrawals pending an examination of current Federal land and resource use and development policies. This request was formally made to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Secretary of Agriculture on July 29, 1957.

There are several bills—H. R. 3594, ENGLE; H. R. 3592, ASPINALL; H. R. 3593, SAYLOR; H. R. 3595, METCALF; H. R. 3596, RHODES of Arizona; H. R. 4819, PFOST; H. R. 4822, PORTER; H. R. 5238, HAGEN; H. R. 6884 and H. R. 7230, DOYLE—under consideration by the committee which would establish a bipartisan National Outdoor Recreation Resources Review Commission composed of 15 members to study the outdoor recreation resources of the public lands and other land and water areas of the United States. Although some hearings were held on this legislation, the committee's consideration was not completed principally because time was not available. It is expected that the commmittee will return to this legislation next year.

Several bills—H. R. 1960, METCALF; H. R. 500, SAYLOR; H. R. 361, O'HARA of Illinois; H. R. 540, BALDWIN; H. R. 906, REUSS; H. R. 2162, MILLER of California; H. R. 7880, PORTER—are before the committee which would establish a national wilderness preservation system on the public lands of the United States. Three days of hearings were held on this legislation but the hearings were not completed and the committee took no action.

FEDERAL LAND GRANTS TO STATES

Several measures relating to Federal land grants to States were enacted. One of these acts—Public Law 85–180; H. R. 8079, DEMPSEY; H. R. 7705, MONTOYA—deletes certain provisions of the New Mexico-Arizona Enabling Act which restricts the degree of discretion those States may exercise in the establishment, deposit, and investment of funds derived from Federal land grants to them.

Three measures were enacted which broaden the permissive uses of revenues from lands granted to States for public buildings at the capitals of such States to include construction, reconstruction, repair, renovation, and other permanent improvements of such buildings, the acquisition of necessary land for such buildings, furnishings and equipment for such buildings, and the payment of principal and interest on bonds issued for such purpose. They are Public Law 85–6—H. R. 348, METCALF—amending the Enabling Act of the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Washington, Public Law 85–84—S. 1794—amending the Enabling Act for the State of Idaho, and Public Law 85–97—S. 1396; H. R. 7708, THOMSON of Wyoming—amending the Enabling Act for the State of Wyoming. A fourth measure—H. R. 5149, RHODES of Arizona—containing similar provisions but general in nature, passed the House and is pending in the Senate. This bill would apply to any State that has been granted lands for the purpose of erecting certain public buildings at the capital of such State.

RESOLUTIONS

Two concurrent resolutions were approved by the Congress. One of these—House Concurrent Resolution 91, BASS—expresses the sense of Congress that the altar of the Nation, located in the Cathedral of the Pines, Rindge, N. H., has been dedicated to the glory of God as a memorial to all American war dead and is so recognized. The other—Senate Concurrent Resolution 32; House Concurrent Resolution 183, EDMONDSON; House Concurrent Resolution 178, BERRY; House Concurrent Resolution 177, DEMPSEY; House Concurrent Resolution 181, ALBERT; House Concurrent Resolution 182, BELCHER; House Concurrent Resolution 184, MORRIS; House Concurrent Resolution 185, STEED; House Concurrent Resolution 186, JARMAN—gives Congressional recognition to the National Cowboy Hall of Fame and Museum as a memorial to western pioneers.

V. INDIAN AFFAIRS LEGISLATION

The Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, chairmaned by Hon. JAMES A. HALEY, of Florida, has legislative responsibility over matters involving the relationship of the Federal Government with the approximately 435,000 Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos of the United States and Alaska. Indian landholdings and reservations subject to varying degrees of Federal control total approximately 52 million acres in some 28 States and Alaska.

During the first session, substantial progress was made in the committee's continuing efforts to aid effectively in the management and conservation of Indian human, natural, and economic resources and funds, to assist in improving individual and tribal economic conditions, and to resolve difficulties arising from claims against the United States. Of the 113 bills referred to the Indian Affairs Subcommittee, 17 were reported, 28 were tabled, one is pending in full committee, and 67 remain as pending subcommittee business. Of the 17 bills reported by the committee, 14 were enacted into law, one is pending in conference committee, one is pending in the Senate, and one in the House.

TERMINATION AND READJUSTMENT PROGRAMS

Among the major items of legislation considered by the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs were those relating to the termination of Federal supervision over Indian tribes and the need for assistance in the development of readjustment programs.

One measure enacted—Public Law 85-132; S. 469; H. R. 2471, MILLER of Nebraska; H. R. 2518, ULLMAN—authorizes the appropriation of not more than $550,000 to assist the Klamath Tribe of Indians in preparing for termination of Federal supervision and defers the final termination date for 18 months.

Several bills—H. R. 2824, MOSS; H. R. 6364, ENGLE; H. R. 2838 and H. R. 8072, SISK; H. R. 2576, SCUDDER—relating to California rancherias were considered by the committee. The committee reported H. R. 2824, providing for the distribution of lands, minerals, water rights and improvements on 14 Indian rancherias and reservations in California. The Bureau of Indian Affairs is required to furnish assistance in this program. The legislation is purely permissive and does not impose the program on any of the groups who do not want it. This bill is pending in the Senate.

The committee reported one measure—H. R. 6322, LAIRD—relating to the Menominee Indians of Wisconsin, which is pending in conference committee. This legislation would defer for two years the date for formulating and submitting the Menominee tribal plan for the future management and control of the tribal property after termination. It would also postpone the final termination date for 2½ years.

RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT

Two measures were enacted which will improve Indian land and resource development. One of these—Public Law 85-86; H. R. 3836, HALEY—repeals existing law prohibiting the sale of livestock issued to or purchased in trust for Indians without the consent of the superintendent in charge of the tribe. This law is no longer necessary and it places undue burden upon the purchasers of Indian livestock. The other act—Public Law 85-186; H. R. 7051, ULLMAN; H. R. 3942, BERRY—will stimulate industrial development near certain Indian reservations by authorizing the transfer of certain surplus Federal property at McNary Dam, Oreg., and Pickstown, S. Dak., to Indian tribes.

INDIAN LAND AND PROPERTY CONVEYANCE

As usual, a number of measures concerning Indian land and property conveyance were considered by the committee during the first session. Six such measures were enacted into law. Public Law 85-34—H. R. 676, HEMPHILL—authorizes the city of Rock Hill, S. C., to acquire approximately 49 acres of tribal lands on the Catawba Indian Reservation to serve as a site for a new sewage disposal plant.

Public Law 85-91—H. R. 6692, SCUDDER—terminates Federal supervision over the members of the Coyote Valley Indian Rancheria in California and provides for the transfer of certain Indian lands to the Secretary of the Army in connection with the construction of the Coyote Valley Dam.

Public Law 85-188—H. R. 993, WESTLAND—authorizes the exchange and conveyance of certain land on the Makah Reservation to the Cape Flattery School District in the State of Washington.

Public Law 85-205—S. 999—directs the Secretary of the Interior to convey 70 acres of land to the State of North Dakota for the use of the North Dakota State School of Science, in return for which the school will provide tuition to 10 Indian students each year for the next 10 years.

By enactment of Private Law 85-217—H. R. 1259, SCRIVNER—the United States disclaims its interest in 86 acres of land in Miami County, Kans., and confirms a judgment of the county district court.

Public Law 85-31—S. 998; H. R. 3995, PFOST—amends in certain respects existing law which authorizes the conveyance to local governmental agencies land and improvements used for Federal Indian school purposes after they are no longer needed for that purpose.

EDUCATIONAL MEASURES

Two Indian educational measures were enacted. One of these acts—Public Law 85-89; H. R. 3837, HALEY—permits teachers in Bureau of Indian Affairs schools to take leave for attending educational meetings which are in the interest of the Federal Government. The other act—Public Law 85-72; H. R. 7050, ULLMAN—provides for the recoupment of funds expended in cooperation with the school board of Klamath County, Oreg., because of the attendance of Indian children.

INDIAN RECLAMATION

One Indian reclamation bill was reported by the committee but was not enacted. House Joint Resolution 2—ANDERSON—provides for payment to the Crow Indian Tribe for transfer to the United States of certain tribal lands necessary for the construction of the Yellowtail Dam and Reservoir. This resolution is pending before the House Rules Committee.

MISCELLANEOUS

Miscellaneous Indian legislation enacted includes a measure—Public Law 85-154; H. R. 4830, SHUFORD—authorizing revision of the roll of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians, a measure—Public Law 85-195; H. R. 6521, BERRY—authorizing payment of claims to certain Sioux Indians for losses incurred during wars with the United States, and a measure—Public Law 85-192; S. 1417; H. R. 4912, EDMONDSON—extending the tribal government of the Osage Indians for 25 years.

Although not reported, the committee held extensive hearings on H. R. 3789—UDALL—to determine the rights and interests of the Navaho and Hopi Tribes.

Record of the Activities of the Committee on the Judiciary, 1st Session, 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, the concentration of the activities and operations of the Committee on the Judiciary is evidenced not only by the number of bills considered, but by the very nature of the legislation itself. Major legislation enacted into law which came out of this committee includes, among others, the civil rights legislation, which bears the chairman's name, the first revisions in the Immigration and Nationality Act since 1952, the legislation dealing with the production of statements and reports of witnesses arising out of the case of Jencks against United States.

Out of the total of 10,711 bills, joint resolutions, concurrent resolutions, and House resolutions included, 4,181 were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Add to that 375 Senate bills referred to this committee and we find that 4,556 were referred to this committee. Thus, 39 percent of all bills and resolutions introduced in the House came before us. Thirty-three bills were enacted into public law. Approximately 2,660 individuals were beneficiaries of private bills and resolutions who, otherwise, would have been inadmissible of permanent residence in this country under the immigration law. Private laws enacted arising out of the work of our subcommittee on claims totaled 105, granting to these people equitable relief for losses sustained.

A list of the special reports issued by this committee during the first session reveals the scope of the operations of this committee in addition to the consideration of the bills routinely referred. A list of these special reports follows:

Antitrust Problems in the Exploitation of Patents.

Judicial Doctrine of Primary Jurisdiction as Applied in Antitrust Suits.

Spanish Sheepherders.

Refugee Relief Act of 1953, as amended.

ICEM and Land Resettlement.

Presidential Inability.

The Television Broadcasting Industry.

Japanese Agricultural Workers.

Airlines.

Problems Relating to a Federal Constitutional Convention.

As stated above 33 public laws resulted from the activities of this committee, and it is to be noted that this list reveals the wide rang of subject matter which comes before this committee. The statistics themselves, of course, do not reveal the intensive nature of the work since the statistics themselves cannot reveal the amount of preparation and deliberation that entered into both favorable and adverse reports of the work before us.

85-316	To amend the Immigration and Nationality Act, and for other purposes	S. 2792.

The enactment of this committee's legislation into public and private law does not take into account the work done on some 19 bills now pending before the Senate, a number of bills pending before the House Rules Committee for its consideration. It is for this reason that I attach hereto a detailed account of the work of each of our 5 subcommittees and the 4 special subcommittees set up to consider matters coming within the jurisdiction of the committee, although of singular interest and complexity demanding separate concentrated attention.

Throughout the session this committee, together with the subcommittees, held approximately 190 meetings. Without the unflagging interest and sustained work of the members of this committee and the devotion of its staff, none of this would have been possible.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1: GENERAL JURISDICTION OVER BILLS AS ASSIGNED, SPECIAL JURISDICTION OVER IMMIGRATION AND NATURALIZATION

The principal public legislation considered by Subcommittee No. 1 in this session of the 85th Congress was the bill, H. R. 8123, to facilitate the entry into the United States of certain adopted children, and other relatives of United States citizens, and for other purposes, which was introduced by Representative WALTER on June 13, 1957. The bill was reported by the House Judiciary Committee on August 19, 1957, with amendments, and was placed on the Union Calendar. A Senate bill, S. 2792, described as a companion bill to H. R. 8123, sponsored jointly by Senators KENNEDY, WATKINS, DIRKSEN, PASTORE, LAUSCHE, CLARK, NEUBERGER, JACKSON, and KEFAUVER, passed the Senate on August 21, 1957. The Senate bill, with amendments, was brought up on the House floor, under suspension of rules on August 28, and was approved as amended, becoming Public Law No. 316.

Public hearings were held by a special subcommittee of Subcommittee No. 1, on Japanese temporary workers, on May 15, 1957. A report, with recommendations dealing with the problems involved in the importation of these agricultural laborers, was issued by Subcommittee No. 1 on July 10, 1957—House Report No. 780.

Hearings were also held by Subcommittee No. 1 on May 23, 1957, on the bills: H. R. 1011, by Representative WILSON of California, and H. R. 4452, by Mr. SAUND, on the crossing of the international borders by juveniles.

A careful review was made by the subcommittee of the circumstances and conditions of employment of skilled sheepherders, mainly imported from Spain. House Report No. 67 containing the recommendations of Subcommittee No. 1 was issued on February 14, 1957.

Following the last session of the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration last October, an intensive study was made of the problems involving land resettlement, specifically the resettlement of European migrants in Latin America. House Report No. 203 was issued by Subcommittee No. 1 on March 18, 1957.

The extent of work of this subcommittee cannot be appreciated without a review of its activity in the area of private legislation. The following table sets this forth:

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 2—GENERAL JURISDICTION OVER JUDICIARY BILLS, AS ASSIGNED; SPECIAL JURISDICTION OVER CLAIMS

During the first session of the Congress the subcommittee conducted hearings on 16 different days. These covered public as well as private claims measures.

Consideration was given to a total of 327 bills and resolutions.

The subcommittee considered several bills relating to statutory provisions governing claims handled by the Armed Forces. Two of the bills recommended by the Treasury Department and approved by the subcommittee, H. R. 3820 and H. R. 4370, provide for an amendment of title 14, the title of the United States Code relating to the Coast Guard. H. R. 3820 provides for the amendment of section 490 so that the Secretary of the Treasury can have the same authority to settle claims of the military and civilian personnel of the Coast Guard as is now possessed by the Secretaries of the military departments with respect to their personnel. The bill was reported favorably and passed by the House, but no action was taken on it in the Senate prior to adjournment. H. R. 4370 would amend section 645 of title 14 so that its provisions would conform to those of section 2733 of title 10, United States Code, relating to similar claims for damage to property, personal injury, or death which are asserted against the Army, Navy, or Air Force. This bill was also reported favorably and passed by the House but was not acted upon in the Senate.

Another bill relating to claims handled by the military departments, H. R. 1061, was favorably reported by the subcommittee and the committee and was passed by the House. That bill would grant the Secretary of the Army and the Secretary of the Air Force the same authority now possessed by the Secretary of the Navy to settle claims for damage to or the loss of private property. The bill would further expand the authority to include settlement of claims for personal injury and death within the limitations of the new section which would be added to title 10, Armed Forces, of the United States Code. No action was taken on this measure in the Senate.

A number of bills granting relief to States or political subdivisions within States were referred to the subcommittee. Among the bills recommended favorably was H. R. 7636, authorizing the Attorney General to convey a site of land to Florida for use as a State road department shortwave-radio tower upon the payment of a fair value for the land conveyed. This bill became Public Law 85–293. The bill, H. R. 1942, provided for the payment of the amount due the Sergeant Bluff Consolidated School District of Iowa for the tuition of children of Air Force personnel—Public Law 85–140. Another bill favorably recommended was S. 807, to provide payment to the Jackson School Township of Indiana the amount of $193,392, in exchange for the conveyance of the school building and land, which was necessitated by the proximity of the school to an airfield—Public Law 85–291. S. 364, providing for payment of compensation to the village of Wauneta, Nebr., for the demolition of a dam by the United States, was favorably reported and became Public Law 85–214.

The subcommittee also recommended H. R. 4768, to confer jurisdiction on a United States district court to adjudicate a controversy relating to certain lands in San Jacinto County, Tex. That bill passed the House, but no action was taken in the Senate prior to adjournment.

A bill providing for the payment of $581,721.91 to the State of Washington for the replacement of a road previously located on land taken for use by the United States, H. R. 2224, was considered and passed by the Congress, but was the subject of a pocket veto. This is the claim on which hearings were held by the subcommittee in the State of Washington during the 84th Congress.

A bill, H. R. 293, authorized the payment of amounts due certain commissioned officers during the years 1932, 1933, and 1934 for advancement in rank, which were not paid because of an application of the Economy Act of 1932. This bill became Public Law 85–255.

Prior to July 1, 1954, certain officers were placed on active duty with the armed services while they were interns or resident physicians in non-Federal hospitals. These persons received the usual compensation, including meals and living quarters in kind, which normally attached to the positions. The Comptroller General subsequently ruled that these amounts should have been regarded as having been received in behalf of the United States and should be refunded. The situation was not clarified finally until 1953, and the affected individuals were not given clear notice of the situation until that time. The subcommittee made a favorable recommendation as did the committee and the bill was passed by the House; however, no action was taken in the Senate.

The Secretary of the Army recommended a bill which became H. R. 5810, and which provided for the reimbursement to the Tribal Council of the Cheyenne River Sioux Reservation for expenses incurred in negotiations relating to an agreement between the United States and the tribal council. The payment authorized was in accordance with the provisions of the agreement set out in the act of September 3, 1954—68th United States Statutes at Large, page 1191. The bill became Public Law 85–274.

House Joint Resolution 185 authorized the reference to the Court of Claims of a claim asserted against the United States by Norway. This reference was in line with an agreement previously entered into between the two countries providing that the matter, with the consent of Congress, would be referred to that court in the event that it could not be settled by negotiation. This bill became Public Law 85–60.

The settlement of a group of claims arising as the result of the crash of an airplane at Worcester, Mass., on July 18, 1957, would be provided for under the provisions of H. R. 8868. The bill was reported and passed the House, but was not acted upon in the Senate prior to adjournment.

The subcommittee held hearings on several bills which remained pending in the subcommittee at the time of adjournment, and further consideration of such bills is contemplated in the coming session. One of those bills was H. R. 105, which is a bill to cancel certain bonds posted in accordance with the Immigration Act of 1924. Based on the testimony presented at the hearing, a substitute bill was introduced, H. R. 8439, which is presently before the subcommittee. Also, an extensive hearing was held on H. R. 6681, which is a bill to make the Federal tort claim provisions of title 28 of the United States Code the exclusive remedy for persons injured or damaged as the result of accidents involving Government vehicles instead of permitting suit against individual Government drivers. This bill, too, remained pending in the subcommittee at the end of the session.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3—GENERAL JURISDICTION OVER JUDICIARY BILLS AS ASSIGNED—SPECIAL JURISDICTION OVER PATENTS, TRADEMARKS, COPYRIGHTS, AND REVISION OF THE LAWS

During the first session of this Congress 99 bills were referred to the subcommittee. They included such subjects as appellate review, juvenile delinquency, interstate compacts, patents and copyrights, constitutional amendments, and the classification and codification of laws of a general and permanent nature to the United States Code. Some 58 bills were considered by the subcommittee. In connection with this work, hearings were held on 41 bills. In some instances favorable action was taken; in others action has been deferred pending the submission of additional information and Government agency report. There follows a three-part statement pointing up the work of the subcommittee and highlighting some of the particular items of legislation which were processed.

GENERAL LEGISLATION

Because of the great difficulty experienced in recent years by the States with juvenile delinquency, the subcommittee, after hearings, took favorable action on House Joint Resolution 10, granting the consent of Congress to 23 States and the Federal Territories and possessions, to enter into compacts by which they may cooperate for the apprehension, return, and supervision of delinquent juveniles. This legislation is urgently needed, especially where States are seeking to erect and maintain, on a joint and cooperative basis, specialized institutions for the rehabilitation of delinquent juveniles and runaways.

In order to reduce the current heavy workload of the Federal courts and to help in eliminating the great backlog of cases now pending on the court calendars, the subcommittee held hearings on legislation (H. R. 2516 and H. R. 4497—diversity of citizenship) which would increase from $3,000 to $10,000 the monetary jurisdiction of the courts, and which would either eliminate completely corporations from the diversity of citizenship provision of our Federal statutes or restrict their use of the Federal courts by declaring them citizens of those States where they have their principal places of business. Because of the legislation's widespread effect, the subcommittee decided, instead of taking final action at this time, to have the hearings printed and made available for wide distribution so that during the Congressional recess, interested parties may study the material and submit recommendations for the subcommittee's consideration in the next session of Congress.

Recent bomb scares and bomb explosions in public transportation facilities such as railroads, trains, airplanes, and their terminals caused the subcommittee to take early favorable action on H. R. 4193, which makes the mailing of bombs Federal offenses. The bill also makes the giving of false information or "tips" on these matters Federal offenses.

Several identical bills on which the subcommittee postponed final action concern legislation authorizing the President of the United States to veto individual items in appropriation bills. Proponents of the measure were heard and the subcommittee will hear those who would oppose such legislation in order that it may be apprised of all of the arguments before taking action.

Important legislation upon which the subcommittee took favorable action relates to abbreviated records on appeals—H. R. 6788. This bill will permit the several courts of appeal to adopt rules authorizing the abbreviation of the transcript and other parts of the record made before Federal agencies when the orders of those agencies are reviewed by the courts of appeal. In many instances much of the record before such agencies is not relevant to the questions actually raised on appeal. This legislation, in permitting an abbreviated record to be transmitted, should result in substantial savings of time and money to the Government without interfering with appellate rights.

The subcommittee also acted favorably on H. R. 7915 which would authorize Federal courts, after a witness has testified, to require the Government to submit prior statements and records of the witness in its possession for the court's inspection for the purpose of turning relevant material over to defendants who seek to impeach the credibility of the witness. This legislation resulted from the Supreme Court decision in the case of Jencks v. United States (353 U. S. 657).

The subcommittee approved other matters, such as the use of certified mail for summoning jurors—H. R. 3367—which will result in monetary savings to the Government; peremptory challenges—H. R. 3368—giving to plaintiffs the same advantages which defendants now have; H. R. 7261, bringing the District of Columbia under the Federal probation laws, thereby making the laws uniform throughout the Federal districts; H. R. 7153, consenting to the agreement between the States of Oregon and Washington reestablishing their boundary line along the Columbia River; and H. R. 6789, authorizing interested parties to seek temporary injunctive relief from the orders of administrative agencies on reasonable notice where irreparable harm might result if the agency order became immediately effective.

PATENTS, TRADEMARKS, AND COPYRIGHTS

Favorable action was taken again this year on H. R. 103, which would reward persons, both Government and non-Government employees, who make inventive contributions to the national defense.

The subcommittee also reaffirmed its favorable position and reported H. R. 7151 which raises generally patent and trademark fees. It is estimated that these fee rises will offset the expenses of the Patent Office by 70 percent.

Another measure approved by the subcommittee is H. R. 277 which sets a 3-year statute of limitations on civil copyright actions, thereby establishing a statute of limitations which would be uniform throughout the United States.

The subcommittee took unfavorable action on H. R. 1656, a private patent bill and on a series of bills relating to patent extensions.

REVISION OF THE LAWS

The work of classifying the general public laws to the appropriate title in the United States Code and the general laws of application in the District of Columbia to the District of Columbia Code has been carried on since the beginning of the session. These laws and the balance of the laws enacted at this session will be incorporated into supplement V of the United States Code and into supplement VI of the District of Columbia Code. With respect to the supplement of the District of Columbia Code all the decisions of the courts affecting the Code from August 1, 1956, to July 31, 1957, have been examined and notes have been prepared for insertion under the appropriate sections in the next supplement.

The reading of page proofs on supplement IV of the United States Code and supplement V to the District of Columbia Code was completed early this year and the supplements have been published and distributed.

At the last Congress Public Law 1028 was enacted codifying the laws relating to the armed services and the National Guard. Inasmuch as the bill had been pending in the Congress for more than a year, Public Law 1028 did not contain all the laws on the subject as of the date of enactment—a cutoff date of March 31, 1955, had been decided upon when the bill was reported by the committee during the 1st session of the 84th Congress. During the recess at the end of the 84th Congress and for several months during the present session the law revision staff cooperated with the codification group at the Pentagon in the preparation of a bill and constructive report intended to incorporate in titles 10 and 32 the applicable laws enacted between April 1, 1955, and January 2, 1957. This bill, consisting of almost 200 pages, has passed the House and is now pending in the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate. In addition the bills to enact into law Title 20: Education; Title 21: Food, Drugs, and Animals, and Title 39: the Postal Service, have been brought up to date as of the beginning of the present session and introduced. We are now awaiting reports from the departments concerned with a view of reporting the bills favorably to the House at the earliest moment.

Work has also progressed on bringing up to date and eliminating changes in substantive law from the bills to enact into law Title 16: Conservation, and Title 43: Public Lands.

With respect to the District of Columbia Code a bill has been prepared by the staff to enact into law part IV consisting of titles 22, 23, and 24. In addition, the services of a publishing corporation have been engaged to assist in the preparation of a bill to enact into law part II consisting of titles 11 to 17.

After the adjournment of the present session work will be continued in conjunction with the West Publishing Co. and the Edward Thompson Co. in preparing copy for the Government Printing Office for supplement V of the United States Code and in reading proofs. Also copy for supplement VI for the District of Columbia Code will be sent to the Government Printing Office and proofs will be read as received.

During the session the staff has continued its cooperation with other committees of the Congress and with numerous Government departments and agencies with regard to the form and style of proposed legislation affecting the United States Code.

During the 1st session of the 85th Congress, Subcommittee No. 4 held hearings and reported a number of bills improving the substance and administration of the bankruptcy law. H. R. 106 gives bankruptcy courts jurisdiction to determine the effect of a discharge. At present, with some exceptions, bankruptcy courts are determining only the right to a discharge. This bill was passed by the House and sent on to the Senate. The subcommittee has held comprehensive hearings on H. R. 5195, dealing with the difficult problem of circuity of liens embodied in section 67 (c) of the Bankruptcy Act. To make administration of the bankruptcy system more efficient, H. R. 5811 was favorably reported and passed the House. The bill eliminates one of the notices now required in bankruptcy proceedings and results in a substantial saving of money. Impelled by the reequipment financing problems of the airlines, the subcommittee favorably reported and both House and Senate passed H. R. 7671, making chapter X proceedings inapplicable insofar as they effect title and the right to repossess aircraft and aircraft equipment. In the area of railroad reorganizations, the subcommittee favorably reported H. R. 982, which provides that a former lessor whose properties are being operated under section 77 (c) (6) of the Bankruptcy Act shall have the same right as other carriers to receive a division of revenue accruing from operations over its lines, in accordance with the criteria fixed by section 15 (6) of the Interstate Commerce Act.

General legislation assigned to Subcommittee No. 4 has covered a wide variety of subjects, including over 60 holiday and celebration bills. Among these were bills establishing both a Civil War Centennial Commemoration Commission and a Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission. In addition, action was taken extending certain temporary legislation. These included war-risk hazard and detention benefits for direct-hire Federal employees and employees of Federal contractors. The subcommittee also favorably reported the extension of title II of the First War Powers Act, enacted into law. H. R. 3370, increasing the mileage and subsistence allowances of Federal jurors, was also passed and has been signed by the President.

This subcommittee exercised jurisdiction over a variety of subjects, with specialization over bills concerning antitrust and the Federal judicial system. Under its general jurisdiction, the subcommittee considered several bills relating to the improvement of the Federal judicial system. Among these bills were bills providing for a roster of retired judges, for representation by district judges in the judicial conference of the United States and for the retirement of the chief judges of the circuit and district courts, as chief judges, upon reaching the age of 75. In addition, the subcommittee approved a bill increasing the fees of the United States commissioners. The subcommittee has under consideration additional bills creating a number of new judgeships throughout the entire Federal judiciary as well as bills relating to the organization of the judicial districts and places of holding court.

This subcommittee devoted considerable time to the consideration of approximately 60 bills relating to various civil-rights proposals. It conducted several days of hearings on these bills which constituted over 1,000 printed pages. As a result of its considerations and deliberations of civil-rights bill H. R. 6127 was enacted into law.

During the 1st session of the 85th Congress the subcommittee had referred to it 187 bills—186 being House bills and one being a Senate measure. Hearings were conducted on 68 of these measures. It disposed of 74 bills of which 8 were favorably reported to the House. There were seven bills enacted into public law during the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

ANTITRUST JURISDICTION

In March, the subcommittee held hearings on three bills, H. R. 264, H. R. 2143, and H. R. 7698, that would require advance notification to antitrust enforcement officials of certain corporate mergers and acquisitions. Based on amendments recommended by the subcommittee and additional amendments adopted by the Judiciary Committee, a new bill, H. R. 7698, was reported by the Judiciary Committee with the recommendation that it be enacted by the House—House Report 486. At the close of the first session, H. R. 7698 was pending in the Rules Committee.

H. R. 7698 provides that when a corporation subject to the Clayton Act acquire the stock or assets of another corporation engaged in commerce, if the combined capital, surplus, and undivided profits of the 2 corporations exceed $10 million, 60 days' advance notification must be given to the Attorney General and to the Federal Trade Commission or other appropriate commission or board. Together with this notice, the corporations must supply specifically enumerated information to the Government, in order to enable a determination to be made of the transaction's probable effect on competition. The bill requires the Government officials vested with jurisdiction to establish procedures for the waiver of all or part of the waiting requirement in appropriate cases or categories of cases. Willful failure to give the notice or to give the information required by the bill subjects the offending corporation to a fine of not less than $5,000 nor more than $50,000 in a civil action brought by the Attorney General.

In addition to the broad exemption for mergers and acquisitions where the combined capital, surplus, and undivided profits of the corporations are $10 million or less, the bill also exempts from its notification and waiting requirements a number of specific types of transactions. Fifteen specific types of transactions are enumerated in H. R. 7698 that are not likely to have substantial antitrust significance and, therefore, are not required to be reported in the interest of effective enforcement in the antitrust statutes.

H. R. 7698 also would amend the Clayton Act to provide the Federal Trade Commission with authority to seek a district court order to prevent and restrain a merger in violation of Clayton Act section 7, pending issuance of a complaint and completion of the Commission's administrative proceeding. This amendment would give the FTC, which has concurrent jurisdiction with the Attorney General to enforce the merger provisions of the Clayton Act, authority similar to that now possessed by the Attorney General to seek a preliminary court injunction to restrain consummation of a merger pending adjudication of its legality.

In June, the Antitrust Subcommittee jointly held hearings with the Subcommittee on Commerce and Finance of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on a series of bills designed to vest in the Federal Trade Commission jurisdiction over unfair or monopolistic trade practices in the meatpacking industry. The subcommittees held joint hearings in order to consider conveniently and expeditiously, H. R. 5282, H. R. 5283, H. R. 5454, H. R. 7764, and H. R. 7796 which were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and H. R. 7038 and H. R. 7319, which were referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Under existing law, jurisdiction over the trade practices of meatpackers is vested in the Secretary of Agriculture, by virtue of the Packers and Stockyards Act of 1921. That act ousted the Federal Trade Commission of jurisdiction over unfair methods of competition by companies engaged in the meatpacking industry. The bills were introduced to cope with the recent criticisms of the lack of enforcement by the Secretary of Agriculture of his jurisdiction over allegedly unfair and monopolistic practices in the meatpacking industry. It has been contended that for a number of years meatpackers have enjoyed a virtual immunity for their trade practices from supervision by any Federal agency. Further, recent Federal Trade Commission cases disclosed a situation where certain food stores and other elements of the food-distribution industry escaped Federal supervision of their trade practices by the simple expedient of acquiring minority interests in a meatpacking plant.

Because of these criticisms, bills were introduced to amend title II of the Packers and Stockyards Act in a manner to transfer to the Federal Trade Commission responsibility for supervising the unfair and monopolistic practices of companies engaged in the meatpacking industry. At the end of the first session public hearings had been completed and the bills were under consideration by the subcommittees.

In June, July, and August, the Antitrust Subcommittee held hearings on a series of bills that would clarify the applicability of the antitrust laws to organized professional sports enterprises. These bills were introduced in response to recent Supreme Court decisions which have had the effect of placing under antitrust coverage all organized professional sports with the exception of baseball.

In the Toolson case in 1953 the Supreme Court reaffirmed its 1922 ruling that organized baseball is not subject to the antitrust laws. In its decision the Supreme Court signified that baseball in effect is a unique enterprise. By contrast in February 1954 the Supreme Court in the Radovich case held not only that professional football is subject to the antitrust laws but implied that all other professional organized sports, like other interstate businesses, are subject to the antitrust laws. In the Radovich case, the Supreme Court recognized that its ruling, in light of baseball's unique exemption, might be regarded as "unrealistic, inconsistent or illogical." It indicated, however, it would have no doubt as to baseball's coverage under the antitrust laws were it considering this question for the first time upon a clean slate.

In explanation of its position, the Supreme Court said, "The orderly way to eliminate error or discrimination, if any there be, is by legislation and not by court decision. Congressional processes are more accommodative, affording the whole industry hearings and an opportunity to assist in the formulation of new legislation. The resulting product is therefore more likely to protect the industry and the public alike."

Three types of solution to the sports problem were suggested by the bills that were referred to the subcommittee. H. R. 5319 and H. R. 5307 provide that baseball, like other professional sports activities, shall be subject to the antitrust laws. Under these bills, the courts would be permitted to determine upon the facts of each individual case whether or not any particular agreement or trade practice constituted an unreasonable restraint of trade.

Other bills, H. R. 6876, H. R. 6877, and H. R. 8023, include all professional sports under the antitrust laws, with the exception of certain enumerated practices which are specifically exempted. H. R. 8023 also provided that a reserve clause in a player's contract of employment would enjoy an antitrust exemption only if it did not exceed 5 years in duration and if the amount of compensation for the last 2 years were increased by 15 percent each year.

Finally, H. R. 5383 provides a complete antitrust exemption for all professional sports enterprises, as well as for acts in the conduct of such enterprises.

During its extensive hearings, the subcommittee received testimony from representatives of the American and National Baseball Leagues, National Football League, National Hockey League, National Basketball Association, owners of team sports enterprises and from a number of players. At the end of the session, hearings had been completed with respect to professional team sports and the bills were pending before the subcommittee.

INVESTIGATIONS

The subcommittee completed and published two reports that contain the results of its investigations during the 84th Congress of the airlines and television industries.

On June 7, 1957, the subcommittee released its report on the television-broadcasting industry. The record on which the report was based contains the testimony of 58 witnesses and comprises 3,342 pages of transcript.

Among the matters examined into by the report on the basis of this record was the manner in which the Federal Communications Commission has discharged its antitrust responsibilities in important areas of broadcasting; the UHF problem and competitive television; the network programing and time sales with reference to alleged tendency of networks to favor their own programs; network talent contracts; network time sales and discounts; the role of the advertising agency in the sale of TV time; the FCC chain-broadcasting regulations; network affiliation contracts; network ownership of stations and the multiple-ownership rule; network must-buy policy; network time options; the first-call rule; regulation by the FCC of coaxial cable and microwave relay rates and private relay systems; and activities by broadcasters in the field of music. The report was particularly critical of testimony and documentary evidence disclosed in its investigation in which references were made to informal private conferences and discussions between Commissioners of the FCC and representatives of industry, some of whom were directly interested in problems pending before the Commission.

On September 3, 1957, the subcommittee released its report on airlines. In its hearings on the commercial airlines industry, the subcommittee received the testimony of 38 witnesses and compiled a record that includes 3,106 pages.

In its report the subcommittee gave particular attention to the following: The present structure of the airlines industry; analysis of Federal administrative controls with respect to airlines operations; the record of the Civil Aeronautics Board with respect to the antitrust problems involved in competition and entry into commercial aviation; the antitrust implications of the activities of the Air Transport Association and an analysis of its operations; the role of travel agents in civil aviation; the results of the activities of the International Air Transport Association; and a case study of the Pan American World Airways System.

Particular attention was given to ATA, the trade association of the certificated carriers. The close relationship with the Board's responsibilities that has been established by the certificated industry through its trade association provides the means for a result that frequently has been deplored by critics of Government regulation. It is here that there is the greatest danger that the "regulated" may become the "regulators."

On April 3, 1957, the Antitrust Subcommittee initiated a study into the procedures and competitive effects of the consent decree program administered by the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice. In this study, the subcommittee is seeking to ascertain how effective consent decrees have been in the elimination of conditions that caused the Government to institute its antitrust proceedings, and to restore a competitive climate in the industries concerned.

In addition, the subcommittee in this study is interested in determining the impact of consent decrees upon competitors of the defendants. As part of its study, the staff of the subcommittee has secured relevant information from the Department of Justice and has conducted file examinations of certain companies that are parties to specific consent decrees. During the first session this investigation was in preliminary stages and hearings were not scheduled by the subcommittee.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE OPERATION OF SUBMERGED LANDS LEGISLATION

The Special Subcommittee on the Operation of Submerged Lands Legislation was instituted under the authority granted to the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct studies and investigations, including the operation and administration of the Submerged Lands Act and the Outer Continental Shelf Act. The subcommittee is composed of Messrs. Edwin E. Willis, chairman, William M. Tuck, James B. Frazier, Jr., Kenneth B. Keating and Patrick J. Hillings.

The purpose of the special subcommittee is to conduct a study and analysis of the problems arising from the operation and administration of those laws. The need for such a study was predicated upon a preliminary survey conducted by the staff of the Committee on the Judiciary as well as other studies conducted by agencies outside of the Government. Such preliminary studies have pointed up many and varied problems arising out of the operation and administration of the existing law. Examples of such problems are the question of double jeopardy in criminal law over violations committed in the area of the Outer Continental Shelf; the peculiar problem of contract law resulting from the drilling and building operations in the same area. Also, there are serious questions of workmen's compensation as well as problems in the field of insurance such as the type of underwriters and of policies. Of course, there are many others.

Therefore, the special subcommittee will undertake the task of gathering sufficient facts and knowledge from the time and experience of operation under the existing laws in order that a conclusion may be reached as to what, if anything, should be done in the way of amendatory legislation to the existing law. It is believed that sufficient time has passed in which to garner experience in the administration and operation of these laws so that whatever improvements may be necessary will be in the best interests of all the parties involved, including the Government of the United States.

The subcommittee held an executive conference with representatives of the various governmental departments concerned with submerged lands legislation.

In the near future the subcommittee will conduct a study of the problem at which time representatives of private industry engaged in operations under this legislation will be heard.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON STUDY OF PRESIDENTIAL INABILITY

The Special Subcommittee on the Study of Presidential Inability is composed of Messrs. Emanuel Celler, chairman, Francis E. Walter, Jack B. Brooks, Kenneth B. Keating, and William M. McCulloch. It was originally constituted in the 84th Congress. During that time an exhaustive study was made of this subject and hearings held in which the views of eminent political scientists and constitutional lawyers were heard. In addition to these hearings, that subcommittee published a document setting forth replies to a detailed questionnaire on the problem.

This subcommittee in the 1st session of the 85th Congress conducted a hearing on the problem at which time the Attorney General testified. The subcommittee also published a document which was an analysis of the replies to the questionnaire and hearing held on the subject during the 84th Congress. The subcommittee had referred to it several bills relating to the subject. After considerable deliberation and consideration, the subcommittee reported four bills, House Joint Resolution 293, House Joint Resolution 295, H. R. 6510, and House Joint Resolution 334, to the full committee, where they are pending at the present time.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE

Eleven bills have been referred to the Special Subcommittee on Administrative Procedure. These cover problems such as pay for hearing examiners, legal career service, admission to practice before Federal agencies, and so forth. Several comprehensive bills, notably H. R. 3350, dealing with all of these topics are now before the subcommittee and information and departmental reports are now being compiled and analyzed with a view toward conducting extensive hearings at the beginning of the next session. The subcommittee is composed of Francis E. Walter, chairman, Robert T. Ashmore, DeWitt S. Hyde, and Russell W. Keeney.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO STUDY SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

This subcommittee was established by the Judiciary Committee and authorized to conduct an inquiry and make findings and recommendations, legislative or otherwise, with reference to those questions raised by decisions of the Supreme Court, rendered at its last session which affect the power of Congress to investigate Federal laws relating to subversive activities and the enforcement of Federal criminal laws. The subcommittee is composed of Messrs. Edwin E. Willis, chairman, Byron G. Rogers, Earl Chudoff, William C. Cramer, and Arch A. Moore, Jr.

The subcommittee initiated hearings during the 1st session of the 85th Congress with reference to the particular decision of the Supreme Court in Mallory against the United States, which affects Federal law enforcement. A series of hearings was held on this case and witnesses represented Federal and local law authorities as well as representatives of bar associations.

Further hearings on this and other Supreme Court decisions in these particular fields will be held both during the adjournment period and the second session.

Ten Years of Progress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, the past 10 years have been 10 years of perhaps the greatest progress against disease that our country has ever seen.

As a recent article said, "You're living in medicine's golden age." It pointed out that new medical knowledge had meant the saving of 1,240,000 lives since World War II. It stressed the fact that "this miracle of medical progress has come largely within the last 10 years."

As I look back over the past decade, I am proud to have had the opportunity to work in Congress, year by year, to provide through Congressional appropriations the share of Federal aid that has helped achieve the progress of these 10 years. This aid has been a major influence in increasing and stepping up our Nation's medical research that has meant the saving of those million and more lives.

This year marked the ninth time that it has been my privilege to present to my colleagues in the House of Representatives, on behalf of our Committee on Appropriations, a bill which represented the consensus of the House and Senate committees on the support for health and medical research to be provided through the Federal Government. The bill represented, at the same time, carefully considered judgments as to the interests of economy. It reflected what was needed to strengthen and speed up just as much as scientifically and humanly possible this year's attack on the many problems of disease and disability.

This year, we believe, will see further medical advances, in which the continuing and new programs to which we have given adequate and needed support will play, as in the past, a vital role.

Let us glance back for a moment into the field of health research achievements to see what may lie ahead in the way of returns on the tax dollars invested.

The decline in death rates since World War II from some of the major illnesses dramatically shows how over a million lives have been saved by modern medicine.

Influenza has gone down over 90 percent in its death rate. I should mention here, and emphasize, too, that there is not only great concern with the threatened invasion of the Asian flu, but there is concerted action under way to set up a great network of protection for the American people.

We in Congress have already acted by appropriating the $800,000 which will be used in providing diagnostic materials to the States and also have authorized an additional $2 million out of the President's reserve fund if an outbreak should occur, which would be used in those areas where needed.

The Public Health Service, American Medical Association, State health authorities, the medical societies, and individual physicians are all alert to the problem and are joined in the nationwide collaborative endeavor against this threat.

To return to the past 10 years of progress, we see the striking fact that once great killers like acute rheumatic fever, tuberculosis, diseases that cause maternal deaths, and appendicitis have had the rate at which they cause death reduced over 70 percent in each case. Syphilis' death rate has been brought down 63 percent, pneumonia's over 40 percent, some kidney disorders 60 percent, and infant death rates have dropped 33 percent. Even high blood pressure, one of the greatest medical problems in terms of numbers afflicted, has seen some decline in death rates in the past few years—and, authorities say, is going to be subject to even better control through new and improved drugs for treatment.

This is what the recent past has brought. What of the work under way today, the challenging and promising new areas of medical research that will pay off increasingly?

The medical research and health programs under way in our State of Rhode Island offer splendid examples of the march of progress and some of its new areas of promise.

As a result of these programs, Rhode Island is taking a place of leadership among the States in the forefront of medical research, modern medical teaching and practice and public health advances.

Our State institutions and organizations, both public and private, and Rhode Island's researchers, medical teachers, physicians, nurses, and allied hospital and health agencies workers of all kinds—these men and women and their institutions are placing our State in this new position of leadership—as well as bringing its people the very best in medical and health benefits.

Supplementing and aiding them, and helping make many of the forward looking programs in Rhode Island possible, is support such as that which we are providing through Congressional appropriations.

For health and medical research and related work in Rhode Island there was provided in fiscal year 1957, which ended June 30, almost $3 million in grants and awards from the programs of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. From the Public Health Service's National Institutes of Health, about $1 million aided research, research training, building and equipping of research facilities, and other activities in institutions in our State.

Some $881,000 last year from the Public Health Service's Bureau of State Services helped a variety of public health programs in Rhode Island, such as control of water pollution, tuberculosis, mental illness, heart disease, cancer, and poliomyelitis. Through the Service's Bureau of Medical Services, Rhode Island in fiscal year 1957 had available for medical facilities and hospital construction some $788,000. Of this, almost half a million dollars was for hospital construction for needed facilities at the Providence lying-in hospital, the State hospital at Cranston—Howard—and Roger Williams General Hospital at Providence.

Through the Children's Bureau of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, our State health department had about $235,000 for services for crippled children and for maternal and child-health activities. Also, from the Department's Office of Vocational Rehabilitation came a research grant of $39,415 to Butler Health Center at Providence to evaluate the effectiveness of rehabilitation programs for both physically and mentally disabled persons.

Speaking of mental illness, which is one of our gravest health problems of today, we can be proud of the progressive work that is being undertaken in Rhode Island on this.

Butler, as well as another institution in Rhode Island, has recently been awarded mental-health project grants by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service. The Emma Pendleton Home, a children's psychiatric hospital, is using the mental-health project-grants funds to study a special group program for acting-out children. This study will shed light on the effectiveness and application of group work to special diagnostic categories of disturbed children. This project, begun in August of this year, will extend over a 4-year period.

Butler Health Center, which recently opened an inpatient unit, the fourth of its major programs, has been awarded two mental-health project grants. One of these projects has been set up to investigate the nature of attitudes, interactions, and activities by the patients and personnel, which help recovery of chronically ill psychotic patients. This project will continue, according to present plans, over a 3-year period.

The other research program at the Butler Mental Health Center supported by a mental health project grant is one essentially designed to discover and test effective alternatives to the conventional inpatient psychiatric treatment. Through the operation of a new kind of outpatient department, a day hospital and a hospitalization program for emergency services to patients in periods of intense panic, the Butler Health Center hopes to do pioneering work in treatment and care of the mentally ill. Present plans for this project cover a 3-year period.

Grants have also been made to Rhode Island institutions to participate in the large scale evaluations of the tranquilizing drugs—that have been so useful in mental illness and other conditions, but that need a great deal of study before we understand just how they act and produce their effects. This kind of study will lead to even greater eventual usefulness on the part of these drugs which affect the central nervous system. Indeed, the whole knowledge of the brain and its chemistry—an area our scientists say that they need much more information on before it is fully understood—is being opened up tremendously through new investigations today.

In the field of cancer research, Rhode Island institutions are participating in the vast new endeavor that has been implemented through National Institutes of Health grants to screen all chemical compounds that might have possible use in the treatment of cancer.

Moreover, in the field of cancer control, Rhode Island is actively engaged in a new program aimed at cancer of the uterus, the second largest cause of death from cancer among women, which claims the lives of nearly 15,000 American women each year. Now a test, known as the cytologic test, makes possible the early detection of this type of cancer.

Unfortunately uterine cancer, which is highly curable in its earliest stage, presents no detectable symptoms until the disease reaches a stage when cure is more difficult. By means of the cytologic test, women with a suspicion of uterine cancer can learn about its presence long before they ordinarily would. Numerous investigators and clinicians believe that, if widely used, this test could reduce mortality by as much as 75 percent.

The test is completely painless and usually takes less than 5 minutes. The technique consists simply in taking samples of vaginal fluid which contains cells shed by the internal organs of the body. Microscopic examination of slides made from these samples enables trained laboratory workers to distinguish cells which are suspected of being cancerous from those that appear to be normal. Scientists recommend that women take the test once a year to be sure that they do not have uterine cancer.

In collaboration with the Rhode Island Medical Society and Rhode Island Society of Pathologists, the Rhode Island State Department of Health is, for the second year, making the cytologic test available to women over 20 in the State. The project, which was aided by a grant of $70,000 from the National Cancer Institute in 1956, is receiving additional assistance this year in the form of a $100,000 grant from the same source.

The program is being conducted through hospitals, private practitioners, and State-sponsored cancer-detection centers, and is endorsed by the Rhode Island Medical Society and the Rhode Island Society of Pathologists.

The Rhode Island cytology program is one of several which were recently established in this country after the effectiveness of the technique as a case-finding procedure was successfully demonstrated in Memphis, Tenn. The Memphis project, now in its fifth year, led to the discovery of about 800 cases of uterine cancer among 108,000 women who were examined for the first time.

Half these 800 cases were found in the very earliest stages, and most of these were entirely unsuspected. Many of the 400 cases of advanced cancer were also unsuspected.

The first year of the Rhode Island project was spent in tooling up and training technicians to examine slide tubes as a part of the test. Since operations were started, 10,000 women have been screened as of September 1. Carcinomas in situ proved by biopsy totaled 51. These are the tumors that this program is designed to discover, because they can be cured in the early stage. There were also 13 other cancers of the uterus diagnosed which were somewhat more advanced but not dangerously so. This is a total of 64 early cancers of the uterus discovered and proved so far by this cytology laboratory. In 14 other cases, biopsies have been requested and will be done soon.

There are between 225,000 and 250,000 women over 20 in Rhode Island. It is hoped that the project will eventually make it possible for 50,000 a year to take this test. For the great majority, it will mean peace of mind and relief from needless worry. For those who have uterine cancer, it will mean the discovery of their disease at a time when cure is most probable. In my opinion, this is one of the best run programs in the country.

Rhode Island is playing a key role in another project which has a direct bearing on the health and well-being of millions of Americans. I refer to the recently launched nationwide investigation directed to studying and evaluating the factors which are believed to bring on such diseases as cerebral palsy and mental retardation—disorders which are often due to damage to the brain of an infant before, during, or shortly after birth.

This investigation is being coordinated by the National Institute of Neurological Diseases and Blindness in Bethesda, Md. Eleven medical schools and hospitals—in key communities throughout the Nation—are working with the Institute. Among these is our own Brown University in Providence.

I have had occasion to hear testimony on this nationwide study from medical men in position to know a good deal about cerebral palsy and related disorders. It is my feeling that this study—which may go on for a decade or longer—may bring the effective treatment and prevention of such disorders a generation or more closer to achievement.

What are some of the causative factors which the project will be evaluating? Well, there are many. Among these are such factors as lack of oxygen, brain injuries, infections occurring during pregnancy, and the so-called Rh factor which is actually a blood incompatibility between mother and child. Heredity, which is believed to play only a minor role in cerebral palsy and mental retardation, will also be evaluated.

Brown University, I am pleased to say, was among the first institutions to join in this important study and its program is well under way. The university's initial grant—a grant covering the last fiscal year—was for just short of $100,000—$97,633.

I might say here that Providence is truly blessed in terms of its fitness for this kind of project. Brown University, which has an unusually fine department of biology, is working closely with the Providence Lying-In Hospital on one hand and the Meeting Street School on the other.

Providence Hospital is one of the largest lying-in hospitals in the country and the Meeting Street School is a unique semicustodial institution for cerebral palsied children. Thus, we have a coordinated approach to the research problem posed in which the onset and impact of cerebral palsy can be studied and evaluated through pregnancy, birth, and the early years of life.

Dr. Glidden Brooks, director of the project, brings to the study not only years of research experience but a number of major contributions to our knowledge of cerebral palsy and related disorders.

Why is this collaborative program—in which Brown University and its associated organizations are playing a key role—of such importance?

One answer, of course, lies in its humanitarian aspects—in the promise it holds for the development of effective treatments and preventive techniques for coping with cerebral palsy, mental retardation, and related disorders. But the problem can also be sketched in terms of statistics—statistics of vital concern to all of us.

Today, there are an estimated 500,000 people in the United States who have cerebral palsy traceable to brain damage occurring in the year or so surrounding birth. There are an estimated 4,500,000 Americans with mental retardation, about one-third of them children. There are thousands of others with related disorders—thousands who stand to be benefited by the results of the study.

Clearly, then, the severity and scope of the problem cannot be questioned.

Eventually, it is expected that about 15 medical schools and hospitals will be collaborating with the National Institute of Neurological Diseases and Blindness and about 8,000 cases will be coming under investigation each year. Whenever possible, the mother will be studied through the entire period of pregnancy. Infants showing signs of neurological stress or brain damage at birth will be closely observed. They will be given detailed psychological and neurological tests. Normal infants will serve as controls to provide an adequate basis for comparison with those who show stress.

This broad-gaged investigation may go on for a decade or even longer. But, as I have said, its implications for future and present generations are considerable. It is among the most hopeful and most comprehensive studies in the medical field that the Congress has been called upon to consider during my service in Washington.

Turning to another field of disease, rheumatic fever, Rhode Island also offers a splendid example of how researchers, physicians, health workers, school authorities, and others team up to apply new medical knowledge through their alertness and cooperative action.

As knowledge about rheumatic fever developed, Rhode Island was one of the first States to develop and carry on a good, sound program against this killer and crippler that strikes hardest at children and that does its damage through causing rheumatic heart disease.

The Rhode Island rheumatic-fever program, as long as 10 years ago, was selected as the subject of an educational film because our State exemplified how community resources could be brought to bear on this disease. The film was made with the sponsorship of the United States Children's Bureau, whose funds have aided the rheumatic-fever program along with our own private and public funds in our State. Shown widely throughout the country, this fine educational motion picture, called We See Them Through, is still being used, I understand, for health-education purposes.

With this background, we can understand why, early this year when there seemed to be a good deal more scarlet fever showing up than there ought to be, our people in Rhode Island were in a position to do something about it. With cooperative programs already well grounded in the heart as in other fields, they, of course, were alert to and acting against rheumatic fever through these programs. Therefore, they would merely need to see what new or intensified action was necessary. There were meetings of the groups, and the medical society, State and city health departments, school authorities, and heart association joined forces to take any desirable and necessary action.

The United States Public Health Service was invited to cooperate and a team of epidemiologists of the Service came to Providence and aided in studying the how, when, where, and why of the scarlet fever cases.

The situation, it was decided, needed an action program to prevent first attacks of rheumatic fever by treating or preventing scarlet fever in the areas where it had shown up heavily. Moreover, with measures to do this established along with other measures to strengthen the general rheumatic fever program, the data that could be gathered and the techniques that could be studied offered a vital research opportunity, which the Public Health Service assisted in starting and carrying on.

I understand that the intensified activity has been very successful and that our people, particularly our children, have been well protected through the physicians' and community's efforts. Alertness averted what might have been a grave situation. The combined forces of medicine, voluntary and official health agencies, school authorities, and parents and the people generally showed how activities could be intensified when needed. The research experiment has not been completed, but I am told by the Public Health Service that the splendid cooperation of the people in Rhode Island made possible gathering of important data which will be of value in the nationwide heart program.

Another first in Rhode Island of which we are very proud is the special clinic that was organized jointly by the Our Lady of Fatima Hospital, the State Committee on Aging, and the Federal Office of Vocational Rehabilitation, at an annual cost of $40,000—$30,000 provided by Congress and $10,000 by Our Lady of Fatima Hospital.

Its purpose is to demonstrate the extent to which vocational rehabilitation for older workers can be achieved through an intensive program of diagnostic, evaluation and rehabilitation services. These services are primarily for workers 45 to 65 years of age, who are eligible for the OAIS disability freeze program and for other persons in the same age category identified by the State rehabilitation agency as persons whose readjustment can be only effected by the clinic's total, coordinated and intensive program of restorative services.

The operation of the clinic involves the participation of multiple professions including rehabilitation counselor, social worker, doctors, nurse, therapists and an employment specialist. The clinic got under way in the middle of 1956 and has since provided services for over 100 older disabled persons. These persons had a variety of handicaps including cerebral vascular accidents, arthritis, multiple sclerosis and other orthopedic involvements.

The last report of the clinic reveals that 21 of these persons had been rehabilitated into employment. National statistics indicate that less than 10 percent of this age group is restored by the official State Vocational Rehabilitation Agencies throughout the country. The 25 percent rate of rehabilitation in the Our Lady of Fatima Clinic documents the efficacy of this special program.

As a result of its accomplishment the Federal Office of Vocational Rehabilitation chose the Our Lady of Fatima Clinic as a selected demonstration project in vocational rehabilitation and recommended State rehabilitation agencies throughout the country to help in organizing similar clinics in their communities with Federal grants coming from the demonstration appropriation.

The clinic is now in its second year of operation and will continue through a third year.

With these examples of current progress in our fine State of Rhode Island, let me turn now to a glimpse of what may lie ahead for us as a result of the medical research and public health measures that the people want and that we in Congress are aiding through providing supportive funds.

I think—and my opinion is based upon the best thinking of the many authorities in medical and scientific field with whom I am in constant touch—that the foreseeable future will bring even greater gains.

The past 10 years' advances have exceeded those of the previous half century. I think it likely that the next 10 years' gains will surpass those of the past decade.

Why? Because, in almost every one of the great disease fields that cause most of the death and disability each year in the United States, there has been a tremendous opening up of new and promising avenues of research where just a few years ago there seemed to exist only blind alleys.

Hardening of the arteries is an outstanding example. Instead of previous, complete darkness, and little research interest and few researchers working on this disease whose consequence is 400,000 or more deaths each year, there is today a burgeoning of research. Already many, many new clues have been turned up, and some of the causative factors are being intensively researched and being broken down into firm specifics. We may well look for treatments and preventives of real effectiveness in the coming years.

Cancer, another stubborn and difficult enemy, may yield, at least in part, within a reasonable time. It would require a volume to list the many pathways of new knowledge that are being charted today. To mention one effort, being implemented on a scale and with an intensity never before seen in history, there is the great search for chemotherapeutic agents, drugs, that may be effective. This is highly promising—as are, indeed, other avenues of approach, such as the new one that involves the possibility of training viruses to attack cancer without harming the host.

In the field of mental illness, that affects so many in our Nation today, we may see very exciting developments. As I mentioned earlier, the tranquilizing drugs and others that act upon the central nervous system are already bringing benefits, but the most encouraging thing about them is the new roads that they will open up into understanding. A broad-scale program is just getting under way, for example, in psychopharmacotherapy that will mean both basic and clinical studies of a wide range and great magnitude.

The answer to the riddles of brain chemistry, an outstanding medical research authority has very recently said, may well come by 1967. Predicting tremendous strides in the next 10 years, he feels that we are on the threshold of great discoveries. These, he says, could mean that many mental illnesses could prove to be chemically remediable.

These are only a few examples of the many cheering and promising new developments, yet they serve to show why I feel so strongly that the past 10 years of progress are but a prelude of greater things to come.

This is why, too, I believe that the work we do in Congress to increase and speed up medical research is work that my own constituents desire me to do and at the same time a real fulfilling of my responsibilities to the whole electorate of the country, who look to Congress to establish and maintain programs that will protect and better their health and welfare.

Activities of the Committee on Un-American Activities During the 1st Session of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS E. WALTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report on the activities of the Committee on Un-American Activities during the 1st session of the 85th Congress:

REPORT BY CHAIRMAN FRANCIS E. WALTER ON THE ACTIVITIES OF THE COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES DURING THE 1ST SESSION OF THE 85TH CONGRESS

Through hearings and investigations conducted in key cities across the United States, the Committee on Un-American Activities thus far in 1957 has uncovered significant new aspects of the operation of the Communist conspiracy.

Paradoxically, the committee has found that at the very moment the Communist Party itself claims that its formal organization is disintegrating, the Communist apparatus has, in fact, been able to record some of its most important accomplishments.

The results of the committee's inquiries have shown that despite the brutal chronicle of communism in this country and abroad, and the Kremlin's patent goal of world enslavement, a great number of Americans still maintain allegiance to the program of conspiracy of international communism.

One major focus of the committee's work was Communist propaganda—material imported from overseas, and newspapers and other literature published by the Communist-controlled foreign-language press and Communist publishing houses in the United States.

Public hearings were held in Washington, D. C., New York, Chicago, and New Orleans, as a continuation of the committee's propaganda hearings conducted last year in Washington, D. C., Philadelphia, and San Francisco.

In New York the committee called before it 28 witnesses from foreign-language publications, periodicals, publishing firms, and book stores. During these hearings, Irving Fishman, Deputy Director of Customs in New York City, testified that 6,947,000 pieces of Communist propaganda were imported into the United States last year as bulk mail; this, he added, does not include Communist propaganda imported via first-class mail or diplomatic pouches.

In Chicago the committee heard 9 witnesses, among them the editors and business manager of the Lithuanian daily Vilnis, whose circulation of 32,000 makes it even larger than the Daily Worker. The hearings in both New York and Chicago provided further proof that the Communist-dominated foreign-language press constitutes the Kremlin's most important propaganda pipeline to nationality and minority groups in the United States.

In order to present to the American people a complete picture of the international Communist conspiracy, the committee this year extended its series of consultations with experts who have had firsthand contact with the global program of the Kremlin. Together their testimony confirms that the operations of the Communist apparatus in the United States comprise only one segment of a worldwide complex of subversion and treachery.

In one of these consultations, Dr. Frederick Charles Schwarz, executive director of the Christian Anti-Communist Crusade, predicted that international communism will achieve its goal of world domination within the next 16 years if its present rate of expansion continues unabated.

In another, three experts warned that trade with the Soviet Union and other Communist nations is a one-way street that can lead only to the ultimate destruction of United States economy.

Reviewing the Communist threat in the Far East, Kuo-Shuen Chang, a former Singapore newspaper editor, reported that Communist labor-union and student organizations, backed by combat-trained guerrillas, are preparing to seize control of Singapore and Malaya in the vacuum created by termination of the British rule there.

Another witness, Dr. August Rei, former President of Estonia, revealed that the Soviet Union has now converted the conquered Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania into a vast staging area for a future world war. Dr. Rei and two Hungarian officials who fled after the revolution was crushed last fall, presented an appalling description of Soviet terror.

Dr. Rei testified that more than 170,000 of a total Estonian population of 1,200,000 had fallen victim to Soviet murder and deportation after the seizure of his country by the Kremlin.

The two leaders of the Hungarian revolution, Janos Jorvath and Sandor Kiss, reported that Hungary is now in the grip of a reign of terror imposed by the Red army and the reconstituted Hungarian security troops. Significantly, all of the witnesses who testified on international communism urged severance of diplomatic relations with the Kremlin and the satellite governments.

The Committee on Un-American Activities this year also inaugurated publication of biographies of leaders of the Soviet Union and international communism. Those released thus far have dealt with Nikita Khrushchev and Nikolai Bulganin, Marshals Georgi Zhukov and Ivan Konev of the Soviet Union; and Mao Tse-tung and Chou En-lai of Red China. The information contained in these biographies demonstrates beyond any doubt the hopelessness of attempting to negotiate with the leaders of international communism as if they were men of good faith.

