that the committee of public safety should be called upon to report immediately on the petition which had been referred to it, instead of waiting till Monday or Tuesday. His proposition was agreed to. Cambon went to the committee, and, presently returning, informed the House that the said committee had proposed certain measures relative to the critical circumstances of the Convention, and would present their project of decree in half an hour. This project was the handiwork of that expeditious maker of decrees, Barrère, who, in less than the given time, ascended the tribune, and proposed that the Girondist chiefs should voluntarily resign their seats, and submit to a temporary exile from Paris. The committee, he said, had not had time to investigate the subject, or to examine any evidence; but, considering the position, moral and politic, of the Convention, they believed that the voluntary suspension of the deputies designated by the petitioners would produce the happiest effect—would save the republic from a fatal crisis; and that therefore the committee appealed to the patriotism and generosity of the accused members, &c. Isnard, who had hastened the crisis by his wild rhodomontade about Paris, and whose name had been set down in most of the black lists, instantly grasped at the proposal. This, as we believe, he did to save his neck; but a patriot and orator like him could scarcely avow so selfish a motive, and he declared, in well-rounded periods, that he suspended himself (that is to say, from his functions as a legislator) solely for the good of his country, and in order to avoid the terrible misfortunes which threatened the Convention. Lanthenas followed his example, saying he entertained the same sentiments as Isnard, but was not at all influenced by the armed masses that were gathering round the House. Fauchet, whose exploits at the taking of the Bastille and whose sermon at St. Jacques de la Boucherie had long been forgotten, because he had given offence to Marat and had sided with the Girondists,—Fauchet, whose Social Circles and systems of universal truth and love had all exploded, or had all been rolled away by newer circles and holder systems,—followed Lanthenas, and voluntarily demitted. Dussaulx, who had also been a Bastille hero, did the same thing, and in still fewer words. Some of the Mountain seemed touched at these political self-sacrifices, but Marat would have none of them, and thought that Barrère and the Committee of Public Safety had been very silly to suggest them. "I disapprove," cried he, "of the measure proposed by the committee, because it gives the accused conspirators the honours of self-devotion. One ought to be pure to offer oneself as a sacrifice for one's country; it is for a man like me, the true martyr of liberty, to devote himself as a sacrifice; and I offer my suspension if you will only this instant order the arrest of the counter-revolutionists, adding to the list the names of Fermont and Valazé, which are not there, and scratching out the names of Dussaulx, Lanthenas, and Ducos, which never ought to have been there. Dussaulx is nothing but an old dotard, incapable of being a party chief ; Lantenas is a half-witted simpleton, not worth a thought ; and Ducos, although he has some erroneous opinions, is not guilty of any state crime, and cannot be regarded as a counter-revolutionary chief." Laajuinais, the bold Breton, said, " I believe I have hitherto shown some courage and some energy ; never expect then from me either demission or suspension. Self-sacrifices ought to be free, and we are not free, you are not free, nobody is free in this Assembly—the cannon of the insurgents are turned upon us." Barbaroux said that he had sworn to die at his post, and he would keep his oath. Some other Montagnards were quite as wroth as Marat at the mezzo termine of Barrère, wanting something more than resignation ; and Billaud-Varennes demanded, not the suspension, but the arrest and judgment of the accused, and was pressing the House to divide on this question, and vote by appel-nominal, when Lacroix, who had been to the lobby, returned into the House making a terrible outcry, and announcing that all the doors were blocked up by armed men, who permitted neither egress nor ingress.* " Ah !" cried Barrère, " all this insurrection comes from London, Berlin, Vienna, Madrid !" Previously to this intimation that the deputies were all prisoners, several of the côté droit had been to the doors and had tried to escape, but not one of them had succeeded except Gorsas, the journalist. Now, several other members, from both sides of the House, ran out to the outer doors ; but they were all driven back, and Boissy-d'Anglas, one of the number, venturing to dispute the will of the sovereign people in insurrection, received some blows and got his clothes all torn. At this sad sight Danton, who was not in all the secrets of this insurrection, although he had himself managed the beginning of it (he had been left behind by Marat), expressed the loudest indignation, and said that the outraged majesty of the nation must be vigorously avenged. At last it was agreed that the whole Convention should go out in a body and ascertain whether it were free or not. All the côté droit and the Plain rose and formed in marching order, with Herault-de-Sechelles, who had a fine showy processional figure, and who had just been called to the president's chair, at their head. They were moving off, but, seeing that the Mountain remained in their places, they halted and called upon them for shame to follow and share in the common danger. The galleries, with signs full of meaning, advised the Montagnards to stay where they were ; but after a little hesitation those deputies descended from their seats and formed in the rear of the Plain. The whole Convention then moved on in solemn procession, Herault-de-Sechelles having his hat on, but all the rest going bareheaded, in sign of woe. The sentinels and guards that had been stationed in the interior of the palace gave way at their approach, and let them pass ; and they descended a great staircase, and issued out of the eastern door of the Tuileries, which opened upon the Place du Carrousel. To such as were not in the whole secret with Marat and the commune, the sight before them was not very encouraging : Henriot was there with his redoubted Parisian cannoneers, who stood by their guns with matches in their hands ; there were camp furnaces for making balls red-hot, tumbrils, and waggons loaded with provisions, with meat and drink provided by the commune for the use of the patriots ; everywhere, every spot to which the eye could reach seemed covered with armed men and artillery ; and in effect Henriot had surrounded the Tuileries with from 80,000 to 90,000 armed men (counting that very effective force the pikemen), and with 163 pieces of artillery ! There was still some iron railing between the Convention and the troops and cannoneers in the Place du Carrousel, and outside the open iron gate was Henriot mounted on a charger, and surrounded by a numerous and mounted staff. Bravely and theatrically Herault-de-Sechelles marched up to the gate, and, in the name of the nation, commanded Henriot to make way for the National Convention. With equal dignity Henriot replied that he would make no way until the Convention had obeyed the sovereign will of the people. Herault and the Convention behind him advanced a few steps, as if they were all determined to pass. Henriot reined back his charger, drew his sword, and shouted " Cannoneers, to your guns !" President, Convention, right, left, centre, and all—or all who had gone so far—fell back from the disputed passage, and fled into the Tuileries. When they had recovered their breath, they thought they would try some other passage ; they went to the opposite side of the palace, and next to the garden-front of the palace through which Louis XVI. and his family had gone forth on the 10th of August, but they met with the same reception, and, not seeing the slightest hopes of obtaining egress anywhere, they returned to their hall with their ears ringing with shouts of " Long live Marat !" " Down with the côté droit !" " Death to the Gironde !" Marat had lagged behind to speak a few words of thanks to the brave Henriot, and to say to the soldiers and cannoneers, " Comrades, no weakness ! Quit not your posts till the traitors are delivered up." But he presently entered the august Areopagus, followed by a long train of patriots, who shouted " Long live the Convention !" and seated themselves among the members with a great rattling of muskets and pikes. And then paralytic Couthon crawled up to the tribune to put an end to this long tragical farce by a sublime piece of mockery. " Representatives of the people," said he, " you see how the people respect you, how they obey you ; you see that you are quite free, and that you can without any fear vote upon the question sub-

* The council of ministers sitting in another part of the Tuileries were equally prisoners. mitted to you. Vote then at once; make haste to satisfy the wishes of the people and your own consciences!" Forthwith the list, under the dictation of Marat, was definitively settled: a decree declaring the members whose names were in the list to be prisoners in their own private residences was drawn up and passed, few of the Plain and none of the côté droit voting. The names included in the list (thirty-two in all) were those of Gensonné, Guadet, Brissot, Gorsas, Pétion, Vergniaud, Salles, Barbaroux, Chambon, Buzot, Biroteau, Lidon, Rabaud, Lasource, Lanjuinais, Grangeneuve, Lehardi, Lesage, Louvet, Valazé, the minister for foreign affairs (Lebrun), the minister of finances (Clavière), and the following ten, who had been members of the Committee of Twelve—Kervelegan, Gardien, Rabaut-St.-Etienne, Boileau, Bertrand, Vigée, Molleveau, Henri Larivière, Gomaire, and Bergoing. It was added in the decree that, though these individuals were to be under arrestment in their own houses, they were to be considered, until the Convention should otherwise determine, to be under the safeguard of the French people. As soon as this vote was made known to the sovereign insurgents outside, brave Henriot raised his blockade, and cannoneers, sectioners, pikemen, and patriots of all descriptions, marched off, singing the Ça Ira. It was about ten o'clock at night. By order of the commune there was another general illumination and another civic promenade by torchlight. Some of the sectioners quarrelled about what had been done, and were near fighting, but, in the end, everything passed off fraternally—only a great many more arrests were made. In the course of the month fourteen victims were sent to the guillotine.

The Girondists, who had themselves trampled upon the constitutional inviolability of Louis XVI., called upon heaven and earth to witness the monstrous crime of their adversaries in trampling upon their inviolability as representatives of the people. The simple truth was, that, as they had got rid of the king because he stood in the way of their republic and of their personal aggrandizement, so the Mountain had got rid of them because they stood in the way of their sans-culottism, and because they had declared war, to the guillotine-axe, against them. The common calamity which had befallen them did not produce any unanimous plan. They might all have escaped from Paris, but Gensonné, Valazé, Guadet, Pétion, and Vergniaud, and six or seven others of less note, thought it better to remain in the capital, and, quitting their places of concealment, they returned to their own houses or lodgings to place themselves under the safeguard of the people, which was immediately converted into a guard of gendarmes or municipals. Others continued in their hiding-places, or fled and disappeared until the Reign of Terror was over. Only Buzot, Grangeneuve, Louvet, Chambon, Salles, Gorsas, Lidon, Rabaut-St.-Etienne, Lasource, Lesage, Vigée, Henri Larivière, and Bergoing, resolved to repair immediately to the provinces to try the chances of a civil war, or of that departmental insurrection which Louvet had so warmly recommended. A little later, however, Barbaroux escaped from his gendarmes and joined his friends who had gone to the departments, and, as soon as opportunity served, Pétion, Salles, and one or two others followed his example. Disguised as servants, grooms, or mechanics, the fugitive legislators arrived at Caen, the capital of the department of Calvados, in Normandy. There they found insurrection enough, but it was an insurrection of royalists, and the chiefs of it considered the Girondist republicans as little better than the Jacobins. For a short time there was a hollow union between these two parties, and the Girondists were allowed to take the name of "Assembly of the Departments reunited at Caen," and to establish the semblance of an administration. Being joined by a few counter-revolutionists from Brittany, they even ventured to skirmish once or twice with the troops of the Convention, who were very weak in that quarter. But they soon came to an open quarrel with the royalists, their incompatible allies, accusing them of a design to betray them and to betray their country by entering into negotiations with the English; and, at news of the approach of reinforcements which the Mountain were sending, they all fled from Caen to try their fortunes at Bordeaux, nearly at the other end of France.

While they sojourned at Caen, Beau Barbaroux and others of the fugitive deputies made the acquaintance of Charlotte Corday, an unmarried lady of twenty-five years of age, graceful, handsome, and enthusiastic, a republican, as she said herself, before the revolution began. She had quitted the house of her father (a provincial nobleman, when nobility was), to live, in greater liberty, in the town of Caen with Madame Coutelier-de-Breteville, a relative or friend. Her morals were said to be irreproachable, but her enthusiasm seems at all times to have had a touch of insanity. How far the eloquence and the misfortunes of the Girondists may have wrought upon her excitable mind, or whether they had any distinct notion of her intention, are considered as impenetrable mysteries. Of this part of the story all that is certainly known is, that she frequently saw and conversed privately with Barbaroux and Pétion, and that Barbaroux gave her a letter for his friend Duperret, the member of the côté droit who had raised such a storm by drawing his sword on the Mountain. On the 9th of July, after taking an affectionate leave of the fugitive deputies who still continued at Caen, she took her place in the Paris diligence, and on the afternoon of the 11th she arrived in the capital and took up her lodging in the hotel of La Providence, in the Rue des Vieux Augustins. On the following morning, the 12th, she delivered Barbaroux's letter to Duperret. On the next morning—the 13th of July—she bought a large sheath-knife at a shop in the

Palais Royal, and then, taking a hackney-coach, drove straight to the house in the Rue de l'École de Médecine, in the squalid third story of which Marat resided. There she was told that the great man was sick, and could not be seen. [And so sick was he in very truth, that he would soon have been a dead man without her knife.] Returning to her Providence hotel, Charlotte wrote him a note, stating that she had recently arrived from the Calvados, that she could give him important information about the counter-revolution and insurrection in progress in those parts, and enable him to render a great service to France. To this note, which she sent by the post, she received no answer. She wrote another note to carry with her, and to present at his door in case of her being again refused admittance, or of his not having received the first. In this second note (which appears never to have been delivered, as Marat had received the first) she said, "I hope that to-morrow you will grant me an interview. I repeat to you that I have just arrived from Caen; I have to reveal to you secrets the most important for the salvation of the republic. Besides, I am persecuted for the cause of liberty; I am unhappy, and this will suffice to give me a right to your protection." At half-past seven in the evening she took another hackney-coach, went again to Marat's lodging, and asked for an answer to the note she had written. The door was opened by a woman or by women, who refused to let her enter, saying that citizen Marat, still very ill, was in a bath. But Marat himself, who had read her first note, hearing her voice, ordered that she should be admitted, and called her into his room. The diseased wretch was in a portable bath with a stool, and papers and pen and ink, by the side of him. He eagerly asked his fair visitant what the fugitive Girondists were doing at Caen? Who were they? What were their names? She named them one by one. He raised himself almost out of the bath, crying, "The traitors! they shall all perish! The guillotine" Here Charlotte Corday drew the knife from her bosom, and plunged it into his exposed right side, and with so firm and well-directed a blow, that the weapon penetrated right through the lungs. He could only shriek, "A moi, chère amie! (Help, dear friend!)"—his blood choked him, and he was dead almost in an instant. The chère amie to whom he called was his gouvernante, or house-keeper, a young woman of the lowest or poorest class, with whom he had for some time been living conjugally. She and her sister ran into the room, and the dying shriek also brought in a man who had been folding up newspapers for the deceased. They found Charlotte Corday standing by the side of the bath; they knocked her down with the stool, and would have torn her to pieces if the noise they made had not brought some sectioners and two national guardsmen, who were on duty at the door of the Théâtre Français, into the house. To these men in authority, who saved her from the fury of the chère amie and conducted her to the Abbaye, she declared that she had done the deed for the good of her country and in the view of ending the civil war which was breaking out on all sides.*

She was lodged in a room or cell which had recently been occupied by Brissot; for that chief, after escaping from Paris towards the end of June, had been intercepted in his flight towards Switzerland, and was now in the safe keeping of the Montagnards. She began to write a long letter to Barbaroux, a document which seems to have been overlooked by the many English writers who have chosen to dress her up as a pure, high-minded heroine. The letter contains much triviality, some coquetry, an infinitude of vanity, and indications of qualities or principles that are still worse. It proves that she had been a diligent student of those writers who had completed the demoralization of France, and driven the people into their present madness—a madness taking various shapes according to circumstances and variety of condition, education, and character. She quotes Raynal, whom she calls her oracle, to prove that one is not bound to speak the truth to one's tyrants. She avows that she had made use of a perfidious artifice to entice Marat to receive her; but she adds that all means are justifiable or good in such circumstances; in other words, that the end justifies the means, which was precisely the doctrine upon which Marat himself had so long acted. In describing her journey in the diligence, she says that one of her fellow-travellers, mistaking her for the daughter of an old friend, and supposing her possessed of a fortune, which she had not, had offered her his own hand and fortune. She admits that she had been guilty of the indiscretion of talking in the public diligence about her friends, and that it was through her fellow-travellers that the discovery was first made that she knew Barbaroux and talked of Duperret. She writes as if she were confident that the death of Marat would put an end to all the horrors of the revolution, and restore peace, union, and happiness to France. She says her own life was worth nothing; that a lively imagination and a too sensible heart promised but a stormy existence; and she anticipated an eternal repose in the Elysian fields with Brutus and a few of the ancients. "My plan," she says, "in setting out from Caen, was to sacrifice him in the summit of his Mountain, but he no longer went to the Convention." She declares that what decided her to undertake the assassination was the courage with which the volunteers had enrolled themselves at Caen on Sunday the 7th. There is not a word to commit Barbaroux, there are many words meant to disprove his complicity; but it must be remembered that this letter was written under the eyes of gendarmes, and must pass through the hands of the commune, the Commissaire de Salut Public, and the tremendous Tribunal. As evidence for the Girondists it is entitled to no weight. She complains of the indecency of being watched in her cell, by night as well as by day, by gendarmes, and says she fancies that this must be the invention of Chabot, as nobody but a Capuchin could have such foul ideas. She says that for the rest she is very comfortable in her prison, and passes her time in writing songs (à écrire des chansons). She has given the last couplet of the charming song Valazé composed at Caen to all who like to have it. Here and there there is a gleam of good sense, as when she exclaims, "What a wretched people this to form a republic! Peace and good will ought to be founded first, and then government might come after; but at least it will not be the Mountain that will reign long."

In consequence of some revelations made by witnesses, Duperret and Fauchet were arrested. After one or two examinations before the Committee of Public Safety, Charlotte Corday was transferred from the Abbaye to the Conciergerie, the latter prison having now become the usual portal to the guillotine. Here, with the certainty of death before her eyes, she wrote (on the 16th of July) to her father to beg him to pardon her for having disposed of her existence without his permission—to beg him to forget her, or rather to rejoice at her fate, and to remember the verse of Corneille,

On the same day, the last of her life, she finished her long letter to Barbaroux. She tells him that he must be sure to read the long interrogatory she has undergone, if it should be published; that she has written an address, but fears it will be suppressed; that yesterday she thought of getting her portrait painted, to be sent to the department of Calvados; but that the Committee of Salut Public had not returned any answer to her demand, and that it was now too late to get the portrait done. She has asked for counsel—for that is the rule—and has chosen an advocate who is a member of the Mountain; she had thought of asking for the legal assistance of Robespierre or Chabot! She is astonished that the people did not massacre her on her way from the Abbaye to the Conciergerie, and considers this as a new proof of their return towards moderation. With the same vanity, and anxiety to figure well in public, was mixed the same rampant Romanism. "To-morrow," she says, "at eight o'clock, I shall be tried; probably by noon, to speak the Roman language, I shall have lived (j'aurai vécu). People ought now to believe in the valour of the inhabitants of the Calvados, since even the women of that country are capable of Roman firmness."

Her trial contains many passages that throw a strong light on her own character, and on the temper and manners of the time. Fouquier-Tinville, the public accuser, who was beginning to make his name terrible in France, read the act of accusation, after which Marat's chère amie and other witnesses were called in to be examined. The prisoner interrupted the first of these witnesses before she could say many words, by declaring that such examination was useless; that she had confessed, and now confessed again, that it was she who had killed Marat. "Who induced you to commit that assassination?" asked the president. "It was his crimes that induced me." "What do you mean by his crimes?" "The miseries he has caused since the revolution." "Who are those who engaged you to undertake this deed?" "Myself alone." They then went on with the examination of witnesses; and Charlotte said after each of them, "That is true," or, "That is very true." But, when a man employed about the Mairie deposed, with the intention of proving that she had had an evil design against mayor Pache, that he had seen her the night before the murder at the Mairie, and that she had asked him whether she could speak with the mayor, she exclaimed emphatically, "That is false. I never was at the Mairie in my life: I know not where it is." When the mistress of the hotel deposed that the day after her arrival a gentleman had called to ask for her, the prisoner said that that gentleman was M. Duperret. The president asked her whether Duperret did not call to conduct her to the minister of the interior. [The minister of the interior was still Garat, who had been very intimate with Duperret.] She replied that it was so, and that he had actually conducted her to the minister's, in order that she might obtain from him some papers for the use of a friend of hers, one Alexandrine Forbin, a ci-devant canoness of the Calvados. "Who recommended you to Duperret?" said the president. "It was Barbaroux, at Caen," said Charlotte. "What is the present state of Caen?" "There is a central committee of the departments, who intend to march upon Paris." . . . "At the time of your departure from Caen, did Barbaroux know the object of your journey?" "No; he only recommended me not to be long on the road." "Who told you that anarchy was reigning in Paris?" "The newspapers." "What newspapers were you accustomed to read?" "Perlet, Le Courrier Français, and Le Courrier Universel." "But did you not also read Gorsas's paper, and Brissot's?" "No; I have never seen those papers." "But you are no doubt acquainted with certain royalist papers, 'L'Ami du Roi,' for example?" "Yes, I sometimes read those sorts of journals." "Were you in close intimacy with the deputies that have fled to Caen?" "No; nevertheless I have conversed with all of them." "Where are they lodged?" "In the Intendance." "How do they occupy themselves?" "In writing songs and proclamations, to call the people back to peace and union." . . . "What do they say about Robespierre and Danton?" "They consider them, like Marat, as provokers of civil war." "Did you not present yourself at the National Convention with the design of assassinating Marat there?" "No." "Who gave you Marat's address, which was found in your pocket written in pencil?" "A hackney-coachman." "Was it not rather Duperret?" "No." "Was your confessor at Caen a sworn or an unsworn priest?" "I neither went to a sworn nor to an unsworn priest, for I had no confessor." "Were you not the mistress of some one of the fugitive deputies?" [The president was thinking of Beau Barbaroux, whose exploits in this line were very notorious.] "No! no!" "What were your intentions in killing Marat?" "To put an end to the troubles of my country, and to escape to England if I had not been arrested." "Is it long since you formed this project?" "Ever since the 31st of May, and the expulsion and arrest of the representatives of the people." . . . "It was, then, in the newspapers you read that you learned that Marat was an anarchist?" "Yes, and I knew that he perverted France. I have killed one man to save a hundred thousand! Besides, he was a buyer-up of money (un accapareur d'argent). A man was arrested at Caen that was buying up specie for him with assignats. I was a republican a long while before the revolution, and I have never been wanting in energy." "What do you mean by energy, or persons of energy?" "Those who set their private interests aside, and know how to sacrifice themselves for their country." The president wanted to know whether she had not made some experiments or studied anatomy beforehand, as the blow she had given to Marat had been so well directed and so instantaneously fatal. She said no—that that had happened as it had happened—that it was mere chancework. Peter Francis Feuillard, garçon or waiter at the hotel of La Providence, deposed that, while he was making her bed on the afternoon when she arrived, she told him that 60,000 men were going to march upon Paris, and asked him what the people of Paris thought of little Marat; and that he, the garçon and bed-maker, had replied thereto that the patriots esteemed Marat very highly, but that the aristocrats did not love him. The president then asked the prisoner whether she had ever been in Paris before; to which she answered, never. Fauchet, who appears to have been denounced simply because he was still nominal bishop of the Calvados (for atheism by establishment had not yet come, though it was coming fast), made rather a miserable exhibition. A woman of the people swore that she had seen him, as well as Duperret, with Charlotte Corday in one of the galleries of the National Convention, on the evening of the 11th. A person belonging to the hotel swore, on the contrary, that Charlotte, who had gone to bed almost as soon as she arrived, had slept all that evening, and had not quitted the house; and Charlotte herself made the same declaration. Fauchet, in an evident tremor, declared that he had never known Charlotte, either directly or indirectly; that he had never seen her in the whole course of his life. Charlotte, when questioned, said she knew Fauchet by sight, having seen him at Caen as constitutional bishop of the Calvados; but that she had turned her eyes from him, as his manner of thinking did not suit a woman of her character. The woman persisted that she had seen Fauchet with the assassin in the gallery, that there could be no mistake, that she knew his person very well. When asked how he made out his alibi, the right reverend Socialist said that, as well as he could recollect, he had spent the evening of the 11th in playing at trictrac with the constitutional bishop of Nancy and the citizen Loiseau, one of the directors of the jury of the tribunal of the 17th of August, or in the house of citizen Gaumets, in the Faubourg St. Honoré. Duperret, who was firm and bold, and evidently prepared to face the certain death which awaited him, and upon charges wholly unconnected with this assassination, declared that he had never been in the gallery of the Convention with Charlotte Corday, but he admitted that he had received her at his house, that she had brought him a letter of introduction, that he had visited her twice at her hotel on the 12th, and that he had accompanied her to the minister of the interior. He added that they had found the minister engaged, and had appointed to return to his house in the evening; but that, in the interval, his (Duperret's) papers having been seized and sealed by decree of the Convention passed that day, he had represented to her that he would do her more harm than good if he returned with her to the minister's; that he saw besides that she had no power of attorney to receive papers or transact business for her friend the canness; and that, in fine, they had not returned to Garat's. The letter of introduction which Barbaroux had given to Charlotte for Duperret had been already produced and read in the Convention, and, though it spoke of the business of the canness, it contained some very different matter, and had a postscript in which the writer said, "Here all goes on well. We shall not be long before we are under the walls of Paris." It appeared also from the letter of introduction that Barbaroux gave Charlotte some writings, and particularly a work of Salles on the constitution, which Duperret was to get printed immediately, and in large numbers. The garçon of the hotel deposed, that, besides visiting Charlotte twice on the Friday (the 12th), he had visited her on Saturday, the day of the murder. Duperret denied the last visit, and so did Charlotte, she asserting that she had expressly forbidden his coming to her on the Saturday. The president asked her why. "Because," said she, "I did not wish him to commit himself; indeed I even pressed him to set out for Caen." "And why?" "Because I did not believe his life to be safe in Paris." "But you see that you yourself were safe in Paris even after committing so horrible a crime, and you know that the deputies who are at Caen did not receive the slightest scratch here." "But the deputies who have been detained in prison here have not been tried yet!" [She was hastening on their trial,—their heads were as good as in the sack.] "How many deputies are there at Caen?" "They are sixteen in all?" "Did you not take a secret oath to them before quitting Caen?" "No." "What did you say when you set out?" "I said I was going to make a little tour in the country." [Barbaroux's letter to Duperret stated that she was going to Paris about the affairs of her friend the canoness, who had some claims on government.] "Did you not intend to assassinate the minister of the interior when you went to his house with Duperret?" "If I had had any such design I should not have taken Duperret with me to be a witness. My only animosity was against Marat, and against him only for the sake of my country." "I ask you again, who were the persons who advised you to commit this assassination?" "I would never have committed such a deed by the advice of others. It was I alone that conceived the project, and executed it!" "But how do you think you can make us believe that you have not been advised, when you say that you regarded Marat as the cause of all the evils which desolate France—Marat, who never ceased unmasking traitors and conspirators?" "It is only in Paris that people are fascinated by Marat: in the other departments he is regarded as a monster." "How can you regard Marat as a monster, when he admitted you into his room by an act of humanity, because you had written to him that you were persecuted and unfortunate?" "What would it have signified his being humane towards me, if he was a monster towards others?" "But do you think that you have killed all the Marats?" "No, certainly not!" The president then turned to Duperret, and asked him what opinion he had formed of the accused from the conversations he had had with her. "I perceived nothing in her discourse," responded Duperret, "that was unbecoming a good citizeness. She gave me an account of the good the deputies are doing at Caen, and advised me to go and join them." "How," cried the president, "can you consider as a good citizeness a woman that advised you to go to Caen?" "I only regarded that as a matter of opinion," said Duperret. The woman who had sworn so positively to what she had seen in the gallery of the Convention, now said that, if it was not Duperret that was with Fauchet and Charlotte, it was some individual very like him. They showed Charlotte the sheath of the knife, and she calmly recognised it. Throughout the trial she seemed perfectly self-possessed. Perceiving some artists occupied in sketching her features and person, she smiled, and complacently placed herself so that they might see her face to most advantage. The letter to Barbaroux, and the letter to her father, were produced and read. At the reading of a passage where she described Marat's terrible threat—"those words which decided his fate"—her countenance was lighted up with satisfaction. At the reading of the indelicate passage about the nightly gendarmes ~~and~~ the ex-monk Chabot, she laughed. The advocate, the member of the Mountain whom she had whimsically chosen to be her defender, did not appear in court; but the tribunal named Chau-

veau, a distinguished advocate and a man of honour and spirit, to act in that capacity, "seeing that the address of the counsel she had named could not be discovered." There was nothing for Chauveau to plead unless it were the insanity of the prisoner; and this he pleaded in a very brief and striking manner. "The accused," said he, "avows with sang-froid the crime she has committed; she avows with the same coolness the long premeditation—she avows the most frightful circumstances attending the execution of her design; in a word, she confesses everything. This, citizens of the jury, is her entire defence. This imperturbable calm and this entire abnegation of self, this absence of all remorse in the very presence of death, this calm and this abnegation, sublime in one point of view, are not in nature, and can only be explained by the exaltation of the political fanaticism which put the knife into her hand. It is for you, citizens of the jury, to judge what weight this moral consideration ought to have in the balance of justice." But at that time no species of monomania, or any insanity short of raving madness, was usually admitted in any court of law in Europe as a bar to responsibility, and the juries and judges of the Revolutionary Tribunal (monomaniacs themselves and athirst for blood) were little likely to make practical improvements in medical jurisprudence. The jury unanimously convicted her, and the president, applying the law to the case, sentenced her to the guillotine, and to be conveyed to the place of execution dressed in a red shirt or shift (chemise rouge) as a murderess. She heard the sentence with a smile, thanked her advocate in a high-flown speech, and then begged him to discharge for her some debts she had contracted in prison, as her property was all forfeit to the Republic.* She returned to the dismal Conciergerie with a smile on her lips. A priest attended to offer her spiritual assistance and consolation; she thanked him, but she did not want his services—she knew how to die. At seven o'clock on the evening of the same day, the 17th of July, the executioner presented himself to conduct her to the Place de la Révolution. At the moment she was writing a note, which she finished and sealed; it was addressed to the advocate of the Mountain, and called him a coward for having refused to defend her. She was conveyed through the crowded streets in an open cart, looking calm and beautiful, in spite of the chemise rouge and the savage cries of the mob. She placed her head in the appointed place without force or assistance from the executioners; and it was severed from her body in a twinkling of the eye. Legros, one of the executioners, in showing the head to the people, struck the cheeks insultingly. This, it is said, excited a universal murmur.† The face, ac-

† The fellow was afterwards imprisoned for his brutality. Rousillon, a jurymen of the Revolutionary Tribunal, wrote a curious letter about it to the public papers, saying that citizen Michonis, administrator of police, had corrected the man on the spot, that the tribunal, informed of his indecency, had thought it their duty to give ording to the minute relation of one of the journalists, was then "pale, but of a perfect beauty;" and when the executioner showed it a second time, "the extravasated blood had given the cheeks their most beautiful colours;" and then "cries were heard of Vive la Nation! Vive la Republique! and every one retired, carrying with him the profound sentiment of her horrible crime, and the memory of her courage and beauty."* One Adam Lux, député extraordinaire from Mayence, went crazy at the thought of her beauty and her fate; he instantly composed a poem or discourse, in which he called Charlotte Corday a greater than Brutus, and proposed erecting a statue to her memory. They seized him, and threw him into the Abbaye; he cried, in a transport of joy, "I am then going to die for Charlotte!" They did not keep him long waiting; his head was cut off a few days after hers.†

The cry that the assassination had been promoted by some of the Girondists was not confined to the Jacobins and sans-culottes. Baron General Wimpfen, a royalist, who had entered into the short and hollow league with them, and who had held the command of the insurrectionary forces at Caen, consisting partly of republicans à la Gironde, but mostly of royalists like himself, says that he penetrated into all their secrets, and knew to a certainty that five of the Girondist deputies at Caen had instigated Charlotte Corday. "The assassination of Marat," he says, "was the work of five of the Girondists who had taken refuge in the Calvados; but it was not Marat that was originally designated; it was Danton that the new Judith was to immolate. The Girondists called this cutting the Mountain in two (couper la Montagne en deux), because the letters, of which Mademoiselle was the bearer, contained an instruction importing that, at the moment of the great event, the report was to be spread in all the corners of Paris that it was Robespierre that had caused the blow." He says that Charlotte Corday was, like himself, a disguised royalist, and that having opened the letters and discovered that the Girondists accused Danton of a design of placing the little dauphin on the throne, a project she cherished herself, she would not think of attacking Danton. This imputed royalism (and Wimpfen even goes the length of calling Charlotte Corday a fanatic royalist) startles belief; but for whatever depends upon assertion, or testimony, the Girondists, who wrote their own mémoires, and who blackened Wimpfen as he blackened them, are in general quite as little deserving of trust as he can be. The mistake has hitherto been to place implicit confidence in the ex-parte statements of one particular faction who made the greatest use of the pen—to quote and repeat, without any examination or search into opposite statements, the stories, professions, and declarations contained in the mémoires of the Girondists. There never yet was a political faction that could deserve thus to be trusted for the materials of the history of their own day and their own desperate struggles, and perhaps least of all were such persons as Barbaroux, Buzot, Louvet, and Madame Roland entitled to such credit. With scarcely an exception, and with only a slight abatement, it may be said of them—

"Vain boasters, liars, make-shifts, they are all;
Men that, removed from their inkhorn terms,
Bring forth no action worthy of their bread."*

Wimpfen refers to living testimony for the truth of his assertions. The heaviest of his accusations seem to fall more especially upon Pétion. He says that that ex-mayor of Paris one day declared in the club of the Cabarots at Caen, that a proof that the Mountain intended to re-establish royalty was their letting live the little dauphin, whose face and charms were state crimes worthy of death! He states that a great diversity and contrariety of opinion prevailed among them; and this fact, though disguised and half-concealed by words and flowery sentences, peeps out even in their own mémoires. He says that Louvet, Barbaroux, and Guadet would have consented to live in friendship with the Montagnards, if they would only have ceded to them all the southern part of France, on the other side of the Loire, to make a republic in their own fashion; that they counted a great deal on the little powers of Italy, with whom they would have made treaties of alliance offensive and defensive. He laughs at Salles, who was eternally writing pamphlets, which he called the batteries that would breach and destroy the Mountain. He could see little patriotism in their fury, their predominant motives being a jealous spite at the triumph of their adversaries and a rabid thirst for revenge; and yet he thought that there was not one of them, except Duchâtel, but would have enrolled himself in the victorious party, with Danton and the Robespierres, if he had been able. He declares that Pétion wanted to establish the guillotine en permanence in Caen; and that, upon seeing that the people were slow in rising against the Convention, he wanted to set fire to the four corners of Caen, in order to have the opportunity of saying the horrible deed had been done by the agents of the Mountain. On the whole Wimpfen insinuates that humanity would not have been a great gainer if the victory had been reversed, and if the Girondists had triumphed over the Montagnards.†

Marat was honoured with an apotheosis. His body was embalmed, and was carried to the church of the Cordeliers, where it lay in state in a novel

a lesson to citizen Legros by putting him in prison, and that the tribunal proposed to make a remonstrance to him coram populo. "I have thought it my duty," continues this jurymen, "to make this act of justice known to the people, who, always grand, always just, will approve this chastisement, which the Friend of the People himself would have approved if he had survived his wound. Marat was too great a man to have approved of such meanness; he knew, and all the world ought to know, that when the crime is punished, the law is satisfied. Some persons have been led to believe that it was the chief executioner himself that committed the fault. This is a great mistake; Sanson is an excellent citizen, and too enlightened to have made a blunder of the sort; on the contrary, he was much grieved at it. Health and Fraternity!"—Chronique de Paris, in Hist. and most strange fashion. The marks of foul disease would have rendered him a most unsightly object if his body had been exhibited as bodies usually were; but painter David, who had charge of all these spectacles and exhibitions, got over the difficulty in a very ingenious manner. "I thought," said he, in his report to the Convention, "that the best way of showing him to his fellow-citizens was to place him in the same attitude in which I myself had surprised him the day before his death; and, therefore, I placed him in his bath, with only one hand, holding a pen, raised above the bath; and at his side I placed a stool with a sheet of paper upon it." His bloody shirt and the knife were exhibited in the church at the same time. The sections came in solemn procession, walking round that hideous mortal mass, and throwing flowers upon it, with republican orations and the most extravagant panegyrics. "He is dead," said one of these section orators, "the Friend of the People is dead! He has perished by assassination! Let us not pronounce his eulogium over his inanimate remains. His eulogium is in his conduct, his writings, his bloody wound, and his death. The people are coming to throw flowers over his tomb. The consternation of the people, their silent grief, their tears, the spontaneous honours they render to his memory, these are the most eloquent, the most sublime of all eulogiums. Citizenesses, throw flowers on the pale body of Marat; he was our friend, he was the friend of the people; it was for the people that he lived, and it was for the people that he died. [Here the citizenesses, in silence, threw flowers on the body—they were virgin citizenesses, according to David's programme.] But no more tears! His great soul, ever inflamed with the love of the republic, expects other honours from you—homages more worthy of him, more worthy of you, more worthy of true republicans. I seem to see that magnanimous soul issue from his bloody wound; I seem to hear him addressing you in his energetic language: 'Republicans, cease your tears; put an end to your regrets; it is for slaves to lament and grieve; the republican sheds but one tear, a tear for the misfortunes of his country, and thinks of vengeance. It was not me they wanted to assassinate, but the republic; it is not me you must avenge, but your country!' Yes, citizens, this is what the soul of Marat tells you. Let the terrified traitors see in you a nation of avengers. Oh, Marat! rare and sublime soul, we will imitate thee, we will crush all the traitors, we will avenge thy death by force of courage and by force of virtue. We swear it on that bleeding corpse, on the poignard which pierced thy breast. We swear, we swear." This strewing of real flowers, and of flowers of speech, continued for two or three days, all the clubs and popular societies making their processions and their harangues. The honours rendered to Mirabeau were tame and insignificant compared with the funeral honours of Marat. At the Jacobins, Ben-tabolle formally demanded that his remains should be deposited in the Pantheon. Robespierre, who thought that the club and the patriots, and sans-culottes generally, were thinking rather too much of the dead Marat, and rather too little of his living self, opposed the demand, and claimed the attention of the society to the Girondists, who had instigated Charlotte Corday, and to his own personal risks and sufferings. "I have some right," said he, "to speak in this matter, for I clearly see that the honours of the poignard are reserved for me also, that Marat's priority has been decided only by hazard, and that my death is advancing with rapid steps. Let us not lose our time in talking about interments and sepulchres. What are these honours of the Pantheon? Who are the men that lie in that place? Would you place Marat by the side of Mirabeau—by the side of that man who only merits renown for his profound villainy? Are these proper honours to solicit for the Friend of the People?" Bentabolle said, angrily, that they were very proper honours, and that Marat should obtain them in spite of jealous men (malgré les jaloux); but the majority of the club went along with Robespierre, and nothing more was said about the Pantheon, the honours of which, by the way, had been interdicted by the Convention until twenty years after death. It was in the end agreed that Marat's body should be interred in the garden of the Cordeliers, near to a tree under which he had been accustomed at eventide to read his own newspaper to the club and to the people. Several societies disputed the honour of possessing his heart; but the Cordeliers obtained that also. The Convention, on the motion of David the painter, decided unanimously that they would attend the funeral in a body. All the clubs came to the same decision. The Mother-society voted, moreover, that Marat's printing-presses should be purchased by the society, in order to prevent their falling into unworthy or sacrilegious hands; and that his journal should be continued by good Jacobin editors, who, if incapable of equalling him, might yet recall some of his energy and replace a part of his vigilance. Busts were ordered with wondrous profusion; thousands of them were made in a very few days, and in all manner of materials, from marble to sugar-paste: they faced you in all clubs and public places—there was no going anywhere without seeing the bust of Marat side by side with the bust of Brutus. The funeral procession was immense: it lasted from six in the evening till midnight. "On arriving in the garden of the Cordeliers," says the reporter of the commune, who aimed at picturesque writing, "the body was placed under the trees, whose leaves, slightly agitated, reflected and multiplied a sweet and tender light. The people environed the bier in silence.

* Others, besides Robespierre, were very anxious to have it believed that their lives were threatened by assassins employed by the discomfited Girondists. On this evening Thirion told the club an absurd story—but not too ridiculous for their belief—about a woman with "a sufficiently bad countenance," that had lately found her way into his apartment, and had very suspiciously rummaged in her pocket for something which he thought must have been a dagger.

The president of the Convention (Thuriot) made an eloquent discourse, in which he announced that the time would soon arrive when Marat should be properly avenged. After several other discourses, which were enthusiastically applauded, the body was deposited in the grave. Tears flowed, and every one retired with his soul full of grief." The seals were then removed from his papers and effects. Nothing in the likeness of money was found where he had dwelt, except a solitary assignat of twenty-five sous. Madame Roland, as well as Charlotte Corday, accuses the Friend of the People of a greed for money, as if he had not vices enough without that one; it appears, however, to be indisputable that the great Incorruptible himself was not so indifferent to lucre or to the comforts and pleasures money can procure, as was Marat. It was held to be the duty of the republic to make some provision for the chère amie, whom, according to Chaumette, "Marat had taken for his spouse, one bright day, in the face of the sun;" and the Convention voted that the governante should have the same annual pension that had been allowed to the widow of Jean Jacques Rousseau. They changed the name of the Rue de Cordeliers into that of Rue Marat, and the name of a square near it, into Place de l'Ami du Peuple; and they put an inscription over the door of the house which he had inhabited, which was written in very bad verse, but which recorded the fact (an indisputable fact to all true sans-culottes) that he had been assassinated by the Girondists.* Charlotte Corday, after she had murdered him, thanked heaven that he was not a born Frenchman. He was a native of that anomalous corner of the earth Neuchâtel, which geographically belonged to Switzerland, but which appertained politically to the crown of Prussia, and the language of which was French. His family were Calvinistic Protestants, but he appears to have got rid of all religion at a very early period. Though not born in France, nearly the whole of his life was passed in Paris, and in the same quarter of it, near the medical schools, where he perished. As a poor and uninformed student of medicine, he declared war against every established system of cure, and against all regular practitioners. He continued to be familiar with poverty and abject misery: a quack medicine of his own invention barely supplied him with the means of existence. At one time he gave lectures on optics. At a later period he obtained the post or title of Doctor of the stables of Count d'Artois, and appears to have doctored both horses and men. Down to the time when the revolution broke out, he seems to have been considered, by the few that knew him, as an eccentric if not a crazy man; but his insanity, when applied to politics and the promulgation of sans-culottism, came to be considered as prophecy and inspiration, or super-human wisdom. He was nearly fifty years old when he perished, thus being a much older man than the great majority of the makers of the French republic.

All parties had adopted Doctor Guillotin's great invention; and among them there appeared to be at one time a chance that the head-lobbing machine would be en permanence in all the great towns of the republic. The counter-revolutionists, the royalists, and the Girondists were strangers to the healing virtue of moderation, marking all their temporary successes with executions and blood. At Toulon we have seen how the royalists had put to death the president of the Jacobin Club. On the 17th of July, the very day on which Charlotte Corday was guillotined at Paris for the assassination of Marat, Chalier, a partizan and imitator of the Friend of the People, president of the Jacobin Club of Lyons, was condemned to death by the Girondists and royalists of that town, who had been driven into a league, and into open insurrection against the Convention, by his violence and his frightful projects. He was executed, with some circumstances of atrocity, on the 18th; and he died predicting that his death would cost Lyons very dear. On the same day the same party or parties put to death Chalier's friend and brother Jacobin Riard. There seems little reason to doubt that Chalier was a monster; but it was not by such summary and barbarous executions that these counter-revolutionists were likely to put a stop to the ferocity of their enemies, or to obtain mercy from them when their hour of triumph should come. On the 15th of August Barrère introduced in the Convention his project for a levée en masse; and the fourteen armies of the republic, which among them already amounted to nearly a million of men, were all reinforced; and by the 21st of August the city of Lyons, which had been invested some days before, was summoned to surrender by Dubois-Crancé, one of the commissioners of the Convention. Though deserted by the Girondists, who would not agree to any project for restoring the monarchy in any shape whatsoever, the royalists, who had employed an able engineer in fortifying the town, which was by its natural situation strong, made a brave defence; and, in spite of the levies that constantly poured in to Dubois-Crancé's besieging army, they held out for two good months. At first they counted on the assistance of the insurgents of Marseilles and the other towns of the south; but the victories obtained by Cartaux deprived them of that hope, and none other remained, except that of assistance from the army of the King of Sardinia, which, as we have seen, never got nearer to Lyons than Aiguebelle in Savoy. As the population of Lyons was large, and as the republicans were numerous enough to occupy in great force every road and path that led to the town, the royalists soon began, to feel the sad pinchings of famine. A large portion, too, of this consuming population—or all the labouring classes that remained—were disciples of Chalier and Riard, were watching the opportunity of avenging the deaths of those two patriots, and were quite as Jacobinical and republican as the men of Dubois-Crancé's army. Thus the royalists had to watch these desperate enemies within, as well as the daily and hourly increasing forces without. Couthon, whose paralysis did not reach his heart or brain, travelled from place to place preaching a crusade against the rebellious city; and on the 2nd of October he arrived with a new levy of 25,000 peasants of Auvergne. Entirely regardless of the sacrifice of human life, he demanded that the town should be immediately stormed on every side. Dubois-Crancé objected that there was no necessity for wasting so much blood, as famine alone must compel a surrender in the course of a very few more days; and upon this Couthon, with proper authority from the Convention, superseded Dubois-Crancé as one deficient in republican energy, and took the chief direction of the siege into his own hands. On the 7th of October, after a terrific cannonade and bombardment, Couthon summoned the place for the last time. After some hours of debate and hesitation, the famishing Lyonese sent out a deputation to negotiate with the terrible cripple, or rather to gain time and the opportunity of allowing Precy, who had been at Turin, and who had invited the troops of the King of Sardinia into France, to escape out of the town with all those royalists who could have no hope of mercy from the Convention. Accordingly, while the deputation, in the skirts of one of the faubourgs, were engaging the attention of Couthon, Precy and his friends, 2000 men in all, rushed out of the town in an opposite direction, and took the road which led towards Switzerland. At the very same instant a republican column rushed into the town by a passage that was thrown open to them by Chalier's sans-culottes. This put an end to the pour-parlers; but the Convention had expressly ordered the commanders of the republican forces never to allow of any conditions; and nothing but having the place entirely at his mercy would satisfy Couthon. As soon as Precy and his royalists departed, and the republicans began to enter, all the Jacobins and sans-culottes came forth from their hiding-places, from their cellars and garrets, and joined the troops; and on the morning of the 8th or 9th of October Couthon, with two other commissioners from the Convention, made a triumphal entrance into the city of Lyons, a considerable portion of which had been reduced to ruins by the tremendous and long-sustained bombardments. Precy had not marched far with his doomed column ere he encountered a great body of republicans; he attempted to cut his way through, and he succeeded, but he left half of his friends behind him there; he was hotly pursued; he found the road before him occupied by the armed peasantry of the country, and, though he again fought through, and even succeeded in reaching the mountains of Switzerland, only about eighty men escaped with him, all the rest of the two thousand who had rushed out of Lyons with him having perished on the road. If the siege had been conducted with the most savage fury—if not so much as the public hospitals, though crowded with sick and afflicted people entirely of the sans-culottic orders, had been respected by the republican artillery, there was slight chance that there would be any mercy or gentleness after the capture of the place. The lex talionis was the only law and rule of all parties; and, the old Montagnard commune or municipality being reinstated by Couthon, its members proceeded to denounce their adversaries, and especially all such as had taken any part in the overthrow, judgment, and execution of Châlier. To facilitate their vengeance and his own, and to carry out the system of terror, Couthon established a popular committee to try all rebels by martial law; and then, writing to the Convention, he divided all the population remaining in Lyons into three classes—1. The culpable rich; 2. The egoistical rich; 3. The ignorant working-people, who had no political feeling: and he coolly proposed to send to the guillotine the first of these classes, and to destroy their houses and every vestige or sign of them; to deprive the second class of their riches and all property whatsoever; and to remove the third class into other departments and corners of the republic, and supply their place by a colony of undoubted and vigorous republicans. At the same time Couthon denounced Dubois-Crancé, who, if he had been somewhat slow or over-cautious in pressing the siege of Lyons, had previously rendered important services to the Convention in putting down a formidable insurrection at Grenoble. The Convention employed the ready pen of Barrère—ready for all kind of work, and for every party that should prove itself the strongest—to draw up the project of a decree that should be decisive of the fate of Lyons. Barrère proposed, as good republican lessons and examples,—that the city of Lyons should be destroyed; that nothing should be preserved of it except the houses of the poor, the manufactories, the schools of art, the hospitals, the public monuments, and the public schools; that the name should be changed into that of COMMUNE AFFRANCHIE; that on the ruins of Lyons a monument should be raised bearing this inscription, *LYON FIT LA GUERRE À LA LIBERTÉ; LYON N'EST PLUS. The decree was carried instantly and unanimously, and copies of it, together with high-sounding republican proclamations, were sent to all the armies and to all the departments and municipalities of France. •To co-operate in carrying the decree into execution a considerable number of the Paris mob, selected from among the most desperate or daring, were sent off to Lyons. Eight hundred workmen were engaged to destroy the houses, the guillotine was made permanent, and the Montagnard commission sentenced their victims as fast as the Jacobin Club could denounce them. Having set the example of republican energy, in which was to be included the most pitiless revenge, Couthon quitted the place, and left the completion of the work to Collot d'Herbois, Maribon-Montaut, and a third villain who has not hitherto been mentioned, but whose name will frequently occur in the sequel:—this third man was Fouché of Nantes. It is said that Collot d'Herbois had solicited this mission from the Convention in order to have the opportunity of taking vengeance on the citizens of Lyons, who, in his strolling-player days, had hissed him off their stage. Fifty or sixty persons of both sexes, and of nearly all conditions and all ages, were dispatched every day by the guillotine. Three times that instrument of death was removed from one quarter of the town to another; but its operation seemed too slow to the fury of Collot d'Herbois, who recommended and introduced the practice of firing upon the prisoners with musketry and grape-shot. On one day 269 victims of both sexes perished in this manner; they were tied together in pairs, and driven into an enclosed space, from which there was no issue. Collot superintended the carnage in person, and killed some of the prisoners with his own hand. In the midst of these horrors, which lasted altogether nearly five months, and which are said to have cost the lives of from 5000 to 6000 individuals, Collot, who was always a great admirer of, and a conspicuous actor in, festivals and processions, got up in Lyons an apotheosis for Châlier, who had proved so true a prophet. Preceded by a moveable guillotine and a band of executioners carrying naked swords, which had been dipped in blood, he and his two brother representatives, Fouché and Montaut, dressed in their costume of ceremony, went in solemn procession to remove the remains of the guillotined Jacobin from the place where he had been thrown, to a more fitting and more honourable sepulchre; republican hymns, written for the occasion, were chanted, extravagant panegyrics were pronounced, and flowers were strewed, as at the funeral of Châlier's great model and teacher. After those fêtes there were fresh butcheries, attended by fresh atrocities: on one occasion, the scene of the wholesale executions was the principal square of the town; and Collot and Fouché looked on from a window or balcony of one of the best houses. But Charlotte Corday had not killed all the Marats; there were thousands of political fanatics capable of the same excesses; nearly all the commissioners of the Convention were as cruel as Collot d'Herbois and Fouché, and some of them, as Carrier and St. Just, were infinitely more ferocious. It has been remarked by an eminent French writer of the present day, that the error has been too generally committed of regarding these men, famous for the blood they shed, as individuals made great as well as terrible by circumstances; pursuing their design with a necessary oblivion of morality and humanity; excused by the danger of their country and the imperious necessity of victory. But this was not the case; there was nothing great or noble or elevated to excuse their crimes in the eye of history. Generally it was not even the error of a blind and fanatical opinion that transported these men, but a factitious exaltation and extravagance, cold at bottom, and always ready to be intoxicated by harangues and declamations; theirs was not the fury against an enemy that resists, against the victim that braves his executioner, for their inhumanity was as complete against the weak as against the strong; the dominant feeling which disturbed, and impelled those ignoble souls was a species of hot fear (peur ardente) inspired by terrible events, seeking to make illusions to itself, and believing itself courageous because it slaughtered, without number, victims without defence. There was also mingled the passion of envy against every superiority, a ferocious irritation against all things to which there was attached any idea of respect or duty. The necessity of deadening their remorse finished the perversion of these ill-organised spirits; and the absolute and arbitrary power entrusted to men who had never before exercised any kind of authority was, in itself, enough to throw them into a sort of mental alienation.* But the members of the Convention who remained at Paris were as sanguinary as the commissioners they sent to the provinces. At a later season, when the French people universally were glutted with blood, and desirous of some new repast, the majority of these legislators pretended an exceeding horror at the massacres which had been committed at Lyons and at so many other places; but at the time they occurred, there was nothing of the sort; they applauded the republican energy which had been displayed; they directed, in most instances, the massacres that were perpetrated, and they never descended to the examination of particulars. More than a month before Lyons was taken by the republicans, the Convention, on the demand of the Jacobin Club, had agreed that Terror should be the order of the day; that no quarter, no mercy should be shown to any that rebelled against the republic, or entertained opinions contrary to the revolution.

* This was the inscription, which was left for a long time over the door:—

The list of the guillotine victims in the capital, where there had been no counter-revolutionary insurrection, was now exhibiting a fearful crescendo. In the month of June, which witnessed the expulsion of the Brissotins or Girondists, the number of executions in Paris was fourteen, but in the course of this month of October it swelled to sixty. Towards the end of July, partly through the assassination of Marat, and partly through the ill success of the republican armies, and the insurrections made by the royalists and attempted by the Girondists, and, perhaps most of all, through the scarcity of provisions, and a report industriously circulated that the plague had broken out in the heart of the city, there was a terrible fermentation in Paris, which tended to disturb the now triumphant Mountain, and to lead to several changes in the conventional committees, which, in union (or at times in disunion) with the committees of the commune, transacted the entire business of government, even the name of ministers having now disappeared. The Committee of Public Safety or Salvation (Salut Public) had the most work, and the heaviest responsibility of all these governing committees; a fatigued or alarmed member of it resigned, and then, in the first days of August, Robespierre obtained a seat in that committee, and the Reign of Terror began. Down to this time Robespierre had been but a private man, directing or commanding much that was done from his "pride of place" in the Jacobin hall, and latterly from the summit of the Mountain in the Convention, without having, however, any part in the execution of government measures: but now, as member of the Committee of Public Salvation, he became an effective member of the government, and, as he forthwith made himself supreme in that terrible body, he rendered himself responsible for all their deeds.* From the instant that he was admitted a member of it, there was both more energy and more cruelty in the proceedings of this essentially revolutionary government. Barrère, who was now his friend and instrument, who had thrown the moderation which befitted a member of the Centre or Plain to the winds, as soon as the Mountain had secured the victory over the Gironde, proposed, on the 7th of August, that by special decree Pitt should be declared the enemy of all mankind (l'ennemi du genre humain), whom every man had the right to assassinate. Couthon thought it would not be quite proper to authorise the assassination of the English minister, but he demanded and obtained a solemn decree that he was the enemy of the human species.† On the 9th of August Gossuin announced that the edifice of liberty was finished and would be durable: and he reported, in the name of a committee appointed to collect the sense of the people, that the new republican constitution had been accepted by the nation with enthusiasm. Condorcet's respectability republic, which had never got into action, was tossed into the same limbo as the Feuillant or Lafayetteist constitution of 1791: and this new constitution was chiefly, if not entirely, the composition of Hérault-de-Séchelles, who had scarcely been a fortnight about it. Compared with Hérault, Trinculo was a great legislator. It may be conceived what manner of unlimited mad democracy it prescribed, and any examination of it is altogether unnecessary, as it was almost immediately suspended, and never produced any other fruits than an inauguration festival which was celebrated on the 10th of August. Hérault-de-Séchelles presided over this grand spectacle, and painter David was its ordonnateur. Besides being the baptism of Hérault's precious constitution, the fête was noticeable as a sort of installation or introduction of atheism. On the ruins of the Bastille the wry-mouthed painter had erected an enormous naked female figure, called Statue of Nature, with the hands pressed upon the two breasts, from each of which flowed or spouted a copious stream of pure water, which fell into a vast basin at her feet. The figure, like all the rest, was made up of wood and canvass, hoops, plaster of Paris, and paint; but on some day (which never arrived) they were all to

† On the same day the Convention was visited by a vast number of federates and other patriots from the departments, who made speeches, and sang a new verse (not very flattering to the Girondists), which had been added to the Carmagnole song:

"La Montagne nous a sauvés
En congédiant Gensonné; Au diable les Buzot, Les Vergniaud, les Brissot.
Dansons la Carmagnole," &c.

be converted into pure marble or everlasting bronze. At the base of the statue of Nature was inscribed, "WE ARE ALL HER CHILDREN." Other inscriptions, far too numerous to be cited, were placed all round about. One of them was brief and significant:—"HELL VOMITED KINGS; HELL VOMITED PRIESTS." Between night and morning the Parisian cannoneers began to fire salvos; and the Convention, the Jacobin Club, all the other clubs, Mayor Pache and the commune, and all the people of Paris, some in processional order, and some in no order at all, took their ways through the long dirty streets to the Place de la Bastille. Hérault-de-Sechelles, in plumed hat and embroidered mantle, marched at the head of the honourable deputies, and bands followed them, playing the softest and sweetest music. Just as the sun rose above the horizon Hérault stepped forth from the crowd, bent his knee before the gigantic statue, and addressed to it a speech or hymn in prose, which was considered a very neat imitation of "the only prayer ever used in the first ages of mankind." It began with "Sovereign of the savage and of the enlightened nations, O Nature!" and it ended with "O Nature! receive the expression of the eternal attachment of the French for thy laws; and may this abundant water that spouts from thy breasts, may this pure draught which satisfied the thirst of the first mortals, consecrate in this cup of fraternity and equality the oaths which France takes to thee on this day;—the most beautiful day that the sun has shone upon since it was first suspended in the immensity of space!" And having so said, President Hérault filled a cup, made after David's design, in the antique form, with the pure water of the basin, and, having taken a draught himself, he handed it round to his fellow-citizens, who drank likewise, or pressed the holy cup of equality and fraternity to their lips, repeating "O Nature!" or making other suitable ejaculations. One enthusiastic patriot cried out, "May this pure water be for me a mortal poison, if all the rest of my life be not employed in exterminating the enemies of equality, of nature, and of the republic!" Another, who, according to the procès verbal of the fête, signed by Hérault-de-Sechelles, Amar, Thirion, and other members of the Convention, must have been seized by the spirit of prophecy, exclaimed, "O France! liberty is immortal! The laws of thy republic, like those of great Nature, will never perish!" As the holy cup was passed from hand to hand there was electrical joy and loud cannon-firing. When the enlightened nation had finished worshipping this plaster-of-Paris Nature, they marched along the boulevards in a most admired disorder, or confusion, or fusion, of all ranks and distinctions, and this simple idea of painter David is said to have impressed on the fête its most beautiful character. Hérault, who doubtless wrote this procès verbal as well as the constitution which the fête inaugurated, says in a transport, "There was no longer any division between private persons and public func-tionaries: the members of the executive were dispersed au hasard; the scarf of the mayor or of the procureur of the commune, the black plumes of the judges, only helped to show that they were marching on a footing of equality with the blacksmith and the weaver. There the differences which seemed made by Nature herself were effaced by Reason, and the African, whose face is blackened by the fires of the sun, gave his hand to the white man as his brother; there all were equal as men, as citizens, as members of the sovereignty!" But the inventive genius of David had thrown some distinct picturesque groups into this chaos of equality. The nurses of the great Foundling Hospital (which, perhaps, was the more filled, in consequence of a recent address of the commune—Citizenesses, give children to the country) carried their little charges, all dressed in clean swaddling-clothes, and ribands and devices importing that the republic was the bountiful mother of them all. Blind men, taken from their hospital, were mounted upon a platform that rolled upon wheels, and were made to sing and cut capers, in order to embody the idea of how physical misfortune was consoled and honoured. Artisans and labourers with hammers, spades, and other tools or emblems of their crafts, walked along in separate bands. There was also a plough turned into a triumphal car, and, an old peasant and his old wife being seated upon it, and being drawn by their own children, this groupe was considered as "offering a tableau vivant of the ever-celebrated history of Biton and Cleobis."* Midway, on the Tuileries, was erected a triumphal arch, destined more particularly to celebrate the citizenesses who, in October, 1789, had marched to Versailles. Over the arch were sundry corresponding inscriptions, importing that the women of Paris had inundated the porticoes, and the tyrants had disappeared; that the justice of the people was terrible, but their clemency extreme: and underneath the arch were some of the citizenesses themselves seated on cannons, even as they were when they went to Versailles. The whole procession stopped before these Dames de la Halle; the people contemplated them, Hérault de Sechelles harangued them, and then gave them the paternal accolade all round, and placed a crown of laurel on the head of every one of them. In the Place Louis Quinze, now Place de la Révolution, and near the spot where they had cut off the head of Louis XVI., David had erected a statue of Liberty bigger than his statue of Nature: it was veiled by canvass, which was painted all over with trees and flowers, but which was removed by rope and pulley at the proper moment. Ten thousand red worsted night-caps and more were stuck upon poles all round the huge plaster

* The two Argive youths, who, as related by Herodotus, in his account of the conversation between Solon and Croesus, when the oxen were not in readiness, yoked themselves to their mother's cart, and drew her to the temple of Juno, of which she was priestess; and then, in answer to her prayer that the goddess would grant them the greatest blessing that could befall a mortal, having after the festival fallen asleep in the temple, were permitted thus to end their days and never awoke.

divinity. Hérault, who must have declaimed as much this day as he would have done if he had been acting first part in the longest-winded tragedy his country ever produced, made another oration, and then took a lighted torch and set fire to a vast heap of combustible materials, fashioned and painted into likenesses of kingly crowns, sceptres, fleurs-de-lis, ducal mantles, escutcheons, &c. &c. And at the very same instant three thousand birds were let loose, to fly to the four corners of the earth, each of them with a tri-colored riband round its neck, inscribed with the words, "We are free; imitate us!" We can follow Hérault-de-Sechelles no farther; but, on the other side of the Seine, in front of the Hôtel des Invalides, there was another colossal figure made of the same materials to represent the Hercules people, the almighty people (le peuple tout-puissant), with uplifted club, about to strike the many-headed dragon of Girondist federalism; and, farther on, in the Champ de Mars, were other effigies and emblems with allegories made in wood and canvass, all about liberty and equality; and at each of these great stations Hérault had to make a great speech.*

The very next day Robespierre, who continued to introduce his great state measures in that place before proposing them to the Convention, announced in the Jacobin Club that there was a very urgent necessity of striking terror into the hearts of the commanders of the armies of the republic, and denounced in a breath some dozen of generals, but claiming precedence at the guillotine for old General Custine, who had not been able to keep Mayence from the Prussians. Within a fortnight and two days Custine's head was in the sack, and his daughter-in-law, and a priest who had attended him to the scaffold, were in prison as suspects. As the old soldier had some religion left, and as he asked for a confessor, he was represented as a rank coward, that died like a Capuchin and not like a warrior. On the 23rd of August the decree of the levée en masse was passed after a report presented by Barrère in the name of the Committee of Salut Public. A few days after this a deputation of schoolmasters and teachers presented themselves at the bar of the Convention, to demand that the national republican education, the arrangements for which had now been systematised, should be compulsory and gratuitous. Nearly a year before this, in discussing this very question of public education, a legislator had said, that for his part he must confess that he was an atheist. On the present occasion, a boy (un enfant) who accompanied the schoolmasters requested that instead of being preached to in the name of a soi-disant God, they should be instructed from the pulpit in the principles of equality and the Rights of Man. But Robespierre, though soon obliged to tolerate for a season the rampant atheism of Hébert and of other colleagues, certainly never favoured such pretensions, and it is said that the Convention generally expressed their indignation or disgust at the forward boy.

On the 5th of September Merlin proposed and carried a decree, denouncing the punishment of death against all who trafficked in or discredited the assignats. On the same day a deputation from one of the Paris sections demanded that no more pensions or allowances should be paid to any priests whatever, and that all the money hitherto set aside for that or for similar purposes should be applied to the pressing wants of the republic. Postmaster Drouet particularly distinguished himself in this debate. "Since," cried he, "our virtue, our moderation, our philosophical ideas, are of no use to us, let us be brigands for the happiness of the people!" (Soyons brigands pour le bonheur du peuple!) And brigands they became with a vengeance, seizing everything they could lay hands on, and not even respecting the burses of the colleges; or the revenues of the hospitals and other establishments of charity. Also on the same day, the 5th of September, Barrère, in the name of the Committee of Salut Public, presented a report on the state of Paris, in which it was stated that royalists and conspirators against liberty were very evidently plotting again in the heart of the capital, that the lives of the members of the Mountain were again in danger, that the lives of Mayor Pache and all his municipals were menaced, and that nothing could save these conscript fathers of the republic but a regularly organised Parisian guard, which should sweep away all the conspirators, and be called, par excellence, the Revolutionary Army (l'Armée Révolutionnaire). To make this decree go down the better, Barrère, with a radiant countenance, announced that a nephew of Pitt had been discovered hidden in a château at Dinan on the coast, and had been put under arrest. The Convention shouted with exceeding great joy at this promising chance of seeing a near relation of the English minister looking through "the little window," as the space between the side columns of the guillotine and block and axe was facetiously called. We hear no more of Pitt's nephew (probably the Englishman caught on the coast was a smuggler), but the Convention immediately decreed that there should be this Revolutionary Army, that it should be embodied that very day, that it should be liberally paid out of the national treasury, and that it should consist of 6000 men and 1200 cannoners, who were to serve as a guard to the Convention, and to enforce the revolutionary laws and the measures of public safety which the Convention had decreed, or might hereafter decree. On the same busy day it was decreed that the members of the revolutionary committees should be entitled to three livres per day per man. As one of these committees had been established, not merely in every town, but almost in every village or hamlet in France, the pay thus voted amounted altogether to an enormous sum. But immense also were the services these committee-men rendered to the Jacobin legislators. To keep up the supplies, forced loans were imposed, and the ascending war-tax was made to press more and more heavily upon all persons of any property; the decrees of the Convention declaring with tolerable clearness that money and effects should be seized wherever they could be found in any abundance, and the commissioners or pro-consuls of the Convention, who ranged through all the departments, giving whatever latitude they chose to the decrees. On the 17th of September was enacted the notorious and terrible Loi des Suspects, which enclosed in its wide-spreading meshes whatsoever individuals the government powers might choose to sacrifice, and which struck with doubt and terror all classes except the very poorest and lowest; and even their poverty and obscurity did not invariably preserve them from the operation of the law. As soon as this decree was passed, a report was ordered on the subject of the Muscadins, or Dandies, by which term was now meant the young men of fashion, or of better condition, who evaded the decree of the levée en masse; and some two months after a law was passed for considering and treating as emigrants all such persons as did not join the army when called upon so to do. Barrère proposed, in the name of the Committee of Salut Public, to bring before the Revolutionary Tribunal, and to punish as a counter-revolutionist, every individual that should be detected in spreading false news and exciting alarm in the country; deportation or transportation to that unwholesome, pestiferous country, French Guiana, being proposed as the proper punishment for such offences. Collot d'Herbois, who was destined to end his days in that colony, thought the punishment proposed by Barrère much too mild—a penalty that would give the enemies of the republic new hopes and chances. “We must transport no one,” said he; “we must kill all conspirators, and bury them in this land of liberty! They must all be arrested! The places of their imprisonment must be undermined, and there must be trains of gunpowder and a match ever ready to blow them into the air, in case they or their partisans should dare to make any new efforts against the republic.” Barrère warmly supported his transportation scheme, saying that there were in France immense numbers of gens suspects who had not conspired; and he proposed to decree, as a revolutionary measure, the transportation of all those who, since the 10th of August, 1792, had not shown themselves friends of the republican government. The proposition was referred to the Committee of Salut Public; but it was not until the Parisians grew weary of the exhibition of the guillotine that Barrère’s plan of transportation was much resorted to. By the joint action of all these decrees, the property, liberty, and lives of the French nation were put at the disposal of the Committee of Surveillance, the Committee of Public Safety, the Revolutionary Tribunal, the revolutionary committees and the pro-consuls or Jacobin members of the Convention en mission. Yet, as though all these means were not sufficient to establish the Reign of Terror, St. Just, on the 10th of October, in presenting a truly terrific report from the Committee of Salut Public, complained of weakness and indecision, and demanded that Herault-de-Sechelles’s republican constitution should be suspended, and that the government should be declared to be revolutionary until the peace. The Convention, which now rarely divided except upon some trifling matters which the Mountain had not at heart, and which no party cared for, unanimously passed a decree embodying St. Just's proposition—"The provisory government of France shall be revolutionary till the peace." At the same time they extended the powers of the Committee of Salut Public by declaring that the provisory executive council, the generals of the armies, and all constituted bodies whatsoever, were placed under the surveillance of the said committee, which would render an account to the Convention every eight days; and that the provisory executive council was to act only under the authorization of the said Committee of Salut Public in matters relating to the security of the republic. They also declared and inserted in their present decree, that, the government being declared revolutionary, any inertness or delay would be considered as treason, and that all the revolutionary laws must be executed rapidly (rapidement).

On the 14th of October, only four days after the passing of the last-mentioned decree, Marie Antoinette was brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal. The sufferings of that hapless queen since the execution of her husband in the month of January had been excessive, for the detestable ingenuity of the most ingenious tormentors and torturers had been directed to their aggravation and embitterment. For some short time after that execution she was allowed a little more liberty in the Temple. Her two children, and the other companion of her captivity, the Princess Elizabeth, were even deluded by the hope that the Convention intended to send them all out of France. But the queen was a stranger to this hope, and continued to suffer an agony which nothing could calm. Her daughter, the only one of the party that survived the Reign of Terror, says, "No hope could touch her heart; because life and death were equally indifferent to her. She would sometimes look upon us with an air of pity which made us shudder. Fortunately affliction increased my illness to so serious a degree, that it made a diversion to the mind of my mother."* The torturer-in-chief was the obscene, bloody, and in every way execrable Hébert, whom we have seen borne in triumph, and crowned with the civic crown, by the people of Paris. At the instigation of this monster, who appears not to have had a single redeeming quality, and to have been altogether a stranger to that political fanaticism which has been pleaded in extenuation of the crimes of some of his compeers (pleaded much too often and much too confidently), the royal captives, shortly after the death of Louis XVI., were deprived of every comfort, and were literally half-starved. He pretended that they were not entitled to any better treatment than the lowest family of sans-culottes, or the worst of criminals, or the galériens. Their servants were all sent away, except an old woman who took charge of the linen, a cook, and two girls; and these, appointed by the commune, were not admitted into the apartment where the queen resided. The faithful Cléry, whom the king had so tenderly implored to take care of his son, was even separated from the dauphin. The wax-lights, which had hitherto been allowed, were changed into tallow candles; the silver forks and spoons into copper ones; and the china plates and dishes into common crockery. To some, if not to all of these privations, the queen, at least, absorbed by her deeper sufferings, must have been indifferent; but Hébert had other pangs in store for her, and for them all. Furnished with the decree of the commune, to which he continued to be substitute procureur-general, he went to the Temple, and barbarously tore from them a number of little articles which were dear to them, as recalling the memory of those friends who had procured or given them. He also deprived Madame Elizabeth of a rouleau of eighty louis-d'or, which had been given to her by the Princess de Lamballe a short time before her death; and inventing nearly every day some new torment, and finding in the members of the council of the commune monsters as depraved as himself, quite ready to authorise whatever he might suggest, he separated the young dauphin from his mother, his aunt, and sister, and gave him in charge to Simon and his wife, in order, as he said, that the little Capet might receive a sans-culottic education. But Hébert had not even yet reached the acmé of his atrocity or beastliness. He proceeded to invent calumnies so unnatural, so revolting, so unspeakably obscene, that we can scarcely venture to hint at them. But the hint, at least, must be given: he accused the queen of incest with the dauphin; he accused the aunt of being a partner or participator in the crime; he accused them both of debauching the child in order to destroy his health, so that, if monarchy should ever be re-established, the dauphin being enervated, they might reign or rule in his stead; and, in the presence of Mayor Pache and the procureur of the commune, Chaumette, he forced the dauphin to put his signature to a paper which contained these infernal charges. It has been doubted whether the poor boy, who was only eight years old, had any notion of the import of the paper he was thus forced to sign. It is probable—it is almost certain that he could have no conception of the charges; but we are assured by his sister, who was some years older than himself, that he understood the paper to be some kind of denunciation against his own mother and against his aunt, and that, from the moment he had signed it, he never spoke again.* Robespierre, though eager for the queen's trial and death, was exceedingly enraged at these charges, not on account of their falsehood and atrocity, but because he thought them impolitic. "That fool, Hébert," said he, "will make her an object of pity!" Nevertheless, the accusations were retained to be produced before the Revolutionary Tribunal, without any remonstrance either from Pache or from Chaumette, who were cited in Hébert's denunciation as witnesses of the dauphin's signature. It was on the 3rd of July that the queen was separated from her son; shortly after she was separated from her daughter and the Princess Elizabeth; and on the night between the 1st and 2nd of August she was removed from the Temple to the Conciergerie. In this great ante-chamber of death she was watched most rigorously, for reports were circulated that every possible kind of attempt, including some of the most desperate character, would be made to rescue her, and carry her out of France. Some plans were really devised, both before she was removed from the Temple and afterwards, but not one of them appears to have presented the slightest chance of success. In the interior of France all hearts that were not steeled against pity were paralysed by terror, and the foreign armies on the frontiers could do nothing. The best attempt was made by Count Merci, the Austrian minister, who found means of communicating by letter or message with Danton, whose protection, he thought, might at least save the queen's life. Danton, it is said, even promised his support, declaring that the death of the queen had never entered into his political calculations, and that he would endeavour to save her without any view to his personal interest.* But Danton, whose courage, except in words, was always problematical, was scared by the Committee of Salut Public, by the espionage which was also the order of the day, by the prospect of the inevitable ruin that awaited him if any correspondence or understanding with Austria should be detected, and by the bloody rabies of the clubs and the populace, who had long determined that the queen must perish, and that her execution would be the proper answer to give to foreign interference, war, and invasion. In Danton's protestations of disinterestedness on this and on other occasions, we cannot place the slightest confidence. If, with safety to himself, he could have saved the life of the queen, and have taken some large sum which the Emperor of Austria would readily have paid, he would most assuredly have done it, for he was no fanatic; he had none of the passion of shedding blood for the mere sake of shedding it: he had been, in a manner, the first author of the system of Terror—he had recommended or justified massacres en masse, when he fancied that they would lead directly to some great result—but he had shown (what is not altogether an inconsistency) an aversion to murder in detail, and, in almost every case where application had been made to him to save the life of an individual, he had done it. It is said that even in the September massacres, not one personal enemy of Danton was sacrificed as such.

We have noticed, not without astonishment, the vast number and infinite variety of persons that witnessed the sufferings of the royal prisoners with dry eyes and unmoved hearts: but, after the king's death, two or three of the municipals, but not more, were sensibly affected by the condition of the queen, and made some perilous efforts to save her. One of these men, Toulan, appears to have carried all the information he could collect to the hapless captives: another, Michonis, introduced to the queen a disguised emigrant, who could do nothing but hold forth an illusory hope, by presenting a flower to her majesty, within the leaves of which was concealed a minute slip of paper, bearing these words, "Vos amis sont prêts" (your friends are ready). Cleverly as the whole affair was managed, it was discovered by that ten-thousand-eyed Argus the Commune. Michonis was arrested and eventually guillotined as a traitor and agent of the foreign powers. And from this time gendarmes, selected from among the most decided Jacobins, were placed night and day at the door of the queen's chamber or cell, with orders not to speak to her, and not to answer if she spoke to them.

In the Conciergerie she was confined in a room which was called the council-chamber, and considered as the most unwholesome apartment in the whole prison. Richard, the gaoler, ventured to represent that the place was unfit for her reception, but he was told that a dungeon and straw would be good enough for such a prisoner. The man and his wife had, however, some humanity, and made the room as comfortable as they could. The queen was allowed to set up an altar, and she passed the best of her time on her knees before it in prayer, which no human being ever more needed. In general the prisoners remained only a day or two in the Conciergerie before they were carried to the Revolutionary Tribunal, which sat in the old Palais de Justice close by, and then to the block, as we have seen in the case of Charlotte Corday: but the queen was left there for nearly ten weeks, although, as early as the 25th of August, Fouquier Tinville, the accuser-general, complained in a letter addressed to the president of the Convention, that he was accused in the newspapers, in the clubs, and in all public places, of shamefully delaying the affair of the ci-devant queen. At last, on Sunday night, the 13th of October, her indictment was delivered to her; and on the following morning she was carried before the Revolutionary Tribunal. Putting the usual questions to her, the president (Herman) said, "What is your name?" She replied calmly, "I am called Marie Antoinette of Lorraine of Austria." "What is your condition?" "I am widow of Louis Capet, once King of the French." "Your age?" "I am thirty-eight years old." She was no older, but she looked sixty or seventy. Fouquier Tinville read the long indictment, which charged her with everything that had been done amiss since her arrival in France; with all the embarrassments and public debt which had preceded the revolution; with every counter-revolutionary project which had been conceived since the meeting of the States-general; with an implacable and savage hatred to the generous French people; with having maintained at all times a close connexion and correspondence with the worst enemies of France; with having enriched her brothers, the emperors, with incalculable sums of money taken out of the national treasury, &c. &c. Notwithstanding Robespierre's political remonstrance, the horrible charge invented by Hébert was inserted in the indictment; and Hébert himself was there to speak as a witness, and present the paper the dauphin had signed, the dauphin being too young to appear in a court of law. After Hébert had been examined, the queen being called upon to say what she could reply to his deposition, answered to several of his charges, which were only ridiculous, but took no notice of his monstrous invention. One of the jury called upon the citizen president to take notice of this omission, and the citizen president put the question singly and distinctly. "I have not answered," exclaimed the queen, "because nature refuses to answer such a charge brought against a mother. I appeal to all the mothers that are here!" She was dreadfully excited; but, except in this one case, her answers were calm, clear, concise, and her composure and dignity unruffled. A smile played on her lips at the depositions of some of the witnesses, as when a low ruffian affirmed that Lafayette had always been her best friend, and the best friend and defender of her husband and family. Never before had there been so strange an assemblage of witnesses; half of them were constitutional royalists and aristocrats, or men who had begun the revolution, but who were now all prisoners themselves, or set down in the guillotine lists, to be taken off, one by one or in batches, as opportunity might serve. Others were ex-ministers, ex-functionaries, or Girondists, who had swept away the Constitutionalists, who had gone farther in revolutionism than they, but only to come to the same scaffold. The mock-trial, in fact, was so directed as to serve in a manner as the trial and judgment of these early revolutionists and respectability republicans. Ex-mayor Bailly, who had been discovered in his hiding-place at Melun, was there, and was so examined and cross-examined that the jury and the spectators were convinced that he, as well as Lafayette, had been in a conspiracy with the court. Yet Bailly played his part with some address: when called upon to state his condition, he modestly said he was a man of letters; when asked whether he knew the prisoner at the bar, he gave a cool, half-insulting nod to the queen, and said, "O Yes, I know Madame." Manuel, late procureur of the commune, was there also, and described his condition as that of a man of letters; and old Count d'Estaing, who had fought in the American war by land and sea, and Valazé, one of the expelled Girondists of the Convention, were all put in the same witness-box, each of them knowing that he must very soon be placed at the bar. None of them appear to have been so calm and self-possessed as the queen. When the brutal president cried out to her, "You persist then in denial? You deny everything?" She replied, "I have told the truth, and I persist in that." "How is it," said the president, "that you, who promised to bring up your children in the principles of the revolution, have only taught them erroneous and royalist principles, as in treating your son with that ceremony and respect which made people believe that you expected to see him become some day the successor of the ci-devant king, his father?" She replied, "My son was too young to be talked to about such things. I merely placed him at the end of the table at dinner, and helped him with my own hand to the food he wanted." "Have you nothing more to add to your defence?" asked the president. "Yesterday," said the queen, "I did not so much as know the names of the witnesses who were to be produced against me; I was altogether ignorant of the charges they intended to make. Yet, not one of them has alleged against me so much as one positive fact. I finish by observing that I was never a queen-regnant, that I was never anything but the wife of your late king, and that, as the wife, I was bound to conform to the will, the interests, and the wishes of my husband." These were her last words before that infernal tribunal. Fouquier Tinville followed with a long declamation; and then Chauveau, who had pleaded for Charlotte Corday, and Tronçon Ducoudray, another advocate, were heard on the side of the defence. The counsel had been named and appointed, not by the queen, but by the tribunal; yet they both pleaded with eloquence and earnestness, and appealed to the clemency, the humanity of the court and jury. But the jury was only a permanent part of the tribunal: and humanity and decency had fled from France. When Chauveau and Tronçon Ducoudray had finished their pleadings, the queen was removed from the bar and conducted into another room, and the president delivered his charge to the jury, ending with a series of questions, as, Is the accused guilty of conspiring against the republic? Is the widow of Louis Capet convicted of having co-operated in bringing foreign armies into France? Is it proved that she has participated in a plot or conspiracy for lighting up the flames of civil war in the interior of the republic? "We are going to give a grand example to the universe," said President Herman, "a grand example which will not be lost upon the nations and peoples of the earth. Nature and reason, which have been so long outraged, are at last going to be satisfied, for equality is going to triumph! A woman, who was surrounded not long ago by all the pomp and prestige that the pride of kings and the meanness of slaves could invent, has this day occupied before the tribunal of the nation the same place that was occupied only two days since by another woman, and this equality assures to her an impartial justice." These words alone—this appeal to the pride of equality—this call upon all the universe to witness and wonder at the great and startling deed that was doing, would have sufficed to settle the verdict, and would have expelled every sentiment of humanity, of pity, of justice, from the minds of the revolutionary and hired jurymen, if any such sentiments had lingered there. After staying about an hour out of court, for form's sake, the jurymen returned with an answer in the affirmative to all the questions which the president had put to them. The queen was then brought back to the bar; the declaration of the jury was read to her; Fouquier Tinville demanded that the accused should be condemned to death, conformably with the laws; and President Herman, after consulting with his learned brothers, Coffinhal, Foucault, Sellier, and others (they were, most of them, sans-culottes, without legal or any other education), pronounced sentence in these words:—"The Revolutionary Tribunal, after having heard the unanimous declaration of the jury, and the requisition of the public accuser, and in conformity with the laws quoted by him, condemns the said Marie Antoinette, called Lorraine of Austria, widow of Louis Capet, to the pain of death: declares, conformably with the law of the 10th of March last, all her property and goods, if any she have, within the limits of the French territory, to be acquired and confiscated to the profit of the republic; orders that, at the request of the public accuser, the present judgment shall be executed in the Place de la Révolution, printed, and placarded in all the extent of the republic." Marie Antoinette, who, except for one brief instant, had displayed so much calmness (it may be doubted whether, during the far greater part of the time, her thoughts were not far away from that scene of iniquity, for it is noted of her that she kept moving her fingers on the arm of her chair as if she were playing on the piano-forte), heard her sentence of Death without betraying any emotion, and walked out of the court without addressing a single word to judges or jury, to the people that crowded the court, or to any one there. It was half-past four o'clock of Wednesday morning, the 16th of October, for the trial had lasted all the 14th and 15th. She was carried back to the Conciergerie, and placed in the condemned cell (cabinet des condamnés). At five o'clock the drums began to beat to arms in all the sections; by seven o'clock all the armed force was on foot, cannons were placed on all the bridges, and, at intervals, all the way from the Conciergerie to the place of execution. Notwithstanding the noise made by these preparations, the queen, first cutting off her own hair and changing her mourning dress for a dress of white muslin, threw herself on her bed, slept soundly for several hours, and was found fast asleep when the executioners came to conduct her to the scaffold. It was about eleven o'clock. They placed her in an open cart, with her hands tied behind her, and they surrounded the cart with cavalry and artillery. As she was dragged slowly through the streets between double rows of national guards and pikemen, and under the eyes of tens of thousands who crowded the windows and the house-tops, all shouting "Long live the Republic!" "Down with tyranny!" &c., she showed no symptom either of dejection or of pride; she looked calmly at the tri-colored flags and the strange republican inscriptions and devices which had been painted in front of most of the houses. But on arriving in the Place de la Révolution, and catching a view of the Palace of the Tuileries, she was much agitated. It was but a moment's weakness. She mounted the scaffold with a firm step, said a few words to a confessor who attended her in a laical dress, placed herself in the appointed position, and in an instant was no more. The executioner showed the head to the people, who shouted "Vive la République!" It was a quarter past twelve o'clock. A little later the body was thrown into the cart, and carried to a grave, partly filled with quick-lime, like that which had received the mortal remains of her husband.

Before the month was ended twenty-one of the Girondists were executed, all in one day, on the same scaffold, the original number of twenty-two being made up by Gorsas, the journalist, having been guillotined on the 7th of October, just nine days before the queen. Some of these twenty-one were deputies who, like Gensonné, had remained in Paris after the decree of the 2nd of June, and others were deputies who, like Brissot, had been intercepted in their flight. Several of them were deputies who had not been named in any of the petitions or addresses of the Commune of the Sections. But, as a good many of those who had been named had escaped, these new names were put down to make up the number twenty-two. The impeachment, or acte d'accusation, which had been demanded repeatedly by the more impatient, was at last drawn up, and also presented, by St. Just. Twenty-two victims were not enough to satisfy this blood-thirsty and yet cold-blooded fanatic. In relating the trial of Charlotte Corday, we have mentioned that the papers of deputy Duperret (to whom Barbaroux had recommended her) were seized and sealed by order of the Convention: now among these papers was a vehement protest against the moral insurrection which commenced on the 31st of May, and ended on the 2nd of June in the defeat and ruin of the Gironde: it was signed by seventy-three members of the côté droit, and St. Just set down every one of these protesters as a conspirator and traitor. Some of the most furious members of the Mountain demanded that these seventy-three should be tried and executed at the same time as the twenty-two; but Robespierre, politically considering that so immense a slaughter of deputies might startle the people, who had not as yet seen the inviolability of one of their representatives touched by the guillotine, strongly opposed the proposition, and suggested that the twenty-two might be tried now, and that the seventy-three ought only to be put under arrest. Since the moral insurrection, there had not been the slightest opposition to the will of the Mountain, and the House, which would have voted for St. Just's scheme if it had not been modified, readily passed into a law or decree the propositions of Robespierre.* The seventy-three deputies were arrested, and Fouquier Tinville was enjoined to proceed without further loss of time against the others. This was on the 3rd of October. Gorsas, who led the death-dance of the representatives of the people, was executed on the 9th, but not in virtue of this decree; the ex-pedagogue and journalist had fled to Caen, and had been outlawed as early as the 28th of July. Upon the dissolution of the insurrectionary army of the Calvados, instead of trying to escape to Bordeaux with Louvet, Buzot, Barbaroux, and that wretched band, he had rashly returned to Paris, and had gone in broad daylight to the Palais Royal (now Palais Egalité), the most frequented place in the capital, where he had a mistress, who kept a book or pamphlet shop in that nursing-place of French liberty and of every vice under the sun. On the 5th of October, at two o'clock in the afternoon, he was seized at this citizeness Brigide's, after a vain attempt to escape by jumping out of a back window. The Revolutionary Tribunal, before which he was carried on the morrow, did nothing but identify his person, and condemn him to death by virtue of the outlawry which the Convention itself had passed. He attempted to address the court, but the court would not hear him, and then, turning to the people, he said, "I recommend to those who will hear me my wife and children! I am innocent; my memory will be avenged!" His execution, on the very next day, was witnessed by the people without any unpleasant emotion. But, between his death and the execution of the Twenty-one, the constitutional inviolability had received another blow, though not at Paris. Biroteau, who had been re-revolutionizing in the south, was discovered in his hiding-place near Bordeaux, was carried into that city, and guillotined on the 24th of October. He, too, had been outlawed in July, and this left nothing for his brother-deputy Tallien (who was at Bordeaux presiding over the military commission) to do but to identify his person. "I know," said he to Tallien, "that the guillotine awaits me; but neither you nor the partisans of the Mountain would have escaped it if we had been the strongest."* The words rest upon ultra-Jacobin authority; but the sentiment pervades and permeates the Girondists' memoirs and hundreds of their speeches.

* Five or six petitions had been presented by the Jacobins, praying for the extermination of the faction; and on the 1st of October, two days before the Convention settled the question, a deputation, composed of Jacobins and of members of all the popular societies of Paris, presented themselves at the bar to intimate that they could wait no longer—that Brissot and his accomplices must receive the punishment due to their crimes, &c.

It was on the 24th of October, when the Bordeaux guillotine was severing the neck of Biroteau, that the grand procès of the Twenty-one commenced, not before the Convention, which meddled with no trials after that of the king, but before the Revolutionary Tribunal. The court was crowded to excess, some of the citizens and citizenesses being brought thither by their sans-culottic fury, and a great many more being impelled merely by that curiosity and love of sight-seeing which carried the Parisians to every kind of exhibition or spectacle, however horrible or disgusting; and on the present occasion there was, as M. Thiers observes, the charm of novelty, it being something new to see so many republicans condemned by other republicans as counter-revolutionists. When the guillotine was first brought into active operation, it was considered as an invention reserved entirely for royalists and aristocrats, for nobles, courtiers, and priests; but here were none but decided anti-monarchists, men of the people, men of letters, popular orators, philosophes, perfectibility men, who, reversing the old monarchic fiction, had proclaimed the divine right of the people to do whatever they chose. At the head of the list, as the man most hated by Robespierre, was Brissot, "aged 39 years, native of Chartres, man of letters and ci-devant deputy." Next followed Vergniaud, "aged 35 years, native of Limoges, homme de loi (lawyer), ci-devant deputy," &c. Then followed—Gensonné, "aged 35 years, native of Bordeaux, homme de loi," &c.; Duperret (whom the fury of the friends of Marat would not allow to be left in the category of the seventy-three protesters), "aged 46 years, agriculturist, ci-devant deputy, &c.;" Carra, "aged 50 years, man of letters, &c.;" Ducos, "aged 28 years, man of letters, &c.;" Gardien, "aged 39 years, ci-devant procureur-general-syndic of Châtelleraut, deputy, &c." The rest were—Valazé, Duprat, Sillery (the husband of Madame de Genlis and the friend and adviser of Philip Egalité), Fauchet (the socialist and bishop), Boyer Fonfrède, Lasource, Lestropé, Beauvais, Duchâtel, Mainvielle, Lacaze, Lehardy, Boileau, Antiboul, and Vigée. The oldest man of them all was Sillery, and he was only 56 or 57 years old; the youngest was Boyer Fonfrède, who was only 26 or 27. Most of them were men of letters or men of the law: there were two merchants, and one medical man. Chauveau, who had pleaded for Charlotte Corday and for the queen, now appeared as counsel for these twenty-one Girondists, who were all equally sure of death: he remarked that the law allowed the prisoners the greatest latitude for their defence, but that, notwithstanding, the articles of charge had not yet been put into their hands; and he demanded, in their name, the production of these papers, with proper time to examine them. The public accuser, Fouquier Tinville, who accused and judged and controlled everything, who was the real soul of this body, the Revolutionary Tribunal, said that some of the papers were not ready, that some of them should be handed over to Chauveau that evening, and that in the mean time the trial must go on, and on it went at the charging pace.

The very first witness examined was the demure, mild-spoken Mayor Pache ("the good papa Pache," as he was invariably called by the people), who owed his first promotion to virtuous Roland, and who had been a Girondist as long as it was profitable and safe to belong to that party. He declared in the first place that he had known very intimately Brissot, Gensonné, Vergniaud, Duprat, Carra, Lasource, Sillery, and Fauchet: and that he had long been convinced of the existence of a plot against liberty and the republic. "From the time," said he, "when I was brought into the ministry, I remarked in the Convention a faction whose actions all tended to the ruin of the republic. What confirmed me in my suspicion was, the demand of an armed force from the departments made by the accused, in order to federalise the republic, and the protection which they gave to the traitor Dumouriez, whose infamous projects they must have known. But it was when I became mayor of Paris that I was better enabled to follow the march of the accused. Dumouriez was threatening to march upon Paris, and the city was without provisions. I hastened to the Convention's committee of finance to solicit the funds necessary to provision the city; and the members of that committee, composed chiefly of agents of that faction, obstinately opposed delivering the money to me, the mayor. The commune of Paris decided that in consequence of Dumouriez's treachery the barriers should be closed: the Committee of General Security, consisting of members of the same faction, said that the barriers should be kept open, and that the officers of the commune should be put under arrest." Pache then took up the terrible subject of the Committee of Twelve, attributing the idea of that unpopular body to Guadet, the Girondist, whereas, as every one knew, or might have known, the idea originated with Barrère. He said he always regarded that committee as contrary to all the principles of liberty; and that he saw that the arrests the committee made had for their object the provoking of an insurrection against the Convention, in order that the faction might have an opportunity of calumniating the people of Paris. He said that the facts which had convinced him that there existed in the Convention a set of men opposed to the establishment of a popular government were public and known to all citizens; that to go over all these acts would be to recapitulate the entire history of the revolution; that the Committee of Twelve had certainly shown anti-popular dispositions;—and this was the substance of all that Mayor Pache could depose. Chaumette, procureur-general of the commune, the next witness called in, began by declaring that he believed the Acte d'Accusation to be founded on truth, and to contain nothing but truth. Then, descending to particulars, and speaking of facts as of his own knowledge, he related, in his own manner, all the quarrels and contests for authority between the Convention and the commune, all the differences and combats between the côté droit and the Mountain; declared that Brissot had done infinite mischief in the colony of St. Domingo (which was true enough, though not in the way meant by Chaumette); that he had monopolised more power and disposed of more places than any three or four ministers of the ancient régime; that Ducos had demanded and obtained the liberty of an English servant, who had notoriously been engaged in the sugar and coffee riots; that Valazé had held nightly meetings in his house, where all the com-

plotters and conspirators assembled. Chaumette said nothing that was more explicit or less vague than this, except that Santhonax, who had been appointed commissioner to St. Domingo, by means of Brissot, had offered to take him out with him to that colony as his secretary. Hébert, Chaumette's depute, told over the long story of his arrest by the tyrannical Committee of Twelve, said that Roland corrupted journalists and other public writers, and vowed that Madame Roland had tried to bribe or buy his own very popular and useful journal, Le Père Duchêne. But none of these witnesses for the prosecution went on so rapidly or rabidly as ex-Capuchin Chabot, who had many personal piques to indulge, the Girondists having long treated him with much contempt. He accused them of being the most greedy place-hunters that had ever attempted to pass for patriots; of having made war upon Narbonne and the other Feuillant ministers only to get their places; of having provoked the people to make their first attack upon the Tuileries on the 20th of June; of having done their best to rob the people and the true republicans of the fruits of their glorious victory on the 10th of August; and finally, of having organised or promoted the massacres of September, in order to ruin the reputation of the patriots. He declared that in the morning of the 2nd of September Brissot had told him that there would be great massacres that evening. Among many things which were not true, or true only in part, the ex-Capuchin presented some unquestionable and weighty truths, particularly with reference to the conduct of the Legislative Assembly, where the Girondists and the côté droit were then the majority, during those awful nights and days. If these pretended friends of humanity had gone to the prisons in a body, those long massacres, he said, might have been prevented: but when the council-general of the commune, confessing their own powerlessness, appeared at the bar to demand assistance, the majority had carried the order of the day. When it was announced that three hundred priests were being butchered, what did the factious majority of that Assembly propose or do? "Did they then, at least, go in a body to the scene of slaughter, and raise their indignant voices to the people? Not they! They contented themselves with naming commissioners; and what commissioners! There was Bishop Fauchet, that drunken priest, who is now among the prisoners before the court, and two or three other men, who were altogether unknown to the people. Fauchet had refused to go—some others had refused to go—new commissioners were named, but they did not want to have me among them. I had saved a great many Swiss and Feuillant national guardsmen; I had saved those traitors to the Assembly from being massacred on the 10th of August by the just wrath of the people. I do not know whether they were anxious that I should not save the poor prisoners on the night of the 2nd of September, but I do know that they were anxious not to send me as one of the commissioners of mercy. I was named, indeed, but that was not their doing. It was my friend Bazire, and some others of the commissioners, who consented to go to the prisons, who obtained my nomination. And Dussaulx, another of the prisoners now before the court, the friend of these Girondists, and the bosom friend of Brissot, being one of the commissioners that went with us to the prisons, prevented me from addressing the people and making use of my influence over them. And would you know why? It was because the people had not yet massacred Morande, the personal enemy of Brissot, who was in one of the prisons, and who was butchered afterwards." He dwelt upon the silence of the Girondist journals and the inactivity of the whole party at and for some time after the terrible September days; he would not allow that terror for themselves had any part in this passiveness. Pétion, he said, had been as bad as Brissot, and both had drunk wine with the men whom they afterwards called Massacreurs. It had long been notorious, he said, that Brissot was the agent of Pitt. This would explain a great deal. Pitt saw with despair that the revolutionary principles of France were making a rapid progress in England; it was, therefore, necessary to disgust the English people with these principles, and to represent the French as a nation of massacres and brigands to the people "who had some pretensions to philosophy." And John Peter Brissot had perfectly served Pitt's project by promoting the massacres first, by drawing up exaggerated accounts of them afterwards, and by attributing them to the virtuous patriots who had made the revolution, and who were about making the republic. All this was wild and absurd enough, yet not more absurd than the counter-imputations of the Girondists, who had been declaring all along that the chiefs of the Mountain were in the pay of England, and that every crime, every disturbance, every massacre, was executed by them in pursuance of direct orders from Pitt. But, perhaps, nothing in Chabot's long accusation made a more unfavourable impression for the prisoner than his quoting some passages from Brissot's published letters to his constituents (Lettres à ses Commettans), in which he called the revolutionary tribunal a tribunal of blood, and divided the inhabitants of Paris into two distinct and antagonist classes, le peuple de Robespierre et les honnêtes gens. Chabot, whose speech, explanations, and replies to the prisoners seem to have occupied the greater part of two whole days, yet left a great deal to be said—to be invented, or magnified, or travestied by other witnesses, every witness examined being a Montagnard, a Jacobin, or a Cordelier, or all three in one, and as such the political and mortal enemy (for in France all political enmities were mortal) of the persons against whom he deposed. This too was the case with every man that sat on the bench or in the jury-box of that vindictive, bloody tribunal. Fouquier Tinville, who frequently gave the key-note to the witnesses, and explained away their contradictions, laboured to connect Charlotte Corday and the assassination of Marat, not only with Duperret and the deputies who had been at Caen, but also with those who had taken totally different directions, or who had never quitted Paris. Montaut, going further back, declared that they had thought of assassinating Marat that night when the traitor Dumouriez, in the midst of the charming festival, was reprimanded by the courageous Friend of the People. Fabre d'Eglantine, who, like Chabot, was strongly suspected of being a great stock-jobber, a swindler, and a robber, declared, among many other things, that there could be no doubt but that the Girondists and their ministers had encouraged and profited by the immense robbery committed at the Garde-Meuble. Although his name was perpetually mentioned by the witnesses, although they quoted his words on many critical occasions, and constantly referred to him as an authority, and as one of their party, Danton neither appeared at the trial, nor sent in any written deposition. Robespierre was equally invisible and silent; and—which is still more noticeable and significant—his name scarcely occurs half-a-dozen times in the course of the whole trial. Danton, who disliked massacres in detail, and who was really free, to a very extraordinary degree, from personal enmities and piques—Danton, who never loved to witness the death-struggles of men that had been his colleagues and comrades, may have stayed away from feeling; but we believe that Robespierre's absence cannot be attributed to any such cause: he was employing the critical interval of time in the Jacobin Club, in the Convention, and in its committees, and we shall presently see the result of his labours there.

The twenty-one prisoners adopted almost twenty-one different ways of defending themselves, the only rule they followed in common being to throw the charges from themselves, who were in the hands of the Montagnards, upon their friends and colleagues who had escaped. Another pretty general method of pleading was, however, to say, I was not a member of that committee, or I was not a member of it at that time, or I did not vote on that occasion in the Assembly or Convention, or I did not say or write those words then, but at another time, when they had a different meaning. Several of them did not hesitate to excuse themselves at the cost of their fellow-prisoners. Thus Brissot said that the proposition to reform or reconstruct the commune of Paris had not proceeded from him, but from Gensonné. Vigée, Boyer-Fonfrède, Gardien, and Boileau, who had all been members of the Committee of Twelve, denied having concurred in the order which brought Raffet and his battalions down to the Convention; and Vigée even confessed that all the ill that had been said about the Committee of Twelve by Leonard Bourdon was perfectly true. Boileau seemed to testify a great willingness to send them all to the scaffold if he could only preserve himself; he declared that, though for a long time he had not believed it, he was now perfectly convinced that there had been a federalist plot against the union and indivisibility of the republic; that he had sought for truth, that he had found it among the Jacobins, and that he was now a decided Jacobin himself. "The treason of the Toulonese," said he, "has convinced me that there are conspirators: but I do not name them; I wait to be enlightened by the judgment of this tribunal." The president, seeing him in so pliant a humour, asked Boileau whether he would not agree that the monster who had cut short the days of Marat had been instigated by the côté droit? "It is perhaps that event which has most enlightened me as to the existence of the conspiracy," responded Boileau. Gardien, following the example of Vigée, condemned the Committee of Twelve, and protested that he had taken no part, or none but the smallest part, in any of its obnoxious proceedings. Others, however, were not so base in spirit, or they had a clearer notion of the inutility of such meanness. When the president asked Duchâtel whether it was not he that had come down to the Convention in his nightcap and flannels to vote against the death of the king, the prisoner replied that it was he, and that the action was one at which he should never blush. Lehardy, when asked whether he had not been in the habit of attending the Girondist meetings at the house of Valazé, and whether he had not lived in close intimacy with Barbaroux, Buzot, Pétion, &c., replied, "I only knew my colleagues, who are here with me, through their genius and talent; and I declare that they still possess all my esteem, because I believe that they merit it." Vergniaud made several eloquent speeches, which several times produced a very visible, and to the tribunal a very alarming, effect on the people who crowded the court, and who had once been accustomed to regard him and his friends as the greatest of orators and the best of patriots. The length of the trial, too, very much disquieted the tribunal and the party that stood watching, not merely behind, but over it, as too much opportunity might be given for examination and reflection, or for the chance recurrence of some generous sentiments in the convulsed mind of the Parisians. But Robespierre provided against this danger. When the trial had lasted three days, the Jacobin Club petitioned the Convention to put a speedy end to this shameful delay of justice; and the great Incorruptible, going over to the Convention, moved and carried, without any difficulty, a decree that, "whenever any trial should have lasted three days, the court might declare themselves satisfied in conscience, and pass sentence without hearing more." This decree was sent on the fourth day of the trial to the tribunal for its rule and government. On the very next day, the 30th of October, when the twenty-one Girondists were quitting the Conciergerie to go to the Palais de Justice, they were stopped and carefully searched, lest they should have concealed some sharp instruments about their persons. They could not avoid understanding that this was to be their last appearance before the tribunal. Valazé avoided search by a little trick; pulling out from his pocket a pair of scissors, he presented them to his friend and fellow-prisoner Riouffe (a political prisoner like himself, and like all who were then in the Conciergerie, but one whose trial was not to be that day), and, as he presented the scissors, he said aloud, "Keep them, my friend; we must not think of suicide!" This deceived the gendarmes, who permitted him to pass the wicket without any search. As soon as they were all at the bar, Fouquier Tinville demanded that the law passed by the Convention should be read in court; the court ordered that it should be transcribed in their registers; and, these things being done, President Herman said, "Citizens of the jury, in virtue of the new law which you have just heard read, I ask whether your consciences are sufficiently enlightened?" The jury withdrew to deliberate. Lest the sudden production and application of so great a novelty in law should shock tender consciences, the permanent and salaried jurymen thought that the trial ought to go on at least through this day, and Antonelle, their foreman or chief, who had been a member of the Legislative Assembly, said for them that their religion (meaning conscience) was not yet sufficiently enlightened. The court sat till two o'clock, when they stopped proceedings, and went to dinner. At six o'clock in the evening, when they met again, Antonelle declared that the conscience of the jury was sufficiently enlightened. The president then, in the name of the law, invited the citizens of the jury to retire and deliberate on the following questions:—1. Is it proved that there has existed a conspiracy against the indivisibility of the republic, against the liberty and the security of the French people? 2. Are John Peter Brissot, Peter Victorin Vergniaud, &c., &c., convicted of having been authors or accomplices of it? The jurymen withdrew: the twenty-one prisoners were removed by gendarmes: it was seven o'clock at night. Perhaps some clouds came over the sufficiently enlightened consciences of the jury; perhaps they were only seeking to make the action of Robespierre's legal ordonnance more solemn and awful; perhaps they only wanted to prolong the agony of some of the prisoners; but, whatever might be the reason of their long absence, it was ten o'clock before the jurymen returned into court with a unanimous answer in the affirmative to the questions. This was their verdict; and, in consequence, the tribunal condemned to death, with forfeiture of goods, &c., John Peter Brissot and all the rest, making no exception in favour of those who had shown so much readiness to recant. The prisoners were then brought in, and the president read to them the declaration of the jury and the sentence of the court. Brissot's head dropped upon his chest, his arms fell by his side: he seemed already half dead. Fauchet shut his eyes and seemed to pray: but others shouted "Vive la République!" and made a show of more firmness. Genoué demanded permission to say a few words on the application of the law, but this was refused by the court. Some of the prisoners hereupon made a loud clamour; some of them uttering terrible invectives against their judges, and others renewing the shouts of "Vive la République! Vive la Liberté!" The president ordered the gendarmes to do their duty and remove the prisoners. The condemned legislators then quitted the court, some of them throwing assignats to the people, and crying out "A nous, nos amis! Help us, good friends! we are innocent!" The people, it is said, manifested a universal indignation at this appeal to them, and trampled the paper money to pieces under their feet. When this uproar was subsiding, a gendarme, who had been escorting the prisoners out of court, returned hastily to the bar and said a few hurried words. Then Fouquier Tinville stood up, and said aloud that one of the condemned had stabbed himself, and that, therefore, he must require that two ushers should be sent to inform themselves of the name of the individual; and that, in case he was dead, his body should be carried in a cart and exposed at the place of execution. An usher presently returned with the information that the name was Valazé, and that the man was dead. [When he gave the scissors to Riouffe he kept a sharp poignard concealed about his person.] The tribunal forthwith ordered that the corpse should be carried to the guillotine, and interred in the same cemetery as the bodies of the rest of the condemned. It was midnight when the twenty survivors were carried back to the Conciergerie to spend the few fleeting hours that intervened between sentence and execution. The manner in which they passed this, their last, night has been made matter of wonderment, admiration, and extravagant eulogy; Thiers calls their last night sublime; and we regret to see that not a few recent English writers, apparently insensible to the outrage they commit on English sense and English feeling, and on our notions of what constitutes sublimity, have taken Thiers upon trust and have re-echoed his praises. For ourselves, we are inclined to doubt a very considerable portion of the account of the conduct of these dying Girondists, for it rests entirely on the evidence of Riouffe, who was their partizan and friend, who was a professional homme de lettres, and phrase and effect maker, and whose subsequent life (for he was so fortunate as to escape the guillotine and survive the Reign of Terror) proves him to have been very capable of falsehood and baseness.* But, ad-

* Riouffe, after figuring among the most enthusiastic of republicans and liberty-and-equality men, became one of the earliest worshippers of the rising star of Napoleon Bonaparte, from whom, in due course of time, he received profitable places, prefectures, the order of the legion of honour, &c. He died in 1814, before the fall of the emperor. He published his 'Mémoires,' and his 'Tableaux des Prisons de Paris,' immediately after the downfall of Robespierre. His Mémoires, which have been perpetually quoted without doubt or examination, contain the most minute details not only of the actions and words of many prisoners he never was allowed to see, and of all that passed in the interior of the Conciergerie, but also of the behaviour and very words of the victims in the death-carts or on the scaffold. "If anybody," says he, "wishes to know how I was so well informed, let him know mitting every circumstance Riouffe relates to be perfectly true, the conduct of the condemned men appears in our eyes to have been a mere mixture of boast and bravado, of revolting levity, and a pre-determination to keep up their courage and keep off reflection by constant excitement—by an excitement scarcely more sublime in its nature than that which desperate sailors in a sinking ship have often found in puncheons of rum. According to Riouffe, whose account differs very materially from that given by Thiers (who had no other authority than his to follow, and who applies anecdotes or descriptions of what passed in the prison in the several preceding days to this last night of all) they spent the hours between their condemnation and execution in singing. He says—"The signal they had promised to give us (of their being condemned) was given; it was the striking up of patriotic songs, which burst forth simultaneously, all their voices mingling in a last hymn to liberty. They parodied the Marseillaise Hymn thus, to make it applicable to their case—

"Contre nous de la tyrannie Le couteau sanglant est levé."

All that frightful night re-echoed with their songs, and, if at times they interrupted their singing, it was only to talk about their country or to listen to some witticism of Ducos."

On the following morning, the 31st of October, the Twenty living, and Valazé the dead, were put into carts and carried to the place of execution, which was close under the Salle de Manège, the scene of their triumphs over the king and the Feuillants, and then, with so short an interval between, of their defeat by the Montagnards. Their heads were bare, their hands were tied behind their backs; to save time at the scaffold they were all in their shirt-sleeves, with their coats hung loosely round their necks. To the people, who were collected in immense crowds along the streets, and who shouted "Long live the Republic! Death to all Traitors!" they replied by shouting "Vive la République!" and by singing in chorus the first verse of the famed Marseillaise Hymn, according to their new version, importing that the day of glory had arrived, that the bloody knife of tyranny was raised against them. When they arrived at the foot of the scaffold they descended from the death-carts, embraced one another, and cried again "Vive la République!" Brissot, however, and several others were faint and silent, even as they had been during their tedious transit from the prison. The first that ascended the scaffold was Sillery. The guillotine, and Samson and his men, worked with such rapidity, that in thirty-one minutes they were all dead.

There was now no single day on which the guillotine was idle; but six days after the execution of the twenty-one deputies a victim appeared on the scaffold who demands some more particular that it was by means of the executioner, who carried every day into that horrible abode, and recounted to the gaolers all these abominable and admirable circumstances." Thus the executioner told the gaolers, the gaolers told Riouffe, and Riouffe, who could not have written a line of his book in prison, told the public!

though brief notice. This was Philippe Egalité, ci-devant Duke of Orleans, who had been alternately accused by the Girondists of being an ultra-Jacobin, and by the Jacobins of being a Girondist. As soon as the flight of his sons with Dumouriez was known in the Convention, certain messengers, who found him playing at whist in his splendid residence of Palais-Egalité, late Palais-Royal, were dispatched to tell him that he was wanted at the bar. He went, appealed to his inviolability as a representative of the people, to his past services to the revolution, and protested that he was entirely ignorant of the causes which had led to the defection of his eldest son. "If," said he, "my son is really a traitor, I see here the image of Brutus, and I know how to follow that Roman example." But all this availed him nothing; and a decree was presently passed which sent him a state prisoner to Marseilles. By other decrees which speedily followed, and which were either proposed or warmly supported by Robespierre, every individual of his family that could be found in France was put under arrest, and the property of all of them under sequestration. For more than six months he lay in prison at Marseilles, uncertain of his fate, and incapable of comprehending the march of affairs; but on the 3rd of November Philippe Egalité was brought back to Paris, and on the 6th of the same month he stood before the Revolutionary Tribunal, charged by the Convention and by the Public Accuser with having been the accomplice of the Girondists who had perished on the last day of October. The merits of the parties were different, but the trial of Philippe Egalité was to all intents as great a mockery of justice as the trial of the queen, whose earliest and most terrible enemy he had been. In one particular, however, it was less odious—it was exceedingly short. In the account before us* scarcely a word is said to prove his complicity either with Dumouriez and his own son, or with the Girondists, who had so frequently endeavoured to procure his arrest or banishment. The chief crime imputed to him, or that which was most dwelt upon, was his fondness for England, his frequent journeys and his numerous intimacies in this country. He was asked whether, during his residences in London, he had not been closely connected with the creatures of Pitt? In denying the fact, which he well might do, he admitted that he had seen Pitt, because he had letters to deliver to him; and, in the present temper of the French people, this admission was equivalent to a confession of enormous guilt. He was asked whether he had not sent his daughter over to England in the view of getting her married to one of the sons of George III.? Having replied in the negative, he was asked what was the object of his last journey—of his last pretended mission to England.? He said he went or was sent because it was known he was very intimate with the opposition party in that country, and because the *French government of that time wished to preserve peace with England. But, when his daughter and Madame Genlis went to London, they were accompanied by the Girondist traitor Pétion—how was that? He said that he did not know then that Pétion had any evil designs against the republic. But did he not know that Madame Genlis, to whom he had intrusted his daughter, was an intriguing woman (une intrigante)? He declared he was entirely ignorant of it. But he must know that at a later period Pétion kept up a close correspondence with his eldest son, who was in the army of Dumouriez. He only knew that Pétion had received some letters from his son; and the letters which he himself had received from his son never contained the slightest hint of Dumouriez's criminal intentions. But was he not aware that the husband of the intrigante Genlis, the traitor Sillery, his constant counsellor, had been closely connected with the Girondists Buzot and Louvet? And did he not know that Louvet's proposing the banishment of the entire family of Orleans was but a blind and a trick concerted between them? No, he knew nothing of the sort. His very vote on the trial of his kinsman Louis XVI.—a vote which we believe to have proceeded from fear—was now brought against him as an unrepugnant crime. Was it not by an artful combination that he, Philippe Egalité, had voted for the death of the tyrant, while his creature, Sillery, had voted against it? He said he knew of no combination; that he, for his part, had voted according to his soul and conscience. They asked him how it was that he, who was at Marseilles all the time of the counter-revolution there, when the federalists were putting to death or imprisoning all true patriots, had been left safe and undisturbed? He replied, that he had not been left undisturbed, that he had been brought before a Marseilles tribunal, but that the court had thought proper to acquit him. "But how was it," cried the president, "that you, in a republic, and in defiance of equality, suffered yourself to be called Prince?" He answered, that he had done everything in his power to prevent it; that he had even put up a placard on the door of his apartment prohibiting the unrepugnant practice, and imposing a fine, to go to the benefit of the poor, upon all such as should use the forbidden word. The immense sums of money he had spent in the early part of the revolution, and which had left him for many months past miserably embarrassed and poor, were also converted into capital offences. "What had you in view," said the president, "in making such grand largesses?" To this he answered, "I made no such largesses. I was only fortunate enough to be able to relieve my indigent fellow-citizens in the midst of a rigorous winter, by selling a portion of my landed property." He was allowed for his counsel Charles Voidel, who had been a member of the first or constituent assembly, who had long lived with him in the closest intimacy, and who, among other services, had introduced the Duke of Chartres, or Egalité the younger, to the clubs, public dinners, and meetings then in vogue. Voidel, who had been a great detector of conspiracies during the early stages of the revolution, when the court and family of Louis XVI. were to be destroyed, pleaded that there was not the shadow of a proof of his client's being engaged in any conspiracy or unrepugnant schemes; and truly nothing like a proof appears to have been produced against him, while even the presumptive evidence seems to have been infinitely less, and far more loose, than might have been expected. We mean the presumptive evidence of his connexion or understanding with Dumouriez; for as to his complicity with the Girondists and their federalists, it was a daring lie and nonsense. Voidel said that the journey to London of Mademoiselle Egalité was solely intended for the benefit of her health and her improvement in the English language; that the woman Genlis would not undertake the journey unless she were accompanied by two known patriots; and that therefore he himself and Pétion, who at that time passed for a good patriot, were chosen by his client to attend them to London; that Dumouriez and the Genlis had been the worst enemies of his client, and the author of all the misfortunes which had befallen his family: for, while Dumouriez deluded the brother, and persuaded him to abandon his country with him, the woman Genlis perverted the mind of the sister, &c. He declared that the prisoner at the bar did not know for a long time what had become of his daughter, and that it was only the other day he had learned that she was in an hospital in Switzerland (dans un hôpital en Suisse). He dwelt upon the exhausted fortune of the prisoner, and upon the odium in which he was held by all the old enemies of the revolution; he represented him as the constant friend of liberty, declaring, with perfect truth, that the royalists regarded him as their most mortal enemy, and that, if at any time a counter-revolution could have succeeded, these royalists would not have failed sending him to the block. But Philippe Egalité had rendered himself either odious or contemptible to all parties, and he could no longer be of any use to the Jacobins except as a victim for the guillotine, whose royal birth would attract more attention to the vigour and impartiality of the revolutionary government than a commoner sacrifice. It was thought too that his death would give the lie to the reports which had once been so prevalent, that the leading Jacobins were his partisans and fellow-conspirators, and that Robespierre and Danton were driving on the revolution only to place him on the throne. The tribunal condemned him with the usual forms, and sent him to the scaffold the same afternoon in company with four other victims. On arriving in front of his old dwelling, and the scene of his orgies, the Palais-Royal, he looked at the building with a dry look (un regard sec), and kept his eyes bent upon it until the death-cart turned the angle of another street; but his countenance the while betrayed no emotion whatever, and his whole behaviour appears to have been as firm or indifferent as that of any who preceded or followed him to the guillotine. He perished on the same spot as the king and queen and the twenty-one Girondists.* It is said that he complained neither of his friends nor of his enemies, and that, when he was told he might be respited till the next day, he refused the favour, saying that, as he was to die, the sooner the better. The mob expressed their "lively satisfaction" when Samson exhibited his head. He was forty-five years old when he died—if not the very worst, then the most defamed man of his bad times.

Next followed Madame Roland. She had been released from the Abbaye on the 27th of June, but had been arrested again on the very same day by order of the commune, and carried to Sainte-Pélagie, a far worse prison. A day or two after the execution of the Girondists she was transferred to the Conciergerie, through which there was now no exit except through the Tribunal Révolutionnaire and the gates of death. Riouffe says that he saw her there, and was much struck by her elegant and graceful person, and her large black eyes full of expression and sweetness; that her conversation was serious without being cold; that she never spoke of the Girondists who had been guillotined but with respect, yet at the same time without any effeminate pity, and sometimes reproaching them for not having adopted more vigorous measures; that her behaviour was dignified and heroic, but that the woman who waited upon her said, "Before you she collects all her strength, but in her own room she will sometimes remain for three hours together leaning on the window, and weeping." She was not permitted to see her young daughter, her only child, who remained with her in Paris when her husband fled. If she really wrote the last part of the Mémoires which were published under her name (the fact has been doubted, and with some appearance of reason), she consoled herself in her misfortune by comparing her life and conduct to that of the flower of Roman republicans, by vaunting the purity and patriotism of her party and the wisdom of her husband's or her own administration, and by uttering rhapsodies against the Mountain, and Pache, and all the ultra-Jacobins, without expressing any penitence for political or other faults committed, without bestowing one word on the fate of the king or even upon the fate of the queen, a woman and a mother like herself; without, in fact, admitting that her party had committed any fault except that of being over-lenient, and too mild, generous, and confiding. On the 8th of November she was brought to the bar of the Revolutionary Tribunal, and condemned to die as an accomplice of the Girondists, and a principal in their federation plots. She was executed on the next day.* As she was drawn through the streets she chatted and seemed to joke with Lamarche, an ex-director of assignat-printing, who was in the same cart with her, condemned to the same death, and less bold to meet it. She died with courage, or in the manner that was fashionable; but all the other particulars, such as her address to the statue of Liberty,† her insisting on dying before her companion, and her bon-mot to the executioner, rest upon the authority of Riouffe or upon authority quite as apocryphal. [At least two-thirds of these grim guillotine bon-mots or smart dying-speeches may be safely attributed to Riouffe.] Roland, who had found a secure hiding-place with some friends at Rouen, quitted that asylum, and destroyed himself a few days after hearing of his wife's death. On the 16th of November he was found about five leagues from Rouen on the high road to Paris, pierced through the heart by a cane-sword, with a paper in his pocket containing the apology of his life and death, a justification of his conduct as minister, &c. The commissioners of the Convention, who had been sent to Rouen some time before, and who repaired to the spot to examine the corpse in order to be sure that it was the ex-minister of the interior, proposed in their letter satisfying the Convention upon this point, that, as they had buried him by the road-side where they had found him, they should erect a post over his grave with an inscription, "to transmit to posterity the tragical end of a perverse minister, who had poisoned public opinion, who had bought very dear the reputation of a virtuous man, and who had been the chief of that criminal coalition which endeavoured to save the tyrant and destroy the republic."‡

On the very day on which Madame Roland died, astronomer mayor Bailly, who had been no friend to her or to her party, having remained a Feuillant and Lafayettist, was tried and condemned. He was accused of complicity with Lafayette, of having used all the means in his power to favour the flight to Varennes, of having been an aristocrat all the days of his life, infamous, sold to the tyrant, &c.; but the head and front of his offence was his conduct on that black Sunday, when the respectability national guards had fired on the peti-

* Kotzebue tells a striking anecdote about the last hours of the Girondist heroine, which he says he obtained from Madame Talma herself.

Madame Talma, who was in the same prison with Madame Roland, said that that lady spent all the night which preceded her execution in playing on the harpsichord; and that the airs she played, and her manner of playing them, were so strange, so shocking, and so frightful, that the sounds haunted her mind ten years after, and could never be forgotten.—Travels from Berlin to Paris in the year 1804.

† We apprehend, however, that this story is more striking than true; for the use of musical instruments was prohibited in the prisons, and, though Madame Roland, or her book of Mémoires, states that, when she was at Sainte-Pelagie, the wife of the keeper allowed her to have a piano-forte placed in one of the keeper's rooms, and the keeper permitted her to go there and play upon it, there is still small probability that this indulgence was continued in the Conciergerie, to which she was removed only a very few days before her execution.

tioners in the Champ de Mars and on the very altar of the country; and this had been embodied in numerous petitions presented to the Convention by the relatives and friends of those who had been killed on that day; and this was a charge which, in the present situation of affairs, allowed no hope of mercy or respite. In pronouncing sentence, the court ordered that he should suffer on the scene of his greatest crime, that he should be executed on the esplanade between the Champ de Mars and the river Seine, and that a red flag which he had used on that black Sunday should be dragged in the dirt behind his cart, and then burned at the place of execution by the headsman. Lafayette's accommodations in the Prussian and Austrian fortresses may not have been of the best kind, but the hero of two worlds was a fortunate man to be where he was, rather than in Paris with his former friend and fellow-idol! On the following day poor Bailly, whose sufferings make us forget his faults and follies, was carted at the Conciergerie. His journey to the distant part of Paris appointed for his execution occupied nearly two hours, and he was hooted and insulted by the sans-culottes all the way. When he reached the spot where the guillotine had been set up for him, the delicate-minded people insisted that that sacred earth, that holy ground, which had witnessed so many liberty fêtes, should not be contaminated by the blood or the presence of so vile a criminal; and, as the sovereign people were sovereigns to do what they chose, they stopped the death-cart, took the scaffolding of the guillotine to pieces, and began to erect it in another place, in a ditch or hollow on the bank of the Seine outside of the Champ de Mars, and beyond the esplanade. All these operations, which passed under the eyes of Bailly, occupied a considerable time, forming a novelty in torture. At last the broad blade of the guillotine hung suspended just where the sans-culottes wished it; and Bailly, descending into the hollow, saw the red flag burned before him, and then, mounting the scaffold, died. The story about the trembling and the ready reply was never heard of until Riouffe told it in his book a year after the astronomer's death.*

During the two months of November and December one hundred and twenty-six persons were condemned by Fouquier Tinville's tribunal, and executed by that great revolution-professor, citizen Samson. Not a man or woman was brought before the court but was condemned, and after condemnation not one was pardoned or even reprieved. The Parisians' appetite for blood seemed truly to grow with what it fed upon: the place of execution was the commonest place of rendezvous; the executions, as the most exciting, were the most popular exhibitions of the day; women and children, as well as men, ran eagerly to them, and, unless the weather was exceedingly cold or exceedingly rainy, the Place de la Révolution, which continued for many months to be the principal slaughter-house, was constantly crowded. Nor was this crowd composed solely of the rabble and faubourg sans-culottes; Manuel, who had been procureur-general of the commune at the time of the revolution of the 10th of August, and during the September massacres, to both of which events he was suspected of having contributed—after escaping assassination at Montargis, his native place, whither, upon the fall of his chief, Pétion, and the Girondists, he had retired to hide himself—was guillotined on the 25th of November; and on the same day General Brunet, who had been serving in the army of Nice, was executed for some real or imaginary military mistake—the principle being now laid down and acted upon, that every military error or misfortune was a state crime, and that every commander who did not achieve in the field all that the legislators and committee-men sitting in the Tuileries thought he ought to do, or could have done, merited death, with infamy and confiscation of property. These two executions were followed, on the very next day, by the death of General Houchard, who was guillotined for not having taken the Duke of York prisoner, and destroyed the whole English army at Dunkirk. In rapid succession the son of old General Custine, and Generals Biron, Beauharnais (the husband of Josephine), and Westermann, were swept away, the important services of the last in storming the Tuileries on the 10th of August being all forgotten. These executions of soldiers were intermixed and varied with the beheading of sundry journalists and men of letters, and lawyers and ex-legislators; heads that had never thought alike meeting in the same sack which received the loppings of the guillotine, and fierce political antagonists, who could scarcely have met in life except to tear each other to pieces, being deposited together in the same grave, with one layer of quick-lime (their common winding-sheet and only shroud) to consume them all together. As the property of all who were condemned was confiscated, the guillotine was an effective instrument even in finance. Thus Barrère is said to have remarked facetiously, that the guillotine was an excellent mint—that they coined money in the Place de la Révolution! Barnave, who had married a rich wife, could scarcely have had a chance of escape even if he had remained quiet at Grenoble, instead of participating in the attempts at a counter-revolution against the Mountain there, and even if the papers found, or said to have been found, in the iron chest had not given him a foremost place among those who had corresponded with the court. He had allowed himself to be seized at Grenoble at a time when he might easily have escaped with his wife into Switzerland or Savoy, and, after lying for a considerable time in the prison of his native town, he was brought by post to Paris and the Conciergerie. Relying on his eloquence, which had gained him so much fame when he led the opposition in the Constituent Assembly, he commenced a long and very admirable oration before the Revolutionary Tribunal; but, when men will not listen, eloquence is less than powder without shot: Fouquier Tinville interrupted him, the court bade him speak to the point, the mob drowned his voice, and he was condemned even like all the rest—like the illiterate soldier who could only plead his cause with sacrés and camp oaths, and like those whose only eloquence was silence and astonishment. Duport-Dutertre, minister of justice under the monarchic constitution, was tried with him, on the same charge of having conspired against French liberty in concert with the ci-devant court; and they were executed together on the 29th of November. Those who had been ministers under the Gironde were pursued with still more fury than those who had held office under the precious Lafayetteist constitution. Clavière, the Genevese minister of finance, whose wife was said to have rallied and recovered from a consumption from her enthusiastic joy at his promotion,* escaped the guillotine by committing suicide in his prison on the 8th of December; his poor wife poisoned herself two days after, and their only child, a daughter, fled penniless to Geneva. The Convention passed a law that the property of those who killed themselves, either before or after trial, should be confiscated to the republic, even as if they had been regularly condemned and executed. Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs, with whom the English opposition had been so eager to treat, after wandering from place to place in all manner of disguises, was found at last in a hayloft, dressed as a labouring man, was whirled away to Paris, and, without any trial, but in virtue of a decree of outlawry passed on the 22nd of June, he was guillotined on the 27th of December. He had been a printer, and a man of letters and journalist, before he became a revolutionary diplomatist, and he was only thirty years old when he died. Barnave, who had done and gone through so much, was only in his thirty-second or thirty-third year. Among the other victims who perished in this dismal December month were Kersaint, the naval officer who had been a member of the Constituent Assembly and of the Convention, who had been as keen a revolutionist as any of them down to the end of 1792, but who had quitted the Convention upon their barbarous sentence against Louis XVI.; Diétrich, ex-mayor of Strasbourg, who had formerly passed for a good patriot and thorough Jacobin, but who was now accused of having been in correspondence with the enemy; and Madame (ex-countess) Dubarry, the last brazen and low-bred mistress of Louis XV. This wretched woman had got safely over to England with considerable property, and there (in safety at least) she might have remained; but she returned to Paris to be presently lodged in the Conciergerie. The Revolutionary Tribunal condemned her to death for having given money to some of the emigrants in England, and for having worn in London mourning for the death of the tyrant. "She had lived," says the continuator of Marat's journal, "in debauchery and crime; and she died without courage." Historians of the revolution have continued to repeat, one after the other, that of all these victims of the guillotine none but the old soldier Custine and this old courtesan showed any cowardice or weakness. The imputation upon Custine's courage rose, we believe, entirely from his religious feelings in the hour of death. No doubt, we believe, is entertained of the shrieks and screams of the Dubarry; but some of the particulars of her execution have evidently been exaggerated by choice moralists like Riouffe. There is a third victim who has not been named among the pusillanimous, or among those who could not make "the scaffold echo with the jest;" and this was Manuel, who, according to the official account, could scarcely stand in the death-cart, and seemed to be dead, or nearly so, before he reached the scaffold.* Eye-witnesses might probably have been able to increase very considerably the list of those who fainted in the cart or on the scaffold; but it appears to be indisputable that there was a fashion in dying, and that the great majority met their doom with theatrical display, or levity, or indifference.

* "Bailly, you tremble," said one of the crowd. "It is with cold then," replied Bailly. In the same paragraph Riouffe compares the death of Bailly to that of Jesus Christ!

Several of the fugitive Girondists, instead of going from Caen to the south, had, like Valazé, returned to hide in Paris. Among them was Rabaut-St.-Etienne, who took refuge with an old friend, was betrayed by him, and conveyed to the guillotine. Those who continued their flight to the banks of the Garonne underwent the extremities of human suffering, and most of them perished at last in the hands of the executioners either at Bordeaux or at Paris. Louvet, one of the survivors, has left upon record a moving history of the retreat from Caen of the deputies who kept together for a time—a history which would be still more moving if it were not written in the style of a romance, and if it did not exhibit, even in its most tragical parts, a lowness of sentiment and a filthy imagination.† According to Louvet's account they must have passed half of the time in which they were out of imminent danger in dancing the carmagnole, and singing their republican songs. They began their journey with some battalions of Breton volunteers, who had joined the insurgents in the Calvados, but who were now retreating homeward completely disheartened at the prospects of the counter-revolution. They marched in the ranks with these Bretons like common soldiers, hoping in this manner to escape observation. At Fougères the battalions separated, each taking its nearest road home. The deputies remained, and continued their march with the battalion of Finisterre, both because it seemed more attached to them, or more averse to the Mountain, than the other battalions, and because it was going to Brest, in the neighbourhood of which town they hoped to find some vessel to convey them to the south. [To make that long journey by land and to traverse the Vendée, the scene of the most terrible of wars, and where the royalist people and the armies of the Mountain were alike their enemies, was too desperate an enterprise to be thought of.] The Finisterre battalion was only eight hundred strong: in most of the towns through which they had to pass the Jacobins kept the upper hand, and, in spite of their precautions, it got known that a certain number of the Girondists, outlawed by the Convention, were with the battalion. At one place a plan was formed to seize the weary deputies in their beds at night, and send them to the Mountain or massacre them. Farther on the road at Dol, the Jacobin mayor and municipals called the national guards to arms, drew out some old cannon, and sent to St. Malo for reinforcements. The Finisterre battalion rushed into the town with bayonets fixed and cannons loaded, and drew up in order of battle in the square of the Hôtel-de-Ville, and in front of the mayor's forces. The mayor protested that he had no intention to stop the march of the battalion, but only wanted to seize the deputies, those traitors to their country, who were concealed in their ranks. The Finisterre men, lowering their bayonets and standing by their guns, told the mayor and his national guardsmen to come and seek the deputies, since they were so anxious to seize them. But the mayor declined the invitation, and permitted the battalion and the deputies to dine in the town, and continue their march unmolested. In going through a narrow wooded pass near Dinan, the battalion expected to be attacked by a very superior force; but they got safely through the defile, and the deputies met with a charitable reception at Dinan. The next morning the proscribed legislators were roused out of their beds by a terrible uproar among the Finisterre volunteers, some of whom were crying that, since the authority of the Mountain was acknowledged, it would be factious and treasonable to protect deputies who were outlawed by it; while others cried that it would be most disgraceful for brave Bretons to betray or abandon unfortunate gentlemen, virtuous representatives of the people, who had thrown themselves upon their protection. The disputants, though almost surrounded by enemies, were on the point of falling upon one another, when the deputies announced their intention of quitting the battalion and shifting for themselves. Their friends gave to each of them a good musket, a sword, and a cartouche-box well filled with ball-cartridge, and a white mantle to throw over their volunteer uniforms; and, thus armed, they struck across the rough mountainous country by cross and bye roads for the port of Quimper at the mouth of the river of that name, not far from Brest. "At this time," says Louvet, "we were Pétion, Barbaroux, Salles, Buzot, Cussy, Lesage, Bergoing, Giroust, Meilhan, and myself; then Girey-Duprée, and a worthy young man named Riouffe, who had come to join us at Caen; and then six guides. Buzot still kept with him his man-servant, who was as well armed as the rest of us: in all, we were nineteen." They had upwards of a hundred miles to march, and few of them were in marching-order. Buzot was so fat that he could scarcely get along, even with the help of his man-servant; Cussy was tormented with the gout; Barbaroux had a sprained ankle; and Riouffe, whose occupation had always been sedentary, soon got foot-sore and weary. Yet nothing but speed could save them, for the revolutionary committees in the townships were giving the alarm, and all the Jacobin part of the country was rising. Sleeping in barns upon straw, or in the fields under hedges, travelling more by night than by day, and toiling and starving along the roughest and least frequented roads, and avoiding the towns, they fared onward for the coast. By a mistake of their guides they stumbled into the town of Moncontour, and on a market-day, when the place was thronged with people. Buzot and Pétion were recognised by several persons, but, though there was a considerable force of gendarmes in the place, they got through the town without molestation. They looked like volunteers returning home on leave of absence, and the commandant of the Finisterre battalion had given them passes. After getting out of Moncontour they concealed themselves in a thick wood till nightfall. About midnight, after a long march in the dark, they reached a friendly house, where they found supper and beds—or the mattresses and bolsters of two beds, which they shared among them. Two of the party, worn out by the march, and flattered by the hope that they might lie concealed and safe there, remained behind in this district; one of them was Lesage, who actually escaped detection; the other was Giroust, who, though arrested at the close of the Reign of Terror, was not brought to trial until after the fall of Robespierre, when his life was safe. They both re-appeared in the Convention, and afterwards filled several important posts. The rest of the deputies, who continued their route to Quimper, were surprised the next night, while sleeping in a barn, by a Jacobin magistrate, with half a regiment of national guards at his heels. At first they thought of fighting. "We were all armed to the teeth," says Louvet, "each of us having, besides his musket, good horse-pistols; and I had, besides, a blunderbuss capable of vomiting twenty bullets at once. . . . There was Barbaroux, whose high stature and corpulence gave him an air of the most imposing kind; there were in our little troop seven fine grenadiers like him; and, among the six others, the shortest was, like myself, five feet four inches high."* [Sad times for legislators, philosophers, and men of letters, when they are thus obliged to measure themselves by feet and inches!] But, after some talk and some very ingenious acting on their part, they were let go, being told, among other things, that they had been mistaken for a set of refractory priests. As they advanced fresh dangers and hair-breadth escapes attended them. They were told of gendarmes being seen lurking near their road; of a hue-and-cry that was following them, and getting before them. The next night, as they were stealing through the long narrow dark street of the village of Carhaix, situated in the midst of bogs and marshes, a little girl rushed from a dark corner, threw open a door, within which they saw a light burning, and cried out, "Les voilà qui passent!" (There they are passing!) They ran with all the speed and strength that was left in them, the lamest forgetting their lameness. They thought they heard horses galloping behind them—horses of gendarmes, a detachment of which, they had been told, was quartered in Carhaix. "It must be confessed," says Louvet, "that the boldest among us was not much at his ease." They lost their road, they wandered among bogs, woods, and mountains (through a country like the rudest parts of Wales), they were afraid of approaching houses lest gendarmes or other enemies might be concealed within; and all the poor country-people they met were afraid of them, they looked so haggard and desperate. At last they reached a forest or wood distant only two leagues from Quimper, and thence sent forward their only remaining guide to seek out some friends they had in that town, as they could not venture to go thither themselves in broad daylight. They lay in the wood all that night exposed to the pelting of a pitiless storm, and half dying with hunger; but the next morning, by early dawn, some of their Quimper friends arrived and found them in the wood, re-animated their fleeting spirits with some eau-de-vie and black bread, then brought horses for the lame, and in the darkness of the following night smuggled them into Quimper. But, alas! there was no decked vessel in that obscure fishing-port except a small barque, and that not sea-worthy. They separated and took up their lodging in three or four little country-houses in the neighbourhood of the town. The Montagnard commissioners could not as yet venture into the wilds of Lower Brittany; but there was a Jacobin Club in Quimper which gave great uneasiness, compelling each of the fugitives to procure for himself some hiding-place in case of domiciliary visits, some hole-in-the-wall or hollow between walls, into which he might rush in case of surprisal. Some of them whiled away the time in writing memoirs. Faublas-Louvet composed his 'Hymn to Death,' the moral of which was that death was better than the Mountain. After some weeks had been passed in this manner, Cussy, Duchâtel, Salles, Bergoing, and five others put themselves on board the crazy old barque, which had been repaired at their expense, and set sail for Bordeaux. The rest remained behind waiting for a better vessel, which some friends of Pétion and Guadet were preparing for them at Brest. "I had long since resolved," says Louvet, "not to separate my destiny from that of Guadet, Buzot, and Pétion; and, very fortunately for him, Barbaroux had just caught the small-pox, and so could not go in the barque. I say very fortunately, for all those who set foot in that unhappy boat were very soon taken." Seeing the sequel, we may doubt as to this piece of very good fortune of Barbaroux. At last, on the 20th of September, Louvet, Guadet, Buzot, Pétion, Barbaroux embarked on board a vessel which was bound for Bordeaux, and which came near to the mouth of the Quimper river to pick them up. On board the vessel they found their brother deputy and friend Valady, and another gentleman "of tall stature and light brown hair," who, although not a member of the Convention, had been proscribed by it. Valady was one of the very few that had displayed great courage in opposing Louis's sentence of death. This had provoked his own proscription in spite of all the services he had rendered to the revolution in its earlier stages, by debauching the grenadiers of the Gardes-Françaises, and by preaching his wild doctrines in other quarters.* In former times he had professed himself a Pythagorean philosopher. He was now destined to practise some part of that philosophy—frugality and frequent fasting. At sea there were fresh perils, the least of which certainly was the swarm of English cruisers and privateers that were hovering off the whole coast from Brest to Bordeaux. They were safely landed at the Bec-d'Ambez, near Bordeaux. "Here we were, at last," says Louvet, "in the department of the Gironde; and here we believed ourselves to be not only in safety, but in a condition to combat the oppressors of our country: we almost fell upon our knees to kiss that blessed earth! Oh! blind, unhappy mortals!" Guadet had a relation in the town, whose house was open to him; but the first thing Guadet did was to go with his companions to an inn, and with his usual confidence (sa confiance ordinaire) announce his name, by which it was easy to understand who were his comrades. Louvet is rather severe upon Guadet, saying that his imprudence was the principal cause of nearly all the dangers which followed; but from his own narrative it should appear that several others of the fugitives were quite as imprudent and confident as Guadet could be. They were scarcely an hour on shore ere sinister reports met their ear:—ultra-Jacobin section Franklin had risen against the respectabilities, had beaten and disarmed them five days before, had turned the city of Bordeaux topsy-turvy, had installed a Montagnard municipality, and had thrown into prison Cussy, Duchâtel, and other patriots who had gone in the barque. Guadet would not believe the sad news. He and Pétion went to Bordeaux, and returned on the morrow with the certain intelligence that all that they had heard was true—that the sans-culottes and Montagnards were absolutely masters of Bordeaux, and of all that was in it or near it, that terror was the order of the day, and that Tallien was coming to put the guillotine en permanence. In a great town, in the capital of his native province, where Guadet had expected to find numberless devoted friends, he found not one that would venture to harbour him and Pétion for the night—he could scarcely find one that had courage enough to show him, at nine o'clock at night, the shortest or safest way back to the Bec-d'Ambez. What was to be done? They could not go to Bordeaux; they could not re-embark, for the friendly vessel which had brought them was gone; they could not long stay where they were, for the keeper of the inn to which Guadet had so rashly conducted them was a rank Maratist. Long and anxious deliberations ended in a resolution that Guadet should hasten to Saint-Emilion, his birth-place, a few leagues off, and that the rest should lie concealed in a solitary house until he should return to them. By some friend they caused it to be reported in Bec-d'Ambez that they were all gone from that neighbourhood; but at night the innkeeper was seen, or was thought to be seen, prying near the house, and this led to fresh alarms and desperate resolves. No attack was, however, made upon their quarters. But the next day passed, and the next, without the return of Guadet, or the arrival of any messenger from him. Even another day of agony passed, and no one came. At the beginning of the third night a trusty and secret messenger arrived. Guadet had been again cruelly disappointed. At Saint-Emilion, besides his father and several relations, he had many friends—friends of his childhood, "of whom one always believes oneself sure, until one has tried them." He had gone in the confidence that these friends would receive him with transports, and dispute with one another the honour of giving refuge to the honourable deputies, the companions of his misfortunes and flight. But panic and terror reigned at Saint-Emilion as at Bordeaux—terror was here, was there, was everywhere, making even generous men cautious, selfish, cowardly. The messenger informed Louvet and his party that Guadet had indeed found an asylum for himself in the house of his relations, and that he had even found a generous friend who would lodge and conceal two of the party. The party thought that where two might be lodged, room might be found for six; at all hazards they determined not to separate, and for any of them to stay longer where they were was impossible, as gendarmes and other troops were marching into Bec-d'Ambez. They all set out together in the dark, Guadet's messenger serving as their guide. They had to cross the river Garonne in a boat, and then the river Dordogne close below the town of Libourne. At this second passage the people of the ferry-boat kept them waiting and shouting on the bank for three-quarters of an hour; but, fortunately, the sentinels in the town were as difficult to wake as the ferrymen, and they got across the Dordogne without misadventure. More hair-breadth escapes on the road, and they reached Guadet's birth-place. He could only receive them in a stone-quarry; his relations and townfolk, more terrified than ever, would not now lodge even two of the proscribed. Guadet was confounded, for it was chiefly on his representations that the fugitives had come to this cradle and home of Girondism, and he had expected that his presence would not merely secure a most hospitable reception for them all, but would also bring armies into the field to fight their battles against the Mountain. "Poor Guadet!" says Louvet—"how many times had he protested to us that, if all honourable and generous sentiments were banished from the rest of France, they would take refuge in the department of the Gironde!" A charitable curé (and they found several such in the course of their wanderings) offered them an asylum for two or three days in his lonely house near Saint-Emilion. At the end of that time Valady's friend, the gentleman of tall stature and light brown hair, would be gone, for he had friends and relatives not far off, and he thought he might reach them in safety by taking cross-roads. But the tall gentleman was arrested en route, and consigned to a local revolutionary tribunal. The rest remained two days longer with the curé, who was then obliged to turn them over to a poor farmer, who hid them in his hayloft, but who at times forgot, or was unable, to furnish them with any victuals. Here they were terribly alarmed one night, and thought of killing themselves, but did not. Guadet, who was still on the search for some noble soul that would redeem the character of the department, at length found an heroic lady, who received, fed, and clothed the miserable refugees, lodging them in a secret cellar thirty feet underground. "Observe," says Louvet, "that this was done when the guillotine was every day striking off heads, and when the brigands of the Mountain were committing all kinds of horrors in this part of the country, threatening to burn the houses, to burn the towns, wherein any of the proscribed had taken refuge. At length the fugitive deputies, who had scarcely any money left among them, thought it better to separate. Barbaroux, Buzot, and Pétion went some leagues off towards the sea to seek an uncertain asylum among rocks and caverns: Guadet, Louvet, Salles, and Valady, who kept together a little while longer, took another direction in search of another hole in a rock—each party to its Patmos. Their separation was sad as sad could be. Barbaroux spoke of his mother; Salles "had death in his eyes." Guadet, who knew the country well, found a cavern where he and those who remained with him stayed for a time.* But they could not stay there long, for the cave was near a village; there was no procuring provisions without risk of being detected; and, as the month of November was far advanced, it was cold even in that southern climate. Guadet had yet an untried friend, a lady with a good house over her head, and luxuries and money to spare. He thought his claims upon her were great, for in earlier times, when an advocate practising at Bordeaux, he had saved her from a criminal prosecution, in which her honour and the character of her family were gravely committed; and since that important service she had a hundred times assured him of her eternal gratitude. On the night of the 14th of November, in a storm of wind and rain, Guadet and his three desperate friends presented themselves at this lady's door. After Guadet had knocked for half an hour, the door was half-opened by a man-servant, who had seen him a hundred times, but who would not recognise him now. The fallen deputy, who not long ago had fancied he was controlling the destinies of nations, told his name and his wants. The lacquey said, Madame was in bed and asleep, but he would wake her. He shut the door in their faces, and did not return until another half-hour had passed, and then only to announce that they could have no food, shelter, or succour of any kind there; that it was impossible for Madame to do anything for them, as there was a Jacobin committee of surveillance in the village hard by. Guadet implored to be admitted alone, to speak for one moment with Madame, but he was told it was impossible, and the door was again closed and made fast, not to be re-opened that night, or as long as such contagious neighbours were in its vicinity. Drenched to the skin by a cold rain, lame in the feet, famishing, spent, Louvet dropped to the earth, and there lay all but senseless. Guadet ran back to the door, and, speaking through the key-hole, intreated for shelter and a fire, if only for two hours. The servant answered nothing save "Cela est impossible." "Then a little vinegar and a glass of water, for a friend is fainting!" "Cela est impossible." Poor Guadet, whose philosophy was wondrously changed by bitter experience, burst out into imprecations against the baseness of human nature. These details will go far in explaining what the Reign of Terror really was. Rendered frantic by Madame's inhospitality, Louvet, as soon as he recovered a little strength, swore that he would go to Paris and die there in the Place de la Révolution, rather than linger and starve any longer in this asylum of all the generous virtues, the Gironde. And, on the very next day, the author of Faublas put a Jacobin-cut wig on his head, a great-coat of a national guardsman on his back, forged some signatures to an old passport, and took the road to Pandemonium.* Valady went southward for Périgueux, where he hoped to find friends among the relations and connexions of his quondam companion, the gentleman of tall stature and light brown hair, who had been intercepted on his way thither. Guadet and Salles kept still together in the neighbourhood of Guadet's native place, hiding wherever they could, and continually changing their protectors and their asylum. But, though their fate was delayed, it could not be avoided. The poor Pythagorean, Valady, was captured in the neighbourhood of Périgueux, and guillotined in that town at the beginning of December.* Guadet and Salles, nine months after their first arrival at Bec-d'Ambez, when they were lying concealed, and fancying themselves forgotten in a barn attached to the house of Guadet's own father, were heard of by some of the Jacobin clubs of the district. Guadet himself was said to have been seen one day lurking between Libourne and Saint-Emilion. It was immediately suspected that all the deputies who had landed at Bec-d'Ambez were hidden in the extensive caves behind Saint-Emilion, where they might be supplied with provisions by Guadet's family. These suspicions were immediately communicated to a commissioner of the committee of Salut Public, who concerted measures with the local committees for blocking up with armed men, and at the same moment, all the mouths of these caverns, which were very numerous, and for sending in fierce and keen-scented dogs to track or drive out any persons that might be hidden in the intricacies of the caves. The committees enjoined the closest secrecy until the blow could be struck. One night, in the middle of June (1794), Lagarde, an agent of the Convention, set out from Libourne with ten patriots "decided, and proof to everything," who were only told that they were to go in search of some enemies of the country. Among these chosen ten was one Marcon, "who had some dogs." At the proper point Lagarde was joined by a battalion of national guards from Bec-d'Ambez, who were left ignorant of the object of this night-march until they arrived at the caves of Saint-Emilion. By break of day, the military force being aided by some peasants of the district, every mouth and issue of any kind was blockaded; and the youngest and most adventurous of the national guardsmen went into those subterranean places with Marcon and his dogs. "If," said the Jacobin clubmen, who reported these exploits of their fellow-townsmen to the Convention,—“If Providence had not watched over their preservation, these young men must all have died, for they were in a violent perspiration from the rapidity of their march, and when, after making the longest and most exact search, they came out of those dark cold caverns, they were almost frozen, and could hardly speak!” As neither dogs nor men could find anybody in the caves, Lagarde led his detachment into the village, and surrounded all the suspected houses. They searched several of the houses very minutely; they even searched old Guadet's barn, and they were going away without having made any discovery, when Marcon (the master of the dogs) detected a double wall at one end of the barn. They could not discover any door or entrance of any kind to the narrow chamber or space between the two walls. Some of the nimblest got to the roof of the barn and commenced untiling it at the hollow end. The click of a pistol that missed fire was now heard. The patriots, on the barn-top, cried out "Here they are!"—and in the next instant Guadet and Salles cried out themselves that they were indeed there and ready to surrender. "They were instantly seized," says the report, "together with all the people of the house that might be able to give explanations: the whole lot of them (le tout) was carried off to Bordeaux, where Guadet and Salles were expedited the next day." From the guillotine scaffold Salles, and the more eloquent Guadet, attempted to address the people; but a Bordeaux Santerre cried "Tambours!" and their voices were drowned by a loud drumming. The reports of the discovery and execution of these two Girondists did not officially reach the Convention, or the committee of Salut Public, to which such matters were generally addressed, until the 28th of June. Dumas (Robespierre's Dumas), however, announced the facts in the Jacobin Club at Paris on the night of the 24th of June, and, little thinking how very soon he would be seized and guillotined himself, he spoke of their fate with much glee. "They have at last," said he, "paid with their heads for their crimes against the republic. They were found in Father Guadet's barn. Salles was busied in writing a comedy, the principal characters of which were the members of the committee of Salut Public, who were treated as it is easy to guess. Salles little thought that it was to end in a tragedy in which he was to figure himself!"† But Salles and Guadet did not figure alone in that frightful tragedy: Guadet's father, brother, aunt, were brought before the revolutionary commission, condemned as accomplices, and executed on the same scaffold.‡

† We can hardly conceive that the English writers who have ventured to bestow such unqualified praise on Louvet's and Madame Roland's Mémoires can have read the books either in the original language or in any correct or complete translation. There are passages in both these works which no Englishman would have the hardihood to translate and publish. In some respects we may be too cynical: but, if our over-prudishness can only preserve us from such French filth, long may it exist among us! Louvet, like nearly all of them, looked to suicide as a dernier resort. He always carried a dose of poison about him; and he tells a story about how he concealed that poison, and how he lost and found it, which is unutterably disgusting.