Distribution of the staff consultations with experts on international communism and the biographies has been made throughout the country. The response that they have occasioned indicates that they have helped fill a need in the knowledge of the American people about the true nature of international communism.

Another need was filled with the publication by the committee of an extensive report on Communist Political Subversion—the campaign to destroy the security programs of the United States Government. The report resulted from hearings held by the committee in key cities across the United States, during which the committee heard dozens of witnesses and compiled thousands of documents dealing with the Communist program. The testimony and committee documents have been published in two massive volumes reflecting one of the most exhaustive inquiries ever made by a Congressional committee into any aspect of communism.

The committee found that a prodigious campaign of political subversion, clandestinely directed by a nationwide apparatus of Communist agents, menaces the entire security system of the United States. The essence of this campaign, the committee found, is the perversion of our democratic process of Government. If it continues unabated, it promises the Kremlin a degree of success that never could have been achieved by the classic means of force and violence.

The chief targets of the Communist Party in its political subversion campaign, the committee found, are the Walter-McCarran Immigration and Nationality Act, the Internal Security Act, the Smith Act and, indeed, all other legislative and executive actions aimed against the Kremlin's operations in the United States.

The Committee on Un-American Activities found that the Communist Party has succeeded in establishing over 200 organizations to execute this campaign of political subversion. While these individual organizations claim to be independent and autonomous, the committee found that they are in fact, controlled in every instance by the Communist Party. Through these organizations the Communist Party has been able to subject both major political parties, State legislatures, and the Congress to an impact of letters, petitions, and personal appeals, all of which are designed to fabricate the impression that a popular sentiment exists for enfeebling the safeguards presently established by our immigration and security systems.

To cope successfully with aspects of the Communist apparatus not treated adequately in current laws, the Committee on Un-American Activities formulated and presented to the Congress proposals for legislation coordinating all individual recommendations that have been made in this field. Together they would greatly strengthen the Government's hand in dealing with all manifestations of Communist activity.

While it was impossible for the Congress to consider the legislation in the few days that remained of the session after it was introduced, it is hoped that action can be taken as soon as possible when Congress reconvenes.

One of the most acute problems presented by the Communist conspiracy continues to be that of espionage. Through testimony obtained from Boris Morros, the American counterspy whose work for over more than a decade has resulted in the exposure of nine key Soviet spies, the committee has been able to obtain connection links which it hopes will enable it to trace the pattern of Soviet espionage in yet undivulged areas.

United States and India

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, to have a friend, you have to be one. At this juncture in world affairs, we certainly need friends and we especially need them in Asia. An opportunity will soon present itself whereby we can extend the hand of real friendship to India. India is seeking a loan of $1 billion from the western democracies for the next 3 years and it is contemplated that the United States Government will be asked to contribute one-half thereof, or $500 million. The remainder may come from Britain and further loans from the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development as well as from private sources. India has been receiving about $60 million a year in United States foreign aid. Fifty million of this is for economic development but mostly on a loan basis. Ten million thereof is in the nature of technical assistance.

India has inaugurated a second 5-year plan, and if this aid is not given, the same will have to be cut drastically or unfortunately abandoned. Most essential projects in its second 5-year plan of industrialization would have to be postponed for many years, or even abandoned. This second 5-year plan has already run into difficulties. The amount of outside financing needed by the Indian Government and private enterprises proved larger than the original plan's estimates. As a result of the import of capital goods required by the plan, India's foreign-exchange reserves have dwindled by some $435 million in 1956–57. It is now certain that the total balance-of-payment deficit during the 5-year plan will be much higher than the original estimate of $830 million. These loans are essential or the plan may go a-glimmering.

Premier Nehru has stressed India's economy as being fundamentally sound and that there is great potential wealth in India. He stresses that the present foreign-exchange difficulties have been brought about by heavy investments in wealth-producing goods and not by the importation of luxuries. India is most anxious to raise the standard of living of her teeming millions. For this the second 5-year plan is most necessary.

Toward the end of September, Indian Finance Minister T. T. Krishnamachari will come to Washington, to attend a board meeting of the International Monetary Fund. At that time, he will discuss the matters of loans with the Secretary of State, if not with President Eisenhower. It is interesting to note that Secretary Dulles has stated that the United States would give sympathetic consideration to any Indian request for economic assistance.

I personally cherish the hope that the Congress will not unduly interfere with efforts to effectuate a substantial loan to India.

I hope, too, that India and her representatives will not try to pressurize the administration by saying that if we do not make the loan, they will go to Moscow for it. I am quite sure that argument will not wash. Frankly, it is a baseless argument and should fall on deaf ears. I do not think that Moscow could or would make a loan of such magnitude without imposing conditions that would stultify India.

India has made considerable industrial progress latterly. There has been a minimum increase of 30 percent in production in all sections of Indian industry. Beyond that, the rate of capital formations in India have been rather rapid. When India obtained her independence, there was a notable dearth of engineering industries. This has all been changed. For example, almost 95 percent of all component parts of bicycles used in India are of native manufacture. India is making rapid strides in the production of automobiles. India mined 30 million tons of coal annually at the time she achieved independence. The figures today are around 44 million. In 1947 she produced 860,000 tons of steel. In the current year, the production is 1,340,000 tons. In 1947 she produced 1,400,000 tons of cement. Current production is 6,100,000 tons. Many more figures could be presented to indicate the great strides made in India's production.

There are many in this country who deplore the so-called nonalinement foreign policy maintained by India. They claim India must make a choice between the two power blocs. I personally would prefer to have India aline herself with the West. But there is an old adage attributed to our own Indians: "Let me not pass judgment on my brother before I have walked 6 months in his moccasins." Perhaps we should try and see this situation through Indian eyes, especially in the light of her geographical location, with her vast common border with Red China, and the other factors which make her hesitate to come over emphatically to our side. Also, I am a bit intolerant of those who say "If you are not with us, you are against us." I am confident that India is not against us. On the contrary, I would estimate that India's attitude toward us is one of benevolent neutrality. I say this despite some intemperate remarks registered by representatives of India at the United Nations and elsewhere.

Beyond all this, remember that India asks for a loan and not a handout. India has vast resources. With hard work and increased productivity, the loan will be paid on the due dates. India might well follow the hard toil that is being put forth by the Germans. It was their industry, perseverance, and hard labor that pulled West Germany out of her economic difficulties. Be it remembered, also, that India's basic economy is capitalistic, although in many instances that economy is controlled due to local conditions.

I am well aware also that the attitude of Krishna Menon, chief delegate of India to the United Nations at the last session, was hardly to our liking, particularly when he said that the Hungarian revolt was an internal affair. It is even difficult to understand an Associated Press dispatch out of New Delhi dated as late as September 9, which reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Nehru said today, "Condemnation of the Soviet Union for suppressing the Hungarian revolt would only make the situation worse."

I am in utter disaccord, and I am sure the Western democracies are in disaccord, with Mr. Nehru when he so cavalierly says that we should not condemn the Soviet Union. Also, it was a sad commentary when India abstained on the Hungarian resolution of the United Nations.

Frankly, it is expressions of this character which makes it very difficult for the well-wishers of India in the United States to be helpful to her. Both Premier Nehru and his dynamic Defense Minister and Chief Delegate to the United Nations, V. K. Krishna Menon, might well leave unsaid some of their unjustified criticisms against the United States and mute their unjustified yet favorable comments of Soviet Russia.

In any event, I do indeed hope that the administration will look with kindly eye upon the application which India may make for this loan. Without this loan, the prime targets of India's 5-year plan will not be reached. Then, the Government of India might have to resort increasingly to centralization and regimentation of her economy and a regimented economy might tend toward gradual elimination of political and individual freedom. Communism would beckon and might take hold.

It is possible, with the help of the United States and other Western democracies, to participate in the underwriting and guaranteeing of the success of Indian development. We dare not allow Indian efforts to fail. If there is economic failure or—worse still—collapse in India, the failure or collapse would spread throughout south Asia. We cannot, dare not, permit such a catastrophe. If we fail to help, the day will surely and bitterly come when we will reproach ourselves.

Coal Research Subcommittee Publishes Excellent Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELIZABETH KEE

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mrs. KEE. Mr. Speaker, the Coal Research Subcommittee is to be congratulated for the excellent report just published. We West Virginians have been vitally interested in activities and studies conducted by this group over the past 15 months, for we recognize that from these findings can come new opportunities and new hopes for families in mining communities. I spoke in support of the resolution to establish the Coal Research Subcommittee when Congressman SAYLOR introduced it in the 84th Congress. In the next session of Congress beginning in January I shall make every effort to bring about passage of legislation to implement these recommendations.

Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, a number of the subcommittee's recommendations can be carried out without waiting for Congress to reconvene if the administration is willing to view the overall energy panorama with objectivity rather than to proceed with policies that are detrimental to the best interests of the Nation and to the welfare of the coal industry. In the first place, the White House should take immediate steps to correct a situation that is described thusly on page 42 of the subcommittee report: "Government agencies disregard fuels cost."

The very first case history in the report in support of this accusation relates to the new Air Force Academy, whose boilers are scheduled to use natural gas despite an abundance of coal within the immediate area. I submit that, even if gas supplies were at the moment available at costs below those at which coal can be delivered, it is incumbent upon the Department of Defense to use the more plentiful solid fuel. This observation is inspired by figures published by the United States Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey which show that coal accounts for well over 90 percent of our total mineral fuels resources, as compared to less than 1 percent for natural gas; furthermore, the Federal Government has repeatedly acknowledged that coal should be utilized wherever feasible in preference to our depleting supplies of oil and natural gas.

The Department of Defense itself has from time to time recommended that all military facilities choose coal over oil and natural gas not only to conserve the scarce energy resources but also to preclude shortages in an emergency.

Other Government installations listed in the Coal Research Subcommittee report as currently burning gas or oil when coal is the logical fuel include the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard, the naval ordnance plant at Louisville, Ky., Bainbridge, Md., Naval Training Center, the new Army hospital at Fort Dix, N. J., the Social Security Building at Baltimore, and a number of other Government bases within close proximity of coal-producing areas.

The administration need not wait until January to correct these abuses. If the White House is aware of the contents of the subcommittee report, then it should act quickly in implementation of the recommendations. If the report has been withheld from the President, responsible administration officials are obligated to send a copy to Newport immediately.

Elsewhere the subcommittee reviews the havoc wrought in coal communities by imports of residual oil. The administration, through a series of investigations by Cabinet members and others close to the White House, has accumulated tons of evidence in proof that excessive imports are counter to the public welfare. Again, it is the responsibility of the administration to substitute action for delay and procrastination if the coal industry is to improve its economy and at the same time get in position to accelerate its production to the levels that would be required under emergency conditions.

Gas imports is another subject covered by the subcommittee. At this very moment hearings are in progress before the Federal Power Commission on applications to pipe Canadian gas into markets now being served by bituminous coal. Unless these applications are rejected, the coal industry will be further victimized by irrational Government policies that subordinate the interests of American citizens to those of international fuel profiteers.

The following paragraphs, which appear on pages 41 and 42 of the subcommittee report, speak for themselves. A word from the administration would be sufficient to include remedial provisions in the gas legislation that is to be considered when Congress reconvenes; meanwhile, the Federal Power Commission should exercise its general authority by restraining gas transmission companies from further usurpation of coal markets through exploitation of loopholes in the Natural Gas Act.

> Coal has been driven out of the market in many areas by the practice of interstate pipeline companies of selling gas to certain consumers and distributors at below cost plus a fair proportion of fixed charges. Prospective consumers are induced to turn to the use of natural gas through contract proposals calling for the delivery of interruptible gas at extremely low, unrealistic rates. Subsequently, as the demand increases for the higher priced, firm contract (uninterruptible) gas, the supply of interruptible gas is reduced. Sooner or later those who have installed gas-burning equipment on the strength of the below-cost gas rates dangled before them must either contract to purchase a firm supply of gas at higher rates or turn to the use of a lower priced fuel—which would entail considerable cost and inconvenience if the standby fuel-burning facilities are not designed for the use of the cheaper fuel. In the meantime, the pipeline companies have captured additional customers and have inflicted considerable damage on the competitive fuels industries.
> The President's Advisory Committee on Energy Supplies and Resources Policy noted that sales either for resale or direct consumption below actual cost plus a fair proportion of fixed charges which drive out competing fuels constitute unfair competition and are inimical to a sound fuels economy and recommended that appropriate action be taken that will prohibit such sales. The subcommittee also notes that the Office of Defense Mobilization is on record as favoring legislation which would amend the Natural Gas Act of 1938 so as to prohibit below-cost sales of natural gas. Until such legislation is enacted, natural gas will continue to be sold at below-cost rates wherever and to the extent such practice serves the purpose of some interstate pipeline companies. The impact of such sales will continue to be felt by the coal industry already weakened by such practices.

Mr. Speaker, the case for coal will be determined when legislation to carry out the recommendations of the subcommittee is presented in January. Meanwhile, many of the inequitable policies which redound to the disadvantage of the industry can and should be corrected by the administration without delay.

Report to Constituents on Work of the 85th Congress

OF

HON. A. L. MILLER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, it has been my practice for the 15 years I have been a Member of Congress to make a yearly report to the people I represent. I want them to know how I voted and to have my views on all public questions. It is their right and it is my responsibility.

NEWSPAPER AND RADIO REPORT EACH WEEK

In my humble opinion, it is the duty of every Member of Congress to keep in close touch with the people that he represents, to know their wishes and keep them informed of pending legislation. I have tried to do this each year by writing a weekly newsletter which goes to approximately 90 newspapers and 14 radio stations, and a number of interested individuals in the district.

I tape a weekly radio program entitled "What's Happening in the Nation's Capital." This program has been carried over the years by all of the radio stations in the district. There has been an occasional TV film. The newspapers and radio and TV stations have been most kind to use these efforts of mine as a public service. I deeply appreciate their help in bringing these reports to the people.

VISIT TO 38 COUNTIES AND 100 TOWNS IN THE DISTRICT

I make it a practice when Congress is in session to stay here on the job. In doing so I have missed out on many invitations to attend various meetings in Nebraska. By staying on the job I have kept one of the best voting records in Congress, in the upper 5 percent.

When Congress is not in session, I make it a practice to be out in the district talking with people at county fairs, service clubs, church groups, farm meetings, and similar gatherings.

In off-election years I hold Government clinics in each of the 38 courthouses for the purpose of discussing problems of Government with my constituents.

LEADERSHIP BY CONGRESS AND THE PRESIDENT

This Nation is entering the fifth year of a world at peace, a period that began with the ending of the Korean war in 1953. It seems to me that we have progressed, day by day, to a more permanent, enduring, and solid structure for conducting our world affairs. It is to be hoped that the disarmament conference will bear good fruits.

This Nation and the world have advanced far in the production of death-dealing weapons. The guided missile is about to take the place of the airplane. The atomic age has burst upon us and if used properly could promise a better world with better living conditions.

The budget has been balanced for the third straight time. Deficit spending has become a thing of the past. Corruption in Government has been held at a minimum. The Communists no longer hold positions of responsibility. Our leadership in world affairs has been firmed. This Nation no longer jumps from crisis to crisis. We have demonstrated a sincere desire for peace by positive, constructive acts and deeds. We can be thankful we do live in a world of peace. Tense though it may be, it has given us a prayerful respite from the slaughter and destruction of two major wars.

If this Nation continues to enjoy wise political, economic, and spiritual leadership, we can rise to new heights of position and power in this world.

BUDGET

One of the greatest roars of protest in the history of the Nation began to batter at the ears of Congress after the President announced his budget for the 1958 fiscal year. It was the largest peacetime budget in history.

I wrote the President and made a protest about the enormous budget and the growth of Federal Government. I pointed out that with proper management we could cut $8 to $10 billion from the budget without injuring a single vital, necessary function of government. I suggested:

First. Adopt all of the Hoover Commission recommendations.

Second. Cut down on foreign economic aid.

Third. Trim the payroll by 10 percent. Stop hiring to fill vacancies.

Fourth. Stop new matching and grant-in-aid programs.

The administration did adopt some of the suggestions and it looks like there will be a savings of around $5 billion of the original proposed budget of $71.8 billion.

I have had hundreds of letters from Nebraska protesting the budget. They were indignant letters. They were detailed and sound in their reasoning. I am mighty glad of the response.

I consider myself a conservative-moderate Republican. I believe in spending when the money goes for the current and future needs of a growing American economy.

I have not been able to go along with the administration on Federal aid to education, increased spending for foreign aid, and additional spending for new welfare programs. I cannot and will not be a rubber stamp.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

For several years I have announced my opposition to Federal aid to education. I have worked and voted against such aid. I have done so because I believe these problems should be left to the people in the local communities. I want no big government in Washington controlling our county and State school systems. As a former teacher in a rural school, it is my conviction that communities should build, operate, and maintain their schools at the local level and without Federal interference.

FOREIGN AID

In the past 10 years, the American taxpayer has been called upon to send more than $65 billion to some 70 countries around the world. I have long been opposed to foreign aid with the exception of food, medicine, clothing, and technical help for needy people. It seems to me we have wasted billions of dollars in the past few years trying to buy friends that cannot be bought. I voted against foreign aid.

HELLS CANYON

Of course, you heard the rumbling over the Hells Canyon issue. Here was a case where proponents of Federal power wanted to spend half a billion dollars of Federal money to construct a high dam over the Snake River out in the Northwest at the very same place where a private power company is already building a series of three dams to accomplish the very same purpose.

The private company has spent about $58 million. The Federal power people wanted to bury this construction and start over. As a matter of fact the production of power would be nearly the same, whichever plan was used.

Nebraska's public power is entirely different from Federal power. We elect our own directors; our electric energy is not controlled from Washington. We do have good local control. I have supported 98 percent of public-power projects in other States.

At the same time I am a firm believer in the free enterprise on which this Nation was founded. It is my steadfast conviction that the Government should not do for the people what the people are able to do for themselves.

There is room in our country for both private and public power—it should not become a political football.

SUPREME COURT

Decisions made by the Supreme Court during the past year have been very disturbing to me. Of course, the one which hit the Nation with the greatest impact was the Girard case, the young soldier who was turned over for trial to the Japanese after he killed a woman.

The case drew a lot of protest. Few tried to argue that Girard was innocent but all demanded that he be tried by an American court-martial. The status of forces agreements came in for a great deal of criticism. I am sure some more effective legislation is needed than we have now.

The Supreme Court also freed a confessed rapist on the technical ground that he had been held too long before arraignment. This man walks the streets of Washington today. There were other cases where Communists were turned loose on technical grounds.

Perhaps the worst of all was in the case where the Court in effect opened up the secret files of the FBI and thus weakened the powers of law enforcement. Some corrective legislation was passed in the final days of the session.

IRRIGATION AND FLOOD CONTROL

We had a severe setback this past session when the Ainsworth and Farwell irrigation districts were denied starting funds. Recognized as two of the best projects in the Missouri River Basin, the projects were denied because of a poor presentation of the facts by the Department of the Interior and the fact that the Nebraska Legislature had passed a misinterpreted resolution against grants-in-aid projects.

These latter projects have no relation to irrigation or reclamation, but opponents made hay with the resolution.

The Democratic leadership effectively prevented the omnibus rivers and harbors bill from coming to the floor. The Gering Valley flood-control project was a valued item in this bill, but too many unsound, unauthorized projects had been included. We tried hard to get a clean bill introduced, leaving out the unapproved items. The leadership prevented this. Of course, we will try again next year.

Sufficient funds were granted this year by Congress for the completion of the Sargent Irrigation District. Funds also were approved for the completion of Glendo Dam, which will provide more power for Nebraska, Wyoming, and Colorado. We were successful in getting adjusted contracts for the Northport Irrigation District and the Mirage Flats Irrigation District.

The 230-kilovolt line from Fort Randall to Grand Island is still an uncertainty. The Appropriations Committee refused to consider it. I believe we would be better off if the power interests in Nebraska joined together, borrowed the money from REA, and built it themselves. Three years ago we could have had the line, but at that time some of the power interests were against it. They thought a 115-kilovolt line would do the job. They refused to look into the future.

FARM PROGRAM

The farm program is in somewhat of a mess. There are many differences between the cotton, tobacco, wheat, and corn farmers and the individuals living in the city.

The best news for Nebraska, however, is that the drought seems to have been broken. There was a good small-grain crop, the best hay and alfalfa crop we have ever had. It is good news to know that the price of hogs and cattle is satisfactory. In general, over the Nation agriculture seems in a better position than it was a year ago. The farm income is up 7 percent in the last year. New discoveries in better feeds, better fertilizer, and better farming methods have helped cure an agriculture that had been quite sick.

Next year I hope there is good sound farm legislation. I believe that discoveries can be made that will find ways and means of using surplus agriculture products for industrial uses. The Commission inquiring into further industrial uses of grains and other farm crops has made its report, which calls for more research in finding new methods of using surplus crops. I feel sure that American scientists will discover these new methods that will tie industry and agriculture closer together.

PEACE AND TAXES

The world has been at peace, I think, partly because we have spent a great deal of money in a sound defense program. Of course, this has caused taxes to remain high. About two-thirds of the tax dollar goes to maintain the peace and to pay for past wars. Recent military manpower cuts indicate a speeding up as we change to more modern methods of war. The national defense is being streamlined to meet the requirements of the nuclear age.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The civil-rights issue occasioned many days of debate in the Senate. This is the question of protecting the Negro and his voting rights. It seems to me that in the last discussion there was more politics than there should have been. The issue has little effect in Nebraska. I supported the administration for a good bill which, in revised form, went to the White House after the Senate's one-man filibuster ended.

THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS

This Congress has proved one of the most frustrating, difficult, and inconclusive that I can remember in my 15 years as a Member of the House of Representatives.

The Congress has been more productive of political maneuvering than of constructive legislation. There has been much partisan bickering. There has been too much logrolling and vote trading.

The vacillation comes about because of the different political complexions of the President and the Congress. When the Chief Executive is of one political complexion and the Congress another, legislation becomes extremely difficult. There have been too many roadblocks thrown in front of good legislation.

The President has shown restraint in dealing with Congress. There are times when he seems to have had poor advice.

The President said he was bitterly disappointed with the results of this Congress. He made some 203 recommendations but less than half of them were approved.

It seems to me that in all legislation there is some good and some bad. I have often wished it were possible to vote for the 70 percent that might be good and reject the balance in any bill. That is not possible.

I have always felt that legislation should be considered on its merits. I have supported those measures which I thought were right. If my conscience told me a measure was wrong, I have withheld my support.

Many controversial bills which should have come to the floor at this session were bypassed by the Democrat-controlled Congress and will have to wait until next year for action. I am not satisfied with the record we made. I believe we could have done better with a Republican President and a Republican Congress.

It has been a great privilege and a great responsibility to represent the people who live in the Fourth District for with every privilege comes responsibility.

As long as I am a Member of Congress I shall try to discharge my responsibility to the very best of my ability.

Good Labor-Management Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to call attention to an outstanding example of good labor and management relationship. In these days when the press is filled with the accounts of wrongdoings of a few union officers and members, the public is inclined to attribute all the wrongs of labor and management relations to organized labor. Unfortunately, the sensationalism of a widely publicized investigation often obscures the vast amount of good things that go on as a matter of routine day by day and which are the product of enlightened work of progressive union labor leaders and their counterparts in management.

Such an example is the progressive activities of the electrical industry in New York City. There, almost 15 years ago, labor and management decided to join together in a team to work out their own problems. Labor wanted employment opportunities, job security, and a measure of security in old age and in event of disaster. Management sought a high level of production, responsibility in its dealings with labor, and all of those conditions that make it possible to produce to the satisfaction of the public. This team was called the Joint Industry Board of the Electrical Industry and it was formed on April 1, 1943. Ten members from management and 10 out of labor comprised this team of members of Local No. 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Electrical Contracting Industry in New York City.

This team had three purposes:

First. To find ways and means to expand harmony between management and labor.

Second. To work out plans for increasing the services of electrical contractors to the public.

Third. To develop new tools and methods of installation to increase production and cut costs.

Suffice to say that in the intervening time the team has more than justified the faith in the plan of such industry leaders as Harry Van Arsdale, of the union, and Harry F. Fischbach and A. Lincoln Bush, of the electrical contractors.

The public is getting the benefit of the widest use of all types of labor-saving tools and methods and production is very high. The worker has obtained the benefit of a high hourly wage, plus medical, pension, and educational benefits and apprenticeship and training which is a pace setter for the entire construction industry.

I am pleased to note that these good things have, indeed, been given some measure of recognition. The September 3, 1957, issue of Look magazine has a picture story of this fine relationship which comes from effective union leadership. It is entitled "What Should a Union Be?" The January 1956 issue of Reader's Digest contains another excellent article on this relationship entitled "The Union That Gives More to the Boss," by Lester Velie.

This team has produced many unusual but effective methods to achieve better labor-management relations. For example, members of the union themselves have stepped up production by eliminating incompetence on the job. This was accomplished by the setting up of a union school and through the elimination by union members themselves of loafing on the job. The ancient practice of featherbedding has been eliminated. Union members have invented various tools and methods raising the production throughout the industry. Union members are assured of efficient administration within their union and through financial reports rendered at their monthly meetings at which attendance is almost a matter of compulsion.

A joint union-employer hiring office was established. Members of the union have obtained pensions, free dental care and medical checkups, and were the first in the building trade to receive paid vacations.

A joint management-union committee administers the welfare system in the industry, thus the employers now plan with the union instead of fighting a welfare system.

This same team has produced low-cost apartments for members of local No. 3. A convalescent home has been established for union members. One of the most recent progressive steps has been the establishment of scholarships for the children of union members.

Thus, this combination of labor and management has established a remarkable welfare program which provides not only lifetime protection against illness, accidents, and unemployment, but a substantial retirement income after the age of 65.

The funds that provide these benefits throughout the industry are amply protected by sound fiscal requirements and management.

It is, indeed, a point of personal satisfaction for me to call attention to this outstanding example of progressive labor-management relationship, for one of the founders and leaders of this program is a personal friend of long standing, Harry F. Fischbach, a man for whom I have the highest regard and who typifies by his industrial and personal life a true leader, a great leader in a progressive industry.

Record of Committee on Public Works in the 85th Congress, 1st Session

OF

HON. CHARLES A. BUCKLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I include the following summary of public-works legislation reported by the Committee on Public Works during the 1st session of the 85th Congress:

LAWS ENACTED

Public Law 85-3: Extends time for report of President's Advisory Commission on Presidential Office Space.

Public Law 85-23: Gives consent of Congress to Merrimack River flood-control compact entered into between the States of Massachusetts and New Hampshire creating the Merrimack River Valley Flood Control Commission and defining its powers and functions relating to approval of flood-control projects constructed by the United States.

Public Laws 85-85, 85-93, and 85-95: Provides for remodeling the existing Senate Office Building, increases the limit of cost on the new Senate Office Building, and authorizes furnishings for the new building.

Public Law 85-106: Extends the times for commencing and completing the toll bridge over the Rainy River at or near Baudette, Minn.

Public Law 85-108: Increases the borrowing authority and clarifies the general powers of the St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation.

Public Law 85-113: Reenacts authorization for the highway bridge over the Pigeon River below High Falls, Minn.

Public Law 85-130: Conveys lands at McNary lock and dam project, Oregon and Washington, to the port of Walla Walla, Wash.

Public Law 85-138: Designates the lake created by the Jim Woodruff Dam, Apalachicola River, Ga., as Lake Seminole.

Public Law 85-143: Authorizes payment by Bureau of Public Roads of transportation and subsistence costs to temporary employees on direct Federal highway projects.

Public Law 85-146: Authorizes municipal water supply from Lake Texoma for the city of Sherman, Tex.

Public Law 85–148: Extends period for amortization of indebtedness of bridge over the Missouri River near Rulo, Nebr.

Public Law 85–159: Authorizes the construction of a hydroelectric power project on the Niagara River at Niagara Falls, N. Y., which would utilize all of the United States share of the amount of water in the Niagara River made available for power redevelopment under the terms of a treaty between the United States and Canada entered into in 1950. Such development is to be accomplished by authorizing and directing the Federal Power Commission to issue a license, pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Power Act, to the New York State Power Authority, an instrumentality of the State of New York. The State power authority would finance, construct, and operate the project, including the United States share, under the 1950 treaty, of the cost of remedial works without aid or assistance from the Federal Government. Provision is made for inclusion in the license of specific conditions relating to the disposition of project power. This law affords an acceptable basis for the long-delayed development of a great natural resource.

Public Law 85–169: Transfers ownership to Allegany County, Md., of a bridge loaned by the Bureau of Public Roads.

Public Law 85–178: Conveys Bunker Hill Island in Lake Cumberland near Burnside, Ky., to the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

Public Law 85–221: Authorizes an additional bridge across Bear Creek at or near Lovel Point, Baltimore County, Md., and collection of tolls.

Public Law 85–230: Increases the storage capacity of the Whitney Dam and Reservoir, Tex.

Public Law 85–242: Amends the act of June 3, 1896, to provide for construction of new terminal facilities between 17th Street on the south shore of Gowanus Creek and Fort Hamilton, N. Y.

Public Law 85–245: Returns to former owners certain mineral interests in lands acquired for Arkabutla, Sardis, Enid, and Grenada Reservoirs, Miss.

Public Law 85–294: Authorizes expenditure of Federal funds to reconstruct lock and dam No. 3 on Little Kanawha River, West Virginia.

BILLS PASSED BY THE HOUSE AND PENDING IN THE SENATE COMMITTEE

H. R. 2: Authorizes the State of Illinois and the Metropolitan Sanitary District of Greater Chicago, under the direction of the Secretary of the Army, to test, on a 3-year basis, the effect of increasing the diversion of water from Lake Michigan into the Illinois Waterway, and for other purposes.

H. R. 2548: Authorizes payment for losses sustained by owners of wells in the vicinity of the construction area of the New Cumberland Dam project by reason of the lowering of the level of water in such wells as a result of the construction of New Cumberland Dam project.

H. R. 3770: Renames the Strawn Dam and Reservoir project in the State of Kansas as the John Redmond Dam and Reservoir.

H. R. 4260: Authorizes the Chief of Engineers to publish information pamphlets, maps, brochures, and other material.

H. R. 4683: Authorizes adjustment, in the public interest, of rentals under leases entered into for the provision of commercial recreational facilities at the Lake Greeson Reservoir, Narrows Dam.

H. R. 6660: Provides that the lock and dam referred to as the Tuscaloosa lock and dam on the Black Warrior River, Ala., shall hereafter be known and designated as the William Bacon Oliver lock and dam.

H. R. 6701: Grants the consent of Congress to the Tennessee River Basin water pollution control compact.

H. R. 8576: Authorizes the conveyance of certain lands within the Old Hickory lock and dam project, Cumberland River, Tenn., to Middle Tennessee Council, Inc., Boy Scouts of America, for recreation and camping purposes.

H. J. Res. 382: Grants the consent and approval of Congress to an amendment of the agreement between the States of Vermont and New York relating to the creation of the Lake Champlain Bridge Commission.

BILLS PASSED BY THE SENATE AND PENDING IN THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC WORKS

S. 1003: Provides for adjustments in the lands or interests therein acquired for the Albeni Falls Reservoir project, Idaho, by the reconveyance of certain lands or interests therein to the former owners thereof.

S. 1587: Authorizes the construction of protective measures in the city of New Bedford and the town of Fairhaven, Mass., to afford hurricane tidal flood protection for New Bedford, Fairhaven, and Acushnet, Mass.

S. 1726: Authorizes certain construction for the protection of the Narragansett Bay area against hurricane tidal flooding.

S. 1785: Designates the reservoir located above Heart-Butte Dam in Grant County, N. Dak., as Lake Tschida.

S. 1869: Amends the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended.

S. 2108: Amends the Public Buildings Act of 1949, to authorize the Administrator of General Services to name, rename, or otherwise designate any building under the custody and control of the General Services Administration.

S. 2109: Amends an act extending the authorized taking area for public building construction under the Public Buildings Act of 1926, as amended, to exclude therefrom the area within E and F Streets and 19th Street and Virginia Avenue NW., in the District of Columbia.

S. 2228: Amends section 5 of the Flood Control Act of August 18, 1941, as amended, pertaining to emergency flood-control work.

S. 2676: Authorizes the Secretary of the Army to make a survey of a water route from Albany, N. Y., into Lake Champlain, N. Y. and Vt., with ultimate connection with the St. Lawrence River.

REPORTED AND PENDING ON HOUSE CALENDARS

S. 497: Authorizes construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors for navigation, flood control, beach erosion, and other purposes. This is the omnibus bill of 1957 and is divided into two parts: Title I, river and harbor projects—navigation and beach erosion control—and title II, flood-control projects. There are four general types of authorization in the bill: First, individual project authorizations or modifications of existing authorizations; second, increases in river basin monetary authorizations; third, matters of general legislation not pertaining to specific projects; and fourth, surveys.

S. 2261: Authorizes construction of Federal buildings by direct appropriation and repeal of lease-purchase program. Primary purposes of the bill, as amended by the committee, are as follows:

First. To authorize appropriations totaling $1,500 million for the 5-year period ending July 1, 1962;

Second. To authorize for construction by direct appropriation all building projects previously approved under the lease-purchase program by the Committees on Public Works of the Senate and the House of Representatives, with the exception of certain projects within the District of Columbia and one project at Rock Island, Ill.

Third. To amend the act of May 25, 1926—which is the basic authority for direct appropriation construction—to provide that before appropriations shall be made for direct construction in the future, a prospectus of each proposed project will have to be submitted and approved by the Committees on Public Works of the Senate and the House of Representatives in order to insure the equitable distribution of projects throughout the United States with due regard for the comparative urgency of need for such projects.

Fourth. To repeal those sections of Public Law 519, 83d Congress, which authorized the Administrator of General Services and the Postmaster General to enter into lease-purchase agreements for periods ranging from 10 to 25 years for acquisition of real property.

H. R. 4266: Amends the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, to authorize TVA to issue and sell revenue bonds to finance needed additions to its power system. Such bonds would not be obligations of, nor guaranteed by the United States. The principal of, and the interest on, such bonds would be payable solely from TVA's power revenues, and TVA would be directed to charge rates for power sufficient to cover debt service on the bonds as well as other expenses and payments for which provision is made under the bill. Proceeds of the bonds could be used for construction, acquisition, enlargement, improvement, or replacement of any plant or other facility used for the generation or transmission of electric power or in connection with lease-purchase transactions.

H. R. 7870: Amends the act of July 1, 1955, to authorize an additional $10 million for the completion of the Inter-American Highway.

SURVEY RESOLUTIONS

In addition to the bills considered and acted upon by the committee, a number of river and harbor and flood-control resolutions proposed by individual Members of Congress, which require only committee action, were approved. These resolutions authorized review survey studies by the Corps of Engineers, Department of the Army, that will ultimately result in project reports submitted to Congress if the projects are found feasible and are approved by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, the Chief of Engineers, and the Secretary of the Army.

GENERAL ACTIVITIES

The committee had 447 bills for consideration during the 1st session of the 85th Congress dealing with such subjects as navigation improvements, flood control, water pollution, beach erosion, highways, public buildings, land conveyances, and water supplies. The committee gave particular study and attention to the needs of every section of the country in reporting the omnibus river and harbor and flood-control bill of 1957 and in acting upon survey resolutions pertaining to civil-works projects, especially with respect to flood-control remedial works necessary as a result of the last three major flood disasters—the hurricanes and floods of 1955, which left such a widespread path of destruction through the New England and Middle Atlantic States, the unprecedented rainfall and floods in California and adjacent States during the Christmas holidays of 1955, and the floods throughout the Southwest United States during May and early June of this year. In this last instance the committee appointed a special subcommittee which made an exhaustive, on-the-ground inspection, the results of which are contained in a report made by the subcommittee on June 29—The Southwest Flood of 1957, Committee Publication No. 85-4.

In all of these accomplishments I have had the active cooperation and valuable aid of all committee members. I pay special tribute to Representatives GEORGE H. FALLON, CLIFFORD DAVIS, JOHN A. BLATNIK, and ROBERT E. JONES, who served as chairmen of the subcommittees. I want to give credit, too, to our efficient and hard-working staff. The committee is fortunate in having capable and experienced staff members and I commend them for a job well done.

Federal Expenditures in Montana

HON. MIKE MANSFIELD

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, economy was the theme of the first session of the 85th Congress and the budget submitted to Congress by President Eisenhower for the operation of the Federal Government in fiscal year 1958 was reduced by nearly $5 billion in funds appropriated by Congress.

However, estimated Federal spending in Montana was increased by an additional $11,197,134 for fiscal year 1958. Appropriations totaling $220,909,849 have been programed for Montana for the 12-month period which began on July 1 of this year. In fiscal year 1957 the Federal Government spent $209,712,715 in Montana. These annual appropriations continue to be the largest single source of income to the State.

Federal income and excise taxes collected in Montana for fiscal year 1956 was in the amount of $128,991,000. On the basis of the above figures Federal expenditures in the State will be at the rate of approximately $1.71 for every $1 collected in Montana.

The Agriculture Department contributed the most to the State and the Commerce Department and the Defense Department are the next two largest sources of Federal moneys.

These appropriations do not include public works projects such as Helena Valley, the second powerplant at Fort Peck and others as portions of these are repayable.

It was a distinct pleasure to work with Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Congressmen LEE METCALF, and LEROY ANDERSON. We worked together—held periodic conferences—in connection with all matters affecting Montana's welfare and endeavored at all times to work as a unit in furthering the development and best interests of our State.

I ask unanimous consent to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a table of the major Federal departments and agencies who programed funds in Montana.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Federal expenditures in State of Montana by departments

Departments	Fiscal year 1957	Fiscal year 1958	Increase (+) or decrease (−)
Commerce: Census Bureau, Weather Bureau, Coast and Geodetic Survey, Bureau of Public Roads, Civil Aeronautics Administration	$35,505,173	$44,194,235	+$8,689,062
(Highway program)	(31,915,857)	(40,297,442)	(+8,381,585)
Treasury: Bureau of Customs, Internal Revenue and Savings Bonds Division	1,169,405	1,234,896	+65,491
Labor: Bureau of Labor Statistics, Wage and Hour Division, employees compensation, apprenticeship and training, employment security	2,024,771	2,008,674	−16,097
Post Office	7,840,000	8,133,000	+293,000
Justice: Legal activities, Immigration and Naturalization Service	557,647	645,000	+87,353
General Services Administration: Government buildings and services, minerals purchase programs	6,887,060	7,212,516	+325,456
Veterans' Administration: General administration, medical and hospital services, benefit payments	14,634,166	14,634,166
Defense: Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force	32,260,000	31,854,000	−406,000
Interior: Bonneville Power Administration, Bureau of Land Management, Bureau of Indian Affairs, Bureau of Reclamation, Geological Survey, Bureau of Mines, National Park Service, Bureau of Sport Fisheries and Wildlife	$14,480,392	$17,971,256	$+3,490,864
Health, Education, and Welfare: American Printing House for the Blind, Office of Education, Vocational Rehabilitation, Public Health Service, and Social Security Administration	8,861,571	9,704,805	+843,234
Agriculture: Agricultural Research Service, Extension Service, Forest Service, Soil Conservation Service, Conservation Program Service, Marketing Service,[1] soil-bank program, Commodity Stabilization Service, Commodity Credit Corporation, Federal Crop Insurance Corporation,[2] REA, FHA, Office of General Counsel	85,492,720	83,317,391	−2,175,329

[1] Since it is not practicable to estimate in advance the availability or demand for surplus commodities, the estimate for 1958 is not included.

[2] Since it is not practicable to estimate the amount of crop insurance indemnity payments in advance an estimate for 1958 is not included. Estimate premium income is as follows: 1957, $1,429,511; 1958, $1,500,000.

Magazines Get Cheap Postal Rates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM LANGER

OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me on the postal rates for magazines.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, for many years, the publishers of Life magazine have been getting away with murder on postal rates. In 1947 and 1948 when I was chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee they offered to increase their rates 10 percent for 3 consecutive years. This was refused because the record showed that they should pay a great deal more. Some of these magazines charged as much as $40,000 a page for advertising.

That they are making a terrific amount of money is shown by the following report on Time and Life magazines to the stockholders on January 16, 1957:

"The most important thing about the year is that 1956 was the best year that Time, Inc., and its magazines ever enjoyed. We estimate our net profit for the year 1956 at approximately $6.75 per share (exclusive of the capital gains on the liquidation of our Houston Oil Co. stock) as compared with $4.72 per share in 1955. * * * A historical footnote to our special letter of 19 years ago: We believe that the level of earnings attained by Life in 1956 has never been equaled by any other magazine in the history of publishing. * * * In early December we announced jointly with Rockefeller Center, Inc., our proposed joint venture for the construction of a new 47-story building adjacent to the Center which will house our future operations and provide several of the country's largest corporations with what we believe will be the finest office space available in New York City for the coming years."

The raising of postal rates to these magazines has been far, far, far too long delayed. The taxpayers are stuck millions of dollars a year to pay these postal rates for these magazines, and there isn't any earthly reason why they should not pay their way as does any other business.

I hope that when we meet in January it will be the first order of business on the part of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to get these rates adjusted and save the taxpayers some money.

Statement on Majority Report, Judiciary Antitrust Subcommittee No. 5, Regarding Regulated Airlines

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OREN HARRIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, for years our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has given careful and constant attention to the problems of aviation. The act of 1938 was a most carefully prepared legislative program for the development of aviation to meet the needs of our country.

The act contains a declaration of Congressional policy which authorizes, directs, and charges the Civil Aeronautics Board with the responsibility of (a) the encouragement and development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the present and future needs of the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States, of the Postal Service, and of the national defense; (b) the regulation of air transportation in such manner as to recognize and preserve the inherent advantages of, assure the highest degree of safety in, and foster sound economic conditions in, such transportation, and to improve the relations between, and coordinate transportation by air carriers, as being in the public interest and in accordance with public convenience and necessity.

During these 20 years, tremendous developments in the field of aviation have resulted.

We have experienced progress in this field of transportation almost beyond comprehension. We have seen our commercial aviation program exceed the progress of most any other field in history. We have watched the dawn of a new age with jets, electronic devices, in air navigation aids, unmatched by anything in our experience. This progress and development has resulted under the act of 1938, providing regulatory procedure for commercial aviation attributing to the national defense and in cooperation with communication, advancement as a necessary entity to this program.

With the transition which our committee has followed closely in these past few years, we have observed some highly complicated and difficult problems. Mistakes have been made and, no doubt, there have been errors of judgment. With such fantastic developments in this field, trial and error process is necessary. Millions and millions of dollars of the taxpayers have gone into this development which has provided us with the difference between victory and defeat in the recent wars and perhaps our own preservation instead of destruction.

Even so in this regulatory field, close scrutiny is necessary by the regulatory agencies and with added consideration of any legislative changes to meet this fast-moving program. I would like to call attention to the recent report of our Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce filed with the House, House Report No. 1272, on some of these problems and the approaches being made to them. We shall continue to give the multiplicity of problems our closest and careful consideration to meet these ever-developing problems.

And, because, Mr. Speaker, of the intricacies involved in the development of this service in our transportation requirements and the monopolistic features which accompany any regulated industry, antitrust considerations cannot be overlooked if the public is to be adequately protected.

In consideration of this important problem, I am constrained to refer to the report of the Antitrust Subcommittee—Subcommittee No. 5—of the great Committee on the Judiciary, issued on April 5, 1957. This report was apparently issued to the Committee on the Judiciary by the subcommittee but was not submitted as a House report.

In view of the responsibilities of the committee on antitrust problems, and particularly the overlapping considerations of our own Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have read the report with much interest.

This report is the result of extensive hearings of the subcommittee during the 84th Congress. It purports to be a rather full and complete inquiry, which, in my opinion, goes far beyond the monopolistic features and antitrust considerations. It is for this reason that I feel constrained to make these comments about it.

In many respects, the report contains constructive considerations, proper and appropriate within its jurisdiction. In other respects, the committe has gone, in my opinion, beyond its scope, and it is with some of these considerations which I feel constrained to take exceptions.

I cannot agree with the majority report concerning the subcommittee's investigation of commercial air transport. There is much in the voluminous report restating fundamental antitrust principles with which I am, of course, in agreement. Where I must depart from the complete report, however, is in regard to numerous conclusions and voluminous detail which I do not find fully supported by the record compiled in the subcommittee's hearing, or which are characterized by a one-sidedness failing accurately or fairly to reflect the whole record.

A comprehensive record consisting of four volumes compiled from that subcommittee's hearings was published and available for study by interested Members of the Congress for more than 6 months. From my own interest in the future welfare of this Nation's commercial air transport systems, I was not only shocked and surprised at the majority's report, purporting to be drawn from that record, but in my opinion from reading the hearings and from my personal knowledge of the facts, the report was issued in substantial disregard for the actual record, and exceeded the authorized purposes for the subcommittee's concerning itself with the aviation field.

I firmly believe in the essential policies and purposes of our antitrust laws to prevent monopoly, restraint of trade, and unfair or deceptive competitive practices to which the subcommittee should properly give its attention under its jurisdiction. Such policies and purposes should be applied to regulated industries to the maximum extent, with exceptions permissible only where other controlling public and national interest considerations are paramount. Where deficiencies in the effectiveness of antitrust policies are found to exist either in the regulatory statute or in its administration by the agency responsible, appropriate corrective measures should be taken. If the statute is deficient from an antitrust standpoint, legislation is in order. If not the statute but its administration by the agency charged with the responsibility therefor has been inadequate, remedial legislation or other guidance by the Congress are among the available remedies.

From the subcommittee's investigation of commercial air transport, apparently no major or glaring deficiencies in the regulatory statutes as such appear to have been developed. The Civil Aeronautics Act of 1938, by specific provisions in sections 2, 403, 404, 408, 409, 411, 412, 1002 (d) and (e) and 1107, among others, makes basic antitrust principles specifically applicable to commercial air transportation.

Furthermore, in view of the original developmental and promotional as well as regulatory purposes of that act, and the grant of grandfather certification by direction of the Congress to airline entities and route patterns as they existed at the time of enactment of such act, irrespective of whatever early Government policies may have accounted for their origins, development, and existence by that time, I find no record support or legitimate purpose for the subcommittee's now undertaking, retrospectively at such late date, to criticize phenomena in the early origins of this industry antedating the Civil Aeronautics Act. Much of the historic discussion seems to stem from sources foreign to this subcommittee's record. For example, alleged secret meetings and spoils conferences involving the Post Office Department during some time prior to enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act were not matters covered in the subcommittee's hearings. If they were to be of sufficient concern to require review by this subcommittee, appropriate hearings would first be in order. Otherwise conclusions in this report drawn in reliance upon outside sources seems to me not appropriate. I assume it to be a fair observation that all elements of the airline industry have endeavored to stimulate support for their particular interests in both the executive and legislative branches of the Government. However, I do not believe this record adequate for concluding that such efforts are an outstanding characteristic of the airline industry in comparison with other types of American businesses, even many of them which are not regulated industries.

Whether the activities permitted or countenanced by the Civil Aeronautics Board in its administration of the regulatory statute thereafter, however, have been in accord with the intent of Congress is quite another matter. It is this subject, insofar as of antitrust import, to which concern of the House Judiciary Subcommittee properly may be directed. The comparatively recent origin of the air transport industry and phenomena which have accompanied it in what is still a developmental stage are circumstances which would lead me to oppose recommendations at this time for any precipitous action. It is my belief that the report proposed from the subcommittee's inquiry has given inadequate attention to at least three important factors:

First. The report does not adequately analyze or treat the extent to which interplay of congressionally directed policies and purposes set forth in the regulatory statute properly may have required relegation of some antitrust concepts in specific instances to positions of inferior importance. As I read the Civil Aeronautics Act, and as it appears to have been interpreted by the Civil Aeronautics Board and the courts, antitrust principles are included in public interest concepts along with a variety of others, the relative importance of which in a given situation has been entrusted for determination by the Civil Aeronautics Board subject to review by higher authority. The report, however, fails to consider as I think it should, whatever weight the Civil Aeronautics Board properly may have given to other policies and purposes necessary for promotion and development of a sound air transportation industry in the interests of best serving the foreign and domestic commerce, the Postal Service and the national defense of the United States.

Nor does the report consider the importance of continuously decreasing cost to the American taxpayer through reduction of subsidies. For example, the proposed report implies that absence of competition, consummation of mergers, establishment of uniform standards under Civil Aeronautics Board approved machinery and other cooperative working arrangements among airlines must be condemned per se. This, to me, represents a rather superficial concern with only one criterion of public interest as defined in the Civil Aeronautics Act. From the record of the subcommittee's hearings, I am not in position to reach firm convictions as to the adequacy of the Civil Aeronautics Board's exercise of its responsibilities in all situations. However, I feel that the conclusions drawn in the report are unjust and perhaps unfounded, unless examination is undertaken of other reasons for which the Government has countenanced such activities and arrangements within the overall regulatory pattern prescribed for air transportation.

Second. The report contains characterizations in considerable detail and some conclusions which are of a derogatory nature from an antitrust standpoint. I am unable to find adequate support for many of them in the record of the subcommittee's hearings, and others I find specifically disproved by the record.

Third. Numerous items commented on in the report appear to me to constitute irrelevancies going beyond the subject of appropriate concern by the subcommittee and prejudicial to the agencies, organizations or companies to which they are related. Similarly, the report is deficient in failing to mention or properly evaluate countervailing evidence weighing upon a variety of disputed issues.

In the interests of brevity, I do not propose in this statement to deal with each detail concerning which my views of the record are in agreement with or dissent from the report.

I do not find record support in these hearings to the effect that the basic techniques of regulatory bodies are necessarily anticompetitive in nature.

As respects Government regulation of air transportation, I am in full accord with the principle that where actions taken pursuant to administrative approval receive specific exemption from prosecution under the antitrust laws, regulatory officials must still make an independent determination as to what weight is to be given to competitive standards in promulgating regulations or approving industry accords. The same is and should be true in licensing under the Civil Aeronautics Act.

The intended role of competition is, in my opinion, adequately covered in the Civil Aeronautics Act, the very terms of which clearly illustrate that Congress has combined conflicting economic policies and has required the Civil Aeronautics Board to exercise its authority so as to accommodate all such policies, determining whichever must be regarded as paramount in weighing the public interest in any given situation under the Board's jurisdiction.

It is for these reasons, together with the scope of the subcommittee's record that I regard generic criticism of other statutes and agencies administering them as irrelevant to and not a proper subject for discussion in this report.

In the subcommittee's discussion of the role of competition in air transportation over the years since enactment of the Civil Aeronautics Act, I must register firm objection to detailed reference to and quotations from those identified with only one side of a contention, and summary dismissal of extensive presentations, analyses, and record data on the other side. The weight and importance of this evidence are, in my opinion, understated merely by commenting: "These allegations were vigorously contested by the representatives from the certified air carriers who also testified at the hearing." The report, I feel, is deficient in not setting forth and weighing the reasons, argument, and data submitted in such vigorous contest. It is from such examples as this that I find a basic onesidedness reflected throughout the entire report.

I infer from the report the definite implication that failure by the Civil Aeronautics Board earlier to authorize new competitive air services automatically must be viewed as a disservice to the public interest. I do not believe such implications sustainable in disregard of whatever other considerations and circumstances may have contributed to the Board's various decisions. The Board's decisions are also guided by desire to avoid uneconomic duplication of or multiple service in markets of limited traffic opportunity and consequently avoiding adverse effect on Government subsidy requirements. Certainly I am not, nor do I believe the subcommittee was upon that record, in any position to reach conclusions as to overall propriety of route patterns established by the Board unless the subcommittee were to undertake more critical analysis of the stated reasons for the Board's actions and the detailed record upon which a particular decision by the Board was reached. This the report does not do. The record before the subcommittee explains, but the report does not mention, the Board's efforts to transform the operations of certain grandfather carriers from their original character of subsidized local and feeder services into self-sufficient trunk line operations. An alternate choice for the Board would have been to forever confine such pioneer grandfather carriers to their original subsidized status and open up the more lucrative long-haul markets to newcomers. Whether in retrospect the Board's choice in any such instance provided the greater protection of the public interest, I am not prepared to say, but from the record I do not believe that the subcommittee is entitled to arbitrary acceptance of the adverse view.

In my opinion the discussions devoted to the Air Transport Association, the International Air Transport Association, carrier relationships with those entrusted with dealing with the public as their authorized agents, and the extent of Civil Aeronautics Board control over such matters, are characterized by a onesidedness not representing a fair evaluation of the whole record.

Upon the basis of the record, I am unable to fully agree with the manner and detail in which the report deals with Pan American World Airways, Inc. I do not believe that the report accurately analyzes the intensely competitive atmosphere in which international air services are now operated or the competitive positions of carriers operating in those fields.

Moreover, by adopting the technique of accepting as fact a variety of accusations made in years past against Pan American by its competitors, and failing to give weight to the testimony and other evidence submitted by Pan American, the report, in my opinion, leaves misleading impressions.

No weight is given to a statement submitted by Pan American calling the subcommittee's attention to the fact that a collection of attacks against Pan American accumulated over the years, long since had been examined into and thoroughly aired in adversary proceedings before the Civil Aeronautics Board. This is borne out by the North Atlantic Route Transfer case in which the Civil Aeronautics Board's assistant chief examiner weighed the full record on many of these matters in 1949, and found:

> These charges lose much of their significance and color when the testimony is read * * *.
> There are some incidents * * * where the acts of Pan American * * * can hardly be described as gracious to their competitors. For that matter, it is a rare matter to find any airline extending itself to welcome competition in its territory, so Pan American's attitude on that point is not unusual. However, the testimony does show that there were two sides to most of the controversies and incidents and it does not prove the charges, many of which have been made on numerous occasions * * *.
>
> * * * there is no occasion for considering the imposition of conditions (upon the North Atlantic route transfer) unless it should be concluded that the transaction as presented will not be consistent with the public interest, but will result in creating a monopoly or monopolies and thereby restrain competition and jeopardize another air carrier not a party to the purchase. On the basis of the evidence of record and the contentions and arguments of the parties, and all the foregoing considerations, the examiner cannot so find.

I cannot find that any new evidence was presented before the subcommittee to support any reason or basis for disputing the correctness of the above findings.

It is for these reasons that I do not feel that Pan American World Airways, Inc., has received the judicious treatment in the report that it or any other responsible business enterprise or private citizen should receive.

I would assume, and the Congress should expect, that the Civil Aeronautics Board will continue to regard consideration of antitrust policies as essential to its guardianship of the public interest in the maintenance and further development of sound United States-flag air-transport systems. However, I do not believe that the character of the majority report of the Judiciary Subcommittee makes any substantial contribution toward those ends; yet, I think it has done a great disservice to the elements of the airline industry with which it chose to deal.

St. Benedict's Abbey in Atchison, Kans., Celebrates 100th Anniversary

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. AVERY

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, during the month of August the St. Benedict's Abbey in Atchison, Kans., celebrated its 100th anniversary. Today the Abbey has more than 165 monks but it had only 2 when established at Doniphan, Kans., near Atchison, in April 1857.

In the early 1870's, the struggling monastery fought for its very existence because of drought, grasshopper plagues, and loans at 12 percent. The Benedictine monks overcame the obstacles and today operate St. Benedict's, a college of arts and sciences for more than 600 men, and Maur Hill High School for 210 students.

The combination of financial circumstances that almost terminated the history of St. Benedict's Abbey in the 1870's included the depression after the panic in 1873, the Kansas grasshopper plagues in 1874 and the following years, and debts that the monks incurred in maintaining a frontier college and a crops of priest-missionaries who rode many circuits tending the spiritual needs of settlers.

The Atchison Daily Globe newspaper on August 11, presented a special St. Benedict's centennial section. Among the many excellent articles was the following concerning the work of the monks:

> The Atchison monks have given a century of service to God in working with people of the Middle West. Their story begins on the steamboat landing at Doniphan, Kansas Territory, in April 1857, when two monks of St. Vincent's Abbey, Latrobe, Pa., arrived to open a priory there. They were the Reverend Augustine Wirth, O. S. B., the prior, and a seminarian ready to be ordained, the Reverend Casimir Seitz, O. S. B. Another Benedictine had been in Doniphan the year before—the Reverend Henry Lemke, O. S. B. He had built the first Catholic church there and had begged his abbot at Latrobe to open a priory there.
>
> The Benedictine monks on the frontier served the settlers in two ways, as missionaries and as teachers. In 1857 Prior Augustine opened a school at Doniphan. In October 1859, less than a year after he had removed the priory to Atchison, 6 miles south on the Missouri River, he opened St. Benedict's College.
>
> But the small band of Kansas monks made their biggest contribution in the frontier years by a saddle apostolate — the settlers. Quickly they developed three missionary circuits: the first a chain of stations in Atchison and Doniphan counties, the second a string of towns upwards along the Missouri River into Nebraska Territory, and the third a line of Catholic settlements on or near the road to Fort Kearney and the West.
>
> An early superior of the Atchison Benedictines became bishop of the old Leavenworth diocese. He was the Reverend Louis Mary Fink, O. S. B., who after 2 years as prior in Atchison was named by Pope Pius IX in 1870 to be coadjutor to Bishop John Baptist Miege, S. J., Vicar Apostolic of the Kansas Vicariate. Bishop Fink succeeded Miege when the latter resigned in 1874.
>
> In April 1876, St. Benedict's priory at Atchison was raised to the status of an abbey by papal act, and in September the monks elected a Benedictine of Latrobe, the Reverend Innocent Wolf, O. S. B., as their first abbot. He held office until a second abbot, the Reverend Martin Veth, O. S. B., was elected November 10, 1921. The present—the third—abbot of St. Benedict's, the Right Reverend Cuthbert McDonald, O. S. B., was elected July 6, 1943, to succeed Abbot Veth, then in his last illness.

Abbott Cuthbert carries out his many duties in a most commendable manner. He is dedicated to the service of God. He manages the business affairs of the monastic community and the college with professional efficiency. So far in his 14 years as superior, two residence halls, and a new abbey church have been constructed. Abbott Cuthbert and the fathers of the abbey are to be commended on the pioneering and progress which has been recorded. They can point with pride to their courageous heritage.

Four special dates in August marked the official observance of the founding of the monastery. All of the events took place in the new abbey church. The official opening of the St. Benedict's centennial year was coordinated with the first religious ceremony in the new church.

On August 11, the Benedictines set aside the day as Atchison Day, so that their many friends in Atchison and the Atchison populace could see the new church. On that day, Father Abbott Cuthbert McDonald blessed the church and sang a pontifical high Mass with Archbishop Edward Hunkler, Kansas City, Kans., preaching the sermon. Some 4,000 persons visited the church during the blessing ceremony and for the tours following.

On August 16, over 500 Catholic Sisters from northeast Kansas and 5 bordering States formed the choir at a mass sung by Abbott Cuthbert and were then dinner guests of the abbey in the college gymnasium.

On August 28, 30 Benedictine and Trappist abbots from the United States and Canada consecrated—simultaneously—30 minor altars of the new abbey church. Each abbot had some 5 or 6 assistants, which meant that approximately 180 persons were involved in the religious ceremony.

This is believed to be the largest multiple-altar consecration ceremony in the history of the Roman Catholic Church in North America.

On the following day, August 29, the apostolic delegate to the United States, the Most Reverend Amleto G. Cicognani, Washington, D. C., celebrated a pontifical high Mass which culminated the opening centennial activities. This day was set aside for out-of-town guests. An overflow crowd of former Atchison residents, relatives of monks, and graduates of St. Benedict's College attended.

My congratulations and best wishes to the reverend fathers of St. Benedict's. Through the years they have clearly demonstrated their faith in God and the future of America.

A Report to the People of Berks County

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE M. RHODES

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. RHODES of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, as has been my custom in years past, I take this opportunity of reporting to my constituents, the people of Berks County, the 14th Congressional District of Pennsylvania.

PURPOSE OF REPORT

This report deals with the work and the record of the first session of the 85th Congress. It summarizes my activities during the past year and the position I have taken on important issues in the Congress.

During the session, I have made weekly radio reports and have written a report for the weekly newspapers of Berks County. This printed report supplements the weekly radio broadcasts and news columns so that all citizens of Berks County may have the opportunity to know my legislative record and the record of the Congress as a whole.

REPRESENTATION

As a Representative of the people of Berks County in the Congress, I have made every effort to serve to the best of my ability. The views of every person who has written me on legislative issues have been afforded full consideration. Individual problems of constituents have been promptly handled. Every possible effort has been made to be of assistance to those persons who have come to my office for information, advice, or service. Again in the first session of the 85th Congress, I was present for every rollcall vote.

READING OFFICE

My office in the Reading Post Office Building has been open 6 days a week for the convenience of constituents who have problems or who wish to present their views and suggestions. I have spent every other weekend in Reading during the session and have fulfilled numerous appointments with constituents who called at my office.

WASHINGTON VISITS

An increased number of school groups, religious organizations, women's clubs, Boy and Girl Scout groups have come to Washington this year and visited me in the Capitol. With the help of Mrs. Rhodes, I have tried to make these visits interesting, educational, and enjoyable.

COMMITTEE WORK

During the 35th Congress I have served on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and the Committee on House Administration. The Commerce Committee has wide jurisdiction over matters pertaining to transportation, communications, health, science, and research. I am also a member of the Health and Science Subcommittee. Last February I served as chairman of a special committee which was named to represent the Commerce Committee at a meeting of deans and directors of schools of public health, held in San Juan, P. R.

My views on pending legislation were presented to other committees of the House and Senate on such subjects as railroad retirement, postal rates, assistance to the handicapped, civil-service retirement, postal pay, and tax exemption on nonprofit community swimming pool associations.

BILLS INTRODUCED

I have sponsored legislation to raise income-tax exemptions to $800, establish a Bureau of Older Persons, reduce the retirement age under social security, establish an agency to assist the handicapped, reduce small-business tax rates, stabilize employment in the textile industry, and to increase railroad retirement benefits. Other bills I have introduced would curb arbitrary cancellation of health, accident, and hospitalization insurance, prohibit destruction of the National Grange headquarters, grant tax deductions to handicapped persons, provide grants to schools of public health, liberalize public-assistance provisions of the Social Security Act, and limit subsidies paid to second-class mail users.

CONGRESSIONAL DEBATE

I have taken part in important debates on the floor of the House on such issues as postal rates, public-health funds, pension increases for Spanish-American War widows, exemption of nonprofit swimming-pool groups from Federal excise taxes, and providing additional wheat-acreage allotments for feed grain use on the farm.

CONSERVATIVE COALITION

A coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats was again a dominant force in the 85th Congress. This coalition succeeded in blocking or weakening many important measures which minority liberal Members of Congress considered essential.

LEGISLATIVE RECORD OF THE 85TH CONGRESS

The 85th Congress took an important step forward in enacting civil-rights legislation but failed to act favorably or to act at all on other important issues necessary to meet successfully the challenge of automation, abundance, and surpluses.

The average citizen did not properly share in the prosperity created by increased production, scientific and technical advances. Those of us who wanted to channel some of this prosperity to aged, retired, disabled, and handicapped citizens were in a minority.

Listed below are some of the important proposals which came before the 85th Congress.

COST OF LIVING—HARD MONEY POLICIES

The cost of living has gone up each month during the past year to a new record high. Inflation is particularly hard on retired persons and others living on fixed incomes since it reduces the amount of goods and services which they can afford. The American dollar today is worth less than ever before in our history.

The administration's monetary and fiscal policies have not stopped inflation. Many Members of Congress and recognized economic experts have been critical of these policies as the cause of the inflationary trend. The national debt has risen by $8 billion during the past 4 years; the Federal budget is the largest single peace time budget in our history. Interest rates which the Government must pay are now at their highest level since the depression years of the 1930's. In Federal taxes alone this costs the people an additional billion dollars a year. This has also raised interest rates on private borrowing to a similar record high, making it difficult for small businesses to expand, increasing costs of home-buying, automobile financing, and other consumer time-purchasing transactions. It has also increased costs of local governments in the issuance of bonds to finance new schools, streets, sewers, and other public improvements.

TAX REDUCTION

No tax cut was considered in the first session. But next January the House Ways and Means Committee will begin consideration of ways to reduce income taxes. Among the plans to be considered is my proposal to increase the exemption for taxpayers and dependents from $600 to $800. This would give substantial tax savings to the great majority of American taxpayers in the low and middle income brackets. It would put additional purchasing power into the hands of people and will contribute substantially to business activity and economic progress.

RETIREMENT LEGISLATION

Bills to increase benefits under the Railroad Retirement and Civil Service Retirement Acts made progress this year, but did not receive final approval before adjournment. Hearings were held on both measures, at which time I presented statements in support of an increase in benefits needed to offset the rising cost of living. There is a strong possibility that this legislation, which has my support, will be favorably acted on early in the next session.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Congress did nothing in this important field, despite the fact that rising costs cut the living level of retired persons receiving social-security benefits. At the end of 1956 more than 9 million persons in the United States were receiving old-age and survivors' insurance benefits. Over 18,000 of these persons reside in Berks County.

More than 73 million American wage earners are now covered. If death should take the family breadwinner, the mothers and children of 9 out of 10 families would be eligible for survivors' benefits.

Under amendments enacted last year, totally disabled individuals are now eligible for full benefits at age 50. However, rigid interpretation of the new disability provisions has denied many thousands of Americans of these benefits.

Much remains to be done to make the social-security program fully adequate in meeting the needs of our retired and disabled folks. The rising cost of living makes an increase in the benefits an urgent necessity. The retirement age for both men and women should be lowered to age 62 and 60, respectively. Disability benefits should be paid immediately upon disability, regardless of age. I am sponsoring legislation to make these improvements in the law.

Congress enacted a law to extend for another year the time limits for disabled persons to file applications for disability freeze to preserve their rights to old-age, survivors', and disability insurance.

LIBERAL DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM

I joined a group of northern and western liberal Democratic Members of Congress in offering a positive legislative program to meet the needs and challenges of our modern civilization.

Our program calls for tax reform, improved social security, aid to small business, strengthening of the antitrust laws, school construction, civil rights, improved utilization and conservation of our natural resources, a positive foreign policy, an adequate and modern national defense, expanded health and research, public-works projects, and an improved and realistic farm program.

All of these objectives cannot be achieved in one session or in one Congress. They are the types of programs which we feel are necessary to the long-range welfare of the American people. Progress on some of these measures has been made during the past session. On others, we have received setbacks. Considering the conservative makeup of the present Congress, I feel that our progress has been encouraging.

We will continue to work for this type of liberal and progressive program.

FARM LEGISLATION

Many farmers are being caught in the squeeze between rising living costs and declining farm income. They have not shared well in the Nation's increased production and wealth.

A bill which will benefit Berks farmers had my active support. It permits farmers to grow up to 30 acres of wheat for feed, without being subject to penalty under the acreage-allotment program. The new law was backed by Berks farm organizations.

Congress increased funds for the farm surplus disposal program, under which we trade our farm commodities for foreign currencies. These, in turn, are used to purchase strategic materials and to bolster their economies.

A limitation of $3,000 was placed on soil-bank acreage reserve payments, while conservation reserve payments were limited to $5,000 per farm unit. These limitations were enacted as a result of abuses of soil-bank payments among large corporation farms in the West. One such farm received $209,000 for not planting crops last year. The new law corrects this unwarranted situation.

CIVIL RIGHTS

For the first time in 82 years a civil-rights bill has been passed by Congress. It is a compromise measure, designed to protect the voting rights of all citizens. It also establishes a Commission on Civil Rights and a Civil Rights Section in the Justice Department. The measure is an important step forward on civil rights; it received my full support.

VETERANS

Legislation was enacted to increase by an average of 10 percent the rates of compensation for veterans suffering service-connected disabilities. Allowances for dependents of these veterans were also increased. This meritorious bill had my full support.

I spoke and voted for a House-passed bill to increase the pensions of Spanish-American War widows to $75 a month; the Senate failed to act on the measure this year. No action has yet been taken on World War I widows' pension legislation. Legislation to incorporate the Veterans of World War I made progress in the Judiciary Committee and is expected to come before the House next session.

An amendment to the Social Security Act permits disabled veterans to draw both service-connected disability compensation from the VA and social-security disability benefits without any reduction.

CONSERVATION

Conservationists in Congress turned back a powerful attack on the water pollution control program. Under the guise of economy, funds to provide grants to States to build sewage-treatment plants were first eliminated from the appropriation bill. They were finally restored on a rollcall vote. I voted for the grants, which are needed to control pollution to safeguard the public health and prevent destruction of fish in our rivers and streams.

GOVERNMENT FISCAL PROBE

The Senate Finance Committee began an extensive investigation of the administration's monetary and fiscal policies, including such problems as hard money, high interest rates, inflation, the public debt, and the budget.

It has already been disclosed that these policies had benefited big speculators and financial interests and seriously hurt small business, farmers, retired folks, professional and industrial workers.

POSTAL RATE INCREASE

The House passed the bill increasing first-class postal rates from 3 to 4 cents and making increases in second- and third-class rates. My amendment to limit publisher's subsidies to $100,000 for any one year was adopted by the House. I feel that it is unfair to require the average citizen to pay more for his letter postage unless subsidies to big magazine publishers, which now amount to as much as $9½ million a year for one publication, are substantially reduced.

This legislation is now in the Senate committee where it will be considered next session.

NATURAL GAS

A bill to exempt producers of natural gas from effective Federal regulation is again before the Congress. Vetoed last year after oil lobbyists attempted to bribe a Senator, the bill was again pushed through committee. Final action was put off until next session. I am opposed to the bill, because it is special-interest legislation which would cost the American gas-consuming public hundreds of millions of dollars in higher gas rates.

HOUSING

Increased grants for slum clearance and urban-renewal programs were authorized by Congress in the 1957 Housing Act. The Walnut Street redevelopment and parking project in Reading was approved by Federal housing officials during the year.

Downpayment requirements on FHA-insured homes were lowered after much administration reluctance. FHA interest rates were raised again, costing home buyers many additional millions of dollars a year.

The new housing measure failed to provide for special housing for elderly folks, a program for which I have been working.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT RACKETEERING PROBE

A special Senate subcommittee has conducted lengthy hearings on improper activities in the labor-management field. The AFL–CIO has moved to expel labor leaders whose actions have been contrary to the best interests of their membership. The hearings will continue in the next session.

Legislation to require more strict regulation of union welfare funds has been considered by various Congressional committees but no final action was taken in the first session.

SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

Legislation to provide Federal assistance to States in building school classrooms to meet critical shortages was blocked in the House by a coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats by a narrow margin of 5 votes.

Although the President said he favored school-construction legislation, he gave it little positive support in the crucial stages. Three of his top four House leaders voted to kill the school bill, along with 108 other Republicans; I joined 125 other Democrats in voting for the school bill. The fate of school-construction legislation in the next session is now in doubt.

ATOMIC ENERGY AND POWER DEVELOPMENT

Congress provided funds for the construction of three atomic-power reactors by the Atomic Energy Commission.

The Niagara River project was approved by Congress authorizing the construction of a hydroelectric power project by the New York State Power Authority. Power generated will be divided between private utilities and municipally owned public utilities and cooperatives. Pennsylvania and other nearby States will share 10 percent of the power.

NONPROFIT SWIMMING POOLS

My bill to exempt dues and fees paid to nonprofit community swimming pools from the 20-percent Federal excise tax has passed the House as part of a broad excise-tax-revision measure. These pools serve a useful purpose in the community in providing healthy recreational facilities for children and young people.

Repeal of the tax would stimulate the growth of these nonprofit pool organizations throughout the country. The Senate is expected to act on my proposal in the next session.

DISTRESSED LABOR AREAS

Senate hearings were held on legislation to provide assistance to areas of our country suffering from chronic unemployment and severe economic distress. No action was taken in the House committee. I strongly favor this legislation and will continue to work for its enactment in the next session.

HEALTH AND HANDICAPPED

Funds for medical research were increased by the 85th Congress, assuring a continuation of the fight against heart disease, cancer, mental illness and other major diseases. Vocational rehabilitation programs to assist mentally retarded children, the blind, deaf, and other handicapped individuals were also extended. Legislation to assist in the training of job placement personnel to assist handicapped persons made progress in committee.

As a member of the Health and Science Subcommittee, I introduced and worked for legislation to improve our public health facilities and to help the handicapped achieve a happier and more productive way of life.

Our subcommittee held hearings on the potential dangers to the public from the use of untested chemical additives in food and other products. Legislation to require more extensive testing before these additives are approved by the Food and Drug Administration is pending before our group.

FOREIGN POLICY

Congress approved President Eisenhower's request for a Middle Eastern doctrine to discourage further Communist aggression. Some $200 million in military and economic aid funds for Middle Eastern countries was approved by Congress. Yet the Soviet threat continues to grow in that part of the world.

Congress ratified United States membership in the International Atomic Energy Agency to promote the peaceful uses of atomic energy for the good of mankind.

The mutual-security program was extended by Congress after reducing the administration's original fund request. A long-term economic loan program was authorized, along with funds for military aid, direct economic aid, and technical assistance programs.

In disarmament talks between the United States, Britain, France, and Russia, efforts have been made to limit the production of nuclear and hydrogen weapons. No tangible results of disarmament conferences have yet been forthcoming.

GOVERNMENT FISCAL POLICIES

President Eisenhower submitted to Congress the largest peacetime budget in our history. Congress cut the budget by over $5 billion, while, in the meantime, the administration instructed all Government agencies to hold fiscal 1958 expenditures to the fiscal 1957 levels.

Administration leaders themselves differed sharply over the size and necessity of recommended programs. I voted for reductions of the budget in areas where it was clear that the public welfare was not endangered. I opposed drastic cuts in the fields of public health, research, education, and other programs essential to the well-being of our people.

DEFENSE PROCUREMENT POLICIES

Procurement policies of the Defense Department have continued to favor large companies over their small-business competitors. Over 90 percent of defense contracts have been awarded without competitive bidding, contrary to sound public policy. The small-business share of defense prime contracts has now dropped to a record low.

MONTHLY NEWSLETTER

During the next session it is my plan to issue a newsletter summarizing Congressional activity each month. If you would be interested in receiving this newsletter, write your name and address on a post card and mail it to me at 1640 House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C.

AVAILABLE FOR MEETINGS

In a brief report such as this it is not possible to discuss in detail the issues before Congress. I welcome the opportunity to appear before any group in Berks County to speak and answer questions on the work of this session. Contact my Reading office with any such requests or on any other matter in which you may be interested.

A Report to the People on the 1st Session of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED E. SANTANGELO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, as the first year of the 85th Congress comes to a close, I wish to report to the people whom I am privileged to represent in the 18th Congressional District of New York. This first session, which lasted from January 3, 1957, to August 30, 1957, was the longest in the last 25 years. Much has been accomplished, much has been left undone, and analysts who demand clear-cut verdicts will be disappointed.

The major drives of this session were to economize, to reduce expenditures without impairing our defenses, and to forge a civil-rights bill. The major legislation dealt with civil rights, the mutual-security program, the revision of the immigration law, postal rate and pay increases, pay increases for classified employees, aid to stimulate private housing, aid to school construction, the Middle East doctrine, the protection of the FBI files, and, of course, the money appropriations to run the governmental agencies.

This session has rejected some of the President's proposals, but some of the Presidential defeats, as, for example, in the death of the school-aid bill, were caused largely by members of his own party and were compounded by his occasional lack of enthusiastic leadership. While everybody seemed to like Ike, no one knew for certain what Ike liked. Perhaps, the President's lack of influence with his party rests with the fact that under the Constitution this is his last term. Of necessity, therefore, the President had to appeal to bipartisan support to offset the alliance between southern Democratic conservatives and Republicans. This bipartisan support prevented the runaway economy movement and held the cuts to $5 billion where, in the beginning, it appeared that the total reduction might run about $10 billion.

As a first-term Congressman, I have taken a keen interest in the debate and, on many occasions, participated.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The civil rights legislation which was considered and passed was arrived at after many skirmishes and compromises. The results did not fully satisfy those who demanded a strong civil rights bill nor did the final measure please those who sought to limit the measure. Here was an issue, harsh, passionate and highly explosive. Never have I heard greater and more inspiring oratory on any subject matter. This issue divided the Democratic Party. On this basic civil-rights bill, the President neither wholly won nor wholly lost. The Deep South, the anti-civil-rights section of the country, was not totally defeated or victorious.

After 87 years the Congress finally enacted a measure affecting civil rights. The measure which finally passed protected only the right to vote and had these features: First, created a Federal Civil Rights Commission; second, established a Civil Rights Division within the Department of Justice; third, gave formidable new powers to the Federal Government to protect a single but basic civil right to vote—that is to say, Federal prosecutors are empowered to obtain injunctions with or without the consent of the victim against actual or threatened interference with the right to vote; fourth, gave to the judge in minor instances the discretion to proceed without a jury, but it also gave to the defendant charged with criminal contempt, a procedure whereby he could obtain a jury trial after conviction by a judge for criminal contempt, but imposed a possible increased jail sentence or fine if he selected a trial by jury and was found guilty.

The absolute right to a trial by jury, which was sought as an amendment to the original bill, was defeated in the House, but was passed by the Senate and finally compromised in the final bill.

I was happy to participate in the debate on this bill affecting human rights and the right to vote. I voted for the final bill and against the amendment in the House which would require a jury trial when a defendant was in contempt of court.

MIDDLE EAST DOCTRINE AND FOREIGN AID

The first great issue to confront Congress was the Middle East crisis. The President on January 5, asked the Senate and House to support him in an unusual enterprise, a joint Executive-Congressional proclamation pledging this country to use its military forces to keep peace in the Middle East. He also requested unrestricted authority to spend up to $200 million in already appropriated foreign-aid funds for special projects in the Middle East. This program would assist those countries that were or might become friends of the democracies.

This approach heralded and signaled a turning point in the President's foreign policy relationship with Congress. Heretofore, Congress had responded quickly, but not this year. After lengthy and bitter debate, which many Congressmen questioned the wisdom and effectiveness of the Eisenhower doctrine, the House approved the resolution. The Senate refused to follow blindly and after 2 months' debate, fixed the ultimate responsibility on the President directly. The Senate refused the President's request for unconditional authorization to use troops as he might see fit and instead proclaimed that the United States was prepared to act militarily if the President should deem it necessary. The House concurred in this resolution 355 to 61 with 188 Democrats, including myself, and 167 Republicans for the measure.

FOREIGN AID

The foreign aid policy received severe scrutiny and cold reappraisal by an economy-minded Congress. The struggle proceeded on two legislative courses. First, on the matter of policy, called authorization, and second, on the matter of money appropriations. The President requested authority to grant long-term economic assistance. The House cut down the Senate authorization of 3 years to 2 years. The House appropriation bill slashed deeply into the estimated funds and provided $2,524,760,000. The House spokesman resisted Presidential and Senate pressures and demonstrated that sufficient funds were still available from former appropriations. The House measure cut 25.4 percent from the estimates. The Senate, at the importunities of the President, sought to increase the appropriation. The final measure was $2,768,760,000 and 18.2 percent cut from the estimates. The outcome was a modified defeat for the administration, but not so severe a defeat as seemed certain from the belligerent atmosphere of the House whose Members were listening to the demands of their voters to reduce governmental spending. I voted for the foreign-aid bill with the reductions. Congress, therefore, cut foreign aid by $1 billion and cut from the defense appropriations for the Army, Navy, and Air Force, $2,368,150,000 out of approximately $36,128,000,000. It was the considered judgment that too much fat was in the estimates for defense and that billions of dollars from last year's appropriations were neither spent nor obligated and were still available for defense spending.

POSTAL RATES AND PAY INCREASES

After lengthy hearings by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, a postal rate increase was approved, subsequently passed by the House, and not acted upon by the Senate. When the chairman refused to call hearings for postal pay raises, a petition was circulated, discharging the committee from further consideration and bringing the pay raise bill to the floor without committee approval. The required 218 signatures were obtained and brought about action by the Post Office Committee to hold hearings. After full hearings an increase of $546 across the board was recommended. The administration opposed the modest increases as inflationary, while it did nothing about rising prices of steel with its concomitant rise of prices of basic commodities, such as refrigerators, stoves, and other articles using steel. Classified employees also clamored for justifiable pay increases, and the Post Office Committee approved a 12-percent increase. I was privileged as a member of the Post Office Committee to fight for pay increases for our postal employees and classified governmental workers who cannot bargain or strike. I participated actively in the debate for decent wages to permit our governmental servants to work in dignity and not labor in debt.

SCHOOL AID

A major disappointment was the defeat of the school construction bill by a close margin of five votes. The House considered a $1½ billion authorization for construction over a period of 5 years as a starter, but because of lack of Republican support, the motion by a southern conservative Democrat to strike out the enacting clause, that is to say to kill the bill, was approved. Among those who voted to kill this bill were ranking Republicans. Despite the importunities of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Marion Folsom, to the President to call Republicans to support the bill, no help came from the White House. One hundred and eleven Republicans and ninety-seven Democrats voted to kill the bill. Despite the Republican platform advocating aid for school construction, this bill was defeated.

In summary, I wish to point out those bills which I supported and which I opposed. I voted for the Mid-East doctrine in the original and in its final form. I supported foreign aid with the cuts. I supported Federal aid to school construction, the protection of civil rights, and the right to vote. I opposed the jury trial amendment to the civil rights bill which would have made impossible the enforcement of the legislation. I voted for aid to small business and aid to private housing. I supported the immigration law which passed the House at the close of the session, which bill, while not completely satisfactory, was a step in the right direction. I voted against postal rate increases because of the unfair provisions against the users of first-class mail while favoring the users of the second class and junk mail. I voted for postal pay and classified employee increases. I voted for the bill for the protection of FBI files from indiscriminate inspection and at the same time would permit a defendant the right to inspect statements by a Government witness if the court determined it would not prejudice the safety of the United States.

Last year while running for Congress, the voters of my district, in response to a questionnaire circulated by me, indicated their viewpoints and preferences. I have voted my conscience with the knowledge of what my contituents desired. It was an honor and a privilege to be a Member of the House of Representatives.

Despite the enforced absence from my five young children, family, and wife, this session was enlightening, stimulating, and pleasant. Many of my burdens and difficulties were eased by an extremely efficient staff in Washington and New York and by the House employees who were always ready to assist and help.

Awarding of Television Station Franchises Important to the Public

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM G. BRAY

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. BRAY. Mr. Speaker, the granting of television station franchises is of great interest not only to the broadcasting industry but also to the general public. The developments which precede such decisions are sometimes lost sight of because they often stretch over a long period of time. The allocations in Indianapolis over a 4-year period can be summed up in the following résumé:

In 1953 there were 6 applicants for the 2 VHF television channels which had been designated for Indianapolis. The applicants for channel 8 were:

First. Crosley Broadcasting Corp.
Second. Television Indianapolis, Inc.
Third. Universal Broadcasting, Inc.

The applicants for channel 13 were:

First. Indianapolis Broadcasting, Inc.
Second. Midwest TV Corp.
Third. WIBC, Inc.

Of the six applicants all but the Crosley Broadcasting Corp. were composed of or dominated by local Indiana people.

Late in 1953 Crosley withdrew its application for channel 8 and applied for channel 13. After the Crosley withdrawal, Television Indianapolis, Inc., dropped its application, which left Universal as the only applicant for channel 8, and this grant was made in December 1953. Subsequent to the withdrawal of Television Indianapolis, Inc., and prior to the grant to Universal, there was a reorganization of Universal Broadcasting, Inc., in which many of the stockholders of Television, Indianapolis, Inc., were brought into Universal.

It is perhaps understandable that some of the stockholders of Television Indianapolis, Inc., would think it wise to drop their application and later to obtain stock in Universal Broadcasting, Inc. It is more difficult to understand why Crosley would drop out of a race with 2 other applicants to enter a race with 3 applicants, each of which was a completely local organization. Playing this long shot proved successful, however, for in March 1957 the FCC, by a 4–3 vote, awarded channel 13 to Crosley.

The awarding of these franchises throughout the country deserves the continued scrutiny of us all. They are not only valuable properties, they are factors of vital importance to the public interest.

Organized Labor Continues Fight To Advance Health of Children

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WAYNE MORSE

OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, in the midst of all the furor in our newspapers and other mediums of public communication over the few members in the ranks of organized labor whose actions have been subject to inquiry and judicial action, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the pioneer work now being done by a much larger and more responsible segment of organized labor in the fight against a terrible and mysterious killer of children which medical science has labeled "cystic fibrosis."

The William Green Memorial Fund committee raised over a million and a quarter dollars to endow philanthropic works as memorials to the late president of the American Federation of Labor, who served with distinction as the head of that great organization from 1924 until his death in 1952 without one single voice ever having been raised to question his honesty and integrity. This memorial fund came from a "head tax" of 1½ cents a member a month for a year—18 cents a member in 1 year if you please—contributed by the international unions. This demonstrates graphically what a great force for good organized labor has been, is at the present time, and will continue to be in the future.

One ordinary rank-and-file member of organized labor here in Washington lost his 9-year-old daughter to this mysterious killer, which is being fought on a national scale by the National Cystic Fibrosis Research Foundation in Philadelphia. He joined the local chapter of the research organization and interested himself in the chapter's work. Last year he made application for a grant from the Green Memorial Foundation to establish a CF clinic to give the extra care to other parents' children that his child did not have. George Meany and the other labor leaders who administer the William Green Memorial fund granted his request and endowed a clinic for cystic fibrosis victims at Children's Hospital in Washington, D. C., with $25,000 which was, incidentally, $5,000 more than he had requested.

There is now operating, at Children's Hospital, the William Green Children's Clinic; conceived, planned, endowed, and supported by organized labor. I have been informed that it is believed to be the first such endowed clinic ever established especially for the diagnosis and treatment of cystic fibrosis.

This disease, which is hereditary, attacks the children with malfunctions of the digestive and respiratory systems, I have been told. While some progress has been made in the past 10 years, including some research at the National Institutes of Health, much still remains to be accomplished to control this disease which medical experts have declared kills more children than any other chronic disease.

I believe that organized labor, which has a magnificent record of service for children, should receive full recognition for this additional piece of good work. It is really pioneering; it is spearheading the assault on this very real danger to the lives of our babies and young children in the Nation; cystic fibrosis.

It is for this reason that I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the action taken by the Washington, D. C., Central Labor Union as it expressed its appreciation for the help which the national AFL–CIO is giving to this great humanitarian work.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Resolved, That we express our appreciation to our parent body, the AFL–CIO, for its encouragement and material help in assisting research and treatment intended to wipe out this scourge of children, cystic fibrosis. This action of our parent body is in line with the services for the health and well-being of all children which has characterized our labor movement from its inception. It is, in a sense, a memorial to those children who have given their lives, we trust not in vain, in order to focus the attention of good men everywhere on this mysterious and merciless killer. We commend the AFL–CIO and urge that similar support be given this movement by State and local federations of labor throughout the Nation.

Foreign Trade and Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN

OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address I delivered before the Foreign Trade Club of the Greater Providence Chamber of Commerce.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, members of the Foreign Trade Club of the Greater Providence Chamber of Commerce, and guests, it is a pleasure for me to be with you here this evening and to be given this opportunity of speaking to you, especially on matters which are of particular interest to your group.
>
> Thomas Macaulay once said: "Man is so inconsistent a creature that it is impossible to reason from his belief to his conduct, or from one part of his belief to another." As evidence of the accuracy of Mr. Macaulay's observation, I offer the following lively example:
>
> Some years ago a public-opinion poll showed that a substantial majority of the people of this country favored the reciprocal trade agreements program. A second poll, conducted at about the same time, revealed that a majority was against lowering tariff barriers to imports of foreign products.
>
> To you people interested in international trade, I need hardly point out that these two polls reflect at least some slight inconsistency in the attitudes of the people of the United States. As a writer, Mr. Macaulay might dismiss this inconsistency with a wave of his pen. A Senator is not in the same situation. He exists, along with ministers and psychiatrists and judges, not only because man is frequently inconsistent with himself but also because there are substantial inconsistencies among men. The Senator's job is largely to understand these inconsistencies and to do what he can to reconcile them through legislation.
>
> The inconsistency in public attitudes toward foreign trade, as reflected in the two polls I mentioned, is the one to which I want to direct your attention tonight. There is little point in ignoring this inconsistency. There is much to be said for recognizing that it exists. There is much more to be said for seeking to deal with it through foreign policy as well as in other ways.
>
> If we examine the implications of the two polls, I believe we find that they add up to this: The people of the United States generally believe that foreign trade is a good and helpful thing for this country. At the same time, many of them have reservations about one aspect of it—imports. They may even approve of that aspect in the abstract, but they are, not infrequently, downright suspicious of it in the specific case. They are suspicious of imports as something which may hurt them or even the country as a whole.
>
> Those of you who are especially interested in this matter will fully appreciate the fact that a foreign trade cannot flourish without both exports and imports. We cannot dismiss the inconsistency to which I referred, however, as merely an attitude of the uninitiated. Some of you who are jewelry manufacturers or textile producers may well share it.
>
> Rather than dismiss it, I believe we ought to try to see what lies beneath the inconsistency. What are the realities of foreign trade which tend to produce it? Why do we both love and hate this trade at the same time?
>
> We can begin, I believe, by noting that foreign trade, as a general proposition, is a good and helpful thing for the country, and most of us recognize it as such. The reasons for this attitude relate directly to the well-being of the Nation. They are to be found on both the export and import sides of the foreign-trade coin.
>
> On the import side, this Nation is consuming various raw materials at a fantastic rate in order to maintain our present high standard of living. Ten percent of these materials now come from abroad, and conservative estimates indicate that this percentage will double by 1975.
>
> Ten percent may not appear to be a very significant proportion of our total raw material requirements. However, if we divide this total into its components, we find that our dependency on imports of certain strategic commodities is very great indeed. At the present time, for example, we import 50 percent or more of our total needs in chromite, tin, manganese, tungsten, wool, cobalt, and bauxite. By 1975, it may well be that copper, lead, and zinc will be added to this list and iron ore will not be far behind.
> In addition to these strategic items, we import substantial amounts of many other products which are highly useful in keeping the wheels of our industrialized society turning. We also obtain from abroad thousands of other products which, while they may not be absolutely essential, certainly serve to add a little extra to the comfort of our lives. Few of us here today, for example, failed to set out this morning without coffee from Latin America or tea from India or Ceylon. Some of us, moreover, find pleasure in a work of art imported from the Orient, Europe, or Africa. Others like to move about the streets in a British or German automobile or on an Italian motor scooter, rather than in a streetcar or on foot. Even though I do happen to be a member of this automotive avant-garde, I can understand the sentiments of one who is a member.

The examples I have cited could be multiplied many times. The point I am trying to make, however, should be clear. It is this: Imports are essential to the highly developed economy of the United States, and they are a significant element in the richness and diversity of our daily life. They are also a substantial factor in employment. One conservative estimate I have seen, places the total number which stem directly from the processing, transporting, and distributing of imports at well over a million jobs.

Public awareness of the importance and benefits of imports—in the sense that I have just been discussing them—is growing in this country. That may be one reason why foreign trade, as a general proposition, is looked upon with increasing favor here. So much for imports.

How about exports? Of course, they have long contributed to building a favorable attitude towards our trade abroad. Except in times of temporary shortages at home or when they take the form of foreign aid, there has been little disagreement on the part of the public as to the desirability of expanding the Nation's exports to the maximum possible extent. This attitude has deep historical roots. You will recall that Congress is expressly forbidden by the Constitution any power to levy a tax or duty on exports.

This favorable attitude toward exports also has a very practical modern application. Exports are a major source of profits and employment. We can obtain some idea of the importance of exports to our prosperity if we consider that over 3 million jobs are directly dependent on the export trade. Our export sales abroad are larger than the sales of the automobile industry in this country. Nearly 11 percent of the production of our soft coal industry is sold abroad; and about 5 percent of our output of synthetic textiles. As for major farm products, more than 25 percent of all the wheat, rice, cotton and hops is exported.

Without export markets many businesses in the United States would be forced to close their doors; others would find themselves with severely curtailed profits. We would be confronted with a widespread unemployment problem. Agricultural surpluses would overwhelm us.

As in the case of imports, so is the case of exports. I could cite hundreds of specific examples of their importance to the national economy. There is neither the time nor the need to do that, especially with you people here this evening.

Let me place this importance, however, in a broader perspective. I suppose that if our foreign trade were suddenly stopped completely—both imports and exports—this country would not collapse in an economic sense, although we would suffer a major dislocation. In time, inventive genius might conceivably develop substitutes for essential commodities which are now imported. We might stimulate production of marginal domestic sources of raw materials, at high cost. We might find substitutes for coffee and tea. People now dependent on foreign trade might find other jobs or other businesses.

While we might survive a drastic change of this kind, one thing is certain. The price of survival without foreign trade would be a sharp drop in our standard of living and the elimination of the so-called extras, which have added variety and flavor to our lives.

What would be to us a major dislocation, would be to other free nations an immediate and unmitigated disaster. Foreign trade, profitable to us, is vital to them. That is especially true of the nations of Western Europe. Without trade they would be confronted, not only with a drastic decline in living standards, but even with actual starvation. There do not exist in Western Europe the basic natural resources for decent survival without extensive worldwide trade, including a substantial trade with us. The nations of that region are deficient in fiber, fuels, and raw materials. They can make up these deficiencies only by imports from abroad. They can obtain these imports only in the form of aid or by paying for them with exports of the goods and services of their own advanced economies.

Under the Marshall plan, Western Europe did receive, in effect, a substantial portion of its imports in the form of aid from this country. In recent years, however, the Europeans have paid for these imports out of the products of their industries with their highly skilled services. Such aid as has continued to go to Europe since the Marshall plan terminated has been largely in the form of military equipment to provide for the common defense of the Western World.

The economies of Western Europe are now operating at record levels. The Europeans have reached these levels and are maintaining them largely as a result of a vast expansion in trade with each other, with us and with other free nations. However, in spite of the great increase in their productivity, their trade and their consumption, Western Europe generally has little reserve to meet an economic catastrophe. It can ill afford any recession in trade. That such is the case is illustrated by the effect of the blocking of the Suez Canal last year. This incident was, in effect, an example of a major interference with international trade, not unlike what would happen if imports and exports were drastically curtailed as a result of Government policies on tariffs. It compelled Britain to seek a postponement of payments on the loan which we had made to that country in 1946. In short, without trade there would have to be aid. Had Suez remained closed for any length of time, not only Britain but most of the other nations of Western Europe would have been in deep economic difficulties and would have had to seek our help.

The United Kingdom, and indeed any country worthy to be called free, is not happy when it is forced to seek aid abroad, and it does not please us to have to give it. Yet in this instance, as in others, we were confronted with a choice between economic assistance and economic chaos. We did what I believe most of you would have done. We chose to provide assistance. We did so because the political consequences of not doing so would have been so adverse as to jeopardize this country's vital security interests.

Unless Western Europe remains in economic health, and that, as I have noted, requires an extensive foreign trade—both exports and imports—the whole system of cooperative defense of freedom is threatened. Yet, it is on that system that the security of this Nation ultimately depends. No matter how high and at what cost we build our defenses, the United States can hardly survive as an isolated island of liberty in a sea of totalitarian hostility.

So much, then, for the advantages of foreign trade. It brings this country both economic and political benefits of great magnitude. The favorable disposition of this country towards foreign trade as a general proposition in all probability arises from an awareness of some or all of these benefits.

Why, then, is there still suspicion of import trade on the part of an important segment of this country? Why are Members of Congress so frequently urged by various citizens to do something to curb imports? The reason, I believe, is this. While foreign trade is clearly of benefit to the Nation as a whole, that does not preclude it from working a hardship in specific localities, specific industries and specific classes of workmen within the United States. I need hardly remind you that here in Rhode Island we are not unfamiliar with this phenomenon. We have been, for example, adversely affected by jewelry and textile imports from Japan. I have received numerous letters from citizens of the State dealing with the situation, and needless to say I have made efforts to cope with this problem.

I have done so because it is small comfort to tell a businessman whose firm faces insolvency as a result of foreign competition, that this state of affairs is good for him because it is good for the Nation. I have made these efforts because I do not like to see workmen lose their jobs as a result of this competition.

I suppose if I were callous enough I might tell the workman to get another job and the businessman to get into another line or retire. However, having no desire to do either myself, I do not feel that I can offer such advice with good grace. Furthermore, such advice as to changing jobs or changing lines of business is advice more easily given than followed.

It seems to me that, if a businessman operates his business efficiently and a workman is conscientious and productive, neither ought to be victimized by changes in Government policy or other factors which might tend to bring on a sudden rise in imports. It is all very well to talk about the general benefits of imports, but for some, they are not a benefit at all. Some of our citizens are being asked, in effect, to bear a disproportionate share of the burden of what is admittedly of value to the entire Nation.

If they resent this inequity, it is understandable. If they appeal to their Senator to do something about it, it is certainly understandable. And if their Senator tries to do something about it as I have tried to do in regard to Japanese textile imports, that, too, is or ought to be understandable.

For me to take this attitude does not mean that I am opposed to foreign trade or that I am unaware of the economic and political value of imports as a part of that trade. It means, simply, that I do not believe foreign trade can be measured in this country, any more than in any other country, in purely economic terms. There is a human side to it which should not and must not be ignored.

Certainly our economy is not static. Businesses are constantly coming into or going out of existence; and they frequently alter their lines of production. Workmen shift jobs. Many factors go into this process of economic change, and foreign trade is one of them. I believe it is the duty of government, however, to see to it that change does not come so rapidly as to create major dislocations. It is also a duty of government to see to it that the burdens of change do not fall inequitably on any particular locality or segment of the population. That is particularly the case when change is the result of a Government policy designed to benefit the whole Nation.

So I would suggest to you who are especially interested in foreign trade, that you devote continued study to this problem. It seems to me that clubs like yours may make a great contribution to the expansion of international trade if you offer constructive suggestions on how to cushion the shock of change that is felt in particular industries and areas as a result of a sudden rise in imports. You know, of course, that some devices already exist for this purpose. There is, for example, the so-called peril-point system which calls for action by the President to curb imports in some instances. By diplomacy, we have also induced the Japanese to set up voluntarily quotas on certain textiles which they export to this country. I am not satisfied, however, that existing devices are sufficient. They have certainly not been sufficient insofar as this State of Rhode Island is concerned. If you have any advice on the matter, therefore, I would be delighted to receive it. It seems to me that effective devices for cushioning the changes and equalizing the burdens of foreign trade will do a great deal to stimulate the greater acceptability of this trade—in all its ramifications.

Even more important, however, than devices for easing changes, is an effective foreign policy. If a foreign policy is such as to encourage an expanding volume of trade, its benefits will be spread more broadly within this country and the adjustments and transitions which result from this trade will be made much easier. In this connection, the Marshall plan and the point 4 program of technical cooperation are both examples of highly effective measures of foreign policy. Not only did the Marshall plan save Western Europe in a political sense, it also contributed to a vast increase in our trade with that region over the past decade.

As for the point 4 program which I have seen in operation in all parts of the world, it is laying the groundwork for expanded trade and investment opportunities with respect to the less-developed countries. The effects of this program on trade are already visible in Latin America. In that region, it has helped in many ways to increase productivity. As a result, the Latin Americans are better and more reliable customers for our products than ever before. They, in turn, are able to sell us more of the commodities we need. There is every reason to believe that the point 4 program is proving beneficial in a similar fashion with respect to the Far East. As for Africa, which I visited last year, I believe that the technical cooperation program is likely to provide an important key to this great trading area of the future.

Foreign policy which can stimulate trade can also multiply the problems of foreign trade. An example of this has been the embargo on trade with China. This was a necessary and inevitable measure while the conflict in Korea was in progress. It was continued after the truce was reached in 1953. Whether in the long run it has helped or hurt the Peking government, only time will tell. In any event, a total embargo on trade is still maintained by this country on the China trade. Most allied nations went along with our policy to the extent of enforcing an embargo on strategic goods until a few months ago. But now the embargo has been relaxed by our principal allies except for actual materials of war.

While the application of the embargo was necessary a few years ago from the point of view of national security, the fact remains that it did tend to divert Japanese trade and, to some extent, the trade of European countries from long-established channels on the Chinese mainland. It is logical to assume moreover, that it also had the effect of intensifying the drive of these countries to increase their exports to this country.

To the extent that interference with trade by our Government is essential to the Nation's security, we must and will accept it. This policy, however, should be kept under close and continued scrutiny.

The question is, of course, one which the President and the Secretary of State are better equipped to deal with than I am. They have all the facts, or should have them. They know that one of the foundations of a genuine peace is trade with other nations.

All matters relating to foreign trade will, no doubt, be discussed when the resolution providing for an extension of reciprocal trade is under consideration at the next session of Congress.

I thank you heartily for letting me address you on this subject which is near my heart.

Washington Report

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALFRED E. SANTANGELO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, the 18th Congressional District of New York which I am privileged to represent has always depended upon its Congressman for leadership, both in Washington and in the community. From January 3, 1957, the day I first took office as Congressman, I have tried to provide leadership to our community. Now that the Congressional session has drawn to a close, may I give you a résumé of the highlights of my community service.

In order to serve the residents of my Congressional District, I have maintained two Congressional offices. One is located at 1484 First Avenue and the other at 208 East 116th Street. My First Avenue office has been open every evening and on Saturdays. It has been staffed by five lawyers and secretarial help. On Saturdays I personally interviewed my constituents and rendered whatever assistance was possible. My 116th Street office is open every Monday and Thursday evening. Two representatives work there and are ready to serve. In both offices during these past 7 months, over 2,500 people have had occasion to ask for advice and assistance. My office has furnished this help without charge and without regard to politics. Our objective has been to help.

In order to better understand the needs of our people, I have called together an advisory council, consisting of various organizations, trade unions, parent-teachers' associations, churches, settlement houses, civil groups, tenant associations, and social and athletic clubs. Once a month, I made an oral report of my legislative work in Washington, my activities in the community, and asked for a discussion of the problems which beset our area. These problems were discussed, and after deliberation, action was taken by myself and the organizations which were cooperating with me.

This procedure has proved helpful. When the New York State Legislature was contemplating an end to rent control, we organized a newspaper and letter campaign to urge the retention of residential rent control. During the legislative rent hearings, I appeared in Albany with a member of my staff to urge the legislature to extend residential rent control. Our newspaper campaign, publicized in the El Diario, the Spanish newspaper, brought in approximately 40,000 letters to the New York State legislative leaders. As you know, public pressure caused a reversal of attitude and caused the legislature to give to tenants much needed protection for an additional 2 years, and I was pleased to play a role in that change of policy.

My advisory council brought to my attention the plight of the east Harlem businessmen and merchants who were being dislocated without adequate compensation and with no provision being made for sufficient stores in new projects. Apart from the legislation which I introduced in Washington providing for payment up to the maximum of $3,000 for expenses to business in relocating, I conferred with the merchants of east Harlem, our city councilman, Mr. Merli, our State assemblyman and senator, and the commissioner of borough works. As a result of our conference, we have brought about the construction of additional stores in the new Benjamin Franklin project between 106th and 108th Streets, and for adequate lighting facilities along Second and First Avenues.

When 400 families were threatened with an eviction in Yorkville with a luxury apartment house, I appeared before the New York City Board of Estimates and pleaded for a halt to this program unless relocation of families was provided for. I am happy to state that because of concerted efforts of an aroused community, this program was abandoned and irreparable harm was avoided.

Just as I fought to protect civil rights on the floor of Congress, I fought in our community to protect the innocent and the elderly men who belonged to social clubs. Several social clubs were being unjustly raided and its members arrested without cause by the police department. My office staff represented successfully these men in the magistrate's court, but I also took preventive action. I took up personally with the police department the matters of these arrests, and after conference and investigation, received assurances that decent social clubs would not be harassed or arrested. Today I am proud to report that a police sergeant participates in my advisory council and offers suggestions for the improvement of community activities.

Our activities have taken all forms. On May 17, we participated in the prayer pilgrimage in Washington to commemorate the third anniversary of the Supreme Court decision which struck down discrimination in public schools. I have organized a committee in the advisory council for the saving of Benjamin Franklin High School, whose continuation is being threatened as a high school. In addition, I obtained from the board of elections the use of Benjamin Franklin High School for the use of permanent personal registration so that the voting public could register more easily and would not be inconvenienced. Furthermore, we called upon, and received from the city of New York, additional funds for East Harlem in order to obtain additional educational and vocational counselors for our area in order that we might give our area the tools for developing a better youth and to provide conditions leading to better citizenship. Newspaper reports have indicated that juvenile delinquency has decreased in East Harlem.

The personal contact which I have enjoyed with these various organizations and with individuals has offered a great opportunity to serve my people. I have been able with the assistance of my staff and volunteers to represent numerous tenants who were being evicted or displaced, to obtain welfare for needy persons, to obtain apartments in low-income projects for families who need housing, to obtain employment from the division of employment and from the post office for people who can work and want to work, to halt deportation of several residents in our area and to facilitate the issuance of visas to persons rightfully entitled to enter America, to prepare and process applications for immigration visas, to secure compassionate transfers for veterans with a serious problem, and to adjust service discharges. The type of assistance which I have given has depended to a large degree upon the complexity of the problem involved. Frequently, my efforts met with a certain degree of success, but even if they were not successful, I have tried to help. These services have been rendered without fee or without regard to politics.

I hope that I shall be of continuous service to my constituents in the years to come.

Economy Versus Spending—Analysis of All Rollcall Votes in the House of Representatives Involving the Expenditure of Federal Funds During the 1st Session of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, President Eisenhower expected the Congress to effect any possible economy in considering his budget. He never suggested that we approve it without exercising our constitutional responsibilities to examine carefully any proposed expenditure.

If we are to reduce the crushing burden of taxation, further substantial reductions in the budget must be made. The Republican record on rollcalls concerned with economy is good. I have reviewed the 100 record votes during this session of the Congress to see which party really saved money for the American taxpayer. I find that there are 49 of these 100 issues which reflect the position of the Members of the House of Representatives on economy. Immediately following my remarks there is a list of these 49 issues. The votes recorded on these issues have been assembled in a subsequent table. The tabulations speak for themselves.

The Republicans cast 63 percent of all economy votes. The Democrats cast 70.7 percent of all spending votes. The support scores by members of each party show a Republican support score for economy of 68 percent, and an opposition score of 32 percent. The Democratic support score for economy is 34 percent, and the opposition score is 66 percent.

Many will remember the charges hurled at President Eisenhower's budget last January by Democrats. Those who were responsible for committing the Federal Government to long-term spending programs were suddenly going to produce economy for the American taxpayer.

The record has now been completed, and the facts are there for all to read. Once again the record shows that the true advocates of efficient economic government are the Republicans. The Democrats have continued in their traditional role of fostering spending programs which must result in either higher taxes or inflation.

List of record votes involving economy in Government

Record vote No.	Vote for economy position	Description
4	Y	1957 deficiency appropriations (H. R. 4249)—Lanham amendment placing a $15,728,000 limitation on amount to be spent for State and local administration of public-assistance grants. Passed 205 to 168.
5	N	Drought relief (H. R. 2367)—Providing for payment to ranchers for deferred grazing as part of relief available to drought-stricken areas of the Southwest Passage. Passed 270 to 109.
13	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $30,000 the appropriation for three new positions in the Department of Labor to handle international labor affairs in South America and the Near East. Passed 286 to 126.
14	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $204,000 the appropriation for new positions in the Office of the Solicitor, Department of Labor. Passed 241 to 171.
15	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $46,300 the appropriation for new positions in the Bureau of Labor Standards, Department of Labor. Passed 246 to 169.
16	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $136,000 the appropriation for new positions in the Bureau of Veterans' Reemployment Rights. Rejected 137 to 275.
17	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $442,000 the appropriation for new positions in the Bureau of Employment Security, Department of Labor. Passed 214 to 205.
18	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $12,186,000 funds for grants to States for unemployment compensation, thus eliminating an increase requested by Bureau of Budget over departmental request and eliminating contingency funds. Passed 220 to 200.
19	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $1,500,000 funds for unemployment compensation for Federal employees and provide same amount used in 1957. Passed 253 to 167.
20	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $263,800 the appropriation for new positions in the Mexican farm labor program. Passed 312 to 77.
21	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $346,000 the appropriation for new positions in the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Passed 217 to 202.
22	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $31,000 the appropriation for new positions in the Women's Bureau. Rejected 206 to 210.
23	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $288,000 the appropriation for new positions in the Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor. Passed 214 to 205.
24	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $1,327,000 the increase in funds for expansion of the Food and Drug Administration. Rejected 130 to 285.
25	Y	1958 appropriations for Departments of Labor, and Health, Education, and Welfare, and related agencies (H. R. 6287)—Amendment to reduce by $1,482,900 the appropriation for new positions in the Office of Education. Rejected 206 to 207.

"Why Should Food Spoil While They Hunger?"—Comments on Congresswoman Sullivan's Food Stamp Bill To Distribute Surplus Commodities to Needy Americans

OF

HON. LEONOR K. SULLIVAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mrs. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, those Members of the House who voted earlier this year against adding my food stamp bill to help needy Americans to the law for giving away surplus food to people and nations abroad will find their position backed up and supported by Secretary of Agriculture Benson, who apparently believes all Americans are prosperous and well fed.

When asked recently at a news conference whether he had changed at all from his bitter opposition to the Sullivan bill, he said he thought the whole idea unnecessary and extravagant.

He acknowledged that a food stamp plan for distribution of surplus commodities to the needy had worked well in the final years of the great depression prior to World War II, when, he said, "people could not afford to buy good food" but that it was entirely unnecessary now in this period of prosperity and high employment.

Those of our citizens who must get along on public assistance—those who are on aid to dependent children, aid to the blind, aid to the disabled, and so on, as well as those on local relief rolls—will be curious, indeed, to know how they are to afford good food on, say, $50 a month. Mr. Benson does not say.

I am heartsick over the defeat of the food-stamp plan this year, but I certainly intend to keep pressing for it next year. I am encouraged by the support voiced for my plan during the House debate on this issue by the chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture, Mr. COOLEY, and by many other Members concerned for the welfare of the low-income American family.

SHOULD NOT BE PARTISAN ISSUE

As we know, the vote by which my amendment was killed this year was in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, under procedures by which the names of the individual Members and how they voted were not recorded. Had the legislative situation been such that I could have succeeded in my attempt to obtain a rollcall vote on the issue, I am positive the result would have been different. Very few Members, I believe, would care to be recorded as voting against a proposal to channel some of this vast surplus to people in our own country we know very well are hungry—actually not getting enough to eat.

Although the vote was not recorded, we do find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a reference to the fact that only one Member of the House from the Republican Party—Mr. SAYLOR, of Pennsylvania—defied Secretary Benson and the Eisenhower administration's cruel position on this matter and voted in support of my amendment. I am appreciative of Mr. SAYLOR's courage and help. I know that many residents of his Congressional District have benefited from distribution of some of this surplus food in the past, and thus he knows of the good it can do.

Mr. Speaker, this should not be a partisan issue and I was sorry to see it made into one. Every Republican Member of the House has some people in his district who needs some of this food. Every person on relief, on public assistance of any type, would be eligible for food stamps under my bill and would receive them automatically, with no costly administrative redtape. I hope that next year, when I am assured we will receive an opportunity to go into this plan on its merit rather than as a amendment on other legislation, Republicans as well as Democrats will be found voting for it. Among Democrats, I am pleased to say, my bill has widespread and wholehearted support.

It has also received outstanding support from one of the greatest newspapers in our Nation, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, and I include now two editorials on my food-stamp plan, H. R. 949, and on the recent developments in connection with it, as follows:

HUNGER IN THE LAND

The inching up of the cost of living may have made some Americans less inclined to boast that "we never had it so good," but in general they are well fed, well clothed, well housed. In general, for there are roughly 6 million persons on relief. (And all the needy are not on the public-assistance rolls.) These people go to bed hungry despite all the food in Government warehouses. Why?

That is the question which Representative LEONOR SULLIVAN, of St. Louis, has been asking in Congress more and more insistently since she first proposed her food-stamp plan in 1954. This has again been sidetracked in the House. This time she offered it as an amendment to the bill which authorizes the distribution of surplus food abroad, and it was narrowly rejected as irrelevant. Now she has carried her appeal to the Senate Committee on Agriculture, asking:

"Perhaps I should not be emotional about this. But I just cannot help being heartsick over the contrast between the food we have and can grow and the hunger we have in our midst—all these hungry people. I mean hungry; I don't mean going without sirloin steak and fresh oranges; I mean hungry. Just try to feed even one person, and pay rent, and keep body and soul together, on $55 a month. We have misery and poverty and hunger, and mountains of spoiling food. Why can't we get this food to those we know need it?"

Mrs. SULLIVAN knows, of course, that some surplus food is being distributed to needy Americans by the Department of Agriculture. But she also knows that this is being done on such an unsatisfactory basis that only 10,366 Missourians have received an occasional sack of flour or beans even though 232,909 Missourians are on the public-aid rolls. She knows that no surplus food has been sent to Arizona, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, North Carolina, the Virgin Islands, Washington, and the District of Columbia. She knows, too, that Pennsylvania, which has taken more of this food than other States, is planning to refuse more of it as too expensive.

The chief objection has been to the Department's demand that the receiving States—or their relief agencies—accept shipments and then pay the storage charges until the food is distributed. As part of her food-stamp plan, Mrs. SULLIVAN would have the Department pay these charges at the distribution points, instead of only at the points of origin as it must do under the present law.

This would mean some increase in storage and shipping costs. There also would have to be more processing and packaging since wheat, for example, could be distributed only in the form of flour. It is hard to say how much more expensive this would be than the food surplus program to which the Government now is committed. But granting that food stamps would cost more, is it truly more economical to let food spoil than to pay the cost of getting it to the hungry?

Why, then, is the plan not given at least a trial? Will the Senate force the House to take a second look at a sensible suggestion for reducing the hunger in our land?

SECRETARY BENSON AGAINST FOOD STAMPS

Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson has again vetoed a food-stamp plan such as that proposed by Representative LEONOR SULLIVAN, of St. Louis. The Secretary acknowledged that this device for distributing surplus foodstuffs had worked well "when people could not afford to buy good food," but he said there is no need for it in a period of prosperity and high employment.

Such assistance certainly is not needed by the prosperous and the employed. But what of the millions of Americans—and there are literally millions of them—on meager public assistance programs? It is these that Mrs. SULLIVAN has in mind. Prosperity and its accompanying inflation only make life harder for those who are trying to keep body and soul and family together on about $50 a month. Why should food spoil while they hunger?

The food-stamp plan, of course, would add somewhat to the cost of the farm price program since wheat can be used by the needy only in the form of flour. But a nation which taxes itself to keep up the farmer's income might be willing to tax itself just a trifle more to help the distressed. Or does Secretary Benson doubt this? If so, he could say as much instead of intimating that everybody is prosperous.

TEXT OF H. R. 949

Mr. Speaker, the provisions of H. R. 949 for a food stamp plan are as follows:

[85th Cong., 1st sess., in the House of Representatives, January 3, 1957, Mrs. SULLIVAN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture]

H. R. 949

A bill to provide for the establishment of a food stamp plan for the distribution of $1 billion worth of surplus food commodities a year to needy persons and families in the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to promote the general welfare, raise the levels of health and of nourishment for needy persons whose incomes prevent them from enjoying adequate diets, and to remove the specter of want, malnutrition, or hunger in the midst of mountains of surplus food now accumulating under Government ownership in warehouses and other storage facilities, the Secretary of Agriculture (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") is hereby authorized and directed to promulgate and put into operation, as quickly as possible, a program to distribute to needy persons in the United States through a food-stamp system a portion of the surpluses of food commodities acquired and being stored by the Federal Government by reason of its price-support operations or other purchase programs.

SEC. 2. In carrying out such program, the Secretary shall—

(1) distribute surplus food made available by the Secretary for distribution under this program only when requested to do so by a State or political subdivision thereof;

(2) issue, or cause to be issued, pursuant to section 3, food stamps redeemable by eligible needy persons for such types and quantities of surplus food as the Secretary shall determine;

(3) distribute surplus food in packaged or other convenient form on the local level at such places as he may determine;

(4) establish standards under which, pursuant to section 3, the welfare authorities of any State or political subdivision thereof may participate in the food-stamp plan for the distribution of surplus foods to the needy;

(5) consult the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Secretary of Labor, in establishing standards for eligibility for surplus foods and in the conduct of the program generally to assure achievement of the goals outlined in the first section of this act; and

(6) make such other rules and regulations as he may deem necessary to carry out the purpose of this act.

SEC. 3. The Secretary shall issue, to each welfare department or equivalent agency of a State or political subdivision requesting the distribution of surplus food under section 2 (1), food stamps for each kind of surplus food to be distributed, in amounts based on the total amount of surplus food to be distributed and on the total number of needy persons in the various States and political subdivisions eligible to receive such food. The food stamps shall be issued by each such welfare department or equivalent agency to needy persons receiving welfare assistance, or in need of welfare assistance but ineligible because of State or local law, and shall be redeemable by such needy persons at local distribution points to be determined by the Secretary under section 2 (3).

SEC. 4. Surplus food distributed under this act shall be in addition to, and not in place of, any welfare assistance (financial or otherwise) granted needy persons by a State or any political subdivision thereof.

SEC. 5. In any one calendar year the Secretary is authorized to distribute surplus food under this act of a value of up to $1 billion, based on the cost to the Federal Government of acquiring, storing, and handling such food.

SEC. 6. The distribution of surplus food to needy persons in the United States under this act shall be in place of distribution to such needy persons under section 32 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1935 (7 U. S. C., sec. 612c), as amended, and section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall affect distribution of surplus food presently provided for in such sections other than to needy persons as defined in section 7 of this act.

SEC. 7. For the purposes of this act, a needy person is anyone receiving welfare assistance (financial or otherwise) from the welfare department or equivalent agency of any State or political subdivision thereof, or who is, in the opinion of such agency or agencies, in need of welfare assistance but is ineligible to receive it because of State or local law.

SEC. 8. The Secretary of Agriculture, in consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Secretary of Labor, shall make a study of, and shall report to Congress within 6 months after the date of enactment of this act, on the feasibility of, the costs of, and the problems involved in, extending the scope of the food stamp plan established by this act to include persons receiving unemployment compensation, receiving old-age and survivors insurance (social security) pensions, and other low-income groups not eligible to receive food stamps under this act by reason of section 7 of this act.

SEC. 9. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

The Tobacco Program

OF
HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, far-reaching changes in existing farm price-support programs have recently been proposed. These programs, of course, are a central part of our total effort to protect, stabilize, and increase farm income so that farmers may share more fully in, and contribute more effectively to, the general prosperity and economic welfare of our country. Their effectiveness concerns us all, and I do not doubt that new approaches to the farm problem will be widely discussed and considered in the next session of Congress.

In view of the widespread interest in this subject, I have prepared a point-by-point appraisal of the price-support program of greatest interest to the farmers of my State—the tobacco program. In it I discuss some of the achievements of that program, and analyze the reasons why a separate and distinct price-support plan is needed for tobacco. I believe my prepared address on this subject presents basic facts, and that these facts clearly call for the continuation of this program which has been such an outstanding success.

In order to make these facts conveniently available in more concise form, I ask that a brief summary of the full statement setting forth my position on this matter be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HIGHLIGHTS OF SPEECH BY SENATOR JOHN SHERMAN COOPER ON THE TOBACCO PROGRAM

The price of tobacco is a matter of vital concern to some 200,000 rural Kentucky families, because it directly affects their income, their standard of living, and their future opportunities. That price is determined not alone by the well-established demand for quality cigarette tobaccos, but also by the effective operation of the production-control program for tobacco—through which growers cooperate with their Department of Agriculture to maintain a balanced supply in line with that demand. This plan of controlling the supply, so that farmers may realize the benefits of the demand for their tobacco, has proved itself workable, effective, popular, economical, and fair to all segments of the industry and to the Nation as a whole.

The tobacco program is in a class by itself. For example, it is the one program having fixed supports, at 90 percent parity, established by law. Yet, tobacco is not subsidized. Effective production control has made 90 percent support work for tobacco—to the advantage of growers, the Federal Government, and taxpayers. In fact, while billions have been spent in honest efforts to solve the problems of a lagging farm economy in general, the tobacco farmer has stuck to his program of balancing supply with demand.

The only question involved here is whether three-quarters of a million farmers, working together, are entitled to the help and assistance of their Government in carrying out the program of their choice so long as they keep that program sound. My answer is that their performance in good faith entitles tobacco growers to the continuation of their present program. I oppose lowering supports for tobacco.

We have this distinct tobacco program today because the production, marketing, and consumption of tobacco itself is in many ways unique. It therefore requires a different price-support and production-control program. I will describe here 11 of the basic differences which both require a separate program for tobacco and make that program workable.

First, tobacco is a high-labor crop. A full year and 410 man-hours of labor are required to produce an acre of Burley. When 4 or 5 baskets of Burley from that acre are set out on the warehouse floor, a year of the farmer's toil, hope, and fears is sold at auction. Our tobacco growers must depend, then, to an unusual degree on their price-support program.

Second, tobacco production is not mechanized. The technological revolution in agriculture as a whole has scarcely affected tobacco. The second acre costs the farmer nearly as much to raise as the first. It takes more, not less, labor to raise an acre of tobacco today than 15 years ago. Support at 90 percent of parity is needed to provide tobacco farmers a decent minimum-wage floor.

Third, tobacco is an intensive crop. Its high value per acre makes it well suited to our small family farms. The average Burley allotment in Kentucky, although only 1.37 acres, last year produced over a ton of high-quality cigarette tobacco—worth $1,400 to the farmer and enough for 2 million cigarettes.

Hundreds of thousands of farmers owning modest family farms are therefore able to rely on their tobacco allotment as a major source of income. These are the men who know tobacco best—and who produce the world's finest tobacco. I do not believe they will agree that it is worth less than parity, or that their years of experience and months of toil should be sold cheaper.

Fourth, tobacco is a highly specialized, regional crop. Its peculiar dependence on soils and climate makes rigid allotments based on historical production patterns more equitable than for other crops. Tobacco producers feel that this program, in which they join together in a cooperative effort to comply with the law of supply and demand, provides them essential freedom in the market place to sell their product for what it is worth.

Fifth, our cigarette tobacco is sold exclusively through central auction markets. This system, developed after years of trial and error and travail, works well. It makes possible a firm price floor, not only supporting the tobacco crop as a whole, but under each farmer's individual lots of tobacco. The farmer is the direct beneficiary of this support operation—receiving immediately 90 percent of parity in cash. The whole operation is handled without loss by farmers' marketing cooperatives under contract with the Commodity Credit Corporation.

Sixth is the limited field of buyers for tobacco. As I stated in 1948, when the Congress adopted my amendment first establishing in law 90 percent of parity as a separate provision for tobacco, the major buyers competing for the tobacco offered by 750,000 farmers can be counted on the fingers of both hands. "The farmer who has spent a year in back-breaking toil to produce a crop of tobacco, which is his cash crop and his principal source of income, must sell his tobacco to one of the few buyers, or else lose his year's labor. The Federal Government offers through its parity and support-price program the only substantial assurance the tobacco growers have that they will receive a reasonable price for their product."

Seventh is the excellent storage quality of cured tobacco, which, in fact, increases in value as it is aged. Without a fixed level of support, however, this very storability would operate to the farmers' disadvantage—as it did for the hundred years when 1 year of good prices was followed by 2 or 3 years of starvation prices.

Eighth, there are no alternative uses for tobacco. In other crops, flexible supports may be used to seek alternative uses and new markets. Tobacco has no such opportunity. However, the single-use market does give farmers a clear demand-supply picture so they can support, and do support, a program which meets these realities, and which gives each of them a fair share of the market at a fair price.

Ninth is the relatively inelastic consumer demand. Consumer demand plays a minor role in determining the price farmers receive for their leaf. Also, farm price plays a small part in retail price. For the tobacco in a 25-cent pack of cigarettes, the farmer gets only 3½ cents. I believe American consumers are willing and able to pay our farmers this very reasonable price for their tobacco.