A few days after the execution of Guadet and Salles at Bordeaux, as some Jacobin volunteers were passing a corn-field, half a league from Castillon, in the district of Libourne, and only a short distance from the caverns of Saint-Emilion, they heard the report of a pistol, and saw two men running into a thicket. They did not attempt to follow the fugitives; but they proceeded to the spot whence the report of the pistol had proceeded, and there found a tall stout man weltering in his blood. They lifted him up and carried him into Castillon. Lagarde, who had been commander-in-chief of the late expedition to the caves and the village of Saint-Emilion, came presently to examine the dying man. Finding his linen marked with the letter B, Lagarde asked if he was not Buzot? He was past speaking, but he signified a negative by a shake of the head. "Then you will be Barbaroux," said Lagarde. The dying man noded an affirmative—and the handsome Barbaroux it was, bleeding from the mouth, distorted, ghastly, horrible to look upon, and, in a few minutes more, dead. The Jacobins concluded that the two men who had been seen flying into the thicket must be Buzot and Pétion, and that the hapless three had all been driven out together from some house or barn in the neighbourhood in consequence of the alarm spread by the finding of Guadet and Salles, and the carrying off Guadet's family to prison. This was really the case; and Barbaroux, in a fit of despair, or at sight of the volunteers in the corn-field, and in the impression that he and his friends were surrounded, had shot himself, having always declared that the Jacobins should never have him alive. They discovered and arrested a woman who had been in the habit of buying and carrying provisions to the proscribed men, and who had some letters in her house which she confessed were written by Pétion and Buzot. "We shall soon catch these two," said Lagarde, "for the country is all on foot, and it is impossible for them to escape." Early in the month of July, or about a week or ten days after the death of Barbaroux, the bodies of Buzot and Pétion were found not far from Saint-Emilion—that fatal neighbourhood where they all seem to have been spell-bound and bewitched, or all of them except Louvet. It was not ascertained whether they had committed suicide by poison or by other means, or whether they had perished of hunger, for their bodies were half devoured by animals, what remained of them was in a rapid process of decomposition, and to the Jacobins who found them it was quite enough to know that they were dead, that the bodies were really those of the ex-mayor of Paris and the great Girondist leader. The Jacobins of Castillon, or, as they signed themselves, "the Sansculottes, composing the Popular and Republican Society of Castillon," wrote instantly a jubilant letter to the citizen representatives in the Convention. These moral and devout men said: "The punishment which the law reserved for them was too mild, and so it pleased the Divine justice to prepare a punishment better suited to their crimes. Their hideous corpses were found half-eaten by worms, their scattered members had become the prey of hungry dogs, their sanguinary hearts the food of ferocious wolves. Such has been the horrible end of lives still more horrible! People! contemplate this frightful spectacle, this terrible monument of vengeance." This letter was read in the Convention on the 7th of July (1794); on the 28th of the same month, Robespierre was no more, and the Reign of Terror was at an end: counting from their first flight from Paris, these Girondists had struggled, for more than twelve long months, through dangers and horrors uncountable and unutterable, to perish miserably at last so near a time which would have brought safety and more than safety to them all. Guadet, Salles, Barbaroux, Pétion, Buzot, had always calculated that the reign of the Mountain could not last long, but must come to some sudden termination—yet thus they all perished on the eve of the event! Others besides the sansculottes of Castillon, and from reasons very different from theirs, might conclude that a Divine vengeance pursued them. But their disastrous story ought, nevertheless, not to be read without a tear. Seldom has destruction been so immediate and complete. Rebecqui, the friend of Barbaroux, drowned himself in the harbour of Marseilles. Condorcet, after lying concealed for eight months in the house of a female friend, sought safety elsewhere when a decree of the Convention made it a capital crime to harbour any outlaw. He wandered in wretched attire, like an outcast serving-man, about the country round Paris, hiding, it is said, and lodging very generally in the abandoned stone-quarries with which the neighbourhood abounds. Driven by hunger, he one day entered a cabaret, or an obscure inn, in the village of Clamart. His ravenous appetite, his long beard, his anxious countenance, excited the suspicions of a patriot who was in the house, and who left off drinking his sour wine to seize and carry him before the revolutionary committee of the village. The philosophe said his name was Simon—his condition that of a valet out of place. But, finding a Horace in his pocket, with marginal notes in Latin, written with a pencil, the committee concluded that he must be rather one of the ci-devans who had kept valets; and they sent him off, on foot, weary and lame as he was, under a patriot escort, to the prison of Bourg-la-Reine. On the morrow (the 28th of March, 1794), when the gaoler opened his door to give him some bread and water, he found him lying dead in his cell. It was known that he always carried poison about him. Of the whole Girondist party, only Louvet, Kervelegan, Lanjuinais, Henri Larivière, Lesage, and La Réveillère-Lépaux survived the Reign of Terror.*

On quitting Guadet and Salles in that fatal Saint-Emilion district, Louvet struck boldly along the high road which led to Paris. He stopped at the poorest inns or huts, mixed with none but the veriest sansculottes, praised Marat and the whole Mountain, and cursed and swore like a true republican soldier coming from the bloody wars in the Vendée. As this was the part he was obliged to perform all the way from the Garonne to the Seine, we may estimate the absurdity of those who have attempted to maintain that out of Paris and a few great towns Robespierre had no party. At the close of 1793, when Louvet made this journey, Robespierre's government was evidently the most popular of any that had existed in France during the last half-century; his cruelties excited no disgust or moral revulsion of any kind among the great body of the people—a people all in arms,

* Louvet turned bookseller and publisher, and, aided by his Lodoviska, kept shop in the Palais-Royal. He did not long enjoy this tranquil life, dying in August, 1797. He had, however, recovered his seat in the Convention, and became also a member of the next legislative body, the Chamber of Five Hundred.

who might have prevented them at any moment they chose. For a considerable part of the journey Louvet counts his day's marches by the news he receives at one place after the other of executions and deaths—of deaths the most agonizing, and, in many cases, attended by the most revolting circumstances, as personal spite, private interest, treachery of friends—and yet the people read these things in the newspapers, and talked them over, on the road and in chimney-corners, without any emotion of the tender or generous sort. He tells us of espionage, of a hundred livres being offered for any information or denunciation, of the vigilance exercised by the municipalities and the national guards; but nearly everything he says goes to prove that the inferior burghers and common people, who now exclusively and solely constituted the municipal bodies, and filled the ranks of the militia (scarcely a shadow of the respectabilities being now left anywhere), had a spontaneous and ardent zeal for the system of government which Marat had preached, and which Robespierre and his colleagues were practising. The revolution had conferred upon them many imaginary and some very real and substantial benefits—immediately and substantially advantageous, whatever might be the remote effects of the dividing and subdividing system from which they took their rise. The feudal claims and oppressions were all swept away; tithes were abolished, and, if worship and religion were abolished with them, it signified little to the majority, who had no religious belief; the oppressive and partial imposts of the taille and the corvée were set aside for ever, and the horrible game-laws of the ancient régime, according to which the king might vest the game of a whole district in whatsoever nobleman he chose so to honour, conferring a sort of right of free-warren over the lands of others, were no more. Previously to 1789 the nobility and clergy paid no fixed taxes, and held the greater part of the land; but now all classes were to pay alike in exact proportion to their means, and the landed-property, by the processes of emigration, confiscation, guillotining, forfeiture, and national sales for assignats, was sliding all into the hands of the common people. Nearly every farmer was becoming the owner of his farm, nearly every peasant the proprietor of the cottage or hut he inhabited, and of the patch of ground in its rear. The Terror was not made for them, or, if for them, then for their advantage and gratification;—advantage, inasmuch as it lightened their burthens by confiscating the property of the condemned, and throwing it into the revolutionary market; gratification, inasmuch as it brought down those above them to their own level, or beneath it, and, however little they might understand or care about real liberty, they had an undoubted passion for equality. The guillotine had not yet begun to molest them, and, as soon as it did begin to evince an appetite for sansculottic heads, it was stopped and thrown into the dark abyss, and Robespierre and Saint-Just and all the ministers of the Reign of Terror, along with it. In all the great central departments, in the huge trunk and mighty heart of France, the revolution was at this time excessively popular, and not a whit the less so on account of the cruelties and other crimes by which it was attended in all its stages, and in its every step. In some of the remoter districts, both south and north, both east and west, there were, indisputably, even among the common people, many who thought its advantages dearly purchased by blood and sin and the sacrifice of the throne and altar; but everywhere these many were, after all, but a minority, except only in the Vendée. There, and in nearly all the western coast of France, from the river Vendée, which falls into the Bay of Biscay not far from La Rochelle and the island of Oleron, to the left bank of the Loire, the people, and all classes of the gentry, nobility and clergy were, and had been from the beginning, unanimous in their dislike to the great political changes. Beyond the Loire, in Britany, and behind the river Vendée, there was a somewhat less decided majority who shared in this feeling, and, as the insurrection and war spread in both directions, parting from the Vendée, it was all called the Vendean war, the name, in a military, and political sense, being applied to great tracts of country which, geographically, it did not include.

We have already mentioned the enthusiastic attachment of the Vendean peasantry to their church and their priests: their attachment to their seigneurs or nobles was almost equally warm, and was produced and maintained by most powerful and direct causes. The seigneurs lived among them like fathers in the midst of great families, or as our Highland chieftains of old lived among their clans, sporting and hunting with them, sharing in all their amusements and some of their labours; leaving the doors of their châteaux always open to them, and the banquet-table in the hall spread for them on all festive occasions. On holidays the peasantry danced in the courts of the châteaux, and the ladies and the young people of the family generally joined them. The seigneurs were their own stewards, treating directly with their tenantry, going about their farms, sharing in their losses and gains, attending at their weddings and christenings, and drinking out of the same cup with the other guests. Pride and oppression were but little known, and there was a practical equality and freedom of social intercourse between man and man, which had been for long ages found quite compatible with a respect for rank and high name and ancient descent. When the wild boar, or the stag, or the wolf was to be hunted, the curé gave notice in the parish church, and the country turned out at the time and place appointed, every man with his gun; and this practice served their turn very effectually when those worst of wolves, the troops of the Convention, fell upon them. If the seigneurs had been wealthy, they might have been allured, like the nobility of the rest of France, to the capital; but their properties in general were but small, and allowed only of a short occasional visit to Paris. These properties were divided into small farms which rarely changed hands, but passed from father to son. The annual rent of one of these farms rarely exceeded 25*l.* of our money; and the proprietor of twenty or thirty of such small farms was considered a very great seigneur indeed, the majority of them not possessing more, on an average, than eight or ten. The land was almost entirely devoted to pasture and the breeding and rearing of cattle; and the profits were usually divided in certain fixed proportions between the landlord and tenant, or vassal, the latter paying, besides, some trifling feudal dues, either in kind or in personal service, but more commonly in the latter. Litigation was scarcely known among them; they had a proverb very fatal to one of the learned professions—in the list of Christian saints and martyrs there was not one that had been a lawyer—and thus the not very complicated disputes which arose were universally referred to arbitration. Shut out from the rest of the world, strongly attached to their old habits, and having but few towns, and those small and far apart, the Vendéans were considered as backward in civilization, but they were contented and happy as they were, and it may be doubted whether their ignorance was not as good a thing as the superficial civilization spread most thinly over the other provinces, and coated and varnished with the new philosophy. When men speak or write of the high civilization of France, and marvel how it could go hand in hand with such barbarous deeds, they seem to forget how little of real civilization existed out of Paris, and how naturally the popular instruction and philosophy which had been given in a crude form to the people led to the deeds that were committed. The Vendean priests are allowed even by their enemies to have been, in the vast majority of cases, men of an exemplary life and of a patriarchal purity and simplicity of manners. If the farmer or the poorest peasant was sick, the curé was sure to be at his bedside, acting in the double capacity of doctor and priest: the curés were the chief arbiters in all their disputes, were the consolers of their misfortunes, the partners of their joys and festivities; and, however diluted by hagiologies and martyrologies, and legends and miracles, the doctrines they taught, and the little books they distributed to the few that could read them, cherished a higher hope and nourished a purer morality than any that could be derived from the writings that were solely read in the more civilized parts of the kingdom. There remains to be mentioned what was perhaps the most powerful of all the causes that rendered the Vendéans the men they were, and made the great and palpable difference between them and their neighbours and fellow-subjects; and this was the difference of blood, race, or origin. The Vendéans, whatever they were, were not an almost unmixed Celtic race, like the mass of the French population, and at the same time there was little or no fusion of the better blood of the Franks in them. They have been considered as descended from the mixed races of the Huns, Vandals, and Pictones, or Pictavi, who conquered these western coasts of France at the breaking up of the Roman empire. In form and feature they differ widely from their neighbours; and in another capital particular the difference is strongly marked—instead of loquacity, they are noted for their taciturnity. Their prevailing vice, too (they are said scarcely to have had any other), was not, speaking of the nation at large, a French vice, for it was a love of drink and of long carousals at certain seasons of the year. When roused they were hot and passionate; when driven to despair and made frantic by the barbarities committed on their women and children, they became ferocious; but they (the peasantry) had none of that horrible mixture of levity and cruelty which distinguished the inhabitants of nearly all the rest of France. Long years of the most bloody and devastating war that was ever waged in modern Europe, seem to prove their exemption from this last characteristic, as also to establish the fact that they were as brave as any of the French, and far more persevering. When the missionaries and apostles of the new doctrines came among these primitive people, they found, to their astonishment, that their eloquence and arguments, which had been so efficacious with the common people everywhere else, were quite thrown away; they found that the Vendéans preferred remaining as they were, with their seigneurs and their curés, and the brilliant tradition of a distant king, to grasping at the benefits held forth on that great bait-hook the Declaration of the Rights of Man. The Vendéans were free enough and equal enough already. When the decrees of the revolutionary legislature sitting at Paris prohibited their paying the feudal dues to their seigneurs, they paid them all the same, vowing that they must do as their fathers had done before them; and they kept paying the dues when the Convention made such payment a capital crime. When the Vendéans were bid choose mayors, they everywhere elected their seigneurs; and, when the national guards were formed, they would have none but their seigneurs to command them. Though attached to the tradition of royalty, the king was certainly the last object they considered; and if they afterwards figured as enthusiastic royalists, it was rather because their seigneurs and priests were of that party, than on account of any very decided feeling of their own. They were first induced to take up arms by the decree of the Legislative Assembly, which exacted the civil oath from all priests, and by the severity with which it was attempted to carry that decree into execution. Their curés, who had almost all been born and bred among them, who spoke their curious and difficult dialect as their mother tongue, and who were endeared to them by a thousand other circumstances, were driven away or persecuted, and new men (novi homines, in more respects than one), constitutional priests who had sworn to nation, law, and king, but who were suspected of scarcely believing in a God, were thrust into their places. But these intruders occupied empty churches, and they were shunned by their parishioners as if the plague were upon them. In a parish containing 400 inhabitants, one of these new curés could not obtain fire to light the church tapers. Like the Cameronians of Scotland, the people forsook all their churches, and gathered on the hill sides and in the fields. There they heard mass and prayers from their old curés; and, as these meetings were liable to interruption, they always carried their muskets and staves and such other arms as they had with them. But in many places they soon drove away the intruders, and reinstated the former incumbents; while in the many more secluded and impracticable parts of the country neither the Legislative Assembly nor its successor the Convention had been able to execute the decrees. Several insurrections took place previously to the 10th of August, 1792. After a short harangue in the patois of the country, delivered outside of one of the churches, a whole parish flew to arms to rescue, as they said, their holy religion and their good priests; and in a very short time more than forty parishes joined them. Some national guards, mixed with gendarmes and other regular troops, marched from the neighbouring departments against these insurgents, and, as they were as yet without commanders and without a plan, easily defeated them, and killed about a hundred in the field. Not satisfied with this execution, the republicans proceeded to wreak their vengeance on all the prisoners they could take. The obstinacy or constancy of the vanquished was as great as the cruelty of the victors: though [offered life and free pardon if they would only join in the cry of that day, Vive la Nation! there were but very few who would accept of life upon these terms. The greater number crossed themselves, fell on their knees in prayer to Heaven, and braved all that man could do to them. They were pitilessly massacred; and even at this stage of the revolution, or long before the Reign of Terror and the Montagnards began, their wives and children were in many instances butchered with them, and their bleeding members or fragments of their bodies were carried in triumph by the constitutionalists upon the points of their bayonets or on the heads of their pikes. After the murderous affair of the 10th of August, the Marquis de Lescure, and another young Vendean nobleman, Count Charles d'Autichamp, who had both served in the army of Louis XVI., and who had narrowly escaped being massacred at the Tuileries with the Swiss, returned to their native province, and took up their abode at Clisson, in a house belonging to Lescure. This house soon became the asylum or rendezvous of many other seigneurs, among whom was Lescure's cousin, Count Henri de la Roche-Jaquelein, a gallant young man, then only in the twenty-first year of his age. These nobles, who were all devoted loyalists, hoped that some timely effort would be made to rescue Louis from his prison, and they kept themselves in readiness to act upon any summons; but no summons ever reached them, and after the execution of the king they seem to have lost all hope, and to have resigned themselves to the common fate which overhung all Frenchmen of their condition. Some of them were actually arrested and in prison at Bressuire, when the Convention, in the month of March of the present year 1793, by calling for a conscription of 300,000 men, drove all the peasantry of the country into an open and connected insurrection, the young men everywhere refusing to enrol themselves in the service of a government which had persecuted their seigneurs and their priests. These insurgents invited all the priests and nobles to make common cause with them; and absolutely compelled many who were timid or despondent to take up arms and put themselves at their head. The civil war then assumed a royalist character; but the struggle was begun not so much in consequence of any preconcerted scheme or effort of the loyal nobility, as in consequence of a spontaneous movement of the common people. It commenced at various points almost at the same moment, or on the day appointed for drawing lots for the conscription. At Saint-Florent, close upon the bank of the Loire, the republican commandant brought out a piece of artillery to intimidate the young men who refused to draw, and even fired it upon them; but the young men rushed upon the gun, got possession of it, put the commandant and his gendarmes to flight, burned all his lists and papers, and passed the rest of the day in joviality. The most respectable and considerate peasant in that district was Jacques Cathelineau, a wool-dealer and waggoner, who was well aware of the terrible vengeance which the republicans would attempt to take for the insult offered to their commandant. Cathelineau called the villagers about him, told them what they had to expect, and advised them to take up arms and anticipate the republicans by proceeding to immediate action. The tocsin was rung in the parish church, and repeated by a church or two within hearing; about a hundred men collected presently, and, putting himself at the head of them, Cathelineau marched to attack a party of about eighty republicans, who were posted at Jallars with a piece of artillery. On his road he was joined by some more peasants, capital marksmen all, for the country abounded with game, and they had been accustomed to shoot it with their seigneurs and without them, for there were no game-laws in the Vendée; but many of these bold fellows had no guns of their own, and went to the attack with nothing in their hands but clubs or staves. Armed as they were, they beat the republicans and captured their gun. This, the first piece of artillery they possessed, they named "The Missionary." On the next day Cathelineau, with an increased force, drove 200 republicans out of Chemillé, and took three pieces of artillery. In another district a young man, who killed a gendarme who was attempting to arrest him, ran to his parish church, sounded the tocsin, and collected another band. A third band was raised by Nicolas Stofflet, a man of German descent, who had been sixteen years a soldier, and who was now living as chasseur or huntsman to the Marquis de Maulevrier. Both these bands joined Cathelineau, who thereupon marched upon Chollet, the most important town in that part of the country, and garrisoned by 500 republicans. Victory still sat upon the crest of the wool-dealer; he took Chollet, killed a good many of his enemies, and possessed himself of many stands of arms, which were much wanted, together with a considerable quantity of ammunition and some money. After these successes the insurgents separated, and returned to their homes to keep Easter with the usual solemnity and festivity. Before they took the field again they invited, and more than half forced, M. d'Elbée and M. Artus de Bonchamp to put themselves at their head to fight in the cause of their God and king. Both these gentlemen had served in the army before the revolution with some distinction, and Bonchamp's military talents were of no common order. In another direction the odious conscription had already produced, or very soon did produce, similar risings of the people. A barber, who bore the ancient and aristocratic name of Gaston, killed a republican officer, put on his uniform, headed a band of young men, stormed Challans and Machecoul, and committed a terrible slaughter on the republicans in retaliation for the cruelties they had perpetrated at Painbeuf, Pornic, and other places. The name of the barber, however, soon disappears from the history of this war, he having been killed by a republican bullet or bayonet. The insurgents in these parts then called upon M. Charette de la Conterrie to take the command. Charette, descended from a noble family in Brittany, had served for six years in the French navy, but, having married a rich widow, he had settled upon her estate in the neighbourhood of Machecoul. It seems agreed on all hands that, though a determined royalist and devout Catholic, he required something very like compulsion to induce him to accept the command or embark in the desperate war. He was, or he had been, notwithstanding his devotion, an effeminate, self-indulging, dissolute man; but he knew the country well, and the country-people had a high and not mistaken notion of his sagacity, ability, and bravery. From the time he took the command the insurgents in these parts became vindictive and cruel. It is said that, instead of checking these evil passions, he encouraged them, in order that they should feel the impossibility of ever treating with the republicans or capitulating with the Convention. The republican general Quétineau had now seized M. de Lescure, with several of his friends and inmates, at Clisson, and had conducted them as prisoners to Bressuire; but Lescure's cousin, Henri de la Roche-Jaquelein, had escaped to his own estate near Châtillon, and all the neighbouring parishes were flying to the white banner of the Bourbons which he had raised. By a rapid movement the young Henri not only drove Quétineau from Bressuire, but also compelled him to liberate Lescure and the other gentlemen he had arrested. Then Lescure for the first time put himself at the head of one of the insurgent bodies, and marched with his cousin, de la Roche-Jaquelein, d'Elbée, Bonchamps, Cathelineau, and Stofflet in the direction of Thouars, into which town Quétineau had thrown himself. The forces united under all these commanders amounted to 25,000 or 30,000 men; and between them and Charette, who soon collected from 15,000 to 20,000 men, there was another body, in the very centre of the almost impenetrable country called the Bocage, under the command of M. de Royrand, a brave old seigneur and knight of Saint Louis, who had already obtained several important advantages over the republicans. The forces thus enumerated could not be kept in the field for any length of time, but for a defensive war they could always be collected again in a very few hours. Quétineau attempted to defend the passage of the river Thoué, which almost surrounds Thouars, but he was beaten back into the town, and there reduced almost immediately to the hard necessity of surrendering. Here the Vendéans were generous, mild, and merciful, destroying nothing but the tree of liberty which the republicans had set up in the town, and the registers and papers of the administrations, against which the peasantry always showed a terrible animosity. The central administration of the Lower Loire sent a circular letter to the adjoining departments, calling upon all republicans to hasten to their succour, as the country was in flames, and the insurrection universal and terrible—as the tocsin was sounding in all directions, and the republican cause everywhere falling before the fury of these demons of royalists. The Convention passed the most tremendous decrees, and hurried off such troops as they could spare; but detachment after detachment, army after army, was beaten, or was brought to a pause by the natural difficulties of the country. The Bocage, which included about seven-ninths of the Vendean country, consists of low hills and narrow valleys, the valleys being traversed by innumerable brooks flowing in different directions, some towards the Loire, some more directly towards the sea. Along the Sèvre towards Nantes the country is bold and wild; but generally the hills are not lofty, nor are the woods to be called forests. Hills, however, there are everywhere, and the whole country, as its name (Bocage) denotes, is thickly dotted with trees and underwood, woods and groves. The inclosures, like the farms, are small, and always surrounded with quick hedges, in which trees grow thickly. These very strong hedges exist everywhere; if the republicans cut their way through one, it was only to find dozens beyond it. Every estate, great or small, was surrounded by a principal hedge, and then divided and subdivided by other hedges, by deep ditches, or by natural rivulets; every field had its enclosure, and the fields communicated with one another only by means of small wickets made of the same materials as the hedges, and covered and concealed by leaves and briars. The inhabitants of the country alone could discover these openings, called échaliers; and, if pursued, they could raise a wicket and replace it so as to render the spot where they passed imperceptible to their pursuers. Only one great road, that leading from Nantes to La Rochelle, then traversed the country; the other roads were cross-roads of the worst description—narrow passes sunk deep in a soft soil, between high hedges and the hedge-trees which sometimes met overhead, and, where they were thickest, shut out the sun. Many of these passes served both for roads and for the beds of brooks, or as water-courses in the seasons of heavy rains. One of these ways was like another; at the end of every field, or at least at the end of every estate, there was a cross-road, and the inhabitants themselves were bewildered in this endless labyrinth if they went a few miles from their own homes without a friendly guide. On the southern border of the Bocage is the slip of country called the Plain, where the brooks collect and form rivers not easy to pass; and to the west, between the Bocage and the sea, is the Marais, or Marsh, intersected by innumerable ditches and canals. In this last direction there also lies, close in to the coast, the island of Noirmoutier, which the insurgents under Charette seized, and occupied for many months.*

A veteran of the French army, who had served the republic in the war of the Vendée in 1793 and 1794, and who has since served Louis Philippe in the same country in 1831 and 1832, has written or dictated an excellent account of the manner in which the Vendéans made war and availed themselves of the advantages their country presented:—"The Vendéans foiled every strategic calculation of the military art. . . . As for the army, which you expect every instant to encounter, it vanishes like smoke, for in truth it has no existence. When a day is fixed on to strike a blow, at daybreak or even during the night the tocsin is sounded in the village designated as the point of union. The neighbouring villages reply in the same manner, and the villagers quit their cottages, if it be in the night, or their ploughs if it be in the day, throwing upon their shoulder the gun which they scarcely ever quit. Having stuffed their belt with cartridges, they tie their handkerchief round a broad-brimmed hat which shades their sun-burnt countenance; stop at their church to utter a short prayer; then, inspired with a two-fold faith in God and in the justice of their cause, they wend their way from all parts of the country to the common centre. Their chiefs soon arrive, who acquaint them with the cause of their being assembled; and, if the object be to attack some patriot column, these chiefs state the road which the column will pursue, and the hour it will pass. Then, when this information is well understood by all, the chief in command gives them the plan of the battle in the following words, "Eparpillez vous, mes gars!—Scatter yourselves, my fine fellows!" Immediately each breaks, not from the ranks, but from the group, marches off his own way, proceeds onward with precaution and in silence, and in a short time every tree, every bush, every tuft of furze bordering either side of the high road, conceals a peasant with a gun in one hand and supporting himself with the other, crouched like a wild beast, without motion and scarcely breathing. Meanwhile, the patriot column, uneasy at the thought of some unknown danger, advances towards the defile, preceded by scouts, who pass without seeing, touch without feeling, and are allowed to go by scathless. But the moment the detachment is in the middle of the pass, jammed in between two sloping banks, as if it were in an immense rut, and unable to deploy either to the right or to the left, a cry, sometimes an imitation of that of an owl, issues from one extremity, and is repeated along the whole line of ambuscade. This indicates that each is at his post. A human cry succeeds, one of war and of death. In an instant each bush, each tuft of furze, glares with a sudden flash, and a shower of balls strike whole files of soldiers to the earth without their being able to perceive the enemies who slaughter them. The dead and wounded lie piled upon each other on the road; and if the column is not thrown into disorder, and the voices of the officers are heard above the firing—if, in short, the troops attempt to grapple body to body with their assailants, who strike without showing themselves—if they climb the slope like a glacis, and scale the hedge like a wall, the peasants have already had time to retire behind a second inclosure, whence the invisible firing recommences, as murderous as before. Should this second hedge be stormed in the same manner, ten, twenty, nay, a hundred similar intrenchments offer successive shelters to this destructive retreat: for the country is thus divided for the security of the children of the soil, which seems to show a maternal solicitude for their preservation, by offering them a shelter everywhere, and their enemies everywhere a grave. What we have just stated explains how the Convention, which had conquered fourteen armies commanded by kings and princes, could never pacify La Vendée, kept in a state of rebellion by a few peasants; and how Napoleon, who dictated his will to the whole of Europe, could never succeed in getting his orders executed in three of the departments of France.*

We can only briefly mention the operations of the campaign of 1793, the details of which would fill a very large volume. For some time the "Blues," as they called the republican troops, were defeated with terrible loss in every encounter. Lescure and his brave young cousin, Henri de la Roche-Jaquelein, captured the town of Fontenay, drove the two republican generals Sandos and Chalbos into Niort, taking muskets, artillery, ammunition, and other materials of war, which were greatly needed by the insurgents. Nearly at the same time Charette drove the republican general Boulard before him. Berruyer, the commander-in-chief of the whole country, was recalled by the Convention, and replaced by Biron; but Biron was as unsuccessful as his predecessor, and found himself still more embarrassed by the arrogant, insolent, and, for the most part, ignorant commissioners and political agents dispatched to the theatre of the war by the Convention and the Jacobin Club. Some of Biron's columns stopped short and refused to enter the labyrinths which had already been the graves of so many of their comrades. His generals of division, Coustard and Berthier, were both beaten with terrible loss, and were obliged to abandon the town of Saumur and a fortified camp, and to retire to Angers. In some of these affairs the Vendéans, now well armed, and furnished with artillery which they had taken from the enemy, fought admirably in the open field: they were well commanded, some of their chiefs, and especially la Roche-Jaquelein and Cathelineau the wool-dealer, abounding in resources and military genius. Many of the peasantry had refused to cross the Loire or to go beyond the limits of their own country; many were compelled to return home to attend to the harvest and to their cattle; but still, when "the Royal and Catholic army" quitted Saumur and marched down the right bank of the Loire to lay siege to the important city of Nantes, it was said to be nearly 30,000 strong. The chief command of it was now given to Cathelineau. The republicans, who had abandoned Angers at their approach, gathered in great strength within the walls of Nantes, where there was a strong Girondist party, but apparently no royalist party, or one so weak and timid that it ventured to do nothing. Charette came up to the left bank of the Loire with his insurgents, and on the 29th of June a bold attempt was made to storm Nantes, Charette attacking by the bridge which crosses the Loire, and Cathelineau falling on from the other side of the river. These united attacks lasted altogether for eighteen hours. Cathelineau had got well advanced into one of the faubourgs, when he fell mortally wounded. His people, his friends, carried off his body on their shoulders, and immediately after they all rushed to boats and rafts, crossed the Loire, and retreated towards the interior of the Bocage. Westermann, who was detached to pursue them, could not follow far, but wherever he penetrated he set fire to the villages and châteaux, and massacred all he could find, men, women, and children, even as the Convention had decreed and ordered. But Westermann had scarcely done writing his boasting, extravagant dispatches to Paris ere he was surprised, surrounded, and thoroughly beaten by avenging bands, who cut his infantry to pieces, took all his artillery and ammunition, and let nothing escape except himself and some 300 horse. The gentleness of the Vendéans had now given place to fury, and on the spots where the republicans had butchered their friends, wives, and children, and burned their homes and their cattle in their stalls, they massacred the Blues in heaps, giving hardly any quarter. Another attempt made by the republicans to penetrate into the Bocage by a route different from that which Westermann had followed was scarcely more successful, for, although they gained an unprofitable victory, they were defeated three days after, near Vihiers, and with terrific loss. The troops never rallied until they reached Chinon, fifteen leagues off; many of them did not think themselves safe until they got back to Paris; and three days after the battle only 4000 men could be collected out of an army of 10,000 or 12,000. Brewer Santerre got here that bitter taste of Vendean warfare which sent him back to the capital, where his exploits had been attended with so very little personal danger. The peasants knew he was in the battle, and they made the most desperate efforts to take him, having the intention of chaining him in an iron cage, as a punishment for his conduct to the king. The brewer owed his safety to his good horsemanship, and to his strong jumping horse, which cleared a wall said to be six feet high, but which was more probably only four. At the end of July the Vendéans were masters of every inch of their own country, and the republicans gathered round it, and, standing on the defensive, were frequently harassed, and at times made to suffer great loss. Some royalist officers from the army of Condé on the Rhine joined the brave insurgents, but they came in much smaller numbers than might have been expected. Perhaps, however, this was not to be very seriously regretted, for those who arrived did not agree very well with the Vendean chiefs; and with professional pedantry they wanted to make war according to old rules and systems, which were altogether inapplicable to the nature of the country and the condition and habits of the people. For the same reasons the co-operation of a regular army of any kind would have been of little or no avail: no such force could have acted conjointly with the insurgents; and what made the strength of one description of force would have constituted the weakness of the other. In the month of August the Vendéans, having ventured out into the open country, were defeated at Luçon by the republican general Tunçq. A few days after they fought another battle precisely on the same ground, but with still worse success; for this time they were mowed down by an immense number of field-pieces, and they lost nearly all their own artillery. Partial successes were, however, making up for these losses, when the 20,000 regular troops who had capitulated to the King of Prussia at Mayence, and a strong garrison which had capitulated to the Duke of York at Valenciennes, began to arrive on the borders of the Vendée with other columns of choice republicans. Seventy thousand troops of the line were thus collected round the devoted country, and to these were joined upwards of 100,000 republican volunteers, national guardsmen, and armed men of all descriptions; every man between eighteen and fifty, in all the districts and departments round about, being compelled to march, under pain of being thrown into prison as suspect. These columns, which merited now the name given at a later period, of "Colonnes Infernales," burned the country before them, and butchered all they could reach, not sparing so much as the infant sucking at its mother's breast. But still some of them met the fate they gave. One particular column, which had taken the name of "LES VENGEURS" (The Avengers), were destroyed to a man, the women and children of the insurgents assisting in the massacre of the wounded and prisoners. There entered calculation as well as revenge into this Vendean cruelty. At the beginning of their war, being too poor to keep and feed the many prisoners they made, they liberated them all, after exacting from them a solemn oath not to serve against them in any future campaign; but the republicans were beginning to despise all such obligations: the Convention, even during the supremacy of the virtuous Gironde, had decreed every man to be a traitor to his country that hesitated to break such an oath, and the prisoners returned to the Vendée to burn and slay, and wear the shorn ears of royalists as cockades. The loss of human life in these regions exceeded that which the republicans sustained this year in all their other wars on nearly every side of France with foreign enemies, that being possible between Frenchmen which was scarcely possible between them and the European armies—absolutely no quarter being given or received. La Roche-Jaquelein and Lescurre appear to have been the only Vendean chiefs that now attempted to moderate the fury of the peasants, and to preach mercy for the vanquished and prisoners. Charette is accused, by those who were at least as bloody as himself, of having been invariably cruel, and there is no evidence to disprove the charge. Charette was, indeed, the very man from whom cruelty might be expected. The chiefs would not allow the contracting circle to gather around them and close upon them without making an effort to break the chain. After consultation and a midnight mass, they hoisted a white flag which had been embroidered for them by the Marchioness of la Roche-Jaquelein, and which had been blessed and consecrated by the priests, and followed by 40,000 men they advanced against the army of Mayence. This army, under the command of Kléber, reputed one of the very best of the republican generals, was stationed at Chollet, behind a river: it enjoyed other local advantages: it had thrown up some intrenchments, and it was supplied with artillery in that great profusion which was now becoming so common in French armies. Nevertheless, it was attacked and defeated, in spite of all the skill and bravery of Kléber. The day after this victory the Vendéans surprised and defeated a division commanded by Beysser, wounded that general, and captured all his artillery and baggage. But Kléber had made a skilful retreat; several republican columns, scattered along a long line or portion of a circle, were concentrated on one point; the insurgents were checked in their advance, and then harassed in their retreat, and in one disastrous action Lescure was shot through the head by a musket-ball, and nearly every chief who had not been wounded before was either killed or desperately wounded. Jealousies and quarrels broke out among the survivors, and Charette some time before this had separated from the main army to pursue some plan of his own, and finally to seek shelter in Isle Noirmoutier. Though fighting for every step, and losing great numbers of men in every day's march, the republicans were getting into the very heart of the Bocage, and the peasants, with their wives and children, and their herds, were flying from the wilderness they were making. Among the royalists who had come to join them was the Prince of Talmont, seigneur of Laval and Vitré, who had formerly owned immense estates in Britany, beyond the Loire, and who still possessed great influence among the Bretons of those parts. The prince is said to have been the first to suggest that the Vendéans should abandon their homes and their country, and throw themselves into Britany; and it is further said that Bonchamp, who agreed with him, flattered himself with the hope of English assistance. Talmont marched away to occupy Varades, which commanded a passage of the Loire. The Vendean chiefs, however, determined to try the chances of another battle before they crossed the river, and wheeling round they fought Kléber once more at Chollet, the scene of their former victory. The battle, the fiercest of all that had been yet fought, lasted from noon till dark night; Bonchamp and d'Elbée were both mortally wounded; some thousands of men were destroyed, rather by the artillery than by any other arm, and then all the rest fled precipitately to the Loire, and commenced crossing that river. Eighty thousand fugitives, soldiers, women, children, the sick, the aged, the wounded, crowded on the left bank, waiting, in an agony of impatience, the passing and re-passing of a few boats and rafts, which were all the means they had of getting across into Britany. Behind them rose the smoke and flames of their burning villages, and every minute that passed was bringing the merciless republicans nearer to them. The Marchioness of La Roche-Jaquelein, who was among the fugitives with an infant of nine months old in her arms, compares the scene to the horrors of the Day of Judgment. The hapless fugitives, however, crossed the broad river with little loss, marched straight upon the town of Laval, defeated a commissioner of the Convention who tried to defend the town, and were received by the townspeople with open arms. They halted at Laval and in the neighbouring villages. Westermann, who was heading the pursuit after them, when near Laval, was met and defeated in the dark. On the next day the republican general Lechelle fell upon them with an army of 25,000 men, chiefly composed of regular troops; but by this time 6000 or 7000 Bretons had joined the royal standard, and once more the republicans were thoroughly defeated with frightful loss. No quarter was given—an entire corps who had laid down their arms were fusiladed. Young Henri de la Roche-Jaquelein was the commander-in-chief of the royalists on this occasion. Lechelle died of vexation and of fear of the guillotine; his second in command, rallying the flying republicans and endeavouring to make a stand, was defeated and slain. For a time the royalists seemed masters of the greater part of Britany, but, instead of marching against Rennes, the capital of the province, the capture of which would have greatly encouraged the Bretons, while it would have given them the means of commanding a great extent of coast, and thereby of receiving succours from England, which our government was ready to send if they could have kept their ground in Britany, after some idle talk about marching to Paris, they put themselves under the guidance of a Norman who had taken part in the feeble Girondist insurrection in the Calvados, and, quitting Britany altogether, they advanced into Normandy to lay siege to the town of Granville. The Bretons, who saw republican armies gathering fast in their own country, would not follow them into Normandy, and the Vendéans, after sustaining a repulse at Granville, fell back into Britany with the desperate intention of cutting their way through that province, re-crossing the Loire, and returning into the Bocage. Fighting or skirmishing every day, and seeing their wives and children drop and die on the road from want and fatigue, they got back again to Laval. Even now they might have struck aside to the capture of Rennes, which was full of royalists, but they preferred continuing their retreat homewards and attacking Angers, which was full of determined republicans. Being completely foiled in this attempt upon Angers, they rushed to the right bank of the Loire in search of some bridge or passage.

* The Duchess of Berri in La Vendée, &c., by General Démoncourt. The old republican General certainly did not write this interesting and well-written little book himself. It is said that he gave the materials of it (chiefly vivâ voce) to a respectable littérateur of Paris—M. Charles Dumas, if we remember right, whose relative, M. Alexandre Dumas, resided for some months in the Vendée previously to the arrival of the Duchess of Berri.

In this disorderly retreat or headlong flight, an aunt of the Marquise de la Roche-Jaquelein, the lady abbess of a monastery, fell into the hands of the republicans: she was eighty years old, but this did not prevent them from putting her to death—she was shot two days afterwards, with seven hundred other prisoners. Finding the main stream of the Loire guarded by republican columns, the fugitives fell back again, fought their way across one of its tributary streams, got to Mans, and there halted, to be attacked in a day or two by the republicans in great force. In a cold and dark December night they were driven out of Mans. Most of their women, unable to move any farther, concealed themselves in different houses in the town; but they were presently dragged forth into the market-place, and there fusiladed by the Blues, who are said to have laughed and joked as they fired upon them by platoons. The rout of Mans was very fatal, for there was a hot pursuit; and between the fire and sword of the enemy, and sickness and excess of fatigue, the road was strewed for miles with dead bodies. Those who were only dying were either dispatched by the soldiery on the spot, or carried into the towns to be guillotined or fusiladed there. The total loss was estimated at 15,000. After wandering for some days in the country between Mans and Laval, and between Laval and Châteaubriant, the fugitives made a rush to Ancenis, in the hopes of recrossing the Loire there. This was the spot where they had crossed the river two months before when flying from their homes. The enemy had lined the opposite banks with troops, and had brought a gun-boat up the river. La Roche-Jaquelein and Stofflet crossed the river and got separated from their men, who could not follow them, and who were thus left without any commander they trusted. They, however, chose one Fleuriot to be their general. This choice is said to have offended Prince Tal-mont, who now quitted the Vendéans. The prince was soon caught, was carried into Laval, and shot at the gate of his own château. Fleuriot, not knowing what course to take, hit upon the worst that could be taken. He retreated from Ancenis to Savenay, where he had the Loire on one hand, the river Vilain on the other, the sea close before him, and the reinforced republican armies behind him. The bridges over the rivers were all broken down, and all the boats and rafts were in the hands of the enemy. Surrender or capitulation was not to be thought of, as it could only lead to a worse death than that to be found in battle. They fought Kléber and his army during three successive days, the 22nd, 23rd, and 24th of December; but on Christmas-eve their column was broken, was driven into some marshes, and destroyed by grape-shot and the bayonet. Between 5000 and 6000 perished with arms in their hands; all those that were disarmed and taken prisoners were fusiladed at Savenay. Some hundreds, however, escaped the pursuit of Westermann and his cavalry, got across the Loire, and joined Charette at Isle Noirmoutier. Among these were d'Elbée, who was dangerously wounded, and many other officers who were in the same plight. The republican generals and the commissioners of the Convention wrote triumphantly to Paris that the Vendée was no more (la grande Vendée n'est plus): we shall find in the course of a few months that they were mistaken. Torrents of republican as well as royalist blood remained to be shed before the surviving Vendéans gave up the struggle.

In the mean time Carrier, en mission from the Convention, had established himself at Nantes, where he was committing atrocities which far surpassed those of Collot d'Herbois at Lyons. On entering the town he said, "We will turn all France into a cemetery rather than fail in regenerating it in our own way!" His first victims were not Vendéans, or royalists of any other kind, but republicans of the respectability order who had favoured the Girondists and betrayed some half-intention of joining them. With his guillotine en permanence he made their heads fly off by scores, by fifties, and at last by hundreds in a day. When some of the constituted authorities of the place ventured to remonstrate he called them fools, that did not know their business, and threatened to guillotine every man of them. But in his bloodiest extremities he was evidently supported and applauded by the sans-culottes of the city, without whom, indeed, he could have done but little, as there were never many troops in the town, and at times none at all except the national guards. The populace of Nantes must therefore share in the "deep damnation" of his guilt. The chief executioner, who had had work enough to kill him, died: instantly a great number of candidates for his place presented themselves: it was given by public trial to the man that could manage the guillotine and cut off heads with most dexterity, and the successful candidate was carried in triumph by the people of Nantes, and was then entertained at a public dinner, where he sat at the same table with Carrier and one or two other deputies and commissioners of the Convention. When the great reverses of the Vendéans began, when many were made prisoners, and others, trusting to promises of amnesty, went into Nantes and laid down their arms, Carrier's business and his pleasure were wonderfully increased. Leaving the guillotine for those who would have been republicans à la Gironde, he employed musketry and artillery upon the Vendéans. By his orders a grave was dug capable of holding eight thousand victims. But the united action of guillotine, cannon, musket, and bayonet was not quick enough for this representative of the regenerate French people, and still the Vendean prisoners came in in greater and greater numbers. The terrible proconsul, who had been a poor little lawyer in an obscure town among the mountains of Auvergne, is generally represented as a very ignorant fellow, but he had probably read Mezeray, and recollected that historian's account of the noyades or drownings at Paris in the fourteenth century.* Carrier, however, made improvements in the process, substituting for sacks great barges and other vessels, which were towed out to the mid-stream of the Loire loaded with victims tied hand and foot. The experiment was first tried on fifty-eight Vendean priests, who were told that they were only going across the Loire to another prison, the prisons of Nantes being so crowded. The gabare in which they embarked had a soupape, or moveable bottom, which dropped the bound priests into the river without admitting water enough to sink the craft.† A few nights after, on the 14th of December, Carrier embarked 138 persons in the same manner; and, proud of his improvement in the work of destruction, he wrote a joyous report to the Convention, ending with the words, "What a revolutionary torrent is this Loire!" The Convention made honourable mention of his infernal letter. Thus encouraged, Carrier and his numerous accomplices and coadjutors persevered in their labours and made new inventions in cruelty. Considering that time was lost in preparing the vessels à soupape, they embarked men, women, and children in a larger craft, drove them over its sides at the point of the bayonet, and kept up a fire of musketry on all that were long in sinking, or that rose to the surface of the water yet struggling for their wretched lives. After a time the cover of night was no longer considered necessary: the victims were flung into the river by broad daylight and in the most horrible manner. Women and girls were stripped stark naked in order that their beastly executioners might have their clothes: young men and young women in this state of nudity were tied together hand to hand and foot to foot, and thus the monsters facetiously called making republican marriages — mariages républicains. Fifteen thousand individuals of all ages perished at Nantes by the guillotine, the fusilades, and noyades, or by cold and hunger, or by the diseases engendered in the crowded prisons. These horrors lasted for nearly four months; for Carrier arrived early in October, and was not recalled till the end of January.* He surpassed all these proconsuls in the amount of the mischief he did, being favoured by the circumstances and feelings of the place to which he was sent; but Lebon at Arras, Maignet at Orange, Tallien at Bordeaux, and other commissioners of the Convention sent to other towns and departments, showed that they were about equally indifferent to blood and human suffering.

Before the year ended the legislators of Paris voted that there was no God, and destroyed or altered nearly everything that had any reference to Christianity. Robespierre, who would have stopped short at deism, and who would have preserved the external decencies, was overruled and intimidated by Hébert and his frowsy crew, who had either crept into the governing committees or had otherwise made themselves a power in the state. The way, however, was made plain and easy to Hébert by the preceding labours of the philosophes, by the rapidly growing unbelief of the Parisians and the majority of town-dwelling Frenchmen, by the contempt for a long time cast upon everything that was old, and by the cool and deliberate proceedings of the Convention itself. All popular journalists, patriots, and public bodies had begun dating First Year of Liberty, or First Year of the Republic; and the old calendar had come to be considered as superstitious and slavish, as an abomination in the highest degree disgraceful to free and enlightened Frenchmen. Various petitions for a change had been presented; and at length the Convention had employed the mathematicians Romme and Monge, and the astronomer Laplace, to make a new republican calendar for the new era. These three philosophers, aided by Fabre d'Eglantine, who, as a poet, furnished the names, soon finished their work, which was sanctioned by the Convention and decreed into universal use as early as the 5th of October. It divided the year into four equal seasons, and twelve equal months of thirty days each. The five odd days which remained were to be festivals, and to bear the name of Sansculottides. Thiers calls this national festival of five days at the end of the year a beautiful idea, and says that the name of Sansculottides, which belongs to the times, is not more absurd than many other names which have been adopted by different peoples. The term scarcely needs translation: Mr. Carlyle renders it into English by "Days without Breeches," and it means that, or the Days of the Breechless. One of these five days was to be consecrated to Genius, one to Industry, the third to Fine Actions, the fourth to Rewards, the fifth to Opinion. "This last fête," quotes Thiers, "thoroughly original and perfectly adapted to the French character, was to be a species of political carnival of twenty-four hours, during which it would be permitted to say and write with impunity about every public man whatsoever the people might choose or writers might imagine. It was for opinion to do justice on opinion, and for all magistrates to defend themselves by their virtues against the truths and the calumnies of that day. Nothing was greater and more moral than this idea. We must not, because a stronger destiny has swept away the thoughts and institutions of this epoch, strike with ridicule its vast and bold conceptions." In leap-years, when there would be six days to dispose of, the last of those days or Sansculottides was to be consecrated to the Revolution, and to be observed in all times with all possible solemnity. The months were divided into three decades, or portions of ten days each, and, instead of the Christian sabbath, once in seven days, the décadi, or tenth day, was to be the day of rest—which Thiers, who admires, or pretends to admire, every part of the new calendar, thinks a very excellent arrangement. The decimal method of calculation, which had been found so convenient in money and in weights and measures, was to preside over all divisions: thus, instead of our twenty-four hours to the day and sixty minutes to the hour, the day was divided into ten parts, and the tenth was to be subdivided by tens and again by tens to the minutest division of time. New dials were ordered to mark the time in this new way; but, before they were finished, it was found that the people were puzzled and perplexed by this last alteration, and therefore this part of the calendar was adjourned for a year, and the hours, minutes, and seconds were left as they were. As the republic commenced on the 21st of September, close on the vernal equinox, the republican year was made to commence at that season. The first month in the year (Fabre d'Églantine being godfather to them all) was called Vendémiaire, or the vintage month, the second Brumaire, or the foggy month, the third Frimaire, or the frosty month. These were the three autumn months. Nivose, Pluviose, and Ventose, or the snowy, rainy, and windy, were the three winter months. Germinal, Floréal, and Prairial, or the bud month, the flower month, and the meadow month, formed the spring season. Messidor, Thermidor, and Fructidor, or reaping month, heat month, and fruit month, made the summer, and completed the republican year. In more ways than one all this was calculated for the meridian of Paris, and could suit no other physical or moral climate. As for universality these enlightened philosophers had committed mistakes as gross as those of Mahomed. But the strangest thing about this republican calendar was its duration. It lasted till the 1st of January, 1806!

In the abolition of religious worships (l'abolition des cultes) Hébert was potently assisted by his official superior Chaumette, procureur of the commune, by l'Huillier, procureur of the department, by nearly all the notables of the commune and present leaders of the Cordelier club, by the majority of journalists and pamphleteers, and by the orator of mankind, Anacharsis Clootz, whose madness had not diminished in the midst of the increasing insanity of others. But the fierce atheism of these men (it was fiercer, more intolerant and persecuting, than any religious bigotry) must, like the cruelty of the pro-consuls or commissioners in the departments, have been powerless and ineffectual, or only effectual in bringing about their immediate overthrow and destruction, if there had not been in the dogmas they taught something very acceptable and captivating to the French people, or if that people had not been prepared for the reception of their doctrines. It is in vain attempting to throw the bloody crimes and monstrous follies of the revolution upon a few scapegoats; the crimes and follies were national, and the great body of the people must bear the weight of them. Another great labourer in the vineyard of atheism was Fouché, of whom we have caught a glimpse at Lyons. This man was a native of Nantes, and had there been educated for a priest. While en mission in the department of L'Allier, he took it upon himself to regulate and reform the public burying-grounds, which he and his guillotine-man were filling at a rapid rate; and, knocking down the cross and the text from Scripture which stood over the gate of a cemetery, he set up a statue of Sleep, to intimate that death was but an everlasting sleep. Fouché's device was considered pretty and poetic, and, before the Convention, or the commune of Paris, which was the great active agent in this new reformation, legislated or decreed upon the subject, the example was followed in various parts of the country. Where they could not readily obtain statues in stone or wood, the people satisfied themselves with inscriptions, painted in large black letters, such as "Death is Sleep," "Here one sleeps," "Death is an eternal sleep," &c.* Chaumette, who took in hand all the cemeteries of Paris, and entirely changed their appearance, was a sentimental atheist, who was wont to say that he should like to inhale the soul of his father in the sweet breath of flowers. Anacharsis Clootz was a political atheist, who considered religion as the only obstacle to the establishment of a universal republic and of the worship of pure reason all over the earth. In his eyes deism was as detestable as catholicism, and a God was as much out of place in a republic as a king. There was, he said, no God but the people; the God-People could not kneel before its divine self—could only worship pure and immortal Reason. Therefore, as he told the Convention (not without applauses from House and gallery), the sooner they put their God among the ci-devans, among the things which had been, but were no more, the better for France, the better for all mankind. Clootz put himself in close communication and fellowship with Gobel, the constitutional bishop of Paris and primate of the revolutionary Gallican church, whose previous antics proved him to be a performer that would take any cue or dance to any tune. While this Gobel was hesitating about the expediency and profitableness of abandoning his church, efforts were made among the constitutional clergy in other directions; and, apparently without any prompting from the central committee of atheism at Paris, one Parens, a curé in the provinces, addressed a letter to the Convention, in which he stated that he was ashamed of preaching a lie, and would preach Christianity no more, that he resigned his stipend, and only hoped that a generous nation would provide for his subsistence by giving him a pension. This letter, which further declared all priests, to be charlatans, was honourably received in the august Areopagus. Thus an invitation was given to other renegades. Cloutz, aided by Chaumette, Hébert, Momoro, a printer, Grammont, an actor, Ronsin, who had been a writer of plays, but who was now general of that Parisian army called par excellence the Revolutionary, Vincent, a clerk in the war-office, Bourdon de l'Oise, and others who had entered into the fanatic league against all religion, prevailed at last over the doubts and misgivings of Gobel, and arranged the dramatic scene in which that unprelatical primate was to resign his mitre. The letter from the curé Parens had scarcely been handed over to the secretaries for insertion in the journals, when Gobel, with his Chapter, or the greater part of it, attended by mayor Pache, the municipality, and the council of the department, went in procession to the Convention. Printer Momoro opened the business by telling the citizen president and the citizens legislators that the bishop of Paris and many other priests, conducted by Reason, were come to strip themselves, in the bosom of the Convention, of the character and attributes imposed on them by Superstition. Then Gobel, with the red nightcap of liberty on his head, his crozier in his hand, and his mitre under his arm, stepped forward and said that he was born a plebeian, and loved liberty and equality, and recognised the sovereignty of the people before the first Assembly published the Declaration of the Rights of Man; that the will of the sovereign people was to him the supreme law; that he knew no duty so sacred as that of submission to the will of the people; that it was the will of the people that had placed him in the see of Paris; that now, as the revolution was advancing to its happy end, and bringing all opinions round one political centre, he thought there could be no public and national worship but that of Liberty and Holy Equality, because the sovereign people so willed it—parce que le souverain le veut ainsi; and that, true to his principles, and submissive to the will of the people, he from this moment and for ever renounced his rank and dignity and the exercise of his functions. And, having so said, he deposited his mitre and his crozier and his episcopal ring on the table of the House. Then the vicars and canons and other priests who had followed him thither did the like, resigning their clerical titles and insignia, and declaring that henceforth they would worship only Liberty and Equality and Reason. Those of them who had come to the House with caps or bonnets or broad-brimmed hats, threw them away and put on the red worsted nightcaps. The president of the Convention (Laloi, a lawyer from Chaumont) made an ecstatic speech, and gave the accolade, or fraternal embrace, to un-bishoped Gobel. Chaumette, in equal ecstasy, accoladed the canons, vicars, &c., and led them through the hall in their red caps. The constitutional priests who were members of the Convention, determined not to be left behind by priests who were not legislators, instantly began to abjure the old creed and to take on with the new. Protestant ministers joined the Catholic priests; and Julien of Toulouse, a Calvinistic preacher, declared, for himself and his brethren, that Protestantism was not much better than Catholicism, that there ought to be no other church than the sanctuary of the laws, no other idol than Liberty, no other worship than that of the country, no other gospel than the republican constitution which the Convention had given to freed France, no other code of morals than that of equality and universal benevolence. Only Gregoire, constitutional bishop of Blois, who really appears to have united the fanaticism of religion with the fanaticism of republican politics, disturbed the unanimity of these strange churchmen by declaring that he was a Catholic by conviction and by sentiment, a priest by his own choice, and a bishop by the free election of the people. Some members of the Convention cried out that there was no wish to force any one, and Thuriot suggested that Gregoire should be left to consult his conscience, in order to discover whether superstition, which had given birth to despotism, could be useful to the progress of liberty and equality. Gregoire never recanted; but the rest of the constitutional bishops and clergy sent in their renegations, or came to present them in person. It was the 7th of November when Gobel led off the dance. On the 10th Abbé Sieyes, who had long been sitting a silent member in the Convention, ruminating some new constitution which should succeed that of Herault de Sechelles, rose to express his exceeding great joy at the triumph of reason over superstition and fanaticism, and to proclaim that no worship but that of reason and liberty and equality suited a republic, or was worthy of the French people. On the same day was celebrated the first Feast of Reason. Chaumette, on the 7th (Gobel's day), had said that Reason merited a place in the brilliant epochs of the French revolution; and he had then and there petitioned the Convention to charge its Committee of Public Instruction to give a place to the Festival of Reason in the new calendar. As neither the Convention nor its education committee attended to Chaumette's petition, he settled the matter himself with the general council of the commune, who ordered that the festival should be celebrated on the 10th in the ci-devant metropolitan church or cathedral of Notre Dame—that the bands of the national guards and other musicians should meet in that church, and play and sing patriotic hymns before the statue of Liberty, which should be raised in the place where the statue of the ci-devant Holy Virgin had formerly stood. But printer Momoro, to whom the management of the spectacle was mainly intrusted (painter David not being ordonnateur on this occasion), went far beyond the letter of this municipal order. Besides the bands and the singers, Momoro mustered all the opera girls and grisettes of Paris, turned the interior of the old Gothic cathedral into a theatre, got a danseuse of repute to figure as Liberty, and made his own wife do the part of the Goddess of Reason. Over the spot where the high altar had stood (for altars, lateral chapels, and crucifixes were already all swept away or concealed by canvas hangings), there was a lofty platform, covered and painted so as to represent a mountain, and on the summit of this mountain there was a temple dedicated to Philosophy, and surrounded by the statues and busts of the philosophers who had most contributed to bring about the revolution and this age of Reason, such as Voltaire, Diderot, &c. While the bands and chorus-singers stationed at the foot of the mountain made sweet republican music, two troops of young women (the opera girls, and grisettes, and other denizens of the Palais-Royal), thinly clad in white, crowned with oak-leaves, and carrying torches in their hands (torches of Truth), traversed the mountain, descended, and re-ascended it; then Liberty (a première danseuse of the opera) came out of the temple of Philosophy, and set herself down upon a green canvas hillock, to receive the adorations, or homages, of the republicans and republicanesses, who sung a hymn in her honour, the words by Chenier, the music by Gossec. When the hymn was over, Liberty rose from her green seat, walked back to the temple of Philosophy, paused at the threshold, cast a fond glance upon her worshippers, and disappeared within the temple, in the midst of shouts of joy and enthusiasm, and oaths of eternal fidelity to her. Thus far we follow the account which Momoro himself gave of the affair in the newspapers. The printer may possibly have exaggerated the effect produced by his own spectacle, yet it really appears that the Parisians enjoyed the sight exceedingly. Of his own wife and her doings, and her dress or undress, as the goddess of Reason, he modestly says nothing; but there are accounts of her appearance from other pens. The commune, the council of the department, and all the constituted authorities, attended this morning in Notre Dame, or now Temple of Reason, except the National Convention, which was busy in preparing decrees for the abolition of the old religion, the seizure of church utensils, &c. In consequence of the absence of the legislature, it was resolved that the performance should be repeated in the evening, when the deputies might have more leisure, and that they should be invited to the spectacle by the goddess of Reason in person, and by her orator, Chaumette, procureur of the commune. As evening approached, an immense procession, the sections of Paris and the magistrates of that city, marched to the Convention with the living statue, the flesh-and-blood goddess of Reason. They were admitted into the hall with beating of drums and flourishes of trumpets, and cries of "Long live the republic! Long live Reason! Down with fanaticism!" The goddess (Mrs. Momoro), seated on a classical chair carried on the shoulders of four tall citizens in Roman costume, wore a white dress, pure and transparent, a sky-blue mantle, a red cap of liberty; her hair flowed loosely about her neck and shoulders (which the mantle was not meant to cover), and she carried in her right hand a pike, the tip of which was not of iron, but of ebony. She was surrounded by the young women in thin white dresses (the opera girls and grisettes). The citizens who bore her halted right in front of the president's chair, and then the citizenesses in white, and the citizens in black, blue, and brown, sung a hymn to her honour. This done, Chaumette told the legislators that Fanaticism had lost his hold on men's minds; that his squinting eyes could not bear the dazzling light; that the ancient temples were now purified and regenerated; that to-day an immense people had gathered under the Gothic roofs, which for the first time had been made to echo with truth; that there the French had performed the only true worship. "Yes," he continued, "we have abandoned our inanimate idols for Reason, for this animate image, this masterpiece of nature!" He pointed to the goddess on the citizens' shoulders, and the goddess of Reason, alias Mrs. Momoro, smiled, as opera divinities smile or smirk. Chaumette then demanded that the ci-devant church of Notre Dame should be henceforward consecrated solely to the worship of Reason. Ex-capuchin Chabot put the demand into a motion, the Convention hurried to vote it: it was voted by acclamation, and the legislators were thanked with songs and kisses—with kisses from the goddess herself, whose only ungratified wish now was to see them all in the temple they had consecrated to her. And after kissing and accolading the goddess, the conscript fathers formed in processional order, followed her to Notre Dame, and joined the commune and all the magistrates in singing chorus to the hymn in her praise. "Now," said the 'Journal of Paris,' "we may safely say that we have got rid of superstition; that the republican decades have killed the Christian Sabbath!"*

Celebrations of the like kind soon followed in other churches in Paris, and in nearly all the departments. In some of the churches the installation of the goddess of Reason was accompanied by the most revolting obscenity—by feasting, drinking, smoking, carmagnole dancing in the naves, and orgies beyond the pillars and in the side chapels behind the canvas, which can be imagined, but may not be described. Under the diligent care of Hébert, Chaumette, and their crew, the new worship, which was to be solemnised on every decade, or tenth day, was nicely regulated. The mayor (Pache still held that office in Paris, and continued to hold it till the month of May, 1794), the municipal officers, the public functionaries of various orders, were the officiating priests: they read and expounded the Rights of Man, the constitutional acts, and the laws that were made by the Convention to keep the republic standing and going; and they also gave an analysis of the news from the armies, with oratorical accounts of all the brave deeds that had been done or made known between one decade and the other. In imitation of the terrible Lion's Mouth of the old Venetian republic, there was a strong-box called Truth's Mouth placed in the Temple of Reason, to receive denunciations, informations, or advice useful to the republic. Every decade the receptacle was opened, and the letters and papers found within it were read. Generally some orator pronounced what they called a moral discourse; and always the ceremonies ended with music and republican songs. Two galleries were appropriated, one to old people and one to citizenesses in the family way, the first gallery bearing the inscription, Respect à la vieillesse—the other, Respect et soins aux femmes enceintes.*

The pillage, mutilation, and desecration which had been going on in nearly all the churches ever since 1790 now became wholesale plunder and open destruction. Chaumette led the van, by demanding on the 11th of November, the day after the first festival of Reason, the demolition of the statues of saints. Hébert wanted to knock down all church towers and steeples as things contrary to the line and principles of equality. Before this most of the church bells had been seized and melted; and now there went forth a decree that no village or country-town was to keep more than one bell, which was to serve for sounding the tocsin. The sacred vessels, the reliquaries, the rich shrines, all the costly ornaments and furniture of churches, abbeys, and religious houses were seized by mobs of the people, who generally professed to carry every fraction of the property to the Convention or to the local authorities, to be offered up on the altar of the country, but who, in most cases, appear to have appropriated no small portion of the spoil to their own use and profit. Sculptures, and paintings, and carvings, beautiful and valuable as works of art, or interesting from their antiquity, were mutilated or destroyed (if of bronze or the more precious metals, they were melted); hardly anything was spared; the graves of the dead were not respected. The decree of the Convention, which ordered leaden coffins to be turned into bullets, had led to some rummaging in cemeteries and church-vaults; but now the sanctity of the grave was violated for spleen, spite, or mere sport, or in the hope of finding valuable relics, or out of a beastly fanaticism which could not tolerate the decencies of Christian interment, or the distinctions which wealth and affection, or the gratitude of sovereigns and governments, and popular communities, had made in former days between the remains—in themselves equal enough!—of different individuals. This war on tombs raged all over France; but it was nowhere else so fierce as at the abbey of Saint-Denis, the burying-place of kings, the Westminster Abbey of the kingdom. There the dead were dragged out of their tombs with shouts, with laughter, with infernal pranks, which no people but the French could have committed, and which no writer of any other nation can describe. The best and the worst of their kings were exposed to equal indignities. No distinction was made as to sex, or virtue, or valour, or even military fame: if the embalmed remains or the mouldering bones were those of an aristocrat, they were cast forth, kicked about, or handled and examined, and exhibited with an apish curiosity scarcely less disgusting than the tiger ferocity, that other element of the national character. Marshal Turenne and Laura de Sades, in very different parts of France, were subjected to the same treatment: the great warrior, who lay in Saint-Denis, near the tomb of the Constable du Guesclin, was thrown out among kings and princes, warriors, and statesmen; the fair lady whom Petrarca has immortalised lay at Avignon, near the church where the poet had first seen her; and her embalmed body was dragged out, was stripped, and exhibited in the streets with the most brutal indignities.

The long processions of the sans-culottes, with the spoils of the abbey of Saint-Denis carried in eighteen carts; the deputations to the Convention of market-women and prostitutes dressed in priests' garments; the carmagnole dances that were danced, and the frowsy songs that were sung in the hall of the legislature, and the thousand other farces that were played during this heyday of Hébertism and Atheism, must all pass without further notice. If the outraged dead—even the dead who had been but a very short time in their graves—could have opened their eyes and ears, they must have felt that they were in a new world. By this time everything seemed revolutionised and changed—dress, language, manners, names of things, places, and persons. In the niches at the corners of streets, which had once been occupied by statues or pictures of the Madonna, stood the hideous busts of Marat; the names of the streets and squares, palaces, and other public buildings, nay, of half of the towns and villages, were altered; and as for the people, they had abolished the use of Christian names, and had all become Brutuses, Catos, Mutius-Scævolas, Anaxagorases, &c. &c.

A.D. 1794. On the 21st of January, when the British parliament met, the speech from the throne and the arguments of ministers urged the necessity of continuing the war with an increase of vigour, inasmuch as the wild and destructive system of rapine, anarchy, and impiety, which the French had adopted, had displayed itself fully to the world, and made it more than ever impossible to think of treating with such an enemy. On the other side the opposition urged that the constant failures of the armies of the coalition, and the victories and triumphs of the French republicans, rendered the prosecution of the war hopeless and ruinous; and that, as we must recognise their government and negotiate with it at last, the best thing we could do would be to acknowledge it and treat with it at once, leaving the other powers of Europe to follow their own course. Amendments to the address, requesting his majesty to take the earliest opportunity of concluding peace with France, were moved in both Houses; but the failures on the continent had not yet brought about any popular discouragement, the successes of the French had not increased the number of the Foxite party, who had always predicted those successes as certain and inevitable; and in the Commons the amendment was rejected by 277 to 59, in the Lords by 97 to 12. Although sure of exhibiting their numerical weakness at every division, Fox and his friends lost no opportunity of attacking the war-measures of government. Only on the vote for augmenting the navy to 85,000 men they agreed with ministers. When it was proposed to raise the regular army to 60,000 men (far too small a force), they renewed their opposition with all their vigour or eloquence; and they were unfortunately furnished with strong facts and arguments wherewith to throw opprobrium and contempt on the way in which the war had been managed. There was, however, the usual unfairness of party—and, whatever may be said of the spirit and motives of some of the members of this opposition, or of the good services they did in many instances in checking a certain tendency to despotic measures, we believe it is now pretty generally admitted by the candid and well informed, that there never was a set of men more thoroughly imbued with the mere spirit of party, or more personally animated against a ministry. In all their proceedings their eyes seemed fixed rather upon William Pitt than upon the fate of Europe. When that minister said in one of his speeches that France had been converted into an armed nation, they laboured to show that it was to him and his policy that this conversion was owing, overlooking the facts (or hoping to make the world overlook them) that France was one great camp or drill-ground before any war with foreign powers began; that the French had declared war against all established governments whatsoever, and had, wherever they could reach them, preached insurrection and revolution to the subjects of those governments; and finally, that an armed democracy like the French, even though less addicted by temperament and old habit to war and conquest, must inevitably spread itself, and seek not merely

On the 2nd of February the minister laid before the House of Commons an estimate of the supplies necessary for the prosecution of the war. He stated that the interior strength of the kingdom, including regulars, militia, fencibles, and some volunteer corps which had been raised, amounted to about 140,000 men; and that there were 60,000 German troops in the pay of Great Britain. The total of the supply requisite for this force he calculated at 19,939,000*l.*; and among his ways and means he proposed some new taxes, and a loan of 11,000,000*l.* On this occasion he moved that the double taxation to which the Roman Catholics had been liable in times of war should be abolished; and this, with all his other propositions, was voted forthwith. On the 17th of February the Marquess of Lansdowne moved in the Lords, "That his majesty should be earnestly requested to declare, without delay, his consent to enter into a negotiation for peace with France, upon such equitable terms as would evidently tend to secure its duration; and that he would signify his determination to his allies, to the intent of putting an immediate stop to hostilities." There was little new in the debate which followed, except a lamentation from the noble marquess, that, while we and our allies were involving ourselves in a hopeless contest, Russia, left to herself, was pursuing her schemes of aggrandisement, and was daily becoming more formidable to the independence of Europe. The motion was finally negatived by 103 against 13. On the 6th of March Pitt moved for an augmentation of the militia, and for the levy of a volunteer force of horse and foot in every county, intimating that the chances of war possibly might expose the coast of Great Britain to invasion. The motion was carried, but not without vehement opposition, Fox and Mr. Grey asserting that all that we had got by the war and the coalition was the chance of being invaded. Strong objections were taken to a requisition circulated by ministers, and to a subscription entered into by country gentlemen and others for the purpose of providing arms and other necessaries for the volunteer corps. Sheridan moved, "That it was dangerous and unconstitutional for the people of this country to make any loan of money to the crown without consent of parliament." He spoke of the feeling which had led to the subscription as an infatuation, and yet said, that the list of subscribers was chiefly composed of the servants, dependents, and emissaries of the ministry. The previous question was carried by a large majority. The small minority, and more especially Sheridan, continued to palliate the massacres and atrocities committed in France; and, as they had urged in the preceding session that we might very decently and honourably negotiate with Lebrun, Brissot, and the Girondists, so they maintained that we might now negotiate with Robespierre, Hébert, and the Jacobin executive. The minister brought a bill into the House of Commons to enable French royalists and emigrants to enlist in the service of the king of Great Britain on the continent of Europe, and to employ French officers as engineers, under certain restrictions. Two amendments were offered : one by the attorney-general, to exact the oath of allegiance from such as enlisted ; the other by Sheridan, to limit the number of such French troops at any time stationed in the kingdom to 5000 ; and both were adopted by the House. Nevertheless Pitt's bill was violently opposed in its after-stages by Sheridan, Fox, and others of that party. While it was under debate, Burke made one of his passionate and splendid harangues against the nature and tendency of the whole French system, insisting that it was better to submit to any cost, sacrifice, and hazard, than to allow the lawless career of men who, under pretext of asserting the liberties of mankind, were seeking the extension of their dominions, the increase of their influence and power, the propagation and enforcement of their destructive principles. In the end, the minister's proposition was carried in the Commons by the usual majority. When the bill came to be debated in the upper House, the Marquess of Lansdowne declared that the common people of France had benefited by the revolution—which was true, and in the manner we have explained—and Lord Stanhope expressed dissatisfaction and anger at some persons of exalted rank in this country who had spoken disparagingly of the Declaration of the Rights of Man.

The subsidiary treaties concluded with some of the powers of the coalition, who were too poor to maintain the expenses of the war without English money, were criticised and condemned by the opposition in an unsparing manner ; and this censure became the more violent when parliament was informed by royal message that a large subsidy had been granted to the King of Prussia. Every ministerial motion on these subjects was, however, carried by an undiminished majority. On the 30th of May the Duke of Bedford produced a series of resolutions binding the government to terminate the war ; and on the same day Fox moved similar resolutions in the Commons. The arguments used were precisely the same as those which had been refuted by Burke in the preceding session : his grace was defeated by 113 against 12, and Fox by 208 against 55. Before this time the news of many fresh reverses and monstrous blunders on the part of the coalesced powers had reached England, but the intelligence which came at the same time of the augmented and still augmenting atrocities in France encouraged the belief that such a system could not possibly sustain itself much longer. Fresh efforts were made to get up popular petitions for a peace ; but the vast majority of the people had conceived a horror and loathing of the French republicans—in many places an extravagant fear that there were men in England capable of imitating their bloody and sacrilegious deeds—and, except among some political clubs, the members of which were at open enmity with the church or the state, or with both, no progress was made in this petitioning.

The heat of some of these political societies (a scarcely visible minority), and the panic-dread inspired in the immense majority of all classes and conditions of the nation, led to strong measures on the part of government, and to some extreme proceedings, the political wisdom of which was questioned at the time, and will perhaps remain for ever doubtful. Of the madness and perilous tendency of some of these political clubs there can indeed be little doubt, but there may be a rational difference of opinion as to their power or capability of doing mischief in England or Scotland. The heat and violence of both parties was, for very obvious reasons, greater in Scotland than in England, although some of the English societies had certainly gone to great lengths, first in corresponding with the Jacobins, and afterwards in holding them up as models to their countrymen.

Proceedings against some of these over-hot reformers had been commenced before the High Court of Justiciary sitting at Edinburgh in the beginning of 1793, the indictments charging sedition and seditious libel, but not high treason. The first person tried was one James Tytler, a chemist, residing in King's Park in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, who had written and published an inflammatory address "To the People and their Friends," and a paragraph besides, in which he asserted that all the unrepresented classes were robbed and enslaved, and recommended them to pay no more taxes until universal suffrage were established. Not appearing in court, he was outlawed, or, in Scotch legal phraseology, he was adjudged "to be an outlaw and fugitive from his majesty's laws," and ordained "to be put to his highness's horn, and all his moveable goods and gear to be escheat." His bail, two Edinburgh booksellers, were made to pay the amount of their bond and penalty, being the insignificant sum of 600 merks Scots. Three days after this (on the 8th of January, 1793) John Morton, a printer's apprentice, James Anderson and Malcolm Craig, both journeymen printers in Edinburgh, were put upon their trial, charged with sedition, for having come into the castle of Edinburgh with intention to seduce a corporal and some soldiers ; for having, in the said castle, drunk as a toast "George the Third and last, and damnation to all crowned heads ;" for having told the soldiers that their pay was much too small, and held out to them the prospect of higher pay if they would only join a certain description of men whom they styled "The Friends of the People," or a "Club for Equality and Freedom." The trial lasted three days, and ended in sentencing the three young men to nine months' imprisonment, after which they were to give security, in 1000 merks Scots each, for their good behaviour for three years.

The next trial was that of John Elder, bookseller of Edinburgh, and William Stewart, merchant in Leith, who were charged with writing and printing a seditious libel, entitled "Rights of Man Delimited, and the Origin of Government." The merchant, who had fled, was outlawed, but proceedings were dropped against the bookseller. There followed in rapid succession the trials of James Smith, gunsmith of Glasgow, and John Mennings, printer of the same town, who had got up a club called "The Sons of Liberty and Friends of Man," which was to co-operate with another society in Glasgow, called "The Friends of the People," and "with the innumerable host of reform associations in Scotland, England, and Ireland, for the glorious purpose of vindicating the native rights of man, liberty, a fair, full, free, and equal representation of all the people in parliament," &c., and who had taken for their guides "the whole works of the immortal author of the Rights of Man, Thomas Paine;" and then those of James Callender, Walter Berry, and James Robertson, booksellers of Edinburgh, for writing and publishing various libels against the constitution, &c., in one of which libels it was said that our most excellent constitution was in practice altogether a conspiracy of the rich against the poor. One or two absented themselves and were outlawed; the others were sentenced to short terms of imprisonment; and no more attention was paid to these Scots trials than to others of a like kind which had taken place in England, until proceedings were commenced against Thomas Muir, Esq., and the Rev. Thomas Fyshe Palmer. Muir, a member of the faculty of advocates—a young member, for he was only twenty-eight years old—was tried at Edinburgh on the 30th and 31st of August (1793). The general offences imputed were, the formation of political clubs holding extreme views; the expressing a constant and warm admiration of the French revolution, with joy for all the successes of the republican arms, and sorrow for their reverses; the writing or circulating pamphlets and papers of a revolutionary or ultra-democratic tendency; the corresponding with clubs of the same sort in various parts of Scotland, England, and Ireland, and the assembling a convention, or an assembly of delegates from all the societies of the friends of the people. A great meeting of this kind had actually been held at Edinburgh on the 11th of December, 1792, where Muir had been president, and the language and proceedings had rather closely resembled those of the French National Convention and Jacobin Clubs, which clubs continued to style themselves "Friends of the People." These mere titles or denominations now filled the majority of the country with horror and alarm. There was in Edinburgh a loyal association of the most intemperate and flaming kind, seemingly ready to go as far in the opposite extreme; there were similar associations and societies got up in other towns to check what were now commonly termed the Scots Jacobin Clubs, and these societies and the general sentiment heated the lawyers of the crown, who were hot and impetuous enough without this excitement and encouragement. Violence had begotten violence, and to that degree, that there was a chance of seeing the renewal of the days of Duke Lauderdale or of Judge Jeffries. In the indictment Muir was more especially charged with feloniously advising and exhorting persons to purchase and peruse seditious and wicked publications, and writings calculated to produce a spirit of disloyalty and disaffection to the king and government; with getting up public meetings in various parts of the kingdom; with advising and exhorting John Muir, sen., late hatter in Glasgow, Thomas Wilson, barber in Glasgow, and John Barclay of Calder, to read Paine's 'Rights of Man,' and to purchase the same; with distributing himself Thomas Paine's works, 'a Declaration of Rights,* a Dialogue betwixt the Governors and the Governed,† and other inflammatory publications; and with having caused to be received, read, and answered by the Convention of Delegates, "An Address from the Society of United Irishmen in Dublin to the Delegates for Promoting a Reform in Scotland," which address was described—and certainly not incorrectly—as a paper of a most inflammatory and seditious tendency, representing the Irish and Scotch nations as in a state of downright oppression, and exciting the people to rise up against the government. Muir had been brought before the sheriff-depute of the county of Edinburgh on the 2nd of January, 1793, shortly after the meeting of his Convention, and had signed a declaration; but immediately afterwards he disappeared. His trial had been fixed for the 11th of February, and time had been given him till the 25th of that month, when, on his non-appearance, the Court of Justiciary had declared him "fugitate." In the month of July he had been discovered and apprehended at Port Patrick, when there had been found upon him a copy of Paine's works, a copy of the Address from the Society of United Irishmen, and other papers held to be highly suspicious. These facts were inserted in the indictment, where it was declared that, conscious of his guilt, he had absconded from his own country; and that he had lately, in a private and clandestine manner, come back, by way of Ireland. On the trial it appeared, and vastly to the disadvantage of the prisoner, that he had been in France, as well as in Ireland, and that he had remained in France a considerable time after the declaration of war, living in friendly and intimate terms with some of the most conspicuous men of the revolution. Muir declared, and in good part proved, that he had not gone off in a secret manner; that he had publicly announced his journey in a numerous meeting of

* This 'Declaration of Rights' proceeded from a society calling themselves "The Friends of Reform in Paisley." The members were chiefly working weavers.

† This dialogue, which contained the essence of Paine's system of politics and religion, was an extract from M. Volney's 'Ruins of Empires.'

citizens at Edinburgh; that he had first gone to London, where he had appeared in public and had attended the meeting of a distinguished society, the Society of the Friends of the People; that by the advice of some friends he had proceeded to Paris some days before the execution of Louis XVI., in order to attempt to mitigate the fate of that unfortunate prince, whose death, it was thought, might afford a pretext for plunging Great Britain into war, and for denying or retarding that parliamentary reform which good men held to be necessary to our salvation;* that while in Paris he had pleaded the cause of mercy, of individual and of general humanity; that the sudden declaration of hostilities, the embargo laid on all vessels, &c., had prevented his quitting France earlier than the month of May; that he had gone to Ireland because he had found at Havre a neutral American vessel that was to touch at Belfast; that, if insurrections had happened in Ireland during his stay in that country, he had had nothing to do with them; that he had indeed associated with Mr. Hamilton Rowan, a leader of the United Irishmen, but that Rowan was a patriot and a gentleman of whose acquaintance he should ever feel proud; and, finally, that he had not returned to Scotland in a clandestine manner, but openly and with the object of demanding justice and a fair trial to wipe away the imputations which had been cast upon him. Muir, who defended himself with great ability and considerable eloquence, maintained that the societies to which he belonged had never entertained any other plan or notion than that of reforming a part of the constitution—the House of Commons—by strictly constitutional means, such as representations and petitions. The witnesses in his favour seem to have been on the whole of a more respectable kind than those produced by the prosecution against him: among them they swore that Muir had frequently moderated the too great warmth of other reformers in the clubs and meetings; that he had repeatedly declared that the monarchical part of our constitution was good, and to be preserved, and that many of the principles of Paine's book were altogether impracticable, while others were inapplicable to these countries; that he had reprobated the doctrine of equality, as it implied violation of property, and asserted that a lasting equal division of property was a chimera which never could exist; that he had said that there was no comparison to be instituted between Great Britain and France; that in France they had sought a revolution, and had brought it about, but that in Britain we wanted no revolution, but only a moderate reform; that in his addresses to the people, in their political societies, he constantly endeavoured to impress upon their minds the necessity of good order, and that, before they attempted public reformation, they should begin by reforming themselves; that he had endeavoured to promote the self-education of the people, recommending good and constitutional books, histories and works of general literature, and assisting in the formation of societies for the purchasing and reading such works. The most valuable witness, on the part of the crown, was a woman-servant that had lived in his father's house, where Muir himself usually resided. She deposed that Muir used to be much busied about reading and writing, but she could not tell the subject: that he had frequently told country-people and others that Paine's 'Rights of Man' was a very good book; that at his desire she had frequently bought copies of the said book for sundry persons; that Muir, in her hearing, had advised his hairdresser to buy a copy and keep it in his shop to enlighten the people, as it confuted Mr. Burke entirely, and as a barber's shop was a good place for reading in; that Mr. Muir had a great many books and pamphlets, and among them, 'Flower on the French Constitution,' the 'Declaration of Rights,' the 'Dialogue betwixt the Governors and the Governed,' which last he used to read to his mother, sisters, and others, saying it was very clever, and written by one Volney, one of the first wits in France; that Mr. Muir frequently read French law-books, and had a good many copies of Paine's 'Rights of Man' "up stairs;" that she recollected hearing him say, that if everybody had a vote he would be a member of parliament for Calder; that members of parliament would then have thirty or forty shillings a-day; that none would be members but honest men who would keep the constitution clean, and give new councillors to the king, such as would govern the nation with justice: that she had heard it said by him that France was the most flourishing nation in the world, since they had abolished tyranny and got a free government; but that she had also heard him say that the constitution of this country was very good, but that many abuses had crept in, which required a thorough reform—that he was for a monarchy under proper restrictions, and a parliament that knew what they were about—that a republican form of government was the best, but that the monarchy had been so long established in this country, that it would be improper to alter it; and, finally, she deposed that she herself had been sent by Mr. Muir to a grinding organist in the streets of Glasgow to desire him to play Ca Ira. The evidence for the prosecution failed completely in proving any intention on the part of the prisoner, or any society with which he was connected, of having recourse to insurrection, or riot, or any act of violence—and much less of seeking for any French assistance:—all that it established was, that Muir had proposed in the Convention the receiving and answering of the violent address of the United Irishmen; that during his stay in Paris, and even after the execution of the king, he had professed great friendship for many of the French leaders; that before and since he had expressed exultation at the trial and victories of the French republicans over the armies of the coalition, or over his majesty's allies and his majesty's own troops; that during his stay in Ireland he had given the pledge and had been admitted a member of the society of United Irishmen of Dublin; that his reformers and clubbists consisted almost entirely of weavers and mechanics, villagers, and small manufacturers; and it also seemed proved by some letters from the prisoner's father, found upon him when he was arrested at Port Patrick, that Muir had seriously thought of flying from Ireland to America, instead of returning to Scotland. Upon these points the lord-advocate and the judges dwelt at rare length, and with rare violence. Morally, Muir, with hundreds of others who were never molested, had been guilty of imprudence; and in his continued admiration of the French revolutionists he had shown himself wanting both in intellectual and moral discrimination: even legally he might be guilty of conduct not strictly justifiable in all respects, but the court and the public prosecutor maintained that his offences fell but little short of high treason. The lord-advocate called him "that unfortunate wretch at the bar," "that demon of mischief," "that pest of Scotland," who had intended to revolutionise these countries in the manner of France, who had gone to Paris in furtherance of that object; &c. The lord-justice-clerk in summing up took several things for granted, which assuredly were not proved. Not being quite bold enough to give the lie to the witnesses who had sworn that Muir had always discountenanced violent proceedings (a fact as plainly and as largely admitted by the witnesses for the prosecution as by the witnesses for the defence), he turned that very moderation against him, saying, "Mr. Muir's plan of discouraging revolt, and all sort of tumult, was certainly political; for, until everything was ripe for a general insurrection, any tumult or disorder could only tend, as he himself said, to ruin his cause: he was, in the mean time, however, evidently poisoning the minds of the common people, and preparing them for rebellion." The jury (though unanimity is not necessary in a Scots jury), "all in one voice" found the prisoner guilty of sedition or of the crimes imputed to him. It seems to have been expected by Muir and his friends that his punishment would not exceed in severity that already allotted by the same court to the printers and other persons who had been convicted under similar charges. But their lordships, after saying that they had their choice of banishment, fine, whipping, imprisonment, and transportation, agreed that the proper punishment for Muir was transportation for fourteen years! We have said that the prisoner defended himself with ability and eloquence; but in some respects his eloquence did him dis-service with the jury, for it carried him away into useless and unseasonable declamations about the virtues of the common people and the vices of the aristocracy, about the patriotism of the United Irishmen and the patriotism and virtue of reformers in general—and this at a moment when, right or wrong, the word reform, more especially in Scotland, had come to be considered as a synonyme for revolution. His friends and admirers, too, did him no good: they loudly cheered him when he finished his speech; and the court, not satisfied with reproving this irregularity, construed it into an exaggeration and proof of the prisoner's guilt, or of the perilous and disaffected state of a part of the country. The ministerial influence was indeed great and disproportionate in Scotland in those days; but it should appear that the spontaneous feeling of the majority of the people was cause enough to account for precipitate conclusions and harsh judgments in trials of this nature.

* The Scots crown lawyers endeavoured to show that Muir had gone to Paris commissioned by the English Society of the Friends of the People, but they evidently failed in proving the fact. Thomas Paine had numerous correspondents, and, as he was most anxious to prevent the execution of Louis, he very possibly suggested the sending over of some British liberal or liberals to plead the cause of mercy with the deputies of the Convention. But the idea may have occurred without any suggestion from Paine.

Palmer was not a Scotsman, but an Englishman, settled in the country. He was descended from an ancient and wealthy family in Bedfordshire. He was educated at Eton, and was afterwards entered at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he took the several degrees of B.A., A.M., and B.D., and obtained a Fellowship. He was for some time curate at Leatherhead, in Surrey. But a short time after taking his last degree at Cambridge, which was in the year 1782, when he was in his thirty-fifth year, he abandoned the Church of England and embraced the doctrines of the Unitarians. The sincerity of his conversion, attributed to the perusal and study of the controversial writings of Dr. Priestley and Mr. Lindsey, seemed to be tested by the sacrifices he made, sacrifices which included an estrangement from his family and friends. Shortly afterwards he went to Montrose, in Scotland, where a Unitarian chapel had then recently been opened by Mr. W. Christie. He resided some twenty months in this town, and then removed to Dundee to take charge of another Unitarian chapel there. He preached very frequently in some neighbouring towns where there were small Unitarian congregations; and at Forfar and in Edinburgh he delivered a series of discourses in vindication of the religious principles he had adopted. However acceptable these proceedings may have been to those who entertained the same opinions as himself, they were little likely to propitiate the rigid Calvinists of Scotland, who were indeed somewhat slow in learning the lessons of religious toleration. His theological creed alone was enough to crush him. His trial came on before the circuit court of justiciary at Perth on the 12th of September. He was simply charged with writing and publishing an 'Address to the People,' which had proceeded from the Society of the Friends of Liberty at Dundee. In his case there had been no evasion or appearance of evasion, no residence in France or in Ireland, no voting upon the extreme principles of the Society of United Irishmen; but he had been the friend or political correspondent of Muir, and on the trial of that gentleman the court had artfully endeavoured to link them or their offences together. Palmer, whose enthusiasm appears to have been, on some points, nearly allied to insanity, may very possibly have delivered from the pulpit, or in club-meetings, or in private society, extravagant, and, as they were then considered, dangerous political opinions; but on the trial this was neither proved nor attempted to be proved, the prosecution confining itself to the writing and publishing the Dundee Club Address to the People. The fact of publication was distinctly proved against him, but with the drawing up of the Address he appeared to have had little to do: one of the witnesses for the crown, George Mealmaker, a raw youth and weaver of Dundee, avowed that he himself had written the Address. It appeared that Palmer had revised it for the press, amending the spelling and the grammar; but it further appeared that in so doing he had struck out some strong passages altogether, and had softened the language of others. His counsel delicately hinted at the touch of insanity, speaking of "certain peculiarities in the character of Mr. Palmer," and of the extravagance of some pamphlets he had published to vindicate his principles as a Unitarian. He was going to read some passages from one of these pamphlets, but he stopped himself and said, "No! I cannot read these wild effusions—I am afraid they would be considered as unfit for a public reading. I shall only say that no one upon reading the pamphlet (if, indeed, it can be read) would think the mind of the author perfectly rational."* But what his counsel might wish to represent as madness, the jurymen might take for deliberate wickedness and horrible impiety: without any attention to this plea they brought in their verdict, "all in one voice," of Guilty, and their lordships ordered and adjudged that the prisoner should be transported beyond the seas for seven years.

The result of these trials did not check the ardour of the reformers and the clubbists, and the so-called Convention, instead of dissolving itself, more questionable acts. On the 29th of October extended its connexions and proceeded to much the Convention assembled at Edinburgh under the presidency of Mr. John M'Intyre, and delegations were received from other political societies in London, Sheffield, Glasgow, Paisley, Dundee, Duffermline, Kirkaldy, Perth, Linlithgow, Hamilton, and a score of other towns. Letters were presented from some English clubs signed by Thomas Hardy and others. Mr. William Skirving, a friend of Muir and Palmer, and secretary to the Convention, read several papers which were certainly of a very inflammatory kind; and among them was one, setting forth the necessity of applying for universal suffrage and annual parliaments, to the king, and not to the British Parliament; and another, proposing an address to the distressed and out-of-work weavers, mechanics, &c. The Convention continued sitting for several days, making nearer and nearer approaches to the proceedings and prepotency of the great Mother Society of Paris. There was, however, one very notable difference,—the Scotsmen generally opened and closed their sittings with a prayer. Fresh deputations continued to arrive from other affiliated or corresponding societies, and with this seeming accession of strength the Convention became bolder and hotter. The evidence on his trial had failed to prove that Muir had ever gone these lengths; but now from his prison in the Tolbooth he communicated with these assembled delegates, and seemed to identify his opinions and principles with theirs. If he could not be tried again, neither was this the way for obtaining a revision of his sentence or a mitigation of his punishment. Subscriptions were set on foot for defraying the public charges of the Convention; and some notion may be conveyed of the condition of these national delegates by the sum total of their first subscription—3l. 11s. 6½d. The delegates were of one mind on the capital question of universal suffrage.

* Palmer had published various pamphlets and theological tracts. Among them are enumerated—1. 'An Attempt to refute a Sermon, by H. D. Inglis, on the Godhead of Jesus Christ, and to restore the long-lost Truth of the First Commandment.' 2. 'An Attempt to prove the Fallen Angels to have been only the Sons of Seth.' 3. 'An Attempt to show that the Cock-crowing which Peter heard was the Sound of a Trumpet.'

On the 6th of November Citizens Hamilton Rowan and Simon Butler appeared in the Convention in the name of the United Irishmen, and Citizens Margarott and Gerald presented themselves as delegates from London, and were all introduced and received with acclamations. Citizen Margarott stated that he had escaped from five hundred constables, who had beset a popular meeting at London in order to prevent the sending of delegates to Edinburgh; that he trusted the Convention would strike terror in their enemies; that the political societies in London were very numerous, though sometimes fluctuating; that in some parts of England whole towns were reformers; that in Sheffield and its environs there were 50,000; that, if they could only get a convention of England and Scotland united, they might represent six or seven hundred thousand males, which would be a majority of all the adult males in the kingdom, and constitute such a force that ministry would not dare to refuse their rights—universal suffrage, annual parliaments, &c. Citizen Gerald, speaking for England, said that he came armed with a full power of delegation: everything the people had gained had been through conventions; and what was the great revolution of 1688 but the consequence of a convention? Citizen Butler said he would give an account of Ireland: there the executive part of the government was almost omnipotent, the landed interest was almost wholly aristocratic, the manufacturer was idle. Last parliament was expected to have given Ireland emancipation, but that prospect had been overcast. An infamous coalition had taken place between the Irish opposition and ministry. The Catholics had retired with what they had got; and, no longer opposed by them, the government had turned their oppressive measures against the friends of reform. The United Irishmen were prosecuted; he himself had experienced six months' imprisonment. But freedom dwelt in almost every heart and must triumph. In Scotland he was happy to see the delegates of the people still met in convention, but in Ireland the parliament had enacted laws against it. It was agreed that the thanks of the Convention should be sent to the societies in England and Ireland; that Citizens Hamilton Rowan, Simon Butler, Margarott, &c., should be admitted as members of the Convention; and that the powers of the delegates of this Convention should continue until another Convention was called. As far as we can discover, no plain and direct mention was made by any of them of an appeal to arms; but a score of them spoke of striking terror into their enemies by their numbers and strength. They seemed, indeed, to have a very clear notion of what the Parisians had meant by an insurrection toute morale. There were several mad gentlemen sitting as delegates, and among them one mad lord, the maddest of them all. This was Lord Daer (son of the Earl of Selkirk), who had passed a considerable time in Paris, and who had been thoroughly indoctrinated by Brissot, Thomas Paine, and other prophets. It was his lordship that recommended the organization after the fashion of the great Jacobin Club in the Rue St. Honoré; but in this he was much assisted by Margarott. They divided the Convention into sections and committees, the committees to meet in the forenoon, and the Convention at five in the afternoon: they had their committees of organization, of correspondence, of finance, of secrecy; they named their places of meeting after the French—there was "Liberty Hall," "Liberty Stairs," &c. They made "honourable mention," and gave the "honours of the sitting," even as in France. They proceeded to institute primary and provincial assemblies, and the division of the country into departments. Margarott, on the 19th of November, moved that a committee should be appointed "to consider and draw up a proper plan of union between the two nations, according to the resolution passed yesterday by the Convention." They named their gazettes and official journals, and agreed that a committee of five should be appointed for the purpose of drawing up weekly an abstract of the debates and proceedings of the Convention, in order that the same might be printed, and a copy sent to every affiliated society. Great anxiety was expressed about the Highland clans, who were now as remarkable for their loyalty to the House of Brunswick, as they had once been for their attachment to the unhappy race of the Stuarts; and it was unanimously resolved that the Convention should take means to convert all the Macs to its own way of thinking, or, as it was expressed in the minutes, "should take some method of enlightening the Highlands of Scotland." It was moved and carried that a fund should be raised by subscription for defraying the expense of small patriotic publications to be distributed in the Highlands; that every publication should bear the figure of a Highlandman in full dress, with target and broadsword, to attract the attention of Highlandmen; and that none of these publications should cost more than one halfpenny. Citizen Skirving insisted that all the members, both of the Convention and of the primary assemblies, ought to subscribe a solemn league and covenant, as the Scots had done when preparing to make war against Charles I.; but this was considered unnecessary, as all the members were already bound. Several of the Conventionalists now expressed their contempt for the revolution of 1688: Citizen Gerald compared the constitution we got by it to a dead horse. The same citizen was very indignant not only at titles, like lord, marquess, or duke, but at the use of the word gentleman; he thought no designation ought to be used among freemen except that of citizen—and citizens they all called themselves and one another, from my Lord Daer down to the weaver's apprentice. A Citizen Brown, delegate from Sheffield, thought it would be proper to determine whether the next Convention should not meet south of the Tweed, in the free town of Sheffield, or some other English town abounding in political reformers. Citizen Hastie said—"The spot of ground on which we meet is of little moment. Englishmen and Scotsmen have declared for universal suffrage and annual parliaments; to obtain these objects they are united; they will proceed until they are secured, or yield the pursuit only with their lives." For his part he thought the best place for the next meeting would be on the borders of England and Scotland. Another delegate spoke as if York were a proper place; but this proposition was very unpalatable to Citizen Gerald, one of the London delegates, who said—"The city of York has been proposed as a proper and central place; but I can assure you that city is the seat of a proud aristocracy, the seat of an archbishop! However, I would not altogether object to going thither: as the Saviour of the world was often found in the company of sinners, let us go there for the same gracious purpose, to convert to repentance! But certainly I should prefer some place on the borders." Citizen Newton, who had probably some Cameronian blood in him, moved that the committee of regulations should appoint a day of solemn fasting, prayer, and humiliation, to be kept by all the friends of reform in Great Britain and Ireland. This motion occasioned a very warm debate. [The violent differences in religious opinions would soon have set these reformers by the ears if they had been left to themselves.] But Citizen Gerald moved the following amendment, which, in a great measure, conciliating opinions, was agreed to:—"That it be recommended to the individual members of this Convention, and to all the friends of liberty in Great Britain and Ireland, to invoke the assistance of God Almighty, the common father of all, in the cause in which we are engaged." The Convention had gone these lengths, and further, when (on the 4th of December) it was announced that the Edinburgh magistrates intended to break it up and disperse its members. Hereupon it was voted that the moment of any illegal dispersion should be considered as a summons to the delegates to repair to the place of meeting to be appointed for the Convention of Emergency; and that the secret committee should be directed to proceed without delay to fix the place of meeting. On the next day the president announced that he had been arrested, that Margarott had been arrested, that several other delegates had been arrested, but that they had all been admitted to bail, their several papers, which had been seized and sealed, remaining in the hands of the sheriff. He had scarcely finished this announcement when the lord provost, properly attended, presented himself, and insisted upon their immediate departure thence, telling them that they might meet in any private houses. Skirving told his lordship that that was a private house—that he had taken it for a time certain for the use of the British Convention—that it was a Freemasons' lodge, and nothing could be more private than a masons' lodge. The lord provost said that he looked upon their meeting and proceedings as illegal and unconstitutional, that it was his duty to disperse them, and that he was determined to do it. The delegates said that their meeting was strictly legal and constitutional, and that they were determined to remain. Citizen Paterson, however, vacated the president's chair. The Convention instantly elected another president, and Citizen Brown took the chair in defiance of the provost. After some altercation, the lord provost said he would act as chief constable, and, stepping up to the chair, he pulled Brown from it by force. The cry of violence was then raised, and a delegate, getting on a table, moved to adjourn to another masons' lodge at the head of the Canongate. This was agreed to; and they met that same evening at the place named, and then and there, under the presidency of the same Citizen Brown, they declared the Convention to be in permanent session. But, on the very next day, as they were in the act of receiving deputations from various parts of the country, the sheriff-substitute, attended by the magistrates of Edinburgh and a little army of constables, invaded this lodge at the head of the Canongate, and intimated that, unless the meeting dissolved quietly, he had orders to dissolve it by force; and, hereupon, after a short unctuous prayer from Citizen Gerald, who prayed the Lord of Hosts to be a pillar of fire to them, as he was to their fathers of old, to enlighten and direct them, and to be to their enemies a pillar of cloud, of darkness, and confusion, the delegates and deputies of this British Convention began to disperse. It appears, however, that actual force was necessary to remove some of them. Four days after this dispersion an 'Address to the Friends of the People,' signed by Skirving, appeared in the public newspapers, stating that, the British Convention being now constrained to adjourn to the place appointed for its meetings of emergency, the general committee were requested to assemble in a house belonging to Mr. Skirving, their secretary, formerly denominated the Cock-pit.*

But Citizen Skirving could not rally in any great force the scattered Convention; and on the 6th of January (1794) he was brought before the Court of Justiciary, and condemned on the following day to fourteen years' transportation. On the 13th of the same month Citizen Margarott, the London delegate, who styled himself "a merchant residing in Marylebone," was put upon his trial before the same court, and was sentenced on the next day to the same term of transportation as Skirving and Muir. In the month of March Gerald, another of the English delegates, was tried by the Court of Justiciary, and was also sentenced to fourteen years' transportation.

In the meantime Muir and Palmer were brought from Leith on board a revenue cutter, and on the 19th of December (1793) they were delivered into the custody of Duncan Campbell, the contractor for the hulks at Woolwich, who put them on board one of the hulks. Though confined among common felons, and for some time, it is said, in irons, they were treated with much humanity, being allowed all the accommodations which their situation would admit of, and being freely permitted to see their friends. Among those who hastened to visit them in the hulks, and to get up a subscription in their behalf, were Dr. Priestley and Mr. Lindsey. By some this punishment was considered as unreasonably severe. Early in the present session Mr. Adam moved in the House of Commons for leave to bring in a bill for making some important alterations in the criminal law of Scotland, and for allowing of appeals from the Court of Justiciary in matters of law. Leave being refused, Mr. Adam, on the 14th of February, gave notice that he would bring forward a motion for the relief of Messrs. Muir and Palmer in another form. In the mean time Sheridan, on the 24th, presented a petition from Palmer, representing that he conceived the sentence passed upon him by the High Court of Justiciary, from which there was no appeal, to be unjust. Pitt objected that the petition could not be received by the House without an improper interposition between the sentence of a competent court and its execution. But it was Dundas that most startled those who were pleading, or about to plead, for the two prisoners: he intimated that the sentence was already executed, that the warrant for the transportation of Mr. Palmer was both signed and issued. A motion for adjourning the debate to Thursday, the 27th, having been carried, it was moved by Mr. Whitbread that his majesty should be requested to prevent Mr. Palmer from being sent off before that day; but this proposition was negatived by a large majority. In the end, however, Pitt found himself compelled to allow the reception of Palmer's petition. On March the 10th Adam was allowed to move for a revision of the trials of Muir and Palmer. He said that "leasing-making," the crime for which those two men ought to have been indicted, corresponded to that misdemeanour called in England a public libel on government tending to disturb the peace; that the only punishment provided by Scottish law for leasing-making was fine, imprisonment, or banishment; that transportation was consequently illegal; and he further declared that, in his opinion, the trial had been unfair and oppressive, and the sentence altogether illegal, arbitrary, and unwarrantable. The trial had certainly been conducted with improper heat and violence. Fox mentioned that one of the lords of Justiciary had said that no man had a right to speak of the constitution unless he possessed landed property, and that another of those judges had asserted that since the disuse of torture there was no adequate punishment for sedition.* The lord-advocate of Scotland, Pitt, and Windham, defended the Scottish court and its sentence. The first of these gentlemen, who was therein supported by Dundas, said that the Scotch laws were better than the English for the punishment of libels and the suppression of seditious practices. The majority of the House seemed to agree with them, and Adam's motion was negatived by 171 against 32. Motions made in favour of the two convicts in the Upper House, by Earls Lauderdale and Stanhope, were not more successful; and there the lord chancellor carried a resolution that there were no grounds for interfering with any of the criminal courts of justice as now established. Skirving and Margarott, having been brought up from Leith, were put on board the same convict-ship, 'the Surprise,' which, being obliged to wait for convoy to a certain latitude, did not set sail for New South Wales until the end of April. Before their departure from the Thames it was discovered that the general character of Margarott did not stand very high: on the voyage he quarrelled with his brother delegates and companions in misfortune; he entered into a most friendly intercourse with the master of the ship, while an accusation was brought against Palmer and Skirving of heading a conspiracy to murder the master and the crew, in order that they might carry the ship into some foreign port, and for this the two accused were closely confined below deck, and otherwise treated with great severity. Muir, who was not included in the accusation, and who was treated with comparative kindness by the ship-captain and those who had charge of the convicts, bore strong evidence to the injustice and falsehood of the charge, and joined Palmer and Skirving in representing Margarott as an accessory to the wrongs they had suffered, as an instigator of their accusation, and as a man rejected and expelled from their society. They all four arrived at Port Jackson at the end of October, and were not long afterwards joined by Gerald. They were treated with great kindness by the governor and the few respectable inhabitants of the infant and penal colony: houses were allotted to Muir, Skirving, and Palmer, near to each other; but "the merchant of Marylebone" was accommodated with a lodging at some distance from them. Palmer wrote to his friends that they had no cause to complain of any want of civility or attention. He and Skirving employed themselves in cultivating the land allotted to them; and both sent home favourable accounts of the climate, the country, and the fertility of the soil. Muir, shortly after his arrival, effected his escape to South America. He was at San Sebastian, Rio Janeiro, in July, 1794. From South America he took a passage to Spain on board a Spanish ship in 1796, when Spain had made her peace with the French, and declared war against England. During this voyage he was in great jeopardy, for the ship he sailed in was attacked by a British frigate: he received a wound in the head during the action, but if he had been captured he would have been hanged. On his arrival in Spain he was cast into prison, where he languished until Talleyrand applied for and obtained his release in the name of the French republic. Muir then repaired to France, and died at Bordeaux. Gerald, who was in very bad health when he left England, died soon after his arrival in New South Wales, and Skirving did not survive him long. Palmer lived nearly two years beyond the term of his transportation, and might very possibly have returned to England if he had not chosen to take a very roundabout adventurous course. At the beginning of 1800 (by the end of which year it was lawful for him to re-appear in his own country) he was allowed to embark in a vessel, which he and some others had purchased with the intention of going to New Zealand to take in a cargo of timber for the Cape of Good Hope market. The ship, principally the property of Palmer, was soon found to be a very crazy craft; and, though they had only taken in provision for six months, they spent twenty-six weeks at New Zealand, where they could obtain no supplies proper for a long sea-voyage. Famishing, and apparently very deficient in the sciences of geography and navigation, they beat about the great Pacific, wandering in search of provisions from one group of islands to another, and never hitting upon a land of plenty, until they got to the island of Goraa, where they ran their crazy vessel on a reef, and well nigh lost her and themselves. Having, by the friendly assistance of the natives, repaired the

* The lord-justice-clerk had said roundly and roughly, "A government in every country should be just like a corporation; and, in this country, it is made up of the landed interest, which alone has a right to be represented; as for the rabble, who have nothing but personal property, what hold has the nation of them? They may pack up all their property on their backs, and leave the country in a twinkling of an eye!" It was Lord Swinton who had said, "If punishment adequate to the crime of sedition were to be sought for, it could not be found in our law, now that torture is happily abolished."

craft and obtained some provisions, they resolved to go, not to the Cape of Good Hope, but to China. They shaped their course for Macao, but meeting with contrary winds they made little way; their provisions were soon exhausted, and the ill-repaired vessel began again to open her seams. To escape the double risk of starving and drowning, they ran into the island of Guam, a possession of the Spaniards, who seized their vessel and made them prisoners of war, but otherwise treated them with much kindness and hospitality. After remaining here about eighteen months, Palmer died of dysentery, in the beginning of June, 1802. The only one of the five who returned to England was Margarott, who is said to have conducted himself throughout with abandoned and shameless profligacy. In the year 1812 he appeared before a committee of the House of Commons appointed to examine the transportation system. By his testimony it appeared that he had remained in New South Wales until the year 1810, and that the expense attending his return to London amounted to 450*l*. He died in 1815, while a subscription was raising for his relief.*

Before the departure of the condemned Scottish reformers from the Thames two political trials were begun and terminated in England. Eaton, a bookseller of Bishopgate-street, was brought before the city court at the Old Bailey, on an indictment for publishing a seditious libel entitled 'Politics for the People, or Hogs'-wash.' English juries being much less alarmed and excited than Edinburgh ones, Eaton was acquitted. It soon became apparent that it was as difficult for the crown lawyers to obtain verdicts in England as it was easy for their brethren to obtain them in Scotland: there every political prisoner was brought in guilty, † and here every one was acquitted. On the 2nd of April, Mr. Thomas Walker, merchant, of Manchester, and a leader of the political societies in that place, was with six others (four labourers or mechanics, one 'gentleman,' and one surgeon) tried at the Lancaster assizes for a conspiracy to overthrow the constitution and government, and to aid and assist the French in case they should invade this kingdom. Walker and his brother Richard (who was not indicted) were both hot-headed men, evidently capable of going great lengths. Walker had signed addresses to the Jacobins, but not since the declaration of war. He had brought himself into such disrepute by his revolutionary politics, that his fellow-townsmen, hot on the other side, had attacked his house and well nigh destroyed it. The counsel for the prosecution attempted to prove a great deal too much, and some of the witnesses appeared to have been tampered with by the Tory and high-church magistrates, and more than one of them grossly perjured themselves. The jury

† On the trial of Muir the lord advocate took occasion to glory in this fact. "All of these persons," said he, "who have had the courage to come and stand a trial at this bar, have met with the same fate;—they have all been found guilty! And I trust, that, as the evidence has clearly unfolded the diabolical conduct of this person, he will receive a similar verdict."

acquitted all the prisoners, and one of the witnesses was committed for perjury, and, when tried at the next assizes, this man was found guilty and sentenced to stand once in the pillory, and to be imprisoned for two years. Not deterred by these acquittals, government resolved to pursue some of the principal members of the Corresponding Society and the Society for Constitutional Information in London; and in the month of May Thomas Hardy, Daniel Adams, the Rev. Jeremiah Joyce, private secretary to Earl Stanhope, and tutor to his son, Lord Mahon, John Thelwall, a political lecturer, the celebrated Horne Tooke, and three or four others, were seized and committed to the Tower, charged with high treason. Their trials did not commence until the close of the year. On the 12th of May, Dundas went down to the House of Commons with a message from the king, informing the House that seditious practices had been carried on by societies in London in correspondence with other societies for the purpose of assembling a Convention to represent the people, in defiance of and in opposition to parliament, and on principles subversive of our constitution, and calculated to introduce among us the anarchy prevailing in France; that the papers of these societies had been seized, and would be laid before parliament; and that his majesty recommended them carefully to examine these papers, and to adopt such measures as might appear necessary. The papers were produced on the very next day, when Pitt moved an address of thanks to the king, and proposed that the papers should be referred to a committee of secrecy, consisting of twenty-one members, chosen by ballot. This was agreed to. On the 16th of May Pitt produced to the House the report of this committee of secrecy, which, if it had found out, certainly did not reveal anything secret or mysterious—the report merely containing the proceedings of the two London societies from the year 1791; most of which had been already published by the societies themselves in the newspapers. If the extreme measures, amounting to little less than the suspension of English liberty, were really rendered necessary by circumstances, the ministry ought to have explained that necessity and those circumstances; but Pitt rested upon that bag of wind the report of the secret committee, which, if it proved anything, proved that, in England at least, no danger was to be apprehended from these clubs and societies. And upon this foundation he demanded, as necessary to the salvation of the country, the immediate suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. Nor did the great majority of the House consider the demand dangerous, irrational, or excessive; Burke maintained that it was the best means of preventing the vast and imminent dangers with which we were menaced; Windham said that, if these evils could not be averted by the laws in being, other laws more stringent must be framed; and the Suspension Bill was carried through all its stages in the shortest time possible, and by overwhelming majorities. In the Lords, Earl Stanhope said that ministers were going to establish a Bastille and to introduce the use of lettres de cachet. Lord Lauderdale asserted that, while ministers were talking of innovations and revolutions, they were themselves pursuing a revolutionary system, and establishing that reign of terror which we so much reprobated in France. Lord Thurlow expressed himself very cautiously, saying he acceded to the bill merely on the presumption that its necessity had been proved. The bill was, however, carried through that House also with the greatest haste, though not without a strong protest from the Duke of Bedford, and the Earls Stanhope, Lauderdale, and Albemarle. An address being moved on the 13th of June, by Lord Grenville, to assure the king of their lordships' loyalty and determination to punish the participators in the conspiracy which had been laid before them, and to invest his majesty, if needful, with additional power for the suppression of attempts against government, it was warmly opposed by Lord Lauderdale, but carried and sent to the Commons for their concurrence. In the debate which ensued in the Lower House, Mr. Lambton noticed that in the report of the secret committee mention had been made of warlike preparation and arms. But what were these arms? They amounted, according to the specification in the report, to eighteen pike-heads, ten battle-axes, and twenty sword-blades. Such were the warlike preparations for encountering and destroying the British government! Fox, alluding to the individuals under arrest, and to the members of the political societies generally, said they appeared to be men who might co-operate in a revolution, but could never produce one;—that they might have held imprudent and even seditious language, but that was punishable without recurring to suspensions and severities that would terrify the whole community, and without anticipating the declaration of their guilt by a court of justice after regular trial. Such an anticipation parliament could manifestly be charged with if it declared its belief in the accusations brought against these persons. In states where the destruction of a few persons subverted the whole order of things, a small number of obscure individuals might possibly effect a revolution; but in a country like this he thought it unreasonable to fancy that so insignificant and diminutive a set of men could seriously, with any remains of sanity in their minds, have engaged in such an undertaking. He moved to omit that part of the address which expressed the conviction of parliament that a conspiracy had been carrying on against the constitution; but his amendment was rejected, and the House concurred in the address as sent down by the Lords. The reverses of our allies and the triumph of the republicans on the continent, together with the turbulent state of Ireland, certainly kept up in a large part of the community an unreasonable but perfectly sincere dread of invasion; and, taking at their heated idle words men who for the greater part would have been among the foremost to hurl back the invaders if they could have come, it continued to be believed that there were not merely in Ireland (where, alas! the belief was reasonable), but in England and in Scotland, phalanxes ready to join the French. To judge of the violence of the times, we should place ourselves amid the anxieties, the unceasing apprehensions, and agonizing fears of the times; and this we can hardly do. The fears seem to us to have been irrational and almost disgraceful; but they appeared not so to great and good men, and to Burke, the greatest man of that day or of any day since. It was the last session the philosophical statesman sat in the House of Commons, and some of his last words there were words of warning to the country to beware of the fate of France. On the 20th of June he received the thanks of the House for the management of the Hastings trial, which only ended now; and a few days after he accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

In the course of the session a bill, brought forward by Wilberforce, and supported by Pitt, for the abolition of that branch of the slave-trade by which we supplied the islands and territories belonging to foreigners with slaves, was passed by the Commons, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the West India interest; the second reading having been carried on the 25th of February, in a thin House, by 56 against 38. But on the 2nd of May the Lords threw out the bill by a majority of 45 to 4. The king prorogued parliament in person on the 11th of July, congratulating the Lords and Commons on the glorious victory obtained over the French at sea on the 1st of June, and the acquisitions made in the East and West Indies, and exhorting them to firmness, notwithstanding the successes of the French in the Netherlands.

Lord Howe's naval victory was both seasonable and glorious. About the middle of April the ships composing the Channel fleet, commanded by his lordship, had received the requisite repairs, and had assembled at St. Helens. It consisted of thirty-two sail of the line and nine frigates, but six of the ships of the line and four of the frigates were detached under Rear-Admiral Montague to escort some outward-bound convoys into the parallel of Cape Finisterre. It was, therefore, with only twenty-six sail of the line and five frigates that Lord Howe proceeded for Ushant to look after the Brest fleet and a great French convoy known to be expected from America and the West India Islands. The English cruised for a good many days in blowing, foggy weather, and when they were enabled to look into Brest harbour they discovered that the fleet had put to sea. On the 25th of May, after the English had made a fruitless search for the enemy, who had gone somewhere to meet their homeward-bound convoy, two French corvettes, mistaking Lord Howe's fleet for their own, ran close in, and were taken. On the 28th Howe caught sight of the French fleet, and on the evening of that day some of his ships attacked a part of their line; but it grew dark, and the firing ceased after the 'Révolutionnaire,' a three-decker and the sternmost ship of the enemy, had been beaten out of the line. On the 29th, soon after daybreak, the two fleets were within random-shot distance; at various times in the course of the day there was some heavy and close firing between the English van and the French rear; three of the French ships were much disabled, but the wind and weather, and the indifferent sailing of some of his ships, did not permit Lord Howe to gain the weather-gage, and get in proper order for breaking the enemy's line.* During most of the time Howe's own ship, the 'Charlotte,' was engaged, a considerable quantity of water was taken in at the lower-deck ports, and the pumps were at work constantly. On the 30th and 31st there was little wind and a great fog; but on the afternoon of the 31st, the fog clearing off, the enemy were seen—and seen to leeward. But before the English could get up abreast of them the day was too far advanced for bringing them properly to action. Howe watched them closely with his frigates during the night; but the French had no intention of being off: they had fully determined to risk a close action rather than abandon the anxiously expected convoy to be intercepted and captured. They had sent their disabled ships back into Brest, and they had been joined by

* It appears that Lord Howe himself passed through the French line on this day, between the fifth and sixth ship in their rear; that the 'Bellerophon,' Captain Hope, and the 'Leviathan,' Captain Lord Henry Seymour Conway, followed him closely, but that, no other ships following him, and his two seconds being very much disabled, he could derive no material advantage from his bold manœuvre, as the rest of his ships had passed to leeward of the enemy, and, having tacked astern of the French line, did not rejoin him in time to give any effectual support.

other ships fresh out of dock or port.* Their admiral (Villaret-Joyeuse) who had distinguished himself under Suffrein, in the East Indies, during the last war, was both a brave and a skilful officer. Jean Bon Saint-André, the friend or creature of Robespierre, and one of the most terrible members of the Mountain, was on board the fleet as commissioner from the Convention, to remind every officer and man of the guillotine, and of what he owed to the republic.

The dawn of the 1st of June disclosed the French about three or four miles to leeward in order of battle, under an easy sail to the westward. They had twenty-six line-of-battle ships, while the English had but twenty-five, the 'Audacious,' 74, Captain Parker, having separated on the 28th in a shattered condition. In the size of their vessels, in their aggregate number of guns and men, and in their weight of metal, the French had a considerable superiority.† Lord Howe immediately stood towards them. Being abreast of them at about seven in the morning, he wore to the larboard tack, while the French waited his approach in the same position. Having made the necessary arrangements in his line for opposing his large ships to the large ships of the enemy, bethinking himself of a good English proverb, he lay-to, and intimated by signal that there was time for the men to breakfast before going into action. At about half-past eight he made the signal for the fleet to close, to pass through the French line and engage them to leeward, van to van, rear to rear, every ship engaging her opposite in the enemy's line. His previous orders had been clear and peremptory, and, as he steered for the 'Montagne,' Villaret-Joyeuse's ship, which mounted 120 guns, he kept the signal for close action flying on board his own ship the 'Queen Charlotte.' The ships ahead and astern of the admiral kept away parallel to her, receiving a heavy fire from the French, which they did not return till their closeness to their adversaries made every shot tell. Although there was scarcely space to effect the passage, the 'Queen Charlotte' forced her way between the stern of the 'Montagne' and the head of the 'Jacobin' 84, and was soon so closely engaged to leeward that the ensign of the 'Montagne,' a much loftier ship, frequently waved over her quarter-deck. These two ships opened their fire a little after nine o'clock, and at nearly the same moment the action became general in the centre. Unfortunately only the 'Defence' (Captain Gambier), the 'Marlborough' (Hon. G. Berkeley), the 'Royal George' (Domett), the 'Queen' (Nott), and the 'Brunswick' (J. Harvey), pushed through the enemy's line and engaged them to leeward. The 'Gibraltar' (Mackenzie) omitted to cross the French admiral in order to engage his second ahead, as his station required, and Captain Molloy of the 'Cæsar' backed his main-top-sail, and whilst distant from the enemy, though the signal for closer engagement was abroad. The far greater part of the ships, to the infinite mortification of Howe, engaged their respective adversaries to windward; thus allowing the French, when beaten, to go off before the wind. But, notwithstanding the failures in the British manœuvre, it was soon found that the French could not stand that close fighting. After behaving manfully for about an hour Villaret-Joyeuse gave way and stood off to the northward, and was followed by all the ships in his van that could carry sail. He left ten of his ships, almost all of them totally dismasted, to the windward, nearly surrounded by the English. But the uninjured state of some of the French ships, which still continued the engagement, and the dispersed and crippled condition of a part of the British squadron (among others Howe's own ship, which had lost her fore-top-mast, and then, just as the French admiral sheered off, her main-top-mast) enabled many of the French to escape, when the only canvas three of them could spread was a small sail raised on the stump of the fore-mast. The retreat of these ships was covered by Villaret-Joyeuse, who, having lain to leeward, and repaired his damages, brought up eleven or twelve of his ships, not disabled by the loss (at least) of any of their masts, to the succour of his dismasted ones. Seven, however—'Le Juste' of 80 guns, the 'Sans Pareil' of 80, 'L'America' of 74, 'L'Achille' of 74, 'Le Northumberland' of 74, 'L'Impetueux' of 74, and 'Le Vengeur,' 74—were abandoned to their fate, struck their flags, and were immediately taken possession of by the English. The 'Vengeur,' however, had received too many English shots between wind and water to remain a prize: she filled and went down in deep water almost as soon as the English flag was hoisted on her.* After securing his six other prizes, and giving assistance to the most shattered of his own ships, Lord Howe made the signal for his fleet to close round him. This was done with the intention of again attacking Villaret-Joyeuse, if he should attempt to cut off the 'Queen' (one of the five ships which had followed his lordship in breaking the enemy's line and attacking to leeward, but which now, from her disabled state, had drifted to a considerable distance from the English fleet†); or if, by trying to weather his captured ships, he should attempt to retrieve the fortune of the day. The French admiral, however, aimed at nothing but securing his own retreat: he attempted neither to cut off the 'Queen' nor to molest the 'Brunswick,' which had lost her mizen-mast and had driven to leeward of some of his ships: he collected his nineteen sail of the line and made away for the coast of Britany. The damage in the mast and rigging of the English ships generally was so considerable that they were obliged to lay-to; and the 2nd and 3rd of June were employed in securing such injured masts as were left, fixing jury-masts where requisite, removing the prisoners, and taking the six prizes in tow. The victory had not been obtained without a considerable loss, for as long as the French remained in action they fought gallantly, and their advantages were, as we have stated, not inconsiderable. The number of killed in the British fleet was 279, of wounded 877. Of the officers of rank Captain Montagu of the 'Montagu' was killed, and Captain Hutt of the 'Queen' and Captain J. Hervey of the 'Brunswick' died of their wounds: Rear-Admiral Pasley ('Bellerophon'), Rear-Admiral Bowyer ('Barfleur'), and Admiral Graves ('Sovereign'), were badly wounded and mutilated: Captain the Hon. George Berkeley ('Marlborough'), Captain Sir Andrew S. Douglas (second captain of the 'Queen Charlotte') were also wounded severely, and a contusion which Sir Andrew received occasioned his death after the lapse of some years. Three lieutenants of the navy, one captain and one lieutenant of the army, three masters, seven master's-mates and midshipmen, were killed: one master, two captains, and one lieutenant of marines, ten lieutenants of the navy (two of whom died) and eighteen midshipmen, were severely wounded. But the carnage on board the more crowded French ships was far more dreadful. In the six captured ships alone the killed were 690, the wounded 580. Above 300 were supposed to have gone down with

* The 'Vengeur' had been so closely engaged with the 'Brunswick,' one of the six ships that broke the line, that many of their ports were torn away by the collision. The sides of both ships being extremely straight, they lay so close together that on the lower decks the crews fought hand to hand, with the implements for loading the guns, with cold shot, and with any weapon that chance supplied.

† The 'Queen' had been greatly injured, and had fallen into the same critical situation, on the 29th of May.

the 'Vengeur.' The number of prisoners removed is stated at 2300.*

Of some of his captains Lord Howe evidently thought he had good reason to complain, and it has been hinted that more than one of them ought to have been brought before a court-martial for misconduct and disobedience of orders. His lordship's biographer, whose opinions carry with them a professional weight, says, "The commander-in-chief's orders were undoubtedly not carried into effect by a very large portion of his fleet, as to passing through the line, and each engaging his opponent to leeward; but this did not appear to have arisen from any wilful disobedience, but from inability in some, on account of the bad sailing of the ships, and in others from the very compact line in which the French were formed, so that five captains only of the British fleet had the nerve to let their ships 'make their own way,' like the 'Charlotte,' through the line: others again erred by mistake of signals, which may very often happen in the midst of the smoke and confusion that must occur in an engagement between two fleets. There was besides a signal, which left to each commander a discretionary power to engage his opponent either to windward or leeward, as circumstances might arise. In a letter from a gallant admiral, who was in the battle of the 1st of June, and now living, it is justly observed,—'The 1st of June was the first general action fought in the course of the war, and led to many glorious results; had it been the last, not one of the French ships would have been allowed to return to port;'"—alluding to the inexperience of many of the captains and the rawness of the crews, some of the former of whom, in particular, completely defeated the intention of the commander-in-chief, by mistaking his order—the most simple and intelligible that could be given—that each ship should pass through the enemy's line, and each engage his opponent to leeward. The subsequent signal, that 'each ship should steer for and engage the ship opposed to her in the enemy's line,' relieved the commanders from the difficulty and danger of passing through the enemy's compact line, but enforced the order for each ship to engage her opponent."† Possibly there were among Lord Howe's captains some who would have preferred waiting for the rich-freighted French convoy from America and the West Indies to fighting the republican fleet; for the temptation of prize-money was great, and it might very reasonably be apprehended that while they were getting their ships dismantled in close combat the convoy might steal into port; and it really happened, after the battle, and when the disabled fleet was returning to England for repairs, that the rich convoy, escorted by eight sail of the line and some frigates, arrived in safety in Brest harbour. But still, with every deduction, "the Glorious First of June" was a day honourable to the British navy—was a most seasonable victory, proper to keep up the national spirit, and to lead to greater exploits hereafter.

Not satisfied with claiming the merit of the safe arrival of the great convoy, and with praising the valour which the French sailors had really displayed, deputy Jean Bon Saint-André (who had wished himself ashore as soon as the battle began) claimed the victory over the English.* With the national impudence, and a bold defiance of evidence, and of facts which had been visible to many thousands of individuals, he declared, in his report to the Convention, that the English had thirty-six ships of the line, or ten more than the French; that the battle lasted from nine o'clock in the morning till three in the afternoon, when the English, after seeing several of their ships sunk, suspended their fire and sheered off with all the sail they could carry. But Jean Bon's strength of lying and power of invention † were not strong enough for Barrère, the great reporter and oracle of the committee of Salut Public, who, on the 9th of July, amused the National Convention with an account of the victory of the republican fleet ten times more fabulous than the commissioner's. Jean Bon had admitted, in a periphrastic manner, that some ships had been captured by the English, but Barrère merely said that the French had been compelled to leave seven of their dismantled ships at sea, which he feared were lost. Jean Bon in relating, in a hyperbolical style, many acts of heroism, said not a word about the sinking of the 'Vengeur;' but Barrère garnished his oration with a poetical description of that catastrophe, declaring that the republicans on board the 'Vengeur,' seeing that she was filling, refused, to a man, to seek safety by surrendering, fought their lower-deck guns till the water reached them, then gathered on the quarter-deck, and, having hoisted every flag, pennant, and streamer they had on board, went down with her, shouting Vive la République! Vive la France!—the last thing disappearing beneath the waves being the tri-color flag. He moved, and the Convention most enthusiastically decreed, that a model of the 'Vengeur' should be suspended from the roof of the Pantheon, or the temple dedicated by the gratitude of the republic

The biographer adds:—"It has been said that, if Lord Nelson had been in the place of Lord Howe on the 1st of June, the probability is that not a ship of the French would have escaped. Granted;—and, if Lord Howe had been fortunate enough to have had Lord Nelson's captains and crews, which gained the battle of the Nile, the probability is equally strong that he would have been equally successful; for Lord Nelson only followed Lord Howe's example in assigning to every commander his opponent; but what could Lord Nelson or any other commander effect, if his whole plan was deranged by the bad qualities of his ships, and the inexperience and incapacity of many of their commanders?"

* It is related of Jean Bon, that, being very slightly wounded on board the admiral's ship, the 'Montagne,' he got himself carried on board one of the frigates which never came into action, and remained perdu at the bottom of the hold under pretence of getting his wound dressed.

† The commissioner's report, here and there, lets out the truth, and the melancholy conviction that his countrymen were not quite such good sailors as they were soldiers. "We have sustained," said he, "the rudest and most horrible combat that the ocean has ever witnessed. The French fleet was in good order, and its dispositions were well made. But the French at sea have always more impetuosity than method, and this is a vice which it appertains to the legislature to cure them of. Faults have been committed."—Jean Bon's Report to the Convention, in List. Parlement.

to the memory of her great men. Painters and poets seized upon the splendid fiction, and many were the hard pictures and harder verses painted and written upon it and about it. Chénier, the lyrist and laureat of the revolution, put it into his 'Song of Victories;' and, not satisfied with making the heroes of the 'Vengeur' sing 'Vive la République' while they were sinking, he made them sing on when they were at the bottom of the sea!* The "Pindaric muse" of old republican Lebrun "could not be mute;" and she or he devoted an entire ode to the 'Vengeur.' The story spread far and wide, becoming an article of historical belief, not only in France and all over the continent, but also in England. It had been inserted in hundreds or thousands of respectable books, and no one seemed to doubt its perfect authenticity, when, in 1838, an English veteran, who had been in the battle, extinguished it for ever for all the world, but France, by a plain statement of facts in a homely letter to the newspapers. It was, however, strange that the bubble should not have been burst at least thirty-six years earlier, for Mr. William Stewart Rose, who had the best means of information, and who knew personally many of the officers engaged on the 1st of June, exposed Barrère's fiction in the volume of his 'Naval History' which was published in 1802.* Mr. Rose then said, in the most distinct manner, that the whole story was an extravagant fiction. The following passages from his book ought not to have been allowed to slide out of memory:—"Far from challenging certain death, and glorying in their fate, these poor wretches (the crew of the 'Vengeur'), whose gallant defence deserved a better fate, substituted our union-jack for the republican ensign, and spread themselves over the sides and rigging of the ship, stretching out their hands to their enemies, and supplicating their assistance. Part of the crew were saved by the exertions of their enemies; but the crowds which attempted to spring into each boat, threatening these unfortunate men and those who came to their succour with equal destruction, made all further efforts desperate, and checked the compassionate zeal of their conquerors. Two of the French officers, indeed, betrayed no anxiety to avail themselves of any means of safety, and continued walking up and down the stern-gallery apparently engaged in conversation, while the ship, heeling and gradually sinking deeper and deeper, at length admitted the water into her ports, then righted for a moment, and was immediately engulfed. . . . So entirely destitute of foundation is this (Barrère's) account, that there is not an officer who was present at the moment but bears witness to the fact of the French crew having actually hoisted the British ensign, there is not one who does not testify to the eagerness with which they implored succour, and the generous anxiety with which the English attempted to save them. It is a curious fact, that, while Barrère was expatiating on the noble ardour of republicanism, which thus excited a whole ship's company to prefer death to slavery, several of the crew were actually enrolled in the royalist regiment of Count d'Hervilly." [D'Hervilly's was a regiment composed chiefly of French emigrants, then raising or raised in England.] Yet so it was: in spite of these almost official, and thoroughly reliable revelations in 1802, Barrère's story was allowed to pass current, even in this country, until November, 1838, when Rear-Admiral Griffiths checked and finished its career.*

At least nine-tenths of the marvellous things told by the French of their exploits in the revolutionary and Bonaparte wars rest on a foundation just as slender as this incident of the 'Vengeur;' but, until some more Griffithses and Carlyles raise up their hands, the unrebutted lies are likely to maintain their credit. So long as our writers take upon trust the inventions or exaggerations of the French, without exercising logic or common sense—without referring to German, Spanish, Italian, and other contemporary authorities (less easy to read than the French accounts)—we must expect no rational history of the last war. We have hinted

"Since the period of Lord Howe's victory, on the 1st of June, 1794, the story of the 'Vengeur,' French 74-gun ship, going down with colours flying, and her crew crying 'Vive la République!—Vive la Liberté!' &c., and the further absurdity that they continued firing the main-deck guns after her lower deck was immersed, has been repeatedly declared, and has been very recently re-asserted by a French author. It originated, no doubt, on the part of the French, in political and exciting motives—precisely as Buonaparte caused his victory at Trafalgar to be promulgated through France. While these reports and confident assertions were confined to our neighbours, it seemed little worth the while to contradict it. But now, when two English authors of celebrity—Mr. Alison, in his 'History of Europe during the French Revolution,' and Mr. Carlyle, in his similar work—give it the confirmation of English authority, I consider it right thus to declare the whole story is a ridiculous piece of nonsense. At the time the 'Vengeur' sunk the action had ceased some time. The French fleet were making off before the wind, and Captain Renaudin and his son had been nearly half an hour prisoners on board her majesty's ship 'Culloden,' of which ship I was fourth lieutenant, and about 127 of the crew were also prisoners, either on board the 'Culloden,' or in her boats, besides, I believe, 100 in the 'Alfred's,' and some 40 in the hired cutter, commanded by Lieutenant (the late Rear-Admiral) Winnie. The 'Vengeur' was taken possession of by the boats of the 'Culloden,' Lieutenant Rotherham, and the 'Alfred,' Lieutenant Deschamps; and Captain Renaudin and myself, who were, by Captain Schomberg's desire, at lunch in his cabin, hearing the cries of distress, ran to the starboard quarter-gallery, and thence witnessed the melancholy scene. Never were men in distress more ready to save themselves."

Although the gallant rear-admiral seems to do so, we are anxious it should be understood that we do not confound the celebrity or merit of Mr. Alison and Mr. Carlyle—that we do not consider the works of these two gentlemen as being at all similar.

Mr. Carlyle, in his second edition, retracts his error with his usual point, declaring that Fernando Mendez Pinto, Baron Munchausen, Cagliostro, Psalmanazar, were great liars, but not the greatest—that Barrère, "Anacreon of the guillotine," surpassed them all—that this story about the 'Vengeur' was Barrère's masterpiece, "the largest, most inspiring piece of baque (blarney and rhodomontade) manufactured, for some centuries, by any man or nation." For which words a black mark has been set upon Mr. Carlyle, in France, for ever and evermore. We should think his life would scarcely have been in safety if he had ventured over to Paris shortly after the publication of this his second edition. The French journalists and writing people in general clung and still cling to the exploded fable, and were and are furious, rabid, stark-staring mad against all who have dared to doubt it, but most of all against Rear-Admiral Griffiths and Thomas Carlyle, who put doubt out of the question. If M. Thier's History should go through fifty editions in his lifetime, Barrère's lie will be found, unreduced, unmitigated, unspoil in the fiftieth edition.

at the absurdity of placing implicit confidence in the stilted casuistical mémoires of the Girondists; but what shall we say of the English writer who places the same reliance on Girondist authorities in one page, and on Jacobin authorities in the next, or perhaps in the same page, or even in the very same paragraph; making a pot-pourri of contradictions and inconsistencies—who goes on bestowing the same confidence on the Bonaparteans or Imperialists as he had given to the Girondists and Jacobins, and who seems not to be aware of the existence of any other continental authorities whatsoever—who, even when there is good English authority at hand, either overlooks it in ignorance of its existence, or couples it with the French bombast, as if truth and fiction could march together, or, by being blended, present a perfect truth?