Tenth, the tobacco program does not result in burdensome Government-owned stocks. CCC does not own a pound of tobacco. Tobacco is not subsidized. The program has, in fact, made several million dollars in interest profits on CCC loans. This remarkable record must be credited to the farmers who have made the sacrifices necessary to keep their part of the bargain in this program. The Government can do no less than to keep its part of the bargain and maintain 90-percent support prices so long as growers continue to demonstrate their willingness to keep this program sound.

Eleventh, tobacco is the only farm commodity on which excise taxes are imposed. Federal and State revenues from the growers' efforts ($2 billion yearly) are about double the return to the growers themselves. Thus, while operation of our price-support program for tobacco has not cost the Government anything, tobacco has brought immense revenues to local, State and Federal Governments. This fact surely merits continuation of a tobacco program which insures stable prices and balanced supplies.

The most eloquent testimony as to what farmers think of their tobacco program is found in the referendum votes—where the growers have approved burley and flue cured marketing quotas by 95 to 98 percent in all the elections held since 1948. Here is what the tobacco program has meant to farmers in dollars and cents: Burley prices tripled, and the value of the crop to farmers increased six-fold from $40 million to one-quarter billion dollars in the first 15 years of the program. These gains have been improved in recent years, so that last year the burley crop sold for the highest prices on record—averaging 63.5 cents a pound for a crop which brought farmers $322 million. The current flue-cured crop is also bringing record prices.

Thanks to the joint efforts over many years of a great many conscientious and devoted people, and to the active cooperation of tobacco farmers everywhere, the tobacco program has been conspicuously successful. I believe it is a basically sound, helpful and essential part of our total farm program today. I believe it can continue to serve faithfully and well the tobacco growers of my State, the rural economy of the South, and hence the general welfare of our country.

In support of this position, I can do no better than to quote the President's Agricultural Message of 1954. President Eisenhower stated then: "Tobacco farmers have demonstrated their ability to hold production in line with demand at the supported price without loss to the Government. * * *

It is recommended that the tobacco program be continued in its present form."

The record of accomplishments since that time fully justifies the President's faith in our farmers and in this program. No more dramatic demonstration of farmers' willingness and ability to keep their tobacco programs sound could be asked than the substantial production adjustments made by both burley and flue-cured growers in the last 3 years. The President's conclusion, therefore, is still valid. And I believe his recommendation is as sound today as it was 3½ years ago.

The Chairman's Report on Activities of the Select Committee on Small Business of the House of Representatives

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am presenting at this time the chairman's report covering the activities of the Select Committee on Small Business of the House of Representatives. This committee was created in the 85th Congress by House Resolution 56 agreed to on January 31, 1957.

Pursuant to the provision of that resolution the following Members were appointed to serve thereon: Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, Democrat, of Texas, chairman; Representative JOE L. EVINS, Democrat, of Tennessee; Representative ABRAHAM J. MULTER, Democrat of New York; Representative SIDNEY R. YATES, Democrat of Illinois; Representative TOM STEED, Democrat, of Oklahoma; Representative JAMES ROOSEVELT, Democrat, of California; Representative CHARLES H. BROWN, Democrat, of Missouri; Representative WILLIAM S. HILL, Republican, of Colorado; Representative R. WALTER RIEHLMAN, Republican, of New York; Representative HORACE SEELY-BROWN, Jr., Republican, of Connecticut; Representative WILLIAM M. MCCULLOCH, Republican, of Ohio; Representative TIMOTHY P. SHEEHAN, Republican, of Illinois; and Representative CRAIG HOSMER, Republican, of California.

INTRODUCTION

This is intended to constitute not only a report accounting for the work of your Small Business Committee during the 1st session of the 85th Congress but also a brief summary concerning economic conditions and various activities affecting the small-business community directly and the Nation's economy indirectly.

ECONOMIC HEALTH OF SMALL BUSINESS

The problem of maintaining an economic climate in which small business can survive is ever present. Downward trends in the general health of small business which have been in evidence for the past several years continue, and are disturbing.

In the first 8 months of this year, there were 9,520 business failures—according to Dun & Bradstreet reports—an increase of 8 percent over the same months of last year. Yet business failures last year had set a previous postwar high. If business failures continue throughout the year at the rate established in the first 8 months, this will mean a failure rate of 53.7 failures per each 10,000 firms in operation. This will be the highest failure rate since 1941—when numerous small firms became "war casualties"—and it will be twice the average annual rate—26.9 percent—of the previous 15 years.

The mounting toll of small business failures becomes a warning signal for most serious concern when considered against the backdrop of general business conditions. These conditions are generally regarded as representing a high rate of business growth and a state a general prosperity. In reality, increases in the Nation's output of actual goods and services, during the past few years, have not kept pace with the annual productivity increases of the postwar years. For example, from 1948 through 1952 the gross national product, measured in constant prices, increased at an average rate of 5 percent per year whereas the annual rate of growth from 1952 through 1956 has been at the rate of only 3 percent per year. Nevertheless the national output has continued to increase, with the actual physical volume of goods and services produced in 1956 representing a 12 percent increase over the physical output in 1952. And, in the same period, the population of the country has grown by 16 percent.

The most striking feature of business activity over the past few years, moreover, has been the increasingly large investment in new business capacity. Expenditures for new plants and business equipment of all kinds have risen to unprecedented highs, reflecting an expectation of increasing production in future years—at least on the part of those firms that are able to make the expansions. If the estimate of approximately $37.5 billion to be spent for new capital goods in 1957 proves correct, this will be 5 percent more than was spent last year, and 42 percent more than was spent in 1952.

Furthermore, corporate profits—taking businesses of all sizes together—continue to mount to new highs. In the first quarter of this year corporate profits exceeded the previous alltime high reached last year, and this was true both on before-taxes and after-taxes basis.

MORE ON PROFIT RATES

How then has this general growth of busines affected small business? Has there been a corresponding growth in opportunity for small business to accommodate the Nation's increased population?

Between the end of 1952 and the end of 1956 the total number of business firms in operation increased from 4.2 million to 4.3 million—a rise of only 2 percent to accommodate a population increase of 16 percent, and a physical increase in goods and services of 12 percent. The stunted growth of small business during this period involved a cost of 1,313,500 discontinued businesses and 1,330,220 transeferred businesses, including both mergers and businesses sold to new owners.

What also, it might be asked does the present boom in capital expansion portend for small business in the future?

Since present productive capacity, with a few exceptions, is already substantially in excess of the immediate foreseeable consumer demand, there is a grave question whether the tremendous new investment in productive facilities being made by the giant corporations foreshadows a corresponding outpouring of consumer goods and services, or whether the new capacity being acquired by the larger corporations is not destined—in large part—to replace capacity now in the hands of smaller firms.

MAJOR CAUSES OF SMALL-BUSINESS DECLINE

Undoubtedly there are many factors working toward the diminution of small business in our economic system. Your Small Business Committee has tried, and will continue to try, to discover what the important factors are and point out those which can and should be corrected.

There are several factors, however, which bear with such overwhelming weight on small business that they warrant extraordinary attention.

First, the Federal antitrust and trade regulation laws contain serious weaknesses, permitting trade practices which create artificial advantages to bigness and destroy smaller competitors without respect to technical efficiency or other merits. Foremost among these is the practice of discriminatory pricing which has reemerged since the Supreme Court reinterpreted the Clayton Antitrust Act, as amended, in the Standard Oil—Indiana—case. Your Small Business Committee investigated this matter thoroughly during the 84th Congress and made a full report to the House. In addition, during the present Congress, the House's attention has been called to the need for legislation to plug this loophole in the antitrust laws.

Second, the present Federal tax structure alone could be expected to contribute importantly to the possible elimination of small firms from the business system within not a great many years. Differences between the impact of the individual income tax and the impact of the corporate tax allow the large corporations to retain earnings and accumulate growth capital—with relative ease, whereas there is no commensurate opportunity for proprietorship and partnership firms to retain profits on which to expand. Furthermore, the corporate income tax places a vastly heavier burden on the smaller corporations than it does on the bigger corporations. The tax cuts heavily into the retained earnings of the smaller corporations, since, as a general rule, the forces of competition are present to limit the prices and profits which smaller corporations may take, but little affects the capital accumulation of the bigger corporations which are much more able to shift the tax onto other taxpayers.

These considerations were set out in the committee's final report in the last Congress and, at other times, the attention of the House has been called to the need for tax adjustments which will bring about a more equitable distribution of the tax burden among business firms.

Third, as has long been recognized, there is a problem of small firms gaining adequate access to the sources of capital. On top of this chronic problem, it now appears that to the extent that business firms are being squeezed by the tight money and high-interest policies, small firms are bearing the brunt of these policies. While your Small Business Committee has made no recent recommendations concerning the small-business financing problems, it does have an investigation underway by which it is hoped that at least the sources of this continuing problem will be better identified and understood, with the result that constructive recommendations will be forthcoming.

WORK OF THE COMMITTEE

The interest of your Small Business Committee has pointed primarily at those matters having a direct bearing upon the establishment, growth, and survival of small-business concerns. These matters include problems arising from the financing and the taxing of small-business enterprises as well as studies of business practices and activities of Government in the enforcement of laws relating to business practices, financing, procurement and numerous other matters affecting small business.

CASE WORK OF THE COMMITTEE

In addition to the program of the committee and its subcommittees regarding the studies, investigations, hearings, and reports covering the matters referred to above, the staff of the committee, under the direction of the chairman, from day to day throughout the first session of the 85th Congress carried a heavy work load of case work. The term "case work" is used to identify those problems pertaining to small business which were referred to your Small Business Committee principally by Members of the House. In the handling of each of these day-to-day problems, the committee and its staff operated as a service agency for the Members. In doing so it served as a special link between the Members and parties from whom information was needed. Frequently the needed factual information was secured from agencies of the executive branch of the Government. In other instances it was obtained from offices of large corporations. In each instance your Small Business Committee located the proper source, secured the pertinent data, arranged for appropriate consideration of the small-business concern's problem, and thereafter reported to the interested Member. These matters, as indicated, were quite numerous and some of them involved such knotty problems as to require the members of the staff to devote a substantial part of their time in handling them to completion.

FINANCING PROBLEMS OF SMALL BUSINESS

It goes without question that with each increase in price on the items needed for the operation of small-business concerns the latter are faced with an increasing need of more financial resources in order to carry inventories and to satisfy other needs for working capital, growth, and survival.

When any business concern is faced with a condition of depleted financial resources and his suppliers and the local banks tighten up and refuse to extend him lines of credit, he is indeed in a precarious situation. Small business faced with such difficulties is quite limited in its opportunities to secure financial assistance. Therefore, it is natural for small business concerns to look to and expect from the Federal Government not only sympathy but assistance in such situation. Indeed, to meet that problem Congress enacted Public Law 168 of the 83d Congress in 1953 to establish a Small Business Administration to provide among other things financial assistance to small business. Thereafter, the Small Business Administration was renewed and strengthened by Public Law 268 of the 84th Congress in 1955. In the closing days of the 1st session of the 85th Congress, S. 2504 was passed and approved extending the life of SBA to July 31, 1958. In the meantime, Congress will be considering additional legislation regarding the Small Business Administration and for providing needed financial assistance to small business.

By comparison with its present rate of activity, SBA did much less to provide financial assistance to small business during the period of 1953 and 1954 than it has done in 1956 and 1957. According to a press release from the SBA dated August 28, 1957, it increased its approval for financial assistance during July 1957 to an amount more than double what it had approved for small business during July 1956. The rate of SBA's activity in that respect had more than doubled in 1956 over what it had been during 1954 and 1955. Prior to 1955 a larger proportion of small business concerns applying to the SBA for financial assistance was denied assistance than is the case today. Also the growing need for financial assistance is reflected in the additional activity of the SBA.

The increasing need of financial assistance for small business has been of deep concern to your committee. Consequently, the House Small Business Committee decided to make an investigation into the financing problems of small business. That investigation has been started.

An effort has been made to determine how well private financial institutions are serving small business. We are attempting to get a clear picture on how well the present policies of the Federal Government have served the needs of small business in its efforts to secure financial assistance and whether other policies of the Federal Government have worked against small business satisfying those needs. In that connection, the committee has undertaken factual surveys with the cooperation of life-insurance companies and other segments of the financial community. Efforts are now under way to secure the cooperation of commercial banks in securing data concerning this matter. Also, your committee is watching with interest and giving study to proposals that the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System make a study in the field of small-business financing.

In addition to the staff work which has been undertaken under the direction of the chairman concerning the financing problems of small business, the committee has decided to hold hearings on that subject in Washington, D. C., and these hearings will commence before the end of the year. They will be resumed early in the second session of the 85th Congress in January 1958.

It is planned that at the hearings testimony and other evidence will be introduced which will show how well private financial institutions and Government policies are serving small business in its effort to secure needed capital. In addition, the inquiry will cover the extent to which the boards of directors and advisers of the big financial institutions and the big industrial and commercial corporations are interlocked and how these interlocking boards and advisers affect the ability of smaller industrial and commercial companies to obtain financing. Of course, within the purview of that inquiry will be a probing of the policies and practices of such groups in their relation to the flow of capital into and through free and competitive financial markets for the financing of business enterprises.

IRON AND STEEL SCRAP PROBLEMS

Proposals for Government intervention to restrict exports of scrap iron and steel have been the subject of a periodic controversy for several years. Manifestly, such limitations, or the failure to impose such limitations, affect numerous small-business firms, both in the scrap trade and in the metal-using industries, such as the iron and steel foundries and the semi-integrated steel companies.

In addition, the committee has received numerous complaints from members of the scrap trade concerning conditions and practices alleged to be growing up within the industry. These have included complaints of exclusive dealing, or near-exclusive dealing, on the part of foreign scrap-buying cartels with certain favored members of the United States industry; they have included complaints that similar exclusive dealing or near-exclusive dealing has become a common practice of United States steel mills in their purchases of scrap; and they have included a variety of other alleged private trade restrictions which are said to threaten the continued welfare of small firms in the scrap industry.

As a consequence, at the beginning of this session of Congress, the committee undertook the task of making a more thorough investigation and study than had previously been made of this industry for the purpose of trying to reach a resolution of some of the chronic issues and conflicts.

Shortly after the study was begun, the committee's attention was abruptly focused on new problems in the export phase of the industry. On May 6 the Department of Commerce suddenly announced that it was invoking its authority to embargo further exports of heavy melting scrap to three geographic regions of the world which constitute the principal foreign markets for these materials.

The committee held open hearings during the week of May 19, and hearings in executive session during the week of June 16.

Testimony was directed primarily to export problems and to conditions in the export markets about which exporters and dealers were disturbed, although considerable testimony was also heard about problems in the domestic markets.

While the committee has not yet made its findings, certain uncontroverted highlights can be pointed out.

Scrap dealers were disturbed at what seemed a new policy of restricting exports of scrap steel—and were protesting the adoption of such a policy on the grounds (a) that there was insufficient reason for it and (b) that such a policy would be inequitable in view of the fact that there was no proposal to limit exports of either new steel, iron ore, or pig iron. Testimony of officials of the Department of Commerce point out, however, that the United States Government had in fact adopted the policy in question early in the previous year and that restraints on exports of steel scrap in the calendar year 1956 had been effectuated by working out voluntary quotas with the governments, or their buying agencies, representing the three foreign markets in question. The three principal foreign markets are: (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Japan, and (c) the European Coal and Steel Community, which is comprised of the steel industries of France, Western Germany, Italy, Belgium, Luxembourg, and the Netherlands. In each case, purchase of United States scrap for importation to these areas is made through a central buying agency.

An export license from the Department of Commerce is required to ship scrap to most of the other countries of the world, but there has been no quota limitation as to the tonnages which these countries may purchase.

During the calendar year 1956, the Japanese purchasing cartel had made purchases substantially in excess of its voluntary quota for that year. The voluntary quotas for the calendar year 1957 were in controversy on May 6 of this year, although at least one of the foreign purchasers with whom quotas were then being negotiated had already placed orders aggregating the total quantities of scrap which it had received from the United States in the previous year. It was for these reasons—according to Department of Commerce officials—that the Department had reached the decision to limit exports to the tonnages of the previous year—pending an understanding on the 1957 quotas. An additional reason given for this decision and for the Department's intention of working out "voluntary quotas" again for the year 1957 was the fact that the Department was then newly in receipt of a report prepared by the Battelle Memorial Institute at the Department's instigation. The Battelle report appraised the supply-demand outlook for scrap and concluded that there is a "potential shortage" of the heavy melting grades of steel scrap in the United States in the years ahead.

Following the committee's first week of hearings, the Department of Commerce announced that an understanding had been reached with the foreign purchasers as to "voluntary quotas" for the year 1957. These quantities, in general, allow each of the 3 principal foreign purchasers tonnages amounting to approximately 13 percent more than the tonnages which these purchasers actually imported from the United States in the year 1956. These quotas, it might be added, apply only to the heavy melting grades of scrap, as the lighter grades are considered to be in plentiful supply and may be freely exported.

On this point, witnesses representing the foundry industries and the semi-integrated steel companies said that in their operations heavy melting scrap is an essential raw material for which neither iron ore nor pig iron is a substitute, and in many cases new steel is also not a practical substitute. One foundryman testified that he had been forced to raise the price of his products because of a long period of rising prices for scrap.

Scrap exporter witnesses testified that, since lifting of United States export controls at the end of 1953, it had been the practice of the central purchasing agency for the European Coal and Steel Community to purchase all or substantially all of its scrap requirements from the United States on contract with a syndicate of a small group of United States exporters, the group including the dominant factor in the United States market. Some of the most vigorous complaints heard from both exporters and dealers went into this situation.

The attention of the Department of State was called to the transcript of the committee's hearings, and the State Department in turn called attention to the transcript to the High Authority, which is the governing body of the European Coal and Steel Community. Subsequently, the High Authority advised the State Department that it was instructing the OCCF, its purchasing agency, to promulgate "standards and criteria" for a new method of purchasing scrap from the United States, whereby normal "commercial considerations" would determine which and how many United States suppliers might have access to that market.

Finally, on July 11, the High Authority sent a communique to the State Department setting out the standards for a new purchasing procedure. These state that "all scrap dealers of the United States shall be entitled to make offers under the same conditions," and "that when examining the offers the OCCF will take into account (a) prices and other conditions relating to prices, (b) compatability and regularity of quality, (c) date of delivery, and (d) dependability and regularity of shipment." It thus appears the restrictive features which have heretofore obtained in the European market will be removed and that all United States suppliers of "good reputation" will have equal opportunity to compete in the OCCF market.

Several exporter-witnesses made complaints about the purchasing practices of the Japanese cartel, similar to those which have been made about the OCCF. Testimony is to the effect that immediately following removal of the export embargo in 1953, the Japanese cartel first entered into an exclusive supply contract with one United States firm, an arrangement which continued, however, for only approximately 6 months. Since that time the Japanese cartel has widened its "cartel list" of acceptable suppliers to the extent that six United States exporters have contracts or orders from the Japanese. There was testimony, however, to the effect that the practice of limiting orders to six exporters is highly arbitrary, and that other aspects of the cartel's purchasing practices appear to be motivated by other than normal commercial considerations.

Statements from officials of the State Department indicate also that that Department considers that the Japanese cartel's present method of doing business with United States firms falls short of the objectives of United States policy to encourage competitive conditions and practices in foreign markets as this policy has been enunciated in the Mutual Security Act.

In its investigation of the iron and steel scrap industry the committee must necessarily open up for inspection points around which sharp conflicts of commercial advantage or disadvantage revolve. Under these circumstances it is regretable, but perhaps inevitable, that all parties would not be pleased or give enthusaiastic welcome to the committee's investigation. Thus, for example, shortly before the committee's hearings opened, the executive vice president of the Institute of Scrap Iron and Steel—which is the largest trade association of yard dealers and scrap brokers—made a speech which was then published in one of the trade journals in which he described the committee's investigation as an "attack on business" by Members of Congress who have been associated with the New Deal movement.

On the other hand, following the first week of the committee's hearings, the board of directors of the National Federation of Independent Scrap Yard Dealers, Inc., adopted a resolution commending and thanking the committee for its investigation.

In addition, the committee has received, and continues to receive, large numbers of letters from members of the trade commending or approving the committee's investigation.

This resolution and excerpts from many of these letters appear below:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT SCRAP YARD DEALERS, INC.,
New York, N. Y., June 7, 1957.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
Select Committee on Small Business,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PATMAN: I take pleasure in enclosing herewith text of a resolution adopted by the board of directors of the National Federation of Independent Scrap Yard Dealers, Inc., at its meeting in New York City on Monday, June 3, 1957.

It not only expresses the views of the board but, I feel, fairly reflects the attitude of the approximately 4,000 independent scrap yard dealers in the United States.

We have had several meetings with members of your staff. I take this opportunity to state to you the great regard which I have for their work and to note the high level of efficiency and courtesy on which the current study is being conducted, judging from my personal experience.

Very truly yours,

STANLEY ASRAEL,
President.

Resolved, That the board of directors of the National Federation of Independent Scrap Yard Dealers, Inc., at a meeting assembled, extends its thanks to Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, chairman of the House Small Business Committee, for the splendid work being conducted by the committee and its staff in its trailblazing study of the vital scrap industry, composed for the greatest part, numerically, of small-business men; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the board of directors of the National Federation of Independent Scrap Yard Dealers, Inc., that the current study fills a sorely needed review of this industry which has too long been regarded as being merely on a standby basis and has been denied proper recognition for the indispensable role which it plays in our national economy as one of the few remaining major noncaptive components of the steel industry.

JUNE 7, 1957.

We note with great pleasure the recent announcement made by the State Department to the effect that the European Coal and Steel Community is planning to take steps to eliminate the monopoly purchasing practices by the Luria Bros. & Co., Inc. We feel that this was a very necessary step, as it will enable the independent scrap dealers in this country to participate in a larger way in the export program to the OCCF countries, as we will now have a free and competitive situation in the export scrap industry, which will be helpful to the United States of America as well as to the OCCF countries.

Once again we want to congratulate you on the wonderful stand you have taken.

* * * * *

I wish to congratulate you and the committee on the very fine and conscientious study which you and your staff has made of the scrap industry.

As a small-business man we are conscious of the fine results. * * * It is very gratifying and we wish to express our appreciation for a job well done.

* * * * *

It is heartening to see the wonderful results you and your committee have attained. * * * We are a relatively small scrap organization, and at times it is very difficult for us to maintain our independence and not become a pawn of others. We have been discriminated against and have found certain markets closed to us, but we will still maintain independence. Again, thank you for your sincere efforts on our behalf.

* * * * *

Congratulations on a job well done. To your, your committee and the staff of your committee, our hats are off and for a very thorough study of the scrap industry. * * *

We as an industry are very grateful to you for accomplishing this worthwhile program.

* * * * *

Our small company has watched with interest the work of yourself and your committee in its study of the scrap industry. A very fine job has been done which is a credit to you and the committee.

The industry is extremely grateful for what you have done for it. We trust that this small measure of appreciation will show you that your efforts have not been wasted.

* * * * *

The recent announcement to the effect that the European Coal and Steel Community is planning to take steps to eliminate restrictive purchase practices of the OCCF was indeed good news to me, as well as to all my colleagues in the scrap export field. I wish to thank you and all the members of your staff for the stand you have taken in this matter.

This growing monopoly situation was bound to have widespread effects upon independent scrap dealers in the United States who, because of location and other economic circumstances, depend upon the export market for a large volume of their business. We believe that the best interests of the Community and the United States are served by a truly free and competitive situation in the scrap-export industry.

We hope that the Select Committee on Small Business will continue the vigilance which it has exhibited in the past to prevent a recurrence of the monopoly situation that has existed.

* * * * *

May we extend to you, and your committee, our congratulations on the study you have made of the scrap industry and the fine results forthcoming therefrom.

Speaking for ourselves, and our friends, in the industry, we express to you and your staff our gratitude.

* * * * *

As one engaged in the humble industry of buying and selling scrap—I want to thank you and your committee for the valuable services rendered the scrap dealers through your untiring efforts in the study of the situation in the scrap industry.

* * * * *

We conduct a small scrap yard operation here in Rochester, N. Y., and are members of the scrap industry.

At this time we would like to pass along to you and your committee congratulations for the wonderful job done on your study of the scrap industry.

* * * * *

It is my pleasure to take this opportunity to congratulate you, your committee and staff on the excellent and revealing study the committee has made of the scrap industry.

* * * * *

Please accept our humble thanks, for the worthwhile program, set up by both you and your committee.

As a small-business man, also a member of the scrap industry, excellent results seem to have been obtained, and we are very grateful.

* * * * *

We wish to congratulate you, your committee, and the staff of your committee on the time, effort, and consideration which you have given to the study of the scrap industry.

Bringing into the open various phases of operation will help to preserve the independence and advancement of the small dealer, collector, and broker in a free and competitive atmosphere.

As a whole the industry is thankful to have a champion such as you have demonstrated and appreciate the accomplishments of your program.

* * * * *

Several days ago I received a press release of the Department of State, which contained information pertinent to the hearings before your committee. * * *

Certainly the information contained in this press release indicates that your committee has accomplished at least part of what it set out to do, and this is, of course, gratifying to us as it must also be to you and the members of your committee.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank you and all of your staff for your firm stand in this matter, and to assure you of my cooperation and that of other members of our industry should the necessity arise in the future.

I sincerely hope that most of the members of your committee are convinced that a real monopoly situation exists in connection with the activities of Luria Bros. Co., Ltd., and that this is not just a case of certain members of an industry requesting governmental aid in a normal competitive situation.

Again please accept my sincere appreciation for your efforts on behalf of our industry.

* * * * *

From our trade papers, we note that the European Coal and Steel Community is planning to take steps which will eliminate the monopoly purchasing practices of a certain group of large brokers in this country. This is certainly a step in the right direction and we know that this was brought about to a large extent by the actions of the United States Department of State and your committee. You realize that we as small independent dealers look at this action selfishly from our point of view. However, the writer feels certain that the well-being of the entire industry, of this country, and that of the OCCF countries will be in much better shape since the independent scrap dealers are enabled to participate in the export program to these countries.

Going still further, and along the same line, we also feel certain than an examination into the competitive situation and to a certain degree restrictive buying practices of several domestic steel mills could be corrected to the betterment of all concerned. I mean to the benefit of the scrap dealer, the scrap broker, the steel mill, and the economy of the country.

May I take this opportunity to thank you for the work which your committee has done in our behalf.

* * * * *

We wish to congratulate and thank you for the recent announcement that the European Coal and Steel Community is planning to take steps to eliminate the monopoly purchasing practices by the Luria group. We feel that this will save the day for the independent scrap dealers in our country.

A free and independent scrap business enabling competing participations in foreign markets will prove helpful to the United States of America as well as to the OCCF countries.

* * * * *

We understand that you, your committee, and the staff which worked with you has made a very thorough study of the scrap industry, which should go far toward promoting an understanding of our complex business.

* * * * *

This is to express my appreciation to you for inviting me to present testimony to your committee last Thursday, June 20, 1957, in connection with its hearings on ferrous scrap.

I am grateful, too, for the courtesy which you and your colleagues extended to me while I was before your committee.

* * * * *

I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating you as chairman of the House Select Committee on Small Business for the accomplishments of that committee with regard to the recent developments in the alleviation of restrictive purchase practices of the OCCF. The feeling of many dealers like myself is that it is a direct result of the efforts of this hard working and fair minded committee and you are to be commended. We can only hope that the hear> ings will have the same effect on the domestic scene.

> As the daughter of a man who immigrated to this country at the age of 10, I have since childhood been taught that this is truly a democratic country where a person can rise as high as his own capabilities will permit and anyone can be heard by its government. My father is living proof that there are opportunities in this country but I must confess that until last week, I was cynical about having anyone listen to the voice of "the little man."

I sincerely appreciate the courtesy of the committee when I gave my statement and feel that the questioning by its members showed interest in and a good knowledge of the scrap industry. Now I not only say, "Thank God for America," but also, "Thank God for those dedicated representatives who give so much of themselves to make sure that it remains a government of, by, and especially for the people."

> We wish to thank you for your efforts which resulted in the recent announcement to the effect that the European Coal and Steel Community is planning to take steps to eliminate the monopoly purchasing practices by certain groups.

> As a member of the Institute of Scrap Iron & Steel, Inc., and the National Federation of Independent Scrap Yard Dealers, Inc., permit me to take this opportunity to extend congratulations to you.

> I noted with great interest the recent State Department announcement that the European Coal and Steel Community is planning steps to eliminate certain practices of the OCCF which have resulted in restraint of normal trade in iron and steel scrap in this country.
>
> The monopolistic situation developed by the OCCF practices resulted in harmful effects on many individual scrap operators in the United States who depend upon the export market for the movement of a large percentage of their materials. I know that you will agree that the best interests of small business firms in this country are served by a free competitive situation, not only in the export trade but also in normal domestic activities. The logical extension of restraining practices would have soon forced the breakup and dissolution of many small firms who have actively served American industry in stress periods of iron and steel scrap requirements.
>
> Our Nation should certainly support the operations of such small-business men and maintain their strength for service during periods of heavy domestic and military need for raw materials.
>
> We trust that the Select Committee on Small Business will continue its unceasing efforts toward furthering a normal flow of iron and steel scrap, and thus prevent a recurrence of any monopolistic practices in the handling of this vital raw material.

> I am pleased to submit my congratulations to you, your staff, and your committee for the very extensive and productive study of the scrap-metal industry just completed by your committee. As an owner of a scrap metal firm, a small-business man and a member of the National Federation of Independent Scrap Yard Dealers, I am gratified at the results that you have achieved, and I am certain that my fellow members of the scrap industry will aptly demonstrate their mutual appreciation of the fine work performed by you and your committee.

ACTIVITIES OF SUBCOMMITTEES

In order to carry out the detailed work connected with a variety of specific investigations agreed upon by the full committee, 6 subcommittees were established and designated as subcommittees, numbered 1 to 6, inclusive.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 1

This subcommittee is composed of Hon. JOE L. EVINS, of Tennessee, as chairman; Hon. SIDNEY R. YATES, of Illinois; Hon. CHARLES H. BROWN, of Missouri; Hon. WILLIAM M. MCCULLOCH, of Ohio; and Hon. CRAIG HOSMER, of California.

The matters referred to this subcommittee for study, investigation, and report related to law enforcement and subsidies affecting small business.

This subcommittee has initiated an investigation covering the policies and practices pertaining to Federal research and development contracts, as well as other Federal subsidies and incentives to business, with particular attention to the effect of these Federal activities as they relate to national antitrust policies. The study involves a review of the small business interests in Federal policies pertaining to the acquisition and control of patents on federally financed inventions.

On November 19, 1956, the Attorney General of the United States, in reporting to Congress, made the following pertinent observations regarding this problem. He stated in part:

> The impressive factual indications * * * may point a warning that the total effect of the research and development effort may well tend to increase concentration of economic power. Moreover, that evidence indicates that this tendency toward concentration may be accentuated and not retarded by the administration of Government financing of research and development.
>
> As noted * * * the agencies administering the program have made no adequate compilation of statistical materials in this important area. The few analyses made have not adequately considered the problem of economic concentration.
>
> The vital importance of preserving our economic system makes obvious the need for greater effort in this regard by the administrative agencies concerned. * * * A comprehensive delineation of the exact problem is a necessary first step to its solution. That delineation should include in detail the distribution of federally financed research and development projects among the various size classifications of industry, as well as the exact scope and distribution of other tangible benefits, such as patents and subsequent procurement, which result from participation in these projects.

The study undertaken by the subcommittee has, therefore, seriously considered the concentration of economic power flowing from these policies of the Government and the manner in which they have affected small business.

It is apparent that what happens in research and development might well spell out what will happen to small business in the future.

One of the major purposes of this project is to ascertain why officials and agencies of the Federal Government have adopted policies and procedures in connection with grants and subsidies for research and development programs which provide attractive opportunities for big business but seem to foreclose more and more the opportunities of small business to receive such favors.

In connection with this study, a letter of inquiry was forwarded to 100 representative large and small companies who were recipients of research and development grants from the Federal Government. The companies were requested to submit to the committee a list of all patents secured on inventions derived through research and development grants, awards, or contracts obtained from any agency of the Federal Government. The companies were also requested to submit copies of license agreements executed under each of these patents. Virtually all of the companies have responded thereto, and the staff of the committee is presently evaluating and studying these replies.

The problem is serious in view of the most recent available Department of Defense statistics revealing that small business is receiving less than 5 percent of these grants. It would seem, therefore, that small business is not receiving its fair share and that the Department of Defense apparently has failed to follow congressional intent. An outline of proposed hearings covering this problem of small business is being prepared.

In addition to the foregoing, the subcommittee has been studying problems affecting small business, which involve agencies of the Federal Government and their enforcement of laws designed to protect small business from unfair, predatory, and restrictive trade practices. This study has been prompted by the fact that small-business concerns which have requested Federal agencies to enforce laws prohibiting destructive trade practices have now complained that the Federal agencies in question had failed to act or if they had acted the action had not been taken timely. In addition, it appears that small-business men have complained to the Federal agencies about certain practices which, although made the subject of formal proceedings, those proceedings were concluded without provision for stopping the alleged unlawful practices. Therefore, before this subcommittee completes its study it will review not only the practices covered by the formal complaints issued by the agencies but also those covered by orders and decrees which made disposition of the formal complaints relating to the practices affecting small business. Likewise, the subcommittee is studying the effectiveness of the action taken by the agencies to enforce their orders and decrees for the purpose of determining whether small and independent business is being adequately protected in this regard.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 2

This subcommittee is composed of Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER, of New York, as chairman; Hon. SIDNEY R. YATES, of Illinois; Hon. TOM STEED, of Oklahoma; Hon. R. WALTER RIEHLMAN, of New York; and Hon. HORACE SEELY-BROWN, Jr., of Connecticut.

The matters referred to this subcommittee for study, investigation, and report related to small-business problems connected with the Small Business Administration and those pertaining to Government procurement, loans, and disposal activities.

During the early days of the first session of this Congress, this subcommittee conducted a searching inquiry into all of the operations of the Small Business Administration in order to disclose the degree of efficiency attained by its staff under current management, the effectiveness of its operations, and the needs for strengthening or improving the basic act. It was the intent and purpose of the subcommittee to develop full and comprehensive information concerning the activities of this Agency and their effect upon the related problems of small business in order that appropriate recommendations thereafter could be made to the Committee on Banking and Currency and the House of Representatives. Eight days of hearings were held during March and April 1957, at which evidence was elicited which proved to be of valuable help to the membership of the House in connection with their ensuing debate regarding the merits of proposed legislation dealing with this Agency.

Turning to other fields, it can be reported that the subcommittee carried out a number of field inspection trips and conferences. Such meetings were held in Los Angeles, Calif., Seattle, Wash., and Hawaii. Basic subjects covered in these field investigations were:

First. Certain problems of small business in the financial assistance field.

Second. Problems of small business in Government procurement.

Third. The operation and efficiency of the Small Business Administration in disaster areas.

In general, the subcommittee found that small business is not receiving its fair share of Government procurement, is not receiving equal or equitable opportunity to compete in Government business, and is being squeezed by the tight-money policies. In the tidal wave disaster area in Hawaii, the subcommittee found that unfortunately the Small Business Administration had not performed its mission in an expeditious manner. However, as a result of the findings and report submitted to the Small Business Administration by the subcommittee covering its investigation in Hawaii, the program was accelerated and the victims of the disaster received assistance somewhat seasonably.

The subcommittee has received reports and has been advised that as a result of these field trips, the Small Business Administration has improved upon its administration of business loans and procurement in the regional areas visited in California and Washington.

In making these field trips it was learned that the small-business man who cannot come to Washington to tell his story to Congress was extremely anxious to voice his opinion on these important problems to the visiting members of the subcommittee, and was definitely grateful for being given the opportunity of doing so.

As a part of its work in studying the problems affecting small business flowing from Federal Government procurement policies, the subcommittee gave special study to a case arising out of Atomic Energy Commission procurement. The case originated as a result of a letter from a small-business man complaining to the committee that it had not received a proper opportunity to compete for furnishing the Atomic Energy Commission with the item in question and that the bid of the successful bidder was neither responsive nor was the bidder responsible. The subcommittee in studying this procurement problem carefully reviewed all information made available to it by the complaining small business concern and the Atomic Energy Commission. The Commission failed to supply the committee with all of the information requested but upon the basis of all of the information that it did receive, the subcommittee concluded that the Atomic Energy Commission was not fair in its treatment of the complaining small business concern. It was found that the Commission had not taken into consideration the sums of money invested by this small-business concern, the establishment of a plant which was more than satisfactory, that it had met all of the requirements of the Commission, that it had never failed in its delivery of goods and had never defaulted at any time on any of its prior contracts with the agency. Nevertheless, the Atomic Energy Commission, in disregard of these factors, made the award to a less qualified bidder. The subcommittee requested that the Atomic Energy Commission, in the handling of similar future procurements, advertised, and set the same aside for small business. The Commission failed to give assurance to the committee that it would accede to that request. Therefore, the subcommittee has recommended that in the future procurements of this kind be by sealed bids and set aside for small business.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 3

This subcommittee is composed of Hon. SIDNEY R. YATES, of Illinois, as chairman; Hon. JOE L. EVINS, of Tennessee; Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER, of New York; Hon. TIMOTHY P. SHEEHAN, of Illinois; and Hon. R. WALTER RIEHLMAN, of New York.

The matters referred to this subcommittee for study, investigation, and report related to developments arising within the minerals and raw-materials industries which affect small business.

Since January of this year the attention of the subcommittee has been devoted to those situations adversely affecting small business which stem from recurring shortages of certain basic raw and strategic materials, such as aluminum, copper, nickel, steel, and so forth. The facts are that from time to time during the past several years these shortages have arisen, and during these periods of time it is imperative that steps be taken to make sure that small business is permitted to obtain its fair share of the short supply. This is true because the minerals and materials in question in many cases are vital to the continuing operation of the small companies affected.

It appears that the shortages in question arise due to a variety of developments, including accelerated industrial expansion, newly discovered uses for the materials, stockpiling for national defense, and so forth. Evidence and information thus far supplied the subcommittee indicate that our stockpiling programs at times have had an adverse effect upon small- and medium-size manufacturers, fabricators, and processors. There are further indications that our national policy pertaining to our domestic mineral and metal industries is unrealistic and has contributed to a situation causing smaller manufacturers and processors to face a price squeeze on semifabricated and semifinished products.

The subcommittee has agreed that an investigation should be conducted covering the aluminum industry, with particular reference to the stockpiling programs and the overall importance of aluminum on small business. Problems involving the supply and usage of aluminum scrap, insofar as they affect small business, are now being considered. Contracts entered into between the Government and the integrated producers of aluminum respecting the new and expanded facilities will be scrutinized and, in addition, the privileges granted to the producers to place unlimited supplies of basic aluminum in the stockpile will be reviewed.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 4

This subcommittee is composed of Hon. TOM STEED, of Oklahoma, as chairman; Hon. ABRAHAM J. MULTER, of New York; Hon. JAMES ROOSEVELT, of California; Hon. HORACE SEELY-BROWN, Jr., of Connecticut; and Hon. CRAIG HOSMER, of California.

The matters referred to this subcommittee for study, investigation, and report related to problems found within the aircraft industry affecting small business.

The aircraft parts industry is largely a small-business industry. It is composed of firms which make a countless variety of parts, pieces, components, instruments, and so forth, which go into the assembled aircraft.

Changes in types of aircraft, as well as other weapons, always produce a severe impact on small contractors. Renegotiation, taxation, and financing are continuing problems. There are other problems of course; for example, at this time the effect of the cutback in the manufacture of military aircraft recently announced by the Department of Defense is expected to pose serious problems for all segments of the aircraft industry, including both the large aircraft companies as well as their smaller subcontractors.

The staff of the subcommittee has been instructed to observe and study the effects that these cutbacks may have on small business within this industry. In the past, when other cutbacks have occcurred, large manufacturers canceled their contracts with many small subcontractors, thereby causing severe hardships, considerable unemployment, and bankruptcies. The subcommittee plans to conduct an investigation and hold hearings during the coming session of Congress covering these problems.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 5

This subcommittee is composed of Hon. James Roosevelt, of California, as chairman; Hon. Tom Steed, of Oklahoma; Hon. Charles H. Brown, of Missouri; Hon. Timothy P. Sheehan, of Illinois; and Hon. Craig Hosmer, of California.

The matters referred to this subcommittee for study, investigation, and report related to distributional problems effecting small business.

This subcommittee received many complaints from distributors of petroleum products concerning alleged coercion and discriminatory practices applied by the major oil companies, as well as the destructive effects of gasoline price wars. Wholesalers, independent refiners, and producers, as well as dealers, voiced their grievances.

It was decided that an investigation of the distribution practices in the petroleum industry should be made. Thereafter hearings were held in Washington on April 10, 11, 12, and 13, 1957, in Denver on April 16, 1957, in Los Angeles on April 24, 25, and 26, 1957, and in Chicago on April 30 and May 1, 1957.

As a result of the investigation and the hearings, the subcommittee issued its interim report—House Report No. 1157—which received the unanimous approval of all the members of the committee.

During the hearings in Chicago, efforts by the major oil companies to dictate retail gasoline prices in the South Bend, Ind., area were disclosed. This led the Department of Justice to initiate a grand jury investigation.

In its report, the subcommittee outlines a further suggested program in regard to the problems still unresolved in the petroleum industry to which attention is being directed at this time.

In addition to all of the foregoing, the subcommittee received a considerable volume of correspondence concerning a variety of problems relating to the distributional field in industries other than the petroleum industry. Generally, these complaints and inquiries constituted reports concerning alleged practices in restraint of trade being applied by manufacturers in a variety of industries. Replies were transmitted to all such parties and wherever possible helpful information supplied. The subcommittee is continuing to devote attention to the matters thusly received with the view in mind of determining whether investigations and hearings should be undertaken.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 6

This subcommittee is composed of Hon. Charles H. Brown of Missouri, as chairman; Hon. Joe L. Evins, of Tennessee; Hon. James Roosevelt, of California; Hon. William M. McCulloch, of Ohio; and Hon. Timothy P. Sheehan, of Illinois.

There was referred to this subcommittee the task of studying, investigating, and reporting upon practices and conditions existing in certain food industries for the purpose of determining whether the facts are as alleged that changed patterns and methods and distribution, coupled with business practices and relationships of a few large concerns, are operating to "ruin the smal operators." Almost immediately the subcommittee announced plans for investigation and hearings regarding the poultry industry. It had received numerous complaints from small poultry hatcheries, processors, dealers, and feed manufacturers to the effect that business practices of their larger competitors and other factors to which reference is made above were destroying the small- and independent-business men in the poultry industry. The investigation led to hearings which were held during May, July, and August 1957.

The testimony and other materials which were made a part of the record during the course of the hearings throw considerable light on the changing patterns and methods of production and distribution in the poultry industry and the concentration of the industry in the hands of large operators, as well as the business practices and the relationships of those operators with one another and their effect upon small business. Copies of the testimony adduced at these hearings have been printed and distributed.

A report dealing with the facts of that record is in the course of preparation and when completed it is expected to contain not only the subcommittee's findings as to the facts but also conclusions and recommendations. The report should be available before the end of 1957.

The problems covered by this investigation are of relatively recent origin and therefore it is fortunate for all concerned that the subcommittee has seen fit to conduct this study at this particular time. So often it develops that information revealing changes or new trends in an industry are brought to light too late to permit corrective measures to be taken seasonably. Not so in this case and accordingly there is reason to believe that highly beneficial results may be expected to flow from the hearings which this subcommittee has conducted. This conclusion is buttressed by the observations of several important members of the industry who thanked the subcommittee for its timely interest in their problems and for the highly objective and constructive fashion in which the proceedings were conducted.

Report to the Voters of the 10th Congressional District of New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDNA F. KELLY
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mrs. KELLY of New York. Mr. Speaker, the first session of the 85th Congress is ending. The heated debates, the deliberations, and the controversies are all a picture of the true American scene. Let me remind my readers that on the other side of the world where communism rules, there are no debates, only ultimatums; no opinions, only foreordained plans; and no controversies for fear of liquidation. In controversies over legislation, I have tried to keep in mind the common good and I have voted for the kind of strong America in which my constituents want to live, where the rights of man guaranteed by our Constitution prevail.

The question of the rights of individuals and the sovereignty of nations is a basic issue both nationally and internationally. Much of the legislation considered during this session concerned itself with these principles on which the Government of the United States was founded. In a free democracy, legislation can be enacted to correct the ills and injustices that exist. The accomplishment of these social reforms needs the cooperation of all citizens, particularly in this era when the enemies of freedom use, without compunction, the weapons best known to them—propaganda, insurrection, subversion, infiltration, and intrigue. We must keep this in mind when we consider present-day problems. For the purpose of clarifying the issues, I will separate them into categories of international and national.

With these toughts in mind, I analyzed and voted on legislation. The bills and resolutions which were enacted are embodied in this report to the people of the 10th Congressional District of New York. Due to the strong, constructive leadership of the Speaker of the House, Sam Rayburn, and of the majority leader in the Senate, Lyndon Johnson, there are accomplishments on the credit side of the ledger of history for the first session of the 85th Congress. Their determination to withstand the vacillating approach and the indecisions of the administration brought to a successful conclusion issues which otherwise would have been shelved.

INTERNATIONAL

The foreign policy of the United States rests upon the foundation formulated under a Democratic administration when the United States reluctantly accepted leadership of the Free World. This involves a duty to keep the Free World united and to cooperate with the nations of the Free World in the fight against the common enemy. This policy is known as collective defense. We must be alert to every situation where a gain can be scored in the fight against international communism.

As long as the Communist threat exists, the United States is interdependent with the free nations of the world. Whether the leaders of international communism call themselves Socialists, national Communists, or international Communists, their objective is the same—to destroy the United States of America, the most powerful Nation standing in the way of their avowed domination of the world. The power of the atom bomb which threatens the annihilation of civilization is held by the most diabolical enemies of freedom the world has ever known—the leaders of the Kremlin.

But, to be effective, this policy of the United States must have consistent leadership to inspire confidence in our intentions and objectives. The Eisenhower administration has not been firm enough nor sufficiently definite. Consequently, the Soviet Union has been able to obtain a propaganda advantage before world opinion It is an admitted fact that the unity of the Free World has been ruptured by the events of the past few years, particularly, the past year.

MUTUAL SECURITY ACT

The backbone of United States foreign policy is the mutual security program which embodies foreign aid. This has proved to be not only useful but also necessary. It is the bulwark against communism and it is a foundation for world stability. It represents the first line of defense of the United States and our share of the cost of collective security. As a great industrial nation, we are dependent on world markets for strategic materials. As a nation blessed with surpluses, humanity demands that we share our goods with the less fortunate.

The United States cannot afford to falter again as we did in the Suez crisis and in the Hungarian crisis last fall. The United States leadership must seek and obtain Free World loyalty and cooperation among members of the entire Free World. Had the United States exerted true leadership last fall, the difficulty between Great Britain, France, and Israel would not have arisen.

The Mutual Security Act is the expressed desire of Congress to bear our responsibility in authorizing and appropriating funds necessary to carry out United States obligations toward the mutual defense of the Free World. The administration of these funds is the duty of the President.

The fact is that the mutual security program has strengthened free Europe. For example, in 1956, when our contribution to the NATO countries amounted to $1.7 billion, our NATO partners in Europe expended for defense, $13 billion or almost 90 percent of their combined defense expenditures. In addition, the nations receiving military assistance from us have spent for defense $5.50 for every dollar that we have put into such assistance.

I question the policy of the Eisenhower administration in the vital area of the Middle East. Lack of action in halting Russian arms to Egypt and Syria in 1955 gave Russia a foothold in the Middle East. While President Eisenhower and Secretary Dulles were in Geneva seeking peace with the Soviet, the Free World was stabbed in the back by the Russian deal in arms with Egypt. A strong policy by President Eisenhower at that time would have borne fruit.

The mutual security program for the fiscal year 1958 has been under Congressional consideration since early last spring. Before that, it had been the target of searching legislative and executive investigations.

The executive branch originally asked for $4.4 billion, which was scaled down to $3.8 billion. The appropriation for defense support for fiscal year 1958 was reduced by $336,700,000 from the previous year. This reduction is justified by the more rigid definition of defense support and the improved economic conditions of some countries that hitherto have received such assistance. The principal shift in emphasis has been to the countries in the Near East and the Far East. More than 80 percent of the sum requested by the executive branch has been planned for use in Greece, Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Korea, Taiwan, Vietnam, and, more recently, Jordan. New funds for military assistance for fiscal year 1958 were reduced $334,200,000 from the previous year. There is at present in the pipeline $4,380,594,000. In addition, this country holds currencies of other countries in the amount of $2.5 billion resulting from the sales of agricultural commodities. We can draw from these so-called counterpart funds to further mutual security and its objectives.

The mutual-security program makes greater emphasis on loans rather than gifts. No new funds were appropriated for fiscal year 1958, but an unobligated balance of $52 million remains. In lieu of appropriating new funds for development assistance, the development loan fund was created with an appropriation of $300 million for 1 year only. Originally the executive branch requested an appropriation of $500 million for fiscal year 1958 and borrowing authority for $7,500,000 for 1959 and 1960, respectively. I opposed this latter authorization for 1959 and 1960 because this would have been added to the national debt. The bill when passed carried the appropriation for 1 year only.

It is contemplated that the fund will operate on a revolving basis, with the payments and principal on loans being reloaned as they become available. Repayment of loans in foreign currencies will be accepted when necessary to meet the requirements of the program. Such currencies could be reloaned or they might be sold for dollars to United States Government agencies needing such currencies, thus providing dollars for use by the fund.

The details as to how the fund will be administered have not been worked out completely. Information concerning the activities of the fund will be announced soon.

I firmly believe the mutual-security appropriation and the carryover funds give the program more than can be spent in the current fiscal year.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 117 (ALSO CALLED THE EISENHOWER MIDDLE EAST DOCTRINE)

This was a joint resolution to authorize the President to undertake economic and military cooperation with nations of the Middle East to strengthen the defense of their independence.

The request by the Eisenhower administration for the adoption of this resolution was an admission that a Communist threat to the Free World and the security of the United States existed in the Middle East, Secretary Dulles, in referring to this legislation, stated publicly:

> Congress would have to take responsibility for the risk that the Middle East would be lost in a great and maximum disaster unless it backs the President.

As a matter of fact, the resolution was overdue by at least 2 years. It meant little at this late hour, as events in that area of the world have proved. The time for its adoption and efficient operation was in 1955 when the U. S. S. R. slipped into the Middle East by furnishing arms to Egypt at the very time its perfidious leaders were negotiating with the administration. No policy was formulated. The wait-and-see attitude continued until the situation exploded and action was demanded. A strong policy by President Eisenhower at this time would have borne fruit.

But, what did this resolution seek to do? This can best be explained by quoting section 2:

> The United States will employ the Armed Forces of the United States if invited and the President deems it necessary, if there is an overt act by international communism.

As we well know, an overt act by international communism could well be the start of world war III. The grave defect in this resolution is that it does not deal in any way with subversion, that new look of the U. S. S. R. so well known by the leaders and governments of the Middle East and so stated by the present administration.

At a Foreign Affairs Committee hearing, Secretary of State Dulles said that, although there was Soviet influence in the area, he believed the Eisenhower program would keep international communism from taking control. Congress responded to the President's request by adopting the Eisenhower Middle East doctrine. A mission—headed by former Congressman James P. Richards—was sent to that area to explain this doctrine, but all the mission did was pledge $119 million out of the $200 million authorized to bolster the economies of the countries against the Communist threat. The countries alining with Russia refused to invite the Richards mission for consultation. At this writing, Syria has fallen into the Russian entanglement which Nasser had already embraced. Thus, the weakness of the Eisenhower doctrine has brought the Free World again to the brink which was the fear I had expressed in my questioning of Secretary Dulles during the committee hearings on this doctrine. Following are my questions and the Secretary's replies:

> Mrs. Kelly. Mr. Secretary, since you and the President have stated that this resolution does not deal with the peaceful solution of the critical problems in this area, for example, (1) settlement of international use and operation of the Suez Canal, (2) establishment of a just peace between Israel and the Arab nations, including settlement of a refugee program, and so forth, and since it does not deal with indirect aggression, does not this resolution almost secure the position of the U. S. S. R. in the Middle East rather than displacing her, by almost guaranteeing the status quo, which we are all against?
> Secretary Dulles. In my opinion the best way to deal with these problems is for us to undertake the program here, which is not being dealt with by the United Nations at the present time and which could not effectively be dealt with by the United Nations, and support the United Nations in its dealings with the other problems of the area. It is dealing very actively with the problem of the relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors. As you know, the United Nations has an observation mission watching the borders as to these raids. There is a United Nations mission looking after the refugees. Mr. Hammarskjold, the Secretary General, went on two missions to the area last spring and summer to deal with that problem and to study it. He is dealing with it actively and we are supporting him.

There is the problem of the future of the Suez Canal. That is a problem before the Security Council of the United Nations and it is also being dealt with by the General Assembly, and Mr. Hammarskjold is dealing with that problem.

I believe the best way is for us to support the United Nations in the areas where it is acting and can act effectively, and for us, through this legislation, to deal with areas which the United Nations cannot cover adequately because of the veto power of the Soviet Union in the Security Council and its disregard of the General Assembly as evidenced in the case of Hungary.

Mrs. Kelly. Mr. Secretary, you emphasized international communism's breakthrough in this area. Since the U. S. S. R. established herself in the Middle East during these 2 years in Egypt and Syria, and so forth, and since we are not going to deal with this indirect aggression, are we not accepting the establishment of national communism by saying that if those nations accept aid from Russia we will stand by and let them and thereby perhaps establish national communism?

Secretary Dulles The Soviet influence, of course, is in the area. It has been there for a long time in fluctuating degrees. But we do not believe international communism has yet gained control of any Middle Eastern state, and this program that we outline is designed to take all the measures which I think are available to prevent that happening; or, if it happens, to be sure it is of very brief duration.

I indicated that I do not think we should attack any country by armed force because we think it has a government controlled by communism. We are not going into the business of using armed force to accomplish that purpose. There are other ways it can be done.

KELLY RESOLUTION ON HUNGARY
(H. CON. RES. 204)

One of the most important resolutions adopted in the 1st session of the 85th Congress was the Kelly resolution on Hungary which was unanimously agreed to by the House and the Senate. This measure expressed the sense of Congress that the President and the United States delegates to the United Nations General Assembly should seek adoption of the report of its Committee on the Hungarian Revolution and work for measures to bring about the freedom of captive nations.

The following recommendations are included in this resolution:

First. Consideration and adoption of the report of the United Nations Special Committee on the Problem of Hungary and other available information on the brutal action of the Soviet Union in Hungary.

Second. Join in seeking the most effective way of dealing with the report of the U. N. special committee in order to advance the objectives of the United Nations regarding the situation in Hungary.

Third. To prevent further repressive action by the Soviet Union and seek all practical redress of the wrong which has been committed in violation of the principles of the United Nations and the elemental requirements of humanity.

Fourth. Implement policies through the United Nations or in cooperation with the peoples of the Free World to work toward the freedom and independence of the captive nations, and to effectively utilize the position of the United States through the proper means, to the end that the Hungarian tragedy shall not be repeated anywhere.

If the United Nations is to be more than a debating society, positive action must be taken on all these recommendations.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 16 (ON THE STATUS-OF-FORCES AGREEMENTS)

This resolution provides for a revision of the Status of Forces Agreement to remove armed services personnel from criminal jurisdiction of foreign countries.

I voted to bring this resolution to the House floor for action because I felt the rights of our military personnel overseas should be brought to the attention of the United States Senate. While the House of Representatives has no power in the ratification of treaties, it does have a grave responsibility to make known its views so that legislation will be truly representative.

My previous support of the Status of Forces Agreement was based on the assurance that servicemen were under the jurisdiction of the United States in respect to offenses committed on duty. The following is quoted from the statement of the Deputy Under Secretary of State at the hearings on this resolution before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs:

> In the first place, the Status of Forces Agreement provides that the United States servicemen remain under United States jurisdiction with respect to offenses committed while on duty. In other words, foreign governments have voluntarily limited their jurisdiction to criminal offenses occurring while soldiers are off duty, on leave, or a. w. o. l. President Eisenhower once addressed himself to this important feature of the agreement. He said in effect that he believed servicemen deserved special treatment while carrying out their assignments, but that when these servicemen were on leave and were following personal interests they should be subject to the same basic responsibilities as other citizens.

Since the recent decision of the President and the Court to the effect that they have the authority to waive this jurisdiction, I feel a clarification should be made in our agreement and I therefore will support an amendment to prohibit such waiver of the "on duty" clause by our Government.

AGRICULTURAL TRADE DEVELOPMENT AND ASSISTANCE ACT EXTENSION

The Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act—Public Law 480 of the 83d Congress—authorized the sale of our agricultural surpluses to friendly nations. Public Law 128 of the 85th Congress, 1st session, extended the original act of June 30, 1958, and it increased from $3 billion to $4 billion the amount of surplus commodities for sale and from $500 million to $800 million the amount for relief of needy persons abroad. To date, the cost of this program has been $3 billion for moving $1 billion of agricultural surpluses to nations abroad. To me, this is not only unsound—it is morally wrong. The sale of these surpluses to needy Americans is denied. True, a small portion of our agricultural surpluses is given to school lunch programs and to welfare agencies, but this Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act provides for the sale of such surpluses to foreign nations.

In 1954, the Congress adopted my amendment to the original act in limiting the sale of surpluses to friendly nations and prohibiting the sale to the U. S. S. R. and those nations under Soviet domination or controlled by Communist organizations. In 1957 during the consideration of the bill to extend this law, I offered an amendment to continue to prohibit the sale of surpluses to the U. S. S. R. and to those nations under Communist control or Communist organizations unless Congress passed a resolution declaring the nation friendly. I regret to have to report that this amendment was not adopted. The Eisenhower administration believes these surpluses should be sold to nations behind the Iron Curtain.

We must not forget that we are engaged in a sinister cold war with a ruthless, diabolically clever enemy. It will require the full, positive force of the Congress of the United States in conjunction with the executive branch to counteract the Soviet exploitation of our kindness, humanity, decency, adherence to treaties, and adherence to the pledged word. The executive branch desires to retain absolute discretion in determining which nation is friendly. Perhaps it would like to consider Syria a friendly nation. Or North Vietnam. Or North Korea. Or Red China. Recent developments should give us pause for great fear on this score. Surplus agricultural commodities to Red China? Recognition of Red China? Admission of her representatives to represent China in the United Nations?

The issue is really not the Congress versus the executive branch of our Government. The issue here is whether it shall be the executive branch in conjunction with the Congress, or just the executive branch alone making a vital determination.

RELAXATION OF TRADE RESTRICTIONS

A further demonstration of the attitude of the Eisenhower administration toward Communist nations and the satellite countries was the announcement in 1957 that the United States had agreed to relax the curb on trade with Red China.

The Mutual Security Control Act of 1951 prohibits the shipment of strategic material to Communist-dominated countries. The United States, with the Free World allies, has agreed on this principle for many years. The listing of items of trade fall into qualitative and quantitative categories. Since 1953, the Eisenhower administration has agreed to relaxation of the restrictive items on this listing. In 1957, the relaxation extended to about 160 new items for our allies while no relaxation was planned on the United States embargo.

Agreement among free nations on the easing of trade restrictions with Russia and Red China may be the new policy but the fact remains that there is grave danger in easing trade barriers with Communist nations and Communist-controlled nations. European nations have the greatest concentration of industrial production in the world. The U. S. S. R. does not want to destroy this potential. If the U. S. S. R. can achieve business agreements with European powers, it can control the economy of those nations by severing exports and imports at will. It must be remembered that Russia's support of Egypt in the seizure of the Suez Canal proved the dependence of European economy on the importance of the international control of this canal.

Easing of East-West trade could, in the long run, bring economic ruin to Europe and could outweigh the immediate relief to the economy of Europe in the increase of East-West trade at this time. Reducing the East-West trade barriers could be more helpful to the U. S. S. R. at this time by the Free World's relieving the Kremlin of bearing the responsibility for the failure of their Communist economic theories. The failure of the Communist theory is proven by conditions within Russia and within Communist-controlled nations. The Polish and the Hungarian revolutions have proven this fact. The big question for the Free World is: "Butter or guns?" Should the Free World furnish the butter so that the U. S. S. R. can continue the buildup of her guns?

Other enactments international in scope are as follows:

Public Law 21 approves amendment of Anglo-American Financial Agreement of December 6, 1945, to permit deferment of payments on loan to the United Kingdom.

Public Law 55 extends the operating authority of the Export-Import Bank for 5 years to June 30, 1963.

Public Law 27 extends for 1 year, to June 30, 1958, the suspension of duties and import taxes on metal scrap.

Public Law 14 authorizes agreements for construction of atomic reactors in Berlin, West Germany.

Public Law 220 authorizes the sale of 4 and the loan of 45 naval vessels to friendly nations in Europe, Latin America, and the Far East, to facilitate mutual security agreements.

House Concurrent Resolution 115 declares the sense of Congress that Spain should be admitted to membership in NATO.

NATIONAL

The recommendations of the President on domestic issues were marked by the same shifting of position. This, together with the failure of the President and his Cabinet to clarify the position of the administration, caused misunderstanding by Congress of what the President sought to accomplish. Congress was forced to sift from among the various propositions, the ones which would serve the country best.

BUDGET

It was the budget and its presentation that snarled the work of the 85th Congress. The President requested Congress to grant the authority to spend $73.3 billion. Congress responded by appropriating $67.7 billion. This cut of over $5 billion does not include the permanent authorization of $8 billion which represents interest on the national debt. When President Eisenhower took office in 1952, the national debt was $258 billion, the interest on this amount being $5.9 billion. The national debt today is $274 billion with an interest of $8 billion.

Coming hard on the heels of the much publicized economy drive by the Republicans and their cries of extravagance, waste, and mismanagement by the Democrats, the budget request was a shock. It is the largest peacetime budget in the history of our country. The Secretary of the Treasury declared it was too high and requested that Congress reduce it. The President defended the Secretary's stand, thus failing to support his own request. Congress fulfilled its responsibility and reductions were recommended by committees after months of searching study and hearings. The defense budget was reduced by $2.6 billion. Last year, the Department of Defense had available $74.7 billion, of which, $36.2 was a new appropriation by Congress. The carryover funds were for ships, aircraft, and other long lead-time items. The Department of Defense has $70.8 billion for the current fiscal year, of which, $35.9 billion is new appropriation with the exception of $590 million which represents transfers from unneeded funds. Thus, out of the available total of $70.8 billion, the Department of Defense expects to spend about $38 billion.

There have been many news reports in recent months of announcements from the Pentagon concerning cutbacks in personnel and the slowing down of many programs. The reductions in the defense budget are not responsible for these cutbacks. It became apparent to the Defense Department a few months ago that if defense spending took its natural course during this fiscal year, it would range between $40 and $42 billion. Adequate funds are in the hands of the Defense Department to finance a defense program this year in the sum of $42 billion, or more, out of a total availability of $70.8 billion.

DISARMAMENT

On this subject, the administration's attitude has not been firm enough and consequently, the Soviet Union has been able to obtain a propaganda advantage before world opinion. It is felt that basic goals and policies of the United States have been so obscured in a morass of detail, that a clear statement of fundamentals is obviously necessary.

NATIONAL DEFENSE AND INTERNAL SECURITY

Public Law 63 continues to July 1, 1959, suspension of 2,000,500 statutory limitation on personnel strength of Armed Forces.

Public Law 62 provides for induction of doctors, dentists, and allied specialist categories into the Armed Forces, as needed, with Reserve commissions, and it ends the special doctor-dentist draft.

Public Law 116 extends to June 30, 1959, authority for enlistment of aliens in the Regular Army.

Public Law 269 establishes a uniform procedure for production in court of statements by Government witnesses and limits admissibility to such as the court deems relevant. This law is designed to protect the secret files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation against unlimited exploration by attorneys for defendants in criminal trials. It bans pretrial disclosure of the files. After hearing the testimony of the prosecution witnesses, the trial judges must screen the FBI documents and turn over to the defense only those relevant to the testimony.

NATIONAL ECONOMY

Public Law 4 increases the lending authority of the Small Business Administration by $80 million to the total of $455 million.

Public Law 10 increases the borrowing power of the Federal National Mortgage Association by $0.5 billion to $1.6 billion to help ease the mortgage-money market.

Public Law 12 extends to July 1, 1958, the 52 percent corporate income tax and present schedule of excise taxes on alcoholic beverages, cigarettes, automobiles, and parts and accessories.

Public Law 17 authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay nterest up to 3.26 percent on savings bonds.

IMMIGRATION

Public Law 316 represents substantial progress toward a revision of our immigration laws and it exhibits a recognition by the Congress of its responsibilities in the field of legislation. The most important provision in this new law is its effect on those cases which involve family hardship. It allows the admission of about 28,000 alien members of immigrant families and it permits the admission of 2,000 orphans over a 2-year period. The new law calls for a redistribution of 18,656 visas which remained unused at the expiration of the Refugee Relief Act. Fourteen thousand of these will be allocated to refugees from persecution in Communist nations and the general area of the Middle East. It cancels all mortgages on national quotas which were incurred by the Displaced Persons Act and the Refugee Relief Act. Approximately 8,000 people from countries whose quotas were in some cases mortgaged up to the year 2274, can now hope to migrate to America. Other features of the bill are: it will permit to stay here 15,000 people from behind the Iron Curtain who made fraudulent representations about their birthplace for fear of prosecution; it provides for the admission of 840 skilled specialists; it permits the Department of Justice to waive the requirement of fingerprints of nonofficial visitors to the United States; and it gives illegitimate children the same immigration rights as all others.

CIVIL RIGHTS

The civil-rights bill of 1957 is the first legislation of its kind that has been enacted in 82 years. This fact in itself is important although the weakness of this legislation must not be minimized. The original civil-rights bill, sponsored by my colleague, Congressman EMANUEL CELLER, of New York, survived the delaying tactics and other methods of obstruction and was passed by the House of Representatives. It became the 10th civil-rights bill passed by the House in the last 24 years. In the Senate, the main features of the Celler bill were eliminated.

The civil-rights law does not establish a new set of rights. It does create a new procedure whereby the Department of Justice may intervene and the Federal courts may act, to prevent denial of the right to vote. I supported the Celler bill and I voted for the compromise bill when it was finally agreed that we had the choice of the compromise measure or nothing. Despite its weakness, this law is a step ahead in our determination to wipe out discrimination which can have no place in our democracy. It is the first legal attempt to provide the machinery for making the 14th amendment a reality.

Briefly, the civil-rights law provides:

First. For the creation of a special Civil Rights Division within the Department of Justice.

Second. For the creation of a Federal Civil Rights Commission to investigate charges that constitutional rights are being violated. This Commission is to be a bipartisan body of six members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It will have broad powers to illuminate abuses of civil powers. Ultimately, its objective is to suggest to Congress how the civil-rights laws could be improved. Out of such study may emerge further action by Congress.

Third. For injunctions against interference with the right to vote and any defendant can demand a new trial before a jury if a judge rules him guilty in a criminal case and fines him more than $300 or sentences him to more than 45 days in jail.

VETERANS AND SERVICEMEN

Public Law 168 increases rates of compensation for service-connected disabilities and for dependency allowances.

Public Law 209 liberalizes eligibility standards for widows and veterans.

Public Law 217 makes permanent the Missing Persons Act authorizing continued pay to next of kin for personnel missing in the course of duty.

The bill to extend direct home loan and loan guaranty programs for World War II veterans to July 25, 1959, was vetoed by the President. This bill carried provisions to increase the maximum amount of loans and to encourage new construction in rural and small-town areas.

NATURAL RESOURCES

Public Law 159 authorized $600 million Niagara River power development by the New York Power Authority under Federal license, providing preference to public agencies of 50 percent power. It directs the Federal Power Commission to award a license to the New York State Power Authority to build and operate hydroelectric facilities at Niagara Falls with a capacity of 1.8 billion kilowatts. This is equal to about one-fifth of New York State's present production capacity. The State Power Authority is prepared to start work immediately and plans to finance the project by the sale of revenue bonds. Under the provision of the law, half of the power will be reserved for municipal distribution systems, cooperatives, and other public bodies.

The Niagara Power Cooperative would be guaranteed about 445 million kilowatts of the nonpreference power to replace the Schollkopf plant in Niagara. This plant was destroyed by a rock slide on June 7, 1956.

This authority has been a controversial subject between public and private power for over 6 years. Public power advocates sought priority for all the power while private power advocates fought any firm preference clause. The measure, as enacted, was a compromise acceptable to both public and private advocates, and it will benefit the consumers.

POSTAL RATE INCREASE BILL

The Eisenhower administration recommended a postal rate increase for all classes of mail, including the increase from 3 cents to 4 cents per ounce on first-class mail. I have long felt that the rates for second-, third-, and fourth-class mail should be adjusted before an increase is imposed on first-class mail rates. All of us are aware that the Post Office Department operates at a loss, but the deficit is to be found in second- and third-class mail. In 1956, the second-class mail deficit was $269,210,078 and the third-class mail deficit was $207,305,500. The Government, therefore, is in the position of subsidizing the newspaper and magazine publishers, the mail order firms, and the direct mail advertisers, all of them, profitmaking organizations. As an example, the following list shows but a few of the annual losses sustained by the Government in handling magazines and newspapers:

Publication:	Loss to Government in 1956
Life	$9,310,000
Saturday Evening Post	6,087,000
Reader's Digest	4,800,000
Chicago Tribune	1,788,000
New York Times	1,700,000

There are those, however, who contend that the post office is a service to all and that it should not be expected to base its rates entirely on its costs.

This bill was passed by the House late in the session, but action in the Senate has been deferred until the next session of the 85th Congress.

POSTAL PAY RAISE BILL

A bill to raise the salaries of 500,000 postal employees and the bill to increase the salaries of Federal employees were passed by the House and the Senate late in the 1st session of the 85th Congress. In my appeal for this legislation I said, in part:

> Mr. Speaker, I submit that we are dealing with the career employees of the United States Government—the richest and most powerful Government in the world. Many of these career men and women are the principal wage earners of their families. Let us pay them a family wage and not just a living wage.

I regret that the President vetoed this bill. New bills on the subject will be presented in the next session and I feel confident that favorable action will be taken on them.

FEDERAL AID FOR SCHOOL CONSTRUCTION

This bill authorized a 5-year $1.5 billion program of Federal aid to States for school construction. It was defeated in the House of Representatives for many reasons. Many Congressmen believe that the schoolroom shortage is not nationwide and that the States and local communities are handling the problem satisfactorily and that the preservation of our States as vigorous, powerful government units is essential to permanent, individual freedom, and the growth of our national strength. The need for economy was a factor in some cases, but in many more, there was a reasonable fear that a precedent would be set which would be difficult to overrule. President Eisenhower sought to distribute Federal aid on the basis of need. Under the plan sponsored by the Democrats, funds were to be allocated on the basis of school-age population. A compromise measure for an even distribution of funds was found acceptable. The bill which was defeated was one sponsored by Representative AYERS, of Ohio. It called for a distribution of funds according to the Eisenhower formula. Congress did not have the opportunity to vote directly on the bill. The vote by which the measure was defeated was on a motion to strike out the enacting clause. A vote in favor of striking out the enacting clause meant a vote against Federal aid for school construction and a vote against striking out the enacting clause meant a vote in favor of Federal aid for school construction. The final vote was 208 to strike the enacting clause and 205 against such action.

The White House claimed that President Eisenhower was greatly disappointed in the failure of Congress to act favorably on this legislation. Informed observers are of the opinion that it was well within the power of the President to save this issue during the session, particularly since a wire was kept open to him until the last moment.

It is hoped that a school-aid bill of the future will carry a more equitable arrangement affecting New York and that the taxpayers of our State will not have to raise $74,445,000 in order to get $18 million in Federal aid to education.

SOCIAL SECURITY, HEALTH AND WELFARE

Public Law 104 authorizes $1.9 billion for the housing program; it increases the borrowing authority to purchase mortgages; it lowers downpayments on FHA insured homes, and provides $350 million for urban redevelopment and slum clearance for 1 year.

Public Law 109 extends to July 1, 1958, the time for disabled persons to file applications to preserve their rights to old-age, survivors' and disability insurance, and permits veterans with service-connected disabilities to receive both social security and VA benefits.

Public Law 110 revises the formula for computing Federal social-security grants to States for medical and other assistance to provide for more effective distribution.

Public Law 172 provides for compulsory inspection of poultry and poultry products.

CONCLUSION

Any criticism for the lack of accomplishment on the part of the first session of the 85th Congress should be placed where it belongs; not upon the House of Representatives, nor upon the Senate, but on the lack of prior consultation between the administration and Congress.

What could be termed an oblique approach in government has been used instead of the strong and unquavering leadership so necessary. A statement of principle without a followup of legislative correctives is valueless. On many occasions, President Eisenhower has reaffirmed his resolve to remake the Republican Party. The Democratic policies on social welfare and economic reform can point the way for him. I am referring to the Democratic programs of social security, custodianship of natural resources, taxation predicated on ability to pay, protection for small business, and fair employment practices, to name but a few. Under these programs, benefits have been given without concern for race or creed, based only on the need for equity and justice in our social and economic structure.

It has been my privilege and responsibility to serve you for over 7 years. If you desire to write me, may I point out that letters sent to my Washington office receive my immediate attention. My office is open 6 days a week; my address: Edna F. Kelly, Member of Congress, Washington 25, D. C. During adjournment, I am at the Madison Club, 739 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, on Monday and Thursday evenings for appointments with my constituents.

Report to the People of New York, Autumn 1957

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JACOB K. JAVITS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Congressional Record my final report of the first session of the 85th Congress to the people of New York.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Report to the People of New York, Autumn 1957

This is the final report on the first session of the 85th Congress. It is the second of this Congress intended to keep citizens of our State informed of my activities, of the work of the Senate and the state of the Nation.

PROSPECTS FOR PEACE AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The most important phase of foreign policy dominating the world scene is disarmament. Since the 1955 Geneva Conference the United States has been working toward a first-step disarmament agreement with the U. S. S. R. I have worked to have included measures to improve the peace machinery of the United Nations, including an established U. N. police force like that now functioning in the Near East. Our country continues to insist on U. N. inspection and control in some form as essential to any secure plan for disarmament or ending nuclear-weapon tests.

Congress authorized a foreign-aid appropriation of $3,435,810,000. The new Mutual Security Act has as its principal feature a $300 million economic development fund on a loan, rather than a grant, basis; $1.9 billion for military assistance; and $725 million for defense support.

The 900,000 Arab refugees from Palestine remain as the most nettling problem in the Near East; their resettlement is a prerequisite to a permanent, peaceful solution there.

Plans must be accelerated for alternates to the petroleum supply routes in the Middle East on which 70 percent of free Europe's oil supply depends, presently threatened by Communist infiltration and subversion in Syria, Egypt, and Yemen.

If we are to resolve the struggle against communism without war, the foreign-aid program is indispensable to our national security and must be adequate to meet the tremendous task. Our foreign economic policy must emphasize international trade expansion and Congress should approve joining the Organization for Trade Cooperation. The Syrian crisis, the Soviet claims to an intercontinental ballistics missile and developments at the London disarmament conference underline these hard realities.

I sponsored legislation, which passed, calling for a special study by Government and private industry of the barriers to international travel with a view to its increase.

In line with the President's historic 1953 atoms-for-peace proposal, the Senate ratified the treaty for United States participation in the International Atomic Energy Agency. Due safeguards for the national security are included and I opposed efforts to weaken our participation.

I have protested constantly the situation of Americans held prisoner by Communist China contrary to international law.

I introduced a measure to promote the interchange of students with the European Soviet bloc countries to help break down the Iron Curtain and promote people-to-people understanding.

AGRICULTURE

About $3.6 billion was appropriated for the Nation's farm programs for this fiscal year. The soil-bank program, a major effort to reduce farm surpluses without wastefully high Government price supports, has been continued for another 4 years.

I joined in sponsoring the Agricultural Research and Industrial Act of 1957 for the increased use of agricultural products for industrial purposes, a necessity if we are to reduce our vast farm surpluses.

The $50 million Federal flood indemnity insurance program failed of passage. Though the Senate approved $14 million, the House eliminated it. I hope next year we will be successful with this program as we have affected areas in New York.

BUDGET AND TAXES

The 1957 fiscal year was concluded with a surplus of $1.6 billion. This has been applied to reducing our $270.6 billion national debt, the interest on which comprises some 10 percent of the budget.

In appropriations for the current fiscal year Congress cut some $4.9 billion from Presidential requests. I supported budget cuts where I believed they were consistent with the national interest.

The Senate passed S. 434 requiring Federal budget estimates on an annual accrued expenditure basis, a Hoover Commission recommendation. A similar proposal, H. R. 8002, is pending in the House.

Legislation was passed restricting rapid tax amortizations to new or specialized defense and for research and development facilities for defense, in line with recently adopted Administration policy.

Hearings commence January next on legislation to revise the tax structure. It is hoped that the Congress will be able to give relief to small business, those on pensions and individuals of moderate income, where such relief is most needed.

CONSUMERS

Inflation is a major domestic problem and calls for unremitting corrective effort. I am sponsor of the resolution authorizing the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee to study consumers' services of the Federal Government and how they may be best utilized for lower living costs. I fought for lower interest rates and lower FHA downpayment requirements to ease the heavy burden imposed upon those who wish to purchase their own homes. As a member of the Small Business Committee, I have been active in efforts to fight against economic monopolies and oligopolies which prove so costly to the consumer. Also, I am sponsor of legislation for a Federal Department of Housing and Urban Affairs.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

The most significant action this session was the passage of the civil rights bill, the first such legislation enacted in over 80 years. This bill provides (1) a six-member bipartisan Commission on Civil Rights, with subpena power, to study any deprivation of voting rights and to appraise civil rights laws and enforcement; (2) an additional Assistant Attorney General for civil rights enforcement; (3) action at the discretion of the Attorney General for an injunction in the Federal courts to stop interference with the right to vote in Federal elections; (4) that Federal judges may issue orders to safeguard equality in the right to vote under State laws; and (5) for extending to many Negroes in the South the opportunity to serve on a Federal court jury. A compromise provision was adopted permitting a judge in criminal contempt to fine up to $300 or imprison up to 45 days without a jury; in all other criminal contempt actions a jury is required upon request of the defendant.

While the civil-rights bill fails to do all it should to secure equal civil rights, it is an effective step ahead in the key area of voting. It contains a practical, constitutional solution to the jury amendment. I shall continue to seek other civil-rights legislation essential to our people and our times.

The O'Mahoney bill, designed to protect FBI files as a result of the Jencks case, has been enacted into law. I worked with Senator O'Mahoney to insure that the bill would not be unconstitutional, to make clear its purposes to deal with statements or reports made to a Government agent and to make airtight the safeguards against a "fishing expedition" into FBI files.

The Special Subcommittee on Senate Rule XXII, the filibuster rule, of which I am cochairman, held extensive hearings and a report is soon to be forthcoming. Rule XXII should permit full debate but bar filibusters designed solely to block Congressional action. The recent one-man filibuster during the civil-rights debate—the longest on record—emphasized the need for reasonable changes.

Congress passed amendments to the Virgin Islands Organic Act giving its popularly elected legislature greater authority. This is another forward step to full self-government.

SOCIAL SECURITY, EDUCATION, AND HEALTH

By an amendment which I supported, New York State policemen and firemen may now obtain social security coverage on the same basis as other State and local employees after a referendum.

The time for disabled persons to file to preserve old-age, survivors, and disability insurance has been extended to July 1, 1958.

The House of Representatives killed the $1.5 billion Federal aid to school construction measure, thus preventing Senate action. Assistance to school construction in areas of special Federal activities like Army camps, however, was continued for 1 additional year.

I supported passage of authorizing grants to the States to aid nearly 1 million mentally retarded children of school age. Only 15 percent of these are now receiving help. I am working on a proposal for a national health program to give all our citizens an opportunity for medical care through cooperation fostered by the Federal Government within the private economic system.

HOUSING

The fight in which I actively engaged to achieve lower downpayments on FHA home purchases under the new Housing Act was successful. The new law also authorizes $1.99 billion for housing programs of various types, including $965 million for new lending authority for the Federal National Mortgage Association to provide a secondary market for home mortgages; $350 million for urban renewal or slum clearance grants to cities; $250 million for mortgages on housing adjacent to military establishments; $175 million for college housing mortgages; $100 million for cooperative housing mortgages; and $150 million for a special Presidential fund largely for mortgages on housing for the elderly and families displaced by slum clearance.

Instances of flagrant maladministration of Title I slum clearance projects in New York City have been disclosed. I am following closely the investigation of the Federal Housing and Home Financing Agency of the former Manhattantown project, to see that the public is fully apprised of the results and if new legislation is needed.

Housing starts, now at an annual rate of 980,000, are the lowest in 5 years and insufficient to take care of new family formations and necessary home replacements; the subject demands constant attention.

IMMIGRATION

The compromise immigration bill which was overwhelmingly passed permits an estimated additional 60,000 immigrants to come to the United States. The new law provides during the next 2 years for unlimited entry of alien orphans adopted by United States citizens; grants nonquota status to spouses and children of skilled aliens following to join their families; gives the Attorney General discretion to grant visas to aliens previously convicted of minor crimes or afflicted with TB; gives discretion to the Secretary of State and the Attorney General to waive visitors' fingerprinting; authorizes issuance of 18,655 visas, under the expired Refugee Relief Act of 1953, to German expellees, Dutch refugees, refugees in the Far East and persons escaping persecution by the Communists and includes an amendment of mine and others including Egyptian and other escapees from the Middle East. It terminates mortgages placed on immigration quotas by the Displaced Persons Act.

The new law does not regularize the entry on parole of 25,000 Hungarian refugees here as a result of the anti-Communist revolt last fall—a serious omission. In addition, it fails to start modernization of the quota system and elimination of inequities in the present McCarran-Walter immigration law as advocated by the President, a whole host of voluntary organizations and millions of Americans, and contained in legislation of which I am a cosponsor. This is a No. 1 objective for the next session, vital alike to justice at home and our peace leadership abroad.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The U. S. S. R.'s announcement about its development of an intercontinental ballistic missile (ICBM) and the termination of the London disarmament negotiations without tangible results intensify consideration of our present national defense policy. While we emphasize defense and offense with modern nuclear means we cannot omit means to deal with local Communist aggressions or to contribute our share to U. N. police action.

I have been urging action on the Cordiner Committee report for modernizing the compensation system for our Armed Forces personnel. This is vital to training and retaining the skilled personnel modern defense requires.

I am working with other Senators and the Army to see what can be done to facilitate transfer into a 6-month program of men drafted for 2 years.

I was a cosponsor of the bill to increase Federal help to State maritime academies or colleges, such as Fort Schuyler, which passed the Senate. Also, there was enacted a law to provide career incentives for badly needed nurses and medical specialists in the Armed Forces.

Congress continued reduced travel fares for servicemen on leave, a measure I originally sponsored in the House of Representatives.

LABOR

Disclosures by the McClellan Committee of misuse of union funds, racketeering in labor-management relations and other abuses continue. I am supporting the President's proposal for protective regulation of union welfare funds to help assure honest and effective administration for the benefit of the working people. The Senate passed a bill providing for public disclosure of financial reports and other statements filed with the Department of Labor under the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. Also, assurances of internal democracy and grievance machinery is vital to the future of industrial statesmanship in trade unions.

The President has appealed to labor and management for self-discipline to hold back inflation. Walter Reuther has suggested his $100 per car price-decrease plan and the motorcar companies have asked for a wage-increase standstill. The problem is clear in any case and I shall support policy declarations and legislation effective to deal with it.

Modernization and improvement in pensions, annuities, benefits, and other factors in the laws governing railroad retirement are past due, considering costs of living and wages today. Hearings have been held on this necessary legislation but further action will wait until means are found to finance the increased expenditure. I supported actively the railway-brake bill, for greater safety, which passed the Senate.

NIAGARA POWER AND NATURAL RESOURCES

A major accomplishment this Congress was the enactment, after a 7-year effort, of legislation, sponsored by Senator IVES, myself, and Representative MILLER, authorizing construction by the New York State Power Authority of the $532 million self-financed power project at Niagara Falls as allowed by the 1950 United States-Canadian Treaty. The law provides fair preferences for power to defense needs, public bodies, nonprofit cooperatives, and neighboring States, while allotting adequate power to replace the loss from the 1956 Schoelkopf disaster, and for the industrial needs and development of the Niagara frontier.

The full development of Niagara power is one of the greatest concepts of economic development in our country. Joined with the St. Lawrence power development it should stimulate tremendous growth in the underdeveloped areas which exist even in New York.

In legislation authorizing Government assistance in the domestic development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes I supported the middle position which finally prevailed. It provides Federal help for research and pilot-plant development, gives electric cooperatives a chance to participate, but encourages commercial development of ultimate production facilities.

I opposed the $500 million Hells Canyon Dam which was to have been financed by the United States as I believed there had to be some finality sometime even in Government. The three-dam privately financed project had been approved by the Federal Power Commission and the courts, after the Senate had rejected the federally constructed dam in 1956 and had proceeded with extensive construction estimated at $50 million. I could not find an adequate justification to flood out this work.

I supported the Fryingpan-Arkansas project as the reclamation and power factors involved indicated Federal development to be the best alternative.

Legislation to limit billboard advertising on highways constructed with Federal aid remains in committee; it is a problem deserving our utmost consideration.

POST OFFICE AND CIVIL SERVICE

In the closing days of the session the Congress passed measures granting an 11-percent pay raise to Federal civil service and a $546 pay raise to postal workers. I worked actively for passage of this long-overdue legislation and urged the President to sign them. Unfortunately a veto seems indicated and we must do our utmost next year, I believe, with better hope of success.

A measure to increase postal rates as an offset against the $527.5 million annual postal deficit passed the House. Hearings are being held in the Senate to afford an opportunity for all points of view to be thoroughly presented. Responsibility demands action in this matter as it does for pay increases.

SMALL BUSINESS

I am now a member of the Senate Select Committee on Small Business and am participating actively in this vital work.

Congress enacted 11th-hour legislation extending the life of the Small Business Administration 1 year and authorizing an additional $75 million for making small-business loans. It is hoped that next year the Small Business Administration will be made permanent, legislation for which I am a cosponsor.

Government contracts set aside for exclusive award to small business increased nearly 50 percent during this fiscal year over the previous year.

VETERANS

Pensions for veterans with service-connected disabilities were increased 10 percent or more. I strongly supported the new provision in the law permitting veterans with a service-connected disability to receive both Veterans' Administration and social-security benefits.

The measure providing an additional $200 million of direct veteran-housing loans by the Government and extending the direct loan and GI mortgage-guaranty programs for a year was passed, but a veto is indicated.

As a member of the Senate Rules Committee, I have been working for the establishment of a standing Veterans' Affairs Committee in the Senate similar to the one in the House.

MATTERS OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO NEW YORK STATE

Bills I had joined in sponsoring were passed to amend limitations imposed by an 1896 law, thus permitting construction of a new shipping terminal in Brooklyn; authorizing a survey of a water route from Albany into Lake Champlain with ultimate connection with the St. Lawrence River; clearing the last obstacle to the construction of the Throggs Neck Bridge; and facilitating creation of a Lake Champlain Bridge Commission by New York and Vermont.

I worked in the Rules Committee, of which I am a member, to report out a measure for strengthening our election campaign expenditure control laws; action is expected next year. I joined in sponsoring a measure providing for an official residence and sufficient allowances for the Vice President.

I joined with Senator IVES in special representations to the Senate seeking to protect the interests of the Seneca Indians of New York (granted them by a 1794 treaty) incident to the flooding of lands in the construction of the Kinzua Dam.

The Senate passed Senator IVES' and my bill for additional Federal circuit and two district-court judges to relieve the overcrowded court dockets in the Metropolitan New York area. I introduced legislation for national recognition of the Baseball Hall of Fame at Cooperstown, N. Y.

I was active in efforts to retain the Veterans' Administration regional office in Brooklyn, to save the Scotia naval installation in Schenectady, to protect employee rights at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and similar matters of concern to individual citizens.

CONCLUSION

The thousands of letters from New Yorkers I receive weekly show lively citizen interest in Federal Government activities. These communications serve as an invaluable guide in my work here, and I sincerely hope that the people of this State will continue, as they have for over a decade now, to give me their views on matters of national importance.

Report of the Committee on House Administration for the 85th Congress, 1st Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. OMAR BURLESON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on House Administration, of which I have the honor to be chairman, has had a busy schedule this first session of the 85th Congress with activity in each of the committee's four regular subcommittees plus the work of the Special Subcommittees To Study Federal Printing and Paperwork, the Special Subcommittee on Electrical and Mechanical Office Equipment, and the Special Subcommittee on Parking. A total of 75 bills and resolutions were reported from the committee and passed the House. The carryover of items to the second session is negligible. A breakdown of activity by subcommittee is given below:

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS, HON. SAMUEL L. FRIEDEL, CHAIRMAN

The Subcommittee on Accounts approved a total of $2,894,500 for studies and investigations to be conducted by committees of the House of Representatives during the 85th Congress. In each case hearings were held by the subcommittee prior to final approval by the full committee. Following is a list of the committees and the amount of funds approved for each:

Committee	Amount requested	Amount approved
Agriculture	$50,000	$50,000
Armed Services	150,000	150,000
Banking and Currency	105,000	105,000
District of Columbia	10,000	7,000
Education and Labor	150,000	125,000
Foreign Affairs	75,000	75,000
Government Operations	627,000	575,000
House Administration	130,000	130,000
Interior and Insular Affairs	60,000	57,500
Interstate and Foreign Commerce	350,000	350,000
Judiciary	200,000	190,000
Merchant Marine and Fisheries	50,000	50,000
Post Office and Civil Service	50,000	50,000
Public Works	125,000	125,000
Small Business	250,000	225,000
Un-American Activities	305,000	305,000
Veterans' Affairs	75,000	75,000
Ways and Means	250,000	250,000
Total	3,012,000	2,894,500

Four resolutions were referred to the Subcommittee on Accounts which would provide supervision and a residence for Congressional pages. Hearings were held by the subcommittee, but action was deferred until the second session. Participating in the hearings were the president of the Parent-Teachers Club of the Capitol Page School, the assistant superintendent of senior high schools in the District of Columbia, the principal of the Capitol Page School, the president of the student council of the Capitol Page School, the Doorkeeper of the House and the authors of the pending legislation. The consensus of the subcommittee members was that there was a definite need for some legislative action which would provide the pages with more supervision, including housing, and better study and recreational facilities.

Legislation was reported by the Subcommittee on Accounts looking to greater efficiency in the administration of Congressional offices. This included:

H. R. 790, allowing Members to be reimbursed for official office expenses incurred outside the District of Columbia. The previous law confined such reimbursement to expenses incurred within the Member's district.

H. R. 9282, increasing from 1 to 2 offices the space authorized for each Member in his home district, and increasing the annual allowance for rental of such office space from $900 to $1,200.

H. R. 9406, authorizing the computing of each Member's telephone and telegraph allowance on a biennial rather than an annual basis.

House Resolution 399, increasing each Member's allowance for special-delivery and airmail postage from $200 per annum, and the postage allowance for standing committees from $80 to $180 per annum.

A hearing was held on H. R. 7683, which would simplify payroll administration in the House by providing that salaries of certain employees of the House, and the clerk-hire allowance of Members, shall consist of aggregate annual amounts rather than basic annual amounts plus additional amounts.

Fifty-five items of legislation were referred to the Subcommittee on Accounts, 37 of which were reported to the full committee for final action.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS, HON. ROBERT T. ASHMORE, CHAIRMAN

The principal activity of the Subcommittee on Elections centered around contested election cases and a study of proposals to amend the Hatch Act.

In the contested election case of Dolliver against Coad, the subcommittee conducted three hearings and received the direct testimony of both contestant and contestee. It was determined no contest existed by virtue of the fact that no valid notice of intention to contest the election was filed as contemplated by the appropriate statute governing contested election cases. This finding was reported to the full committee and on April 11, 1957, House Resolution 230 passed the House declaring, in effect, no contest existed.

In the contested election case of Carter against LeCompte, two hearings were conducted by the subcommittee to consider side issues related to the contested election, both involving requests by Mr. Carter. The House adjourned prior to the receipt by the subcommittee of all material involved in the case, thus further action has been deferred until the House convenes for the second session of the 85th Congress.

Two hearings were conducted on the bills H. R. 1167 and H. R. 433 which pertain to the Hatch Act. These hearings resulted in the formation of a Special Subcommittee on Elections of the Committee on House Administration which will study the Hatch Act and related laws restricting political activity.

While 32 items of legislation were referred to the Subcommittee on Elections there was an unusually large percentage of identical or similar bills.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE LIBRARY AND ENROLLED BILLS, HON. PAUL C. JONES, CHAIRMAN

Thirty-three bills and resolutions were referred to the Subcommittee on the Library and Enrolled Bills, several of which were exact duplicates.

In 5 meetings, the subcommittee took 13 of the measures under consideration, reporting 7 favorably to the full committee. Two of these were laid on table and the Senate bills passed in lieu.

Action was deferred on six bills.

Hearings were held on 3 bills, 2 of which passed and 1 of which failed. The former were House Joint Resolution 233, by Hon. GEORGE MILLER of California, and H. R. 7813, by Hon. JOHN MCCORMACK. The bill upon which action was deferred, after a hearing with several citizens of Newport News and the Peninsula area of Virginia, was H. R. 2574, by Hon. EDWARD ROBESON.

Former President Truman appeared as a witness in support of H. R. 7813; Justice Frankfurter testified in favor of House Joint Resolution 233.

Finally, members of the Library subcommittee who are also members of the Joint Committee of Congress on the Library met with the latter on July 18, 1957, to hear testimony from the Librarian of Congress, Mr. L. Quincy Mumford, and other Library officials, on the matter of codifying the many statutes under which the Library presently functions.

House bills passed:

House Joint Resolution 23—CANNON, appointing Arthur Compton as Smithsonian regent.

House Joint Resolution 202—CANNON, appointing J. N. Brown as Smithsonian regent.

House Joint Resolution 345—KEAN, authorizing extension of Second Division Memorial.

H. R. 7234—JONES of Missouri, fixing responsibility of Library certifying officers.

H. R. 7813—MCCORMACK, microfilming Presidential papers in Library.

House bills laid on table; Senate bills passed in lieu:

House Joint Resolution 233—MILLER of California, Senate Concurrent Resolution 31 passed in lieu: Encouraging historical societies to participate in program of National Historical Publications Commission.

H. R. 8228—THOMPSON of New Jersey, S. 2434 passed in lieu: Removing statutory ceiling on appropriations for books for the blind.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON PRINTING, HON. WAYNE L. HAYS, CHAIRMAN

There were 44 items of legislation referred to the Subcommittee on Printing during the 1st session of the 85th Congress for consideration, 34 from the House and 10 from the Senate. The subcommittee met 7 times and reported 32 of the 44 measures to the Committee on House Administration, all of which passed the House.

Legislation was approved which provided for the printing of additional copies of hearings, reports, and publications in which widespread interest had been indicated. Examples of these items are listed below:

House Concurrent Resolution 17, providing for the printing of additional copies of House Document No. 232 (The Capitol in Story and Pictures), 84th Congress, with emendations.

The Superintendent of Documents sold 40,000 copies of this publication, and has received to date approximately 2,000 requests that could not be filled. The names and addresses of these interested persons have been filed and they will be notified if the publication becomes available.

House Concurrent Resolution 62, requesting the printing of additional copies of House Report No. 2966, dealing with the subjects of price discrimination, the Robinson-Patman Act and the Attorney General's National Committee To Study the Antitrust Laws.

House Concurrent Resolution 82, providing for the printing of additional copies of hearings held on the national highway program. Because of the general interest in this program, additional copies were needed.

House Concurrent Resolution 104, providing for the printing of additional copies of the hearings on excise taxes. This request was made due to the great amount of interest manifested in this subject.

House Concurrent Resolution 215, providing for the printing of additional copies of hearings on The Nature of Radioactive Fallout and Its Effect on Man for the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Requests for copies of the hearings are very great due to the widespread interest in the subject.

House Concurrent Resolution 179, providing for the printing of additional copies of report to accompany H. R. 7125, a bill to make technical changes in the Federal excise tax laws.

House Resolution 199, requesting the printing of additional copies of the Synopsis of Benefits Available to Veterans and Their Dependents, prepared by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, 85th Congress.

House Concurrent Resolution 188, to print as a House document, and additional copies of the document entitled "Congress and the Monopoly Problem, 1900–1956."

House Resolution 97, to print as a House document the document entitled "United States Defense Policies Since World War II."

Senate Concurrent Resolution 22, a request to have printed additional copies of the Internal Security Annual Report for 1956.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 39, providing for the printing of additional copies of a compilation of studies and reports on the foreign-aid program.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 45, authorizing the printing of additional copies of the hearings on the mutual-security program for fiscal year 1958 for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO STUDY FEDERAL PRINTING AND PAPERWORK, HON. WAYNE L. HAYS, CHAIRMAN

The Subcommittee To Study Federal Printing and Paperwork of the Committee on House Administration, authorized pursuant to House Resolution 128, 85th Congress, continued with its work in a number of phases of the overall study, with emphasis on the following:

First. Survey of libraries designated as depositories of Government publications: As a result of hearings held last year on the sale and distribution of Government publications by the Superintendent of Documents, the subcommittee has completed a comprehensive survey by the medium of detailed questionnaires sent to the 571 depository and some 623 nondepository libraries. The staff had the cooperation of the American Library Association's public document committee, both in the preparation and analysis of these questionnaires, response to which was most gratifying. On the basis of information thus gathered and from intensive research into the subject, a bill has been introduced (H. R. 9186) to revise the laws relating to depository libraries. Hearings have been scheduled to be held in key cities, namely, Chicago, San Francisco, New Orleans, and Boston, on October 7, 10, 14, and 17, respectively, in order to resolve the best thinking on this legislative proposal designed to meet present-day needs.

Second. Procurement and supply of paper for printing, duplicating, and office use in the Federal Government: A study was prepared by the subcommittee staff on this subject, based on data received in reply to inquiries directed to the Government departments and agencies engaged in the purchase and supply of paper for governmental use. The information thus developed constituted the basis for a hearing which was held on May 1 with officials of the General Services Administration and the Government Printing Office in order to amplify the data contained in the staff study. The hearings on this subject, including the staff study, present a picture of overlapping activity and indicate the need for coordinated supply and distribution of commonly used items of paper. Proposed legislation to correct existing conditions which result from outmoded laws is being formulated for presentation to the Congress in the next session.

Third. Government printing facilities—study of wages, hours, and overtime at the Government Printing Office: The data pertaining to wages, hours, and overtime at the Government Printing Office, furnished by the Public Printer at the request of the subcommittee chairman, has been reviewed and analyzed. This data is being studied in relation to the whole subject of Federal printing facilities. Related information, including the procurement of Government printing services from commercial sources, is currently being studied to develop a subject for consideration by the subcommittee during the next session of Congress.

Fourth. International exchange distribution of United States Government publications: The staff is now in the process of obtaining additional information from the United Nations Library, in Geneva, Switzerland, which will assist in the appraisal of existing methods of distributing United States Government publications to other governments. Any needed changes indicated by the information received will be discussed with officials of the Library of Congress and the Smithsonian Institution, who are responsible for this function.

Fifth. Free distribution and sale of identical Government publications: The paradoxical situation which permits many Government publications to be acquired gratuitously, if requested from issuing agencies or from Members of Congress out of quotas available to them, but for a price if ordered from the Superintendent of Documents, is being studied with a view toward the formulation of needed corrective legislation. This condition was cited among several set forth in House Report No. 2945, part II, on the subject of publications management, which the subcommittee issued during the 84th Congress.

SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON ELECTRICAL AND MECHANICAL OFFICE EQUIPMENT, HON. PAUL C. JONES, CHAIRMAN

The subcommittee through the session viewed demonstrations of the latest developments in the field of office equipment. The list of equipment approved for purchase was revised to remove obsolete equipment and make available newer models of authorized items. Further revisions made available entirely new items which have a practical value in the operation of Congressional offices.

The subcommittee has been in almost daily contact with the office of the Clerk of the House, which officer administers the equipment program, to work out the various problems which continually arise and to seek ways and means to improve the program. The transition from manual to electric equipment has been moving along steadily with the result that few Congressional offices and committees do not have the most modern office equipment available.

PARKING SUBCOMMITTEE, HON. GEORGE S. LONG, CHAIRMAN

The subcommittee has continued the established parking procedures and rules, working to distribute fairly and equitably the available space. The availability of additional parking space in the areas south of the new and old House Office Buildings has greatly alleviated the parking problem for the time being. The subcommittee is continuing its study of the problem particularly with the view toward shortage of space which will develop as work on the third House Office Building proceeds.

Engle Offers New Water Resources Development Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLAIR ENGLE
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. ENGLE. Mr. Speaker, water enough for the needs of its growing population is a dominant issue in California. The impasse on our water problems, I believe, stems from trying to divide too little water among too many people. I am advancing a proposal which strikes at the real problem—the financing of additional water development. In a letter to State Assemblyman Carley Porter, I have suggested a new Federal-State relationship for construction of large multiple-purpose projects, where the major cost is for the development of municipal and industrial water. A subcommittee of the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, of which I am chairman, will meet in Los Angeles in November with Mr. Porter's subcommittee of the California Legislature's joint interim committee on State water problems to go into this proposal.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include the text of my letter to Assemblyman Porter:

COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., August 8, 1957.

Hon. CARLEY PORTER,
Chairman, Subcommittee of Joint Interim Committee on State Water Problems, Compton, Calif.

DEAR CARLEY: I am very anxious this fall to hold joint hearings with your subcommittee and a subcommittee of our committee on the financial problems relating to California's State water plan.

Specifically, it is my intention to propose a new Federal-State relationship for the construction of large multiple-purpose projects where the major cost is for the development of municipal and industrial water.

As you are no doubt aware, the Federal Government at the present time constructs projects primarily for irrigation through the Bureau of Reclamation and under the reclamation law. In addition, under the small-projects legislation, of which I am the author, the Federal Government advances interest-free money to public agencies for the construction of small irrigation projects costing not in excess of $10 million. The Watershed Protection Act, through the Department of Agriculture, makes provision for Federal grants and loans for the construction of small upstream conservation projects. With reference to flood control, the Federal Government has historically built on a nonreimbursable basis projects primarily dedicated to flood control.

You are, I am sure, familiar with all of these existing Federal water programs. There is one obvious gap: no provision exists in present Federal law for the Federal Government's participation in projects primarily for the development of industrial and municipal water, which is a field of growing importance in all areas of our Nation. I would venture the guess that the major undeveloped water projects in California will be mainly for industrial and municipal water, rather than for irrigation and flood control. Consequently, I have been studying for some months the introduction of legislation to establish the basis and lay down the principles for Federal cooperation in such water-development projects where the major cost is allocated to industrial and municipal water.

I expect, therefore, to propose the joint financing of Federal-State projects where the major cost is for industrial and municipal water, as follows:

First, that the Federal Government contribute to such projects on a nonreimbursable basis an amount equal to the portion of the project allocated to flood-control benefits. This is a recognition of the traditional responsibility of the Federal Government for flood control and follows the precedent established in H. R. 8677, which, as you know, is the bill I introduced providing for the Federal contribution for the flood-control benefits from the Oroville Dam on the Feather River project. This principle has since been merged in the omnibus public-works bill which passed the House last year and was vetoed (for other reasons) by the President, and is currently embodied in this year's omnibus public-works bill (S. 497) which has passed the Senate and was recently voted out of the House Committee on Public Works. Congress has therefore indicated that this is an acceptable principle for Federal-State cooperation in the building of multiple-purpose projects.

Second, that the Federal Government provide a non-interest-bearing loan for the amount of the project cost allocated to irrigation. This procedure would apply the principles of the 50-year-old reclamation law under which non-interest-bearing money is provided by the Federal Government for the development of irrigation projects. It is an expansion of the principle laid down in the small-projects legislation, but of course in this instance is limited to multiple-purpose projects primarily for industrial and municipal water where irrigation water is developed incidental to the main purpose. It is my feeling that Congress would not approve the advance of non-interest-bearing money for construction by the State of a large project primarily for irrigation, but would insist that such a project be built under the present reclamation law if it is to be financed by the Federal Government. I think it important that the traditional function of the Federal Government in building projects under the reclamation law not be invaded. However, I believe there is a good chance of getting Congress to authorize a non-interest-bearing loan to a State for incidental irrigation features of a major project primarily built for industrial and municipal water.

Third, the Federal Government will require a contract to be executed under which the State would agree that the project should be managed in such a fashion as to produce the benefits for which the Federal contribution is made. This follows the present provision for the Federal contribution for the flood-control benefits on the Oroville Dam. As to irrigation, Congress, I am sure, would require that the non-interest-bearing loan for irrigation be subject to the general provisions of reclamation law. However, I expect to propose with reference to the operation of the 160-acre limitation that the same formula be applied as is set forth in the small-projects legislation, namely, that the non-interest-bearing loan apply only to lands in compliance with the 160- or 320-acre limitation and that excess acreage be required to pay an interest charge on the capital cost of supplying those lands with water.

This proposal is intended to be the basis of establishing under general law the character and extent of Federal participation in projects primarily devoted to the supplying of municipal and industrial water. However, I would like to try it on for size in the State of California which, so far as I know, is the only State capable of major financing of its own projects and with water plans of large magnitude already drawn and planned primarily for supplying municipal and industrial water. I have in mind particularly the possible application of this proposal to the financing of the Feather River project, the Biemond plan for the North Bay Aqueduct, and construction of all or part of the projects planned in the north coastal area on the Klamath, Trinity, and Eel Rivers. However, the priority of projects for construction under the State water plan is a matter that rests with State officials and the legislators. Some projects such as the Auburn project are logical and proper extensions of the Central Valley project and should be reserved for Federal construction as a part of that project.

I am especially anxious that this principle be set in motion to develop new water supplies in California. It appears to me that the impasse on California water problems stems from trying to divide too little water among too many people. Southern California interests understandably do not want to buy a pig in a poke—that is, contribute their money to the construction of northern California projects without assurance that southern California will receive benefits from such development. Northern California, on the other hand, doesn't want to promise water deliveries south of the Tehachapis, which may in the future literally leave northern California high and dry.

You will recall that in 1951 I brought a subcommittee to California which sat jointly with the State water committee for the purpose of studying the water problems in the Central Valley project area. We came to the conclusion then that the developed water supplies in the Central Valley project area were overcommitted. We recommended immediate construction of the Trinity River project, and that project has since been authorized and is under construction. However, the water contribution of the Trinity is specifically dedicated to Central Valley project operation. It is contended, as you know, that the Feather River project will not produce sufficient water to permit water deliveries to southern California with adequate margins of safety for future water demands in the north. At the hearings in 1951, serious legal questions were raised as to whether or not the applications made on the Feather River were in conflict with the applications already assigned to the Bureau of Reclamation for operation of the Central Valley project. (See Central Valley project documents, pp. 683 and 701.) I am informed there are interests in California that are prepared to litigate this matter if water deliveries outside of the Central Valley project area are authorized by the State legislature or by constitutional amendment.

I am not saying which side of this argument is right, but with this state of affairs any strictly legal approach will, in my opinion, wind up in the courts for years. There may or may not be a surplus which is physically and legally exportable, but I am sure that, unless new water supplies are developed, the whole proposition will end up in court, delaying water progress in California for as much as a decade. It seems to me imperative that action be taken now to avoid creating a legal Frankenstein that will paralyze water development. The answer is more water—not litigating over what we have.

The importance of this proposal is that it strikes at the real problem, which is the financing of additional water development. I am advised that your subcommittee has announced that it will investigate the economic and financial feasibility of the State water plan. The foregoing proposal has a direct relationship to that study, and I am therefore suggesting that we arrange this fall for another joint meeting of the State and Congressional legislative committees dealing with this subject matter, similar to the one which was so productive in 1951. I have already in draft form legislation to implement the proposal which I have just outlined and would be glad to submit it at an appropriate time to your subcommittee and staff. If this proposal appears to be attractive to you and to your subcommittee, I will be glad to discuss the matter of such a joint hearing. Your early comment on this proposal and the feasibility of a joint meeting with your subcommittee will be appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

CLAIR ENGLE,
Chairman.

An Increase in the Import Duty on Lead and Zinc Is Unnecessary, Unwise, and Against Our National Interest

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. CHARLES A. WOLVERTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker, I look with considerable alarm upon the effort that is being made by certain interests to build an import barrier against lead and zinc. I am fearful that the adoption of a policy as now being advocated might result to our national disadvantage, harmful to the economy of friendly nations, without benefit to the producers of these metals in our own Nation, and distinctly detrimental to our national security.

The situation that would be created by the adoption of pending legislation requires that the matter should have careful and serious consideration. Of course, there is naturally a desire to protect our own lead and zinc producers from unfair competition from other countries. But, from such study as I have made, I am not satisfied that any necessity exists at this time for legislation of the kind suggested. In fact, I am inclined to the belief that, in addition to it not being necessary for the protection of our domestic mining industry, it could prove to be highly disadvantageous to our manufacturing industries that use the metals, and also to our own national interest. Thus, praiseworthy though it may be to protect our domestic lead and zinc mining industry, yet, we must be careful that we are not at the same time doing more harm than good.

Aside from the great harm that the adoption of the proposed legislation would have upon the economies of friendly nations in this Western Hemisphere that supply our national needs, both industrial and defense, the fact remains that such a policy is contrary to the defense policy we have sought to build between the nations of North, Central, and South America and ourselves.

The basis of this defense policy has been to strengthen and stabilize the economies of these nations. The result of pending legislation, if adopted, would be to break down all the good that has been accomplished by the neighborly policy of good will and helpfulness to which I have referred.

As an illustration of the injury that could result to the friendly relations existing between this Nation and our neighbors to the North and South of us, permit me to make reference to the favorable reaction that followed the announcement of President Eisenhower in 1954 that import duties on lead and zinc would not be increased. The news was received with a great sense of relief in Mexico and as a proof of good will toward Mexico and the other lead and zinc importing countries. The President of Mexico expressed these sentiments in his annual state of the Union message to the Mexican Congress as follows:

> The decision of President Eisenhower of not authorizing the increase in lead and zinc tariffs has been greatly appreciated by the Government of Mexico and by the Mexican people who derive their livelihood from mining, because it contributed to avoid a new crisis in our mining industry.

Could anything be more impressive? Could anything be said that would more clearly demonstrate the buildup that a continuation of the Eisenhower policy could have in further strengthening the friendly relationship that now exists between Mexico and ourselves? And, by the same token, is it not easy to realize that a discontinuance or curtailment of that policy could create a very unfavorable attitude? The same considerations and reactions prevail with respect to the other nations similarly affected as Mexico.

It is most gratifying to note that this announcement by President Eisenhower was accepted by the exporting nations of lead and zinc in the spirit of mutual understanding. For instance, when President Eisenhower announced he would not increase the import duty on lead and zinc, he expressed the hope that the exporting countries would not take undue advantage of the solution that he gave to the problem confronting the producing countries by unduly increasing their exports to the United States. And, it is particularly gratifying to further note that the Mexican mining industries observed and complied fully with the wishes of President Eisenhower. Zinc exports from that country to the United States were kept in 1956 at the same level as that of 1953 and lead exports were reduced to about 45 percent of the 1953 figure.

Before any precipitous action is taken by increasing the import duties on lead and zinc, it would be well to study carefully the fact that some of the producing countries which would be adversely affected are among our best customers in the purchase of our products. This is particularly true with respect to Mexico. We should not overlook the fact that Mexico is the third highest United States customer in the entire world. In 1956, for example, Mexico bought from this country goods amounting to $831,100,000, and sold to the United States $404,500,000, leaving an unfavorable balance against Mexico of $426,600,000. These figures taken from the United States Department of Commerce publications—FT–950–1 and 950–E—tell a story too important to be ignored when considering legislation of the kind proposed, which, if adopted, could be highly detrimental to our trade relations with a friendly nation.

There can be no doubt that the adoption of a policy that would eliminate, or even curtail, the exportation of Mexican lead or zinc to this country would strike a vital blow at the Mexican mining industry and could greatly harm the economic status of that country. In this connection, it must be borne in mind that the mining industry is one of Mexico's most important industries. Lead and zinc production in Mexico together represent 55 percent of all mining production. Its importance to the economy of that country can be further understood when it is realized that other metals, such as silver, gold, arsenic, bismuth, and cadmium, are obtained as byproducts of lead-zinc operations. The complete lead-zinc group of metals accounts for 90 percent by value of the total mining production of Mexico.

A further understanding of the vital part the mining industry occupies in the total economy of Mexico can be readily seen when we consider the fact that it employs 70,000 workers in Mexico. Each has an average of 4 dependents, which makes 350,000 persons directly affected, plus thousands who work in allied and related industries. Thus, unemployment, whole or partial, would cause considerable hardship to this large number of people. Furthermore, such restrictions could create political and social problems in Mexico. I have used facts, figures, economic and social considerations based on data relating to Mexico. The same could be duplicated with similar illustrations from other nations that would be equally appropriate.

The closing of mines, wholly or in part, the unemployment that would result, reduced railroad traffic, reduced business activity and foreign trade, independently of foreign exchange complications, could cause a slump in the Mexican economy and that of some other producing countries that would be very serious.

There are many additional considerations that could be appropriately offered as objections to a policy that would increase the import duty on these strategic metals. For instance, the United States is not now and cannot be expected to become self-sufficient in the production of lead and zinc. Thus, aside from the purely economic point of view the proposal is also unsound and unwise from the standpoint of our national security. The United States must depend upon imports for approximately one-third of its requirements for lead and zinc. This has been verified by a report issued by the United States Bureau of Mines in 1956. And, in this connection, it is also well to point out that Mexico and Canada are the only foreign sources of supply that are in a position to ship these strategic materials to us by overland transportation. Incidentally, the same is true of shipments of oil. This should also have our serious consideration as a part of our national security and defense.

It is also worthy to note and emphasize, as we consider this question from the national security and defense angle, that during World War II Mexico supplied the United States with approximately 52 percent of its lead imports and 35 percent of its zinc imports, and that Mexico sold to the United States during the war at prices which were lower than those received by the United States producers. And, as evidence of a close association with the purposes and objectives of the United States in World War II the Mexican Government in agreement with our own Government, prohibited the exportation of strategic materials to any country outside the American Continent and to any American countries that had not adopted similar restrictions, and, at the same time, agreed to supply such materials to our country. All of this was done without formal treaty and on a voluntary basis to enable our two nations in fullest cooperation to make a worthwhile contribution in the winning of the war.

The cooperation that existed during the war has continued during the years following the war. Great progress has been made in building strength and power among the nations of this hemisphere by adopting agreements that bind us and these other nations in strong ties of mutual understanding and cooperate defense, based on the principle of "one for all and all for one."

The value of any such inter-American Treaty of Reciprocal Assistance depends upon the individual economic and industrial strength of each. For this Nation to take any action that would weaken the economic strength of any of our copartners in this great undertaking to maintain the peace and security of each would be against our own best interests.

The adoption of a policy that would produce the adverse results that I have sought to show is inherent in the proposal to increase import duties on lead and zinc and is extremely unwise and should be unthinkable.

Republican Money Policies Versus Small Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, anyone who questions the administration's money and credit policies is promptly labeled an inflationist. Since the first great crusade, our Republican friends have somehow established—at least in their own minds—that they are the party of sound money, while the Democratic Party is the party of inflation.

Actually, the record shows that just the opposite is true. From the very beginning of World War II through the Korean hostilities, the Republican Party, the Republican press, and the Republican Members of the House waged a bitter and highly vocal fight against all of the measures that were adopted in these years to combat inflation. Our Republican friends fought last-ditch battles against price and rent controls, against rationing, and against allocations of production materials and against all of the other measures designed for keeping prices down during the periods of shortages. And at the same time they opposed adequate taxes to sop up purchasing power and to check the rise in the Federal debt.

Indeed, unless my memory of the last two decades is completely faulty, the only policy offered in the name of combating inflation that has received enthusiastic support from the Republican leadership, and from the great majority of Republicans in this body, is the present administration's tight-money and high-interest policy. Certainly, the Republican leadership has not otherwise followed an anti-inflationary course, even since it acquired control of the Government and presumably became responsible. As soon as this administration took office it set about making tax concessions to high-income families and giving all kinds of tax bonuses to the big corporations. And it has created both the framework of Government and the attitude of Government which has been favorable to the repeated big-business price increases which are continually increasing the cost of living.

REPUBLICAN RECORD HAS NOT BEEN ANTI-INFLATIONARY

Our Republican friends' single effort at combating inflation is, to say the least, of doubtful value in restraining inflation. Both logic and experience suggest that the tight-money high-interest policy is causing prices to go up, not down. Curiously enough, however, the tight-money high-interest policy does result in more interest income for the bankers and big investors; and it is resulting in the big industrial corporations gaining greater monopoly control over markets, with less threat of competition from small businesses.

When this administration took office at the beginning of 1953, the cost of living had been almost completely stable for 18 months. Yet the administration immediately embarked upon a high-interest tight-money policy for the purpose of stabilizing prices. The Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board have been coordinating their actions in pursuit of this policy, with increasing dosages of high interest, ever since. It is true that these agencies backed away from the policy in late 1953 and early 1954, after an overzealous application of the policy brought on a business recession, but the country's reprieve was quite brief. Late in 1954, the money managers were on a new spree of raising interest rates, only to find with each increase in interest rates there was a further increase in industrial prices. For many months these mounting industrial prices were not reflected in the cost of living, for the simple reason that the props were being pulled from under farm prices and farm prices were falling correspondingly. But when farm prices finally sank to the new floor, the cost of living index started rising; it has now risen for the 12th consecutive month—to the highest level in history.

Where do we stand now? Interest rates have been raised to the highest level since the bank holiday of 1933, yet the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board is calling for even tighter bank credit, and the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, is calling for even lower farm price supports.

Now to question this administration's policies does not mean that the questioner is in favor of inflation. Obviously, there are times when the Federal Government should conduct its affairs so as to counter inflationary forces; there are times when Federal policies should be calculated to counter deflation and depression; and there are times to be neutral.

HOW DO WE HAVE INFLATION WITHOUT SHORTAGES?

The pertinent question today is therefore: Are we in a period when anti-inflationary measures are appropriate? I say, "No," certainly not the kind of measures that are being used for the purpose.

It may be true, as many people say, that some new kind of Government machinery is needed to restrain price increases in those industries where monopoly power has been acquired, and prices can be raised arbitrarily. But this is not a problem that is peculiar to a period of inflation; the monopoly power which can raise prices in times of inflation can be used, and is used, to raise prices also in times of depression.

As for the kind of inflation which comes from shortages of goods, productive capacity or labor—this has long since disappeared. True, the official spokesmen for tight money still think they can see such shortages at work. For more than 18 months now, the chairman of the Federal Reserve has been proclaiming that "too many dollars are chasing too few goods," and the recently retired Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Humphrey, insisted too, that shortages are at the bottom of the price increases.

Several committees of Congress have been asking where, specifically, are these shortages to be found? Where are there shortages of materials? Where are there shortages of labor? And where are there shortages of plant capacity? The truth is that there are substantial surpluses of both goods and productive capacity in most sectors of the economy, but it is rather difficult to find any place where there is any shortage of either goods or productive resources.

The argument about shortages should have been exploded by now. The chairman of the Federal Reserve System has been invited again and again to point to some specific shortages which he thinks he sees. He has finally agreed that he can point to no specific shortages of any consequence. On August 1 of this year, he finally told the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House that there are today no basic shortages. He said:

> Now the problem today, as I see it, is that we have had a high level of activity for some time, and there are no basic shortages in the economy with the exception of the shortage of savings, but this high level activity is at inflated prices.

Yet, while Chairman Martin has finally agreed that there are no specific shortages, he now maintains that there are shortages in general. He told the Senate Finance Committee, on August 13, that—

> As a nation, we have been trying to spend more than we earn through production.

In other words, we are now being given a theory that the total is bigger than the sum of its parts. With all due respect for Chairman Martin, I say that his thesis is nonsensical.

In such an economic system as ours, it is, of course, possible to purchase more than is produced—for a brief period of time. But such a period of dissavings would come about only when the Nation's store of business goods is being used up faster than it is being replaced. Manufacturer and retailer inventories have been increasing, not decreasing. And new productive equipment is being acquired at a phenomenal rate—an estimated $37 billion per year—which must certainly be greater than the rate at which existing plant and equipment is being worn out or becoming obsolete.

CAN CONSUMERS CREATE BIG-BUSINESS COMPETITION?

Under these circumstances it is both foolish and misleading to say that the Nation is trying to buy more than is being produced. It would be more to the point to recognize that the big-business industries are trying to sell what they produce at higher and higher prices.

But the official explainers seem to prefer to go anywhere and everywhere, except to the point. After many months of being treated to a propaganda line which has strongly suggested that labor has been responsible for the increasing prices, we are now treated to a shift in emphasis which, of all things, blames consumers for the price increases. Faulty diagnosis of the disease will not lead to a cure, but to bad treatment. Thus, as I see it, the President's new call for action, which is to admonish consumers to buy wisely—not to go on a buyers' strike, but to shop around and avoid paying foolish prices—involves the absurd notion that consumers should take on the burden of stimulating competition among the Nation's suppliers, while the administration pursues money and credit policies that bring about a state of competition which gives consumers even less protection.

TIGHT MONEY IS THE WRONG CURE FOR THE WRONG DISEASE

But perhaps I misjudge the balance of inflationary forces at work today. Let us assume for a moment that inflationary forces are in the ascendancy, and let us assume also, despite all of the evidence to the contrary, that the increases in interest rates, which add to the cost of the retailer, the wholesaler, the manufacturer, and the raw materials producer, have not been multiplied and reflected in consumer prices. Let us assume further that the present tendency of big business toward high-price and low-production policies is not encouraged by the tight-money squeeze on consumers and small business. In short, let us assume—contrary to all appearances—that some active measure for combating inflation is actually needed. Making these assumptions, then let us ask what is wrong with the tight-money high-interest method of fighting inflation?

I say that everything is wrong with this method of fighting inflation. It benefits no one but the bankers and the big investors, it has unwholesome effects on the Nation's education and health, and it involves discriminations and distortions in the economic system which will bring about more monopoly control and more high prices.

In the first place the high interest rates—which are claimed to be a necessary part of tight money—are causing the greatest cutback in the very activities which are most needed. These are the activities of building schools, building homes and building hospitals, and building other badly needed State and municipal facilities. The high-interest rates have simply priced out of the market much of the activity of these kinds. It is in these activities that the effect of increased financing costs are most clear; and it is in these activities that the cure is at least no better than the disease.

TIGHT MONEY SQUEEZES SMALL BUSINESS—HELPS BIG BUSINESS

But within the business system itself tight money does make a vital difference. The tight-money policy is rapidly weakening and undermining the position of small business. Yet this policy has little, if any, effect on the volume of capital available to the big corporations; it has not even succeeded—if it were intended to succeed—in dampening the big corporations' recordbreaking capital expansion. In short, the policy affects the big corporations not at all, except to promise them a future of more secure control over markets with less rivalry from small competitors. The reasons for this are not hard to trace.

In the first place, the mechanics of the tight-money policy are to limit the growth of commercial banks' credit. This means that the credit squeeze is put on about the only source of capital available to small firms.

The big corporations can still sell stock, issue bonds, and borrow from the insurance companies and the investment bankers. But these sources of capital are not, as a practical matter, generally open to small firms.

Furthermore, not only has bank credit been limited, but the high-interest policy has caused the big corporations to shift their credit demands on to the commercial banks, and thus to cut into the credit supply which would otherwise be available to small firms. According to the press reports, managers of many of the big corporations are not convinced that the new high-interest rates on bonds and other long-term debentures can be made to stick. Consequently, the big corporations with expansion programs are turning to the commercial banks for temporary financing, hoping to postpone permanent financing until interest rates come down again.