Lord Howe's Channel fleet was at sea again on the 3rd of September, and then consisted of thirty-seven sail of the line, and seven frigates, to which were added a squadron of four seventy-fours, one sixty-four, and three frigates, furnished by our ally the King of Portugal. The French fleet had not yet come out of Brest; but towards the end of the year, when Howe had returned to port, they ventured out to sea, and began a most unfortunate cruise, which ended in the loss of five of their ships of the line by bad weather and accidents. It is impossible to comprise in our narrative all the frigate fights, or even the contests between small squadrons, which took place in these first years of the war. There was a variety and inequality in the spirit displayed in some of these numerous engagements; but, in general, the superiority of the English, as sailors and combatants on their own element, was maintained and enhanced; while many of the actions showed a combination of skill, coolness, and bravery, which will never be surpassed. These engagements took place in the Channel, on the coast of France, in the Mediterranean and Archipelago, in the East Indies and in the West; for the French had ships enough to show in all these seas, and in some places they had for a time a decided superiority of force. During the whole of the present year the British lost only one ship of the line, the 'Alexander' 74, and she did not surrender until she had sustained the assault of three French ships of the line for two hours. Nothing was more evident than that the spirit of our officers and men was incomparably higher than it had been during the American war.

In the West Indies, where land forces co-operated with the navy, our success was sufficiently brilliant. Perhaps too much importance was attached to the conquest of some sugar islands; but, if we had not taken theirs, the French would have taken ours, subjecting the planters and colonists to a horrible fate. The troops under the command of Lieut.-General Sir Charles Grey, which had been landed on the coast of Flanders in the preceding autumn, when the Duke of York and his allies were closely pressed by the French, were soon re-embarked, and continued their voyage to Barbadoes, the place of their original destination; and in the month of February they proceeded, with a squadron of four ships of the line, and fourteen frigates and other vessels, under the command of Admiral Sir John Jervis, to reduce the island of Martinique, against which an unsuccessful attempt had been made in 1793. The French defended themselves in their forts, which were rather numerous and strong; but the British squadron and army were both reinforced during the siege of Fort Louis and Fort Bourbon, and by the 25th of March the island was completely reduced.* Saint Lucie surrendered after the mere show of a defence. The rich and well-fortified island of Guadaloupe held out for some time, and gave occasion to several sieges and stormings; but by the end of April the garrisons capitulated, five or six thousand men laid down their arms, and the isles of Mariegalante, Descada, and the Saintes (the dependencies of Guadaloupe), were included in the surrender. Sir Charles Grey then despatched some of his troops, under General Whyte, to complete the expulsion of the French of the republican party from the island of St. Domingo. In the month of May, the republicans having fled in all directions, Port-au-Prince, the French capital, was captured by Whyte. In the mean time the yellow fever broke out in Guadaloupe, committed great ravages among the English troops there, and carried off General Dundas, who had been appointed governor of the island; and at this sad moment, and when our ships were engaged elsewhere, a squadron arrived from France, having on board fifteen hundred or two thousand land troops, and a commissioner of the Convention—the bloody and terrible Victor Hugues, who, upon the death of the commandant by the fever, took upon himself the entire direction of the troops. Being the bearer of the decrees of the Convention, which gave immediate liberty to all the blacks, he was immediately joined by the negroes and mulattoes. The French royalists of the island, who had joined the English, and invited them thither, in order to be protected from the fury of the sans-culottes, either changed sides or faintly adhered to the English. Sir Charles Grey and Sir John Jervis, who were away at St. Christopher's, collected a force from the adjoining islands, and attempted to dislodge Victor Hugues, who had made himself master of one or two of the forts. On his side the Conventionalist attracted a number of blacks and desperate adventurers of nearly all kinds and nations to his standard, promising the poor the property of the rich, promising the blacks a perfect equality with the whites, assuring to all the Rights of Man, and every blessing and advantage which the revolution had conferred on the common people in France. These motley republicans, who plundered, burned, and murdered the respectable colonists, were well beaten in three encounters, but their number kept increasing, while the English force was thinned by incessant fatigue, the spread of the yellow fever, and the miseries of the rainy season. After some desperate but unfortunate and apparently ill-directed attacks on Point-a-Pitre, the capital of the island, Sir Charles Grey returned to Martinique, which was in danger from fierce insurgents and banditti, the proselytes of Victor Hugues. The weak English force which remained behind in Guadaloupe, with some three or four hundred desperate French royalists—men who had nothing to hope from Victor Hugues, but death by the guillotine he had brought with him, or fusilade and massacre at the hands of his emancipated blacks—kept their ground for a long time in a corner of the island. When they were surrounded and reduced almost to extremities, Sir John Jervis, though the hurricane months were not passed, sailed to their assistance. On arriving, he found that he could not so much as communicate with them, and a day or two after his arrival General Graham, who had been badly wounded, made a very bad capitulation, by which the French royalists were given up to Victor Hugues and his black, white, and mulatto republicans. The guillotine was set to work upon them at Point-a-Pitre, the negroes being taught how to manage that holy instrument; but the greater part of these royalists were fusiladed in heaps by the republicanized negroes. If the same deeds had not been perpetrated in France by scores of the generals and commissioners of the Convention, this Hugues, whose name to this day is never mentioned in the West India Islands without shuddering, might pass for a most extraordinary and conspicuous villain: he showed no mercy; the sick and wounded in the hospitals, the very dead in their graves, were the objects of his cruelty or outrage. At his command the remains of General Dundas were torn from their sanctuary and thrown into the river. Some British officers, whom the chances of war had made his prisoners, were condemned to the most servile labours. By the end of the year he had entirely recovered the island, but had reduced a great part of it to a frightful waste, having destroyed the plantations and seats of the royalists, and marked his course everywhere with devastation and blood.

A curious triumph attended our arms in the Mediterranean, where Corsica, the native island of the man who was so soon to be the master and despot of France and the arbiter of Europe, annexed itself to the British crown. The cruelties committed by the French, under Louis XV., in their subjugation of the island, were of too recent a date to be forgotten by a very brave but very revengeful people. To the Corsicans the French settlers were aliens in blood, in language, in manners, in interests, in everything; and a very large part of the population, including all the mountaineers and most of the peasantry, who pretty closely resembled their neighbours, the Sardis, who had so mauled Admiral Truguet's fleet last year, were incensed at the changes introduced into the isle, and the disrespect shown to their priests since the revolution. At the dawn of that mighty change, which deluded so large a portion of mankind with false and extravagant hopes, many of the better-educated Corsicans fondly believed that their country would be improved and rendered happy by the political reforms in progress at Paris, and by remaining a portion of the French empire, a realized Utopia. In 1789, on the motion of Mirabeau, in the Constituent Assembly, all the Corsican patriots, who had bravely fought against the French twenty years before, for the independence of their country, and who had been living in exile ever since, were recalled with honour, and invited to concur in the new order of things. by an iniquitous treaty to Louis XV., who had been a sort of king or president under the title of "General of the Kingdom and Chief of the Supreme Magistracy of Corsica," who had afterwards struggled hard with the French, and defeated them in more than one terrible battle, was the most eminent of all these recalled Corsican exiles. He had passed nearly the whole of his exile, from the year 1769 to the year 1789, in England, living in familiar intercourse with the noblest, the most enlightened, and best of our countrymen. Every English reader is acquainted with him as the friend and frequent companion of Doctor Samuel Johnson, who held him in high estimation. With habits almost become English, Paoli repaired to Paris in the autumn of 1789: he was received with acclamations in the Assembly, and in their hall swore fidelity to France and the new and unfinished monarchic constitution. He was presented to Louis XVI., who made him lieutenant-general and military commandant in Corsica. After being entertained in Paris by the patriots and popular idols of that day, he proceeded to his native island, where he was received with enthusiasm, and placed at the head of the national guards that were then raised or in process of being raised in Corsica. He acted faithfully towards the constitutional monarchy so long as it existed; but when the Girondists and Jacobins united and destroyed that government, to which equally with himself they had all promised and vowed fidelity, when they had set up an anarchical republic, and destroyed or proscribed all those friends who had brought him back, he separated himself from the French party, and began to concert measures with the old Corsican patriots. He was presently denounced to the Convention, who placed his name on their lists of proscription. He assembled his countrymen, explained his danger and their own, held up to execration the cruelty and impiety of the French, and was forthwith appointed general-in-chief and president of the council of government.* Paoli knew that the island was not strong enough to defend itself against France; his predilections made him look towards England; and, as soon as war broke out between this country and France, he put himself in communication with our government, and with the English commanders cruising in the Mediterranean. Lord Hood, who commanded the Mediterranean fleet, instantly gave him some assistance; and at the appearance of a few English ships the insurrection became general, and the French were driven out from all the places they held, with the exception of San Fiorenzo, Calvi, and Bastia. This was in the summer and autumn of 1793, when the mother of Bonaparte and all of that family who remained in the island fled in sad plight for Marseilles, to call upon the triumphant Jacobins there for succour and for vengeance upon Paoli and the English. Commodore Linzee, who had only three ships of the line and two frigates with him, was, however, roughly handled and repulsed in making an attempt upon San Fiorenzo. But, after the evacuation of Toulon, Lord Hood, having received certain information that the Convention intended throwing a very strong French reinforcement into the island, made his preparations for attacking their garrisons there with his whole force. By the 7th of February of the present year he completely blockaded the ports, and landed five regiments under the command of General Dundas—a spiritless, incompetent pedant, who ought never to have been employed beyond the drill-ground and the reviewing-field. Dundas invested San Fiorenzo in form, as if it had been a fortress of the first order and defended by a well-appointed garrison. The French, finding the post

untenable, burned one frigate they had in the harbour, scuttled another, evacuated San Fiorenzo, and retreated with proper speed to Bastia—with such speed that the slow and lagging Dundas seems scarcely to have touched their rear during the retreat. This was on the 19th of February. Lord Hood now proposed the immediate reduction of Bastia, then the principal town of the island; but Dundas, after advancing to the heights behind the town, retreated, and declared that he could not co-operate in the undertaking until the arrival of 2000 more land troops who were expected from Gibraltar.* Hood thereupon determined to reduce the place himself with his naval force, and without co-operation or assistance from Dundas. In this resolution his lordship was encouraged by Horatio Nelson, now captain of the 'Agamemnon,' and the youngest captain in the fleet. "A thousand men," said Nelson, "would certainly take Bastia: with 500 men and the 'Agamemnon' I would attempt it. My seamen are now what British seamen ought to be, almost invincible: they really mind shot no more than peas."† General Dundas retained his former opinion, saying that he considered the siege of Bastia, with their present means and force, to be a most visionary and rash enterprise, such as no officer would be justified in undertaking. Hood replied, that he would gladly take the whole responsibility upon himself, and attempt the place with the means and force at his own disposal. At this time there was a change in the military command; but General d'Aubant agreed in opinion with his predecessor, and refused to furnish the admiral with a single soldier, cannon, or any stores. Lord Hood, however, obtained a few artillerymen; and, as a part of the troops had been originally embarked as marines, and were borne on the ships' books, he could call them on board, as his own men. "We are but few," said Nelson, "but of the right sort." That hero superintended the landing of the besieging force, which consisted of 1183 soldiers, artillerymen, and marines, and 250 sailors. The landing was effected on the 4th of April, and immediately the sailors began to drag the great guns up the faces of almost perpendicular rocks, which had seldom been scaled except by Corsican goats. The soldiers, removed from the benumbing influences of their pedantic, over-cautious leaders, and under the command of "Brigadier" Nelson (for he had now obtained that title from the army), vied with the seamen; and, to the astonishment of the French and Corsicans, artillery, ammunition, and stores were soon lodged on the tops of these precipices, and the ridges of them were seen bristling with batteries that commanded the town and citadel, as well as the outworks of the enemy. Paoli sent a small Corsican force to co-operate on the opposite side of the town, but it does not appear that these islanders rendered any essential service: they were, probably, destitute of artillery and proper officers. By the 10th Nelson and his brave coadjutor, Colonel Villetes, had everything ready on the heights, and on the morning of the 11th the place was summoned by Lord Hood. The National Convention had sent thither one of their most energetic commissioners, Lacombe-Saint-Michel, who had been a captain of artillery, and an officer of high repute before the French revolution began. This functionary replied to his lordship's summons—"I have red-hot shots for your ships, and bayonets for your troops. When two-thirds of our men are killed, I will then trust to the generosity of the English." Nelson, who remained on shore in the batteries, then took up the discourse with five twenty-four pounders, two 13-inch mortars, two 10-inch mortars, and two heavy carronades. The fleet could do little beyond keeping up the blockade, for the port of Bastia is not very safe, nor adapted for vessels of high tonnage.* During the time which had been lost through the hesitation and timidity of the English generals the garrison had erected several new works, and had strengthened the old ones, with the skill and rapidity Frenchmen usually display on these occasions: the place was, therefore, much stronger now, when it was only attacked by Lord Hood's force, than it had been at the period when it might have been assailed by this force united with that of Dundas, whose five regiments were now lying at San Fiorenzo doing nothing. But, if Nelson and Villetes had but few pieces in battery, they fired with such precision that a ball or bomb was rarely thrown away; they cleared the outworks of the enemy, and knocked some of their inner works about their ears. Lacombe-Saint-Michel proved not quite so valorous and desperate in deed as he had been in word. As early as the 11th of May, when the siege had lasted a month, he began to speak of negotiation, and on the 19th of May a treaty of capitulation was begun with him. That night some of the troops from San Fiorenzo made their appearance on the neighbouring heights, and on the following morning Dundas's successor, General d'Aubant, came up with the whole force to take possession of Bastia, to the reduction of which they had not in the slightest degree contributed. On the 21st the articles of capitulation were signed on board Admiral Hood's ship, the Victory: 1000 French regulars, 1500 national guards, and a large party of Corsican troops attached to the French interest, in all between 3000 and 4000 men, laid down their arms, to be shipped off for Toulon.

* "The horn of the islanders resounded in every valley, and its threatening voice carried alarm even to the ramparts of Ajaccio."—Lucien Bonaparte, Mémoires écrits par lui-même.

* Nelson, who had landed, and was serving on shore with a few sailors and marines, was greatly astonished and annoyed. He said, "If I had had with me 500 troops, to a certainty I should have stormed the town; and I believe it might have been carried. Armies go so slow, that seamen think they never mean to get forward. . . . What the general could have seen to make a retreat necessary, I cannot comprehend."—Southey's Life of Nelson.

If our sieges had been more frequently intrusted to seamen, or men who had been trained in the navy; if our routine generals had been put on the shelf, and their old books and systems into the fire; and if a set of post-captains had been draughted from our fleets, there are good grounds for believing that England might have been spared some tremendous expenses, many reverses, and not a few disgraces in the first fourteen years of this long war. Wherever the seamen were landed and left to act under their own officers, they did their work well and rapidly. It was the same in the West India Islands as in Corsica. The French republicans were obtaining rapid victories mainly because they had got rid of the old routines and systems, and were employing commanders who had no other theory than that of moving rapidly, and attacking boldly and suddenly. The loss sustained by the British during the whole of this daring siege amounted only to seven sailors and seven soldiers killed, and thirteen sailors and twenty-one soldiers wounded. There still remained in possession of the republicans the coast town and fortress of Calvi, most strongly situated among rocks and precipices. It was and is by far the strongest place in the whole island, and in other respects most important, being the point nearest to France, and with a fresh wind only eight hours' sail from the French port of Antibes. It was resolved that Calvi should be invested, without loss of time, by both army and navy; and, fortunately, at this juncture the command of the land troops was intrusted to General Sir Charles Stuart, an officer of eminent talent, and of almost romantic bravery and enterprise. He suited Nelson, who was to take the chief management of the sailors on shore, as well as the gallant Wolfe had suited Lord Howe in his younger days. Two such men, with adequate means, would have performed miracles if they had been left to act together.

By the middle of June Calvi, in spite of its thundering and commanding batteries, throwing red-hot shot, was invested by sea and land. Nelson, together with Captains Hallowell and Serecold, served in the batteries on shore, after having helped to make them. Serecold, who had given proof of the greatest coolness and intrepidity at the siege of Bastia, was killed by grape-shot whilst getting the last gun into its place on one of these batteries. "I trust it will not be forgotten," said Nelson to Lord Hood, "that twenty-five pieces of heavy ordnance have been dragged to the different batteries, mounted, and all but three fought by seamen, except one artilleryman to point the guns." These heavy guns were all dragged up precipices as steep as, and more lofty than, those at Bastia. This tremendous fatigue was undergone in that scorching, almost African, climate, in the hottest season of the year, or during the reign of the Sol-Leone, or Lion-Sun, as the Italians and Corsicans poetically call what we designate the Dog-days. But worse than fatigue was suffered during the lengthened siege of this strong place. Many of the neighbouring hollows and flats were covered with underwood and stagnating water—were infectious pantani, or maremmes, differing only in extent from the pestilential marshes on the Tuscan and Roman coasts; and close under the ships and the encampment of the besiegers there was a great pestiferous bog or pond, called by the natives La Vigna del Vescovo (the Bishop's Vineyard); and from all these points, sweltering and evaporating under the Lion-Sun, there rose malaria enough to poison the air for a considerable distance. Of two thousand men that were landed, above half were sick, and the rest looked like so many phantoms. On the 10th of August, after a siege of fifty-one days, the republican general, Casabianca, surrendered on terms of capitulation. The loss from the fire of the enemy had not been great, amounting only to 31 killed and 60 wounded; but Nelson received a serious injury: a shot struck near him, drove sand and small gravel into one of his eyes, and deprived him of the sight of it.

By the advice of Paoli, a deputation of the Consulta, or Provisionary Council of Government, proceeded to London, to offer the ancient crown of Corsica to the King of Great Britain. The offer was accepted; and most Corsicans, and no doubt Paoli himself, expected that he would have been appointed viceroy. But the British government chose to send in that high capacity Sir Gilbert Eliot (afterwards Lord Minto), whom we have seen as a great parliamentary debater on the side of opposition, and as the bitter and unfair assailant of Sir Elijah Impey. This appointment gave almost universal dissatisfaction to the Corsicans, and certainly both hurt the pride and cooled the patriotism of Paoli—an old man indeed, being in his sixty-eighth year (a year younger than Lord Howe when he achieved the greatest of his victories), but still full of health, vigour, and activity, and with his intellect in better order than at any previous period of his life. Having alienated the affections of the islanders by a step which hurt them all, we set about gratifying them with a constitution, which the great body of the people, unfit and unprepared for any such regimen, neither understood nor cared about. Sir Gilbert Eliot, on the 21st of June, wrote exultingly to his government, "His majesty has acquired a crown; those who bestow it have acquired liberty. The British nation has extended its political and commercial sphere by the accession of Corsica; Corsica has added new securities to her ancient possessions, and has opened fresh fields of prosperity and wealth, by her liberal incorporation with a vast and powerful empire." But there was no chance of durability for these mutual benefits, for that must depend upon mutual good-will and the devotedness of the people to the new system. Even the constitution which Sir Gilbert Eliot helped to make, which he recognised and swore to for his sovereign and for himself, was a most crude and defective thing, containing the monstrous and inexcusable blunder of a parliament of only one house or chamber, the consequence of which must eternally be, that the representative will be in constant collision with the executive. It conferred trial by jury, which, among a people like the Corsicans of that time, can only be a curse, and the cause of murder and perpetual feuds. A remarkable piece of diplomatic impudence seems to demand a brief notice. The long since fallen and contemptible republic of Genoa not only claimed the restoration of some prizes taken by Corsican cruisers previous to the arrival of the English, but preferred a claim to the possession of the island itself. These demands did not meet with much attention; but orders were given that the Corsican privateers should respect the Genoese flag as that of a neutral state.

The management of the great armies of the coalition on the continent was, by many degrees, worse and more inexcusable than during the preceding year. The rising of the Polish patriots under Kosciusko distracted more than ever the attention of the Emperor and the King of Prussia; and induced his Prussian majesty to send a large army into Poland to secure the territories which had been allotted to him in the last partition, and to set up a pretension to more. Frederick William went into Poland to take the command of his army there, and the Duke of Brunswick, dissatisfied with his conduct, and discouraged by the bad termination of two campaigns, threw up the command of the Prussian army and its contingents on the Rhine. The King of Prussia even authorised some secret negotiations for a separate peace with the National Convention, and, when these manoeuvres became known, he frankly intimated that he would abandon the coalition unless he were retained by a liberal subsidy. A bargain—as bad a one as ever was struck—was concluded in the month of April: 2,200,000*l.* was to be paid to his Prussian majesty, who was to furnish an army of 62,400 men; the money to be provided by Great Britain and the States-General of the United Provinces (the only subsidizing powers in Europe), but not in equal proportions, for Great Britain was to pay more than five times as much as the Dutch. A great part of this subsidy went to Poland, where Frederick William remained. As more and more troops were required in that country, his army on the Rhine fell short of the stipulated number; and the gentlest thing that can be said of the conduct of this latter Prussian army in this year's campaign is that it was loose and spiritless.

In the Netherlands, where Austrians, English, Dutch, Hanoverians were to fight together, the campaign scarcely opened under better auspices: a great many of the Dutch, both officers and men, were lukewarm or democratic. The Duke of York quarrelled with the Austrian commanders, and refused to serve under General Clairfait. This ill-timed quarrel has been very generally attributed to the pride, petulance, and jealousy of rank of the young English prince; but it appears that he had better reasons for objecting to the supreme command of the Austrian general, who had evinced on various occasions an indifference to the common interest of the coalition, and even a readiness to sacrifice that interest to the views and objects of his own government. He had, too, in the preceding campaign worn out the patience of the best part of the English army by the slowness of his movements. The Duke of York was not a military genius, and possibly would never have become a great general under any circumstances; but he was badly mated, sadly hampered in this his brief career: his energy and bravery, if they had been allowed full play, might have maintained the war in a better manner than that in which it was carried on by the Austrian formulists. In order to restore harmony (which never was restored), it was agreed between the courts of London and Vienna, that the emperor himself should take the command of the army, that the Duke of York should serve under him, that the campaign should be opened with vigour on the French frontier, and that the heads of the columns should be again turned towards Paris.* It was also agreed, or rather projected, that the army of the King of Prussia should move from the Rhine by the valley of the Moselle, traverse Luxembourg, and join the allies on the Sambre, or co-operate with them in their advance; and England further undertook to send Lord Moira with 10,000 men to the coast of Britany to back the Vendceans, who seemed determined to make another effort, and to advance with them towards Paris from the west, while the English, Austrians, Prussians, &c. advanced from the north. It appears, too, that something more was expected from the Spaniards and Sardinians than a defensive war to cover their own territories—that it was hoped that the Spaniards, who had fought so well during the campaign of 1793, might advance from the Pyrenees, and that the King of Sardinia might hurl back the French from the Alps, repossess himself of Savoy, and once more open the road towards Lyons. Thus, this was still to be a “centrifugal war,” and those who had honestly built their hopes upon it seem to have lost sight of the inadequate strength of these five widely-separated armies. The emperor arrived early in April; but Francis II. was no soldier, was more methodical than any of his generals, and, though the flattering Imperialists of Brussels told him that the Gauls would tremble now that Cæsar was come, the fact proved otherwise.† As if to demonstrate from the beginning that there was to be no change of system, the emperor went with the main army and laid siege to Landrecies, a second-rate fortress. The republicans made several attempts for its relief, but they were defeated with considerable loss, and the place was obliged to surrender. But, as the allies already possessed on the same frontier Valenciennes, Condé, and Quenoy, Landrecies was far from being worth the time and trouble it had cost to take it; and, while the emperor was engaged here, Pichegru penetrated into West Flanders, where Clairfait was stationed with a division of the imperial army, and captured Courtrai and Menin before that slow

general could offer him any interruption. Another republican force, commanded by Jourdan, had entered the country of Luxembourg before the siege of Landrecies was begun; but while the siege continued Jourdan was allowed to increase his army to a prodigious extent. Without counting the Prussians, who were to come, but who never came, the allies, when they opened the campaign from the Netherlands, had not, altogether, above 200,000 effective men in the field, and these were absurdly scattered, divided, and subdivided under a perplexing variety of commands. The French, at the commencement of operations, must have had, at the least, 350,000 men (garrisons included) spread along this frontier, and later in the year, when their successes on or beyond their other frontiers allowed them to reinforce this army of the North, not only were all the losses it had sustained made up, but it was rendered much stronger than it was at the opening of the campaign. The republican generals cared little for the loss of a few thousands of men here and there, for the populous and armed hive was close behind them whence they could always draw reinforcements. On the other hand, the armies of the allies were recruited with slowness and difficulty. It is extremely difficult to get even to an approximation of the amount of the republican forces, for French writers, in applauding the energy of the central government, which raised them so rapidly, generally exaggerate numbers, and, in eulogising the conduct of these armies in the field, they always diminish numbers, as if calculating on a forgetfulness of their previous numerals and assertions. Taking their own lowest estimate, the levée en masse and régquisition permanente had given them in the preceding year 1,250,000 men, who were all put under arms to cover the frontiers or to fill the depôts in the interior. Of these troops, 450,000 had been brigaded, two battalions of the new levies being united with one battalion of troops of the line, and 800,000 men mixed in these proportions were on the frontiers or in the frontier fortresses at the beginning of the present year. They state that of these 800,000 men (which left in depôt 500,000) there were stationed under the Alps 100,000, under the Pyrenees 120,000, on the western coast, between Cherbourg and La Rochelle (to keep down the Vendéans and the Bretons) 80,000, on the Rhine 200,000, and along the frontier of the north (including the Ardennes, where there were 40,000 or 50,000) 300,000; but it appears certain that the numbers of four of these armies are overstated, in order to diminish the strength of the fifth, or army of the North, which alone had to sustain an obstinate war with the allies, whose main force and principal attack was in this quarter. The simplest rules of arithmetic ought to have taught the allies the absurdity of their plans and hopes (but some of them had no longer a hope left, and were only idling with the war); and the same simple rules ought to expose the mendacity of the French, who pretend that, notwithstanding the myriads they had in arms, they gained all their victories with handfuls of men, or with numbers incomparably less than those opposed to them. Jourdan, after being greatly reinforced from the army of the Rhine, fell upon the Austrian general, Beaulieu, who attempted to check his progress in Luxembourg. The Austrians were well placed behind fortified lines, and they fought bravely for two days; but Jourdan, throwing forward column after column, perplexing them with a variety of attacks, and then overwhelming them with numbers, drove them from their lines with great loss. Pichegru, after beating or outmanœuvring Clairfait, wheeled round upon the Duke of York, who, with about 30,000 men, chiefly English and Hanoverians, was stationed at Tournay; but here the republican general was repulsed in every attack he made, and compelled to retreat from a field which he left covered with his dead: the celerity of his movements and the superiority of his numbers were of no avail. Yet, on the very next day, the 11th of May, Pichegru took by surprise Clairfait, who had come up to try to retake Courtray. The Austrians, who had got possession of the suburbs, and who had thrown up some hasty works on the road that led from Bruges to Courtray, made a spirited resistance, driving back their assailants, and at one moment seemed secure of the victory, for the new levies of the French, who very generally fell into panics in their first actions, gave way and swept off some of the veteran troops with them; but the fugitives were rallied, the republican garrison made sorties, and after fighting for twelve hours Clairfait abandoned his ground, falling back into Flanders in good order, and taking up a position which enabled him to cover Ghent, Bruges, and Ostend. A few days after this Pichegru, impelled against his better judgment by the fanatical Saint-Just, who was en mission with the army, threw his right wing, under Kléber and Marceau, across the Sambre, to attack the Austrian general Kautnitz, who was lying there to cover some towns. Here the republicans were defeated with terrible loss, were driven back into the river and across it, and must have been utterly annihilated but for the over-caution and slowness of the Austrians and the good generalship of Kléber. The actual loss of the French was estimated at 4000. With spirits revived by this victory the allies came to the determination of waiting no longer for the Prussians, who showed no intention of moving, and whose march along the Moselle would have now been obstructed by Jourdan with an army far superior in numbers to their own: in a grand council of war they determined to envelop the left or chief and victorious part of the French army on the Marne, by moving upon it from the various points they occupied, in five attacking columns. But the success of these combined movements depended upon celerity and a perfect understanding among the leaders of the several columns; and, while quickness could be expected from none except the English column, there was, apparently, a total want of good understanding, good feeling, and concert among all the commanders. They took no proper measures for ascertaining the movements of the enemy, while all their own movements were promptly and correctly ascertained by the French, who still had a large portion of the population of the Netherlands in their favour. The Duke of York, whose experience of the Austrian slowness ought to have moderated his speed, dashed forward towards the appointed centre, round which all the columns were to meet; but at Turcoing, where he expected to see the head of Clairfait's column, he was enveloped by the republican columns of Souham and Bonnaud, was attacked by a force three times greater than his own, and completely defeated. The duke himself narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the enemy. The other columns of the allies which had moved so slowly, or which had scarcely moved at all, now fell into panic and confusion, and the Emperor Francis had the mortification of witnessing from the heights of Templeuve the retreat of the entire army of the coalition. He soon returned to Brussels, and then to Vienna, taking his great military adviser Mack with him, and leaving the Prince of Cobourg to command in his name. His departure was important in this respect—it served as a signal for the generals of different nations to burst out into loud, vehement reproaches against one another. The English and Hanoverian column, though it had suffered a terrible loss in the battle of Turcoing, soon rallied, and even foiled Pichegru in an attempt to seize or invest Tournay. The Austrian general Kaunitz, who had defeated Kléber and Marceau, gained another victory on nearly the same ground, and once more drove the French across the Sambre. But these exploits, only retarded the crisis: Jourdan, having nothing to do on the Moselle, brought the greater part of his army towards the Sambre, Pichegru and all the divisions under him were reinforced almost daily, fresh corps d'armée were drawn from the dépôts and advanced towards this theatre of war; for, whatever revolution took place in the central government at Paris, and whether power was in the hands of Robespierre and his party, or in the hands of those who overthrew him, there was no relaxation in these efforts, and the people, once in arms and encouraged by victories that never lost anything by quiet or modest reporting, were ready to march without any effort on the part of their strange government. More than ever war was the best and most profitable business for the French; and, if there had been other employment for them, they were losing their taste for it, through that incessant drilling and soldiering which was kept up in every part of the country. At the same time the reinforcements of the allies, which were to be brought from great distances, arrived very slowly and in very small numbers. Austria as well as Prussia had need of a large force on the side of Poland, unless she resigned herself to the loss of her share in another and final partition, and to the aggrandisement of her neighbour and rival. Pichegru, after some manoeuvres which perplexed the allies, struck off to the left and laid siege to Ypres. Clairfait, after waiting for reinforcements which never arrived, marched to the relief of the besieged town, and defeated Pichegru in a smart action. But the French general was reinforced immediately after by the brigade of Devinthier, and he turned upon Clairfait, who had been left without any support on the ground he had won—Prince Cobourg was coming, but not come. Pichegru recovered the ground he had lost, beat Clairfait, and took Ypres, the strong garrison of that place opening the gates, and piling their arms like traitors or cowards. In the meantime Jourdan marched to the siege of Charleroi, and called in troops, who moved with lighter baggage and a much quicker pace than any of their adversaries, to fall in from various points and join him. The Hereditary Prince of Orange was dispatched with a part of the army of the coalition to cover Charleroi; and the prince performed this duty so well that he defeated Jourdan in a pitched battle, and drove him across the Sambre. This was the third time in the course of the present campaign that the French had been compelled to recross that river. But again the republicans were reinforced, and their assailants not. A proclamation was issued by the Austrian authorities of Brussels exhorting the people of the Austrian Netherlands to rise en masse; but, if these people rose at all, it would be for the French and not for the emperor. In a few days Jourdan crossed the Sambre once more, and opened a tremendous bombardment upon Charleroi. When the place was reduced, and actually in the hands of the republicans, Cobourg came up, joined the Prince of Orange and General Beaulieu, and risked a general action to save the town. On the 26th of June Cobourg attacked Jourdan on the plains of Fleurus. At first the allies were very successful: the Prince of Orange drove in Jourdan's left, pursued it through the woods of Monceaux, and almost to the banks of the Sambre; but in this advance they were discouraged by learning for the first time that the garrison of Charleroi had capitulated; and Kléber brought some batteries to bear upon them, enveloped them in the wood of Monceaux, and drove them back with great loss. Nearly at the same moment Beaulieu thoroughly defeated on the extreme right of the French the division of Marceau, the greater part of which fled across the Sambre, and appeared no more on the field of battle. Even in the centre the republicans were worsted and driven out of some redoubts. Evening was advancing when Jourdan received a powerful reinforcement, including a great quantity of artillery, which continued to be supplied with still increasing profusion. Marceau, who had thrown himself, with that portion of his division which did not run away, into the village of Lambusart, close on the bank of the Sambre, was joined there by General Lefevre: Beaulieu attacked them both, and was gaining the village, when Jourdan brought all his corps de reserve to the threatened point. Here, and here only, the allies were at last beaten; but they had fought for thirteen hours in a hot summer day, and could bear up no longer against an enemy whose numbers were increased rather than diminished in the course of the battle; and, as night was setting in, the Prince of Cobourg ordered a general retreat. This was by far the hardest-fought battle of the campaign: the loss on both sides was very great; and all that the French could boast of was that they had repelled an attack. Cobourg retired in good order to Halle, and prepared to fight again for the preservation of what remained to the house of Austria in the Netherlands. But the sans-culottic portion of the Belgians now again declared everywhere for the French: Bruges, having only a weak garrison to resist the popular will, opened its gates to them; Pichegru, aided by General Moreau, compelled the Duke of York to retreat to Oudenarde, from Oudenarde to Tournay, and thence on to Antwerp. The places the English left in their rear followed the example of Bruges; and the English garrison at Ostend was embarked on board of transports, and brought round to the Scheldt. At Antwerp the Duke of York was joined by Lord Moira, with 10,000 British troops, who had been originally intended for the war in the Vendée, but who had not been got ready until some time after the terrible destruction of the Vendéans at Savenay. The duke's communications with Clairfait were re-established; and these two armies occupied the country between Antwerp and Louvain, holding both these towns, and Mechlin, which lay between them. Part of the army of Pichegru invested Valenciennes, Condé, Quesnoy, and Landrecies, those useless conquests of the allies; the Convention, which had before this ordered that no quarter should be given to any English or Hanoverian troops, sent a fresh decree commanding that the garrisons left in these places should be butchered to a man if they prolonged their defence; and these troops, otherwise disheartened, capitulated almost immediately. A grand junction was made between the armies of Pichegru and Jourdan, and 150,000 men advanced upon Brussels. Cobourg threw himself before them, and formed an entrenched camp in the forest of Soignies, in the hope of covering Brussels. When attacked, the Austrians stood their ground manfully for some time, and with their well-served artillery inflicted a severe loss: but the republican columns were precipitated upon them from all sides; masses succeeded to masses; and at last they were driven out of their entrenchments at the point of the bayonet. They retreated to Brussels, retreated through that town during the night, laying the sans-culottes in it to welcome the French, who entered in triumph on the 9th of July, just as the abundant harvests of the country were ripe for the sickle. The ancient town of Ghent had opened its gates to the republicans on the 5th. The Duke of York and Lord Moira were attacked by the enemy in great force on the 12th, and compelled to take shelter in Mechlin; but when the French attempted to dislodge them Lord Moira drove them back with loss. Three days after fresh columns of the republicans renewed the attack, and drove the English out of the place; and on the following day Clairfait was overwhelmed near Louvain, and obliged to abandon that city, as also Liege. So wretchedly had all things been managed, and so extensive had been the system of treachery, that not one of the strong fortresses which studded the country had been stored with provisions or ammunition for standing a siege: thus General Beau lieu was compelled to evacuate Namur, so renowned for the sieges it had stood in former days, and to leave it open to the enemy, without its costing them the trouble of firing a gun. The citadel of Antwerp, to which the Duke of York had retreated, was in no better case than Namur: the populace of the town were decided partisans of the French; and after staying there a week, in order to give the Dutch time to prepare for the defence of their own country on the other side of the river, the English crossed the Scheldt, and abandoned citadel and city to the French, who made another triumphal entrance without burning any gunpowder, except for a feu de joie, on the 23rd of July. Thus the whole of Austrian Flanders and Brabant fell under the dominion of the French in one short campaign. The Prince of Cobourg, after some altercations with the Dutch generals, who refused to join him in risking another battle, and after making a powerful appeal to his German brothers and friends on the Rhine and the Moselle, along all the frontier of Germany, to rise and arm themselves for the defence of their altars, their habitations, their emperor, their liberty, and the old Germanic honour; to bring provisions for the use of his army, to coin the treasures of their churches, the utensils and vases of silver, for the pay of their defenders (an appeal which made but little impression), withdrew from the command of the Imperial army. The emperor himself was so discouraged by the events of the war, and so irritated at the conduct of his ally the king of Prussia, that a notion got abroad of his intending to abandon the coalition, and seek a separate peace with the republicans. As Francis had all the old Austrian tenacity, it may be reasonably doubted whether he ever seriously thought of relinquishing his rich Netherland dominions without another struggle for them (to obtain them back from the French by negotiation, or by any peace that he could make with them, must have been an idea too visionary to be entertained), and the report of the secession was, perhaps, circulated only for the purpose of putting himself on a par with Prussia, by obtaining a round sum of money from England. Whatever were his feelings or motives, this was the effect produced. Alarmed at the sinister report, Pitt dispatched Earl Spencer, and his own relative, Mr. Thomas Grenville, to Vienna, and the diplomacy of these two envoys ended in our offering, and the emperor accepting, a very large subsidy, in the shape of a guarantee of a loan of four millions. A new treaty was concluded with the Duke of Brunswick, who engaged to furnish his Britannic majesty with a corps of 2289 men, infantry, light horse, and artillery, and all well trained and disciplined, completely armed and equipped, upon condition of his Britannic majesty's paying these troops on the same liberal scale on which he paid the Hessians in his service, and granting over and above to his serene highness the Duke of Brunswick an annual subsidy of about 16,000*l.* sterling. But it was too late in the year for these efforts to be of any use in the present campaign; and we had no security that the emperor would use the money in a proper manner in the campaign to come, while the Brunswick mercenaries were contemptible in number, considered with reference to an enemy who raised levies by half millions at a time, and marched armies of hundreds of thousands.

The Germanic Diet, at the beginning of the year, had agreed to a conclusum for a general armament of the people of the empire, of the burghers and peasantry of all the circles, electorates, principalities, and states comprised in the league. But the king of Prussia had declared that if this conclusum were not withdrawn and annulled, he would be forced to withdraw his troops, as he could not expose them to the danger which must necessarily result from such a measure. As many parts of his patchwork kingdom were disaffected to the house of Brandenburg, to which they had been united by force and fortune of war, and at very recent dates, he evidently feared that if the population were armed they might assert their independence, or struggle to be restored to the states and sovereigns to which they had formerly belonged. But these apprehensions were not good to put in a royal declaration, and therefore Frederick William gave other reasons for objecting to the bold and great measure which might have placed Germany in a condition to withstand the armed millions of France. He said that his reasons were—1. That by employing the peasantry against the enemy, agriculture would want hands. 2. That there were not arms sufficient to give to such a mass of people. 3. That it was impossible, in so short a time, to teach the manual exercise to the inhabitants. 4. That it had been found, by the experience of the two last campaigns, that the soldiers exposed to the French must be perfectly exercised to make head against them. 5. That it was infinitely dangerous, at a time like the present, when the French were watching every opportunity to insinuate their principles, to assemble such a mass of men, whose ideas upon forms of government must be various, and among whom, consequently, dissensions might arise, disastrous in their consequences both to the armies and to the constitution of the empire. The example of the French might have shown his Prussian majesty, if he had really wished to look at it, how the first four of his difficulties might have been overcome; and, as for his fifth objection, it was scarcely applicable to any part of Germany, except the provinces or states on the Rhine—the vast mass of the German people having a strong antipathy to French principles, and a natural incompatibility with the French character. Other electors, however, also shrunk from the execution of the bold project, for they were nearly all jealous and distrustful of one another, and none of them, except the House of Austria in their hereditary states, had an entire confidence in their own subjects. The conclusum of the Diet was let drop; twenty years of loss, humiliation, disgrace, were allowed to follow; and then, by acting upon its principle, the German people were armed as landwehr, and Germany was freed, and bore honourably her full part in putting down the oppressors of all Europe.

Early in the year, while these German potentates were disputing with each other, and discouraging, in many ways, the army on the Rhine, which stood in need of every encouragement after their unfortunate campaign of 1793, the French advanced, and took the fort of Kaiserslautern, the town of Spire, and several other towns and fortresses. Adhering to the routine of long winter-quarters, and to the principle that armies were not to take the field until the season of snow and frost was over, the German commanders had no forces on foot at all equal to contend with the republicans; nor was it until the month of May that they got a-field in earnest. The Prussians, who did not exceed 50,000 effective men, were now commanded by Count Marshal Möllendorf. Besides this force there was an Austrian army on the Rhine of about the same strength, some small contingent forces furnished by the lesser circles of the empire, and the emigrant army of Condé, which was still 12,000 strong—upon paper. Towards the end of May, Möllendorf, taking them by surprise, drove the French out of their entrenchments at Kaiserslautern, with slaughter, and took a good many of their guns. But from this time till the beginning of July, when the republicans were greatly reinforced, the Prussians and their allies did nothing of the least consequence. With a superiority of numbers which gave them the assurance of success, the French, who were moreover cheered by the intelligence of the successes obtained in the Netherlands, and the news of the battle of Fleurus, sought out Möllendorf, and on the 12th of July began a battle which was desperately maintained, at different points, during four whole days. On the night of the 15th, when both sides had suffered tremendous loss, the allies made a hasty retreat. The Imperialists crossed the Rhine, and the Prussians retired down the left bank of that river to Mayence. Neither of these armies was of any further use during the remainder of this campaign. A territory sixty miles in length was abandoned to the republicans, who marched to the easy reduction of Treves, and then poured down in great numbers to the Netherlands, to help to finish the war there, and after that to conquer Holland; for there was no intention of stopping short at the Scheldt and Roer, as Dumouriez had done in 1792.

The Duke of York assisted the Hereditary Prince of Orange in covering the United Provinces; but their force was miserably insufficient: the democratic party was again on tiptoe, corresponding with the French, giving every encouragement and assistance in their power to those liberators; and the Dutch army, infected by the same principles, or disheartened by toilsome retreats and many defeats, was, in more senses than the military one, demoralized. In Dutch Flanders, Cadsandt and Sluys were reduced by Moreau before the end of August; masses of men were thrown upon the retreating columns of Clairfait, who, after standing another battle, left Juliers and Aix-la-Chapelle to Jourdan. Clairfait rallied once more, and fought a battle, or a succession of battles, which lasted from the 29th of September to the 3rd of October; but this was the last effort his exhausted army could make, and his continued retreat left Cologne open to the French. He would have attempted to maintain himself in that old town, if he had found proper supplies, and a proper spirit among its inhabitants; but there was nothing of the kind: the people had been proselytized by the Jacobins, and Clairfait was therefore constrained to recross the Rhine with all expedition. The French were so close on his rear that they entered Cologne as the last division of his troops were hurrying over the river, and thus had the opportunity of shouting after them that that was not the road to Paris. Bonn, and other towns on the left bank of the Rhine, in the electorate of Cologne, submitted to the conquerors. These places were defenceless or weak; but Coblenz, a dependence of the electorate of Mayence, had been strongly fortified, and contained a considerable garrison, yet here too scarcely any resistance was made. The Imperialists retired to the other side of the river, and the republicans took possession of the place with exceeding great joy; for it had long been the head-quarters of the emigrant princes and nobles—the foyer of royalism and counter-revolutionism. Worms and several other towns threw open their gates. With the exception of Mayence, the French remained absolute masters of every place on the left bank of the Rhine between Landau and Nimeguen. On the Maes the strong fortress of Venloo had been allowed to be taken by a coup de main; and Bois-le-Duc, from which an obstinate resistance was expected, was surrendered by its Dutch garrison after a very short siege. The Duke of York, now stationed near Nimeguen, was cut off from all hope of reinforcement from Germany; for if the allies had meant to support him, which they certainly did not, they could not have sent their troops to him without making a circuitous march. He resolved, however, with such force as he had, to cover that important place, the possession of which by the French would greatly facilitate their advance into the heart of Holland. On their side the republicans resolved to drive him thence, hoping, by a decisive blow, to compel him and his English troops to retire from the defence of the United Provinces. To this end they attacked the Duke on the morning of the 19th of October, with 60,000 men, and compelled him to retreat from his covering positions. As the Duke, however, took up another position which equally prevented their investing Nimeguen, they attacked him again, with still greater numbers and fury, on the 27th of October, and finally compelled him to withdraw entirely, and leave the town to the chances of a siege. As Nimeguen was exceedingly strong by situation, and well garrisoned, it was expected that it would prove an exception to the general rule, and make a vigorous defence; but there were traitors within its walls in intelligence with the French, and the place was allowed to be surprised and carried a very few days after the Duke of York's retreat. Nearly at the same time Kléber, after a siege of only five weeks' duration, obtained possession of the formidable fortress of Maestricht, which was garrisoned by 8000 Dutchmen and Germans in the pay of the States-General, and which was abundantly supplied with provisions, stores, and all things necessary—except fidelity and courage. It is true that the French conducted their sieges upon a new system and with unprecedented numbers and fury: it is true that they astonished, perplexed, and struck with consternation the officers of the old school; but still the ease and rapidity of these operations can hardly be accounted for without admitting a very large amount of disaffection, treachery, and corruption on the part of the Dutch. Their disaffection is notorious, and proved by innumerable facts. With respect to the corruption, the French had the means of it in their hands, for every army had a chest of secret-service money furnished by the Convention. The Duke of York, with the wreck of his army, retreated across the Waal and the Rhine, and stationed himself at Arnheim in the province of Gelderland, with but a faint hope of stopping the progress of Pichegru, who had been appointed by the Convention to complete the conquest of Holland. We have often been assured by one who was in the duke's army, that such was the irritation of both officers and men at the conduct and countenance of the Dutch troops, that they would rather have fallen upon those allies than upon the French.

The Spaniards seemed to have spent their strength and spirit in their Roussillon campaign in the preceding year. Their finances had long been in a ruinous condition, and at present they husbanded such resources as they could command from a belief, which other powers shared in, that the sway of the Jacobins was drawing to a close; that public opinion fermenting in France would soon pronounce itself against the promoters of anarchy; in short, that a reaction was on the point of breaking out, and that the salutary crisis must be hastened by the least check the French might experience in this campaign.* They have, however, been censured too severely; for, after all, they kept their banners on the soil of the republic some time longer than any other power, and they fought on when the most terrible reverses were befalling the armies of the coalition on the side of Italy, on the Rhine, and in the Netherlands. The brave Ricardos, who had repeatedly beaten the French in 1793, was carried off by a sudden illness on the 3rd of March; Count O'Reilly, who was appointed to succeed him, died on his journey in the same sudden manner, and thereupon the command of the army of Roussillon fell to the Count de la Union, who had distinguished himself in the preceding campaign under the orders of Ricardos. On the other side Dugommier, a native of Guadeloupe, and one of the very bravest and best of the generals of the republic, was sent by the Convention to take the command of the French troops, which had been prodigiously reinforced. The republicans had remained on the defensive ever since the winter. Early in April Dugommier succeeded, by a number of feigned attacks, which his numerical superiority allowed him to make on various points at once, in detaching large forces from the Spanish centre, which lay in a fortified camp at Boulon; and on the 1st of May the French made a general attack on that centre, and carried, after a hot engagement of six hours, the two redoubts of la Trompette and Montesquieu, the chief defences of the Spanish camp. As Dugommier had blocked up all other roads, the defeated Spaniards were obliged to retire by the narrow and difficult road of Morallès, and to abandon a great part of their artillery. La Union could not rally his men until they were within their own frontiers: he then took up a position in front of Figueiras, and covered that important fortress, the key of Catalonia. The Spanish garrisons he had left behind in Roussillon, in the forts of St. Elme, Portvendre, and Colliouvre, though beleaguered by immense forces, made a gallant resistance. The garrison of St. Elme made one bold sortie, in the course of which Dugommier, badly wounded, had the greatest difficulty to escape on the shoulders of some of his grenadiers. At last, when a breach was opened, the Spaniards abandoned this fort, and, with the garrison of Portvendre, which was no longer tenable, they threw themselves into Fort Colliouvre. This place, being assailed by 20,000 men, could not hold out very long, but the Spaniards nobly defended themselves until they found the opportunity of sending off in fishing-boats a corps of French emigrants, the remnant of "the Legion of the Queen," who were serving with them, and who were doomed to death by the laws of the pitiless republic. As soon as these unhappy men were safe the garrison made an honourable capitulation. The Spanish flag still floated over the French fortress of Bellegarde, one of the strongest fortresses at the foot of the Eastern Pyrenees, and which the Spaniards, who held it for nearly fifteen months, had put in good repair. Even the impetuous Dugommier shrunk from a close siege and assault, and contented himself with closely blockading Bellegarde. La Union made several vigorous attempts to relieve the place, but failed every time: at last, on the 18th of September, after a blockade of four or five months, the garrison of four or five thousand men was fairly starved out of the place and obliged to surrender. Early in October Dugommier poured his columns into Catalonia, and drew them up in front of a long line of posts which the Spaniards had established to check the invasion. About the middle of the month he attacked these posts from three several points: leading on the centre himself, he was killed by a cannon-ball; his left column of attack was repulsed with terrible loss: the centre was not more fortunate; but the right, led on by Augereau, carried everything before it, and obtained possession of a part of La Union's line. Everywhere the loss seems to have been considerable: the attack was not renewed until after two or three days; but then Perignon, who had succeeded Dugommier, drove the Spaniards from all their remaining positions and entrenchments. La Union, fighting on foot like a common soldier, and making every effort to rally his troops, was killed. As he had never contemplated the possibility of a defeat, he had made no arrangements for securing a retreat; and, while he had been engaged in front, a French division had got into his rear, and now actually blocked up the road to Figueiras. This increased the panic of the flying army, who took another route, and never rallied till they reached Bascara, a position between Figueiras and Gerona. Though thus left to itself, Figueiras, with 200 pieces of artillery on its ramparts, with a garrison of 10,000 men well supplied with ammunition and provisions, might reasonably have been expected to hold out for a few months: through panic, or frenzy, or treachery, it surrendered in a few days, leaving Catalonia open to the invaders, and supplying them with artillery and other abundant means of war. On the Western Pyrenees, on the side of the Biscayan provinces, the Spaniards had gained some trifling advantages at the beginning of the year; but, after standing for some months on the defensive, the reinforced republicans burst into the valley of the Bastan, overwhelmed the Spaniards in two engagements, captured Fuenterrabia, and advanced rapidly towards the commanding fortress of San Sebastian. Not only were the Spanish troops far inferior in number to their assailants, but they were environed with disaffection and treachery. The never-ending antipathies between the Basques and their fellow-subjects were not overlooked by the French: Pinet, an adroit commissioner of the Convention, persuaded some people of Guipuscoa that they might establish a separate republic altogether independent of Spain in the Biscayan provinces; Michelena, the alcalde of San

Sebastian, with some other notabilities of that place, succeeded in delivering it up to the French republicans; and other madmen, deluded by the same dream of independence under the motherly protection of France, rendered Pinet and the army some important services in other quarters.* Tolosa, the capital of Guipuscoa, was abandoned almost immediately afterwards; but this was an open town, little capable of defence. The majority of the people of the province, if they had ever been duped, soon saw their error, and flying to arms they joined their neighbours in Biscay and Navarre, and for every other foot of ground the French had to fight, and to fight desperately. But the invaders had secured, without fighting, a good basis of operations; their commander Muller was replaced by Moncey, an officer of much greater ability, and they were reinforced with infantry, cavalry, and artillery, there being among these new arrivals one of those columns called "the Infernal," which had been seasoned to war and atrocity in the Vendée. In the month of October, when Moncey had sixty-six battalions of infantry, four thousand horse, and three brigades of artillery, he received the peremptory orders of the Convention to overrun the whole of the Basque provinces, occupy Navarre, seize upon Pampeluna, and transfer his camp to the banks of the Ebro. Moncey would have hesitated and remonstrated, but this no general of the republic durst do as yet; and what was still more to his disadvantage was, the not uncommon circumstance of the commissioners or proconsuls with the army insisting upon directing its movements. Under these mischievous agencies the French general led his columns into Roncesvalles, that deep valley formed by the Pyrenees of Navarre, between Pampeluna and Saint-Jean-Pié-de-Port on the French frontier—the pass in which, according to poets and romances, Charlemagne and all his paladins had been put to "dolorous rout" by the people of Navarre. He was harassed at every step, and on the 16th and 17th of October he obtained, with the loss of three thousand of his best men, a victory which gave to him nothing but a momentary occupation of the renowned valley, and to the commissioners of the Convention some romantic materials for a dispatch to Paris.† Winter was fast approaching, the tops of the Pyrenees were soon covered with

* Alcalde Michelena and his friends met with their proper reward. Having assembled at Guetaria, as an independent Convention, charged by the people with the high office of constituting the republic, they were seized by Pinet and brought to trial before a French military court, which condemned some of them to death as rebels, and sent the rest into France as close prisoners.

† Messieurs Baudot and Garant wrote to the Convention—"Citizens, the army of the Western Pyrenees, by obtaining a signal victory over the Spaniards, has avenged an old insult inflicted on the French nation. Our ancestors, in the days of Charlemagne, were defeated in the plain of Roncesvalles. In memory of that event, the proud Spaniard had erected a pyramid on the field of battle. Defeated in turn, on the same spot, by the French republicans, he has, with his own blood, effaced all traces of it. Nothing was left but the frail edifice, which has been instantly demolished. The banner of the republic now waves where floated the standard of kingly pride, and the fostering tree of liberty has replaced the destructive club of the tyrant. The inauguration was followed by affecting and warlike music. The shades of our forefathers have been comforted, and the army of the republic has sworn to conquer for the glory of the French name of all ages, and for the happiness of the country."

deep snow, provisions were falling short, and, unless the republicans could force their way to Pampeluna, they must retreat to Saint-Jean-Pié-de-Port. It is said that Moncey, who knew the difficulties of his situation, would have returned at once, and that the ignorant commissioners again forced him to act against his better judgment. The Spaniards, after their late reverses, had retreated in good order, and, under the command of General Colomera, they now occupied excellent ground at the head of the pass between Moncey and Pampeluna. The French attacked them there on the 26th of November: the French left wing was completely defeated at Ortiz; one of their divisions was on the point of being cut off, when Moncey made a skilful diversion, and then ordered an immediate retreat. The republicans poured down Roncesvalles under cover of the night, leaving behind them their sick and wounded, who were very numerous. By the 29th the Spaniards had recovered their old positions; and the French, instead of wintering pleasantly in the city of Pampeluna, on the banks of the Ebro, were obliged to take up their cantonments in the part of Guipuscoa of which they had obtained possession, in the valley of Bastan, and at Saint-Jean-Pié-de-Port.*

On the side of the Alps the republicans were indebted for many advantages to the credulity, simplicity, or stupidity of the King of Sardinia, who conceived that they would respect the neutrality (to them a most friendly neutrality) of the republic of Genoa, the territories of which covered on one side the rich plains of Piedmont, and by the Bocchetta and other passes afforded access to Alessandria, and to his capital, Turin. In perfect reliance on this respect for neutrality, Vittor Amedeo neglected to fortify himself on that side, collecting nearly all his strength in the passes of the Alps, which led from Nice and from Savoy, countries of his own which had been conquered and occupied, and attached to France. The easy credulity of the court of Turin was the less excusable, as they had before their eyes abundant proofs of the disregard of these new republicans for the old law of nations, as the weakness and venality of the Genoese government, and the existence of a strong French party both in that government and among the Genoese people, were matters of notoriety, and as the French had already treated Genoa in a most insolent and arbitrary manner. The Convention had threatened that proud city with destruction, because the English fleet had seized French ships on the coast and in the harbours of the Genoese republic: the government had made the most humiliating excuses, but they had only purchased a temporary pardon by paying four millions of livres, half into the treasury of Paris, and half to the 'Army of Nice' (now called prospectively the 'Army of Italy'), for no other crime than their having permitted what they could not possibly prevent. At one moment they had run a narrow risk of seeing their beautiful city bombarded by the British fleet, solely on account of their subserviency to the French. On the 30th of May the three commissioners from the Convention superintending the operations of this army of Italy—Robespierre, the younger, Saliceti, the Corsican, and Ricord, another potent Jacobin—printed at Nice, and sent into the contiguous states of the Genoese republic, a memorable manifesto, telling the people that the French well knew that the kings and tyrants contemplated taking possession of all the territories belonging to Genoa, to put them under the dominion of their hated neighbour, the despot of Piedmont, in order that he might send his armies through them to attack the territories of the French republic; that, therefore, the French found themselves obliged, out of regard to their own safety, to anticipate the designs of their enemies, by marching their army of Italy into the Genoese territories, &c. The manifesto was closely followed by the advance of a part of the army of Italy. On the 2nd or 3rd of April sixteen thousand men, under the command of Dumorbion, marched upon Mentone, a town in the little principality of Monaco, close on the western frontier of the Genoese republic; and on the night of the 5th of April they sent forward General Arena, another Corsican, to Vintimiglia, the first Genoese town beyond that border, to inform the governor of it, that France demanded a free passage, that the army of the republic was in full march, and would presently be under the walls of the town. The governor, a right noble Spinola, whose ancestors had been great in arms, protested against the violation of neutrality; but protests were worse than useless: the handful of Genoese soldiers in the town mounted the tricolor cockade; and on the following morning Dumorbion's army, with Arena in the van, and Massena in the rear, crossed the Genoese frontier, and entered Vintimiglia.* By this advance they were not only opening their way towards the passes of the Apennines, but they had actually turned some of the King of Sardinia's positions on the Alps, and were opening upon more than one ill-defended pass in that chain. One of their columns, leading to the left, took possession of the Marquisate of Dolceacqua, a territory belonging to the King of Sardinia, and drove a weak Piedmontese garrison to the other side of the mountains; another column, ascending lofty and rugged mountains, drove the Piedmontese from the heights of Col delle Forche, and possessed themselves of a direct though narrow and rough pass leading to Saorgio, the most important of all the King of Sardinia's fortresses on this side, the place which had kept the French so long at bay, and which was the key to nearly all the rest; and a third division of Dumorbion's army, keeping towards the sea-coast, seized upon the little town and port of San Remo, belonging to the Genoese, and then fell upon Oneglia, the only seaport in Italy that then appertained to the King of Sardinia, and the only place through which he could receive assistance from, or promptly correspond with, the English fleet in the Mediterranean. Since the French bombardment which had nearly reduced Oneglia to a heap of ruins at the end of the year 1792, the town had been partially repaired, and the seaward defences had been strengthened; but as an attack by land, only to be made by violating the Genoese territory, had not been anticipated, no preparations had been made to resist it: there were some Piedmontese troops in the town and neighbourhood, but their total number was small. Being, however, joined by the sailors and people of Oneglia, these troops posted themselves on some heights, and made a gallant effort to defend the approaches to the town. But Massena, who led this division, dislodged these brave men, though not without suffering a frightful loss, and then took possession of Oneglia, which was deserted and silent as the grave, for the inhabitants, on his approach, had all fled to the mountains. Massena next advanced to Loano, whence he soon moved to the bridge of Nava, to which point his late adversaries had retreated. Those Piedmontese soldiers were joined by some fifteen hundred Austrians; but this united force was incapable of resisting the strong columns and superabundant artillery which the French brought against them. After this victory Massena issued terrible manifestos, threatening with destruction all the slaves that should attempt to oppose his progress or enter into a hopeless struggle with the invincible armies of the French republic, but promising at the same time friendship, favour, honour, liberty, and equality to all such as would throw off the yoke of their king, &c. A greater than Massena was with this army, and is said not only to have directed some of its best movements, but also to have suggested the whole plan of the campaign: this was Napoleon Bonaparte, who had been recently raised to the rank of brigadier-general of artillery. From the bridge of Nava the republicans pushed forward to Ormea, Garresio, Bagnasco, preceded by terror, and the most extravagant reports of their audacity and numbers. No further resistance was offered, and, excepting the fortress of Ceva, they were now masters of the whole of the valley of the Tanaro, which gives access to the heart of Piedmont.*

In the mean time another strong division of the army of Italy, moving from Nice, had carried a number of Piedmontese outposts on the Col de Tende, had even captured the hill and fort of Raus, where they had been completely defeated the year before, and were now gathering close round Saorgio, to co-operate with the column which had possessed itself of the Col delle Forche, the heights of Dolceacqua, and the pass that led from that opposite direction to Saorgio, which place, if found too formidable for an assault, was to be closely blockaded. On a near approach to this formidable place the boldest gave up all notion of assault, and in order to establish a blockade it was necessary to get possession of the upper parts of the Alpine valley in which it was situated, and of the heights of Col Ardenle, which the Piedmontese had fortified. But the advance into the Genoese territory had opened another rough road which led across the valley of the Roia to the rear of Col Ardenle, and Massena marched in force, and with wonderful rapidity, considering the nature of the ground, by this new route. Before the Piedmontese general Colli could bring up any reinforcements from the plains, he was attacked and defeated; and on the 27th of April the French became masters of Col Ardenle, of other crests of the Alps, and of all the valley above Saorgio. The blockade was now completed, and the garrison cut off from Piedmont. The place, however, was well supplied, and a long resistance was expected from it (at least by the King of Sardinia), when, at the beginning of May, Sant Amore, the commandant, capitulated, and thus left another passage to Turin open to the French. Colli had sent this coward or traitor orders to defend Saorgio to the utmost extremity, informing him that he would soon return with his army reinforced to its relief. Upon arriving at Turin, whither he and his garrison were permitted to go, upon condition of not serving any more against the French during this war, Sant Amore was brought to trial before a military tribunal, was condemned and shot, together with the commandant of another fortress who had behaved equally ill. Vittor Amedeo and his court were incensed at the numerous acts of treachery which had been committed; but it is doubted whether these executions did their cause any good. After the reduction of Saorgio, the invaders, with comparative ease, made themselves masters of the whole of the Col de Tende, the loftiest point of those maritime Alps. The troops of the king all retired disheartened and in confusion to the plain of Piedmont or to the roots of the Alps; and only the fortresses at the mouths of the passes on the Piedmontese side of the mountains checked the advance of the French to the banks of the Po and the city of Turin. Vittor Amedeo had now lost one-half of his states and the principal passes and defences of the Alps (for another French army advancing from the side of Savoy was climbing Mont Cenis and the Little St. Bernard), but he did not yet lose heart or think of relinquishing the struggle. He ordered a levy en masse, but unfortunately Jacobin clubs had been established in nearly all the towns of Piedmont, active conspiracies against the royal government were in progress, and a very considerable portion of his subjects were either disaffected or dispirited. He applied to the King of Naples and Sicily, a member of the coalition, for assistance, and Ferdinand was going to send an army of 18,000 men to the north of Italy, to the plains of Lombardy and Piedmont, when the discovery of a republican conspiracy among his own subjects at Naples, and other critical events, compelled him to delay that project. The other independent Italian states were either powerless or timid: the republic of Venice, which might have made a great effort at this moment, preferred listening to French flatteries, assurances, and promises, and, without the same excuse for its conduct, behaved as pusillanimously as Genoa. At this very moment the Venetian senate received Lallemand, an ambassador appointed by Robespierre and the committee of Salut Public, and suspended a levy of troops which had been ordered a short time before for the defence of their continental possessions. The Austrians in Lombardy, who were apprehensive of plots and conspiracies in all their part of Italy, and who thought themselves obliged to strengthen their own garrisons and their own frontier, could not spare many reinforcements to the emperor's army serving with the troops of the King of Sardinia; they, however, afforded some assistance when the danger became imminent, and this was the only succour the Piedmontese at present received. The republican army, called the Army of the Alps, which had moved from Savoy towards the passes of Mount Cenis and St. Bernard, had taken the field earlier and in much greater number than the army of Italy that started from Nice; and it was by inducing the King of Sardinia to collect the mass of his forces in these Graian Alps above Savoy that the Col de Tende and the rest of the maritime Alps had been weakened. While the snow was lying deep, not merely on the lofty mountains, but in the valleys, the army of the Alps gained the crests of the Cenis, the St. Bernard, and the Valaisan, and, taking the Piedmontese and the Austrians by surprise, drove them from their redoubts and gained possession of the heads of some of the valleys, which lead down to Piedmont and open upon Turin at the distance of only twenty-five or thirty miles from it. They were in full march through the Alpine valley of Aosta and within a few miles of the capital town of that province when the king's eldest son, the Duke of Montferrat, advancing up the valley from the Italian side with such volunteers, militia, and regular troops as he could most readily collect, brought the head of their column to a stand, and then beat them back to their less comfortable quarters among the snow and ice. Another division of the republicans, climbing another mighty Alp, captured the Fort Mirabocca, and then, descending on the other side by the valley or pass of Lucerna, they occupied Bobbio and other Alpine towns or villages belonging to the King of Sardinia, and even threatened the strong fortress of Pinerol with assault: but here again the Piedmontese behaved manfully, driving back the invaders to the lofty ridges from which they had descended. It was the middle of May before the main body of this Army of the Alps, led on by General Dumas, completely cleared the important pass of Mont Cenis, which was defended by forts, batteries, and redoubts, some old, and some recently erected. Dumas, who had studied mountain warfare, and who had all the Savoyard peasantry, who best knew the country, heartily disposed to assist him, found ways for his troops which the Piedmontese and Austrian generals had considered impassable: he marched to his great enterprise by moonlight, and so divided and directed his forces that they fell upon the three principal redoubts at one and the same moment. Though taken by surprise, and thrown into an almost superstitious consternation at seeing the French descending heights which had been considered impracticable, and rising out of hollows and chasms and black abysses, the allies for some time stood properly to their guns; but when the broad moonlight disclosed a fresh column of assailants on the edge of a rock which was in the rear of the principal redoubt, and which almost overhung it, the men burst away panic-stricken, leaving their artillery and everything in the redoubt behind them. The troops in the other redoubts abandoned their posts without firing another gun, and the whole host fled with mad haste down the steep valley of Susa. Among the fugitives were some Savoyard royalists, who, to escape the guillotine, which the republicans had established at Chambery, threw themselves over precipices and were dashed to pieces. A part of the French never ceased the pursuit until they reached the walls of Susa. All the artillery, ammunition, and provisions collected on the summits of the mountain and in the redoubts fell into their hands, together with a large quantity of musketry which the Piedmontese had thrown away in their flight. The short moonlight fight had given the republicans possession of the important pass, of all its defences, with the single exception of Fort la Brunette, which stood upon a detached solid rock, but which did not materially interfere with their possession of the pass. Dumas then spent some months in inactivity, not considering himself strong enough to venture through the valley of Susa and into the plain between Rivoli and Turin, where the King of Sardinia, with the main body of his army, and Count Wallis with Austrian troops hastily drawn from Pavia, Lodi, Cremona, Como, Milan, Mantua, and other parts of Lombardy, were stationed, with their flanks well covered by rivers, their fronts by redoubts, and with a fine high-road and all the resources of Turin in their rear. The army of Italy, for somewhat similar causes (as another good army of Piedmontese and Austrians had gradually gathered at the mouths of the passes of the maritime Alps and Apennines), was equally inactive. It appears, too, that some doubts were entertained as to the humour of the Genoese; and, perhaps, a plan was concerted for taking possession of the city of Genoa and all the strong places within the narrow limits of that republic before they crossed the Apennines, and left them in their rear: for, on the 13th of July, the deputies of the Convention, who were still superintending the operations of the army, gave Bonaparte a commission to proceed to Genoa, with secret instructions to examine the state of the fortifications and to observe the conduct of the Genoese government towards the English and other belligerent powers. At last, however, learning that the Piedmontese and Austrians were projecting an attack along their line of posts, with the hope of compelling them to evacuate the passes and the Genoese territory, they scaled the Apennines, descended into Piedmont by the valley of the Bormida, and, on the 21st of September, attacked the allies at Cairo, where they were strongly intrenched. The republicans were conducted to the assault by Dumorbion, Massena, Laharpe, Napoleon Bonaparte, Saliceti, and Albitte (the two civilians being now the commissioners from the Convention), and Buonaroti, an enthusiastic Florentine, a descendant from the family of Michael Angelo, who had abandoned his country to become a republican and demagogue at Paris, and what was called a national agent. They attacked in three columns, with their usual impetuosity and assurance of victory; but they were repulsed with the loss of six hundred of their best men, and obliged to retire to the declivities of the Apennines, from which they had moved to begin the battle. Yet, on the very next day, the allies withdrew their artillery and stores, abandoned their strong positions, and retired across the Bormida to Acqui, fearing that the autumnal swelling of the river might interrupt their communications with that town, which they had made their dépôt, or, according to another account, retreating upon false intelligence artfully given by some of the many friends of the republicans, that another French army, collected at Savona, was about to strike through another pass of the Apennines and throw itself between Acqui and Cairo. At first the republicans could not believe that they were gone; next they fancied it was a ruse de guerre to draw them in pursuit into the plain, where the Austrian cavalry could act with advantage; but at last they ventured forward as far as Cairo and the other possessions which had been abandoned. On the other side of the Apennines, or at least so long as they had been in the Genoese territory, the French had behaved with moderation; but now they gave way to all their wonted excesses, plundering the towns and villages, destroying what they could not carry off, burning the vineyards, which there produced a delicious fruit and a generous wine, and subjecting the poor Piedmontese peasantry and their wives to every humiliation, barbarity, and horror. After three days of these practices they crossed the mountains in haste, apprehending an attack from the allies, who were collecting in greater force at Acqui: they returned to their former stations in the Genoese territory, and threw up redoubts to defend themselves in case the allies should cross the Apennines: their head-quarters were fixed at Vado, a town near the coast, which they strongly fortified. Nothing more was done this year: but the republicans had done much; the bulwarks of the Alps and Apennines were in their hands, the road was opened into Italy, and an excellent basis laid for future operations. It had taken them three years, enormous sums of money, and prodigious sacrifices of life to achieve these great objects; but the work was done at last.*

* "It was on the 6th day of April," says Botta, "that the republican army of France appeared for the first time on Italian territory: its aspect was squalid and miserable, but with that confident appearance which becomes conquerors."—Storia d'Italia.

* The republican army had not been long in Italy before it was materially improved in substance as well as in appearance. They had come hungry and half naked; they now found the best of bread, good wine, abundance of provisions, and good cloth to clothe themselves in. In the town of Ormea alone they found provisions enough to last them for months, and a great quantity of cloth, which they cut up into loose greatcoats, without caring for uniformity of colour.

In Paris, meanwhile, the different factions had waged a fiercer war upon one another than that which the armies had carried on in the field. No sooner were the Girondists exterminated than jealousies and deadly hatreds broke out among the victorious Jacobins themselves. Hébert became the head of a party which put itself in direct opposition to Robespierre. These Hébertists were for some time all-powerful in the commune, exceedingly popular in Paris, and with all the extreme sans-culottes: they shared in the executive power by holding places in the salut public and in others of the governing committees: they had the 10,000 men of the armée révolutionnaire of Paris completely at their bidding, Ronsin, the general of that army, being one of the chiefs of their party; and in the Convention they for a season could command a majority of votes—a fact which first made Robespierre determine that that legislature should be purged anew, and that the Hébertists should be treated like the Girondists. But, as Hébert and his friends were so powerful, it was necessary to proceed against them slowly and with extreme caution. In installing atheism and the worship of the Goddess of Reason the Hébertists well knew that they were declaring mortal war—a war without quarter—against Robespierre, who by speeches and by writings, by declarations repeatedly made both in the Convention and in the Jacobin Club, had pledged himself to the support of a pure deism, and who (if any one thing is clear in his mysterious character) was really a determined and fanatical deist. With bitterness of soul he had yielded for the moment to the preponderance of Hébert, Chaumette, Cloutz, and that atheistical herd; but he believed that a large portion of the French people still retained a respect for Christianity, that a still larger portion, though rejecting all revealed religion, clung to the belief of a God and to the hope of the immortality of the soul; and he nicely calculated that the strength of these opinions would come to his aid in his death-strife with Hébert. In a manner it was Robespierre that was now invoking the respectabilities; but what he considered as this class was a body of the people, of better sans-culottes, who differed enormously in power as in numbers from the classes of society on which the Feuillants and Girondists had leaned. Hitherto the revolution had been a game in which the man or the parties who went farthest obtained the prize and kept it until some other man or party went still farther; but now Robespierre was to obtain his supreme power by checking this onward movement, and by destroying the Hébertists, who had already gone beyond his limits in other things besides the promulgation of atheism, and who were bent upon going to still greater extremes. For some time this new system, which was in itself a species of conservatism or counter-revolutionism, seemed, in the Convention at least, but a hopeless business, for the majority, which was only a majority through the fears and cowardice of the Plain or middle party, who had trimmed and shifted on all occasions, voting in one month measures tenfold more iniquitous than measures they had opposed the month before, seemed to support Hébert, to have no preference for deism over atheism, and to be perfectly indifferent to those "moral ideas" and that belief in a God which Robespierre advocated as things essential to the happiness of mankind and the existence of a pure republic. As early, however, as the month of December, 1793, the "Incorruptible" felt sufficient confidence in his own strength in the Jacobin Club to ridicule and denounce Hébert and his new religion or worship of Reason, to declare that some belief was necessary to man, and that, "if the Divinity did not exist, a wise legislator would have invented one." And a day or two after delivering this speech, which appears to have been applauded by the club, Robespierre rose in the Convention to expose the danger and absurdity of atheism, and to connect the ultra-revolutionists and their designs with Pitt, and England, and all the foreign enemies of France—a trick which could never be played off too often, and which hardly ever failed of success, play it who might. He represented that the banded kings, finding themselves foiled and beaten by the armies of the republic, were labouring more than ever to discredit the revolution, and to render it odious in the eyes of Europe, in all parts of which a God at least was held a necessary part of belief; that these tyrants had still their secret emissaries in France, who were labouring to overthrow the republic by means of republicanism, and to spread the flames of civil war by means of philosophy. After insinuating that Cloutz the German, Hébert, Chaumette, Ronsin, and the other atheists, were acting in concert with these secret emissaries, he conjured the Convention to exert itself for the prevention of extravagances and follies which coincided with the plans of the foreign conspiracy; and he demanded that the commune of Paris should no longer be permitted to tyrannize over men's consciences, and to serve the enemies of France by inconsiderate acts which gave offence to all religious opinions. He was even enabled to carry a vote prohibiting all acts of violence and measures contrary to the liberty of worship; but the Convention would not at present go farther than this, nor had he the courage to propose the shutting up of the temples of Reason, which had become temples of prostitution and every other debauchery. Camille Desmoulins, Fabre d'Églantine, Philippeaux, and other Cordelier

Jacobins, once at the head of all movements, sided with Robespierre in his present conservatism; and it was Camille Desmoulins, who in earlier days had prided himself in his popular title of "Procureur de la Lanterne," that gave the Hébertists the name of ultra-revolutionists. Danton, the sonorous chief of this Cordelier party, though he had become strangely indolent and neglectful, declared himself frankly against Hébert and his gang. Hereupon the Hébertists collected shocking stories—many of them perfectly true and notorious—of Danton's venality, dissipation, and extravagance; and, after assailing him with this light artillery in their newspapers and pamphlets, they attacked him with their heavier guns in the Convention. This brought Danton back to Paris from his luxurious retreat in the country. Not satisfied with exculpating himself, this Mirabeau of the sans-culottes inculpated the Hébertists, accusing them, more openly than Robespierre had done, of complicity, with the secret emissaries of tyrants, of a bottomless immorality, of a thirst for blood which nothing could satisfy; and, encouraged by his presence and bold oratory, Philippeaux and others, who had held commands in that war, denounced the tremendous atrocities which had been perpetrated, and which were still perpetrating, in the Vendée, attributing them all to orders received from the Hébertists, or to a few sanguinary monsters who had been promoted by them and sent into that unhappy country. For the first time for many a long day cruelty and crimes were called by their proper names, and the walls of the Convention were made to echo with indignant demands for stopping carnage and returning to the paths of moderation and mercy. Camille Desmoulins now began to publish a new journal under the title of "The Old Cordelier," intimating by the name that the new Cordeliers, the Héberts, Chaumettes, Momoros, and all that faction, though now trying to domineer in the club, had departed entirely from the original principles of the society. Camille had married a rich young wife, and Danton had also married a lady described as young, fair, and otherwise interesting, and, if she was not rich, Danton had abundance of money derived chiefly from his first missions in Belgium. In short, both these revolutionary heroes, poor as poor could be in 1789, had now attained to affluence, high consideration, and domestic comfort; and therefore they were anxious that the revolution should go no farther. Danton had never been an enthusiast except in words and orations: Desmoulins's madness seemed really to have been calmed down by his prosperity, and charmed away by his charming young wife. It was well for humanity that both these gentle Benedicts had not got far beyond the happy transports of the honeymoon! The "Vieux Cordelier," with its novel lessons of mercy and gentleness, made a very great impression, more particularly upon those who, like the editor, had gained affluence and consideration during the overthrow of old things, and the re-construction of the political system; Camille too, though absurdly overpraised, as a Machiavelli in profundity and a Voltaire in wit,* was certainly a vivacious writer: by degrees it became quite a fashion, quite a rage, to read what he wrote. Even the lowest and most rabid of the Parisian sans-culottes began to think or say that there was more reason and philosophy in the "Vieux Cordelier" than in the "Père Duchêne"—that Hébert's style was too low, &c. There was one particular passage which made a great sensation: it was a picture of the present time in the form of a picture of the past, or of the tyranny and suspicion which deluged Rome with blood under Tiberius, and the other bad or worst of emperors. Drawing his facts from the dark repertory of Tacitus, and placing them in an antithetical and startling manner, he showed that every man of any eminence, or in any place of government, was suspect, and that, in all cases, the word suspect was equivalent to death; that the courts of justice became mere slaughter-houses; that no men flourished except vile informers, who possessed themselves of the property and even the names of the victims they denounced as suspect; that even poverty was no security, as poor men might become desperate, and must therefore be very suspect. Danton encouraged Camille, and Robespierre himself not only gave his approbation to the "Vieux Cordelier," but also read and corrected the proofs for the author. But Camille very soon committed great indiscretions in his paper and in conversation, venturing to speak disrespectfully of Robespierre's right-hand man Saint-Just, and even to expend some witticisms on the great Incorruptible himself. He described Saint-Just as a solemn youth, puffed up with pride and conceit, who "carried his head as if it were a Saint-Sacrament:"—which provoked from the said Saint-Just the retort that he would make the said Camille carry his own head like Saint-Denis, in his hand or under his arm. Forgetting that he was playing with a tiger, Camille joked Robespierre, who had always preserved the dress and manners of a gentleman, upon his aristocratic tastes, and reminded him and the public that, in former times, he had prefixed the feudal particle de to his name. But, until he should be able to annihilate the Hébertists by the aid and assistance of this old Cordelier party, Robespierre seemed resolved to betray no animosity either against Camille Desmoulins or against Danton, whom he suspected and feared—as is generally thought, without motive or reason, for Danton was believed to be weary and sick of politics and the turmoil of the revolution, and only desirous of retiring. When the Hébertists impeached Danton, Robespierre took upon himself his defence, recalling the important services which that great orator and energetic man had rendered to the republic, and speaking of him as his own personal as well as political friend. Hébert was violently assailed in the Jacobin Club by Robespierre's brother and Camille Desmoulins, who conjointly accused him of robbing the money-box of a theatre, of extracting from Bouchotte and other members of the governing committees one hundred and eighty-three thousand livres in payment for the good he had done to the revolution by his "Père Duchêne," and of having occasioned great troubles in some of the départements by defiling the churches, and attacking that liberty of worship which was intended to allow every man in France the free exercise of his religion, be it what it might. Hébert raged and foamed at the mouth, demanding the immediate expulsion from the club of Camille, the younger Robespierre, Philippeaux, and others. In this hurricane, though the elder Robespierre affected a rigid impartiality, it was easy to perceive that he encouraged the attacks upon Hébert, and covered Camille with his invisible shield. Yet, soon after, when Camille and his friends had rendered all the services they were capable of in shaking and discrediting the Hébertists, when Camille had overshot his mark by criticising the governing committees as keenly as the commune, and by recommending a committee of mercy (a proposition which went to hold up all the existing committees as merciless and bloody), when Couthon, returned from his missions, gave it as his opinion that this modérantisme must inevitably ruin the republic, and end in sending to the scaffold all the members of committees, and at least one-half of the deputies of the Convention, Robespierre joined in the outcry against Camille, accused him of political heresies, and even proposed in the Jacobin Club that some number or numbers of the "Vieux Cordelier" should be burned then and there. Camille, quoting from Rousseau, said that burning was not answering. Robespierre, rejoicing, treated Camille in a sneering, contemptuous manner, calling him the spoiled child of the revolution—a young fellow of a naturally good disposition, but who had been corrupted by the bad company he had kept. He even said that Camille, in some of his numbers, had emitted sentiments and opinions which Brissot and the Girondists themselves would not have dared to utter; and he took occasion to declare that he had had nothing to do with the "Vieux Cordelier"—that he had only seen the two or three first numbers, and that he had abstained from reading the rest or speaking about them through fear of its being said that he had dictated them. Danton seemed to act as a mediator; and Robespierre then intimated that a distinction ought to be drawn between the person of Camille Desmoulins and his writings; and that, though it would be very proper to burn his numbers in the hall, it would be very improper to expel him from the club. The question of Camille's exclusion was postponed. When the club returned to it, Robespierre, seriously alarmed at reports spread by the Hébertists, that he too was a convert to modérantisme, inveighed against the pernicious doctrine as something more dangerous even than the ultra-revolutionary system, and the disgusting proceedings of the Hébertists, whom he once more charged with being in the pay of Pitt and Prince Cobourg! Part of the riddle is dark and perplexing, but we can see that Robespierre was now attempting to kill two birds with one stone—to destroy the old Cordelier party by charging them with modérantisme, and the Hébertists by making them suspects; and perhaps a regard for appearances, as much as anything else, induced him now to treat Camille and Danton with affected candour and gentleness, or at least to blow in that direction hot and cold. He said that Camille, though spoiled by aristocratic associates, was still a legitimate child of the revolution; and that, though he had promulgated in his journal some maxims of the most pernicious modérantisme, there were still, by the very side of these maxims, principles of the most truly revolutionary kind. On the 10th of January the great Incorruptible carried a vote importing that Camille Desmoulins should not be expelled by the Jacobins. The Hébertists, now a majority in the Cordeliers Club, voted a resolution that Camille had lost the confidence of his brother Cordeliers, which was only to be recovered by his recanting his revolutionary heresies, and by his denouncing such traitors as he might know. Printer Momoro, who drew up this resolution, which applied equally to Philippeaux, Bourdon-de-l'Oise, and Fabre d'Eglantine, spoke rather slightly of Robespierre, and exhausted himself in a panegyric on Marat, that great man, who had never been capable of any moderation towards aristocrats and traitors, and who, if living, would put down at once all this execrable modérantisme. Hébert followed up this theme, and printed a pamphlet entitled 'Portrait of Marat.' Camille Desmoulins, Danton, and their friends took up the same promising subject, and, in order to show that they were still disciples of that great prophet and teacher, they out-Héberted Hébert in eulogiums of Marat. As a more substantial proof of their undiminished revolutionism, all parties, Dantonists, Hébertists, and Robespierrists, concurred in keeping the guillotine going: in this month of January, when some of them were talking about the necessity of healing the wounds of the revolution, eighty-three victims were sacrificed at Paris alone.

Fabre d'Eglantine, a decided Dantonist, and a bosom friend of Camille Desmoulins, had denounced an Hébertist, named Marnel, as guilty of forgery; the committee of general security, which was composed entirely of Hébertists, released Marnel, and threw Fabre d'Eglantine into prison in his place, and under the same charge, whereunto was added the accusation of his being the chief pensioner and prime agent of Pitt. At the same moment the revolutionary committee of one of the Paris sections arrested Camille Desmoulins's father-in-law as suspect. On the other side the Dantonists, aided herein by the Robespierrists, threw Ronsin, Vincent, and other Hébertists into prison. A few days after, on the recommendation of Danton, the Convention voted the liberation of

Vincent and Ronsin, but Fabre d'Eglantine was left in prison. There was a short suspension of this war and these perplexing manoeuvres; Robespierre occupied the attention of the clubs and the Convention by some long and studied discourses on the British government, on the crimes of Pitt, and the imprescriptible rights of man. He said that appeals to the British people might do something towards revolutionizing that wretched country, but that there must be something more than these appeals; that it would be a great mistake to believe that the morality and enlightenment of the English people equalled the morality and enlightenment of the French people; that the English people were certainly ready to rise, because they were oppressed, enslaved, impoverished, ruined; but this revolution could only be successful through the assistance of the armies and fleets of France. "Yes," said he, "your ships of the line must make this revolution, and overthrow Pitt, the imbecile minister of a mad king!..... That minister must be a fool, who, abusing the influence he has acquired in a mere island, thrown by chance in the midst of the ocean, would try to struggle with the great French people, without perceiving the explosion that revolution and liberty are going to make in his own country!..... Pitt's plans are so absurd that they can only have been conceived in a madhouse." The Convention occupied itself for some days with plans of public instruction, with decrees for the making of elementary books, for forming a popular republican library in every district, for improving the manufacture of arms and gunpowder, for totally abolishing negro slavery, &c. On the 5th of February Robespierre delivered a rambling and yet pedantic discourse upon the "principles of political morality, which ought to guide the National Convention in the internal administration of the republic." In this discourse he denounced, in the most open manner, both Dantonists and Hébertists, under their now received names of Moderates and Ultra-Revolutionists. "Both these factions," said he, "march under different banners and by different roads, but they are both marching to the same end; and that end is the disorganization of the popular government, the ruin of the Convention, and the triumph of tyranny. One of these factions would drag us into weakness, the other would drive us into excess." This was a declaration of open war to both parties alike, and it served to prepare the minds of the people for the proscription of the Dantonists as well as Hébertists. Robespierre's victory over the two (though the Hébertists alone had lately seemed so strong in the House and in the committees) was in a manner decided on this very day; for the Convention, without any discussion, decreed that his discourse should be printed and sent to all the constituted authorities, to all the clubs and popular societies, and to all the armies; and further, for the instruction of the world in general, that it should be translated into all languages. The sudden shiftings and changings which have always distinguished the French in their legislative bodies, and which even at the present day seldom allow of any calculation as to the majorities or minorities, or whether the same question which is rejected to-day may not be carried next week and almost unanimously, may in good part explain Robespierre's triumph. It was followed by immediate and important consequences; denunciations poured in from the Paris sections and from the departments against the chiefs of the revolutionary army, who were all Hébertists, and against the commissioners or proconsuls, some of whom were Hébertists and some Dantonists; those who were Robespierrists, as Saint-Just and Lebas, being for the present, and for obvious reasons, respected.*

Danton, sensible of the danger that threatened him, sought an interview with Robespierre, who consented to receive him and one or two of his friends in his own lodging at the carpenter's in the Rue St. Honoré. Danton complained of the hatred and malice of the governing committees, but said he did not fear them. Robespierre, whose manner was cold and reserved, replied that Danton was under a mistake; that there were no evil intentions against him personally; but that it might be well to enter into some explanations. "Explanations!" cried Danton. "For us to make any explanations there must be good faith on both sides!" And, seeing that Robespierre's countenance darkened at these words, he added: "Without doubt it is necessary to put down royalists, but we ought to strike only such blows as are really useful to the republic: we ought not to confound the innocent with the guilty." "Eh!" rejoined Robespierre, with bitterness, "Who has told you that a single innocent person has perished?" Danton, turning to one of the friends who had accompanied him, said with a bitter smile, "What do you think of that? Not one innocent person has perished!" With these words they separated, never to meet again in private, or elsewhere, except as mortal and declared enemies. Robespierre, if he had been as frank and out-speaking as Danton, might have said to him, as Danton had said to the Girondist mediator—"I cannot trust you, and you will not trust me." A coalition between the Dantonists and the Hébertists might have proved strong enough to renew the combat and delay the destruction of the two parties; but Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and others of the moderates had committed themselves as open and irreconcilable foes of Hébert, Chaumette, Vincent, Ronsin, Clotz, and all that gang, before Robespierre betrayed his intention of guillotining them all, Dantonists and Hébertists; and here again, though even in the presence of a common danger, these two factions could not trust one another. Singly, the Hébertists made an energetic and most daring struggle for their power and their lives; but the Dantonists remained inactive, stupified, paralyzed, without even that degree of courage which is required in certain circumstances to run away : the cowards took Danton's bold words for heroism, and flattered themselves into a half belief that what he so often repeated must prove true—that the Robespierrists, cautious cowards themselves, would not dare touch a hair of the head of a man who had been such a revolutionist as he ; and that, so long as he was safe, he would prove a shield to every one of his party.

When the sombre Saint-Just returned to the Convention from a mission, the war of extermination became more active : on the 26th of February he presented a terrible report on the suspects, under which term were now included men and women of the most opposite parties: Working out Robespierre's axioms and dogmas, and throwing contempt upon Camille Desmoulins and his 'Vieux Cordelier,' Saint-Just proclaimed that the republic could not be too suspicious, that the number of the justly suspected was still infinite, including Camille himself and all his party, as well as Hébert and all his frowsy faction. "That which constitutes a republic," said this cold-blooded fanatic, "is the destruction of every man that is opposed to it. Your moderates are as bad as your anarchists or ultra-revolutionists. Every dissident is a traitor!" Apostrophising Danton, he told him that he and men like him were guilty, because they took pleasure in frequenting public places to attract the attention of the people ; because they were hunting after luxury and fortune, because they were selling themselves to foreign powers, &c. "Your last hour is approaching," cried he ; "you shall all perish! I say all! Measures are already taken to secure the guilty ; they are all known, watched, surrounded!" He said that it was an illusion to represent the revolution and the French people as inhuman. The revolutionary tribunal had indeed cut off the heads of three hundred scoundrels within a year, but what was this compared with the executions of the Spanish inquisition? And had not the tribunals of England butchered anybody this year? And had not Frenchmen the right to treat the partisans of tyranny as the partisans of liberty were treated elsewhere? Marat had been assassinated in France ; the illustrious Margarott, member of the Scotch National Convention assembled at Edinburgh, had just been transported, with confiscation of property ; and, while all tyrants were rejoicing at this last judgment, was France to tie the hands of her revolutionary avenging tribunal? Marat was in his grave, and could not be recalled ; but the illustrious Margarott must not be left to perish, he must be recalled from Botany Bay by his destiny, which would prove stronger than the government which oppressed him. Marat, he said, had emitted some happy ideas upon representative governments, and the best means of finishing the revolution : he regretted that he was not there to speak them himself, as the holy truths would carry more weight if delivered from his own mouth ; but, urged by necessity, he would try what effect these truths might have from his lips. And, proceeding with his exposition, Saint-Just reproduced the most sanguinary axioms of the Friend of the People, mingling them here and there with rhetoric stolen from Danton, who had been, if not the original framer of the plan, the real orator of the audacity and terror system. "If," said he, "you allow yourselves to be duped by moderation and misplaced indulgence, if you shrink from shedding blood, if you spare the aristocracy, you will condemn France to fifty years of trouble. Be bold. Dare! (Osez!) That word contains all the policy of our revolution." He presented several decrees, importing that the governing committees should be purged ; that poverty and distress were to disappear from the body of the real people ; that the committee of General Security alone should be invested with the faculty of examining the petitions and reclamations of political prisoners (there were at this moment five thousand suspects in the prisons of Paris alone), and of liberating the said prisoners if their patriotism should be proved ; that all such prisoners as should be recognised as enemies to the revolution, or as suspects, should be kept in prison till the peace, and then sent into perpetual banishment ; that all their property should be confiscated and divided amongst the indigent patriots, of whom regular lists should be drawn up by every commune in France. This last process, Saint-Just observed, would notably strengthen the republic and the reign of liberty and equality, by taking from the criminal rich to give to the virtuous poor, by indemnifying the unfortunate with a division of the spoils and property of the enemies of the revolution, by making comfort and happiness flourish in France—that popular happiness which was a new idea in Europe. "This plan," says Thiers, with his usual placidity, "was the Agrarian law imposed on the suspects for the profit of the patriots." Wild as it was, it was adopted without a dissentient voice. The other articles of the decrees, which altogether tended to enlarge the powers of the revolutionary government, and to exclude from it all that were not the friends of Robespierre or of his system, seem to have been passed with the same unanimity. The Hébertists had concluded that it was not in the Convention that they could make any stand : the Dantonists, with the common cowardice of French minorities, had given up their ground in the House, without taking up any other, and had apparently surrendered their weapons ; and at this critical moment Camille Desmoulins even left off publishing his 'Vieux Cordelier,' which had certainly been making converts and a party even among the sans-culottes.

In the field of battle which they had chosen the Hébertists were busy enough. Printer Momoro, whose wife had played Goddess of Reason, went among the faubourgs and the most desperate sections ; and he got up a striking and telling scene by veiling in black crape the tablet of the Rights of Man in the Cordelier Club. Not being able to win over a majority in the Jacobins, the Cordeliers set themselves in a state of open hostility to that club, declaring by manifesto that they were better patriots than the Jacobins, or that the Cordelier-Jacobins were the only true ones, and calling upon the people of Paris, the real people and true sans-culottes, to testify to their character, and to the truth of these declarations. It was, in fact, a club war, or war of clubs, the Jacobins for Robespierre, the Cordeliers for Hébert. But, besides the Cordelier Club, the Hébertists had good ground to stand upon in the commune, for Chaumette was still procureur-general. Hébert himself was substitute, and mayor Pache, uncertain as to the side for which victory might finally declare, and flattered by their promises to make him a sort of president of the republic, smiled complacently upon their projects. In the revolutionary army of Ronsin they had an organised force; and, though the greater part of these ruffians had been sent into the Vendée, there remained in Paris and the neighbourhood about 4000 of them. They were favoured too by what had been a potent agent in the first and in most of the later stages of the revolution—a scarcity, approaching, in some parts of France, almost to a famine. They produced pamphlets and placards attributing this dreadful calamity to the vices, the corruptions, and rapacity of the existing executive. At this juncture Robespierre, who was liable to frequent attacks of bilious fever, and Couthon, who was never well, fell into serious illness, were obliged to confine themselves to their beds, and were both reported to be at death's door. Other terrible chiefs of that party, as Billaud-Varennes and Jean-Bon-Saint-André, were in the departments. If the blow, the grand coup d'état, could be struck now, surely it must succeed! Thus thought the Hébertists, who for the rest resolved to proceed according to the old approved system, which had been tried so successfully with mayor Pétion and with the present mayor Pache himself. They declared the sections to be in insurrection; they collected a mob (not so great as they expected), marched down to the Hôtel-de-Ville, and endeavoured to carry the commune along with them. But here they sustained their first reverse: sly, cautious Pache had kept out of the way, upon information timely received that in fact only the section of Marat had insurged; his deputy (Lubin) represented to the patriot mob that they were under some illusion, that the Convention and governing committees had just adopted and were carrying into execution the best measures possible for making provisions cheap and indigent patriots happy; and even procureur-general Chaumette, though a chief of the Hébertist faction, and one of those whose heads must fall if this insurrection should not succeed, eyeing the weakness of the force before him, turned pale and stammered a few words about the respect due to the law and to the National Convention. In the meanwhile Saint-Just and Collot d'Herbois, acting for Robespierre and Couthon, who were sick, and for the other chiefs that were absent, ran down to the Convention, where they found such of the deputies as had assembled trembling and doing nothing, but only expecting that this day, the 16th Ventose or Wind month,—or, in 'slaves' style,' the 6th of March,—was going to bring forth a hurricane like that which had swept away the Girondists. Saint-Just called them to life and exertion by representing the insurrection as nowise dangerous, and by moving that Fouquier-Tinville should instantly be summoned to the bar. That truculent accuser-general, who was never so happy as when he had a grand wholesale case set before him,—as when (to use his own expression) he had an opportunity to fire in line, faire un feu de file,—soon appeared, and received the orders of the House to arrest all agitators and conspirators as soon as might be. This being done, Collot d'Herbois ran to the Jacobin Club to make a moving oration, and to claim the support and succour of that society, without which the decrees of the Convention were little worth. Momoro, who, like nearly all the Cordeliers, was a member of the Jacobins, and who had not yet been expelled from that mother-society, ascended the Jacobin tribune after Collot, and attempted to prove that there was no insurrection or project of insurrection,—that the section Marat and the Cordeliers were quiet, well-intentioned citizens, &c. Momoro, who was well known to have contributed to the movement, was hooted out of the speaking-place; and Collot was charged to go, in the name of the Jacobins, to fraternise with the Cordeliers, and bring back to the true path those friends and brothers who could only have been misled by perfidious men. Collot, however, did not risk his person in the Cordelier Club till the following day, when the insurgents for the most part had separated and gone to their homes, cursing or laughing at the ridiculous parade they had been induced to make, and when the majority of the club itself, who were not personally committed, had come or were coming to the conclusion that the wisest course they could pursue would be to give up the Hébertists and make their own peace with the Jacobins. Accordingly, as soon as Collot came to fraternise, it only cost him a short speech to induce the Cordeliers to tear away the black crape from the Rights of Man, and to charge him with an assurance to their brethren the Jacobins that they would always march in the same road with them. The game was now up, for Ronsin's 4000 heroes of the revolutionary army lost heart at the dispersion of the section patriots, protested that they were too few to attempt a coup-de-main, and began to desert in troops. Although they must have felt that their case was desperate, although they must have known that Fouquier-Tinville was letting loose all his bloodhounds upon them, not one of the Hébertist chiefs attempted to save himself by a prompt flight; some of them tried to conceal themselves in Paris, but concealment there was impossible, for, as Saint-Just had already told them, they were watched, surrounded. So perfectly sure were the Robespierrists of their game, that they played with it as a cat with a crippled mouse that cannot run away or find a hole to hide in: they let several days pass without taking any further steps; and it was not until the 13th of March, by which time Robespierre and Couthon were sufficiently recovered to be at their posts, that Saint-Just presented to the Convention a report which, to keep up the old fiction, was styled "Report on the factions of the foreigners, and on the conspiracy concerted by them in the French republic, to destroy the republican government by corruption, and to starve Paris." In a speech still more terrible, and more coldly and systematically atrocious, than any he had yet delivered, Saint-Just not only fell upon the Hébertists, as plotters, incendiaries, robbers, cut-purses, vile atheists, but also attacked another party, at the head of which stood ex-capuchin Chabot, as agents of corruption, stock-jobbers, gamblers, forgers, that to a man merited the guillotine. Nor were the Dantonists, who had in a manner commenced the war upon the Hébertists, treated with more leniency:—Saint-Just wanted the blood of all of them, and of a vast number of individuals who were connected neither with Danton nor with Camille Desmoulins, neither with Hébert nor with Chabot—men, in short, who had avoided linking themselves with any party whatsoever in the vain hope of keeping their heads on their shoulders. These neutrals were all declared to be suspects. And Saint-Just demanded, and the Convention instantly voted, another exterminating decree, beginning "Are declared traitors to the country, and shall be punished as such," and ending with a wide-spread universal category, which might enfold in its gigantic and deadly embrace every man in France that Robespierre or Fouquier-Tinville might choose to designate. On the evening of the same day, Robespierre and Couthon reappeared in the Jacobin Club, where they were received with acclamations, and promises and vows that that society would stand by them now and for ever. In the course of the night Fouquier-Tinville got into his death-grip Hébert, Ronsin, Vincent, Momoro, and all the chiefs of that party, including a Dutch banker or stock-jobber named Kook, a democrat and ultra-revolutionist of the first water, at whose pleasant country-residence at Passy the Hébertists had been accustomed to dine sumptuously, and in dining to settle their plots and plans: in all they were nineteen men, of whom not one made the slightest resistance. And during the same dark hours Fouquier-Tinville seized Chabot, Bazire, Julien, and the whole batch of those who had been denounced as agents of corruption, stock-jobbers, &c.; and with them was included another foreign banker, the Baron de Batz. The last-named individual had not been so intimate with Chabot and Bazire and their friends as the Dutchman Kook had been with the Hébertists, but he was arrested in order to make the people believe that both factions had been in the pay of foreign powers, and that each had its foreign banker. They were all safely lodged in the Luxembourg, a palace converted into a state prison, and which, spacious as it was, was crowded before the arrival of these unexpected guests—crowded chiefly through the denunciations and arrests made by the Hébertists themselves in their brief but busy day of power and triumph. As the new prisoners were handed in, the old prisoners crowded to see them, to mock them, to rejoice at their fall: scenes took place worthy of a Pandemonium of gibing, mocking devils. Those whom Hébert had sent thither vainly fancied that their hour of deliverance must be now at hand; the Hébertists, upon a surer calculation, knew that for themselves "the holy guillotine" (they had so named it when they had the direction of its knife) awaited them within a few short days or hours; General Ronsin continued to play the bravo; all the rest were dejected—Hébert was fainting, Vincent in convulsive fits.

On the morrow all Paris seemed in a transport of joy. At the call of Robespierre the Jacobins assembled in extraordinary session, and agreed that the arrests were not yet sufficiently numerous; that the commune must be purged, reformed, reconstructed; that Hébert's official superior, Chaumette, who had been left undisturbed in his office at the Hôtel-de-Ville, must go to the Luxembourg, together with other magistrates and municipals, chosen and appointed, indeed, by the sovereign people, but traitors nevertheless; that Anacharsis Clootz, who had always been preaching atheism, and sworn constitutional bishop Gobel, who had led off in the abjuration farce, should be sent to the same prison, together with other traitors and conspirators (all in the pay of Pitt), who had been connected with foul Hébert or greedy Chabot. And forthwith, by another easy cast of the net, all these fry were caught. Fresh scenes of Mephistopheles mirth and mockery as they entered the Luxembourg! One of the old prisoners, bowing to Chaumette, who had taken to himself the name of Anaxagoras, and who arrested all manner of people as suspects, said—"Oh, philosopher Anaxagoras! I am suspect, thou art suspect, he is suspect, we are suspects, you are suspects, they are suspects—all are suspects." Chaumette reeled to his cell, and never showed himself again until he walked out with gendarmes to go before Fouquier-Tinville. On the 1st Germinal, or the 20th of March, twenty of them went through the tragical farce of a trial. Some changes were made in the distribution of persons; Clootz, who ought to have figured with Chaumette, was placed with Ronsin and Hébert and Prolly; Chaumette was put aside with Gobel, to be tried a little later. Hébert and his nineteen companions (Clootz having raised the number of this party to twenty) were all accused of being the agents of foreign powers, and they were all found guilty except one, who in the whole business had acted as a spy for Robespierre and his party. On the 24th of March (the trial had lasted for three days, and then the jury, as in the case of the Girondists, had cut the matter short by declaring their consciences to be satisfied) the nineteen were led to that scaffold to which they had sent so many victims. The crowd was immense; the richer or more curious of the spectators paid for places in carts and waggons, that were so arranged as to command a near view of the guillotine; every window and house-top in the streets through which the death-carts passed were crowded with spectators; and the Parisians hooted and jested, laughed and blasphemed, and showed by other parts of their conduct that in ferocity, obscenity, atrocity, they were nearly of a kin with the crouching, shivering monsters and madmen that were on their way to death. Hébert fainted several times in the cart; only Ronsin and mad Cloutz kept up the bravado to the last; Momoro, the Goddess of Reason's husband, was as chaf-fallen as Hébert; Vincent was again in fits and convulsions. It seems to be universally allowed that this was the most spiritless batch that perished during all the Reign of Terror. Ronsin consoled himself with saying, and no doubt believing, that Robespierre and his friends, who were now sending him and his party to die, would march the same road in their turn, and that before long, Ronsin is rated as a vulgar, unphilosophical mind; but his political foresight seems to have been as good as that of the best of them.* Cloutz acted as atheist-chaplain; for it is said he was sorely afraid lest some of them might, through weakness, die believing in a God: he endeavoured to keep up the spirits of Hébert by preaching comfortable "doctrines of materialism;" and he is said to have requested to be executed the last of them all, in order that he might have time to establish "certain principles" while their heads were falling. It is, however, also said that, when in the cart, he doubted whether it were not all a dream—whether it could be true that mankind were so blind and cruel as to think of immolating their champion and orator—and that when on the scaffold he appealed from the sentence of the wicked Revolutionary Tribunal to all mankind (au genre humain).

Madame Momoro had been arrested and thrown into the Conciergerie before her husband was put upon his trial, for fear that she might raise their section—for Momoro and the goddess had their admirers and friends. According to a fellow-prisoner, this Goddess of Reason, this ethereal essence, was very terrestrial, having only passable features, shockingly bad teeth (des dents affreuses), the voice of a fish-fag, and une tournure gauche. But this is a portrait painted by an enemy—one of the old prisoners who had been suspect to the Hébertists;—and we lose faith in his candour, and can only include him with the rest of the rabid beasts, when we find him in the sequel laughing at Madame Momoro's anxiety and agony for the fate of her husband while it was as yet undecided, or rather while it was not yet finished by the click and drop of the guillotine (wretches as the pair might have been, there was affection and love between them, and this would have made the feelings, at least of the woman, respected, sacred, everywhere but here); and when, on the receipt of the news that Momoro and Hébert and all their band had perished, we find him punning upon the Goddess of Reason, "who was not reasonable that day," making jests of the wretched woman's woe, and describing the exultation of all the rest of his fellow-prisoners, who had evidently no feeling but for themselves.*

Nineteen heads had fallen in one day—in the course of one afternoon, for the execution did not commence until some time after mid-day—yet the Dantonists, who had been so clearly threatened with the same fate as the Hébertists, remained in their despairing inertia. The herd looked to their leader, and their leader, who had never been anything more than an oratorical hero or a bully, had nothing to offer them but sonorous phrases, and found hope for himself in his vast self-conceit—the trap which, in various ways, proved fatal to every one of these revolutionary chiefs. We believe the hope was of that kind which is called a half-hope: but flight was extremely difficult; and, although Salles and Guadet, Barbaroux, Pétion, and Buzot had not yet come to their miserable end, a sufficient number of the fugitive Girondists had perished to warn Danton of the perils that would await him in the departments, even if he could get clear of Paris, where his burly person and rough peculiar physiognomy were known to nearly every man, woman, and child. To those who kept representing to him the danger which threatened his party, he kept responding, "They would not dare!" (Ils n'oseraient!) Between the arrest and trial of the Hébertists (on the 16th of March), when a deputation came to the Convention to congratulate it on the fall of those conspirators, and when one of this said deputation sang a song written for the occasion, Danton was in his seat; and, expressing his indignation at the singing (though he had often heard the like thing, and had even encouraged it, in the same place), he obtained a decree that henceforward no one should be allowed to sing songs at the bar of the House; and this, as has been observed, was the great and terrible Danton's last act.† It appears that he never presented himself in the tribune, or even in the House, again, though incessantly urged to do so by his friends or partisans, who conceived that his loud roar might produce a re-action, with wonders and miracles, and who would not see the fact that the roar of the bull is nothing but a loud sound in the air when his horns have been cut off and his legs gyved. The Robespierrists, who now saw nowhere the shadow of an opposition to their sovereign will, which was held to be, and which for the time in reality was, the representation of the will of the sovereign people, arrested Hérault de Séchelles, the great showman of the republic, the great author of the existing (upon paper, locked up and hidden) republican constitution of 1793, the familiar associate of Camille-Desmoulins and Danton. "You will be the next," said Danton's friends; but Danton still responded, "Ils n'oseraient!" His wife entreated him to fly; his personal friends—and the man had many—joined in the prayer. If he had spoken unrhethorically, he would have said that, being already in the toils, it was idle to think of flight—that flight would expose him to a worse risk than any he ran in staying where he was; but being eternally a rhetor, and great and sublime in words, Danton said, "I am weary of this—I would rather be guillotined than guillotine others! My life is not worth so much trouble; I begin to be sick of mankind! . . . But if ever Robespierre, if ever Billaud-Varennes should dare . . . They will be execrated as tyrants; the house of Robespierre will be razed to the ground, and a gibbet planted where it once stood! . . . But my friends will say of me that I was a good husband, a good friend, a good citizen! . . . But they will not dare!" His friends intimated that Robespierre, the Salut Public, and the other governing committees, were taking their measures to arrest him; and they again recommended what seemed to them his only chance. "But whither," cried he, "can a revolutionist such as I have been direct his steps? If France cast me out, there are only dungeons for me in the rest of the world! Can a man carry his country with him at the sole of his shoe? It is better to stay than go. I would rather be guillotined than guillotine any more. But I tell you they will not dare!" His friends and adherents urged him to go down to the Convention, rush to the tribune, from which he had so often thundered and shaken France, and there denounce Robespierre and the committees, and try and rally round himself the members who had so recently seemed to desire a more moderate and merciful system of government. It is said Danton would not make the attempt, because he knew too well the personal fears and base subjection of the House; but, if Danton had not been overcome by fear himself, assuredly he would have tried the experiment. On the 30th of March, Paris, one of the jurymen of the Revolutionary Tribunal, assured him that there was no longer any doubt of the intention of the Robespierrists to send him to the guillotine, for that a clerk of the committee of Salut Public had told him that Danton's warrant was made out, and that he was to be arrested that very night. He repeated again his "Ils n'oseraient!"—went to his bed—and in the course of the night was roused from his slumbers by the tramp of gendarmerie and the rattling of arms. It appears he would then have tried to fly, but could not, his house being invested on all sides. In the same night, and in much the same manner, Camille-Desmoulins, Philippeaux, Lacroix (Danton's brother commissioner and plunderer in Belgium), and several others were seized. They were all carried to the Luxembourg. The prisoners crowded to gaze upon them, but for the most part with more friendly eyes than those they had lately cast upon Hébert and his ribald crew, for they had flattered themselves that Danton's loud oratory and Camille's smart pen were to make moderation the order of the day, and consequently to open the doors of all the prisons. "Eh, messieurs!" said Danton, "I hoped soon to have got you all out of this, but here I am myself; and now I cannot see how all this will end." One of the first persons he saw on entering the Luxembourg was Thomas Paine! The great American (as it had been the fashion to call him) had never recovered from the effects of his humanity in endeavouring to save the life of Louis XVI. Robespierre had caused him to be excluded from the Convention, as a foreigner (although he had been naturalised), in June, 1793, had subsequently persecuted him as a dangerous enemy to liberty and equality; and now Paine had been for some time in prison, where he was occupying himself in finishing his 'Age of Reason.' Danton was lodged in the room which had been occupied a few days before by Hébert, and which, after another turn of the wheel, was to be occupied, though only for a few hours, by Robespierre.

On the morrow morning, when the arrest of Danton was announced in the Convention, many faces became pale; but not one voice was raised in his favour, except that of his friend, butcher Legendre, who had courage enough to say that he believed Danton to be as pure as himself (and no man, he thought, could reproach him, Legendre, with any act contrary to the most scrupulous probity), and even to move that Danton, Camille, and the others should be heard at the bar of the House, and, in short, be tried by the Convention itself. The majority hooted and interrupted the friendly butcher, and then Robespierre answered him in a long speech. "Why," cried the Incorruptible, "should we treat Danton differently from the Girondists or the Hébertists? The republic must be strictly impartial—the law must be one and the same for all! . . . What signify to me the fine discourses, the eulogiums which men may bestow upon themselves and their friends? A long and too painful experience has taught us the value we ought to put upon such oratorical formulas! We no longer want to know what good this or that individual may have done to the revolution at some particular antecedent period: we only seek to know what men are doing now, and what has been the course of their whole political career! [He was loudly applauded.] Why has not Legendre mentioned by name his friend Lacroix, who is in the number of the arrested? Because he knows that he cannot decently defend Lacroix. He speaks about Danton, because he believes that there is a privilege attached to that name; but we have done with privileges for ever, and we will have no more idols! [Here he received several rounds of applause.] What have we ever done that has not met the approbation of the people—of all France? Are we not free, and just as we are free? Why, then, should any one pretend that Danton and his friends will not have a fair trial? This is doubting the national justice, this is calumniating men—upright judges and a patriot jury—who have obtained the confidence of the National Convention; this is distrusting the Convention, who have given them that confidence; this is libelling public opinion, which has sanctioned that (our) confidence in the revolutionary tribunal. I say that every man that doubts and fears the tribunal—that every one that trembles at this moment, is guilty; for innocence can never fear justice and public surveillance! And I also have been tempted by men who have represented that I am myself surrounded by dangers; that I ought to cling to Danton as my only shield and buckler; that Danton is a rampart, a tower of strength, that might save and defend me; but that, he being once overthrown, I shall be left open to my mortal enemies. I have been written to, the friends of Danton have made me receive letters, have beset me with their discourses. They have fancied that the recollections of an old intimacy, that my early faith in false virtues, ought to determine me to slacken my zeal and passion for liberty. But these things cannot touch me. I have only seen in the flatteries and caresses of Danton's friends the certain signs of his and their terror! Formerly I was the friend of Pétion; but, as soon as he had unmasked himself, I abandoned him: once, also, I was connected with Roland, but Roland turned traitor, and I denounced him!† To calm the trembling House, to conjure the desperation of cowardice, which, at times, can do as much as courage, he said and repeated that he knew the number of the Dantonist conspirators, of the real traitors, to be but small; and that the patriotism and magnanimity of the Convention would make proper distinctions between error and crime, between weakness and conspiracy. Legendre's motion, unsupported, seconded by no one, was thrown to the wind. Saint-Just, in the united names of the committee of Salut Public, and the committee of General Security, read a long report, which, though it professed to be merely an acte d'accusation, or impeachment, was, in effect, the sentence of death upon the accused before their trial began, and without their having been heard anywhere in their own defence. The decree was carried not only with unanimity, but also with loud applauding and cheering. The greatest cowards probably made the greatest noise, for Robespierre's hint to the tremblers could not have been thrown away, any more than the consulatory intimation that it was but a few heads he wanted; and, as a French writer observes, every member was seeking to gain time with tyranny by delivering up other men's heads to save his own.*

On the next day the Dantonists were removed from the Luxembourg to the Conciergerie, and on the morrow, the 2nd of April, their trial began under the gentle auspices of Fouquier-Tinville. Saint-Just in his reports had connected them with the old treasurers of Mirabeau, the Lameths, Lafayette, Philippe Egalité, Dumouriez, Carra, and the Girondists, and had even endeavoured to link them with the new conspiracy of the Hébertists. But Fouquier-Tinville mixed them up, in the strangest and most arbitrary manner, with ex-capuchin Chabot, Bazire, and all that swindling, stock-jobbing crew, among whom were involved another foreign banker, or stock-jobber, a native of Moravia, named Frey, and a brother of the said Frey, who had been an army contractor; and with this motley group and Fabre d'Eglantine, Herault de Sechelles, a Dane, and two Spaniards (all described as accomplices), they were put upon their trial.* Danton's pride was much hurt at being put in such company. Chabot and Bazire, to make the humiliation greater, were placed foremost in the indictment, and were questioned the first as to their names, callings, places of abode, &c. When Fouquier-Tinville put these questions of formality to "the Titan of the Revolution," Danton replied magniloquently, "My name is George Jacques Danton—a name not unknown in our revolution; my abode will soon be dans le néant (in annihilation or nothingness); but I shall live in the Pantheon of history!" Camille Desmoulins, when his turn came, spoke in much the same vein, saying that, as for his age, it was just that of the good sans-culotte Jesus Christ when he died—an age fatal to revolutionists!† Herault de Sechelles, Philippeaux, and the rest of their friends joined them in complaining that they should be mixed up and tried with swindlers, forgers, men of the Stock Exchange, &c. Chabot, who had been at the very head of the stock-jobbing party, swore that he had joined them only in order to learn their secrets and denounce them. When Danton spoke in his own defence, his loud-roaring voice, his revolutionary style, his gigantic person, and gigantic rhetorical figures made some impression, created some emotion in the spectators and auditors. He demanded that the members of the committee of Salut Public and of the committee of general security should be made to appear as his accusers, and as witnesses against him. Above all he called for Saint-Just, Couthon, and Lebas, whom he styled the three most downright scoundrels in France, the three base flatterers who were fawning upon Robespierre and leading him to his destruction. "Let

* It was scarcely attempted to be proved that the Dantonists had ever had the slightest connexion with these foreigners and stock-jobbers. Such of them as had made money had made it in a different manner. The connexion between Chabot and the Freys was close and notorious enough, for the unfrocked capuchin had married a sister of those two foreign adventurers, and had received from them a marriage portion, said to have been 200,000 livres.

† Camille's age, as stated in the indictment, was thirty-three. Danton was only a year older. Chabot was thirty-five, Bazire only only twenty-nine, Herault de Sechelles thirty-four: the oldest of all the batch was under forty. "Thus," says Thiers, "talents, courage, patriotism, youth, were united in this holocaust, as they had been in that of the Girondists." And this is the most moral reflection that Thiers makes on the subject.

then appear," cried he, "and I will plunge them into that nothingness (néant) out of which they ought never to have risen. I must speak to these three rogues who have already ruined Robespierre. Let those cowards who have calumniated me come and attack me en face!" Let them show themselves, and in a moment I will cover them with ignominy and opprobrium! I have said it, and I repeat it: my domicile will soon be in nothingness, and my name in the Pantheon! My head is here ready to answer for everything! Life is burthensome to me, I long to be delivered from it!" President Herman, the same who had presided over the trials of the Queen and the Girondists, rudely interrupted him, and not once, but often. "Danton," said he, "audacity is the common characteristic of guilt; the innocent are calm. You must be decent, moderate; you must respect your accusers; you must remember that you are sent before this court by the highest of all authorities! you owe all obedience to the decrees of the National Convention." "Audacity!" roared Danton, who was now getting into that vein of courage which was really in him, "mine is a national audacity—an audacity very necessary in revolutions—an audacity which France benefited by in 1792 when the Prussians were in full march upon Paris, and when the cowards of the Convention would have abandoned the capital, would have fled behind the Loire, would have sacrificed the republic, and have left France to be dismembered and partitioned! There was a time when the people, when the Convention thought well of the audacity of Danton! Is it from so strongly pronounced a revolutionist as I am that you would expect a cold and quiet defence? Men of my stamp are above price—it is on their brow that liberty and the republican genius are stamped in ineffaceable characters! And am I to reply to the contemptible contradictory accusations that are here heaped against me? I have been the hottest man in the revolution, the most ardent friend and defender of liberty; and now Saint-Just and Couthon, and my whole being shudders as I think of this list of" Here the president checked him and reprimanded him. "The virtuous Marat," said Herman, "was once accused before a tribunal, even as you are now. He felt the necessity of justifying himself, but he accomplished his object like a good citizen, speaking in mild, respectful language, and was not the less beloved by the people for it. Marat did not permit himself to indulge in invectives against his accusers. I cannot recommend to you a better model than the great Marat." Danton, changing his tone, but still demanding that Saint-Just, Couthon, and Lebas should be brought face to face with him, continued for a short time, when he was again interrupted by the president, who told him that irony and pleasantry were no more to his taste than invective. "Nothing is now more common," said Herman, "than to meet with irony and pleasantry and jeu de-mots from accused parties who feel themselves crushed by their own deeds, and know not what to say." Taking the narrative style, but still chequering the narrative with bursts of revolutionary oratory, Danton narrated all that he had done to promote the decisive insurrections of the people—all that he had done to unmask the mercenary traitor Mirabeau, and the vain conspirator Lafayette—all that he had done on the day when Louis XVI. and his court wanted to go to St. Cloud, on which day he it was that had blocked up their passage with pikes and bayonets—all that he had done to sound the tocsin on the 9th of August, 1792, and the active part he had taken in the attack on the Tuileries the day after; boasting of having led the people to sign the republican petition in the Champ de Mars, and of having been the first man to propose openly the overthrow of the throne—boasting of all his revolutionary deeds, excepting only his bloody and mysterious exploits during the September massacres. Of these horrors, the guilt of which had been bandied about from party to party, of these September butcheries in which Danton's participation was certainly less than that of many other men now his accusers and judges, not a word was said in the whole course of the trial, for the dominant faction had strong reasons for desiring that those scenes and days should be forgotten.* When the president again rang his hand-bell to interrupt him, and told him how he ought to plead, Danton raised his voice the higher, crying or shouting, "What is it to you how I defend myself? You can condemn me all the same. The voice of a man pleading for his honour and his life may well drown the tinkling of your miserable bell!" As on the trial of the Girondists, no satisfactory evidence was produced upon points of delinquency, which might easily have been proved: thus Danton and his brother commissioner Lacroix were not proved to be guilty of the rapine and plunder in Belgium: but the reason is obvious—there were men sitting in the Convention, and now voting with Robespierre, who had been accomplices in that guilt or sharers in its profits; and both Lacroix and Danton demanded that some of these members should be made to appear in court. In spite of the precaution which had been taken to admit into court and into the galleries none but such as were furnished with tickets, the Robespierrists and the court were in a panic lest Danton's bold harangues, lest that sonorous voice which had so often thrilled and roused the great sans-culottic heart as though it were the blast of a thousand trumpets, should excite the auditors, and, re-echoing out of doors, produce an insurrection. As soon, therefore, as the first day's work was over, and the prisoners were sent back to the Conciergerie, president Herman and Fouquier-Tinville hastened to the committee of Salut Public to impart their alarms, and to explain the great uneasiness they felt at Danton's audacity, and his persevering demands for the appearance of some of his accusers, and other members of the Convention. They found in the committee only Saint-Just and Billaud-Varennes, who enjoined the president to take no notice of Danton's demands, and instructed him and Fouquier-Tinville to lengthen proceedings to the end of the three days, without giving or permitting any explanations, and then to wind up, according to the letter of the decree which had been carried in order to give their quietus to the Girondists, by making the jury declare that their consciences were sufficiently enlightened, &c. We believe the description of the excitement which prevailed among the people of Paris to be much exaggerated; but the fears and suspicions of the Robespierrists were, no doubt, excessively great, as they were on all occasions, and as they continued to be when Danton was no more. Circumstances happened too, or were invented, which increased their panic, and furnished them with a pretext for passing another expeditive decree. Among the hundreds of prisoners in the Luxembourg, there was a certain Laflotte, who had been employed diplomatically by one or more of these rapidly succeeding revolutionary governments: he had been a chargé d'affaires at Florence, a secretary of embassy at Naples, where his business lay in Jacobinising thoughtless young gentlemen; and he had also been on a mission at Rome, where he had a very narrow escape from sharing in the fate of the French ambassador (Basseville), who was massacred by a furious mob.* Laflotte was a nimble, tricky man, and one who had given his proofs of civism and revolutionism; what mistake led him into prison we know not; but being there he resolved to get out as soon as possible, and by any means. He frequently sought the society of General Dillon, who solaced his captivity by hard drinking. When Dillon was not drunk he played at tric-trac; but when he was drunk he gave way to violent and imprudent declamations against Robespierre and his party. He told Laflotte that it was high time that true republicans should rise against their vile oppressors; that the Parisians seemed to be awakened by the behaviour of Danton on his trial; that the condemnation of Danton and his friends was far from being certain; and that the wife of Camille Desmoulins, by distributing assignats in proper places, might get up a popular insurrection, which would save and liberate them all. Laflotte waited upon the head gaoler of the Luxembourg, and, upon promise given that he should be restored to liberty, he revealed what he called a double plot—a conspiracy within the prison and outside of it—to enlarge the Dantonists and assassinate Robespierre, together with all the other members of the governing committees.

* Some little facts came out on the trial which we do not remember to have seen noticed in any of the biographies or histories of the Revolution. It appeared, for example, that Danton, on the 17th of July, 1789, three days after the capture of the Bastille, came over to England. He admitted the fact, and said he passed some time in this country. As they chose to consider this visit a crime, he said—then Marat had been more guilty than he, for Marat had paid two visits to England.

On the second day of the trial, while Danton was thundering before the revolutionary tribunal, and repeating his legal demand for the appearance in court of his accusers, the members of the committees, &c., when president Herman was half deafened and wholly perplexed, and when even Fouquier-Tinville was losing heart and countenance, the keeper of the Luxembourg suddenly appeared in the committee of Salut Public, and presented Laflotte's deposition. Robespierre, Couthon, and others are said to have been almost petrified by their fears, while Saint-Just, who held the paper in his hand, and who had more presence of mind and invention, soon saw the good use which might be made of it. However this may be—whether Saint-Just was or was not made bold by that which made his chief a coward—it is certain that it was Saint-Just who, on the third day of the trial, at an early hour, and before proceedings were well commenced at the tribunal, ran over to the Convention and presented a most startling report on the dangers which threatened the country—the last dangers to which the country and liberty could be exposed, for, if the legislature would only be resolute on the present occasion, the safety and happiness of the republic would soon be secured for ever. “Danton and his co-accused,” cried he in his dolorous voice, “are behaving most indecently before the national tribunal! They are in open revolt; they threaten their judges—they even pelt them in the face with crumbs of bread made up into little pellets!—they are exciting the people, and may, very possibly, mislead them. Nor is this all: they have prepared a conspiracy in the prisons—ay, in the prisons! The wife of Camille has received money to provoke an insurrection; General Dillon is to get out of the Luxembourg, to put himself at the head of some of the conspirators, to butcher the committees, and to liberate all the guilty!” The deputies cried out that this was horrible, too horrible; and, although many of them certainly desired that some such conspiracy might succeed, they all gave way to their present fears, and voted unanimously a decree proposed by Saint-Just, which commanded the Revolutionary Tribunal to conclude the trial of Danton and his accomplices before they adjourned, and which further authorised the said tribunal to silence, or throw out of the debates (mettre hors des débats) all such prisoners as should fail in respect to justice, or endeavour to excite troubles. Vadier and Vouland, two members of the committee of General Security, hastened with this decree to the court, where they found the prisoners more bold and the judges more dismayed than ever. “What is to be done?” said Fouquier-Tinville. “They still call for their accusers to appear as witnesses: they are demanding still more—they are calling upon the National Convention to name a committee to receive the denunciations and evidence they have to offer against the governing committees, and against a project of dictatorship, which they say is entertained by Robespierre and those committees! Within doors and without the people seem to be much excited—what is to be done?" "We have got the villains in our grip! Here is what will get you out of your embarrassment," said Vadier, handing him the decree. Fouquier glanced his eye over the paper, brightened up, ran to his place, and, with a voice of great joy, read this new and horrible law, by which the accused could be gagged even as the refractory condemned were under the old regime. Danton rose indignantly, and called the auditory to witness that he and his friends had never insulted the tribunal. Several voices cried out that that was true; and there appeared a very general feeling of disgust at the decree. The tribunal was again intimidated; but the prisoners at the bar conceived no hope. Camille, on hearing the judges speak of the prison plot, of Dillon, and of his own young wife, exclaimed in the accent of despair, "The scoundrels! not satisfied with butchering me, they want to butcher my dear innocent wife!" Danton said that the day would come when the truth would be known; and then, pointing to Vadier and Vouland, who had brought the decree, he exclaimed, "See there the cowardly assassins that will never quit us till we are all dead!" The two committee-men sneaked out of court; the excitement of the people seemed to increase; but at last the president summoned up courage enough to pronounce the words, "Hors des débats." "We are gagged," cried Danton, "we are all immolated to the ambition of a few cowardly brigands! But they will not long enjoy the fruit of their guilty victory. I drag down Robespierre in my fall. . . . Robespierre follows me!" Camille Desmoulins began to declaim in the like sort; but the president gave the order, and they were all seized, dragged by main force from the bar, and carried over the way to that vast condemned cell the Conciergerie. Fouquier-Tinville then expressed a hope that the conscience of the jury was sufficiently enlightened. The jury rose and retired to their chamber: both Fouquier and president Herman followed them, and remained closeted with them: Herman produced for the first time what he called an intercepted letter, and an ample proof of Danton's correspondence and complicity with the coalition; only three or four of the jurymen hazarded a few words favourable to the accused; all the rest promptly agreed in a verdict of guilty against every one of the accused except Lullier, and with this verdict the foreman of the jury returned into court with a ferocious joy. As soon as the verdict was read, the president pronounced sentence, and ordered execution within four-and-twenty hours—the property of the condemned to be confiscated, the sentence to be printed and placarded in all parts of the republic, &c. To avoid a new scene,—to avoid the reproaches and violence of dying, desperate men,—the court, setting aside the law which required the sentence to be pronounced in the presence of prisoners at the bar, resolved not to bring them there again, and sent the sentence on the following morning to be read to them in their prison. Some of the condemned stamped the paper under their feet—some gave vent to invectives and raging—some heard their doom with silence and tears—some with indifference or with a show of gaiety—that great procession man, that eternal actor (Herauld de Sechelles) is said to have been the gayest of them all.* Danton appears to have been the most dejected, or at least the most silent: ex-capuchin Chabot was not there to have his conduct observed, for (apparently before the trial began) he had taken a dose of corrosive sublimate, and he was now lying in the infirmary of the Conciergerie, suffering agonies from the poison, which did not, however, produce death in time enough to save him from the guillotine. No time was lost in binding them and carting them for that great slaughter-house the Place de la Révolution. Camille Desmoulins, who travelled in the same cart with Danton, wept about his wife, and then went mad and tore his clothes and his shirt off his back, so that when he arrived at the foot of the scaffold he was almost naked. The fine speeches made or the smart things said by Danton, and one or two others of the party, rest upon the yielding foundation of the scribbler Riouffe, or upon authorities equally questionable, which differ from and contradict one another.* Executioner Samson showed their fifteen bleeding heads, in rapid succession, to the people; and the people, just as usual, shouted "Long live the Republic!" It was the 5th of April, or 16th Germinal, only twelve days after the execution of the nineteen Hébertists. According to a prisoner in the Luxembourg, the execution of the Dantonists excited less surprise than the execution of Hébert and Cloutz and their gang.

Camille Desmoulins' young widow—only twenty-three years of age, and of a beauty said to surpass even that of Charlotte Corday—was by this time under bolt and bar, and, on the 10th of April, being put into a strange batch with twenty-four others, she was brought before the Revolutionary Tribunal. This batch (the term fournée was now the popular and common expression) was indeed one of the very strangest that Fouquier ever made up for Samson's oven. It contained General Dillon and Bishop Gobel, Chaumette and Philibert Simon, a Dantonist member of the Convention, General Beysser, and the widow of Hébert, who had been a nun before the revolution, Grammont,

* The orator's prison ejaculations scarcely rest upon better authority than his dying speeches; but it may have been true that he exclaimed—"About this time last year I was engaged in setting up the Revolutionary Tribunal, for which I ask pardon of God and man!" Camille Desmoulins was very sad, and had brought with him "sombre melancholic books" with Christianity in them, such as translations of Young's 'Night Thoughts,' and Hervey's 'Meditations.' Réal who had been arrested at the same time as a decided Dantonist, but who was not tried with this batch, and had subsequently the good fortune to escape, laughingly asked Camille if he was going to die before-hand? and holding up Voltaire's 'Pucelle d'Orléans,' said, "This is the book for me!" Lacroix was dumb with grief and fear; Philippeaux was as sad and as silent as the once loquacious Camille—and, like Camille, he grieved for a charming and much-loved wife. One of the prisoners, in seeing them all pass to their cells, said, "Here are enough to make a good load for the carts!" Hérauld de Sechelles, who was playing at pitch and toss (à galuche, a favourite amusement of these captive statesmen), left off his game to embrace his friend Lacroix.

the actor, and his son, a youth aged nineteen, Barbe, a maker of mattresses, and Lapalus, a justice of peace and judge of one of the revolutionary commissions in the provinces, together with other individuals of the most different stations, characters, and parties, most of whom were altogether unknown to one another until Fouquier-Tinville drew them up in line before the bar of the tribunal as brother and sister conspirators. Among other treasons against the state, some of them were charged with having uttered atrocious insults and calumnies against Robespierre, and against the committee of Salut Public. This charge was particularly laid against Hébert's widow, who denied the fact, and who, moreover, protested that, if she had ever known her husband to be a conspirator, she would have killed him with her own hand, like a true republicaness. Laflotte, who had denounced Dillon to the gaoler, appeared on the trial as a witness, and inculpated the widow of Camille Desmoulins and several others: he seemed ready to swear away the lives of hundreds or of thousands to save his own neck. The trial, for form sake, was allowed to occupy three days. Nineteen of the prisoners were brought in guilty, and they were all guillotined on the 13th of April. Anaxagoras Chaumette was almost dead before he reached the scaffold: Bishop Gobel, who was sixty-seven years of age, was penitent, and begged absolution of a priest; the ci-devant nun, Hébert's widow, shrieked and wept, but the fair relict of Camille is said to have comforted her, and to have behaved with courage and dignity.

As the terrible armée révolutionnaire which Ron-sin had commanded was disbanded, and as the activity of the guillotine, which struck off one hundred and twenty-three heads, including that of Hébert, in the month of March, and which before the middle of this current month of April had struck off some two hundred heads, including that of Danton, seemed to have left itself little or nothing more to do, such of the community as were desirous of a return to mercy and moderation flattered themselves that Robespierre must have destroyed all those who gave him umbrage, and that Paris and France might now look forward to happier days. But these calculations did not sufficiently take into account that madness of fear and suspicion which could never cease in men like Robespierre and his colleagues, placed in such circumstances as they were in. Before this month of April came to an end from sixty to seventy more victims were sacrificed in the Place de la Révolution under the grim statue of Liberty. All manner of men, and of women too, were handed over by president Herman and Fouquier-Tinville to Samson and his assistants; the poorest and most essentially sans-culottic classes now began to figure on the scaffold—a pretty sure sign that Robespierre's death-dance could not last many months longer. Ex-nobles, aristocrats, respectabilities, men and women who had cast off their rags and become rich and luxurious in the revolution, the citizens of Paris could see perish with pleasurable emotions and joyous cries about liberty and equality; but the case was altered when they saw the bleeding heads of journeymen tailors, sempstresses, cobblers, carters, and other poor artizans and labourers, held up with increasing frequency as the heads of traitors and conspirators. This convinced them that poverty and obscurity would no longer be a safeguard—this made them think of their own necks. Among the more distinguished victims that perished between the middle of April and the end of May were d'Espréménil, the old parliamenter and the hero of the earliest stage of all of the revolution; Chapelier, once the popular president of the Constituent Assembly; the venerable Malesherbes, who had so nobly defended Louis XVI., and who was now condemned and executed, together with his daughter and his granddaughter, his sons and grandsons and sons-in-law, the noble Lamoignons and Châteaubriands;* Lavoisier, the eminent chemical philosopher, who, unfortunately for himself, had been a farmer-general of the revenue before the revolution, and who was now accused of having in that capacity mixed water and noxious ingredients with tobacco (then, as afterwards, a monopoly of government); † the Marchioness de Crussol, and the Princess Elizabeth, the innocent, amiable, every-way exemplary and almost angelic sister of Louis XVI. The princess and the marchioness, like twenty-three other individuals of very different ranks who were put in the death-carts with them and executed all on the same day, were accused of plots against the republic, for Fouquier-Tinville had seized upon the idea first presented by Laflotte, and when other pretexts were wanting he now invariably charged his prisoners with prison plots. The Bourbon princess behaved like a heroine before the bloody tribunal, and like a martyr on the scaffold.

* The living inheritor of the ancient name of Châteaubriand owed his life to his absence from France. He was travelling at the time in the wilds of America, collecting the materials for one of the most popular and best of his numerous writings.

† Lavoisier requested a respite of some days in order to finish certain experiments, the result of which, he hoped, would be beneficial to mankind. Fouquier-Tinville, in refusing the respite, coolly told him that the republic had no need of chemists and savans.

Suicides became astoundingly frequent. The cynical philosophe Chamfort, whom we have seen so busy and so influential at the earlier part of the revolution in the conciliabula which Thomas Paine and the other republic-makers frequented, knowing that an order for his arrest had been issued, shot himself, with an unsteady hand, with a pistol, and then cut and mangled himself with a razor. He did not die at the time, but lingered in agony and as an object of horror for several months, and then died when, but for his self-inflicted wounds, he might have lived on in safety and in good repute. Other persons of less name used the pistol, the razor, the sword, or the knife, with a more decided hand (but poison appears to have been most frequently resorted to): in most parts of France desperate beings, starved or driven out of their hiding-places, or driven frantic by their fears, destroyed themselves in fields or by the roadside. Still, however, the sans-culottic municipalities, the revolutionary committees, the Jacobin clubs, and all the authorities which had been constituted by the revolution, expressed their approbation of everything that was done, and their entire confidence in Robespierre's government. After the execution of the Hébertists and the Dantonists addresses poured in from every corner, from every department, from almost every commune, felicitating the Convention and the committee of Salut Public on the energy they had displayed, and on the success which had attended it. Many of these innumerable addresses recommended the legislative and governing powers to persevere in the same energetic course, until the head of every traitor or enemy to the republic, or to the liberty and equality of the French people, was struck off. It was not, therefore, without countenance and encouragement that Collot d'Herbois announced, in the Jacobin Club, that Samson had yet a great deal of work to do; that there was not a street, scarcely so much as a house in Paris but concealed some conspirator; that, though the Revolutionary Tribunal had, by what it had already done, secured to itself a glorious place in the history of regenerated France, it must still be doing—must still be zealous, indefatigable, inexorable. Under the same auspices Saint-Just repeated the same axioms in the National Convention; and that mixed assemblage of sanguinary scoundrels and loathsome cowards applauded all he said, and voted unanimously and by acclamation every torturing, cut-throat decree he proposed.

The Cordelier club, for a long time a sort of rival of the Société Mère, had been rent and shaken by the schism between the Hébertists and the Dantonists, and, after the fall of both of these parties, it fell itself; its terrified members pronounced their own dissolution, and penitently implored to be re-admitted to the embraces of the indulgent Mother. As the other political clubs in Paris were of small account, the Jacobins were soon enabled to shut them all up. Thus there remained only the one great club of the Jacobins in the Rue St.

Honoré, which has been properly called "Robespierre's House of Lords."

In the whole month of May the number of lives sacrificed in the Place de la Révolution reached the fearful amount of 324. Collot d'Herbois, who had become principal orator at the Jacobins, as Robespierre, Couthon, Saint-Just, and Barrère were absorbed by the business of the governing committees, and who was ever repeating that France must 'sweat more blood,' was attacked on the night of the 21st of May by one Amiral, a desperate man from the south of France, who had been deprived of a place and left to starve. He waited in the streets for the ci-devant comedian, who was generally drunk at that time of night, and he fired one or two pistols at him, but without hitting him. Being pursued, and (after a vain attempt to kill himself) captured by a patriotic locksmith, Amiral declared that he had really intended "to purge France of a tyrant," that he had thought of taking off Robespierre as well as Collot, and that he grieved he had not succeeded; for, if he had killed either Collot or Robespierre, he would have become an object of admiration to the universe, and his name would have lived in history. He most solemnly denied having any accomplices, or having acted upon the suggestion of others. On the following day Barrère announced to the Convention that this was a new plot of Pitt—that dealer in coalitions—that hirer of assassins! The deputies agreed that it must be so, and that the perfidious English government, being determined to cut off Robespierre and all the members of the Salut Public, it was quite clear that Amiral must have a vast many accomplices. Couthon made a terrible speech, in which he coupled the Prince of Cobourg with Pitt, and furthermore declared that all the kings, princes, and aristocracies of Europe were engaged in these assassination plots. "But let them sharpen their daggers," cried he, "we republicans of France are too great to follow their vile example!" The House fell into a delirium, partly real, but for the far greater part, fictitious; the excitement spread through Paris; the tribunal, the police and its countless agents were commanded to be more than ever vigilant; and thousands of eyes and hands went peering and groping about in search of the hired assassins of the English minister and the accomplices of Amiral, who had really no accomplices whatsoever. Collot d'Herbois reaped a full field of glory: living, he was honoured almost as much as Marat, when really killed by Charlotte Corday's knife;—the Convention embraced him, the whole Jacobin club hugged and kissed him, and in each august assembly the chief orators exhausted themselves in his praise. Robespierre, as if jealous, stayed away both from the House and from the club. But in the course of this busy, noisy day, Robespierre secured to himself the same sympathy and the same applause. A young woman, respectably attired and of a mild blooming countenance, called at the carpenter or cabinet-maker's house in the Rue St. Honoré, where the Incorruptible resided, and insisted upon seeing the great man. She was told that Robespierre was out, or that he could not be seen. She insisted more eagerly than ever upon her right of being admitted to speak with a public functionary and a representative of the people. The women of the house became alarmed at her manner, particularly one of the carpenter's daughters, Cornelia Duplaix, who had for many months been living with Robespierre as his wife without the old religious ceremony, or the new civil contract.* Moreover the Incorruptible had now for some time had a volunteer body-guard, popularly styled Tappent-Durs (strike-hards), armed with bludgeons and pikes, who escorted him when he went abroad, and who at other times mounted guard round about Duplaix's house. Some of these strike-hards, as vigilant and suspicious as Cornelia (who was not so fortunate as to be a mother of Gracchi), ran and secured the pertinacious visitor. There is even more than the usual quantity of contradiction in the various accounts of what followed. According to some, they found a knife about her person; but it was at that time a common custom in France for people to carry knives in their pockets to cut their victuals, so that the possession of one knife would not be extraordinary. According to others, there were two knives, which looked more suspicious. But, again, some say that she had no knife about her person, but that one knife (or, as others have it, two knives) were found in a small basket containing a change of linen, which she had left in the shop of a dealer in lemonade who lived hard by Robespierre's lodgings. Some writers of the day, like Mercier, not merely doubt, but absolutely deny, that the poor girl had any real design against the life of the tyrant; and assert that Robespierre, envying Collot his honours, dreamed and published that a second Charlotte Corday had attempted to assassinate him: it appears most likely, nevertheless, that the poor girl had really entertained the notion of playing the part of Corday, but that being weak and silly, and probably more than half-crazed, she had gone to work in a most awkward, undecided manner. This question, however, must be left in doubt. If accident had not favoured Robespierre, it is exceedingly probable that he would have resorted to invention; and, in the state of the public mind, little ingenuity would be required to make any given person pass for a conspirator and assassin. When his Tappent-Durs carried their prisoner before those scoundrels, who dealt much harder blows, the Committee of General Security and Surveillance, she stated that her name was Aimée Cécile Renault, that she was twenty years old, and the daughter of a paper-maker or stationer of Paris. If mad, there was some method in her madness—a case much more common than uncommon. When asked whether on being arrested she had not said that she would shed her life's blood to have a king again in France, she answered that she had said it because she preferred a king to fifty thousand tyrants. But when asked what use she intended to make of the knife or knives, and what motive, except assassination, could have led her to Robespierre's abode, she declared that she had never intended to do the least hurt to any person, and that all she had wanted was to see how a tyrant was made, à voir comment était fait un tyran! But then, upon being questioned about the change of linen found in the basket, she said she had brought it for her use in the place she was sure of going to; and to the interrogatory, "What place do you mean?" she responded, "Why, to prison, and thence to the guillotine!"