Thus we are told that the banks are in a position of having to ration a limited supply of credit among small and large borrowers—and, of course, there have been some claims from the bankers that they are rationing fairly, and taking care of their small-business customers as a matter of policy. Why would we expect the banks to ration a supply of credit to small borrowers, when the big corporations, the banks' biggest depositors, are demanding the same credit—any more so in a period of tight money than in normal periods of easy money?

The truth of the matter is that the rationing of bank credit is not new or peculiar to periods of tight money. If it were, we would have to find that the bankers have adopted a new way of doing business and acquired new motivations in place of their normal motivations. Actually, the supply of bank credit is never allocated by the price of money. But, as we know, the banks set interest rates and then choose between the applicants at predetermined rates. Bank interest rates then are a matter of convention, determined by current notions of what is proper and ethical and, particularly, by what the Federal Reserve System is willing to agree to.

TIGHT MONEY AND HIGH INTEREST ARE SEPARATE POLICIES

It is for the very reason that there is no direct and necessary connection between the supply of bank credit and interest rates that the Federal money-managers could have tightened bank credit, had they cared to do so, without raising interest rates. This has been clearly recognized by the Federal Reserve System over the years past whenever the System wanted to loosen credit. On these occasions the Federal Reserve did not reduce interest rates, as a means of increasing the credit supply, but it reduced required bank reserves. For example, in July 1953 and again in June of 1954, when the money-managers had a temporary policy of loosening credit, the Federal Reserve did not reduce interest rates, it reduced reserve requirements of its member banks. This meant that each dollar reduction in reserve requirements was a dollar freed for lending; and under our fractional-reserve banking system, it actually meant that the banks could lend up to $6 for each dollar reduction in required reserves.

Since each time the Federal Reserve System wanted to loosen credit, it reduced reserve requirements and thus made more money available, why, we might ask, has it not raised reserve requirements on any of the dozen or so occasions in the past 2 years when it has acted to tighten credit? The record shows that on each of these occasions the Reserve System has either initiated a general rise in interest rates by raising the Reserve banks' discount rate, or it has shown a ready willingness to raise the discount rate immediately after one or two big banks announced a raise in their commercial rates. In either case, the results are the same: all bank rates go up correspondingly with an increase in the discount rate—which demonstrates a remarkable instance of the tail wagging the dog. The Reserve banks' loans, discounts, and advances outstanding—in short the amount of credit on which the discount rate applies—amounts to less than 1 percent of the commercial banks loans outstanding.

The tight-money policy and the high-interest policy would not therefore seem to be directly connected, except for the possibility that our Federal money managers may have felt that the high-interest policy would be fair compensation to the bankers for their accepting the tight-money policy. Or possibly the tight-money policy has been advanced only as an excuse to justify the high-interest policy. These observations are arguable, of course, but certainly the great majority of the banks very much like the net result of the two policies. Indeed, the banking community has taken the lead in demanding and propagandizing for these policies.

TIGHT MONEY HAS THE EFFECT OF REPEALING ANTITRUST LAWS

Under the tight-money policy, the volume of loans outstanding to small business has probably not declined. On the contrary, it is probable that there has been some expansion in the volume.

But those of us who have been especially concerned about a continuing place for small business are not concerned merely with whether the small firms already in business will survive. A proper perspective of the values at stake require that we be concerned also over whether there is a continuing opportunity for new small firms to be created and for small firms to keep pace in the tremendous expansion of business capacity now taking place. It is against the backdrop of the tremendous expansion of business capacity now taking place—all of which requires capital—that we get the import of the tight-money squeeze on small business.

Prof. Kenneth Galbraith, of the Harvard School of Economics, recently caught the import, and he summed it up this way:

> We should recognize that monetary policy as it is now being practiced is a magnificent instrument for promoting centralization. A move at the present time to repeal the antitrust laws would, without doubt, excite considerable opposition. But it might contribute less markedly to industrial concentration than a long continuation of monetary restraints in their present form. These deny to the smaller and weaker firm the funds on which growth or even survival may depend. The large and the strong tend to get them. The consequences must be clear.[1]

Such ideas as these expressed by Professor Galbraith are, of course, quite contrary to the impression that some of the big bankers, and the banker associations have tried to give by the various speeches, reports, and so forth, which they have been circulating. These bankers have been trying to knock down all criticisms of the tight-money policy and hence have felt it necessary to assure the public that big borrowers really are not in any favored position, when it comes to obtaining bank credit, but that the banks are all judiciously dividing up their limited credit so as to give small borrowers at least a proportionate share. Noting these banker statements, Professor Galbraith remarked in the same article, that—

> In recent months commercial bankers have been sensitive about the suggestion that the smaller and weaker borrowers have been losing out. Some have come perilously close to claiming that their least valued clients get their first consideration.

NEW CLAIMS THAT BANKERS FAVOR WEAKEST CUSTOMERS

None of the bankers, to my knowledge, has made any direct or outright claim that they are showing a preference for their least valued and least influential clients. But recently they have found a college professor who makes the claims for them.

Recently I received a letter from the public relations department of the American Bankers Association enclosing a paper titled "Monetary Policy, Tight Money, and Small Business," by Prof. R. G. Thomas, of Purdue University. The publicity man's letter assures me that because of my interest in small business I will be interested in the contents of Professor Thomas' paper, a paper which not only argues a justification for the tight-money policy in general—on the grounds of excessive pressure upon the productive capacity of the country—but concludes that small business has not been "the victim of tight money discrimination to the advantage of the large business firms."

Since I suspect that other Members of the House have received copies of that paper, I would like to take a few moments to point out what seems to me the technical weaknesses in the facts and arguments which led Professor Thomas to conclude that small business has not borne a disproportionate burden of the tight-money policy.

Specifically, the factual basis for the professor's conclusions consists of certain extremely skimpy statistics pertaining to the very small commercial banks and to the very large commercial banks. No reference is made, and no statistic is offered, bearing on the question of whether the banks in the size range between $10 million in deposits and $250 million in deposits have increased or decreased their loans to small business in the tight-money period.

According to a survey made by the Federal Reserve Board of its member banks in October of 1955, banks with between $10 million and $250 million in deposits accounted for 57 percent of all the member bank credit extended to business firms having assets of less than $50,000, and such banks accounted for 56 percent of the credit extended to borrowers having assets of less than $250,000.

Nevertheless the professor draws conclusions about the effects of tight money on the lending of all commercial banks, even though the facts are missing for banks which supply about half of the small-business credit.

SMALL BANKS LEND TO BIG BORROWERS

What about the smaller banks? According to the Federal Reserve survey, member banks having less than $10 million in deposits supply between 26 and 32 percent of the member-bank credit extended to small firms. The professor reasons thusly: Since banks with less than $10 million in deposits usually cannot, as a matter of law, lend more than $100,000 to a single borrower, then—

> Clearly these 11,500 banks must lend mainly to the small, local business firms and even if they wished they could not discriminate in favor of big business against the smaller firms.

That conclusion is clear only because it overlooks certain important facts. First, the legal limit refers only to the amount which a bank can lend to a single borrower; it does not limit the amount which a big borrower can borrow from a number of different banks. It is common practice for big corporations to maintain multiple banking connections, and to split their borrowings among the banks.

Second, it is common practice for the small banks to have their loans made for them by larger, correspondent banks, in which case they usually participate in pool loans to large borrowers. It is by way of indirect payment to the larger banks for service in placing loans that small bankers keep funds on deposit, interest free, with the larger banks.

So much for the facts and the arguments about the smaller banks and the medium-size banks—banks which together supply about 70 to 75 percent of all the small business credit. The statistics cited by Professor Thomas reveal nothing. They do not tell us whether these banks made more or less credit available to small business, in a period of tight money, nor do they indicate whether big firms have obtained more or less credit from these banks.

BIG BANKS LEND TO BIG BORROWERS

What now about the very large banks? For his facts on this subject, Professor Thomas leans on a survey conducted by the American Bankers Association covering 78 of the Nation's largest banks. The survey made comparisons for August 31, 1955 and August 31, 1956, a period when bank credit was being tightened. This survey indicated that the 78 of the Nation's largest banks increased their loans to small business—or at least their business loans in small amounts—in this period of tightening credit. Specifically, the survey indicated that outstanding loans in amounts of less than $50,000 increased by 14 percent within the year, and that outstanding loans in amounts of less than $100,000 also increased by 14 percent.

These facts greatly impressed Professor Thomas and led him to assume that there had been a 14-percent increase in all small business loans, a percentage which he proceeded to compare with a 5.5-percent increase in the gross national product for the same period.

[1] Are Living Costs Out of Control? by John Kenneth Galbraith, the Atlantic Monthly, February 1957, p. 40.

> A 14-percent increase in the dollar amount of loans to small business during a period of tight money certainly does not appear unreasonably restrictive in the face of an increase of only 5.5 percent in the gross national product for the same period.

As the reports of the House Small Business Committee have pointed out, however, the volume of small business loans extended by the 78 biggest banks is in no sense a measure of whether commercial banks as a whole have extended more or less credit to small business. The 78 top banks in the ABA survey are in no sense typical of the banks from which small firms obtain credit. Among other things, the smaller banks lacked the forevision exercised by the big banks in unloading their Government bonds, before the price drop, thus acquiring added loan funds. Turning again to the Federal Reserve survey, we find that the 97 biggest banks—those having deposits of more than $250 million—accounted for 77 percent of all the business loans outstanding; but they accounted for only 25 percent of the loans outstanding to firms having assets of under $50,000; and they accounted for only 30 percent of the loans outstanding to firms having assets of under $250,000. Clearly the Nation's biggest banks are not the main supply of credit for small firms.

ABA'S STATISTICS OMIT COMPARISONS

How, then, we might ask, did the ABA's 78 very untypical banks' increased lending in small loans compare with their lending in large loans? Did the total business loans of these banks go up more or less than 14 percent between August 1955 and August 1956? Unfortunately, this is a fact that the ABA report neglected to supply, although it is the one easy fact that such a survey is automatically expected to supply.

BIG FIRMS GET CREDIT AND EXPAND

Professor Thomas' paper does, however, make reference to published Federal Reserve data which bears on the subject. These data show that in the same period when small-business loans of the 78 top banks increased 14 percent, total commercial loans made by central Reserve city banks—New York and Chicago—increased by 28 percent, and total commercial loans made by Reserve city banks—49 cities—increased by 18 percent. In light of these facts, Professor Thomas poses the question, "Does this not indicate that the big borrowers in the big cities were under less restraint than were the small borrowers?"

And in answering his question, the professor shifts the grounds of his argument. He observes that "the relatively greater increase in loans to big borrowers by the big city banks does not necessarily mean that these borrowers were not subject to credit restrictions," because "the pressure on large business for loan accommodation was probably greater than on the smaller firms."

And why was the "pressure for loans greater on large firms"? Principally because "many of these firms, with expansion plans under way, found the long-term capital markets unappetizing because of higher interest rates and turned to the big city banks for temporary financing."

In other words, the firms which are expanding most need to raise the most capital—which is what the critics of the tight-money policy have been saying all along, except that we have added two pertinent facts. One, the firms that expand are the firms that can obtain the capital for expansion. Two, while the long-term capital markets may presently seem merely unappetizing to the big corporations, these markets at all times are closed to small firms, so when the big corporations shift their capital demands onto the commercial banks they are taking up the only credit normally available to small business.

COST OF BIG FINANCE POLICIES IS TOO HIGH

Sometimes I think the country is paying too high a cost for having too much big banker and big business control over the Government. When we fight inflationary forces that do not exist, by methods that increase prices, the cost is too high. When we have a high interest policy which flattens the bankers at the expense of sacrificing needed schools, hospitals, and homes, the cost is too high. When we have a tight-money policy that weakens small business, weakens competition, and weakens consumer protection, the cost is too high.

The Recent June Decisions of the Supreme Court

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WINT SMITH

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SMITH of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the recent June decisions of the Supreme Court have caused more comment among all groups of Americans than any other decisions of the Court within the last 50 years.

The hurricane of protests is not confined to just people in right-wing groups, nor to those citizens who write letters to the editor. Neither is this indignation confined to the speeches of—as the liberal press likes to say—hotheaded rural Congressmen, but to bar associations, judicial councils, Federal judges and 3,000 members of the American bar assembled in London—who all speak out openly against these June decisions.

What is the basic cause of all this alarm regarding these decisions? In the opinion of most observers, this outcry is caused by the well-founded belief that for many long years the Congress—and for the last 5 years the Presidency—has been pointing out the necessity of passing laws to curb the inroads of communism at home and to build roadblocks against communism all over the world with United States tax dollars.

This expressed attitude by the Congress and the Presidency can now well be destroyed by these recent decisions.

It is an obvious fact that any government exists to protect the well-being of its whole society. It seems highly significant that our country which has spent billions upon billions within the last 8 years fighting international communism throughout the world and now by these decisions to be told by this Warren Court that communism is no present danger.

Something seems to have happened to the thinking of this Court, because just a few years ago in a Supreme Court decision we find these words: "It"—communism—"is a clear and present danger."

That was the sentiment expressed with regard to the theft of bomb secrets.

It is now frequently asked, "What does the Court mean? If the Communists can destroy nations by subversion and infiltration, why maintain and spend untold billions for military defense?"

I am sure that even the man in the street, far removed from the semantics of legal phrases, full well knows that if our Government goes down he will have nothing to hope for from the communistic system that will take its place. The average American believes that self-preservation should be the first duty of this Government. He does not expect his Government to be so virtuous about theoretical citizens' rights that he, Mr. Average American, will become a mere number in a slave camp or just a corpse.

And, above all else, Mr. Average American is not so naive as to believe that communism is just another shade of political opinion.

There is another belief held by most American citizens which is simply this: The Supreme Court should be just as anxious to protect the Nation itself as to the theoretical rights of Communists who have openly avowed their belief in the forceful overthrow of our Government.

Most of the criticism now directed at the Supreme Court is not at the third branch of our Government, but at the individuals on this bench. Most Americans believe that these men who write decisions on the Supreme Court should not be swayed by pressure groups.

Most assuredly, most citizens did not approve of the Supreme Court Justices going to New York City to testify as to the "sterling and unimpeachable character" of Alger Hiss, who was convicted for perjury for denying he turned over stolen documents to Communist agents.

It might also be well to remember that Alger Hiss in his early years was one of "these bright young law clerks" who help Justices of the Supreme Court in writing decisions.

I am sure it was never intended by the founders of our Government that political expedient politicians should be appointed to the Court instead of men well founded in the law. When mere political expediency creeps into decisions, the whole governmental structure is in danger. These recent Warren Court decisions seem to all point to the fact that anyone whose loyalty to the United States is questioned always receives a favorable decision.

These June decisions on communism were particularly denunciatory of the Committee on Un-American Activities and its investigations. The Court found fault with the resolution creating the Committee on Un-American Activities in 1938.

Here is a copy of the resolution of Congress creating the committee:

> The Committee on Un-American Activities, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to make from time to time investigations of (I) the extent, character, and objects of un-American propaganda activities in the United States; (II) the diffusion within the United States of subversive and un-American propaganda that is instigated from foreign countries or of a domestic origin and attacks the principle of the form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution; and (III) all other questions in relation thereto that would aid Congress in any necessary remedial legislation.

Read it again. Do you have difficulty in determining what this committee was authorized to do or to investigate?

The intent seems to be plain to most citizens, but not the Supreme Court.

Here is what they said in one of their recent decisions:

> It would be difficult to imagine a less explicit authorizing resolution. Who can define the meaning of Un-American?

What is the basic form of government as guaranteed by our Constitution? It would seem that someone on the Court has failed to remember section 4 of article 4, a provision in the Constitution which says:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government and shall protect each of them against invasion * * * and against domestic violence.

The Court apparently does not recognize the dangers of infiltration, sabotage, the designs of fellow travelers, or the complexities of a modern society. This decision seems to point out that only when armed resistance breaks out would the States or the Federal Government be justified in protecting themselves from the Communist menace that everyone seems to be aware of except the Warren Court.

This decision to me points out most convincingly that the rights of the Congress, the Executive, and the States have been usurped by the Court.

It is all very well to say, "Oh, yes, Congress has the right to investigate for purposes of writing legislation." But the words are a bit hollow sounding in view of the Supreme Court's repeated decisions on communism.

It is all very well for Chief Justice Warren to write about academic freedom and political expression in the classrooms as he did in the Sweezy case, but it is difficult for some to see the difference between a professor lecturing his students on the benefits of communism and another professor's teaching his students the art of secret writing and making microfilm and how to set fires secretly. The basic design in both is to destroy our form of government.

But of course, these new guardians of Communist liberties might see a difference, but it is doubtful.

It will be somewhat difficult for future historians to find the basic reason why the judicial branch of our Government became the chief foe of the anti-Communists in America. To date, these anti-Communist foes, through their decisions, seem to be in the ascendancy; namely, Warren, Frankfurter, Black, and Douglas.

Running through many of these comments on the June decisions is this one question: "Who writes these opinions?"

In the U. S. News & World Report, July 12, 1957, is an article entitled "The Bright Young Men Behind the Bench." This article infers that these law clerks freshly arrived from law schools are influential in the opinions expressed.

Before we start condemning and blaming the faceless and almost nameless clerks, let us examine some records and recall from our memories a few well-known facts. It seems strange that memories can be so short.

Who is the most powerful man on the Court? It is Earl Warren, because he is the Chief Justice. He can wield terrific power, if he so desires.

From the intellectual aspect, many would say Felix Frankfurter holds the reins of power. All informed persons know of Frankfurter's background, training, ancestry, and close associates. One only has to read his decisions since he has been a member of the Court to see through the semantic smokescreen of his judicial decisions.

In looking into the background and writings of Felix Frankfurter, we sometimes find strange words that seemed a bit puzzling at the time they were written.

The Justice said this:

> If facts are changing, law cannot be static. So-called immutable principles must accommodate themselves to the facts of life, for facts are stubborn and will not yield. In truth, what are now deemed immutable principles once themselves grew out of living conditions. (Law and Politics.)

Does that mean, since we have long since passed out of an agricultural economy into an industrial one, that we must now adopt socialistic-communistic principles?

Here are some more direct words written by Justice Frankfurter:

> The history of the Supreme Court is not the history of an abstraction, but the analysis of individuals acting as a court who make decisions and lay down doctrines * * * and sometimes even overrule the decisions of their predecessors, reinterpreting and transmitting their doctrines. (Law and Politics.)

Did the famous liberal Justice have the present decisions in mind when he wrote the foregoing?

Justice Hugo Black's court experience was only as a police judge in an obscure village in Alabama. His decisions reveal through the years no sign of any approach to a basic American problem except that "We can't hunt witches or burn books." He has lived peacefully, bouncing back and forth from one side to the other.

Justice Black on several occasions in the past has upheld the right of Congressional committees to investigate all corporate practices and was severe in his comments that corporations had no right of secrecy nor could they withhold necessary information from a Congressional committee.

Listen to him rave at a corporation:

> There is no power on earth that can tear away the veil behind which powerful and audacious and unscrupulous groups operate, save the sovereign legislative power armed with the right of subpena and search.

A great many people will wonder why the Justice from Alabama won't see any dangers from Moscow's agents and that none of them are powerful, audacious, unscrupulous in their attempt to infiltrate schools, homes, churches, and factories of America with but one ultimate objective in mind—destroy America.

Justice Brennan has no long record on the bench, but before coming to the Supreme Court he was no Judge Medina in his approach to this country's gravest world problem, namely communism.

William O. Douglas, the climber of Asiatic peaks in far-off lands, has never been noted for climbing any American peaks of lofty ideals. He has just been going along for the ride, except for occasional bird walks on obscure trails. He is a westerner who succumbed very easily to the taints and tarnish of the international aspect of all domestic problems.

Let us take a little look into the background of the Chief Justice, Earl Warren. There are perhaps quite a number of people who over the past years have heard Earl Warren say, "We have nothing to fear from communism."

The chief source of Warren's so-called influence is that he assigns the cases to the various justices for the writing of the opinions. It is apparent that the man who writes the opinion makes a lot of difference, because the reasoning behind the decision in many cases is as important as the decision itself. It is well to remember also that Warren assigned himself to write the sociological opinion in the school case in 1954, and in some of the recent Communist cases, Warren wrote the opinion.

Communists and socialists have long recognized socialized medicine as the first step in organizing a totalitarian state. Warren in California always worked for and advocated socialized medicine.

He and CIO bosses and Harry Bridges advocated socialized medicine. Warren in California always advocated an FEPC law.

In 1944 Warren helped Harry Bridges and other CIO leaders defeat a right-to-work law in California. This law would have freed the unions from the despotic rule of labor racketeers.

Warren was against the ruling of the board of regents in California requiring loyalty oaths for professors.

It is reported at the 1950 governors' conference, at which Dean Acheson spoke, only Governor Warren praised Dean Acheson's speech.

During the campaign of 1948, both Time and Newsweek reported that Warren had asked the national campaign managers to soft pedal the issue on communism.

And always remember, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, as Governor of California, twice tried unsuccessfully to put over socialized medicine in California.

Justice Holmes once wrote in an opinion:

> The life of the law is not logic but experience.

It is to be hoped that the good Chief Justice will listen to those words and remember law and precedent are fundamental if we are to survive as a Nation.

The Watkins case was one of those decided in the recent so-called June decisions:

> We must condemn the practice of imputing a sinister meaning to the exercise of a person's constitutional rights under the fifth amendment * * *. The privilege against self-incrimination would be reduced to hollow mockery if its exercise could be taken as equivalent either to a confession of guilt or a conclusive assumption of perjury.

Yet let us look back a few years in the Supreme Court decision with regard to the Teapot Dome scandal. This decision is quite different, the Court said:

> Men with honest motives and purposes do not remain silent when their honor is assailed. * * * These gentlemen have the right to remain silent * * * but a court of equity has the right to draw reasonable and proper inferences in the case.

That clearly represents a changed view of the Court. When some barrels of oil were involved, you can use those inferences. But when the decision involves the control of communism in the United States and the protection of this country against the menace of international communism, you must not draw any inferences because a witness refuses to answer questions.

In final analysis it will be most tragic if a majority of the Court continues to follow the Warren, Black, Frankfurter, Douglas line. It may be too much to hope for but "hope springs eternal."

Let us hope that this Supreme Court can again revert to law and precedent rather than expediency and an expanding sociological concept of a planned blueprint society, in which the social engineers are preeminent.

Law and precedent stabilize and give society a permanent base for a complicated society.

These opinions and beliefs are pointed out simply to point up the fact that it is often difficult to throw overboard some firmly ingrained beliefs. And for some—even while sitting on the bench—to again not hear voices in the air of some phony political philosophers of times long past.

These are members of the Court, and their personal past history should be remembered when these June decisions on communism are discussed. It is also to be remembered that these men were not elected—they were appointed.

It has always been assumed that the President and Congress made the basic policies in all matters concerning the welfare of the people of the United States. Hence, these policymaking decisions in regard to the control of communism by the Warren Court came as quite a shock to many people. It was a great shock because most thinking Americans have believed for a long time that their heavy tax load, with American soldiers stationed in 69 countries of the world, 30,000 dead American soldiers in Korea, the continued draft of their own sons and relatives, was all due solely to the dangers of worldwide communism.

Not only does the rank and file American know what communism means, but students of history, both amateur and professional, realize the method used by the Communists and intellectual fellow travelers has always been the Trojan-horse approach. Everyone seems to know of this except the black-robed men on the Warren Court.

There is no other conclusion that can be reached except that this Warren Court has now thrown its protective cloak around the fellow travelers and Communists. The Court is simply blind to the reality of our times.

These decisions grant an absolute immunity and aid to known Communists and fellow travelers. They place individual Communist rights above national security.

Very few people seem to realize that these June decisions of the Warren Court wiped out not only Federal legislation but State legislation. And again the field of States rights was invaded not by the President, not by the Congress, but by the Court.

When you wipe out another States rights concept that States cannot pass their own sedition laws, you just put one more nail in the coffin they are constructing to destroy all States rights.

Jefferson once said:

> There is no danger I apprehend so much as the consolidation of our Government by the noiseless and therefore unalarming instrumentality of the Supreme Court.

We should also remember that ancient Rome existed for 800 years under the classic maxim that the safety of the nation was the supreme law. There are some who seem to think that the Warren Court's attitude toward communism can best be summed up by saying it seems more concerned about protecting the big bad wolf of communism than of Little Red Riding-hood.

Perhaps some will doubt the propriety of a Member of Congress pointing out some of the anticipated effects of these decisions. Justice Clark, a member of this Supreme Court in a dissenting opinion in the Watkins case, put it this way:

> The Court has become the grand inquisitor and supervisor of Congressional investigations.

But why has the Court suddenly become so enamored with its position and why seek so much power? The answer to this question is not hard to find if one only remembers, reads, listens, and looks at the mores of the times. The attitude of the Court and its decisions is nothing more nor less than the natural product of 20 years of New Deal-Fair Deal and now modern republicanism concepts.

These June decisions and others for the past several years clearly show that the Court is listening to the siren voices for the substitution of demagogic political welfare state panaceas instead of "Equal justice under law."

And all history points out the necessity of trying to curb unlimited power. Lord Chatham expressed it this way:

> Unlimited power corrupts the possessor and this I know, that where the law ends, there tyranny begins.

The President can only be elected now to two terms. During his second term he cannot control with the unseen power he has in his first term. As his second term diminishes, his power and political prestige declines.

There are few persons of mature stature and judgment who believe that maybe some of the members of the Supreme Court see an opportunity in this amendment to the Constitution to assume and arrogate to themselves more power.

That it will permit the Court to assume more power because after all the Court in final analysis is the creature of the President. This danger is apparent because this present Warren Court is superliberal, if not radical. Maybe some members think they can assume the cloak of more false liberalism because of the waning power of the Executive in the last years of his final term.

What will be the eventual outcome of these pro-Communist decisions? It seems clear that Congress should take the lead in wiping out these incredible decisions. It is to be hoped that the Judicial Subcommittee appointed to investigate these decisions will come up with the necessary answer.

There is a famous motto cut in the marble canopy in letters 3 feet high above the entrance of the Supreme Court Building, it reads: "Equal justice under law."

The general American public wants the Supreme Court to follow this motto and forget the theory that they should write sociological decisions to achieve their false ideas of social justice for enemies of this Republic.

This Warren Court seemingly is determined to build up the doctrine that the idea of a limited government must give way to the ideal of totalitarianism.

Congress still has the power to change this direction of travel, but it cannot do it by sitting idly by and letting these decisions go unnoticed. Congress has still not been completely captured by the leftwingers and the internationalists.

Congress still controls the purse strings and can create such inferior courts as it deems advisable and designate the duties and procedures of these courts.

Congress has always had and still has the power to curb "a bad court" because the Congress gets its powers from the people and the courts get theirs from the Congress.

The Eisenhower Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN SHERMAN COOPER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, on August 8, 1957, Senator CAPEHART, of Indiana, offered a report on the 4½-year period of the Eisenhower administration. I wish to reprint portions of this report and then to indicate some of the advancements which Kentucky has enjoyed since the beginning of the 85th Congress.

Mr. CAPEHART said in his report to the Senate:

"Mr. President, I believe the facts show that this Nation is well on the way to an even more enduring peace and to an expanding economy which will assure gainful employment and happy, comfortable living for every family making up the rapidly increasing population of our Nation.

"The way to these achievements is not easy.

"On all counts it is fraught with fatal dangers—suicidal war and/or economic collapse, or both.

"That is why we have a weighty obligation to proceed with a maximum of caution and a minimum of strictly partisan consideration toward the enactment of those laws—the establishment of those policies—most likely to avoid ruinous inflation, international chaos, or economic stalemate.

"Thus, it is obvious that the dominant reason for our phenomenal growth is the fact that we established, developed, and encouraged a private enterprise system under which the tenant farm boy of today can become the farm owner of tomorrow; the factory worker of today can become the factory owner of tomorrow; the poor immigrant boy of today can become the leading citizen of tomorrow; and all of us possess the right to progress in proportion to our own initiative and ability.

"Thus, I say that one of the most important accomplishments of this administration has been to restore confidence in and encourage the development of the basic principle of our greatest asset, the American system of government.

"LABOR HAS BENEFITED

"The national product, national income, and employment are necessarily tied together.

"I mentioned that employment is nearly 67 million, more than 4 million above the same time in 1952.

"Since we are talking about workers, let us see how labor has fared.

"Legislatively speaking, the Republican record shines.

"When Republicans controlled the 83d Congress the following legislation was passed:

"1. Provision for increasing the amount of vocational rehabilitation.

"2. Railroad retirement benefits were increased.

"3. Unemployment insurance was strengthened.

"4. Unemployment insurance was extended to 4 million more employees.

"5. Tax deduction was granted for private pension benefits.

"6. Federal workers were given unemployment compensation and many fringe benefits, including life insurance.

"7. District of Columbia unemployment insurance increased.

"Since that 83d Republican Congress, only two of the administration's 13 recommended labor programs have been approved by the Congress, but those two can be credited to the Republican administration.

"They were:

"1. Increase from $35 to $50 the maximum compensation benefits for longshoremen, District of Columbia residents, and others in Federal jurisdiction.

"2. Regulation of interstate transportation of migratory workers. The other 11, including revision of the Taft-Hartley Act, went by the boards.

"The lack of progress legislatively after the 83d Republican Congress did not prevent the Department from making a sensational record by enforcement of the laws which existed.

"For example:

"Under the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Walsh-Healey Act the Department recovered $1,250,000 in back wages for workers.

"That's half a million dollars more than in the 4 years before Eisenhower.

"A total of $1,443,800 was recovered under the Walsh-Healey Act, 5 times as much as in the previous 4 years.

"Over $833,000 has been recovered for workers under the Davis-Bacon Act, almost 3 times as much as in the previous 3 years.

"Investigations alone prompted the payment of over $7 million in back wages for 88,800 employees in 14 months.

"From 1950 through 1952 one contractor paid $502 fine for failing to pay his workers for overtime under the 8-hour law.

"In 1956 alone, 19 contractors were found guilty of the same offense and paid fines totaling $22,665. For all 4 years the penalties totaled $41,145 as compared with $525 in the previous 4 years.

"Davis-Bacon enforcement cases under Eisenhower Republicans totaled 1,143 in 3 years and 453 more were started in the fourth year as compared to a total of 476 cases in the previous 3 years.

"From 1935 through 1952—17 years—only 4 contracting firms were blacklisted under the Davis-Bacon Act. Since 1953, 50 firms and 64 individuals have been forced to comply with the law.

"The administration before the present Republican administration took 89 enforcement actions under the Walsh-Healey Act. Under this administration the total is 102 with 35 blacklisted contractors compared to the 17 blacklisted by the previous administration.

"Let me tell you what this administration faced with the farm problem, what it has been doing, and what it is doing at the moment toward a solution.

"FARM RECOVERY

"A decline in farm prosperity took place since the Korean war peak of February 1951, but the parity ratio shows that three-fifths of the decline took place prior to this administration.

"The record shows that in February 1951 the parity index was at 113. It was 94 in January 1953 when Mr. Eisenhower became President. It was 86 in December of 1954, 82 in August of 1956, and 84 in July 1957.

"The drop has been halted.

"The decline was halted in 1956 by increasing wheat price supports from $1.81 to $2 per bushel; by increasing corn supports from $1.40 to $1.50 per bushel; corn grown outside acreage allotments was supported at $1.25 per bushel; rice supports went from $4.04 to $4.50 per hundredweight; milk supports went to $3.25 per hundredweight; butterfat was raised from 56.2 cents a pound to 58.2 cents.

"Other actions were taken such as:

"Adoption of the soil bank plan.

"Expansion of the barter plan of farm goods for strategic materials.

"Commodity program strengthening through action on corn, rice, sugar, school-milk programs.

"Rural-development pilot funds.

"Great Plains conservation program.

"More research funds.

"Improved loan programs of Farmers' Home and Farm Credit Administrations.

"Tax refund on farm gasoline.

"RURAL ELECTRIFICATION INCREASED

"In the 4 years of the Republican administration of agricultural programs we find a great deal more to boast about.

"The backlog of REA loans was reduced from $192 million to $90 million by faster processing of applications.

"Four times as many loans for rural telephone facilities were made in the Republican 4 years than in all prior years and as a result those facilities have doubled since 1953.

"There has been added to the services of the Farmers' Home and Farm Credit Administration livestock loans to maintain herds in drought and severe weather areas; emergency loans to aid farmers temporarily unable to get credit; soil- and water-conservation loans to aid farmers in developing water supplies.

"The Farm Credit Administration was reestablished as an independent agency and more than $2½ billion in credit was granted in 1955.

"Disaster loans totaled $231 million; large discounts were allowed on 5½ million tons of surplus feed grains; 461 million pounds of beef and pork were bought to stabilize the market after the drought; erosion damage was met with a $21 million program.

"In the Republican 4 years, 494 million bushels of grain-storage facilities were added; 200 million bushels more were added through guaranteed occupancy arrangements with commercial warehouses; producers used Government loans to construct facilities on farms for 142 million bushels; farmers and warehousemen were permitted to charge off storage-construction costs over a 5-year period for tax purposes; many farmers built additional storage through private financing.

"We go on and on with the progress of the Republican administration in developing a farm program aimed at permanent prosperity.

"SURPLUS DISPOSAL

"The Commodity Credit Corporation disposed of over $6 billion worth of surplus commodities from storage.

"Agricultural attachés abroad were placed under the Department of Agriculture to assist in the trade program.

"Stocks of commodities have been offered for export at competitive prices.

"The program to barter surpluses and sell for foreign currency was expanded.

"Farm exports in fiscal 1957 were the highest in history.

"I have always said that if somebody gives you a lemon, make lemonade out of it. The Republicans were certainly handed a lemon in the surplus commodity problem, and they have done a good job of making lemonade out of it.

"What is the farmer's situation today after 4 years of Republicanism in Government?

"Let's have a look:

"Three-fourths of the Nation's farmers today own their farms.

"Farm tenancy is at an alltime low.

"FARM ASSETS $10 BILLION UP

"Total farm assets are more than $170 billion, nearly $10 billion more than before President Eisenhower took office.

"The farm debt is about 11 percent of the assets, a near alltime low percentage of debt.

"Seven of every 10 farmers have no mortgage debt.

"Four-fifths of those mortgaged are mortgaged for less than 50 percent of market value and half for less than 30 percent of market value.

"The farmer now has social security, something he couldn't get for 19 years.

"FOREIGN POLICY—PEACE

"The Free World, on the other hand, is growing stronger; closer knit.

"Our friendly nations are growing economically stronger: more able to stand on their own feet; more capable of contributing to western defense against communism.

"Mr. President. I submit it is difficult to argue successfully against a foreign policy which has contributed to such a situation in the Free World."

The achievements in my own State are many. I would like to list just a few, which I feel are of outstanding value.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

During fiscal 1957, REA approved a total of $18,157,000 in loans to 18 of the 28 active REA electric borrowers in Kentucky. Their plans called for the construction of 925 miles of line to serve an additional 5,136 rural consumers. Five million eight hundred and five thousand dollars of the total amount loaned was obtained by distribution cooperatives. The balance, $12,351,000, went to the Eastern Kentucky Rural Electric Cooperative Corp., in Winchester, for the construction of a 66,000-kilowatt steam-generating plant and transmission facilities. This power-type borrower provides electric power for 16 member distribution cooperatives.

The Rural Electrification Administration, during fiscal 1957, loaned a total of $2,801,000 to 8 active telephone borrowers in Kentucky; there are a total of 16 telephone borrowers in the State. The loan funds will be used for new construction and system improvements to provide improved service to 4,411 additional rural subscribers over 1,011 miles of pole line, 830 of which will be new pole line. At the close of fiscal 1957, Rural Electrification Administration borrowers were providing modern dial service to 16,191 rural subscribers over 8,821 miles of line.

TVA FINANCING

Over the last few years, there has been an increasing reluctance on the part of the Congress to appropriate the tremendous sums needed to increase the power-producing capacity of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Several bills were introduced this year to authorize TVA revenue bonds. The Senate enacted, and has sent to the House, a bill embodying the main principles of the bill I introduced: limitation on total amount, provision for consultation with the Treasury Department regarding times of issuance, limitation of geographical expansion of TVA, and repayment of the Government's appropriation investment, with interest.

FLOOD CONTROL

The Congress appropriated funds totaling over $40 million for expenditures during fiscal 1958 on flood control and navigation projects benefiting Kentucky. They are as follows:

Examination and survey

Little Sandy River and Tygarts Creek	$30,000
Kentucky River	54,500
Laurel River	19,800
Upper Cumberland	15,000
Cypress Creek	5,000
Clark River	16,100
Lynn Camp Creek	20,000

Advance engineering and design (planning)

Pound Reservoir (Big Sandy)	$140,000
Nolin Reservoir	138,000
No. 2 Barren River Reservoir	50,000
New Richmond lock and dam, Kentucky and Ohio	175,000

Construction

Buckhorn Reservoir	$1,900,000
Rough River Reservoir	3,000,000
Barkley Dam	5,000,000
New Richmond lock and dam	825,000
Catlettsburg floodwall	2,000,000
Greenup locks and dams, Kentucky and Ohio	13,500,000

Construction—Continued

Markland locks and dams, Kentucky and Indiana	$9,500,000
Lock and dam No. 41, Kentucky and Indiana, Louisville	4,000,000

In addition to the four new projects included in the above list (New Richmond lock and dam, Pound Reservoir, upper Cumberland survey, and Lynn Camp Creek survey), a local flood protection project is being commenced by the Corps of Engineers at Prestonburg at a cost of $265,000.

RURAL LIBRARY SERVICES

The rural areas of Kentucky have enjoyed the innumerable advantages of the library services program. Through the appropriations made available by the Congress, and the cooperation of private organizations, the circulation of books in the counties of Kentucky has spread from 2 million in 1953–54 to 6 million books last year.

Kentucky's basic allotment for library services was $40,000, but through the appropriation for fiscal 1958 authorized by this Congress, the share of our State will total $137,929. This more than triples the opportunity of bringing books to thousands of people who live in the remote areas and who are not able to share in the service of city libraries.

A number of the actions of Congress this year are of particular interest to Kentucky farmers. In the field of agriculture as a whole, our problems continue to be those of surplus and price, not of shortage and hunger. The two most important legislative acts to lower surpluses and control production in order to protect farmers' income were extension of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and continuation of the full soil-bank program.

Congress fulfilled a Presidential request when it authorized a 1-year, $1.3 billion expansion of agricultural trade development and assistance, under Public Law 480 which extends this program to June 30, 1958. Authorization for sales of American farm surpluses for foreign currencies was raised from $3 billion to $4 billion, and for gifts to needy nations from $500 million to $800 million. Under its provisions, $111 million worth of tobacco has been sold to 19 foreign countries, and it is expected that the total will approach 200 million pounds by this time next year—in effect increasing our tobacco exports by one-eighth.

The soil-bank program, which seeks to hold production more nearly in line with consumption while protecting farmers' income and guarding future productivity of America's soil, was continued for 1 year. In addition, the provisions of the conservation reserve, of particular interest to Kentucky farmers, have recently been strengthened administratively by increasing some payment rates and making the tree-planting program more attractive.

The administration's new rural-development program is being continued. Kentucky has three trade areas covering 25 counties in the rural-development program, centered around the pilot counties of Butler, Metcalfe, and Elliott.

The agricultural-conservation program was continued for 1958 on the same basis as in the past. This long-established program, under which farmers receive cost-sharing payments for a number of important conservation practices, was unexpectedly threatened with drastic limitations until Congress encouraged its full continuation.

In a special appropriation near the close of the session, $20 million in emergency agricultural-conservation program funds were made available for rehabilitating farmlands and reestablishing conservation measures on farms damaged by flood and other natural disasters. Fifty-five thousand dollars for this purpose has already been allocated to eastern Kentucky from a previous appropriation, and it is expected that additional amounts will soon be made available.

The Congress passed unanimously a modification of the price-support program for the dark-leaf tobaccos, H. R. 7259. This grower-sponsored measure provides price supports for Kentucky producers of dark-fired and dark air-cured tobacco at the 1957 level, 90 percent of parity, or a percentage of burley parity, whichever is higher. It is already helping to preserve their markets.

An Experiment in the Administration of Adrenalin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WAYNE MORSE
OF OREGON
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, on August 21 I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a leaflet published by the National Humane Association of Chicago entitled "An Experiment Concerning the Administration of Adrenalin to Cats Which Have Been Skinned Alive" (department of physiology, University of Buffalo School of Medicine).

On the same day, prior to inserting this material, I announced on the floor of the Senate:

"I am a little disturbed, Mr. President, about some of the material I have received from representatives of antivivisection groups. They have asked me to put some material in the RECORD, and, by request, I shall do so.

"In doing so, Mr. President, I want to make it clear to the antivivisectionists that I am not an antivivisectionist. I am in favor of humane policies in animal experimentation. In our medical laboratories I have always taken the position that I did not favor the dissection of animals for any useless purpose. * * *

"Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD certain material sent to me by the antivivisectionist group. I know nothing about the facts, true or alleged, which are set forth in the material, but I think the group referred to is entitled to have this material available for the reading of Senators."

Although the leaflet was inserted with the foregoing precautionary remarks, Prof. Fred R. Griffith, Jr., who was mentioned in the leaflet, objected to the insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Professor Griffith supplied me with a report of the actual experiment involved in this case. I ask that this report, designated as "An Experiment Concerning the Administration of Adrenalin to Cats Which Have Been Skinned Alive." (department of physiology, University of Buffalo School of Medicine) be inserted at the conclusion of my remarks.

I assure Professor Griffith that if he cares to supply appropriate comments in answer to the statements contained in the leaflet of the National Humane Education Association, I shall be pleased to include his comments in the RECORD early in the next session.

The report follows:

"A POSSIBLE ROLE OF THE SKIN IN THE EFFECT OF ADRENALIN ON BODY TEMPERATURE AND RESPIRATORY METABOLISM

"(Reprinted from the American Journal of Physiology, vol. 156, No 1, January 1949)

"(By Charles E. Whitcher and Fred R. Griffith, Jr., from the department of physiology, University of Buffalo School of Medicine., Buffalo, N. Y.)

"Administration of adrenalin in physiological dosage to the intact animal invariably leads to increased respiratory metabolism and body temperature, which appear without discoverable dissent to be accepted as cause and effect, respectively. On the other hand, attempts to demonstrate a calorigenic action on isolated tissues have led to results so contradictory as to be completely inconclusive. In the face of this, the idea suggested itself that the uniformity of result in the intact animal might be due to a simple reversal of sequence: increased body temperature due to cutaneous vasoconstriction might be responsible, at least in part, for the increase in metabolic rate. As will be shown in what follows this appears to be true.

"Procedure

"The experiments were made with fasting cats, anesthetized with dial-urethane (Ciba). Oxygen consumption was measured in a closed-circuit system from which carbon dioxide was removed by soda lime. Body temperature was recorded with a rectal thermometer. Freshly prepared adrenalin hydrochloride (Parke Davis) in saline was injected intravenously for 5 minutes at the rate of 0.004 mg/min/kg. body weight. Oxygen consumption was recorded continuously before, during, and for 25 minutes following the injection. Rectal temperatures were read each minute. Following a normal run, the skin was removed except from the head, feet and tail; all denuded parts were covered with vaseline and cotton. Rectal temperature, which fell during the operation, was brought back to the previous normal with artificial heat; when it and oxygen consumption were stabilized adrenalin was again injected and oxygen consumption and rectal temperature recorded as before.

"Results

"The cats fared well throughout the experimental period. Skinning caused little loss of blood, and had no apparent effect on pulmonary ventilation, blood pressure, pulse rate, or the pressor response to adrenalin. In addition, it seemed to have no effect on normal oxygen consumption, the average for which, in the period preceding injection, was 12.6 in the normal and 12.9 ml/min. in the skinned animals. This small difference probably was related to the slightly unequal rectal temperatures which as a consequence of failure exactly to control body temperature with artificial heat were 38.41 and 39.49° C., respectively.

"Figure I [not printed in the RECORD] shows the average results obtained on 14 animals. Oxygen consumption of the intact animal was increased 7 percent during the 5-minute injection period and 14 percent during the interval 5 to 15 minutes after injection; at the end of the experiment, 25 minutes after injection, it was still 6 percent above the normal. These results gain credence by being almost exact replicas of a previous observation of the effect of the same dosage of adrenalin.[1]

"In the skinned animal oxygen consumption rose only slightly, 4 percent during the 5-minute injection period. The maximum increase, which was only 5 percent, occurred in the 10-minute interval following injection and was followed by a sharp fall to 2 percent below normal 25 minutes after injection.

"As to body temperature, the intact animal showed a rise of 0.03° C. during the 5-minute injection period; this continued to a maximum of 0.11° C. during the first 5 minutes after injection and was still 0.08° C. above normal 25 minutes after injection.

"In contrast, the skinned animal showed an actual fall of temperature, amounting to 0.03° C., during the injection period itself. A maximum rise to only 0.01° C. above normal occurred during the 5 minutes following the injection. This was succeeded by a steady fall, which persisted for the remainder of the experimental period, leading to a temperature of 0.17° C. below the starting normal 25 minutes after injection.

"Discussion

"These results appear to substantiate, at least in part, the hypothesis that cutaneous vasoconstriction in the intact animal by reducing loss of heat through the skin effects a rise of body (rectal) temperature. This, in turn, would be expected to increase the metabolic rate. In the skinned preparation there were no cutaneous vessels to constrict and so to conserve heat. Therefore, if, as seems probable, the vessels in the splanchnic viscera were constricted as normally, the blood supply of the exposed striated muscles would be increased with the possibility of augmented heat loss. This could account for the general reduction, rather than increase, of rectal temperature and oxygen consumption in the skinned animals during and after injection. The source of the small increases which still occurred after skinning are being further studied.

"Summary

"A skinned animal preparation is described which appears to be new and which may be useful in subsequent investigations. In this work the calorigenic response to adrenalin shown by intact cats is found to be reduced after the removal of the skin."

Data Covering the 111 Record Votes During the First Session of the 85th Congress

OF

HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, at the conclusion of the 84th Congress I compiled statistics showing the support President Eisenhower's program had been accorded by the members of our two parties in the United States Senate. Once again I have compiled similar data covering the 111 record votes during the first session of the 85th Congress. A listing of each rollcall follows my remarks.

They have been divided into four groups. Group 1 lists those rollcalls which did not concern the President's program. Group 2 includes rollcalls where a majority of the Senators from each party voted in support of the President. Group 3 lists the seven instances where a majority of the Republican Senators voting were in opposition to President Eisenhower. Group 4 includes the rollcalls where a majority of the Republican Senators supported the President and a majority of the Democrats opposed him.

A careful review of each issue shows that 81 of the 111 issues were concerned with the President's program. On these 81 issues the Republican support score is 82 percent and the opposition score only 18 percent. The Democratic support score is 56 percent; the opposition score is 44 percent. The 81 issues included treaties and other matters on which there was no recorded opposition.

Twenty-seven rollcalls out of the 81, or 33.3 percent, were on issues on which the two parties were divided. A majority of the Republicans supported the President and a majority of the Democrats were recorded in opposition to him. On these 27 issues the Republican support score is 82 percent; the opposition score is 18 percent. What is even more significant, on these issues the Democrats supplied only 22 percent of the support accorded President Eisenhower and 78 percent of all the opposition votes.

On many occasions the President has indicated that he did not want rubberstamp support by Republicans for his program. Republican Senators have discharged their constitutional obligations and have considered each issue on its merits. Nevertheless, the Republicans have supported President Eisenhower on those measures recommended by the President where we were given an opportunity to vote. I say advisedly that there were many issues on which we would have supported the President if we had had an opportunity to do so. Since we are the minority party in this Congress, and the committees are controlled by the Democratic Party, many measures were not reported by committees and placed on the calendar for our consideration.

While our support quite properly has not been unanimous, I find that of the 81 rollcalls there were only seven on which a majority of the Republicans voting did not support the President's program. Incidentally, on 6 of the 7 issues a majority of the Democrats were also recorded in opposition. Thus, it is clearly apparent that the President needs a Republican Congress if he is to achieve his goals.

On June 13 I took exception to a study by the Congressional Quarterly which attempted to record the support accorded the President by the 2 parties based on 7 Senate rollcalls. I stressed the fact that last year my study, based on the entire record, showed that the President's program had been supported by the Republican Members. I was confident that such a review would again show that the Republican Party, as represented in the Senate of the United States, would supply the main support for the President.

Now that the record is complete, we can all let the chips fall where they may. Eighty-one Eisenhower rollcalls, constituting the entire record, furnishes a fair basis for my evaluation.

In my remarks of July 26 I said:

"The difference between my table and the statements by the Congressional Quarterly lie in the fact that I am willing to submit the entire record, including all of the details, to public scrutiny. I do not expect anyone to accept summary figures because I say they are correct" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 12853).

I am, accordingly, again including tables which I prepared covering every recorded vote during the first session of the 85th Congress. They are self-explanatory. Anyone can check and audit my figures.

Republican Senators and the President can take pride in our record.

A National Cultural Center Plan for the Mall Area in the Nation's Capital

OF

HON. FRANK THOMPSON, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, on August 8, 1957, the House voted 2 to 1 against a plan to locate the National Cultural Center in the so-called Foggy Bottom area of the District of Columbia.

Since that time I have been working on a draft bill to provide for the construction of the National Cultural Center in the District of Columbia on part of the land made available for the Smithsonian Gallery of Art.

My bill, on which I completed work recently, directs the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to utilize so much of that tract of land in the District of Columbia referred to in the first section of the resolution of May 17, 1938—title 20, United States Code, section 76—as is bounded by Fourth Street SW., on the east, Seventh Street SW., on the west, Independence Avenue on the south, and Adams Drive on the north, title to which is in the United States, and shall construct thereon a public building which shall be known as the National Cultural Center. The National Cultural Center shall be under the supervision and control of the Regents.

The Congress for a century has thought of the Mall area between 4th and 14th Streets, and Constitution and Independence Avenues, as the location for cultural activities and buildings devoted to them. The Congress, as a result of this conviction, has placed there the Smithsonian Institution and its branches: the Freer Gallery, the National Gallery of Art, the National Museum, the new Museum of History and Technology, and it authorized the building there of a Smithsonian Gallery of Art.

During the 84th Congress I campaigned to have this administration reverse itself regarding the historic Patent Office Building which had been designed by Robert Mills, one of our country's great architects who designed the Treasury Department Building and the Washington Monument.

This administration seriously recommended to the Congress that the Patent Office Building be razed for a parking lot on the site.

When the administration finally reversed itself as a result of this campaign it tried to take credit for saving the building.

Saved it was, and the plan now is to use it as a great art gallery.

Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON, and I have sponsored legislation in the 85th Congress which would utilize the building for the century-old National Collection of Fine Arts and a National Portrait Gallery.

These measures, if enacted into law, would leave the Mall site, set aside for the Smithsonian Gallery of Art by the 75th Congress, free for other purposes. In the absence of any better proposal, some of the officials of the Smithsonian Institution have suggested that the Mall site be used for a National Air Museum.

The bill which I have developed provides, instead, that the National Cultural Center be located on the site set apart for a cultural center in 1938. My bill also provides that the National Cultural Center shall be a branch of the Smithsonian Institution in the very same way that the Freer Gallery, the National Gallery of Art, and the National Collection of Fine Arts are branches of that Federal agency.

The Congress in its wisdom has provided a site on the Capitol Grounds for a memorial to the late Senator Robert A. Taft, of Ohio. It has also established a Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial Commission to plan a fitting memorial to former President Roosevelt.

President Roosevelt was deeply interested in the fine arts as was proved by the role he played in establishing the National Gallery of Art and the American National Theater and Academy. He has been cited by knowledgeable people as "the most intelligent President about art since Jefferson."

I think it would be fitting to provide that the National Cultural Center shall include a Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial Theater in the spirit of the resolution entitled "Joint resolution to establish a commission to formulate plans for a memorial to Franklin Delano Roosevelt," approved August 11, 1955 (69 Stat. 694).

Finally, my bill provides that the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution shall solicit subscriptions, gifts, and bequests of money, securities, and other property of any character whatsoever, for the purpose of constructing, furnishing, equipping, and presenting cultural programs at the National Cultural Center.

The National Cultural Center, under my bill, shall be self-financed.

This is the reason that I am of the opinion that my plan for a National Cultural Center will work.

I include here the text of my bill for the information of my colleagues, in the hope that they will join with me in sponsoring it.

Also, I include an article from the Washington Evening Star which gives some of the background of my plan. Although the article was written in 1955 it seems to me to be very timely in connection with my new measure.

A bill to provide for the construction of a National Cultural Center, to include a Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial Theater, in the District of Columbia on part of the land made available for the Smithsonian Gallery of Art, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc.—

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "National Cultural Center Act."

NATIONAL CULTURAL CENTER

SEC. 2. (a) In order to provide a suitable building for the presentation of music, opera, drama, dance, and poetry which is deserving of recognition as a part of the great heritage of our civilization, and to memorialize our great artists (both living and dead) who have contributed to the advancement of these arts, the regents of the Smithsonian Institution (hereafter in this act referred to as the "regents") shall utilize so much of that tract of land in the District of Columbia referred to in the first section of the resolution of May 17, 1938 (20 U. S. C. 76), as is bounded by Fourth Street SW. on the east, Seventh Street SW. on the west, Independence Avenue on the south, and Adams Drive on the north, title to which is in the United States, and shall construct thereon a public building which shall be known as the National Cultural Center. The National Cultural Center shall be under the supervision and control of the regents.

(b) The National Cultural Center shall include a Franklin Delano Roosevelt Memorial Theater in the spirit of the resolution entitled "Joint resolution to establish a commission to formulate plans for a memorial to Franklin Delano Roosevelt," approved August 11, 1955 (69 Stat. 694).

(c) (1) The regents shall utilize, insofar as possible, the design for a national theater developed by the American National Theater and Academy and presented to President Truman in 1951, as the design for the National Cultural Center. Provision shall be made for parking facilities in the vicinity of the National Cultural Center and for landscaping the grounds surrounding the National Cultural Center. The National Cultural Center shall not include facilities designed specifically for conventions, trade fairs, or commercial exhibits.

(2) The regents shall authorize the preparation of the site referred to in subsection (a) of this section and the construction of the National Cultural Center thereon, including approaches, landscaping, and other related facilities.

(3) The Administrator of General Services shall supervise the preparation of plans and specifications and the actual construction of the National Cultural Center without reimbursement. For such purposes the Administrator of General Services shall make all necessary contracts and may employ such consultants as he may deem necessary.

DUTIES OF THE REGENTS

SEC. 3. In carrying out their duties under this act the regents shall—

(1) present at the National Cultural Center classical and contemporary music, opera, drama, dance, and poetry of the highest type from this and other countries;

(2) establish resident repertory companies in such arts as an activity of the National Cultural Center;

(3) promote public interest in the arts of music, opera, drama, dance, and poetry by publishing a periodical devoted to the activities of the National Cultural Center and by making the programs presented at the National Cultural Center available for dissemination by radio, television, and motion picture;

(4) take such other steps as will, in the judgment of the regents, encourage the study and presentation of such arts in the schools, and as an activity of State and local governments;

(5) solicit subscriptions, gifts, and bequests of moneys, securities, and other property of any character whatsoever, for the purpose of constructing, furnishing, equipping, and presenting programs of such arts at the National Cultural Center;

(6) receive and administer moneys, securities, and other property received pursuant to paragraph (5) of this section; and

(7) consult with the National Cultural Center Commission established by section 5 of this act with respect to the most suitable means of carrying out the duties of the regents under this section.

POWERS OF THE REGENTS

SEC. 4. The regents may for the purposes of this act—

(1) appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a Director of the National Cultural Center;

(2) employ such other personnel to work under the supervision of the Director of the National Cultural Center as they may deem to be necessary for the efficient operation and administration of the National Cultural Center;

(3) sell or exchange such securities and other properties received pursuant to section 3 (5) as they may deem advisable;

(4) invest or reinvest moneys and the proceeds of securities and other properties received pursuant to section 3 (5), in such investments as they may deem advisable;

(5) place moneys, securities, and other property received pursuant to section 3 (5) in such depositories as they may deem suitable for that purpose; and

(6) expend moneys and the proceeds and income from securities and other property received pursuant to section 3 (5) to carry out the purposes of this act.

NATIONAL CULTURAL CENTER COMMISSION

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby established a National Cultural Center Commission (hereafter in this act referred to as the "Commission"). The Commisison shall consist of—

(1) the Librarian of Congress, the Chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts, the President of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the Chairman of the District of Columbia Recreation Board, who shall be ex officio members of the Commission;

(2) seven persons appointed by the President of the United States;

(3) seven persons appointed by the President of the Senate at least four of whom shall be Members of the United States Senate; and

(4) seven persons appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives at least four of whom shall be Members of the United States House of Representatives.

Any vacancy occurring in the Commission among members appointed pursuant to paragraph (2), (3), or (4) shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment was made.

(b) Persons appointed to the Commission other than Members of the Congress and officers or employees of the United States shall be persons who are recognized for their knowledge of or experience in, or for their interest in one or more of the arts referred to in section 3 (1). In making such appointments the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall give due consideration to the recommendations for nomination submitted by leading organizations concerned with the arts referred to in section 3 (1) including but not limited to the following national organizations: Actors' Equity Association, American Council on Education, American Council of Learned Societies, American Educational Theater Association, American Federation of Musicians, American Federation of Radio-TV Artists, American Guild of Musical Artists, American Guild of Variety Artists, American National Theater and Academy, Associated Actors and Artists of America, Association of American Colleges, Children's Theater Conference, Council of Living Theater, Dramatists' Guild, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National Association of Concert Managers, National Association of Legitimate Theaters, National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters, National Association of Schools of Music, National Education Association, National Federation of Music Clubs, National Music Council, Motion Picture Association of America, Inc., Music Educators National Conference, and Screen Actors Guild.

(c) The Commission shall—

(1) advise and consult with the regents with respect to financing the construction of the National Cultural Center;

(2) advise and consult with the regents with respect to the duties of the regents under section 3 of this act; and

(3) assist the regents in carrying out section 3 (5) of this act.

(d) The term of office of each member of the Commission appointed pursuant to paragraph (2), (3), or (4) of subsection (a) shall be for 4 years.

(e) (1) The Commission shall meet at the call of the regents but not less than six times each year.

(2) Members of the Commission shall serve without compensation, but each member of the Commission shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by him in connection with the work of the Commission.

INTERAGENCY COMMITTEES

SEC. 6. The President is authorized to create such interagency committees as in his judgment may be of assistance to the regents in performing their functions under this act. Such committees shall include individuals having special knowledge and experience in the arts of music, opera, drama, dance, and poetry, as well as individuals whose knowledge and experience in other fields will assist the regents in performing such functions; and may include representatives of each department and agency of the Federal Government which carries on any activities related to any of such arts whether or not such department or agency has any primary concern or responsibility with respect of any of such arts. The provisions of section 214 of the act of May 3, 1945 (31 U. S. C., sec. 691), shall be applicable to any interagency committee created pursuant to this section.

REPEAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 7. The following acts are hereby repealed—

(1) the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Conservatory of Music of America," approved March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. 1093); and

(2) the act entitled "An act creating a Federal commission to formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of a civic auditorium, including an inaugural hall of Presidents and a music, fine arts, and mass communications center," approved July 1, 1955 (69 Stat. 243).

[From the Washington Sunday Star of September 18, 1955]

FUNDS FOR AUDITORIUM AVAILABLE, OFFICIAL SAYS

(By Francis P. Douglas)

NEW YORK, September 17.—Robert W. Dowling, member of the commission being formed to plan a civic auditorium for the Capital, is confident $15 million can be raised for the project.

This money would be in outright donations. It would make unnecessary planning the financing of the structure on a self-liquidating basis, as directed by Congress.

"If the Federal Government donates the land," he said, "it should do it contingent on the money being raised and it should set a time limit," Mr. Dowling said. "I think there ought to be a 2-year restriction."

He said the money can be raised on a nationwide basis from individuals, the foundations, the theater—"it could raise a great sum through benefit performances"—the moving-picture industry, and other groups.

EXPERIENCED FUND RAISER

Mr. Dowling takes time from business—big business—for an enthusiasm for the theater. And he knows about raising money. He is engaged in the real-estate and building business in New York. He is president and director of the City Investing Co. and a director of Starrett Bros. & Eken, the largest in their fields. He is director of almost a dozen other companies. His interests control the National Theater, the Playhouse, and the Dupont Theater in Washington.

He is chairman of the American National Theater and Academy (ANTA). This is a nonprofit foundation chartered by Congress in 1935 to promote the American theater. It is in charge of this country's international exchange program, which sends American plays like Porgy and Bess overseas.

When the French Government suggested last summer that the United States stage an American Festival of Arts in Paris, the State Department accepted. But there was no money for the project. Mr. Dowling raised the necessary $400,000 through private subscriptions. The American program in Paris included the presentation of Thornton Wilder's Skin of Our Teeth, with a topnotch cast.

INTEREST LONGSTANDING

Mr. Dowling's interest in an auditorium for the Capital is of a number of years' standing. He testified in favor of the bill setting up the Commission to plan a civic auditorium, to include an inaugural hall of the Presidents and a music, fine arts, and mass communications center.

It was natural that the seven members named to the Commission by Speaker RAYBURN should include Mr. Dowling. Vice President NIXON named seven members Friday and announcement of President Eisenhower's seven appointees is expected shortly.

The law specifies that the Commission shall report by next February 1. Mr. Dowling believes that allows plenty of time.

"There is no mystery involved," he said. "It is not like splitting the atom or launching a satellite. An auditorium can be established using the arts and skills already developed."

He suggested that the auditorium should seat 4,000, but said that is something for the Commission to work out. He mentioned it as a fair guess, just as he had mentioned $15 million as "not an exact sum, but a good start."

ACCORDION PLAN FAVORED

Of the auditorium he said:

"I should like to see it built on what I would call the accordion plan—an auditorium seating 4,000 one night and contracting to seat 1,000 the next night, with no vacant seats. It is of enormous importance always to have the room full.

"This accordion plan is entirely practical. It can be accomplished in either of two ways. One is by movable walls. The second is by movable drapes suspended from ceiling tracks.

"In the case of the walls, they could either be raised from the floor or, again, suspended from ceiling tracks.

"The hall should be fitted to the performance. You could have a magnificent chamber music concert but in a big hall the three or more players would be like flies on the distant stage. For a full-scale opera or ballet you would want the entire hall."

NOT JUST THEATER

He dismissed the idea that the auditorium should be for the theater alone. He said it could be used for important meetings of state, for international meetings, and to provide a chamber for the inauguration of Presidents, as the law contemplates.

The building, he said, should also provide facilities for schools of music, the drama and painting and it could become a great center in those fields. This would help in raising money, he pointed out, because some give more quickly to education than to other purposes.

In the auditorium he would like to see 50 boxes, probably more. He explained there should be a presidential box and suggested a box named for each State in which the Governor of the State or the State's representatives would be welcome.

Discussing the need for the building he said many factors are obvious but some are not so obvious.

"When we send abroad an exchange program, exchange is a misnomer if we can't receive something here in return. These have been making friends for our country. But then artists, producers, musicians ask when they can come here."

NO THEATER AVAILABLE

"There is no commercial theater you can book them into in midseason. Every New York theater manager hopes to book his house for a whole season. With the exception of the National in Washington, where you might find a couple of weeks in the winter, there is no other place to play. New York is practically closed.

"You just have to have an adequate house, not only for the theater, but for ballet, opera, concerts—all the performing arts need it."

As far as Mr. Dowling is concerned, the site is an open question. Asked about a site on L'Enfant Plaza in the projected Zeckendorf development of Southwest Washington, Mr. Dowling said a consideration would be what other buildings—assets of national importance—would form the surroundings.

Parking, he said, should be an important consideration in the site selection. "We want this to be a theater of the people," he said, stressing that parking facilities must be available.

Suggestions were made initially that the building should include a big convention hall. Mr. Dowling thought this would be a mistake. It would put Washington in competition with other cities which seek big conventions. He would rather, he explained, keep the building to the field of culture and artistic achievement.

He saw no hurdle in the way of working out an acceptable manner of control. The building might be under the National Park Service, he suggested. Or it might be administered by a board of trustees similar to the board which administers the National Gallery of Art. Someday, he speculated, there might be an American counterpart to the ministers of culture of other countries and the center would be in his department.

Illustrating Mr. Dowling's longtime interest in such a project here is an incident which occurred more than 5 years ago. He and Belvins Davis, producer of Porgy and Bess, came to Washington and proposed a civic auditorium to President Truman.

Qualifying To Vote in Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH W. YARBOROUGH

OF TEXAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, a few days ago speaking to a group of Democrats at San Antonio, Tex., I pointed out the necessity for poll-tax payments in Texas, beginning October 1, 1957, in order to qualify to vote in 1958. I request unanimous consent to include my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The first job for Democrats right now is getting the Democrats ready to vote in 1958. In a few weeks, on October 1, 1957, to be exact, the poll-tax paying period will open at the county tax collectors offices all over Texas.

Those of us who want democracy to flourish in Texas must work to wipe out the poor record we have had by qualifying ourselves to vote. Too few people in Texas qualify to vote and then vote. Government is everybody's job. You have a stake, a privilege, a duty, and an opportunity.

Why should Texans bother to pay $1.75 this year? Well, the reasons are many. In the cities, there will be city elections and school board elections. There will be important bond elections. They will affect the tax rate of millions of Texas homeowners.

In the rural areas there will be elections on watershed flood prevention districts. There will also be some school elections and some county bond elections. Then there will be the elections of 150 members of the Texas House of Representatives and 15 members of the Texas Senate. Those elections are particularly important to rural people because of the attacks on their REA power program and on their rural roads program.

It is clear that the enemies of rural electric cooperatives have control of the machinery and a majority in the Texas Legislature, and there's just one cure for that—for the 230,000 Texas families who belong to the REA co-ops to pay their poll taxes and be ready to vote next July. Just recently, an attack has been launched on the farm-to-market road program. The enemies of this program were defeated in 1951, when they set out to do away with rural roadbuilding. They said the job was finished, that the farmer was out of the mud. They were defeated, and since that time, more than 12,000 miles of farm-to-market roads have been built in Texas. But school buses still travel thousands of miles of dusty, muddy, unpaved roads.

Now they are back at it again, with the same old song. They say there is no longer any need for paving rural roads, that the money ought to be switched to other uses. The issue will be decided at the polls in July and August of 1958. And it will be decided by the Texans who step up to the tax collector's window and ante up $1.75 for the right to be a practicing citizen in this State of ours. And you must pay that $1.75 by January 31, 1958, to vote to save REA and farm-to-market roads in Texas. A large number of constitutional amendments will be submitted, to the qualified voters in November of next year. Then we have to elect a United States Senator, a governor, a lieutenant governor with power to appoint committees with life or death power over all legislation, a commissioner of agriculture, an attorney general, a land commissioner, a State treasurer, a railroad commissioner, and a comptroller.

But that is not all you get to decide on for the sum of $1.75. We have 22 Congressmen in Texas, and they'll all be up for reelection next year, except 1 who is talking about running for another office.

And then there are the precinct conventions of the Democratic Party, on the fourth Saturday in July of next year. You can't attend those conventions unless you have a poll tax or an exemption certificate for 1957. And here in Texas, the Democratic Party machinery is, as someone said the other day, the machinery of the State Government. Unless real Democrats qualify themselves and take part in those conventions, the party machinery will speak only for the few—perhaps those who have been trying to destroy the Democratic Party before, and who will do it again if we give them the chance. Right now our Democratic Party is headed in Texas by some officers who in 1952 tried to destroy the party, and who came back in 1956 and took charge again. Until the year-in-and-year-out Democrats who can be trusted to be faithful hold the party's top offices in Texas, we can continue to see the same thing happen again.

Let me put in a word of warning right now. The drought and Ezra Benson have driven many Texans off the farms and into the cities. Mama and papa, if they are past 60, have been voting each year in the country without getting exemption certificates But if they've moved to town, to a city of 10,000 or more, they must get a new exemption every year. It broke my heart last spring to talk with dozens of fine Texans who wanted to help us, but hadn't known that they had to get an exemption each year now that they've moved to town.

You must pay your poll tax or get your exemption certificate between October 1, 1957, and January 31, 1958, so that you can vote in all elections and participate in the conventions in 1958.

So pay your poll tax or get your exemption, and get it early so you won't forget. Let's all be citizens in 1958, not just residents of Texas. Government is everybody's job. Hard money and high interest rate aren't accidents. Get ready to vote.

Need for a Protective Tariff Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN E. HENDERSON

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the 1st session of the 85th Congress has concluded its work without having considered legislation bearing directly upon the tariff policies of the Nation. This is a regrettable omission. However, to those of us who believe that Congress should reassert its constitutional powers over tariff policy, it is not proper to conclude that the tariff issue has been ignored.

Legislation has been proposed to offer tariff protection to our domestic industries which are being harmed by competing products of foreign industries in our local markets. Although formal Congressional attention was not given to these bills, there has been, I believe, a significant strengthening of support in the Congress for such bills. One test of this growing awareness that a protective tariff law is needed is obvious when we realize that legislation which would threaten the further lowering of tariffs has also failed to be considered by the 85th Congress. I refer to the proposal that the United States join the international organization known as the Organization for Trade Cooperation.

The passage of the OTC bill has been urged most vigorously in the past 2 years. I believe that the explanation of its failure to be considered lies in the fact that the philosophy of free trade which has dominated Congressional thinking in the past several decades has lost some of its appeal as more and more Members of Congress have witnessed the economic deterioration in areas they represent because of the application of those free trade principles.

The OTC bill, at first glance seems simple and harmless enough. It would allow this Nation to participate in an organization composed of many nations to administer another international entity known as the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Thus, tariff agreements among all of the participating nations could be decided in this international arena.

I have opposed this bill for several reasons. First, because the Federal Constitution specifically gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. This power is given in the same clause which makes the Congress solely responsible for taxation. It is unthinkable that the power to tax the American people be delegated by the Congress to the executive branch of our Government or to some international organization. In past years, the tariff power has been delegated to the Tariff Commission, thence to the President, thence to the State Department, and now it is proposed to an organization of nations. The ebbing away of this Congressional power becomes even clearer when we realize that although our Nation's tariffs are being affected by the international conferences of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, this agreement which has such an outward appearance of a treaty has never been ratified by the Congress. Thus, if Congress agrees to our becoming a participating nation in the OTC, it is, at the same time, ratifying the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

I do not believe that in the complex world in which we live today that the United States can isolate itself from the community of nations. We are clearly interdependent in a very large degree for our economic and military security. However, the zeal with which we have given away our economic substance in many programs during the last two decades is alarming. The tariff question is only one aspect of this pellmell race to prove that we can solve all of the world's problems and quicken the time when a halcyon state of social and economic well being for all mankind will be achieved. While this purpose may be a worthy one, we would be better advised to set our goals in more realistic terms and preserve this Nation's strength for the long struggle against our enemies who would reduce us to the roll of peons of the Soviet Union.

In 1955, the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act assured the continuation of low tariff policies. Many of us fought against this legislation in the belief that our international trade policy must prevent the further eroding away of many American industries. At the international bargaining table, our representatives have been too anxious to agree to the demands of other nations permitting them to invade American markets with an increasing volume of their products. This was, unfortunately, ignored by the Congress when the reciprocal trade legislation was enacted.

In southeastern Ohio, we know well what low tariff policies can mean to communities whose economies are struck by competition from imported products. There are few areas of the Nation where this problem is so apparent. In our potteries, ceramic tile factories, and coal mines, economic depression in the midst of national prosperity has become an enforced way of life. What this has meant in terms of hardship to communities, families, and individuals in the 15th Congressional District cannot be overstated.

The extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act authorizing bargaining in Geneva which resulted in even lower tariffs on pottery and tile products. We can predict that even greater damage will result from this unwise action. For instance, under the Geneva negotiations of GATT, the tariff on imported earthen artware would be reduced 15 percent over 3 years with annual 5 percent reductions effective in 1956, 1957, and 1958. Tariffs on chinaware, stoneware, and the great bulk of dutiable tile would also be affected. This is a direct and serious blow at domestic producers and their employees already grievously suffering from the effects earlier of tariff reduction.

I wish to present for the RECORD, some indication of the amount of foreign-produced household pottery items which have been and are now flooding our markets. The following figures, compiled in August 1957 by the United States Tariff Commission, show the generally increasing volume of imports into this country:

Beginning Jan. 1, 1954, the Bureau of the Census discontinued complete compilation of import statistics of certain formal entries (or separably classifiable parts of larger entries) valued at $250 or less. Estimates of these omitted imports, based on an officially tabulated monthly sample of the omitted entries, are included in this table; such estimates represent up to 11 percent of the totals shown above.

What we are witnessing here is a direct challenge to more than the pottery and tile industries. The challenge is to the American standard of living. The prices of these imported products in the domestic market are based upon production costs. I am informed that almost 65 percent of the cost of most pottery items represents the cost of labor. For example, at the prevailing wages of a Japanese pottery worker, his production can be shipped to the United States, undersell the American product, and still produce a fantastic margin of profit for the Japanese pottery producer. The conflict, then, is between the American employee and the foreign worker. The competition is between subsistence or "rice bowl" standards and wages to sustain the decent way of life which has become the standard in this Nation. Unless we revise our tariff regulations in terms of essential human values and competing standards of living, we are by a calculated national policy writing the destruction of any American industry where such forces are brought into play.

This is clearly happening now in the pottery industry. It will become apparent in other of our industries if the past and present trends are not reversed. I can cite the American textile industry as an example where import competition is already causing serious economic dislocations in regions depending upon it for a source of income.

In view of our Nation's unprecedented prosperity, it may seem unusual to express concern in such grave terms. However, I believe we allow our prosperity to obscure the pressing need to come to grips with economic problems carrying serious implications. This is certainly a good example of a national refusal to look around us to understand what is happening. It is long past the time to restudy our tariff policies, admit our past errors, and correct the distress which our trade policy has created. Another opportunity will come early in 1958 when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act will be considered again for extension. It is my earnest hope that each Member of Congress will during the next several months study the economy of his own district to understand how existing tariff policies affect the people he represents here. I feel certain, then, that when the battle of our foreign trade policy is joined early next year, the ranks of those opposing a continuation of past policies will number many members who have previously given their support to those policies.

Record of the Committee on Ways and Means in the First Session of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished chairman and the entire membership of the Committee on Ways and Means are to be congratulated on their devotion to duty and on the performance of their responsibilities as members of the committee and as Members of the House of Representatives during the first session of the 85th Congress. I would particularly like to extend my congratulations to my esteemed friend and chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee, the Honorable JERE COOPER, for his wise guidance and leadership as chairman of our great committee.

Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the record of the Ways and Means Committee for achievement during this session of Congress has not been matched or anywhere near approached elsewhere in the Congress of the United States. Much of the legislation on which favorable committee action was taken failed to receive the consideration it deserved in the House of Representatives or in the Senate.

This breakdown in the legislative process must be attributed to a failure of the Democrat majority in the Congress to provide the essential guidance and leadership that is so necessary to the accomplishment of an effective legislative program. Such a legislative failure is perhaps inevitable with the Democrat Party in the majority; a party that is sharply divided on legislative issues involving civil rights, a strengthened farm program, and the development of natural resources; a party that is composed of the traditional spenders in Congress who now for political purposes give brazen lipservice to being the proponents of Government economy, while at the same time irresponsibly urging the enactment of legislation to create an ever bigger Federal bureaucracy. The cleavage in the Democrat ranks is made apparent by an examination of the issues and the record. The Democrat from Boston cannot agree with the Democrat from Atlanta on the issue of civil rights. The Democrat from Detroit cannot agree with the Democrat from Nashville on the issue of public power. The Democrat from New York City cannot agree with the Democrat from Minneapolis on the essentials of an effective farm program. Mr. Speaker, the national issues on which the Democrat Party is divided could be enumerated ad infinitum.

Because of this Democrat intraparty strife and division it is little wonder that the first session of the 85th Congress was characterized by a breakdown in Democrat leadership and failure of achievement.

This absence of general accomplishment in the 85th Congress to date causes me to be particularly gratified to be able to report achievement by the Committee on Ways and Means during this period.

In the 85th Congress, 1st session, the Committee on Ways and Means had referred to it a total of 1,517 bills and 20 resolutions. The committee reported 50 bills to the House of Representatives of which 43 were passed by the House. Twenty-two of these bills were favorably reported by the Senate Finance Committee and 21 bills passed the Senate. Since the convening of the 85th Congress the full committee held 8 days of public hearings and received testimony from 119 witnesses. The committee also met 61 times in executive session. In addition the subcommittees of the committee have been active within the areas of their respective jurisdictions.

The legislation acted on by the committee included subject matter covering virtually every major subject within the committee's jurisdiction. With one exception no major legislation on which the committee acted completed the legislative course to become public law. In this connection the committee prepared and reported to the House of Representatives two major tax bills. One of these bills, the Excise Tax Technical Changes Act of 1957, H. R. 7125, was reported by the Committee on Ways and Means on May 24 and passed the House on June 20. Despite the fact that this legislation contained many beneficial changes in our Federal excise-tax structure, the Senate took no action on the legislation. The other somewhat major tax bill was H. R. 8381, the Technical Amendments Act of 1957, to provide significant changes in the income, estate and gift tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. This legislation was favorably reported by the committee on July 9, but the Democrat House leadership failed to schedule it for floor consideration in the House of Representatives. The remaining tax bills were of a somewhat minor nature with the exception of H. R. 4090 which provided for a 1-year extension of existing corporate and certain excise-tax rates and which became Public Law 12.

On the subject of tariff and customs legislation, the most significant bill on which action was taken was H. R. 6006 relating to the Antidumping Act of 1921. This legislation which was originally recommended by the Department of the Treasury would make important improvements in the antidumping law to provide more effectively for the enforcement and administration of the act. This bill did not pass the House of Representatives until August 29 so that it was not possible for the Senate to consider the legislation in time for it to become public law this year.

Minor but important changes were made in the Social Security Act including the extension of a coverage option to policemen and firemen in my State of New York and certain other designated States as well as a change in the law so that veterans sustaining a service-connected disability would not be deprived of their benefits under the disability provisions of the old-age and survivors insurance program by virtue of their receiving another Federal disability pension. In addition the coverage option available to ministers under the OASI program was liberalized.

Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the list of meritorious legislation that did not become public law is longer than the list of such legislation that was enacted into law. On August 16, 1956, the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means called upon the Democrat leadership to promptly enact certain legislation vitally affecting the citizens of our Nation. None of this legislation was enacted into law to the consequent detriment of our citizens.

The first legislative proposal that the Republican Members urged be favorably considered by the Congress pertained to the tariff protection accorded our domestic lead-zinc industry. This legislation would have imposed a sliding scale import tax on lead and zinc imports. Hearings were held by the Committee on Ways and Means but no further legislative action was taken or scheduled by the Democratic majority.

The second legislative matter on which the Republican committee membership urged prompt action on August 16, 1957, pertained to amendments to the Antidumping Act, and I have already described the disposition of that meritorious legislation taken late in the first session of the 85th Congress.

The third legislative matter on which the Republican members concurred in urging prompt action pertained to proposed tax reforms for small business. These tax recommendations constituted a minimum legislative program to improve the applicability of our Federal tax structure to small business. These changes were derived from recommendations made by the President of the United States in a letter to the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means dated July 15, 1957. These recommendations are as follows: First, purchasers of used property not exceeding $50,000 in any 1 year should receive the same liberalized depreciation that was made available to purchasers of new property by the Internal Revenue Code of 1954; second, corporations with 10 or fewer stockholders should be given the option of being taxed as a partnership; third, the payment of estate taxes should be allowed in installments over a period of up to 10 years in cases where the estate consists largely of investments in closely held business concerns; and, fourth, an original investor in a small business should be allowed to deduct from income up to some maximum amount prescribed by Congress any loss realized on a stock investment in such business. These tax recommendations were noncontroversial and would have been of significant benefit to our small business community. To the list of unfinished legislative business must be added proposals to extend unemployment compensation coverage to ex-servicemen, to further simplify customs administration, to simplify OASI reporting, and several other important legislative matters.

Mr. Speaker, if in this review of the record of the Committee on Ways and Means in the first session of the 85th Congress, have dealt at greater length with the failure of the Democratic leadership in the Congress than I have with the record of accomplishment achieved by the Ways and Means Committee, it is because of my conviction that despite the best efforts of any legislative committee, such efforts will be for nought in the absence of effective leadership in our two great legislative Chambers. It is essential, if the second session of the 85th Congress is not to duplicate the failure of the first session, that the Democratic leadership cast aside political motivations and machinations and work conscientiously for the strengthening of our Nation and the improvement in the wellbeing of our citizens.

Mr. Speaker, it is my fervent hope that the reconvening of the 85th Congress next January will mark the beginning of a session that will find such productive accomplishment realized.

The Embattled 85th Congress

OF
HON. CHARLES B. BROWNSON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. BROWNSON. The first session of the Democratic-controlled 85th Congress adjourns today, unwept and unmourned.

The House met for 585 hours on 141 days and enacted 166 public bills on which there were 100 rollcall yea-and-nay votes. Everyone went through all the accepted motions but it was a session of inactivity and frustration, especially for a Republican. For this Congress was different. It was the first Congress since 1848 to be elected in a presidential election year by the party in opposition to the one winning the White House. And it was the first to serve with a President barred by constitutional amendment from seeking another term. Referring to the accomplishments of the first half of the 85th Congress, Democratic leaders are saying:

> It is sufficient to say it was a job well done. (Senator LYNDON JOHNSON, Democrat, of Texas, Senate majority leader, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 30.)
>
> One of the most fruitful I have ever attended. * * * Very impressive. (House Speaker SAM RAYBURN, Democrat of Texas, Washington Post and Times Herald, August 30.)
>
> We can leave here with a feeling of having done a great job. (Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, August 30.)
>
> The Congress has made a record of solid legislative accomplishment. (Paul Butler, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, New York Times, August 31.)

High praise for sitting on their hands.

The liberal Democrats came to this session convinced that the Republicans' loss of the Congress was a mandate for them to resurrect every public power, public housing, Federal aid to education and social welfare bill which had been voted down in the past, and pass it in 1957. Early in the session 80 northern Democrats signed a so-called manifesto advocating social legislation which would have added at least $10 billion a year to the budget—this year and every year in the future.

President Eisenhower's $71.8 billion budget shocked the conservative Members of Congress, and, more important, it shocked the American public. The people considered the fact that we must continue to arm with conventional weapons, which will soon be obsolete, while we pour billions into the development of missiles and nuclear arms. They still thought the budget was too high and contained fat which could be eliminated.

From constituents in every walk of life came letters by the thousands. On tablet paper, perfumed note sheets, business stationery, and in telegrams, they protested this high rate of spending tax moneys.

In Congress, we fought the battle of the budget from February, when the first appropriation bill came before us, right up to the last day of the session when I voted against final passage of the foreign-aid appropriations. Up to August 2, the best available figures indicate that House Republicans, as a whole, supported economy 60 percent of the time, while House Democrats have an economy support record less than half that good, 29 percent.

BROWNSON'S ECONOMY VOTING SCORE HIGH

According to Walter Trohan's article in the Chicago Sunday Tribune—August 4, 1957—I supported economy on 22 out of 25 votes. This earns for me an economy support score of 81 percent. This score compares with such widely known economy advocates as Congressman NOAH MASON, Republican, of Illinois, who supported economy 22 times out of 24 for an economy score of 81 percent, the same as mine. Senator HARRY FLOOD BYRD, Democrat, of Virginia, widely recognized advocate of cutting Government spending, supported economy 16 times out of 20 in the Senate for a percentage score of 70 percent. The two Democratic Congressmen from Indiana are each listed as having voted for economy 4 times and against economy 23 times for an economy score of 15 percent.

As your representative, I voted for every budget cut to pass the House, and for many which did not. Had a majority of Congress agreed with all my economy votes, an additional $3,064,584,958 would have been saved over and above the actual $4,914,355,584 Congress succeeded in cutting from the budget. In addition to reducing the 1958 fiscal budget, we also sliced $134,023,395 from 1957 supplemental appropriations.

An ironic sidelight on the budget battle was the role played by the Democrats, traditionally the party of big spending, who desperately tried to parlay the demand for economy into a partisan issue. When public sentiment became too obvious to ignore they were quick to talk economy although they continued to quietly prod behind the scenes for increases in various appropriations, notably in foreign aid. As the taxpayers became more vocal in their demand for budget cuts, the Democrats became increasingly vocal in proclaiming their frugality—this despite the fact that earlier in the session 80 northern Democrats in the House signed the manifesto calling on the President to vastly expand Federal spending programs. Their lack of sincerity is obvious when you compare the overall economy support record of the House Republicans—60 percent, and the House Democrats, 29 percent.

THE NEED FOR H. R. 8002

In the wake of the budget cuts came conflicting pronouncements of the exact amount by which the budget actually was reduced. This annual confusion stems from our present clumsy budgeting procedures involving an obligation budget and expenditures estimates. Congressional appropriations are presently geared to the obligation budget, and Congressional action on the 1958 budget relates to agency obligation budgets totaling $73.3 billion and not to the $71.8 billion that the Executive estimated for expenditures.

One of the greatest disappointments I experienced this year was the stubborn inaction of the Democrat-controlled House on H. R. 8002, a bill implementing Hoover Commission proposals, and designed to modernize Federal budgeting. The bill would increase Congressional control over the annual rate of Federal expenditures by requiring an annual review to be taken by Congress on both existing and proposed programs. It will minimize carryover balances of appropriations given in one year and expended in later years. This annual accrued expenditure method would be applied on a gradual basis to the extent, in such manner, and at times as may be determined by the President.

The legislative history of H. R. 8002 thus far has been stormy. I fought for and voted for the bill in my Government Operations Committee, with the result that it ultimately was placed on the Consent Calendar. There, members of the Democrat-controlled House Appropriations Committee, from less than unselfish motives, successfully blocked it from coming to the floor. Transferred to the general calendar, the bill once again was stalled, this time by being ignored by the Democrat leadership. What the fate of H. R. 8002 will be next year, I hesitate to predict; that there is a crying need for it is a certainty.

FOREIGN AID

Results of the economic portions of the foreign aid program appear so nebulous when considered in proportion to the heavy burden it places on the American taxpayers and the administration of this program is still so loose that I felt compelled to vote against both the original authorization bill and final passage of the appropriation bill. One of my very last legislative acts of the first session was on adjournment day, August 30, when I voted "nay" on the foreign aid conference report appropriating $2,768,760,000. Personal investigations in line with my committee assignments have disillusioned me with the manner in which our tax dollars are being spent abroad, and with the vague justifications brought to Congress to substantiate the need for these funds.

FEDERAL SCHOOL AID

By a shockingly narrow margin of only 5 votes—208 to 203—we managed to defeat the Federal aid to school construction bill. I twice took the floor to speak at length against this inherently dangerous measure, and while relieved that it was defeated, I wish I could be sure that this year's victory was not only temporary. Already two new school aid bills have been introduced in Congress, one in the Senate, the other in the House. Each day's mail brings printed material from organized, professional proponents of Federal school aid. Dues have been doubled by the National Education Association, chief advocate of the program, to make possible a $7 million budget for the coming year. More than $677,000 has been set aside for NEA Federal relations lobbying, to be conducted both in the Capitol and in grassroots areas. I am extremely anxious for the future of State-supported educational systems.

The fact that former NEA Legislative Committeeman Lawrence G. Derthick is still United States Commissioner of Education is not cheering, especially in view of his statement in a recent Newspaper Enterprise syndicated story. Commissioner Derthick told reporters that "the fight for Federal aid to school construction will continue in spite of the defeat of [the] proposal recently suffered in Congress."

My 11th District constituents, who have done a commendable job in providing the finest of educational facilities for their own youngsters, made me proud by supporting wholeheartedly my fight against Federal school aid. In the letters they wrote me, their opposition to this program was in a ratio of 20 to 1.

POSTAL AND CLASSIFIED PAY

Both House and Senate approved pay raises for postal and Federal classified workers, but the Democrat-controlled Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee delayed reporting the pay bills until so late in the session that passage came right on the heels of adjournment. This move made possible the Presidential pocket veto and prevented Congress from having an opportunity to override that veto if it so chose. The veto was almost inevitable because of the Senate's failure to pass the postal rate increase bill to provide funds for the operation of the Post Office Department, putting the President in the position of having little alternative but to veto the pay bill.

AGRICULTURE

Congress passed legislation calling for compulsory inspection of poultry and poultry products, and extended to June 30, 1958, the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act. It failed to act on a humane slaughter bill, although such legislation has been in effect for many years in European countries, and it also defeated a program to establish a minimum acreage allotment for corn and to provide acreage reserve programs for diverted acres and feed grains.

GOVERNMENTAL REORGANIZATION

At a time when much lip service was being given to economy, one of the greatest failures was a complete lack of Democratic leadership in passing Hoover Commission recommended bills. More than 100 bills implementing these recommendations were introduced this year; only one was passed. H. R. 8364, which extends the Reorganization Act, represents the sum total of Hoover Commission-inspired legislation to be enacted. Among the many other bills introduced on which no action has been taken are several of my own, including H. R. 5808 to severely curtail Federal competition with private enterprise.

An Airways Modernization Board was established to assure safe and efficient navigation systems for all civilian and military planes. Legislation also was passed requiring the Atomic Energy Commission to obtain specific authorization of Congress for civilian power project appropriations. No action was taken on statehood for either Hawaii or Alaska.

INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS

I was one of a lonely 61 who voted against authorizing the President to undertake economic and military cooperation with nations of the Middle East when that House Joint Resolution 117 was passed through the support of 355 House Members on January 30. This Mideast doctrine cost the United States an estimated $174 million during its first 4 months, March through July. I opposed the measure because in essence it puts the cart before the horse. It starts out with $200 million, then searches for foreign projects to use the funds. That this method does not result in economy or efficiency was fully documented in my committee's report, United States Aid Operations in Iran, issued just a few days before voting on the doctrine in the House.

A much more sensible method is to let countries develop their own projects and bring them to us, together with their justifications, so that we can screen them and sponsor only the worthwhile activities, rather than begging them to find some way of using the funds they have available.

The current tense Syrian situation threatens to involve use of United States troops as well as United States funds. I have not regretted my vote.

Congress—my vote 1 of 167 dissenting in the House—agreed to approve amendment of the Anglo-American Financial Agreement to permit deferment of payments on our loan to the United Kingdom.

The United States became a participant in the International Atomic Energy Agency through an act of Congress, and operating authority of the Import-Export Bank was extended for 5 years. Unfortunately, no executive or legislative action was taken on the matter of the status of forces agreement, or on a bill requiring the Armed Forces not to surrender personnel for criminal trial except in special circumstances, in cases where it is determined that the Armed Forces have primary jurisdiction.

An amendment to the Immigration and Nationality Act was passed which eases restrictions mainly on a temporary basis to deal with hardship cases. It permits the admission of alien orphans under nonquota visas who are under 14 years of age, and who are adopted by United States citizens, this program to run under Congressional scrutiny for 2 years. It authorizes the Attorney General to adjust the status of about 400 skilled specialists now in this country temporarily but whose services have been deemed necessary, and it authorizes him to admit, after consultation with the Surgeon General, the spouses, parents, and minor children of United States citizens or law residents. It also makes available to the Department of State certain unused nonquota immigrant visas which remain unissued to those for whom intended.

While I frown on liberalization of the act to a point where the floodgates would be let down, this minor adjustment, introduced by Congressman FRANCIS WALTER in the House, and author of the act, appeared to me to be good commonsense. Heretofore, time-consuming private bills introduced by individual House and Senate Members have cleared for those who will be covered by the new amendment.

NATIONAL ECONOMY

Lending authority of the Small Business Administration was increased from $375 million to $530 million, and that agency was extended to July 31, 1958. Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to pay up to 3.26 percent on savings bonds. Although the House agreed that the cabaret tax should be reduced from 20 to 10 percent, the Senate did not see fit to act on the measure, nor did it take action on a House-approved bill making numerous technical changes in excise-tax provisions of the Internal Revenue Code. Neither body took action on a House-reported bill making changes in income, estate, and gift-tax provisions of the code.

No legislative action was taken, or appears immediately forthcoming, on the Nation's gravest problem, inflation.

NATIONAL DEFENSE—INTERNAL SECURITY

Congress moved with commendable swiftness to protect Federal classified files and sources. Of the 17 who voted against this legislation to correct the Supreme Court's Jencks decision, not one was a Republican.

H. R. 8850, authorizing deferments in certain cases to raise the standards of the selective service, passed the House but was not reported in the Senate. A Senate-passed bill, bringing all Federal employees under the loyalty-security program, received no House action.

NATURAL RESOURCES

The Democrat majority was sufficient to permit passage of a bill calling for a $382.6 million program for the Atomic Energy Commission, including $21 million for reactors to produce electric power. It also increased from $105 million to $140 million the borrowing authority of the St. Lawrence Seaway Corporation, while deferring its interest payments. At the time I proposed private financing of the St. Lawrence Seaway, I predicted their expense estimates were inaccurate and they would be back for more money before it was completed. It now appears doubtful that operating tolls will ever be sufficient to make a significant return of the taxpayers' investment in this waterway which serves only a small part of the country and benefits a few big businesses.

Authorization of TVA expansion through issuance of up to $750 million in revenue bonds was postponed until next year, at which time I will take the floor to oppose it. Only a stubborn and hard-fought battle by Republicans in the House Public Works Committee prevented the Senate-approved Hells Canyon bill from coming to the House. The Senate passed a bill authorizing construction, operation, and maintenance of a $172-million Fryingpan-Arkansas reclamation project in Colorado, but action in the House was held over until next session.

SOCIAL SECURITY, HEALTH, AND WELFARE

Congress approved a $1.9 billion housing program, which increases FNMA borrowing authority to purchase mortgages, lowers downpayments on FHA-insured homes, and provides $350 million for urban redevelopment and slum clearance for 1 year.

It is interesting to note that the Brownson amendment to the Housing Act of 1955 reduced downpayments on FHA loans to virtually the same level as this new bill. Federal Housing Administration officials never used their discretionary authority under the Brownson amendment.

It favorably reported, but took no action, on annuity increases for retired or disabled civil-service workers, nor did it act on a bill which requires the Secretary of Labor to make available to the public financial and other reports filed by labor unions.

VETERANS AND SERVICEMEN

Rates of compensation for service-connected disabilities and for dependency allowance were increased, and the direct home loan and loan guaranty programs for World War II veterans were extended to July 25, 1959. Widows of Spanish-American War veterans once again were passed by; the House approved a pension increase, the Senate apparently plans to take no action at all.

CIVIL RIGHTS

When it adjourned on August 30, after the longest session since 1951, the 85th Congress had achieved at least one distinction. After months of hearings, debate, political maneuvering and compromise, it passed in its final week, the first civil-rights bill since the Reconstruction days after the Civil War. This bill seeks to protect the individual rights of all our citizens guaranteed by the Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments in those cases where the individual States have shown they are unable or unwilling to do so. Its primary protection is extended to the right of the individual to vote. This Republican inspired measure is the first such legislation enacted in 88 years and is designed to provide the muscle necessary to prevent the 14th and 15th amendments from becoming mere scraps of paper.

Only once, in the Republican 83d Congress, has President Eisenhower been given a cooperative Congress of his own political party. Through that cooperation, $11 billion was slashed from the Truman budget and Federal taxes were cut $7.4 billion a year. In the ensuing years, over $50 billion has been saved the taxpayers as a result of the tax reductions passed by that Republican Congress, and the budget has remained in balance, too.

As your representative I have fought against extravagance, waste, duplication, and big government in committee, on the floor of the House and in the votes I cast for you. Our common objective of economy in government and tax reduction would be nearer were the Republicans in control of Congress with a substantial majority to back them up and with the powerful committee chairmanships in Republican hands. It is a tough fight to buck that segment of the opposition whose only political philosophy is to spend more money to buy more votes to elect more liberal Democrats. You do not effect an honest reduction of taxes that way, either.

Status of the Old-Age and Survivors Insurance Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, in recent months there has been a number of reports in the press and elsewhere with respect to the actuarial solvency of the old-age and survivors insurance and disability insurance trust funds. For the most part these reports have concerned themselves with the imminence of the so-called cross over whereby annual fund surpluses become deficits as the result of an excess of disbursements over collections.

The old-age and survivors insurance program is an integral part of virtually every American's planning for his retirement security and for the security of his dependents in the event of his untimely death. To millions of American citizens the OASI system constitutes the basic foundation of retirement security and survivorship protection. Because of that fact I believe it appropriate that the Members of Congress and the American people have made available to them the most recent statement of the operation of the OASI trust fund issued by the Board of Trustees and a report of July 23, 1957, by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare with respect to the financial status of the fund.

Mr. Speaker, because disbursements from the fund closely approximate OASI tax collections, because of the great fiscal implications contained in even modest reforms in the OASI system, and because of the public reliance on a soundly based program of OASI protection, it is extremely important that substantive amendments in the OASI program be carefully considered in public hearing, in executive session, and in debate on the floor before such changes are enacted into law. It was for that reason that at the time of the enactment of the meritorious social security amendments of 1954 during the Republican 83d Congress, careful and deliberate study of the proposed amendments was made by the Congress. In the 83d Congress a group of highly skilled nonpartisan experts made a thorough study of their social security system. As a result of their study, as a result of study by the appropriate departments in the administration, and as a result of study by the Congress, the social security amendments of 1954 were developed. These amendments constituted in my judgment the most important and the most beneficial changes made in the law since the program's inception.

These Republican improvements included the following changes in the law:

First. Coverage was extended to an additional 10.2 million American workers and their families, including farmers, State and local government employees, and self-employed professional individuals;

Second. Monthly benefits were increased for those already on the retirement rolls and an improved benefit formula was provided for those retiring in the future;

Third. Average benefit payments were raised by allowing the dropout of up to 5 years of lowest earnings;

Fourth. Benefit recipients were allowed to earn as much as $1,200 annually without loss of benefits;

Fifth. Benefit rights of individuals were protected during periods of total disability, and other important improvements were made in the law that I shall not take the time to enumerate.

I stress the fact that these improvements were made possible by, and were the result of, thorough and complete consideration of the legislation in public hearings, in executive sessions, and in expert study.

In the Democrat-controlled 84th Congress social-security amendments were again enacted, but unfortunately such amendments did not receive the extensive study that circumstances warranted be given to them. The Republican members of the House Committee on Ways and Means constructively endeavored to have public hearings held on proposed changes to the Social Security Act at the time the Democrat members of the committee undertook to hastily prepare what they hoped would be a politically popular social security bill. This occurred in 1955 during the first session of the 84th Congress, and the Democrat majority used as an excuse for not holding hearings the fact that time remaining in the 1955 session of Congress did not permit a mature consideration of the proposed changes. The Democrats took this position despite the fact that they were proposing a multibillion dollar increase in the cost of the program, despite the fact that they proposed to increase the social security tax burden imposed on the American people, and despite the fact that there were many other meritorious proposals for improving the OASI system that were to be arbitrarily disregarded by the Democrat majority. The soundness of the Republican position on the legislation to the effect that hearings should be held so that the proposed amendments could be perfected and so that a priority could be established to determine the changes that would be most beneficial to the American people was clearly supported by the fact that the Senate took no action on the bill during 1955 and that the legislation did not become public law until August 1, 1956. The Republican Party supported the resulting amendments to the law but pointed out the need for more deliberate consideration of the proposed changes.

It is important to recount this legislative record of Republican responsibility and Democrat political motivation with regard to social-security legislation because of its implications with respect to future improvements in the social-security law that may become possible and may be deemed desirable and necessary. Under existing law the ultimate tax on covered wages is projected to become 9 percent effective in 1975 shared equally by employees and their employers. The self-employment tax would become 6¾ percent at that time. To evaluate the highness of these rates it must be remembered that the tax applicable to wages is a tax on gross wages without allowance for personal exemptions, dependents, or other deductions. The tax on self-employment income is a tax on adjusted gross income and permits only certain business deductions. Consequently, as a percentage of net income, the tax is substantially higher than would be indicated by the actual rates. Mr. Speaker, these facts make it obvious that meritorious improvements in the social-security law which affect millions of Americans must be the subject of the most careful legislative study at such time as they are enacted. Democrat-controlled executive sessions are not enough. The public's stake in a sound social-security program is so great that the Democrat Party cannot responsibly pursue a course of closed-door sessions in the preparation of social-security amendments as they did in 1952 and again in 1954. Such legislation must not be brought up under suspension of the rules in the House of Representatives allowing only 40 minutes of debate in regard to a program that is so vital to the economic security of our great Nation.

As chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means during the 83d Congress it was my privilege to be the author of the legislation which made sweeping improvements in our social-security program and which became known as the Social Security Amendments of 1954. As chairman of the committee at that time I insisted, with the support of my colleagues on the committee, that public hearings be held on the legislation and that full discussion be had on the subject before further legislative action was taken. It is my hope that further improvements in the law will come about only after such consideration in public session has occurred. As I stated previously I will include two documents relating to the actuarial status of the OASI trust fund for the information of all interested persons at this point in the RECORD:

FINANCIAL STATUS OF THE OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE TRUST FUND

The trustees of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance trust fund, in their report to Congress dated March 1, 1957, state that the old-age and survivors insurance system is in actuarial balance. That is, for the long-range future the system will have sufficient income from contributions, based on the tax schedule now in the law, and from interest earned on investments, to meet all future payments for benefits and administrative expenses. Disbursements will grow, but so too will contribution and interest income.

It was widely recognized when the old-age and survivors insurance program was first established that the number of beneficiaries on the rolls, and hence the amount of benefit payments, would increase steadily for the next 50 or 75 years. This is due not only to the rising number of aged persons in the population but also because in the future a much larger proportion of aged persons is expected to be eligible to receive benefits under the program than at present.

To meet this expected future rise in benefit payments Congress has provided for gradually rising contribution rates. The combined employer-employee contribution rate to finance the retirement and survivor benefits under the program is now 4 percent of the first $4,200 of an employee's anual earnings. The combined rate is scheduled to rise to 5 percent in 1960; to 6 percent in 1965; to 7 percent in 1970; and to 8 percent for 1975 and later years. (Beginning in 1957, an additional one-half percent of taxable earnings is paid into a separate fund—the Federal Disability Insurance Trust Fund—to finance the payment of monthly insurance benefits to disabled workers between the ages of 50 and 65.)

Because of the long-run upward trend in benefit payments the excess of income over disbursements declines each year during the 5-year periods between scheduled tax increases. As a result, it has been recognized that the year-to-year growth in the trust fund would be smallest—the fund might even decline—for a time before each change in rate became effective. However, aggregate income of the fund over many years will exceed aggregate outgo, and thus the long-range trend in the size of the fund will be upward.

CURRENT DEVELOPMENT

1. Trust fund income has exceeded outgo in every year since the program started operations in 1937. As expected, the amount of this excess of income over disbursements—in other words, the net increase in the fund—has been declining for the past several years. Thus during the calendar year 1954 the fund increased by $1,869 million; during 1955, by $1,087 million; during 1956, by $856 million. Estimates now indicate that during calendar year 1957 the trust fund will increase by more than $100 million. The assets of the fund at December 31, 1957, are estimated at $22.6 billion. During 1958 the fund may increase slightly or decrease slightly. (A precise estimate of the direction of movement in 1958 is not possible because a slight variation in estimated income or in estimated disbursements can completely change the close balance that will apparently prevail for that year.) In 1959 it seems quite likely that the fund will decline. Then under the impetus of the rate increase beginning in 1960 the fund will rise substantially during the first 2 or 3 years of the next 5-year period, 1960–64.

2. Although contribution income to the trust fund is in line with and is expected to continue in line with estimates, current benefit expenditures are somewhat higher than was originally estimated. As a result, the temporary halt in the growth of the fund which was foreseen as a part of the general pattern of trust-fund growth has come about somewhat earlier than was expected.

3. Legislation in 1954 and 1956 extended coverage under the program to a number of occupational groups that were formerly excluded. More aged persons have become insured and filed claims for benefits as a result of these extensions of coverage than was originally estimated. Self-employed farmers are a major group among these claimants. Some 375,000 self-employed farm operators filed applications for retirement benefits by June 30, 1957. These higher than expected claims, coming primarily from a backlog of farmers, many of whom were well beyond the minimum retirement age under the program, represent largely a one-time event. The resulting additional benefit payments, although significant from a short-range viewpoint, have virtually no significance in relation to the program's aggregate disbursements over the long-range future and thus have virtually no effect on the financial soundness of the system.

4. A minor element in raising the amount of benefit payments over the short-range future beyond what was expected is a result of the provision, enacted in 1956, which lowered from 65 to 62 the minimum eligibility age for benefits to women. Benefits under this provision first became payable for the month of November 1956.

On November 1, 1956, there were an estimated 1,300,000 women between the ages of 62 and 65 who were eligible for old-age and survivors insurance benefits. Of this total, some 860,000 could draw benefits for November if they filed an application; the remaining 440,000 women were either workingwomen or wives whose husbands were working.

The number of women between 62 and 65 on November 1, 1956, who it was estimated would file applications for benefits before reaching age 65 was 740,000. About 710,000 have actually filed by June 30, 1957. It is estimated that an additional 80,000 such women will file applications before they reach age 65, bringing the total to 790,000, or some 7 percent in excess of the original estimate. However, current experience indicates that the excess over the estimate is the result of claims filed by women workers and wives. (It is not the result of claims filed by widows—who can receive full-rate benefits at age 62.) The higher disbursements arising from these additional claims will have no significant effect on the long-range cost of the system. This is because a woman who elects a retired worker's or a wife's benefit when she is between age 62 and age 65 will receive a reduced benefit both before and after age 65, which is, on an actuarial basis, virtually equivalent to the full-rate benefit that would have been payable at age 65.

CONCLUSION

The earlier-than-expected temporary halt in the anticipated future growth of the trust fund will have no significant effect on the long-run actuarial balance of the system. Moreover, there is nothing in recent experience under the old-age and survivors' insurance program which suggests the need for changes in the present contribution schedule in order to assure the continued financial soundness of the system.

Analysis of All Rollcall Votes in the House of Representatives During the 1st Session of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RICHARD M. SIMPSON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, at the end of the 84th Congress I presented a statistical record which portrayed the support accorded President Eisenhower's legislative program by the Members of both parties in the House of Representatives. Once again I have prepared similar tables covering the first session of the 85th Congress.

During this session there were 100 record votes. I have classified these rollcalls into four groups. Group 1 includes 26 issues which are not concerned with the President's program. Group 2 includes 23 issues on the President's program which were supported by a majority of the members of both parties. Group 3 includes 24 issues where a majority of the Republicans voted in opposition to the President's program. Although this looks like a great many rollcalls, I must add that 13 of these rollcalls involved amendments to a single bill, H. R. 6287, the appropriation bill for the Departments of Labor and Health, Education, and Welfare. One of these amendments involved a vote on a $30,000 item. I have no way of weighing rollcalls and hence have included the entire 24 in the group of Eisenhower rollcalls. However, these 13 are hardly representative of support for the President's overall program. Group 4 comprises 27 issues. These are the issues where the parties were clearly divided, a majority of the Republicans voting in support of the President and a majority of the Democrats in opposition to him. It is significant that this is the most numerous group.

Immediately following my remarks I have included the classification of each of the 100 rollcalls together with complete statistics for the Eisenhower rollcalls.

When we consider the entire list of 74 Eisenhower rollcalls, we find that of all the votes cast in support of President Eisenhower's position, Republicans account for 53.8 percent, and Democrats, 46.2 percent. Of all the votes cast in opposition to President Eisenhower's position, the Republicans were responsible for 36.6 percent, and the Democrats for 63.4 percent.

When we compute Republican and Democrat support scores for the entire list of 74 Eisenhower rollcalls, we find a Republican support score of 64.7 percent and an opposition score of only 35.3 percent. The Democrat support score is 47.7 percent, the opposition score, 52.3 percent. Mr. Speaker, let me add that these percentages include the 13 rollcalls already discussed, as well as the 23 issues where a majority of both parties supported the President.

The support score for the 27 issues where the parties were divided is most revealing. The Republican support score was 82.4 percent, and the opposition only 17.6 percent. On the other hand, the Democrat support score for these issues was only 16 percent, and their opposition score 84 percent.

The President needs a Republican 86th Congress so that he may complete the task he has undertaken.

Average Family Pays "Through the Nose" While Favored Groups Enjoy Income-Tax "Gimmicks"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HERMAN P. EBERHARTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, every wage earner knows what it is to fill out income tax forms each year, and most of our wage earners pay a heavy proportion of their earnings in these taxes. They do not object to helping to pay their share of the tremendous expenses of government, since we all enjoy precious privileges as citizens of this great country.

But the average wage earner and taxpayer bitterly resents having to pay a disproportionately high income tax in order to make up for the legalized shenanigans practiced by those who enjoy special tax benefits not available to the average family.

And they are perfectly justified in resenting this sort of unfair treatment.

As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, the committee which originates all tax legislation for the Congress, I have always battled for a fair break for the average taxpayer. I make no apologies for the many battles I have waged for this purpose, and I intend to keep up this fight to assure fair tax treatment for all.

Beginning early next January, our committee plans to make a comprehensive review of current tax laws and tax policies to remove those provisions which are unfairly generous to some wealthy taxpayers and to corporations while being unfairly discriminatory against the average family.

Such a study is particularly necessary now to repair the damage to the tax structure—the damage to fairness in the tax structure—caused by the passage in 1954 of a rich man's tax law which had practically nothing in it of help to the average wage earner and the average family.

EVENTS JUSTIFY MY 1954 STATEMENTS

Looking back over the debates in 1954, I find that I made quite a number of speeches on the House floor condemning some of the very provisions of the bill which are now causing Uncle Sam extensive losses in revenue and thus making the average taxpayer pay more than a fair share.

I find, too, that the Eisenhower administration and its chief Congressional spokesmen denied my charges in 1954 and insisted the rich man's tax bill we were then debating would not do the very things that experience now shows it has done to the revenues of this country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, there is perhaps little to be gained in going back through the old issues of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to point to chapter and verse in order to prove that what I said would happen has actually occurred. Suffice it to say that the RECORD proves it. Suffice it to say that the American public knows now that it was—yes, swindled, is the word—by that tax bill of 1954.

But while there is perhaps little to be gained in going back over the bygones of that historic debate of 1954 merely in order to prove that Mr. Eisenhower and his Secretary of the Treasury and all of his officials and advisers were responsible for pushing an extremely bad tax law through that Republican Congress of 1954, there is much to be gained in reviewing now the deficiencies of that tax law and correcting them.

That is one reason why I look forward to the investigation by our Committee on Ways and Means next January. We have a tremendous and an urgent task to perform.

DIVIDEND GIVEAWAY SHOULD BE REPEALED

In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I have personally introduced several pieces of legislation which I hope will form a keystone of the tax-reform bill we eventually vote out of committee for consideration by the House and later by the Senate.

One of these bills of mine would repeal the special tax gimmick which gives wealthy taxpayers with large incomes from common stocks a vast handout—and it is a handout—of your money and mine by permitting them to avoid a fair tax on their incomes from stock dividends.

I do not want to dwell on the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury who was most active and vigorous in insisting that this stock dividend tax gimmick be passed in 1954 has, in his own private capacity as an investor, reaped a great bonanza from this same provision of the tax law.

Mr. Humphrey has made no secret of the fact that he had vast holdings in common stocks while serving in the Treasury, and apparently he was within his legal rights if not his moral rights in doing so. I do not want to dwell either on the fact that firms in which he was a large investor benefited tremendously from policies of this administration which he helped to put into effect.

But I do think it was improper for a man who enjoys great income from common-stock dividends to insist upon—and fight for—and push through into law—a provision of the tax code which allows him special tax treatment on stock dividends of a sort which the average taxpayer does not enjoy on his earned income.

WHY IS WAGE EARNER'S INCOME TREATED DIFFERENTLY?

Is there something particularly sacred about income derived from dividends on common stocks that it should not be taxed to the recipient in the same way a steelworker, or a meatcutter, or a taxi driver, or a white-collar worker, or a salesman, or any other wage earner is taxed on his earnings?

This administration insisted there is such a special virtue in holding common stocks that the stockowners should not have to pay full taxes on their dividends.

My bill would repeal that discriminatory feature of the 1954 law. It would require that income from common-stock dividends be taxed in the same way a wage earner's pay check is taxed. Why not?

Another of my bills introduced in anticipation of our comprehensive review of tax legislation early next year is one which I introduced just today, which carries out a principle for which I have been fighting for the full 3 years since the law was changed in this respect.

I refer to the special depreciation allowance which the present tax law gives to businesses on new plants and equipment.

The average taxpayer does not get much advantage out of the depreciation features of the law. If he uses his car on his job, or if he rents out a house to tenants, then he is familiar with the depreciation provision of the law. This provision allows you to deduct from income each year a certain percentage of the original cost of the property used to produce income.

REGULAR DEPRECIATION FAIR TO ALL

Under the previous law, you were allowed to deduct for depreciation each year only an amount equal to 1 year's estimated proportion of the cost of the investment, based on the average useful life of that piece of property or equipment.

That still holds true on a piece of property or equipment which was built since 1954. But on any plant or other facility built new by a corporation since enactment of the 1954 law, the owners can now deduct a much higher percentage for depreciation in the early years of the life of the plant.

Under the old law, a corporation building a new plant would deduct about 5 percent a year for depreciation—based on an average estimated useful life of the plant of 20 years. The same depreciation allowance would then continue for each of the 20 years until the entire cost of the plant was written off for tax purposes.

Thus, on a $1 million plant, the corporation each year would deduct from its profits one-twentieth of the original cost of the plant and not pay taxes on this part of the profits, and at the end of the 20 years, it would have the plant paid for out of tax-free profits.

That is a good arrangement, and fair to all. It applies to used property even now—and to any plant already built which a corporation might now purchase. And it is the only way the average taxpayer with some income-producing property ever gets any help out of the depreciation allowance.

NEW GIMMICK DOUBLES RATE IN EARLY YEARS

But the new law doubles the rate of depreciation for the early years of a plant's useful life. Instead of 5 percent a year for 20 years, for instance, a new plant can be depreciated at the rate of 10 percent the first year, 9 percent the next, and so on, on a declining scale.

Over the full 20 years of the life of that plant, the depreciation allowance would work out to just about the same under both plans.

But here is what is happening and can happen: Using this special gimmick, many corporations have built new plants, using the latest automation equipment to reduce manpower needs, and have been milking these plants for quick profits under the tax laws. Then they can sell out after reaping the cream through the depreciation allowance, and move elsewhere and build a new plant.

SPUR TO RUNAWAY PLANTS

Needless to say, much of this new plant and equipment goes to the low-wage areas, often to areas where bitterly anti-union local or State laws are in effect to discourage union organization and hold down wage rates. And, needless to say, such runaway plant practices react adversely against established industrial centers such as Pittsburgh where wage rates are fair and labor is able to defend its rights.

Mr. Speaker, we have just recently enacted a law to repeal the so-called rapid amortization program which, under the guise of promoting construction of necessary defense facilities by private enterprise, has cost the Federal Government literally billions of dollars in unfair tax concessions to big business. This wartime law—enacted to serve a wartime purpose—was so badly abused by this administration in handouts to big business that it became a national disgrace. It permitted favored companies to write off plant costs in a very short period of time.

PRINCIPLE THE SAME AS RAPID AMORTIZATION PROGRAM

We have repealed the wartime law for depreciation handouts, but the same principle still exists, although to a less flagrant degree, in the regular tax laws.

That, too, should be repealed. And I have introduced a bill to repeal it.

Let us see how this double-rate depreciation allowance now in effect works out for big corporations. They put aside twice as much of their profits tax free in the early years of a new plant's existence. They enjoy, at the very least, an interest-free loan of this extra money for years, if they hold the plant through the full 20 years. They enjoy a wonderful bonanza if they sell out before then after skimming the cream by huge tax-free extra profits through the depreciation gimmick.

In any event, imagine how nice it would be if you or I could, in effect, borrow huge amounts of money now without paying interest on it. When anybody on the inside in any organization is able to borrow big sums without paying interest, we are all horrified by it, particularly if it happens in a union.

INTEREST RATES EXTREMELY HIGH FOR MOST PEOPLE

But it is happening every day on a vast scale as corporations in effect borrow money from Uncle Sam—without interest—through this special depreciation allowance. Thus they borrow it from you—the taxpayer.

The average home buyer now pays nearly 6 percent interest on his mortgage. GI loans are virtually unobtainable at 4½ percent. FHA loans are up to 5¾ percent, and even then, the builder may have to pay a substantial gray market side payment in order to get a loan at all on a house he is trying to sell FHA.

Installment loans carry very high interest rates now. Automobile loans cost the average citizens dearly, too, in interest.

But big business gets this handout of interest-free loans from the Government merely by taking advantage of the depreciation allowance in the tax laws as passed by the Republican 83d Congress in 1954.

This must end. The law should be made fair to all.

NEW LAW SHOULD REPEAL "GIMMICKS," HELP AVERAGE FAMILY

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am looking forward to our hearings and investigations in January, through the Committee on Ways and Means, and I intend to do everything I can to promote the passage of better tax laws.

The average family needs tax relief. It pays through the nose. The revenues which have been lost to the Government as a result of the tax gimmicks for big business and the wealthy stockowner in the 1954 law could more than cover the cost of a substantial and significant tax reduction for everyone.

We have cut Eisenhower's budget and we have taken many other steps to economize on Government costs. The need now is to cut the loopholes out of the tax laws—remove the gravy which goes to the few—repeal the slick gimmicks—and thus put taxpayers on the same basis—put them all on a fair basis.

No true American would deny his Government the necessary funds and revenues to maintain our country's greatness and to do the things which only Government can do.

By the same token, no American should be made a fall guy, to have to pay more than his fair share of the tax burden in order to provide handouts in taxes to friends of the Eisenhower administration and to those who put up the huge campaign contributions to elect this administration.

What is fair is fair. We must make fairness the keystone of new tax legislation.

H. R. 9591 by Mrs. Sullivan—The Exceptional Children Educational Assistance Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEONOR K. SULLIVAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mrs. SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, several days ago, in a special order during proceedings of the House, I outlined a bill which I was preparing to introduce before adjournment designed to stimulate and assist the training of urgently needed teachers for instructing so-called exceptional children—that is, the gifted and also those children with physical, mental, or emotional handicaps. I have today introduced the bill, and it is numbered H. R. 9591.

H. R. 9591, as its title states, is a bill to provide for the establishment of a special $18,500,000 7-year program of Federal scholarship and fellowship grants to individuals, and a $2,500,000 program of grants to public and nonprofit institutions of higher education, to encourage and expand the training of teachers for the education of exceptional children.

The preamble of the bill states:

> The Congress believes that the American promise of equality of opportunity extends to every child within our country, no matter what his gifts, his capacity, or his handicaps, whether he is handicapped by defects of speech, of sight, or of hearing, or crippling disease or condition, whether his adjustment to society is made difficult by emotional or mental disorders, or whether, on the other hand, he is endowed with outstandingly brilliant gifts of mind and of spirit. All such exceptional children require special educational guidance for development of their total educational potential.

The Congress finds that the educational problems presented by such exceptional children are of national concern, and that there is an acute national shortage of, and urgent national need for, individuals professionally qualified to teach such children, to supervise the teachers of such children, to train such teachers and supervisors, and to conduct research into the problems relating to the education of exceptional children.

While the Congress recognizes that the primary responsibility for meeting these problems lies with the States and local communities, national interest in the training of self-reliant and useful citizens demands that the Federal Government assist and encourage and stimulate the initiation of adequate programs in the States to meet these problems.

Therefore, this act provides, on a temporary, 7-year basis, a program to further the training of teachers, supervisors of teachers, and researchers in special education for exceptional children, and to encourage and assist public and nonprofit institutions of higher education to expand their training work in these fields.

DEFINITION OF "EXCEPTIONAL CHILDREN"

Mr. Speaker, among the definitions carried in H. R. 9591, covering various phases of the program this bill would authorize, is the definition of the children it is specifically intended to help—"exceptional children"—as follows:

> The term "exceptional children" means those children determined in accordance with regulations issued by the Commissioner (United States Commissioner of Education) to present special educational problems, such as (a) children who are unusually intelligent or gifted; (b) children who are mentally retarded; (c) children who are deaf or hard of hearing; (d) children who are blind or have serious visual impairments; (e) children who have serious health problems due to heart disease, epilepsy, or other debilitating conditions; (f) children who suffer from speech impediments; (g) children who are crippled (including those who have cerebral palsy); and (h) children who are maladjusted emotionally and socially, including the institutionalized delinquent.

Under the bill, Mr. Speaker, fellowships or scholarships would be authorized, with such stipends as the Commissioner should determine, totaling $500,000 for the remainder of this current fiscal year ending next June 30; $1,500,000 for the 1959 fiscal year; $2,500,000 for the 1960 fiscal year; and then $3,500,000 a year for fiscal years 1961, 1962, 1963 and 1964, when the temporary 7-year grant program would end. Thus, $18,500,000 would go to individuals for tuition, other scholastic expenses, living expenses and such other stipends as the Commissioner should provide. The idea, as I said in outlining the plan originally, is to make it worthwhile for experienced teachers to go back to college to take this advanced training, without feeling they were making a difficult financial sacrifice.

SECTION ON GRANTS

In addition to the grants to individuals, $2,500,000 would be authorized altogether—not a year, but over the 7 years—for grants to public and nonprofit institutions, making a total of $21 million for the entire program.

The language of this section of the bill on grants, section 5, is as follows:

GRANTS BY THE COMMISSIONER

SEC. 5. (a) The Commissioner is authorized to award scholarships and fellowships, with such stipends as he may determine, to individuals for the purpose of taking advanced training, at institutions selected by the recipients, for stated periods of time, in order to engage in employment as teachers of exceptional children, or to train or supervise teachers in this field, or engage in research in the teaching of exceptional children: Provided, That, in his discretion, the Commissioner, in order to accomplish the objectives of this act, may also make these awards for study at the undergraduate level.

(b) The Commissioner is also authorized to make grants to public and nonprofit institutions of higher education to construct, install, improve, or expand specialized facilities and equipment in connection with courses of instruction for persons preparing to engage in employment as teachers of exceptional children, or to train such teachers, or to supervise such teachers, or to engage in research in special education for exceptional children: Provided, That the Commissioner, in his discretion, may also make grants to establish specialized courses in this field in such institutions.

(c) The amount of scholarship and fellowship grants made in any fiscal year to residents of a State under section 5 (a) shall not exceed, in the aggregate, an amount which bears the same ratio to the total funds appropriated under authority of section 4 (a) for such fiscal year as the school-age population of such State bears to the total school-age population of all the States.

(d) Payments of grants pursuant to this act may be made by the Commissioner from time to time, on such conditions as the Commissioner may determine, including conditions requiring public and other nonprofit institutions to make such reports, in such form, and containing such information as the Commissioner may from time to time reasonably require to carry out his functions under this act, and conditions requiring compliance with such provisions as the Commissioner may from time to time find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports.

(e) The Commissioner shall consult with an advisory committee as described in section 6 (a) which shall assist him in determining the areas and priorities of need in the award of these grants, and in setting the standards for the granting of such fellowships, scholarships, and grants.

TEXT OF BILL

Mr. Speaker, the full text of H. R. 9591 is as follows:

[85th Cong., 1st sess., in the House of Representatives, August 30, 1957, Mrs. SULLIVAN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor]

H. R. 9591

A bill to provide for the establishment of a special $18,500,000 7-year program of Federal scholarship and fellowship grants to individuals, and a $2,500,000 program of grants to public and nonprofit institutions of higher education, to encourage and expand the training of teachers for the education of exceptional children

Be it enacted, etc.—

SHORT TITLE

This act may be cited as the "Exceptional Children Educational Assistance Act."

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE OF ACT

SEC. 2. The Congress believes that the American promise of equality of opportunity extends to every child within our country, no matter what his gifts, his capacity or his handicaps, whether he is handicapped by defects of speech, of sight or of hearing, or crippling disease or condition, whether his adjustment to society is made difficult by emotional or mental disorders, or whether, on the other hand, he is endowed with outstandingly brilliant gifts of mind and of spirit. All such exceptional children require special educational guidance for development of their total educational potential.