On the morrow morning (the 24th of May) one of Robespierre's creatures rose in the Convention to ask whether it were true that a new Charlotte Corday had arisen to assassinate a representative of the people? The president replied that it was too true, but that they had got the she-devil safe in prison, and that a full report on her crimes would be presented on the 26th. On the 25th Robespierre, who had been invisible for some days, went in the midst of his Tappent-Durs to the Jacobin Club, where he was received with far greater enthusiasm than Collot d'Herbois had met with. Butcher Legendre, who had been in great danger on account of the interest he had taken in the fate of some of the Dantonists, and who had only retrieved that false step by declaring in the Jacobins that he had been labouring under an illusion, but was now fully convinced that Danton and all his party were detestable traitors and conspirators, ascended the tribune as the great Incorruptible entered the hall, and exclaimed, "The hand of crime has been raised to strike Virtue, but the God of Nature would not suffer the blow!" As had happened before, several conspicuous Jacobins and members of the Convention put in their claims for the honours of having narrowly escaped assassination and martyrdom; and Couthon and others exclaimed, "These assassinations all proceed from the faction of the foreigners! These murderers are all hired by Pitt! Let us declare the British government guilty of treason against humanity (coupable de lèse-humanité)." Accordingly on the 26th, when the report was presented to the Convention by Barrère, who continued to be the great compiler of these papers, it was moved in form, and unanimously voted, that henceforward no quarter should be given to any English or Hanoverian soldier; and that this order should be dispatched immediately to the armies of the republic, and to the representatives of the people in mission to those armies—the latter being bound to see to the punctual execution of the same. To this brutality the Duke of York made a very proper reply, in general orders issued on the 7th of June. "His royal highness," said the paper, "anticipates the indignation and horror which have naturally arisen in the minds of the brave troops whom he addresses, upon receiving this information. His royal highness desires, however, to remind them, that mercy to the vanquished is the brightest gem in a soldier's character, and exhorts them not to suffer their resentment to lead them to any precipitate act of cruelty on their part, which may sully the reputation they have acquired in the world. His royal highness believes that it would be difficult for brave men to conceive that any set of men, who are themselves exempt from sharing in the dangers of war, should be so base and cowardly, as to seek to aggravate the calamities of it upon the unfortunate, people who are subject to their orders. It was indeed reserved for the present times to produce to the world the proofs of the possibility of the existence of such atrocity and infamy. The pretence for issuing this decree, even if founded in truth, would justify it only to minds similar to those of the members of the National Convention. It is, in fact, too absurd to be noticed, and still less to be refuted." The duke recalled to memory that, in all the wars which had existed between the English and the French, they had been accustomed to consider each other in the light of generous as well as brave enemies, while the Hanoverians, for a century the allies of the English, had shared in this reciprocal esteem; that hitherto, when the combat was over, the conquerors had become the friends of the conquered, covering the wounded with their own cloaks, and carrying them to their own hospitals, &c. He would not believe that the French, even under their present infatuation, could so far forget their character as soldiers as to pay any attention to so dangerous and disgraceful a decree; he hoped and trusted, therefore, that the war would be conducted as became civilised nations, that the French army would not relinquish every title to the character of soldiers and of men by obeying so atrocious an order, and that his own brave troops would not be compelled to make terrible retaliation. Some of the rabble of the republican army continued to commit great cruelties wherever they found the opportunity; but the great majority of the soldiers refused to act up to the letter of the decree; some of them said that, if the representatives of the people wanted to murder prisoners, they had better take them and kill them themselves, or, having taken them, send them to Paris to the strong man, Samson.

In the meantime the so-called conspiracies, of Amiral and Cecile Renault furnished Samson with an abundant crop of heads, for they were not only executed themselves, but their relatives and friends, with some who had never known them, or even seen them before, they were all arraigned at the bar of the tribunal together, were put into the death-carts with them as accomplices and co-agents of Pitt. Thus Cecile Renault's father and brother; one Saintonax, a surgical student in the provinces; one Cardinal, a poor schoolmaster of Paris (who, being drunk, had said he thought the French base cowards to submit to such tyranny); the venerable Sombreuil, once governor of the Invalides, who had been saved by his heroic daughter from the September massacres; Madame Buret, an actress of the Opera, with her servant, a girl of eighteen; Michonis, the municipal who had shown some tenderness to the late queen during her confinement in the Conciergerie; Madame de St. Amaranthe, with her two daughters, aged seventeen and nineteen, and other persons still more dissimilar, were put in the same batch with Amiral and Cecile, and were clothed like them in red shirts, to designate that they were all murderers and assassins. The entire batch amounted to fifty-four!

All this blood was poured out to the accompaniment of long drowsy harangues about the necessity of public morality and republican virtue. In presenting one of his most terrible reports, Saint-Just had moved that Morality and Virtue should be declared the order of the day—a vote which the Convention passed unanimously. Robespierre, since the fall of Chaumette and Clootz and all that gang, had repeatedly declared that atheism was so foul a thing that it could not have been thrown into France except by Pitt; that there could be no security even for republican virtue unless they voted the existence of a God, or of some Supreme Being, and the immortality of the soul. At first there seemed, at least in the Convention, a pretty general disposition to sneer at both these dogmas, as unworthy of the enlightenment of France, and as tending to revive the old superstitions; but when Robespierre and Saint-Just, Couthon and others of that party, held up atheism as the greatest of all the crimes of which the Hébertists and Dantonists had been guilty, proclaimed it to be an importation from England, and intimated that its propagators and abettors must expect nothing less than that a virtuous republic would take off their heads, these mockers all took the cue, learned the short and easy lesson, and professed themselves (what Saint-Just and Robespierre really were) determined and fanatical deists, and implicit believers—without any revelation, but by the light of reason alone—in the soul's immortality. The reformed commune assembled in the Hôtel-de-Ville (which in Chaumette and Hébert's time had been the high altar of the Goddess of Reason, and very Vatican of the atheist world, the place whence all the destroying, desecrating bulls had emanated) now sent up a deputation and an address to represent to the august representatives of the people, "whose policy was wholly founded on virtue and morality," "whose sublime meditations were directed exclusively to the happiness of mankind," that it was at length time "to proclaim those useful opinions disfigured by fanaticism, the natural idea of the existence of a God, and the consoling notion of the immortality of the soul." These virtuous municipals declared that Hébert's Goddesses of Reason were more abominable even than the old superstition and the priests of the Catholic church; and they petitioned that the inscription put upon all churches, "TEMPLE CONSECRATED TO REASON," should be obliterated, and its place supplied by the words, "TO THE SUPREME BEING." Evidently in fear that this forced march backward to deism might be considered as an anti-revolutionary proceeding, Robespierre sent some new propagandists into the departments, agitated the Jacobin clubs, and waited until other addresses in the same key as that of the commune of Paris, which he had probably written himself, came up to the table of the Convention. Then he ascended the tribune and delivered a vague, long-winded, pragmatistical report on what he styled "The relation of religious and moral ideas with republican principles," and concluded by moving that the Convention should instantly decree (décréter) the existence of the Supreme Being, together with "that consoling principle, the immortality of the soul," and appoint the decadi, or tenth day, or new sabbath, the 20th Prairial, — or 8th of June, slave style, — as a national festival in His honour. The deputies, the representatives of the French people, who had so recently made their profession of faith to the Goddess of Reason, who had so lustily declared that a God or a king was alike incompatible with a republic, now voted by acclamation all that Robespierre proposed. The Mother Society, too, instantly voted and adopted the new profession of faith. It was even proposed in the Jacobins to banish every man from the republic that did not believe in the Divinity: but Robespierre thought it expedient to reject this proposition.

Painter David, who had got up so many pomps and ceremonies, and who last summer had arranged that festival, and made that statue to mother Nature, before which handsome Herault de Sehelles, now headless and buried deep in quicklime, had made libations of pure emblematic water, and prayed his pagan prayer, presented a programme and plan for this festival voted to the Supreme Being—an elaborate production, a conceited, pendent conglomerate, of execrable taste, which revolts the mind more than Hébert's atheistical masquerades, but which the legislators adopted with unanimity, as they now adopted everything that was moved or sanctioned by Robespierre.* As if in-

* David's hands must have been very full of business, for on the same day that the National Convention adopted his "Plan de la fête à l'Être Suprême," they commissioned him to devise and design new costumes for the pupils of the school of Mars, or new military school, costumes for all classes of citizens, and a general military costume which should be classical and at the same time suited to the climate, habits and customs, and revolution of France.

toxicated by his success and power, and the praise and incense that surrounded him, Robespierre, who had hitherto played the retiring, modest part, resolved to officiate as high-priest to the divinity he had got decreed. Long historical doubts, and speculations ingenious but interminable as to the motives and objects of this Apollyon of the Revolution, may be settled by the simple assumption, warranted by a hundred facts, that he was, from first to last, insane—possessed by a reasoning madness of the worst kind, a maniacal vanity, which grew and increased with his successes and the facility he found in bending a frantic nation to his will. No other hypothesis will explain his character and his doings; no researches among contemporary evidence will ever explain or reconcile half the facts of his public life: in him, many a circumstance which has been set down as a mystery, deep, unfathomable, becomes simple enough if considered as a freak of madness. On the morning of the fête, as he looked out from one of the windows of the Tuileries upon the immense multitude assembled or assembling, and especially upon the crowds of elegantly-dressed women that ran to this novelty, as to everything else that was new and showy, he gesticulated, acted, and spoke in a frantic manner. In a universal frenzy such as reigned in Paris his insanity is scarcely so apparent; but it seems to us that Masaniello, on that day when he triumphed over the Spaniards and rode on the beautiful charger before the cardinal archbishop and the viceroy, in scarlet raiment and with gold chains round his neck, was not madder than Robespierre on this day of the festival à l'Être Suprême. He had dressed himself in a splendid manner; his hair was frizzled and powdered; he carried in his hand a brilliant bouquet of flowers mixed with ears of wheat; for the first time his countenance was irradiated with joy: but the joy was mingled with pride and triumph, and everybody remarked his moral intoxication. The celebration took place in the Tuileries garden. Under the creative genius of David a mound or monticule surmounted by hideous statues of Atheism and Anarchy, made of combustible materials, and by a pure white incombustible statue of Wisdom, had risen in the garden. The deputies of the Convention followed Robespierre, who walked quite alone and several yards a-head of them, to this mound, where he was to 'Pontifier,' or play the Pontiff. The spectators honoured the great man with many applauses, and shouted most joyously, the day being uncommonly fine and exhilarating. But some satirical sallies and murmurs were heard amidst the crowd from men who preferred the Goddess of Reason to his Être Suprême, or who were irritated at his unwise glaring departure from the lines and levels of equality. "Only see," said one, "he wants to make himself a god!" "Or the high priest of this Être Suprême," said another. "Yes," cried a third, applying to him one of the grossest of epithets, "not satisfied with being master, he wants to be our god!" Even the Convention, which had been so timid and submissive, betrayed symptoms of discontent; nay, several of his old partizans and present colleagues in the committees either put on a sullen countenance, or plainly expressed in coarse and energetic words their disgust not merely at his pomp and pride, but at the whole celebration, and especially at his Être Suprême. Barrère, Collot d'Herbois, Priour, and Carnot seemed greatly dissatisfied; Billaud-Varennes, and the principal members of the Committee of General Security—Vadier, Amar, and Vouland—were fanatics in atheism, and disposed to be excessively jealous of all such public honours or distinctions as those the Incorruptible was now assuming. Bourdon de l'Oise was equally disgusted, and, being a man of a rough temper and tongue, he abused the whole performance, while Tallien, Freron, and other Montagnards more quietly sneered at it. This ill humour of some, and this mockery of others, were increased by a miscalculation of painter David, who had not made the monticule, which was to have held all the deputies of the Convention, large enough to hold half of them, and hence arose jostling and pesting, laughing and swearing, and irreverent jokes divided between the painter, the projector, and the object of the fête. Indeed all the stage properties went wrong. David handed Pontiff Robespierre a lighted torch: the pontiff, after delivering an oration in honour of the Supreme Being and the French republic, set fire to the pasteboard statues of Atheism and Anarchy, which, as they blazed, ignited a veil or screen which concealed the statue of Wisdom. It was intended that the last-named divinity should burst upon the eye in all its pure original whiteness; but in the combustion of Atheism and Anarchy, and the canvas screen, it got sadly smoked, and when poor Wisdom appeared she was as dingy as a blackamoor, and this was considered as a very bad omen! Robespierre, standing forward in his sky-blue coat and white silk waistcoat embroidered with silver, then delivered a second discourse, which was not audible to the multitude, but which announced that Atheism, "the monster which kings had vomited on France," was now annihilated; and which concluded with a prayer to the Supreme Being. "Avec ton Être Suprême," said Billaud-Varennes, "tu commences m'embêter—With thy Supreme Being thou beginnest to stupify me." A very large portion of the spectators indisputably entertained the same notion as Billaud. In the end the fête was considered as a miserable failure even by such as preferred Robespierre's Être Suprême to Hébert's Déesse de la Raison.* Those who had attended the festival in the hope that the inauguration of a new religion was intended to put a stop to the old cruelty heard nothing to confirm their hope, for in his discourses Robespierre had declared that more blood must be shed—that, if this day were devoted to joy and festivity, to-morrow must be given to vengeance—that the republic must still be inexorable! In various ways this festival was fatal to him; but in no way was it more so than through that of the blind spite and madness that were provoked in him by its evident failure and by the loud grumbling and taunts and sarcasms of his brother deputies. Instead of purging the governing committees of Billaud-Varennes, Collot, Barrère, and the other members who had almost openly declared themselves in a state of hostility, and who actually formed a majority in those committees, he set about strengthening the Revolutionary Tribunal, whose powers, already so tremendous, were sure to be subordinate to, and controlled by, whatsoever party maintained the ascendancy in the committees. Thus, if Robespierre, with Couthon, Saint-Just, and his other adherents, should prove the stronger (which was scarcely probable or possible without a purgation), that bloody tribunal would readily dispatch, with forms of revolutionary law, whatsoever enemies he might choose to designate; but, for the same reasons, if he should fail, he and his friends must expect the same fate: so that his increasing the powers of the court was like arming a band of assassins before being sure that the first use that they would make of their arms would not be against his own life. On the 9th of June, the very day after the fête, he went to the Committee of Salut Public: and ranted and raved against all those who had misconducted themselves at his great celebration. He called them the impure remains of the parties of Hébert and Danton—indulgent, corrupt—men destitute of every virtue, whose Modérantisme was only a portion of a conspiracy, whose heads ought to fall. Billaud-Varennes and Collot d'Herbois now ventured to dispute with him over the council-table, and the dispute became so loud and violent that a cautious member of the committee thought it expedient to shut all the windows. Billaud said that the ceremonies of yesterday had made a very bad impression on the public mind; that the people thought all this fuss and ceremony, about the Être Suprême and the immortality of the soul, superstitious and counter-revolutionary. Robespierre said he would soon show them that his intention was to make the Revolution go on faster and farther than it had hitherto gone; and in his wrath he uttered words which might very well be construed into a threat of the guillotine against every one of them. Saint-Just was absent on a mission, but on the next day Couthon crawled on his paralytic legs to the tribune of the Convention, and there exhibited and explained a terrible project of law which had been drawn up by Robespierre's own hand. It proposed to divide the Revolutionary Tribunal into four sections, under a president and three vice-presidents, and each with its public accuser and three judges, its jury, &c., so that, each being complete in itself, they might all act simultaneously and expeditiously, doing, if necessary, four times the work that was now done.* It named the presidents, judges, public accusers, and jurors. This quadruple tribunal was to be declared to be instituted "to punish the enemies of the people," and, in order that this vague definition should not be restricted, it was to be explained that the enemies of the people were all those who endeavoured to destroy public liberty, either by force or by cunning—all those who should speak ill of the republic, or raise the price of provisions, or favour the escape of aristocrats or conspirators, or calumniate patriots, or mislead the people, or disturb and divide the people by spreading false intelligence, or deprave morals and corrupt the public conscience, or stop the progress of republican and revolutionary principles by counter-revolutionary writings, or other insidious means, &c. &c. &c.; while all the previous definitions laid down by Saint-Just in his decree against the suspects, &c. were to be included; and the punishment of every prisoner, under whatsoever definition or designation his offence might come, was, in case of conviction before any one of the sections of the revolutionary tribunal, to be DEATH. The power of sending persons to trial before this tribunal was to be given to the Convention, to the two committees of Salut Public and Sureté Générale, to the individual representatives employed on missions, and to the public accusers. As a climax of atrocity, it was proposed that if the tribunal should possess either material or moral proof of guilt, it should be relieved from the necessity of hearing witnesses; and that no counsel or advocates should be allowed to prisoners, because calumniated patriots would find their best defenders in the patriot jurors, and conspirators could have no claim to any indulgence! When Couthon had finished reading this report and project of law, there was, for a time, hesitation and silence, for, if the members who were now leaguering or thinking of leaguering against Robespierre should oppose the law, he might fix upon them the perilous charge of Modérantisme, or counter-revolutionism, and they had all some months before, when they fancied their own heads safe, publicly agreed with him as to the necessity of giving additional powers to the terrible tribunal. At last, however, Ruamps, one of the most obscure and vulgar scoundrels even of that assembly, mustered courage to propose an adjournment, and to declare that, if the law passed without adjournment, he, for one, would think it necessary to blow out his brains. After this explosion Lecointre of Versailles hazarded a few words, and supported the motion for an adjournment. Barrère, as anxious for the adjournment as any of them, but at the same time more sensible of the critical situation in which they were placed, ingeniously hoped that the patriots were unanimous in the wish to punish and cut off the enemies of the people with more expedition than had hitherto been used, and that therefore the adjournment would not be voted for a longer period than three days. Upon this Lecointre said that two days would be quite enough. But Robespierre, who was now sitting as president of the House, would not allow an adjournment of one day—nay, nor of one hour. He reminded them that this law was what they had been clamouring for, was what they had been demanding from the committee of Salut Public for more than two months; that for more than two months the Revolutionary Tribunal had been complaining to the Convention of the shackles and impediments which delayed the march of national justice; that for more than two months the Convention had been under the knives of assassins; that conspiracies were never so rife as now; and, after a few timid equivocating sentences from Bourdon de l'Oise and one or two other members, the project, as presented by Couthon, was decreed and passed into law that very morning. Ruamps neither killed himself nor protested.

But the strangest part of the story of this decree of the 22nd Prairial, or 10th of June, is, that Robespierre, after getting it carried, made no visible use of it, and from that moment ceased attending the committees. His enemies in those committees, who had dreaded that the decree was to be the instrument of their own destruction, were left to employ it against others, and awful was the use that they and the Revolutionary Tribunal made of it. In the course of the forty days that the framer of the decree absented himself from their council eleven hundred and eight victims were tried according to the new forms, and executed, in Paris alone! It has been very shrewdly conjectured that a return of his former prudence or cunning made Robespierre desirous of withdrawing from his recent prominence, and of escaping back into the safer individuality under the shade of which he had achieved such wonderful successes; that he might mean one day to reproach Collot d'Herbois, Barrère, and Billaud-Varenes with having shed more blood in a month or six weeks than had been shed during the whole preceding twelvemonth; and that, while he absented himself from the committees and thus got rid of his responsibility, he secretly instigated his creature Fouquier-Tinville to mark the administration of his rivals with a violence more odious than his own.* There are circumstances which seem to bear out this hypothesis. Thus, when Fouquier-Tinville increased his batches so as to immolate one hundred and seventy-one victims in three days, and set up the guillotine in the great hall of the Palais-du-Justice (in the side chambers of which the dread tribunal held its sittings, as our courts hold theirs in the side chambers of Westminster Hall), Collot d'Herbois angrily asked him whether he meant to demoralize the punishment of death? (démoraliser le supplice)—and the committee of Salut Public eventually obliged Fouquier to remove the guillotine. But there are other circumstances which seem to be quite as strong against the hypothesis. Three days before the execution of the first of the batches (those whose united number made up the 171), Barrère warned the Convention of the danger of a "precocious clemency" towards the enemies of the interior. "If," cried he, "you spare them to-day, they will attack you to-morrow, and massacre you without pity. No, no! Let these enemies die; for, as I have said before, 'it is only the dead who come not back to trouble us'—il n'y a que les morts qui ne reviennent point." And again, on the very day that Fouquier handed over the second of his terrible fournées to Samson, in presenting in the name of the committee of Salut Public a report on the atrocious conduct of Joseph Lebon at Cambrai and Arras, where he had been acting as commissioner for the Convention, Barrère not merely palliated but applauded his cruelties and his executions, which had been nearly as numerous as those committed in Paris. "It is true," he said, "that Lebon has made use of some rather sharp forms—des formes un peu acerbes; people reproach him with an extravagant severity; but he has completely beaten the aristocrats, put down the evil-intentioned, and punished the counter-revolutionists and traitors. The vigorous measures he has adopted have saved Cambrai, which was full of conspirators! These services seem sufficiently decisive to the committee of Salut Public to induce them to recommend you not to give a triumph to aristocracy by censuring what he has done." This report, which was unanimously adopted, and Barrère's discourses certainly do not go to prove that Robespierre's rivals were desirous of moderating the action of the guillotine, or that it is necessary to have recourse to the supposition (and it is no more) of Robespierre's secretly instigating the Revolutionary Tribunal, or Fouquier-Tinville, in order to account rationally for the accelerated slaughter. Collot d'Herbois, who had deluged Lyons with blood, Billaud-Varennes, who had proposed some of the bloodiest of the decrees, and Barrère himself, were, at the very least, as cruel as Robespierre, Couthon, and Saint-Just. Besides, the recent law of the 10th of June contained a fresh invitation to informers and denouncers, and its provisions, as intended, enabled the Tribunal to proceed with a fourfold dispatch. Where all is mystery and doubt, we may modestly hazard a few conjectures of our own to account for Robespierre's strange conduct at this crisis of his fate. The humiliations he had suffered in consequence of his festival to the Être Suprême may have driven him into something little short of a temporary frenzy; and his fears and suspicions may have induced him at first to absent himself from the committees. During nearly the whole of this secession Saint-Just was absent on a mission to the armies of the North, and his other supporter, Couthon, was nearly always sick. But, although Robespierre went no more to the committee-rooms in the Tuileries, he soon began to re-appear with more frequency than formerly in the Jacobin Club, where Fouché was vainly attempting to undermine his authority. He also maintained a close intercourse with the new commune, with Payan, whom he had made procureur-general in lieu of Chaumette, with Fleuriot, the successor in the mayoralty to Pache (who, in spite of all his cunning, was now lying among the suspects in the Luxembourg), with other municipals who were nearly all of his own appointing, and with Hénriot, the commander of the armed force of Paris, who was devoted body and soul to his service. By his persevering exertions in the Mother Society he established his dominion there on what seemed a firmer basis than ever; his influence over the new commune became unbounded, the national guards of the capital and its populous neighbourhood appeared to be under his control, and is it not probable that his friends en mission were endeavouring to sound or gain over the regular armies in the field? Saint-Just, in his mission, was accompanied by Lebas, Robespierre's townsman, and one of his most devoted, enthusiastic, and able adherents; his own brother (Augustin Robespierre) had, at this moment, just returned from the army of Italy, where he had been living in the closest intimacy with Bonaparte and other officers whose promotion he had obtained; the commissioners with the army of the Pyrenees were of the same party:—if their united efforts could attach all these armies to their chief, to the Incorruptible, to the most virtuous man in France, there was hardly anything that Robespierre might not hope and achieve. It was clear that in the committees, at least, he could do nothing until Saint-Just returned and Couthon recovered his health; and what were these committees, or what the Convention itself, if, by attending them, he should lose ground in the Jacobins and be circumvented in the commune? On the 1st of July he denounced in the Mother Society various errors of the government, complained of the injustice and calumny to which he was exposed, and accused, almost by name, all his enemies in the Convention and in the committees of designs and plots against liberty. On the 11th of July he spoke in the same place upon the necessity or expediency of stopping the effusion of blood; and, as he spoke of his own dangers, of the daggers that were constantly aimed at his heart by the enemies of the people, the Jacobins cried out with one voice that they would all die for him or with him. On the 14th, he affirmed that his adversaries were a set of Atheists and thieves, like the Hébertists and Dantonists; that Fouché was one of the worst of them all; and hereupon the club expelled Fouché.* "But," said the Incorruptible, "the committees must be purified, and all the men of corrupt morals must be driven out of the Convention! Are these continuators of Hébert and Danton less dangerous, or deserving of more tenderness, than the Girondists?" It was on a day when Barrère presided in the club that he made his most regular attack on the committees of Salut Public and Sureté Générale, which now, in a manner, consisted of none but Collot D'Herbois, Billaud-Varennes, and Barrère himself. On quitting the club, Barrère was completely cast down. He is reported to have exclaimed, "I am sick of mankind! This Robespierre is insatiable! Because we cannot do all he wishes, he must seek to destroy us all! If he would be satisfied with the sacrifice of Thuriot, Guffroi, Rovère, Lecointre, Panis, Cambon, Monestier—of all that Dantonist-tail—we might understand one another; nay, let him even ask us to give up Tallien, Bourdon de l'Oise, Legendre, and Fréron, and we will not care for that. . . . But Duval and Andoin—but Leonard Bourdon, Vadier, Vouland,—it is impossible to give them up to him!"* These last-named individuals were the leading members of the committee of General Security, and, as of late the proceedings of the two committees had become mixed and identified, to have delivered them up would have been to pronounce sentence of death upon the members of the committee of Salut Public.

On the other side, however, the committees and the other enemies of Robespierre, who felt, as every party or faction had done in France, that they must destroy or be destroyed, were far from being inactive: they laboured hard to make the world believe, even in the presence of their own bloody pranks, that Robespierre and his colleagues Saint-Just and Couthon were the only cruel men in France—that Robespierre was the one great tyrant; and, knowing, by long experience, the mighty importance of classical nicknames, they called him Pisistratus. They dwelt upon his rash exhibition of himself on the 8th of June, and they represented his new religion as a part of a plot intended to secure to himself and his race an hereditary theocratic monarchy. Certain little accidents and circumstances afforded them a handle, which they did not fail to grasp. There was living in one of the most dingy and squalid corners of Paris a crazy old woman, a kind of French Joanna Southcote, named Catherine Theot. Like the English maniac, this Catherine gave out, and herself believed, that at the age of sixty-nine she was to give birth to the Saviour of the world, who was now to be born again, and to commence his final reign upon earth. She had ruminated upon the astounding horrors of the revolution (in themselves enough to bewilder a better brain), and upon the inexplicable verses of the Apocalypse, until her head was completely turned, and until she fancied that the revolution and the Apocalypse explained one another, and that she had gained possession of the key of prophecy. Like Joanna, she obtained her votaries and disciples, but their total number appears to have been but small, for her prophesying was soon stopped by that evil prophet Fouquier-Tinville; and the prevailing madness of the French people, though not without its superstitions and its monstrous beliefs, did not range in this direction, or make itself accessible to any belief which rested upon any part of the Old and New Testament. Catherine, indeed, would have had a better chance if she had built up her theory upon classical mythology, and had announced that she was going to give birth to a Jupiter or a Mars, a Minerva or a Bellona. Her sectaries, anticipating the miraculous parturition, called her 'The Mother of God;' and one of them (probably the ex-monk about to be mentioned), more learned than the rest, knowing that Theos was the Greek word for God, changed the final t in her family name (Theot) into an s, and thus made her 'Catherine God.' It is not easy to say what extravagant nonsense the old woman really did or did not prophesy, for she offered a fine subject for French wit and exaggeration, while those who took her in hand, and who notoriously falsified or forged papers, had other motives for exaggerating her impiety or insanity. It appears, however, probable that so conspicuous an actor in the revolution, and so popular a man as Robespierre, had been included in, or had been alluded to in, some of Catherine's vaticinations, and that his appearance, on the 8th of June, as the apostle of Deism and high-priest to the Etre Suprême, had become mingled in the visions of the poor bedlamite. Down to that celebration the governing powers had taken no notice of this obscure contemptible sect; and the laws in force promised entire freedom of worship, a toleration of every possible belief or unbelief: but soon after that festival the committees began to pry into the mysteries of these Theosites, with the view of proving that Catherine was nothing but a prophetic machine set a-going by Robespierre, and that his Etre Suprême and her Theos were the same. The committee of General Security, which was more particularly charged with the interior police, presently made the notable discovery, that one of Catherine's most devoted votaries—that the man who was, in a manner, her Pontifex Maximus—was no less a personage than Dom Gerle, that ex-Carthusian friar whom we have seen sitting among the patriots of the côté gauche in the Constituent Assembly, and who had been a friend of Robespierre. Gladdened by this discovery, Vadier, Vouland, Leonard Bourdon, and other members of the Sureté Générale, sent some of their spies and secret agents to Catherine's garret, to pretend to be converts to her doctrines, to affiliate themselves, and to discover fresh evidence which might implicate Robespierre—or, failing in discovery, to forge some such evidence. When these agents had done what was considered most necessary, they threw off the mask and arrested the old woman, the ex-Carthusian, and twelve of her votaries; the total number of whom is said not to have exceeded thirty or forty, men and women. Their next step was to draw up a report in the name of the committee to the Convention; but, as none of the members of the Sûreté Générale were so good at report-making as Barrère, it was agreed that his practised, pungent pen should draw up the document, and that Vadier should read it to the Convention as his own production. To give the more weight to the report, it was further determined that it should run in the name of both the committees: accordingly, on the 15th of June, just one week after the festival of the Être Suprême, Vadier ascended the tribune with Barrère's sharp report in his hand, and informed the representatives of the people that he had to denounce to them, in the name of the committees of Sûreté Générale and Salut Public united, a primary school of fanaticism just discovered in enlightened Paris. It was not only in reporting of battles and of sinking republican ships that Barrère had an inventive genius. His present composition wondrously swelled the number of Catherine's votaries. "In that dirty receptacle," said he, or said Vadier for him, reading his report, "there are numerous swarms of bigots and idiots constantly grouped round this ridiculous divinity. Certain chiefs, more dangerous than these, are also seen there, such as demi-savans, doctors, lawyers, idle capitalists who detest the revolution, and mix in these mummeries with perfidious intentions. There also go thither your animal-magnetizers or Mesmerists, your Illuminati, and other vapourish and atrabilarious blockheads, whose hearts are cold to their country, and whose heads are hot only when they think they can betray liberty. In the houses of some of these individuals letters have been found from emigrant priests residing in London.* Above all, it is to be remarked that there is not a single patriot in all that band or sect: it is composed of nothing but royalists, usurers, maniacs, egotists, muscadins (dandies or fashionables), and counter-revolutionists of both sexes." After describing the reception or initiation of the elect, and the ceremonies they used in approaching the Holy Mother, the report explained, in Barrère's wittiest manner, some of the dogmas and prophecies of

* Barrère's doctors are reduced, in fact, to one—Quévremont de Lamotte—who had been employed in the household of the late Duke of Orleans. As for his or Catherine's Mesmerists, the only proof of their existence was a letter found in de Lamotte's possession, written from London by an emigrant, as far back as December, 1792, in which there was some mention of animal-magnetism, and of the visions of Swedenborg. And this letter was the only letter written from London, by priests or any one else. It had no more to do with Catherine Theot than with the man in the moon; but that signified nothing to Barrère, who could always twist and turn documents and facts, and make a thousand out of a unit. It has been usual to set down the old Marchioness of Chastenois among the votaries of Catherine, because she was sent to prison at the same time, and, with the usual logic, included in Barrère's present report; but the old marchioness, who lived at Versailles, was no Robespierriest or republican, but an enthusiastic or frantic royalist, who professed the re-establishment of the monarchy, and who had a little sect of her own. As for Barrère's lawyers, idle capitalists, &c., they became more visionary than his doctors and Mesmerists, being unsupported even by a unit. But in his report he went so far as to declare that Catherine had numerous votaries in the army, superstitious soldiers, who received their initiation, in the belief that it would make them invulnerable in battle. The foundation for this was, that one old soldier, blind of an eye, out of a love of fun, or at the suggestion of the secret agents of the police, had insinuated himself into Catherine's garret, and had thence repaired to the committee of Sûreté Générale, to relate and laugh at the trick he had played and the mummeries he had witnessed.

Catherine Theot. She was chosen to give birth to the Divine Word; she was the corner-stone of the kingdom of God upon earth; it was she that was to choose the elect, who were to command the soldiers of the God of armies; her throne was to be miraculously erected near the Pantheon, on the spot formerly occupied by the schools of law. It was from that centre that she was to rule the universe. A single flash of lightning was to reduce to dust the thrones, the armies, and all the miscreants of the earth, to level mountains and dry up the seas. She was a new Eve, appointed to repair the miseries caused to mankind by the first Eve and Adam, her husband, realising that redemption which had hitherto existed only figuratively. The entire population of the globe was to be reduced to one hundred and forty thousand elect, chosen by the Holy Mother; and these elect were to be immortal upon earth like herself, and to enjoy with her the terrestrial paradise which she was about to establish! "Such," said the sportive composition of Barrère, which excited continuous peals of laughter as Vadier read it, "such, citizen legislators, is an abridgement of the monstrous absurdities which have been collected from the interrogatories of the accused by your committees. But you must know, citizens, that the pretended mother of God is not the most curious piece of this machinery. She is only there for the mere mechanical part of the mummeries and grimaces—she is only the physical or material part of the system;—the moral part of the institution, the substance of the doctrine, the explanation of the meaning of the oracles, prophecies, and gospel, all this is confided to more experienced and much more dangerous hands. It is an ex-monk that is charged with this part of the system—and this monk is Dom Gerle, ex-Carthusian and deputy of the Constituent Assembly! Everybody here remembers the audacious motion he made in 1789, in the view of getting the Roman Catholic religion declared to be the dominant religion of France. The patriots of the côté gauche, with whom he at that time cunningly connected himself, imputed that liberticide motion to the disorder of his brain, and became the dupes of his perfidious bonhomie. Afterwards, when the Jacobins were going to expel him, he feigned repentance, and, like his friend Gobel, wormed himself into the confidence of the patriots, in order to deceive and betray them. Well, it is this very same Dom Gerle that is at the bottom of this afflicting conspiracy—cette conspiration affligeante!" The report said a great deal more about the unlucky ex-Carthusian; but, apparently, Barrère and his committees had not had courage to attack Robespierre directly and openly, for the report said not a word about the friendship which had existed between him and Dom Gerle, nor breathed a syllable to implicate the great man: on the contrary, it implicated his enemies, or those he had sent to the guillotine, declaring that Gerle was, as the close friend of Gobel, connected with Chaumette and Danton!

But the fact of Robespierre's friendship for the ex-Carthusian was very generally known, and other means were taken to publish the circumstance that it was Robespierre who had procured for Dom Gerle his certificate of civisme—a certificate without which there was no living in France. Moreover, though Barrère's report (which gave the substance of other letters found or forged) made not the slightest allusion to this document, it was made known through other channels that, when the secret agents of the committee of General Security arrested Catherine Theot, they found in her bed a letter addressed to Robespierre, calling him "the son of the Supreme Being," "the eternal Word," "the Redeemer of mankind," "the Messiah spoken of by the prophets." This letter could not have been written by Catherine, for the old bedlamite knew not how to sign her own name; the probability is, that it was written by some one of the committeemen, and put into the old woman's bed by the fellow who pretended to find it. But probabilities or possibilities were not often taken into account in these days; and it appears that the evidence of this letter and Dom Gerle's Robespierre-bestowed certificate of civisme convinced a very considerable portion of the Parisians that the Incorruptible was himself the author or promoter of the whole of the impious farce.* These people would not recollect that Dom Gerle had taken up the trade of prophecy at the very beginning of the revolution, or open their eyes to the self-evident, glaring fact that he was deranged. Whatever was the extent of Robespierre's own insanity, it was not likely to unite itself with the monk's idiocy and the old woman's rhapsody: there is abundant evidence to prove that Dom Gerle really and sincerely believed in Catherine's heavenly mission and divine nature; but there is nothing to show that Robespierre so much as knew of the existence of Catherine and her tiny contemptible sect until the committees proceeded against her, and, without his knowledge, presented the report to the Convention, who, upon Vadier's motion, had unanimously voted that it should be printed and sent to all the armies and to all the communes. Although that report had not ventured to name him, the other voices and whispers which proceeded unofficially from the committees met his ear, alarmed his suspicion, and wounded his pride—a pride already sufficiently hurt by the levity and laughter which had attended the reading of Barrère's production—nor could he mistake the intention to throw ridicule and contempt upon his own new religion, and upon all belief whatsoever. His friends represented that the farce might be fatal to him, and that it left no possibility of reconciliation or compromise with Barrère, the committees, and their atheists. He brought the whole subject under the consideration of his House of Lords. The Jacobins treated it very differently from the Convention: instead of laughing at Barrère's witty report, which bore a close resemblance to Voltaire's 'Candide' and other romances of that school, they frowned and groaned at it, declaring that such conspiracies as Catherine Theot's were no laughing matter, but things which might demoralize, Chaumettize, and utterly ruin the republic. They hinted that none but immoral men, disbelievers of the soul's immortality and the existence of a Supreme Being, could have treated such blasphemies and abominations as the report had treated them, or jest and grin at them as some immoral deputies had done in the legislature. It was not necessary for Robespierre to speak in his own justification, it was not necessary for him even to appear in the club; it was enough that his friends expressed their and his abhorrence of the levity of the committees and of the blasphemy of the Theotites, and invoked the guillotine for those wretched sectaries. In vain Dom Gerle now wrote to implore his protection: he left the ex-Carthusian to his fate. But even the great and solemn Jacobins could not shield their chief from the fatal effects (fatal at least to one in his situation, in a country like France) of ridicule and contemptuous giggling; and it remains indisputable that Barrère's light shafts, and the insanity of Catherine Theot, contributed very materially to precipitate his ruin.*

* The ex-Carthusian, Dr. Quévremont de Lamotte, and Catherine, were by decree of the Convention ordered to be tried by the Revolutionary Tribunal, together with the Marchioness of Chastenois, who, as we have mentioned, had no connexion with them. Luckily for these prisoners the Tribunal was very busy, and another revolution close at hand. They were all liberated, without looking through the little window of the guillotine, soon after the fall of Robespierre. Dom Gerle subsequently obtained some clerkship or trifling post in the Home Office, or ministry of the interior, and became one of Revilleire Lepeaux's Philanthropists.

Both parties employed their spies and secret agents. Those of the committees gave their employers alarming accounts of lists of proscription drawn up by Robespierre; those who were employed by Robespierre made reports quite as alarming as to the intentions and preparations of the committees. By degrees it began to be reported that Robespierre's perruquier, in dressing his hair, had caught sight of his death-list—that some of the committee-men themselves, who had not yet broken with the Incorruptible, had discovered by some lucky chance or other that he had drawn up such a list, and that their own names were in it—that Robespierre himself, overtaken by wine, which he rarely drank at all, had blabbed—and that, in short, it was perfectly well-known that he had set down the names of forty individuals, members of the Mountain, committee-men, &c., who were to form the first batch, but not the last—that Fouquier-Tinville and his tribunal were to immolate for him. It is quite certain that such lists, containing forty or more names, were secretly circulated by his enemies; but it is by no means so certain that he had ever committed the imprudence of drawing up any such lists in writing; and it seems now to be pretty generally admitted that the lists exhibited were forgeries designed to drive men into action through their self-fears and desperation. In his mental arithmetic Robespierre, no doubt, had calculated the numbers it would be necessary to sacrifice to save himself; for (it had again come to this) he must guillotine or be guillotined; and they must be guillotined or guillotine:—reconciliation there could be none, as he could not trust them, nor they him. When the game was up with him, Robespierre's triumphant conquerors produced a few notes and papers which had been found, or which were said to have been found, in his lodging at the carpenter's, in the Rue St. Honoré; but the Barréists were not likely to be more scrupulous about these papers than the Girondists and others had been about the documents found in the iron cupboard in the Tuileries; and they are accused of having mutilated, postilled, and interlined some of the documents they found; of having entirely forged some of the papers they produced, and of having destroyed others. But, even after all this, the only list of proscription they published (and this appears to have been really in Robespierre's handwriting, and without any of their alterations) contained the names of but five individuals, and those five not the most formidable of his adversaries—Dubois Crancé, Delmas, Thuriot, Bourdon de l'Oise, and Leonard Bourdon. Carnot, as bloodthirsty a man as any of them, who had had a mortal quarrel with St. Just, was mentioned in this paper more than once, and in a way which left no doubt as to the intentions of the writer in regard to him. But this is the only thing like an authentic list of proscription; and even this lay hid until Robespierre fell. Indisputably those who had put themselves in opposition to his will, and entered into a conspiracy against him, had very good reasons to believe that there was a long mental list or register, and that all their names were in it, as they, on their side, carried written on their hearts a list of the Robespierrists they were to sacrifice. Of all those that were threatened, not one felt the guillotine-knife so near his neck as Tallien: for he had been a decided Dantonist; he had quarrelled both with Couthon and St. Just, as well as with Robespierre; he had been roughly recalled from his mission at Bordeaux, and had been repeatedly menaced in the Jacobins. Tallien was not wanting in fire, energy, and address; and there were certain other little accidents and circumstances of a tender nature to raise his courage and put him foremost in the assault. During his Bordeaux proconsulate, he became enamoured of the young and beautiful wife of M. Fontenai, daughter of a once-celebrated merchant or banker of Madrid named Cabarrus, and had induced her to follow him and his fortunes. The lady had followed, or accompanied him, to Paris; and they were living together conjugally, when she was denounced as suspecte, arrested, and thrown into the Luxembourg. Not knowing how soon she might be dragged to the Revolutionary Tribunal and the scaffold, she called upon Tallien to save her—to save himself; for she knew—and so did he—that his danger was almost as immediate and as great as hers. He called a secret meeting of friends, of brother-deputies, such as the Bourdons, Fréron, Barras, and Delmas, who (barring the lady) stood in the same painful and perilous predicament as himself; and at this or some subsequent meeting Tallien undertook to commence the death-attack upon Robespierre in the Convention, as soon as a good opportunity should present itself. There can scarcely be a greater mistake than that of fancying that these men were united by a horror of cruelty and bloodshed—they were united and impelled by nothing but the instinct of self-preservation. They were clamouring for blood, more blood, for greater revolutionary energy and faster executions at this very moment. Although the committee of Salut Public had pretended to disapprove of Couthon's or Robespierre's terrible decree of the 10th of June, Barrère announced to the Convention that fresh plots had been discovered, and that greater severities must be resorted to; that all the enemies of the people in prison in the departments must be tried and executed as rapidly as the prisoners in the capital; and the day after the delivery of this speech or report the two committees of Salut Public and Sûreté Générale united in a resolution that four popular commissions should be appointed to try all the political prisoners of the departments with the utmost speed, and with the summary powers which the decree of the 10th of June had conferred on the Revolutionary Tribunal.

* Barrère's Report and Debates in the Convention and Jacobin Club, as given in Hist. Parlement.—Vilate, Mystères de la Mère de Dieu dévoilés.—Senart, Mémoires.

Senart tells us that he was employed by the committees to dupe the wretched fanatics, and then arrest them. The testimony of a man who could thus play the part of a spy and entrapper is not entitled to implicit credit. Vilate, too, lies at least up to the average quantum of these revolutionary memoir-writers; but on the present occasion he had no apparent motives for falsifying such facts as he knew. He repeatedly expresses his astonishment at Barrère's gigantic mendacity; and both he and Senart make out that gay Anacron of the guillotine to have been the greatest liar of those lying times.

As early as the beginning of July, Henriot had intimated to Mayor Fleuriot that he and his armed force of Paris were fully prepared to strike a blow, to make a coup d'état like that which he had managed last year when the Convention was purged of the Girondists; other friends, partisans, or colleagues, who were so identified with Robespierre that they must either conquer with him or die with him, urged him to be up and doing, or to give the signal and let them act for him with the Parisian artillery, muskets, and bayonets: but the incorruptible hesitated, faltered, and most wretchedly paltered about respect for the laws, and the propriety of doing the business in a calm and constitutional manner; and it was not until the return of St. Just from his mission to the army of the North that he began to gird himself up for his last wrestle. "Only dare," said St. Just. "That one word contains all the secret of revolutions!" But still Robespierre could not dare in this style; and, instead of settling himself in the Hôtel de Ville, and calling out Henriot and his cannoneers at once, he allowed several days to pass, and then re-appeared in the Convention, from which he had absented himself so long that the deputies had lost the habit of fear. His plan was to proceed according to precedent, to denounce the committees as the Committee of Twelve had been denounced before Henriot and his Parisian army and mob marched to pull out the Girondists by the ears; and perhaps he hoped, by mere oratory and terror, and by the recollection of Henriot's former exploit, to win over a large majority of the House, who would decree his enemies into the hands of Fouquier-Tinville without the employment of any military or mob force. It was the 8th Thermidor, or 26th of July, and Collet d'Herbois was occupying the president's chair, when Robespierre ascended the tribune with an awfully long discourse in his hand, which denounced not merely the two committees, but every man in France that was opposed to his own scheme and projects. He declared that the country was demoralized and worn out, the Convention degraded and chained by those tyrannical and profligate men who were nothing but foul remnants of the atheistical Hébertists and corrupt Dantonists. He declaimed at great length, and in several parts of his discourse, against the "desolating doctrine" of materialism. "No!" he exclaimed; "No! Chaumette, death is not an eternal sleep! Citizens, erase from your cemeteries and tombs that maxim, which, engraven by sacrilegious hands, throws the black crape over all nature, discourages oppressed innocence, and insults the virtuous dead. Citizens, inscribe rather these words—Death is the commencement of Immortality." He had recourse to arguments which go far to support the ingenious hypothesis of his having kept away from the committees in the hope of depopularizing his enemies, who remained at their posts and guided the mad machine of government with the whip or scourge of the decree of the 10th of June in their hands. After reminding the Convention that he had no force or faculty except such as they and the people had chosen to intrust him with; that he had never done anything of himself, and that all the decrees he had proposed had been carried either unanimously or by such majorities as scarcely left a minority visible to the naked eye; after reminding them that in the committees he was but one, he exclaimed, "And yet, will it be believed, there were people who tried to heap upon my head the entire responsibility of all decrees of the Convention, of all operations of the committees, of all the errors of all the constituted authorities, of the very blunders and crimes of all my enemies? Perhaps not a single individual was arrested, not a single citizen brought into trouble, but it was said 'Robespierre is the author of your misfortunes—you would be happy if he were dead!' And men who were acting not merely without my concurrence, but against my will and principles, were accustomed to say at every terrible severity, 'It must be so because Robespierre so wills it, and we cannot resist him!' How could I withstand the effect of these insidious, clandestine, and incessant calumnies, these efforts made in all directions to render me odious and terrible? I withdrew: for six weeks the feelings of nature, the force of calumny, the powerlessness either to do good or prevent evils, have forced me to abandon absolutely my functions as a member of the committee of Salut Public. . . . Well, then, at least during these six weeks my dictatorship has been lying extinct—during these six weeks I have taken no part whatever in the government, and have exercised no influence over it:—but has there been, for that, less bloodshed? Has patriotism been better protected? Has the country been any the happier?" With very considerable ingenuity he endeavoured to identify himself with the great body of the Convention, or with all the deputies who were not members of the governing committees and had no share in the executive. He preferred his quality of a representative of the people to the being a member of the committee of Salut Public, and he hoped that the great majority only prided themselves on their representative character. They must perceive and feel and groan under the fact that the governing committees, who ought to be but as clerks and servants of the Convention, were becoming, nay, had become, its masters and tyrants. For his part, if he could only rouse the Convention to a proper sense of its own power and dignity, and to an active odium against the usurpations and excesses and anti-republican tendencies of the committees, he would gladly drain the poisoned cup, even as Socrates had done at Athens. He spoke, as he had recently done at the Jacobins, of his declining health and his approaching end (his health, in reality, was in a deplorable state); and he said his warnings were to be considered almost as a voice from the grave, or as a testamentary bequest to his country. His enemies were the enemies of the Convention, were a combination of traitors who had obtained places of power and emolument by the revolution, whilst other men remained as poor as when they first left their homes to serve the country. To the party occupying the centre or plain—the low-spirited, shifty, cowardly party who had now for a long time enjoyed the honourable designations of "le Ventre" (the Belly), "le Marais" (Marsh or Bog), "Grenouilles," or "Crapauds du Marais" (Frogs or Toads of the Marsh)—he addressed much comfortable discourse. He called them wise patriots, moderate, impartial, unambitious legislators, who had not allied themselves with any faction, who looked only for good government and peace—peace for their country as well as for themselves and their families. He declared that he had always been the friend of that section of the House; that he had opposed the arrest of the seventy-three deputies who had been thrown into prison for protesting against the expulsion of the Girondists; that this opposition to what he considered an unnecessary act of violence (the Girondists being once dismissed) had made his enemies accuse him of partiality to the Marais. He had a plan for remedying the existing evils; it was short, it was simple:—let the traitors be punished, let the committee of General Security be purged and made subordinate to the committee of Salut Public; let the Salut Public be purified also; and let these two committees and the committee of finance be rendered submissive and subservient to the supreme authority of the National Convention.*

The Plain, Ventre, or Marais, seemed to be touched: if he could only secure them he was sure of a majority; and, if he could release and reinstate the protesting deputies, he might reasonably count on their votes. But the trimming middle party were afraid of committing themselves until they should see some better assurance that Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon were stronger than the other triumvirate, Barrère, Billaud-Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois, backed by the committees and nearly the entire force of the executive: the Frogs would not croak one way or the other; the whole House sat silent and confused, the different factions gazing at one another, but not one of them, or so much as a single man belonging to any of them, expressing either approbation or disapprobation of the long discourse they had heard. This silence was ominous and awful: never before had Robespierre descended from the tribune of the Convention without the applauses and acclamations of the Assembly. When it had lasted for some minutes a sort of subdued murmur was heard, and then a whispering that this or that member ought to speak. Nobody, however, rose to brave the Incorruptible to his face. Tallien, though pledged to do it, thought that the proper moment was not yet come. At last draper Lecointre of Versailles, who had recently undergone many anxieties and terrors, either to conciliate Robespierre or to bring his enemies to the scratch, rose and moved in the usual forms that his discourse should be printed. Then Bourdon de l'Oise, who had been severely flagellated in the discourse, stood forward and boldly and vehemently opposed the motion, and moved that Robespierre's discourse, as it might contain dangerous misrepresentations, should be referred to the two committees of Salut Public and Sureté Générale. Barrère, whose hatred and whose danger were as great as Bourdon's, but whose courage was much smaller, said that the discourse ought certainly to be printed, and that the usual vote ought to be passed to that effect, as in a free country nothing ought to be hidden from the people, &c. Couthon insisted that the discourse ought not only to be printed, but ought also to be sent to all the communes or municipalities of the republic. The wavering Convention thereupon unanimously voted that it should be printed and transmitted. When this was done, the threatened members of the committees, fearing that Robespierre was going to recover his old ascendancy in the House, fell upon his discourse with great fury and not a little confusion, for two or three of them wanted to speak at the same moment. Vadier, who still fathered Barrère's report on that subject, took up the story of Catherine Theot, complaining that Robespierre had spoken disrespectfully and maliciously of the report he had had the honour to deliver to the House in the name of the committees, and declaring that in all things the Salut Public and Sureté Générale had acted wisely and uprightly; that the two were but as one body, and were determined to stand or fall together. The next that followed was Cambon, the chief of the committee of finance, whom Robespierre had named several times in his discourse as a known rogue, a stockjobber, a dilapidator. "And I too," cried Cambon, knowing he must fight or die, "and I too present myself in the lists! I am an honest functionary: I belong to no faction, I exercise no tyranny: but there is a single man here who paralyzes the whole National Convention—and that man is Maximilian Robespierre!" Here some applauses were heard; the deputies were growing bolder. Robespierre said a few words in reply: Cambon rejoined by giving him the lie direct, in a sonorous Cela est faux!—a phrase often used there, but which for a very long time no one had dared apply to the Incorruptible. Billaud-Varennes, following Cambon, exclaimed, "The day is at last come for pulling off masks and speaking the truth. I would rather that my dead body should serve the tyrant as a stepping-stone to the throne, than that I should become by my silence the accomplice of his crimes!" Panis, Bentabole, Charlier, Thirion, Amar, all followed in this onslaught, while not a voice except that of the paralytic Couthon was raised on the side of Robespierre. Freron shouted, "The moment is come for the resurrection of liberty of opinion and of speech! But let us revoke the decree which gives to the committees the right of arresting and sending before the Revolutionary Tribunal the representatives of the people. Where is the man that can speak freely in this House, when he is under the fear of being arrested at the door?" But this proposition was very unsavoury to the committee triumvirate, who wanted the arresting faculty in order to seize and commit Robespierre and his party; and who, besides, were bent upon retaining every atom of the power they had got. Looking contemptuously at journalist Freron, Billaud said that the man whose fears hindered him from speaking out in the Convention was unworthy of being a representative of the people. Charlier moved that the vote they had just passed should be rescinded, and that Robespierre's discourse should be referred to the committees of Salut Public and Sureté Générale, as originally demanded by Bourdon de l'Oise. "How," cried Robespierre, "when I have had the courage to deposit in the bosom of the Convention truths essential to the salvation of the country, would you submit my discourse to the examination of the very individuals I accuse!" His voice was drowned by murmurs; his enemies were growing bolder and bolder.

* Last discourse of Robespierre, pronounced on the 8th Thermidor (28th of July), found in manuscript among his papers, and printed by order of the Convention.

“He who boasts of courage,” cried Charlier, “ought to have the courage of truth. Name those whom you accuse!” Robespierre had named a good many of them, and had designated others quite as clearly as could have been done by spelling their Christian names and surnames: but Charlier nevertheless was loudly applauded; and a great many members kept repeating and shouting, “Name them! Name them! Name them!” When this had lasted for some time, Barrère said that this discussion could only serve Pitt and the Duke of York; and thereupon Charlier’s motion was put to the vote—was carried without opposition—and the discourse handed over to the committees. Humiliated, discouraged, but not yet giving up the game for lost, Robespierre passed over from the Convention to the Jacobin Club. Here his spirit was revived by an enthusiastic reception. His friend Couthon followed him, and was received with the same enthusiasm. The Incorruptible was called upon to repeat the discourse he had delivered to the Convention. The Jacobins applauded every paragraph. When he had finished the reading, which occupied two mortal hours, he extemporized some touching appeals to their feelings. “This discourse,” said he, “is my dying testament. I have seen to-day that the league of the wicked against me is so strong that I cannot hope to escape it. I shall die without regret!” “You shall not die!” cried the Jacobins. “There is nothing to fear!” Henriot, Payan, Dumas, Coffinhal, and others, surrounded him, declaring that they were all ready to act. Henriot, alluding to his exploit of last year, said, “Courage, Robespierre, the cannoneers of Paris are steady, and I still know the road to the Convention!” “Well,” said the Incorruptible, “we must purify that assembly; you must march to-morrow to try and save the cause of liberty.” “But if we should fail?” “Why then, my friends, you will see me drink the hemlock calmly, like Socrates.” “Robespierre,” cried painter David, “I will drink the hemlock with thee.” On the motion of Couthon, it was agreed that there should be a new purification of the society, that at the instant all the members that had voted against Robespierre should be purged out for ever. Several of these members were present: Collot d’Herbois attempted to speak for them and for himself: he spoke of his long services, of his dangers, of the two pistols which Amiral had fired at him; but he was hissed, hooted, and finally driven from the tribune, not without cuffs and kicks. Tallien bolted from the club-hall to save himself for a fight to-morrow: other members, being named and pointed out by Couthon, were buffeted and kicked out of doors: Collot d’Herbois, as he fled, thought he saw knives and daggers drawn to take his life. He ran straight to the committee-room of Salut Public in the Tuileries. There he found Saint-Just deliberating with his brother committee-men as if nothing extraordinary had taken place or was about to take place: though alone of his party, the starch, pragmatical fanatic seemed to be giving the law. Perceiving that Collot d’Herbois was much excited, Saint-Just asked him what had happened over the way at the Jacobins? Collot, still smarting with the kicks and cuffs he had received, foamed out, “What has happened! Revolt has happened! Horrors are happening! And you, Saint-Just, are one of the infamous triumvirate that seek our lives! But you shall not have them! You mean to denounce us to-morrow morning—you have your pockets full of lists and notes against us—show them!” Saint-Just emptied his pockets, but no such lists or notes were found. He had announced his intention of presenting to the Convention on the morrow a report upon the state of the great army of the North that was gaining victory after victory in Belgium, and upon the state and prospects of the republic in general: the committee wanted to see this report, or to be informed beforehand of its tone and contents: he had it not about him, but he said he would go and seek it, and bring or send them the manuscript, which was at present in the hands of a friend. They allowed him to depart; and, as soon as he got well clear of the Tuileries, he sent them word that they should not have the report—that he would read it from the tribune to-morrow morning. This was a declaration of war; but although, since his arrival from the army, many insidious attempts had been made, no hope could have been rationally entertained by the committees of detaching Saint-Just from Robespierre: the Incorruptible was that young fanatic’s model and idol; and, besides, Saint-Just had committed himself in mortal strife and hatred with several of the committee-men, and especially with Carnot, who must guillotine him or be guillotined. When Saint-Just had joined Robespierre in the Jacobin-Hall, Payan, procureur of the commune, a man of action rather than of words, proposed that they should go forthwith and arrest their enemies, who were all assembled in the committee-rooms of the Tuileries. Nothing would have been more decisive, nor could anything have been much easier to do, for there was only a weak guard at the palace, and that guard would that night have obeyed the orders of Henriot rather than those of the committees. But Robespierre shrunk from the decisive step, thinking that the committees and the Convention ought to be purged with the same medicine, and precisely the same doses as had been administered to the Girondists:—and this adherence to revolutionary precedent and routine ruined his chances. It appears that, like most orators, he fancied everything was to be done by speech-making; that he still entertained the confident hope of bringing back the majority of the Convention to their former fears, submissiveness, and allegiance. “I can no longer expect anything from the Mountain,” said he: “those men want to cut me off as a tyrant; but the mass of the Assembly will hear me.” His host (Duplaix) took a more correct view of the dangerous crisis, and recommended energetic measures, deeds to be done by the strong hand: but the now doomed and infatuated Incarnation of the Revolution told the carpenter that there was nothing to fear, and kept repeating—“The mass of the Convention is pure—the majority will hear me!”

While Robespierre was supping quietly with his Cornelia and the rest of that family, and a few of his most honoured friends, Barrère, Collot d'Herbois, Carnot, Billaud-Varennes, Tallien, Bourdon de l'Oise, Leonard Bourdon, and others of his enemies, quitting the committee-rooms, where they might all have been taken with one cast of the net, and giving up for that night all thoughts of supping or sleeping, ran over Paris and its faubourgs, flattering the lately despised Frogs of the Marsh, and imploring them to be steady and bold, to be heroes to-morrow—treating and negotiating with the leading patriots of some of the sections, and even tampering with the terrible Parisian cannoners, upon whose guns must depend the final decision of the tremendous conflict that offered no hope of quarter to the defeated party. At first, Barrère, Collot, and his friends were but coldly received by the Frogs. “It was natural,” says one of these reptiles, “that we should be less friendly to the Mountain, who had demanded our arrest and accusation, than to Robespierre who had constantly protected us—no doubt with the intention of making us serve as a rampart to him in case of need. The Mountain knew this, but as they had no other means they applied to us. Their emissaries beset us, addressing themselves particularly to Boissy-d'Anglas, Palasne-Champeaux, and myself, for we had all three been Constituents, and our example was sure to drag others after us. They made use of every argument they could muster to win us over: they told us that we should be responsible for all the executions and massacres if we refused to concur in the means they proposed for making them cease; that the political protection which Robespierre had afforded us would not last long, and that our turn would inevitably come! Rejected, repulsed once, they almost immediately returned to the charge; on their third attack we yielded. It was no longer possible for us to see without horror sixty or eighty heads falling daily under the guillotine. Our adhesion promised to stop this slaughter; we gave it at last, and that very moment the irons were put in the fire.”*

On the following morning—the 9th Thermidor, or 27th of July—the combatants met betimes in the Convention. Saint-Just took possession of the tribune and began to read his promised report, which turned out to be nothing but a denunciation of the committees, sterner, more terrible, and far more direct than that which Robespierre had presented yesterday. The committee-men looked with an agony of anxiety to the Frogs of the Marsh, to the neutral men of the côté droit. “Now, brave men of the Plain,” said Bourdon de l'Oise and

* Durand-Maillaue, Mémoires.

Tallien, affectionately squeezing the hands of some of them, “now, brave patriots of the right, steady! Allons!” Saint-Just had not proceeded far, and was declaring that he belonged to no faction, but would combat all factions, when red-faced Tallien, who had probably elevated his courage with wine, started to his feet, and made what was called a motion of order. “No good citizen,” cried he, “can restrain his tears at seeing the unhappy fate to which the commonwealth is abandoned! There is nothing to be seen but woe and division! Yesterday a member of the government isolated himself, and pronounced a discourse in his own private name; to-day another member of the government does the same thing. Let the curtain that hides this horrid mystery be entirely torn down!” Three rounds of applause, which followed Tallien's beginning, encouraged others to continue. Billaud-Varennes stood up, and others stood up, vociferating and gesticulating like maniacs: the president's chair was occupied by Collot d'Herbois, who grasped his hand-bell in order to ring down St.-Just and Robespierre when they should attempt to reply. Billaud drew a terrible picture of the seditious scenes which had passed in the Jacobin-hall on the preceding evening. “That society,” he exclaimed, “has plainly announced its intention of seizing and butchering a great part of the Convention! Apostles of assassination threatened the lives of patriot members last night. . . . I see one of them there sitting on the Mountain!” There rose a terrible outcry of “Turn him out!—Turn out the assassin!” And the obnoxious individual was dragged or kicked out of the House with as little ceremony as the Jacobins had used towards Collot d'Herbois and his friends, the House accompanying the act of expulsion with fresh rounds of applause. “The moment to tell the truth, the whole truth,” resumed Billaud, “is at last arrived. . . . This Assembly is placed between two abysses. . . . If it be weak it must perish!” Right and left, and Centre or Plain or Marsh—all the deputies, almost to a man, started up, waved their hats over their heads, shouting that there would be no weakness, and that the Convention should not perish; and even the people in the galleries seemed to send forth an unanimous shout of “Long live the Convention!” “Long live the Committee of Salut Public!” That stanch Robespierriest, Lebas, demanded to be allowed to speak; but the House called him to order, threatened him with the Abbaye, and president Collot silenced him with his dreadful bell. Billaud continued his declamation, making use of some very good arguments, proper to keep the shifting Plain steady through the very agency of their fears; for they went to show how one party was swept away after the other—how the Dantonists, after concurring in the destruction of the Hébertists, had been destroyed themselves—and how little men ought to rely on the promises of a party who had defended Danton enthusiastically in March, and had sent him to the guillotine in April—who had so plainly announced that every man who was not for them was against them, and must be cut off. “A chasm deeper than the catacombs has been dug at your feet,” cried Billaud, “and you must fill it with your dead bodies, or triumph over Robespierre and his fellow-tyrants!” Here Robespierre rushed to the tribune, but he was assailed with the cries of “Down with the tyrant!” (à bas, à bas le tyran!) with the loud dissonance of the president’s hand-bell, and with an ominous roaring and grumbling from the galleries. Tallien again thrust himself into the speaking-place. “Citizens,” cried he, “last night, at the Jacobins, I trembled for the republic—I shuddered for the country! I saw formed there the army of the new Cromwell. I armed myself with a dagger, and I said to myself, if the Convention should not dare to strike the tyrant, I will pierce his heart with this!” And, as he said the word, he drew forth a shining dagger, and flourished it in the eyes of the Convention. The stage-trick produced all the effect that could have been desired; and, in the midst of a roar of voices, of one commingled shout of “Down with the tyrant!” “Death to the triumvirs!” Barrère moved, and the House voted, that the Convention should be declared in permanent session, and that a decree of arrest should be issued against the enemies of the country. St.-Just stood motionless and pale, Couthon sat looking at his paralytic limbs, silently, or ejaculating “Triumvir, indeed!” Only Robespierre struggled—and desperately did he struggle—with the impending doom. He ran to and fro, foaming at the mouth like a tiger taken in the toils. He tried to speak from his place, he climbed to the tribune, he rushed to the table of the house—to the president’s chair; but Collot rang his bell until it seemed to crack, and speech or word they would allow him in no place. This was but the measure he had often meted out to others. The House, wanting a report and some more decrees, called for that great report-maker, Barrère. This smooth-tongued turn-about, this variorum edition of the révolution—who had belonged to every party, who had been by turns monarchy-constitutionalist, Girondist, Jacobin, Dantonist, Robespierrist, and Dantonist again—had kept himself in the background, in the rear of the combatants, until he saw for which side victory was declaring. It is said (and the fact is perfectly credible and consistent) that he had come down to the House with two reports in his pocket, one to be read in favour of Robespierre if the Frogs should croak on the wrong side, and the other (which he now proceeded to read) in favour of the committees and the Mountain in case of their assured triumph. As the proper tail-piece to the report which he read, Barrère moved that the Convention should decree that Henriot’s rank of commandant-general should be abolished; that every commandant of a legion or section should exercise the chief command over the armed force of Paris in rotation; and that the mayor Fleuriot and the procureur Payan should be called to the bar to render an account of the state of the capital. The readyman added a short proclamation in the name of the Convention to the French people, telling them that the enemies of the country were going to desolate the legislature, that aristocracy was going to triumph, and that the royalists would soon re-appear on the scene, unless the said French people rallied round the real patriots of the Convention, &c. The decree, the proclamation, and all the rest were voted by acclamation, Robespierre still vainly struggling to obtain a hearing, Saint-Just and Couthon remaining as silent and as passive as before. Vadier, Bourdon de l’Oise, and Tallien again, all fell upon the fallen dictator; but not as a terrorist, not as a man of blood, not as the perpetrator of wholesale judicial massacres, not as the hand which day after day touched the springs of the guillotine (for these his accusers had been his associates, the accomplices of his worst crimes; they had carried out his system during his secession from the government, they had made the guillotine play with more than a quadruple speed, and they did not mean that it should rest yet, or cease its labours with the Incorruptible and his fournée): Bourdon de l’Oise accused him of defending from the guillotine several heads; Vadier taxed him with having endeavoured to save the enemies of the people, and with having interfered with Fouquier-Tinville to suspend the execution of conspirators! But they spoke of the fate of Danton, and of the guilt and horror of sacrificing one’s colleagues:—in short, they explained, as clearly as words could do it, that this was a personal quarrel between him and them, and that Robespierre had been guilty of none but venial offences until he entered into this quarrel. Vadier, still proud of the part he had borne in the denouncing of that dangerous conspiracy, was going into a rigmarole about Catherine Theot and Dom Gerle. Tallien hoped they would not wander from the point. “I will soon bring you back to the point,” cried Robespierre, once more rushing to the tribune and endeavouring to speak. Again he was interrupted by a universal hubbub. He looked to the Mountain, to the côté droit, to the Plain or Marais; and at last, fixing his eyes on the Frogs of the Marshes, he shouted, “It is to you, O virtuous men of the Plain, it is to you, pure patriots, and not to those brigands, that I address myself!” The Plain turned their eyes from him and joined the other sections of the House in hooting and roaring him down, while Collot d’Herbois kept ringing his hand-bell. “President of assassins,” shrieked the Incorruptible, “I demand speech of thee for the last time!” By this time Collot was exhausted by his exertions—by that almost incessant bell-ringing—and, vacating the presidential chair, he was succeeded in it by Thuriot, who hated and feared Robespierre as much as Collot did, and he now told him that he could not be heard then. Robespierre’s mouth foamed no longer, his tongue seemed to cleave to his dry palate, his voice to die away in the throat. "The blood of Danton is choking him," exclaimed Garnier de l'Aube. This remark made him recover voice and courage, and he exclaimed indignantly, and with a terrible truth, "Danton! is it, then, Danton you would avenge?—Cowards! why did you not defend him?" But Thuriot with a fresh arm rang the bell, the House drowned their recollections and kept up their courage by renewed vociferations, and Louchet demanded an instant decree of arrest against Robespierre. On all sides the members shouted, "Seconded!" "Supported!" "President, put it to the vote; you see there is unanimity!" The younger Robespierre demanded to be included, saying that, as he had endeavoured to share in his brother's virtues, he was eager to share in his final fate; a piece of self-devotion not much worth, for if the planet perished the satellites must be extinguished also. His brother's short speech and the allusion to Danton put, however, a new life into the almost extinct Incorruptible: he rushed again to the tribune, to the table of the House, to the chair, menacing the president, menacing the Convention, with terrible gestures. "President," cried Duval, "how long is this man to be allowed to be the master of the Convention?" "How hard it is to knock down a tyrant!" cried journalist Freron, now one of Robespierre's mortalest enemies, but once his friend and companion in the college of Louis Quinze. Loseau exclaimed, "Vote! vote! Vote the arrest of the two brothers!" And anon president Thuriot put that question to the vote, and it was carried nem. con. The members then waved their hats and shouted, "Long live liberty! Long live the republic! The tyrant is no more!" "The republic is lost! The brigands triumph!" said Robespierre; and these were the last words that were distinctly heard from him in public. Duchêne observed that, in voting for the arrest of the two Robespierres, he and his friends had intended as a matter of course to include Saint-Just and Couthon. A great many members rose and spoke in confirmation, and the arrest of Couthon and Saint-Just was decreed. Lebas, another of the satellites, begged to be included—a favour which was readily granted. The five impeached members continued, however, sitting or standing in their places, the trembling ushers of the House not daring to lay hands on them, and they refusing to submit without force. But every part of the House shouted "To the bar! to the bar with them!" and the two Robespierres, Couthon, Saint-Just, and Lebas were obliged to descend to the bar and to resign themselves to the ushers, who still trembled as they carried them out to the committee-rooms, whence the five were soon afterwards conveyed to five several prisons.

It was now five o'clock in the afternoon; and the Assembly rose for a couple of hours, in order that the members might dine. Henriot, who had taken brandy to keep up his heart, had been more or less drunk ever since the morning, or probably matters would not have come to this point. Indeed, had a few of his cannoneers and Parisian cannons been in the Place du Carrousel and in the gardens of the palace, matches lighted, and muzzles turned towards the hall of the Convention, at an early part of the day, it is almost more than probable that the majority would have flinched, and that Barrère would have read the other report. Yet neither Henriot nor the commune had been altogether idle; and their activity received a spur when they learned that the Convention had really decreed the accusations. The brandied commandant-general went caracoling through Paris, followed by his mounted staff, and riding over or knocking down quieter citizens. He went to the faubourgs and harangued the patriots, telling them that the traitors in the Convention had voted the arrest of the best and only true patriots remaining in that assembly. As he was flourishing his tropes and his sword, the death-carts containing that day's batch came up; for the guillotine, after several changes of locality, had now been for some days set up in the Faubourg St. Antoine, on the site of the Bastille. It is said that the citizens of the other parts of Paris had at last had a glut of blood, and could no longer bear the daily sight of the condemned; it is said that even the rabble of the faubourg were getting weary of the daily massacre, that the arrival of the death-carts produced an impression very unfavourable to Robespierre, and that they attempted to send back the death-carts; but if they had really made any such attempt they must have succeeded, whereas it is certain that the carts were allowed to go on, and that the execution took place much as usual. Henriot lost much time in his caracoling and haranguing, and, after all, he neither gave the faubourg patriots a clear account of what had happened, nor an intelligible plan of action, for, many hours after this, we find them writing to the commune to know what they are to do? From the faubourgs he and his staff galloped to the Luxembourg, and gave orders to the gendarmes to march to the Hôtel-de-Ville, and remain there for the protection of the council-general of the commune. With a very slight escort Henriot then dashed along the quays, shouting and gesticulating like a madman. From the quays, still galloping, he went into the Rue St. Honoré, announcing that he was going to liberate Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, and that all good patriots ought to follow him. Merlin de Thionville, on his way back to the Convention or to the committee-room, to give the alarm, was seized and thrown into a guard-house at the Palais de l'Égalité. Robin de l'Aube, and another member of the Convention, Courtois, were dining at a restaurant's in the Rue St. Honoré, as Henriot dashed by for the Tuileries: they instantly went forth, addressed some soldiers and citizens on the duty of obeying the decrees of the Convention, and induced five or six gendarmes to engage their honour and lives to follow the madman and arrest him. Merlin de Thionville also succeeded not merely in obtaining his own liberty, but also in inducing the men doing duty at the guard-house to follow the gendarmes and assist them in the capture of Henriot. Robin, one of the two members who had interrupted their dinner out of patriotism or a delicate regard for their own safety (they being both on Robespierre's black-lists), ran down to the Tuileries and into the council-room of the committee of General Security, to warn them of what was passing: the first and only living object he perceived there was Amar, who was running away with all his speed to hide himself—for his name too was down in the black-lists, and without Robin's warning he knew that danger was on the wind. Robin then went to another apartment in the palace, which served as a committee-room for the Salut Public; and there he found Billaud-Varennes, Barrère, and some other members, whose fears and prudence had kept them at their post. On Henriot presenting himself at the gates of the palace with only two or three aides-de-camp, he was boldly met by some ushers, and the five or six pledged gendarmes falling upon him in the rear, he allowed himself to be made prisoner, and to have his hands tied behind his back. The stern Lubin, coming out of the palace, found the commandant-general in this predicament: he conducted him to the committee of Salut Public above stairs, and, after reminding the said committee that the Sûreté Générale, the committee more especially charged with the police, had abandoned their posts, he recommended a "step worthy of the circumstance, and above all, a prompt execution." Billaud-Varennes and Barrère were startled at the proposition of putting the commandant to death without any trial. Robin said, that, if they did not finish Henriot on the spot, it was possible that that scoundrel, powerfully seconded, might butcher them all in the Convention that evening—that, unless they were accomplices with him, it could not be perceived how they should hesitate. At length, however, it was arranged between Barrère and Robin that the prisoner should be carried to the rooms of the committee of Sûreté Générale, and there kept in safe custody until the Convention, on its return from dinner, should decide and decree. In this manner, instead of liberating the two Robespierres, Saint-Just, Couthon, and Lebas (they had apparently been all removed from the committee-rooms of the Tuileries before his arrival), Henriot was arrested himself, and corded and bound like a common felon. In the mean while the council-general of the commune, who claimed and exercised extraordinary powers over all the prisons of the capital, had issued their orders that no prisoners should, on any account, be received by any of the gaolers on that day or night; that the tocsin should be sounded at the Hôtel-de-Ville and in all the sections; that the barriers of Paris should be closed; and that a commission of twelve great municipals, headed by Payan, the procureur-general, and Coffinhal, one of the new judges of the Revolutionary Tribunal, should exert themselves to liberate Robespierre and the rest of those prisoners. Within an hour after his arrest, Henriot was set at liberty by Coffinhal, who burst into the Tuileries sword in hand, being followed by about one hundred Robespierrists of different colours and descriptions. In a trice the commandant-general was again on horseback; but, though the lapse of hours and the perils he had just run ought to have sobered him, Henriot continued to act like a drunkard or maniac: his imbecility discouraged his friends, gave heart to his enemies, and effected many sudden conversions, for men who wanted only to make sure of the strongest side became inwardly convinced that that could not prove the stronger which depended upon his abilities and exertions. The five prisons to which the five great men had been carried were situated in distant parts of Paris, and their keepers were not equally alert in obeying the orders of the commune; but by eight or nine in the evening Robespierre, his brother Augustin, Saint-Just, and Lebas were at perfect liberty, and sitting in deliberation with the council of the commune, and Couthon joined them somewhat later in the evening. They called upon the Jacobins, who had declared themselves in permanent session; they sent round commissaries to the different sections, none of which had rushed to arms so eagerly as in former times; and they instructed Henriot to collect his Parisian cannoneers and point their guns against the Tuileries. By degrees the section battalions, which ought to have been collected in the morning, began to arrive in the Place de Grève, and to post themselves round the Hôtel-de-Ville, shouting "Long live Robespierre! Robespierre or Death!" "Down with the Committees and the Traitors of the Convention!" Some of the cannoneers also arrived, and, turning the mouths of their guns so as to command the approaches, they stood by them match in hand. Mayor Fleuriot, Payan, and Coffinhal were exceeding resolute and bold, administering oaths to the armed force, and unequivocally announcing that the Convention must be purged of the majority of its members; but Robespierre seemed even now irresolute and enslaved to forms and precedents. Couthon proposed drawing up a proclamation to the people and the armies. Robespierre asked in whose name? Saint-Just, more decided, and somewhat more a man of action, said, "Why, in the name of the National Convention, which is wherever we are!" No decision was, however, come to on this important matter an hour after midnight, when Henriot, instead of besieging the Tuileries, was allowing the Hôtel-de-Ville to be besieged. The Incorruptible's younger brother displayed more energy or a greater disregard to formulas; but both Saint-Just and Augustin Robespierre had taken part in the operations of war, which Maximilian Robespierre had never done, and had acted in the field with the armies they were sent to superintend as commissioners. If the elder Robespierre had been possessed of the habit of military command, and of some of the spirit of a soldier, instead of spending long hours debating and hesitating in the council-chamber of the commune, he would have gone early to look after Henriot, who had given such glaring proofs of incapacity and fatuity, he would have superintended in person the collecting of the cannoneers and troops in the Place du Carrousel and the gardens of the Tuileries: one volley of grape-shot, given betimes, would assuredly have put the Convention to flight; and his fall, though inevitable in the end, would not have happened this night, nor probably for weeks or months to come.

The honourable deputies, who had gone to their dinners at five, returned to the Convention at seven o'clock in the evening, when Henriot, only recently liberated by Coffinhal, was galloping hither and thither, as if without any fixed object. We can find nowhere any mention of numbers, or any hint that the House was a full one: we are inclined to believe that it was a very thin House—that many members of the côté droit and the marais, who were not so thoroughly committed as others, never returned from their dinners, but, on hearing the rumbling of cannon, the beating of the drums to arms, and then the dismal sound of the tocsin, remained under cover in their houses, or sought more secure abiding-places. Bourdon de l'Oise, Leonard Bourdon, Barrère, Collot d'Herbois, Billaud-Varennes, Amar, Vouland, and apparently all those who felt that they must, this night, do or die, were at their posts. Collot pale, and, no doubt, trembling, took possession of the president's chair, clapped his hat on his head in sign of deep distress, and exclaimed that the hour was come to die at one's post, or triumph over the tyrant; that the sun must not rise before the heads of the conspirators had fallen! Many exciting revelations were made, some referring to the circumstances of the day and the events actually passing that evening and night, and others to bygone days when Robespierre was the idol of the Convention, and the most popular man in all France. Dubois-Crancé, who had at one time been devoted body and conscience to the Incorruptible, now, for the first time, announced that the greatest of all French republicans had a long time ago seen through the perfidious mask. "Yes," said he, "I must render homage to the sagacity of Marat! As far back as the trial of the tyrant Capet, he said to me, speaking of Robespierre, 'You see that scoundrel there, ce coquin-là?—' How! Robespierre a scoundrel?" said I. "Yes," replied Marat, "that man is more dangerous for liberty than all the coalesced tyrants of Europe!" Barrère was set to his old work of report and decree making: the rest of the members either made speeches, or ran to and fro from the hall to the outer doors or windows of the palace to see what was passing in the Place du Carrousel. Billaud at last returned with the startling intelligence that Henriot was in the Place, and was making the cannoneers turn their guns right against that part of the palace which was occupied by the Convention! At this announcement the patriots and patriotesses in the galleries all fled out of the palace, shouting and screaming; but, if credit is to be given to the newspapers which published their reports of the debates and transactions of the night from one to three days and more after the fall of Robespierre, and the assured though temporary victory of his mortal foes, the deputies who had assembled behaved with all the courage and sublimity of Roman senators; and Collot, repeating that the hour was come for them to die at their posts or triumph, sat in his curule chair as motionless and as majestic as the best of Roman patricians when the unmannerly Gaul took him by the beard. Their imminent danger did not last long: a deputation from the department of Paris, no longer in unison with the commune, came to the bar to receive the orders of the House; intelligence was brought that the pupils of the School of Mars, though efforts had been made to seduce them, had declared for the Convention, and were shouting "Death to traitors! Down with Robespierre!"—that, while the faubourgs seemed slow and undecided, several of the best sections were arming and marching for the defence of the representatives of the people; and, finally, Amar imparted the glad tidings that the cannoneers outside, instead of obeying Henriot's orders to let their grape-shot fly on the hall of the Convention, were turning the mouths of their guns the other way, forcing the commandant-general and his plumed staff to gallop off for the Hôtel-de-Ville. Hereupon the members in the House all vociferated "Hors la loi! Hors la loi!" and Barrère, who had been working in that sense, presently presented a decree of outlawry against Henriot, the Robespierres, Saint-Just, and the rest. This was voted instantaneously, together with an order to silence the tocsin and prevent the closing of the barriers. A deputation from the cannoneers stationed in the Place du Carrousel and in the gardens came in and defiled through the hall, having at their head several members of the House, and making comfortable speeches to the president. These cannoneers were soon supported by several battalions of foot and some squadrons of horse. Nothing but a commander was wanting, and the House lost no time in voting that this post should be temporarily occupied by Barras, and that seven other members of the House, Bourdon de l'Oise, Leonard Bourdon, Fréron, Delmas, and three others of Robespierre's most declared and energetic enemies, should be appointed to serve under Barras. As soon as this was decided, the House appointed sundry missions of representatives to repair to the sections, to encourage those who were in the right path, and to win back those who had got into the wrong. Henriot had done nothing to stop the communications between the Tuileries and the town and faubourgs, so that these missionaries went without trouble or danger whithersoever they chose. They succeeded in inducing several armed bodies that were obeying the summons of the commune, and were in full march for the Hôtel-de-Ville, to change sides and march away to the Tuileries to receive their orders from Barras and the true representatives of the people. As these troops arrived they sent deputations into the hall to swear that they would all die for liberty and the Convention; and at about one hour after midnight Barras announced that he had gone through a great part of Paris, that he had found the people everywhere in the best of dispositions, shouting "Long live the Convention!" that many of the cannoneers had accompanied him in his march; that there was nothing to be feared, and nothing more to be done, except to surround the Hôtel-de-Ville, scatter the small force collected there, and seize the outlaws. Tallien, who had stepped into the president's chair to relieve Collot, said that moments were precious—that what remained to do ought to be done at once, or the force at the Hôtel-de-Ville might grow stronger, or the wavering cannoneers might turn again. Leonard Bourdon, who had put himself at the head of several battalions, undertook to lead the march to the Hôtel-de-Ville. "Go," cried Tallien, "and let not the rising sun see one of the conspirators alive!" Leonard, marching along the quays, soon reached the Place de Grève, which he found occupied by men armed with muskets and bayonets, or with pikes, while the cannoneers were ranged with their pieces immediately in front of the Hôtel-de-Ville. All these forces, or nearly all, had been abandoned by their commanding officers: they were waiting for the arrival of the section battalions. Leonard Bourdon sent adroit emissaries among them to tell them that the section battalions were not coming at all, or were coming as their foes; that the Convention had outlawed Henriot and all the conspirators. Some of them instantly set up the cry of Vive la Convention!—some said they had been labouring under a mistake: the decree of outlawry was allowed to be read, and then they began either to steal away quietly or to join Leonard's columns, thus leaving the cannoneers in front of the Hôtel without any cover or support. But those terrible cannoneers showed a determined face:

their matches were lighted, and tremendous must be the effect of their grape-shot—if they should fire. It appears too that Leonard Bourdon was not of a very heroic temperament, and that he had taken it into his head that the Hôtel-de-Ville, and all the ground in front of it, was undermined—that the desperate outlaws would set fire to the train, and blow him and his columns, and themselves, and a whole quarter of Paris, into the air. While he lingered on the quay, between the Place de Grève and the river, some of his people, without arms, stole among the cannoneers, to represent the danger they were in, and the great glory they would obtain if they would only change sides, as their comrades at the Tuileries had done; and this reasoning, and the general aspect of affairs, operated so powerfully upon the minds of these artillery-men,—who had only just sworn to Henriot that they would die for him, and the commune, and Robespierre,—that first they swore they would not fire upon Leonard Bourdon's columns, and next they wheeled round their guns and pointed them against the Hôtel-de-Ville.* At this decisive movement Henriot, who had been consulting within, and assuring the outlaws that their triumph was secure, that the cannoneers were steady, and the section battalions coming, ran out into the Place to declaim and harangue, to implore, threaten, and cajole; but it was all in vain—he could not make them turn their guns again—he was threatened with some of their bitter grape—he rushed back, ran upstairs to the great council-chamber of the commune, and announced that all was lost. "Villain! and thy cowardice is the cause!" roared Coffin-hall, a strong man made stronger by despair, who, as he uttered the words, seized light Henriot round the waist, and in the next instant hurled him out of an open window. The ex-commandant-general fell upon a dung-heap, or, as others say, into an open sewer. The younger Robespierre, mounting one or two stories higher, threw himself head foremost out of window: Lebas shot himself effectually with a pistol, and fell dead; Saint-Just clasped a knife or dagger in his hand, but made no further use of it; Couthon crept under a table, and, with a weak hand and blunt weapon, inflicted one or two insignificant wounds on himself; Robespierre put a pistol into his mouth to blow out his brains, but in pulling the trigger he changed the direction of the piece, and the ball broke his under jaw and went through his cheek, without touching any vital part.† When Leonard Bourdon

* It appears that what most weakened Robespierre's party was the report industriously spread by the committees and their adherents, that he was, after all, nothing but a royalist and an agent of Pitt in disguise. At the moment when the people of the Faubourg St. Marceau were about to march to the Hôtel-de-Ville, some agents of the committee of General Security slid into their ranks and reported that Robespierre was at the head of a royalist conspiracy, and that a seal with the fleur-de-lis of the Bourbons engraved upon it had been discovered in his lodging. When Vadier, a leading member of the Sûreté Générale, was asked long after how he could ever have imagined such a fable, he replied, that the fear of losing one's head makes one very inventive.

† There are many and great contradictions in the accounts of the arrests and the events which immediately preceded them. The universal excitement, and the rapidity and confusion of the incidents of the night would be sure to lead to some such contradictions; but the burst into the room, followed by some gendarmes (himself, according to some accounts, including his own, being disguised as a common gendarme), Robespierre was sitting bleeding on a chair, with a knife in his hand; Couthon was lying under the table as though he were dead; the municipal officers were throwing off their scarfs, and apparently preparing for flight. One or two pistols were fired by the gendarmes, and then all the conspirators quietly submitted to be taken and bound. Henriot, badly wounded, disfigured, and covered with filth, was discovered in the foul place where he had fallen; Augustin Robespierre was also found alive, though with limbs broken and a skull fractured. Some of the armed people, who were now crowding into the council-chamber and running over every part of the vast building, dragged out Couthon by the heels from under the table, and proposed throwing his carcase into the Seine; but hereupon he opened his eyes and gave them to understand that he was not yet dead, nor so much as dying. The wounded were put upon brancards, or stretchers, and, shouting "Victory! Victory!" Leonard Bourdon conducted them to the Tuileries.* It was past three o'clock, a bright July day was breaking, all Paris was getting abroad, and in the morning light many thousands were gazing from their windows at a scene which they could scarcely comprehend. A member of the revolutionary committee of one of the sections was the first to announce in the Convention that the game had been played out, and that the conquered and captured were approaching the Hall. The deputies shouted "Victory!" and Charlier, who now succeeded Tallien in the president's chair, exclaimed, "The coward, Robespierre, is here at the door of your hall! For a certainty, citizen representatives, you will not allow him to enter?" The de-narratives have been still further varied and falsified by the anxiety of a great many of the actors, each of whom wished it to be believed that it was his head or hand that settled the business. Out of these contradictory a doubt has arisen whether Robespierre shot himself or was shot by another. Leonard Bourdon, long after the fact, boasted that it was he, disguised as a gendarme, who shot the tyrant. Bourdon's story never obtained much credit; but it was otherwise with the story told by the young gendarme Meda, who attended Bourdon in his irruption into the Hôtel-de-Ville, although this story, like the other, was not heard of at the time. Meda, who was rapidly promoted, and who died in battle in the Russian campaign of 1812, a colonel or brigadier-general, was accustomed to boast that it was he who had shot Robespierre, and to show a pistol with which he had done the deed. But the report of Vergez and Marrigues, the two surgeons who examined Robespierre's wound and bound up his broken jaw, proves decidedly that the wound had been inflicted by his own hand; Barrère, in his studied official report of the whole affair, presented the day after, though he lavishes praises both on Leonard Bourdon and on Meda, says nothing about either of them having wounded the tyrant, but, on the contrary, affirms that Robespierre had timidly and clumsily shot himself. The pistol-bag or case which Robespierre clenched in his left hand, and with which he afterwards attempted to absorb the blood which flowed from his wound, has been adduced as a further proof that he shot himself; but in truth there is a great deal more evidence on the same side, while there is not the shadow of a proof on the other.

* In these details the contradictions and doubts are strong. From some accounts it appeared that Henriot and the younger Robespierre were not discovered until several hours after the arrest of their friends; Henriot threw himself, and was not thrown by Coffinhal, out of window, and Augustin Robespierre did not intend to throw himself down at all, but fell as he was attempting to escape by climbing to the back part of the roof of the building; Couthon did not wound himself, but was wounded by Meda or some one else, and, instead of lying under a table, was found lying outside the building with a slight wound on the head.

There are many other discrepancies, but the important historical fact is, that they were all taken alive (with the exception of Lebas), and guillotined.

puties all cried "No! No!" Thuriot, who had had his hand in the bloodiest crimes which had been perpetrated, and who, like so many others of them, had discovered Robespierre to be a tyrant only upon finding or fancying that he was aiming at his own precious life, exclaimed—"To bring here into the bosom of the Convention the body of a man covered with every crime, would be to deprive this glorious day of the brightness and beauty which belong to it. The carcase of a tyrant can only bring the plague. The place marked out for him and his accomplices is the Place de la Révolution. Let the two committees take the necessary measures for striking off all their heads with the sword of the law!" The Convention decreed this proposition with all the necessary enthusiasm; and the moment after Leonard Bourdon entered the hall, which resounded with fresh acclamations and shouts of "Victory!" He led by the hand a modest young man, a common gendarme, and he requested the president and the House to permit this young soldier to ascend the tribune with him. This permission being granted, Leonard related the circumstances which had occurred in the Place de Grève and in the Hôtel-de-Ville, adding that he and the country were under great obligations to the young gendarme now standing at his side, Charles André Meda, who had, with his own hand, killed two conspirators, snatched a knife from Robespierre, and struck Couthon, who had also armed himself with a knife. He demanded that the president should give the fraternal accolade to this brave gendarme. The president embraced Meda in the midst of great applauses; the Convention decreed that honourable mention should be made of the civic devotion of the young man, and charged the committee of Salut Public to give him promotion in the army.

The Jacobins had kept together in considerable numbers in their hall, but communication between the Rue St. Honoré and the Hôtel-de-Ville had apparently been cut off at an early hour of the night, and they had remained speculating and doubting, and not knowing what course to pursue. The Convention had scarcely finished honouring Meda ere Legendre entered the House and related how he had scattered the Jacobins—the majority of whom, according to all appearances, had dispersed of their own accord as soon as they learned the catastrophe at the Hôtel-de-Ville, and before the butcher could have had time to show his face or his double-barrelled pistol among them. Everybody, however, on this night and morning, as on every other night or day when anything important had been done, was eager to show that he had been an important actor, and therefore Legendre related that he had burst into the Jacobin-hall with only ten self-devoting patriots, and with a double-barrelled pistol in his hand wherewith to shoot the conspirator he should find sitting as president. "As bad luck would have it," said he, "the villain mingled with the crowd, and I held my hand for fear of shooting the innocent. That president's name is Vivier. I said to the women in the galleries of the club, 'Citizenesses, you have been led astray; get ye home! The National Convention punishes guilt, but not error.' Men and women went away. I closed and locked the doors of the Jacobins, and here are the keys! As it is the mass of the Convention that has saved the country, tomorrow the Convention, en masse, will be Jacobin, and virtue will re-open the doors of that society!" After Legendre had been honoured with enthusiastic applause, Thirion demanded an act of rigour against that scoundrel Vivier, that man devoted to Robespierre, that traitor who had presided over the club in order to support a rebellion; and the Convention forthwith put Vivier hors la loi. It was now six o'clock in the morning, and the wearied members rose for a few hours.

In the meanwhile, by order of the committeemen, Robespierre had been carried into the committee-room of Salut Public and laid upon a table. He was speechless, apparently senseless; the blood flowed from his mouth. To prevent it choking him, they put a deal box, which contained some samples of bread for the army, under his head. He had on the same gay sky-blue coat he wore at the festival of l'Être Suprême, nankeen breeches, and white cotton stockings, which last had fallen or had been dragged over his heels. In about an hour he opened his eyes and attempted to absorb the blood with a pistol-bag which he grasped in his hand. Some of the citizens who surrounded him, and who were curiously watching all his motions and sufferings, gave him some pieces of white paper: other citizens mocked, insulted, and cursed him; and a cannoneer, his own townsman, distinguished himself by the fervour and coarseness with which he swore at him or over him. The whole scene was but an epitome of the national character, and a proof that those who triumphed were as ferocious as those who fell. It is even said that his former colleagues and the clerks and servants of the committee, who had so long crouched before him, gathered round him to insult him, to exult in his sufferings, to spit at him, to strike him; and that some of the clerks pricked him with the points of their penknives. At six o'clock, and not before, a surgeon was brought from the Palais Royal to look to his wounds. He submitted to the rough and agonizing treatment without uttering one cry or groan. The surgeon bandaged up his broken jaw, and placed a basin of water by his side. Of a sudden he raised his head from his hard wooden pillow, sat bolt upright on the table, pulled up his stockings, slid from the table, and ran or staggered to an arm-chair, in which he seated himself. It was remarked that he looked fixedly on those who came into the room, and particularly on the clerks and servants of the committee; that he often raised his eyes to the ceiling; but that, with the exception of some convulsive movements, he constantly showed an extraordinary impassibility. This has been called moral courage, but it was more probably a physical dullness, a sluggishness of nerve and sense which had tended to make him so insensible to the blood and sufferings of others. The only words he spoke were to ask for some water to drink, and for some linen rags, neither of which were given to him. Couthon, Saint-Just, and some others, were either left at the foot of the staircase, exposed to the gaze and the brutality of all that chose to approach them, or were carried upstairs into the committee-rooms. At nine o'clock in the morning Barrère, Billaud-Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois assembled in the room next to that where Robespierre was bleeding, and, taking upon themselves all the powers of the committee of Salut Public, they issued an order for transferring the prisoners immediately to the Conciergerie. As some men carried Robespierre downstairs in an arm-chair, one of them savagely struck him. As Saint-Just, following him, traversed the Hall of Audience of Salut Public, he fixed his eye on a grand copy of the Declaration of the Rights of Man, and muttered—"And yet it was I who did that!" While Robespierre was quitting the Tuilleries for ever, the Convention re-assembled, and his former vassal, Fouquier-Tinville, came to the bar to inquire how the Convention wished the Revolutionary Tribunal to proceed against the conspirators. Thuriot exclaimed, "As the conspirators are all outlawed, the tribunal has nothing to do but to recognise their persons and send them to the scaffold! Let no time be lost, for every moment they live must be prejudicial to the republic. With the heads of his accomplices strike off the head of this infamous Robespierre, who pretended to believe in a Supreme Being, and who only believed in the force of crime. The soil of the republic must be instantly purged of a monster that was plotting to get himself proclaimed king. For the rest, let the Revolutionary Tribunal go and take its orders from the committee of Sûreté Générale, and return forthwith to its post and its important duties." The Convention agreed in this last proposition, and issued one or two more decrees of outlawry to expedite the business: Fouquier bowed and retired, deputations arrived to congratulate the Convention, and Barrère, with his ordinary glibness and placidity of countenance, presented in the name of the Salut Public, and began to read, one of his mendacious reports on all the accidents and incidents of the preceding night.

After lying an hour or two in the Conciergerie, Robespierre was carried, with twenty friends or accomplices, before the Revolutionary Tribunal. Fouquier, as commanded, merely identified them, one by one, and then read the decree of outlawry. At four o'clock in the afternoon they were all carted at the Conciergerie to be carried through the busiest streets of Paris to the Place de la Révolution. Robespierre went in the same tumbril with his brother Augustin and Henriot, who were covered with blood like himself, still more horribly shattered, and all but dead. As they went along the gendarmes pointed their swords at him to show the people which was he. A yelling mob followed him, cursing, and charging him with all the cruelties and executions from the beginning of the Revolution till now—as though he had not blood enough to answer for without this device of the committees, this exaggeration of his enemies, who were more deeply steeped in blood than he. A furious woman sprung on the tumbril, and, waving her hand over his prostrate figure, shouted, “Thy death makes me drunk with joy!” He opened his eyes on her. “Go down to hell, with the curses of all wives and mothers!” shrieked the woman. The streets, windows, and house-tops are said to have been even more crowded than ever they had been before. Jestings and laughing, filthy puns and quodlibets, were mixed with the curses, shrieks, and anathemas. When the tumbrils came opposite to the house of Duplaix, where Robespierre’s only peaceful hours had been passed, a halt was ordered, and a band of women, formerly his own Tricoteuses, or Furies of the Guillotine, executed an infernal dance round his cart, with clapping of hands and other demonstrations of joy. On arriving in the Place de la Révolution they laid him down on the ground at the foot of the scaffold, for he was to be executed last of the twenty-one, and he could not stand—indeed, he too was now almost dead, his face was livid, his eyes were sunk in his head. At the fall of each head the countless multitude shouted and waved hats and caps—and they shouted the loudest when Samson held up the heads of Saint-Just and Couthon. At last, Robespierre’s turn came, for the axe had clanked down twenty times, and there remained none alive but he. As his ghastly figure and well-known sky-blue coat (now torn, and streaked and clotted with blood), slowly emerged to the surface of the scaffold, there was another universal roar of voices, and a still more enthusiastic waving of hats and caps. Samson tore off his coat, brutally wrenched the foul linen bandage from his jaw: the broken left jaw fell, and then a horrible cry or scream proceeded from him, being the first sound of lamentation or suffering he had been heard to utter since his arrest. This fearful cry was still ringing in the air, when the heavy axe, wet with the blood of his brother and his friends, clanked down once more. Samson held up the frightful head; the spectators shouted and applauded for several minutes, and then went away singing.* It was towards seven o’clock in the evening of the 10th Thermidor, or 28th of July.

The triumphant committee-men, the sanguinary Collet d’Herbois and Billaud-Varennes, the reporting Barrère, the atheistical Bourdons, Vadier, Fouché, Tallien, and Vouland, gave out that the reign of terror was over, that the reign of justice and mercy was going to begin; that the innocent, who still crowded the prisons notwithstanding the immense number of executions, would now meet with a fair trial, and have nothing more to fear: but at the same time they intimated that they must wreak their vengeance on many of their personal enemies, on all the officers of the commune who had assembled under mayor Fleuriot and procureur Payan in the Hôtel de Ville on the day or night of the 9th Thermidor, who had otherwise aided or abetted in the great rebellion of Robespierre, or who had been in any way connected with that tyrant; and, instead of disbanding the atrocious Revolutionary Tribunal (alike the instrument of Robespierre’s and of their own butcheries), they recognised and confirmed its authority, leaving Fouquier-Tinville undisturbed at his post; and, if these committee-men could have imposed their will on those who had co-operated with them, Fouquier’s Tribunal would long have been retained as an indispensable part of the republican system. They plainly showed an anxiety to retain it. This induces the belief that the said Revolutionary Tribunal was never so entirely devoted to Robespierre as is represented; that, at least during the forty days of his secession from the government—the period in which incomparably the greatest numbers of lives were sacrificed—they had identified themselves with the committee-men, who thus had nothing to fear from them, and who might not easily have found an organized body of men so willing to gratify their present vengeance, and so fitted to work out their future schemes. On the morning of the day on which Robespierre perished, the members of the Tribunal appeared in the Convention, and were there received with honours and applauses. Their orators said that a few traitors like Dumas and Coffinhal had crept in among them, but that the representatives of the people had known how to distinguish them; that they therefore were, as they had ever been, entirely devoted to the national representation and to their sacred duties as administrators of justice; and that all they wanted was the Convention’s instructions as to the mode in which they were to proceed against all the late conspirators. On the very next day, the committees having drawn up the lists of proscription, the said upright judges condemned to death sixty-nine municipals; on the 12th Thermidor they sentenced twelve more, thus making up eighty-one victims, who were all executed within the space of twenty-four hours! If one class of prisoners began to obtain their liberty, other classes were treated with great severity; and for some time the vacancies left in the prisons were rapidly filled up by fresh arrests. In too many cases those who had escaped out of the jaws of death were impelled by their suspicions and revenge to throw others into the same jeopardy, denouncing those whom they suspected of having denounced them, and heaping accusations upon men who had heaped insults upon them when their party was dominant. On the 29th or 30th of July, Elie Lacoste, indeed, moved that the Revolutionary Tribunal should be suppressed, as a body composed in great part of the creatures of Robespierre; but Billaud-Varennes denied that the tribunal was so composed, and conjured the House not to suspend the salutary action of that court for the present. Barrère also (who must be supposed to have known something of the composition and temper of the court) said that so far were they from being the creatures or friends of the fallen tyrant, that Robespierre and the rebellious committee of the commune had determined to fusilade all the members of the Revolutionary Tribunal. If this fact be true, it would seem to prove that Robespierre and the commune blamed the excesses which had been committed by the tribunal since the festival of l'Être Suprême: and, if it be one of Barrère's solemn lies, it would still tend to show that he and his party were well satisfied with the tribunal, and eager to preserve its services. On the 1st of August, when Lecointre of Versailles moved that the law of the 22nd Prairial, or 10th of June—that terrible law which had given the tribunal four sections and such an immense increase of power—should be immediately abrogated, Barrère again defended the whole court, insisting that the government had need of its services, that no part of it ought to be changed, and that Fouquier-Tinville was very essential to the justice and well-being of the republic; but the Convention, which had been united for a moment against Robespierre, was now splitting into parties, and some of those who had helped to gain the victory were now anxious to overthrow the committees, or to get place in them. Fréron, at mention of the public accuser, burst forth into an angry rhapsody: "I demand," cried he, "that we at length purge the earth of that monster, and that Fouquier be sent to digest in hell the blood he has drunk here! I demand a decree of accusation against him." As a portion of the House and of the galleries applauded Fréron, other members ventured to speak with equal boldness against the declared will of Barrère and his brother committee-men. Turreau said that a decree of accusation was too honourable for a scélérat like Fouquier; that it would be quite enough to order his arrest, and send him for trial before his own tribunal. In vain Barrère assumed a high and almost menacing tone; the House voted the abrogation of the terrible law, and the arrest of Fouquier-Tinville. This functionary demanded to be heard at the bar, and he was heard on the 8th of August, when, expecting to be defended by Barrère, Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, and the rest of that party, he attributed everything that he might have done amiss to the despotism of Robespierre. He was thrown into prison, but was not brought to trial till the month of April, 1795, when, the committee party being swept away, and there being nothing to hope or fear from them, he materially changed the tone of his defence, and attributed many of the most terrible doings of his tribunal, not to Robespierre, but to Barrère, Billaud, Collot, Carnot, Amar, Vadier, Vouland, and other members of the Salut Public and Sureté Générale.* On the 10th of August the Convention voted that the Revolutionary Tribunal should continue to exist, but with other members, judges, accusers, and jurors, and a different organization. Twenty-three of the old jurors were arrested some months later, and thrown into prison, to take their trial with Fouquier.† The new court was from the first more decent than the old one, and, as Barrère and his allies lost ground (which they did most rapidly), it became cautious in its proceedings and merciful in its judgments—that is, as compared with any criminal court that had existed in France for a very long time.

* The number of the executed on this day is variously stated, as 21, 22, 23, and 24. The first of these numbers appears to be the correct one: in the other numbers are probably included some individuals who were included in the first outlawry, but who were not taken and executed until two or three or more days after the death of Robespierre. Coffinhal, for example, escaped out of the council-chamber of the commune, and out of the Hôtel de Ville, just as the troops were entering, concealed himself for some days, was then betrayed by a friend or dependant, to whom he had lent money, and was guillotined on the 28th Thermidor.

Among those who were executed with Robespierre was Simon, the shoemaker and municipal, who had behaved with such barbarity to the prisoners of the Temple, and who is universally charged with having destroyed the health of the little dauphin. This Simon was the oldest man of the batch, being 58; Robespierre, when he died, was 35; Couthon, 38; Heuriot, 33; Dumas, 39; Saint-Just, only 26; Payan, 27; Mayor Fleuriot, 29; and most of the others were under the age of thirty.

The party or union of parties which set themselves thus early in opposition to the committees monopolised all the honour and glory of the overthrow of Robespierre, and assumed the name of Thermidoriens. They counted in their ranks Abbé Sieyès, who had contrived to keep his head on his shoulders, and who had lost none of his confidence in constitution-making; Chenier, a littérateur and poet, accused of having denounced and sacrificed his own brother; Cambacérés, Boissy d'Anglas, and Thibeaudeau, who had been members of the côté droit or of the Plain; and butcher Legendre, Lecointre of Versailles, Treilhard, Thuriot, Fréron, Tallien, Bourdon de l'Oise, Barras, Bentibol, Rovère, Dumont, Merlin de Douai, and Merlin de Thionville, who had all been Dantonist Montagnards. Some of these individuals had participated in the deepest guilt of the revolution; but on the whole they were distinguished from the Collots and the Billauds by being fonder of pleasure, and of places and profit, than of persecution and blood. As soon as the Robespierrists were all dispatched by Samson and his men, these Thermidoriens laid claim to their share of the government. In the committee of Salut Public Herault de Sechelles had never been replaced; Jean Bon St. André and Prieur de la Marne were in mission; and Robespierre, Couthon, and Saint-Just had gone on a longer journey. These vacancies were now filled up by Tallien, Thuriot, Treilhard, Laloë, and two other Thermidoriens. The committee of Sureté Générale was also incomplete: Lebas had killed himself, Lebon was absent, and the deter-

* At this time, when Fouquier had still less to hope or to fear from Robespierre than from the committee-men who had destroyed him, he affirmed that he had never had any private connexion or correspondence with Robespierre, Saint-Just, Couthon, Damas, or Coffinhal; that no proofs of any such correspondence, that no trace of any such connexion had ever been found, either in his own papers or in any of the papers of the Robespierrists which had been seized.

† Orders were issued to arrest twenty-nine of these jurors, but six of them could not be found. Among those who were caught, and afterwards tried and executed with Fouquier, was Robespierre's landlord and quasi father-in-law, the carpenter or cabinet-maker Duplax.

mination had been adopted of getting rid of Lavicomterie, Jagot, and painter David, who had been a very busy and pestilent member of it. The painter was openly denounced by André Dumont, the fanatical atheist, as an accomplice of that Catherine Robespierre, as a Saïde of that Mahomet, as the tyrant of the arts, as a conspirator as cowardly as he was atrocious. Without hearing David, or any one of the three, the majority of the Convention voted that he, Lavicomterie, and Jagot should be deprived of their posts in the committee. Just as the vote was passed, the painter, fearing that worse might follow, entered the House, and rushed to the tribune to defend himself. He declared that it was not possible to conceive to what a point he had been duped and deceived by "that wretch Robespierre:" he swore he would never again attach himself to any man, but only to principles. A great many members fell upon him, reminding the House of his constant adherence to Robespierre, and of the tardiness of his conversion. Some of them, who had been kicked out of the Jacobin Club with Collot on the evening of the 8th Thermidor, recalled to his recollection how passionately he had then embraced Robespierre, declaring that he would drink the hemlock with him! Legendre declared that David, as a member of the committee, had been guilty of sundry arbitrary and detestable acts. A decree of arrest was issued against the painter; but he was liberated in the month of December, with his head upon his shoulders. The Thermidoriens who stepped into the committee were Legendre, André Dumont, Goupilleau, Merlin de Thionville, Bernard de Saintes, and Rewbell. Thus both in the Salut Public and Sureté Générale, the two main wheels of government, the Thermidoriens obtained a majority, and in fact a decided supremacy over the old committee-men, or party of Barrère, Collot d'Herbois, and Billaud-Varennes. It was voted and decreed that henceforward the powers of these governing committees should be subjected to nice limitations, and that one-fourth of their members should be changed every month, so that in the course of four months the whole would be renewed. The forty-eight revolutionary Section Committees of Paris were reduced to twelve, and these twelve, instead of meeting daily, were to assemble only once in ten days; and, what was perhaps still more important—as important as anything that had happened since the 10th Thermidor—the forty sous per diem allowed to the sans-culottic patriots for attending these revolutionary committees were stopped for ever.

The Thermidoriens very soon resolved to get rid of the old committee-men altogether, and, if possible, to wind up the history of the Reign of Terror by sending them all to the scaffold. Just a month after the execution of Robespierre, Tallien delivered a terrible speech against the whole régime of terror, showing that it was absurd to imagine that Robespierre, Saint-Just, and Couthon, and their party, were answerable for all the abominations which had been committed, or that other men, who had shared with them the powers of government, and who, for forty of the bloodiest days of the revolution, had monopolised those powers to the almost total exclusion of the Robespierrists, were not equally guilty with them. On the very next day after this prelude by Tallien, Lecointre rose and denounced by name Barrère, Billaud-Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois, of the Salut Public, and Vadier, Amar, and Vouland, of the Sureté Générale, presenting against them twenty-three articles of accusation, imputing to them nearly all the measures of cruelty and tyranny, the odium of which they had thrown upon the fallen triumvirate, and calling them, even now, the continuators of Robespierre. Billaud-Varennes made a better and bolder defence than one might have expected; but his strength lay in the miserable weakness, meanness, and vacillation of which the vast majority of those now arrayed against him had been but so recently and so notoriously guilty. How could they accuse him, when they had unanimously voted all those decrees which had given the committees and the tribunal their excessive powers? when they had unanimously voted the law of the suspects, and all the other laws upon which the committees had acted? How could they condemn now, as state crimes, deeds which they had applauded for their republican energy and efficacy? He called his accusers mercenary and corrupt men, political weathercocks, men of intrigue, who now wished to sacrifice him and his friends to the memory of Danton, that odious conspirator, who had been the main hope of all parricide factions! The draper of Versailles found that he had been premature: the Convention almost unanimously rejected Lecointre's charges, and even declared them calumnious. But a few days after this debate the time arrived for a fourth of the committees to go out, and by chance or by ballot, or by some other process, Barrère, Carnot, and R. Lindet had to retire from the Salut Public, and Vadier, Vouland, and another of that faction, from the Sureté Générale: six more Thermidoriens stepped into these vacancies; and then Billaud-Varennes and Collot d'Herbois, finding themselves completely crushed, resigned. Nearly the whole governing power and patronage were thus absorbed by the enemies and rivals of the old committee-men, and this falling faction was depopularized and made odious by editor Fréron and the whole enterprising Thermidorien press, and by certain public trials which had hitherto been delayed, partly in order to allow time for the re-organization of the Revolutionary Tribunal, and partly out of an apprehension that, if encouragement were given to witnesses to appear against the commissioners or proconsuls belonging to the party of Robespierre, or to the party of Barrère, Billaud, and Collot, witnesses might also hasten to Paris to testify against the scarcely less atrocious deeds of Tallien, Dumont, and other commissioners or proconsuls who appertained to the Thermidorien party, and who were now endeavouring to captivate public opinion by setting themselves up as angels or ministers of mercy. After denouncing Lebon, who had been intimately connected with Robespierre, they cautiously proceeded to reveal the iniquities of Carrier, against whose atrocities Robespierre had repeatedly raised his voice, and over whose head he was holding the axe of the guillotine at the moment of his own downfall. Carrier and the Revolutionary Committee of Nantes had sent 132 Nantese republicans to be tried in the capital as Girondists and Federalists. As these victims were loaded with chains, made to march on foot, and subjected to most barbarous treatment on the road, only ninety-four of them reached the prisons of the capital alive. They had been lying in captivity ever since the beginning of January. Early in September they were brought to trial before the re-organized tribunal, which paid a delicate attention to evidence, lengthened the trial to seven days, the better to attract public notice, and, in the end, acquitted every one of the prisoners. These liberated Nantese republicans, from the condition of prisoners became accusers and witnesses against Carrier and the members of the Revolutionary Committee of Nantes; but, although Paris and the greater part of France were made to ring with the frightful tales they told of fusilades, noyades, and mariages républicains, Carrier's trial was not begun just yet, the Thermidoriens being much less anxious to punish him than to secure their own power by annihilating the old committee-men. Legendre now renewed the attack which had been made by Lecointre against Barrère, Billaud, Collot, Vadier, Amar, and Vouland: the butcher was outvoted, as the draper had been: but this time the Convention did not declare the charges to be calumnious; and the parties assailed, instead of being daring and confident, were timid and irresolute to a degree which showed they might soon be entirely extinguished without much risk. Barrère, who was probably contemplating the possibility of another change, and the practicability of making a good bargain with the Thermidoriens, was less active, but Billaud-Varennes and Collot d'Herbois began to canvass the regular sans-culottes of the faubourgs and to frequent the Jacobin Club. But the great club never recovered from the two blows which it had received on the 10th Thermidor, when (early in the morning) Legendre had locked the doors, put the keys into his pocket, thrown them upon the table of the Convention, and (in the evening) the president of the club, Vivier, was executed with Robespierre. The keys were gotten back, the hall was re-opened; a new purification drove away the Robespierrists, as they had driven away their adversaries; but in purging out the Robespierrists the stamina of the club were destroyed. Billaud idly exclaimed that the Jacobin lion was not dead, but only sleeping, for it never woke again to any purpose:—instead of being an Upper House, the hall became a mere cock-pit or fives-court, where cudgelling was taught. The Convention, growing strong as the Jacobins grew weak, prohibited by decree their systems of correspondence and affiliation, and their practice of petitioning as a body. As in the departments the affiliated societies had been split quite as much as the parent society in the capital, scarcely an effort was made to sustain the system. In Paris the Jacobins par excellence put bludgeons in their pockets or sticks in their hands, and cultivated the good fellowship of the rougher sans-culottes of the faubourgs. It was really a beautiful moral improvement, this cudgelling, over guillotining:—heads were occasionally broken, and arms and legs damaged—but that was all. The Thermidoriens opposed the respectability sections to the faubourgs, and encouraged the gay young men to take up—not swords and bayonets and pikes, but—clubs and sticks against the Jacobins. Fréron was the recruiter and commander of this army, which was called la Jeunesse Dorée de Fréron, the Golden or Gilded Youth of Fréron. His journal, l'Orateur du Peuple, called them to arms or sticks, and traced out the plan of their campaign—a simple plan enough, consisting merely of two instructions—1. Wherever they found the Jacobins (now clubbists in a double sense) disturbing the public peace, they were to fall upon them, if sufficiently strong; 2. Whenever they were not strong enough, they were to avoid a combat until they could collect more youths and sticks. This curious army of journalist Fréron was composed entirely of young men of the better or, at least, richer classes of society: they wore a fantastic costume, and loaded the ends of their sticks or clubs with lead, even as Robespierre's Tappent Durs had done before them. In most public places this Jeunesse Dorée had the advantage; they reigned in the theatres, and gave the law in the Palais-Royal, but in the gardens of the Tuileries, the Rue St. Honoré, and all the immediate neighbourhood of the club, the Jacobins for a long time kept their ground. Not a day, scarcely an hour, by night or by day, passed without some of these combats, in which dozens or fifties or hundreds of these clubbists and anti-clubbists charged one another in the streets with their clubs and sticks, the one party crying "Vive la Convention!" the other "Vive la Montagne!" The Jacobins were encouraged by Carrier. The Convention sent the Revolutionary Committee of Nantes before the Revolutionary Tribunal, where they exculpated themselves in the ordinary fashion by accusing Carrier—a monster, if there ever was one, but whose atrocities could not have been committed without the concurrence of the committees. Now, the Convention let the Tribunal proceed against the terrible proconsul. Carrier demanded to be heard in the House, and it was thought proper not to refuse him. He represented that in all that he had done at Nantes he had only obeyed the decrees of the Convention and the orders of the committees; that his conduct had been conformable to the general spirit of the day; that measures pretty nearly the same had been adopted at Lyons and in other parts of France; that at the very time he was exercising his severities at Nantes, the Convention had issued a decree commanding the generals to put to the sword all the Vendéans, and reduce all their villages to ashes; that the Infernal Columns had actually executed this command in most parts of that country, committing slaughters which were horrible indeed, but which he thought justifiable as a retaliation for the cruelties the Vendéans had committed on the republicans. "Why," said he, "would you blame to-day that which your own decrees ordered then? Does the Convention wish to condemn itself? If I am guilty, everything here is guilty, down to the president's hand-bell!" His last argument could scarcely be refuted, but nevertheless, out of 500 members who voted, 490 voted for the accusation, and the other 10 also voted for it, but conditionally. The Jacobins took up Carrier's cause as their own, and endeavoured to save him by exciting the faubourgs into insurrection—so, at least, said Fréron, his Gilded Youth, and the Thermidoriens of the Convention generally, though it seems to be confessed that their proofs of the facts are but doubtful. Their party, however, was now the strongest, and therefore (and possibly, from that cause alone) a terrible attack was made on the Jacobin Hall one night in November, by la Jeunesse Dorée, the respectability sections, and other anti-Jacobins. The attack was commenced by smashing the windows with stones; next, the doors were broken open, and then a hand-to-hand conflict with clubs, sticks, stools, tables, and chairs, took place in the body of the hall. The Jacobinesses in the galleries ran out shrieking; their retreat was intercepted by Gilded Youth outside, and by a crowd four thousand strong; and were treated with great severity and indignity, many of them being whipped in the streets in the most indecent manner. [Respectability was now retaliating upon sans-cullotism in more ways than one.] The male Jacobins within the hall, overpowered by numbers, were compelled to evacuate their own fortress. On the next day they complained to the Convention of the illegal violence which had been exercised upon them, without—as they alleged—the slightest provocation on their part. Rewbell, now a member of the government as one of the committee of Sûreté Générale, drew up a report upon the whole matter, and made it very unfavourable to the Jacobins. "Who," said he, "covered France with mourning, carried despair into families, peopled the republic with Bastilles, rendered the republican régime so odious that a slave bending under the weight of his chains would have refused to live in it?—The Jacobins! Who regret the frightful régime under which we have been living?—The Jacobins! If you have not the courage to pronounce their dissolution at this moment, you will have no republic, for a republic cannot exist with Jacobins!" The Convention, not daring to adopt a bold measure at once, voted that the meetings of the club should be provisorily suspended, in order to allow time for a fresh purgation or new organization. The Jacobins disregarded this decree, met in their hall this very night, and, to be better prepared against a new assault, they carried more clubs and sticks with them—not a few, it is said, carrying weapons of a more deadly sort. They had not been long assembled ere stones and other missiles whistled through the hall, and ere the whole building was surrounded by Fréron's Gilded Youth, and by an auxiliary army or Thermidorien mob, more numerous and more furious than that of the preceding night, who were shouting Vive la Convention! A bas les Jacobins! The clubists, quitting their benches, rushed to the doors, and, shouting Vive la République! made a sortie, which was not altogether unsuccessful, for they took a few prisoners and broke a great many heads. But the Thermidoriens soon burst into the hall, overwhelmed the clubists with their superior numbers, disarmed them, cudgelled them soundly, and hurled or kicked them into the streets. It is worthy of note that the mad Marquis St. Huruge, now a fierce anti-Jacobin, led one of the attacking columns. The next morning—a cold drizzling morning of November—the Convention sent down its commissioners and its ushers to put their seals on their register and papers, and to shut up the club—and from this moment the Mother Society ceased to exist. She had survived Robespierre not quite four months, and had been dying ever since his death. Many and terrific were the tragedies she had played, but she expired in a broad farce, to the accompaniment of bons-mots, laughter, and hooting. There were some street club and stick fights—with great breaking of heads, but apparently no loss of life—between Fréron's Jeunesse Dorée and the discomfited Jacobins, and then nothing more came of it. If the advice of Fréron had been taken, the combat would have been of a more sanguinary kind, and fresh massacres, leading to accumulated vengeance, and eventually to other massacres, would have been perpetrated. This journalist had been the college companion of Robespierre, and was worthy of being the friend and disciple of Marat himself. He called upon all the youth of France, la Jeunesse Française, "to rouse them from their lethargic sleep, and avenge the deaths of old men, women, and children, by exterminating (yes, exterminate was his word) the massacrers and butchers of the revolution!" . . . "You have closed the Jacobins," he exclaimed, "but you will do more—you will annihilate them!"

For a time the Thermidoriens clung to the revolutionary fame and name of Marat, for it was considered too dangerous an experiment to attempt destroying at once so popular a prestige, so pure and perfect a symbol of the Gallican republic. Fréron, who affected to write in his style, and who used his sanguinary arguments, only slightly altering them so as to adapt them to the Thermidorien youth instead of the multitude, the lowest and poorest of the people, called himself "the cherished disciple of Marat," boasted of having been his collaborateur in the 'Ami du Peuple,' and in his new 'Orateur du Peuple' kept apostrophizing Marat as his "political teacher," "master," "eternal model." The more the Jacobins accused the Thermidoriens of counter-revolutionism, and of a departure from the holy principles of democracy, liberty, and equality, the louder the Thermidoriens sang paeans to Marat; and it was to cover their mortal attack that the Convention, some weeks before locking and sealing up the Société Mère, decreed a new apotheosis to l'Ami du Peuple, with translation of his remains to the Pantheon; and, when the foul coffin of Marat was dug up from under the trees in the Cordelier's garden, the Thermidoriens, with all the rest of the honourable deputies, followed it in solemn procession to the temple which the gratitude of the country had consecrated to her GREAT MEN, and, when there, the president of the Convention delivered a long eulogistic oration over it. The bust of Mirabeau had long since disappeared, but hitherto his remains had been left undisturbed in the Pantheon; but now, as Marat's coffin was brought in at the front door, Mirabeau's was heaved out at a back door: "for the impure remains of a royalist plotter could not be allowed to repose near those of the true republican and real friend of the people." The people themselves completed the task of degrading the dead tribune; they dragged what was left of him through the kennels and filth of the streets, and then threw the dissecta membra into the foulest places. But short was the rest of the translated skin and bones of Marat under the dome of the Pantheon: Jeunesse Dorée, acting as if on its own impulses, smashed the busts of l'Ami du Peuple in theatres, halls, committee-rooms, street-corners, shops, wherever they were to be found, giving their great original the well-earned epithets of butcher and monster; and at the end of January (1795), some four months after the translation, and two months after the closing of the Jacobin club (the Thermidoriens being by that time bold enough and strong enough to do without his prestige), the Gilded Youth burst open his tomb, dragged what was left of him to the cloaca, or great sewer or cesspool, of Montmartre, and there threw them in, as dirty little boys had already thrown in the fragments of his busts, with loud laughter and the brief funeral oration—"Lie there, scélérat; that is the proper Pantheon for thee!" In the National Convention these proceedings were not merely excused, but justified; and André Dumont, in the name of the united committees, presented a decree, which was forthwith passed, that the honours of the Pantheon should never again be awarded to a citizen, nor his bust placed in the National Convention, or in any public place, until ten years after his death. "Thus the very men who had Pantheonized Marat, un-Pantheonized him as soon as it suited their policy to do so." * They had disgraced the dust of Rousseau by translating it to the Pantheon; and now, in the theatres and nearly all public places, the bust of Jean Jacques was substituted for that of Marat.

Carrier had been constituted a prisoner in his own house or lodging, with four gendarmes to watch him by night and by day. Several deputies, including Raffron, complained in the Convention of this treatment, and pleaded Carrier's cause as that of an honest, energetic man, who had merely obeyed his instructions and done his duty. Butcher Legendre, whose aversion to cruelty and blood was of a very recent date, fell into a mighty fury on the 23rd of November against those who recommended a delay, with an ample production of proofs, before they sent Carrier to take his trial. "What proofs?" cried Legendre. "You ask for material proofs: well, then, if you will have them, make the waters of the Loire flow back in their bed; bring to Paris his vessels with the false bottoms; bring the corpses of the wretched victims he sacrificed—they are numerous enough to hide the living here!" That night Carrier was surprised in his bed; and, after trying to blow out his brains with a double-barrelled pistol, he was carried to prison. On the way he said that the patriots would never pardon those who had prevented him from shooting himself; he hoped that his daily pay, as a deputy of the Convention, would not be stopped, and that he would be allowed an airy room in the prison, as he was accustomed to breathe the mountain-air of Auvergne (his native province), and could not live without free air. Fourteen members of the Revolutionary Committee of Nantes, and some sixteen or eighteen other individuals, and all of them natives or inhabitants of that town, were put in the same indictment with Carrier, and were all accused of being more sanguinary than Nero, more barbarous than Phalaris. The fusilades, the noyades, the republican marriages, were all minutely described and held up to the detestation of mankind; but especial care was taken to charge Carrier and his gang with having perpetrated all these horrors with counter-revolutionary views and intentions, and in order to degrade or debase the Convention, or national representation (avilir la représentation nationale); which was as false as it was true that the governing committees and the Convention itself had either expressly commanded or afterwards sanctioned the worst of their deeds. The trial lasted many days: in spite of all the ingenuity of the re-organised tribunal, which laboured and lied to excuse the Convention and such members of the committees as had borne a part in the Thermidor revolution, it was proved by Carrier that their guilt, their monstrosity was nearly as great as his own; and incidents were revealed and details given which make the hair stand erect and the eye almost doubt what it is reading. Carrier repeated over and over again—and without being contradicted—that his orders from the government and the decrees of the Convention were peremptory and terrible; that other deputies in mission had been as obedient to those orders and decrees as he had been; that

Roussignol and other generals in the Vendée had been far more rigorous than he; that the massacres of prisoners, the fusilading and drowning, had not ceased with his recall, which had been brought about by Robespierre and his party, but that, on the contrary, far more lives had been sacrificed in the Vendée since his return to Paris than during the whole of his mission. In finishing his long defence before the tribunal, he pleaded his poverty and disinterestedness, his known revolutionism, his republicanism which had ever been above suspicion, and the general morality of his character and conduct. "Oppressed," said he, "with illness, worn out by fatigue, exhausted in body and mind, I can only appeal to the justice and conscience of the jury. My morality is attested in an address from my department. I demand whatever advantage can be granted to those who are accused with me, and who have excused themselves by pleading that they only obeyed my orders; I demand that, if national justice must strike some one, it strike me alone!" The jury brought in a verdict of Guilty, and the court passed sentence of death against Carrier, and two members of the Revolutionary Committee of Nantes, Moreau Grandmaison and Pinard. Twenty-eight individuals, members of the said committee of Nantes, or functionaries employed by Carrier, were convicted as accomplices; "but," says the record of the trial, "not having acted with criminal and counter-revolutionary intentions, the tribunal acquits them all, and sets them at liberty."* Two members of the committee were acquitted upon the ground that it was not proved that they had taken any active part in the arbitrary deeds ordered by the committee. On the 16th of December, Carrier, with the two condemned committee-men of Nantes, was dragged to the scaffold; he persisted that the whole of those who had made the revolution, or suffered it, or directed it, were as guilty as he, if guilt there was. In presence of the guillotine he was firm, and he died repeating that he was innocent, that he had only executed the orders of the committees; and indeed, comparing himself with his accusers, he might well consider himself as not very guilty.†

The party or parties who now ruled the Convention were not satisfied with this trial; they refused

* Wholly to acquit and liberate twenty-eight men, declared to be accomplices, or auteurs ou complices, was a strange judicial proceeding! Some of these individuals, even as stated in the verdict, had been most active agents in the atrocities committed at Nantes. Thus: Joly had "tied together the victims destined to the noyades, fusilades, &c.;" and Naud, who, like Joly, was a member of the committee, had "assisted and co-operated on board the gabarras, from which the prisoners, on the night of the 24th Primaire, had been precipitated into the Loire;" Richard had "executed the orders of the committee in preparing a noyade of priests, disputing with Lambertye the honour and profit of that operation, and had appropriated the drowned priests' clothes;" Foucaud had "co-operated and assisted at several noyades, and had given orders to the military to be present at a noyade performed at Paimboeuf" (these nocturnal drownings were not confined to Nantes); Lefevre had "ordered and caused to be executed a noyade of men, women, and children, and committed many arbitrary acts;" O'Sullivan had "co-operated and assisted in various noyades, exercising unheard-of cruelties on the victims he consigned to the waves;" Dheron had "committed assassinations of children; worn publicly, stuck on his hat, the ear of a Vendean whom he had killed; and killed two children that were quietly watching a flock of sheep," &c. &c.

to sanction the acquittals pronounced by the Revolutionary Tribunal; and on the 18th of December they voted a decree which ordered that all the prisoners who had been acquitted should be kept in prison. On the same day another decree was passed to change still further the Revolutionary Tribunal:—juries and judges were to be entirely renewed every quarter of a year; the number of judges was to be twelve, instead of twenty-four; of jurymen thirty, instead of sixty. After lying in prison till the end of April, 1795; the Convention, which by that time had undergone many changes, sent, by decree, Carrier's acquitted accomplices (except such of them as were military men, and who, in that capacity, as Bourdon de l'Oise remarked, were bound to execute whatever orders their commanding officers might have given them at Nantes or in the Vendée) to take their trial, not before the Revolutionary Tribunal of Paris, but before the Criminal Court of Angers. We cannot clearly discover the result of their trial; but it appears that two or three of the worst were guillotined on the banks of the Loire, and that more of them were deported or transported to the pestilential swamps of French Guyana.

On the 1st of December the Convention received a letter from Dulaure, one of the seventy-three imprisoned members of the House, who demanded a trial.* This letter was referred to the united committees. Four days afterwards Lanjuinais, who had been outlawed with the other Girondist chiefs, and whose life for a long time had been in the greatest danger, wrote a similar letter to the Convention, who referred it also to the committees, with some expressions of regret for the sufferings which had been inflicted on such illustrious statesmen and friends of liberty. It was evident that the seventy-three at least (whom Robespierre himself thought of restoring) would soon be restored to their seats. And as early as the 8th of December, while the trial of Carrier was still pending, Merlin de Douai presented a report from the united committees demanding the instant recall of the imprisoned deputies—imprisoned, it will be remembered, for protesting against the proceedings of the 31st of May, 1793, or the forcible expulsion of the Girondist chiefs. The proposition was hailed with enthusiasm by as great a majority (of the very same men) as had voted them all into prison. It was agreed that indemnities should be given, and the arrears of their twelve livres per diem be paid to these ill-used representatives of the people. A few other men, not included in the list of proscription for the protest, but thrown into prison for other causes or suspicions, were honourably recalled. Thomas Paine, who is said to have had a very narrow escape from being included in the batch sent to the guillotine on the 9th Thermidor,† was

* This was J. A. Dulaure, author of 'L'Histoire de Paris,' 'Esquisses Historiques des Principaux Evénemens de la Révolution Française,' &c. works which forcibly show how little moderation or political wisdom he had learned from misfortune and persecution, and from a lengthened experience of the world.

† The story of Paine's escape (which is better known than it is authenticated) is this:—On the night which preceded Robespierre's of this last number, it being now declared that he, having been naturalized and made a French citizen, could not fairly be included in the law which excluded foreigners from the National Convention. As soon as these protesting and imprisoned members were released, they began to recommend the immediate recall of all such of the outlawed Girondists as yet survived; but here there was a violent and long opposition, for the Thermidoriens and the new members of the committees dreaded the return of that party, although it was almost extinct, the best of it having perished so miserably; and, as the insurrections in the provinces, which had followed the events of the 31st of May, had tended to prove that these Girondists were really federalists, and in connexion with royalists, and as these proofs or appearances had been proclaimed hundreds of times in the Convention, and cited by all parties in it as justifying the utmost rigour of the republic, and the total annihilation of such a faction, these Thermidoriens apprehended that, if they were now to recall and stretch out the hand of friendship to the surviving outlaws, they would themselves be suspected of being (what the ultra-Jacobins, the Robespierrists, &c. were daily calling them) counter-revolutionists, federalists, or royalists. "How!" cried Merlin de Douai, "would you open the gates of the Temple and set up royalty again? Would you have men say that you have shut up the Jacobin Club only in order to open the Temple?" Butcher Legendre, who had attempted to drag Lanjuinais from the tribune on the terrible 31st of May, and who had ever shown himself a vehement, implacable, personal enemy of the Girondist chiefs, dreading that the return even of the few survivors might compromise his own security, asked how it was possible to think of recalling such dangerous, desperate men, who had been traversing the departments with the dagger in their hands? At last—on the 17th of December—it was decreed that neither Lanjuinais nor Louvet, neither Isnard nor any of the outlaws, could re-enter the bosom of the Convention, but that none of them should henceforward be pursued or troubled in any way.

Before the close of this year (1794) some further progress, though not very considerable, was made on the road of gentleness and mercy. The terrible police law of the 16th of April was moderated, and priests and nobles were no longer subjected to expulsion, banishment, and imprisonment merely on account of their caste or profession. Cambacérès proposed an amnesty for all facts relating to the revolution that were not comprised among the crimes designated in the penal code; Abbé Gregoire, the ultra-Catholic republican, who had kept clear of the guillotine, invoked the humanity of the Convention in favour of the multitudes of priests that were pining in prisons in all parts of France; but Boissy d'Anglas hoped that the House would adopt the severest measures against such priests as were still exciting troubles in the country. These several propositions were referred to the committees, with the evident expectation that 1795 would open as a year of mercy.

fall, as he was lying in the Luxembourg prison, a turnkey, with Fouquier-Tinville's list in his hand, went along the corridors marking with chalk the doors of such as were to be tried and executed on the morrow. Paine's room or cell had two doors: one of these doors happened to be open; the turnkey chalked the inner door that was closed; another turnkey, passing along the corridor, slammed to the open or outer door, so that when they came in the morning to drag out the victims and make up the founsee for that day, the death-mark on Paine's cell was not visible, and they passed onward to other doors.

Before returning to the home affairs of England a few words must be said concerning the third partition of Poland, that deed which in its perpetration had weakened the armies of the coalition employed against France, and which, in its moral effects, threw a black cloud over the reputation of kings at a crisis when it ought to have been kept bright and spotless, and cast even a shade of obloquy over all who were attached to established governments. The French republicans, for many years, covered their own aggressions by referring to the fate of Poland; and, although in their case they added deception and mockery, cajoling for a while the people of the countries they overran with hopes and promises of national independence and internal freedom, it is not easy to show which of their worst conquests and occupations was worse than the dismemberment and absorption of Poland by the anointed sovereigns of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. Among the much-divided Polish nobility, whose dissensions, jealousies, mad ambition, and political immorality had kept their country distracted and weak, in a confusion and anarchy worse than what had obtained in the old feudal days of Europe, while all its neighbours had been growing in strength and improving in organization and administration, was Thaddeus Kosciuszko, of an ancient but not wealthy family of Lithuania, a man whose bravery, humanity, and patriotism are equally indisputable, but whose abilities, whether as a general or a statesman, are liable to some questioning. In the dearth of truly great men in modern times, and in their enthusiastic and laudable admiration of his gallantry and entire honesty, the Polish patriots have been wont to attribute more greatness and genius to the gallant soldier than ever belonged to him (his amiable and generous qualities they could scarcely exaggerate); but at the same time it is but fair to state that, even had Kosciuszko been as great and able a man as he is represented, it may be doubted whether he would have succeeded in his grand enterprise of driving out the three great powers from his native country—a country, for the most part, open and ill-calculated for defensive war, and most of the strong places in which were occupied by Russia, Prussia, and Austria. Kosciuszko, in his early life, had resided a considerable time in France, studying the science of war. While yet a very young man, he had volunteered to accompany Lafayette to America: he served for some time as aide-de-camp to Washington, and his services to our revolted colonists had obtained for him the rank of a general officer, and, after the war, a pension from the United States. The school or schools in which he had studied had given him a preference for republican institutions, but he had no excessiveness or extravagance in his political opinions, and seems to have agreed that the government best suited to his country would be a representative monarchy, in which the aristocracy should have its due share and influence. With some of the patriot nobles who had adhered to the constitution of 1793, and had gallantly fought the overwhelming forces of the empress Catherine, Kosciuszko had fled into Saxony. From Dresden and Leipsic these unhappy exiles corresponded with their friends who remained at home under the harsh rule of Russian ministers and Russian generals, and concerted with them the means of attempting one struggle more for the independence of their native country. What followed is variously told, according to the predilections of party or of private friendship: some accounts state that the fugitives and exiles, anxious to regain their homes, precipitated the plan; others state that the patriots who remained in their country, suffering under the insolence and arrogance and oppressions of the Czarina's agents, who were instructed to drive matters to extremity, were the more impatient and imprudent party: one thing is perfectly clear—the plan was precipitated, and the insurrection broke out at an inauspicious moment, and before half the preparations it was really in their power to make had been made in Poland. The outbreak was hurried on by an order from Catherine's minister for the immediate reduction of the Polish army to 15,000 men. The permanent council of government, which had been set up by Stanislaus Augustus under the dictation of Catherine, complied with this mandate, and issued the necessary orders; and, if the patriots had been wise, they also would have complied, if only in order to gain time. There was not much to lose by this course, for the Polish army actually organized and on foot consisted only of some 30,000 men, and it would not have been difficult to have recalled the 15,000 disbanded men at any given moment, or when their other preparations, including the recall of 50,000 and more troops who had been disbanded already, should be in a state of maturity or of greater forwardness. But the Polish patriots, ever impetuous and rash, resolved to strike the blow now, rather than suffer the reduction of a single regiment of the small and scattered army—for the 30,000 men were not even collected on one point, but spread all over the country, in order to keep them weak and inefficient, and most of these detachments were closely watched by detachments of Russians, superior in number, in appointment, and, perhaps, in discipline. The great engine on which the patriots relied was clubism, or an organized system of secret societies, the head or mother society being established at Warsaw, the capital, and the affiliated societies being in the provincial towns and villages. It may be doubted whether such a machine ever worked perfectly well: and at this time there was a panic dread and horror, in all Europe, of such political means. In private conversation George III., while regretting the inability of England to do anything at this moment to avert the fate of Poland, and deploring its inevitable doom, was accustomed to say, "But are not the Poles all Jacobins? Look at their clubs! Look at their secret societies."* It is said that Kosciuszko had no very great reliance on this clubism; that in the autumn of 1793 he secretly sent his friend and companion Zajoncsek to Warsaw, and that he reported that the members of the conspiracy were too enthusiastic, that their only connexion with the army was through Madalinski, Dzialynski, and a few subalterns. Madalinski, a general officer, vowed he would risk everything if they attempted to oblige him to disband his brigade; and Kapustas, a banker of Warsaw, strenuously exerted himself, in various ways, in order to give activity, spirit, and unanimity to the clubs, and rouse the people from their unpatriotic lethargy. A supreme committee of four had been appointed; the ultra-revolutionists, the men who would have imitated the ultra-revolutionists of France (and there were such men, there was such a party, in Poland), would have preferred Iasinski, but Kosciuszko enjoyed the general confidence of the patriots; his judgment was regarded almost as infallible, and with something like unanimity, or with far more agreement and mutual goodwill than usually attended the elections and deliberations of his countrymen, Kosciuszko was appointed chief and generalissimo of the confederacy. The wretched king, who had always despaired of success, and who foresaw that this premature struggle must end in his total dethronement, in the ruin of all the patriot nobles, and in the extinction of his country as a nation, became acquainted with the operations and intentions of the clubists, and with the secret comings and goings of the exiles in Saxony. In the hope of preventing the hopeless outburst he gave some information to Catherine's minister, Ingestrom, in consequence of which Zajoncsek, Kosciuszko's comrade and one of the chiefs of the confederacy, was discovered in Warsaw, and ordered to quit the kingdom—a mildness of treatment which seems to prove either that Stanislaus did not tell all he knew, or that Catherine was really anxious and impatient for the insurrection, in order to have the opportunity of finishing in her old age what she had begun in her prime, of terminating a business which had occupied her mind for the better part of half a century. It was agreed by the confederates that Cracow, the ancient capital of Poland, on the left bank of the Vistula, should be the rendezvous of the patriots in arms, and the point of junction to all such columns, regiments, companies, brigades, or squadrons, as could traverse the kingdom from their scattered positions and cantonments. Some money, it is said, was procured from France, the leading men of the National Convention having been made to feel, by some of the Polish patriots at Paris, the advantage of exciting a powerful diversion against Prussia.

In the month of March, Madalinski received positive orders to disband his brigade. Instead of obeying, he sounded boot and saddle, and, quitting his quarters at Pultusk, in the neighbourhood of Warsaw, he marched off with his brigade, about 700 strong, for Cracow. On his way he traversed a part of the territory which had been partitioned out to the king of Prussia; and, as the Prussians had proved even harder taskmasters than the Muscovites, and as no doubt could be entertained that Frederic William, and the emperor Francis likewise, would make common cause with Catherine, and assist her in quenching with blood the last sparks of Polish independence, he fell upon and beat all such Prussian detachments as he met, made prisoners, harrowed the civil authorities appointed by Frederic William, and levied contributions. In this manner, to use the words of one of the noble confederates, the Poles began, and left to Providence the issue of the rashest enterprise that man could conceive.* Madalinski reached Cracow towards the end of March, and raised the standard of independence, which attracted fewer of the common people than the patriots had expected. Kosciuszko arrived from Saxony a day or two after; he had no troops to bring, but his fame and the magic of his name made the standard of independence more attractive, and brought numbers of enthusiastic young men of the higher and middling classes to join the thin ranks of the patriotic army. Oaths of obedience, and almost of allegiance, were taken to him; he was invested with all powers, civil and military—with the full and absolute powers of a dictator; the choice of the members of a provisional government, or national council of government, was left entirely to his own will; and it is said to have been only his own good sense, modesty, and moderation, which prevented their empowering him to nominate a successor to his more than kingly office. At this time Thaddeus Kosciuszko was in the 39th year of his age, full of health and vigour, and capable of enduring excessive privations and fatigues. In his quality of dictator he instantly imposed a property-tax, which indisposed not a few minds to the cause,* and called upon all nobles and citizens to join his standard, or to adopt measures to facilitate its progress from Cracow to Warsaw, from the Vistula to the Niemen, and onward to the farthest limits of Lithuania, his own native province, which longest of all had been possessed by the Russians. Soon, in conjunction with the National Council, he issued proclamations enfranchising all the peasants, who had hitherto been neither more nor less than serfs, like the same class in Russia, and calling upon them to arm themselves as best they could, and to fall upon the enemies of their country and of all national and personal liberty. Kosciuszko was not to blame in this, but unfortunately the emancipation came too late, and with hurry and confusion in a moment of crisis. The degraded serfs of Poland could not be all at once elevated to the dignity of citizens, or converted into enthusiastic patriots: some of them scarcely understood the advantages offered them; some thought that the benefit had been withheld until the moment when the noble and wealthy classes found they could not do without them; some doubted that the fine promises given in a season of danger and distress would not be kept when the peril was over; and from these and various other causes the proclamation of enfranchisement produced but a very partial effect. Many of the serfs did indeed fight bravely; but it appears that these men principally belonged to the patriot nobles who had confederated, and that the vassals of such magnates as were neutral, and of such as were of the Russian party (and this last class of unpatriotic nobles was not inconsiderable in number), remained deaf and blind to the charms of the proclamation, and continued to look to their lords as the absolute masters and disposers of their actions and their will, of their souls and bodies. At the same time the proclamation, while it carried alarm among the nobles of Russia, the magnates of the emperor's Hungarian dominions, and all the serf-holding aristocracies in the north-east of Europe, scared and irritated that very considerable body of the Polish nobles who had so strenuously opposed even a gradual enfranchisement, and who looked upon their serfs as our West India planters looked upon their negro slaves. The middle class, which constitutes the great strength of civilized nations, was in Poland exceedingly small and weak—in the very weakness of infancy, for it was only of late years that it had begun to have a recognizable existence. "In our country," says Oginski, "there was really no Tiers Etat, and the people were plunged in ignorance."