The Congress finds that the educational problems presented by such exceptional children are of national concern, and that there is an acute national shortage of, and urgent national need for, individuals professionally qualified to teach such children, to supervise the teachers of such children, to train such teachers and supervisors, and to conduct research into the problems relating to the education of exceptional children.

While the Congress recognizes that the primary responsibility for meeting these problems lies with the States and local communities, national interest in the training of self-reliant and useful citizens demands that the Federal Government assist and encourage and stimulate the initiation of adequate programs in the States to meet these problems.

Therefore, this act provides, on a temporary, 7-year basis, a program to further the training of teachers, supervisors of teachers, and researchers in special education for exceptional children, and to encourage and assist public and nonprofit institutions of higher education to expand their training work in these fields.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this act—

(1) The term "State" means a State, Alaska, Hawaii, the District of Columbia, and the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico;

(2) The term "Commissioner" means the United States Commissioner of Education;

(3) The term "school-age population" means that part of the population which is between the ages of 5 and 17, both inclusive, determined by the Commissioner on the basis of the population between such ages for the most recent year for which satisfactory data are available from the Department of Commerce;

(4) The term "State educational agency" means the State board of education or other agency or officer primarily responsible for the State supervision of public elementary and secondary schools in a State, or, if there is no such agency or officer, an agency or officer designated by the governor or by State law;

(5) The term "nonprofit institution" means an institution owned and operated by one or more corporations or associations no part of the net earnings of which inures, or may lawfully inure, to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual; and

(6) The term "exceptional children" means those children determined in accordance with regulations issued by the Commissioner to present special educational problems, such as (a) children who are unusually intelligent or gifted; (b) children who are mentally retarded; (c) children who are deaf or hard of hearing; (d) children who are blind or have serious visual impairments; (e) children who have serious health problems due to heart disease, epilepsy, or other debilitating conditions; (f) children who suffer from speech impediments; (g) children who are crippled (including those who have cerebral palsy); and (h) children who are maladjusted emotionally and socially, including the institutionalized delinquent.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 4. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated $500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958; $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959; $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960; $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961; $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962; $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1963; and $3,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1964; for grants to individuals for scholarships and fellowships in accordance with the provisions of section 5 (a) of this act.

(b) There is also authorized the sum of $2,500,000 to be expended during the existence of this program in the form of grants to public and nonprofit institutions in accordance with the provisions of section 5 (b) of this act.

GRANTS BY THE COMMISSIONER

SEC. 5. (a) The Commissioner is authorized to award scholarships and fellowships, with such stipends as he may determine, to individuals for the purpose of taking advanced training at institutions selected by the recipients, for stated periods of time, in order to engage in employment as teachers of exceptional children, or to train or supervise teachers in this field, or engage in research in the teaching of exceptional children: Provided, That, in his discretion, the Commissioner, in order to accomplish the objectives of this act, may also make these awards for study at the undergraduate level.

(b) The Commissioner is also authorized to make grants to public and nonprofit institutions of higher education to construct, install, improve, or expand specialized facilities and equipment in connection with courses of instruction for persons preparing to engage in employment as teachers of exceptional children, or to train such teachers, or to supervise such teachers, or to engage in research in special education for exceptional children: Provided, That the Commissioner, in his discretion, may also make grants to establish specialized courses in this field in such institutions.

(c) The amount of scholarship and fellowship grants made in any fiscal year to residents of a State under section 5 (a) shall not exceed, in the aggregate, an amount which bears the same ratio to the total funds appropriated under authority of section 4 (a) for such fiscal year as the school age population of such State bears to the total school age population of all the States.

(d) Payments of grants pursuant to this act may be made by the Commissioner from time to time, on such conditions as the Commissioner may determine, including conditions requiring public and other nonprofit institutions to make such reports, in such form, and containing such information as the Commissioner may from time to time reasonably require to carry out his functions under this act, and conditions requiring compliance with such provisions as the Commissioner may from time to time find necessary to assure the correctness and verification of such reports.

(e) The Commissioner shall consult with an advisory committee as described in section 6 (a) which shall assist him in determining the areas and priorities of need in the award of these grants, and in setting the standards for the granting of such fellowships, scholarships, and grants.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE AND ADVISORY PANELS

SEC. 6. (a) The Commissioner shall appoint an advisory committee of not more than eight persons who shall be conversant with the overall educational needs of exceptional children and who shall assist the Commissioner in developing general policies under this act. The Commissioner shall be ex officio a member of this committee and shall act as chairman thereof.

(b) The Commissioner is also authorized from time to time to establish advisory panels of specialists in special education for any of the categories of exceptional children enumerated in this act. Each such panel shall consist of not less than five persons, who shall meet at the call of the Commissioner.

DELEGATION OF FUNCTIONS

SEC. 7. The Commissioner may delegate to any officer or employee of the Office of Education any of his functions under this act except the making of regulations.

PUBLICIZING AVAILABILITY OF GRANTS

SEC. 8. The Commissioner shall take such steps as are practicable to publicize to the fullest extent possible the availability of fellowships, scholarships, and grants under this act among teachers and prospective teachers, and among all colleges and universities offering accedited courses of study leading to advanced degrees in nursery, kindergarten, elementary, or secondary education.

COOPERATION WITH STATES

SEC. 9. In the administration of this act, the Commissioner shall consult and advise with the various State educational agencies to determine the extent of need for teachers of exceptional children in the respective States and to keep the State educational agencies fully informed of all developments under this program in order to encourage them to establish special programs or special classes for exceptional children. In this connection, the Commissioner shall advise the State educational agencies of the names and home addresses of all individuals from their respective States who have received fellowships, scholarships, or grants for training in the field of education of exceptional children, and the particular field of study each is pursuing, so that the respective State educational agencies can then take appropriate steps to seek to attract such persons to positions in their home States in order to utilize the advanced education and skills which they have acquired under this program: Provided, That no individual receiving a scholarship, fellowship, or grant for advanced study under this act shall be required, as a condition of such scholarship or fellowship or grant, to promise to take employment subsequently in any State.

The Honorable George M. Humphrey: Statesman and Patriot

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, during the period from January 21, 1953, to July 29, 1957, the Honorable George Magoffin Humphrey has rendered to the American people exceptionally outstanding public service.

Mr. George Humphrey took office as Secretary of the Treasury at a time when the fiscal affairs of our Nation had reached a chaotic state. The previous administration had left a Federal debt equal to 89 percent of our annual national income. The previous administration had a planned deficit of $9.4 billion for 1953 and a scheduled deficit of almost $10 billion for 1954. Inflation was unrestrained and had reduced the purchasing power of the dollar from 100 cents in 1939 to 72 cents by 1945 and to 52 cents by 1952. With the advent of the Republican administration in January 1953 and under the aegis of George M. Humphrey as Secretary of the Treasury, deficit financing was first sharply reduced and then entirely eliminated. The budget was balanced for the years 1956 through 1958 which represented the first time since the years 1929 through 1931 that our Nation had had three successive balanced budgets. Federal expenditures were substantially reduced during the time that Secretary Humphrey was in office. This fiscal solvency was achieved despite the granting to the American people of the greatest tax reduction in the history of our Nation—an annual tax saving of approximately $8 billion. These objectives were primarily accomplished during the time that a Republican administration was working with a Republican Congress and I am privileged to say during the time that I was honored to serve as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The responsible management of our national finances under George M. Humphrey had a far-reaching effect and inspired previously unequaled economic growth in the United States. During the 4½ years Secretary Humphrey held office, employment increased in the United States by almost 4 million jobs so that an average of 65 million of our people were gainfully employed. In the same period average annual family income increased from less than $4,600 to an estimated $5,200. The insidious inflation was substantially retarded so that the cost of living rose an average of only six-tenths of 1 percent per year during his tenure in office as compared with an average increase at the rate of about 7 percent per year for the preceding 13 years. The personal financial security of our American families was markedly enhanced, and business assumed an unprecedented volume of investment in new plant and equipment.

Secretary Humphrey would be the first to acknowledge that considerably more progress must be promptly achieved in reducing Federal expenditures, taxes, and public indebtedness. I am confident that his successor, the Honorable Robert B. Anderson, will prove unrelenting in his endeavors to further the policies of his distinguished predecessor in office. This recitation of facts and statistics establishing the economic well-being and growth of America in the period of Mr. Humphrey's public service could be greatly expanded. A large measure of responsibility for this growth must be attributed to the fiscal policies established by, and the fiscal integrity exemplified by, George Humphrey.

The fiscal policies instituted and pursued by our National Government during Secretary Humphrey's tenure in office diverted us from the path of an encroaching Federal bureaucracy with its inevitable culmination in state socialism and restored us to the traditional American path of free enterprise and individual initiative. It has been free enterprise and individual initiative that have given to America our present-day greatness, and George Humphrey was properly convinced that America's even greater future lay in the same economic philosophy.

After rendering distinguished and selfless public service George Humphrey resigned his position of public trust and returned to private life. Every American citizen has personally benefitted from the fact that George M. Humphrey has served as the Secretary of the Treasury.

At the time of his leaving public office the Republican members of the House Committee on Ways and Means joined in signing a letter addressed to Secretary Humphrey expressing their appreciation for the privilege of being associated with him. Mr. Speaker, I will at this time make that letter a part of my remarks at this place in the RECORD:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., July 29, 1957.

The Honorable GEORGE MAGOFFIN HUMPHREY,
The Secretary of the Treasury.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The undersigned Republican members of the House Committee on Ways and Means wholeheartedly join in commending your distinguished public service as Secretary of the Treasury during the period from January 21, 1953, to July 29, 1957.

On the advent of your assuming office, other than the quest for peace, no other problem confronted any Cabinet officer with a more urgent challenge to effective action than the task confronting you with respect to the fiscal affairs of our Nation. To the solution of these problems you brought vast measures of patriotism, integrity, and ability. The outstanding results you accomplished stand as an enduring memorial to your dedication to public service. Without endeavoring to set forth in this letter a recitation of these accomplishments, we are confident American history will record your tenure of office as an outstanding era in our Nation's fiscal affairs.

It is inevitable that the wisdom, foresight, and principle that you have lent to your responsibility will endure as an inspiring example to your successors in office.

Sincerely yours,

DANIEL A. REED, New York; THOMAS A. JENKINS, Ohio; RICHARD M. SIMPSON, Pennsylvania; ROBERT W. KEAN, New Jersey; NOAH M. MASON, Illinois; HAL HOLMES, Washington; JOHN W. BYRNES, Wisconsin; ANTONI N. SADLAK, Connecticut; HOWARD H. BAKER, Tennessee; THOMAS B. CURTIS, Missouri.

Record of Votes in the 1st Session of the 85th Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement prepared by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, the Congressional Quarterly of August 2 once again published a misleading report. It gives the impression that Democratic Members of the Senate were more concerned with economy than the Republicans. While the economy-support score was 33 percent for each party, the opposition score was 52 percent for the Republicans and 50 percent for the Democrats.

The Congressional Quarterly study was based on their selected group of issues, which they claim reflect the attitude of Senators on economy. It did not include many issues which were of great significance. For example, just prior to completion of this study the Senate had voted for the Hells Canyon program. This vote was not included in the group of issues reflecting attitudes on Government economy, yet it is difficult for me to conceive of a single rollcall which was more important in terms of committing the taxpayers to unnecessary expense.

Now that the record of the first session of the 85th Congress has been completed, I have reviewed the 111 record votes. There were 38 such rollcalls which directly or indirectly affect the expenditure of public funds.

Immediately following these remarks I have listed these issues and the position which represents a vote in favor of economy. My study shows that 63.7 percent of the economy votes were supplied by Republicans. Only 36.3 percent were supplied by the Democrats. On the other hand 62.3 percent of the votes in favor of increased spending were cast by the Democrats, and only 37.7 percent by the Republicans. Once again the whole record completely refutes the Congressional Quarterly study.

A study of these issues clearly shows that the Republican Party has made every effort to reduce Government spending consistent with our platform pledges. We know that needed tax reduction can only result from our continued efforts to reduce the cost of Federal Government programs.

Small Business and the Small Business Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. WILLIAM S. HILL

OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, there is abroad in the land an assertion that the welfare of independent business in this country is a political issue. The accusation has been made and no doubt will be continued to be made that this administration is not doing everything that may possibly be done to foster our free competitive enterprise system. This type of argument is to me without any foundation based on fact.

There are approximately 4½ million business enterprises in the United States. Each of these businesses, no matter how small or how large, is an integral part of the trade and commerce of our country.

The smallest business enterprise is as important within its sphere of activity as is the largest business enterprise. The underlying fear of many is that our largest business enterprises will through the power economically inherent in such enterprises eventually control all trade and commerce in our country.

This is not a fancy or something which we can say "won't happen here," but it is a possibility with which we must now and always reckon.

It was in recognition of these facts of business life that the Sherman antitrust law was enacted. It was in recognition of these facts that the Federal Trade Commission Act, which established the Federal Trade Commission, the Clayton Act, the Robinson-Patman Act, and other regulatory acts of Congress were placed in the body of our antitrust-law structure.

It is not a question of large or small, but the question is, Shall our national policy be that of constantly strengthening our free enterprise system in order that every person who desires to engage in business in these United States has an equal opportunity? Since 1890 the Federal Government, regardless of the party in power, has answered the foregoing question in the affirmative. We must and we shall continue to use every resource at our command to strengthen and maintain the capitalistic system of free enterprise. The Congress of the United States as a coordinate branch of our Government has always played an important part by taking the initiative when danger to our economic well-being was threatened.

The Eisenhower administration by aggressive action has built up a substantial and impressive record of antitrust enforcement. Through the President's Cabinet Committee on Small Business the Small Business Administration and other agencies of our Government, this administration has demonstrated by act and deed its interest and concern in the small and independent enterprises of our Nation. The administration, after full consideration of the Small Business Administration's contribution, recommended that the Small Business Administration be made a permanent agency of our Government. The record is impressive and has been made with a total lack of partisanship.

THE CONGRESS AND SMALL BUSINESS

The Congress has recognized that the basic problem is concerned with the health and welfare of the small business concerns of this country; and were it otherwise, we would have no antitrust laws and the Congress would not have established laws and agencies concerned with the welfare of small business. I think it is worth repeating, as I have stated in former speeches, that the Small Business Administration is the third and most wholesome attempt of the Congress to carry out the ultimate for which we strive. The time, the study, and the labors of the Congress have not quite achieved, however, the desired goal of establishing a permanent agency dedicated to the enhancement of opportunity for small business. This we hope will be achieved during the second session of the 85th Congress. Consequently, there is no political issue involved; it is simply a question of the Congress fulfilling its obligation to small and independent businesses and collaterally to our free competitive enterprise system.

A PERMANENT AGENCY FOR SMALL BUSINESS

During the closing days of this session of Congress, the Members of the House of Representatives overwhelmingly expressed their desire to assist the small business concerns of the Nation by voting 392 to 2 to make the Small Business Administration a permanent agency. This bill will not be acted upon by the Senate before the end of this session, but I am reliably informed that it will be given early consideration when the Congress reconvenes in January. I am confident that the Senate will vote just as overwhelmingly to provide assistance so vital to small business.

I have personally urged such action since the inception of the Small Business Administration in 1953, both on the floor of the House and when testifying before Congressional committees. The majority of my colleagues on the Select Committee on Small Business have joined me in this plea for a permanent small business agency. In our own minds and in the minds of the small-business men across the country there exists no doubt that such an agency is essential to the well-being of our economy.

The reasons for the establishment of the Small Business Administration and for its continuation on a permanent basis are well known to all Members of Congress. More than ever in this era of rapid technological change, of constantly increasing demand for consumer goods and of vast purchases by the Federal Government itself there have been tremendous pressures exerted on the competitive structure of our economy. For 20 years forces have developed which threaten the existence of the small-business man who, as I have said, is the basis of our competitive economy.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that these forces exist and are extremely active, but I have not said that the battle to preserve our economy has been lost. Our business population continues to increase, and profits are being made. Many thousands of small-business men retain the incentive to produce and distribute for civilian and defense markets. They are still willing to take risks, and when given equal opportunity, they are strong and successful competitors.

THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND SMALL BUSINESS

It is extremely important, however, that the Federal Government do everything possible to alleviate the position of small business since the Federal Government itself has been partially responsible for exerting pressure on the competitive position of small business. By responsibility I mean that two wars have resulted in heavy tax burdens, in accelerated depreciation of assets connected with production for defense, in increasing dependence upon a thorough knowledge of technological developments and in Federal Government procurement policies and procedures, in rapidly changing civilian markets, in heavy demands upon the credit sources of our Nation and in a host of other factors. I freely admit, of course, that such responsibility has been in many cases unavoidable. But I also believe that such developments have been detrimental to small business and, particularly, that the Federal Government can and should do something about it.

These areas of difficulty for small business have, as I said, been prevalent for many years and will presumably continue to affect their well-being. I wish to comment briefly at this time on the developments which have taken place in two areas of extreme importance to small business; namely, tax relief and assistance provided through the various programs of the Small Business Administration.

AN EQUITABLE TAX STRUCTURE FOR SMALL BUSINESS

The members of the House Small Business Committee have long advocated that the most important step to be taken by Congress to provide relief for small business so that they may have an equitable opportunity to compete is to reduce their tax burden. To this end the minority members of the Small Business Committee introduced in this session of Congress an omnibus small business tax bill. To date there have been over 20 tax bills introduced, identical to H. R. 5631, which I introduced.

It is our strong feeling that tax adjustments will do much to solve the financing problem of small firms, that the number of mergers will be reduced, that the number of business failures will decline and that small firms will have greater incentive and greater resources with which to compete against the larger members of the business community.

The minority members of the Small Business Committee have also introduduced the administration proposal to provide tax relief to small firms in four particular areas. The bills follow the President's suggestions which are necessarily predicated upon the present budget situation.

I earnestly hope that the Ways and Means Committee of the House will give most serious consideration to the proposals contained in all small business tax bills submitted during the first session of the 85th Congress. It is my understanding that the Ways and Means Committee will commence its tax hearings in the near future.

SUBCOMMITTEE NO. 2 OF THE HOUSE SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker, during this session of Congress, Subcommittee No. 2 of the House Small Business Committee, with the Honorable ABRAHAM J. MULTER, of New York, as chairman, investigated in great detail the operations of the Small Business Administration. The Honorable SIDNEY R. YATES, of Illinois, the Honorable TOM STEED, of Oklahoma, the Honorable R. WALTER RIEHLMAN, of New York, and the Honorable HORACE SEELY-BROWN, Jr., of Connecticut, are the other members of this subcommittee. The most thorough examination made by this subcommittee revealed some areas in which improvement could be made in program administration. It showed other areas in which additional legislation was desirable. In its overall operations, however, it was found that a good job was being done and that positive and essential assistance was being rendered to the small firms of our economy. I wish to review briefly the operations of the Small Business Administration.

THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION RECORD

The Small Business Administration was established on July 30, 1953, and, after a brief period of organization and establishing policy, began its financial-assistance program on September 30, 1953.

During the subsequent 4 years, as of July 31, 1957, the agency had approved some 7,398 small-business loans, totaling $341,009,000.

This sum represents credit that this agency of the Federal Government has made available to qualified small firms of all types and in all sections of our country. In every case these firms were unable to obtain private credit. They came to the Government for assistance only as a last resort, and many of these firms would have had very hard going, indeed, had they not been able to get prompt assistance. As my colleagues know, it has always been the desire of Congress, and is so expressed in the Small Business Act, that a borrower first attempt to secure credit from private sources before going to the Small Business Administration.

During the fiscal year just ended, the Small Business Administration approved 3,536 business loans, totaling $159,094,000, nearly double the number of loans approved the previous fiscal year.

It is more than commendable that two-thirds of the Small Business Administration's loan approvals are made in participation with banks. By adhering closely to the policy of cooperating with the banks, the agency helps the individual businessman establish a line of private credit in his home city.

REGIONAL SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION OFFICES OF PRIME IMPORTANCE

Of importance, also, is the fact that most of the loan applications to the Small Business Administration are now handled entirely by the agency's regional offices, under the guidance and supervision of the Washington officials. For the most part, only the larger loan applications are approved in Washington. Through this policy of delegating responsibility to the regional offices, the agency is able to act on applications for loans with a minimum of paperwork. Our committee has consistently urged such delegation of authority and that every means be utilized to expedite processing of loan applications.

DISASTER LOAN PROGRAM

The Small Business Administration also has the responsibility for making disaster loans to help homeowners and businesses rehabilitate their property when a disaster strikes. While not confined strictly to small business, this program has been of immeasurable assistance to virtually every area in the country.

Here, again, the agency has made an excellent record. On a cumulative basis, through June of this year, the agency had approved 6,149 disaster loans for $66 million. I know we are all familiar with the personal and property losses resulting from hurricanes on the east coast 2 years ago and only recently with the hurricane in Puerto Rico and floods in Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, Louisiana, and Texas. All those disasters resulted in heavy losses which the Small Business Administration was able to alleviate through its disaster-loan program.

The Small Business Administration also makes disaster loans to aid firms which suffer economic damage as a result of prolonged drought. So far it has approved 143 drought disaster loans totaling $3 million.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS FOR SMALL BUSINESS

Another important activity of the Small Business Administration is that of helping small firms get a fair share of Government contracts.

During the fiscal year ended on June 30, 1957, the Small Business Administration made impressive progress in its programs of having suitable Government purchases set aside for exclusive award to small-business firms. Through cooperative action by the Small Business Administration and the Government purchasing agencies, some 12,000 procurements totaling $744 million were restricted to small firms. Since the beginning of the agency, procurements estimated at more than $1,800,000,000 have been set aside for small-business firms. The amount set aside for small business in fiscal year 1958 is expected to be appreciably higher than it was this past year. Congress has expressed many times its insistence that small business receive a fair share of Government contracts. I feel that the Small Business Administration set-aside program is a most important tool in accomplishing this objective.

The Small Business Administration also provides small firms with procurement counseling. In its counseling service, the Small Business Administration renders assistance to individual small-business owners and managers in determining what products or services their firms can supply to the Government and which agencies and purchasing offices are their prospective customers.

Explanation to the businessman is made concerning how and where they can obtain Government specifications for the particular products or services, and how to have their firms listed on the appropriate bidders lists. They also provide a wide range of other services—advising small firms how they can become registered as planned wartime materiel suppliers, helping them resolve difficulties with Government procurement officers, assisting them in having their products listed on qualified products lists, helping them obtain financing on Government contracts, and informing them of Government purchases for which additional suppliers are needed.

WORK OF SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION FIELD OFFICES

Field offices of the Small Business Administration handled more than 30,000 cases of procurement-assistance counseling and other case assistance to small firms during fiscal year 1957, as compared to about 21,000 cases during fiscal 1956. In addition, about 10,000 small firms were assisted to bid on specific procurements, compared to about 5,500 during the previous fiscal year.

To help small-business firms obtain subcontracts, Small Business Administration field offices through June 1957 had contacted about 5,000 prime contractors to develop subcontract opportunities and had made over 7,000 referrals. This compares to about 3,100 contacts to develop subcontract opportunities and approximately 3,100 referrals in the entire fiscal year 1956.

When a small-business concern requests assistance in obtaining Government business, Small Business Administration regional offices refer procurement opportunities to the firm until it has had time to obtain listing on the appropriate bidders' lists of Government purchasing installations. More than 51,000 such referrals have been made to assist small-business firms.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION BUSINESS OPPORTUNITY MEETINGS

The Small Business Administration has also sponsored a series of business-opportunity meetings for small firms in many cities throughout the country. These meetings, held in cooperation with other Government agencies, chambers of commerce, and trade associations, provide a means whereby the manufacturer or supplier can learn at firsthand what articles the Government is purchasing that he might supply. During 1956, 21 such meetings were held, and the prospects are that an even larger number of meetings will be held this year.

Estimates indicate that approximately 3,000 small-business owners and managers annually attend these business-opportunity meetings to learn how to do business with the Government.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION CERTIFICATES OF COMPETENCY

From the start of operations in August 1953 through June 30, 1957, the Small Business Administration had issued 317 certificates of competency, covering procurements valued at $38 million. These certificates are issued to aid small firms whose low bid on a Government contract has been rejected on the grounds that the firm lacks the necessary financial and productive capacity. Of course, a certificate is issued by the Small Business Administration only when careful study by the Agency indicates that the firm actually is capable of performing the contract. Once such a certificate is issued, procurement officers are directed under the law to accept it as conclusive, as far as financial and technical requirements of the contract are concerned.

EXAMINATION OF GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT POLICIES

A Task Force for Review of Government Policies and Procedures, established in line with the recommendation of the President's Cabinet Committee on Small Business, is receiving the full cooperation of the Small Business Administration.

This agency, along with the Bureau of the Budget and General Accounting Office, is making available to the task force specific examples of inequities, inconsistencies, and complexities in Government procurement procedures.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION SPECIAL COURSES IN MANAGEMENT

The Small Business Administration, in cooperation with colleges and universities throughout the country, arranges special courses in administrative management for proprietors of small firms.

Through June of this year more than 8,300 businessmen and women had attended management training courses cosponsored by the Small Business Administration. Since the program began, 264 educational courses have been conducted in cooperation with 100 educational institutions. This last fiscal year the agency cosponsored 109 more courses than in 1956.

THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION PRODUCTS ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

The Small Business Administration also has a products assistance program designed to acquaint small companies with new products and inventions which may be of interest to them in diversifying into additional or alternate products, to assist inventors in finding buyers or producers for their inventions, and to furnish information to small producers about current or newly developed manufacturing methods and processes.

POLICY REVIEW OF SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION ACTIVITIES

The Small Business Administration programs and policies are constantly under review by the agency's two advisory groups, the National Council of Consultants, and the National Board of Field Advisers. This is a 2-way street, however, for members of the National Council and the National Board of Field Advisers provide the Small Business Administration with their thinking on the problems affecting small business throughout the entire country. The National Council of Consultants will convene in Washington on September 26, 1957, for its sixth meeting, and the Council members have been invited to attend the President's Conference on Technical and Distribution Research for the Benefit of Small Business which begins on September 23 and continues through September 25.

The President's Conference is being held to assist small manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers in the use of modern methods and techniques for developing and improving their products and increasing sales. The conference has been planned and will be conducted primarily by leaders from business, research and education, with the cooperation of the Small Business Administration and the Department of Commerce.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives voted on June 25, 1957 to make the Small Business Administration a permanent and independent agency. It is imperative that the problems of small firms continue to be attacked through assistance in meeting the need for credit and in supplying information and assistance in areas of Government procurement and production and technical matters. Additionally, the Small Business Administration must continue to serve as a spokesman for small business within the Federal Government itself. The intent of Congress with respect to small business can never be fully carried out unless and until the Small Business Administration achieves the status of permanency.

Capitol Commentary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PHIL WEAVER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, August 30, 1957

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I would like to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my Capitol Commentary covering the period January through June 27. I send these reports to my constituents in the First District of Nebraska periodically in an effort to keep them informed of what their Congressman is doing.

The commentary follows:

CAPITOL COMMENTARY (JANUARY 28, 1957)

This is the first in a series of newsletters which will come to you during the 1st and 2d sessions of the 85th Congress. The purpose of Capitol Commentary is the same as any newsletter—to bring to your attention important questions of the day that concern you as citizens and taxpayers. An expression from you on these matters is solicited, welcome, and helpful so that, as your Representative, I will know exactly what your viewpoints are and the consensus of thinking of folks back home. Please feel free to drop me a line at 440, Old House Office Building, Washington 25, D. C. When you finish with this newsletter, pass it on to a friend or acquaintance. If you are not presently receiving it, a card with your name and address is all that is necessary for you or a friend to be added to our mailing list or to correct your present listing. Check your local paper for radio and TV schedules concerning reports from your Congressman in Washington.

THE 85TH CONGRESS

On January 3, 1957, the 85th Congress officially convened and its membership took the solemn oath of office as pronounced by the Speaker of the House, SAM RAYBURN, of Texas. This was the eighth time Mr. RAYBURN has taken the oath as Speaker and the 23d time as Member of Congress. Only one other Member has repeated this vow as many times in the history of our country, that being the late Adolph J. Sabath, of Illinois.

It was my privilege to repeat in the Chamber of the House of Representatives this oath for the second time:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God."

The Honorable CARL VINSON, of Georgia, who entered the same Congress as Mr. RAYBURN, the 63d, but who was elected some months later to fill a vacancy, administered the oath to Mr. RAYBURN. This Congress is unique in the fact that for the second time in the history of the United States we have a President of one party and both Houses of Congress of the opposite party. This previously occurred during the administration of Zachary Taylor as a result of the election of 1848. With the convening of the 31st Congress in January of 1849, both Houses of Congress were controlled by the Democratic Party while the President, Zachary Taylor, was a Whig. Nebraska is one of the six States out of 48 that has an all Republican delegation in the House and Senate; the others are Connecticut, New Hampshire, Vermont, North Dakota, and Utah.

INAUGURATION

Many Nebraskans journeyed to Washington to attend the inaugural ceremonies of Dwight Eisenhower and RICHARD NIXON and to participate in the festivities of this historic occasion. It was a pleasure for me to welcome so many citizens of our State who were here to witness this impressive event including Governor Anderson and the Sidney, Nebr., High School Band. The presence of these young people in the inaugural parade was one of the highlights for all Nebraskans in Washington as well as for those who watched on TV back home. Townspeople of Sidney are deserving of a real pat on the back for their civic pride and interest in making possible this display of Nebraskan youth and talent in our National Capital.

THE PRESIDENT'S STATE OF THE UNION MESSAGE

The President's state of the Union message was a comprehensive and general review of the administration's program. On the domestic front, school construction and civil rights will probably be the most controversial. Concerning Federal aid to education—it has always been my feeling that the people of Nebraska want to handle their school problems in their own way and dislike Federal interference. Our State has developed a fine educational system where we have local control and the people of the First District and other sections of Nebraska have indicated to me on numerous occasions their desire to work these problems out on matters pertaining to education.

A number of proposals that would keep Federal interference at a minimum will undoubtedly came before the Congress. Our neighbor, ERRETT SCRIVNER, of Kansas, has again introduced the so-called Scrivner plan. His bill provides that the collector of internal revenue of each State would remit to the State treasurer each quarter for educational purposes (or school construction) only 1 percent of the personal and corporate income taxes collected during that quarter. As an example, the income and corporate taxes collected from Nebraska for the fiscal year 1956 amounted to $343,254,000. That share which Nebraska would retain under the Scrivner plan would amount to $3,432,540. I agree with Mr. SCRIVNER's statement, "Federal aid is a myth, that the money for any Federal program comes from taxes earned in each State." In the last session of Congress, I supported the Scrivner proposal and will do so again this year if it is before the House.

I was particularly pleased with that part of the President's message which referred to our soil; and to water as rapidly becoming our most precious natural resource. No one could be more aware or conscious of the full meaning of that statement than the people of Nebraska who for years have witnessed the scourge of these two extremes—drought and floods. With that thought in mind, we must be alert to a sound and realistic appraisal and canvas of our irrigation, reclamation, and power potential—not for next year but for the future needs of our State and Nation. It is incumbent upon us to be guided by the tone of the President's words: "Of making the best use of each drop of water from the moment it touches our soil until it reaches the ocean."

PRESIDENT'S BUDGET

Here in Washington, many members of both parties take a dim viewpoint of the budget outlook and consider it anything but a pleasant one. There are very few, I feel, who honestly know where the line should be drawn as to our defense expenditures in this present stage of international unrest. However, I know that many Congressmen and the majority of the people I represent in Nebraska share my viewpoint that foreign-aid spending must be stopped and that our overall budget must be reduced. A percentage cut across the board with the possible exception of the most essential defense items of our security (B-52's, intercontinental ballistic missiles, etc.) might be the proper approach. At least such a proposal would be an answer to the many agencies of Government which apparently cannot and have not realistically appraised their money needs. I am in full agreement with Congressman BEN JENSEN, of Iowa, who has called for open hearings on appropriation matters that come before the various Appropriations subcommittees and the full committee of the House. Such a suggestion, if adopted, would, I feel, through public hearings eliminate much of the fat in this request of some $72 billion, which the people of Nebraska and the other 47 States must pay with their hard-earned tax dollars.

THE MIDDLE EAST RESOLUTION

Very shortly this forthright expression of policy by the President will come before Congress. It is similar in many respects to the Formosa Resolution passed almost unanimously in the beginning days of the 84th Congress—to put the enemy on notice that the Eisenhower foreign policy is "dedicated to a program of confining world communism to the borders it now occupies, and to resisting further Communist aggression in the Free World." I am confident that this policy of firmness and decision, as it was in the case of Formosa, will promote the cause of world peace. However, the foreign-aid aspects of this question are controversial and it is a great disappointment to me that they are completely tied in with the resolution itself. This measure will come before the House under the so-called gag rule. If the rule is adopted and prevails in the consideration of the resolution, then this would preclude any amendments.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS FOR 85TH CONGRESS

Veterans' Affairs Committee: Subcommittees to be announced.

Interior and Insular Affairs Committee: Subcommittee: Irrigation and Reclamation, Territories, Public Lands.

YOUR VIEWPOINTS (FEBRUARY 20, 1957)

In my last newsletter I requested all of you to pass on your comments concerning matters of Government and important questions before the Congress. May I express my thanks and appreciation for this fine response. It is this keen and continuing interest by you that will make for even better government. Effective and direct representation through your elected Representatives who serve you in Washington is contingent upon the thinking of the majority of people back home. Please continue to write me so that I can have the benefit of your counsel and suggestions.

SPENDING IN GOVERNMENT

Of great concern to me, and certainly to those of you at home, is the amount of money requested in the budget for the fiscal year beginning July 1957—nearly $72 billion, the largest in the peacetime history of our country. This is the time we should be getting our own house in order, and I pledge to you a firm determination to continue to oppose and resist vigorously unnecessary spending in Government. There can be a reduction in spending on many fronts without impairing essential items of security for America. Foreign-aid spending and its many ramifications have brought a feeling of dependence by people in other parts of the world upon the initiative and thrift of American citizens.

Just a few days ago I received a letter from Mrs. William Landgraf, whose home is at Elwood, Nebr.; and I would like to quote several sentences from her letter: "My husband and I were missionaries in the southern part of India for many years. We saw the results of continuous material aid—it caused the people to become dependent upon these benefactors and demanded continued aid. It did not teach them self-reliance and desire to help themselves attain what they wanted or needed. Won't this continuous handout do the same to all countries receiving this aid? It is far easier to be careless and wasteful with someone else's money—there is the responsibility of receiving more."

WHO HANDLES THE PURSE STRINGS?

And while we are talking about money and spending in Government, I want to urge all of you to make your views known to the chairman of the House and Senate Appropriations Committees. They and their membership handle the purse strings of the Federal Treasury. CLARENCE CANNON, Democrat, of Missouri, runs the House committee, and CARL HAYDEN, Democrat, of Arizona, is the chairman on the Senate side.

Our President and his Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Humphrey, have urged the Congress to appraise carefully the budget recommendations of the executive branch, with the hope that further cuts can be made by the Congress in these money requests. Senator BYRD, of Virginia, has been one of the watchful stalwarts in saving your tax dollars, and again this year is working in earnest to effect additional and further savings. Members of both parties are wary of the size of the budget, but the ultimate responsibility as to how much money is spent rests with the Democrats, because, after all, they control both Houses of Congress.

Last week in the initial appropriations measure submitted by the Eisenhower administration action by the House Appropriations Committee and the House itself cut nearly $47 million from this deficiency money bill—from $382 million to $335 million. But the Senate Appropriations Committee then put bck nearly all of the $47 million—one item alone was $30 million for a minerals buying program which was unnecessary and which the House had cut out completely.

PERMANENT STATUS FOR THE SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

A few days ago I introduced legislation in the House of Representatives to give the Small Business Administration permanent status. Early in January the House passed a measure to increase the amount of money available for small-business loans. This legislation seeks to increase the Small Business Administration's lending authority by $80 million—from $375 million to $455 million. Following the action of the House, the Senate took steps to approve this increase and passed the measure on January 29. It was signed into law by President Eisenhower on February 11, 1957.

Established under the first year of the Eisenbower administration in 1953, the Small Business Administration came into existence for an interim period expiring on June 30 of this year. This agency grants loans up to $250,000 on terms up to 10 years to small-business people. It is imperative, I feel, that this agency be maintained on a permanent basis, and that these additional funds be made available for loans. My proposal would provide indefinite operations and continued stability of the Small Business Administration. Address any inquiry to the Small Business Administration, Washington, D. C.

AMENDMENT TO THE BANKHEAD-JONES FARM TENANT ACT

On Monday of this week, I introduced a measure in the House to help our farmers refinance their loans with the Farmers' Home Administration. My bill would amend the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act as amended so that, in addition to real estate, livestock, and farm equipment, a farmer, at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, could list stored agricultural commodities as well as other personal property as assets. Flexibility is necessary in any farm-credit program if we are going to restore our basic industry of agriculture to its rightful place in our overall economy. With extended drought and lower farm prices, we must remove unnecessary credit obstacles if the farmer is to survive. This suggested legislation will permit a farmer applying for a loan with the Farmers' Home Administration to present a financial picture that correctly reflects his total assets and total liabilities and not a onesided picture that overlooks part of his true net worth.

RURAL MAIL ROUTE EXTENSIONS

I have just asked the Post Office Department to review its policy which now requires that three families per mile be benefited before a rural mail route can be extended. Many requests for rural-mail route extensions which have come into this office and to my attention during the past 2 years have been denied by the Post Office Department due to this arbitrary ruling.

In a letter to the Postmaster General, I pointed out that the present law provides that rural-mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States, and that the three-family policy was outmoded and discriminated against many rural citizens in less heavily populated areas. Costs of investigations for these extensions by postal authorities would probably more than offset any increase in cost to provide this additional service. It is my contention that the Post Office Department now places too much emphasis on its three-family rule and not enough on other factors. If the Post Office Department does not liberalize this policy, then I plan to introduce and press for enactment of legislation which would remedy this injustice to our farm families.

NATIONAL GUARD

Recently an unnecessary and unfortunate statement about the National Guard was made by the civilian leader of our Armed Forces, Secretary of Defense Wilson. During World War II, my service was with airborne troops overseas and not with the National Guard. However, I know of the splendid overall record of Company B, 134th Infantry, from my hometown of Falls City. The exemplary conduct of this unit in battle bespeaks the record of similar units throughout our State and Nation. I am proud of our National Guard and its contribution to our country in peacetime as well as in war.

The proposal by the National Guard calling for 11 weeks' basic training contains merit. It would solve the present problem of National Guard recruit training because this period of instruction could be accomplished during vacation months at a substantial saving in manpower and dollars. You can be assured that I will give careful consideration to both sides of this question. I intend to support measures in Congress that will keep the National Guard strong so that it will retain its time-honored position in our Defense Establishment.

EMERGENCY LOAN DESIGNATION FOR NEBRASKA

MARCH 29, 1957

The entire State of Nebraska has been designated through June 30 of this year as eligible for emergency loans under Public Law 727 of the 83d Congress. Such loans are based on the need for credit arising from general economic conditions where no other credit is available privately or under regular Farmers Home Administration credit programs. These loans are for the purpose of purchasing items such as feed, seed, fertilizer, etc., considered to be expense items necessary for conducting farming operations. It is expected that the processing of applications for these loans will start the first week in April.

A REVIEW OF THE RECORD

While serving as your Representative, I have conscientiously tried to practice what I preach as far as effecting economy in government. Nothing can be clearer in this respect than my recorded voting record. A brief rundown of some of these votes show where I stand.

Against increasing the salaries of Members of Congress and United States judges and attorneys.

Against increasing the salaries of the judges of various courts in the District of Columbia.

Against extending for 1 year the existing temporary increase in the public debt limit.

Against appropriations for foreign aid and Federal aid to education.

In addition, there have been many other items that I have opposed because they represented waste, duplication, and extravagance in Government. I intend to continue to work and vote against those measures that I do not consider justified or necessary in the conduct of the affairs of our country. Letters from many of you in recent weeks confirm that you wholeheartedly agree with my position.

FOREIGN AID

In recent weeks, I have had many visits with various members of the House Appropriations Committee concerning excessive spending and particularly that phase which I think is the worst of all, continuation of foreign aid. The members of this committee are diligently attempting to reduce every budget request because most of them are too high. This is certainly in evidence by substantial cuts in each appropriation measure that has been considered so far this session by this committee. It is further evidenced by actual cuts of about $140 million made by the House. I was tremendously pleased to find so much unanimity of opinion to meet this challenge and particularly on the subject of foreign aid. It is my impression that this committee may cut upwards of $2 billion from the foreign aid program. I will be in complete agreement with the committee members and the Congress only when all foreign aid is eliminated. Such a gesture would effect an enormous savings with which we could reduce our national debt and then hopefully look forward to necessary and needed tax relief for our citizens. The challenge is ours and we must face up to our responsibilities.

EXTENSION OF THE VETERANS DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM, H. R. 4602

The House this week passed H. R. 4602, a bill to encourage new residential construction for veterans in rural areas and small communities. The maximum amount in which direct loans can be made was raised from $10,000 to $13,500 and the interest rate was maintained at 4½ percent. This bill is to assist veterans in obtaining home loans in those areas where private financing has not been, and in most instances, is not now available.

At the end of 1956 there were about 20 million veterans of World War II and Korea. It is significant to note that of this number about 5 million have secured VA guaranteed or insured loans while some have obtained VA direct loans or conventional loans from private sources. Thus, some 15 million veterans of both Korea and World War II have not used any or part of their loan guaranty entitlement. This is quite revealing when we see that 40 percent of our veterans, who are still eligible for loans, live in 2,700 out of 3,076 counties in the United States which have been designated as in the direct-loan area. The other 60 percent live in the metropolitan areas. A report from our Veterans' Affairs Committee states: "The inequity of opportunity to obtain a home loan in various sections of the country is demonstrated by the fact that 3,234,438 veterans live in 1,635 rural counties where less than 10 percent have obtained a home loan, as compared with 2,857,307 veterans who reside in 126 metropolitan counties where more than 40 percent have obtained home loans." I feel that this constitutes a discrimination of the worst type.

In the consideration of this measure the matter of raising interest rates from 4½ percent to 5 percent came up. The House Veterans' Affairs Committee had previously voted this proposal down. I strongly feel that the veterans' home-loan program is a veterans' program and not a program designed as a basis for supporting the homebuilding industry. In the lengthy hearings that were conducted before our committee, the building and lending groups, in essence, urged that the interest rates be increased from 4½ percent to 5 percent. However, there were no assurances that such an increase would produce any additional money for veteran home loans. It was disclosed also that the life insurance companies had about $900 million in outstanding commitments for home loans with $150 million of this committed for 4½ percent VA loans. Therefore we must consider other factors. An increase of one-half percent interest on a $15,000 loan over a 25-year maturity will add $1,278 to the cost of the veteran's home. Furthermore, the eligibility of a veteran for a VA loan is contingent upon credit standards set up by the monthly home payment for principal, interest, insurance, and taxes. A veteran seeking a $15,000 loan at 4½ percent must have net earnings of $351 a month. If the rate is increased by one-half percent, he is required to have a monthly net earning of $370 a month. It is apparent then that a rate increase of one-half percent will render ineligible many veterans in the lower-income group who are seeking a loan and will saddle them with this additional cost. A desire to protect these veterans played a great part in a determination not to raise the interest rate.

The Wall Street Journal recently carried an article stating that the mortgage market is easing and quoted several banking officials as saying that future increases in interest rates are out and that some of the lenders are now looking for loans. I trust that this is a nationwide trend and, if it is, I believe veterans will be able to continue to obtain mortgage financing at an interest rate of 4½ percent. Nebraska is typical of the Nation. Only 17.4 percent of the World War II veterans in the First District have been successful in getting a VA loan as compared with the national average of 25.2 percent. Nothing was presented to our committee to indicate that an increase in the interest rate would cause mortgage financing to flow into the areas where the least opportunity for the veterans has existed. H. R. 4602 will encourage the construction of homes for veterans removed from the more populous areas and give them the opportunity to own a home.

We must not look to the VA home-loan program as a means of supporting the home building industry. Our objective should be a liberalized FHA program for all prospective home owners. The future of the home building industry is dependent upon the development of a long-range housing program which will provide a reasonable basis for housing credit for all of the people of the Nation. H. R. 5315 which I have introduced is designed to carry out this purpose. I shall continue to seek its enactment since it is my contention that such a program will be necessary if the future of the home building industry so vital to the Nation's general economic health is to be assured.

THE BATTLE OF THE BUDGET (APRIL 29, 1957)

General opposition to the size of the budget along with close scrutiny of appropriation bills has jammed, to some extent, the legislative machinery of Congress. The House so far has acted on eight appropritaion bills for the fiscal year 1958. Cuts have totaled approximately $1,141,000,000. The Senate has not, as yet, acted on any of these bills. And the record will show that the Senate traditionally ups the figures set by the House. For example, for the fiscal year 1957, the budget recommendation was for $60,892,000,000. The House cut this to $58,584,000,000. The Senate then restored not only the $2,308,000,000 cut by the House but added another $367 million to it. With the record that the House has made to date in effecting substantial reductions in expenditures, the burden now rests with the Senate if these economies are to be a reality.

NEBRASKA PRINCESSES COME TO WASHINGTON

Nebraskans in Washington were happy to welcome recently two talented young ladies from the First Congressional District. Miss Jean Dibble of Bennet, Nebr., who represented our State as a princess in the annual Cherry Blossom Festival, and Miss Shari Lewis of Daykin, Nebr., who is the American Dairy Princess for 1957. Congratulations, Jean and Shari; we are proud of you.

THE POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

The greatest loss today to the Post Office Department is in the handling of second- and third-class mail consisting primarily of newspapers, magazines, and circular material. This deficit must be made up by general appropriations. As a result we are confronted with a postal subsidy in which the costs of handling the mail exceed rates charged for the service. For example, the Post Office Department has made the following estimates of the 1956 postal subsidy for four magazines: Life, $9.5 million; Saturday Evening Post, $6.1 million; Reader's Digest, $4.8 million; and Look magazine, $3.5 million. We must put the Post Office Department on a paying basis so that it can operate in the black. Corrective action, I feel, should be directed primarily at the class of mail causing the deficiency and not at the taxpaying general public.

WEST POINT, ANNAPOLIS, AND AIR FORCE APPOINTMENTS

All young men between the ages of 17 and 22 who want to attend one of our service academies should write to me in care of 440 House Office Building, Washington, D. C. Nominations for classes beginning in 1958 will be made this fall and I am interested in selecting the best qualified young men. A competitive examination will be held in July of this year to assist in this determination. Upon receipt of these letters, I will return an application form and full information on the academies.

UNITED STATES LOAN TO BRITAIN

A few days ago the House considered Senate Joint Resolution 72. Specifically the question was whether we were to postpone the interest and principal payments due the United States from England on a loan made to them in 1946. The facts are briefly this. At the end of World War II, a balance of $622 million was due the United States in settlement of the lend-lease account from World War II. In addition, the Truman administration in 1946 encouraged the making of a new loan to England of some $3¾ billion dollars. Therefore, the total amount of money involved was $622 million left over and due from lend-lease, plus the $3¾ billion of the new loan made in 1946, less six annual payments of $138.4 million paid by England beginning in December of 1951 and continuing through December of 1956. However, no interest was paid on the latter payment of principal. The entire loan was set up for 50 years to come due in the year 2000. It appears that the original loan agreement made with the British during the Truman administration had a number of compassionate features which provided among other things that under certain conditions the British might waive the entire interest payments in any given year. Along in 1953 the British intimated that if we did not renegotiate this loan with them to relax some of its terms, then the alternative would be for them to go to the International Monetary Fund to assert and claim their right of waiver of interest. And by waiving it, it meant writing this interest completely off. It did not mean postponement but it meant complete cancellation and forgiveness of interest due the United States.

In 1953 the English began their negotiations in an effort to take advantage of some of these weak provisions. They continued, however, to make principal and interest payments until December 31 of last year, and on this date they said, "Here is the principal but we claim waiver of the interest." The proposed new agreement presently under consideration by our Government would give the British an extension of 7 years—any 7 they select of the 44 years remaining on the original loan so that they could postpone the interest and principal payments for that year until a year beginning with the year 2001 and on up until the year 2007. So this year, for example, they could postpone principal and interest payments due in December until the year 2001, next year they could postpone it until the year 2002 and so forth with a maximum of seven extensions or until the year 2007—7 years after the year 2000 which was the maturity date of the original loan. I could not support this measure to delay the payment of an honest debt to us. Each year since 1951 and until last year, payments have been made and the British claimed no right for waiving the interest. Principal was paid in 1956, but the interest amount was put in escrow. Now, for reasons of their own choosing, their claim a forgiveness of interest and wish to compel us to renegotiate the original agreement to their advantage. As Representative GROSS of Iowa said, "In other words, we are financing the British backward and forward and now we are asked to fix it so they can go on into eternity refusing to pay their just obligations to this country."

The whole thing boils down to this—it was a poorly and loosely drawn hangover from the Truman-Acheson regime. Loopholes were left at our expense with concessions to the British if they desired to take advantage of them. I wanted no part of delaying a bad one-sided agreement any longer. Under these circumstances I would not responsibly be a part of any such proposition, and particularly in view of the fact that the British have just announced a general tax reduction for their own people—possible because of American dollars.

Here is what we have done for our British friends since 1917. These pertinent figures in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD were quoted by Representative GAVIN, of Pennsylvania, from the U. S. News & World Report of March 22, 1957. "In 1917 we gave the British as a World War I loan $8 billion. In 1941, RFC loan, $390 million; 1941 to 1945, lend-lease, $22 billion; 1946, postwar loan $3,750,000,000. In 1948 to 1950, Marshall plan grants amounted to $2,400,000,000. In 1948 to 1950, Marshall plan loans amount to $337 million. In 1951 to 1956, defense aid grants of $851 million, and defense aid loans, $48 million. Or total aid from the United States of $37,776,000,000."

Our Government must stop this foolishness of doling out American dollars. We must diligently pursue a course that will bring about reductions in our national debt and tax relief for our citizens.

The House granted the British this extension by a vote of 218 to 167 and my vote was cast against it.

SOIL BANK (MAY 23, 1957)

The soil bank, as of this report, is dead after June 30 this year. An amendment was adopted in the House last week which knocked out $500 million for this program. The Senate must reverse this action for the program to be operative next year.

The soil bank was enacted too late last year to give it a real chance to work and it should have been given a fair test before being so abruptly stopped. Partisan politics played a large part in ending the program with 38 Republicans, mainly from the metropolitan areas, joining 154 Democrats to do the job. This same opposition defeated the recent emergency corn bill. While many programs have been ended by a denial of funds by Congress, and some rightly so, it is not a responsible way to legislate. It is not the responsibility of the Appropriations Committee to evaluate farm matters. That is the function of the House Agriculture Committee which conducts the hearings and makes the studies. Southern Democrats successfully led the attack against the soil bank. Why does the South have so much power in Congress? Congressman ARENDS, of Illinois, has this to say about it—

"The question has been asked why the South should have so much power in Congress. It is simply because the South, largely a one-party (Democratic) section of the country, reelects its Members of Congress, thereby gaining the seniority of committees. It is only after years of service that one, by virtue of his seniority, can become a committee chairman."

A sectional breakdown by residence of the 3 senior members of each party on the 19 committees of the House, lists 38 southerners in these key spots.

FOREIGN AID

Most of you are familiar with my stand on foreign aid. I have consistently voted against this gigantic giveaway. I would like to quote in part a recent letter from a constituent.

"Our giveaway in Europe is gaining us no good will. I know because I have traveled and visited most of the European countries several times in the last 15 years. I have many relatives in Denmark, where three of my cousins wrecked and tore down better barns than I have on my farm here, and built $30,000 and $40,000 fireproof barns (this is my estimated cost if built in this country), completely modern in every way with forced air-conditioning and heating, also running water. When I asked them how come, they stated they were helping their Government to use up the Marshall plan money for that year, so the Government's allotment would not be cut down for next year. Two other cousins built new large silos. None of them really needed help for themselves, but were helping their Government make use of the money. They laughed at us and thought we must be nuts."

This may demonstrate to some extent the lack of appreciation for our tax dollars abroad and why America has lost prestige and has, maybe, fewer friends the world over than we had before this program was started some 10 years ago.

THE DEFENSE BUDGET

The House Appropriations Committee has cut the Defense Department budget by $2½ billion. I intend to scrutinize this reduction very closely when it comes before the House to be certain that only nonessential items have been eliminated so that we will not impair, cripple, or endanger the security and defense of our country and our people.

POSTAL PAY RAISE

Many bills have been introduced in this Congress which would grant a pay raise to postal employees. Representatives of our postal people in Nebraska were in Washington recently to seek Congressional support for this legislation. In order that my position may be made clear on this matter, I am taking this means to express my viewpoints to all of the constituents I represent. First, I am sure all of us are grateful to these faithful and loyal employees of the Government for the services they perform so that our mail quickly and safely reaches our homes and offices. When this matter came up in 1955, the facts then justified a reasonable salary increase, which I supported and which was passed by the Congress and signed into law by the President. It was my feeling at that time, as it is today, that we should be guided by a reasonable yardstick in decisions dealing with parceling out of public funds. On any expenditure we must always consider the cost because it is the taxpayer who ultimately foots the bill; and as you well know, since serving as your Representative, I have consistently supported legislation which would reduce the cost of government.

H. R. 2474 is the bill prominently identified with postal groups seeking a pay raise. This measure would increase the average postal salary about $1,800 a year, or an increase of about 41 percent over the present salary scale. It is estimated that the additional per annum cost of the bill would approximate $1.3 billion for the fiscal year starting July 1, 1957. To make this measure retroactive to January 1 of this year, as provided for in the bill, would add another half billion dollars to its cost. If similar salary increases were granted to other Federal employees and to the military, as has happened in the past, the cumulative cost of this action on the part of Congress in approving this specific legislation could run well over $5 billion a year.

There may be specific cases, particularly in the metropolitan areas, where the rise in the cost of living would warrant adjustments in the pay scale of postal and other Federal workers at this time. If these facts can be substantiated, then upon that basis, I would support an increase, providing it was reasonable and fair. A study is in progress at this time so that appropriate recommendations in this respect can be made. It is my duty as a Member of Congress to study legislation carefully, including committee and departmental reports, and then determine what is fair, not only for the people to be benefited, but for all the citizens I represent in the First District. I do not intend, for political advantage, to favor proposals which, in all probability, will not become law. Adverse reports on postal salary increase bills of the magnitude requested by H. R. 2474 have been received from the Post Office Department and the Bureau of the Budget. The administration itself has expressed opposition to this particular bill because of the excessive cost involved. This would indicate that, even though this legislation were passed by the Congress, it would almost surely be vetoed by the President. In 1955, the President pointed out, "There can be no compromise with the principle of fairness, and any pay legislation must be fair to all to whom it applies. It must be workable administratively and not be excessive in cost." This view expresses my thoughts in this regard.

Many postal employees have requested me to sign a discharge petition which would, in effect, discharge the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and the Rules Committee of the House from further consideration of H. R. 2474 and bring it directly to the floor of the House for action. The House operates on a committee system and the members of the various committees study and conduct hearings on numerous proposals with respect to specific legislation. Committee consideration of proposed bills is essential if Members of Congress are to be fully informed. Therefore, I do not think it would be proper or desirable for me to sign a discharge petition on a measure of this scope which, in the final analysis, would bypass this necessary part of our legislative process. There is no assurance that any bill brought to the House floor by this method would retain its original identity and remain intact. Very likely the sponsors of such legislation, by petition, in their effort to secure its passage might be compelled to accept amendments that would be unwise and irresponsible. History will show that this has sometimes been the case. I cannot be a party to any such proposition if I am to do this job right. Only two bills have become law by way of the discharge petition since the rule providing for them was adopted by the 61st Congress almost 50 years ago. As an illustration, from the 80th through the 84th Congress, 84 discharge petitions were filed. Four received the necessary 218 signatures to place the bills on the House Calendar. Two passed the House, but only one passed the Senate and became law.

DOLLARS FOR DEFENSE (JUNE 27, 1957)

The biggest single item today in our budget is the money we spend for the security of America. The cost is very high but it is cheap if we compare dollars with the lives of our sons. Next year's defense spending called for $36 billion. The House sliced $2.5 billion from this request which left it still $1,100,000,000 below the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year ending on June 30. The Senate must still act on this measure. An effort was made in the House to put back some $300 million for aircraft, missiles, research and development, and I supported this proposition. Here in this instance was the exception and not the rule for me, on where economy begins. It is apparent that we must keep pace if we are going to keep the peace. In these critical phases of our defense program, we must stay in a competing position with Soviet Russia and be certain, without doubt, that the security forces of the United States are not impaired, and that we are not letting down our guard. We cannot afford to lag behind in these highly technical and advanced scientific fields or find ourselves lulled into a false sense and feeling of security. No one wants waste, duplication, or extravagance in government, and we must be objective in searching these things out; however, we cannot afford to gamble on needed essential items of defense—particularly aircraft and missiles, when the very freedom of America is at stake.

Let's take a look at some of the costs of these defense items. A B-29 bomber of World War II cost about $600,000. The B-36 of Korea cost $4 million, and now the B-52 which is taking the place of the B-36 will average out at about $8½ million each. Submarines of World War II cost $4.7 million, then the cost went up during the Korean war to about $22 million, and today our nuclear submarines cost between $40 and $60 million. Many of the increases may be attributed to the growing complexity of these and other weapons now being procured, and price and wage boosts which the Defense Department must pay like anyone else for any goods and services that it wants. Prices for petroleum and petroleum products, metals and metal products and machinery have risen significantly during the last several years. In addition to the fuel price increase, modern jet aircraft are more expensive to operate because of increased fuel consumption. For example; one of the new jet engines consumes more fuel in an hour than you use in your car in a year, and the fuel costs of a B-52 for just 1 hour are $330. The cost of overhauling aircraft and other complex equipment is steadily increasing. Today it costs $44,000 to overhaul an Air Force F-102 fighter, more than double the amount it used to cost to overhaul an earlier model. So when we add everything up, we can see that a strong program of defense for our country is expensive, and as one Member of Congress has so many times said, "I would rather err on the side of strength than on the side of weakness," and I might add, "Because then it would be too late."

Congratulations to J. LeRoy Welsh, of Omaha, for his capable leadership as chairman of the five-man bipartisan Commission appointed by the President to study and make recommendations for the increased industrial use of agricultural products. We are determined that the rural citizens of America will come in for a greater share of our national prosperity, and the contributions by him and his associates in this field, will greatly encourage the advancement of this program.

SP3C. WILLIAM S. GIRARD

During the past few weeks I have received numerous wires and letters from citizens of Nebraska protesting the trial of Sp3c. William S. Girard in the Japanese courts. First, may I say that I am in complete agreement with these expressions from home. On the basis of the facts that have been brought to light, Girard should have been tried by Army authorities. When this matter first came up, I went to the Pentagon and discussed the Girard incident personally with the Secretary of the Army, Wilber Brucker. Although the matter was then beyond his jurisdiction and authority, I can honestly say to you that he was in sympathy with my position and had so made known his views to his superiors but his recommendations were overruled. It might be well to review briefly the background of the United States-Japanese treaty adopted in 1953. Under the terms of this agreement the authorities of Japan have the prior right or jurisdiction to try members of the United States Armed Forces for an injury caused to a Japanese national unless—and this is the crux of the argument—such injury is one "arising out of any act or omission done in the performance of official duty." Since the commanding general of Girard's division certified that Girard's action was done in the performance of official duty, it is my feeling that the Army authorities should have jurisdiction over him.

This specific treaty with Japan is not technically a Status of Forces Treaty but in most respects it has the earmarks of one and the end results are the same. Therefore the whole Girard case focuses attention on the Status of Forces Treaty made with the NATO countries which was ratified by the Senate in 1953 by a vote of 72 to 15, and comparable arrangements similarly entered into since then between our Government and other foreign powers. As a Member of Congress, I have opposed this type of agreement which repeals international law followed for more than a century. In the absence of any treaty provisions and according to international law, our soldiers stationed abroad enjoy an immunity from civil and criminal jurisdiction. Yet, under these so-called Status of Forces Treaty arrangements with foreign governments, the United States must surrender to that country and its courts, a soldier who may be charged with violating the criminal laws of that nation. I shall continue to challenge the proponents of such international agreements—of a statuts-of-forces nature—which will permit an American boy who violates the law of a foreign nation to be tried and punished in a foreign court where the violation may have been unintentional, where there may have been no criminal motive, and where the act committed was not criminal under American laws.

From time to time amendments to legislation have been considered on the floor of the House which were designed to insure American boys an American trial if they committed a crime in a foreign country. I have always vigorously supported these amendments and will continue to do so in the interest of justice and equality to members of our Armed Forces. In 1955, Mr. Bow, Republican, of Ohio, and Mr. Budge, Republican, of Idaho, both introduced amendments to repeal portions of the Status of Forces Treaty agreements. The Budge amendment would have prevented any country where the Status of Forces Treaty is in effect from participating in our foreign-aid programs, unless that country waived a claim to try American soldiers in their civil courts and agreed to turn these American soldiers over to the United States authorities to be tried under our principles of justice. The Bow amendment would have restricted the sending of American troops to any nation refusing to comply in similar manner. In my newsletter under date of July 15, 1955, I stated, "Although both measures were rejected, I supported them as did many other Members of the House who believe that an American soldier should not be denied, as would be true in so many cases, a trial by jury."

Representative Poff, Republican, of Virginia, an able lawyer and a member of the House Judiciary Committee, says that advocates of the status of forces treaties argue that these treaties contain a list of nine rules, which guarantee a fair trial in foreign courts. However, according to Mr. Poff, "A close examination of that list discloses that they do not guarantee a public trial, a jury trial, presumption of innocence, freedom from compulsory self-incrimination, freedom from double jeopardy, freedom of worship, speech, press or assembly, or a protection against hearsay evidence, excessive bail or cruel and unusual punishment," and finally, Mr. Poff says, "It is significant to note that in some nations of the world where food is scarce, the penalty for stealing a chicken is the removal of a hand and in nations where the cow is considered holy, a person convicted of killing a cow may receive the death penalty."