Early in April Kosciuszko marched from Cracow at the head of 4000 men, who were for the most part armed with scythes and other agricultural implements. He had no field artillery, but little ammunition, and no stores of any kind: yet, when he encountered, at Raclawicé, a village on the road between Cracow and Warsaw, an army of 12,000 or 13,000 men, he thoroughly defeated it after a bloody battle which lasted five hours, killed 3000 of the Russians, made many prisoners, and took eleven cannon. This success immediately brought him a considerable accession of strength; and some of the nobles who had hitherto been wavering began to repair to his standard. Ingestrom was in consternation, and almost in despair, writing to St. Petersburg “that he had no hope but in God and the good cause of his sovereign.” On the 17th of April the Polish garrison of Warsaw, about 4000 strong, unfurled the banner of independence, attacked the Russian troops in the town, about 8000 strong, gained possession of the arsenal and magazines, and distributed arms and ammunition to the populace. After some murderous and long street-fighting—it lasted, with slight intermission, for two days and two nights—the Russians were driven out of Warsaw, with the loss of more than 4000 men in killed and prisoners. On the 23rd of April Kosciuszko’s countrymen, the Lithuanians, burst into insurrection at Wilna, and, after a sanguinary contest, drove the Russian garrison out of that capital city. At this juncture Frederick William, who, but for Poland, might have doubled or even trebled his army on the French frontier (being aided by the liberal English subsidy), marched 40,000 Prussians into the palatinate of Cracow. This force effected a junction with a large Russian corps, and within a few days his Prussian majesty arrived and put himself at the head of his army. Towards the end of May Kosciuszko, with 16,000 regular troops and about 10,000 volunteers and armed peasants, marched away from Warsaw to defend the city of Cracow. On the 5th of June he fought the united Prussians and Russians at Szezakociny, and was defeated with the loss of 1000 men. He put into his dispatch, or bulletin, that he had killed a great many more of the enemy; but Prussia and Russia could better bear the loss of thousands than he could of hundreds. Three days after this affair another Polish corps was defeated and almost annihilated at Chelm, and on the 15th of June the ancient city of Cracow, the fountain-head of the insurrection, surrendered, after a short siege, to the King of Prussia. The patriot army retreated in good order, and took possession of an intrenched camp at Pracka-Wola, about three leagues from Warsaw. Kosciuszko had committed the old and seemingly incurable blunder of dividing his forces: when he marched from Warsaw with such a diminutive force, he had from 40,000 to 50,000, or according to other accounts from 60,000 to 70,000 men of all kinds, including some admirable light cavalry, under arms. It is said—but the thing is scarcely credible, or, if credible, highly discreditable—that he was not aware of the junction of the King of Prussia’s army with the Russians; and, even if he had been in this state of ignorance, it behoved him to keep his army together, to collect the mass of it on one point, in order to strike one great blow at a time. The Russians that were expected to cross the Niemen were as yet at a distance, no division of his army could be capable of opposing their progress when they came; but, if he had taken the whole of his force with him into the palatinate of Cracow, he might have defeated and exterminated the Prussians and the Russians that were there, and then have wheeled round in good time to meet the fresh army of the Czarina on the Niemen. The reverses he sustained, and the spiritless behaviour of the citizens of Cracow, greatly depressed some of the patriots, and drove others of them into a mad and bloody fury. Generally the Poles are a very excitable people; the political clubs in several particulars had too closely imitated the Jacobin societies of France, had often roused suspicion and inflamed the passions by violent demagogic oratory; and among the citizens and patriots of Warsaw there were a few individuals who had attentively studied and were quite ready to imitate the deeds of the Parisians. Like that fierce democracy, they attributed the ill-success of their arms to treason and a traitorous correspondence with the enemy. Upon the expulsion of the Russians from the city, the many whom they had imprisoned were liberated, and the partizans, both real and only suspected, of the Czarina were arrested and confined. As at Paris, the report was spread that these prisoners were the chief traitors and conspirators, the provisional government was accused of negligence in not bringing them to trial and execution, and the principle was promulgated that the people ought to do what their government had left undone. On the 27th of June a young hot-headed clubist, a sort of an incipient Polish Camille Desmoulins or Marat, harangued the rabble of Warsaw into a savage madness: on the following day they demanded the immediate execution of the political prisoners, and, upon meeting with a refusal, they burst open the prisons, and began to hang their wretched inmates on twelve gibbets which had been erected in different quarters of the city during the preceding night. They had dispatched eight victims when Zakrzewski, the president of the city, who enjoyed the universal esteem of the people, nobly despising all personal danger from the maniacs, threw himself among them, placed his own breast between the prisoners and their swords, harangued them till his voice became hoarse and inaudible, then threw himself on his knees, and with joined and uplifted hands prayed them not to disgrace the Polish name by such cruelty and injustice. The people separated, the imitation of the Parisian Septembrizers was cut short, no more murders were perpetrated, and tranquillity was promptly restored.

Kosciuszko felt most acutely this revolutionary blot. On the following day he said to Count Oginski, who found him at an early hour lying upon straw in a rude tent, “This will be an indelible stain on the history of our revolution! The loss of two battles would have done us less harm: our enemies will take advantage of what has happened to represent us in an unfavourable light to the eyes of all Europe! The populace have indulged in unpardonable excesses, which I must punish severely." An active investigation was ordered, and seven of the ringleaders, including the young mob-orator, were hanged on the gibbets which they had erected for the prisoners.

The emperor of Germany observed a strict neutrality down to the end of June, but on the last day of that month he announced his intention of sending an army into Little Poland—"to prevent," said his manifesto, "the danger to which the frontiers of Galicia might be exposed, as well as to insure the safety and tranquillity of the other states of his imperial majesty." An Austrian army presently crossed the frontiers, meeting with no opposition and offering no molestation to any of the Poles. The united armies of the Prussians and Russians, counting in all 50,000 men, of which 40,000 belonged to his Prussian majesty, advanced from Cracow upon Warsaw, which city had been hastily fortified at the commencement of the insurrection. Kosciuszko, who remained in his intrenched and fortified camp at Pracka-Wola, did not risk a general battle, but cruelly harassed the enemy, and prevented their regular prosecution of the siege of Warsaw, by numerous sorties and night attacks. On the 27th of July, on the 1st and on the 3rd of August, the Prussians and Russians sustained severe losses; other attacks followed in rapid succession: they tried to bombard the town, but did that work so badly that hardly a house in it was injured. At the same time other Polish detachments under Dombrowski, Prince Joseph Poniatowski, and other brave leaders, gained signal advantages in other quarters; and, while his Prussian majesty was wasting his time and his strength in fruitless endeavours to take Warsaw, the inhabitants of the Polish provinces which had recently been ceded to him flew to arms and endeavoured to dispossess him of all those acquisitions, and of every inch of ground he held in Poland. This news obliged him, on the night of the 5th of September, to beat a sudden retreat, and to leave his sick and wounded, and a good part of his baggage behind him. Kosciuszko did not follow his disheartened and disordered enemies: it is said that he had been left in ignorance of the cause of their hasty retiring, and thus fancied that the movement was a feint intended to draw him from his fortified camp. After some delay he detached Dombrowski with a considerable corps to co-operate with the new insurgents. Dantzic evinced the intention of throwing off the yoke, but a strong Prussian garrison restrained the patriots. The insurrection, however, became general, and the whole of Great Poland, with the exception of a few towns, fell into the possession of the Poles. In the conflicts which took place the Poles accused the Prussians of being guilty of excessive cruelty: the Prussians retorted the charge upon the Poles, and it appears that both parties were ferocious and bloody. Kosciuszko, who was not engaged here, was a man of humane and generous feelings, but Dombrowski was of a different character—or at least, wherever he commanded and his legion fought, now, and hereafter when they had become the mercenaries of the French republic, and afterwards of Napoleon Buonaparte, great barbarities were committed. While these bright gleams of success cheered the Poles at Warsaw and in Great Poland, their cause, weakly and miserably defended, fell into ruin in Lithuania. Kosciuszko and his officers patiently submitted to every privation, to beds of straw, to scarce and coarse food, to ragged and dirty attire, in order to be able to give more food and clothing to the common soldiers; but the camp of the patriot army of Lithuania, established at nine leagues beyond Wilna, presented a very different scene: the greater part of the officers of the staff gambled excessively in the very quarters of the general, where there was daily a well-served, luxurious table; and at the same time the soldiers were left to suffer from scarcity and hunger, the horses were perishing for want of proper forage, and Wilna, the capital of Lithuania, was abandoned to its fate, no means being adopted to provide for its defence. The Russian party, moreover, was stronger in that country than in the other parts of Poland, and the misconduct of the patriots gave them encouragement and confidence. Fierce jealousies and dissensions broke out between the patriotic citizens of Wilna and the patriotic army. Clouds of Cossacks gathered round the place as early as the end of July; and on the 12th of August, twenty-four days before the retreat of the King of Prussia from Warsaw, a strong Russian army entered Wilna, after a bombardment of eleven hours, but without committing any of the excesses of which they have been accused.*

In the meanwhile the formidable Suvaroff was advancing by forced marches upon Warsaw, and stand, but their forces, miserably inferior as they were collectively in point of number, were unwisely divided and scattered. A sanguinary affair on the 19th of September opened the road for Suvaroff to the Polish capital. Kosciuszko advanced to Grodno, gave the command of the army of Lithuania to a better general, and then retracing his steps he threw himself between two Russian armies, one under Count Fersen and the other under Suvaroff, who were moving from opposite points in the view of effecting a junction somewhere between Grodno and Warsaw. If the Polish hero had collected and brought with him the whole army of Lithuania, and if he had not detached Dombrowski into Great Poland, he might have fallen upon Fersen with a superior force, and then have turned round with an army elate with victory upon Suvaroff, and, though Poland was scarcely to be saved from the crushing weight of her three great and greedy neighbours, her doom might have been averted for this year at least; but matters had been so managed that Kosciuszko, who attacked Fersen near Macziewice, about fifty miles from Warsaw, on the 10th of October, could bring into action only 20,000 or 21,000 men—Fersen having triple that number, and a similar superiority in artillery and general appointment. The Poles fought desperately. The Russians sustained a terrific loss, but the battle terminated in the entire rout of the patriots, half of whom perished on the field or in the flight. Kosciuszko apparently displayed the most chivalrous or romantic bravery, but little or no strategy or generalship: when his cause was desperate he rushed into the midst of his enemies, at the head of the élite of his cavalry and of his principal and bravest officers: he fell, together with his horse, covered with wounds, and nearly all who followed him were either killed or taken prisoners. He lay for some time senseless among the dead, but was then recognised in spite of his disfiguring wounds, and his simple and coarse uniform. At mention of his name some Cossacks, who had approached with the intention of plundering and stripping him, testified a profound respect and a generous feeling: they made a rude brancard with their lances, put him upon it and carried him to General Fersen, who ordered his wounds to be attended to, and treated the fallen hero and his comrades in misfortune with great respect and kindness. The imperial woman that occupied the throne of the Czars was less generous than her Cossacks and her general: as soon as Kosciuszko was able to travel, he was conveyed to St. Petersburg, and condemned, as a Lithuanian and rebellious subject of Russia, to imprisonment for life—condemned of course, by Catherine herself, without the ceremony of a trial.

The victory of Macziewice removed every obstacle to the junction of the two Russian armies, and a few marches brought the united forces to the neighbourhood of Warsaw. The hopes even of the most sanguine and enthusiastic patriots had expired with the fall of Kosciuszko; but, like brave men, they resolved not to submit to their hard fate without some further struggle. On the 26th of October a body of them fought the van division under Fersen, but were driven back to their intrenchments. Praga, one of the suburbs of Warsaw, separated from the city by the Vistula, as the borough of Southwark is separated from the city of London by the Thames, had been hastily but strongly fortified: its batteries mounted 100 cannon, and the surviving part of the flower of the Polish army was collected within its walls. This bulwark lay between Suvaroff and Warsaw, and must be taken. As he sat down before it he received intelligence that the King of Prussia, from the opposite side of the river, was marching with all speed upon the Polish capital: it neither suited Suvaroff's military pride nor his mistress's policy to permit the Prussians to gain possession of the city, and therefore every nerve was strained to carry Praga and cross the Vistula before Frederick William should come up. On the 4th of November, at break of day, the energetic semi-barbarian ordered a general attack. For four hours the Poles stood well to their guns, and their grape and canister shot inflicted a terrible loss; but Suvaroff, who cared little for the lives of a few thousand men, more or less, precipitated column upon column, drove forward the attacking parties, assaulted all parts of the intrenchments at once, and at the end of the four hours burst into Praga with an overwhelming force. Then followed a massacre as bloody as that which he had perpetrated at Ismail. Twelve thousand inhabitants, of both sexes and of all ages, were butchered in the streets and in the houses; no quarter was given to the brave Polish soldiers who had so thinned many of the attacking columns, and 8,000 of them perished either in defending the place, or helplessly after its capture. During the heat of the combat the Russians had succeeded in burning the bridge which afforded the only communication between Praga and Warsaw: many of the Poles were drowned in attempting to swim across the river. When the suburb was running with blood and heaped with dead bodies, the Russians set fire to the four corners of it, and, as the houses were, for the most part, built of wood, the whole place, in the course of a few hours, was reduced to ashes. All this cruelty was intended to strike terror into the citizens of Warsaw, and it had that effect. The magistrates, on the afternoon of the 4th, sent a deputation to Suvaroff, who dictated his own terms of capitulation, and took possession of the city on the 6th of November. The Polish corps and detachments left scattered in Lithuania, in Great Poland, and other parts of the country, laid down their arms and retired to their homes, or entered the Russian service for bread or by compulsion, or fled in small parties to seek service in France. Russia, Prussia, Austria, each punished all such of the chiefs of the confederates—or all of them that fell into their hands—as were natives of the provinces they had respectively seized, considering and treating them as revolted subjects. Austria was the least and Prussia the most severe of the three; albeit the Czarina sent some few of the Polish nobles into Siberian exile. The independence of the country had really been gone long before, but now its name as a nation was blotted out, the co-partitioners resolving to appropriate every inch of the country to themselves, to govern it by their own laws, and to treat the whole of it as conquered territory. It was not, however, until the 24th of October, 1795, that this last partition-treaty was finally settled, and certain minor arrangements between Prussia and Austria, touching the Palatinate of Cracow, were not settled till the 21st of October, 1796. The unhappy Stanislaus Augustus, who had never been a king except in name, was obliged to go to Grodno and there sign a formal but empty and invalid act of abdication. He accepted an annual pension of 200,000 ducats from the three partitioning powers, who further promised to pay his debts. On the death of Catherine, towards whom he had stood in so many different relations, he removed from Grodno to St. Petersburg, where he finished his chequered and dishonoured career in the month of February, 1798, about fifteen months after the demise of the Czarina. ●

The British parliament opened on the 30th of December, but before proceeding to its debates a few interesting circumstances which had occurred since the prorogation must be briefly noticed. In the month of July some important changes in the cabinet took place. The old Whig or Portland party, the ornament and strength of which had been Burke, formed a coalition or junction with the ministry, whom, ever since the alarming progress of the French revolution, they had backed and supported against the new Whigs or Foxites. The Duke of Portland received the order of the garter and the office of third Secretary of State; Earl Fitzwilliam was made President of the Council, and, in December following, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Earl Spencer became Lord Privy Seal, and, in December, First Lord of the Admiralty (an office which was thought to have been rather incompetently filled by Pitt's elder brother, the Earl of Chatham, who now took the Privy Seal); Mr. Windham, who prided himself on being the political pupil of Burke, became Secretary-at-War, in lieu of Sir George Yonge; Loughborough, who had identified himself with this party, had already been for some time Lord Chancellor.

Notwithstanding the bad success which had in England attended the crown prosecutions, the government resolved to proceed against some other conspicuous members of political societies. On the 6th of October the grand jury of Middlesex returned true bills against Thomas Hardy, John Horne Tooke, John Augustus Bonney, Stewart Kyd, Jeremiah Joyce, Thomas Wardle, Thomas Holcroft, John Richter, Matthew Moore, John Thelwall, Richard Hodgson, and John Baxter, for high treason. Hardy, who had been secretary and a very active functionary to the Corresponding Society, was the first put upon his trial, which took place before Lord Chief Justice Eyre (a judge, even for his time, much given to hanging), Lord Chief Baron Macdonald, Mr. Baron Hotham, Mr. Justice Buller, Mr. Justice Grose, and others of his Majesty's justices, &c., under a special commission, at the Old Bailey. He was charged with nine overt acts of high treason. The charge was opened by the Attorney General (Sir John Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon) in a speech of nine hours, in which all the particulars mentioned in the reports of the secret committee of the club or society were dwelt upon, and the papers of the society to which the prisoner was secretary (or all of those papers that could be found) were produced in evidence against him. Several of these papers were such as no cool and rational Englishman ought to have set his name to; some of them contained principles and doctrines which, if adopted and carried out by any large portion of the nation, must have led to a revolution which would only have been dissimilar to that of France from the national and natural antipathy of the people to any long continuation of cruelty and bloodshed; and there were in some of these papers eulogiums on the Declaration of the Rights of Man and on the conduct of the French revolutionists, calculated to irritate and alarm all lovers of the British constitution and friends of humanity. It was proved that there was a very close connexion between the Corresponding Society and the men (now convicted and transported) who had got up the Convention at Edinburgh, and that Margarot, the worst of that set, was the friend of and had been most intimately linked with Hardy. But, though some of the witnesses spoke of dangerous, concealed intentions, not one of them deserving of any credit criminated Hardy personally; the proceedings of the society were of public notoriety, most of the papers the crown lawyers produced had been published by Hardy or a committee in the newspapers, and it was made to appear that, however imprudent or illegal might have been some of the means they had proposed, but not acted upon, of obtaining their end, their sole object was a sweeping parliamentary reform. This reform would have thrown the constitution under the feet of the democracy; but the thing had not happened, nor was it likely to happen: the demagogic strength was contemptible, and a humane jury shrunk from the horrible penalty attendant on a conviction for high treason. The trial lasted eight days, ending, on the 5th of November, in a verdict of acquittal.*

The trial of Horne Tooke, which next followed, and which commenced on the 17th of November, occupied six days, and was made remarkable by the perfect self-possession, the wit, the acuteness, and the dialectics of the accused, and by the persons he summoned as witnesses—persons who had once been in reality, or pretence, or to serve a present purpose, hot parliamentary reformers; and in this category were the Duke of Richmond, master-general of the ordnance, and Pitt himself, the prime minister, who was obliged to answer from the witness-box the searching questions which the prisoner put to him from the bar concerning the not very remote days when they had met as brother reformers under the roof of the Thatched House Tavern. Tooke also adopted an ingenious course of argument, which was very proper and potent to exonerate himself, but not so well calculated to justify the political societies. He had, he said, belonged to these reforming societies for a certain time and had gone along with them to a certain legal length, but no farther: if he took a place by a Windsor coach to be put down at Hounslow, was it to be inferred that he had gone the whole way, and must be answerable for what passed in the coach after he had left it? The jury, on the 22nd of November, and at a late hour of the evening, brought in a verdict of Not Guilty.* A loose impression has rather generally obtained that it was the wit and ability of this very remarkable man that took the sting out of the government prosecutions, rendered political high treason trials less perilous than a common process for misdemeanour, and secured the lives and fortunes of all those who had been indicted with him: but long before Horne Tooke was brought to the bar of the Old Bailey the trial of Walker, at Lancaster, and other trials and proceedings had proved that English juries would not give verdicts of guilty in any such cases; and the acquittal of Hardy had, in fact, deprived Tooke's trial of nearly all its political importance, and had insured his acquittal, even if he had been as dull and obtuse as he was quick and sharp.

On the 1st of December Bonney, Joyce, Kyd, and Thomas Holcroft, the well-known dramatic writer, and the author of one of the most interesting fragments of autobiography that exist in our language, were put to the bar; but the attorney-general stated that, as the evidence adduced on the two last trials and the evidence which applied to the prisoners was the same, and as, after the best consideration, those persons had been acquitted, he would submit to the jury and the court whether the prisoners should not be acquitted also, and that for this end and purpose he would not trouble them by going into evidence. The Lord Chief Justice told the jury that, as there was no evidence, they must, of course, find the prisoners not guilty; and the jury gave a formal verdict accordingly. The acquitted prisoners all bowed to the court and retired, except Holcroft, the author, who was anxious to speak or read a long defence which he had written in his prison. The Lord Chief Justice told Holcroft that, having been acquitted, he had no right to address one word either to the court or the jury. The author persisted, and apparently in no very gentle manner: he would not, he said, detain the court more than half an hour. Baron Hotham called upon the keeper of Newgate to do his duty and remove the prisoner. Holcroft then begged to be permitted to say one word: the Lord Chief Justice said that, if he would be reasonable, and confine himself within compass, he would not stop him; but that a speech of half an hour was not a thing to be endured. The author said that, as he found the judgment of the court wished him to withdraw, he must take some other means of publishing his sentiments upon the prosecution. The Chief Justice told him he had better take care of that, or he might get into another scrape as soon as he was relieved from this; and then Holcroft withdrew, saying he was very willing to suffer for what he conceived to be right. He soon printed his intended speech, and apparently without getting into any trouble on that account. On the same day that he and the three others were acquitted, Thelwall was brought to the bar, and, it being assumed that there was evidence against him of a nature different from that which had been produced against the rest of the indicted, his trial was allowed to go on. It occupied no less than four days, and also terminated in a verdict of acquittal. Upon this succession of acquittals the government let drop various other prosecutions, and the prisoners were released. All the more liberal part of the nation joined in celebrating the honour and spirit of English juries; and many, who were no friends to the political societies, and no admirers of the objects of the accused parties, united in praise of a free and unbiassed trial by jury. These feelings were, perhaps, made the keener by the result of some other state trials which had taken place before a special commission at Edinburgh. On the 14th of August Robert Watt, late citizen of Edinburgh, and an embarrassed tradesman, was brought to the bar charged with eighteen overt acts of high treason, the most significant of which were that he had agreed to cause and procure the meeting of divers subjects under the name of a Convention, for the purpose of assuming to themselves the powers of government and legislation; that he had instigated and incited persons to send delegates to such convention; that he had conspired with other false traitors to oblige, by force, the king to alter the measures of government, to comply with certain unlawful demands, &c., and consent to the introduction of regulations and measures respecting the government of the kingdom; that he had conspired and agreed to seize the castle of Edinburgh by force of arms, with guns, pikes, spears, battle-axes, &c.; that he had composed, printed, published, and dispersed certain malicious, wicked, and treasonable papers, inciting people to subscribe money for the use of him and his political clubs; that he had hired and employed one John Fairley to distribute such papers, and to incite the king's subjects to give assurance of support, and to remit such money as should be collected, &c.; that he had employed the said John Fairley to instigate the people to take up arms; that he had further employed one William Brown and one Robert Orrock to make and procure arms, having paid them money for the same. It was borne out by the crown witnesses, some of whom had been his associates and brother club-men, and who now betrayed him, as he, at one time, was ready to betray them, that Watt had been a foremost member of the secret committee, and of the committee of ways and means of the society; that he had kept in his house the types (set up) of a very seditious address to the soldiery, and had caused a copy of the address to be given to a sergeant in Lord Hopetoun's Fencibles, with the view of making that regiment mutiny; that he had caused to be made certain pikes (not 50 in all) and had kept 16 of the said pikes concealed in his own house (where they were found); and that he had often discussed a wild plan for getting possession of the Castle of Edinburgh, of all the banking-houses in the city, and of the persons of all the judges, &c. No opportunity was neglected by the crown lawyers to identify the designs and proceedings of Watt with those of Muir, Palmer, and the others who had been transported, and of Thomas Hardy and the others whose trial was yet to come on in England. Some very violent letters, signed by Hardy as secretary to the London Corresponding Society, were read in evidence. The counsel for the prisoner (Mr. Henry Erskine) said he would rest his defence on a correspondence carried on between the Right Honourable Henry Dundas, the lord-advocate of Scotland, and Robert Watt, by which it would appear that the prisoner had been a spy in the employment of government, and had attended the meetings of the Friends of the People with no other view than that of giving information of their proceedings. A letter from the prisoner to Mr. Secretary Dundas was read. It stated that he (Watt) did not approve of the dangerous political principles which then prevailed in Scotland; and that, as a friend to the constitution, he thought it his duty to communicate to him, as a good subject, what information he could procure of the proceedings of those who styled themselves the Friends of the People; that, from his acquaintance with several of the leading men of that society, he flattered himself he had this in his power. The letter mentioned that he knew some of these leading men in Perth, Dundee, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, (three of the Edinburgh men were named,) and concluded with enjoining secrecy. To this letter a speedy answer was returned from London, which was also read in court. Secretary Dundas acknowledged the receipt of Watt's letter; and, after expressing a hope that things were not so bad as he had represented, desired him to go on, assuring him that he might depend upon the strictest secrecy—that he was perfectly safe in any correspondence he might hold with him. Another letter from Secretary Dundas to Mr. Ritchie, the prisoner's agent, was next read, in answer to one from Ritchie requesting Mr. Dundas to return such letters as the prisoner had written to him. The secretary's answer to this was that all the letters he had received from Watt had been delivered to the lord-advocate. It otherwise appeared—and it was afterwards so stated by the prisoner, in his dying confession—that the secretary turned him over to the lord-advocate, recommending him to correspond with that legal functionary; and that he did correspond with the lord-advocate from some time in 1792 till August or September, 1793, when all such intercourse was stopped, and he (Watt), ceasing to be a government spy, became, in reality, what before he had only pretended to be, a hot reformer. The lord-advocate assuming that in dangerous times government must avail themselves of the services of spies, or obtain information by any means that offered themselves, said that he had admitted "at night" and several times conversed with the prisoner at his own house; that the prisoner had at one time given him some information respecting the disaffection of a portion of a regiment which he thought of importance, but which, upon inquiry, he found to be false or ill founded; that in March, 1793, an offer had been made to him by the prisoner to disclose some very important secrets, provided he would give the prisoner 1000*l.*; that he had absolutely refused, but that, some time after, upon the prisoner's representation that he was in great distress to discharge a bill of 30*l.*, which he Watt said he had been obliged to give to two men who had given him information, he had sent him a draft for that sum. All this, the lord-advocate said, had happened previously to the meeting of the Convention at Edinburgh, since which time, or at least since October, 1793, he did not recollect seeing or having had any connexion with Mr. Watt. Mr. Hamilton, the junior counsel for the prisoner, dwelt upon the correspondence between the secretary, the lord-advocate, and his client, endeavouring to show that the prisoner had not deserted the service in which he had engaged, but had not had an opportunity of performing it effectually till the very moment that he was apprehended as a principal plotter and conspirator. Watt, he said, was nothing more nor less than a paid spy of government; and every one knew that a spy was obliged to assume not only the appearance of those whose secrets he meant to betray, but even to take part in their proceedings, in order to prevent suspicion or discovery. Thus a spy in an army was often obliged to wear a uniform of the enemy, and even to appear in arms against his country; and would it not be hard indeed to put such a spy, if taken, to death for having had recourse to the means necessary for the discharge of the duty or service he had undertaken? All the proceedings of the trial occupied five days, but, in the end, the jury brought in their verdict—Guilty. On the 5th of September Samuel Downie, a silversmith of Edinburgh, who had been closely connected with Watt, was put upon his trial, charged with high treason, and with eighteen overt acts, the same as those with which Watt had been charged. The evidence was also nearly the same, but the character of the man was different; and the jury, in giving their verdict against him (on the 6th of September), unanimously recommended him to mercy. The Lord President, who sat at the head of the special commission, pronounced sentence of death upon both prisoners, to be executed by hanging, boweling, beheading, and quartering. Downie was respited, and, in the end, received the king's free pardon; but Watt was drawn on a hurdle, painted black, to the west end of the Luckenbooths, and hanged until he was dead, on the 15th of October. That part of the sentence which related to boweling and quartering had been previously remitted; but, when the body was taken down from the gallows, it was stretched upon a table, and the executioner, with two blows of the axe, cut off the head, which was received in a basket, and then held up to the multitude, while the executioner called aloud, "This is the head of a traitor, and so perish all traitors!" Watt died, as he had lived, a shuffling, selfish, canting, cowardly scoundrel. In the confession which he wrote on the evening before his execution, when all hope of a reprieve had abandoned him, he declared that, after the cessation of his correspondence with the lord advocate, his "mind changed in favour of reform;" that, "being naturally ambitious and enterprising," he advised the formation of the committee of ways and means, and the secret committee, approved of and got printed the 'Address to the Fencibles,' and other seditious papers; that he had sent John Fairley and others "through the country to sound the public mind and to give instructions;" that he had conceived matters to be ripe for a rising, or "that there remained almost nothing to do, for the execution of the whole, but a visit to England and Ireland by intelligent and confidential persons;" that he had planned how to seize Edinburgh Castle, the post-office, other public offices, the banks, the judges, the city magistrates, the commander-in-chief, &c., together with "the property of such persons as were deemed inimical to liberty;" that his views in all this were the good of society, and not robbery and murder, although he would not say but his own interest was blended in these views ("for who is he, that if he serves society, but will naturally expect a reward?") that he had hoped, by means of a successful revolution of the three kingdoms, to be able to pay his creditors; and, finally, that he sorely repented him of all that he had done and planned, being now convinced that it was the duty of all sincere Christians to give honour to whom honour is due, and fear to whom fear, "and to leave the reformation of abuses in the state to those who mind only earthly things." But the guilty intentions of this poor wretch will hardly cover the conduct of the lord advocate and the government in his regard; and (particularly after having been employed as their spy) the imbecility of his plans, the nullity of his means of execution, and the small number and mean condition of his proven accomplices, ought assuredly to have saved him from capital punishment. These accomplices were a poor schoolmaster or usher, a half-starved weaver, a cabinet-maker, and three others equally unwarlike, and apparently just as poor.

On the assembling of Parliament (on the last day but one of the year), the speech from the throne, delivered by the king in person, insisted on the necessity of a vigorous prosecution of the war, and represented the resources of the French republic as in a state of rapid decline. It openly avowed, what there was no possibility of concealing, that the disappointments and reverses which we had experienced in the course of the year's campaign were great; but it maintained that there was no ground for despair, that France was exhausted by the unexampled efforts she had made, and that everything which had passed in the interior of that country had shown the progressive decay of its resources and the instability of every part of that violent and unnatural system. The desperate condition of Holland and the United Provinces, which the Duke of York had vainly endeavoured to defend against the overwhelming force of Pichegru, was frankly admitted; and his majesty informed the Houses that the States General had been led, by a sense of present difficulties, to enter into negotiations for peace with the party now prevailing in that unhappy country, France: but he added that no established government or independent state could, under the present circumstances, derive real security from negotiations; and that, on our part, negotiations could not be attempted without sacrificing both our honour and safety to an enemy whose chief animosity was avowedly directed against these kingdoms. He mentioned the local importance of Corsica, the spirited efforts of its inhabitants to deliver themselves from the yoke of the French, and his acceptance of the crown and sovereignty of that island. Through the wisdom and moderation of General Washington and his party, who had experienced some difficulty in resisting the negotiations of French republicans, and the animosities of a great part of the American people, who fancied that this might be a favourable opportunity for venting their spite and aiding in ruining the country which gave them their origin, their language, their laws, and all that was good and tried in their institutions, the king was enabled to announce the happy conclusion of a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation with the United States of America; in which it had been his object to remove, as far as possible, all grounds of jealousy and misunderstanding, and to improve an intercourse beneficial to both countries. His majesty also announced the conclusion of a treaty for the marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Caroline of Brunswick, trusting that parliament would enable him to make provision for such an establishment as they might think suitable to the rank and dignity of the heir apparent. In both Houses the debates on the address were exceedingly warm; but although the unfavourable prospects of the war, and the downfall of Robespierre and of all the Jacobin party, induced some members, who had hitherto supported the war, to object to a resolution which seemed to imply an indefinite continuance of hostilities, the ministerial majorities were not materially diminished. An amendment in the Upper House, proposed by the Earl of Guildford, was rejected by 107 against 12; and, in the Commons, the strength of ministers proved, on the division, to be 246 to 73. Mr. Canning, who was fast rising into reputation, particularly distinguished himself in these debates. He urged that our failures on the Continent had been occasioned by the misconduct and desertion of our allies; that the fall of Robespierre and the subsequent changes in the French government—changes which left untamed the rage for conquest—did not warrant this country to attempt a treaty of peace; that a pacification with that republic at present would bring so little security, that no diminution of our fleets and armies could possibly ensue, and our expenses must remain as great as though we were actually at war. Mr. Windham also attributed the ill success of the war on the Continent to the misconduct of some of our allies. But the most alarming circumstance attending this war of principles was, he said, the fact that we were not true to ourselves. The political societies in England had, in his apprehension, done great mischief by propagating republican or revolutionary principles. He represented in a most odious light the acquittal of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and the other members of those societies, describing them as no better than acquitted felons. When called to order for these strong expressions, he explained himself by saying that, though proofs had not been furnished of their legal guilt, it did not follow that they were free from moral guilt.

A.D. 1795. On the 5th of January Sheridan, who had introduced that subject in the debates on the address, rose to move for leave to bring in a bill for the repeal of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. In his speech he said that the preamble to that suspension act affirmed that a dangerous and treasonable conspiracy existed in this country; but that the recent verdicts at the Old Bailey had shown this conspiracy to be a mere fabrication of ministers, who had exercised an unlawful influence over the grand jury that found the indictments. He taxed Windham with a scandalous misapplication of language: the parties accused of high treason had, he said, undergone the strictest trial; no pains had been spared to criminate them; 8000*l.* had been paid to the crown lawyers, and no less than two hundred witnesses had been procured at a vast expense against one of the prisoners alone. He laughed at and was very jocose on the epithet of "formidable" which had been applied by ministers to the alleged club conspiracy, the strength and preparation of which consisted of an arsenal furnished with one pike and nine rusty muskets, and an exchequer containing nine pounds and one bad shilling. In the preceding debate he had declared that the members of the House were not free so long as the suspension of the Habeas Corpus lasted; and he now insisted that to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act was in fact to suspend the whole British constitution, and that nothing less than imminent, as well as evident and proved danger, could warrant any such suspension. With more truth or less exaggeration than usually entered into opposition harangues, he declared that ministers were now acting on the most questionable of all information, that of spies; a species of agents more numerous, more employed, and more relied upon than at any preceding period. Windham, in replying with great warmth to Sheridan, imputed the verdicts of acquittal pronounced by the juries to ignorance and incapacity to discern the true state and bearings of the cases before them; and reasserted that, whatever the overt acts might have been, the real object of the political societies was to overturn the constitution. In addition to the high consideration and influence which Windham enjoyed in virtue of his own personal character and shining abilities, he was now, since the retirement of Burke from parliament, considered, on these vital points at least, as the mouth-piece of that great statesman, the weight of Burke being thus superadded to his own. Mr. Erskine, who had been counsel for Walker of Manchester, for Hardy, Horne Tooke, and every one of the prisoners brought to the bar of the Old Bailey, contended, in a long and elaborate speech, that the late trials had explicitly disproved the existence of a conspiracy; that the verdicts of juries were not to be questioned; and that, as the existence of a conspiracy was the basis on which the suspension of the Habeas Corpus rested, there could now be no pretence for its continuance. On the other side, Mr. Sergeant Adair urged that, if the determination of a jury were never, or in no case, to be called in question, the liberty of the subject would stand upon very feeble ground; that parliament was clearly entitled to investigate the conduct of juries, for otherwise there would be no redress against the corruption of juries or of judges, or against ministerial oppression. With these maxims Adair justified the discussions on the late political trials, the issue of which, though in favour of the accused, had not, as he thought, established their innocence in any determinate manner. The suspicions entertained against them had not been cleared up to their advantage: in one particular case the jury had hesitated two hours. He thought the transactions of the societies sufficiently proved unconstitutional and even treasonable intentions; and he held that, as the same circumstances on which the suspension act was grounded in 1794 still existed, no valid motive could be alleged for its repeal. Fox made an eloquent speech on the other side, urging that, as Hardy, whose trial had decided the others, had been privy to all the transactions of the societies and of the several parties accused, he must unavoidably have been condemned if any conspiracy had existed; but, the debate being closed by a speech from Pitt, Sheridan was outvoted by 185 against 41. On the 15th the attorney-general moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill for continuing the suspension; and the second reading of this bill was carried on the 23rd, after another long debate, by a majority of 239 against 53. In the House of Lords, where much the same arguments were used for and against the suspension, the bill was passed without a division; but the Dukes of Norfolk and Bedford, the Marquess of Lansdowne, and the Earls of Lauderdale and Guildford, entered a spirited protest.

On the 7th of January ministers called for an augmentation in the number of seamen and marines, stating that the service of the year, to be properly conducted, would require 85,000 sailors and 15,000 marines. In order to raise the deficient number expeditiously, and without the harshness and violence of impressing, Pitt proposed that a certain number of men should be furnished by each merchant ship on clearing out, in proportion to its tonnage; and that every parish in the kingdom should be made to contribute one man; and, after a few alterations, this plan was adopted. Some severe strictures were passed by opposition on the manner in which both the army and navy had been managed; and the remarks made were certainly justified by the errors which government had committed, and was still committing, in regard to both branches of the service, and more particularly in regard to the land forces. But the opposition overshot their mark and disgusted the great body of the nation by exulting in the failures which had attended our arms, and by representing that it was absurd for England to think of contending with France; and Pitt called English sympathies round him by reminding the House that we were not only masters of the seas, but had obtained, on the 1st of June, 1794, one of the most signal naval victories that ever graced our annals; that the commerce and credit of Great Britain were never in a more splendid condition; that in the worst days of our adversities no disgrace had sullied our military character; that we had been unsuccessful on the continent of Europe, but that true courage was not to be dismayed by temporary failures or disappointments, at a time when we were contending for all that was dear to our hearts and that made life of any value.

By this time it was visible that, besides the United Provinces, both Prussia and Spain were on the point of breaking with the coalition, and concluding separate treaties with the French republic. Austria too, our only steady ally, was in want of money, and thought herself entitled to call upon Great Britain for a supply. She did not, however, demand a subsidy, as the king of Prussia had done, but only a loan; and, whatever mistakes her generals had committed in the field, she had, unlike Prussia, made great and costly exertions in the common cause. On the 4th of February Pitt delivered a message from the king, stating the earnest intention of the emperor Francis to make still more vigorous exertions in the next campaign, but intimating, at the same time, the urgent necessity of a loan of four millions sterling, on the credit of the revenues arising from his imperial majesty's hereditary dominions. It was impossible for the opposition not to take notice of and denounce the foul misapplication of the subsidy granted to the king of Prussia: that money, as we have stated, had been chiefly employed, not on the Rhine or the Moselle, but on the Vistula,—not against the common enemy the French, but against the hapless and almost helpless Poles. Sheridan, Fox, and others dwelt upon this iniquitous transaction, and argued that the emperor was not more trustworthy than his Prussian majesty. Pitt and his supporters were forced to admit that the conduct of Prussia had been highly censurable; but they insisted that there was a wide difference in the case and conduct of Austria, whose own vital interests were dependent on the issue of the present war. The motion for complying with the emperor's demands was carried by the usual great majority.

On the 23rd of February the minister, in opening the budget, made a statement of the entire force required for the service of the year: it amounted to 100,000 seamen in all, 120,000 regulars for guards and garrisons, 56,000 militia, 40,000 regulars for Ireland and for the West Indies and other colonies, besides fencibles and volunteers, foreign troops in British pay, and embodied French emigrants. The supplies demanded for these immense forces were 16,027,000*l.* To this sum was to be added 200,000*l.* annual subsidy to the king of Sardinia, whose strength and resources were nearly exhausted, and who would have required a subsidy of 2,000,000*l.* to enable him to reconstruct and increase his army and fortresses. There were also sundry deficiencies in taxes, &c. to be made up at home, so that the sum total required by the chancellor of the exchequer, including the interest on the debt, somewhat exceeded 27,500,000*l.* In order to make up this amount some new duties were imposed upon tea, coffee, raisins, foreign grocery and fruits, foreign timber, insurances, writs and affidavits, hair-powder licences, &c., and, to increase the receipts of the post-office, the privilege of franking letters was somewhat abridged. To the outcry raised against these additional burthens Pitt replied by triumphantly reciting the extraordinary increase of the national commerce, which in 1794 had exceeded what it had ever been even in the most flourishing year of peace. The opposition clouded this bright prospect by alluding to the very severe winter which had been experienced throughout Europe, and to the apprehensions entertained everywhere for the next harvest. Ministers insisted that the strictest investigation had left no reason for any such fears, but had proved, on the contrary, that a most abundant harvest was to be expected, as well in our own as in other countries. The ways and means were voted as the chancellor of the exchequer desired, but some of his adherents, whose love of pomp was greater than their patriotism, seriously objected to the new powder-tax, on account of the heavy expense they must incur to be entitled to powder the heads of their coachmen, grooms, and footmen.

In both Houses the opposition made repeated efforts to drive the government into negotiations with the French republic, which they represented as much improved from what it had been during the reign of terror, which was true; and as well disposed to renounce conquest and propagandism, which was false. Earl Stanhope, whose violent, inflammatory, and half-mad speeches had served as texts to the intemperate reformers and reforming societies, and more particularly to the weavers and other political mechanics beyond the Tweed, who could think it no sin to repeat what a peer of the realm had uttered in parliament, had, as early as the 6th of January, moved a resolution in the Upper House to the effect that Great Britain neither ought nor would interfere in the internal affairs of France, but would enter into a pacific negotiation with that country. On the 26th of February Mr. Grey made a motion of the same tendency in the Commons; and on the 27th of the same month the duke of Bedford, in the Lords, moved for facilitating the opening of a negotiation with France: but all these motions, together with sundry others having the same object, were negated by immense majorities, and a resolution for the vigorous prosecution of the war was carried almost by acclamation. Ministers and their friends admitted that the republican nature of the French government was not to be considered as an insurmountable bar to negotiation: it was not, they said, because the French had made themselves republicans that we were at war with them, but because they wanted to make, by force of arms, propagandism, intrigue, and internal sedition and dissension, republicans of all the nations of Europe, in order that they might reign over them as their protectors—because they were effacing the old landmarks of Europe, and aiming at, and for the present achieving, conquests on all sides,—that we must lavish our treasures and our blood, or consent to see the ruin of all our allies, the total destruction of the balance of power, and the establishment of one immense, insolent, and constantly aggressive power. The Earl of Mansfield affirmed the right of a nation to interfere in the government of another that acted on principles dangerous to its neighbours; and, as the French had indisputably adopted and were still acting upon such principles, he thought that those against whom the principles were levelled might justly demand the renunciation of them as the preliminary to any peace or accommodation. On the same side Lord Auckland said, that it would be bad policy to betray despondency and a fear of France, although the opposition had chosen to represent that country as invincible; that prudence dictated perseverance in the contest until we could conclude it honourably; that, were it once made evident that France had renounced her dangerous principles and ambitious designs, the British government would not object to a fair and just negotiation with her; that he did not mean, however, that the restoration of monarchy in France should be insisted on at all hazards, but only that while hostilities lasted we should employ our strength in restoring monarchy there, as that species of government which would best answer the purposes of general peace and security to all the powers in the coalition. Lord Grenville urged that there was still no government in France deserving of the name, that everything in that country was in a state of transition and change, that there was no power or party or body of men with whom we could safely or creditably negotiate; and he very justly observed, that, though the guillotine had become less active at Paris, the Reign of Terror and tyranny was far from being over.

On the 24th of March Fox moved that a committee of the whole House should take into consideration the state of the nation, which he represented as degraded and dangerous in the extreme. Pitt allowed that some of the subjects proposed for inquiry were of the highest importance; but he held that this was not a proper season for discussing them. Mr. Canning argued that the actual turbulent situation of Ireland was a sufficient excuse for declining all such discussions at present. Fox was outvoted by 219 against 63. A similar motion, made six days after in the Lords by the Earl of Guildford, was negated by a majority of 90.*

Great attention was bestowed upon the armed forces and the means of bettering their food, general condition, and discipline. In the month of April ministers, without the authority of parliament, made an extra allowance of bread and meat for the army. The opposition very properly objected to this proceeding, as tending to impress the soldiery with the false idea that the bounty proceeded from the generosity of the crown, and not from the pockets of the people, and as being an insult offered to the legislature which was sitting at the time. General Macleod moved that a committee should be appointed to take the matter into consideration, and that the House should resolve that it was unconstitutional to augment the pay or allowances of the army, without previously consulting, or afterwards submitting the measure to parliament. Fox said that it was clear that, while parliament was sitting, no additional pay could be granted to the army without the consent of both Houses; that no objection lay to the grant itself, but a great one to the slight put upon the legislature by not applying for its assent. Pitt endeavoured to exculpate the ministry by representing the relief as temporary, and as arising out of the circumstances of the moment, such as the increased price of provisions, &c., and by representing that any augmentation of pay voted by parliament would have become permanent. This reasoning, however, did not give much satisfaction; some of his out-and-out adherents seemed ready to join the opposition on this point, and Macleod's motion was only got rid of by the previous question, which was carried by 67 against 23. Windham, who, as secretary-at-war, had signed the obnoxious and irregular order, was more successful in sundry measures he introduced in the House for maintaining discipline and increasing the strength of the militia regiments, for improving their staffs, for allowing them the use of artillery, &c.

Mr. Canning had strong grounds for his assertion as to the alarming state of affairs and opinions in Ireland: that country was every day approaching nearer to the verge of open rebellion; but we reserve the narrative of events for the moment when the mask was thrown off and the sword drawn, in order to compress in one clear view the circumstances which preceded, accompanied, and followed that unhappy outbreak.

The marriage of the Duke of York with the Prussian princess had not been, and did not seem likely to be, productive of issue. Prince Augustus Duke of Sussex had contracted a marriage with a subject, in defiance of the Royal Marriage Act, and the well-known resoluteness of his father to enforce the rigours of that enactment. Whatever doubt may cling to the celebration of a marriage between the Prince of Wales and Mrs. Fitzherbert, none can attach to the marriage—the double marriage ceremony—of the Duke of Sussex. While travelling in Italy in 1792 that prince became acquainted at Rome with the family of Lord Dunmore, a Scotch nobleman: he became enamoured of Lady Augusta Murray, one of his lordship's daughters, and with or without the consent of her family, who could not be ignorant of the Royal Marriage Act, which struck all such unions with the stamp of illegality, and who ought to have been warned by the questionable position of the fair Fitzherbert, a private marriage took place at Rome.* After staying some months at Rome the prince returned to London with his bride, who was now enceinte. At the instances of the lady and her friends, Prince Augustus agreed to the celebration of a second and a public marriage, to be attended with all the forms of an ordinary English marriage. To complete the residence of one month in the parish of St. George, Hanover-square, in order that banns might be published in that parish church, they took lodgings in South Molton-street in the house of a coal-merchant. In due time the parties were regularly asked in church, and, on the 5th of December, 1793, they were again united, according to the full ceremonies of the Church of England, in St. George's, Hanover-square, under the names of Augustus Frederick and Augusta Murray.† The king lost no time in instituting a suit of nullity, in his own name, in the Arches Court of Canterbury, to set aside the validity of the marriage on the ground of the Royal Marriage Act. On the 8th of January, 1794, Mr. Heseltine, the king's proctor, served a citation on Lady Murray to answer the charges of the suit. On the 13th of the same month Lady Augusta was brought to bed of a son. The privy council occupied itself for two days in investigating all the circumstances attending the marriage, and in examining Lady Dunmore, Lady E. Murray, the coal-merchant and his wife, a gentleman who resided at Twickenham, and the clergyman who performed the marriage ceremony at St. George's. The Royal Marriage Act was clear and positive; the marriage, by that act, was no marriage at all; and the Ecclesiastical Court, with very little deliberation, pronounced both the ceremony at Rome and the ceremony at London to be null and void. Though separated in law, the couple did not separate in fact: they lived together conjugally at least till the birth of another child—a daughter—and the perpetual separation which then took place is said to have depended upon causes and circumstances very different from the will of the king of England, the law of parliament, or the canons of the Arches Court. We will not attempt to institute comparisons or make distinctions between the conduct, in these delicate matters, of the eldest and the fifth son of George III., although, in the spirit of party, that invidious task has been undertaken by many, and things have been extenuated or set down in malice to the one or the other prince, according to party predilections. We would fain pass over all these facts in total silence; but they were attended by not unimportant consequences; and perhaps something is attained by relating them simply as they occurred, without comment or bias. Notwithstanding her equivocal situation, and the declaration of Mr. Fox in the House of Commons that in her case there had never been any marriage or nuptial ceremony of any kind, Mrs. Fitzherbert continued to live with the Prince of Wales, and no inconsiderable portion of the high society of England, reproaching the severity of the Royal Marriage Act, visited her and treated her as the lawful wife of the heir to the throne; but a change and disavowance of that connexion also was about to take place at the time when the Ecclesiastical Court nullified the marriage of the Duke of Sussex. The fair widow of two husbands had a friend, a bosom friend, a grandmother, not merely without a grey hair,* but with the full possession of that kind of beauty which was most to the taste of his royal highness of Wales. This was Lady Jersey, the daughter of an Irish clergyman, who had been celebrated and toasted a quarter of a century ago as "the beautiful Miss Twysden."† The voice of common fame had for some time proclaimed that the Jersey had supplanted the Fitzherbert, when, in the summer of 1794, a noticeable separation took place: the Fitzherbert went to Margate, the Jersey to Brighton; her noble lord and husband was appointed master of the horse to the Prince of Wales. When the Fitzherbert returned to town she gave up her house in Pall-mall; her ci-devant friend shone foremost in all the festivities at Carlton House, as she had recently done in those at the Pavilion at Brighton: from that time forward the prince and the fair Catholic never met again. Upon this separation the king and queen renewed their instances to induce the heir to the throne to marry a foreign and protestant princess; and the prince, again encumbered—and encumbered more than ever—with debt, at last consented, upon the express condition, it is said, of obtaining the payment of his debts, and a more liberal allowance of money for the future. As his royal highness had never been abroad, and had seen none of the ladies among whom his choice could be made (the whole number of them, what with political considerations and what with religion, was exceedingly limited), he appears to have left the choice of a bride to his father and mother. The queen, it is said, strongly recommended her own niece, the Princess Louisa Augusta Amelia of Mecklenburg (afterwards the fair, graceful, high-minded, but most unfortunate Queen of Prussia); but the king preferred his own niece, his sister's daughter, the Princess Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, second daughter of the reigning Duke of Brunswick Wolfenbüttel, who had so unfortunately led the Prussians against the French republicans in 1792; and the choice was determined in favour of this lady. Even in the list of royal matrimonial alliances it would be difficult to find (at least in modern days) one more unhappy than this, or one that more clearly promised from the beginning to be unhappy. If on the one side the prince, with his ties, connexions, pursuits, and habits of life, was a reluctant bridegroom, the princess was scarcely a more willing bride; and, if a report universally prevalent on the Continent, as in England, is entitled to credit, she had been warmly attached to a young German prince serving on her father's staff, and had for him rejected the proffered hand of the Crown Prince of Prussia, who, in 1797, became King Frederick William III., and espoused the Princess of Mecklenburg, whom Queen Charlotte of England had wished to select for her son the Prince of Wales. Whatever influences, paternal or extra-paternal (her father was subsidized by England at the time), may have been used to obtain her consent, or whether any such influences were necessary, the negotiation was soon settled by Lord Malmesbury, who went over to Germany for that purpose towards the end of the year 1794. After a circuitous route by land, made necessary by the war on the Continent, and after a rough voyage by sea, not wholly without the risk of the British squadron that escorted her from the mouth of the Elbe being attacked by the French, the princess reached the British coast, where the squadron, enveloped in a dense fog, was obliged to lay-to for nearly forty-eight hours. At last the ships glided safely into the estuary of the Thames, and Caroline of Brunswick, embarking in a royal yacht, landed at Greenwich on Sunday the 5th of April, 1795. On the evening of the 8th the marriage ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury at St. James's. On the 27th of April the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a message from the king, recommending the settling of some suitable provision upon the Prince and Princess of Wales. His majesty at the same time expressed the deepest regret at the necessity of providing the means of freeing the Prince of Wales from encumbrances to a large amount; but said he entertained no idea of proposing to relieve him otherwise than by the application of part of the increased income which might be settled on his royal highness. It is said that the prince, in consenting to the marriage, had understood that his debts were to be discharged by a parliamentary grant, or a succession of grants, so as to leave his increased revenue entirely free; and that the course now proposed annoyed and irritated him beyond measure, making more and more unpalatable the union which he had contracted, and his dissatisfaction with which he took little care to conceal. Pitt simply moved the taking into immediate consideration his majesty's message; but Colonel Stanley observed, that, parliament having already paid the debts of the prince, it was proper that a call of the House should precede any further grant of this nature; and that the king's message, for the last payment of the Prince of Wales's debts in 1787, ought to be read. The minister opposed all this as unnecessary; the king's present intention not being to require a grant to discharge at once the whole of the debt, but only to enable the prince to pay it off gradually out of his increased allowance. Pitt also spoke of the propriety of making an adequate provision for the splendour that ought to attend the heir-apparent of the British crown, remarking that the allowance which would now be asked for was smaller than that which had been settled on the prince's grandfather, Frederick Prince of Wales, while the value of money was far less now than then. The moment was not very favourable for prodigality: the expenses of the war were enormous, and constantly increasing; millions were wanted for subsidies, and services avowed or secret; new taxes, not very onerous in their several amounts, but considerable in the aggregate, perplexing in their number and variety, and vexatious in their collection, had been imposed; provisions were exceedingly dear; and, notwithstanding the prosperity of some branches of trade, many classes of the people were suffering severe privations. Many members of the House were dissatisfied and alarmed, and some of them expressed their feelings strongly. Mr. Sumner thought that, before the Commons proceeded to vote the prince any more money, they ought to be informed how the preceding grant for the payment of his debts had been applied. Mr. Curwen warned the House that one of the leading causes of the French revolution had been the unthinking prodigality of the princes of the royal family; and Mr. Martin exclaimed, that the only sure way of maintaining monarchy, in times like the present, was to prevent it from becoming oppressive to the nation. It is said that the prince was exceedingly hurt by these and other discussions which took place in both Houses, and that he complained that the king and the minister had broken faith with him; but, while it is very doubtful whether he had not deceived himself as to the assurances and intentions of his father, it appears to be proved that Pitt had never pledged himself to ask, at so critical a moment, a separate grant for the liquidation of the debts. The amount of these debts the chancellor of the exchequer stated to be not less than 630,000*l.* He proposed that 65,000*l.* should be added to his highness's income, which would thus be about 140,000*l.* a year; that 25,000*l.* per annum should be deducted for payment of the debts, which might thus be all paid off in the course of twenty-seven years; and that, in order to prevent the incurring of further debts, no future arrears should be suffered to go beyond the quarter, no claims should be admitted after its expiration, and all suits for recovery of debts due by the prince should lie against his household officers only. Even the Foxite opposition were divided on these delicate matters; for, although the Prince of Wales had transferred his political confidence from Mr. Fox to the Duke of Portland, some of them certainly hoped to see him wear the blue and buff once more, and calculated that his present irritation against Pitt would lead to that happy party result.

Mr. Lambton boldly and broadly insisted that parliament ought both to pay the 630,000*l.* and increase the prince's revenue to 150,000*l.* clear. Fox, precluding that the allowances to heirs apparent had always been influenced by party motives, or had ever been sheer party matters, said he would vote for the additional 65,000*l.* a year, as moved by the minister—provided only that requisite precautions were taken to obviate the necessity of future applications for money. He added, however, that he thought that a contribution from his majesty's civil list ought to have come in aid of the prince, and have obviated the necessity of any painful discussion; that he must object to the smallness of the sum set apart for the annual payment of the prince's creditors; and he proposed that not less than 65,000*l.* a-year, together with the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall, should be set aside for the liquidation of the debts. Mr. Grey, on the contrary, said that, though the prince was entitled to a proper establishment, there would be more dignity in declining than in requiring an expensive one; that times of public distress ought to check the spirit of prodigality; that other means ought to be resorted to than the money of the people; that a refusal to liberate the prince from his embarrassments would doubtless prove a mortification, but it would, at the same time, awaken a just sense of his imprudence, and in the mean time his creditors, no longer presuming on the facility of parliament, and deprived of expectations from the public purse, would readily agree to a composition of their claims. Mr. Grey concluded by moving, that, in lieu of 65,000*l.* proposed by the minister, the addition to the prince's revenue should be only 40,000*l.*; but this motion, being put to the vote, was negatived by 260 against 90—a minority, however, larger than usual. Sheridan, who was not present at this debate, delivered a startling speech at a subsequent stage of the proceedings. He declared that, from political differences, his intimacy with the prince had ceased, but that at the same time he must defend his royal highness from injurious imputations, and give it as his "positive opinion that the debts ought to be paid immediately, for the dignity of the country and the reputation of the prince, who ought not to be seen rolling about the streets, in his state-coach, as an insolvent prodigal." He even declared that the prince had not really been a party to the promise and pledge given to parliament, in 1787, that he would contract no more debts. He said that, "on the subject of expense, and of keeping solemn pledges to the public, the prince would not suffer by comparison with the king." For these words Pitt called him to order; but Sheridan proceeded to say that the king, in the early part of his reign, had given a solemn assurance that the civil list should not be exceeded; and yet, since that promise, the debts of the civil list had been paid to an amount which would, at compound interest, make nearly 7,000,000*l.* He concluded with proposing that the king and queen should contribute, the one

10,000*l.*, the other 5000*l.* a year; and that the further deficiency should be made good out of sinecure offices, &c. In the House of Peers the Duke of Clarence delivered a very hot speech against ministers, accusing them of having eagerly endeavoured to deprive his brother of the popularity to which he was justly entitled, and of having singled him out as an exception to the unbounded liberality with which they supplied the foreign princes who applied to them for pecuniary assistance.* In the end, and after two months' agitation of the question, it was settled, by a bill which received the royal assent on the 27th of June, that the Prince of Wales should have an annual revenue of 125,000*l.*, together with the rents of the duchy of Cornwall, which were valued at 13,000*l.* more; that 73,000*l.* should annually be set aside, out of these sums, for the payment of his creditors, under the direction of commissioners appointed for that purpose by parliament; and that, in order to prevent the accumulation of future debts, the regulations suggested by the minister should be adopted, and strictly enforced. All this had been carried by great majorities in both Houses, but there were few who really thought that this settlement would be a final one.

* The Duke of Clarence was not alone in this debate. The Duke of Bedford expressed himself in much the same manner, saying that a variety of circumstances would occur to candid minds in extenuation of the errors of the prince, which were of a juvenile description, and which by no means called for any asperity of censure. But it was the Scotch Foxite Peer, the ultra-liberal or quasi-republican Earl of Lauderdale, that went to the greatest lengths for his Highness of Wales. Debts, he said, of a much larger amount, had been discharged by parliament in preceding reigns, without exposing and stigmatising the princes who had contracted them; and did it become so great and opulent a people to be severe and parsimonious towards a young prince (his Royal Highness was in his thirty-third year, or within three years of being as old as the Chancellor of the Exchequer), from whose virtues, abilities, and accomplishments they might justly expect so much contentment?

On the same day (the 27th of June) the session was closed by the king in person, who expressed his hope "that the present circumstances of France might, in their effects, hasten the return of such a state of order and regular government as might be capable of maintaining the accustomed relations of peace and amity with other powers;" but he also said that our main reliance must be on our naval and military forces.

Long before this the wretched remnant of the fine but small and ill-commanded army we had sent to the Netherlands and the northern frontiers of France was collected in barracks at home, or drafted off to other quarters of the world. The Dutch democratic party—who had done their utmost to facilitate the progress of the French, and discourage, thwart, and disorganise the forces which their stadtholder, the Prince of Orange, had collected after the fall of Nimeguen, and the retreat of the Duke of York behind the Waal—openly declared themselves everywhere for friendship and alliance with the Gallican republic, and for the entire abandonment of the old connexion with Great Britain and the forced connexion with Prussia.

COSTUME OF BRITISH INFANTRY IN 1795.

Early in December, 1794, the Duke of York returned to London, leaving the command of the British and Hanoverian troops to Count Walmoden, a Hanoverian nobleman, said to be closely, though illegitimately, connected in blood with the royal family of England. Walmoden, and the general officers under him, seem to have been fully possessed of the old notion that war was not to be waged in winter, and to have slept over the fact that, in the north of Holland, the frost was often severe enough to convert the canals, and all the smaller rivers, into solid high-roads, capable of bearing any weight that men could put upon them. The troops were in cantonments here and there, when, in the middle of December, after one or two nights of very hard frost, the French crossed the Waal on the ice, drove in the few videttes that were on the alert, and carried all the posts in the Isle of Bommel. But on the 30th of December, General Dundas, who was serving under Walmoden, advanced rapidly from Arnheim with only 8000 men, almost entirely British infantry, and drove the French, in spite of their vast superiority of number, and the batteries they had thrown up or taken possession of, back beyond the Waal, with a considerable loss in men, and the loss of several pieces of cannon. This affair was in the highest degree honourable to the staunch infantry of England; but it could be of little service to the common cause, for Pichegru soon collected a force of 200,000 men, the people of the country continued to favour the French, and the English army, with a miserable, and in part fraudulent, commissariat, with an equally bad medical staff, was totally unprovided with most of the requisites indispensable in their hard and trying circumstances: the sick and wounded had neither medicines nor able surgeons to attend them; and often wanted food, covering, and proper places of shelter to receive them. The indignation of the army was the greater as it was perfectly well known that the government had provided, with a lavish hand, for all their wants, as far as money, orders, and injunctions could provide for them, and that a variety of those comforts needed by the soldiery in a cold, inhospitable country had been furnished by private patriotic subscriptions raised throughout England. The standing orders of the army, and the orders of the day issued by the Duke of York, were humane, clear, and altogether excellent; but, unfortunately, there was generally not only a want of an active superintendence over the execution of these orders, but also a want of knowledge and method in our officers as to the means of carrying them into execution. Moreover, England had not at that time any very numerous body of able well-trained surgeons to draw upon, and the pay offered was scarcely sufficient to tempt good surgeons into the service. Both on the medical staff and in the commissariat a great many French emigrants and other foreigners were employed pro tempore; and, although there is no cloaking the iniquity of some of our own native-born subjects, it is easy to understand that most of these foreigners kept only in view the making of as much money as they could during the campaign. The medical department was improved more rapidly; but we never had anything like a good, honest, effective commissariat, until Sir Arthur Wellesley (the Duke of Wellington) was intrusted with the command of our forces in Portugal; and half of our military failures, and a very large portion of the excess in expense of all our expeditions, are attributable to this one great want. When the Duke of York quitted the army, and came home, matters became much worse, and the acts of cruel neglect and of peculation more flagrant and barefaced.*

Five days after the French had sustained their unexpected and inglorious defeat at the hands of General Dundas, Pichegru crossed the Waal upon the ice with an enormous force. It became evident that nothing but a hasty retreat could possibly save the remains of the British army; and, after spiking their heavy cannon and destroying all the ammunition they could not carry off, they retired towards the Leck on the 6th of January. The French van pressed upon their rear. Though disheartened and in some of the disorder inevitable in a hasty retreat, the gallant English infantry halted, formed in order of battle, charged, and, after four charges, attended with various success, drove the French from the field with a frightful loss, for the most of the battle had been fought as it were hand to hand. On the 10th of January fresh columns of the republicans crossed the Waal; and on the 11th Pichegru, with a condensed force of 70,000 men, fell upon General Walmoden in the defile of the Greb, between Arnheim and Nimeguen, in the confident hope of destroying or reducing to an unconditional surrender all that remained of the British army and of their German subsidiaries. But Walmoden, after sustaining an assault, which was long and general, made good his retreat. Four days after this Pichegru fell upon some posts which had been occupied to cover the retiring army: these posts were gallantly held until the retreat of the British was secured, and then the troops who had

* The following report was made by an eye-witness, whose veracity and accuracy were found to be well attested:—"January 21st, 1795. Our hospitals, which were so lately crowded, are for the present considerably thinned. Removing the sick in waggons, without clothing sufficient to keep them warm in this rigorous season, has sent some hundreds to their eternal home; and the shameful neglect that prevails through all that department makes our hospitals mere slaughtering-houses. Without covering, without attendances, and even without clean straw, and sufficient shelter from the weather, they are thrown together in heaps, unprotected and unprotected, to perish by contagion, while legions of vultures—down to the stewards, nurses, and the numberless dependents—pamper their bodies, and fill their coffers with the nation's treasure; and, like beasts of prey, fatten on the blood and carcases of their unhappy fellow-creatures, of whom not one in a hundred survives, but perishes under the infernal claws of those harpies, still thirsting for more blood, and rioting in the jaws of death. For the truth of what I say, I appeal to every man in the army, who has only for a few hours observed, with an attentive eye, the general rule of conduct in our hospitals of late. And witness here the scene before me, while I now write. A number of men lying on a scanty allowance of dirty wet straw, which, from the heat of their bodies, sends up a visible steam, unable to help themselves; and, though a sufficient number of men are liberally paid for their attendances, none has been near for several hours, even to help them to a drink of water."—Annual Register.

held them drew off unpursued by the enemy, some of whose columns hastened to take possession of Utrecht and Rotterdam. By this time the English had lost nearly all their camp-equipage and baggage. The multitude of inferior commissary agents, who had been appointed to procure the requisites, had so grossly deceived their employers that no provisions had been collected. Besides the open enmity of the successful French, the English found concealed enemies in every Dutch town and village through which they passed; for the majority of the Dutch people looked upon them as the original cause of the calamities inflicted on their country, and took every opportunity of insulting them in their misery, and of adding to their sufferings. These sufferings, particularly among the many sick and wounded, were as cruel as any that ever fell to the lot of a retreating army: they were, in the midst of a rigorous winter, carried in open waggons, exposed to the weather, and destitute of all comforts and accommodations. Many were frozen to death, many dropped and perished through want; especially during the day and night marches of the 16th and 17th of January, when they had to cross the sandy, desert, houseless districts that intervened between Utrecht and the towns of Deventer and Zutphen, in the midst of an unceasing hurricane of wind, snow, and sleet. After a march of nearly two months, through countries everywhere hungry and beggarly, and in many parts churlishly inhospitable or inimical, the wretched fragment of the Duke of York's army reached the mouth of the Elbe and embarked at Bremen for England. Our ally, the Stadtholder, arrived in this country long before them. The democrats at the Hague began to threaten his person and his family; and the same triumphant party, shutting their eyes to the exactions and oppressions they must expect from the French, were everywhere insulting and menacing the aristocratic party, and preparing solemn entrances and public feasts for Pichegru and his generals. Taking with him his son, the Hereditary Prince of Orange, the stadtholder, not without difficulty, escaped from the Hague to the small port of Scheveling, where, on the 19th of January, he and his son embarked in an open boat.* The fugitives arrived at Harwich on the following day. The democrats of Amsterdam, who had appointed a provisional council of government, planted the tree of liberty in the chief places of their city, and mounted the French cockade, gave an enthusiastic reception to Pichegru, who made his entrance at the head of 5000 men on the 20th of January. The republican general went through the form of proclaiming the magnanimity of France (who only wanted to assist the peoples of Europe to break the chains of their despots), and the freedom and independence of the Seven United Provinces. Haarlem and Leyden adopted the same measures as Amsterdam; and, while the opposite party of Dutchmen ran away or concealed themselves, or at the least kept close within their houses, the democrats in nearly every town and village welcomed the French, and declared themselves their disciples and friends. In the province of Zealand there lay a considerable squadron of Dutch men-of-war: the admiral, said to have been all along hot in the French interest, hoisted the French flag on the 30th of January, took possession of Flushing and Middlebourg, and, on the 4th of February, concluded a very agreeable negotiation with the republican general Michaud. The States-General, or such portions of them as chose to assemble at the Hague, an open, defenceless town, where they were entirely at the mercy and under the dictation of the French army and the Dutch mob, issued proclamations, calling upon the people, in consequence, as they said, of the stadtholder's flight, to admit the friendly troops of the French republic. Scarcely one of the formidable and well-provided fortresses which lined and studded the country had made more than a show of resistance: they had nearly all opened their gates to the French before the Duke of York quitted the army; but some few fortresses on the frontiers of Brabant still remained in the occupation of Dutch troops, or of Germans who had been in the pay of the stadtholder. In this number was Bergen-op-Zoom, one of the strongest fortresses in the world, and at the time in an admirable state of preparation—if only the garrison within it had been true to their trust. But Bergen-op-Zoom, with all the rest of them, threw its gates wide open at the first invitation, and its garrison fraternized with the French. A requisition of clothes and provisions for the use of the republican army, to the value of one million and a half sterling, caused some consternation among the thrifty Dutchmen; but the republican party, or all the ultra-democratic Dutch, were in an ecstasy at their triumph by means of French bayonets over their countrymen who had triumphed over them by means of Prussian bayonets in 1787; and they were flattered by the convocation of a Representative Assembly on liberty and equality principles, which abolished the hereditary stadtholderate, with all the forms of the preceding constitution, published in good Dutch the Declaration of the Rights of Man, reversed the sentences passed against the democrats of 1787, and recalled all the exiles. It is to be supposed that this class of patriots were not greatly or immediately affected by the embargo which the English government immediately laid upon all Dutch ships and goods in the ports of Great Britain, Ireland, and our colonies; but the seizure or detention of the Dutch East Indiamen and cargoes was a terrible disappointment to the French, and at the same time a heavy blow to the monied interest and trading aristocracy, who abhorred the French and their principles. The Council of Government, the merest puppets of the

* On the morning of their departure from the Hague a mob assembled and insisted that the stadtholder should be brought to justice for the part he had taken in favour of the English. His guards, however, protected him from their violence, and conveyed him to the seaside, where he was again in danger, till the guards that accompanied him dispersed the populace.—Ann. Regist.

BERGEN-OP-ZOOM.

French, sent over two delegates to London to remonstrate and claim restitution. Lord Grenville, as secretary for foreign affairs, asked them in what capacity they wished to be received? The delegates replied, as representatives of the Sovereign People of Batavia. The secretary said, he knew of no such delegating power, and therefore must decline any further conference with them. The ministry soon took into consideration the important subject of the Dutch colonies: an expedition was prepared; and on July the 14th Vice-Admiral Sir G. Keith Elphinstone, and Major-General Craig, with a land force, appeared in the neighbourhood of the Cape of Good Hope, and took possession of Simon's Town. From that point the troops advanced towards Cape Town: they soon carried by assault the strong post of Muzzenberg, which commanded the road to it, and there waited for some reinforcements from the island of St. Salvador. These forces, under the command of Major-General Alured Clarke, arrived at the beginning of September; and then the whole army—still a very small one—pushed forward to Cape Town. The Dutch governor, who had rejected a proposal to place the whole colony under the protection of Great Britain (the only protection which could save it from the French) till the peace, yielded at once to this display of force, and surrendered the town and castle on the 23rd of September. Instructions were also sent out to our naval and military commanders in the East Indies to prepare for the reduction and occupation of the Dutch settlements in that part of the world; and by the end of the year, or by the beginning of 1796, all the places the Dutch held in the island of Ceylon, with Malacca, Cochin, Chinsura, Amboyna, and Banda, were taken possession of, with scarcely any resistance. Other plans of easy execution were arranged for the seizure of the Dutch colonies in the West Indies and on the coast of South America; so that it was made evident that the Batavian republic would soon lose all those foreign possessions and plantations which had once poured a continuous stream of wealth into the United Provinces.

Such, for a long time, had been the equivocal conduct of the King of Prussia, that it excited little or no surprise, when, in the spring of this year, he concluded a separate treaty with the French, whom he had been the first of all the coalition* to assail. By this treaty, which was definitively settled at Basle, in Switzerland, on the 5th of April, the king ceded to the republic all the Prussian territory on the left bank of the Rhine, and the republic restored to Prussia the territories she had overrun on the right bank of that river. Both the contracting powers pledged themselves not to grant a passage through their respective territories to the enemies of the other. All prisoners taken respectively since the commencement of the war were restored, including the prisoners taken by the French from the corps of Saxony, Mayence, the Palatinate, Hesse-Cassel, Darmstadt, &c., who had been serving with the army of his Prussian majesty. Until a treaty of commerce should be made, all the commercial communications and relations between France and the Prussian states were re-established on the footing upon which they stood before the present war, &c. And on the 17th of May a supplementary treaty was concluded at Basle by the same plenipotentiaries—M. Barthelemy for France, the Baron Hardenberg for Prussia—professing that it was the interest and earnest desire of both contracting parties to establish a line of demarcation and neutrality for the purpose of removing the theatre of war from all the north of Germany. The French drew a line that admirably suited them, and promised to consider as neutral states all those that were situated behind that line, on condition of the said states recalling their contingents, and making no new contracts for furnishing troops to the emperor, or any of the powers at war with France: but every state that did not comply and strictly conform to these conditions was to be excluded from the benefits of the neutrality. The sovereign princes on the right bank of the Rhine were to be entitled to negotiate with the French republic under the mediation of his Prussian majesty. In secret articles or overtures the pride and cupidity of the court of Berlin were flattered by prospective aggrandisements at the cost of its old enemy and rival, Austria; and, perhaps, England's best and steadiest ally—as Frederick William had been so often represented to be by our ministry—already anticipated the rounding of his dominions by the occupation and sovereign possession of Hanover.

One link of the chain once broken, other links of the coalition were soon snapped asunder. Spain was exhausted by the efforts she had made; the Walloons in her service had all deserted to the enemy; the republican columns again threatened to advance even to the gates of Madrid; and, dismayed and discouraged, and urged on by a strong French party,* Godoy, the royal favourite and prime minister, humbly sued for peace. The French, who had chosen that place for the centre of their diplomacy, or for their political Vatican, whence they were to fulminate their will and terms, and who had selected Barthelemy for their pontiff, named Basle as the spot for the negotiations, and Barthelemy as their plenipotentiary: Spain deputed Don Domingo d'Yriarte, and the Don, on the 22nd of July, accepted and signed a definitive treaty of peace. Even as Prussia had done, the proud monarchy of Spain, with its Bourbon sovereign, fully recognised the French republic, and engaged to a reciprocity of friendship and good understanding. The French republic restored all the conquests she had made in the Spanish peninsula, and agreed to accept as an indemnity all the Spanish part of the island of San Domingo. Spain recognised the Batavian republic which the French had set up in the United Provinces, and stipulated that the same peace, amity, and good understanding should take place between the King of Spain and those allies of the French republic as between his majesty and the French. As a testimony of amity to his catholic majesty, the French republic agreed to accept his mediation in favour of the King of Portugal, his relatives and allies the King of Naples and the Infanta Duke of Parma, the King of Sardinia, and the other states of Italy; and also to accept his majesty's good offices in favour of other belligerent powers that should apply to him in order to enter into negotiations with the French government.

* There was a French party at Madrid; but the party that was far more numerous and influential consisted of men who had no particular partiality for the French or their principles, but who had already adopted the dishonourable and dangerous fallacy that those republicans were and must continue to be invincible. Count d'Aranda, who had been president of the council of Castile as far back as 1765, and who had been called to the ministry in 1792, but who had made way for Godoy towards the close of that year, declared to the court that it would be better for Spain to unite with France against the coalesced powers than to expose herself to certain ruin by continuing a member of the coalition: that the war against France was both unjust and impolitic; that the countless French people had an invincible spirit of liberty like that which had animated the mighty Greeks and Romans, &c.; that to the soldiery of Europe, who were mere machines and passive instruments, they opposed millions of intellectual citizens, who must conquer whenever or wherever they fought.—Memoirs of Godoy, Prince of the Peace.

The Grand-duke of Tuscany, who had all along aimed at a scarcely attainable or admissible neutrality, and who had shut his eyes to several infractions of the law of nations, and of the rules which govern a fair neutrality, published an edict, dated the 1st of March, in which, terrified at the close approach of the French armies of Nice and Italy, which had nothing between them and the maritime part of Tuscany but the narrow territory of the Genoese republic, whose neutrality they despised, and had repeatedly and for a permanence violated, he deplored the calamities of war, asserted the principle that the welfare and safety of his country ought not to be intrusted to the preponderance of any of the belligerent powers, but to the sacred right of nations and to the inviolable faith of those treaties which guaranteed the immunities and of course the neutrality of the port of Leghorn; that, the natural and political situation of his dominions demanding the most impartial line of conduct, he had resolved from the beginning to observe the edict of neutrality which had been published during the last war by his august father; but that, though constantly respected by the French republic, he had found himself involved in those unpleasant transactions which were known to all Europe; * that, although he had been unable to resist those influences, yet all that he had really done was to consent to the removal of the French minister residing at his court, and that this act, extorted from him by the imperious circumstances of the moment, could not be quoted against him as a breach of neutrality towards France, &c. He stated, with sufficient humility, that he had since treated the French with all respect and kindness, and finished by announcing that he had concluded a treaty with the National Convention, calculated to re-establish his former neutrality for the benefit of his peaceful subjects, without encroaching upon the rights and interests of any of the belligerent powers, with respect to whom he had never taken upon himself any particular obligation. This treaty with a prince of the House of Hapsburg, the near relative of the emperor, flattered the pride of the republicans; but it was otherwise of little importance to the interests of the coalition, while it was quite certain that it would be of no benefit to Tuscany, which would be overrun by the French just as soon as it suited their purpose to overrun it. Overtures were made through Spain to detach the King of Sardinia and the King of Naples from the league: but the first of these sovereigns was heroically true to his treaties and obligations; and the second, though much less firm, rejected the propositions for the present.

* The visits of the English fleet, the quarrel about the exporting of corn from Leghorn for the use of the French army in Nice, and the expulsion of the diplomatic agents of the French republic, which was in a manner forced upon the grand-duke by the English minister at his court and the English admiral in the Mediterranean.

The court of Sweden and the Protestant cantons of Switzerland recognised the French republic, and its dependency, the nominal independent Batavian republic; and, in consequence of the defection of Prussia, the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and even George III., in his quality of Elector of Hanover, were compelled to engage to furnish no more troops to the emperor. Although our diplomatists had not been idle, they had but little to set off against the breach of treaties committed by Prussia. Ever since the commencement of the war strenuous efforts had been made to bring into the coalition the Empress of Russia: that sovereign had professed the greatest detestation and a scarcely credible dread of the French revolution and of its principles and propagandists; though she had at one time been the correspondent and professed friend of d'Alembert, Diderot, and others of the French philosophes, whose writings had helped to make the present state of things in France, and to furnish the principles and dogmas upon which that democracy was acting, she had put her interdict upon the introduction of all new French books into her not very literary dominions, had expelled a number of Frenchmen from Petersburg, and had made difficult the entrance of any individuals of that nation except royalists and emigrants; but, having a tolerably clear foresight that Russia had little to gain by becoming a party to the war in the west of Europe, she declined becoming an active member of the coalition. But at last she was induced to consent to a treaty of defensive alliance with Great Britain. This treaty, though not publicly announced or noticed in the British parliament till the next session, was concluded and signed at St. Petersburg on the 18th of February. With most empty and unmeaning words it was stipulated that there should be a sincere and constant friendship between his Britannic majesty and her majesty the Empress of all the Russias, and between their heirs and successors. The contracting parties guaranteed to each other all their dominions, territories, &c., as well such as they might actually possess as those which they might hereafter acquire by treaty. In case of one of them being attacked by sea or land, the other was immediately to send succour; and, "as the natural force of Russia consists in land troops, whilst Great Britain can principally furnish ships of war," it was agreed that her imperial majesty, whenever called upon, should send immediately to the King of Great Britain 10,000 infantry and 2000 horse; and that his Britannic majesty, whenever called upon, should send to Russia a squadron of twelve ships of the line. To draw still closer the bonds which united us to the Emperor of Germany, a separate treaty of defensive alliance was concluded with him also, and was signed at Vienna on the 29th of May. Each power guaranteed to the other all its dominions, territories, &c., and engaged to succour its ally without delay in case of any attack. As the House of Austria was not assailable by sea, no mention was made of ships; but the succours were to consist on either side of 20,000 foot and 6000 horse, which were to be paid for by the party demanding the succour at the nicely-fixed rate of 10,000 Dutch florins per month for every thousand infantry, and 30,000 Dutch florins per month for every thousand cavalry. In case the limited establishment of land forces in Great Britain should not permit the king to furnish the succour in men at the time required, and the emperor should be obliged to take other troops into his pay, then the confidence which his imperial majesty reposed in the friendship and equity of his Britannic majesty left him no room to doubt that his Britannic majesty would grant him an indemnification in money, &c. Added to these treaties with high Christian powers and crowns imperial—treaties which meant little more than that Russia might require the assistance of an English fleet, and Austria an English subsidy—there was, towards the close of the year, a treaty or agreement with the infidel and piratic Dey of Algiers! This last piece of diplomacy originated with Sir Gilbert Elliot, the viceroy of George III.'s new and transitory kingdom of Corsica, who wished to oblige a people whom he had in many instances disobliged and irritated. There was an ancient antipathy and enmity between those islanders and the Barbary states; but now the Algerines were to be permitted to carry their prizes into the ports of Corsica, and to sell them publicly there; they were to grant freedom to all the Corsicans they had captured and made slaves of, and to permit those islanders to frequent the African coast for the coral fishery, &c.; in return for which the Viceroy of Corsica was to pay to the Dey 179,000 piastres of Algiers, and a further sum of 24,000 piastres for a cargo of grain, the property of Algerines, which had been taken by the English. If this was a good arrangement for the Corsicans, it was far otherwise for the neighbouring Italian states, whose vessels might be picked up and sold almost within sight of their own coasts.

The French had fitted out all the ships in dock or on the stocks at Toulon which Sir Sidney Smith had failed of destroying; some other vessels had stolen round by the Straits of Gibraltar from Brest; and on the 28th of February Rear-Admiral Pierre Martin quitted the outer harbour of Toulon and took the sea with fifteen sail of the line, six frigates, and three corvettes—a force which he believed to be superior to our Mediterranean fleet under Vice-Admiral Hotham. The Frenchman had positive orders to engage Hotham if he met him, and to drive the English out of Corsica: he had a powerful body of troops on board, and was accompanied to sea by the conventional deputy and commissioner Letourneur, who was to look to the proper execution of the orders which the Convention had given. On the 2nd of March Pierre Martin gained sight of Corsica; but a gale of wind drove his fleet back, and damaged two of his ships. It was not until the 8th that Hotham, who was lying in Leghorn Roads, received intelligence that the French fleet was at sea. The British fleet, composed of thirteen sail of the line, four frigates, and two sloops, to which were added a Neapolitan 74 and two frigates of the same flag, commanded by the Chevalier Caraccioli, a veteran officer who had both courage and skill, instantly unmoored and went in search of the enemy. Through storms and contrary winds, it was not until the 12th that the English came fully in sight of the French between Corsica and Genoa. Martin, having the wind, might have attacked, but did not. During the ensuing night the 'Mercure' lost her maintop-mast in a squall, and was driven out of the French fleet, which she did not join again until after the battle. At eight on the following morning the 'Ça Ira,' an 80-gun ship, and the third ship from Pierre Martin's rear, ran foul of the 'Victoire,' and, in sight of the British fleet, carried away her own fore and main topmasts. Captain Freemantle, who was nearest at hand, in the 'Inconstant,' a 36-gun frigate, presently ranged up within musket-shot of the 'Ça Ira,' gave her a broadside and stood on. A French frigate, the 'Vestale,' bore down, and, after firing several distant broadsides, which did little or no harm to Freemantle's ship or crew, she took the 'Ça Ira' in tow. The 'Inconstant' got under the lee of the 'Ça Ira,' and fired into her; but by this time the Frenchmen had cleared away the wreck of their topmasts from their deck, and were enabled to open a heavy fire from their first-deck guns, which compelled Freemantle to bear up. Nelson, in the 'Agamemnon,' 64, now got abreast of the 'Ça Ira' and 'Vestale;' and, most of the time quite alone, and part of it aided by the 'Captain,' 74, he warmly engaged the French 80 and frigate from ten o'clock till past two in the afternoon. He so placed himself that the 'Ça Ira' could never get a single gun from either starboard or larboard to bear on him; and when the French fired their after-guns it was not with coolness and precision, for every shot went far ahead. A little after two

P.M., several French ships of the line, including the 'Sans-Culotte,' of 120 guns, bore down to the protection of the 'Ça Ira:' this obliged Nelson to bear away and leave her; but he left her with her sails all hanging in tatters, her mizen-topmast and cross jack-yards shot away. In the mean time there had been some partial firing between two English 74's and the three rearmost ships of the French; but, as soon as the 'Agamemnon,' Nelson's ship, dropped into line, the combat ceased for that day, the French keeping to the wind under all sail, and being followed by the British as fast as four or five heavy-sailing ships would permit. Rear-Admiral Martin and Deputy Letourneur, for the alleged purpose of better directing the manœuvres of the fleet, had removed from the great flag-ship 'Sans-Culotte' to the frigate 'La Friponne.*' In the course of the night the 'Sans-Culotte' separated from the rest of the fleet (as if in spite of the admiral's having separated himself from her), and the crew, fancying or pretending that they were chased by five men-of-war, ran her into Genoa. On the following morning, soon after daybreak, a sudden change of wind gave Admiral Hotham the advantage of the weather-gage. The 'Ça Ira,' which had suffered so much from Nelson's fire, was now in tow of the 'Censeur,' 74, and a good way astern of the retreating French line. The 'Captain,' our foremost ship, closed and sustained the united broadsides of the two Frenchmen for fifteen minutes before she was in a situation to return a shot; the 'Bedford,' 74, came up to her assistance; but the 'Captain' was soon terribly cut in her masts and rigging, and, becoming quite unmanageable, she made a signal for assistance, and was towed out of the reach of her opponents. About the same time Hotham, by signal, recalled the 'Bedford' to her station; and the 'Bedford' fell into line, with her masts and rigging in nearly as bad a state as the 'Captain's.'

* In general actions with ships of the line, it is not customary for frigates to fire; or, while they remain quiet, to be fired at. This established usage may have had something to do in inducing the French admiral and deputy to transfer themselves to a frigate from the ship of the line that was likely to attract most of the English attention—and cannon-balls.

The French van now came round in support of their rear, and to rescue the 'Ça Ira' and 'Censeur;' they were so hotly received by the British ships that were now foremost, that they soon abandoned their two sternmost ships to their fate, and crowded all sail to effect their own escape. After making a brave resistance, and sustaining a great loss in killed and wounded, the 'Ça Ira' and the 'Censeur,' with scarcely a spar left standing, struck, and Nelson's friend, Lieutenant Andrews, of the 'Agamemnon,' hoisted British colours on board them both. Two or three French ships suffered severely: but it seems to be proved, beyond a doubt, that all the rest, and M. Pierre Martin, their admiral, behaved very ill. Nor was Vice-Admiral Hotham "quite awake enough for such a command as that of the king's fleet in the Mediterranean,"* or sufficiently emancipated from the old routine rules of his profession. Apparently through the fear of disordering his line, he had allowed two of his ships to be exposed a long time to the desperate firing of the 'Ça Ira' and 'Censeur,' when, by attacking in greater force, he might have carried them at once; and, when the French fleet fled, he rejected the bold proposition of Nelson, to leave the two prizes with two English ships of the line which had been crippled in the action, and with the rest of the fleet to pursue the enemy. With two prizes under his lee, and with the certainty that Corsica was saved, Hotham said, "We must be contented: we have done very well." "Now," said Nelson, "had we taken ten sail, and allowed the eleventh to escape, when it had been possible to have got at her, I could never have called it well done." The gallant Caraccioli, whose name will be again, and most unhappily, associated with that of Nelson, brought his 74, 'Tancredi,' into action in good style: his ship received several shots between wind and water, and had her foremast injured. The total loss sustained by the British and Neapolitans amounted to 74 killed and 284 wounded: the loss on board the French ships, which were rather crowded with troops, and which, as usual, received more shots in the hull than they gave, was incomparably greater. The firing had first commenced between six and seven o'clock in the morning; it ceased altogether about two in the afternoon; and soon afterwards the two fleets were out of each other's sight, the French running for Hieres Bay, near Toulon, and the British retiring to San Fiorenzo Bay, in Corsica, to refit.†

In spite of our Channel fleet, and other blockading or cruising squadrons, six more ships of the line, two frigates, and two cutters, succeeded in getting from Brest into the Mediterranean, where they joined the Toulon fleet, which had thus a decided superiority over their adversaries. Great things were expected from Earl Spencer, the new first lord of the Admiralty, but, although in the end some of these expectations were realized, there was no great immediate improvement in the ministerial management of the navy; and, in spite of numerous representations, our Mediterranean fleet was left for some time in its state of inferiority. Hotham was joined by another Neapolitan 74; and, to the mortification of Nelson's national pride, this was matter of exultation to an English fleet. At last, however, on the 13th of June, three months after the battle with Pierre Martin, Hotham was joined by eleven sail of the line and several frigates from Gibraltar and England. The French, who had avoided an encounter even when they were superior in number, now shunned it more cautiously than ever. They had, however, put to sea before they learned the arrival of the British reinforcement; and, on the 13th of July, Hotham, who had now twenty-one sail of the line, got sight of them near Cape Roux. As they had only seventeen sail of the line, and six frigates and corvettes, they fled for the coast. The English pursued, but only a few of their van ships were able to get up with the French rear. Between these forces a smart action ensued, which terminated in the surrender of the 'Alcide,' French 74. The rest of the French ships got safely into Frejus Bay. Before the 'Alcide' could be taken possession of, a box of combustibles in her foretop took fire, and presently set the whole ship, sails, masts, and hull, in a blaze; and, though the English boats that were nearest were put out to the assistance of the frantic crew, they could only save three hundred of them, and from three hundred to four hundred were blown into the air with the ship—those unhappy men thus experiencing "how far more perilous their inventions were to themselves than to their enemy."* Carnot and the other humane philosophers, who were presiding or who had presided over the Committee of Salut Public and the war department, had introduced sundry novelties, with the view of making war more murderous. For obvious reasons, the use of red-hot shot at sea was not considered honourable warfare; but they ordered the French ships to be supplied with furnaces, and to fire red-hot shot whenever it should be thought advantageous. They had also invented, or adopted the invention of, a certain preparation which was thought to have the same properties as the Greek fire—to become liquid when discharged, and to be inextinguishable by water; and this preparation, with the consent and concurrence of the National Convention, they had sent to the Toulon fleet. In the action of the 14th of March the 'Ça Ira' and 'Censeur' had fired red-hot shot, and had also on board some of this new Greek fire; and they have been supposed to have fought the more desperately from a persuasion that, if they struck, the English sailors, incensed at their new methods, would have given them no quarter.

It is said in this admirable manual for seamen, the author of which would not have hazarded such an assertion without good foundation, that the 'Agamemnon,' Nelson's ship, and the 'Cumberland,' Captain Rowley, were just getting into close action a second time, when Admiral Hotham called them off, and this too at a moment when a baffling wind and a vexatious calm had been succeeded by a fresh wind blowing directly into Frejus Bay.

Except by Nelson, detached on some coast service, scarcely a gun was fired by our Mediterranean fleet during the remainder of the year.

Many encounters of detached ships took place in various parts of the world, and were, generally speaking, to the advantage of the English: but the only other approach to a general action at sea took place on the 23rd of June, off the French coast, near Port l'Orient, between the Channel fleet of fourteen sail of the line and eight frigates, under Admiral Lord Bridport, and a part of the Brest fleet, consisting of twelve ships of the line and eleven frigates, under Vice-admiral Villaret. It was a running fight, the French flying for their own port and the protection of their own land batteries, and the English pursuing along a difficult and dangerous coast; but three French ships of the line struck their colours and were taken possession of. All the vigilance of our squadrons and cruizers in the West Indies was not sufficient to intercept the communications or foil the daring projects of Victor Hugues, who was in one single person the Marat, Robespierre, Carnot, and Barrère of the negroes, mulattos, Caribbs, and all the mixed populations of those parts. Pitt, in the last session, had repeatedly referred to our acquisitions in the West Indies as a set-off to our losses and failures in other quarters: yet sufficient forces had not been sent to keep what we had gotten; and, in the course of the year, we ran the risk of losing not only those new conquests, but our old colonies, including Jamaica, the oldest and most valuable of them all. Early in the year the French succeeded in gaining possession of St. Eustatius; and, having put that island into a good state of defence, they made it the basis and pivot of extensive designs and operations, which were all conceived by the teeming head, and in good part executed by the daring stop-at-nothing energy, of Victor Hugues. He flew from island to island, preaching, with more fire than Peter the Hermit, liberty and equality and the Rights of Man to the negroes, and to all people of colour, and a crusade against the English, the French royalists, and all who adhered to them: he made the hot blood of the tropics boil over; he led his dark converts and disciples into the perpetration of the most horrible cruelties; and, when the deeds were done, he told them that they could never more hope for quarter, that they must now exterminate the English or be utterly exterminated by them. Other emissaries were sent among the slaves and the poorer part of the French colonists, to excite them to a universal and simultaneous insurrection. In St. Lucie the project succeeded completely; the English troops were taken by surprise and overpowered; the fort, after a blockade of three months, was compelled to surrender; such of the British as were not butchered were shipped off the island; and the tri-color flag and the red cap of liberty (the new Mumbo Jumbo of the African slaves) were erected triumphantly. The flame spread to Grenada, Dominica, and St. Vincent; but, after a fierce struggle, it was extinguished there by the British—save only in the interior and mountainous parts of St. Vincent, where the Caribb insurgents kept their ground for a considerable time. Under the same auspices, the Maroons of Jamaica—the descendants of negroes who had revolted and fled to the mountains in the time of the Spaniards—prosecuted a long and cruel war.

The conflict of armies on the European continent, in which our troops had no share, may be briefly related. The old Austrian general Bender, on the retreat and dissolution of the grand army of the coalition, threw himself into Luxembourg with some 10,000 men. The republican government at Paris was certainly less active and energetic in war than it had been in the days of Robespierre and St. Just. Although Bender was entirely isolated and cut off from all succour, it was the 7th of July before he was reduced to capitulate, and then he and his numerous garrison were allowed to retire to Germany, upon condition of not serving against the French till exchanged. With the exception of Mentz, or Mayence, the republicans were now masters of the whole of the left bank of the Rhine, and of the estuaries through which the Rhine flows into the North Sea, from Holland to Strasbourg; and there was nothing on the right bank of that river to disturb this their natural frontier, except Manheim and a few other weak places. In the month of August Pichegru, the conqueror of Holland, undertook the reduction of Mayence, which was occupied by Imperial and Austrian troops: as preparatory steps, he crossed the Rhine, captured Dusseldorf, and occupied Manheim. The emperor had kept his promise to England of making a great effort for this campaign; and old Wurmser, esteemed one of the best of his generals, was now advancing with a good army to effect a junction with Clairfait, succour Mayence, and drive the French from the left bank of the Rhine. Pichegru detached a division to prevent this junction: the division put a part of the Austrians to the rout; but, while the French were engaged in plunder, Wurmser's excellent cavalry advanced in full force, threw the French into confusion, and drove them back to Manheim. General Jourdan, who had followed Clairfait at the end of the last campaign from the Netherlands, came up to cooperate with Pichegru in the reduction of Mayence, and, crossing the Rhine, he established himself on the right bank opposite to the town, to cover the siege and assist in it. There was another urgent reason for Jourdan's movement: he had exhausted the country where he had been quartered during the winter, the treaty with Prussia forbade him to levy military contributions within the marked line of neutrality, and, Mayence being once reduced, he must push forward towards the heart of Germany to find food and forage for his army. Clairfait, who had been strongly reinforced early in the spring, made a rapid and skilful advance, took Jourdan by surprise, obliged him to decamp hastily and leave part of his artillery behind him, harassed him by continually skirmishing with his rear until he reached Dusseldorf, and there re-crossed the Rhine. Clairfait then threw a considerable part of his army across the river into Mayence, in spite of the French lines drawn round that place. On the 29th of October Clairfait ordered a general attack on the French lines: part of the garrison of Mayence made a sortie with the fresh columns that had been thrown into the place; and, while these forces, divided into two columns of attack, fell upon the lines in front and turned one of their wings, a flotilla of gun-boats ascending the river began to cannonade the French in their rear. The whole plan of attack was beautifully conceived, was admirably executed; and, if Clairfait had only brought over all his forces from the opposite bank and risked them all in this one great enterprise, nothing but a miracle could have saved the French army from entire destruction. As it was, the Austrians drove the republicans from their fortified lines with a terrible loss, captured their battering-train and most of their field-pieces, separated them into two divisions, and obliged one to retreat northward, while the other fled southward.* The pride and confidence of the French were sadly damped; but, if Clairfait had acted in force upon their retreating, disorganised columns, he might not only have annihilated them, but have cut off two other corps d'armée that were advancing by different lines of march towards Mayence. On the opposite side of the river old Wurmser, who was quite strong enough to have contended with Pichegru, without the aid of that large part of his army which Clairfait had left on the right bank, obtained many advantages over the republicans, (who never properly recovered from the beating they got from his cavalry,) gained by a simultaneous attack the bridge of the Necker, and drove Pichegru within the walls of Manheim. After the retreat of Jourdan, and the flight of all the French forces from the lines of Mayence, neither Manheim nor any other spot on the right bank of the river was a proper abiding-place for Pichegru: after strengthening the garrison, he quitted Manheim, recrossed the Rhine, and was allowed to effect a junction with Jourdan. Wurmser, who would have done better if he had followed Pichegru with his own and all the troops which Clairfait had left on that side of the river,—by rapidity of movement he might have rendered the passage of the Rhine a desperate or most costly affair to the retreating general,—sat down before Manheim, which did not surrender until the 22nd of November.† Wurmser then formed a junction with Clairfait, and the two presently recovered the whole of the Palatinate, and of the country between the Rhine and the Moselle.* The successes of the Austrians emboldened them to form the project of penetrating once more into Luxembourg, the loss of which weighed heavily on the emperor's heart. They made preparations to this intent, but were, as usual, slow in collecting and concentrating the necessary troops; and Jourdan and Pichegru advanced along the Rhine by forced marches, and kept them in check. Some obstinate and sanguinary encounters took place; but the winter was now setting in with great severity; both republicans and imperialists were much exhausted by a campaign which had commenced very late in the season, but which had been exceedingly active and fatiguing while it lasted; and it was thought expedient to agree to an armistice, which was not to be broken by either party without ten days' previous notice, and during which both belligerents were to confine themselves strictly to the positions they actually occupied.

On the side of Italy, where the French had gained such important advantages in the preceding campaign, their army, all through the spring and summer, was much neglected: the Austrians and Sardinians, or Piedmontese, now assisted by some troops from the south of Italy, comprising some brigades of Neapolitan cavalry that behaved very well, collected such a force in the passes of the Maritime Alps and the Apennines as gave them a decided superiority. Almost all that the republicans tried to do was to keep possession of the posts they had gained in 1794: and even some of these posts they lost; and they must have lost many more if the allies had been less sluggish and irresolute. Nelson, who had been detached with a small part of his fleet to co-operate with Devins, and who served on the coast of Nice, sometimes at sea, sometimes on land, doing soldiers' work (and much better than most soldiers did it), was driven almost frantic by the Austrian general to whom his Sardinian majesty had mainly intrusted the salvation of his kingdom. "This army," said he, "is slow beyond all description; and I begin to think that the emperor is anxious to touch another four millions of English money. As for these German generals, war is their trade, and peace is ruin to them; therefore we cannot expect that they should have any wish to finish the war. The politics of courts are so mean, that private people would be ashamed to act in the same way: all is trick and finesse, to which the common cause is sacrificed."† Devins charged his inactivity upon the Piedmontese and Neapolitans, and these in their turn attributed it to the Tudesque dulness. A good plan had been formed for getting between the different French divisions that occupied the Nissard territory and a part of the western Riviera or coast of the Genoese republic, for taking the

* Considerable portions of these separated retreating columns fell into a perfect panic; and many of these brigades never stopped until they got into the interior of France, where they spread the most alarming reports, asserting (as Frenchmen always do when well beaten) that there had been treason in the camp, that they had been betrayed by some of their own officers.

* Wurmser joined Clairfait previously to the reduction of Manheim: but he left the greater part of his forces employed on that siege; and very little was undertaken either on the right or left side of the river until the republican garrison capitulated.

foremost of these divisions in the rear, and finally for blockading the important port and city of Nice. To work out this plan it was necessary that the allies should take possession of the town and bay of St. Remo; but when Nelson proposed that Devins, who had again obtained free communication with several parts of the coast between the Nissard territory and Genoa, should embark a considerable force for this object, the general pretended to believe that Nelson only wanted possession of St. Remo for the advantage and snug harbouring of the English ships of war, and told him that the Bay of Vado, which was open to our shipping, but which could be of no use in reducing Nice, was a much better and safer anchorage. At last, after many equivocations, which left Nelson no confidence in his word, Devins agreed to send 10,000 men to St. Remo, if Admiral Hotham would only send him ships of war and transports enough to carry them. Nelson believed at the time that, if the whole of our Mediterranean fleet had been offered him for transports, he would have found some other excuse. But Devins ought to have been put to the test on the point, and this was not done, for Hotham declined sending any more ships; and thus the old German was enabled to attribute a part of his inactivity, and the total evaporation of an excellent plan, to the British admiral.

It has been well said that the neutral, or pretended neutral, powers and states assisted France more effectually than the allies or coalesced powers assisted each other. We have seen what respect the French republicans paid to the neutrality of the Genoese republic in 1794. Great as had been the insults and wrongs suffered, the Genoese senate made no complaint against the French; their subjects continued to serve and assist them; and, while they presumed to claim from the British fleet all the rights of a strictly neutral state, they allowed—without making a single effort or remonstrance to prevent it—all their roadsteads, bays, harbours, and the strongly-defended port of the city of Genoa itself, to be crowded with French privateers, of nearly all sizes and riggings, but of which the most mischievous were swarms of long row-boats and galleys. Larger privateers were allowed to be towed out of the port of Genoa, to board trading vessels bound to that very port, and then to return within the mole, which was bristling with cannon—with cannon the doge and his timid senate durst not fire upon the French. There was, from the first advance of the republicans, a strong party in their favour in the city of Genoa; but the greater part of these strange irregular proceedings were indisputably attributable to the weakness and helplessness of that small state—the neutrality was broken in every way, because the government could not help it. When a country is in this condition (and this was the condition in the course of a very few months of Tuscany as well as Genoa), when it is invaded and domineered over by one belligerent party, it can have no reason to demand or expect that the other belligerent party should observe neutrality towards it. England and her allies respected the pretended neutrality too long, and suffered much by so doing: they ought to have despised the pretension long before, telling the Genoese republic that, as it was not strong enough to defend itself against those who trampled upon it and laughed at every precept and principle of the law of nations, they would not permit it to be converted into a basis of operations against them. After all their scrupulosity the allies were driven into extreme measures, which might have greatly benefited their cause if they had resorted to them many months before, or as soon as it was made evident to the world that the territories and ports of the now small and contemptible republic were wholly controlled by the French. It required some most barefaced and outrageous acts to rouse them from their superstitious veneration for a visionary neutrality—some of them had been less scrupulous elsewhere. An Austrian commissary left the city of Genoa to go to Vado: it became known to the French minister at Genoa and to the captain of a French frigate in that port, that he carried about 10,000*l.* sterling with him, and that he was to sleep at Voltri. The boats of the frigate were sent out with some adroit privateers, the greater part of whom were probably Genoese subjects; a party landed, robbed the commissary, and brought back the money to Genoa. The very day after this buccaneering exploit men were publicly enlisted in the city of Genoa for the French army: 700 men, with 7000 stand of arms, were embarked in the French frigate and in other vessels, were to land between Voltri and Savona, there join a detachment from the French army, and invite all the Genoese peasantry to a liberty and equality insurrection. The opportune arrival of Nelson off the mole-head of Genoa prevented for the present the execution of this nice plan: the French frigate got within the inner mole, and placed herself behind the tiers of merchant-vessels of all flags that were there. The squadron of the English hero was far too small to perform all the duties required of it: if he remained to blockade the port of Genoa, half a dozen other ports along the Riviera and the Nissard coast required watching. He had bitterly complained of Admiral Hotham; that admiral had now quitted the command, but Sir Hyde Parker, who had succeeded to it till the arrival of Sir John Jervis from England, was not more disposed than Hotham had been to reinforce Nelson, who only demanded two more ships of the line, with some frigates and sloops. And, in a very short time, Sir Hyde, instead of reinforcing the squadron, diminished it, leaving Nelson nothing but his own ship, the 'Agamemnon,' and one frigate and a brig. This reduction was made at the very moment that the French were rousing themselves from their comparative lethargy, and making immense preparations for recovering the advanced posts they had lost, for clearing the Alpine and

Apennine passes, and for carrying the war into the plains of Piedmont. They were in fact paving the way for the brilliant campaign of 1796. Nelson had destroyed many vessels on the coast; and, a few days before, being called to Genoa, he had chased a large convoy into a fortified harbour, round which 2000 French troops were stationed. While he lay watching Genoa other convoys got into the same port, which was strengthened by the French troops, with their accustomed activity and ingenuity—and there were now above 100 sail of transports, store-ships, gun-boats, and ships of war collected in that one inlet. Nelson offered to go in and destroy the whole of this fleet, if the admiral would only send him two ships of the line. The admiral again returned a flat refusal, and the hero was left to deplore that he could have prevented the attack almost immediately afterwards made upon the Austrian and Piedmontese army, if he had been permitted.* And what were the reasons of this strange conduct on the part of Nelson's superiors? The Toulon fleet, too happy at having been allowed to anchor unmolested in the Gulf of Frejus, had not taken the sea again, and our fleet was superior too, even numerically. But the truth was that, in good part through imprudence and ill management, amounting in some respects almost to imbecility, the Corsicans, who had received us as friends and deliverers, had been brought to regard us as their worst enemies, and even to desire a reunion with the French republic. The islanders were almost in an open state of hostility, were carrying on a secret but active correspondence with Toulon and with the French at Nice and Genoa; and Sir Gilbert Elliot, the viceroy of a royalty which lasted some eighteen months, required nearly the entire service or presence of the British fleet. General Devins, after patiently bearing so many insults and injuries, demanded satisfaction of the Genoese government, a government only in name, for the seizure of his commissary; and then, without waiting a reply, took possession of some empty French magazines on the territory of the republic, and pushed his advanced posts forward to the very gates of the city of Genoa. If he had taken these steps at first he would have found the magazines full: "but, timid as the measure was, and useless as it was to the cause of the allies, it was in character with the whole of this Austrian general's conduct; and it is no small proof of the dexterity with which he served the enemy, that, in such circumstances, he could so act with Genoa as to contrive to put himself in the wrong."† The mass of the Austrian troops was now collected on the shores of the bay at San Pier d'Arena, which lies so close to Genoa that it may be considered as a suburb of that city. Devins, who could not but see the storm about to burst upon him, implored Nelson not to leave Genoa, as, if he did, and if the Austrians should be worsted, their retreat by the Bocchetta pass would be cut off, seeing that the French frigates would be sure to land the appointed troops between Voltri and Savona; and Nelson staid where he was, lamenting that his diminutive force would only allow him to act at one point at a moment when ships were required at several points. While Nelson was thus chained to one narrow spot—for, if he moved a mile from the mouth of the harbour of Genoa, the French frigates and transports within, with hundreds of galleys and row-boats to tow them out, must escape and land the troops only a few miles off—Devins was laid up with the gout, which became so bad, or so available an excuse, that, just before the French attacked him, or, as others say, while the battle was raging, he transferred the command to General Wallis, and got himself carried through the Bocchetta pass to Novi, a Piedmontese town at the foot of those Apennines. At the end of November the French army of Italy, commanded by Massena, a Nissard by birth, whom the revolution had raised from the condition of a corporal—a young man of rare energy and ability, and who knew thoroughly the country he was to fight in—put itself in motion, having been allowed to collect all its materials and to mature all its necessary preparations. Generals Scherer and Serrurier, commanding separate columns, and pursuing different lines, co-operated with Massena; and Generals Laharpe, Charlet, Victor, and Cervoni, Colonel Suchet, and other officers whose names were soon made famous, served under him.* Massena's great object was to get between the Austrians and Piedmontese, to cut them off from one another, and then beat them in detail; for, partly through their old stone-blindness, and partly through the necessity of watching several accessible passes, both armies were scattered over a wide extent of mountainous country. The attacks of the republicans, superior in number and in all essentials, but above all in the qualities of their commanders, were nearly everywhere successful. The fighting took place among rocks and precipices, and in the midst of hail and rain, sleet and snow. The centre and the right wing were beaten from post to post, and at last put to a general and ignominious flight. The left, stationed at San Pier d'Arena, and composed entirely of Austrians, behaved better; but, while attacked in front and on one of their flanks by the republican troops, flushed with their successes, they were assailed on the other flank by a swarm of French gun-boats, which Nelson, though so close at hand, could not come round to scatter and annihilate. And, after a bold stand, these Austrians also broke and fled towards the Bocchetta pass. "From that moment," says Nelson, in his expressive style, "not a soldier staid at his post—it was the devil take the hindmost. Many thousands ran away who had never seen the enemy; some of them thirty miles from the advanced posts. Had I not, though I own against my inclination, been kept at Genoa, from 8000 to 10,000 men would have been taken prisoners, and among them General Devins himself; but, by my means, the pass of the Bocchetta was kept open." Enriched and strengthened by the capture of all the artillery and most of the baggage, ammunition, waggons, and stores of the allies, the French went to winter in Vado and in Savona, being masters of all the Riviere di Ponente, and threatening at the approach of spring to descend into Italy and once more tinge with blood the waters of the Po.* The Austrians and Piedmontese, driven from all that coast, were again deprived of every direct communication with the British fleet; and Nelson, being no longer of any use there, went away to refit. There was not a mast, yard, sail, or any part of the rigging of the 'Agamemnon' but what was wounded or cut to pieces by shot; and the hull was so damaged that it had been for some time secured by cables, served or thrapped round it.†

The pacification of the Vendée, effected during this year, was of inestimable advantage to the French republic: it stopped a drain of blood more copious than any that had flowed in her exterior wars, and enabled her to liberate a large army from a most wearying service, and to employ it next year beyond her frontiers against her foreign enemies. It also reduced to despair the royalists in all parts of France, and, coinciding with the fall and discredit of Jacobinism, and the altered tone and system of the government, it reconciled not a few of the royalists to the Convention, or to its successor, the Directory. The reverses and frightful slaughter which the Vendéans had sustained at the end of 1793 had not prevented their rising again. Impelled by the fierce spirit of revenge, and goaded to desperation by the cruelties of Carrier, Rosignol, and the Infernal columns, they began, early in 1794, to collect again in arms, and to make themselves formidable to the republicans, who had fondly believed that they were all but extinct.

When the fugitives who escaped from the slaughter at Savenay crossed the Loire, a brother of Cathelineau put himself at the head of a few hundred men of Angers, carried off the wounded d'Elbée, with his wife, and some other disabled officers; and they then all made their way to join the army of Charette, who was maintaining himself on Ile Noirmoutier. Charette set out on an expedition, in the hope of striking some blow in quarters which the republicans, in their long pursuit of La Roche Jacquelein's army, had left bare of troops; but all the sick and wounded Vendéans were left on the isle, with a garrison of 1800 men, to defend them and the important place—the more important because it was now almost the only place through which the insurgents could communicate with England, and the French princes and royalists there. The republican general Turreau opened a secret correspondence with the garrison—a correspondence which most probably consisted of a remittance of assignats, and of more solid money—for Charette's garrison surrendered the isle without firing a shot, and thus left the wounded and the sick at the mercy of the Jacobins. D'Elbée was lying in bed between life and death; his wife might have escaped, but would not leave him: they were both taken. As Turreau's soldiers entered their chamber the wounded royalist exclaimed, "Yes, here I am! Here is d'Elbée, your greatest enemy! If I had been strong enough to fight or stand upon my feet, you would not have taken me in my bed!" They kept him for five days, treating him with execrable barbarity, and then carried him in an arm-chair to the place appointed for fusilading the prisoners, and there shot him. His wife was fusiladed the next day, and her brother and brother-in-law perished in the same manner. Charette, who, with all his bravery and ability, appears to have been a vain, jealous, selfish, and most irritable mortal, soon quarrelled with the gallant and generous La Roche Jacquelein; and that young hero, putting himself at the head of his own peasants and tenantry, quitted the main army and renewed the death-struggle by himself. But the young hero's career was soon terminated. On the 28th of January, 1794, as he was marching from Trémintine towards Nouaillé, he fell in with two republican grenadiers. In an instant the muskets of his followers were at their shoulders. "Do not kill them," cried he; "I will speak with them." Running forward, he cried, "Only surrender, and you shall have quarter!" One of the grenadiers stepped back, presented his piece, and shot him through the brain. His followers sabred the grenadier; and, wishing to hide the dead, because a republican column must be close at hand, they hastily dug a grave, and buried in it their beloved chief and the soldier that had killed him. Henri de la Roche Jacquelein was only in his 21st year when he fell. Stofflet, the chasseur or huntsman, took the command of the young hero's party; but the hope and heart of the Roche Jacquelein peasantry died with Monsieur Henri. Dissensions and fierce jealousies, carried even to death and mutual assassination and attempts at it, broke out among the subordinate chiefs; hellish cruelties were committed wherever they had the advantage; and, after a few reverses, both Stofflet and Charette listened to overtures made by secret agents of the Convention. These negotiations, however, were soon broken off, for none of the royalists would trust the Jacobins and Terrorists. On the 24th of September, 1794, while Stofflet remained inactive, Charette attacked a republican corps d'armée in an entrenched camp near Challans, and cut it to pieces. This victory gave Charette the entire command of a considerable portion of the Vendée; but the overthrow of Robespierre, and then the restricted power of his rivals, gradually introduced more humane views and a milder system. An amnesty was published in favour of all such Vendéans as would lay down their arms; they were assured that they should have the free exercise of their religion, and that their beloved priests should be molested no more. The plan of reducing the insurgents by burning their country, and exterminating them by means of infernal columns, was given up, and with comparative sincerity the reformed Convention renewed the efforts to bring about a pacific negotiation. At the end of February, 1795, Charette confided in the good faith of the government so far as to trust his person within the walls of Nantes, in order to open the negotiation. A treaty of pacification was concluded and signed.

It soon, however, became evident that the enmi-

ties of the two parties were irreconcilable, that each suspected the other, and that both were preparing for another struggle. As usual in such cases, they accused one another of a breach of faith and of treaty. For some time Charette seemed to be leading the life of a quiet country gentleman, but all the while he was carrying on an active correspondence with the Bourbon princes, and receiving supplies of money from the emigrants in England. It would have been well for him if money had been all he got from this country; but a number of emigrants, of miserable intriguers and adventurers, whose heads conceived the most absurd projects, and whose hearts in many instances were false to the cause, crossed the Channel, beset the Vendean chiefs, and eventually led them to their ruin. Some of these men were old officers, who, with professional pedantry and obstinacy, insisted upon making war in a scientific or systematic manner, as a prelude to which they wanted to drill and discipline, and convert into mere machinery, the fiery peasantry who had instinctively adopted the mode of warfare best suited to their country. About the middle of May an aide-de-camp of Count d'Artois came over to announce that a descent was to be made on the coast of Brittany, where fresh insurgents, called the Chouans, had taken the field, by an army of emigrants, under cover of a great English naval force, and that Charette, who could justly complain of many infractions of the treaty of pacification, must fly to arms and renew hostilities in the Vendée, in order to create a diversion in favour of the Bretons and the coming expedition. Some money, which had come all the way from St. Petersburg, was distributed by the aide-de-camp;* but the cash seems to have been absorbed by the officers and hungry adventurers who had recently arrived in the country; and it was observed that, while the officers showed a great deal of ardour, the peasants, who had begun to taste the sweets of repose, were much less zealous than on former occasions. The entrenched camp of the Essarts was, however, surprised and taken, the republicans were defeated in two or three minor encounters, and obliged to draw troops from Brittany, in order to reinforce their army in the Vendée. Although the project had been repeatedly under discussion, the British government had declined sending any forces to this part of the Continent. We have ventured the expression of our opinion, that no regular army could have been made very available in such a country, or could have acted effectually with such irregular forces as the Vendéans. Certainly, such a petty military expedition as our ministers and their predecessors (not excepting even that famed war minister, the first Earl of Chatham) were in the habit of sending to the French coast, as if purposely to render our army contemptible, could not possibly have been of any use, even if it had been sent in 1793, before the dismal tragedies that occurred on the Loire and at Savenay—before the fall of Laval, Lescure, d'Elbéc, and Henri de la Roche Jacquelin; yet, when all these heroes had perished, when the heart had been taken out of their cause, when the bravest of the peasants had been exterminated, and when the Vendéans were far weaker and more divided than ever they had been, Pitt, in an evil hour, allowed himself to be overcome by the sanguine representations and incessant importunities of the French princes and emigrants, and gave his orders for fitting out the fatal Quiberon expedition. The Counts d'Hervilly, d'Hector, du Dresnay, and Puissaye, Colonel Rothalier, and other royalist officers, collected in England and in our Channel islands a little army of 3000 men, partly royalist emigrants and partly prisoners who had been taken from the republicans, some by land, some by sea: almost all of them had been trained to arms either in the French army or in the French navy; many of them were veteran soldiers; and there were 400 Toulonese artillerymen, well organized, and serving under the orders of Colonel Rothalier. The Bishop of Dôl accompanied the military staff, as legate from the pope to the faithful and devout Vendéans. Count d'Artois, after talking of taking the command in person, gave it to Puissaye, together with some 10,000*l.* in gold, or in letters of credit on London, and several millions of livres in assignats,—a paper money which the Bourbon princes thought they had a better right to manufacture than had the de facto government at Paris. In expectation of being joined by numerous bands of devoted royalists, Puissaye also took with him 27,000 muskets, 600 barrels of powder, provisions for three months for at least 6000 men, and complete uniforms for 17,000 infantry and 4000 cavalry. A fine squadron of three ships of the line and six frigates, under the command of Sir John Borlase Warren, an officer in high estimation, having in charge 50 transports with about 2500 French troops on board, set sail from the Isle of Wight in the early part of June. Another squadron was appointed to go to Jersey, and there take on board, or under their convoy, another division of emigrants, who were to be landed at St. Malo, where Puissaye had royalist correspondents who hoped to be able to hoist the white flag of the Bourbons and deliver up that town; and still another squadron was to repair to the mouth of the Elbe, bring round some regiments of emigrants who had formed part of the army of Condé, and land them on another part of the western coast of France, somewhere in Normandy, or Britany, or the Vendée (the where was never precisely settled); and, when some good sea-port town or towns should be secured, then another expedition, with English troops and Count d'Artois, was to cross the Channel, and land. Thus, according to the inveterate and incurable habit of all who were contending with the republic, the British government and the French princes and the royalists made a bad plan worse by dividing their expedition into three or four separate parts. If they had collected all the forces proposed to be employed, and had attacked the coast at one point and at one moment, something might have been done, though not much. A few weeks' delay to collect these scattered forces would have signified little, for the secret of the expedition had been so badly kept that nearly everybody in France knew it was coming, and the disaffected Bretons, who, according to the plan, ought to have remained quiet until the arrival of the English fleet, had committed the imprudence of flying to arms, and had sustained several defeats before Sir John Borlase Warren quitted the Isle of Wight. On approaching the coast the English ships were discovered by a part of the Brest fleet, but, although Villaret-Joyeuse had nine ships of the line with him, he did not venture to attack Warren, suspecting that Admirals Cornwallis and Lord Bridport, and that terrible commodore, Sir Sidney Smith, were not far distant.* It was on a bright sunny day—the 25th of June—that the English squadron and the transports cast anchor in the Bay of Quiberon. Two precious days were lost in debating how, and where, and when the landing was to be made, and in petulant disputes that broke out among the French officers. On the 27th, at day-break, the troops began to land at the small village of Carnac, at the head of the bay, and this operation was completed without the loss of a single man, a handful of republicans running away from the place. Georges Cadoudal, d'Allègre, and other royalist insurgent chiefs of less name, hastened to the coast and joined Puissaye with from 4000 to 5000 men, badly armed, raggedly dressed, looking more like robbers than soldiers, but brave and determined fellows. The Breton peasants of the neighbourhood also came into Carnac, shouting Vive le Roi! and bringing fresh eggs, poultry, and other provisions for the use of the liberating army that was come to restore to them their king and their religion. The muskets and the uniforms, the ammunition and some of the money were landed from the ships, and distributed with a liberal hand. The fame of this liberality attracted fresh bands to the Bourbon standard: in two days 10,000 royalists, more or less sincere, were collected round Carnac: but terrible quarrels took place in the division of the arms and dresses and the other good things; and some of them, when they had got all they could, decamped to their own villages among the hills, while others took the same course because they could get nothing, or were dissatisfied with what they got. Puissaye understood matters better, and would have acted at once in an irregular manner with these very irregular troops; but d'Hervilly, who disputed his authority on all points, and who pretended to have the entire command of the regular troops which had been landed, wanted to make war according to the schools, and expressed a very lofty but very silly contempt for all the Chouan bands. Puissaye found it necessary to dispatch in a cutter letters and messengers to Count d'Artois; and some more precious days were lost in inactivity. At last, Puissaye being assured of the hearty co-operation of the English admiral and fleet, determined to attack Fort Penthièvre, situated on a small peninsula or promontory which encloses Quiberon Bay on one side, and which is only two leagues long and one broad, and joined on to the mainland by a low sandy isthmus called La Falaise. On the 3rd of July Sir John Borlase Warren, after landing 300 British marines, began to thunder at Fort Penthièvre; Puissaye threatened an assault with his Chouans; and the republican garrison, 700 strong, surrendered to the royalist general. But by this time the whole of Britany was enveloped by three or four corps-d'armée, under the supreme command of General Hoche, while General Canclaux, who had collected a large force to watch Charette and Stofflet, prevented the arrival of any succour from the Vendée, and even kept the Vendéans in a state of inactivity. Some of the Breton insurgents bravely attempted to check the advance of Hoche's columns: but d'Hervilly refused to assist them with his regular troops; and on the 5th of July Hoche established his strong right wing on the heights of Ste. Barbe, which command the sandy isthmus of La Falaise. On the 7th, d'Hervilly, with all his regular troops and with 200 British marines, attempted to drive the republicans from those heights, but he was repulsed with great loss. The republicans then descended in dense column from the heights of Ste. Barbe, and the royalists, regulars and irregulars, regimented troops and loose Chouan bands (many of the latter being accompanied by their wives and children), ran for the sandy isthmus, for Fort Penthièvre, and the farther end of the promontory. But for the good provision of the English admiral, who had stationed close in to the beach five launches armed each with an 18 or 24-pounder carronade, which kept up an unremitting fire upon the republicans, the royalists would never have been able to cross the sandy isthmus. As it was, from 18,000 to 20,000 fugitives reached the promontory, and were there shut up, as in a bottle, by the numerous and still increasing forces of Hoche. The provisions brought by the fleet must be soon exhausted by this immense crowd, and nothing more could be expected from the country; except in the confined limits of Fort Penthièvre, there was no shelter or lodging for them, and the bare promontory scarcely furnished a stick or a twig for fuel: they were obliged to eat their rice and their other rations raw. In this condition, crowded together and altogether comfortless, fresh quarrels broke out between the Breton insurgents and the regular troops; and while desertions became frequent, no new royalist troops arrived, and nothing was heard of the forces that were to come from Jersey, the Elbe, and the English coast. Had these forces all arrived together, it would now have been too late; for Hoche and Canclaux had collected between them two great armies, and such intrenchments had been made on the heights of Ste. Barbe as would render the dislodgment of Hoche a most difficult enterprise. The British squadron in the bay and the many guns placed in battery on Fort Penthièvre might, however, have defied for some time all the forces of Hoche, if treachery had not displayed itself. At last, on the 15th of July, the English convoy arrived with the royalist troops from the mouth of the Elbe. These troops were commanded by M. the Count de Sombreuil, a brave young man, son of the late governor of the Invalides, but their total number did not exceed 1100. Before these troops were well landed Puissaye detached Vauban with 12,000 Chouans to make a diversion on the right of Hoche's camp, and then to effect a junction with some other bands of insurgents that were said to be gathering behind the heights of Ste. Barbe; and on the following day Puissaye himself marched from the narrow promontory, crossed the sandy isthmus, and attacked the republicans in front. Both Vauban's diversion, and Puissaye's sortie failed completely: after some desperate fighting the main body of the royalists fled back once more to the isthmus of La Falaise, and once more did they owe their preservation to the boats of the British squadron, whose untiring and correct firing kept the republicans at bay. Yet Colonel Rothalier lost nearly all his cannon, which sunk and stuck fast in the deep sands at the head of the isthmus. Still there were guns at Fort Penhièvre, and the British fleet might have furnished more; the approaches to that place over loose sand and under the fire of the English sailors were far from being easy to the besiegers; but all the Frenchmen who had been prisoners of war in England, and who had enrolled in this strange army merely for the chance of escape, settled with the republicans to desert and put them in possession of Fort Penhièvre. And on the night of the 20th of July—a dark and stormy night—a detachment of republican grenadiers having approached near to the spot, some of these sham royalists who were on guard betrayed the fort, helped in the republicans, and fell upon their own comrades, shouting Vive la république! In a trice the white flag was lowered and a tricoloured one put in its place; the timid laid down their arms and joined in the republican shout; the traitors massacred their officers and all such as did not re-echo the Vive la république! A scene of disorder and despair followed: about 1100 troops, led by Puissaye, hastened to the shore and there waited the return of daylight and of the English shipping, which the tempest had obliged to keep at some distance from the shore. D'Hevilly, mortally wounded in the affair of the 16th, could do little more than complain; and de Sombreuil was ignorant of the ground and equally ignorant of who were friends or who enemies in the disorganized royalist army. In spite of the storm and the darkness, some of the launches kept their station and maintained their fire, and other boats of the fleet ran almost upon the beach to carry off the fugitives. But some of these boats were upset, some being overcrowded sank; the number of Frenchmen saved by their means was not very considerable. Not a few of the emigrants killed themselves with their own swords or pistols. With the fire and bayonets of the republicans on one side, and the raging sea on the other, de Sombreuil, after defending himself for a long time on the beach, surrendered and made his men lay down their arms, for the republicans, who were suffering severely from the cannonades of the English launches, cried out, "Only surrender, and we will do you no harm;" and Humbert, one of Hoche's generals, promised, or is said to have promised verbally, honourable terms of capitulation. Early on the morning of the 21st the British frigates, which on account of the gale and extreme darkness had been unable to approach the shore in the night, worked up to the south-east point of the peninsula, and there received on board, by means of boats, Puissaye and his 1100 troops, with about 2400 Chouans and royalists of that description. Nearly all the arms and uniforms, with the ammunition and stores, were left behind for the benefit of the republicans. The royalists who had surrendered were marched off to Vannes: a sort of military tribunal, who denied that there had been any capitulation, or that any such agreement could be made with emigrants and royalists fighting with the English against their own country, condemned to death the brave young Sombreuil, the Bishop of Dôl, and all the officers and gentlemen taken; and, these being all shot, the common men enrolled themselves in Hoche's army. Sir John Borlase Warren next proceeded to take possession of two small islands on that coast, and to disembark near l'Orient, at their own request, some 2000 of the Chouans whom he had brought from Quiberon Bay; and these Chouans renewing their strange partizan warfare did much more mischief to the republicans than they had been able to inflict upon them while acting with the regular troops of the royalists. On the 29th of August another squadron, consisting of one ship of 100 guns, two of 98, and two of 74, besides frigates, and having on board 4000 British troops, sailed from St. Helens. Some time in September this new force joined Warren, who thereupon sailed to Ile Noirmoutier, which had at one time been the stronghold of Charette and his Vendéens, but which was now occupied by a republican force supposed or said to be 15,000 strong. General Doyle, the commander of our land troops, thought it prudent to decline any attack, and so, sailing away to Ile d'Yeu, a very small, defenceless, and worthless island about fifteen miles from Noirmoutier, the English took possession of it, and remained there for nearly three months, eating the bread of idleness and discontent. At the close of the year the troops were re-embarked, and ships and men returned to England. Perhaps Doyle and his little army might have done something if Count d'Artois had been more enterprising and more decided; and that 4000 of our soldiers were kept so long on that coast was certainly owing to the French prince, with whom they had been designed to co-operate, not in Britany, but in the Vendée. As soon as Canclaux weakened his army to strengthen that of Hoche and crush the royalist expedition at Quiberon, Charette resumed the offensive, gained several advantages over the republicans, and looked eagerly for the promised arrival of Count d'Artois. After the fusilading of de Sombreuil and the other emigrant officers at Vannes the civil war returned to all its old atrocities: Charette fusiladed all the prisoners he had in his possession, and vowed he would never more give quarter to a single republican. At length the same aide-de-camp who had visited him before reappeared with the positive assurances that the mournful failure at Quiberon had not discouraged the royalists and their allies, that Count d'Artois was coming very soon, and that an English squadron was bringing some arms and ammunition and a little more money for the loyal Vendéans. An English ship really landed some muskets and gunpowder, but weeks passed away, and were lengthening into months, before his royal highness came to the coast, and even then he would not venture to land on the continent. On the 10th of October d'Artois disembarked at Ile d'Yeu and took up his quarters with General Doyle. All that he heard of the murderous affair of Quiberon and of the savage executions at Vannes filled his mind with disgust, not unmixed with terror, and his courtiers had little inclination to risk the hardships and perils of a campaign in the Vendée with very loyal but very rough and uncourtly peasants, whose chief leaders were now an atrabilious ex-lieutenant of the navy and an ex-huntsman and gamekeeper. A place of rendezvous was, however, appointed, and Charette, fully assured that the prince would land at the little port of La Tranche, united his forces, dispersed some republican detachments, and cut his way to within a day's march of the appointed place. But here d'Artois's active aide-de-camp met him with the intelligence that his highness had changed his mind, and would choose a more opportune moment and a better place for landing. "My friends, we are lost!" said Charette; "this is my death sentence! To-day I have 15,000 men around me, to-morrow I shall not have 300!" Falling back from the coast, the Vendean chief saw his troops disperse rapidly and his enemies gather on all sides of him: Hoche, elated with his success at Quiberon, arrived from Brittany; and Stofflet, who had but badly seconded his chief, was demanding a conference with the republican generals. After some hollow negotiation—hollow on both sides—Stofflet, apparently without any concert with Charette, though not without instructions and pressing instances from some of Count d'Artois's people, collected an inconsiderable force in January (1796), fought a battle at Bressuire, lost it, hid himself in a secluded farm-house, was discovered or betrayed, was seized in the night of the 23rd of February, and, being carried to Angers, was there executed on the 26th of February, with four of his companions. Charette, abandoned by all his followers except an old body-servant and some twenty or thirty men, and hunted down like a wild beast, was surrounded in a wood by the light troops of General Travot, and was at last made prisoner as he lay stretched on the ground by the side of his faithful servant, who had been killed in attempting to defend and to cover with his own body his master. "Is it thou, Charette?" said the republican general. "By the faith of Charette it is even I," replied the Vendean chief. This was on the 23rd of March (1796). Charette seemed scornful, and quite indifferent to his own inevitable fate. Travot, who in other respects behaved like a man of honour and humanity in this horrible Vendean war, treated his prisoner with respect, and prevented his fierce soldiery from insulting and ill-treating him. Travot's superiors and the commissioner of the Directory were not so humane: by their orders he was carried to Nantes, and made to traverse that crowded city on foot, all the way from the gate on the Loire to the prison. He was covered with wounds, his grey dress was stained with blood, his head was bound up in a handkerchief, his left arm was in a sling; but, though pale and wasted, he was as haughty and as sarcastic as ever he had been. He said to the officer who escorted him through the streets, and who treated him with great inhumanity, "Monsieur, if I had taken you prisoner I would have had you shot on the spot, without fatiguing you with a long walk." He was put to death on the 29th of March, himself giving the word to the republican soldiers to fire, and to fire at his heart. The war of the Vendée, which had languished since the summer of 1795 and the failure at Quiberon, may be said to have expired with the death of Charette. According to General Hoche's own statement it cost the lives, in all, of 100,000 Frenchmen; and not a fifth part of the male population of the country was left alive.*

* Count d'Artois (afterwards Charles X.) had repaired to Petersburg with rather a numerous suite—all gay and handsome young men, very noble, very brave, but all penniless. The Empress Catherine gave the prince a sword, a frigate, a million of livres in cash, and the services of the brave and skillful Count de Vauban. His royal highness d'Artois passed some time with the army of the Duke of York, and then went over to England to prepare for the great descent at Quiberon.

In other parts of France the year 1795 was a red year. Though the guillotine was comparatively inactive in Paris, and though in that city the reaction against the Terrorists was not very sanguinary—the combat being principally carried on by Fréron's Gilded Youth with their sticks and clubs—the retaliation was of a much more ferocious kind in many of the departments, and in some of the great towns of the South murders and massacres were committed by the royalists and Girondists upon the overthrown Jacobins almost as atrocious and as extensive as any that they had perpetrated during the Reign of Terror.† Many of these hot southern re-acteurs

† The following anecdote has several times been cited to show the frightful state in which the Vendée was left:—Near Chollet there were extensive bleaching-grounds, the owners of which kept a great many watch-dogs, large and fierce. The town, after having been repeatedly stormed, sacked, and burned, was at length abandoned by both parties. The watch-dogs, to the number of 400 or 500, took possession of the ruins and remained there for many weeks, feeding upon the unburied bodies of republicans and Vendéans that lay scattered in the streets and all round the place in a horrible abundance. After the pacification, when the disarmed townspeople of Chollet returned and attempted to rebuild their houses, the animals had become so ferocious that they attacked them and would have devoured them; and a battalion of republican soldiers were obliged to march against the dogs and exterminate them before the place could be re-inhabited.

† The moderation of the Thermidorians in the capital has, however, been much overrated. Five days after the execution of Robespierre no fewer than ten thousand new arrests had taken place in Paris alone for imputed Terrorism. The same measures were applied had little right to blame the excesses of the Terrorists. They regimented assassins; and, under the names of "Companies of Jesus," and "Companies of the Sun," immense bands spread themselves through all the South, on a mission to plunder and assassinate. Isnard, the fiery orator and habitual drunkard—Isnard, who had hastened the destruction of his party, the Girondists, by speaking, prophet-like, of the destruction of Paris, participated in organising these terrible companies, and stood by, with Chambon, Guerin, Cadroy, and other Moderates, to be an eye-witness of many of the butcheries they committed. The prisons of Lyons, of Avignon, of Marseilles, of Tarascon, and of other towns, were broken open by these new Septembrizers, who massacred in cold blood all they found within them. The perpetrators or directors of these massacres were of mixed colours and qualities: some of them were Girondists, who could not rest satisfied without a bloody and almost indiscriminate revenge; some were hot royalists; some merely religious fanatics, who held that they were honouring God by destroying wretches who had denied his existence; and a great many of them were merely apostate Jacobins and revolutionists, who, after having played the part of Terrorists as Hébertists or Dantonists or Robespierrists now acted the same part as Thermidorians. The old national principles seemed to be sanctified in all eyes, that violence and cruelty were to be avenged with cruelty and violence, and that no mercy was due to a party that had fallen and become a weak distracted minority. The worst parts of the national character displayed themselves in as glaring a light after the so-called termination of the Reign of Terror as during the most heyday part of that bloody régime. Nor could the bloodthirstiness and the other crimes be now imputed to the canaille, to the ignorant, needy, desperate mob; the re-acteurs belonged principally to the respectability classes; and such of those classes as did not act, or applaud, watched what was done with calm indifference. In describing the Reign of Terror, and the scarcely less horrible system which preceded it, we have found it necessary to confine ourselves almost exclusively to Paris, the capital and centre of this revolutionary Pandemonium; we have said scarcely a word concerning the horrible doings at Arras, Troyes, and fifty other provincial towns, and have dropped a veil over the scarcely credible exploits in the south of Jourdan Coupe-Tête, over the towers and glaciers of Avignon, and all the unspeakable atrocities committed in that ancient city; and we must now leave untold the particulars of the Thermidorian reaction in the departments. Yet, before returning to Paris, we may add a few short sentences, that will enable the reader to form some faint conception of this dawn of French political moderation.

The assassinations began at Lyons almost immediately after the 10th Thermidor, and the decapitation of Robespierre. Lists were printed and distributed of the names of all the individuals who had distinguished themselves as Terrorists, or who were suspected of having denounced and accused non-Jacobin citizens; and on the same sheets, in a parallel column, there were lists of all the non-Jacobin citizens who had been denounced, guillotined, fusiladed, or drowned in the Rhône. Guided by these lists, the respectable young men—the Jeunesse Dorée of Lyons—tracked the revolutionists from door to door, made them come out by pretending that they only wanted to conduct them to the Commune, and then shot them, stabbed them, cut them to pieces in the streets. The dead bodies were tied to the first cart or carriage that happened to pass, were dragged to the banks of the Rhône, and thrown into the river, to float down to Avignon and the Mediterranean Sea. If no vehicle was passing, the assassins—the Gilded Youth, the hope of their country—dragged the disfigured corpses with their own arms to the quays, and hurled them into the river with imprecations and curses. Not a voice was raised to condemn these atrocities. The bourgeoisie, the manufacturers, merchants, traders, and shopkeepers, who were now absolute masters of the town, contented themselves with saying, at every dead body that passed, "Well, there is one villain the less!"—and at times they directly excited and encouraged the zeal of the assassins, who in many cases were their own brothers or cousins, sons, nephews, or clerks. The murderers—the members of a nation which, on very insufficient grounds, had passed for the most gallant in Europe—made no distinction as to sex, treating the Jacobinesses even as they treated the Jacobins. Failing in finding one Richard, a picture-dealer, they seized his daughter, a girl of seventeen, and carried her to prison, where she was put to death, with scores of other victims. Three women were assassinated in the open streets. Madame Roua, a marchande de modes, was invited to step out of her shop, and then her brains were blown out before her own door. These excesses were not committed merely in the first madness which followed the overthrow of the Terrorists; they were prolonged through many months: Robespierre had died on the 28th of July, 1794; yet, on the 5th of May, 1795, the Jeunesse Dorée of Lyons, fatigued with single separate assassinations, and weary of the delay and forms of law as exercised by the new tribunals, determined upon a massacre en masse. The signal to begin was given at the public theatre. The young men divided themselves into three troops, marched instantly to the three prisons of the town, which contained real Jacobins and suspects, broke open the doors, and butchered ninety-seven individuals, inclusive of five women. At one of these prisons the captives made a desperate resistance; the Jeunesse Dorée lost twelve of their own number, and finished the battle by setting fire to the building. A woman with an infant in her arms was seen to throw her-

At one of these prisons the captives made a desperate resistance; the Jeunesse Dorée lost twelve of their own number, and finished the battle by setting fire to the building. A woman with an infant in her arms was seen to throw herself from the top of one of the prison towers into the midst of the flames. And what, under the boasted return of mercy and moderation, law and justice, were the judicial consequences of these monstrous proceedings? Fifteen young men, notoriously guilty, and conspicuous among the égorgeurs, were tried before the tribunal of Roanne, and were acquitted by the jury. On returning to Lyons they were honoured with a triumphal entrance: women, unmarried and unmarried, and mostly of the bourgeoisie or respectability class, went out to meet them, and strewed flowers on their path, and at night they were publicly crowned, like heroes of antiquity, in the resounding theatre. With such encouragement, it is not surprising that the Lyonese moderates should continue their work of assassination for a very long time. At Aix, in Provence, the Jeunesse Dorée, after making an attack with cannon and butchering a great many persons, set fire to the prisons, in the hope of burning all that remained in them. Subsequent to this massacre, Isnard, the orator, the legislator, who chanced to be at Aix, addressed the citizens from the balcony of an inn, and charmed them with one of his flashes of eloquence. "If," said he, "you have no arms, if you have no muskets, dig up the bones of your fathers, and make use of them to exterminate all the Jacobin brigands!" At Fort St. Jean, in Marseilles, one of the most frightful of massacres was perpetrated under the eye of Cadroy, another Conventionalist, a bosom friend and (in this reaction) a collaborateur of Isnard. "Children of the Sun," cried Cadroy to the égorgeurs in the act of butchering defenceless men; "Children of the Sun, I am at your head, and will die with you if necessary. But can you not do your work without making so much noise? You will disturb the town." At Toulon the ultra-Jacobin party were treated with the same inhumanity that they had meted out to the royalists in 1793. The worst proceedings of the Parisian Septembrizers were imitated and repeated upon different objects; and, taking the whole of the South, the quantity of blood spilt must have been prodigious, for slaughters or assassinations were committed in every town, in every village and hamlet; and this Thermidorian fury of revenge raged at intervals for months, and even for years, leaving family feuds which have not entirely ceased at this day.

The victory of the National Convention over the Mother Society in the Rue St. Honoré, obtained solely by Freron's Jeunesse Dorée, had led directly to the trial and execution of Carrier; and that great event was soon followed by renewed and much bolder attacks on Billaud-Varennes, Barrère, Collot d'Herbois, and Vadier. Chenier, a bad poet and a worse man, made another motion for the recall, to the loving bosom of the legislature, of all the Girondists who yet survived: he was seconded by Sieyès, who made a mathematical speech, and by Merlin de Douai, who thought that they ought to be reinstated not merely in the Convention, but also in the governing committees. The Montagnards made some timid resistance, but Chenier's motion was carried, and twenty-two Girondists—all that had escaped the guillotine and famine or suicide—were readmitted to their seats in the Convention, after eighteen months of proscription. They associated themselves with the Thermidorians; but some of this party were so much alarmed and irritated at their recall, that they immediately went over and joined the Mountain. In this number were Thuriot, the mortal enemy of Robespierre, and draper Lecointre, who had so obstinately pursued Billaud, Collot, and Barrère. "You know not what you are doing," cried Thuriot to his colleagues; "these Girondists will never pardon you for what you did or suffered to be done to them!" On the 2nd of March, or 12th Ventose, very soon after the return of the twenty-two Girondists, Saladin, in the name of the Committee of Twenty-one, reported that there were good grounds of accusation against Billaud, Collot, Barrère, and Vadier; and forthwith, on the motion of butcher Legendre, a decree of provisory arrest was launched against these four men, who had little to plead except that they considered all they had done as necessary to save liberty, republicanism, and their country; that in doing what they had done they had only executed the laws which the Convention itself had previously passed; and that, in many instances, they had been overawed and driven onwards by Robespierre, Couthon, and Saint-Just. Vadier ran away and hid himself; the other three were laid fast in the dismal prison to which they had consigned so many hundreds of victims. The three ex-dictators had their friends and partisans, and the Thermidorians, who had stepped into all the governing committees, and filled every office with their allies or creatures, had so managed matters as to create many enemies in Paris. These new authorities and ruling powers were, almost to a man, corrupt, rapacious, and depraved in morals and habits of life, scoundrels that jobbed in the stocks, in the national contracts, and in almost everything else whereby money was to be made; many of them, beggars before the revolution began, made a pompous display of their wealth, and revelled in luxury and festivity, in banquets and balls of the most costly kind, while the people of Paris were almost starving, and assuredly suffering far worse privations than any they had known at the beginning or during any previous part of the revolution. The populace could not but remember that Robespierre, Couthon, and Saint-Just were men that despised money and led quiet, modest lives, and that in their days the people of Paris at least had bread to eat; nor could they forget that, so long as Billaud, Collot, and Barrère retained their power in the committee of Salut Public, there was a comparative abundance of the first necessaries of life. They nicknamed Boissy-d'Anglas, the present manager of the subsistence department, and a speculating money-making man, Boissy-Famine. Hungry and desperate as they were, it was but natural that the real sans-culottes should make an effort to upset the new system. These Thermidoriens, said they, after taking all power from the people, have stopped the payment of the forty sous per day to the poor and only true patriots, and are spending each of them daily more money than nourished the revolutionary committee of a whole section. This must not be! We must release Billaud, Collot, Barrère, and the other members of the old governing committees, and send these Thermidorien intruders to prison or the guillotine. Such prompting as was needed was given by Vadier and his numerous agents. The 22nd of March, or 3rd Germinal, was the day fixed for the trial, before the National Convention, of Billaud and his companions. On the 20th of March, which was a decade, or republican sabbath, the sans-culottes of the Faubourgs St. Antoine and St. Marceau collected in large bodies, and marched down to the Convention, shouting "Bread! Bread! Bread! and the Constitution of 93! Bread, and Liberty to the imprisoned Patriots!" Near to the Tuileries they met a few of their antagonists, Fréron's Gilded Youth; but, being more merciful or more timid than in former times, they only threw these smart young men into the pond or basin in the Tuileries gardens. But, before these insurgents or very turbulent petitioners invaded the sanctuary of the laws, the cry was spread that the Convention was in danger,—that the Jacobins were going to deliver their chiefs; and the whole of the fighting Jeunesse Dorée, followed by some 5000 or 6000 citizens of the respectability sections, marched to the Tuileries, dispersed the mob, and mounted guard round the Convention. Being thus delivered, and yet warned of the danger they were supposed to have run, that merciful legislature, on the proposition of Sieyes, voted the re-establishment of the old martial law, under the moderated name of Loi de grande police. On the appointed day, the 22nd of March, Billaud, Collot, and Barrère were brought to the bar of the Convention. The trial lasted many days. Their old colleagues, who now felt that they must support them or perish with them—that no mercy or compromise was to be expected from the Thermidoriens and revengeful Girondists—defended or excused their public conduct, and nearly all the present members of the Mountain supported them warmly. But the Mountain was now a minority; minorities never had any weight in representative France, and it was evident to all men that nothing but a strong popular demonstration could prevent a sentence of condemnation. The patriots of the Faubourgs, who had been in a sort of permanent minor insurrection ever since the 1st Germinal, repeated their visit to the Tuileries on the 12th Germinal: they were more numerous, and apparently more furious than before: they wore on their hats, "Bread; the Constitution of 93; the liberty of the Patriots!" and this time they burst into the hall of the Convention, and seated themselves down among the members of the Mountain, many of whom unequivocally declared for them. Crassous, a deputy from the island of Martinique, a decided Montagnard and ultra-Jacobin, said that the Convention ought instantly to restore to liberty all the patriots who had been arrested since the fall of Robespierre; that the royalists were agitating France more than ever; that the aristocrats were showing themselves everywhere, and triumphing in all public places, preventing, at the theatres, the singing of patriotic airs, which was an evident proof that they were conspiring against the republic. Ruamps declared that the committees of government had given 30,000 francs to the muscadins or dandies; and that he would proclaim to all France that the committee-men, the Thermidoriens, the restored Girondists, and all who sat on the côté droit, were so many tyrants. Bourgeois, another Montagnard, said that the new committees of government, after having organised famine, were organising a counter-revolution; and, being interrupted by some of the Thermidoriens, who told him that he ought not to utter vociferations against the government, as such things irritated the minds of the people, he shook his fist at the côté droit, and then rushed to the tribune, and struggled and wrestled and scratched with Tallien and Bourdon de l'Oise, who attempted to drag him from the speaking-place. The Thermidoriens cried out for a decree to commit this pugnacious Bourgeois to the Abbaye: the Montagnards shouted, "Vote the liberty of the imprisoned patriots!" and the galleries, and the so-called deputations on the floor of the house, roared "Bread! Bread! Give us bread, and the Constitution of 93!" Thuriot announced that there was a system on foot for revising the democratic constitution of 93, and for driving France back to the monarchic constitution of 91. Leonard Bourdon, Lecointre of Versailles, Cambon, Amar, and others, who had helped the Thermidoriens to overthrow Robespierre, but who had returned to their old seats on the Mountain, were equally violent, telling the people that they were purposely starved by the iniquitous committees of government, who were all in a conspiracy against liberty. The mob, which, as usual, comprised a vast number of women, kept increasing so rapidly, that every corner of the House was soon crammed to suffocation. Several deputies cried out that they were all but smothered, and implored the president to beg the citizens and citizenesses to defile through the hall, and leave the legislators space and air to breathe. Great as was the mob, it was more peaceable and more submissive to the law than many other mobs which had at various times invaded the august Arcopagus, for they neither used nor even showed any pikes or swords, confining themselves to words, which were principally demands for bread: but matters had changed now from what they had been; the Paris artillery was secured by the governing committee; the tocsin, which had been removed from the Hôtel-de-Ville at the defeat of Robespierre and the Commune, was now placed on the roof of the Tuileries, just over the Convention-hall, and at the order of the president that dreadful bell was set a-going to call the Golden Troop and the respectability sections to the rescue. And, at the sound La Jeunesse Dorée, the respectabilities, armed with muskets and bayonets, came marching and drumming to the Tuileries gardens and to the Place du Carrousel, and the quays between the palace and the river side. Pichegru, the conqueror of Holland, who chanced to be at Paris, and in the palace, was named commandant-in-chief in the capital until the danger should be over, with Merlin de Thionville and Barras for his adjoints. The unarmed mob slunk out of the palace, and dispersed as rapidly as they could, only giving two or three wounds and receiving two or three dozen in their retreat. The liberated triumphant Thermidoriens then decreed that Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, Barrère, Vadier were guilty of all the state crimes with which they were charged, and that they should be deported or transported for life to French Guiana. Nor did the victorious party stop here, but, continuing their work of vengeance, they decreed that Crassous, Ruamps, Bourgeois, Leonard Bourdon, Duhem, Amar, Choudieu, Chasle, Lecointre, Cambon, and six other Montagnards who had taken part with the mob (called insurgents by the winning party, and petitioners by the party that lost), should be put under arrest and sent to the strong castle of Ham. The Thermidoriens further declared Paris to be in a state of siege; and, having done all this business, the wearied Convention rose at six o'clock in the morning. Little time was allowed for making adieus and packing up portmanteaus: those condemned to deportation to Guiana, and those consigned to imprisonment in the castle of Ham, were all to take their departure from Paris this very morning, the 13th Germinal, or 2nd of April, "slave style." It was expected that an insurrection would be made to liberate them, and therefore Pichegru and his adjoints, Merlin de Thionville and Barras, were on the alert. Vadier, who had been tried and condemned en contumace, could not be found; Barrère, whose windings and shufflings had brought him to this sad pass, was, or feigned to be, extremely sick; but he, Billaud-Varennes, and Collot d'Herbois were removed from their prison and put into one carriage. Thuriot, Amar, Ruamps, Chasle, and all of the seventeen Montagnards that could be seized, were placed in other carriages. The postillions mounted their horses, and the carriages rolled away, preceded and surrounded by mounted gendarmes with loaded pistols in their holsters and with drawn swords in their hands. An immense multitude had collected in the Champs Elysées, and as the coaches arrived there some of the sans-culottes cried that it was the Convention running away to Châlons with all the people's money, and others cried that it was the patriot deputies unjustly torn from the bosom of the Convention, and from the functions with which the people had invested them. In a trice the mob arrested the carriages, dispersed the gendarmes, and conveyed the coaches and those in them to the committee-room of the section. At the same instant another mob fell upon the guard at the Barrier de l'Etoile, seized some cannons that were there, and pointed them along the road which led from the Tuileries and the Place de la Révolution, across the Champs Elysées. But presently the conqueror of Holland arrived with a great force, including some hundreds of the Jeunesse Dorée. Two or three guns were fired on either side (it is said that Pichegru ran some danger), and then the insurgents took to their heels, and the carriages with the prisoners in them were driven off rapidly through the Barrier de l'Etoile without further interruption. The victorious party then proceeded to disperse a great meeting of some of the sans-culottic sections, who had declared themselves to be a permanent assembly, and who were said to be plotting a new insurrection. In a few hours Pichegru appeared in the Convention, and, saying, with a most rare brevity, "Representatives, your decrees are executed," laid down his commandantship. The three ex-dictators were carried safely to Brest, and the authorities there were ordered to ship them off by the first opportunity for the pestifential swamps of French Guiana. But Barrère's shiftiness saved him from this dreadful voyage: he contrived to be left behind at Oleron when the other two set sail with a fair wind—which made a wit observe that this was the first time Barrère had neglected to go with the wind. After two or three other revolutions or insurrections, the revolution of the 18th and 19th Brumaire (1799), when Napoleon Bonaparte upset the Directory with grenadier's bayonets, and established a new kind of tyranny under the name of Consulate, restored him to entire liberty. He returned to Paris and set up a Bonapartist newspaper, entitled the 'Anti-Britannic.' This journal was not very successful, and his employer was far from liberal: he led but a poor life in the coffee-houses and garrets of the centre of the universe. He re-appeared for a moment on the political scene in 1815, on the return of Napoleon from Elba; but after the battle of Waterloo he was exiled by a royal ordonnance, and he died at last in a foreign country in poverty and obscurity. Collot d'Herbois died of fever and drink, on the 8th of January, 1796, or very soon after his arrival in Guiana. Another deported or transported republican—an innocent victim of the tyranny of the Directory—describes him as lying upon the ground in a raging fever, and exposed to a burning sun: in his agony or delirium he had swallowed a whole bottle of brandy, and the negroes who had been appointed to carry him on a brancard from Kouron to Cayenne, a distance of six leagues, had thrown him down to perish. To a surgeon who found him in this sad state, he said, "I have the fever and a burning sweat." "I believe it," rejoined the surgeon; "you are sweating crime!" He expired vomiting froth and blood, invoking the Virgin Mary, and vainly calling for a priest. The pestiferous climate proved less fatal to Billaud-Varennes, who probably drank less brandy: this ex-legislator and dictator betook himself to the taming and educating of parrots and parroquets, with which the country abounded; and the new batch of revolutionists that were sent to Guiana after the revolution of the 18th Fructidor found him surrounded by a numerous family of these noisy loquacious birds, which he had taught to speak French. It appears that after some years he escaped, or was let go, and that he was seen to arrive at New York, in May, 1816, with an appearance very like that of Robinson Crusoe.

The Thermidoriens rapidly organised a strong guard for the protection of the Convention, and by adroit management got all the military force in Paris and its neighbourhood under their immediate control. They then, at first cautiously and afterwards boldly attacked the principles of democracy, and announced that the constitution of 93 was a Decemviral constitution, dictated by terror, and altogether unfit for France. They named a committee of eleven members to prepare what they called organic laws, intimating very plainly that the sans-culottic order were to be excluded not merely from power and office, but also from the right of voting. The Declaration of the Rights of Man was treated as a delusion and an impracticability, and the axiom was emitted that, for the good of the people themselves, there must be a power distinct from and above the people. Foiled and beaten as they had been, the sans-culottes would not submit without a struggle: the faubourgs were again agitated, and the poor were rendered more and more desperate by the continued scarcity of bread and the dearth of all provisions.* They still had some leaders who knew the whole business of revolution-making; and these leaders, as far as their restricted means allowed, organised a new insurrection. On the 1st Prairial, or 20th of May, "in the name of the people in insurrection to obtain bread and to re-possess themselves of their political rights," they proclaimed, at a great meeting in the Faubourg St. Antoine, the establishment of the democratic constitution of 93; the dismissal and arrest of all the present members of government; the liberation of all the patriots; the convocation of primary assemblies for the 25th Prairial; the convocation of a new legislative Assembly to replace the Convention, which ought to have dissolved itself long before; and the immediate suspension of all authority that did not emanate from the people. They resolved to create a new municipality, to seize the barriers, the telegraph, the alarm-guns, the tocsins, and all the drums, and not to allow themselves any rest until they had secured food, tranquillity, liberty, and happiness to all the French. They invited the Parisian cannoneers, the gendarmes, and all the troops on foot or on horseback to rally round the banner of the people; and with an immense multitude at their heels they marched down once more to the Convention, where again many members of the Mountain were ready to favour them, and, in case of success, to make common cause with them against the Thermidoriens and the Girondists. The Conventional guard, strong as it was, was not strong enough to oppose the insurgents: the door was soon broken open, and the hall and the galleries were inundated, chiefly by market-women and other patriotesses, who shouted, "Bread and the Constitution of 93!" According to the accounts of the victorious party, which were published after their victory had been secured, the president and the great body of the Convention preserved a calm and a sublime countenance; but according to other accounts, entitled to just as much credit, a good many of the legislators ran away at once out of the perilous Bedlam. There was more cause for fear than at the irruption of the 12th Ventose, for now most of the sans-culottes had brought their pikes with them, and some of them had muskets and sharp bayonets. The boldest of the deputies called in gendarmes and respectability sections, who, entering the hall by inner doors, charged the petticoat patriots, and drove them out. Then the cry arose from the Place du Carrousel and the Tuileries gardens that the Convention was assassinating the women; and, fired at the words, the men of the Faubourgs St. Antoine, St. Marceau, and the Marais fell to work upon all the closed doors of the palace with hatchets and axes; hammers and crow-bars—the doors flew open, or into pieces, the insurgents entered, and, sweeping away the gendarmes and the sectioners, penetrated into the august Areopagus. The gendarmes tried another charge, and fired a few musket-shot from the galleries—but not many, as the insurgents and the Thermidoriens were mixed, and some of the faubourg-men soon dislodged the gendarmes. In this confusion Deputy Féraud, who came running in from one of the corridors, was shot by a pistol fired by Fréron, the insurgents; and mistaking him for Fréron, the renegade journalist, the patriots fell upon him with their pikes and swords, and then, dragging him into a passage, cut off his head and stuck it upon a pike. By this time every Thermidorien deputy had taken his flight, except Boissy-d'Anglas, or Boissy-Famine, who probably considered himself safer in the interior of the Convention than he would have been outside among the mob. About sixty approving Montagnards remained on their benches to finish, and in their manner legalise, what the people had begun and were doing. Romme, the mathematician, who had made the republican calendar, took the president's chair, and made himself the organ of the sovereign people. The Montagnards, acting as though they were a House, and upon the principle that the Thermidoriens had restored Girondists, having lost the people's confidence, could no longer have a voice in the representation, voted and decreed everything that the insurgents demanded or suggested. They named an executive committee or provisory government, composed of their friends Bourbotté, Duroi, Duquesnoy, and Prieur de la Marne, and appointed Soubrany to be commandant-general of the armed force of Paris. They decreed the recall of Thuriot, Amar, and of all their comrades who had been arrested, the imprisonment of all their enemies in the Convention, the democratic constitution of '93, and the immediate re-establishment of the Jacobin Club. One of the insurgents kept bawling for the space of an hour, "I demand the arrest of all rogues and cowards!" This would have comprehended every man then sitting, or that had been sitting during the last two years in that legislature; but it appears that the demand was not attended to.

* "It would be difficult," said one of the newspapers on the 19th Fructidor, or just eleven days before this insurrection, "to find to-day, on the whole surface of the globe, a people so wretched as those who inhabit the city of Paris. Yesterday we received only two ounces of bread a-piece; and to-day this miserable ration has been diminished. All our streets are re-echoing with the complaints of those who are tormented by hunger!" — Annales Patriotiques.

But, while the Montagnards were voting and decreeing, and the insurgents were shouting and hugging one another for joy, the Thermidoriens who had fled out of the House were bestirring themselves in the city; and, as evening was setting in, Barras, Keruegan, and butcher Legendre returned to the neighbourhood of the palace with an immense force of respectability sectioners, and occupied the Place du Carrousel, the Tuileries gardens, the quays, and all the avenues. The Parisian cannoneers had not joined the patriots, but were now dragging their cannon along the streets to point them against them; and the silly insurgents, who had been besiegers in the morning, were now besieged. They made some resistance, but not much; the sectioners and Freron's Gilded Youth soon penetrated into the Convention Hall with charging bayonets, and Legendre, who was at their head, ordered, in the name of the law, the armed citizens to retire. The insurgents hesitated for a moment, and then, making a rush to every door and window, they ran or leaped out in terrible confusion. Most of the Montagnards vacated their seats and followed the mob at the risk of being crushed to death: the Thermidorien deputies returned, annulled all that their adversaries had done, and ordered the arrest of thirteen or fourteen of the most active of the Montagnards, a number which was more than doubled in the course of the two or three following days, so that the Mountain was purged out as the Gironde had been, until the scarcely visible minority submitted to and was lost in the majority, a pot pourri of all parties and opinions. On the following day, the 2nd Prairial, or 21st of May, the sans-culottes of the faubourgs returned to the charge: they were still better armed, and they had procured some cannon; but the sectioners also were better prepared, more numerous, and had a better park of artillery. The respectabilities were also the first to arrive in force at the Tuileries, and, before the insurgents could point their guns at that unhappy edifice, the artillery of the sections, from behind the iron railing, from the garden and the courts of the palace, was pointed at them. On either side, however, there seemed a reluctance to begin fighting, and, instead of putting their lighted matches to their guns, they began to call one another names, the respectabilities calling the faubourg men "Drinkers of blood," and these calling them "Dandies" (muscadins). The Thermidoriens sitting in the House proposed terms of accommodation, sent commissioners to treat with the insurgents, and admitted to the hall, and accoladed and fraternized with, St. Léger, a commissioner the mob sent in to announce what would satisfy the faubourgs. These terms were as high as they had been yesterday:—the people must have bread and the constitution of '93—the patriots must be released and restored, and the non-patriots sent to Guiana and to prison in their stead—the members of government must be changed, and their places be supplied by true democrats;—and St. Léger vowed that the insurgents had made up their minds to die at their posts rather than lower these demands. But, while he was speechifying and receiving the Judas accolade of the president, the Thermidorien commissioners were cajoling the armed mob, and the respectabilities and the Gilded Youth were increasing and still increasing their forces: the men of the faubourgs, who were only capable of an alacrity in fighting when the odds were decidedly in their favour, were easily induced to retire on the Convention's promising to provide bread and preserve the principles of the constitution of '93. This retreat was fatal to sans-culottism and the Montagnards. Many of the faubourg men were gained over in the course of that day and the following night, and some of the bravest of them resolved never again to join an émeute, since they were now to begin and end in mere talking and calling of names. The man who had shot, or was said to have shot, deputy Féraud was sent to the guillotine. A party of friends rescued him and carried him back to Faubourg St. Antoine. But the heart and strength of that once terrible faubourg had departed; and the sectioners and Gilded Youth not merely re-captured the man, but executed with surprising ease the decree of the Convention to seize the guns, and entirely disarm St. Antoine. The Montagnard deputies now saw that it was not their deportation to Guiana that would satisfy their enemies. Old Ruhl, who had helped to organise the last insurrection, blew out his brains. Romme, Bourbotté, Duroi, Duquesnoy, Soubrany, and Goujon were put upon their trial before a military commission. On hearing the sentence of death, Goujon drew a sharp knife which he had concealed about his person, and, stabbing himself, handed it to Romme; Romme, after making the same use of it, passed it to his next neighbour, and the next to the next: but only Goujon, Romme, and Duquesnoy struck with a firm hand, and died on the spot; the other three, with their wounds open, were carried to the scaffold. The six were fanatics, but far, very far from being the worst men of the Convention: they had been infinitely less sanguinary than many of the Thermidoriens, and their honesty and disinterestedness in money matters were above all suspicion. Jean Bon St. André, Vouland, Robert-Lindet, and David the painter, were thrown into prison as dangerous Montagnards and ultra-Jacobins; and Carnot had a very narrow escape.* Some of this fallen party fled and concealed themselves till the storm was over, and two or three shot or poignarded themselves, declaring that the blessed hope of liberty and equality, and of the peaceful reign of a virtuous democracy in France, was gone for ever. Like the flying and self-murdering Girondists, not one of them appears to have confessed that he and his party had committed imbecile errors and monstrous crimes. The surviving Girondists, who had learned vengeance, but not mercy, from the dreadful sufferings they had undergone during their proscription, were now among the most active and pitiless of the proscribers, and there were men among them who would have been satisfied with nothing less than the utter extermination of their adversaries. As it was, between the 10th Thermidor and the 10th Prairial nearly one hundred Montagnards were militarily condemned and executed, or transported, or incarcerated, or compelled to fly and hide themselves from the sight of man. The victory of the Thermidoriens, and the measures they adopted after it, entirely secured the dominion of the respectability or middle classes. The Parisian gendarmes and cannoners, who were too closely connected with the poorer inhabitants of the capital and its faubourgs, were dissolved and completely disarmed; the national guard was to be re-organized, none being admitted into its ranks that could not show some property or respectability, or some other good proof of their aversion to sans-culottism and to a perennial state of turmoil and insurrection; a regular camp, with artillery constantly in battery, was established in the Tuileries garden under the windows of the Convention; † a strong garrison of troops of the line was cantoned in and round Paris; and finally the entrance to the galleries of the Convention was closed to the mob, who had made so fearful a use of their privilege:—it was decreed that women should be wholly excluded, and that men should only be admitted by members' tickets.

While these things were doing, and while the Thermidoriens and restored Girondists were riding rough-shod over the prostrate democracy, that hapless boy the Dauphin, whom the royalists now fondly called their king, expired in the Temple, in the twelfth year of his age. He had been slowly dying for many months, but it was on the 20th Prairial, or 8th of June, that he was released from his sufferings. Reports were spread that he had been poisoned—idle reports—for the close confinement, and the affliction, and the frightful usage he had undergone were more than sufficient to account for his death, and must have killed him long before if his constitution had not been a very strong one. On the 9th of June his body was opened and examined by four surgeons and physicians, in presence of several commissaries, and their procès verbal was published in the Moniteur. On the 10th of June, in the dusk of the evening, two civil commissaries, and the commissary of the police of the section, repaired to the tower of the Temple "to carry away the body of the son of Louis Capet." They found it naked, and in their presence it was put into a common wooden coffin or shell, and then carried forthwith to the cemetery of Ste. Marguerite, in the street of the Faubourg St. Antoine. It was escorted from station to station, on the way, by detachments of infantry, and was buried in darkness, without prayer or ceremony, like the carcass of a dog. All this was done by the orders and precise directions of the committee of Sûreté Générale, which was not now composed of Maratists or Robespierrists, but of your generous and humane Girondists, and your excellent counter-revolutionary Thermidoriens, who had no longer anything to fear from that rabble to which the brutalities of all parties have been so exclusively and so falsely attributed.

* Carnot was denounced, and his name was set down on the fast lengthening list of proscription; but a Thermidorien deputy observed that Carnot had been a good administrator for the army, and had "organised victory," and at these words the name of Carnot was struck out of the list.

Monsieur, the eldest of the dauphin's uncles, now took the title of king; and, in a religious ceremony which took place at the head-quarters of the emigrant army of Condé, the Prince of Condé pronounced the ancient formula: "Louis XVII. is dead; long live Louis XVIII." The Committee of Eleven, appointed to prepare organic laws, and modify and make fit for action the constitution of '93, soon produced a very new and a very different constitution, which was accepted and decreed by the purged Convention on the 22nd of August. These philosophical statesmen had been brought at last to recognise the necessity of two houses or chambres; and therefore there were to be two elected chambres, one of ancients or seniors, to be called CONSEIL DES ANCIENS, and to consist of 250 members, of the age at least of forty full years; and one of juniors, to be called CONSEIL DES CINQ CENTS, and to consist of 500 members, all of the age of thirty years at least. All the powers of legislation were to be divided between these two elective chambres or councils; and there was to be no third estate, or president,* or any other authority with the faculty of confirming or rejecting laws. As if to place the two councils in a state of direct antagonism and perpetual collision, the Cinq Cents were to have the sole right of proposing and discussing decrees and laws, or seul l'initiative et la discussion des lois; and the Anciens were to have the sole right of confirming or rejecting the decrees and laws, their negative being made as absolute as any royal veto. The committees of government were to be suppressed, and the executive power, separated from the two councils, was to be vested in a directory, consisting of five members, who were all to be elected by the two councils—or, as they expressed it, the directors were to be named by the Council of Ancients, on the presentation of the Council of Five Hundred. These directors were to have the management of the army and the finances, the nomination of public functionaries, and the conducting of negotiations; but they were to do nothing by themselves, but must employ ministers, generals, negotiators, &c., for whose conduct they would be responsible. The judges were to be elective. The Declaration of the Rights of Man had been put in mourning and veiled in crape many times before, but now nearly every principle, line, and word of, it were blotted out by this constitution ink, or painted over, all one black, by the Thermidorien brush. Universal suffrage was declared an abomination; the old distinction of active and passive citizens was to be revived, and the money qualification made necessary both in elected and in electors; and this money qualification was fixed high enough to exclude totally the great body of the common people. The elections, as before, were not to be simple and direct, like ours; but the constituents, in primary assemblies, were to elect electoral assemblies, and those bodies were to elect the representatives.

Assuming that the revolution could only be defended by the men that made it, and that this new constitution could be made to march properly only by its authors, the Convention issued two supplementary decrees, importing that two-thirds of the present members must remain or be re-elected; and that for this time the active citizens, sitting as electoral assemblies, should only have free choice of one-third; and that, in default of the re-election of those two-thirds, the Convention should fill up the vacancies themselves. It was further decided and decreed that the primary assemblies should meet on the 20th Fructidor, or 6th of September, to accept the constitution and its supplement, or reject both. Abbé Sieyès, who had had the chief hand in the concoction of this new scheme of polity, felt convinced that he had now produced the most ingenious, the most perfect, and most enduring of constitutions.

On the appointed day the constitution was accepted and ratified by the townships of France, the primary assemblies voting with overwhelming majorities for a thing they neither understood nor had examined. Oaths again volleyed through France—oaths to live or die by this glorious republican charter. But in Paris a very mixed opposition instantly began to show itself, for each party had hoped to gain something by a new election, and now there was to be only the third of an election! Ultra-Jacobin republicans, men who continued the party or the principles of Romme, Ruffin, and Bourboite, the shuffling middle men of the Convention, who never knew what party to be of, and who were of all parties by turns, the constitutional monarchists, and the disguised ultra-royalists, all joined in shouting usurpation; in declaring that the supplementary decrees plainly showed that the ruling Conventionalists were determined to preserve their tyrannical power at all hazards—that they wanted to perpetuate themselves. The journalists of these strangely mixed parties wrote con vigore, their orators spouted con furore. Section Lepelletier, under the direction of Richer-Serizy, La Harpe, Lacretelle, jun., Vaublanc, and other men of note and literature, flatly declared that they would not accept the supplement, invited the other free sections to join them, and formed a central committee. The majority of the sections accepted the invitation, and agreed at a numerous meeting that the electoral assemblies of Paris should meet on the 10th Vendémiaire in the Théâtre Français; that they should be escorted thither by the armed force of the sections, who should swear to defend them unto death, &c. And, in effect, on the very next day the electors assembled in the theatre to elect new representatives without regard to the decree of the two-thirds; they were presided over by the Duke of Nivernois, a decided royalist and an ancient minister of state, and they were protected by strong detachments of the national guard. In the evening the Convention sent to dissolve the meeting by force; but before their troops arrived the assembly of electors had adjourned for the morrow, and had quietly retired to their several sections. During the night the Convention voted two decrees, one dissolving, as illegal, this meeting or college of electors, and the other embodying, under the name of patriots of '89, some 1500 or 1800 ultra-Jacobins, who had been driven out of the departments, or exposed to great persecution in Paris during the fiercest part of the reaction, and who now seemed ready to fight for any party that would give them bread. These decrees carried terror and consternation through the sections which had committed themselves: section Lepelletier beat to arms; and during the whole of the 12th Vendémiaire, or 4th of October, the committee sat in the convent of Filles St. Thomas, in the Rue Vivienne, surrounded by guards with fixed bayonets and muskets primed, and calling upon all the sections to arm and fight for the freedom of election, and the overthrow of a set of greedy, ambitious, bloodthirsty usurpers. With a consternation as great as that of the section, the Convention ordered Menou, the general of the interior, to march, disarm, and disperse the conspirators. Menou marched accordingly, and with a considerable force; but he was brought to a dead halt in the Rue Vivienne by seeing the muzzles of muskets protruding from every door, gateway, and window, and by hearing a terrible chorus of most resolute shouts; and after hesitating for a few minutes, during which a good many of his volunteers skulked away, he returned speedily to the Convention, who deprived him of his command, and ordered him under arrest as a traitor. Next they named Barras as a proper man to take the command of the troops and put down the insurrection. Barras had acted in this capacity before, and particularly on the critical night when Robespierre was extinguished in the Hôtel-de-Ville; but Barras, though he had served under the old régime, was no soldier, and had a decided aversion to exposing his own person; and this time most people thought that there would be some hard fighting. Some deputies very opportunely thought of Napoleon Bonaparte, the young officer who had contributed so materially to the taking of Toulon, and who had since distinguished himself in the war of Nice and the Maritime Alps. This adventurous young officer, who had owed his promotion to the rank of brigadier-general of artillery to the younger Robespierre, with whom he had lived in the closest intimacy, had fallen into disgrace, had been dismissed the army, and had even suffered a short imprisonment after the revolution of the 9th and 10th Thermidor, being then evidently judged by the Thermidoriens to be a decided ultra-Jacobin and Robespierrist. When Robespierre's papers were seized, a number of letters were found addressed by the young soldier of fortune to the dictator. Besides, other members of his family, and particularly his brother Lucien, had distinguished themselves by their ultra-republican eloquence or vehemence in the Jacobin clubs in the South;* and, though no one would now suspect Napoleon Bonaparte of ever having been a Jacobin in heart, or believe that his Jacobinism was anything more than an indispensable means of promoting his advancement, and procuring places for his brothers, and a subsistence for his impoverished mother and sisters, it must be admitted that the Thermidoriens had some grounds for their suspi-

* Various attempts have been made to disguise or deny the fact of the early Jacobinism of Joseph, Napoleon, and Lucien Bonaparte (Louis and Jerome were mere children); but Lucien himself, in attempting to palliate, clearly admits the fact in his own memoirs (Mémoires de Lucien Bonaparte, Prince de Canino, écrits par lui-même, London, 1836). When Napoleon gained his first promotion in the artillery, his elder brother Joseph was appointed a commissary of war, and Lucien was made a sort of clerk of the commissariat, being placed in the bureau or office of military subsistences at St. Maximin, a little town near Marseilles. Lucien had figured in the tribune of the Jacobin society at Marseilles before this; but at St. Maximin, as he tells us himself in his memoirs, "the popular favour carried him rapidly from the presidential chair of the Jacobin club of that town to the presidency of the Revolutionary Committee." It was in these local committees that nearly all the mischief and horrors were brewed that desolated the departments. In his memoirs, published forty-two years after those bloody doings, Lucien speaks of the atrocities with becoming reprobation; but we cannot perceive that he entertained these feelings at the time when Jacobinism was triumphant. Lucien also tells us he went by the name of Brutus, and that in a few days he acquired a little dictatorship; that his spontaneous Jacobin zeal kept the prisons of St. Maximin well filled with suspects; but he takes credit to himself for having prevented an emissary of the committee of Public Safety removing these unfortunate victims to Orange, where he knew they would all be murdered. On the downfall of Robespierre one of these suspects (at St. Maximin, as elsewhere, all persons of respectability or property were included in this category) denounced M. Lucien as a Robespierrest and Terrorist, and the Corsican Brutus, with other Terrorists of the town, was in his turn thrown into prison. The excuse which Lucien pleads for others, he might well have pleaded for himself and his two elder brothers,—they were poor and dependent; employment was to be obtained only by and through the Jacobins; when once employed, the slightest suspicion of aristocracy or moderatism, the least symptom of lukewarmness, might have sent them to the guillotine: the terrible and inexorable en avant! en avant!—forward! forward!—of the fierce democracy must have resounded incessantly behind them as it did behind others. And on several occasions they may have been reduced very nearly to what Lucien calls "the infernal alternative of kill—or die!"

So destitute were the rest of the family, Madame Bonaparte (a widow), Louis, Jerome, Elize, Pauline, and Caroline, on their arrival from Corsica, that, under the claim of refugee patriots, they had rations of bread from the republican government. Madame Mère was an excellent manager, and through her economy and method, and some slight contributions from the pay of her three eldest sons, who had obtained employments, she and the rest were enabled to live.

cions. After lying under arrest for a fortnight—which time, it is said, he chiefly occupied in studying the map of Upper Italy—he had been liberated by the Convention, and had been allowed to serve out the remainder of the campaign of 1794. But ever since the spring of the present year he had been in Paris vainly soliciting employment. He had been offered the command of a brigade of infantry in the Vendée; but that appointment he had refused. He had entertained some thoughts of going to Constantinople and entering into the service of the Sultan. At the critical moment—on the night of the 12th Vendémiaire—when Menou was dismissed, he was sitting in the gallery of the House. He was well known to Carnot, Tallien, and other members of the Convention as a man of head and of action; and it is added that either Carnot or Barras himself said, "I have the very man we want for this business: it is that little Corsican officer, who will not stand upon ceremony!" The young brigadier was instantly called before the committee of Cinq Cents; and, after some hesitation and considerable embarrassment, he consented to accept the command under Barras, and to do all the needful work. There was no time to lose: he sent adjutant Murat to secure and bring up all the artillery which had been removed from the Tuileries to the camp of Sablons. Murat, with such men as he could most speedily collect, made a rush for the spot; section Lepelletier, with the same intention, was already in motion for the camp; but the brave and rapid son of the innkeeper and postmaster of Cahors got there first, and made sure of the guns. These were only guarded by some twenty men!—a few minutes, and Murat would have been too late! While the Convention sat in permanent session through the night, Bonaparte quickly drew his lines of defence round the Tuileries, and along the adjoining quays on the north bank of the Seine. He had about 5000 regular troops under arms; and the 1500 or 1800 patriots of '89; but his main reliance was upon the cannon, which he loaded with grape-shot and placed at the head of the various avenues through which the insurgents must advance. He sent 800 muskets, with ball cartridge, into the Convention, with the hope that the honourable members would make good use of them in case of extremity—a proposition which is said to have made the honourable members look very grave. Betimes in the morning of the 13th Vendémiaire—the 5th of October, and the anniversary of the march of the Parisian mob to Versailles—the sectioners were in motion; but many of the national guards did not answer the call to arms; several of the sections were altogether backward, and long delays ensued. At length, about the hour of noon, section Lepelletier seized the church of St. Roch, and drove in some piquets near the Pont Neuf. Then there was another pause, which lasted till near four o'clock in the afternoon, Bonaparte wisely waiting to be attacked, and his adversaries hesitating as to how it was to be done, or waiting for more force. Having been anticipated by Murat at the camp of Sablons, they had no artillery—apparently not so much as a single gun; the number of their national guardmen is variously stated at 20,000, 30,000, or 40,000; but it is doubtful whether half of the smallest of these numbers ever debouched and came into action, or near the scene of action:—it may be that half of the largest of these numbers would not be an overstatement, if there were taken into the account battalions that lay in the cross streets out of the fire of the artillery, and others that meant to join in the conflict when the certainty of success should be demonstrated. They were commanded, or at least headed, by General Danican, a brave officer of noble birth, the Count Maulevrier, and Lafond-de-Soule, who had belonged to the garde du corps of Louis XVI.* It is scarcely possible to believe that even a third part of the sections would follow such leaders. When section Lepelletier first came in sight of the conventional troops, they waved their hats, and intimated by other signs and words that they wished to fraternize. Women with dishevelled hair ran between the two armies, crying "Peace! peace!" But none of these appeals made the smallest impression on the men that manned the guns; for things were not now as they were on the 10th of August, 1792, when the cannoneers stationed to defend the Tuileries turned, at the first call of the insurgent people, the mouths of their guns against the palace. A little after four o'clock a part of the sections began to move in several columns along the quays and the Rue St. Honoré. As soon as they were within musket-shot, they were ordered to disperse in the name of the law; they answered by discharging their muskets, and thereupon Bonaparte's gunners opened a murderous fire of grape-shot and canister. The effect was instantaneous and decisive, for, although some desperate men returned to the charge once or twice, and attempted to carry the guns, the mass of those who had come into action ran from the open ground under cover of the houses and churches, and into the side streets where the cannon shot could not reach them. The party which had occupied the church of St. Roch attempted to maintain themselves there, although their position lay exposed to the fire of the artillery: it was here that the greatest number of lives were lost, but when about two hundred had fallen the post was evacuated. A few hundred that clustered about the Théâtre de la République were dislodged by a few shells. According to Bonaparte's own account, the fighting, which had not properly begun till half-past four, was all over by six. Faint attempts to erect barricades in the streets were defeated by rapid movements; and the scattered and

* General Danican, after driving in 400 or 500 men stationed at the Pont Neuf, sent a flag of truce to summon the Convention to withdraw their troops and disarm the Terrorists; that is, the 1500 or 1800 ultra-Jacobins whom the legislature had taken into their pay under the more attractive name of patriots of '89. The bearer of this flag of truce was blindfolded and conducted into the hall of the Convention. His message threw the House into great doubt and trepidation, for, notwithstanding the monopoly of guns and grape-shot, and the reported genius of the young artillery officer in command of them, victory, to the majority, seemed anything rather than certain. Several members recommended conciliatory measures—a negotiation, a treaty with the insurgents. Boissy-d'Anglas was of opinion that a conference ought to be opened with Danican. Gammon recommended a proclamation, in which the Convention should engage the citizens to retire, promising them the immediate disarming and dismissal of the battalion of '89. Lanjuinais supported Gammon's motion, dwelling upon the dangers and horrors of civil war: but Cheuier said there was nothing for the Convention but victory or death; and, on the motion of Fermond, the House passed to the order of the day. They continued, however, in a state of hesitation till about half-past four o'clock, when a heavy firing announced that the battle had begun. The muskets were then brought into the hall, and the honourable deputies armed themselves.

The victory was complete; the ill-combined sectioners, who would soon have turned their arms against each other if success had attended them, could never rise again. The victors, though not very moderate in their vengeance, were incomparably less sanguine than any triumphant party had hitherto been. Tallien and some other conventionalists would have annulled the elections of the third, or of all the new deputies returned in virtue of the constitution and the supplementary decree, and would have suspended the new constitution itself before it came well into action—setting it aside as they had formerly shelved Herault de Sechelles's masterpiece, or the democratic constitution of 1793—but the majority, after some ferocious debating, negatived both these propositions. The House then formed itself into an “Electoral National Assembly,” to complete in its own bosom the two-thirds—that is, to name themselves the members that were to remain, and the members that were to go out to make room for the third who had been elected by the people, or by their electoral colleges. Next, they divided themselves, according to their several ages, into Council of Ancients and Council of Five Hundred; and, all this being done, they proceeded to elect out of their own body or bodies the five directors. The Directors thus chosen were Sieyes, la Réveillère-Lepeaux, Rewbell, Letourneur, and Barras. They were to preside, turn and turn about, each for three months at a time; and he who presided was to keep the great seals and sign for the whole Directory. Every year one-fifth of this Directory was to be renewed; that is, one director was to retire annually, and make room for a new one. By this rapid rotation all the leading members of the convention might hope to be directors in their turns. A military guard and a sort of civil list were conferred upon them, and the palace of the Luxembourg was appointed for their residence. Sieyes, out of antipathy and hatred to his colleague Rewbell, or through calculation, or perhaps out of a vain desire to show that, if his perfect constitution did not work quite so well as its admirers had anticipated, it was because those intrusted with its execution did not perform their duty ably or honestly, very soon resigned, and was succeeded by Carnot. Except la Réveillère-Lepeaux, all these first directors had been Montagnards and ultra-Jacobins. They published an amnesty for political offences, changed the name of the Place de la Révolution into that of Place de la Concorde, and they intimated in sundry speeches and diplomatic papers that the French republic, all conquering as it was, was not averse to peace upon fair and honourable terms. Yet, on the 30th of September, when the Convention had organized the new constitution, and was sliding into its new names and appointed forms, it had been decreed that the Austrian Netherlands were for ever incorporated with the republic. And the instant that Carnot became director all his attention was directed to plans of conquest for Germany and Italy. The Directory offered to liberate the sister of the dauphin (afterwards Duchess of Angoulême), the sole sad survivor of the prisoners of the Temple, upon condition that the emperor should restore the commissioners of the Convention whom Dumouriez had given up to him—Lamarque, Drouet (the hero of Varennès), Quinette, Bancal, Beurnonville, and starch Camus. The exchange being agreed to, the young princess, with a face and a heart already made old by grief, was removed from the Temple on the 19th of December, by the minister of the interior, who carried her to his own house, whence she immediately departed for Germany. She arrived at Vienna on the 9th of January (1796), as poor and forlorn as well might be. The only property she brought with her was a small parcel of linen, some miniatures, some hair of her father, mother, and the Princess Elizabeth, her aunt, with a few other relics she had gathered and preserved in her horrible prison.*

Notwithstanding the confident predictions of ministers in the last session of parliament, the dearness of bread and general scarcity of provisions had increased in Great Britain, and the poorer classes had certainly suffered severe privations ever since the beginning of the year.† The successes of the French, and the defections from the coalition, together with some harsh practices used at home for recruiting the army, had to some extent rendered the war unpopular and hopeless. We had no brilliant victory by sea to set off against the triumphs of our enemies by land, nor could ministers quote so much as the acquisition of one unhealthy sugar-island. The common council of the city of London passed, by a vast majority, a petition for peace, wherein was contained a severe criticism on the origin and conduct of the war, and Southwark and various other cities and boroughs followed this example. Counter-addresses were indeed procured by ministers, but their tone was thought to be but faint and languid. The political societies took advantage of the prevailing discontents, and laboured hard to give them growth and increase. At the end of June a numerous meeting was held in St. George's Fields to petition for annual parliaments and universal suffrage: a riot was apprehended, and the volunteers of the metropolis were drawn out on Kennington Common; but the day passed over with nothing worse than some very bad speeches. The harvest, however, had been very abundant, bread was becoming comparatively cheap, and the worst cause of alarm was gradually subsiding by the month of October. On the 26th of October the London Corresponding Society called a general meeting in the fields between Islington and Copenhagen House. The multitude that assembled was vaguely computed at 50,000; but it was a fine day, and it appears that the majority of those present were merely seeking a little amusement. Three rostra were erected, and one John Binns was called to open the business of the day, which he stated to be—an address to the nation on its critical and calamitous state; a remonstrance to his majesty on the neglect and contempt shown to some previous addresses presented to ministers, and certain resolutions as to the best mode of remedying the existing evils of the country. The multitude were informed that every man among them who chose to make a speech might do so, and was invited to do it, whether he were a member of the Corresponding Society or not. But not a single individual of all those thousands accepted the invitation, so Thelwall, who had been so recently acquitted of high treason at the Old Bailey, got upon one speaking-place, Gale Jones got upon another, and one Hodson occupied the third, and these three Society-men (no doubt, much to their own satisfaction) had all the speech-making to themselves, with an occasional word from Mr. president Binns. The address, remonstrance, and resolutions were all agreed to—though many of the men and women and little boys and girls present could hardly hear a word of them—and it was ordered that they should all be printed and distributed at the expense of the Corresponding Society. It was a glorious day for Copenhagen House, for the other nearest taverns, and for the itinerants who sold hot buns; and the meeting dispersed with the most perfect tranquillity. Ministers had, however, taken the alarm, and had convoked parliament for an unusually early day.

* Thiers makes an attempt to show that the directors behaved with respect and kindness to this most unfortunate of women. He says they provided liberally for her journey. He, however, states that Count Carletti, minister at Paris from the Grand Duke of Tuscany (the maternal uncle of the princess), applying for leave to see the released captive, received from the Directory no other answer than an immediate order to quit Paris. Thiers, indeed, interweaves in this striking anecdote a suspicion that the directors suspected Carletti, who was always boasting his love for France and for republicanism, of being at heart no friend to the French.

On the 29th of October, as the king was going down to the House of Lords, to open the session in person, he was surrounded by a numerous mob who had previously hissed the Earl of Chatham, the Duke of Portland, and his Royal Highness of Gloucester, and who now hooted and groaned at his majesty, and clamorously demanded peace and the dismissal of Mr. Pitt, and cheaper bread. As the state-coach came opposite to the Ordnance Office, then in St. Margaret Street, a pebble or a marble thrown by a vigorous hand, or a ball discharged from an air-gun, went through one of the glasses, and passed between the king and Lord Westmoreland, who was in the coach with him. His majesty said, "That's a shot!" and on entering the House of Lords he said to the chancellor (Loughborough), "My lord, I have been shot at!" A number of persons were immediately arrested and carried for examination into the Duke of Portland's office; the glass of the carriage was examined, and the clean round hole in it seemed to leave little doubt that it had been made by a bullet. Waiting the result of these examinations, no business was done by the Lords till near six o'clock, when Lord Westmoreland, having previously moved that strangers should withdraw, related in a formal manner the insult and outrage with which the king had been treated, adding that his majesty and those who had accompanied him were of opinion that the glass had been broken by a ball from an air-gun, which had been discharged from a bow-window of a house adjoining the Ordnance Office, with a view to assassinate the king. On going back from the House to St. James's Palace, a stone was thrown which struck the wood-work between the windows of the state coach; there was a good deal of hooting and shouting, "Bread! Bread! and no Pitt!" some of the mob, either by design, or because they were driven forward by the living heaving masses behind them (the crowd having swelled prodigiously), got so near to the coach that the king, somewhat agitated, made a motion to the horse-guards who rode on either side of him, to keep them off; and, as his majesty was about to alight at St. James's, one of the carriage horses taking fright threw down an old groom and broke one of his thighs. After the king had entered the palace some fellows in the mob threw stones at the carriage and did it much injury. Staying but a short time at St. James's, the king put himself in a private coach and drove to Buckingham House, the usual residence of the queen and the princesses. He was again surrounded in the park, but, while part of the crowd cried "Bread, Bread! Peace, Peace!" another part cheered and applauded him, and a detachment of horse-guards presently dispersed them all. No bullet—though we believe one was used—was ever found, and neither air-gun nor plot was ever discovered, although the most determined search was made for both. All that was clear was that there were some ill-mannered ruffians in London (no surprising fact in a population of near a million), and that some one villain or madman had fired at the king. The great mass of the people of London, as of the whole nation, were filled with disgust and horror, and were really animated by a loyalty which suspicion ought not to have reached. The king himself seemed to show that he did not suspect them, for he went the very next night with the queen and three of his daughters to Covent Garden theatre, where he was received with enthusiastic bursts of applause, and where the audience made the actors sing 'God save the King' three times over. Some few critics in a corner of the gallery, venturing a few hisses at the third call for the national anthem, were presently ejected with torn coats and sore bones. The nation in no way merited the strong coercive bills which ministers immediately prepared for it—bills which were almost enough to provoke and create the evils they were intended to prevent.

had made the most of the check which the French had received from the Austrians on the Rhine. It also said that the ruin of their commerce, the diminution of their maritime power, and the unparalleled financial embarrassments of the French seemed to have induced them to have some wish for peace; and it gave the assurance that any disposition on their part to negotiate for a general peace on just and suitable terms would not fail to be met on the part of his majesty with an earnest desire to give it the fullest and speediest effect. The directorial government, which had certainly put down anarchy, had scarcely yet been tried in its foreign relations; and the speech held out a hope (a most unfounded hope) that the rage of foreign conquest was abating in France. Still, however, energy was recommended, in order to meet the possible continuance of the war, and improve our maritime superiority.

The first consequence of the late riot was a proclamation offering 1000*l.* for the discovery of any person guilty of the outrages against his majesty's person. This was followed by another proclamation enjoining all magistrates and well-affected subjects to exert themselves in suppressing all unlawful meetings and the dissemination of seditious writings. These were but preludes to more stringent measures. On the 6th of November, Lord Grenville introduced in the House of Lords a bill "for the safety and preservation of his majesty's person and government against treasonable and seditious practices and attempts." And on the same day a bill was brought into the Commons by Pitt, "for the prevention of seditious meetings." These bills, which went to restrict the right of the people to assemble for petitioning the crown and the legislature, and for discussing political subjects, were warmly opposed in all their stages and in both Houses, as violent and unnecessary encroachments on popular liberty and the privileges granted or acknowledged by our constitution, but they were both carried by majorities even larger than usual: for many men, without any rational link, had chosen to connect the meeting in the Copenhagen fields with the outrages offered to the king; and others were of opinion that the unchecked harangues of the Thelwalls and Hodsons, the Binnses and the Gale Joneses, might lead the people into excesses. In this frame of mind the majority would probably have voted the bills in perpetuity; but it was thought proper to limit their duration to three years. With the Habeas Corpus Act suspended, with these new enactments, and with a fast increasing shoal of spies and informers, it can scarcely be denied that the freedom, tranquillity, and domestic enjoyment of Englishmen were placed in great jeopardy; and a reference to the accumulating prosecutions and trials of the day will show an uneasy and unhappy state of society, the result of the political intemperance and madness of a few, and the fears and suspicions of the many—for the majority of the nation more than shared in the panic of those who governed them.

On the 8th of December a message from the King was delivered to both Houses, stating that the present order of things in France would induce his majesty to meet any disposition for negotiation on the part of the enemy with an earnest desire to conclude a treaty for a general peace; and that his majesty hoped that the spirit and determination manifested by his parliament, added to the recent and important successes of the Austrian armies, and to the continued and growing embarrassments of the enemy, might speedily conduce to the attainment of this great object. In the debates on the address to be returned to this message the opposition insisted that it was absurd to pretend that any of the recent changes in the French government rendered that nation either more or less fit to be treated with now than it had been last session, or the session before, or at any other period when that side of the House had recommended entering into pacific negotiations. The address was, however, carried in both Houses, by the usual high majorities, and thus a most delusive hope was held out to the people that the war was really about to be terminated.

A. D. 1796. After the Christmas recess Mr. Grey, in the Commons, made a motion to bind the country to a peace, complaining that, contrary to general expectation, the ministry, in lieu of opening negotiations, were making preparations for continuing the war. Pitt said that there was a sincere desire of peace if it could be obtained on honourable terms, but that the country could not break her faith with the allies that remained true to her, or consent to any arrangement which should leave the French in possession of Belgium, Holland, Savoy, Nice, &c.; and he added, rather haughtily, that it was for ministers to determine when and how negotiations should be opened. Mr. Grey's motion was negatived by 190 against 50.

On the 10th of March the same honourable member moved that the House should resolve itself into a committee to inquire into the state of the nation. In his speech he dwelt upon the enormous expenses and the hopeless prospects of the war. Within the last three years 77,000,000*l.* had been added to the national debt; to pay the interest of which taxes had been imposed amounting to 2,600,000*l.* per annum. The American war, from first to last, had not cost us so much as this—the debt contracted on that account did not exceed 63,000,000*l.* He represented our commerce as declining, and the country as reduced to a state in which it could bear no new taxes. Pitt and his adherents insisted that the commerce of the country had increased and was rapidly increasing; and with bold faces they attempted to justify an expenditure which was in good part unjustifiable, for large sums had been thrown away in absurd projects, and still larger sums had been allowed to be robbed by jobbers, contractors, commissaries, and the other harpies that were fattening on a misconducted war, or reaping a golden harvest at every blunder committed in the conduct of it. The opposition, however, committed a political error in constantly repeating that England was ruined and never could compete with France; and Pitt bitterly accused them of taking pains to encourage the French to assume the arrogance of dictating the terms of peace. Mr. Grey's motion was negatived by 207 against 45. A few weeks later, on the 6th of May, he moved a long series of resolutions charging ministers with numerous acts of misappropriation of the public money, in flagrant violation of various acts of parliament, and of presenting false accounts calculated to mislead the judgment of the House; but the order of the day was also carried against this motion by a majority of 209 to 38. On the 10th of the same month a motion was made in the House of Commons, by Fox, and another in the Peers, by Lord Guildford, for an address to the crown upon the manner in which the war with France had been misconducted, and against its continuance. Mr. Wickham, our envoy to the Swiss Cantons, had already had some communication with Barthelemy, the French negotiator in chief: ministers urged that these communications were quite sufficient to induce the republic to treat, if it really had any pacific intention; the opposition said that Mr. Wickham had not done enough to conciliate the French: the ministerial majority was, in the Lords 110 against 10, in the Commons 216 against 42. In the course of the session two budgets were produced, and two new loans contracted, amounting together to 25,500,000*l.* The supplies granted for the year were, for the navy, 7,522,552*l.*; for the army, 11,911,899*l.*; for the ordnance, 1,954,665*l.*; for miscellaneous and extraordinary services, 13,821,430*l.* An absurd tax upon printed linens and calicoes was removed; a paltry tax upon dogs, and a still more paltry one upon hats (estimated to produce together 140,000*l.*), and a tax of 20*l.* a tun upon wine, which was calculated to produce 600,000*l.*, were laid on. On the 19th of May the session was closed by a speech from the throne, which expressed the happy effects experienced from the provisions adopted for suppressing sedition and restraining the progress of principles subversive of all established government.

In the course of the summer, Burke, to persuade or to shame a part of the country out of its fears, and to prove that there was more danger in treating with the French than in fighting with them, published the two first of his celebrated 'Letters on a Regicide Peace.' These two Letters, the last of his writings he lived to give to the world, and the two others that were published after his death, are to be classed among the most splendid efforts of his great mind. The war had been conducted on a very different system from the one he had proposed; but the monstrous errors which had been committed did not make him despair of the final result, provided only a check could be given to that despondence which had seized upon many minds, and which the opposition were inculcating and promoting. "To a people," said he, "who have been once proud and great, and great because they were proud, a change in the national spirit is the most terrible of all revolutions!" The Letters, which were soon to be looked upon as a dying legacy to his country, had a decided effect in re-animating those whose spirit had been drooping. Nevertheless Pitt considered himself obliged to continue the overtures which had been made to Barthelemy at Basle. Mr. Wickham asked whether the Directory were desirous to negotiate with Great Britain and her allies on moderate and honourable conditions, and would agree to a meeting of a congress for this purpose. Barthelemy replied that the Directors sincerely desired peace, but must positively insist on keeping Belgium, or all the Austrian dominions in the Low Countries, as they had been formally annexed to the French Republic by a constitutional decree which could not be revoked. It was after these overtures that the Directory, who had already adopted the principle that England was to be ruined only through her commerce, issued and enforced a severe decree, preventing the admission of English goods, not merely into any part of France and Belgium, but into any of the French dependencies, among which were now to be reckoned Holland and the German States on the Rhine. In the very country where the pacific overtures were made, the French were dictating the law, and domineering in the most insolent manner. In the preceding year a democratic revolution, under their auspices, had been effected in Geneva, where the sans-culottes established a revolutionary tribunal, which capitally condemned several of the principal citizens, and banished or imprisoned many more; and it was already made evident—as much by the mad fury of the native democrats as by the tone and the increasing power of the French—that all the cantons of Switzerland would be converted into helpless dependencies of France. Never had the Gallie propagandism been more insidious and active, and, perhaps, at no previous period had it been so successful; for, although the Thermidoriens and the Directors had blotted out the vaunted Rights of Man, and every day and hour proved the fallacy of the popular dream of liberty and equality and the unlimited sovereignty of the people, both their public and their secret agents in foreign countries were still repeating the old naked Jacobin principles, in order to excite the people to insurrection against their governments, and to co-operation with the liberating armies of France. Moreover, at the very same time, the Directors were fostering and entertaining at Paris a number of Irish revolutionists, and were contemplating a grand expedition to Ireland, to co-operate with our rebellious subjects, and to convert that country into another small dependency. Nay, to such length had matters gone, that in the preceding month of June the Directory had concluded a treaty with Wolfe Tone, Arthur O'Connor, and Lord Edward Fitzgerald, the leaders of the Irish revolutionists, who had smuggled themselves over to Paris for that purpose; and, though all unknown to his lordship, a copy of that secret treaty was lying not many yards from the spot where they, in October, pretended to enter upon a pacific conference with the noble English envoy. This they were doing while pretending a desire to treat; and yet they indignantly complained of an English mission sent to the court of Berlin, which mission, they said, could only be intended to bring Prussia back to the coalition. Afterwards they affirmed that it was on account of the failure of this mission that Pitt was induced to renew his overtures to France. In the autumn, not, we believe, with the slightest hope of bringing the negotiation to any admissible end, our government actually applied for passports for an ambassador and suite to go to Paris. "Thus," says Thiers, who can still chuckle over the matter, "the English aristocracy were reduced to sue for peace to the regicide Republic! . . . This striking proceeding on the part of our most implacable enemy had something glorious in it for our republic!" As Thiers feels now, even so felt—but only much more intensely—the republicans then. The step raised their presumption and confidence by many degrees: it was a gigantic faux-pas in politics, from which the trumpet-tongue of Burke ought to have warned every statesman, every Englishman: its effects were likely to be as mischievous as all the blunders united which had been committed in the conduct of the war; but the opposition had driven for this, and Pitt had thought it necessary to prove to the nation that a peace with France was not attainable. Lord Malmesbury and his numerous retinue arrived at Paris on the 22nd of October. The five kings of the Luxembourg—the Directors were fast assuming a very regal state—appointed their minister of foreign affairs to confer with his lordship, who proposed mutual restitution of conquests as the fundamental principle of a treaty. The successes of England in the East and West Indies, at the Cape of Good Hope, &c., placed her out of the condition of requiring restitutions for herself; but, as France had made large acquisitions from the allies of England, the present negotiation must turn upon the compensations France would expect for the restitutions she was expected to make. England, on her part, would make restitutions, but not without some compensations. Delacroix, who had not the shadow of a power intrusted to him, withdrew to consult the Directors. These honourable men intimated that England had better treat by and for herself, and leave her allies to shift for themselves; considerably adding, however, that, if he could obtain credentials from those allies, they would take into consideration any specific proposals his lordship might have to make. With a contempt for all the rules of diplomacy they published in the Moniteur the notes and observations of Lord Malmesbury, and the answers of Delacroix. After several discussions his lordship, on the 14th of November, stated that it was usual for the ambassador of one allied power to demand to treat in the name of its allies, without being named plenipotentiary by each and all of them; that, for the rest, England was sure of obtaining the consent of her allies to all that was reasonable; and that he must request the Directory to explain themselves clearly as to the principle of restitution and compensation, as without restitution of territory on the part of France there could be no treaty. The directors replied, that they admitted the principle of compensations, but that his lordship must instantly state what compensations he had to offer. On the very next day the directors hurried off to Vienna General Clarke,* to endeavour to lead the emperor into a separate negotiation, or, failing in that, to render the English cabinet doubtful and jealous of their steadiest ally. Clarke failed completely in his mission; he was even refused admission into the Austrian capital. When the mock negotiations had lasted six or seven weeks, Lord Malmesbury intimated that Belgium must be restored to the emperor, that Holland must be evacuated, and the Prince of Orange reinstated in the stadtholderate, and that Russia and Portugal must be included as parties to the new treaty, as well as all our other allies; that, in return, England would give up the Dutch and French colonies she had seized in the East and West Indies, only requiring some compensation, or an equivalent, for the half of San Domingo, which Spain had ceded to France. The directors required him to define what this compensation or equivalent was to be, and to state categorically all his demands within four-and-twenty hours, telling him that they could never listen to terms inconsistent with the constitution, and the engagements formed by the republic; meaning thereby that, as by the constitution the republic was one and indivisible, and as a decree, called a constitutional act, had annexed Belgium, Luxembourg, &c. to the republic, they must never be ceded. As the unfortunate King of Sardinia had been compelled to sue for a separate peace in the spring, no restitution was demanded of the states of Savoy and Nice, although England could hardly have intended at that moment to submit to the French occupying those two countries, or to recognise the spoliation of an ally who had kept his faith to the utmost limits of his power. To the last haughty message Lord Malmesbury replied, that their requisition precluded all further negotiation; and on the next day, the 19th of December, his lordship was told that his further presence in Paris was totally unnecessary, and that he and his suite must take their departure within forty-eight hours. Rejoicing in the opportunity of insulting a lord, the low-bred directors added, that a common courier could do the business as well as he, if the English government were disposed to accept the conditions of the republic.* Between the overtures made to Barthelemy at Basle and the journey of Lord Malmesbury, Bonaparte had obtained most of his brilliant successes in the north of Italy. Spain had been driven to declare war against Great Britain (on the 8th of October); Genoa had just shut her ports against our shipping; and the King of Naples had concluded a peace with France. With their hopes elated, with the plunder of Italy flowing fast into their coffers, with a confident and happy belief in the assertions of our parliamentary opposition, that Great Britain was exhausted and undone, the directors thought that they had everything to gain and nothing to lose by continuing the war. At the same time they had much to fear from any discontinuance of it; for in case of a peace what could they do with the countless armed legions they had on foot? These hosts were now supporting themselves on the countries they overran, and even paying the Directory for their licence to plunder; but, should they be recalled to France, there was slight provision for them there, and any sudden influx of them must inevitably lead to fresh revolutions, and the destruction of the present system, with its Cinq Cents, its Ancients, and its Directory.

* This Clarke was descended from an Irish family settled in France. In his youth he had been a page to the Duke of Orleans (Philippe Egalité), and was a captain of dragoons when the revolution broke out. At this moment he was a general officer, and employed in the war-office under Carnot, who was his warm protector. Under the empire he became Duke de Feitze, and obtained the reputation of being one of the greatest plunderers in Bonaparte's army.

Persevering in their old system, the English government sent out some large reinforcements to the West Indies. We had already more sugar colonies than we needed, and most of the French and Dutch colonies were wretchedly unhealthy—charnel-houses to the British troops that were sent to them—but the managers of the war are entitled to the benefit of the doubt, whether without actual possession of the French islands, at least, we could have put down the terrible system of Victor Hugues, or kept Barbadoes, Jamaica, and our other really valuable islands in anything like a tranquil and thriving state. In the month of March, General Nichols recovered from the French insurgents the island of Grenada; and in May, General Abercrombie, who was fitted for a wider and more glorious field, regained entire possession of St. Lucie. General Whyte captured the Dutch settlements of Demerara, Berbice, and Essequibo; and these, with the addition of some skirmishes with French republicans and negro republicans in San Domingo, where a small English army was perishing rapidly of the diseases of the climate, were all our operations for the year in this part of the world.

The Dutch or Batavian republicans made a bold effort to recover possession of the Cape of Good Hope. They fitted out in the Texel two ships of 64, and two of 54 guns, six or seven frigates and sloops, and embarked in them some of their best land troops. The Texel was blockaded by a British squadron; but, taking advantage of a temporary absence, the Dutch squadron escaped to sea on the 23rd of February. A French squadron had engaged to join them, but failed in so doing.

* Just two days before this message General Hoche stole out of Brest harbour with 25,000 men for Ireland.

Where the Dutch had passed the spring and summer months no one could tell; but on the 3rd of August they appeared, with nine sail, off Saldanha Bay. Rear-Admiral Sir George K. Elphinstone immediately set sail from the Cape, with seven sail of the line, one 50-gun ship and three frigates, and to this superior force the Dutch admiral, surprised in Saldanha Bay, and unable to escape out of it, surrendered without firing a shot on the 17th of August.* Towards the close of the year some frigates belonging to the Cape of Good Hope squadron destroyed a French settlement on the island of Madagascar, and brought away five merchant vessels that were lying there.

There were numerous encounters between single ships and small squadrons, attended with the usual amount of success to the English; but there was no great battle fought at sea in any part of the world; the Brest fleet keeping in port till the end of the year, and the Toulon fleet doing the same. In October the Spanish admiral Don Juan Langara sailed from Cadiz as the ally of the French, and, chasing the squadron of Admiral Mann before him, entered the Mediterranean with nineteen sail of the line and ten frigates. At Carthage the Spaniard added seven more sail of the line to his fleet. He thence proceeded to Corsica, and there covered the landing of a French invading force which had been shipped off from Leghorn. The English Mediterranean fleet had been madly divided and scattered on various detached services, or Don Juan would never have ventured thus far.† As it was, as soon as he had seen the French troops safely landed, he made haste into Toulon harbour, and there joined Admiral Villeneuve. The united French and Spanish fleets, thirty-seven sail of the line at the least, made no very heroic use of their immense superiority: they only kept a few cruisers out at sea, and when Sir John Jervis, who had succeeded Admiral Hotham in the command of our fleet, was quitting the Mediterranean with troops and stores, and suffering a variety of misfortunes, no attack was attempted, and, after little more than a parade of his formidable numbers, Don Juan de Langara returned to Carthage. Commodore Nelson hung off the Riviere of Genoa, arduously attempting to assist the Austrians and Piedmontese—who were not to be assisted—until the battle of Montenotte. Months after that affair he discovered between Toulon and Genoa six vessels laden with cannon and stores for the siege of Mantua: he drove them under a battery, followed them, silenced the battery, and captured the whole. The loss of this artillery is said to have been one of the main causes which compelled the French to raise their first siege at Mantua.‡

* The Dutch ships that were taken were two 64's, one 54, five frigates and sloops, and one store-ship.

† The English ships were not merely divided by a multiplicity of services rendered necessary by the rapid progress of the French army in Italy, but also by the wavering councils, the rapid and contradictory orders, and counter-orders they received. Nelson exclaimed, "Do his majesty's ministers know their own minds?" The question might certainly have been answered with a negative.

‡ In the captured convoy were found military books, plans, and

When the French seized Leghorn, Nelson, after blockading that port, seized Elba, which belonged to Tuscany, and the small island of Capraja, which belonged to the Genoese republic. By this time Sir Gilbert Elliot had made the island of Corsica too hot for him and the small English force there: he had entirely alienated the affections of the islanders, and had quarrelled with nearly all the English officers about him; he had so disgusted General Sir Charles Stuart, that that brave and high-minded man had sent in his resignation and returned to England. After driving the venerable Paoli (with-out whom the English would never have been there, nor Sir Gilbert have been made a viceroy) into an obscure retirement in the interior of the country, he had driven him in his extreme old age into another exile, by sending him an intimation that he must immediately leave the island; he had taken mortal offence at Colonel Moore*—the best officer left on the island—because he had shown a generous sympathy for the old Corsican patriot, and had paid him a visit of respect in his native village in the mountains; he had accused Moore, who was the very soul of honour, of intriguing against him, of leaguering himself with his opponents, of taking a decided part against his measures, of having too great an influence among the Corsicans; and, without any previous complaint or intimation made to the party accused, he had written home to the secretary of state, and had procured an order to dismiss Colonel Moore from the island. As Moore had predicted, the constant disrespectful and harsh treatment, and then the expulsion, of Paoli was followed by immediate confusion and anarchy: the peasantry, always inclined to be lawless and unruly, set the laws at defiance, laughed at the courts and the mockery of a parliament which Sir Gilbert had set up: as they never quitted their arms, it would be an improper expression to say that they rose in arms; but in se-maps of Italy, with the different points marked upon them, where former battles had been fought, sent by the Directory for Bonaparte's use.—Southey, Life of Nelson.

* Afterwards General Sir John Moore.—According to Moore, Sir Gilbert, like a man bred to the law, and then trained and exercised in the House of Commons, was much addicted to playing the orator, and making long speeches when he ought to have been doing, or at least permitting others to act for him: he was exceedingly jealous of his authority, and, though he knew nothing of war, he insisted that, in his quality of deputy king, he must have the entire command of the forces; and he was prone to flattery to that degree that he was at last surrounded only by flatterers. Moore, or his brother and biographer for him, says that the viceroy, most unfortunately, could never perceive the necessity of conciliating the Corsicans, or of acting in unison with their feelings. Those islanders are an exceedingly proud race; yet, the streets leading to the citadel of Bastia being dirty, the viceroy commanded that a party of a Corsican battalion which had entered our service should be employed to cleanse the streets. He was warned that this would give mortal offence, but he peremptorily insisted on obedience. When the men were assembled, and told what they were to do, they angrily threw down the shovels and dispersed, saying that they were enlisted for soldiers, and not for scavengers. This was passed over at the time, but afterwards the battalion became very troublesome. Soon after this the viceroy made a visit to Ajaccio (Bonaparte's birth-place), where the officers of a Corsican corps resolved to give him a ball. The hall of the municipality was chosen for the purpose, in which had been placed a bust of Paoli. Some of the officers were consulting in the hall about the decorations, when an aide-de-camp of the viceroy, pointing to the bust, asked, "What business has that old chieftain here?" The aide-de-camp then pulled down the bust, and threw it into a closet, where it was broken to pieces. This insult to their revered chief was soon reported all over Corsica; yet no punishment was inflicted upon the officer, who remained attached to the person of Sir Gilbert.—Life of Sir John Moore, by his brother, James Garriek Moore.

veral districts they met in considerable force, and concerted measures for driving out the English, who had so unceremoniously driven out Paoli. The French party instantly raised their heads: they were numerous in the principal towns of the island; and now a sort of patriotic feeling, or national sympathy mingled with their partizanship for a foreign power, for it was a young Corsican general that was leading the armies of the republic to unprecedented victories in Italy, many native Corsicans were serving with Bonaparte, not a few had obtained posts of eminence in the civil service of France, and Saliceti, who had been a conspicuous member of the National Convention, and one of the most potent of its commissioners, was also a Corsican. They opened or renewed communications with the republicans, who by the summer of the present year were absolute masters of all the opposite Italian coasts from Nice to Genoa, and from Genoa to Leghorn. The Corsicans might soon have been able to drive out our forces by themselves; but it was evident that some great effort would be made from the opposite continent to assist them; and, as soon as our ministry saw Spain declaring war, and preparing her fleets to join the French, they transmitted orders for the evacuation of the island and the retreat of our fleet out of the Mediterranean, in order that our forces might be at hand to assist our ally Portugal, against whom, with one of their ordinary miscalculations, ministers fancied the combined fleets of France and Spain were going to act. Some of the troops and stores had already been sent off to the island of Elba, which lies between Corsica and the Tuscan coast; but, when the Corsicans found that the English intended to evacuate their island entirely, such of them as remained attached to our interests, or such as had too deeply committed themselves to have any hope left of a reconciliation with the French and their own very vindictive countrymen of that party, were filled with grief and despair, and constrained to make up their minds to flight and a lasting exile. The partizans of France met with hardly any resistance: a committee of thirty took upon them the government of Bastia, and boldly ordered the seizure of all the British property: armed Corsicans mounted guard in nearly every place, other hands were gathering round the town, a plan was laid for seizing the viceroy, and, but for the promptitude and energy of Nelson, Sir Gilbert Elliot would have passed from his vice-regal government to a French prison. But, threatening to bombard the town about their ears, the commodore imposed respect on the committee of thirty, and sent their guards scampering out of the town; and, quietly commencing the embarkation on the 14th of October, he saw that work completed on the 19th, just as the great Spanish fleet was coming in sight of Cape Corso. All private property was saved, and our public stores, to the value of 200,000*l., were gotten safely on board. On the very next day, the French troops, who had been pushed over from Leghorn, and who had landed at Cape Corso under cover of the Spanish ships, marched into the citadel of Bastia only one hour after the rear of the British had spiked the guns and evacuated it. Nelson was the last man that left the shore; having thus, as he said, seen the first and the last of Corsica. He was then sent with only two frigates, the 'Blanche' and the 'Minerve,' to superintend the evacuation of Porto Ferrajo in the isle of Elba. On his way he fell in with two Spanish frigates, the 'Sabina' and the 'Ceres.' After a desperate engagement, which lasted two hours and fifty minutes, the 'Sabina' struck. Her captain, Don Jacobo Stuart, an illegitimate descendant from the royal line of Stuart, the only surviving officer on board the 'Sabina,' was removed to the 'Minerve,' where Nelson treated his brave foe with all possible respect; and two English lieutenants and forty men were put into the prize, which was taken in tow by the 'Minerve.' The other Spanish frigate, the 'Ceres,' had made her escape from the 'Blanche,' and the 'Blanche,' in pursuing her, had got to a great distance from her consort the 'Minerve.' At this juncture another Spanish frigate, the 'Matilda,' came up and engaged the 'Minerve,' who was compelled to cast off the prize she had made, and in reducing which she had sustained great damage in her own masts, rigging, and sails, and had had one midshipman and six seamen killed, and one lieutenant, the boatswain, and thirty-two petty officers and men wounded. Yet, after half an hour of close action, the 'Matilda' was compelled to wear and haul off. Nelson was following with a certainty of capturing her, when an immense Spanish ship of the line, of 112 guns, and two fresh frigates, came in sight. It was now Nelson's turn to haul off; and, crippled as the 'Minerve' was, she must have been taken if the Spaniards had not been more anxious to recover her now loose prize, the 'Sabina,' than to fight her. The consort English frigate 'Blanche,' who before this time had come up with the flying 'Ceres,' and with eight or nine broadsides had made her call for quarter and strike her colours, was equally deprived of her prize, and ran the same risk of being captured; but both the English frigates got safely in to Porto Ferrajo; and the small prize party on board the 'Sabina,' being readily joined by part or by the whole of the surviving Spanish crew, manœuvred her with great skill in the hope of bringing her into Elba, and did not surrender the frigate until her fore and main masts went over the side. General De Burgh, who commanded our troops in the isle of Elba, hesitated about abandoning the place, as he had received no specific instructions from England. He complained—and most of our commanding officers in all parts of the world might have re-echoed the complaint—that he was utterly unable to decide between the contradictory orders of government, or to guess at what their present intentions might be. Had the Spaniards stood in to Porto Ferrajo with even a small portion of their immense fleet, De Burgh's hesitation might have cost him dear, and might very possibly have cost the country the life of its greatest hero, for strike or surrender were words which Nelson had expunged from his vocabulary. But the Spaniards had not put their heart into this war; and both Don Juan de Langara and the admiral of the Toulon fleet were evidently haunted with the dread that Sir John Jervis might suddenly unite his scattered fleet, which they fancied to be much stronger than it was, and bring them to a general action; and at last, General De Burgh's scruples being removed, Nelson was enabled, without any molestation, to embark the troops and stores, to repair his crippled frigates, and to remove the naval establishment which we had formed at Elba. Then, late in the year, he sailed down the Mediterranean with a numerous convoy for Gibraltar; and was fortunate enough to rejoin Admiral Sir John Jervis in time to take part in the great battle off Cape St. Vincent.

The only important advantage (and that a very inglorious one) obtained by the French marine during the year was this:—Rear-Admiral Richery, who had escaped from Toulon with six sail of the line in 1795, and who, together with some English prizes he had picked up, had remained closely blockaded at Cadiz until the great Spanish fleet put to sea from that port, stretched across the Atlantic to Newfoundland, plundered and set fire to our fishermen's huts, destroyed their vessels and fishing-stages, and then returned for Europe, without seeking for Vice-Admiral Sir James Wallace, who was on the Newfoundland station with only one fifty-gun ship and three or four very light frigates. On his homeward voyage Richery picked up a great many English merchant vessels, and was so fortunate as to get through our Channel fleet and blockading squadrons in a haze, and to make Rochefort and Brest with his sweep of prizes. In the latter port he joined his flag to those already flying, and moved with that great Brest fleet on the 17th of December. This fleet numbered forty-three sail, of which seventeen were of the line, four were frigates, six corvettes and brigs, and the remaining six large transports. On board were 25,000 men, choice infantry and cavalry, who had been tried in the war of the Vendée; a great quantity of field artillery, ammunition, and stores of every description; a good many spare muskets and bayonets to put into the hands, and some red liberty nightcaps to put upon the heads, of the Irish patriots, or insurgents, or rebels. The fleet was commanded by Vice-Admiral Morard de Galles, Rear-Admirals Richery, Nielly, and Bouvet;† the commander-in-chief of the army was Hoche, a young serjeant in the Gardes Françaises when the revolution began, a man full of courage, energy, ability, and ambition; who, though very unfortunate against the Prussians, had acquired great fame in the civil wars of Britany and the Vendée, where he had had the handling of a republican army of 100,000 men, stretching all along that western coast from la Rochelle to Brest. Hoche was accompanied by many distinguished officers, including Generals Grouchy, Humbert, and Adjutant-General Bruix. According to their usual custom—to which we have already made allusion—the French commanding officers, naval as well as military, admirals as well as generals, did not embark in ships of the line, but in several frigates. At about dusk the fleet got under weigh, and, in a very dark night, it rounded the Saintes, and stood away to the southward. Sir Edward Pellew, in the 'Indefatigable' frigate, who had been watching all their motions in the very jaws of the port, and who by skilful and daring manœuvres watched them on their progress to the Saintes, being frequently within half gun-shot of their leading ships, now went away in search of Admiral Colpoys, who, with a large squadron of our Channel fleet, had fixed a rendezvous eight leagues to the west of Ushant. The 'Indefatigable,' carrying a crowd of sail in a gale of wind, and burning false fires and blue lights all the way as signals, reached the spot of rendezvous at about midnight, but no Colpoys was there, nor was there a single English ship to be seen, or to answer to Pellew's signals. In the course of the night the whole of the French fleet came to anchor in Camaré Bay—and there, if our Channel fleet had been united and at hand, it ought to have been annihilated. On the following afternoon the French again weighed and put to sea in a gale of wind, and in evident haste and confusion. In getting out, one of their ships of the line struck on the rock called the Grand Stevenet, and was totally lost, only 60 being saved out of the 1400 souls she had on board. Instead of keeping well together, the fleet separated, some running through the Passage du Raz to the southward, and others running through the Passage du Four. The gale increased, and, the wind chopping round to the south-west, these divided forces could not join again. The commanders-in-chief never got near Ireland; but, on the 24th of December, having now the wind at N.N.E., Rear-Admiral Bouvet rounded Mizen Head, at the southern extremity of Ireland, and entered Bantry Bay with seven ships of the line and ten other vessels. His own ship and two or three others got to a safe anchorage; but the rest dropped where there was no holding, and a strong gale from the east came presently to tell them the mistakes they had committed: most of these ships had to cut their cables, all were driven out to sea, and in the confusion an eighty-gun ship ran foul of a frigate and carried away her masts. Bouvet remained at anchor until the 30th, refusing to comply with the requisition of some of Hoche's officers (who thought anything preferable to the horrors of sea-sickness and the chance of being drowned) to land that portion of the troops he had brought to the appointed place; and, seeing no chief commander arrive, and divided between doubts whether Vice-Admiral Morard de Galles and General Hoche had gone to the bottom of the sea in the tempest, or had gone back to Brest Harbour, or had been intercepted by a British fleet, he gave a few courses to Ireland, and to those who had sent him thither, and, heaving anchor, sailed away for Brest, where he arrived safely on the 1st of January (1797). In the meanwhile Rear-Admirals Nielly and Richery had reached the Irish coast; and there they remained beating about, and hoping to be joined by the commander-in-chief, until another terrible gale scattered them. Three or four were driven into Bantry Bay, as far up as Whiddy Island, and eight or nine showed themselves off the mouth of the Shannon; a frigate went on shore, and was lost, with all her crew except seven; a cut-down seventy-four foundered, but her crew was saved by another ship; and a frigate or large corvette, being found unseaworthy, was scuttled and sunk; some of the transports went down at sea, with all on board, and others, scattered all about, were afterwards picked up by English cruisers, as was also a frigate of Richery's squadron. One seventy-four, the 'Droits de l'Homme,' remained at sea, to be intercepted and destroyed when close to port; but the other ships, in scattered portions, reached Brest, l'Orient, and Rochefort. Among the last ships that arrived was the 'Fraternité' frigate, with Morard de Galles and Hoche on board, who had not seen anything of their fleet since their first leaving the French coast. Of forty-three sail, thirty-one returned.*

The immense preparations which had been making at Brest during the whole summer could be no secret, but, although our government had an almost unlimited command of secret service money, they threw away that money so badly that they never penetrated into the secret of the destination of that threatening force: at times they thought it was intended to invade the western coast of England; and so strong was this impression, that even at the last moment, or when the expedition was quite ready to sail, the Duke of Portland sent a circular to the lord-lieutenants of counties on the coast to take an account of live and dead stock in all parishes within twelve miles of the sea, and to communicate with the military commanders of their districts respecting the measures to be adopted for the removal of that stock and all articles of provision, if necessary; at other times they thought the mighty armament was destined for the West Indies, or for Ireland,† or for Portugal, or for Gibraltar; and thus, to be prepared for whatever might happen, they had divided the Channel fleet into three squadrons: one, under Rear-Admiral Sir Roger Curtis, to cruise well to the westward; another, under Colpoys, to cruise off Brest; and the third, under Admiral Lord Bridport, to remain at Spithead, to be despatched wherever the surer intelligence received by government might render expedient. Colpoys had 13 sail of the line—a force more than sufficient to have destroyed the badly manned, crammed, and confused French fleet—but he was left with only two frigates, for some time with only one; and it should appear that this want of scouts contributed, if not as much as the tempestuous weather, at least very considerably, to the comparative impunity with which the French were allowed to traverse, in almost every direction, the English and Irish Channels. When Colpoys got the necessary information, he endeavoured to regain his station off Ushant, in the hope of picking up stragglers separated by the tremendous gales that were blowing; but in the continuance of these gales most of his own ships parted company, and all sustained damage. Sir Roger Curtis's squadron had its attention occupied by Villeneuve, who, with five sail of the line from the long idle Toulon fleet, had descended the Mediterranean and stolen through the Straits of Gibraltar to the western coasts of France, in order to co-operate with the grand Irish armament. Curtis discovered him as he was crossing his path, gave him chase, and drove him into Port l'Orient; but he could neither take nor touch one of his five ships; and such a force, requiring watching, kept Curtis for some time in-shore and away from the chance of falling in with any portion of Morard de Galle's scattered fleet. Owing to the tardiness of his information, to the baffling state of the winds, and to accidents which occurred in putting to sea in stormy weather, it was the 3rd of January before Lord Bridport could get fairly out with the Spithead squadron, composed of 10 sail of the line. By the time he reached the Irish coast, the bulk of the French fleet had quitted it; and, though his lordship made all possible haste to Ushant, he was too late to do any good; and he was soon obliged to return to Spithead, with his ships greatly damaged by the severe weather. The only fighting that took place was between the stray 'Droits de l'Homme,' a 74-gun ship, and two English frigates—the 'Indefatigable,' of 44 guns, Captain Sir Edward Pellew, and the 'Amazon,' of 36 guns, Captain Robert Carthew Reynolds; but never was combat more desperate than this, or attended with more horrible circumstances. The French two-decker was without a poop, and through a fault of construction, and the terrible sea that was rolling, she could make but little use of her first-deck guns, being obliged to keep most of her lower ports closed. In the dusk of the evening, on the 13th of January (1797), Pellew, whose ship was the better sailer of the two English frigates, brought the French 74 to close action, and sustained it, alone, for a full hour. Then the 'Indefatigable' unavoidably shot a little ahead. Captain Reynolds, in the slower and smaller frigate, the 'Amazon,' came up, and poured in a well-directed fire; but, being under a press of sail, the 'Amazon' too glided ahead. The 'Droits de l'Homme' then nearly ran the 'Indefatigable' on board, and kept up a tremendous fire, frequently using her guns on both sides at the same time, and pouring in from her lofty decks and (having on board 1050 land troops) from her tops incessant volleys of musketry. But, in brief space, the 'Indefatigable' got clear, and placed herself on one quarter, the 'Amazon' got upon the other quarter, and both maintained a fire—often within pistol-shot—for five hours, the storm raging all the while, the night being dark, and everybody ignorant of the precise part of the coast on which they had run in pursuing the enemy, but all of them knowing that a lee shore and perilous rocks could not be far distant. At the end of the five hours the 'Indefatigable' and the 'Amazon' sheered off, to secure their wounded masts and loose rigging. The sea was running so high that the men on the main decks of the frigates were up to their middles in water; the 'Indefatigable' had four feet water in her hold, the 'Amazon' three, and scarcely a stick was left standing in either of them.* In hauling off they left the 'Droits de l'Homme' in still worse plight; and when they renewed the action her foremast was shot away by the board, and the main and mizen masts were tottering; her rigging and sails were all cut to pieces, and her crowded decks were strewed with the killed and wounded. At about half-past four in the morning, the two frigates being close under the 74, starboard and larboard, the moon opened through the clouds with some brightness, and Lieutenant G. Bell, who was keeping an eager look-out from the 'Indefatigable's' fore-castle, caught a glimpse of the land, and had scarcely reported to Sir Edward Pellew, ere the breakers a-head were visible to all. With admirable coolness and self-possession, Pellew's crew hauled on board the tacks, and the ship in an instant made sail to the southward. They still knew not where they were, but calculated that the land they saw was the Isle of Ushant, in which case there would have been no danger. But they had not run long to the southward, ere breakers were seen upon their other bow. The ship was then wore to the northward, and the lingering approach of daylight expected with intense anxiety. When it came, the land was close ahead, but the ship was again wore to the southward. They now discovered that they were, and had been nearly all the night, in Audierne Bay, half a degree to the south of Ushant. As they looked in-shore they saw their late enemy, the 'Droits de l'Homme,' lying broad-side uppermost, with a tremendous surf breaking over her, and their consort, the gallant little 'Amazon,' at the distance of about two miles from the Frenchman, in the same predicament. Pellew passed at the distance of about a mile from the French ship, but could do nothing to afford the crew any assistance, as he must weather the much-dreaded Penmarcks, or drive on shore himself, and in the crippled state of the 'Indefatigable' it seemed next to impossible to keep her from the breakers. Pellew, therefore, by the aid of a gale—a gale now loaded with shrieks—and by force of skill and steadiness, passed a short half-mile to windward of the dreadful rocks, and was safe. The 'Amazon,' which wore to the northward at the first alarm of breakers ahead, and which was far too crippled to work off the land, had struck the ground at nearly the same moment as the 'Droits de l'Homme,' but, going higher up the beach, and the men preserving better order (not being so crowded, and crammed, and mixed), and making use of better means to save themselves, the officers and crew, with the exception of six men who selfishly stole the cutter, all got safely on shore by nine o'clock in the morning.* The awful shrieks which Pellew had heard proceeded from the 'Droits de l'Homme,' which had grounded much farther from the beach, and which became at once a scene of hopeless confusion, for, between the ship's complement and the land troops, there were upwards of 1800 souls on board when the night battle commenced; and, of the multitude that remained alive, many were disabled by their wounds, or driven frantic by their pain and their despair. Many threw themselves into the surf, many were presently washed away by the waves which broke over the ship incessantly. The country-people lined the shore, but could render no help. At low-water rafts were constructed, and the boats were got in readiness; but it was found impossible to hoist them out, and the day closed and another night of horror ensued. At low-water on the following day, an English captain and eight English sailors, prisoners on board the 'Droits de l'Homme,' ventured into a small boat, and succeeded in reaching the shore. A number of the Frenchmen, thinking they might do what those daring fellows had done, now launched out on rafts and in boats, but not one of them reached the beach alive. Another night of cold, hunger, and maddening thirst followed. On the third day larger rafts were constructed, and the largest of the ship's boats was got over the side. This boat was intended for the women and for the wounded; but, heedless of the voice of their officers, soldiers and sailors leaped into it, to the number of 120, and the billows soon rolled over and swamped the boat. Nearly 900 souls had perished, when the fourth night came with such an addition of horrors as made men envy the fate of those whose lifeless corpses were driving on the shore. The sense of hunger was, in most cases, deadened, but a parching thirst made them madly drink salt water. The ship began breaking to pieces, falling away from the stern-posts. On the next morning some of the famishing survivors began to look at each other with cannibal eyes, and were on the point of casting lots, when the sky cleared, and the winds and waves subsided, and a French man-of-war brig and a cutter stood in to the bay. These two vessels soon anchored near the wreck, and sent off boats and large rafts, on which about 150, of nearly 400 who attempted it, were saved that evening. About 380 were left upon the wreck, to endure the miseries of another night, which proved to be their last to more than half of them. Of the 1800 and odd souls, not many more than 300 were saved.*

† A week or a fortnight before the Brest fleet sailed our ministers ought to have been fully aware of its destination. Early in December, an American vessel, laden with 20,000 stand of arms and cannon, was taken by an English man-of-war, on the shrewd suspicion of being bound for Ireland—which she unquestionably was. "She was a good omen of American peace—her name was the Olive Branch—with a covered cargo of arms."—Letter from Laurence to Burke, in "Epistolary Correspondence of the Rt. Hon. Edmund Burke and Dr. French Laurence."

Our American kinsmen had made very strenuous efforts to revolutionize Ireland on their own account, during their war of independence; and now a very numerous party of them, partly through spite, but more through the love of lucre, were willing to assist the French.

* So terrible was the motion of the two frigates, that some of the 'Indefatigable's' guns broke their breechings four times; some drew their ring-bolts from her sides; and many of the guns, owing to the water beating into them, were obliged to be drawn immediately after loading. All the 'Indefatigable's' masts were wounded; her main topmast was completely unrigged, and was saved only by the astonishing coolness and alacrity of the men. The 'Amazon' had her mizen topmast, gaff, spanker boom, and main topsail-yard completely shot away, her fore and main masts cut through by shots, and all her sails and rigging more or less injured; and she had expended, during the action, every inch of her spare canvas. The crews of both frigates, whose exertions, between the chase and the battle, had lasted nearly ten hours, were almost worn out with fatigue.—James.

Carnot, as one of the five directors, now entirely monopolised the war department. Under his auspices, but not at his original suggestion—for the idea, obvious, in itself had occurred to Dumas, Moreau, Pichegru, Napoleon Bonaparte, and a hundred officers besides—it was resolved, early in the year, to attack Germany and Italy at the same time, in order to divide the emperor's forces; and, in case of the complete success of both the attacking armies, that of Italy was to move through the passes of Tyrol or of Carinthia, effect a junction with the army of Germany in Bavaria, or farther on in the hereditary states of Austria, and then the two were to advance upon Vienna, and impose their terms of peace there. Pichegru, who had fallen out of favour with the Directory, was superseded by Moreau, and this able general and Jourdan, who had been foiled and beaten by Clairfait the preceding year, undertook the German part of this great plan. Jourdan, who had 63,000 foot and 11,000 horse, driving back some Austrian corps from the ground they had conquered on the left bank of the Rhine at the end of the last campaign, invested the renowned fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, on the right bank of that river immediately opposite to Coblenz. The Emperor's brother, the Archduke Charles, who had taken the command of Clairfait's army, which now amounted to about 70,000 foot and 20,000 horse, advanced rapidly with a part of it to the Rhine, defeated one of Jourdan's divisions under General Lefebvre, and forced Jourdan to relinquish his siege, and take up other positions. But, while the archduke was thus occupied by Jourdan, Moreau, who had about 72,000 foot and between 6000 and 7000 horse, dashing across the Rhine

The particulars of the terrible wreck are derived from the narrative (published in the Naval Chronicle, vol. viii.) of a British officer, Lieutenant Elias Pison, of the 63rd regiment, who was a prisoner on board the 'Droits de l'Homme.' The lives of the captain of the ship, Jean-Raimond Lacrosse (a ci-devant baron), and the republican general Humbert, were saved. The English prisoners, in consideration of their sufferings, and the help they had given in saving many lives, were sent home in a cartel, without ransom or exchange.

The 'Amazon' frigate went to pieces, like the 'Droits de l'Homme.'

* They were, of course, all made prisoners; but the people of Brittany, among whom they had fallen, treated them kindly. Their escape from the wreck was effected by means of a raft, which went and came with great order and regularity.

at Strasbourg, some hundred and fifty miles higher up the river than Coblenz, captured on the 24th of June the fortress of Kehl, and after a series of victories advanced towards the heart of Sraubia, his progress being facilitated by the rapid drafts made upon the army of his opponent, old General Wurmser, to reinforce the emperor's armies in Italy. When the campaign opened Wurmser had not 60,000 foot to oppose to Moreau's 72,000, but his cavalry was superior in number, as in nearly every other quality—he having at one moment upwards of 20,000 horse. At one draft 25,000 men were withdrawn from Wurmser's army, and sent through the Tyrol into Italy; and in a short time the veteran general himself was obliged to hurry to the defence of Lombardy. On the 26th of June the archduke, with the mass of his forces, marched up the Rhine in order to check Moreau. Jourdan, thus disembarassed, re-crossed the Rhine, and, finding nothing to oppose him except a small army of Imperialists under Wartensleben, he pushed forward, and, after a series of skirmishes rather than battles, took Frankfort, Wurtzburg, and other towns. Moreau kept advancing on nearly a parallel line, his army and Jourdan's, en echelonnant, presenting a front which extended more than sixty leagues. It was by the imperative order of Carnot that the two armies thus spread themselves in order to turn both wings of the Imperialists. The Archduke Charles perceived the error, and, narrowing his own front, and gradually bringing nearer to a converging point the separate forces of Wartensleben and Wurmser, he slowly retreated, frequently disputing the ground, but determined not to hazard a battle until his retiring forces were all brought so near to each other, that he might fall with a superior force either upon Jourdan or upon Moreau. As the French advanced triumphantly, and with the appearance of so little opposition, some of the contingent corps, who, on the whole, behaved indifferently, quitted the Imperial army and disbanded, and several of the states of the empire sued to the Directory for a separate peace, which they obtained upon condition of paying enormous contributions. Still extending his front, and moving over a good deal of the ground which our great Duke of Marlborough had traversed in his Blenheim campaign, Moreau captured Ulm and Donawert on the Danube, and was preparing to cross the river Leck into Bavaria, and thence to move onward to the defiles of the Tyrol, on the Italian side of which the republican army was at the moment completely victorious, when, on the 24th of August, the Archduke Charles, who had gathered some reinforcements in the valley of the Danube, and who had rapidly executed his admirably designed movements, fell upon Jourdan with a superiority of force, and completely defeated him at Amberg. The Austrian prince then followed the flying republicans to the Maine, and gave them another tremendous beating, on the 3rd of September, at Wurtzburg. Still pressing on the rear of the republicans, who fell into a miserably disorganised state, he defeated them again on the 16th of September, at Aschaffenburg, and drove them with terrible loss to the opposite side of the Rhine. In his retreat Jourdan had lost 20,000 men, and nearly all his artillery and baggage. Moreau, who was too far away to the right to render any assistance to Jourdan, could neither advance nor maintain himself where he was, on the Bavarian frontier, without Jourdan: he therefore began his famed retreat, which lay through the Black Forest, on the 25th of September. Moreau had still 70,000 men, who had suffered no serious disaster. The imperial general Latour, who was nearest at hand to follow him, had not above 24,000 men; and some scattered corps did not join his standard with sufficient rapidity to enable him to contend successfully with the republicans. Latour, pressing too close on Moreau's rear, sustained a defeat on the 2nd of October at Biberach. The republicans got safely through the valley of Hell and the whole of the Black Forest; but when they reached the banks of the Rhine they found the victorious Archduke Charles ready to meet them, with a force equal, or perhaps somewhat superior, to their own. Moreau, at the end of his too much praised retreat, found himself compelled to fight two battles, and both battles were to him defeat. On the 19th of October he was beaten at all points, at Emmendingen; and, on the 20th, in spite of his formidable position among the rocks and cliffs of Schliengen, he was beaten again; and nothing but a violent storm, and the pitchy darkness of the night and the roughness of the ground, which prevented the splendid Austrian cavalry from acting, enabled him to get his disheartened columns to the safe side of the Rhine.

The Archduke Charles had saved Germany, but, owing to the invasion of Jourdan and Moreau on this side, the much smaller republican army of Italy had subdued all the north of the Italian peninsula. The command of this smaller army, which took the field much earlier than the army or the two armies on the Rhine, was given to the aspiring young man who had "killed the people for the regicides,"* on the critical 13th Vendémiaire, and who had since then married Madame Josephine Beauharnais, a native of Martinique, widow of Vicomte Alexandre de Beauharnais, who had served as a general in the republican armies, and who had been guillotined during the Reign of Terror, which had also consigned his fair relict to a prison. This very graceful, captivating woman was linked in a close friendship with the fascinating Cabarus, who now bore the name of Tallien, the daring man who had been the first to beard Robespierre in the Convention, and who, in consequence of that deed, had obtained a large share of political power and patronage. The Beauharnais was also exceedingly intimate with Director Barras, and enjoyed the friendship or patronage of other powerful individuals. It was unfair to say that the young Corsican owed his appointment to this marriage; but it would be unreasonable to doubt that Josephine contributed to it.* It was Barras and Carnot that proposed to give the command of the army of Italy to Bonaparte, as the fittest man for it, and the other three directors, after some hesitation, assented. He arrived at head-quarters, at Nice, on the 26th of March. He found the disposable forces amounting to about 50,000 men, but badly provided and in a wretched state of indiscipline. The combined army of the Austrians and Piedmontese amounted to 60,000—in Bonaparte's reckoning to 75,000 men—and was now under the command of Beaulieu, a gallant veteran. It was stretched along the ridge of the Apennines, at the foot of which the French, as in the preceding campaign, were advancing. Not waiting to be attacked, Beaulieu descended from the heights, and on the 11th of April he met the advanced guard of the French at Voltri, near Genoa, and repulsed it. At the same time d'Argenteau, who commanded Beaulieu's centre, traversed the mountains of Montenotte to descend upon Savona, and thus take the French in flank. But, when more than half his march was completed, d'Argenteau met a French division of 1500 men, who threw themselves into the old hill redoubt of Montelegino, which in a manner shut up the road of Montenotte. The fate of the campaign, and perhaps of the then young republican general, lay within that old redoubt: d'Argenteau attacked it three times with all his infantry, but Colonel Rampon maintained the post; and this gave time to Bonaparte to march round by night by an unguarded road to d'Argenteau's rear; and, before Beaulieu, who was on the left, or General Colli, who was on the right with the mass of the Piedmontese troops, could come up to his support, d'Argenteau was defeated, and driven in disorderly retreat beyond Montenotte. The young republican general had now pushed into the valley of the Bormida, between the two disjointed wings of the allied army. Beaulieu and Colli hastened to repair this disaster, by re-establishing their communications; but Bonaparte was too quick for them, and by two attacks, one at Millesimo on the 13th of April, the other at Dego on the 14th, Colli and the Piedmontese army were completely separated from the Austrians, and Provera, with an Austrian division of 2000 men, was obliged to lay down his arms. On the 15th, a mistake committed by Wukassowich nearly retrieved the fortune of the allies: that general, with 5000 Austrians, came suddenly from Voltri, where Beaulieu had been victorious over the French, ran upon Dego, where he expected to find his countrymen, but where, instead, he found Massena, with a division of the French army, little prepared for any attack.

* All his friends, and particularly the cunning Talleyrand, whom the amnesty had allowed to return to France, strongly recommended this marriage as a means of promoting his interest with the governing powers of the day. At the time of the marriage Bonaparte was 26, and the lady—the mother of two fine children, Eugene and Hortense Beauharnais—was, in her 29th, or according to other accounts, in her 30th or 31st year.

Wukassowich made a brilliant charge and scattered the French division; but General Laharpe came down with reinforcements, and Bonaparte himself, dreading the fatal consequences of a defeat in his rear, hastened to the spot with still more troops. Then, after the most heroic conduct, Wukassowich was obliged to retire. As the republicans debouched through the valley of the Bormida into the rich plains of Piedmont, Beaulieu retreated in good order to the Po, to defend the emperor's Milanese territories, leaving Colli and the Piedmontese army to shift for themselves. Bonaparte instantly turned against Colli, who had taken post on the western declivities of the Apennines at Ceva, drove him from that post, followed him to Mondovi, dislodged him there, and pursued him beyond Cherasco. Betrayed by a part of his army who had been proselytised, and now badly served by the rest, pressed by a superior force, and looking in vain for aid from Beaulieu, Colli at length retreated to Carignan, close to Turin. By this time all the provinces of Piedmont south of the Po were open to the republican invaders, the capital itself was almost at their mercy, and the resources of the country were consumed. Vittor Amedeb sued for a truce, which Bonaparte granted in consideration of having the key fortresses of Cuneo and Tortona put into his hands. The Directory soon afterwards extended the truce into a treaty of peace, which his Sardinian majesty paid for by delivering up all the other Piedmontese fortresses and all the passes of the Alps, and by ceding to the French republic for ever Savoy, Nice, and some Alpine tracts of country. The poor old king did not long survive this ruinous peace, dying broken-hearted on the 16th of October. Immediately after concluding the truce Bonaparte marched against Beaulieu, drove him from the Po, beat him in a sharp battle at Fombio, between Piacenza and Milan, and made him fall back upon the river Adda. The Austrian general occupied the town of Lodi and its bridge across the Adda, which last he defended with a numerous and excellent artillery—but, with that want of ensemble or compactness which attended nearly all the operations of all these generals, he stationed his infantry too far off to be able properly to support the artillery. On the 10th of May Bonaparte, after a terrific conflict, carried the bridge of Lodi, when, as he said himself many years afterwards, the idea first flashed across his mind that he might become a great actor in the world's drama. Beaulieu, with an army now demoralised and panic-stricken, made a faint attempt to defend the line of the Mincio; but, after throwing a garrison into Mantua, he withdrew behind the Adige into the Tyrol. On the 15th of May Bonaparte made a triumphal entrance into Milan, where the French had many converts and partizans. All Lombardy was now at the feet of the conqueror except Mantua, and that fortress was soon blockaded. Piedmont had been pitilessly plundered, in a regular manner, by the commissaries of the army and the commissioners of the Directory, and in an irregular manner by the soldiery. As a good part of Lombardy seemed to receive the republicans as friends and deliverers, Bonaparte endeavoured to stop the irregular plunder here, but the regular plunder which he ordered himself was enormous. He imposed at once a contribution of 20,000,000 of francs, which fell chiefly on the nobility and clergy; he authorised his commissaries to seize whatsoever provisions, stores, waggons, horses, &c. the army might want, merely giving cheques (which for the most part were never paid at all), to be paid out of the contributions; the horses and carriages of the nobility were seized because they belonged to aristocrats; a great deal of property which belonged to the late treasury and the Austrian government, and a great deal which did not belong to them, was sequestered as public property; and, to finish the accursed climax, the Monte di Pietà was broken open by express orders from Bonaparte and his countryman Saliceti, and all the property in it that was worth sending was sent to Genoa to be converted into money for the benefit of the Directory. In passing through Piacenza Bonaparte and Saliceti (that most rapacious and terrible of commissioners) had already treated the Monte di Pietà there in the same manner; and it afterwards became a rule to plunder all these charitable institutions. The five directors at the Luxembourg were incessantly calling upon the general for money—money—more money; and Bonaparte himself says, that, besides clothing and feeding and abundantly paying his army, he remitted to them 50,000,000 of francs during his first Italian campaign. The petty principalities, into which so much of the beautiful country was so unhappily divided, had never made war, but they were all obliged to purchase what was called a peace, at prices which might have saved Italy from this invasion, if they had been collectively poured into the treasury of the keeper of the keys of the Alps, the King of Sardinia. Thus the Duke of Parma was made to pay 1,500,000 francs, to furnish clothing for the army, and to surrender twenty of his best pictures; the Duke of Modena was made to pay 6,000,000 francs in cash, 2,000,000 more in provisions, cattle, horses, &c., and to deliver up fifteen of his choice paintings; and, as he could not feed the voracity of the republicans fast enough, they took his whole duchy from him a few months later. Until the emperor should send another army, there was absolutely nothing in Italy to offer any valid resistance to these insatiable plunderers. An insurrection of the peasantry of Binasco, and of the common people of Pavia, provoked less by the plunder carried on privately by the soldiery than by the outrages offered to their women and their religion, was quenched, by Bonaparte's express orders, in torrents of blood; and for a night and a day the city of Pavia was given up to plunder, debauchery, and every sort of violence and crime.*

* We have no less an authority than Lucien Bonaparte for some of the horrors that are reported to have been committed. Lucien was Advancing southward Bonaparte showed how the Directory respected neutrality by overrunning Tuscany, taking possession of Leghorn, putting a garrison in it, seizing and selling by auction the English, Portuguese, and other goods found in the warehouses of that great free port, and commanding the native merchants to deliver up all the property they had in their hands belonging to any enemies of the French republic. To escape the infamy of this last, and to screen themselves from further exactions, the merchants of Leghorn agreed to pay 5,000,000 francs. The next to be plundered were the states and possessions of the poor old helpless pope; and about this work the unbelievers went with great zest. On the 18th of June a marauding column entered Bologna, and at once laid hands on the Monte di Pietà. Another division entered Ferrara and did the same; the papal authorities were ordered away, a municipal government composed of French partizans was set up; and right and left, in town and in country, contributions were levied at the point of the bayonet. Pius VI. dispatched envoys to sue for terms; and, on the 23rd of June, Bonaparte granted an armistice at the following price:—15,000,000 francs in cash, and 6,000,000 in provisions, horses, &c. &c.; a number of paintings, ancient statues and vases, and five hundred manuscripts to be selected out of the Vatican library by commissioners sent from Paris; the cession of the provinces of Bologna and Ferrara, the cession of the port and citadel of Ancona, and the closing of all the Papal ports to the English and their allies.

Bonaparte was recalled from this easy and profitable work by intelligence that Wurmser was coming against him with part of the imperial army which had retreated before Moreau. The German veteran descended from the valley of Trento with from 50,000 to 60,000 men, consisting of some divisions he had brought with him from the Rhine, the scattered remains of Beaulieu's troops which he had collected in the Tyrol, and some Tyrolese levies. Blind as ever to the fatal consequences of dividing his forces, Wurmser split his army into two, moving himself with the larger half along the eastern shore of the Lake of Guarda, and sending Quosnadovich with the other division along the western bank. Bonaparte, who had raised his blockade of Mantua and concentrated his forces, instantly threw their entire weight upon Quosnadovich, crushed him at Lonato, drove him back into the mountains, and then, turning quickly round, faced old Wurmser with a force now nearly double that of the Austrians; and in two an eye-witness. He had obtained leave to go to Milan, and, not finding his brother Napoleon there, was following him to Pavia. He says, "Upon the road my eyes were struck with the distant reflection of a vast fire. . . . It was the village of Binasco delivered up to the flames, to expiate the assassination of some of our straggling soldiers. I traversed the burning ruins. Pavia presented me with a spectacle still more deplorable. That great city had been delivered up to pillage; the traces of blood had not been effaced; the bodies of the peasants, who had refused to surrender, were not carried away; people were occupied by funeral rites within the gate by which I entered. The streets and squares were transformed into a perfect fair, where the conquerors were selling to hideous speculators the spoils of the vanquished."—Memoirs.

bloody battles fought near Castiglione, on the 3rd and 5th of August, the dull but brave old man was defeated, and driven back into the Tyrol with the loss of his artillery and of several thousand men. Bonaparte followed him up the lower valley of the Tyrol, defeated an Austrian division on the 4th of September, and entered as a conqueror into the city of Trento. Wurmser then suddenly struck away across the mountains to the east of Trento, and, descending the valley of the Brenta, again entered Italy and advanced to Bassano, where he was joined by some reinforcements from Carinthia. But his active young opponent followed close upon his rear, and all that the veteran could do was to throw himself into the important fortress of Mantua with some 18,000 men, the wretched remnant of his army.* It was the 14th of September when Wurmser got within the walls of the Virgilian city. By the end of October, as the snows were beginning to whiten the ridges of those Alps, two fresh Austrian armies were descending into Italy. The British government had supplied the court of Vienna with some more money; the emperor had made a solemn appeal to his hereditary subjects and to the bold Hungarians; and, misuse them as she would, the warlike resources of Austria were immense, and the loyalty and firmness of the people untouched. But, again, these two armies, instead of being united in the mountains, out of the reach of the enemy, and then poured down on the plain as one torrent, were allowed to come dribbling in different directions, and to get into the presence of the French divided and far apart. Marshal Alvinzi descended from Carinthia upon Belluno with 30,000 men, while Davidowich with 20,000 men moved down from the Tyrol. The two armies united would hardly have been a match for Bonaparte, who could bring at the least 45,000 men into action; but, as it was arranged, they had between them to traverse nearly one-half of the breadth of Italy before Alvinzi and Davidowich could join at the appointed spot, between Peschiera and Verona, whence they were to march together to Mantua, where Wurmser was to be released,—and the general with the Slavonic name moved at a snail's pace. With the mass of his forces Bonaparte rushed to meet Alvinzi, and gave him battle at Le Nove on the 6th of November; but, instead of defeating him, he himself sustained a terrible repulse, and retreated, next day, towards Verona to pick up the shattered columns of Vaubois, who was retreating before Davidowich. Contrary to what might reasonably have been expected, Alvinzi, overcoming every obstacle, reached the heights of Caldiero, in front of Verona. But, instead of finding Davidowich there, he learned that that sluggish and blockhead, or arch-traitor,

* From Bassano to Mantua was a very long and very difficult march, but going at what for an Austrian army seemed a miraculous pace, and marching by night as well as by day, old Wurmser outstripped his light pursuers, avoided the divisions which were advancing against him from various quarters, surprised the bridge of Legnago, got safely across the Adige, and thence into Mantua. Had he only made use of this skill and activity six weeks before, when he opened this campaign, and but kept his army together in one mass!

had been reposing himself for ten blessed days at Roveredo, between Trento and the Lago di Garda, and was still there or far away in that neighbourhood.* Thus left to himself, Alvinzi was attacked, on the 12th of November, by Bonaparte, who attempted to dislodge him from Caldiero. This effort proved fruitless; the Austrians stood on those heights like rocks, and after considerable loss the French were compelled to retreat again into Verona. For a moment the young Corsican's heart failed him, and he wrote a desponding letter to the directors.† But he soon roused himself, and, marching quietly out of Verona in the night of the 14th of November, and moving rapidly by a cross road that ran through a marshy country, he got close to Villanova, in the rear of Alvinzi. The Alpone, a mountain stream, almost dry in some seasons of the year, ran between the French and Villanova, and was traversed only by the narrow stone bridge of Arcole. Bonaparte made a rush at the bridge, but found it defended by two battalions of Croats and Hungarians with some artillery. Three times the French column attempted to storm it amidst a shower of grape-shot and musketry, and three times reeled back with terrific loss: many of the men ran away along the narrow causeway which led up to the bridge and plunged into the marshes for safety. Bonaparte himself was thrown from the causeway into a marsh, and was very near being taken, for the Croats and Hungarians rushed across the bridge and swept everything before them. A charge of French grenadiers drove back the enemy, and extricated their general when he was up to his middle in mud and water, and almost surrounded. By this time Alvinzi had changed his front, and advanced from the heights of Caldiero, upon which the battle became general. It lasted for three days, and was by far the hardest fought in all these Italian campaigns. If Davidowich had been at hand with only half of his 20,000 men, or if old Wurmser, leaving Mantua to take care of itself, had come up while Bonaparte was sacrificing his best men in obstinate and fruitless efforts to carry the bridge of Arcole, or when the French army was divided, one part on one side of the Alpone and the rest on the other side, there would have been an end as perfect as could have been desired—the invaders must have been exterminated. But so bright an hypothesis was not to be realised by Austrian generals, or by any other generals for many a year to come. Intimidated by those terrible Croats and Hungarians and the well-served guns on the bridge, the French detached General Gueux with 2000 men to cross the Adige lower down, at the ferry of Albaredo, which is below the confluence of the Alpone, and thence to march by the left bank of the Alpone, where the ground was firmer, to the village of Arcole. All this Gueux did successfully; but in the evening, the Austrians in that quarter, being reinforced, fell upon him and drove him out of the village. Next day (the 16th) Bonaparte obstinately renewed his attacks upon the fatal bridge, which he did not carry after all, and every attack on which cost him many officers and heaps of men.* On the 17th he did what he ought to have done at first—he threw a bridge over the Alpone, just above its confluence, and, sending Augereau across to advance along the left bank with a strong column to take the defenders of the bridge in flank and in the rear, and then push forward for the village of Arcole, he himself charged with another strong column along that unlucky causeway flanked by marshes, on which he had been so long detained. Bonaparte's column was met in the teeth by such a fire that men or fiends could not stand it, and again they recoiled back; but Augereau, after a sharp contest, succeeded in his objects and gained possession of the village. Alvinzi then made his retreat upon Vicenza and Bassano, where he took up his winter-quarters. The French estimate his loss at 4000 in killed and wounded, and as many in prisoners; they do not state their own loss, but it must necessarily have been immense.* On the same day that Alvinzi began his retreat from the left bank of the Adige, Davidowich, as if waking from a drunken sleep, came blundering down by Ala to the right bank of that river, and entered the Italian plains between Peschiera and Verona; but Bonaparte, who had now nothing else to do, turned against him with his superior and victorious forces, and presently drove him back to Ala, to Roveredo, and the steep hills that overhang the Tyrol pass. Thus ended what was not incorrectly called the third Italian campaign of the year 1796; and thus Bonaparte had beaten successively Beaulieu, Wurmser, and Alvinzi. Of the future campaigns we shall say little or nothing, having already said enough to explain how these matters were managed by or for Austria, and there having been for a long time no change of system, no wisdom taught by a fatal experience and an accumulation of disgrace.

* Davidowich, as we have seen, had driven in Vaubois, who had been stationed between Trento and Roveredo to block up that narrow pass into Italy; and, if he had only followed up his success, he might have pushed on to the right bank of the Adige near Verona, and thus have placed Bonaparte in a most critical position, with Alvinzi in front, himself (Davidowich) on his left flank, and Mantua in his rear, within which fortress Wurmser had at that moment 18,000 men at the very least.—A. Vieuzeux, Life of Napoleon Bonaparte.

† In this latter he expressed his dread of being surrounded—as he ought to have been, and must have been if Davidowich had but done his duty,—he recapitulated the great losses he had sustained, saying that his best officers were either killed or wounded, and his men exhausted by their hard fighting, by their rapid marches and counter-marches.

The British parliament had been dissolved by

* Bonaparte wrote to Carnot:—"Never was a field of battle so obstinately contested; our enemies were numerous and resolute. I have hardly any general officers left." They were nearly all killed, wounded, or prisoners. General Lannes had received three wounds. Bonaparte's aide-de-camp, Meuron, was killed in covering his general with his body.

The young general has been strongly censured for attempting, so many times, to carry the bridge of Arcole in front, instead of turning it by throwing the temporary bridge over the Alpone, as he was obliged to do at last. We have not seen any satisfactory excuse for this dogged obstinacy: but it appears to have been part of the system already adopted by Bonaparte, to disregard the loss of human life, and to precipitate column after column, or attack upon attack, upon every important point, and never to swerve from a plan once formed, except under the most imperious circumstances.

proclamation soon after the close of the last session. Ministers had been more occupied by the elections than by the war. The new parliament assembled on the 6th of October, and was opened by a speech from the throne, in which his majesty repeated his anxious wish for an honourable peace, and announced the intended fruitless and degrading mission of Lord Malmesbury to Paris. Allusion was also made to the success of our arms in the East and West Indies, and to the brilliant campaign of Archduke Charles. The usual addresses passed without a division. As the French fleet and Hoche's army were at this moment lying at Brest, and as it was not yet known whether the English coast was not the object of attack, Pitt, on the 18th of October, moved "that a bill be brought in for raising a certain number of men in the several counties of Great Britain, for the service of his majesty," and proposed a plan for augmenting the national force, by a levy of 15,000 men from the parishes, to be divided between the sea and land service, and by a supplementary levy of 60,000 men for the militia, and 20,000 men for irregular cavalry, not to be immediately called out, but enrolled and gradually trained. Many bitter remarks were made by the habitual opponents of government, who, numerically, were scarcely stronger now than they had been in the last parliament; but, after the alteration of a clause which proposed forcibly to convert gamekeepers into soldiers, the plan was adopted, without any division. On the 20th of October, Windham, as secretary-at-war, announced that the whole military force of this country consisted of 195,674 men, the expense of which would amount to 5,190,000*l.* Of this number the whole army, counting regulars, guards, invalids, militia, fencibles, and all, amounted to 67,765: the troops abroad (excepting those in the East Indies, which fell under a separate head, and were otherwise provided for) amounted to 64,276, all regulars, and some of them veteran regiments.

On the 7th of November, Pitt opened the budget. The money required by ministers was 27,945,000*l.* Among the ways and means they proposed was a new loan of 18,000,000*l.* There seemed to be, on the whole, a good English spirit in the House. Whatever Pitt said that was animating, as to the courage and resources of the country, and our capability of achieving the safety of Europe, our own glory and permanent advantage, was well cheered; but Fox, on the other hand, was heard in dead silence when he endeavoured to attribute the zeal shown in the new loan, called the Loyalty Loan, to a desire of peace.* It had been stated by Pitt, in his speech on opening the budget, that ministers had made an advance of 1,200,000*l.* to the hard-pressed emperor. On the 13th of November, Fox triumphantly moved "That his majesty's ministers, having authorised and directed, at different times, and without the consent and during the sitting of parliament, the issue of various sums of money for the service of his imperial majesty, and also for the service of the army under the Prince of Condé, have acted contrary to their duty, and to the trust reposed in them, and have thereby violated the constitutional privileges of this House." At first Pitt took up good ground, by admitting that it was an irregular act which he had hazarded, knowing his responsibility, but not doubting his duty; that he had had only a choice of difficulties, from the exigencies of our ally on the one side, and from the public panic on account of the scarcity of specie at home, on the other. But afterwards he quibbled, attempting to bring what he had done within the authority of the ordinary vote of credit, and endeavouring to find a principle in other discretionary and indefinite expenditures. When Pitt sat down, the Hon. Charles Bathurst Brage, treasurer of the navy, moved an amendment upon Fox's resolution, to the effect that the advance to the emperor, "though not to be drawn into precedent but upon occasions of special necessity, was, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, a justifiable and proper exercise of the discretion vested in his majesty's ministers by the vote of credit, and calculated to produce consequences which have proved highly advantageous to the common cause, and to the general interests of Europe;" and this was carried by a majority of 285 to 81.

The precipitate return of Lord Malmesbury from Paris was followed, on the 26th of December, by a message from the king to parliament, in which his majesty declared that the rupture of the negotiation did not proceed from the want of a sincere desire on his part for the restoration of peace, but from the excessive pretensions of the enemy, which were incompatible with the permanent interests of this country and the general security of Europe. Copies of all the memorials and other papers relating to the negotiation, from the first overtures made by Mr. Wickham to M. Barthelemy, were laid before parliament, and on the 30th of December the king's message was taken into consideration in both Houses. Although Fox, it is said, confessed in private that this would have been the very worst moment for making a peace with France, and that he thought that England might possibly be enabled to carry on the war two or three years longer at the most, he himself in the Commons, and his friend Lord Guildford in the Lords, moved an amendment to the address to be returned to the king's message, full of inculpations of ministers for not having concluded a treaty with the French republic. The amendments, however, were rejected by great majorities.

A.D. 1797.—During the last year the directors of the Bank of England had several times represented to the chancellor of the exchequer their inability of supplying his rapid and increasing demands. The dread of an invasion had, moreover, produced a run upon the bank for specie, and certain opposition pamphlets and journals had done their best to increase this panic, as a likely means of overthrowing Pitt, not bearing in mind that it might have overthrown the country as well. On the 9th of February, the bank directors informed Pitt that to comply with his new request of making a further advance of 1,500,000*l.* as a loan to Ireland would most probably force the directors to shut their doors. In this alarming state of affairs the Privy Council, on Sunday, the 26th, sent an order prohibiting the directors of the Bank of England from issuing any cash or specie in payment, till the sense of parliament could be taken, and measures be adopted for supporting public credit. This decisive step was announced to parliament on the next day by a royal message; and the subject was immediately taken into consideration by both Lords and Commons. The opposition testified as much glee as a noted smuggler is said to have done at seeing the old Custom-house on fire. This must crush the cold proud minister, who prided himself most of all on his financial ability, or nothing would. Fox exultingly gave notice that he should feel it necessary to move an inquiry into all the past transactions between the bank and the minister, and said several things very proper to keep up the panic, and destroy what little credit there was left at that moment. "I thought," says a member of the House, "that his tone should have been, in common policy, subdued, solemn, even alarmed at the state of the country, professing a desire to take all measures which the exigency might justify for the support of our credit, and postpone personal considerations; but he plainly showed himself to have hardly any feeling but the ruin of Pitt."* Sheridan, Whitbread, and others made motions with the same animus. The history of Pitt's paper system belongs to another chapter. We need only mention here a few immediate measures. Ministerial motions were carried in both Houses for appointing by ballot a secret committee to examine into the affairs of the Bank. In the meanwhile the Bank was authorised to issue small notes. The secret committee soon reported that there was a clear balance or surplus belonging to the Bank, of 3,826,890*l.*, exclusive of a debt from government of 11,666,800*l.*; that the Bank had lately experienced a drain of cash, owing to the prevalence of alarm; that, as this alarm might continue, the Bank might be deprived of the means of supplying the cash necessary for the exigencies of the public service; and that therefore it was proper to continue the measures already taken, for such time and under such limitations as should seem expedient to parliament. The Commons having resolved themselves into a committee of the whole House to take this report into consideration, Pitt moved for a bill to continue and confirm for a limited time the restriction of the issue of specie by the Bank of England; and, after various clauses had been added, chiefly by ministers themselves, this bill was passed. The Bank was to be authorised to issue specie to the amount of 100,000*l.* for the accommodation of private bankers and traders; and, saving and except to the army and navy, who were to be paid in cash, bank notes were to be a legal tender to all. At starting—when one of the bank directors declared in the House of Commons that there was every reason to hope that the bank would soon be enabled to resume its payments in specie—the bill was limited in its operation to the 24th of June: but the restriction was afterwards continued from time to time by a succession of new acts; and the return to cash payments did not take place till 1819, when Mr. (now Sir Robert) Peel carried his well-known bill.

Having established a precedent of two budgets for one year, the chancellor of the exchequer, on the 26th of April, demanded and obtained a further supply. The whole of the money voted this session amounted to 42,786,000*l.* Another loan was to be made for 16,000,000*l.* of this money; and government was to guarantee besides a further loan of 2,000,000*l.* for our ally the emperor. New taxes were imposed, or old ones increased, to the amount of 2,544,000*l.* The sum of 80,000*l.* was voted as a marriage portion to the king's eldest daughter, Charlotta Augusta, who was married on the 18th of May to Frederick William, Hereditary Prince of Wurtemberg. The navy was still further increased; the number of seamen and marines for the service of the year was 120,000, and the total sum voted for that service, in all its branches, was 13,133,673*l.*

While parliament was sitting mutinies broke out in the fleets, which gave far greater alarm than the Bank's suspending cash payments. For some time discontents had prevailed among the seamen, the principal subjects of which were the miserable smallness of their pay and of the Greenwich pensions, neither of which had been augmented since the reign of Charles II.; the very unequal distribution of prize-money, which gave almost everything to the admirals and superior officers, leaving next to nothing to the petty officers and the crews; the excessive harshness and severity of the discipline, and the haughty and tyrannical behaviour of many of the officers. Within three days, at the beginning of the month of March, Lord Howe, who still held the chief command of the Channel fleet, but who was then at Bath for the benefit of his health, received four petitions, from the 'Royal George,' 'Formidable,' 'Ramillies,' and 'Queen Charlotte,' soliciting the interposition of his lordship, as the seamen's friend, with the Admiralty, in order that the seamen might in their turn experience an act of munificence like that which had been shown to the army and militia, in the provision made for an increase to their pay, and for their wives and families. Lord Howe, considering their tone rather mutinous, submitted the four petitions to Earl Spencer, the head of the Admiralty, and wrote to the port-admiral, Sir Peter Parker, and to Lord Bridport, who was holding the command of the Channel fleet* under him (Earl Howe). Sir Peter and Lord Bridport replied, that the petitions (three of which seemed to be in the same handwriting) were the work of some ill-disposed person; and, in consequence of this reply, both Lord Howe and Earl Spencer thought that no danger was to be apprehended. But on the 12th of April the Board of Admiralty were startled by Sir Peter Parker, who reported that intelligence had been communicated to him of a regular plan, concerted some time before, by the seamen, to take the command of the ships from their officers, which plan was to be carried into execution on the 16th of April. Instantly orders were given by telegraph from London to Portsmouth for the fleet to proceed to sea. But, when Admiral Lord Bridport made the signal to prepare for sailing, the seamen mounted the rigging, instead of going to the capstan, and gave tremendous cheers—cheers of defiance. This astounding act was followed by others still more decisive: the men took all command from their captains and officers; they appointed "delegates," two from each ship, who met in council in the great cabin of the 'Queen Charlotte,' Lord Howe's flag-ship; and there they wrote and issued orders to all the seamen of the fleet to take oaths of fidelity to the cause. By the 17th every man was sworn. They put on shore a good many officers whom they accused of oppression, keeping the others on board as prisoners or hostages; but at the same time they passed resolutions to maintain order and sobriety, and to pay all due respect to the officers on board from whom they had taken the command. To strike terror ropes were then reeved (the sailors' preparation for hanging) at the fore-yard-arms of every ship, but they found no occasion to use this tackle, except for ducking minor offenders. There is no denying or concealing the fact—the men had been ill-paid, ill-fed, shamefully neglected by the country which depended upon them for its all, and, in many instances, harshly and brutally treated by their officers, and belly-pinched and plundered by their pursers; and, with a tithe of their wrongs, or with no wrongs at all, if the French sailors had made this mutiny, they would have murdered most of their officers, as in fact many French crews had done on the first promulgation of liberty and equality and the other Jacobin principles. But here not a drop of blood was spilt, nor, after the landing of the obnoxious officers, was there so much as an insult offered. Punishments were inflicted on all who got drunk, or misconducted themselves in any way. The mutineers allowed all frigates with convoys to sail, in order not to injure the commerce of the country. The thirty-two delegates drew up and signed a petition to parliament and another to the Admiralty: their language was respectful, and their demands were very far from exorbitant.*

* They prayed that the wages of the seamen should be increased; that their provisions should be of a better quality, and be weighed and estimated as provisions were ashore, 16 oz. to the lb.; that their measures should also be the same as those used in common trade; that while in port vegetables, instead of floggs, should be served with

* Letter of Lord Howe, in Life by Sir John Barrow.

On the 18th of April a Board of Admiralty, consisting of Earl Spencer, Lord Arden, Rear-Admiral Young, with Mr. Deputy-Secretary Marsden, met at Portsmouth, and discussed with Admirals Lord Bridport, Sir Allan Gardner, Colpoys, Pole, and Halloway, the proper means of putting an end to this perilous and (to the government) humiliating state of things. It might have been expected of them that previous care and attention to the condition of the seamen should have prevented the undeniable evils of which they complained. As it was, they frankly admitted among themselves the existence of those evils, and agreed to grant the sailors some of the terms they demanded. But they certainly stinted their generosity—perhaps intending to extend it, when they might give with a less appearance of giving under compulsion. They offered additional allowances of pay, namely, four shillings to able, three shillings to ordinary seamen, and two shillings to landsmen, per month; and their full pay to seamen wounded in action, until they were either cured or pensioned off, or received into Greenwich Hospital. The only answer the delegates would give was that they would take the terms into consideration, and return an answer to-morrow morning. The next morning the delegates sent their reply: they urged that there never existed more than two classes of men in the navy, “able” and “ordinary;” and that the distinction between “ordinary” and “landsmen” was an entirely new distinction (which it certainly was, and introduced only in the view of making a paltry saving—so economical was this government in some things, and so profuse in others); and they demanded that the wages of able seamen should be raised to one shilling a-day, and the wages of petty officers and ordinary seamen in the same proportion; and that the marines, while embarked, should have their pay augmented in the same ratio as that of ordinaries. They also demanded that the Greenwich pension, which was now less than 7*l.*, should be raised to 10*l.* per annum; that the weight and measure on board should not be curtailed, as they had been, by one-eighth (which some pursers made a sixth); that they should have provisions of a better quality, with an allowance of vegetables, essential to their health, whenever attainable; and they concluded with a declaration that, until their grievances should be redressed, and an act of indemnity passed in their favour, they were determined not to lift an anchor. On the following day, the 20th of April, fresh beef; that the sick should be better attended to, and their necessities not be embezzled; and that the men, on returning from a voyage or long cruise, should, like their officers, have short leaves of absence to visit their friends, &c.

The seaman's pound had hitherto been only 14 oz., the remaining two being retained by the purser, to allow for waste, leakage, &c. A similar reduction took place in the measures. Not only was government privy to this, but it was actually a financial or economical arrangement with them; for the pursers, who keep and distribute the provisions, had no other pay than the difference, if any, between the real and the assumed loss by waste, leakage, &c. If to this system we add the villainous practices of navy commissioners, contractors, &c., who passed (but too often!) biscuit, salt-beef, and salt-pork, which a decently fed dog on shore would not have touched, we may conceive that the poor sailors were very frequently supplied with the worst food and in scanty quantities.

the Board of Admiralty sitting at Portsmouth informed the mutineers by letter that they had resolved to recommend to his majesty the increase of wages they demanded, the full weights and measures, their full pay while laid up with wounds, and an entire pardon; but still they took no notice of those two most capital and reasonable demands, the augmentation of the Greenwich pension, and the allowance of vegetables while in port. On the same or the following day the delegates expressed, in a note exceedingly well written (as all their papers were), their utmost satisfaction and gratitude for what had been granted; but persisted in demanding the two omitted conditions, as also the redress of grievances in some particular ships,* repeating their firm resolution not to lift an anchor until all this should be granted. In the hope of removing these obstacles, Admirals Gardner, Colpoys, and Pole went on board the ‘Queen Charlotte,’ in the state cabin of which the delegates were assembled, with sentinels at the door, who paid the said delegates the military honours usually paid to superior officers. The delegates were evidently irritated at the still stinted bounty of the Admiralty,—were not satisfied with what, in fact, was only the promise of the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, and not law without the sanction of higher authorities; and some of their heads were turned by their brief possession of power and dignity. On the other hand, there were circumstances enough to exasperate the superior officers; and when one of the delegates, in an insolent tone, told the admirals that they would be satisfied with nothing less than an entire compliance with their demands, and that no arrangement would be considered as final, until sanctioned by the king and parliament, and guaranteed by a proclamation of pardon, Sir Allan Gardner lost all command of his temper, and, seizing the man by the collar, swore he would have all the delegates hanged, together with every fifth man in the fleet. The delegates in the cabin, and the crew upon the decks, were thrown into a fury by this intemperance. According to one account his brother admirals pacified Gardner, but according to another the difficulty lay in pacifying the mutineers, and saving Gardner's life from their rage. As soon as the two delegates named by the crew of the ‘Royal George’ (Lord Bridport's flag-ship) returned on board their own vessel, they summoned another meeting there, and immediately hoisted that dreadful signal, the red or bloody flag.† Forthwith all the crews in the fleet loaded all their guns, set their watches, and cleared their ships as if for action. But on the 22nd, the men having become more tranquil, the delegates wrote two letters, one to the Admiralty, in which they stated their provocations, and the other to Lord Bridport, in which they styled him their father and friend, and disavowed any intention of offending him. Earl Spencer, with Lord Arden and the rest of the Board of Admiralty, had returned to London on the 21st; and in consequence of their representations a royal proclamation was agreed to by ministers, and, having received the sign manual at Windsor, this document was forwarded with all speed to Portsmouth. Furnished with the proclamation, which contained a free pardon, but which said not one word touching the redress of grievances, except in an oblique manner, by referring to the measures taken by the lords commissioners of the Admiralty, Lord Bridport, on the 23rd, went on board the 'Royal George,' and re-hoisted his flag; and having done this he delivered an address to the crew, informing them that he had brought with him a redress of all their grievances, and the king's pardon for the offenders. After some deliberation, arising out of the silence of the proclamation as to their demands, the crew of the 'Royal George,' and then the crews of all the ships in the fleet, hauled down the red flag and returned cheerfully to their duty. All disputes being now considered as settled, the fleet dropped down to St. Helens. But, on the morning of the 7th of May, when Lord Bridport, who had just received intelligence that the Brest fleet was ready for sea, and was dropping into their outward harbour, gave the signal to weigh anchor, the crews of every one of his ships refused obedience, and the fleet stood stock still. The reasons alleged for this second great act of mutiny were, that the king's proclamation was not sufficiently explicit, that government had been altogether silent respecting the concessions demanded, and that no act of parliament had been passed to secure the redress of their grievances; from all which they suspected an intention to deceive them. They had been confirmed in this suspicion by certain inflammatory hand-bills, which had been printed on shore by some hired traitors, or by some mad reformers, and widely circulated through the fleet. But the suspicion was further excited by other strong causes, little honourable to the wisdom and discretion of the government and parliament. In the House of Lords ministers had deprecated any mention of the complaints of the sailors and the disorders in the fleet, and Earl Spencer had said that he was not aware of any intended message to the House from the king on that subject. In the Commons Pitt had indeed made a motion to increase the wages of seamen; but the House had not gone into the matter with any alacrity, and the supply to cover the increase of pay had not yet been voted. Moreover, the Board of Admiralty had issued an order, bearing date the 1st of May, which contained sundry paragraphs which almost seem to have been purposely devised to drive the suspicions of the sailors into frenzy and despair, by making them believe that they were to gain nothing by their late daring proceedings except an increase to the already intolerable severity of their discipline, with an occasional quietus from the bullets and bayonets of the marines.* In vain the captains and officers remonstrated with the men, who resolved to summon a convention of delegates at Spithead, on board the 'London,' Vice-Admiral Colpoys's flag-ship, and who, accordingly, put out their boats, collected delegates, and rowed away to that ship. Colpoys, in obedience to his instructions, refused to admit them, ordered the officers to be armed, the marines to be in readiness, and the ports to be let down. Upon this the sailors of the 'London'—Colpoys's own men—insisted that the delegates should come on board: the armed officers resisted and ordered the men to go below: the men refused, and one of them began to unlash one of the foremost guns, and to point it aft towards the quarter-deck: Simpson, the first lieutenant of the ship, cried out to this man that he would shoot him if he did not desist: the fellow continued to unlash; and the lieutenant, keeping his word, fired, and shot him dead on the spot.† The sailors then turned several guns aft, seized their white arms, and presently succeeded in disarming all the officers and all the marines. They were proceeding to hang the first lieutenant at the yard-arm, when Admiral Colpoys stepped forward and told them that Simpson had acted in conformity to orders which he (the admiral) had given him, and which orders had been received from the Admiralty. The chaplain and the surgeon of the ship interceded, and in the very paroxysm of their fury, when blood had been shed and when some of them were talking of hanging the admiral as well as the lieutenant, they promised to spare Simpson's life, and to do him no manner of harm. They then ordered the admiral, the captain, and all the officers to their respective cabins, and confined the marines as prisoners. Matters remained in this state on board the 'London' from the 7th to the 11th of May, when Admiral Colpoys and Captain Griffiths were requested to go on shore, which they did, accompanied by the chaplain. In the meanwhile every crew of the fleet had taken possession of their own

* This appears to have meant the immediate change of the captains and some of the officers of certain ships of the fleet.

† The blood-red flag, which is rarely hoisted except by renegade privateers and pirates, is considered as an intimation that no quarter will be expected or given.

* This order, which was offensive to the officers as well as to the men, stated among other things that, "from the disposition lately shown by the seamen belonging to several of his majesty's ships, it had become highly necessary that the strictest attention should be paid by all officers in his majesty's service, not only to their own conduct, but to the conduct of those who may be under their orders; the more effectually to insure a proper subordination and discipline, and to prevent, as far as may be, all discontent among the seamen." "Unnecessary," says Sir John Barrow, "as this was, at any time, as both Articles of War and Instructions enjoin it, such an order, at this particular moment, reflecting on the conduct of both officers and men, was, to say the least of it, indiscreet and inexpedient." But much worse things followed in the same order. A new instruction was introduced, importing that all captains of his majesty's ships must see "that the arms and ammunition belonging to the marines be constantly kept in good order, and fit for immediate service, as well in harbour as at sea." This meant nothing less than that the marines were to be kept in constant readiness to fire upon the sailors in the case of any symptom of mutiny; and, lest the sailors should not clearly understand it, a paragraph was added, enjoining, "that the captains and commanders be particularly attentive to the conduct of the men under their command; and that they be ready, on the first appearance of mutiny, to use the most vigorous means to suppress it, and to bring the ringleaders to punishment."

† Other accounts say that a sailor, one of the delegates, was the first that fired, firing at and wounding Lieutenant Sims of the marines; that the first lieutenant of the ship then ordered the marines to fire; that the marines obeyed; that five seamen, two of them delegates, were mortally and six others badly wounded: that then the men turned their guns towards the stern, and threatened to blow all aft into the water, &c.

ship; and several of them, with much less politeness than the men of the 'London,' had compelled their captains and officers to land. At last, however, at the suggestion of the king, or, as some say, of his prime minister, it was determined to send down Lord Howe with plenary powers to settle all matters in dispute;—that is, to offer the seamen an entire compliance with all their demands, which would have settled everything so long before, and have saved the country from a long agony of alarm, and the government from an indelible disgrace. Lord Howe arrived at Portsmouth on the 11th of May, bringing with him an act of parliament, agreeable to the wishes of the seamen, which had been passed on the 9th, and not before. His first step was to visit personally all the line-of-battle ships, to ascertain precisely all their grievances. His presence touched the hearts of the men, for his venerable age and his very infirm state of health told them that he was not long for this world; and they could not forget the glories of the First of June, and the many times that the older mariners among them had braved with him "the battle and the breeze." On his representations they soon agreed to express generally a contrition for what had happened, and to request his interposition to obtain the king's pardon for their transgressions. Howe said that these poor sailors, though the most suspicious, were the most generous minds he ever met with in the same class of men. On the 13th deputies from each ship presented their petitions to his lordship on board the 'Royal William'; they all expressed contrition, they were all full of respect and loyalty; but they all avowed a most decided resolution not again to receive on board those tyrannical officers whom they had sent on shore. His lordship found himself obliged to comply; and a number of new appointments were instantly made to fill up the vacancies thus created.* A gracious proclamation of pardon under the great seal was then published; and the sailors of the fleet struck the flag of disaffection, and expressed a great anxiety to be off to look after the Frenchmen at Brest.† This was the last important service rendered to his country by Richard Earl Howe, who died on the 5th of August, 1799, in his seventy-fourth year.

While these things were transacting at Portsmouth, a fresh mutiny broke out at Sheerness. At first it gave little alarm, as it was reasonably calculated that the terms which had satisfied Lord Bridport's ships, and which were to be extended to all ships and fleets whatsoever, would satisfy the

* Among the officers thus charged with oppression, and discarded by their men, were, 1 admiral (Colpoys), 4 captains, 29 lieutenants, 17 master's mates, 25 midshipmen, 5 captains of marines, 3 lieutenants of marines, 4 surgeons, and about 13 petty officers.

† The whole business was concluded on the 15th of May, when the deputies from the ships landed at Portsmouth, proceeded to the governor's house, where Lord Howe was lodged, partook of some refreshments, and then marched in procession to the Sally-port as an escort of honour to Lord and Lady Howe, who with a number of officers and gentlemen were going to visit the fleet. Sir Roger Curtis's squadron had just come in from a cruise: his seamen had showed symptoms of mutiny, but on learning what had passed they became satisfied. In the evening, when the party returned to Portsmouth, the late organs of insurrection, the deputies or delegates, carried Lord Howe on their shoulders to the governor's house.

mutineers at Sheerness; but great was the consternation, when, on the 20th of May, many of the ships lying at the Nore, and soon afterwards nearly all of those belonging to the North Sea fleet, hoisted the red flag, chose two delegates from every ship, and went much farther than their precursors had done, by electing a president, who styled himself "President of the floating republic." This mutiny was, in fact, altogether different from the other; and it was met in a very different spirit by all classes on shore. The Portsmouth men had demanded nothing but a redress of long accumulated and crying grievances; in the midst of alarm, the sympathy of the nation went along with them; but these madmen at the Nore had been perverted by some floating demagogues, and had no grievances left to complain of, and no demands to make, but such as were ridiculous, or incompatible with the service; and, like so many other half or wholly Jacobinised classes of men, they knew not what they were aiming at. It appears that their chief perverter was the very aspiring man they had elected for their president. This was Richard Parker, a native of Scotland, and at one time a little tradesman of Edinburgh, who had ruined his affairs by a too close attention to politics, and who had then abandoned his wife, and entered on board a man-of-war as a common sailor. The man had some education, and he had frequented debating clubs and reforming societies until he conceived himself an orator and a statesman. Under his direction a committee of twelve was appointed in every ship; and these committees decided upon all affairs, and upon the merits of the respective delegates. There were some minor arrangements which showed how attentive a student Parker had been in the school of the Edinburgh clubs. On the 20th of May the delegates delivered "a statement of the demands of the sailors," peremptorily insisting upon compliance as the only condition upon which they would return to their duty. On the 22nd they received from the lords commissioners of the Admiralty a firm, dignified, and decided negative, together with the promise of a pardon if they would immediately return to their duty, and proceed to sea in search of the enemies of their country. Hereupon the delegates declared that some of the Board of Admiralty must come down to Sheerness to negotiate with them. On the next day the mutineers in the 'Sandwich,' of 90 guns, Vice-Admiral Buckner's ship, in which President Parker was serving, struck the admiral's flag, and hoisted the red or bloody flag in its stead; and then all the ships of war which lay near Sheerness dropped down to the Great Nore. On the 24th the government offer of pardon was repeated and rejected. On the 29th a committee of the Admiralty went down to Sheerness, sent for the delegates, and tried to bring them to reason, without, however, yielding to any of their new demands. The delegates, who often landed, with strong escorts of armed seamen, and marched in procession alongshore, as if to entice the people of Kent to join them, behaved with great insolence to the commissioners; and, as soon as they returned to the fleet, the mutineers moored their ships in a line across the river, and detained every merchant-vessel bound up or down the Thames. This was nothing less than an effectual blockade of the port of London. Two vessels, laden with stores and provisions, they seized and appropriated. The conduct of the Foxite opposition, who had done great mischief, during the previous mutiny, by delaying the minister's bill in favour of the seamen, was at this present crisis unpatriotic in the extreme, and, in our humble estimation, infamous. On the 26th of May, when the mind of the country was wholly occupied and agitated by the daring conduct of Parker and his delegates, Mr. Grey rose in the House of Commons to move—for a sweeping reform in parliament. He was seconded by Erskine, and supported by Sir Francis Burdett, Sir Richard Hill, Sir William Dolben, Mr. Smith, Mr. Pollen, Mr. Fox, the great leader, and others of his party. The vast majority of the House testified their disgust at the time chosen for agitating such a question, and the motion was smothered by a vote of 258 against 93. Not a man of the defeated party could have had the shadow of a hope that the motion would pass; but now they pretended to be driven to despair by its rejection, and by the numbers and obstinacy of the Pittites; and Fox and most of his friends instantly seceded from parliament, declaring their attendance there useless, retired into the country, and hoisted, as it were, the black flag of despair to the English people, or to the, at that time, very limited portion of the nation that was eager for a reform of the House of Commons. Some of the seceders returned to their seats, and attended occasionally to their parliamentary duties, but none of them returned during Parker's mutiny; and from this time till the month of February, 1800, Fox spoke only three or four times in the House. Sheridan, who, for some time past, had been altering his tone about the French revolution, refused to secede, or follow his leader; and, when the anxious debate came on touching the rebellion at the Nore, he stood forward, in defiance of his party, to strengthen the hands of government, to recommend firmness, and to exclaim, that, if we yielded to mutinous sailors, we should extinguish, in one moment, three centuries of glory.* The Foxites could only account for this conduct by suspecting, and indeed assuming, that Sheridan was acting under selfish motives, and was, in fact, looking out for some well-paid place and a seat on the treasury bench; and it grieves us to say that there are sundry little circumstances and indications which tend to confirm this suspicion.† Sheridan never recovered the friendship and confidence of his party; nor could that party soon remove the evil impressions made upon the public mind, by their conduct at this crisis. The members of the House who remained at their posts behaved with becoming spirit, and imparted additional firmness to the government. The buoys at the mouth of the river were taken up, batteries were erected alongshore for firing red-hot shot, and a proclamation was issued declaring the ships in a state of rebellion, and forbidding all intercourse whatever with them. Fierce dissensions now broke out among the mutineers, who became sensible that their fellow-seamen in the other fleets and the whole nation were against them. For some time they had been sick of Parker's long speeches, and had deprived him of his presidency. On the 4th of June, the king's birthday, the whole mutinous fleet, to prove its loyalty, fired a royal salute and displayed all the gay colours and flags usual on such occasions, the red flag being struck during the ceremony on board every ship except the 'Sandwich,' where Parker was. A day or two after this, several of the ships deserted the rebels, who pointed their guns at them, but did not fire, and went for protection either up the Thames or under the guns of Sheerness. In those that remained, the well-disposed rose upon the determined rebels, and many wounds were given and some few lives lost. By the 13th of June the bloody flag had disappeared from every mast-head; and on the following morning, the crew of the 'Sandwich' carried the ship under the guns at

* Mr. Moore says that, while the ministry were yet hesitating as to the steps they should take, Sheridan went to Secretary Dundas and said, "My advice is, that you cut the buoys of the river, send Sir Charles Grey down to the coast, and set a price on Parker's head. If the administration take this advice instantly, they will save the country—if not, they will lose it; and, on their refusal, I will impeach them in the House of Commons this very evening.—Life of Sheridan."

† It was never, we believe, thought that Sheridan had any intention of deserting to Pitt; but at this time there was a talk of a new mixed administration, from which Fox must inevitably be excluded by the old antipathies of the king. At this moment Sheridan's pecuniary embarrassments were thickening and becoming unbearable.

Sheerless, and gave up ex-president Parker to a guard of soldiers, who carried him on shore. Parker was solemnly tried, and was hanged at the yard-arm of the 'Sandwich' on the 30th. A few of the delegates were executed shortly after, some of the ringleaders were flogged through the fleet, and others were left under sentence on board prison-ships; but the general good behaviour of our fleets at sea, and Admiral Duncan's victory off Camperdown, gave an excellent occasion for the exercise of royal mercy, and in October a general pardon was proclaimed.* The mutiny at the Nore, which had madness for its origin and nothing but mischief for its end, was thus put down with (for the times) a very small sacrifice of human life. From the other mutiny may be dated the most rapid improvement in the management and condition of our sailors, with a proportionate improvement in the discipline and spirit of the men and the gallantry of their officers.

On the 20th of July the king prorogued parliament.

"The Year of Mutinies" was not altogether an inglorious year to the British navy. On the 14th of February the late Mediterranean fleet, under Admiral Sir John Jervis, fell in off Cape St. Vincent with the great Spanish fleet, just come out of Cadiz under the command of Don José de Cordova, who had recently superseded Langara. The Spaniards had 27 sail of the line, the English only 15; but the greater part of the Spanish crews were about equally destitute of seamanship and spirit; and Nelson, who was in himself worth a whole squadron of line-of-battle ships, was with Sir John Jervis, and executed all the daring and really brilliant part of the action.* By breaking the line, by battering and boarding, four Spanish ships of the line, including one of 112 guns, were taken; and all the rest were driven into Cadiz and there blockaded. The news of this opportune victory reached London at the time of the panic caused by the state of the Bank of England, and had a great effect in reviving the national spirit. Sir John Jervis was made Earl St. Vincent, and Nelson a Knight of the Bath.

* Nelson had said, just before the breaking out of the war with Spain, that, if her fleet were no better now than when it acted in alliance with us, it would "soon be done for."

BATTLE OFF CAPE ST. VINCENT.

On the 11th of October Admiral Duncan, with 16 sail of the line, attacked a Dutch fleet of 11 sail of the line and four 56-gun ships, which had stolen out of the Texel during a storm, and which was on its way to join the great French fleet at Brest. The Dutch admiral, de Winter, his officers, and crews, fought their ships in a very different style from the Spaniards—fought them like brave men and excellent sailors, like worthy descendants of the men who had so long disputed with us the empire of the seas. Their inferiority of force was very considerable, and the only particularly glorious part of the action, on the side of the English, was the daring way in which they ran between the Dutch line, close in-shore, and the dangerous coast; thus setting an example which Nelson afterwards followed at the battle of the Nile. After a most obstinate combat, and a terrible loss in killed and wounded on either side, Admiral de Winter struck; and eight ships of the line, two 56-gun ships, and two frigates remained as trophies of victory to the English; but they were little more than trophies, being all riddled in their hulls like sieves, and otherwise so cut to pieces as to be nearly all incapable of repair. This victory off

Camperdown excited a rapturous joy at home. Duncan was very properly elevated to the peerage. In the meanwhile, in the month* of July, misled by incorrect intelligence, Nelson with a small force had made a very unfortunate attack on Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriffe, which had ended in the loss of his own right arm and of the lives of some 200 of his men. But for his admirable presence of mind and indomitable courage the loss must have been fourfold what it was.

In the West Indies a squadron, under Rear-Admiral Harvey, co-operated with General Abercromby, in reducing the Spanish island of Trinidad. A Spanish squadron lay at anchor there: it was nearly as strong as his own, and was, moreover, protected by some strong batteries on an island at the mouth of the harbour. But, while Harvey, on the night of the 17th of February, lay at anchor off the harbour, within random shot of the Spanish batteries and line-of-battle ships, four of the Spanish ships caught fire, apparently by accident, and burned with great fury till daylight, when the huge boats entered and towed out the fifth ship; and the Spaniards, in dismay, surrendered the island without any further struggle. Abercromby and Harvey were much less successful at the island of Porto Rico, which they attacked on the 18th of April; for the Spaniards had strongly fortified the town and the approaches to it, and the English general, after losing about two hundred men, gave up the enterprise. The mortality among the troops employed in the West Indies continued to be prodigious, nor was any apparent improvement made in the management of them.*

Before proceeding to the war on the continent we must mention a strange expedition of the French to the English coast, which occurred during the money-panic. On the 20th of February four vessels, three of them old French frigates, came to anchor in the British Channel off Ilfracombe. They had troops on board, but no attempt was made to land there, as the north Devonshire volunteers presently lined the coast. The ships stood over to the Welsh coast, and there, in a bay near Fishguard, the troops were disembarked. They advanced into the wild country of Pembrokeshire, apparently without knowing whither they were going. The alarm was spread rapidly, the Welsh collected on every hill, and in every valley, to oppose them; and more than 3000 men, including 700 well-trained militia, with Lord Cawdor at their head, marched directly against the invaders, who, without firing a shot, laid down their arms and surrendered as prisoners of war. There were 1400 of them, without artillery, but well supplied with ammunition. The men were in rags, and looked more like felons escaped from prison than soldiers. It was concluded that they must be prisoners let loose; but this conclusion was perhaps too hasty, for Bonaparte's conquering army of Italy had been just as ragged a few months before, and, in English eyes at least, would have looked just as much like escaped felons or vagabonds. This petty invasion of Wales was not intelligible at the time, and can hardly be said to have been made intelligible since. Some thought it was meant to alarm us by showing that a body of troops might be thrown on our coasts in spite of the vigilance and mighty force of our fleets (but this object might have been attained without so large a sacrifice of men as 1400); some thought that it was meant to be a rapid predatory expedition; some that it was meant to burthen us with so many prisoners, who must be fed at our expense, and who might afterwards increase the confusion in the event of an actual invasion; which last conjecture seems the most rational.

In order to strengthen the armies in Italy, the victorious Archduke Charles had been left weak on the Rhine. He recovered Fort Kehl at the beginning of the year; but Moreau, strongly reinforced, again reduced that important fortress, and defeated the Austrians in a great battle in the month of April. Nearly at the same moment Hoche, who commanded on the Lower Rhine, defeated General Krey; and other French divisions were again advancing into the heart of Germany, when their march was suspended by the intelligence that the emperor was negotiating for a peace with Bonaparte.

Both the young republican general and the old

Austrian marshal had received reinforcements during the winter. Alvinzi, as early as the month of January, took the field with 50,000 men, intending not merely to relieve Wurmser, but also to drive the French from the whole line of the Adige; but he again divided his forces, was defeated at Rivoli on the 14th of January; and, after General Provera, who had surrendered with 2000 men the year before, had surrendered with a division of 5000 men, old Wurmser, being reduced to extremities for want of provisions, was obliged to capitulate in Mantua.

The pope was unable to pay the enormous contributions demanded from him. After the surrender of Mantua the French overran the greater part of the papal states, scattered with a few shots some 6000 or 8000 very unwarlike troops in the pope's pay, took possession of the city and port of Ancona, and at Tolentino dictated new and still harsher conditions of peace to the helpless head of the Catholic Church.* By this time Austria had poured another army to the frontiers of Italy, and had given the command of it to the Archduke Charles. But this last Austrian army was composed almost entirely of raw recruits, and of the disheartened fragments of the forces of Beaulieu, Wurmser, Davidowich, and Alvinzi; and the archduke, instead of being left to his own genius and ready resources, was checked and embarrassed by the Aulic Council at Vienna. On the other side, the French, already superior in numbers, were flushed with victory; and General Bernadotte, who had quitted the army of the Rhine, joined Bonaparte with 20,000 men. After sustaining some terrible defeats in the month of March on the Tagliamento, the archduke retreated slowly and in admirable order towards Vienna, in the hope of receiving reinforcements from that capital and from Hungary, and of drawing the French into the hereditary states, where a population enthusiastically devoted to the emperor would be sure to rise en masse and attack them on their flanks and rear. The campaign was not hopeless: the archduke was full of hope and ardour; the French, who had violated the continental territories of the republic of Venice, were apprehensive of an attack on their rear from that quarter; General Laudon was pouring through the valleys of the Tyrol with another Austrian division, was driving back the French detachments on the Upper Adige, and was almost on the edge of the plains of Lombardy. Bonaparte was full of anxiety; but disguising this feeling, and suddenly pretending to deplore the horrors of war, and to be anxious, merely for humanity's sake, for a peace, he wrote a very flattering letter to the archduke, calling him the saviour of Germany, and representing England as the only power in Europe that had an interest in continuing the war. The archduke referred him for an answer to Vienna. Bonaparte was now at Judenburg, in Upper Styria, about eight days' march from Vienna; but, notwithstanding the successes of Moreau and Hoche, there was no republican army in the valley of the Danube to co-operate with him, he had many streams to pass, and several dangerous defiles before him, and behind him the Lombard Venetians, though without any aid from their timid, contemptible government, were actually rising in insurrection, it being reported among the people, who had many wrongs to avenge, that the French army had got enclosed in the mountain passes of Carniola and Styria, and would inevitably be compelled to lay down their arms. But there was a party at Vienna overcome by their fears, and ready to purchase peace at almost any price: the archduke was ordered to agree to a suspension of hostilities; an armistice began on the 7th of April, and the preliminaries of a peace were signed by Bonaparte, at Leoben, on the 18th. The French on their first advance into the Venetian dominions, and many months before any popular insurrection was heard of or thought of, had made up their minds to overthrow that aristocratic republic, to appropriate all its territories on the continent, together with the city of Venice itself, seated on its hundred isles, to keep all this as an affiliated or dependent republic, or to barter it away (after having well plundered it) for territory elsewhere and other advantages.* In a secret article to the preliminaries Bonaparte now agreed to give the neutral state of Venice to Austria in compensation for her losses. This done, Bonaparte hurried back to the Adige, took a sanguinary vengeance for some disgraceful excesses which had been committed by the people of Verona and its neighbourhood, sent his propagandists into the city of Venice, to excite a mad democratic party into insurrection against the Doge and the aristocrats by promising them liberty and equality, and by setting up the tree of liberty under the shadow of the winged lion in the square of St. Mark; roused the people to rebellion in Bergamo, Brescia, and other towns, got possession of the castles and other fortified places by pretending that he meant merely to keep them until a free, democratic, and essentially independent republican government could be settled by delegates and representatives of the people (in all these deeds a body of Poles, who had been so recently duped, betrayed, and then beaten out of their own country, were active and zealous co-operators with the French); introduced surreptitiously troops into Venice, and next, with something plainer than words, told the Doge and the senate that the people must have a new constitution and form of government, and that they must resign; which the equivocating, heartless cowards did in the month of May. Bonaparte then took possession of the arsenal and docks, with all their stores and all the ships of war; a provisional go-

* Fifteen millions of livres, part in cash, part in diamonds, were to be paid within one month; 30,000,000 more were to be paid within three months; horses and cattle were to be furnished to an immense amount; and the Vatican was to be again plundered of statues, paintings, and rare manuscripts.

* The correspondence of Bonaparte published by Panckoucke fully establishes this fact, which is proved by a mass of other evidence equally incontrovertible.

vernment of the required democratic form was set up, and the mad Venetian democrats, insulted their pusillanimous, degenerate nobles, with impunity, sang the 'Ça Ira' with the French soldiery, and danced round the tree of liberty in the square of St. Mark in an ecstasy, and down to the last moment without any foreboding that they and their country were to be given up to the hated rule of the Austrian Kaiser—whose acceptance of this compensation was only less infamous than Bonaparte's offer.

At the same time, but with much less deception and difficulty, Genoa was democratised and affiliated. The shuffling senate and aristocracy of that once-proud republic had hoped to preserve themselves by their treaties of neutrality, and their secret co-operation with the French; but one fine day in June, the democrats of the city hoisted the red nightcap, and told them that their government was no longer compatible with the improved notions of the times. Fearing plunder, and worse, most of the respectability classes rallied round the senate: the sans-culottes were beaten and put down; but the vanquished applied to the French, who had promised to support them; and then Bonaparte, the conqueror, stepped in, with the intimation that the Genoese government must submit. It submitted accordingly, and was remodelled in the French fashion. Four millions of livres were wrung from the principal nobility, and sent to the five kings at the Luxembourg; a French garrison took possession of the city, and of the mountain fortifications which gird it; and all who gainsaid what was done were put under arrest, while the peasants who attempted to defend their native mountains and their homesteads were tried by martial law and shot. All this while negotiations were going on, and the young republican general was browbeating the Austrian diplomats, now hinting that he might have gained much more for France by continuing the war, and now threatening to shatter Austria like a potsherd. As England was now clearly to be left in the war without a single ally, Pitt, as early as the month of June, intimated to the Directory a willingness to enter into a new negotiation. The Directors, who had taken up and echoed Bonaparte's note that France loved peace, agreed to the opening of conferences at Lisle. In the beginning of July Lord Malmesbury repaired to that city, and continued there exchanging useless notes and receiving many insults until the middle of September, when he was ordered to quit the place within four-and-twenty hours. The French negotiators had acted as if England had been beaten as well as Austria, having demanded that we should give up the Cape of Good Hope and every island or settlement, French, Dutch, or Spanish, without receiving any compensation. Again, as we believe, Pitt was driven into a humiliating negotiation without any expectation of concluding a treaty; and again, the French, while pretending to negotiate and to blame the insincerity of the English cabinet, were stirring up insurrection and civil war in Ireland.

They had already been made to feel that in a maritime war with this country they must be losers; but they confidently calculated that the civil war now on the point of breaking out in Ireland, and popular insurrections in England and Scotland, and the state of our navy, which they very incorrectly considered as still mutinous, must bring Great Britain to the verge of ruin, and facilitate their triumph over her. Bonaparte, who hated the English and their institutions (which he never during his whole life could understand) with a hatred as bad as any Jacobin sans-culotte had ever felt, and who had already begun uttering his pithy oracular sentences, had said that the monarchy and aristocracy of England must be destroyed—that they were undermined already—and that it would only take him three months to democratise London as he had democratised Venice and Genoa.

On the 17th of October the definitive treaty of peace between France and Austria was signed at Campo Formio, near Udine. The emperor ceded to France all the Netherlands, and the left bank of the Rhine, with Mayence, the great outpost and bulwark of Germany; he gave up, nominally to the natives, but virtually to the French, all that he had held in Lombardy, acknowledging the independence of the Milanese and Mantuan states, under their new name of the "Cisalpine Republic;" and he consented that the French republic should have the Ionian Islands, which then belonged to Venice, and the Venetian possessions in Albania. The French republic, on its part, consented (such was the word) that the emperor should take and keep Venice, and its territory in Italy as far as the Adige, together with Istria, at the head of that sea, and all Venetian Dalmatia, on the opposite side of the Adriatic. The Venetian provinces between the Adige and the Adda were to be incorporated with that political phantom, the Cisalpine republic. The emperor, who, in the case of Venice, had admitted the principle of taking neutral or friendly states as compensations from an enemy, was also to have an increase of territory in Germany at the expense of Bavaria, and his feudatory and relative by marriage, the Duke of Modena, was to have the Brisgau. Modena, Massa, Carrara, and all the papal provinces of Bologna, Ferrara, Ravenna, Faenza, and Rimini, as far as the Rubicon, were declared to be annexed to the Cisalpine republic aforesaid. Tuscany, Parma, Rome, and Naples were left to their old governments and monarchic institutions; but, except Naples, they were all in complete subjection to France and her liege vassals the new Italian republicans, who never ceased promoting plots and conspiracies against the said established governments. From these manœuvres Naples itself was certainly not exempted: even now the road was paved for that entrance of the French into the Neapolitan kingdom which took place in 1799. To General Serrurier was confided the honourable task of finishing the spoliation of Venice, and then delivering it over to the Austrians: having removed all their plunder, having stripped even the Bucintoro of its gold and ornaments, the French quitted Venice one day and the Austrians entered it the next; and not only was the new-fangled tree of liberty in St. Mark's cut down, but an end was put to a republic which had flourished for fourteen hundred years. It was an oppressive, tyrannous, jealous oligarchy when at its best; and for more than a century it had fallen into decrepitude and imbecility; its proud patricians had become the meanest of the mean, and not something, but everything was rotten in the state of Venice;—but

When that which once was great hath passed away.”

To settle various questions relating to Germany it was agreed at Campo Formio to hold a congress at Rastadt. Bonaparte, being appointed by the Directory to act as plenipotentiary at this congress, took his leave of Italy in November, leaving his victorious army behind him. As he passed through Switzerland he found an opportunity of insulting Bern and the other aristocratic cantons, thus indicating that they were soon to be democratised and plundered. After a short stay at Rastadt, in which he proscribed and dictated at his pleasure, he hastened back to Paris, where he arrived early in December, to claim the command in chief of the “Army of England,” as an immense force was called which was said to be prepared for the invasion of this country. A proclamation had been issued to that army, telling the soldiery that they should soon be enriched by sharing among them the uncountable wealth of London and the spoils of the English aristocracy.

Since we last alluded to the internal government of France, numerous turmoils, conspiracies, and changes had taken place in Paris. In 1796 the Montagnards and Jacobins made a terrible effort to recover the power they had lost; but their deep conspiracy was detected at the moment it was about to break out by the vigilant Directors, who had organised a very complete system of espionage and treachery; and Gracchus Babœuf, betrayed by one Grisel, a brother conspirator, was arrested by night, and all his papers, containing every particular of the plot, were found and seized. Forthwith all the chiefs of the conspiracy, as Vadier, Amar, Choudieu, Drouet (the hero of Varennes), Rosignol (whose name in the Vendée was ‘Devil’), Ricord, and a great many others, were captured. Gracchus Babœuf bullied the Directors, and endeavoured to make them believe that, from the great strength of his party, the best thing they could do would be to make terms with him, and save his friends by declaring that there had been no conspiracy at all; but the Directors sent him and his friends to take their trial before the High Court of Vendôme. Their partizans in Paris talked of liberating them and overthrowing the five kings at the Luxembourg; but they talked too long and too loudly. At last, in the month of August (1796), about 700 desperadoes, and not more, and only armed with swords and pistols, marched over to the Luxembourg at about midnight to seize the directors. Finding that the palace was defended by a numerous guard, and that they could do nothing there, they marched away to the camp at Grenelle, where they counted on the co-operation of one battalion, and where they hoped to win over the rest of the soldiery. They entered the camp shouting “Long live the republic and the constitution of ’93!” but their friendly battalion had been removed, and the rest of the soldiers, instead of joining, fell upon them with sabres and bayonets, killed a great many of them on the spot, and made prisoners of a great many more. A military commission established in the camp condemned thirty-one of these conspirators to death, thirty to deportation to Guiana, and twenty-five to a hard imprisonment at home. After a very long delay the High Court of Vendôme proceeded with the trial of Babœuf and the other chiefs of the conspiracy, who kept up their spirits on their trial by singing the Marseillaise hymn, and repeating the liberty and equality dogmas which a few months before had been the law and gospel of all France. Gracchus Babœuf and Darthé were condemned to death, the rest to deportation. On hearing their sentence Babœuf and Darthé stabbed themselves with concealed daggers; but, not doing the thing effectually, they were both carried to the scaffold in a half-dead state, and guillotined. These men were about the last of the honest fanatics of the revolution, and they left behind them few or none but selfish time-servers, or men prepared by want of principle, or want of courage, to conform to the course of events, be it what it might; and to submit to that military despotism which was already forging for France. Before the trial and execution of Babœuf, which did not take place till March, 1797, the royalists in their turn began to conspire against the Directory and the so-called republic. Two or three men said to be secret emissaries of Monsieur or Louis XVIII, were apprehended in January, and accused of attempting, like the Babœufists, but for a very different purpose, to seduce the soldiers in the camp at Grenelle. In the month of March, when the elections came on for one-third of the legislature, some of the ancient noblesse were returned, and these decided royalists soon formed a powerful coalition, in direct opposition to the Directory. In May they were even strong enough to get General Pichegru elected president of the Council of Five Hundred, and Barbé-Marbois president of the Council of Ancients. If Pichegru was not a royalist before, the depriving him of his high command in the army had made him one now: Barbé-Marbois was a warm and honest constitutional royalist. In the same month when, in conformity with Sieyès’s last constitution, one of the Directors went out, Barthelemy the diplomatist, who was also by this time suspected of royalism, was brought in to fill up the vacancy. [The director that retired was Letourneur.*] Loud outcries were raised against the extravagance, corruption, and profligacy of the directional government; the full liberty of the press, so often promised, was demanded by the royalists; peace—peace, even with England—was recommended; some of the severest of the decrees against the emigrants and non-juring priests were actually revoked, and the coalition were evidently making considerable progress, when Director Barras secured the services of the astucious Talleyrand by making him minister for foreign affairs, and then appealed to General Bonaparte and the victorious army of Italy. Bonaparte hereupon dispatched Augereau, one of the most devoted and most daring of his satellites, to Paris, with terrible addresses from the army of Italy, which were evidently Bonaparte's own compositions. "Tremble," said one of these significant addresses, "tremble, royalists! From the Adige to the Seine is but a step. Tremble! Your iniquities are counted, and the reward for them is at the point of our bayonets." Besides sending army addresses, Bonaparte sent a few more millions of livres. It seems to have been gratefully acknowledged by Barras, Rewbell, and La Réveillère, that but for the plunder of Italy thus remitted from time to time the Directory would have had very hard work to weather this storm. To overawe the two councils numerous detachments of troops were marched into Paris. Everything announced that a coup d'état or another revolution was at hand. Carnot hated royalty and royalists; but he hated three of his colleagues in the Directory—Barras, Rewbell, and La Réveillère Lepeaux—quite as much; he was enraged too at the tone of "that little Corsican," and, though he did not league himself with his new brother director Barthelemy, or with the coalition in the legislature, he refused to co-operate in the energetic measures proposed by Barras and Rewbell, and even thwarted them continually. Therefore it was they determined that Carnot, that mild republican, should be treated even as a royalist, and classed with Barthelemy in the Dies Irae. The legislature, on the motion of Pichegru, decreed the immediate arming of the national guards, and the removal of the regular troops which had been brought into the capital or stationed around it. General Willot, one of the coalition, and the most determined royalist of them all, recommended that Pichegru should put himself at the head of the national guards, that a decree of accusation and arrest should be launched against Barras, Rewbell, and La Réveillère (it is said he offered to go himself to the Luxembourg, and bring them handcuffed to the bar), that the old sectioners who had survived Bonaparte's hail-storm of grape and canister should be called out, and that the coalition should anticipate their enemies and strike the first blow boldly, and in open day. But Pichegru hesitated; others were all for acting according to law or the new constitution; and, while they were thus deliberating, Bonaparte's own Augereau took the command of the troops of the line in and round Paris, put some more grape and canister into their guns, and with 12,000 men, and 40 pieces of artillery, surrounded the Tuileries, and stepped in to execute the order of the triumvirate—Barras, Rewbell, and La Réveillère—and arrest all their enemies. Eight hundred grenadiers of the guard of the Corps Legislatif were under arms behind the iron railing of the Tuileries—but what were they against so many? "Are you republicans?" said Augereau. "Certes," replied the 800, who then went over and joined his 12,000.* Pichegru, Willot, General Ramel, and about sixty other members of the legislature, were instantly arrested and transferred from the Tuileries to the Temple, charged with high treason. The triumvirate had also proscribed Carnot and Barthelemy: the first of these personages concealed himself, and afterwards escaped, but Barthelemy remained to be condemned and deported or transported with his party. The Council of Five Hundred, who had so recently bowed to the majorities and the will of the coalition, now trimmed their sails to go with another wind: they named a committee of Five, with Sieyes (wroth that men should be so mad as to mutiny under his best of constitutions) at the head of it, to organize a new committee of Public Salvation, or Salut Public. This committee, with a power as dictatorial and absolute as that which it had enjoyed under Robespierre, soon stepped forth, annulled the elections of some forty-eight or fifty departments, drove away the persons elected by them into the legislature and into official posts (as judges, municipal administrators, &c.), and gave to the Directory the power of nominating to the offices thus vacated. Fortunately the Parisians had become sick of blood, and "deportation" was all the mode. Pichegru, Willot, and forty other members of the Council of Five Hundred, Barbé-Marbois and ten other members of the Council of Ancients, Carnot and Barthelemy, the two losing members of the Directory, one abbé, one ex-minister of police, two generals (Miranda and Ramel), and seven other individuals were condemned to be deported or transported for life to that same terrible country where Collot d'Herbois had died, and where Billaud-Varennes was living and educating parrots. Cayenne and Sinimari, and the other yellow-fever towns that lie between the Maroni and the Oyapok, must have been astonished at the mixed batches exported by these successive governments of the mother-country! Considering that the opposition journalists were quite as dangerous as the deputies or members, and that there were no means of striking them judiciously, the Salut Public "resolved to act revolutionarily (révolutionnairement) in their regard, as they had done with the members of the Corps Legislatif." †

* Some of the money sent by Bonaparte had been employed in corrupting beforehand these grenadiers of the guard of the Corps Legislatif. Barras had performed this office with his usual address, and the coup d'état had been deterred until the arrival from Italy of the necessary funds, &c. Augereau wanted to blow the Tuileries and the enemies of the Directory into the air many days before; but, though sure of an easy victory, Barras was anxious to avoid any combat.

† Thiers.

The proprietors, editors, and writers of forty-two journals (collectively an immense number) were also condemned to deportation to French Guiana. It was laid down as good, free, republican law that for the future the Directory should have the power of suppressing whatsoever journals, or newspapers, pamphlets, and books, it might think fit, of seizing and deporting to Guiana without any trial (sur un simple arrêté) all such priests as were thought to misbehave themselves politically, and of shutting up all clubs, preventing with the armed force all meetings, &c. &c. The re-organization of the Paris national guard was suspended; but there was an immense increase and a re-organization of the police, which began from this time to mix in nearly all matters, and to exercise a despotism which has never since ceased, and which, apparently, never will cease in France. All these measures, which gave the Directors a power more absolute and more revolutionary than any that had been possessed by Robespierre, Couthon, and St. Just, were voted on the 18th Fructidor, or 4th of September, by the Council of Five Hundred. "Not a voice," says Thiers himself, "was raised against their adoption; some deputies applauded, the majority were silent and submissive." The Council of Ancients showed less promptitude in their submission; but on the 19th the Directory sent them a peremptory and insolent message; and forthwith they constitutionally confirmed all that the other House or council had voted. Nearly all the emigrants and priests who had returned now went flying out of France. Some cargoes of the deported were shipped off for the pestiferous settlement in South America; but a good many of them remained on the French coast, in prison or under strict police surveillance in the Isle of Ré. Poor diplomatic Barthelemy was of the number of those who went to Guiana, where he caught the endemic fever and nearly died; but after some months of captivity he escaped with six of his companions, and got safely to England. Carnot, who had fled, took up his quarters in Switzerland, waiting for some new revolution at Paris. Merliu de Douai, a timid, submissive lawyer, and François de Neufchâteau, a man of letters, a writer of republican odes, and as servile as Merlin, were put into the Directory to fill up the places left vacant by Barthelemy and Carnot. Such was the revolution or coup d'état of the 18th Fructidor.

The British parliament reassembled on the 2nd of November. The speech from the throne dwelt on the excessive pretensions of the French; the failure of the negotiations at Lisle, the flourishing state of trade and the revenue, our naval victories and our new conquests in the West Indies; and it once more recommended those vigorous exertions which alone could make peace attainable. As Fox and other great orators of the opposition continued in their secession (as if to encourage the enemy by showing what a divided people we were), there was little interest in the very slight opposition offered to the addresses, or in any of the debates which followed during the session. The army and navy estimates were smoothly passed, and, as a beginning, supplies were voted to the amount of 25,500,000*l.* Among the ways and means adopted was the trebling of all the assessed taxes.

A. D. 1798.—At the end of April, when the sword of rebellion was all but drawn in Ireland, the minister demanded further supplies to the amount of more than 3,000,000*l.* The money was voted with little opposition, as was a new increase of taxes to meet it. Sundry more millions would have been required if our late ally the emperor had not made his separate peace with the French. As the storm thickened in the West, as the Irish were flying to arms in all parts of the country, and as the French were not merely preparing to co-operate with them in the heart of that island, but also threatening to invade England with 100,000 men, a bill was readily passed for allowing men in the supplemental militia to enlist into the regular army; and another bill soon followed to enable his majesty to provide more effectually for the security and defence of the realm, and to indemnify persons who might suffer in their property by such measures as it might be thought necessary to adopt. The Alien Bill was revived, and the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was renewed or prolonged.

Discussions on the state of Ireland were stopped by ministers and their majorities, as being only dangerous at so critical a moment. But in the month of June, when the Irish insurgents had attacked and beaten several detachments of the king's troops, and more of the militia, and had captured several towns, a message was delivered to parliament from the king, desiring "that he might be enabled to take all such measures as might be necessary to defeat any enterprises of his enemies, &c." The chief object of the message was to allow the officers and privates of different militia regiments, who had made a voluntary tender of their services to assist in the suppression of the Irish rebellion, to go to that country and act with his majesty's regular troops. Although there was no other force to send at this moment, several members hotly opposed the measure as likely to be turned into a precedent, and made the means of forcibly, and against the tenor of the Militia Acts, obliging English militiamen to serve out of their own country. The bill was, however, passed; and on the 29th of June the king prorogued parliament, with a good, manly, English-sounding speech, in which honourable testimony was borne to the public spirit of the nation.

Not less through the faults of the government than through the faults of the governors, Ireland had never enjoyed any continuance of tranquillity, not merely since the Reformation, which introduced the capital, embittering difference of religion, but not even since its first connexion with England in the 12th century. Since the period of the American war, when the Irish volunteers were allowed to arm themselves, the turbulence had manifoldly increased; and, whether acting wisely or unwisely, liberally or illiberally, whether granting concessions or withholding them, nearly every act of government had tended to augment the disaffection. To this unhappy end the fierce, excessive, extravagant spirit of all parties, both in the Irish parliament and in the country, could not but contribute. Generally speaking, the period from 1778 down to 1798 had been one of concession to the Irish Catholics, who formed about sevenths of the population. Whilst the American revolutionary war lasted, and for some years after it ceased, the disaffected Irish took their inspiration from the other side of the Atlantic, and in many instances closely imitated the proceedings of the Americans. But, as soon as the eruption of the great volcano commenced in France, they fixed their eyes on that pillar of fire as that which was to lead them through night and darkness, and waves more perilous than those of the Red Sea, to the glorious light of day, and to regions more blessed than the Promised Land. From that moment the French revolutionists became the models of the leaders of the Irish reformers, some of whom, at a very early stage of the revolution in France, contemplated nothing less than a revolution in Ireland, and went over to Paris to be indoctrinated into the modes of making it, and to bargain for the disinterested assistance of the French. Still, however, these men maintained the broad and necessary fiction, that they aimed at nothing and wished for nothing beyond Catholic emancipation and a reform in parliament; a fiction rendered necessary not more by the decided aversion of all the respectable classes of Catholics to the extremity of a revolution, than by the fears the said chiefs entertained of government prosecutions and trials for conspiracy and treason. At the beginning of 1793, or almost immediately after the declaration of war against England, the ruling party in France (then Jacobin Girondists) dispatched a secret agent to Ireland to confer with the leaders of the Society of United Irishmen, and to offer them the aid of French arms for the liberation of their country. This emissary brought a letter of introduction to Lord Edward Fitzgerald, who had been dismissed from the English army for having frequented the Jacobin Club at Paris; for having been one, with Thomas Paine, and men of that stamp, at a great public dinner at Paris, where the most revolutionary and jacobinical speeches were delivered, and the hope expressed that England as well as Ireland would soon be revolutionized à la Française.^{*} Soon after that unlucky dinner, he became acquainted with the Genlis, and married her Pa-

^{*} It would have become Lord Edward Fitzgerald, as a man of honour, to have resigned his commission before going to such lengths. It was impossible for any government to overlook his daring, extravagant conduct; and under any other government than the English he would assuredly have been shot, or condemned to perpetual imprisonment in some fortress. Holding the commission of the king, with the oath attached to it, his lordship, or, as he chose to call himself at Paris, citizen Fitzgerald, proposed the toast—"May the Ca Ira, the Carmagnole, and the Marseillaise Hymn soon become the favourite music of every army, and may the soldier and the citizen join in the chorus!"

mela—her own illegitimate daughter by the Duke of Orleans, or Philippe Egalité, who was then universally considered as having contributed more to the bloody crimes of the revolution than any other man.* Lord Edward is said, by his warm-hearted biographer and countryman, to have apparently done nothing more towards the object of the revolutionizing mission of the beginning of 1793 than to introduce the secret emissary to Mr. Bond, Mr. Simon Butler, and a few others of the party, or members of the Society of United Irishmen; but, if he did no more than this, it fell little short of treason; and if the fact had been known at the time, or in the course of the two following years, when several of these United Irishmen (as Hamilton Rowan, who had been so closely linked with the Scotch reformers and the Edinburgh Convention) were put upon their trials for seditious practices, and pleaded that they were only seeking parliamentary reform and a redress of grievances, through paths strictly constitutional, it may be doubted whether they would have escaped with such lenient sentences. In 1794, when the reign of the Jacobins and of Terror was at its height, another secret emissary came over from France to Ireland. This individual, a subject of the king, an Irishman by birth, and a protestant clergyman by profession, was the Rev. William Jackson. He conferred with Wolfe Tone, and many others of the Irish revolutionists, and repeated the promises of the French to assist them "in breaking their chains." This Jackson was arrested in Dublin soon after his landing, and was tried and condemned for high treason; but he made no confessions, he left government in the dark as to the extent of the conspiracy, and he escaped a public execution by committing suicide. Enough had already transpired to call forth vigilance, and the government and the anti-revolutionary party (a party excessively hot) were provoked and alarmed by the long line of carriages filled with United Irishmen and Clubbists that followed the convicted traitor to the grave. A stop was put to further concessions; and in Ireland, with at least as much reason as in England, every attempt at reform or change was reprobated. Motions for parliamentary reform, made by Grattan and Ponsonby, were rejected by large majorities in the Irish Parliament; and the Catholics were told that, having received much, they must wait more tranquil times for more. When Burke's party, or the Old Whigs, strengthened Pitt's government, and arrayed themselves against Fox, they had recommended a liberal system of policy towards Ireland. In 1794 Lord Fitzwilliam, esteemed one of the most liberal and enlightened men of that party, was sent over as viceroy or lord-lieutenant. His lordship's public conduct alarmed and ^{*} Mr. Thomas Moore (Life of Lord Edward Fitzgerald), after stating in a positive manner that Pamela was the daughter of Madame Genlis by the duke, intimates in a later edition that the fact has been contradicted by a good authority, whom he does not name. But we have heard the fact affirmed and re-affirmed upon very good authority; and we believe that at this moment no doubt is entertained upon the subject by people in France who know most about these secret histories.

exasperated the Orangemen, or Ultra-Protestant party, a great deal more than it conciliated the Catholics, or than it disarmed the decided revolutionary party, which, far from being composed entirely of Romanists, was in good part made up of Presbyterians, and other Protestant sectarians; and these dissenters from the North of Ireland were, by ancestral, traditional, and other obvious reasons, by far the most prone to republicanism.* In the Irish parliament, which met in the end of January, 1795; the celebrated Grattan, with the avowed consent and encouragement of Lord Fitzwilliam, obtained leave to bring in a bill for the entire emancipation of the Catholics. We cannot discuss the long and difficult question whether the lord lieutenant did or did not exceed his instructions from the English ministry, who had certainly intimated on many occasions that this was no time for trying great political experiments;—we can only state that Lord Fitzwilliam was immediately recalled, and that plotting and conspiracy, and the intercourse with the French, increased rapidly under his successor Lord Camden. We believe, however, that it can be proved that a certain party had never ceased that plotting, and that in the golden days of Lord Fitzwilliam's government there were emissaries going and coming between France and Ireland. Now, not satisfied with a test which had hitherto bound them together, the United Irishmen took themselves, and exacted from the converts who joined their club, a solemn oath to be faithful and secret; and a clause in the old test, which seemed to limit their views to a reform in parliament, was cancelled. A new organization was introduced for the provincial clubs; people were sworn in everywhere; and in their secret meetings no secret was made to the initiated of the intention and fixed part of taking up arms and calling in French assistance. Wolfe Tone, who had fled to America, found at Philadelphia his friend Hamilton Rowan, who had also escaped from justice, a Dr. Reynolds, and other Irish patriots who had made their own country too hot for them. Hamilton Rowan (formerly the friend and guide of Muir) introduced Wolfe Tone to citizen Adet, the minister or ambassador of the French to the American republic; and a negotiation for invading Ireland by a French army was opened forthwith. Tone himself tells us that he consulted at every step with Dr. Reynolds, Hamilton Rowan, and James Napper Tandy; that, being at length supplied with some money by Keogh, Russell, and other United Irishmen in Ireland, and furnished with a letter to the committee of Salut Public by citizen Adet, he sailed for France to conclude his treaty there. He arrived at Havre-de-Grace on the 1st of February, 1796, and found that the French "are a humane people, when they are not mad;" and that he liked them, "with all their

* All the Irish parties were in a state little short of madness at the time. If Lord Fitzwilliam had gratified the Catholics by giving them everything they desired, he would have had to fight the ultra-Protestants, or Orangemen, who, in spite of their numerical inferiority, would have been far more difficult to subdue than their rivals and adversaries.

faults, and the guillotine at the head of them, a thousand times better than the English."† On arriving at Paris he was received by Carnot and by General Clarke, then a sort of secretary-at-war, and afterwards the notorious Duke de Feltre, who told him that General Hoche should sail for Ireland with an irresistible army as soon as the Directory could raise money to hire and equip transports.‡ To make Clarke exert himself he promised him 1000*l.* a-year for life; and he always kept up the idea that liberal provision should be made in liberated Ireland for all the French generals, commissioners, &c. who should assist in her liberation. But, while he promised birds in the bush, this Hibernian patriot wanted a bird in the hand for his own sustenance; and he importuned the Directory, like a barefaced beggar, and for a long time in vain. It was ingeniously represented to him that it might be considered beneath the dignity of his character as representative at Paris of the Irish nation to accept a military commission from the French government; but, with equal ingenuity, he explained away the objection, and at last he got a commission as brigadier-general, together with a whole month's pay in advance. Besides showing his poverty, this little briefless barrister, who had been enabled to live in his own country only through the pay he received from the political societies, must have shown, to shrewd men like Carnot and Clarke, that he was a vain, rash, empty-headed coxcomb, not very likely to have any great weight or influence in Ireland. The Directory expressed an anxiety to see some agent or agents from the United Irishmen of a more exalted condition and of better known name and character. Lord Edward Fitzgerald, brother to the then Duke of Leinster, and Mr. Arthur O'Connor, nephew of Lord Longueville, and said to be lineally descended from Roderick O'Connor, king of Connaught, readily accepted the mission at the request of the chiefs of the United Irishmen. They left Dublin at the end of May, 1796, Lord Edward being accompanied by his French wife. They took London in their way; and during their short stay in that city Lord Edward dined at the house of an opposition peer, in company with Fox, Sheridan, and

* Wolfe Tone's own Diary, published by his son.

† The French did not engage in this liberation business without the most extravagant promises of co-operation on the part of the Irish.
 ‡ The Catholics of Ireland are 3,150,000, all trained from their infancy in an hereditary hatred and abhorrence of the English name. For these five years they have fixed their eyes most earnestly on France, whom they look upon, with great justice, as fighting their battles, as well as those of all mankind who are oppressed. Of this class, I will stake my head there are 500,000 men would fly to the standard of the republic, if they saw it once displayed in the cause of liberty and their country. The republic may rely with confidence on the support of the Dissenters, actuated by reason and reflection, as well as the Catholics, impelled by misery, and inflamed by detestation of the English name. . . . The militia are about 18,000 strong, as fine men as any in Europe. Of these 16,000 are Catholics, and of these a very great proportion are sworn defenders. I have not a shadow of doubt that the militia would, in cases of emergency, to a man, join their countrymen in throwing off the yoke of England. . . . It would be just as easy, in a month's time, to have an army in Ireland of 200,000 as 10,000. The peasantry would flock to the republican standard in such numbers as to embarrass the general-in-chief. A proclamation should instantly be issued, containing an invitation to the people to join the republican standard, organize themselves, and form a National Convention for the purpose of framing a government, and administering the affairs of Ireland till it was put in activity."—Wolfe Tone's Memorial to the Directory.

several other distinguished Whigs of the Fox party, to whom he is supposed to have revealed the object of his mission to the continent.* If this supposition, which has been advanced by a friend, and not by an enemy, be correct, then were Fox, Sheridan, and all who heard him, guilty of the capital crime of misprision, of treason. Those most nearly interested in the fame of Fox have not, as far as we are aware, made any effort to remove this suspicion; but, as we doubt several of Mr. Moore's inferences and conclusions, we may venture to doubt this most astounding one, which, after all, is only given upon hearsay evidence.† From London the secret negotiators proceeded to Hamburg, where they began to treat with a French agent; and from Hamburg they went to Basle, and through Barthelemy negotiated with the Directory. They were informed that an army for Ireland would soon be ready, and that Hoche would have the command of it. They wished to confer personally with that general, who was on the western coast of France. The utility, the necessity of such a conference must have been felt by Hoche and the Directory; but a difficulty arose, and the French government objected to receive Lord Edward Fitzgerald, "lest the idea should get abroad, from his being married to Pamela, that his mission had some reference to the Orleans family." After a month's stay at Basle, O'Connor went into France to confer with Hoche and to finish the negotiation; and Lord Edward returned to Hamburg, talking on the road with his fellow-travellers in what appears to have been the most rash and puerile style.‡ Hoche, having full powers

* The startling passage in Mr. Moore's biography is to this effect: "About the latter end of May, accompanied only by his lady, who was then not far from the period of her confinement, Lord Edward set out from Dublin on his perilous embassy—passing a day or two in London on his way; and, as I have been informed by a gentleman who was of the party, dining on one of these days at the house of Lord —, where the company consisted of Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and several other distinguished Whigs—all persons who had been known to concur warmly in every step of the popular cause in Ireland, and to whom, if Lord Edward did not give some intimation of the object of his present journey, such an effort of reserve and secrecy was, I must say, very unusual in his character."

† On the trial of Lord Edward's companion and brother negotiator O'Connor, Fox was summoned as a witness to speak to his character. After saying that he knew Mr. O'Connor very well, that during the last three or four years he had had occasion to see him frequently and converse with him on political subjects, that he lived chiefly with his (Fox's) friends, "who are called the opposition," that he also lived in esteem and confidence with him, &c., Fox said—"I am acquainted with Lord Edward Fitzgerald, who is a near relation of mine. I believe Lord Edward was anxious to go to France relative to some private affairs concerning his wife, who had property there. Knowing the political state of that country, and that a law against going there existed in this country, I advised him not to enter the French territory on any account, if he went on the continent."—The Trial of Arthur O'Connor, Esq., John Bains, &c., for High Treason, before Judge Buller, under a Special Commission at Maidstone, Aldwych; London, 1798.

‡ His biographer says:—"Leaving to Mr. O'Connor, therefore, the management of their treaty with Hoche, whom the French Directory had invested with full powers for the purpose, Lord Edward returned to Hamburg,—having, unluckily, for a travelling companion, during the greater part of the journey, a foreign lady who had been once the mistress of an old friend and official colleague of Mr. Pitt, and who was still in the habit of corresponding with her former protector. Wholly ignorant of these circumstances, Lord Edward, with the habitual frankness of his nature, not only expressed freely his opinions on all political subjects, but afforded some clues, it is said, to the secret of his present journey, which his fellow-traveller was, of course, not slow in transmitting to her official friend."

A writer less partial and less national than this amiable biographer would surely describe in very different terms the conduct of a man who could thus babble with a loose madame in a diligence or post-wagon! Lord Edward's indiscretions were committing not merely himself, but hundreds of his political friends who were then in Ireland from the Directory, very soon concluded the treaty with O'Connor, and pledged himself that the expedition should sail in the course of the autumn. All this time Wolfe Tone had been kept in the dark as to any negotiation beyond his own; and, when Hoche, after the conclusion of his treaty with O'Connor, saw Tone for the first time at Paris, he artfully drew from him all that he knew or thought concerning O'Connor and Lord Edward Fitzgerald, without dropping the least hint about his recent negotiation with them. Lord Edward and O'Connor soon returned to Ireland; but Tone remained to come over militarily with Hoche and the French army. The fate of the expedition has been already narrated. Wolfe Tone went with it to Bantry Bay, running two narrow and terrible chances—the one of being taken and hanged, the other of being shipwrecked and drowned. He, however, got back safely to France, spent some months at the head-quarters of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, employing himself principally in attempts to corrupt the British soldiers and sailors that were prisoners of war in France, with a view of embarking them with the next invading army;* for neither abroad nor at home in Ireland was the notion given up of another invasion. The winds of heaven had scattered the last armament, but another might be more successful. In the course of the spring of 1797 the chiefs of the United Irishmen, thinking it expedient to have a resident ambassador at Paris, dispatched thither a Mr. E. J. Lewines, with powers to act as their accredited minister, and with instructions to negotiate, if possible, a loan of half a million sterling. In the course of the summer "the Irish Executive" sent over Dr. MacNeven on a special mission, which was to urge the Directory to hasten their preparations. The Directory, who were then on the point of sending an ambassador to Lisle to meet Lord Malmesbury, and delude the English with a feigned negotiation for peace, told the doctor that they would soon be ready, and that the Batavian republic would have the honour of taking the lead in the invasion of Ireland with the fleet collected in the Texel. But that fleet, which could not get ready or would not venture out to sea until the month of October, was annihilated, as we have seen, off Camperdown. Before this event took place, Lord Edward Fitzgerald came over from Dublin to London, and here conferred with a secret and most confidential agent of the French Directory, who were anxious to obtain correct information respecting the state of Ireland and the forwardness of the preparations of the re-

and within the grip of the law. What could be hoped but failure and disgrace from a rebellion or revolution with such heads! His lordship had not even the plea of youth in his favour, for, though it has been the custom to speak of him as that "young nobleman," that "light-hearted young man," his lordship had attained the 34th year of his age!

"I know the Irish a little. When everything else is ready, let them send in a large quantity of wine and brandy, a fiddle and some French filles, and then, when Pat's heart is a little soft with love and wine, send in two or three proper persons in regimentals, and with green cockades in their hats, to speak to them, of whom I will very gladly be one. I think, in that case, it would not be very hard to persuade him to take a trip once more to Ireland, just to see his people a little."—Wolfe Tone's Diary.

volutionists. By this time the United Irishmen and their Executive had arranged everything for a general insurrection; and, although neither French nor Dutch, neither money nor arms arrived from the continent, it was with great difficulty that the more prudent of the chiefs prevented a rising in the north. Three of the more ardent chiefs, Lowry, Teeling, and Tennant, being discovered in a plot (warmly recommended by Lord Edward Fitzgerald) to debauch some of the regiments then on duty in Dublin, and seize the barracks and the castle, were obliged to fly to Hamburg. There had always been jealousies and discordant views between the delegates of Ulster and the delegates of Leinster, and these were increased by the difficulties and embarrassments which rose on every side, and by their disappointment of receiving the promised succour from France. The strong religious repugnance of Catholics and Presbyterians had manifested itself long before this, the Presbyterians of the north pretending they could do without the Catholics, the Catholics pretending they could do without the Presbyterians. If they had been left to themselves, these revolutionists would soon have butchered one another. If a French army had landed, the fanatic incredulity of the soldiery, the insults they everywhere offered to churches and priests, the intelligence of the barbarous treatment the pope of Rome had received at the hands of their nation, their outrageous conduct towards the women of the country (and it was not to be expected that the French would have been more devout or tolerant or moral in Ireland than they had been in other countries), would, in a very brief space of time, have brought the entire Catholic population down upon the liberating army, and a war without quarter would inevitably have taken place between the liberators and the liberated. As events ran, horrors and cruelties, for ever to be deplored, were committed in the Irish rebellion, and by both parties; but the aggregate of these evils is a mere trifle compared with those which must have desolated the country, and converted it into one vast slaughter-house, if the Irish could have been left to themselves, with their feuds and their French allies. In the month of February of this present year, 1798, a most pressing letter was addressed by the so-called Irish executive to the French Directory, urging them to send immediate succour, and stating that the people of all classes throughout Ireland then regimented, and partly armed, amounted to little less than 300,000 men. Talleyrand positively assured their agent at Paris that an expedition was getting ready in the French ports, which should certainly sail in the month of April. On the 28th of February, Lord Edward Fitzgerald's friend, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Quigley or O'Coigley, an Irish priest, and Binns, an active member of the London Corresponding Society, were arrested at Margate, as they were on the point of embarking for France. A paper was found on the priest, addressed to the French Directory, and earnestly inviting an invasion of England, which, it was calculated, would prevent our sending troops into Ireland. This paper, and the trial which followed, put government in possession of many important secrets; but a great deal had been unravelled before this time. Quigley, the priest, who died protesting his innocence of treason, and who really appears to have been less deeply engaged in the conspiracy than any of them, was found guilty, and was executed on Pennenden Heath; O'Connor was remanded on another charge of high treason, and Binns was acquitted.* Some arrests were forthwith ordered at Dublin, and some more papers were found in a printing-office—the office where O'Connor had been publishing a revolutionary journal, called 'The Press.' But much completer revelations were now about to be made, by one of the chief revolutionists. Several obscure members of the Association of United Irishmen had played false before; but the great secrets of the society were not intrusted to such as those; and the government was anxiously looking for some higher and more fully informed traitor to that cause, when a Mr. Thomas Reynolds, who had Esquire written after his name, and who lived in what was called a castle, who had been deep in all the plots and intimate with most of the leading plotters, who was the nominal treasurer of a county and the appointed colonel for a regiment of the insurgent army, pretending that the United Irishmen were going much farther than he, in his innocence, had ever anticipated, and that his love of the constitution and the integrity of the empire induced him to betray his friends, but in reality being hard driven by debt, and filled with the hope of an immense reward, divulged all that he knew to a friend of government, and undertook to render further services to enable or assist the government to counteract the whole plan.† A warrant from the secretary of

* We have mentioned in a preceding note the appearance of Fox on this trial. But Sheridan, the Earl of Suffolk, the Duke of Norfolk, Lord John Russell, Lord Thuret, Lord Oxford, Michael Angelo Taylor, and Whitbread, all of the Foxite party, appeared also to speak to the frank, open, honourable character and constitutional politics of O'Connor. Sheridan said he had known him for three years, and had never met him in any company "but that of the respectable gentlemen of opposition" with whom he (Sheridan) associated; that he had always conversed with him on political subjects without any reserve; that his character was remarkable for its openness; that he never met any man in his life who so much reprobated the idea of any party in this country desiring French assistance, &c. Sheridan appears to have been somewhat disconcerted when, in his cross-questioning by Mr. Garrow, he was asked how so remarkably open and frank a character could disguise himself and assume a false name. He had allowed before that he had advised O'Connor not to remain in this country; and now he said that Mr. O'Connor was driven from his own country, and friends, and was endeavouring to go abroad. The other distinguished witnesses all spoke of O'Connor as one of the honestest of men and politicians. The Duke of Norfolk said: "From what I know, I consider him as a gentleman warm in the political line, and attached to the constitution in the same manner as myself." Whitbread said: "I know Mr. O'Connor; his character amiable, and his political principles the same as my own."—Trial at Large.

† A son of this Reynolds—a gentleman highly esteemed by those who know him—published some four years ago a book in vindication of his father's conduct and character. The motive may have been natural and laudable, but the work failed entirely of its object. Mr. Reynolds could not disprove the following facts:—1. That his father had run himself into debt by extravagance and over-speculation; 2. That he was greatly distressed for a few hundred pounds, and got that money immediately from government; 3. That he afterwards claimed 20,000*l.* as compensation for the furniture, &c. destroyed in his castle; 3. That he obtained a consular appointment, and also a pension to the amount of 1000*l.* per annum Irish, constantly clamouring for more money until the end of his days.

state's office was forthwith placed in the hands of Major Swan, a magistrate for the county of Dublin, who, on the 12th of March, repaired to the house of Mr. Oliver Bond (a merchant, and one of the principal conspirators), where there was to be a great meeting, attended by thirteen serjeants in plain clothes, and by means of the pass-words—"Where's MacCann? * Is Ivers from Carlow come?" obtained admission to the meeting, and arrested all such persons as were there assembled. Dr. MacNevin, who had been on the special commission to Paris, Emmet, Sampson (both barristers), and Lord Edward Fitzgerald, were not at the meeting; but, separate warrants being issued against them, MacNevin and Emmet were soon apprehended: Sampson fled to England, was seized at Carlisle and brought back to Dublin; but Lord Edward Fitzgerald concealed himself in Dublin and the neighbourhood, and was not discovered till the 19th of May. It appears that, on the part of government at least, the search after him had not been very active, and that, on account of his noble family and his numerous friends, his escape would gladly have been connived at. But seemingly he never contemplated escaping, but employed himself all the time he was under hiding, in arranging how the insurgents were to rise and march upon Dublin. He had fixed the 23rd of May for the general rising. On being surprised, lying on a bed in the house of one Murphy, on the evening of the 19th, he behaved more like a madman than a hero, savagely shedding blood without the slightest hope of fighting his way out, for the house was surrounded by piquets, and a numerous and steady garrison were under arms in the streets of Dublin. When Major Swan entered the garret and showed his warrant, he sprang up like a tiger. Swan, to stop his attack, fired a pocket-pistol at him, but without effect; and then Swan rammed the pistol into the face of Murphy, who was in the room, and whom he suspected of hostile intentions. A soldier now entered, and at that instant Lord Edward ran at Swan with a dagger which had been concealed in his bed. Mr. Ryan, a magistrate, next entered, armed only with a sword-cane, and presently received a mortal wound from Lord Edward's dagger. Major Sirr, the active town-major who had been setting the piquets, next rushed into the room, where he found Lord Edward, a very tall and powerful man, struggling between Swan and Ryan, Ryan being on the ground weltering in his blood, but still clinging, like Swan, who was also bleeding and wounded in several places, to his adversary. Major Sirr, threatened by the bloody dagger, took a deliberate aim, and lodged the contents of a pistol in Lord Edward's right shoulder. A number of soldiers followed Sirr up stairs, and, after a maniacal struggle, Lord Edward was disarmed and bound, carried to the Castle, and thence to Newgate. Ryan died of his wounds, on the 23rd of May; Lord Edward died of his wounds, or fever brought on by them and by his anxiety of mind, on the 5th of June; Swan recovered from the frightful gashes he had received.

In spite of the fall of Lord Edward, who was to have been their commander-in-chief, and in spite of the flight or arrest of every member of the Directory or Executive, the Irish flew to arms in various places on the appointed 23rd of May. On the 24th they made an abortive attempt on Naas, Carlow, and some other towns. Lord Roden, with a party of 35 dragoons, drove 400 or 500 of these ill-armed, disorderly insurgents before him; and General Dundas dispersed a much more numerous party at Kilcullen. But on the 25th an army of 14,000, or more, pikemen, headed by a Father John Murphy, marched to Wexford, defeated part of the garrison that sallied out to meet them, killed all the prisoners they took, and terrified the town of Wexford into a surrender on the 30th. Most of the Protestant inhabitants had fled; such as remained were barbarously used and thrown into prison. The insurgents also made themselves masters of the town of Enniscorthy; and, having now procured some artillery, they fortified a position at Vinegar Hill. Colonel Walpole, with a small detachment, fell into an ambuscade, and was slaughtered, together with nearly all his men. Encouraged by these and other trifling advantages, the rebels made a rush at New Ross, took part of the town, began to plunder and drink, got for the most part very drunk, and were then driven back by General Johnson, leaving 2600 of their number behind them in killed, wounded, and dead drunk. At the news of this success of the king's troops at New Ross, a body of the insurgents, stationed at Scullabogue, massacred in cold blood more than 100 Protestants they had taken prisoners. These and similar atrocities prevented the Presbyterians of the North from rising, and gave to the insurrection the old character of a Popish rebellion and massacre. But the best of the Catholics presently came forward to express their abhorrence of the whole rising, and to offer their assistance to government in suppressing it. After a few other fights or skirmishes, General Lake attacked, on the 21st of June, the fortified position at Vinegar Hill, carried it with a frightful loss to the insurgents, who never rallied again, and then retook Wexford and Enniscorthy. Lord Camden was now recalled from the lieutenancy of Ireland, and succeeded by Lord Cornwallis, who brought with him a general pardon (with a very few exceptions) to all who submitted. Of the leading conspirators who had been taken, only four—MacCann, Byrne, and two brothers of the name of Sheares, the sons of a banker at Cork—were executed. Bond was condemned to die; but his life was spared on condition of disclosing all he knew respecting the rebellion—a condition he accepted, with the proviso that his information should not effect the lives of his fellow-prisoners. Arthur O'Connor, MacNevin, Emmet, Sampson, and the rest, were merely banished. In the month of August, when the flames of rebellion seemed completely extinguished, three French frigates, eluding the vigilance of our fleets, reached Killala, and threw on shore 900 troops of the line, commanded by General Humbert, who had been in the former expedition to Bantry Bay, and who had narrowly escaped perishing in the wreck of the 'Droits de l'Homme.' A small number of the Catholic peasantry of the country joined him, and Humbert proceeded rapidly to Castlebar. There he encountered General Lake, with a force superior in number, but consisting chiefly of Protestant yeomanry and militia. Lake was beaten, and in his retreat lost six guns. From Castlebar Humbert marched eastward into the very heart of the country, expecting to be joined by all the men of Connaught, if not by all the Papists of the island, but finding, wherever he advanced, that the mass of the people shunned him and his soldiers as though they had brought the plague with them. About seventeen days after his first landing, Humbert was beaten by the advanced guard of Lord Cornwallis, who was marching against him with troops of the line; and, on the 8th of September, being entirely surrounded, the French laid down their arms and became prisoners of war. To keep up the ferment and suspicion, and to oblige England to keep a large force in Ireland, rather than with any hope of reviving a cause which was utterly lost, the French, within a month after the surrender of Humbert, ordered a squadron of one ship of the line and eight frigates, with troops, arms, and ammunition on board, to choose a favourable moment for getting to sea, and then to proceed to Ireland at all hazards. This armament actually reached the western coast of Ireland; but Sir John Borlase Warren, with his squadron, met it there, and gave a very good account of it, capturing the ship of the line and three of the frigates.* On board the French ship of the line was seized Wolfe Tone, who had not improved his very lax morality during his residence at Paris, and whose deeds, words, and writings had placed him beyond the liberally extended verge of mercy.† On his trial, he pleaded his commission of a brigadier-general in the French army as a bar to punishment for all

* Eventually three more of the frigates were taken.

† A short time before starting on this his last trip, we find this gentle reformer writing in his Diary:—"My heart is hardening hourly, and I satisfy myself now at once on points which would stagger me twelve months ago. The Irish aristocracy are putting themselves in a state of nature with the people, and let them take the consequences. If ever I have the power, I will most heartily concur in making them a dreadful example." "This is no slight affair; thousands and thousands of families, if the attempt succeeds, will be reduced to beggary. I cannot help it! If it must be, it must."

And in order to entice the Directory, and to show the officers of the French army what a golden harvest they might reap, he enumerated in one of his memorials what he delicately called the resources of Ireland. These were, the net annual revenue of government, 2,000,000*l.*; the church, colleges, and chapter lands, whose exact value he did not know, but he knew it to be of vast amount; the property of all the absentees, amounting to at least 1,000,000*l.* per annum; the casual property of emigrants; the property of all Englishmen in Ireland, whether vested in land, mortgages on land, trade, manufactures, bills, book debts, or otherwise;—and all these Pactolian streams could so easily be made to flow into the treasury of the Irish republicans and their French allies! One English nobleman he knew had 300,000*l.* lent on mortgages in Ireland; one single English commoner had 150,000*l.* employed in the like manner.

These grand sums being multiplied by 24, to turn them into French francs, presented an array of figures which must absolutely have dazzled the French republicans.

treasons present or past; but he was condemned to die the death of a traitor, and, finding that the sentence really meant hanging, he cut his throat in Dublin gaol to escape the ignominy of the gallows. His madness, and the madness of his friends and party, cost the lives, from first to last, of many thousands of individuals, and reduced a still greater number to squalid misery and woe. They had begun their attempts at revolution in drunkenness and folly, with a thumping and breaking of glasses and frantic huzzaing; they had conducted their enterprise—scarcely with a single exception—like a set of rash school-boys; and they had ended it in the very spirit of fatuity. Amiable and honourable traits are to be found in Lord Edward Fitzgerald and in Emmet; but we believe that the characters of the rest will be best served by being consigned to silence and oblivion. Tone's execution was the last on account of this rebellion.*

In the month of May, while parliament was sitting, a spirited attempt was made to interrupt the preparations for invasion on the coast of Belgium, and to destroy the sluices, gates, and basin of the Bruges canal at Ostend. Captain Home Popham, with a small squadron having on board a body of troops commanded by Colonel Coote, sailed from Margate Roads, bombarded Ostend, and landed about 1000 men at a short distance from that town. The soldiers blew up the sluices, destroyed a good many vessels, and did all the work they were sent to do in very quick time; but, on returning to the beach to re-embark, they were prevented by the fury of the wind and surf; and, being next day hemmed in by an immense force, Coote found himself under the necessity of surrendering, after he had lost about one man in every ten.

An expedition to Minorca was more successful, and gave us possession of an excellent port, which our Mediterranean fleet much needed. In the autumn Admiral Duckworth's squadron landed in Addaya Bay, in the island of Minorca, a land force of about 800 men, commanded by General Sir Charles Stuart. Assisted by a hot fire kept up by Duckworth's smaller craft alongshore, Stuart defeated about 2000 Spaniards, drove them from post to post, attacked them in some intrenchments, and easily compelled the governor to surrender the whole of the island by capitulation.

In the West Indies orders were received from ministers to abandon that large portion of San Domingo which we had reduced at the invitation and with the aid of the French planters, but which we could not retain without a constant, terrible sacrifice of human life. General Maitland entered into a compromise with Toussaint l'Ouverture, formerly a slave, but now chief of the revolted negroes and the founder of a sort of negro republic, who engaged to respect the lives and properties of all the European or Creole planters and inhabitants that might choose to remain. In the month of May all that were left alive of our troops were withdrawn; and towards the end of the year some French troops, who had maintained their ground in some strong places, shipped themselves off, and left Toussaint in undisturbed possession of the best part of San Domingo.

The fate of Switzerland was decided in the spring of this year. The unprovoked aggression of the French was hardly more infamous than the means they employed. They began by complaining of the permitted residence of Mr. Wickham, the English envoy, and they next demanded his expulsion. To remove this ground of quarrel Mr. Wickham was recalled by his own government. The Directory then ordered the French troops to take possession of a part of the territory of Basle, and almost as soon as this was done they sent a strong division under General Menard into the Pays de Vaud, a dependency of the aristocratic canton of Bern. Menard was received as a liberator by all the democrats and sans-culottes among the Vaudois, who, like all the French-speaking portion of the Swiss, had been stirred up by French propagandists and French books. These people had some reasons to complain of the pride and oppression of their Bernese rulers; but to get rid of these minor evils they threw themselves and the whole of Switzerland at the feet of the Gallic republic. On the 7th of January, the Vaudois, being joined by deputations and delegates from other democratic cantons, held an assembly of representatives chosen according to the French plan; and presently they all agreed to send a deputation to Paris to testify an entire devotion to the republic, and to claim still more assistance to enable them to put down aristocracy, and defend liberty. Notwithstanding the manner in which he had been invited into the country, Menard soon began not only to seize upon all public stores, but also to levy military contributions; for, friends or foes, or neutrals, the people of the country must support every French army that traversed or remained upon their territory. The Federal Diet of the Swiss, then sitting at Aarau, were perplexed and distracted, for Basle, which had been thoroughly democratized and revolutionized, refused to concur in any of the measures proposed to secure the independence of the country, and hastily recalled its deputies; and Mengaud, a fierce propagandist, who had now assumed the title of 'Minister of the French republic in Switzerland,' came repeatedly to Aarau, escorted by French hussars and accompanied by Swiss proselytes, vexing the diet with notes, spreading fresh revolutionary pamphlets among the people and the local militia, and presiding over democratic clubs which he had himself organised.* The Diet, still further embarrassed by the fierce democracy of one or two other cantons, separated without coming to any resolution. As soon as it had quitted Aarau, which was subject to Bern, an insurrection broke out in the town; the municipality proclaimed its independence, and hoisted the tree of liberty; a regiment of militia revolted against its officers, and formed a revolutionary committee; other things were done according to the teaching of Mengaud and his agents, and his pamphlets and handbills; the revolt spread; the ignorant or unthinking revolters being assured that they should enjoy, together with the old national independence, the perfection of a democratic government, an elysium of liberty and equality. The aristocracy of Bern made a spirited effort to resist this storm; several of the cantons sent deputies to Bern, where a sort of federal representation was formed; some of the mutineers were arrested, the rest were put to flight; and, a call being made for the double contingent of the Helvetic Confederation, 26,000 sturdy Swiss assembled in arms—an admirable militia, but still only a militia. But by this time General Menard had 15,000 regular troops—a part of the victorious army of Italy—concentrated in the Pays de Vaud; and, with the Swiss demagogues to assist him, he had organised a provisional government at Lausanne; and, on the other side of Switzerland, the peasants of Basle, encouraged by the presence of a French force, had driven away their governors and set fire to their castles, had compelled the magistrates of the city to resign their authority into the hands of a commission of sixty persons, said to be selected from all classes, but composed, as we believe, entirely of the lowest class and of the most enthusiastic proselytes of the French. After making a spirited beginning, the Council of Bern fell into a fatal irresolution, and matters were made almost hopeless by their choosing a pedantic, scribbling blockhead, a Colonel Weiss, to head the contingents. Instead of endeavouring to dissolve the revolutionary committee of Lausanne, and showing a bold front to the French on the frontiers, he busied himself in writing a pamphlet;* and, as his enemies grew stronger, he retired to the northern extremity of the Pays de Vaud, leaving the whole country at the mercy of the democrats and their French auxiliaries, who presently decreed its separation for ever from Bern. As General Menard approached nearer to Bern, the council endeavoured to propitiate the French Directory by numerous apologies and humiliating condescensions: they invited the communes to elect a deputation of fifty-two members to take their seats in the sovereign council and assist in making a new constitution of a more democratic kind; but, when they announced this last measure to the Directory and to Mengaud, they were told by this successful preacher of insurrection that no leaven of aristo-

* Mengaud, who is described in French biographical dictionaries as a man of letters and diplomatist—littérateur et diplomate—was originally a penniless Jacobin from Bellort. In 1801, sacrificing his republicanism, he became one of the most devoted slaves of Bonaparte, who employed him as a supreme commissary of police and surveillance in the seaports of Dunkirk, Calais, Boulogne, &c. He was a sort of minor Fouché, but not so adroit; for, in 1804, he raised such a clamour by some of his proceedings, that the First Consul was obliged to dismiss him.

cracy must be left; that they must create a provisional government framed on an entirely democratic basis, and from which all the members of the old government should be excluded. This rendered an appeal to arms inevitable; but the vacillating counsels of the Bernese destroyed whatever hope their good cause might have had. Brune, a general of high repute, and a protégé of Director Barras, arrived on the Swiss frontiers with 10,000 more troops, and took the command over Menard. It ought to have been known or suspected that Brune only waited for fresh reinforcements in order to begin the attack; yet the Bernese sought and obtained a truce for fifteen days, during which Brune's army was raised to 40,000 or 45,000 men, and many of the Swiss soldiers were made to believe that they were betrayed and sold to the French by their own government. There were other insidious arts employed on one side and other imbecile acts on the other side; but it will be enough for us to state that on the 1st of March, before the expiration of the armistice, some French columns surprised in the night a Swiss battalion and cut most of the men to pieces, and on the following morning Brune led the main body of his army against Freyburg. Many of the contingents withdrew to look to the protection of their own homes, leaving less than 15,000 men to defend Bern; and, as these men retreated before the French, in the impression that they were betrayed, they drove away many of their officers and bayoneted two of their colonels. After committing these excesses, the Swiss soldiers, as if struck with a sudden horror, submitted again to their officers, and prepared to fight the French. And bravely did they fight on the 5th of March, when Brune was repulsed with terrible loss, and driven back for several miles on the road to Freyburg. But the odds were too great, the country was too much disorganised: the brave General d'Erlach, who commanded a part of the Swiss army, was defeated at another point, and was afterwards murdered on the road by some infuriated Swiss soldiers and peasants.* On the 5th of March Brune, in greater force, repeated his attack, and a wavering on the part of the Swiss troops was followed by a most sanguinary defeat. More than one hundred officers—the pride of the Bernese nobles—were killed on that dreadful day. Their names may be read, inscribed in golden letters upon six slabs of black marble in one of the aisles of Bern cathedral. After this victory, Brune, unopposed, entered the city of the Fighting Bear—that bear “that once gave fearful strokes with his paws.”†

“Such,” says an excellent writer, in whose veins flows some of the good blood of the Swiss, “such was the fall of Bern, a republic which had existed nearly 600 years. It fell by the same arts, by the same hands, and nearly about the same time as Venice and Genoa; like them it exhibited weakness and hesitation in its councils, but, unlike them, it showed something of old Swiss determination in the hour of struggle, and it fell neither unhonoured nor unmourned.”* General Brune, in the name of the French Directory, who would have been less eager if the old republic had been less rich, seized the public treasury of Bern, in which were found above 30,000,000 of francs in gold and silver; and emptied also the chests of the various branches of the administration, as well as those of the various trades or companies of the burgesses and of the patricians. He cleared the arsenal of 300 pieces of artillery, of a great quantity of ammunition, and of arms and accoutrements for 40,000 men. He obtained more arms by disarming all the people both in town and country; and he ransacked all the public magazines of corn, salt, wine, &c. The whole plunder was carried off to France. Some of the Bernese guns were sent to Toulon for the Egyptian expedition, and, but for the money seized in that old Swiss republic, Bonaparte might not have had the opportunity of dating bulletins from the foot of the Pyramids. Most of the Bernese money was employed in fitting out that mighty armament. The Directory dispatched into Switzerland a commissioner of the name of Le Carlier, who began his mission with forced requisitions for provisions and more money;—“For,” said he, in a proclamation, “it is but just that the Swiss should support their liberators.” Bern, plundered as she had been, had to pay 800,000 more francs, Freyburg 300,000; and, that the money might be forthcoming, sixteen members of the old government were seized and carried to the French citadel of Strasbourg, there to be kept until the last franc was paid. When the aristocratic cantons were exhausted by plunder, the liberators directed their attention to the cantons that were or had become ultra-democratic, and that had either invited them into Switzerland, or facilitated their progress when they came. The traders and manufacturers of Zurich and other towns, who had refused to send their contingents to the army of the Confederation, and who had professed every principle which the French propagandists and then the French army recommended, were taxed, fined, and harried, even like the aristocrats of Bern, and were compelled to admit within their walls a French garrison, to debauch their wives and daughters, and tyrannize over all. Luzern became equally the object of Le Carlier's attention; contribution was levied upon contribution, and confiscation of property ensued upon every attempt at resistance. Many of the peasantry, who would not and could not conform to the new system, were shot as traitors or rebels. The five kings of the Luxembourg gave wings to a decree, declaring, in that phraseology which Bonaparte afterwards adopted to several royal dynasties, that the Helvetic Confederation had ceased to exist, and that Switzerland was to form a single republic, one and indivisible, under a central government to be established in the well-democratized town of Aarau. And, that this centralized government might be spared the pains of making a constitution for itself, the directors sent one ready-made from Paris, or a transcript of Abbé Sieyès's last masterpiece, with its two councils, its executive directory, &c. They also applied their compasses and their squares and measures to the country, changing the old cantons, which were far too irregular in their shape to suit their nice mathematical notions, into twenty-two new cantons or departments, all cut and squared at Paris, and in the true Parisian fashion. Under 45,000 bayonets there was a smooth submission, until they called upon the Waldstätten, or mountain-cantons, to send their deputies to the centralization at Aarau. These hardy mountaineers, who had lived in a state of pure democracy (not unsuited to the thinly-peopled, poor, and primitive districts they inhabited—a democracy which was, however, tempered by the genial spirit of the early patriarchal system, from which all systems of government originally sprang), who were averse to all changes and novelties, and indignant at the thought of foreign interference, boldly refused to send deputies, stating that they were quite satisfied with their old form of government, and only wished to be left to themselves. The French Directors and system-makers, who wanted a uniformity of government everywhere, without the slightest allowance for ancient habits and feelings, or any other circumstances, moral or physical, and the organizers of conquests and subjugations, who were eager to make Switzerland a post-road into Italy, and to level the mighty Alps, or prostrate and keep in entire submission the brave Teutonic or anti-Gallican tribes who inhabited them, were in a fury at the contumaciousness of the Waldstätten, and 15,000 men were ordered to march against the stubborn democrats of the mountains. A man with a Teutonic name, a native of a province which never ought to have been allowed to belong to France, Schauenburg, an Alsatian, was put at the head of this invading army. He routed the shepherds and cowherds of Glarus, Uznach, and some other districts; but Aloys Reding (honoured be the name!) who had served in foreign armies, and who knew how to direct the undisciplined valour of his countrymen, met him with only 1200 sturdy Schwyzers, beat him repeatedly, and, in conjunction with some auxiliaries from Uri, so harassed and beset him in the mountain passes, that he lost in all nearly 4000 men, and was but too happy to conclude a convention, in which it was agreed that no French soldier should enter the canton of Schwyz, that no contributions should be levied there, and that the Schwyzers should send deputies to Aarau. The Schwyzers and others of the Waldstätten sent their deputies to Aarau; but, in the month of July, nothing less would satisfy the French commissioners and commanders, than that the people should assemble in every canton to take a solemn oath to preserve forever the new French-manufactured constitution of the Helvetic republic. The French had proved how lightly they thought of such matters; but, to a people with strong religious feelings, the oath was a matter of high import, and the small mountain cantons refused to perjure themselves. Upon this the Alsatiens marched again with 15,000 men. Through a want of concert the brave men of Nidwalden were left to stand the brunt by themselves. The entire population of that district did not much exceed 10,000, of whom about 1800 or 2000 might be capable of bearing arms. The rustic heroes who took the field and stationed themselves in one of the passes, being attacked in the rear as well as in front, and assailed by artillery to which they could not reply, were defeated on the 9th of September, but not until they had nobly fought from sunrise to sunset, and strewed the pass with their own and their enemies' bodies. Fifteen hundred Nidwalders perished there; the rest took refuge among the caves and the glaciers of the higher Alps. The victors showed no mercy. "They were rebels, whom we must subdue," said the Alsatian general, in his dispatch to the five kings, who were faring sumptuously in the Luxembourg; "we are now masters of this unhappy country, which has been pillaged. . . . The fury of our soldiers could not be restrained; all that bore arms, including priests, and unfortunately many women also, were put to the sword.* Our enemies fought desperately; it was the hottest engagement I ever was in." All the cattle that could be caught were carried off by the French; the houses and cottages were set on fire, the fruit-trees cut down, three or four pretty little towns, built chiefly of the Alpine fir, were burnt to ashes. With their hands reeking with the blood of the Nidwalders, the French, in contempt of their recent convention, made a rush into the canton of Schwyz, butchering some of the inhabitants and disarming the rest. The liberty for which William Tell had fought and bled was now annihilated by these new Gallic republicans, who had professed to give liberty and equality and an augmented happiness to all mankind!

Meanwhile, the exactions of the Directory over the rest of Switzerland had continued. Le Carlier had been recalled as not sufficiently active, and a new

* In the churchyard of the rustic town of Stanz a chapel has been built to the memory of 414 inhabitants of that town, including 102 women and 25 children, butchered by the French on the 9th of September. On the winding road from Stanz to Sarnen is the chapel of St. Joseph, outside of which eighteen women, armed with scythes, and leaning against the wall, defended themselves against a party of French soldiers until they were all killed. The priest was saying mass in the church of Stanz when the French rushed in: a shot struck him dead, and fixed itself in the altar, where the mark is still seen. commissioner or commissary had been sent, who bore the ominous and appropriate name of Rapinat.* The rapine committed by this Rapinat surpassed the slow conception of the poor Swiss: the rogue's only merit was his impartiality—he robbed all alike. At the same time Schauenburg, after disarming the people, forbade any one to leave his own canton without a passport signed by the general. Hitherto passports had been unknown in Switzerland: the use of them was first introduced by these French republicans, as an appendage to their curious system of liberty. Such were some few of the blessings which the Irish people would have enjoyed if the Lord Edward Fitzgeralds, the Wolfe Tones, could have succeeded in getting a French army into the heart of their island!

The Swiss were not the only people in Europe that felt the hollowness and bitterness of the friendship of the French, and the implacability of their hatred, during this eventful year. The Belgians were so harassed by military conscriptions, that they broke out into insurrections in five departments—insurrections which added the loss of blood and life to that of money and goods. In Italy the people of the so-called Cisalpine Republic were made to sigh and groan for the blessings they had enjoyed under their old governments. Rome was made the seat of anarchy and woe. In order to raise the money required from it by the treaty of Tolentino, the papal government was obliged to drain the pockets of its subjects. This created violent discontents, which were fermented by a strong French or revolutionary party, who recommended, as a proper remedy for every evil, the destruction or expulsion of the old pope with all his hierarchy, and the setting up of a Roman Republic under the immediate protection of the French. These Roman patriots were about the worst that had shown themselves in Italy—for the most part unprincipled and cowardly, ready to plunge the country into a domestic war, but shy in risking a hair of their own heads; sensualists and materialists; rabid atheists, who had rushed from the extremity of superstition to the extremity of unbelief; self-seekers, that calculated how much they should gain per man by the spoils of the church and the sale to foreigners of the antiquities and masterpieces of art which attracted all the nations of the civilised world to Rome, forgetting that, in dealing with the French, they dealt with a nation which took what it wanted without paying for it.† Ever since the Director La Réveillère-Lepeaux had taken it into his head to be the founder of a new religion under the name of Theophilanthropy, the French agents at Rome had received urgent instructions to discredit all revealed religion, and particularly the Roman Catholic, to give additional encouragement to the Roman reformers, in order that the supreme head of the Catholic Church might be humiliated, degraded, and driven out, as all this might serve to facilitate the establishment of La Réveillère-Lepeaux's new faith, which was nothing but the old theism of Robespierre furbished up and made more ridiculous. The family of the fortunate Corsican general had risen as he rose: his elder brother, Joseph Bonaparte, was no longer in the commissariat but in the diplomatic department, being at this time ambassador at Rome, with instructions to change the state of that government without appearing to take any active part with its disaffected subjects. Joseph, who loved his ease, and respected the ease and comfort of others, had no zeal for la Réveillère-Lepeaux's new religion, and apparently no very excessive anxiety to co-operate with the Roman reformers and demagogues. To excite him to more activity, or in order that they might act for him, the five kings at the Luxembourg sent to Joseph two fiery republican generals (whether Theophilanthropists or not we are not informed): one was General Duphot, who had had the chief management of the overthrow and change of the ancient republic of Genoa; the other was General Sherlock, who descended from an Irish family, and who testified an earnest desire to date the era of the new world, not from the birth of Christ, but from the birth of the French republic. As soon as these two men arrived, the Roman democrats became uncommonly bold and turbulent. They insulted the pope's guards, and even the pope himself when he showed himself in public. This roused the common people, the true sans-culottes of Rome, who had no French political sans-culottism about them, but who were devout, superstitious, attached enthusiastically to their pontiff and their priests. A certain number of the democrats armed themselves; but, if the papal government had chosen to put arms into the hands of the populace in the quarter beyond the Tiber—the athletic and daring Trasteverini, who looked like ancient Romans—and to give them but the word, these revolutionists would have been exterminated in a day, with all the French who encouraged them. The papal government only remonstrated with the French embassy, and slightly increased the town-guard or urban militia. On the night of the 27th of December, (1797), while Joseph Bonaparte was giving a grand ball, an encounter took place in the streets between this town-guard and a band of democrats, who had mounted the French cockade in their hats: two of the guards were badly wounded, and one of the democrats was killed outright. On the very next day some three hundred of the democrats assembled at the Villa Medici: General Duphot was among them, haranguing and waving his hat, and

* This Rapinat was another Alsatian (it should seem that the German blood in Alsace had not been improved by the French mixture), and a relation of Rewbell, one of the five directors. Like most of his school, he robbed on his own account as well as for his employers. With his portion of the plunder of Switzerland he afterwards purchased some of the finest estates in Alsace. The following epigram has often been quoted:

Un bon Suisse que l'on ruine
Voudrait bien que l'on décidât
Si Rapinat vient de rapine, Ou rapine de Rapinat.

by his advice the madmen hoisted the tricolor flag and shouted, "Down with the pope, and up with the Roman republic!" Their valour was an after-dinner valour, for they had dined and drunk copiously before the flag was produced. As soon as they saw or heard that some cavalry as well as infantry of the pope's guard were approaching, they all ran away from Villa Medici to the Palazzo Corsini, the residence of Joseph Bonaparte and of all the French embassy. The papal troops were held at bay by the arms or insignia of the Gallic republic painted over the palace-gate; and the democrats within the palace, made bold by this awe and by the law of nations, which makes an ambassadorial residence a sanctuary, harangued from the balconies, called the Roman people to liberty, and threatened to go and plant the tricolor flag on the summit of the Capitol. Other democrats gathered in the streets, making noise enough to awaken the dead in the tomb of the Scipios. The papal troops came up, fell upon these out-of-door revolutionists, wounded some of them, and saw the rest run into the vast court-yard and up the broad staircases of the Palazzo Corsini, whence, thinking themselves safe, they insulted the soldiery with words and gestures. Part of a regiment of dragoons galloped into the court-yard, calling upon the ambassador, Joseph Bonaparte, to turn those rebels out of his house. Joseph, who never showed the least stomach for fighting, remained under cover and proposed pacific messages; but General Duphot drew his sword, and ran down stairs into the court-yard, calling upon the democrats to follow him and stand by him, and he would drive away those cowardly soldiers of priests. It should appear that the Roman heroes, who were under cover in the apartments above, remained where they were; but a combat took place between those in the court-yard and the dragoons, and, at the very beginning of it, Duphot, who on the next day was to have married Joseph Bonaparte's sister-in-law,* was mortally wounded by a shot from a carbine. Several of the democrats there were killed in the same way, and a greater number wounded; most of their brethren upstairs escaped through back doors and windows, and fled across the garden behind the palace at the first report of fire-arms. As soon as he was able, Joseph Bonaparte, with his suite, fled to Florence, calling the poor old pope the assassin of Duphot. The Directory, who had long wanted some such occasion, sent orders to General Berthier to march instantly to Rome with a large body of troops. Some weeks before the death of Duphot, Pesaro, Senigaglia, and other towns in the Roman states, were in open rebellion, and the papal government had vainly remonstrated with Joseph Bonaparte on the encouragement and assistance the French were giving to his revolted subjects. With nothing to oppose them, the French and 4000 Poles, under Dombrowski, advanced into the states of the Church; Loretto, with its Holy House, was sacked; Osimo was plundered and burned; and, on the 10th of February, Berthier drew up his forces on the Roman hills, and planted his guns as if to bombard the city. The terrified Cardinals who formed the government signed a capitulation, in which they gave up the castle of St. Angelo and nearly everything else. On the same day the pope's garrison was turned out of the castle, and the French entered it; and Ceryoni, the Corsican, took possession of all the principal posts in the city. On the morrow, in the midst of the acclamations of the Roman democrats, Berthier made his triumphal entrance into the capital of the ancient world. Four days after—the 15th of February, and the anniversary of the day on which the reigning pontiff, Pius VI., who had now reigned for 23 years, had first put on the triple crown—the democrats of Rome assembled in the Campo Vaccino, the ancient Forum, erected a tree of liberty with the tri-color and the red night-cap at the top of it, renounced for ever the government of priests, aristocrats, or kings, and proclaimed that, by the will of the Roman people, the ancient republican form of government was restored. A wretched constitution, badly translated into Italian from the French, was presented next day to Berthier for his approval, without which they knew full well the thing could not live for an hour. The French general gave his approbation, but only conditionally. The Roman democrats then crowned him with laurel, and carried him in triumph to the Capitol, where Berthier, in return, called them worthy descendants of Brutus and Scipio. When these farces were played out, the spoliation and the robbery began. The grey-headed Pope was confined in the Vatican palace under a strong guard of unbelieving, mocking French; and seals were put upon all the pontifical apartments and upon the palaces of the absent cardinals. As a beginning, immense contributions were demanded, and, as security for the prompt payment of them, four cardinals and a number of the principal lay nobles were seized and thrown into the castle of St. Angelo. Not a word more was said about Duphot, whose death had been stated as the provocation which brought Berthier and his army to Rome: his rashness had served the turn, and he was forgotten in his bloody grave. Full liberty was given to the Roman demagogues to wreak their vengeance on their late superiors and masters, and to gratify all their personal animosities. These things provoked a fearful reaction on the part of the common people: assassinations by night and by day became horribly frequent; and, though they were masters of the city, it was a long time ere either Frenchman or Roman Republican could venture to show his face among the Trasteverini. Berthier, having some delicacy of feeling, some respect for venerable age and fallen dignity, which made him shrink from the task himself, sent the Corsican general Ceryoni to the Vatican to tell Pius VI., in the name of the French Republic, that he must recognize the new Roman republic, lay down his temporal authority, and quit his palace.* Pius replied, that his eighty years and the infirmities and maladies which oppressed him must soon end his life and his sufferings, but that for the rest he would not yield except to force; that his enemies might have power over his body, but none over his will or over his soul, which was looking to another world where the wicked ceased from troubling, and the weary found rest. The Corsican adventurer, nourished with the French philosophy, could not but laugh at the miserable old dotard. A commissioner or commissary of the Directory, who had come to look after the plunder, finished what Cervoni had begun, by telling Pius that by will or by force he must leave Rome within forty-eight hours. The aged pontiff replied that he could not resist violence, but that his people would see and remember that he was torn from them by force. On the 20th of February he was seized in the Vatican, and put into a coach with two or three faithful ministers; and, escorted by a regiment of French cavalry, he was whirled rapidly out of Rome and along the northern road which leads to Tuscany. The common people were overcome by horror and consternation; but, wherever he passed, crowds of them fell upon their knees, blessing him and imploring his blessing. Apart from spiritualities, the old man had been a benefactor to the country. He was allowed to take up his residence in a convent of the Augustinian monks in Siena, in the dominions, or in what had been the dominions, of the Grand Duke of Tuscany; but his residence was constantly surrounded by a guard of republicans, and he was treated to all intents like a state prisoner.

Shortly after these troubles at Rome, popular insurrections, fomented by the French and the democrats of Genoa or the new Ligurian republic, broke out in Piedmont, and the new king of Sardinia was compelled to admit a French garrison into Turin, and all the other citadels which he had hitherto retained. Thus that fine country became virtually a province of France.

Bonaparte, after a rapid inspection of the French coasts and of the so-called "Army of England" stationed near them, had returned to Paris to undertake the command of another army destined for no less an object than the conquest of Egypt, which country, it was calculated, would not merely supply to France the loss of her West Indian colonies, but also enable her first to annoy, and afterwards to invade the British possessions and dependencies in the East Indies. It was a wild scheme, and as unjust as it was wild, for, whatever might be the occasional contumacy of the Mameluke Beys, Egypt was a country belonging to the Turks, the ancient allies of the French, who were living in peace with the republic, and had done nothing to provoke an attack. But a very extravagant estimate was formed of the wealth of Egypt itself: the plunder of the land of the Pharaohs would, it was calculated, amply pay all expenses of the expedition and enrich the army; men's heads were filled with high-sounding names of places and dynasties, and with those always intoxicating comparisons with the Greeks and Romans; Bonaparte's fame as the conqueror of Italy, or rather of the Austrians in Italy, was an additional inducement, and 30,000 men, chiefly from the army of Italy, assembled with wonderful enthusiasm at Toulon, to sail, whenever the opportunity should offer, for Alexandria and the mouths of the Nile. The secret of the expedition was well kept from the enemies of the republic; a continuance of violent winds drove the English blockading fleet from those waters; and on the night of the 19th of May, Bonaparte, with a vast fleet of men-of-war and transports, put to sea and sailed up the Mediterranean. On the 9th of June the fleet arrived before Malta, the capture of which important island was included in the plan adopted by the Directory. The knights of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, who had held Malta ever since the days of the emperor Charles V., had not acknowledged the French republic; but not a few of those noble knights entertained French notions or had sold themselves to French interests. Hompesch the grand master, a weak old man, was bullied and terrified by these traitors, and, instead of manning the works of La Valetta, which might have defied the whole French fleet and army for months—whereas every moment was precious to them, and full of apprehension, for they knew that the British fleet would soon be after them—he returned a miserable answer to Bonaparte's summons to surrender, and actually capitulated on the 11th, the date fixed by the republican general. After plundering the churches and the alberghi and other establishments of the order, and thereby collecting no inconsiderable quantity of gold and silver, Bonaparte re-embarked on the 19th for Egypt, leaving General Vaubois and a garrison to take care of Malta. As the French fleet sailed by the island of Candia it passed near the English fleet, but without being seen by it; for a thick haze favoured the invaders, and prevented their utter annihilation, with the destruction or captivity of all the troops, and of Bonaparte himself, by Nelson. On the 29th of June the French came in sight of Alexandria; and on the following day the troops landed within three miles of that city, without any opposition, but with such haste and confusion, produced by the dread lest Nelson should be upon them, that a considerable number were drowned. The town of Alexandria was easily taken. From its ancient walls Bonaparte issued a proclamation to the inhabitants of Egypt, telling them that he came as the friend of the Sultan, to deliver them from the oppression of the Mamelukes, and that he and his soldiers had a particular respect for God, the prophet Mahomet, and the Koran. On the 7th of July he moved from Alexandria to Cairo, marching over burning sands, where the French troops suffered greatly and murmured not a little. On the 21st, on arriving in sight of the great pyramids, they saw objects less peaceful than those stupendous memorials of the dead—they saw the whole Mameluke force, under Murad Bey and Ibrahim Bey, drawn up at Embabeh. Battle was joined almost immediately. The Mameluke cavalry, 5000 in number, was splendid and brave; but their Arab auxiliaries were not so well armed; and their infantry, composed chiefly of Egyptian Fellahs, or peasants, armed with matchlocks, was altogether contemptible; and they had no artillery. The battle of the Pyramids, as the affair was called by the French, was easily won: such of the Mamelukes as escaped destruction retreated towards

Upper Egypt; and two days after Bonaparte entered Cairo without resistance. Here he assembled a divan, or council, of the principal Turks and Arab chiefs, to whom he promised the civil administration of the country. He also endeavoured to conciliate the Ulemas and Imams, holding frequent conferences with those doctors and professors of the Mohammedan faith, talking oracularly and orientally (by means of interpreters): he repeated their brief credo, that there is but one God, and that Mahomet is his prophet, and at least hinted that he and his army, who had destroyed the Pope of Rome, and those other ancient enemies of the Moslem, the Knights of Malta, might some day undergo the initiatory rite, and become thorough converts to Islamism. While he was thus engaged at Cairo, Nelson disturbed his visions by destroying the fleet which he had left near Alexandria. The British hero had returned up the Mediterranean without any instructions from his government, and without any certain knowledge of the French expedition. He was unfortunately without frigates to scour that sea, and he was thus, as it were, compelled to grope his way in the dark. The first news he got of Bonaparte's movements was that he had surprised Malta. Instantly he bore away for that island; but some days before he could reach it the French were gone, and he could find no one to tell him whither. Making, however, a shrewd guess, he sailed for the mouths of the Nile, and arrived off Alexandria on the 28th of June. But no French fleet was there, and, although it was so near at hand, he could learn nothing of its whereabouts. He then shaped his course to the northward for the coast of Caramania, and steered from thence along the southern side of Candia. It was here he so nearly touched the objects he was seeking. Baffled in his pursuit, he crossed the whole Mediterranean and returned to Sicily. He had sailed six hundred leagues with an expedition almost incredible; his flag-ship the old 'Vanguard' was nearly strained to pieces; but as soon as he could re-victual and take in fresh water he turned his prow again toward Egypt, still holding to his opinion that the French must have been bound thither, but vowing that if they were bound to the Antipodes, or if they were anywhere above water, he would find them out and bring them to action. On the 28th of July he entered the Gulf of Coron in the Morea; and there for the first time he received certain intelligence that the French had been seen about four weeks before steering between Candia and the coast of Egypt. Then, setting every sail that his ships could possibly carry, he stood over once more for the mouths of the Nile, grieving for the time which had been lost, and wishing it had only been his fate to have tried Bonaparte upon a wind. Earl St. Vincent had been severely censured for sending so young an officer upon so important a service; but the glory of the British flag could not have been intrusted to better hands; and the perseverance, the ability, and self-resources he displayed before the battle were as honourable as the skill and the valour he displayed in it. Never did mortal man more eagerly seek an enemy.

The British fleet, consisting of thirteen 74's, one 50-gun ship, and a brig of 14 guns, at about ten in the morning of the 1st of August, again got sight of Alexandria and its harbours, now crowded with ships. At four in the afternoon, Captain Hood, in the 'Zealous,' signalled the enemy's fleet at anchor in Aboukir Bay. The admiral immediately hauled his wind, followed by the whole fleet; signals were made to prepare for battle; to attack the enemy's van and centre, as they lay at anchor. Nelson, who had scarcely taken rest or food for some days, ordered dinner to be served, observing to his officers as they rose from table, "Before this time to-morrow I shall have gained a peerage or Westminster Abbey." At half-past five signal was made to form in line of battle abreast and astern of the admiral. At a little before six they were rapidly approaching the enemy, whose force comprised one ship of 120 guns, three of 80, and nine of 74, moored in compact line of battle, describing an obtuse angle, close in with the shore, flanked by gun-boats, four frigates, and a battery of guns and mortars on an island in their van. Nelson no sooner perceived the enemy's position than his plan of attack was formed. Where an enemy's ship could swing, there was room for a British one to anchor; and he therefore determined to station his ships on the inner side of the French line.* At about twenty minutes past six the French opened their fire on the two leading

British ships. The guns on Aboukir Island also fired at the ships as they rounded the shoal, but ceased as the ships became closely engaged, to avoid striking the French van. The 'Culloden,' 74, Captain Trowbridge, unfortunately grounded on a ledge of rocks, and could take no part in the action. The 'Vanguard,' Nelson's flag-ship, with six ensigns flying in different parts of the rigging, lest any should be shot away, was the first that anchored, within half pistol-shot of the 'Spartiate,' the third ship in the enemy's line. By seven o'clock eight of the British fleet had anchored, and were in close action with the enemy. At half-past nine, or thereabouts, five of the French van had surrendered; the 'Orient' was in flames, and at about ten o'clock blew up with a tremendous explosion. Nelson had received a severe wound in the head; but in the confusion, to the astonishment of every one, he appeared on the quarter-deck, and immediately gave orders that the boats should be sent to the relief of the enemy; and many of the 'Orient's' crew were saved by our boats, or dragged into the lower ports of British ships by British sailors. The brave French admiral, Brueys, was dead. He had received three wounds, yet would not leave his post: a fourth cut him almost in two. He desired not to be carried below, but to be left to die upon deck. Among the many hundreds who perished was the Commodore Casa Bianca, and his son, a brave boy, only ten years old. They were seen floating on a shattered mast when the ship blew up. The dreadful shock stayed the fury of battle: for full ten minutes not a gun was fired on either side. The French ship 'Franklin' was the first to recommence firing, but was soon silenced, and struck her colours. At midnight the only French ship whose guns continued in active play was the 'Tonnant;' but, her masts being shot away, she ceased firing, and, by veering cable, took up a station in the rear, and another interval of silence ensued. As the day broke the battle recommenced between four of the French ships and two of the English, soon assisted by two others. The French frigate 'Artemise' fired a broadside, and then struck her colours, and soon afterwards blew up. The four French line-of-battle ships, and two frigates, kept dropping to leeward, and were almost out of gun-shot of the British that had anchored to attack them. Two of these ships ran themselves on shore; and, after an exchange of a few distant shots, struck their colours. The others got under weigh, and escaped—only one of our fleet, the 'Zealous,' being in a condition to make sail after them.* Of the thirteen French ships of the line eight had surrendered, one had perished, two had escaped, and two were on shore with their colours flying, one of which soon after struck, and was taken possession of, and the other was set fire to by the crew, who escaped on shore—making eleven line-of-battle ships lost to the French. If Nelson had not been wounded, and the 'Culloden'

* Captain Berry, when he comprehended the scope of the design, exclaimed "If we succeed, what will the world say?" "There is no if in the case," replied Nelson: "that we shall succeed is certain; who may live to tell the story is a very different question."

could have got into action, it is probable that not one of the enemy's fleet would have left Aboukir Bay.*

The British loss, in killed and wounded, was 895. Westcott, of the 'Majestic,' was the only captain who fell: 3105 of the French, including the wounded, were sent on shore by cartel; and 5225 perished. The victory was complete. "Victory," said Nelson, "is not a name strong enough for such a scene." He called it a conquest.†

The destruction of the French fleet, which was announced far and wide by bonfires kindled by the Arabs along the coast and over the whole land of Egypt, left Bonaparte with only such stores and military materials as he had succeeded in bringing with him, and shut him out from all communication with France. If Nelson had been provided, as he ought to have been, with small craft—if he had only had three or four bomb-ketches—he would have burned all the French transports and store-ships which Admiral Brueys had prudently secured in shallow water in the port of Alexandria, and thus the land army would have been reduced at once to the greatest straits.

The Sultan now issued an indignant manifesto, declaring war against France for invading one of his provinces in a time of peace and pretended amity; he called upon the pashas of Syria to collect their forces; and he prepared to send from Constantinople an army for the recovery of Egypt. On the 22nd of September the people of Cairo, who had hitherto been quiet, puzzled and bewildered at the French doings, burst out into insurrection, and killed a good many Frenchmen in the streets. The insurrection was put down by a dreadful massacre; but the blood of 5000 Moslems, shed in one single day, and mostly in the great Mosque of the Prophet, called for vengeance, and precluded all chance of the French ever retaining quiet possession of the country.*

In Europe the victory at Aboukir, or the battle of the Nile as it was called, produced an immediate and an immense effect, reviving in every country the drooping spirits of the anti-Gallican party, and filling England from end to end with transports of joy and triumph. Nelson was raised to the peerage with the title of Baron Nelson of the Nile, and all sorts of honours were heaped upon him. From Egypt he returned to Naples, where he found that King Ferdinand was collecting a numerous army with the view of driving the French from Rome and from Tuscany; that the congress at Rastadt had been virtually broken up; that the emperor was arming, and a new coalition forming against the French, who, by their conduct at Rome, in Switzerland, and in other countries, had broken the conditions of the treaty of Campo Formio. Nelson's achievement,

* It was after this massacre at Cairo that Bonaparte issued his well-known proclamation, in which, in Oriental style, he told the inhabitants of Egypt that he was the Man of Destiny foretold in the Koran; that any resistance to his will was impious as well as useless; and that he could call them to account even for their most secret thoughts, as nothing was hid from him. All this seemed but mountebank-work in the eyes of the Moslems.

and the absence of Bonaparte, who it was expected would never find his way back to Europe, were the two grand circumstances of encouragement to this new coalition.

In the month of November the island of Gozo, separated from Malta by a narrow channel, capitulated to a detachment of Nelson's squadron; Malta itself was closely blockaded; and, as the people were rising with great spirit and resolution against the French, it was clear that the tricolor flag would not float long over the stately city of La Valetta.

The British parliament assembled on the 20th of November. The speech from the throne, after grateful mention of our successes, and of the suppression of the Irish rebellion, congratulated the country on the hopes of new alliances, by which it might be anticipated that the common enemy of nations would be humbled and repressed. This alluded more particularly to Russia. The Czarina Catherine had died of apoplexy in November, 1796, and had been succeeded by her son Paul. At first anxious doubts had been entertained whether, as usual in despotic countries, the successor would not pursue a line of foreign policy directly opposite to that of his predecessor. It was known that tempting overtures had been made to him by the French; and Bonaparte's invasion of Egypt, by embarrassing the Sultan, and obliging him to send an army down the Archipelago, would probably leave the frontiers of European Turkey in a weakened state, and even possibly lay open the road to the Balkan pass and to Constantinople, the grand object of Russian ambition. But Paul had now engaged to respect existing treaties, had declared his detestation of French principles and French ambition, had contracted a close alliance with Great Britain, and had engaged to take an active part in the war against the conquering republic, upon condition of receiving from Great Britain 112,000*l.* per month, during a campaign of eight months, for the pay of troops. It was not yet known that the eccentricities of the Emperor Paul's character amounted to insanity: the money, and even more than was asked for, was readily voted, and high expectations were entertained of the exploits to be performed by old Suvaroff, who had never known defeat, and his iron-framed Russian veterans.

The estimated supplies for the ensuing year were put at 29,272,000*l.*; and Pitt presented a new plan for raising a considerable part of them by an INCOME TAX. A series of resolutions relating to this new and bold plan were passed in the House of Commons before the close of the year.

A. D. 1799.—The minister's resolutions were, in substance, that the augmentation of the assessed taxes made in the last session should be repealed, and have its place supplied by a duty upon all incomes above 60*l.* a-year. Every person whose income exceeded 60*l.* a-year was to state, to the commissioners appointed for collecting the tax, the exact amount of his income: the return was to be according to his own statement, but liable to checks and correction by surveyors, if there were good reason to suspect a false or deficient return. If a man's income exceeded 200*l.* a-year, he was to pay 10*l.* per cent. upon it; if it only exceeded 100*l.*, he was to pay considerably less than 10 per cent.; and, if his income was only between 60*l.* and 100*l.*, he was to be taxed in a still diminishing proportion. Pitt calculated the yearly income of the whole nation at 192,000,000*l.*; from which, by this income-tax, he anticipated a revenue of 10,000,000*l.* A bill, framed upon these principles, after undergoing some amendments of detail, was carried through both Houses by great majorities.

The regular army was slightly increased; 120,000 men, including marines, &c., were voted for the navy; the volunteers and yeomanry cavalry had risen from 5000 to 30,000 men; and the militia, a portion of which had done good service in Ireland, was now about 85,000 strong.

A plan for uniting Ireland under one legislature with Great Britain, as Scotland, to her inestimable advantage, had been united to England nearly a century ago, had been discussed and seriously entertained before the breaking out of the late unhappy rebellion; but that event had made the necessity of such a union more apparent. On the 22nd of January a royal message to both Houses recommended the consideration of the most effectual means to defeat the design of our enemies to promote a separation between the two kingdoms, by settling such a complete and final adjustment as might perpetuate a connexion essential for their common security, and consolidate the power and resources of the British empire. Sheridan spoke of taking the Irish people by surprise, and of a design of ministers to carry their end by fraud, corruption, and intimidation; but it was agreed by an immense majority that the question should be considered on the 31st. On that day, Pitt, after explaining the grounds which would make the union, at the very least, as beneficial to Ireland as to England, proposed certain resolutions as the basis for the measure; and his motion, that the House should go into committee on these propositions, was carried by 140 against 15. After some long and warm debates, the resolutions, with some slight amendments, were agreed to, and sent up to the Peers. After equally warm debating in the Upper House, a joint address to the king was agreed to, presenting the resolutions as a proper basis for the union. And here, as far as regarded England, the matter rested for the present year.*

* The most important of these resolutions were—That the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland should be represented by one common parliament, in which a number of Lords and Commons, to be hereafter agreed on, should represent Ireland.—That the churches of England and Ireland should be preserved as now by law established.—That the subjects of Ireland should be entitled to the same privileges in trade and navigation as those of Great Britain.—That the charge for the payment of the interest of the public debt of each kingdom before the union should continue to be paid by Great Britain and Ireland separately, but that the future ordinary expenses of the United Kingdom should be defrayed by them jointly, according to proportions to be established by the parliament of each kingdom as

On the 12th of July the king prorogued parliament with a very hopeful address.

The convention and subsidiary treaty with the Emperor Paul had not been fully concluded until the month of December of the preceding year; but before that time the court of Vienna had formed a close alliance with the czar, and Russian troops had begun to collect on the frontiers of Austria, while a great army of the German empire was assembling between the rivers Inn and Lech. One great object proposed was to drive the French out of Italy, where, through the folly of King Ferdinand, who had begun too soon, or through the slowness of the Emperor Francis, who had begun too late, they had been allowed to overrun the kingdom of Naples, and to drive the court into Sicily. In the autumn of 1798, long before he was ready himself, the Emperor Francis sent Colonel (now General) Mack, whom we last saw negotiating with Dumouriez on the frontiers of the Netherlands, to organize and take the command of the Neapolitan army—a fine army to the eye, but woefully officered, and bad in nearly every other respect. Nelson, who was then at Naples, formed almost at a glance a correct estimate of the vaunted tactician. “General Mack,” said he, “cannot move without five carriages! I have formed my opinion.” On another occasion he exclaimed with bitterness that the fellow did not understand his business. Instead of waiting until the Austrians and Russians should be ready to descend from the Alps upon the other end of Italy, it was resolved that this unwarlike army should march to Rome, drive away the French, restore the pope, and liberate Tuscany, if not all Italy. To make bad worse, it was put into the head of King Ferdinand, the least martial of sovereigns and the most indolent and thoughtless of men, that he ought to march with Mack and his army. To create a diversion, a British and Portuguese squadron landed 5000 Neapolitans at Leghorn, and took quiet possession of that port and city. The king, with the main body of his army, 32,000 strong, entered the Roman states at the end of November. The rainy season alone was almost enough to dishearten his old-womanly officers. The great strategist and tactician, Mack, faithful to the old and fatal system, divided this Neapolitan army, not into two, or three, but into five columns; and these columns were separated by rivers, marshes, and mountains, some of them by the entire breadth of the Apennines. Hardly any of the troops had ever been under fire, and a notion of their discipline and military morale may be derived from the one simple fact, that most of their officers were in the constant habit of robbing or defrauding the men. Championnet, the French general-in-chief there, had 20,000 veteran troops in the territories of the church; these, it is true, were also dispersed over a broad surface: but, agreed upon previously to the union.—That all laws in force in either kingdom at the time of the union, and all courts, civil and ecclesiastical, in each kingdom should remain as now established, subject only to such future alterations as might seem requisite to the united parliament.

with their habits of rapid motion, they could soon be collected; and the weakest of their columns, which was about 5000 strong, was not only a match for one of Mack's five divisions, but for his whole host if he could have collected it together—which it was evident from the beginning he never could. The advanced posts of the French army fell in without fighting; Championnet evacuated Rome to concentrate his forces at Terni, and the King of Naples entered the Eternal City in triumph on the 29th of November. But there ended the success of this contemptible expedition: the triumph was immediately followed by shame and by flight. One of Mack's columns, far away on the left, was beaten and scattered like chaff before the wind by 3000 men of the Polish legion; another column, far away on his right, was put to an opprobrious route by the republican general Macdonald; and, after some petty skirmishing in the hills near Terni, the King of Naples fled by night from Rome to his own capital, and Mack, as soon as might be, followed him with such portions of the Neapolitan army as he could get and keep together. Championnet soon followed the fugitives with more than 20,000 men, for he had received reinforcements from the north of Italy. On the 21st of December king Ferdinand and his family embarked in Lord Nelson's flag ship, and set sail for Palermo in a gale of wind. The democratic or revolutionary party at Naples, which had been made the more numerous by long and sharp persecution, prepared to co-operate with the advancing French; the lazzaroni, though deserted by their king, and abandoned or betrayed on every side, showed that it was not the quality of courage their country was most destitute of, fought the French desperately for three days on the Capuan road and in their own suburbs, and did not yield the entrance of their fair city until their own treacherous countrymen and townsmen hoisted the tri-colored flag, delivered up the forts to the enemy, and opened a fire upon them from the castle of St. Elmo, which stands on a high hill close behind the town. Championnet took possession of Naples on the 23rd of January; royalty was abolished, and the country in Europe least fitted for such institutions was converted into a republic, under the name of REPUBBLICA PARTENOPEA. The bank could not be robbed, nor could the Monte di Pietà, as the fugitive king had swept them both clean, and had carried off their money with him into Sicily; but the French liberators imposed a contribution of 12,000,000 of francs upon the impoverished inhabitants of the capital, and another contribution of 15,000,000 of francs upon the people of the provinces, made the Neapolitans pay for the support of their army, seized not only the royal property, but also the estates of the church and of the rich monastic orders, ransacked the national museum for choice manuscripts, books, statues, and pictures, and appropriated not only all the curiosities and works of antiquity which had been discovered in Herculaneum and Pompeii, but all such as might be discovered hereafter. These were ordinary proceedings; but Faypoult, the commissioner and money collector of the Directory, adopted such novelties in sequestration and plunder, of a more private kind, that General Championnet expressed his disgust, and interfered with his authority. The directors, who wanted the money, and who could never tolerate such interference, recalled Championnet, and gave the command of the army to Macdonald.

It was while Naples was thus falling so easy a prey to the French, that her Austrian and Russian allies began collecting on the other side of the Alps. The French negotiators at Rastadt, after demanding from the Emperor of Germany the dismissal of the Russian troops, declared the congress to be dissolved. A republican army forthwith pressed the siege of the fortress of Ehrenbreitstein, which was obliged to capitulate at the end of January. Jourdan then crossed the Rhine once more, and established himself in Suabia. The Directory, however, did not declare war against the Emperor Francis until the month of March, when Jourdan advanced towards the Danube; but again the Archduke Charles met this unlucky republican, and, after defeating or weakening him in several rapidly succeeding engagements, he drove Jourdan back over the Rhine in April. Nearly at the same time the Austrian generals Bellegarde and Hotze recovered the Grison country which had been invaded, drove the French from the St. Gothard, and poured into Switzerland, where General Massena was reduced to act on the defensive. In the month of May Massena occupied a strong position in front of Zurich. In the meanwhile another fine Austrian army had taken the field with old General Melas for its commander. Melas, pouring through the Tyrol towards the end of March, drove all the French outposts before him, entered Upper Italy, cleared all the left bank of the Adige; and obliged Scherer, the unpopular and very inferior general whom the Directory had appointed to the supreme command of their army of Italy, to retire beyond the Mincio in great confusion. Scherer was ignominiously recalled to Paris: he ran the hazard of being torn to pieces by his infuriated soldiers; and he only escaped imprisonment and impeachment by running away and hiding himself in some obscure corner of France, where he lay for a few months, until a new revolution overthrew the Directory. Moreau, who had a much higher reputation, took the command, but only to be beaten like Scherer. On the 18th of April, when Melas was driving Moreau before him, the famed Suvaroff came up with some 50,000 Russians, joined the Austrians, and assumed the chief command of both armies. On the 27th of April the battle of Cassano decided the fate of the Cisalpine Republic, the people of which were almost everywhere in open insurrection against the French and the native democrats whom they had set up as a government. The citadels of Brescia and Peschiera surrendered to the allies, Mantua was closely invested, and Suvaroff entered Milan in triumph. Moreau continued his hasty retreat towards Genoa, hoping to be able to guard the barrier of the Apennines, and to be joined there by Macdonald with the army of Naples, whom he had pressing summoned to his assistance. Leaving a small garrison in the castle of St. Elmo under the command of Colonel Mègean, and advising the Neapolitan democrats to defend that helpless infant, their three-months-old republic, Macdonald, on the 7th of May, began his rapid march from Naples, got out of the kingdom (not without sustaining considerable loss from some daring royalist partisans), traversed the Roman states and the whole of Tuscany, reached the river Trebia, and, being joined by General Victor, ventured to face the Russo-Austrian army. But, after fighting for three days on the banks of the Trebia, in the neighbourhood of Piacenza, he was crushed by Suvaroff; and, flying thence towards the pass of the Bocchetta, he joined Moreau with what was only a fragment of his army. Before Macdonald's arrival, Moreau had drawn some reinforcements from Nice and Genoa, and had made some entrenchments on the declivities of the Apennines and in the entrance of the Bocchetta pass behind the Piedmontese town of Novi. Dissatisfied with Moreau, the Directors now sent Joubert to take the command-in-chief of the army. Joubert stationed himself on the same heights behind Novi which Moreau had occupied, and improved and extended his field-works. But, being attacked in that formidable position by Suvaroff on the 16th of August, Joubert was most thoroughly beaten, and was killed in the action by a cannon-ball; and the miserable wreck of the French army which survived his fall left nearly all their artillery behind them, and fled like sheep over the mountains and through the pass towards the city of Genoa. Shortly after this victory, Suvaroff quitted the Apennines and struck across the Alps to make head against Massena, who had resumed the offensive, and, marching from Zurich, had defeated the Russian corps of General Korsakoff, who had arrived in Switzerland to relieve or co-operate with General Bellegarde and the Austrians. There was some fearful fighting among the precipices and ravines of St. Gothard, which the French had again occupied. Suvaroff swept the republicans back, and opened his way into the heart of Switzerland; but the Austrian general, who had engaged to form a junction with him, was nowhere to be seen; and Korsakoff was too far separated, and too weak, to move to meet him. This obliged Suvaroff to turn aside towards the lake of Constance and the frontiers of Germany. He was interrupted on his march by Massena; but, fighting and retiring, halting and fighting again, he attained his object, and effected a junction with Korsakoff, though with an army sadly diminished. Leaving the French once more absolute masters of Switzerland,* the two Russian generals marched away to

* The Archduke Charles, when marching against Massena, was

Augsburg, where they received orders to lead back all their troops to their own country.

The Neapolitan kingdom was recovered in the course of the months of June and July by Cardinal Ruffo, with an army of wild Calabrians, by a motley force of English, Russians, Portuguese, and Turks, and by Lord Nelson and his squadron. A sanguinary vengeance was taken by the vindictive court on the Neapolitan republicans; and the fame of Nelson, who had surrendered his better feelings and judgment to the fascinating Lady Hamilton, the wife of the British minister at that court, the friend of the queen (Caroline of Austria, sister of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette), and the ready instrument of her vengeance, was obscured by more than one dark deed, which no right-minded Englishman will ever attempt to palliate. A detachment of Nelson's squadron, under Commodore Trowbridge, blockaded the French garrison in Civita Vecchia, the Pope's sea-port town near the mouth of the Tiber. The French soon capitulated, as did also a small garrison which had been left by Championnet in the castle of St. Angelo at Rome. Captain Lewis, followed by a few English sailors and marines, rowed up the Tiber in his barge, hoisted English colours on the Capitol, and acted for a time as governor of Rome.* The Papal government was reinstated, but to restore the old Pope was beyond the power of our bold man-of-war's-man. Pius VI., on the irruption of the Austrian and Russian armies, had been carried across the Alps into the south of France; and he died at Valence on the Rhône in the month of August. The election of his successor, Pius VII., by thirty-five cardinals, assembled at Venice under the protection of the Austrians, was not completed until the month of March, 1800. A detachment from the army of General Melas easily recovered the whole of Tuscany; and, long before the close of the year, hardly anything was left to the French in Italy except Genoa.

When Suvaroff was carrying everything before him in Italy, and when the French seemed fully occupied by the wars in that country and in Switzerland and Germany, the Emperor Paul sent another Russian force to co-operate with the English in an attack on the French in Holland. It was, however, the month of August before this armament was ready. An army of 30,000 men, of which 17,000 were Russian and the rest British, was collected on the Kentish coast. On the 13th of August Sir Ralph Abercromby, who was intrusted with the chief command, sailed with the first division, consisting of 12,000 British troops, embarked in transports and in the squadron of Admiral Mitchell, who was to join the fleet of Admiral (now Lord) Duncan, then cruising in the North Seas. The fort of the Helder was imme-obliged to descend the Rhine by a fresh incursion of the French into Germany. He fought several battles with varying success; but, in the end, he once more drove the invaders to the other side of the Rhine.

* Southey.

diately abandoned by its garrison; Abercromby landed there; the Texel was occupied by our fleet—the Dutch fleet surrendering or hoisting the Orange flag.* General Brune, with a mixed army of French and Dutch, 25,000 strong, attempted to dislodge Abercromby, who was left for a whole month in a very critical situation; but his inferior force stood its ground manfully, and Brune was repulsed with considerable loss. At last, on the 13th of September, another and a stronger division of the Anglo-Russian army arrived, bringing, unfortunately, with it the Duke of York to take the command in chief of the whole. From this moment nothing went well; and, after fighting several battles honourable to the troops, but rather disgraceful in point of generalship, his royal highness was fain to conclude a convention (on the 17th of October), by which it was agreed that the English and Russians should be allowed to re-embark without molestation; and that, as the price for that favour, 8000 prisoners of war, French and Batavians, taken before the present campaign, and now detained in England, should be released.

Eight days before this convention or capitulation by the Duke of York, Bonaparte arrived in France. In the month of February he had quitted Cairo with the intention of dispersing the Turkish forces that were collecting near the Syrian frontier, and then of conquering all Syria. Crossing the desert with 10,000 men, he took Gaza, stormed Jaffa, butchered all the prisoners there in cold blood—by fusilades, as practised by the Carriers and the other agents of the reign of terror—and carried everything before him, like the Man of Destiny, until he came under the old crumbling walls of Acre. This place, the key of Syria, was defended by the Pasha Djezzar, a very cruel but very resolute old man; by Colonel Philippeaux, an emigrant royalist, and an able officer of engineers, who at one time had been Bonaparte's schoolfellow; and by the brave and alert Sir Sidney Smith, who not merely brought two ships of the line close inshore to maul the besiegers, but also landed some of his sailors and marines. After spending sixty days before the place, making seven or eight assaults, and losing 3000 men, the French raised the siege of Acre;† and on the 21st of May they began their retreat, burning everything behind them, harvest and all. On the 14th of June, Bonaparte re-entered Cairo. During his absence, General Desaix, ascending the Nile, had driven the remnant

* This fleet consisted of eight ships of the line, three of 54 guns, eight of 44, and seven of inferior rates. There were also four large Indiamen in the Texel. The ships were brought over to England; but, as they had hoisted Orange colours, it was considered necessary to pay the Prince of Orange, the ex-Stadtholder, for them.

† When a prisoner in the island of St. Helena, Bonaparte said that the fate of the East lay within the narrow walls of Acre:—"Once possessed of Acre, the army would have gone to Damascus and the Euphrates; the Christians of Syria, the Druses, the Armenians, would have joined us. The provinces of the Ottoman empire which speak Arabic were ready for a change, and were only waiting for a man. . . . With 100,000 men on the banks of the Euphrates, I might have gone to Constantinople or to India; I might have changed the face of the world. I should have founded an empire in the East, and the destinies of France would have run in a different course!"—Las Cases.

SIEGE OF ACRE.

of the Mamelukes from Upper Egypt, and beyond the cataracts of Assuan; but this expedition had no other importance than that of affording the exaggerative French artists, and the savans, as they were called, the opportunity of visiting the monuments of Thebes, Dendera, and other ancient places. In July, Bonaparte, with nearly his whole army, was called down to the coast—to the point where Nelson had annihilated the French fleet,—for a Turkish army of 18,000 men had landed at Aboukir. On the 25th of July a terrible battle took place on the sandy coast. The Turks fought with admirable courage; but their irregular, undisciplined, unformed masses could not stand long against masses of French that were even in number nearly equal to their own: 10,000 of them perished, by shot, bayonet, or in the sea, where they threw themselves in the hopes of reaching their ships. Soon after this battle of Aboukir, Bonaparte began to make secret preparations for getting back to Europe. If, as some have suspected, one strong inducement which led him to quit France at a critical moment, and embark on this wild Egyptian expedition, had really been to allow the five kings at the Luxembourg time and opportunity to disgust the French people with their profligacy and ineptness, and to prove how essential he was to French victory and conquest by or through the failures of the other republican generals, he had most completely succeeded in his object. Letters from his brothers Joseph and Lucien, and from his numerous friends in Paris, informed him that Italy was lost; that the French armies were being beaten everywhere; that the directors were quarrelling among themselves—were intriguing and quarrelling with the two legislative councils; and that the people, whose rage for liberty and equality was now merged in military pride and a passion for conquest—with those good things which the conquests of rich countries bring with them—seemed heartily sick of Directory, Ancients, and Cinq Cents, and ripe and ready for another revolution.

Two small frigates which lay in the harbour of Alexandria were got ready for sea; and on the 23rd of August, leaving behind him his army, now reduced to 20,000 men, and taking with him his favourite officers, Murat, Lannes, Berthier, Marmont, and three of the savans, he embarked secretly in one of the frigates, and set sail for France. Though happy to escape the comfortless life in Egypt, most of those who went with him expected to be stopped on their passage, and carried prisoners of war to England; but the extraordinary fortunes of the man favoured him still, and, without being pursued, or even seen, by any of our ships, he landed in the Gulf of Prejus, to the eastward of Toulon, on the 9th of October. He had been at Paris two days, privately consulting with chiefs of parties and officers of the army, before the directors knew of his arrival. Augereau, who had fought by his side at Arcole, who had surrounded the Tuileries with troops and artillery, and had purged out two former directors and all the refractory members of the legislature, on the 18th Fructidor, 1797,* and who was now ready to do whatsoever Bonaparte might command, was one of the first to wait upon him. In the course of a few days Talleyrand gave his councils the benefit of all his craft and ability. Abbé Sieyès, though now one of the directors himself, had made the notable discovery that his last constitution was a great deal too democratic; had conceived a mortal hatred to his brother director Barras, whom he accused of downright Jacobinism and sans-culottism; and was now ready to cooperate with the ambitious general, duping himself into the absurd belief that Bonaparte would remain in allegiance to him and to another perfect constitution which he had, all ready, in his portfolio. Roger Ducos, another of the directors, yielded to circumstances. Lucien Bonaparte had just succeeded in obtaining the presidency of the Council of Five Hundred, and was thus in a condition to render important services to his brother. Cambacères, minister of justice, and the atrocious Fouché, now minister of police, went with the strongest party, and powerfully seconded the views of Bonaparte and Sieyes. Even Barras, the early patron of the young Corsican officer, after listening in two or three private conferences to the persuasive tongue of Talleyrand, and to splendid offers of honours and riches, agreed to give up the last shred of his pretended republicanism, and to remove all opposition by sending in his resignation. The two directors, who remained to support the present constitution and resist a military dictatorship, were Gohier and Moulins, a couple of blockheads, who had obtained their places through their known incapacity, which would allow their associates to do with them as they pleased. The Council of Ancients were easily persuaded of the necessity of a new constitution; but a great majority of the Council of Five Hundred vowed that they would die for the constitution they had got. On the 19th Brumaire, or 10th of November, just one month and a day after Bonaparte's landing at Frejus, the business was finished by Murat and a detachment of grenadiers with levelled bayonets: the Council of Five Hundred was cleared in a trice; most of the members jumped out of the windows—not one of them staid to die. On that night all the ardent republicans were proscribed; three provisional consuls (for the government was now to be consular) were appointed—and who so fit to be consuls as Abbé Sieyes, Roger Ducos, and Napoleon Bonaparte? On the following day the rising general took up his residence in the Luxembourg, the palace of the ex-Directors. At the first sittings of the three consuls Roger Ducos said, "The general takes the chair of course." Bonaparte seated himself in the president's chair as though it had been a throne, and the throne of an absolute monarchy to which he had succeeded in due course of inheritance. Sieyes was quite chafffallen, for he found he had placed a master over his head. The daring, irreverent soldier, who had no thought of confining himself to the military department, as the civilians who had worked with him had calculated he would do, treated the logician's last masterpiece with no more respect than he would have treated an order of the day, or a dispatch badly written out by a blundering aide-de-camp; and he clipped, cut, and hacked Sieyes's new constitution, until it was no longer recognisable. Sieyes had strengthened the executive, but not half enough for Bonaparte; but both the original scheme and the modification of it deprived the French people of every direct election of their representatives, and set up a tri-partite legislature which could only become slavish and contemptible. As finally promulgated on the 24th of December, this "Constitution of the Year VIII.," as it is called, established three consuls, or a chief consul with two inferior ones, who were to have only a deliberative voice, the first or chief consul having the power of appointing to all public offices, and of proposing all public measures, such as peace or war; while he also commanded the forces, and superintended both the internal and foreign departments of the state. There were—1. A Senate called Conservative, composed of only eighty members, appointed for life, and enjoying high salaries; 2. A Legislative Body, of three hundred members, one-fifth of whom were to be renewed annually; 3. A Tribunal, of one hundred members, of whom also one-fifth were to be renewed every year. The consuls chose the senate, and the senate chose, out of lists of candidates presented by the electoral colleges, both the legislative body and the tribunal. The consuls, or rather the first consul, had the initiative, or the sole right of proposing acts of legislation; the senate was to sit privately with closed doors; the legislative body was to vote, but not debate or speak, all the speaking being reserved to the tribunal. The process was this:—the first consul sent in his project of law to the tribunal, who debated it, but without voting upon it, for the voting was reserved for the legislative body, who were not allowed to speak; when the tribunal had debated the project, they left the business to the legislative body, who silently voted by ballot, and then returned the act to the quarter where it had originated, or to the consul, who made it law by putting his signature to it and promulgating it. Left perfectly free to choose his own two satellites, Bonaparte would have retained Sieyes, but the ex-abbé preferred taking the place of senator, with the yearly salary of 25,000 francs, and the royal domain of Crosne in the park of Versailles. Cambacères and Lebrun, who had both been brought up to the law, were appointed second and third consuls. Roger Ducos was also put into the senate. The first consul very soon removed from the Luxembourg to the palace of the Tuileries, where he lived with royal state. He now wrote to the King of England, as one sovereign writes to another, expressing a wish for peace, but without stating any conditions. George III., who could scarcely do otherwise, gave the epistle to his secretary for foreign affairs, to answer it. Lord Grenville addressed his reply, not to the first consul, but to Talleyrand, now the French minister for foreign affairs. Talleyrand replied, Lord Grenville rejoined, and there the matter ended. Our opposition orators attached great importance to the overture, which was the hollowest of all that had been made, for the first consul was preparing at the moment to recover Italy, and was determined to keep Switzerland, Savoy, Nice, Belgium, Holland, and all the German territories on the left bank of the Rhine.

In the course of this year Tippoo Sulthan was destroyed. To recover what he had lost in the last war, he had sent an embassy to Cabul to bring the Affghan tribes down into India; he had negotiated or intrigued with the Nizam of the Deccan, and with other native princes; and, towards the end of 1797, he had sent two ambassadors to the Isle of France to propose an alliance with the French republic, and to request an immediate supply of troops (30,000 or 40,000 men Tippoo thought would be sufficient) to enable him to expel the English from every part of Hindustan. The governor of the Isle of France, who was daily expecting a visit from the English, had no troops to spare; but he forwarded Tippoo's letters to Paris, and allowed his two ambassadors to enrol about 150 Frenchmen, "the refuse of the democratic rabble of the island," some of whom were lying in gaol at the time. But, when the moment came for embarking, nearly one-half of these desperadoes refused to go to conquer India. Some, sixty or seventy of them, however, arrived at Mangalore, and thence proceeded to Tippoo's capital, where one of their first operations was to set up a tree of liberty, surmounted by the red nightcap of liberty and equality. They next organised a Jacobin club in Seringapatam, and bestowed upon the bewildered Oriental despot the republican appellation of Citizen Tippoo.* As soon as Bonaparte had arrived in Egypt he had dispatched a letter to Tippoo, requesting him to send a confidential person to Suez or Cairo, to confer with him and concert measures for the liberation of India; but it appears doubtful whether this epistle ever reached the Sultan. The embassy to the Isle of France, the arrival of Frenchmen at Seringapatam (but not their number), the intrigues set on foot in various parts of the country, and the fact that Tippoo was rapidly increasing his army, all became known to the government at Calcutta. The Earl of Mornington (afterwards Marquess Wellesley), who was now governor-general, determined to anticipate the Sultan; and, after demanding explanations which were never given, his lordship sent General Harris into the Mysore country with 24,000 men, and called up General Stuart with the Bombay army of about 7000 men to co-operate with Harris.† General Harris, moreover, was joined at Vellore by a strong British detachment serving with the Nizam,

* It appears that a good portion of these soi-disant Frenchmen, who arrived in India and set up the amusing novelty of a Jacobin club in the capital of Mysore, were Caffres and half-castes.

These Seringapatam Jacobin clubs were distinguished by this peculiarity, that the members were required to swear hatred to tyranny, the love of liberty, and the destruction of all kings and sovereigns—except the good and faithful ally of the French republic. СИТАХХХ ТИПОО.

† Most of these troops were sepoys: the number of Europeans in Harris's army was not much above 4000; in Stuart's army it fell short of 2000.

and by some regiments of sepoys which the Nizam had raised, and which were officered by Englishmen. Harris entered the Mysore territory on the 5th of March (1799), and moved straight on for Seringapatam, reducing all the forts in his way. General Stuart's advance was attended with greater difficulty, and with some loss, for he was encountered by the main army of Tippoo. On the 27th of March, when Harris was within two days' march of Seringapatam, he found the active Sultan drawn up to oppose him. In the action which ensued Colonel Wellesley (now Duke of Wellington) particularly distinguished himself; and it was his regiment, the 33rd, that decided the affair. Tippoo then retreated, and threw himself with his whole army into Seringapatam, the fortifications of which had been improved and increased since General Abercromby's attack in 1792. On the 5th of April General Harris took up ground for the siege; and on the 14th he was joined by General Stuart with the Bombay army. Now Tippoo sent the most humble letters and messages: but it was too late; and at no time could the slightest confidence be placed in him, or in any treaty that he might sign. On the 30th of April the besiegers began to batter in breach; and on the 4th of May Seringapatam was stormed and captured. Two of his sons were taken alive; but Tippoo fell near one of the gates, and was found, not without a diligent search, buried under a heap of dead bodies.* His territories were immediately divided among his enemies: the English kept Seringapatam, with the island on which it is situated, the whole of his territory on the Malabar coast, the district of Coimbatore, with all the country that intervened between the Company's possessions on the western and their possessions on the eastern coast, thus obtaining a direct communication and uninterrupted dominion from sea to sea: the Nizam of the Deccan obtained a more inland country, affording a revenue equal to that yielded by the country which the English appropriated; and another great tract of country was conferred, as a separate and nominally independent state, on a child, the descendant of the ancient Hindu Rajahs, who had been dispossessed by Tippoo's father, Hyder Ali. In consequence of these successes British India, instead of being invaded, was enabled to send an armament across the ocean and up the Red Sea, to assist in driving the French invaders out of Egypt.

The British parliament was assembled as early as the 24th of September, when the government entertained sanguine hopes of success for the Anglo-Russian army in Holland. A bill was instantly introduced to facilitate the reinforcing our regular army, by allowing three-fifths of the militia of each county to enlist in the regulars for service within Europe; and it was passed into a law on the 4th of October. The remainder of the session, previous to the Christmas recess, was occupied by commercial and financial matters.

A.D. 1800. After the recess the sense of parliament was shown by divisions which took place on an address to the king in approbation of the conduct pursued towards the first consul. In the Lords there were 79 votes for the address to 6 against it, and in the Commons 260 to 64. "As a sincere lover of peace," said Pitt, "I will not sacrifice it, by grasping at the shadow, when the substance is not within my reach." In replying to Mr. Erskine, who had published a pamphlet to prove that England and her allies had been the first aggressors, and had contracted the guilt of beginning a war with France without necessity or provocation, Pitt exposed the inaccuracy of dates, and the false reasoning of all those who had spoken or written on that side of the question. He declared that the causes of war which existed at the beginning, or arose during the course of the discussions with M. Chauvelin, were such as would have justified, twenty times over, a declaration of war on the part of this country. It was only recently that any party or person in France had thought of accusing England of being the cause of this destructive war. All the different parties in France had accused one another of plunging their country into an unnecessary contest with England: thus the friends of Brissot charged Robespierre with the war with this country, and the friends of Robespierre charged it on Brissot; but both acquitting England. The testimonies of the French governments, during the whole interval since the declaration of Pilnitz, gave the broadest contradiction to the insinuations now made that England had gone, into the war through ambition, and with views of conquest, partition, or dismemberment. He thought it necessary to recall to memory the state of the continent, and the innumerable aggressions of the French, many months before the war began—the demand made by France upon Holland to open the navigation of the Scheldt, on the ground of a general and a national right, in violation of positive treaties—the discovery of that sacred law of nature which made the Rhine and the Alps the legitimate boundaries of France—the assumption of the power which the French had affected to exercise ever since, of superseding, by a new metaphysical code of their own, all the recognised principles of the law of nations—the violated neutrality of small and weak states, and the clear intimation that all countries who were not friends to the new principles would be considered and treated as enemies—the confirmed practice of sending secret agents into every country in Europe to inoculate the people with the Jacobin virus, and drive them into sedition and open rebellion against their established governments, whether constitutional or despotic. "They had already shown their moderation and self-denial by incorporating Belgium with the French republic. These lovers of peace, who set out with a sworn aversion to conquest, and with professions of respect for the independence of other nations, who now pretend that they departed from this system only in consequence of your aggression, themselves, in a time of peace, while England was still confessedly neutral, without the pretence or shadow of a provocation, wrested Savoy from the king of Sardinia, and proceeded to incorporate it likewise with France. These were their aggressions at that period when we were at peace with them; and there were far more aggressions than these! They had issued an universal declaration of war against all the thrones of Europe; and they had, by their conduct, applied it particularly and specifically to us. They had passed their decree of the 19th of November, 1792, proclaiming the promise of French succour to all nations who should manifest the wish to revolutionize themselves." Pitt asserted distinctly and positively, and with documents in his hand to prove it, that from the middle of the year 1791, when the rumour was first heard that the emperor of Germany was taking measures to check the torrent, and till late in the year 1792, we were not only no parties to any of the projects imputed to the emperor, but we wholly declined all communications with him on the subject of France; while to Prussia, with whom we were in connexion, and still more decisively to Holland, with whom we were in close and intimate correspondence, we uniformly stated our unalterable resolution to maintain neutrality, and avoid interference in the internal affairs of France, so long as France should refrain from hostile measures against us and our allies. No minister of England had had any authority to treat with foreign states, even provisionally, for any warlike concert, till after the battle of Jemappe—till a period subsequent to the repeated provocations which had been offered to us, and subsequent particularly to the decree of fraternity of the 19th of November. After dwelling upon the seizure of the pope's city and territory of Avignon, and the atrocities committed there by the revolutionists, and upon the seizure of a portion of the dominions of the bishop of Basle, Pitt reminded the House how in one year (1792) the French had hurled a declaration of war against Austria, against Prussia, and against the German empire—a declaration which could have been justified only on the ground of a combination and league of sovereigns for the dismemberment of France; and he then added, with great warmth, "I say that some of the documents brought to support this pretence are spurious and false; I say, that in the documents that are not so there is not one word to prove the charge principally relied upon—that of an intention to effect the dismemberment of France, or to impose upon it, by force, any particular constitution. I say that, as far as we have been able to trace what passed at Pilnitz, the declaration there signed referred to the imprisonment of Louis XVI. its immediate view was to effect his deliverance, if a concert sufficiently extensive could be formed with other sovereigns for that purpose. It left the internal state of France to be decided by the king restored to his liberty, with the free consent of the states of his kingdom, and it did not contain one word relative to the dismemberment of France." He insisted that the explanations which Austria offered to France were in themselves satisfactory, and sufficient to have prevented any war between those two powers, if one of them had not been fully determined to have war; that the then minister for foreign affairs at Paris (M. Delessart) had announced that there was a great prospect of an amicable termination to the discussions; but that it was notorious, and had since been clearly proved, on the authority of Brissot himself, that the violent party in France considered such an issue of the negotiation as likely to be fatal to their projects, and thought, to use Brissot's own words, that "war was necessary to consolidate the revolution." Hence followed rioting and insurrection at Paris; the dismissal of M. Delessart; a most insolent and arrogant ultimatum; and then a declaration of war against Austria, a war which was nothing but a war of aggression on the part of France. The king of Prussia had declared that he should consider war against the emperor or the empire as war against himself; that, as a co-estate of the empire, he must defend its rights; that, as an ally of the emperor, he must support him if attacked; and that, for the sake of his own dominions, he felt himself called upon to resist the progress of French principles, and to maintain the balance of power in Europe. With this notice before her, France declared war against the emperor, and the war with Prussia was the necessary consequence of this aggression. The war against the king of Sardinia followed next. The declaration of that war was the seizure of Savoy by the republicans, who had found out, by some light of nature, that the Rhine and the Alps were the natural limits of France. With respect to Spain the war was evidently and incontestably begun by France. Beyond the Alps the king of Naples had been outrageously insulted in his capital, and the whole coast of Italy had been threatened with destruction, long before any prince or government in that peninsula thought of joining the coalition. Pitt drew a striking picture of the proceedings which had since taken place in that beautiful country: the virtual deposition of the king of Sardinia; the conversion of Genoa and Tuscany into democratic republics; the revolution of Venice, and the iniquitous transfer of that ancient republic to Austria; the expulsion of some of the helpless princes, the plunder of them all, the beggary brought upon all the upper classes of Italians, and the anarchy and demoralization introduced among the poorer citizens. He bade the House look at the fate of Switzerland, and at the circumstances which led to the destruction of that unoffending and devoted country—"a country which had long been the faithful ally of France, which had never given any cause of jealousy to any other power, which had been for ages proverbial for the simplicity and innocence of its manners, and which had acquired and preserved the esteem of all the nations of Europe—which had almost, by the common consent of mankind, been exempted from the sound of war, and marked out as a land of Goshen, safe and untouched in the midst of surrounding calamities." He asked whether the disasters of Switzerland—of all Europe—were to be charged upon the provocation of England and her allies, or upon the inherent principles of the French revolution, which, after causing such misery and carnage at home, had carried desolation and terror over so large a portion of the world? This inherent principle of the revolution was nothing but an insatiable love of aggrandisement, coupled with an implacable spirit of destruction directed against all the civil and religious institutions of every country. This, the first moving and acting spirit of the French revolution, was the spirit which animated it at its birth, which grew with its growth, and strengthened with its strength. It had been invariably the same in every period, and under the dominion of every party; it had been inherent in the revolution in all its stages; it had equally belonged to Brissot, to Robespierre, to Tallien, to Rewbell, to Barras, and to every one of the leaders of the Directory, but to none more than to Bonaparte, in whom all powers were now concentrated and united. He mentioned the seizure of the island of Malta and the invasion of Egypt. "The all-searching eye of the French revolution," said he, "looks to every part of Europe, and every quarter of the globe, in which can be found an object either of acquisition or plunder. Nothing is too great for the temerity of its ambition—nothing too small or insignificant for the grasp of its rapacity." The character and position of Bonaparte, and the habits and condition of the French people, alike precluded the hope of any honourable or lasting peace. In treating with them, the most that we could expect would be a hollow truce of some twelve or eighteen months' duration; and then, if tempted by the appearance of some fresh insurrection in Ireland, encouraged by renewed and unrestrained communication with France, and fomented by a fresh infusion of Jacobin principles, Bonaparte, taking advantage of the reduced state of our fleets, of the disembodiment of our militia, of the reduction of our regular army, might tell us that the hollow truce was at an end by suddenly landing 30,000 men on the Irish coast.

On the 17th of February a debate took place on a royal message, in which his majesty, after intimating that he was concerting such engagements with the Emperor of Germany, the Elector of Bavaria, and other powers of the empire, as might materially conduce to the advantage of the common cause in the course of the ensuing campaign, stated that, in order to insure the benefit of this co-operation at an early period, he was desirous of authorising his minister to make (provisionally) such advances of money as might be necessary in the first instance for this purpose; and his majesty recommended it to the House to enable him to make such provision. Pitt declared that 500,000*l.* and no more was the sum which it would be necessary to advance "by way of commencement." Mr. Tierney objected in strong terms to every part of the proposition, taxed Pitt with special-pleading ambiguity, and defied him to state the real aim and object of the war. "He defies me," replied the minister, "to state in one sentence what is the object of the war. Not in one sentence, but in one word I can tell him, that it is SECURITY—security against a danger the greatest that ever threatened the world! It is security against a danger which never existed in any past period of society—against a danger which threatens all the nations of the earth!" The motion was carried by 162 against 19. A proposal for an inquiry into the causes of the disgraces which had attended our arms in Holland—an inquiry which might have been productive of much good, if it could only have been conducted in the right spirit and with proper moderation—was instantly quashed by the huge ministerial majority. The total of the supplies voted for the year was 47,490,739*l.* In detailing his ways and means Pitt now estimated his income-tax at only 5,300,000*l.*, but expressed a confident hope that it would soon yield a great deal more. He negotiated a new loan of 20,500,000*l.* by annuities, and imposed a variety of new taxes. On the annual motion for renewing the act for suspending the Habeas Corpus bill, there was a very stormy debate, but the measure was carried by the usual majorities. The attempt of the maniac, Hadfield, on the 15th of May,* to shoot the king in Drury

* The king, on this day, ran more than one risk of losing his life. In the morning, while attending the field-exercises of the grenadier battalion of the Guards, during one of the volleys, a ball cartridge was fired from the musket of one of the soldiers, and the ball hit a Mr. Ungley, a clerk in the navy-office, who was standing only eight yards from the king. A rapid examination was made of the ear-touche-boxes of the soldiers, but it did not lead to the discovery of the man that had fired the ball. In the evening, as the king entered the box at Drury Lane, a man in the pit, standing near the orchestra and just under the box, discharged a pistol at him. On hearing the report his majesty, who had advanced about four steps from the door, stopped and stood firmly. The man was instantly seized and carried behind the scenes; the king, apparently not in the least disconcerted, came forward to the front of the box, and then the crowded and very loyal audience cheered enthusiastically, and made the performers sing "God save the king" twice over. In the green-room it was presently discovered that the man, though now a working-silversmith (to which trade he had been bred), had recently been a soldier, and had served on the Continent in the 15th light dragoons; that he had been repeatedly and badly wounded, particularly in the head; and that, though sane and rational on most points, he was insane on others. As the Prince of Wales and the Duke of York entered the room he said to the duke, "I know your royal highness—God bless you!—You are a good fellow!—I have served with your highness, and (pointing to a deep cut over his eye, and another long scar on his cheek) I got these, and more than these; in fighting by your side! At Lincoln. I was left three hours among the dead in a ditch, and was taken prisoner by the French. I had my arm broken by a shot and eight sabre-wounds in my head; but I recovered, and here I am!" When asked what had induced him to attempt the life of his sovereign, he replied, that he had not attempted to kill the king—that he had fired purposely over the royal box,—that he was as good a shot as any in England, and must have hit the king if he had tried,—that he was weary of life, wishing to die, but not to die by his own hands; that he had hoped the people would have fallen upon him and killed him, and that now he hoped the law would finish him. To the question whether he belonged to any of the political societies, he answered No: that he only belonged to a club of Old Fellows and to a benefit society. After this he began to talk very incoherently about dreams and visions, and a great commision he had received in his sleep—about martyrdom and persecution, and especially some mysterious persecutions he had undergone in France. He was tried in the Court of King's Bench for high treason. It was clearly proved that he had been for some time insane, and he was therefore acquitted but not discharged. In the month of July, 1802, he found means to escape from Bedlam; but two days after he was re-taken at a public house in Deal, and brought back to London. The rest of his life was spent

Lane Theatre, led to the insertion of two additional clauses in the Insanity Bill, by which the privilege of bail allowed to alleged lunatics was considerably abridged, and the personal safety of the sovereign, which had been so often endangered by the attempts of insane individuals, was specially consulted. The scarcity of corn continued to excite serious alarm, and a committee of each House was appointed to consider of the most effectual means for remedying this distress. These committees neither brought any great store of knowledge to the subject nor displayed any great fertility of invention: they could do little more than recommend the use of brown bread instead of white, and of stale instead of new bread. After much discussion a bill was brought in and passed, prohibiting the sale of bread which had not been baked twenty-four hours, it being generally admitted by the noble and honourable members of the committees, and by the reputable London bakers, that people would eat a smaller quantity of stale bread than of new. On the same day that this bill was passed into a law the Archbishop of Canterbury recommended a series of resolutions, and a voluntary association, by which each of their lordships should bind himself to lessen as much as possible the consumption of bread and flour in his family, and endeavour to introduce the use of such articles as might be conveniently substituted in the place thereof.* The resolutions of the archbishop, being reduced to the proper form recommended by the lord chancellor, were passed unanimously in the Upper House, and a message was sent to the Commons to acquaint them that their lordships had come to the said resolutions and agreement. The Commons forthwith concurred with their lordships; and subsequently the example was followed very generally by persons of superior wealth and condition throughout the kingdom. Bounties were granted on the importation of grain not only from America and the Mediterranean, but also from the Baltic; encouragement was given to the fisheries, the corn-mills were placed under certain regulations, and for the present the distilleries were all stopped. The opposition, without attempting to suggest any better cure for the existing evil, laboured to show that the scarcity of corn arose solely out of the war, and that the continuance of hostilities must subject the country to between Newgate and the mad-house, and he died in New Bedlam only a few years ago. We saw him in Newgate, loose and associating with other prisoners of nearly every description, about the year 1813. He was then a good-looking, soldier-like man, with scarcely any visible signs of insanity. But we were informed that he was subject to occasional paroxysms, and that any excess in drinking drove him into a furious state. And yet, when we saw him, he was allowed to sit drinking beer nearly all day long!

* One of these resolutions was thus solemnly worded:—"We the undersigned agree, that, until the 10th day of October next, we will not consume, nor permit to be consumed, in any week, within our respective families, more wheaten bread than in the proportion of one quarter loaf for each of the individuals of whom our said families may be composed; and also that, during the same period, we will discontinue and cause to be discontinued, within our said families, all pastry."

Before this, Mr. Wilberforce, in the Commons, had earnestly recommended the prohibition of fancy rolls and biscuits, and the prohibition of the use of oats, except for the use of man, and of horses in the service of government.

all the horrors of famine and pestilence. Pitt complained of the insidious use made of this language in promoting certain measures out of doors—meaning hereby petitions for peace, petitions for parliamentary reform, &c.—and insisted that nothing could be more unfair in reasoning than to connect the present scarcity with the war, or to insinuate that its prosecution would interfere with those supplies which we might require.

At first the Irish parliament testified no great willingness to accede to the Union. The resolutions which had passed the British parliament in 1799 excited a terrible storm in Dublin and other towns; but it was observed that a large proportion of the Roman Catholic party, who had suffered most by the late rebellion, preserved a sullen neutrality. When the Irish Commons debated the address proposed by ministers in answer to the speech from the throne, in January, 1799, it was carried by a majority of only one vote. Yet, on the 15th of January, 1800, a motion made in the same House to declare their disapprobation of an Incorporating Union was negatived by a majority of 42, the numbers being 138 against 96. On the 5th of February the whole plan of the Union was detailed by Lord Castlereagh, then principal secretary for Ireland. In addition to the resolutions already mentioned, as adopted by the British parliament, it was now proposed that the number of Irish peers to be admitted to the House of Lords of the United Kingdoms should be four lords spiritual by rotation of sessions, and twenty-eight lords temporal elected for life by the peers of Ireland; and that the number of representatives to be admitted into the House of Commons should be one hundred. The storm of opposition rose to a hurricane: but Lord Castlereagh's motion was carried in the Irish Commons by 158 against 115; and in the Lords the measure of the Union was agreed to by a great majority. On the 13th of March Sir John Parnell, a determined anti-unionist, intimated his conviction that improper influences had been employed over the present representatives of the Irish people, and that it would be proper to take the sense of the nation in a less questionable manner; and he moved an address to request his majesty to dissolve the present and convoke another parliament—a kind of Irish conventional parliament. Mr. Saurin spoke strongly in support of the motion, and of a direct appeal to the Irish people. The solicitor-general accused him of “unfurling the bloody flag of rebellion.” Mr. Egan accused the solicitor-general and other members of administration of having unfurled “the flag of prostitution and corruption.” In the end Parnell's motion was negatived by a large majority. After some more vehement debates the whole plan of the Union was approved by the same parliament which the year before had all but rejected it in toto; and on the 27th of March the two Irish Houses agreed in a joint address, informing his majesty that they considered the resolutions of the British parliament as wisely calculated to form the basis of an incorporation of Great Britain and Ireland into one kingdom; that they had adopted them as their guide, and now felt it their duty to lay before his majesty the resolutions to which they had agreed, and which, if they should be approved by the two Houses of the parliament of Great Britain, they were ready to confirm and ratify, in order that the same might be established for ever by mutual consent of both parliaments. On the 2nd of April this address, together with the resolutions, was laid before the British parliament. In the Upper House Lord Holland contended that a Union would not remedy the discontents of the various descriptions of persons composing the Irish community; that it would not insure a redress of their grievances, but would increase that influence which was already the object of general complaint; that it was evidently offensive to the great body of the Irish people; and that, if it should be carried into effect against the sense of the people, it would endanger the connexion between the two countries, and might possibly produce irreparable mischief. Lord Grenville defended the measure as equally beneficial to both kingdoms; and, while eighty-one peers voted with Grenville, only two—the Earl of Derby and Lord King—divided with Lord Holland. In the Commons it was held by some of the opposition that the Union would injure our constitution, inasmuch as the influence of the crown arising from places in Ireland, being now to be concentrated upon only one hundred members, instead of three hundred, the former number of the Irish House of Commons, it must necessarily be augmented. Pitt replied that he wished not to augment the influence of the crown; that the system proposed was rather calculated to favour the popular interest; that the members for Irish counties and principal cities would be sixty-eight, the remaining thirty-two members being to be elected by towns the most considerable in population and wealth; and that, as the proposed addition would not make any change in the internal form of British representation, it would entail none of those dangers which might attend innovation. He said that, if anything could counterbalance the advantages that must result from the Union, it would be the necessity of disturbing in any way the representation of England; but that, most fortunately, no such a necessity existed. He went on:—“In stating this, I have not forgotten what I have myself formerly said and sincerely felt upon the subject of parliamentary reform: but I know that all opinions must necessarily be subservient to times and circumstances; and that man who talks of his consistency merely because he holds the same opinion for ten or fifteen years, when the circumstances under which that opinion was originally formed are totally changed, is a slave to the most idle vanity. Seeing all that I have seen since the period to which I allude; considering how little chance there is of that species of reform to which alone I looked, and which is as different from the modern schemes of reform as the latter are from the constitution; seeing that where the greatest changes have taken place the most dreadful consequences have ensued, and which have not been confined to the country where they originated, but have spread their malignant influence to almost every part of the globe, shaking the fabric of every government; seeing that in this general shock the constitution of Great Britain has alone remained pure and untouched in its vital principles; I say, when I consider all these circumstances, I should be ashamed of myself, if any former opinions of mine could now induce me to think that the form of representation which, in such times as the present, has been found amply sufficient for the purpose of protecting the interests and securing the happiness of the people, should be idly and wantonly disturbed from any love of experiment or any predilection for theory. Upon this subject, I think it right to state the inmost thoughts of my mind; I think it right to declare my most decided opinion, that, even if the times were proper for experiments, any, even the slightest change in such a constitution must be considered as an evil." In conclusion, Pitt proposed the immediate adoption of the resolutions voted by the Irish parliament. Mr. Grey moved an amendment, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, praying that he will be graciously pleased to direct his ministers to suspend all proceedings on the Irish Union till the sentiments of the Irish people respecting that measure can be ascertained." This amendment was rejected by 236 against 30. The three first resolutions were then carried without opposition; and, all proceedings both in Ireland and in England relative to this great national measure being concluded in the month of June, the Act of Union received the royal assent on the 2nd of July. On the 29th parliament was prorogued, the speech from the throne expressing peculiar satisfaction at the effecting of an entire union between the two islands, which his majesty would ever consider as the happiest event of his reign, being persuaded that nothing could so effectually contribute to the happiness of his Irish subjects, and to the strength, prosperity, and power of the whole empire. But there were other less cheerful notes in the royal speech, for the course of the campaign on the Continent had, by a sudden reverse, disappointed the sanguine hopes which had been entertained at its commencement.

Bonaparte tells us himself that the answer from London filled him with secret satisfaction, as war was necessary to maintain union and energy in the state, which was ill organised, as also to maintain his own influence over the imagination of the French people. But, notwithstanding this secret satisfaction, he in public pretended to be greatly grieved, and in a proclamation to the French people he complained of the obstinate hostility of the English; and called upon the French to furnish men and money in order to acquire peace by force of arms. Giving the command of the army of the Rhine to Moreau, the First Consul assumed the direction of the army of Italy. Having made a demonstration of assembling an army at Dijon, in Burgundy, where he never collected more than a few thousand men, mostly raw recruits or old invalids, Bonaparte secretly directed a number of regiments from the interior of France to assemble in Switzerland, in the town of Lausanne and along the Lake of Geneva. The Austrians, lulled into security, continued their operations against Genoa and on the side of Nice, recovering the greater part of that maritime country, and menacing the old French frontier beyond it. On the 13th of May the First Consul himself appeared at Lausanne, and prepared to march, with about 36,000 men and 40 pieces of cannon, up the Great St. Bernard, which had till then been considered impracticable for the passage of an army with artillery. His left wing, 15,000 strong, under Moncey, was ordered to cross the Alps by the pass of St. Gothard, while, on his right, 5000 men under Turreau were to cross at Mont Cenis, and 5000 more, under Chabran, were to pass by the way of the Little St. Bernard. The passage of the Great St. Bernard was attended with the greatest difficulty, lying for the best part of the way among rocks and precipices and eternal snows. The cannons were dismounted, put into the hollowed trunks of trees, and dragged by the soldiers; the carriages were taken to pieces and carried on mules, or, slung upon poles, were borne on men's shoulders. The powder and shot were packed into boxes of fir-wood, which were carefully lashed on the backs of mules. Every mule, nearly every sturdy peasant in those Alps was hired or pressed into the service; so that, as the artillery was not heavy, the baggage, as usual, very light, and the command of labour immense, both the fatigue and the difficulty must be considerably exaggerated in most of the French accounts of this enterprise. On the 16th of May Bonaparte's vanguard under Lannes descended from the Great St. Bernard into the beautiful Piedmontese valley of Aosta, being closely followed by the other divisions. On the 17th Lannes drove in a detachment of Austrians, who were as much astonished at the appearance of the French in that quarter as if the enemy had descended from the clouds. Between Aosta and Ivrea the fort of Bard commanded the direct road, the deep and narrow pass which leads into the Piedmontese plains, and which at that point is not above fifty yards wide, with rocks on either hand, and the rapid river Dora running in the midst. The French van in their haste came suddenly upon it, and, after making a useless attempt to carry the fort, they fell into a panic. But Bonaparte came up and ordered that Fort Bard should be turned; and this was done by climbing the heights of Albaredo. He then pushed forward, driving several Austrian divisions before him, for the Ticino, on the banks of which river he was to be joined by Moncey, Chabran, and Turreau, who had passed the barrier of the Alps by easier roads. On the 2nd of June Bonaparte entered Milan without any opposition, and was there joined by some of his divisions. On the 5th of June, after his soldiers had eaten their shoes and the leather of their knapsacks, Massena gave up Genoa to the Austrian general Ott and Admiral Lord Keith. More than a week before this event Melas, the commander-in-chief of the Austrian army, advised of the descent of the First Consul into Italy by so unexpected a route, retraced his steps through the Nissard country and the territories of the Genoese republic, being followed by Suchet, who had been contending almost hopelessly on the old frontier-line of France. With considerable rapidity the old Austrian concentrated his scattered forces at Alessandria, a well-fortified town in the open plain of Piedmont. We must pass over the minor operations and combats to come to the decisive affair. Marching to meet Melas, Bonaparte crossed the Po at Piacenza, drove back Melas's advanced-guard, and took up a position in the plain of Marengo, on the right bank of the insignificant river Bormida, and close in front of Alessandria. On the very next day, the 14th of June, Melas came out of Alessandria, crossed the Bormida in three columns, and attacked the French. For a long time the Austrians carried everything before them; and at four o'clock in the afternoon the battle seemed lost to the French, who were retiring on all points, and in considerable disorder. Melas, oppressed by age and infirmities, exhausted by the fatigues he had undergone, and fondly fancying the victory to be secured, quitted the field and returned to Alessandria. The commander-in-chief was scarcely gone ere his advancing and victorious column was suddenly confronted by a fresh French division under General Desaix, and was presently afterwards charged in flank by a mass of heavy cavalry commanded by the younger Kellermann. But for the opportune arrival of Desaix and Kellermann, the main army of the First Consul was clearly ruined; and nothing but the extraordinary luck of the man, and some new blunder or torpidity on the part of the Austrians, could have allowed him to recross the Alps otherwise than as a fugitive.* But now his flying columns rallied; and the Austrians, who had fought hard all day, allowed their column to be broken: General Zach, Melas's second in command, was taken prisoner with nearly all his staff; a panic arose, and horse and foot fled back in confusion towards the Bormida, the cavalry in their frantic haste riding over the infantry. The Austrian official report stated their total loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners at 9069 men and 1423 horses. The French stated their own loss at only 4000, and that of the Austrians at 12,000. But it has been proved that the loss of the French must have been much greater. Desaix, who had saved them, was shot through the heart at his first charge. He had arrived from Egypt only a very few days before, and had made all possible haste to join the First Consul. Neither during the battle nor in his preceding campaigns in Italy had old Melas shown any want of judgment or of firmness;

* * At this crisis of his fortunes Napoleon Bonaparte ran other risks besides the perilous chances of war. A commercial traveller, who had quitted the plain of Marengo at the moment when the French were flying, posted to Paris with great speed, and announced that Bonaparte's army had been annihilated. A republican party, who were already disgusted by the more than regal power which the young First Consul had assumed, promoted an intrigue for removing him from the head of the government, and for giving his power, with some proper limitations, to Carnot, whose pure republicanism was supposed to be above suspicion.

but after his defeat, and when he came to negotiate, it seemed as if his eighty-four years had indeed reduced him to a second childhood. Perhaps, however, the Austrian and Italian diplomatists who now gathered around him may be more answerable than he for the pusillanimous, imbecile (or it may be treacherous) throwing up of a game which was not yet lost—of a great game, where the stake was little less than the whole of Italy. Even after his serious reverse Melas might have collected in the field from 40,000 to 50,000 men; General Ott had thrown a great force into Genoa, and most of the fortresses were well garrisoned. Yet, by the armistice concluded on the 16th of June, the Austrians gave up Piedmont and the Genoese territory, with all their fortresses, including Alessandria, which might have stood a long siege, and the superb Genoa, which had only been taken from the French eleven days before this disgraceful armistice, after a very long siege and at an enormous expense. The French were to keep all Lombardy as far as the river Oglio. In return for all these immense sacrifices, old Melas was allowed to withdraw his troops to the line of Mantua and the Mincio. We have been assured, both by French officers and by Italian gentlemen, who were either in Bonaparte's camp or living near the scene of the battle, that, when the conditions of the armistice were first made known, all were astonished, and many could not believe them. On his return to Milan from Marengo, the First Consul was received in triumph, like a consul and conqueror of ancient Rome. The Milanese, who are rather distinguished by their honest simplicity, called him the unique man, the extraordinary hero, the incomparable model of greatness, the liberator of Italy; and exulted at his coming to restore liberty to his beloved Cisalpine people. Bonaparte, in return, gave back compliment for compliment, spoke a great deal about letters, sciences, and arts, about peace and its blessings, and even about religion. He ordered the University of Pavia to be re-opened, and a liberal increase of salary to be paid to its professors; he appointed a number of new men—for the most part of indisputable merit—to fill chairs in that ancient seat of learning. In Milan he created a consulta, or council with legislative power, and a committee of government with the executive power; but over all these Milanese or Lombards he put a Frenchman, who, nominally minister extraordinary from the French republic, became prime minister and president, or dictator, of this provisional government. In all these matters Bonaparte proceeded according to his own absolute will, and on his own single authority, not deigning to inform his brother consuls, or the senate, or the tribunes, or the legislative body at Paris, either of what he was doing, or of what he intended to do in future. The Italian democrats and ultra republicans, with whom alone he had sought friendship and alliance at the time of his first invasion of Italy, were now spurned, reprobated, and driven from the light of his presence, as dangerous fanatics, or selfish, rapacious, thoroughly immoral demagogues. The fools did not dare to ask where was the perfect liberty and equality which he had promised them in 1797:—among themselves they called him an aristocrat, and even a tyrant, but in public they only spoke of him as of a demigod. The men he called around him were all of those classes which had passed for the aristocratic;—they were men of family, name, and property, or men of learning and science, there being among them even bishops.* But these personages were in their turn to be almost as much cajoled as the sans-culottic party had been, for they were artfully led to hope that Bonaparte, himself an Italian, or the native of an Italian island, whose mother-tongue was Italian, whose family once flourished on the banks of Arno, and had transferred itself from Tuscany to Corsica only a few generations since, intended nothing less than to give a national union and independence to Upper Italy at the first peace he should be able to make, as a grand preparatory step to the independence of the whole of the peninsula! Other Milanese and Lombards of the higher classes, whose Italianism was less fervent and sanguine, whose patriotism was rather limited to their own portion of Italy, and whose hopes or wishes scarcely went beyond the enjoyment of peace, and of a quiet, unoppressive, gentle government, such as they had enjoyed more than once under the dominion of Austria, and especially in the days of Maria Theresa and Joseph II., but which would be sweeter and dearer if it could be enjoyed without any foreign dominion, trusted that, when the storms of war were blown over, they might be left to govern themselves in tranquillity. It is difficult to conceive how any of these hopes could ever have been entertained by rational, well-informed men (and many of the two classes of hopefuls were men of knowledge and of genius), but we know, and from other sources than speeches and addresses and adulatory poems, that they were entertained and fondly cherished by many of the best of the nobility and citizens of Upper Italy; and that, too, in the midst of a renewed system of plunder, spoliation, and dilapidation; for, although the more private robberies of the kind which had been practised by the Conventional commissioners were checked under the Consulate, the public robberies were perpetrated as unblushingly as ever. Having established a provisional government in Genoa, and another in Turin—although here the present King of Sardinia, Charles Emmanuel, was shut up in the citadel of his capital—Bonaparte returned to Paris, where he made a triumphal entrance on the 3rd of July.

The French army on the Upper Rhine, under Moreau, had been scarcely less successful than the army of Italy. Moreau crossed the Rhine on the 25th of April; and, after defeating the Austrians under Kray in several engagements, he penetrated to Ulm. As soon as he was apprised of the First Consul's successes beyond the Alps, he crossed the Danube, drove the Austrians from an entrenched camp, overran a great part of Bavaria, captured Munich, the capital, and pressed upon the frontiers of the emperor's hereditary dominions. The armistice concluded in Italy did not extend to Germany; but Bonaparte ordered Moreau to accede to the request of the Austrians for a truce till the month of September. The Russian Czar, instead of assisting his imperial brother, now seemed disposed to join the First Consul. Conditions or overtures of peace, such as became an ambitious conqueror, were now tendered by Bonaparte; but Austria refused to treat without England, and France demanded an armistice by sea as a preliminary to the negotiations with England.* The object of this last demand was as transparent as air: the French garrison in Malta, and the French army in Egypt, seemed on the point of surrendering to the English, and the First Consul wanted to send reinforcements to those countries during the naval armistice. But the armistice was instantly refused by the British government, and hostilities were recommenced by land and by sea, the Emperor of Germany and the King of Great Britain reciprocally binding themselves not to conclude a peace the one without the other. At the word given by Bonaparte from Paris, three French armies put themselves in motion nearly at one and the same moment. The army of Italy, now under General Brune, drove the Austrians from the Mincio, and beyond the Adige and the Brenta, and advanced to within a few miles of Venice. Macdonald, with another army, occupied the passes of the Tyrol, being prepared to reinforce either Brune in Italy or Moreau in Germany. Moreau himself directed the heads of his columns towards Saltzburg and Vienna. He was met near Haag by Archduke John, the younger brother of his old adversary, as brave but not so skilful a general as the Archduke Charles. A battle took place, which was decidedly favourable to the Austrians; but, hazarding a general engagement on the 2nd of December, at Hohenlinden, between the rivers Iser and Inn, the Archduke John was thoroughly defeated and driven from the field with the loss of 10,000 men. Moreau, advancing, occupied Saltzburg, and the road to Vienna seemed almost open, not only to his army, but also to the armies of Brune and Macdonald. In this terrible condition the Emperor Francis was compelled to sue for a separate peace, and the British government obliged to release him from the terms of his alliance. An armistice was concluded on the 25th of December; and the treaty of peace, called the treaty of Lunéville, was signed on the 9th of February, 1801. It ratified all the conditions of the treaty of Campo Formio, and included several new articles very humiliating to the House of Austria. The emperor was to retain possession of Venice, but Tuscany was taken away from the Grand-Duke Ferdinand, and bestowed upon Louis, son of the Duke of Parma, who had married a Spanish princess—the first consul, who had need of her further assistance, thinking it proper to give some recompense to Spain for her past services, and for the serious losses her fleet had sustained in encounters with the British. The emperor again acknowledged the independence of the Cisalpine and Ligurian republics, renouncing all right or pretension to any part of those Italian territories, and a new and extended and more advantageous frontier was drawn for the Cisalpines, the line of the Adige being taken from the point where that river issues from the Tyrol down to its mouth on the Adriatic. Piedmont, which lay awkwardly between the Cisalpine and Ligurian republics, was for the present left to his Sardinian majesty Charles Emmanuel, whose fortresses and cities were occupied by French troops, whose subjects were in a state of revolt, and whose authority scarcely extended beyond the walls of the citadel of Turin, into which he had been compelled to throw himself with his family, and a few faithful adherents.* Through the mediation of the Czar Paul, the King of Naples obtained a peace shortly after, agreeing to close all his ports against the English, and our only remaining allies, the Turks; to withdraw some Neapolitan troops which he had sent into the Roman States, and to give up the principality of Piombino with some other small detached territories which belonged to him on the Tuscan coast. It was also prescribed to him by the first consul that he must pardon all political offences committed by his own subjects, restore the confiscated property of the Neapolitan revolutionists, liberate all such of them as were in prison, recall all that were in exile; both parties, or royalists and republicans, being enjoined by Bonaparte to realize the political impossibility of forgetting and forgiving everything that had passed in that year of blood 1799.

Through the timidity of the court of Naples, which became a perfect panic after the battle of Marengo, the supplies of corn and other provisions which had been drawn from Sicily for the use of our Mediterranean fleet, and of our forces blockading the French in La Valetta, had been interrupted for many months before king Ferdinand obtained the brief respite of this treaty of peace; and, instead of starving out the French, our forces and the poor Maltese, who co-operated with us to a man, were in great danger of being starved away themselves: but at last, after a blockade which had lasted for more than two years, the island of Malta was surrendered to the British troops, commanded by Major-General Pigot, on the 15th of

* Preliminaries had actually been signed at Paris, by Talleyrand for the First Consul, and by the Count de St. Julien for the emperor, on the 8th of July.

* Never was country more cruelly plundered, agitated, and torn to pieces, than was Piedmont at this moment. Massena demanded from the exhausted treasury 1,000,000 livres per month, and food and clothing for all the French garrisons. Brune, who succeeded Massena, agreed that the troops should be maintained out of the monthly million; but he got the livres and did not maintain the troops: Piedmont was therefore obliged to make up the deficiency, because, if the French soldiers did not get quietly all that they wanted, they took it by force. When money became scarce, the French commissaries demanded the lead which covered the cupola of the magnificent church of Superga.—Carlo Botta.

September. The work ought to have been done sooner, but the prize was truly great, though it could be valuable only to the power that held the dominion of the seas.

Except in the services which Admiral Lord Keith had rendered at the useless reduction of Genoa, there was little more deserving of attention in any of our military operations during this unhappy year. The small island of Goree, on the western coast of Africa, with a dependent French factory at Joul, surrendered to Sir Charles Hamilton, who appeared before it with a small squadron early in the summer. The Dutch island of Curaçoa surrendered to a small British force at the end of September. Repeating the miserable blunder they had committed in the Quiberon expedition, and the expedition to Ile Noirmoutier in 1795, our ministers sent over an expedition to the western coasts of France to co-operate with the Breton royalists and the insurgents called Chouans, who had flown to arms while Bonaparte was absent in Egypt, and had even made themselves formidable, but who had either been beaten and dispersed, or conciliated and won over by the consular government, months before our insignificant expedition appeared off the coast. All that could be done was to destroy some brigs, sloops, and gun-boats, and a few worthless trading vessels. The armament then proceeded to the coast of Spain to destroy the arsenal and the shipping at Ferrol; but the commander of our land troops, Sir James Pulteney, fancying the defences of the place too strong, re-embarked his troops almost as soon as he had landed, and came away without doing anything. Some time after this Pulteney proceeded to Gibraltar and joined his forces to those of Sir Ralph Abercromby, who, with the Mediterranean fleet, still commanded by Lord Keith, was to make an attack upon Cadiz, to burn the arsenal, and capture or destroy the Spanish fleet. Absurd and apparently contradictory orders had been sent out by our government—by the admiralty and by the secretary of state—to the land and sea officers in command; a terrible epidemic was raging in the city; Lord Keith shrunk from risking his ships in a bad anchorage and among land batteries; and on the 6th of October, when General (afterwards Sir John) Moore and three thousand men were actually in the boats to make the first landing, they were countermanded; and on the following day, amidst heartburnings, jealousies, and a deplorable confusion, the whole enterprise was given up, and our fleet sailed round to Gibraltar, blushing at the ridiculous figure it had cut before Cadiz. General Pulteney was soon sent with six battalions to Lisbon, as the Spaniards were threatening an invasion of Portugal; General Abercromby, who had been beating about the Mediterranean, the Straits of Gibraltar, and the part of the Atlantic nearest to them, with fifteen thousand soldiers cooped up in crowded transports, now fancying he was to be called upon one expedition, and now upon another,*

* General Moore, who was heartily tired of this sailing about with-

did at last receive positive information that he was to be employed in Egypt: but the year was now spent; and it was the middle of December ere the armament got so far as Malta.

The scarcity of grain still continued at home, depressing the national spirit, which, during the whole year, had scarcely a glimpse of victory or of glory to cheer it. The city of London and other places presented petitions to the king in the month of October, imploring him to convene the parliament. That assembly, which had taken such paltry means to relieve the distress during the last session, met on the 11th of November, and passed, in rapid succession, a number of acts, granting bounties on the importation of foreign corn, enjoining the baking of mixed and inferior flour, &c. &c. The hand of private charity did more good to the poor than all this legislation; subscriptions were entered into in all parts of the kingdom, immense sums were collected, and, though the people continued to be stinted in the luxury of the best wheaten bread—a luxury still unknown to every labouring population in Europe except the English—their sufferings were not so severe as might have been expected. Some riots which took place were mainly caused by the ignorance and impolicy of the government and courts of law in enforcing the old laws against forestalling, regrating, &c.; and they were put down without bloodshed, having been attended with no consequences more serious than the breaking of some cornfactors' and bakers' windows, and some trifling temporary addition to the price of wheat, the holders being terrified from Mark-Lane.* The impulsive ignorance was in both cases the same; but in Paris the bread-rioters seldom took the field without committing atrocities.

After sundry attacks rather on the foreign policy of ministers than on their spiritless conduct and undeniable mismanagement of the war, a motion was made on the 1st of December, in the Commons, by Sheridan, for an address to his majesty, earnestly to desire him to enter into a separate negotiation with France for a speedy and honourable peace. This being negatived by 156 against 35, Mr. T. Jones, on the 4th of December, moved an address to implore his majesty to dismiss his present ministers, "who, by their profusion and extravagance, had brought their country to the brink of famine and ruin, and who, by their incapacity, had shown themselves unequal to conduct the war with effect, or enter into negotiations of peace with honour." This was rejected by 66 against 13. Supplies were voted for three lunar months only. For the service of the navy 120,000 men, including marines, were granted, out any determined object, says that the armament looked as if it were roving in quest of adventures and the chapter of accidents.

It is not easy to conceive anything more like imbecility than the whole management of this year's war by our government.

* There were men, even in the British parliament, so ignorant of the first principles of public economy, that they would have made the legislature interfere in regulating the price of corn and other commodities, or in fixing that maximum law which had caused such desperate confusion and mischief in France; but, luckily, these legislators were but a contemptible minority.

from the 1st of January to the 1st of April, 1801. According to the army returns the number of men killed in action, or who had died in the service of the army, since the commencement of the present war, was 48,971, and the number of effective men, rank and file, including invalids, militia, and foreign corps, as well as the regular and fencible troops actually serving in the pay of Great Britain, was 168,082.

On the last day of the year the king closed the session of parliament, notifying that the time fixed for the commencement of the union of Great Britain and Ireland necessarily terminated their proceedings; and that the IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT (as the united parliament was to be called) was appointed to meet on the 22nd of January, 1801.

A.D. 1801. On the 1st of January a proclamation was issued concerning the royal style and titles and armorial ensigns, henceforward to be used as appertaining to the crown of Great Britain and Ireland. The regal title was expressed in English by the words, "George the Third, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith." Thus was judiciously relinquished the old title of King of France, which, since the days of Henry V., had been a ridiculous assumption on the part of our sovereigns. The arms or ensigns armorial of the United Kingdom were ordered to be, quarterly, first and fourth England, second Scotland, third Ireland. A new great seal was made in conformity with the alterations made in the royal titles and arms. In honour of the Union many new titles were conferred on the Irish nobility, and several of them were created peers of the United Kingdom.

On the 22nd of January the first imperial parliament was opened by commission. The former members for England and Scotland continued, according to the provision in the treaty of Union, to form part of the House of Commons; and Mr. Addington was re-elected speaker. The king did not meet this parliament till the 2nd of February, when all the members had been sworn, and other preliminary matters arranged. In his speech from the throne, after adverting to the happy accomplishment of the Union, and to the unhappy course of events on the continent, which had forced his allies to abandon him, he announced that a fresh storm was gathering in the north; that the court of Petersburg had already proceeded to commit outrages against the ships, property, and persons of his subjects; and that a convention had been concluded by that court with the courts of Copenhagen and Stockholm, the object of which was to renew their former engagement for re-establishing, by force of arms, a new code of maritime law, inconsistent with the rights, and hostile to the best interests, of this country. He stated that he had taken the earliest measures to repel the aggressions of this hostile confederacy; and he expressed his confidence that both Houses of parliament would afford him the most vigorous and effectual support in his firm determination to maintain to the utmost, against every attack, the naval rights and interests of his empire. Some members of opposition recommended conciliatory measures, and even the suspension of the right of search we claimed at sea, or a tacit assent to the principles of the armed neutrality, which the Czarina Catherine had first raised against us during the American war, and which the three northern powers were now about to revive, hinting at the terrible consequences which might attend the closing of the corn ports on the Baltic in this season of scarcity. Sir William Watkins Wynne, on the ministerial side, said that the emperor of Russia, besides renewing these bygone claims of the right of neutral flags, and abandoning his recent alliance with Austria and England—abandoning the common cause of order, and the balance of power—had committed such outrages on British subjects, as must unite every individual in these kingdoms in a firm determination to avenge and redress the indignity. The hostility of the northern powers, he observed, by cutting us off from supplies of grain, might aggravate the dearth of corn, but the mildness of the present season afforded hopes of relief at home; and from the power and valour of our navy we might augur success in our just and defensive efforts. Pitt expressed his regret that members of the legislature should increase our difficulties by starting a doubt on the question of our right of search, observing that it was singularly unfortunate that these honourable gentlemen should have first begun to doubt when the enemy began to arm. He defended the practice of searching neutrals, which it might now be incumbent upon us to vindicate by force of arms, on the plea of right as well as of expediency. The principle on which we were acting had been universally admitted and acted upon as the law of nations, except in particular cases, where it had been modified by treaties between states. As to the particular treaties between us and the present hostile confederates of the north, they included the right of search in strict and precise terms. So much for the right; and now for the expediency. Were we to permit the navy of France to be supplied and recruited? Were we to suffer blockaded ports to be furnished with stores and provisions? Were we to suffer neutral nations, by hoisting a neutral flag on a sloop or a fishing-boat, to convey the treasures of South America to Spain, or the naval stores of the Baltic to Brest and Toulon? He asked the opposition whether the navy of France would have been swept from the ocean, and left in the state of weakness in which it now was, if the commerce of that power had not been destroyed, and the fraudulent trade of neutrals prevented by the vigilant exercise of the right of search? Mr. Grey, allowing that the conduct of the Emperor Paul had been that of a madman, and violent and hostile in the extreme, wished to draw a distinction between the conduct of Russia and that of Sweden and Denmark (the last of which three powers had ever since the beginning of the war leaned towards France, and shown a decided hostility towards England); but an amendment he moved was rejected by 245 against 63. Preparations were forthwith made for sending that British fleet into the Baltic which, together with the death of the insane czar, put so speedy an end to this northern coalition; but before the tremendous battle of Copenhagen, and also before the brilliant success of the Egyptian expedition (the only army expedition, of all that Pitt had planned, that was successful and honourable), the premier of seventeen years' standing retired from his post. While recommending and urging on the Union, he had flattered the Irish with the hope that that grand measure would be the best means of obtaining the abolition, or very great mitigation, of the penal and disabling laws affecting the Roman Catholics,—that in the united parliament the obstacles might be removed which stood in the way of emancipation; and two anonymous but authoritative papers (one known to proceed from himself, and the other from Lord Cornwallis) had been circulated among the leading Irish Catholics, and were supposed to have had no small influence in removing the obstacles which stood in the way of the Union. Before committing himself thus deeply, he ought to have ascertained whether the strong religious scruples of George III. would allow him to redeem his pledge. When the question was first mooted (apparently in a council held towards the middle of January of the present year), the king's objections were found to be insurmountable. At the levee, on Wednesday the 28th of January, the king said to Dundas, "What is this that this young lord (Castlereagh) has brought over, which they are going to throw at my head?" Lord Castlereagh had brought over some plan of Catholic emancipation. The king continued, "I shall reckon any man my personal enemy who proposes any such measure! This is the most Jacobinical thing I ever heard of!" "You will find," said Dundas, "among those who are friendly to that measure, some you never supposed to be your enemies."* On the 31st of January Pitt wrote a letter to his majesty, stating that the important questions respecting the Catholics and dissenters must naturally be agitated in consequence of the Union; that the knowledge of his majesty's general indisposition to any change of the laws on this subject must always have made this a painful task to him; and that it was become much more so by learning from some of his colleagues, and from other quarters, within these few days, the extent to which his majesty had entertained, and had declared, that sentiment; that every principle of duty, gratitude, and attachment must make him look to his majesty's ease and satisfaction, in preference to all considerations, except those arising from a sense of what, in his honest opinion, was due to the real interest of his majesty and his dominions; that under the impression of this opinion, he had concurred in what appeared to be the pre-ailing sentiment of the majority of the cabinet; that the admission of the Catholics and dissenters to municipal offices, and of Catholics to parliament (from which latter the Protestant dissenters were not now excluded), would, under certain conditions to be specified, be highly advisable, with a view to the tranquillity and improvement of Ireland, and to the general interest of the United Kingdom; that for himself he was fully convinced that the measure would be attended with no danger to the established church, or to the Protestant interest in Great Britain or Ireland; that, now the Union had taken place, and with the new provisions which would make part of the plan, it could never give any such weight, in office or in parliament, either to Catholics or dissenters, as could give them any new means (if they were so disposed) of attacking the establishment; that the grounds on which the laws of exclusion now remaining were first founded had long been narrowed, and were, since the Union, removed. After using various other arguments to prove that Catholic emancipation would consolidate and give full effect to the Union by tranquillising Ireland, and attaching it by the bonds of affection to this country, Pitt hoped that his majesty would maturely weigh what he now humbly submitted to him, declaring that in the interval that his majesty might wish for consideration, he would not, on his part, importune his majesty with any unnecessary reference to the subject; and would feel it his duty to abstain from all agitation of this subject in parliament, and to prevent it, as far as depended upon him, on the part of others. But then he said, that, if his majesty's objections to the measure proposed should not be removed, or sufficiently diminished to admit of its being brought forward with his majesty's full concurrence, and with the whole weight of government, he must beg to be permitted to resign—adding, however, that, if his majesty should consider his services necessary at the present crisis, he would not withdraw himself immediately, but would even continue, for such a short further interval as might be necessary, to oppose the agitation or decision of the question in parliament, as far as he could consistently with the line to which he felt bound uniformly to adhere—of reserving to himself a full latitude on the principle itself, and objecting only to the time, and to the temper and circumstances of the moment.*

On the very next day—the 1st of February—the king replied by letter, beginning with expressing his cordial affection for Mr. Pitt, and his high opinion of his talents and integrity. "These feelings greatly add," said his majesty, "to my uneasiness on this occasion; but a sense of religious as well as political duty has made me, from the moment I mounted the throne, to consider the oath that the wisdom of our forefathers have enjoined the kings of this realm to take at their coronation, and enforced by the obligation of instantly following it in the course of the ceremony with taking the Sacrament, has so binding a religious obligation on me to maintain the fundamental maxims on which our constitution is placed, namely, the Church of England being the established one, and that those who hold employments in the state must be members of it, and, consequently, obliged not only to take oaths against Popery, but to receive the Holy Communion agreeably to the rites of the Church of England. This principle of duty must, therefore, prevent me from discussing any proposition tending to destroy the groundwork of our happy constitution, and much more so that now mentioned by Mr. Pitt, which is no less than the complete overthrow of the whole fabric. When the Irish propositions [for the Union] were transmitted to me by a joint message from both Houses of the British parliament, I told the lords and gentlemen sent on that occasion, that I would with pleasure and without delay forward them to Ireland; but that, as individuals, I could not help acquainting them, that my inclination to an Union with Ireland was principally founded on a trust, that the uniting the established churches of the two kingdoms would for ever shut the door to any further measures with respect to the Roman Catholics. These two instances must show Mr. Pitt, that my opinions are not those formed on the moment, but such as I have imbibed for forty years, and from which I never can depart; but, Mr. Pitt once acquainted with my sentiments, his assuring me that he will stave off the only question whereon I fear from his letter we can never agree,—for the advantage and comfort of continuing to have his advice and exertions in public affairs, I will certainly abstain from talking on this subject, which is the one nearest my heart. I cannot help if others pretend to guess at my opinions, which I have never disguised; but, if those who unfortunately differ with me will keep this subject at rest, I will, on my part, most correctly on my part, be silent also; but this restraint I shall put on myself from affection for Mr. Pitt; but further I cannot go, for I cannot sacrifice my duty to any consideration. Though I do not pretend to have the power of changing Mr. Pitt's opinion, when thus unfortunately fixed, yet I shall hope his sense of duty will prevent his retiring from his present situation to the end of my life; for I can with great truth assert, that I shall, from public and private considerations, feel great regret if I shall ever find myself obliged, at any time, from a sense of religious and political duty, to yield to his entreaties of retiring from his seat at the Board of Treasury."* To this letter, written on the 1st, Pitt replied on the 3rd of February. He said that the final decision which his majesty had formed on the great subject in question, and his own unalterable sense of the line which public duty required from him, must make him consider the moment as now arrived when, on the principles he had already explained, it ought to be his first wish to be released as soon as possible from his official situation; that, although he wished to consult as much as possible his majesty's ease and convenience, he must frankly confess that the difficulty of even his temporary continuance in office must necessarily be increased, and might very shortly become insuperable, from what he conceived to be the import of one passage in his majesty's letter, which hardly left him room to hope that those steps could be taken for effectually discountenancing all attempts to make use of his majesty's name, or to influence opinions on this subject, which he had ventured to represent as indispensably necessary during any interval in which he might remain in office. He said that, as his majesty's final decision was taken, the sooner he was allowed to retire the better it would be for his majesty's service; that he trusted no long delay would be found necessary for forming a new administration, which might conduct the service with credit and advantage, while the feebleness and uncertainty almost inseparable from a temporary government must soon produce an effect, both at home and abroad, from which serious inconveniences might be expected.* On the 5th of February the king rejoined:—He had flattered himself that, from the strong assurance he had given Mr. Pitt of keeping perfectly silent on the subject whereon they entirely differed, provided Mr. Pitt, on his part, abstained from any disquisition on it for the present, they had both understood their present line of conduct; but that, as he unfortunately found Mr. Pitt did not draw the same conclusion, he must come to the unpleasant decision of acquainting him, that, rather than forego what he looked on as his duty, he would, without unnecessary delay, attempt to make the most creditable ministerial arrangement possible, and such as Mr. Pitt would think most to the advantage of his service and to the security of the country; adding, however, that, though it should be done with as much expedition as so difficult a subject would admit of, he could not yet fix how soon a new administration would be formed.† It soon became known that the king had intrusted the formation of the new cabinet to Mr. Addington, now Speaker, who was the son of Pitt's father's favourite physician, Dr. Addington, and who had been brought forward in public life by the Pitt family and connexions. On the 10th of February Lord Darnley rose in the Upper House to move for an inquiry into part of the conduct of the existing administration. Lord Grenville then stated, in the most downright manner, that the failure of their intentions in favour of the Roman Catholics had induced them to resign their places, which they now held only till their successors should be appointed. At the earnest request of several peers, who knew the real state of the king,

These important letters were edited by the second Lord Kenyon, son of the noble lord who wrote several of them, and to whom several of the king's letters were addressed, and by Dr. Phillips, now Bishop of Exeter.

Lord Darnley agreed to postpone his motion. On the same day a letter was read in the Commons from Addington, tendering the resignation of his office of Speaker, on account of his majesty's declared intention of appointing him to a situation incompatible with that post. When this letter had been read, Pitt rose to state that he had his majesty's commands to inform the House that they were to proceed in due time to the election of another speaker, and, in order that time might be had for consideration, he moved an adjournment till to-morrow. Old Sir William Pulteney, who seconded the motion, said, "I have a right to say something: I am now an old man, and have seen many changes, without a real change of principle: I wish to see that kind of change which I never yet saw; a change in which public men of all descriptions shall act from no other motive than the good of the public, without having any view to their own personal interests." The adjournment was agreed to. On the following day—the 11th of February—the House proceeded to the election of a speaker. The choice fell on the attorney-general, Sir John Mitford, who was proposed by Lord Hawkesbury, and strongly commended and recommended by the ministerial or Pittite party. On the 14th of February it was publicly announced that the king was confined to the house by a severe cold; and on the 16th the bulletin declared that he was affected by a fever: but it appears now to be fully proved that his majesty was suffering under a return of his former indisposition, brought on by anxiety and agitation of mind—an agitation occasioned principally, if not entirely, by the Catholic question and the resignation of Pitt.* On the 16th, the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a committee of supply being read, Mr. Harrison rose to oppose it. At the moment, he said, when the House was called upon to pass a vote for so large a sum as 28,000,000*l.*, there was no ostensible person at the head of affairs, on whom responsibility could be fixed, for the proper use and application of the money. It was quite evident that Mr. Pitt was no longer in his former official situation, and it was very proper to know who were the persons that were to direct the government and the energies of the country. If Mr. Pitt and his friends were allowed to obtain this vote of supply, it might be truly said that their entry into and their exit from office were both equally marked by a wound to the character and consequence of that House, and to the constitution of the country. Pitt replied that, whenever there arises a change of administration, it must be left to the king to determine when the new arrangements shall take place; that it was contrary to the spirit of the constitution for the House to assume any right of determination or dictation on a subject of that kind; that, if any further delay took place in voting the supplies, the business of the country must be at a stand still; and that, if any such delay now took place, it would be impossible for him to retire from office. He added that he conceived it to be his duty not to resign till the House had voted the supplies for the year, and he had explained the plans he had in contemplation for the public service. As for responsibility, he observed, that, though the present ministers were to retire from office, they would never be far out of the way when any inquiry was proposed to be instituted into their conduct; and the new ministers who were to succeed them, and under whose administration the supplies must be expended, would surely be responsible for their use and application. Sheridan, Whitbread, and others, supported Harrison; but his motion was negatived, after some long debates, by an immense majority; and on the 18th of February the House resolved itself into a committee of supply. The sum required amounted altogether, for Great Britain and Ireland, to 42,197,000*l.* To raise it recourse was had to the old system:—25,500,000*l.* was borrowed, and some new taxes were imposed.* Pitt described the state of the finances and of trade as very flourishing. The year 1801, he said, might be called the era of our prosperity as well as trial. Our imports and exports were far greater than they were in the year 1791. The war had been attended with a constant increase of commerce and of revenue; so that we were now distinguished by our prosperity, commerce, and naval superiority, above all the other nations of the world; and it was singular, but not more singular than true, that, though we had suffered so much from unfavourable seasons, and from two bad harvests in succession, the present year was the proudest the country had ever known with respect to its commerce. There was no denying the great increase of the national debt; but, without any diminution of confidence in that plausible invention, he pointed to the sinking-fund as a sure remedy for every financial evil. Besides the twenty-five and a-half millions loan for Great Britain, it

"Feb. 25. It is certain that Dr. Willis is with the king. The prince and Pitt were together, and the prince said to Pitt, 'You are still minister.' To which the other replied, 'I hope, if a regency is required, your royal highness and I shall agree better than the last time.' 'Oh!' said the prince, 'I see things now in a very different light from what I did then.' So the ministry is finely mottled. St. Vincent and Hawkesbury are installed, and perhaps Eldon—the rest not."

"Feb. 27. The king's fever is leaving him, and he is just now as he was when he began to mend twelve years ago. They say his illness was brought on by his taking a most extraordinary dose of James's powders of his own accord. If he does not make haste and recover, there will be a regency established upon the resolution entered into in 1789."

"Feb. 28. This morning I hear the king's life is in danger, and some talk of his not getting over the day; but, as these are not the most loyal of his subjects, I cannot trust to their intelligence."

"March 2. The king is recovering fast, both head and health, and there will of course be no motion made in the House about his situation."—Diary; in "The Courts of Europe at the close of the last century, by the late Henry Swinburne, Esq., author of Travels in Spain, Italy, &c."

Wilberforce says that "the king's agitation at being urged to grant power to the Romanists was not unlikely to expose him to such an attack. He says that it was on the 23rd of February he heard in the House of Commons "of the king's being ill in the old way since Thursday evening last."—Diary, in Life by his Sons.

was found necessary to borrow about 2,500,000*l.* for Ireland. The House having agreed, after some slight alterations, to the resolutions upon the budget, Pitt, on the 14th of March, resigned, to the regret and perhaps to the dismay of a great majority in both Houses. He was accompanied in his resignation by Dundas, Earl Spencer, Lord Grenville, and Windham, two of these statesmen being the ablest, and two of them the most high-minded or most honest, of the public men of that day; and other changes took place shortly after.

It was assumed by Pitt's enemies that his delicacy about his pledged faith to the Irish, and his decided sense of the justice and expediency of granting Catholic emancipation, were but pretexts; and that the real cause of his resignation was, his tardy conviction that he had involved the country in a labyrinth from which he knew not how to extricate it, being far too weak to carry on the war, and far too proud to make peace with the French. Whatever may have been the public and the private faults of this minister, meanness never appears to have been of the number; through the publication of the interesting letters which we have cited, we now know (what was only matter of surmise at the time)* that the king most positively refused to enable him to redeem his pledge to the Irish, by carrying or promoting emancipation, and we are inclined to take the word of Pitt that this was the real cause which induced him to resign. Credit is also due to the high character and veraciousness of men like Lord Grenville and Windham, who, both in parliament and in private and confidential intercourse, declared this to be the sole cause of their quitting office with Pitt at this crisis. It does not appear in the least probable that these individuals were dismayed at the northern coalition, or reduced to despair by the continental successes of Bonaparte and the forced dissolution of our foreign alliances. There was not in England a man who had more of the old English character—bravery, resolution, and a loathing of all that is mean—than Windham: almost the last words that Pitt delivered in the House as prime minister were words full of hope and confidence:—he felt convinced, he said, that the British fleet would, with one blow, shatter the coalition of the North—but we can at the same time conceive that these men, and Lord Grenville as well, seeing the probability† of a short peace or truce being made inevitable, shrunk with a natural and not discreditable pride from treating with a party so arrogant as the first consul, and from exchanging diplomatic terms of respect and amity with individuals whose characters they hated or despised, and whose principles they detested; and we can further conceive that, perhaps half unconsciously to themselves, this natural pride weighed, in the same balance with their point of honour respecting the Catholic claims. This view of the case does not seem to us to be disproved by the fact (in itself, and by itself, not very creditable to him) that Pitt returned to office in 1804, without making any stipulations with the king for the Catholic claims. A letter that was now circulating in Ireland, and which was attributed to the retired prime minister, who certainly never denied the authorship of it, contained the following remarkable passage:—“The Catholic body will prudently consider their prospects as arising from the persons who now espouse their interests, and compare them with those which they could look to from any other quarter. They may, with confidence, rely on the zealous support of all those who retire, and of many who remain in office, when it can be given with a prospect of success. They may be assured that Mr. Pitt will do his utmost to establish their cause in the public favour (although he could not concur in a hopeless attempt to force it now), and prepare the way for their finally attaining their objects.” This passage, which accompanied his apology for resigning, has been considered more open to objection than the credibility of the statement of the cause of his resignation. It has been said that he spoke as if the candour, generosity, and increasing enlightenment and toleration of the English people, and all the other champions of popular rights, were sources from which the Catholics had nothing to hope;—as if all their hopes were to be centred in him;—that the language betrayed the fault of his character, which was not duplicity, but solitary ambition, an ambition solitary yet not selfish, the public weal being the sincerest wish of his heart, next to his being himself the chief administrator of it.

As soon as the serious nature of the king's indisposition was made known, a new regency bill was expected. Fox quitted his pleasant retirement at St. Anne's Hill, came up to London, and presided over a meeting of the Whig Club, where he deprecated any public allusion to the king's malady, and declared that, still despairing of the House of Commons, if he re-appeared there, it should only be to support Mr. Grey's motion for an inquiry into the state of the nation. But all the time Fox staid in town he was surrounded by speculating, hopeful visitors, who would not divest themselves of the expectation that he would soon be prime minister to the regent, or to George IV. These hopes were, however, damped by reports that the old king was rapidly recovering, and they were altogether extinguished on the 12th of March (two days before Pitt's final withdrawing), when the physicians announced that his majesty was

* “I give Mr. Pitt credit for his resignation, if it was occasioned by a resistance from another quarter to his liberal sentiments towards the Catholics in Ireland, and the Dissenters in this country.”—Letter from the Bishop of Llandaff to the Duke of Grafton, in Anecdotes of the Life of Richard Watson, Bishop of Llandaff; written by himself at different intervals, and published by his Son.

† It is, however, but fair to state, that at this moment the war party in the country was still exceedingly strong, and negotiation for peace only a probability. For this we have the authority of Fox himself, who says, even a month after Pitt had resigned and had been succeeded by Addington—“I have heard a great deal of the country's being materially turned with respect to the war, and I believe it in a great measure; but I do not see any approach to what I consider as good general principles.”—Letter to Dr. Parr, in the Works of Samuel Parr, LL.D., &c., with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, &c., by John Johnston, M.D.

well, and that no more bulletins would be issued. Fox returned to St. Anne's Hill, and his friends to the opposition benches. The new ministry, now installed in office, consisted of Addington, first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; the Duke of Portland, president of the council; Lord Eldon, chancellor; Earl St. Vincent, first lord of the admiralty; the Earl of Chatham, master-general of the ordnance; Lord Pelham, secretary for the home department; Lord Hawkesbury (eldest son of the Earl of Liverpool), secretary for foreign affairs; Lord Hobart, secretary for the colonies; Viscount Lewisham, president of the board of control for the affairs of India; Charles Yorke, secretary at war, &c.* When Mr. Addington first informed the Prince of Wales of these changes, the prince declared that, though he had not been consulted in the arrangements, he should take no part in opposition to those who were chosen by the king. But at this moment the prince was powerless, nor was the Foxite party, if he had been disposed to resume his close connexion with it, at all in a condition to give him strength. It was almost immediately asserted, by some, that Addington was but the puppet of Pitt, and, by others, that the new government was fairly and honestly bent on peace. Mr. Wilberforce, who was frequently closeted with Addington, devising means to better the condition of the poor, appears to have been convinced of the sincerity of the new premier's anti-warlike professions: but we find him shortly afterwards regretting that everything was kept "profoundly secret," expressing his disappointment that the negotiations should have dragged on so long without coming to a conclusion; and fearing that our victories abroad would lead to a continuance of the war.

Under the new cabinet bills were passed for continuing the act for the suppression of rebellion, and for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act

* The Earl of Liverpool was made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster; Dudley Rider, treasury of the navy; Thomas Steele and Lord Glenbervie were joint paymasters of the forces; Lord Auckland and Lord Charles Spencer joint postmasters-general; and John H. Addington and Nicholas Vansittart secretaries of the treasury; Sir William Grant was master of the mints; Sir Edward Law (afterwards Lord Ellenborough) attorney-general, and the Hon. Spencer Perceval solicitor-general. For Ireland, the Earl of Hardwick was made lord-lieutenant; the Earl of Clare, who was strongly opposed to emancipation, lord chancellor; Lord Castlereagh remained chief secretary, and Isaac Corry became chancellor of the exchequer. But Castlereagh soon succeeded Viscount Lewisham as president of the board of control, and was succeeded in his Irish secretaryship by W. Wickham. A good many of these individuals had held office under the last administration, but nearly everybody felt that the retirement of Pitt, Dundas, Earl Spencer, Lord Grenville, and Windham, left little to be hoped from the inferior men of their party who remained.

It has been said that a good part of these arrangements was made before the king had perfectly recovered his sanity, and that he was made to attend to public business of the most important and most critical kind while his mind was still unstrung. Wilberforce, in entering the heads of a conversation he had at the time with Lord Eldon, says, "Eldon had just received the great seal, and I expressed my fears that they were bringing the king into public too soon after his late indisposition. 'You shall judge for yourself,' he answered, 'from what passed between us when I kissed hands on my appointment. The king had been conversing with me, and, when I was about to retire, he said, 'Give my remembrances to Lady Eldon.' I acknowledged his condescension, and intimated that I was ignorant of Lady Eldon's claim to such a notice. 'Yes! yes!' he answered, 'I know how much I owe to Lady Eldon; I know that you would have made yourself a country curate, and that she has made you my lord chancellor.'"—Diary, in Life.

in Ireland, which country still remained in an uneasy, turbulent state; and, a select committee of the House of Commons having reported rather alarmingly on the existence and proceedings of certain political societies in Great Britain (particularly one in London, entitled the United Britons), the suspension of the Habeas Corpus was continued also for England and Scotland, and an act for preventing seditious meetings was revived. Acts of indemnity were passed in favour of all persons concerned in the securing, imprisoning, and detaining individuals under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Great Britain since February, 1793, and in Ireland since March, 1799. Various motions relative to the state of the nation, to the miscarriage of expeditions, to the conduct of Admiral Lord Keith in breaking the convention of El Arish, &c., were made during the session, and were negatived by great majorities. Parliament was prorogued, not by the king in person, but by commission, on the 2nd of July.

As early as the 15th of April intelligence had been received in London of the astonishing success of our attack at Copenhagen, and of the death of the Emperor of Russia. Various circumstances had converted Paul from an ally into the bitterest enemy of Great Britain, but the weightiest of them all was the disappointment of his irrational expectation of obtaining possession of the island of Malta. Some few of the fugitive, despicable Knights of Malta had repaired to Petersburg to solicit Russian assistance, and to captivate the vain czar by offering to elect him grand-master of their order. It was even pretended that a legal election was made to this effect, although there were not nearly knights enough in Russia to form a chapter, and although by the fundamental rules of the order none but Catholics—none but members of the Roman church who had taken the vows of celibacy—could be admitted into it. Paul, the reader will remember, was the head of the antagonist Greek church. Bonaparte, who wanted to keep Malta for himself, as a convenient stepping-stone between France and Egypt, flattered Paul that his claim would be acknowledged throughout Europe, and that nothing but the cupidity of the English could prevent his obtaining quiet possession of the island. The First Consul had further gratified the vanity of the insane czar by affecting to submit to his mediation, and to spare the kings of Sardinia and Naples solely in consequence of Paul's generous intercessions. Just as the French garrison in La Valetta surrendered to the English, Paul announced in the Petersburg Gazette that several political reasons induced the belief that a rupture between Russia and England might ensue, and that therefore he had collected large bodies of troops on the coasts of the Baltic. Towards the end of October (1800) he published in the same newspaper a declaration, importing that on mounting his throne he found his states involved in war, provoked by a great nation (France) which had fallen into dissolution; that, conceiving the coalition a mere measure of preservation, he had been induced to join it; that he did not think it necessary then to adopt the system of an armed neutrality on sea for the protection of commerce, as he did not doubt that the sincerity of his allies and their reciprocal interests would be sufficient to secure the flag of the northern powers from insult; but that now, being disappointed by the perfidious enterprises of a great power (England), which had sought to enchain the liberty of the seas by capturing Danish convoys, the independence of the maritime powers of the North appeared to him to be openly menaced; and that therefore he considered it a measure of necessity to have recourse to an armed neutrality, the success of which was acknowledged in the time of the American war. Paul also pretended, apparently without the slightest ground, that the English ministers, who had negotiated with him, and had induced him to become a member of the coalition, had promised to restore the island of Malta to the Knights—who had shown that by themselves they could not keep it. On the 7th of November he stated in his Gazette, that he had learned that Malta had been surrendered to the English, but, as it was yet uncertain whether the agreement entered into on the 30th of December, 1798, would be fulfilled, according to which this island, after capture, was to be restored to the order, of which his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias was now grand-master, he, the emperor, being determined to defend his rights, was pleased to command an embargo to be laid on all English ships in the ports of the empire. This was followed in a few days by another declaration, published in the same Gazette, importing that, as two English ships in the harbour of Narva, on the arrival of a military force to put them under arrest, in consequence of the embargo, had made resistance, forced a Russian soldier into the water, and afterwards weighed anchor and sailed away, his imperial majesty was pleased to order that the remainder of the English vessels in that harbour should be burned: that, having received the circumstantial account of the English general's taking possession of La Valetta and the island of Malta in the name of the king of Great Britain, and hoisting the English flag alone, his imperial majesty, incensed at such a breach of good faith, was determined that the embargo should not be taken off till the conditions of the convention concluded in November, 1798, should be fulfilled. Above three hundred British vessels were seized, and the captains and crews of them were hauled on shore, put into irons, and sent into the interior of the country, not without threats of undergoing the horrors of the knout and of the Siberian exile. By another proclamation this madman ordered that all the English goods and effects whatsoever on shore should be sequestered and sold forthwith. A few of his creatures congratulated him on the glory of standing at the head of the great northern confederacy; but the nobility and landed proprietors, who were incensed by a hundred other freaks, and by the incessant operation of a capricious and horrible tyranny, saw nothing but the annihilation of the trade of Russia in this quarrel with England, and nothing in the continuance of such a system of government but destruction to themselves and total ruin to the empire.

Sweden and Denmark were unfortunately too ready to join Paul, and to work out the purposes of the French. The Danes, in particular, had persisted, ever since the beginning of the war, in carrying French goods and articles contraband of war, and had resisted or eluded the search wherever they were able so to do. In December, 1799, a Danish frigate, conveying some merchantmen, fired into an English man-of-war's boat that was sent to make the search. The Danish government disavowed and condemned the conduct of their officer. But in the summer of 1800 another and a more serious collision took place. The 'Freya' Danish frigate, with a convoy under her protection, was met in the Channel by four English frigates. An officer from the nearest of the English frigates went on board the 'Freya' and desired leave to search the merchantmen. The Danish captain replied that he could give no such permission without violating his instructions. After some altercation, the Dane persisting in his refusal, the English officer returned on board his own frigate, which presently was laid alongside the Danish frigate. The captain of the 'Freya' was again desired to permit the search, and his negative was replied to by a broadside. The Dane returned the fire, and several sailors were killed and wounded on each side. At last the Danish frigate surrendered to superior force, and was carried, together with her convoy, into the Downs. Lord Whitworth was immediately sent to the court of Denmark on a special mission; and, to give more weight to his arguments, his lordship was accompanied by ten ships of the line, three 50-gun ships, and several frigates, under the command of Vice-Admiral Dickson. On arriving at the Sound some Danish ships of the line were found moored across the narrowest part of it; but, after various manœuvres, the English fleet, without any hostile encounter, reached Copenhagen roads, and seemed to threaten the bombardment of that capital. In this presence the Danish government came to what was called an amicable adjustment. On the 29th of August Lord Whitworth and Count Bernstorff signed a convention, agreeing that the 'Freya' and convoy should be repaired at English expense, and then released; that the right of the British to search convoys should be discussed on a future day in London; but that in the meantime Danish vessels should only sail under convoy in the Mediterranean, for protection against the Algerines, and should be liable to search as heretofore. As soon as Paul proposed his armed neutrality, the Danes, who alone were likely to be formidable to us by sea, joined it enthusiastically, and commenced making immense preparations.

The confederacy of the three northern powers, under the influence of France, against England's naval supremacy, would soon have become formidable, if extraordinary efforts had not been made to crush it. With this view a fleet was dispatched from Yarmouth Roads, on the 12th of March, consisting of eighteen sail of the line, and a number of frigates and smaller vessels, under the command of Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, with Vice-Admiral Lord Nelson as his second. The Russian, Swedish, and Danish effective force in the Baltic was estimated at more than forty sail of the line; but deficiency in naval tactics (on the part of the Russians and Swedes), it was presumed, would neutralise this numerical superiority. As negotiation was preferred to war, the Hon. Mr. Vansittart was embarked with full powers to treat. He left the fleet in the Scaw, and proceeded in a frigate, with a flag of truce, to Copenhagen, but returned unsuccessful from his mission, which only served to stimulate the Danes, and give them time to augment their means of defence. Nelson disapproved of distant negotiation: he said, "The Dane should see our flag every moment he lifts up his head," and urged the necessity of instant decision; but the pilots magnified the dangers of the expedition, and more days were dissipated in inactivity. Admiral Parker sent a flag of truce, to inquire of the governor of Elsinour if he meant to oppose the passage of the fleet through the Sound. The governor replied that the guns of Cronenberg Castle would certainly be fired at them.* Sir Hyde was therefore persuaded to try the passage of the Belt. "Let it be by the Sound, by the Belt, or anyhow," said Nelson, "only lose not an hour." At last, on the morning of the 30th of March, the British fleet proceeded into the Sound, the van division commanded by Nelson, the centre by Sir Hyde, and the rear by Admiral Graves. The strait at Elsinour is less than three miles across, and in mid-channel vessels would be exposed to shot from the batteries on either side. But, although a fire was opened from about a hundred pieces of cannon and mortars from Cronenberg Castle, not a shot was fired from the Swedish shore. The fleet therefore passed in safety within a mile of that coast, and about mid-day anchored between the island of Huen and Copenhagen. The admirals, with some of the senior captains and commanding officers of artillery and troops, then proceeded to reconnoitre the enemy's defences, which, in vessels of various kinds, supported by extensive batteries, were of the most formidable description. At a council of war, Nelson offered to make the attack with ten sail of the line and the small craft. Sir Hyde gave him twelve line-of-battle ships, and left all to his judgment. The approach to Copenhagen was by a channel extremely intricate and little known; the Danes, having removed all the buoys, considered this channel impracticable for so large a fleet; but

Nelson himself saw soundings made, and new buoys laid down, nor ceased day or night until this arduous preliminary duty was fully effected. At first it was determined to attack from the eastward, but another examination of the Danish position, on the 31st, induced Nelson to commence operations from the southward. On the morning of the 1st of April the fleet anchored within two leagues of the town, off the north-western extremity of the Middle Ground, a shoal covering the whole sea-front of Copenhagen. In the channel that separates this shoal from the city the Danish block-ships, praams, &c. &c. were moored, flanked at the end nearest the town by the formidable Crown batteries. Nelson, with Captain Riou of the 'Amazon,' again examined the enemy's position, and soon after his signal to weigh was answered by a cheer throughout the whole division. Riou led the way; and the whole division anchored at the farther extremity of the shoal as the day closed, the headmost of the enemy's line being about two miles distant. As his own anchor dropped, Nelson called out, "I will fight them the moment I have a fair wind." The night was passed in completing the necessary orders and arrangements. The morn of the 2nd of April dawned, with a favourable south-easterly wind. Nelson signalled for all captains. Riou had two frigates, two sloops, and two fire-ships given him, to act as circumstances might require: every other ship had its station appointed. The land forces and 500 seamen, under Captain Freemantle and the Hon. Colonel Stewart, were to storm the Crown battery as soon as its fire should be silenced. At about nine o'clock the pilots were called on board the 'Elephant,' Nelson's flag-ship, but their indecision as to the bearings of the shoal and the exact line of deep water shewed the danger of trusting to their guidance. At length Mr. Alexander Bryerly, master of the 'Bellona,' undertook to lead the fleet, and went on board the 'Edgar,' for that purpose. The other ships began to weigh in succession. Simultaneously Admiral Parker's eight ships did the same, and took up a position nearer to the mouth of the harbour, but too distant to do more than menace the north wing of defences. A nearer approach was impracticable; at least in sufficient time to be useful in the engagement. The 'Agamemnon' got immovably aground, as did the 'Bellona' and the 'Russell.' Their absence from their intended stations was seriously felt. At about ten o'clock the cannonade commenced. For nearly half an hour only five ships were engaged; at about half-past eleven the action became general. Owing to the currents, only one of the gun-brigs could get into action, and only two of the bombs could reach their station in the Middle Ground, and open their mortars on the arsenal. At the end of three hours, few if any of the Danish force had ceased firing, and the contest had taken no decisive turn. All the floating batteries and gun-boats must be destroyed or silenced, before Nelson could get at the ships of the line and the great land-batteries of the

* An aide-de-camp of the Crown Prince came on board the English fleet. Having something to write down, and finding the pen offered to him a bad one, he threw it away, saying, "Admiral, if your cannons are not better pointed than your pens, we have not much to fear from you."—Nelson's Letters to Lady Hamilton.

Danes. At this time, seeing signals of distress at the mast-heads of three English line-of-battle ships, and the slow progress of three that he had dispatched as a reinforcement, the commander-in-chief threw out the signal to discontinue the engagement: this was communicated to Nelson, but he continued to walk the deck, and appeared to take no notice of it. Soon after, he inquired if his signal for close action was still hoisted, and, when answered in the affirmative, said, "Mind you keep it so." The other ships of the line, looking only to Nelson, continued the action. But Riou's little squadron (which had gallantly taken the place destined for the three disabled line-of-battle ships) was saved by the signal. Being nearer to the commander-in-chief, Riou obeyed it, exclaiming, as he unwillingly drew off, "What will Nelson think of us?" He had been wounded in the head, and was sitting on a gun encouraging his men, when, just as the 'Amazon' showed her stern to the battery, his clerk was killed by his side. Another shot swept away several marines, and a third raking shot cut him in two. Nelson and the whole fleet bitterly deplored the loss of "the gallant good Riou." At about half-past one the fire of the Danes slackened, and before two it had nearly ceased; but the vessels whose flags had been struck fired on the boats as they approached to take possession of them, and Nelson at one time thought of sending in the fire-ships to burn the surrendered vessels. The shot from the Trekroner, and from the batteries at Amak island, struck the surrendered ships, and the fire of the English, in return, was even more destructive to these poor devoted Danes. It was then that Nelson wrote thus to the Crown Prince:—"Vice-Admiral Lord Nelson has been commanded to spare Denmark when she no longer resists. The line of defence which covered her shores has struck to the British flag: but, if the firing is continued on the part of Denmark, he must set on fire all the prizes that he has taken, without having the power of saving the men who have so nobly defended them. The brave Danes are the brothers, and should never be the enemies, of the English." A wafer was given him, but he ordered a candle to be brought, and sealed the letter with wax. "This," said he, "is no time to appear hurried or informal." Captain Sir Frederick Thesiger carried this letter with a flag of truce. The Trekroner battery, from the inadequate force of Riou's little squadron, had suffered scarcely any injury; towards the close of the action it had been manned with nearly 1500 men, and the intention of storming it was abandoned. It was also deemed not advisable to advance against the yet uninjured part of the Danish line, but, while the wind continued fair, to remove the fleet out of the intricate channel from which it had to retreat. In about half an hour after Thesiger's departure, the Danish adjutant-general, Lindholm, came, bearing a flag of truce, when the Trekroner ceased firing, and the action closed. He brought an inquiry from the prince:—What was the object of Nelson's note?

The reply was, "Lord Nelson's object in sending the flag of truce was humanity: he therefore consents that hostilities shall cease, and that the wounded Danes may be taken on shore. And Lord Nelson will take his prisoners out of the vessels, and burn or carry off his prizes as he shall think fit. Lord Nelson, with humble duty to his royal highness the prince, will consider this the greatest victory he has ever gained, if it may be the cause of a happy reconciliation and union between his own most gracious sovereign and his majesty the King of Denmark." Sir Frederick Thesiger was a second time dispatched, and the Danish adjutant-general was referred to the commander-in-chief for a conference upon this overture. Nelson availed himself of the moments thus gained to get his crippled ships under weigh, and the imminent danger from which he had extricated them soon became apparent:—his own ship, the 'Elephant,' and three others remained fixed upon the shoal for many hours. Nelson left the 'Elephant' soon after she took the ground. "Well," said he, "I have fought contrary to orders, and I shall perhaps be hanged. Never mind; let them!" It was soon agreed that a suspension of hostilities should take place for twenty-four hours, that all the prizes should be surrendered, and the wounded Danes carried on shore. Nelson went on shore to confer with the Crown Prince, to whom he says he told more truths than he probably had ever heard in his life—perhaps more truths than any sovereign prince had ever heard. The prince asked him why the British fleet had forced its way up the Baltic. He replied: "To crush and annihilate a confederacy formed against the dearest interests of England." Pointing out Bernsdorf, the prince's minister, who was present, and who was believed to be wholly devoted to France, he said he was the author of the confederacy, and answerable for all the blood which had been spilt. In consequence of his bravery and his humanity Nelson, on his landing, was received with huzzas and shouts of triumph, and was escorted to the palace amidst the acclamations of the admiring multitude. The negotiation continued for five days,* and on the 9th Nelson concluded an armistice for fourteen weeks, the Danes engaging to suspend all proceedings under the treaty of armed neutrality, which they had entered into with Russia and

* A difficulty arose respecting the duration of the armistice. The Danes fairly stated their fears of Russia; and Nelson frankly told them his reason for demanding a long term was, that he might have time to go and destroy the Russian fleet, and then return to Copenhagen. Neither party would yield upon this point; and one of the Danes hinted at the immediate renewal of hostilities. "Renew hostilities!" cried Nelson to one of his friends; "tell him we are ready at a moment!—ready to bombard this very night!" The conference, however, proceeded amicably on both sides; and, as the commissioners could not agree upon this head, they broke up, leaving Nelson to settle it with the prince. A levee was held forthwith in one of the state-rooms,—a scene well suited for such a consultation; for all these rooms had been stripped of their furniture, in fear of a bombardment. To a bombardment also Nelson was looking at this time: fatigue and anxiety, and vexation at the dilatory measures of the commander-in-chief, combined to make him irritable: and, as he was on the way to the prince's dining-room, he whispered to the officer on whose arm he was leaning, "Though I have only one eye, I can see all this will turn well." After dinner he was closeted with the prince; and they agreed that the armistice should continue fourteen weeks.—Southey.

Sweden; that their prisoners sent on shore should be accounted for in case of a renewal of hostilities; that the British fleet should have permission to provide itself at Copenhagen or along the coast, with whatever it might require for the health and comfort of the seamen; and that fourteen days' notice should precede any recommencement of hostilities. In this interval the prizes were disposed of. Six line-of-battle ships and eight praams had been taken, but only one ship, the 'Holstein,' 64, was sent home, all the others being burned, and sunk in such shoal water, that the Danes soon after recovered their brass battering-cannon. As early as the morning of the 3rd all the grounded English ships, except the 'Désirée,' were got afloat. Nelson repeatedly declared that no men could have behaved with more bravery and steadiness than the Danes; that the battle of Copenhagen was the most dreadful affair he had ever witnessed, that this was the most difficult achievement, the hardest-fought battle, the most glorious result that had ever graced the annals of our country. The loss was terrible, the British counting in killed and mortally wounded about 350, and in recoverably and slightly wounded 850; while the Danes, at the lowest estimate, lost 1700 or 1800 in killed and wounded, the number of their prisoners taken and restored, but to be accounted for, exceeding 4000.* Nelson, who was raised to a viscountcy for this exploit, lamented the slowness, over-caution, and indecision of his superior officer (Sir Hyde Parker) both during and after the action; and, with no empty boast, he wrote to Earl St. Vincent, that, if he had been left to himself, he would have settled all this business in the Baltic much sooner, and far more effectually than was done. Three days after the signing of the armistice, Parker sailed from Copenhagen roads with the main body of the fleet, leaving Nelson in the 'St. George' with a few other ships, to follow as soon as their spars and rigging were repaired. The fleet directed its course along the channel called 'The Grounds,' between the islands of Amak and Saltholm. In this tedious and dangerous navigation most of the men-of-war were obliged to tranship their guns into merchant vessels: and, even thus lightened, several of the largest ships grounded in that shallow water. In all these operations the difficulties of the navigation were extreme, and the skill and perseverance which our sailors brought to overcome them were at least as honourable as the gallantry they had displayed in action.† It was expected that the most dreadful disasters would attend their present daring experiment: but at length all the ships extricated themselves from the passage; and, to the astonishment of Danes, Swedes, Russians, and Prussians, entered the Baltic by this route. Their first object was to attack the Russian fleet, which was lying frozen up at Revel, waiting for a thaw, in order to get to sea and join the Swedes. But on his way Sir Hyde Parker received intelligence that a Swedish squadron was at sea, and, altering his course, he went in pursuit of it. The Swedes, who had only six to oppose to sixteen British ships of the line, sought refuge behind the strong forts of Carlsrona. Sir Hyde sent in a flag of truce, stating that Denmark had concluded an armistice, and requiring an explicit declaration from Sweden, whether she would adhere to or abandon the hostile measures which had been taken against the rights and interests of Great Britain? The Swedish admiral replied that he could not answer this question, but that his sovereign would soon be at Carlsrona. Gustavus, who had been dragged into the confederacy against his will, arrived; and on the 22nd of April he informed Sir Hyde that he would not refuse to listen to equitable proposals, made by deputies furnished with proper authority by the King of Great Britain to the united northern powers. Sir Hyde then sailed for the Gulf of Finland, but was soon overtaken by a dispatch-boat from the Russian ambassador at Copenhagen, bringing intelligence that the Emperor Paul was dead, and that his son and successor, Alexander, had accepted the offer made by England to his father, of terminating the dispute by a convention. Paul had perished on the 24th of March, nine days before the battle of Copenhagen; but his death had been concealed for some time at Petersburg, and was tardily communicated to the neighbouring countries: he was reported to have died of apoplexy; but the real circumstances of his death were these:—A conspiracy was formed among some of the courtiers, ministers, and officers nearest to the person of the mad emperor, some of whom had discovered that he contemplated sending them to join the innumerable exiles he had already sent into Siberia, and all of whom were disgusted with his savage, capricious, and imbecile tyranny. These individuals went in a body, by night, to his sleeping apartment, found him naked and standing trembling behind a screen, and stated to him the acts of injustice and cruelty of which he had been guilty, the ruin he was bringing upon the country, the universal discontent of his subjects, concluding by recommending him to abdicate quietly in favour of his eldest son Alexander, and presenting him an act of abdication to sign, on the score of mental weakness. Paul refused, saying he was emperor and would remain emperor. A violent dispute, and then a scuffle ensued, in which the wretched lonely man, who had not near him one arm to defend him, or one voice to plead for mercy, was knocked down, trampled upon, and strangled. His body was then laid in the bed he had quitted, just as the conspirators were bursting into the room ; and on the following morning a physician was called in to certify that he had died of apoplexy.

† Nelson, even in speaking of the actual battle, places the dangers of the navigation foremost. He says, "This was a day when the greatest dangers of navigation were overcome."

Nearly every part of this Baltic expedition was attended by dangers of navigation, and by daring and successful experiments. In the month of July, when both Sir Hyde Parker and Nelson had left the fleet, Sir Charles Maurice Pole, who had succeeded to the command, performed another novel exploit:—The fleet being ordered home, Sir Charles carried it, with all its ships of the line, two of which were three-deckers, safely through the intricate channel of the Little Belt, and that too against a contrary wind, thus increasing the high reputation the British navy had gained in these inland seas.—James, Naval Hist.

Sir Hyde Parker, who felt assured that the death of Paul had dissolved the Baltic coalition, and that the young emperor Alexander would pursue a system of policy the very opposite to that of his father, thought it no longer necessary to go to Revel to look after the Russian fleet ; but Nelson, who had joined him off Carlsrona, was of opinion that they ought to take advantage of the wind that was blowing fair for Revel ; that negotiations with Russia would be best conducted with a fleet near at hand to back them ; that nothing ought to be left to the uncertain events of time, and the very possible chances of insincerity on the part of the new Russian government ; and it was with mortification that Nelson saw his commander-in-chief returning to Kiøge Bay, on the coast of Zealand, there to wait patiently for what might happen. As reinforcements had arrived from England, the fleet counted eighteen good sail of the line, a force which Nelson held to be sufficient to sweep the Baltic clean of all enemies' ships. On the 5th of May dispatches arrived from London, recalling Sir Hyde, and appointing Nelson commander-in-chief. Nelson's first signal as chief was to hoist in all boats and prepare to weigh ; and on the 7th the fleet sailed from Kiøge. Nelson called at Carlsrona, where he demanded and obtained an assurance from the Swedes that the British trade should not be molested by them : he told the Swedish admiral that he hoped nothing would disturb the returning harmony, but that he was not directed to abstain from hostilities should he meet with a Swedish fleet at sea. Leaving a part of his fleet to watch these Swedes, he sailed away with ten ships of the line, two frigates, a brig, and a schooner, for the Gulf of Finland, vowing that he would have all the English shipping, subjects, and property restored, and that he would not suffer Russia to mix up the affairs of Denmark or Sweden with Paul's irregular embargo and the seizure of our ships. The wind was fair, and in four days Nelson was in Revel Roads. But the bay had been clear of firm ice on the 29th of April, while Sir Hyde Parker was lying idle at Kiøge. The Russians had cut through the ice in the mole six feet thick, and had sailed on the 3rd of May for Cronstadt, where they were protected by land batteries and other works of the most formidable description. Nelson said that if he had but found them at Revel, and if the necessity of treating them hostilely had continued, nothing could have prevented his destroying them in toto in a couple of hours. He now opened some friendly communications with the shore, and wrote to the Emperor Alexander, urging the immediate release of British subjects and restoration of British property, and proposing to wait on his imperial majesty personally, in order to congratulate him on his accession. An answer from Petersburg arrived on the 16th of May : Alexander's ministers, though professing the most friendly disposition towards Great Britain, declined Nelson's visit unless he came in a single ship, made use of expressions which implied distrust and suspicion, and said nothing about the late embargo. "These Russians," said Nelson, "would not have written thus if their fleet had been at Revel!" He wrote immediately to tell the court of Petersburg "that the word of a British admiral was as sacred as that of any sovereign in Europe ;" and "that under other circumstances it would have been his anxious wish to have paid his respects to the emperor, and to have signed with his own hand the act of amity between the two countries." And then he quitted Revel, where it was pretended that his presence created alarm, and stood out to sea, leaving only a brig behind to bring off some provisions, and to settle some accounts on shore. "I hope," said he, writing to the British ambassador at Berlin, "that all is right : but seamen are but bad negotiators ; for we put to issue in five minutes what diplomatic forms would be five months doing." On his way down the Baltic he met the Russian admiral Tchitchagoff, who was dispatched by Alexander to enter into friendly explanations. Nelson then anchored off Rostock, where at the beginning of June he received dispatches from the Russian court, expressing their regret that there should ever have been any misunderstanding between them ; informing him that the British subjects and vessels which Paul had detained were ordered to be liberated ; and inviting him to Petersburg in whatever mode might be most agreeable to himself. But Nelson, whose services had chiefly been in warm, sunny climates, and whose shattered, enfeebled constitution could ill bear the cold and the fogs of the North, was now only anxious to return home, feeling that if he stayed there he must die : on the 6th of June he returned to Kiøge Bay ; on the 13th he received the sanction of the Admiralty to an application he had made to return to England ; and on the 19th he quitted the Baltic in the 'Kite' brig, declining, in his unwillingness to weaken the British force, to accept of a frigate—a very unusual sacrifice of comfort on the part of an admiral and commander-in-chief, and the more to be remarked, as Nelson, who is said never to have gone to sea without suffering sickness for the first day or two, though in a line-of-battle ship, was known to suffer excessively from sea-sickness in a small vessel.*

In the meanwhile Lord St. Helens had proceeded from London to Petersburg ; and on the 17th of June, just two days before Nelson betook himself to his comfortless berth on board the little brig, a convention was signed by his lordship and the Russian ministers, in which all disputes were adjusted. Sweden and Denmark acceded to the same terms, which included a more explicit definition of the right of search, and of the law and principles of blockade, together with a limitation of articles considered as contraband of war to those of real military and naval stores, ammunition, &c. The Danish troops, who had occupied Hamburgh, eva-uated that great trading city; the navigation of the Elbe, and of the other German rivers which had been closed, was re-opened to our flag; and Frederick William III. of Prussia, who had succeeded his father, Frederick William II., in November, 1797, who continued in vassalage or subservience to the French, and who had seized not only the independent trading city of Bremen, but also the whole of the electorate of Hanover, the hereditary dominion of George III., where he had levied contributions, and acted as a conqueror and sovereign, engaged to give up both these acquisitions, and to withdraw his troops within his old frontiers after certain amicable arrangements should be completed. Except on the part of Denmark, there seemed no reason to doubt the sincerity and willingness with which these northern powers abandoned French interests. Besides breaking the confederacy of the Baltic, the battle of Copenhagen and the death of Paul gave the death-blow to sundry French schemes, and induced Bonaparte really to wish for some short peace or truce. He had hoped, by some sudden (though certainly not very practicable) junction of the fleets of Denmark, Sweden, and Russia, with the navies of France and Spain, to obtain the mastery of the British Channel and the narrow seas, and to be enabled by these means to throw an invading army of 100,000 men on our coast. He had also secretly concerted with the madman Paul the plan of a wondrous expedition to India, which he found was not to be conquered or disturbed from the side of Egypt: 30,000 choice French troops were to have marched into Poland, there to join 30,000 select Russian infantry, and 40,000 Cossacks and other irregular cavalry; and from the heart of Poland this allied army was to have proceeded to the shores of the Caspian Sea, either to embark and cross that sea, or to march by the way of Persia, whose consent had been solicited both by the Czar and the First Consul. But these splendid visions—and they were but visions at the best—were now dissolved into the thinnest air.

The fate of the French army in Egypt was sealed about a fortnight before the battle of Copenhagen. In the year 1800 General Kleber, after losing the fortress of El Arish, and retreating before a Turkish army commanded by the grand vizier, and essentially aided by an English squadron under Sir Sidney Smith, found himself under the necessity of agreeing to evacuate Egypt. On the 24th of January, 1800, a treaty was concluded at El Arish between the Turks and the French, and confirmed by Sir Sidney Smith, who had received no instructions to that effect either from his commander-in-chief or from the government at home. By the conditions of this treaty the French army was to be allowed to return to Europe unmolested. Pitt's ministry, naturally averse to permit the arrival of such reinforcements to Bonaparte, then contending or about to contend with the Austrians in Italy and with the imperialists in Germany, sent out orders to Lord Keith not to ratify any such convention as that of El Arish. The commander-in-chief of our Mediterranean fleet accordingly acquainted Kleber by letter that he could not permit any of his troops to depart for France before they had been exchanged in Europe as prisoners of war; that he must lay down his arms, give up the plunder which had been made in Egypt, and the French transports and stores in the port of Alexandria, before any capitulation could be agreed to. Hostilities recommenced immediately, and on the 20th of March Kleber routed the undisciplined, disorderly army of the grand vizier. But at this critical moment the Moslems of Cairo rose in insurrection, murdered many of the French that were in that city, and drove the rest of them into the citadel. Instead of following the flying vizier, Kleber was obliged to return to Cairo. After some sanguinary conflicts, and many atrocities committed on both sides, the insurgents were obliged to capitulate. Kleber was engaged in the very hopeless task of restoring order and tranquillity, when, on the 13th of June, he was stabbed by an Arab. He was succeeded by General Menou, whose indecision or pusillanimity had left so good an opening to Bonaparte at the crisis of the 13th Vendemiaire,* who had pretended to turn Mussulman, taking the turban and the name of Abdallah, assiduously frequenting the mosques, and marrying an Egyptian wife; and who appears really to have been one of the most contemptible of these French republican generals, who, generally speaking, were raised far above contempt by martial bravery and ability. The French were, however, enabled to maintain themselves in Egypt until the arrival of the British army under Sir Ralph Abercromby; and in the interval four French ships of war and some fast-sailing transports escaped our cruisers, ran into the mouth of the Nile, and landed important succours of troops and ammunition. By the 1st of January, 1801, the fleet under Admiral Lord Keith, which carried this small but excellent army, had all come safely to anchor in the Bay of Marmorice, on the coast of Karamania, one of the finest harbours in the world. Here the troops were kept waiting for some time for horses which had been promised from Constantinople to mount the cavalry, and for other necessities, some of which arrived very slowly, and some not at all. But the time was not entirely wasted; the whole army was frequently exercised in the manœuvre of landing, which they were shortly to practise in presence of the enemy; and these manœuvres and experiments were repeated until it was nicely ascertained that 6000 men might be landed in the most perfect order, and ready for immediate action, in the short space of twenty-three minutes.†

The capital defect of English armies had hitherto been the almost total want of a proper staff of officers, educated and trained in the scientific parts of their profession, in planning and mapping, in catching at a glance, or on a rapid survey, the military capabilities of a country for offensive or for defensive operations, in judging of the relative value of positions, of the best lines whereby to advance or retreat, and of taking the field advantageously, compactly, and scientifically. Through the want of such a staff, and through the obstinacy and blindness of ignorance, the armies led by the Duke of York in the Netherlands and in Holland had taken the field hap-hazard, or like geese scattered over a common, rarely or never knowing anything of the country that was before them or behind them, or on their flanks; and time after time nothing but the doggedness of the British soldiery, who would never know when they were beaten, had saved the army from an ignominious surrender. But now this capital defect was beginning to be supplied by young officers who had been duly educated in the military school or college established at Marlow, under the superintendence of General Jarry, a veteran, who had devoted his whole life to this sort of science, and who had had ample practice and experience in the wars of Frederick the Great. It was in this Egyptian campaign that the French generals were first astonished and alarmed at the skill and excellence of the British staff.* During the stay of the army in Marmorice Bay it was joined by two more regiments of dismounted cavalry; and a sloop of war arrived in the harbour, which had a few days before captured a French brig, having on board a general officer and 5000 stand of arms for the use of the French army in Egypt. The horses for the cavalry at last arrived; but they were such sorry beasts, that the English dragoons were ashamed to mount them or take charge of them, and every commanding cavalry officer solicited rather to serve with his corps as infantry.† About two hundred of these half-starved, diminutive, galled steeds were, however, kept for the cavalry, and about fifty for the artillery, the remainder being shot or sold for a dollar a-head. Miserable indeed would have been the state of our cavalry had it not been amended by the purchase of some horses in the neighbourhood of Marmorice; but this supply was small, for the measure was not pressed vigorously till too late: if the purchase had been previously made, it would have rendered the dragoons an effective force, and have saved an enor-

* See General Foy's History of the Peninsular War, in which the able French officer acknowledges this fact, and the admirable qualities of the staffs employed by Wellington and his generals in Spain and Portugal. The best of our staff-officers who served in the Peninsular war had been trained at Marlow under old Jarry. [We learn from a register in the war-office that old Jarry was not commissioned "commandant of the royal military college of the senior department" until the 25th of June, 1801; but he had given instructions some time before receiving his commission—such practical instructions as no other man in England at that time could have given.] We believe we only repeat good professional opinions in saying that there has been no regularly progressive improvement in these branches of military education; that the military college of Sandhurst, the successor or continuator of the military college of Marlow, has dwindled into a mere school of mathematics, where little or nothing that is practical is practically taught, and where old Jarry's field lessons are never repeated, and scarcely known except by tradition. The government of this country cannot too soon direct its attention to this important subject.

† It is said that Lord Elgin, our ambassador at Constantinople, had purchased 400 or 500 very good horses, but that these had been changed on the road through the knavery of the people employed in conducting them through Asia Minor.

mous expense. Some gun-boats which had been fitted out at Rhodes now joined the fleet, being intended for covering the landing in Egypt, further to facilitate which operation a number of small vessels, decked, but of easy draught of water, were hired. General Moore, who had been sent to examine the grand vizier's army, stationed at Jaffa, returned with the melancholy intelligence that it was weak as to numbers, without discipline, and infected with the plague, so that its co-operation offered no apparent advantage. At the same time it was ascertained that the French force in Egypt was far greater than had been supposed: it had been calculated that, through disease, battle, assassination, wounds, and other casualties, the army under Menou had been reduced to 13,000 or 14,000 men, whereas it was now found that, through reinforcements they had received, and some hundreds of auxiliaries they had raised, the French were more than 30,000 strong, having with them above 1000 pieces of cannon, exclusive of upwards of 500 unserviceable pieces, in boats, shipping, &c. When Abercromby had received all his reinforcements, he could not muster more than 15,330 men, including 996 sick, 500 Maltese, and all kinds and descriptions of people attached to an army except officers:—the effective force, therefore, could not be, at the highest computation, above 12,000. Nothing was seen or heard of the Turkish Capitan Pasha, whose co-operation with a fleet and land troops had been promised: the Capitan Bey arrived, but he brought with him only two corvettes, his line-of-battle ship having been dismasted by lightning. It was resolved, however, to wait no longer. The weather had been very stormy for some time, and all the country pilots declared that, till after the equinox, it would be madness to attempt a landing on the Egyptian coast. But to their astonishment the fleet, on the 23rd of February, weighed anchor, and set sail in a gale of wind. The number of vessels was so great, being 175 sail of all descriptions, that it took them a whole day to clear out of Marmorice Bay and assemble in the roads. According to an eye-witness, a nobler sight could not be beheld. On the 2nd of March the whole fleet anchored in Aboukir Bay; the men-of-war, riding exactly where the battle of the Nile was fought, for one of our ships of the line chafed her cables against the wreck of 'L'Orient,' whose anchor she afterwards fished up. From the 2nd to the 7th of March the state of the weather prevented any operations in boats; but, on the afternoon of the 7th, the weather moderating, Sir Ralph Abercromby and Sir Sidney Smith, whose services were invaluable, went in boats to reconnoitre the coast, and fix upon the best place for landing the troops. On the following morning some gun-vessels and armed launches were sent forward to clear the beach, 5500 soldiers were put into the boats, and at a given signal a simultaneous dash was made for the shore. Though rapidly, the boats advanced in perfect order, the soldiers sitting between the seats close together, with unloaded arms. When the boats came within range, fifteen pieces of ordnance from the opposite hill, and the artillery of Aboukir Castle, opened upon them with round and grape shot; and, on advancing still nearer, musket-balls were showered upon them. The British soldiers huzzaed occasionally, but never attempted to return a shot. Numbers of the soldiers were killed and wounded; some boats were sunk, some turned aside to save the drowning men, but the mass of them rowed steadily forward, until they touched the strand, when the soldiers with wonderful rapidity got all on shore, and General Moore, drawing them up in line, gave the welcome word to load. Some of the English guards were roughly handled by a division of French cavalry before they could form; some loss was sustained in ascending the sand-hills which rose above the beach; but in less than half an hour those heights were carried, and the French fled, leaving all their field-pieces behind them.* Advancing against the French, who took post on the ridge of heights between Aboukir and Alexandria, Sir Ralph Abercromby, with sailors dragging the artillery through a deep and burning sand, came to an indecisive action on the 13th of March, and had a horse killed under him. On the

* "Some of our troops formed and loaded as they quitted the boats, while others pushed on without having time to load; and, notwithstanding the rapid fire of musketry which assailed them, and the violent charge of the enemy, the latter were forced to give way. Not more than 2000 of our men were on shore when the French retreated; but every step was contested and carried. There was scarcely any interval between the landing of the troops and their pushing up the hills, under difficulties and amidst dangers that baffle the powers of description. Some marched up in an excellent line with charged bayonets, while others proceeded on their hands and knees. But, however they ascended, or whatever dangers they encountered, they gained their object."—Journal of the Forces which sailed from the Downs in April, 1800, &c.; with the subsequent Transactions of the Army under the command of General Sir Ralph Abercromby, in the Mediterranean and Egypt, &c.; by Aeneas Anderson, Lieut. 40th Regt.

19th Fort Aboukir capitulated; and on the 20th, General Menou having arrived from Cairo, the whole of the French disposable force was concentrated at Alexandria. The British forces now occupied excellent positions near the ground where they had fought on the 13th. About three o'clock in the morning of the 21st, when all was quiet, the report of a musket was heard at the extremity of the British left: this was followed by the report of a cannon; scattered musketry succeeded, and then the roar of two more guns was heard. Early as it was, our men were all under arms; but it was still dark, and, although some streaks of grey were perceptible in the eastern horizon, the morning seemed slow to break. While all eyes and ears were turned towards the left, whence the sound of the firing proceeded, of a sudden loud shouts were heard in front of our right—shouts that were presently succeeded by a crash of musketry. Menou had hoped to take the British by surprise, and had ordered a general attack: the surprise failed, but the attack soon became general enough, and the fighting more terrible than any the French had hitherto met with. For awhile the darkness was made greater by the smoke of the guns and small-arms, and one of the greatest difficulties of our troops was to discern friends from foes. But anon the tardy dawn brightened into day, and then the fighting went on with increased vivacity.* At first the well-mounted French cavalry made great impression, turning our right wing and getting into the rear of our infantry; but the 42nd Highlanders and the 28th regiment, aided by the flank companies of the 40th, and fighting at the same time to the front, flanks, and rear, not only kept their ground, but fired such volleys that the field was presently covered with men and horses, while other horses were galloping without their riders: in short, the French cavalry was destroyed. In several parts of the field the French and English, who had exhausted their ammunition, were seen pelting one another with stones. Wherever the British bayonet was used, its success was complete and terrible. In addition to a doubt, the English had possession of the ruins of an ancient Roman palace, surrounded by a low stone wall, like a Turkish cemetery. Menou had promised a louis d'or to every French soldier who should penetrate into that quadrangle. After several desperate attempts, the French, attacking on three sides at once, got within the walls. Here they were received by the 58th and 23rd, and followed by a part of the 42nd, who blocked up every exit and completely cut off their retreat. When they had expended all their ammunition, our people had recourse to stones and the butt-ends of their muskets. Then they transfixed the French with their bayonets against the walls of the old building, and covered the whole area with the blood and bodies of their enemies. Seven hundred Frenchmen were shot or bayoneted among those ruins—scarcely a man of them that had entered escaped. While this tremendous conflict, which decided the fate of the day, was at its height, Sir Ralph Abercromby, riding towards the ruins, was nearly surrounded by a party of French horse. A French officer made a savage thrust at the old general; but Sir Ralph, receiving the sabre under his left arm, wrested the weapon from his antagonist. A French hussar then rode up to aim a surer blow; but a Highland soldier, perceiving his intention, and being without ball, put his ramrod into his musket and with it shot the hussar. Unfortunately the brave old general, who had always been accused of exposing his person too much, and whose shortness of sight had often led him into danger, received a sabre-wound in the breast in this melee with the French hussars; and, a short time after, he received a musket-shot in the thigh. Between nine and ten o'clock A.M. the battle ceased. It was not until he saw the French flying that Sir Ralph could be prevailed upon to quit the field. He had continued walking about, paying no attention to his wounds; officers who went to him in the course of the action had returned without knowing from his manner and appearance that he had been wounded at all, and even now many ascertained it only by seeing the blood trickling down his clothes: but at last, when exertion was no longer necessary, his spirit yielded to the weakness of the body: he became faint, was put into a hammock, and was carried off the field in the midst of the blessings and tears of the soldiery, who loved him as a father. The cut or contusion in the chest was trifling; but the shot wound was dangerous from the first, and proved mortal: he was carried almost immediately to Lord Keith's flag-ship, where he expired on the evening of the 28th.* General Moore was badly wounded early in the action, as was also Brigadier-General Oakes; but both, like their veteran commander-in-chief, remained on the field till the action was over. Sir Sidney Smith, who was serving on shore, and who was always in the hottest fire, and Brigadier-General Hope, were also wounded. On the other side, General Roize, who commanded the French cavalry, was killed on the field, with nearly all the men and horses he led into action; and Generals Lanusse and Rodet died of their wounds. The total number of British killed and wounded is stated at about 1400, and that of the French at more than double that number. The field was covered with the wounded and the dead: on it were found above 1700 French, 1040 of whom were buried by the English in the course of two days in the ground on which they had fought and fallen. "I never," says General Moore, "saw a field so strewed with dead!" A corps which, like nearly all the regiments now under Menou, had formed a part of the conquering army of Italy, and which in its pride had taken the name of "The Invincible," was almost annihilated. A standard was taken inscribed with victories and exploits in Italy.† Menou, as well as all his army, had gone into action quite confident of success: their numbers were from 12,000 to 14,000. Our effective force on the ground did not exceed 10,000; and during nearly all the conflict about half of that number had to sustain the concentrated attack of the French, the left wing, which had been the first threatened with attack, and which continued to be observed by General Regnier with 800 French, scarcely coming into action at all until Menou was already in full retreat. The French prisoners confessed that the battles in Italy were nothing compared to those they had fought since the landing of the British in Egypt: some of them said they had never fought till now.‡

The consequences of the three victories we had obtained were of the utmost importance; the Arabs, who had witnessed fighting such as their

* "Sir Ralph was a truly upright, honourable, and judicious man; his great sagacity, which had been pointed all his life to military matters, made him an excellent officer. The disadvantage he laboured under was being extremely short-sighted. He therefore stood in need of good executive generals under him. It was impossible, knowing him as I did, not to have the greatest respect and friendship for him. . . . Our forces had been reduced by the actions of the 8th and 13th: many men were taken away for the care of the wounded; and three regiments had been left in the rear to prosecute the siege of Fort Aboukir.

Even according to Regnier's boastful account of the battle, the French had 9700 men, including 1500 cavalry, together with 46 pieces of artillery. The British had only some 300 cavalry, and those miserably mounted. We had only two 24-pounders, and 34 field-pieces, and these were spread along the whole line.

fathers had handed down to them no tradition of, flocked into the British camp with abundance of provisions; the remnant of the splendid Mameluke cavalry soon began to re-appear in Upper Egypt; and even the quiet, spiritless Fellahs thought of resenting the wrongs and insults they had sustained from the French soldiery. The French at Aboukir soon surrendered: in a few days the Capitan Pasha's fleet anchored there, and landed 5000 or 6000 Turks; and the grand-vizier, who had been dozing at El Arish, began to rouse himself. General (afterwards Lord) Hutchinson succeeded to the command of the British army, which was reinforced in the month of April by 3000 men. Rosetta and Fort Julien were taken from the French about the middle of April. Alexandria, into which Menou had retired, was almost insulated from the rest of Egypt by General Hutchinson, by cutting through the embankments which served to retain the waters of the Aboukir lake, and by inundating the dry bed of the ancient Lake Mafetotis: a British flotilla ascended the Nile, capturing the convoys of provisions destined for the French, and carrying several works which had been erected on the banks of that river. The grand-vizier was crossing the desert, and the troops from India were expected to be soon at Suez. Leaving General Coote to maintain the lines before Alexandria with 6500 men, General Hutchinson proceeded to Ramanieh, where the French had collected 4000 men, who had dug intrenchments and raised batteries. Having driven the enemy from this important post, Hutchinson proceeded still farther up the Nile towards Cairo, which the grand-vizier was approaching in an opposite direction. Before he could effect a juncture with the vizier's army, the French sallied out of Cairo and attacked it; but so spiritless had they become in their adversity, that 5000 disciplined republicans, with twenty-four pieces of artillery, allowed themselves to be repulsed by a most irregular Turkish army. Now 1200 Mamelukes, finely equipped, joined the vizier, and Turks, Arabs, Syrians, and Copts, all offered their aid to expel the French. Cairo was soon invested; and, on the 27th of June, the French general, Belliard, capitulated, on the condition that his troops, with their arms, baggage, field-artillery, and effects, should be embarked and conveyed to the French ports of the Mediterranean at the expense of the allied powers. The French, who issued out of Cairo, exceeded 13,000 in all: they left behind them 313 heavy cannon and 100,000 lbs. weight of gunpowder. At this moment the Anglo-Indian army, under Major-General Baird, was ascending the Red Sea. Baird, who had sailed from Bombay on the 7th of April, with about 2800 British, 2000 Sepoys, and 450 of the East Indian Company's artillery, reached Jeddah, on the Red Sea, on the 17th of May, and was there joined by an English division from the Cape of Good Hope, consisting of the 61st regiment, some squadrons of light horse, and a strong detachment of artillery. On the 8th of June Baird reached Kosseir and commenced landing his troops; but it was the month of July before his van division began to cross the burning deserts which lie between the Red Sea and Egypt; and, before he could unite his forces at Cairo, Menou capitulated upon the same conditions as Belliard, and Egypt was cleared of the French.*

In the month of March, the court of Madrid, considering that it could only stop French invasion by submitting in all things to the will of the First Consul, declared war against Portugal; and towards the end of April a Spanish army, commanded by Godoy, the Prince of the Peace, invaded the Portuguese provinces. In June the court of Lisbon purchased a treaty of peace (the treaty of Olivenza), by yielding some territory to Spain, and by engaging to shut their ports against the English. Bonaparte refused to concur in this treaty, and sent a French army, 25,000 strong, through Spain to attack Portugal. The Spaniards not merely allowed the passage of these Frenchmen, but gave them every countenance and assistance they could. The French soon invested Almeida and menaced both Lisbon and Oporto. The helpless Portuguese could do little beyond imploring English succours in troops, ships, and money. Some money—300,000*l.*—and some ships were sent; but our government thought it could spare no more troops than the three or four regiments that were already in the country. During these contests, however, an expedition was sent from England to take possession of the island of Madeira, in order to secure it for Portugal. As the negotiations for peace with England, which had been secretly renewed in the course of the summer, were now drawing to a conclusion, and as the French generals were gratified by enormous donations or bribes, the operations of the invading army were soon suspended; and by a definitive treaty, concluded at Madrid in the last days of September, Bonaparte agreed to withdraw his troops and respect the independence and integrity of Portugal, the court of Lisbon, on their part, agreeing to confirm to Spain all the territory which had been ceded by the late treaty of Olivenza; to make over to France one-half of Portuguese Guiana; to shut all the ports and roads of Portugal, in Europe, against all English vessels until the conclusion of peace between France and England; to nullify all preceding treaties and conventions with England; to treat France, in all matters of commerce, as the most favoured nation, and to admit all French commodities and merchandise whatsoever, particularly French broad-cloths. By a more secret article the Portuguese court paid immediately twenty millions of francs to the French republic.

The naval war became very languid, the French and Spanish fleets not venturing out of port, and their detached squadrons putting to sea only in the absence of the English. Admiral Gantheaume, however, escaped out of Brest with seven sail of the line and two frigates, got through the Straits of Gibraltar and into the Mediterranean, and, while our fleet in that sea was occupied on the coast of Egypt, he contrived to pick up two of our frigates, and the 'Swiftsure,' a 74-gun ship. The 'Swiftsure,' unaided and alone, fought two French 80-gun ships, at the closest quarters, for more than an hour, and did not strike until two other French line-of-battle ships were within gunshot and closing fast upon her. Another French squadron carrying troops from Toulon to Cadiz was not so fortunate. It was obliged by contrary winds to put into Algesiras Bay, right opposite to Gibraltar. It consisted of three line-of-battle ships, a Gallo-Venetian 36-gun frigate, and some smaller craft. On the 6th of July, two days after its arrival, this squadron was attacked by Rear-Admiral Sir James Saumarez, with six sail of the line; but the bay of Algesiras was defended by several heavy land-batteries, some of them situated on a rock about a quarter of a mile from the shore, and others on commanding cliffs to the north and south of the town: the cross-fire of these batteries completely flanked the entrance to the harbour, which harbour was in itself extremely difficult to navigate, being surrounded by reefs of sunken rocks. For some time only three of Saumarez's ships could get into action, and they had to contend with the three French line-of-battle ships, a number of gun-boats, and the land-batteries, which were well served. When two other English ships brought their fire to bear, one of them, the 'Hannibal,' struck and stuck fast on the rocks, where she was soon dismasted and almost destroyed by the terrible fire of the French and Spaniards. After a stern contest, in which he was repeatedly baffled by flaws of wind, Saumarez hauled off: he left the 'Hannibal' behind him to strike; but he had sunk five Spanish gun-boats, and had materially injured both the Spanish forts and the French ships of the line. A few days after this affair five Spanish ships of the line and three frigates, and another French ship of the line, came into Algesiras bay. By working night and day Admiral Saumarez repaired the damages he had sustained in the late action, and on the afternoon of the 12th of July, as the combined squadron, now consisting of ten sail of the line, three frigates and an immense number of gun-boats, was working round Cabarita point to get into the Straits, he made a dash at it with only five ships of the line, two frigates, a polacca, and a hired armed brig. The allies, whose chief anxiety was to land the troops at Cadiz, went away before the wind through the Straits, and it was night before the English could get fairly up with them. The Spaniards fought but loosely: one of their immense line-of-battle ships, carrying 112 guns, was set on fire, and as she blew up she set fire to another ship of the same flag and of the same immense size, which mounted in the air soon after her; between the two, nearly 1800 lives were lost. A Spanish 74-gun ship was taken; the rest of the combined squadron, much crippled and in a frightful state of confusion, reached Cadiz.

On the 1st of August Admiral Lord Nelson, with a flotilla of gun-boats and other small vessels, stood over to the coast of France to reconnoitre the preparations said to be making for the invasion of England. On the 4th he made an experimental attack upon the flotilla which lay at the mouth of Boulogne harbour. He sunk two floating batteries and destroyed a few gun-boats which were outside the pier. But on the night between the 15th and 16th, going right into the harbour, he was repulsed with considerable loss.*

Many circumstances, some of which are explained in the narrative of the events of this year, and some of which will fall to be noticed in the next Book, now rendered the First Consul really eager for some short suspension of hostilities with England. The Addington administration, which had started as a peace ministry, agreed to preliminaries, which were signed on the 1st of October. The Turkish sultan and the young czar Alexander treated with the First Consul, and there was a grand interchange of compliments and of promises, which were never meant to be kept. In the month of November the Marquess Cornwallis went over to France as ambassador plenipotentiary. From Paris, where he was received with the greatest honours and with the very lively joy of a part of the population, his lordship repaired to Amiens; the place appointed for holding the conferences. The discussions, in which Cornwallis had to contend with Joseph Bonaparte and the wily Talleyrand, were prolonged beyond all expectation, and were several times all but broken off in anger and with mutual defiance. Great and reasonable jealousies were excited by the use the First Consul made of the suspension of hostilities, which had followed the signing of the preliminaries in October, in sending out the French fleets; but, at last, on the 27th of March, 1802, the definitive treaty of peace was signed at Amiens.

* Besides being moored by the bottom to the shore, the French boats and other craft were defended by long poles headed with iron spikes projecting from their sides; strong nettings were braced up to their lower yards; they were strongly manned by soldiers and protected by land-batteries, the whole shore moreover being lined with troops. Nelson had complained that the force put at his disposal was not sufficient; but he could never come in sight of an enemy without fighting him.

CHAPTER II.

THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

F the Established Church, regarded by itself, the history, whether external or internal, during this period, amounts to nothing or next to nothing: it was disquieted by scarcely any contention among its own members; and the circumstances described in the last

Book* continued to operate in consolidating and fixing the new form into which it had subsided as a political institution, with a more undisturbed action than ever. It had still, however, to sustain some occasional alarm, and a few actual collisions, in the course of the process of adjusting the positions and rights of the various dissenting religious communities, which was not yet quite completed.

This process, which had been one of relaxation in regard to the Protestant sectaries ever since the Revolution, had, as we have seen already, begun to take that character before the commencement of the present period even in regard to the Roman Catholics, at least in England and Ireland. After more than sixty years had passed without any additions having been made to the penal code, the first actual repeal of any part of that code was effected by the English and Irish statutes of the year 1778.† And the following year witnessed the last mitigation we have yet had to record of the less severe restrictions or disabilities which the legislation that preceded the Revolution of 1688 had imposed upon the Protestant dissenters.‡

No attempt was made by this latter description of persons to obtain any further relief till after the lapse of several years. But at last they resolved to make application to parliament for the repeal of the two statutes of the 13th of Charles II. st. 2, c. 1, and the 25th of Charles II. c. 2, commonly called the Corporation and Test Acts, which made the taking of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the rites of the Church of England, a necessary qualification for being elected to any municipal office, or for holding any office of trust or profit under the crown, whether civil or military. By an act passed in 1718 (the 5 Geo. I. c. 6) the first of these two statutes was so far repealed, as that the not having taken the Sacrament within the period prescribed (a twelvemonth before the election) no longer made the election of the party ipso facto void; and then the Annual Indemnity Acts protected persons who neglected to qualify themselves within the six months succeeding the election, within which the time for removal or prosecution was now limited. Relief had also been already granted to the Protestant dissenters in Ireland from disabilities similar to those which these statutes imposed, by an act of the parliament of that kingdom passed in 1779, which declared that all persons, being Protestants, might there hold and enjoy any office, civil or military, notwithstanding they should not receive nor have received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, without incurring any penalties for or in respect of that neglect. The claim of the English Protestant dissenters to be placed in the same condition with their Irish brethren was brought before the House of Commons on the 28th of March, 1787, by Mr. Beaufof, member for Yarmouth, in a motion that the

House should immediately resolve itself into a committee to consider the Test and Corporation Acts, which he prefaced by a long speech. He described the persons aggrieved by the provisions in these laws, which made the taking of the Sacrament a necessary qualification for office, as consisting of three classes;—the first, composed of all those Englishmen who were dissenters from the Church of England; the second, of all the members of the Established Church of Scotland; the third, of all those clergymen of the Church of England who looked upon the prostitution of the most solemn ordinance of their faith to the purposes of a civil test as little less than a sacrilegious abuse. The English dissenters, however, were the body of which Mr. Beaufoy professed to be more especially the deputy or organ on this occasion. "The dissenters of England," he said, "are chiefly composed of the Presbyterians, the Independents, and the Baptists, who differ in many circumstances of doctrine and discipline, but who all agree in the custom of annually appointing two deputies from each of their congregations in the metropolis for the management of their affairs; a custom which has long been established among them. Now, it is by the unanimous voice of that assembly of delegates, supported by the wishes, earnestly expressed in letters, of their brethren in all parts of the kingdom, that the present request solicits the attention of parliament." At a general meeting of the deputies of the three denominations, held at Dr. Williams's Library, Redcross-street, on Friday the 5th of January, Edward Jefferies, Esq., in the chair, it had been resolved unanimously, after full debate, that an application for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts should be made to parliament, and that it should be referred to a committee to take the most effectual measures for that purpose; and at a meeting of the said committee, held at the King's Head Tavern, in the Poultry, on the 2nd of February, it had been further arranged that the mode of proceeding should be by motion in the House of Commons, and that Mr. Beaufoy should be desired to make the motion. "Thus authorised," proceeded the honourable member, "I am happy, in the outset of our deliberations, to declare that the grievances of which the dissenters complain are of a civil, not of an ecclesiastical nature. They humbly solicit a restoration of their civil rights, not an enlargement of their ecclesiastical privileges. It is of consequence that this fact should be distinctly stated, and clearly understood. . . . They wish not to diminish the provision which the legislature has made for the established church; nor do they envy her the revenue she enjoys, or the ecclesiastical privileges of dignity and honour with which she is invested. If their aim had been to attack the rights of others, and not merely to recover their own, they would not have chosen a member of the church of England for their advocate, nor could I have accepted such trust." The claim, therefore, could not well have been more humbly urged, or rested on lower grounds. Beaufoy went on to state that his clients, in praying for the relief they sought, had "chosen the time which they thought the most convenient to parliament, and the mode which they deemed the most respectful to the House." "United," he said, "in sentiment on this occasion, to a degree which I believe unexampled in any body of men, and hitherto unknown among themselves, and forming, in most of the towns of England, a large proportion of the inhabitants, they did not choose to crowd your table with petitions. They wished to owe their success, not to the number of the claimants, but to the equity of the claim.* And no doubt that method would be the most satisfactory, if it were always practicable. But the number of the claimants is also an element, in such cases as the present, which is not without its weight. In the continuation of his speech Mr. Beaufoy, with no small rhetorical display, went over the history of the first enactment of the two statutes which he desired to repeal, of the grievances which they occasioned, and of the various attempts which had been made to blunt or turn aside the edge of their disqualifying clauses, in so far as the Protestant dissenters were concerned. In the same session in which the Test Act was passed, a bill "for the ease of Protestant Dissenters" was brought into the House of Commons, and was passed both by that House and by the Lords, but was prevented from becoming law by the king adjourning the parliament before certain amendments made by the Lords could be considered and agreed to by the Commons. In the next session a bill, having for its object to discriminate Protestant dissenters from Papists in respect to the operation of the excluding provisions of these acts, was read a first and second time in the Commons, and referred to a committee, but was not reported. In December, 1680, and January, 1681, a bill for repealing the Corporation Act was in like manner read twice and committed by the Commons; and at the same time another bill was passed by the upper House "for distinguishing Protestant Dissenters from Popish Recusants;" but both were defeated by the sudden prorogation of the parliament on the 10th of January, leaving the Commons only time to resolve; "That it is the opinion of this House, that the presentation of the Protestant dissenters upon the penal laws is, at this time, grievous to the subject, and a weakening of the Protestant interest, and an encouragement to Popery, and dangerous to the peace of this kingdom.*" After the revolution, again, King Wil-

* See Pict. Hist. of Engl., iii. 733.—Some of the above-mentioned facts are not noticed in Beaufoy's speech, but are taken from a temperately expressed paper published and dispersed a short time previous to the debate, entitled 'The Case of the Protestant Dissenters, with reference to the Test and Corporation Acts.' Beaufoy says that, while one of the bills (he does not state which) of 1680 lay ready for the royal assent, the king, Charles II., "prevailed upon the clerk of the crown to steal the bill, and overreach the parliament." This account is probably founded upon the following relation given by Burnet, in his 'History of his Own Time' (i. 494): "There was a severe act passed in the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign, when she was highly provoked with the seditious behaviour of the Puritans, by which those who did not conform to the church were required to abjure the kingdom under the pain of death; and for some degrees of non-conformity they were adjudged to die, without the favour of banishment. Both Houses passed a bill for repealing this Act: it went indeed heavily in the House of Lords; for many of the bishops, though they were not for putting that law in execution, which had never been done but in one single instance, yet they thought the terror of it was of some use, and that the repealing it might make the party more insolent. On the day of the prorogation the bill ought to have been offered to the king, but the clerk of the crown, by the king's particular order, withdrew the bill. The king had no mind openly to deny it; but he had less mind to pass it. So this indiscreet method was taken, which was a high offence in the clerk of the crown." A note to the Oxford (1823) edition of Burnet says, that the single case in which the law thus intended to be repealed was put in execution was that of Penry—meaning John Penry, or Ap-Henry, the Welsh Brownist, who was executed in 1593. But this is a mistake, for Penry was indicted on the 23rd of Eliz. c. 2, for seditious words and rumours uttered against the queen's majesty tending to the stirring up of rebellion among her subjects. The act which Burnet means was, in fact, the 35th of Eliz. c. 1, entitled, 'An Act to retain the Queen's majesty's subjects in their due obedience,' by which persons above the age of sixteen forbearing to attend church for a month, or denying or persuading others to oppugn her majesty's authority in causes ecclesiastical, or being convicted of the offence of attending a conventicle, were ordered to abjure the realm, and subjected, if they refused so to do, or to cou-

liam, in one of his earliest speeches from the throne, had expressed his earnest hope that such alterations would be made in the law as would leave room for the admission of all his Protestant subjects who were willing and able to serve him. Nevertheless, nothing had yet been actually done to effect this object, save only the passing for some time past of the annual Act of Indemnity. But Beaufoy argued that the Indemnity Act, while, by professing to dispense with the sacramental qualification, it amounted to a confession on the part of the legislature that that portion of the Test and Corporation Acts might be repealed without danger, was, in truth, no complete protection to the dissenters from these statutes. "Its only effect," said he, "is, that of allowing further time to those trespassers on the law against whom final judgment has not been awarded. Should, for example, a prosecution have been commenced, but not concluded, the Indemnity Act does not discharge the proceedings; it merely suspends them for six months: so that, if the party accused does not take the sacrament before the six months allowed by the Indemnity Act shall expire, the proceedings will go on, and, long before the next Indemnity Act will come to his relief, final judgment will be awarded against him. Thus it appears that the Indemnity Act gives no effectual protection to the dissenter who accepts a civil office or military command; for he who cannot take the sacrament at all cannot take it within the time required by that act. The penalties of the Test Act will consequently follow; he becomes incapable of receiving any legacy, of executing any trust, or of suing in any court, or on any occasion, for justice: he is placed in the dreadful situation of an outlaw." Practically, however, we believe, the Indemnity Act effectually prevented form, or returned from banishment, to the penalties of felony, without benefit of clergy; while such as, having submitted, afterwards relapsed, were not even to be allowed the choice of transportation. (See Piet. Hist. of Engl., ii. 745.) As soon as the next parliament met, at Oxford, on the 21st of March, the subject of the miscarriage and disappearance of the bill for repealing this act of Elizabeth was warmly taken up by the Commons; and on the 25th it was resolved, "That a message be sent to the Lords, desiring a conference with their lordships on matters relating to the constitution of parliament in passing of bills;" but the sudden dissolution of the parliament three days after prevented the conference being held. (See Parl. Hist., iv. 1308, 1312, 1313; and Hatsell's Precedents, ii. 242, edit. of 1785.) We may mention, by the by, that a similar instance, not noticed by Hatsell, of the abstraction or loss of a bill when it was ready for the royal assent occurred at the close of the second session of Charles II.'s Long Parliament, on the 27th of July, 1663. (See Parl. Hist., iv. 285.) Burnet, in continuation of the passage quoted above, gives the following account of the dissolution of the parliament in January, 1661, and of another measure that had been introduced for the relief of the Protestant dissenters: "There was a bill of comprehension offered by the episcopal party in the House of Commons, by which the Presbyterians would have been taken into the church. But, to the amazement of all people, their party in the House did not seem concerned to promote it; on the contrary, they neglected it. This increased the jealousy, as if they had hoped they were so near the carrying all before them, that they despised a comprehension: there was no great progress made in this bill. But, in the morning before they were prorogued, two votes were carried in the House of a very extraordinary nature: the one was, that the laws made against recusants ought not to be executed against any but those of the church of Rome. That was indeed the primary intention of the law; yet all persons who came not to church, and did not receive the sacrament once a year, were within the letter of the law. The other vote was, that it was the opinion of that House that the laws against dissenters ought not to be executed. This was thought a great invasion of the legislature, when one House pretended to suspend the execution of laws, which was to act like dictators in the state; for they meant that courts and juries should govern themselves by the opinion that they now gave, which, instead of being a kindness to the non-conformists, raised a new storm against them over all the nation."

the prosecution of dissenters on the Test and Corporation Acts; it sufficiently indicated the feeling and determination of the legislature, and made informers understand that other measures would be taken to check and put down prosecutions, if that should prove inadequate. Beaufoy's motion was seconded in a short speech by Sir Henry Hoghton, the author of the bill relieving dissenting clergymen from subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles, which was brought forward in 1772 and 1773, and at last carried through both Houses in 1779.* The opposition to the measure was led by Lord North, who spoke at some length. Amid much that was of little or no force, he urged one consideration, in reply to part of Beaufoy's speech, which perhaps has been sometimes too much overlooked in the discussion of this and similar questions. "We are told," said his lordship, "that other countries have no Test Acts, and that their established churches are not endangered for the want thereof. France has Protestants at the head of her army and her finances; and Prussia employs Catholics in her service: but it must be considered that these are arbitrary governments—that the king alone in these countries is to be served, and can at pleasure remove or advance whom he pleases. The King of England, being a limited monarch, can do no such thing: he is bound by those restricting laws as much as his subjects." There is enough in this consideration at least to destroy the logical conclusiveness of the argument it is here brought forward to meet. North afterwards insisted that the Test Act in particular was the corner-stone of the constitution, which every care ought to be taken to preserve. "King James," said he, "when he wished to gain the Prince and Princess of Orange to his views, desired to have their opinion on the propriety of repealing the Test and Corporation Acts. The answer of the Prince of Orange was, that he agreed to the removal of the Corporation Act, but not of the Test Act; and he declared it to be the practice of Holland to confine all civil employments to those who professed the principles of the States, but that the army could not be so restrained on account of the want of troops." The motion was supported by Lord Beauchamp and Mr. William Smith, whose speeches, however, contained nothing worth quoting, unless we should except an admission made by Smith, that the number of the dissenters was of late much decreased, from which he argued that the government had now less to fear from them than at any former period, and could therefore better afford to relax the restrictions of the old laws. Sir James Johnstone, representative of the Dumfries burghs, said he was determined to vote in favour of the motion, which, however, he intimated that he considered to be very much a piece of humbug; and he seems, after all, to have voted against it.† Pitt then rose and spoke on the other side, but, apparently, with no great ardour. He professed to argue the question solely on grounds of expediency, the principal of which that he stated were the desirableness of not unnecessarily offending or alarming the fears and prejudices of the members of the established church, and the real danger the established church might incur from the free admission to office of at least certain descriptions of dissenters. Some dissenters went so far as to maintain that all establishments were improper. "This," said Pitt, "may not be the opinion of the present body of dissenters [the parties with whom the motion before the House originated]; but no means can be devised of admitting the moderate part of the dissenters, and excluding the more violent: the bulwark must be kept against all; and I am endeavouring to take every prudent and proper precaution." It affords a remarkable illustration of the state of opinion at this time among all parties, to find Fox commencing his reply to this speech by avowing that he should have found himself at one with Pitt, if the latter had gone no farther than to propose that there should be some test for shutting out from office such dissenters as denied the propriety or necessity of established churches altogether. He only complained that his right honourable opponent had afterwards carried out his argument so as to apply it to all dissenters indiscriminately. But Fox really answered every argument that had been brought forward in the course of the debate for maintaining the existing law by the single remark, that it undeniably had not, in any degree whatever, the effect attributed to it, or for the sake of which it was held desirable that it should be kept up. He stated that there were corporations which were entirely filled by dissenters, and that he knew of two such corporations. He afterwards exposed the absurd and mischievous consequences of employing religion for a test in politics. Beaufoy had argued that the law which declared that every man who accepted a commission in the army, or was appointed to a civil office, should take the sacrament of the Lord's Supper compelled a clergyman to administer this sacrament to every person who should demand it upon that ground; inasmuch as, if he refused, a ruinous prosecution for damages was the inevitable consequence. To this North had replied: "Every minister is bound by his holy office to refuse the communion to any unworthy person. If he refuses according to law, by law he will be justified: the fear of an action should not prevent a man from doing his duty: if he is right, where can be the fear of an action? He will gain honour, and the person bringing the action will have a considerable expense, attended with disgrace. The clergy are situated now in the same manner that they were before the Test Act: they could then, and they may now, upon proof, refuse to administer the holy sacrament of the Lord's Supper to any unworthy character." Pitt had not expressed himself in terms quite so decided upon this head, if we may trust to the report of his speech. He is stated to have observed "that there was nothing in the Rubric that supposed a clergyman to be acquainted with all the circumstances of the life of a communicant. The crimes which it was incumbent upon him to object to must be glaring; nor could it be imagined that the state could be deprived of the service of an officer of the army or navy on the ground that they were the most profligate of men, and ought not to be communicants." Thus North seems to have laid himself out to meet the argument that exposed the hardship of the law in its bearing upon the clergy; Pitt, that which pointed to its inconveniences in reference to the state or the public service. Fox very neatly showed that, whether the clergyman had or had not the power of rejecting the applications of communicants, the evil was equally great. "With respect to clergymen giving or refusing the sacrament," he observed, "if the clergyman of the parish refused, he subjected himself to an action; and, supposing that he found means to get through the inconveniences of the litigation, what was the consequence? Why, that, having refused the man the sacrament, he had disabled him from being qualified to hold the office: for the man could not take the sacrament from another clergyman; and thus there was vested in the minister of a parish a power superior to that of any ecclesiastical court," or, he might have added, of any other court or established authority in the state. This was at any rate a sufficient answer to the assertion that the Test Act had made no change in the situation of the clergy, in so far as respected the consequences of their refusing to administer the sacrament: if the Test Act had not altered the consequences to themselves of such refusal, it had at least given a great extension and additional weight to those of them that affected other people. This and all other arguments tending in the same direction, however, were urged in vain: when, after a few remarks from Sir William Dolben, formerly the solitary auxiliary of Sir Roger Newdigate in his resistance to Hoghton's bill in 1772, and now the successor of that worthy baronet in the representation of the University of Oxford, the question was put, and the House divided, the numbers were found to be, for Beaufoy's motion, 98; against it, 176.

For the next two years the question was allowed to sleep; but it was again brought before the same parliament, by the same advocate, on the 8th of May, 1789. Mr. Beaufoy's motion on this occasion was substantially the same as before,—that the House would immediately resolve itself into a committee to consider of so much of the Corporation and Test Acts as required persons, before being admitted into any office or place in corporations, or having accepted any office, civil or military, or any place of trust under the crown, to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the rites of the Church of England. The dissenters, he said, had not indulged the language of complaint in consequence of their former disappointment, nor had they sought the aid of political alliances, or endeavoured to avail themselves of party divisions: "they had patiently waited the arrival of a period in which the wisdom of a complete toleration should be generally acknowledged, and in which the experience of other nations should have proved that such a toleration would strengthen the interest of the established church, and so entirely destroy the bitterness of religious variance that the state would afterwards be as little affected by that variance as by a difference of opinion in natural philosophy or any other speculative science." A great deal to be accomplished all in an interval of two years! The principal novelty in Beaufoy's present speech, which was neither so long nor so elaborate as his former one, was the more detailed statement which he gave of the disabilities inflicted upon dissenters by the laws of which they now sought the repeal: "No office under the crown, though your sovereign may invite you to his service; no commission in the army, though the enemy may be marching to the capital; no share in the management of any of the commercial companies in the kingdom, though your whole fortune may be vested in their stocks, shall be yours; from the direction of the Bank of England, from the direction of the India Company, from that of the Russia, the Turkish, and South Sea Companies, you are entirely debarred; for, if you should accept of any share in the management of these companies, or of any office under the crown, or of any military employment, you are within the penalties of the statutes. In the first place you forfeit to the informer the sum of 500*l.*; if you cannot pay that sum without delay, the penalty is imprisonment; if you cannot pay it at all, as may be the case with many a brave officer, who has offended against the law by fighting the battles of his country, the penalty is imprisonment for life. In the next place, you are incapable of suing for any debt. Does any one owe you money? Have you intrusted him with your whole fortune? It is in his power to cancel the debt, by annulling your means of recovering it; and for this act of dishonesty, of consummate fraud, of treachery in the extreme, the parliament assigns him a reward of 500*l., to be bequeathed from the wreck of your fortune. In the next place, the law denies you its protection: for his wrongs, his insults, his injuries, however atrocious, you shall have no redress. . . . In the next place, you are incapable of receiving any legacy. . . . In the last place, you are also incapable of being guardian to any child, even to your own." Beaufoy afterwards reminded the House that, if there were any persons, as no doubt there were many, who had, no matter how many years ago, held appointments without having qualified themselves by taking the sacrament, all these penalties were still by law hanging over them. Some of the arguments and statements which he advanced, with the object of allaying the apprehensions of his opponents, are also curious, as marking the movement of opinion, and indeed, in many respects, of the actual condition of things, between that day and this. He maintained that the goodwill of the dissenters to the revenues of the church was ensured, and would still be equally ensured if the Corporation and Test Acts were repealed, by a variety of circumstances. "These circumstances were, that the dissenters, generally speaking (for, he said, there were undoubtedly many exceptions), belonged not to the landed interest of the kingdom, which bears the principal burthen of the tithes, but to the commercial interest, on which the weight is comparatively light. That the voluntary subscriptions of the dissenters for the maintenance of their own clergy were too light to be felt as a burthen, and in their destination and use were constantly regarded as a privilege. That the several denominations of the dissenters differed as much from each other as from the established church; and were so far from being hostile to its ministers, that he believed the clergy themselves would acknowledge that, of the voluntary contributions which they received from their parishioners, those of the dissenters were, in general, the highest and most liberal." He also reminded the House that the repeal would do nothing for any such classes of dissenters as were not able to give a sufficient pledge of their civil obedience:—"that the Quakers, who undoubtedly were enemies from principle to the revenues of the church, would still be excluded from the offices of executive government by their refusal to take the oath of allegiance; that the Catholics also would still be excluded by their refusal to take the oath of supremacy." He added, "that he did not mention the Methodists, for that, unless the utmost ardour of devotion with the strongest attachment to the doctrines of the church—unless that could be called differing from the church, he knew not on what ground they could be considered as dissenters." The motion, which was seconded as before by Hoghton, was again opposed by Lord North, and also by Pitt; but their speeches contained nothing new, although the former seems to have spoken with increased earnestness, the latter with even less ardour than he showed in the former debate. They were answered by several members, among others, by Fox, who spoke at considerable length, and with his usual animation and force. Sir James Johnstone said he should vote for the question, although he had before opposed it. He had at that time thought that all the old women and children would cry out, the church was in danger; but he found there had been no such cry, and he was fully persuaded that there had not been any grounds for such a cry at all. Mr. William Smith contested the assertion which had been again made by North, that a clergyman was equally warranted in refusing to administer the sacrament to a notorious ill-liver, whether he had a place or employment, or not: he believed, he said, that the noble Lord would find but few lawyers who would affirm such to be the law. North had gone so far as to declare it to be his opinion, that, although no person had ever been examined and convicted under the enactments proposed to be repealed, yet, if they had been enforced, the doing so could not have been called persecution, unless it was persecution for the legislature to maintain its laws [which, by the by, it might very well be]. He also called the conduct of persons who had introduced themselves into corporations without taking the test "a sort of mental fraud, which did not recommend such persons to the indulgence of the legislature: it was an evasion and abuse of an act of parliament, which solemnly and substantially required that the test should be given fairly and truly." To this Smith replied:—"What were the Indemnity Acts passed for, but to be resorted to as a protection against the consequences of not having conformed?" North, however, kept to his extraordinary avowal. Rising to explain, he said: "The fact he understood to stand thus: the Indemnity Acts came frequently, and the persons who had taken offices and not qualified, instead of availing themselves of the opportunity afforded by the Act of Indemnity, did not conform, but waited till another act came forward, and so on from time to time without taking the test at all. This, he must say, was an abuse of the indulgence of the legislature." Fox's able speech was almost wholly argumentative. He and Pitt were followed by Windham, who supported the motion principally on the ground that, even supposing the dissenters to be hostile to the established church, the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, while it removed an irritating stigma, could give them no more real power than they already had; and then the House divided, when the motion was negatived, but only by the narrow majority of 122 against 102. It will be observed, however, that the present vote, as compared with the last, indicated scarcely any accession to the number of the friends of the repeal, although there was a considerable falling off in the force that came down to resist Beaufoy's motion. The zeal or determination of his opponents seems to have somewhat given way; but, probably, few or none of them had gone over to the other side.

A few days after this decision of the Commons, an unsuccessful attempt was made in the other House by Lord Stanhope to rid the statute book of some old laws, which he conceived to press with unnecessary severity, not so much upon dissenters as upon members of the established church. It is certain that, whatever might be the grievances thus sustained by the class of persons who were the objects of his lordship's present anxiety, this ingenious but most eccentric peer, who never professed much attachment either to church or state, was about the last member of the legislature whom the great mass of them would have chosen for their advocate. However, on the 18th of May, his lordship, self-elected to this office, came forward, according to previous notice, with what he designated "A Bill for relieving members of the Church of England from sundry penalties and disabilities to which, by the laws now in force, they may be liable, and for extending freedom in matters of religion to all persons (Papists only excepted), and for other purposes therein mentioned." In a debate on the Regency Bill, on the 17th of February, Stanhope, following the example of Mr. William

EARL STANHOPE.

Smith in the Commons, had moved an amendment on what was called the Uniformity Clause (prohibiting the regent from giving the royal assent to any bill for repealing the act passed in the time of Charles II., for the uniformity of public prayers), with the view, as he explained himself, of preventing that clause from standing in the way of the repeal of a number of preceding statutes, which were referred to and ratified in the Uniformity Act; and upon that occasion he had rapidly reviewed some of the most remarkable of these old laws, and pointed out what he considered their absurd and persecuting character. He was replied to by the Archbishop of Canterbury (Moore) and the Bishops of Salisbury (Barrington) and Gloucester (Halifax), none of whom, however, attempted to defend the enactments in question; they merely deprecated such a discussion at that moment, as having nothing to do with the business in hand, and argued that the ancient penal provisions, to which attention had been called, had been long buried in oblivion, and had wholly ceased to be enforced. In his present bill, and in the speech with which he introduced it, Stanhope gave a more elaborate and methodical exposition of the old laws respecting religion still remaining on the statute book, which he described as being a disgrace to the country, although he professed to notice only about a tenth part of them, being convinced, as he said, that that sample would prove more than sufficient to induce the House to pass the bill.

In the first place there were the laws about going to church; of which the principal were, that every person must attend at church every Sunday and holiday, or forfeit twelve pence (by the 1 Eliz. c. 2, § 14); that every person above the age of sixteen, not going to church for a month, should forfeit 20*l.*, and should besides, after absenting himself twelve months, be bound with two sufficient sureties in 200*l.* At the least for his good behaviour, until he should conform (by 23 Eliz. c. 1, § 5); that, if he cannot pay the fine, he should be committed to prison, there to remain till he paid or conformed (by § 11); that all persons, above the age of sixteen, forbearing to go to church for a month, without any lawful cause, should, upon conviction of that offence, be committed to prison, there to remain without bail or mainprise, until they should conform (by 35 Eliz. c. 1, § 1); that the fine of 20*l.* per month, incurred for not going to church, might, though legally tendered, be refused by the crown, and two-thirds of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments of the offender seized, instead of the said 20*l.* (by 3 Jac. I. c. 4, § 11); that every person should pay 10*l.* per month for every servant, for every visitor, and for the servant of every visitor, in his or her house, who did not go to church (by §§ 31 and 32); that over and above these new penalties the ecclesiastical courts might exercise their jurisdiction against persons thus offending, as fully as they might have done before the making of this act (by § 39). Even the Toleration Act (the 1 Will. and Mary, c. 18) provided (by § 16) that all the old laws respecting attendance upon divine service on Sunday should still remain in force, and be executed against all offenders, unless they went to some congregation or assembly of religious worship allowed or permitted by the act. By the 29 Eliz. c. 6, § 1, it was enacted that every feoffment, gift, grant, conveyance, alienation, estate, lease, incumbrance, and limitation of use, of or out of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments whatsoever, had or made at any time since the beginning of the queen's majesty's reign by any person subjecting himself to the penalties of the statute respecting attendance at church, if it was revokable at the pleasure of such offender, should be taken to be utterly frustrate and void as against the crown for the levying of the fine incurred; so that, as Stanhope put it, a son might forfeit his estate, if settled upon him by his father at his marriage or at any other time, in case his father did not go to church, though he (the son) himself did. And by the 21 Jac. I. c. 4, § 5, it was provided that any information, suit, or action, against any person or persons for not frequenting divine service, might be laid in any county, and at the pleasure of any informer. It was laid down by Dr. Burn that "he who misses either morning or evening prayer, or goes before the whole service is over, is as much within the statute of the 1st Eliz. c. 2, § 14, as he who is wholly absent;"* and this clause, imposing a fine of twelve pence for every day's absence from church, without lawful or reasonable excuse, expressly declares that, if they would avoid the fine, people must repair to their parish churches, "then and there to abide orderly and soberly during the time of the Common Prayer, preaching, or other service of God then to be used and ministered, not only upon Sundays, but upon all the other days ordained and used to be kept as holidays."

Then there were the laws about fasting. The enactments contained in the 5 Eliz. c. 5, entitled "An Act touching politic constitutions for the maintenance of the Navy," by which every person who should eat flesh upon a fish-day was made liable to a fine of three pounds, or to three months' close imprisonment, had indeed expired: but Stanhope complained that the eating of meat on the old fish-days was still an ecclesiastical offence; and he proposed to declare in his bill that no person should for the future be sued in any ecclesiastical court for eating any kind of meat on any day of fasting or of abstinence. He also commented on the inconsistency of some of the old laws on this subject; for instance, this statute of 5 Eliz. c. 5, says (§§ 40 and 41), "And because no manner of person shall misjudge of the intent of this estatute, limiting orders to eat fish and to forbear eating of flesh, but that the same is purposely intended and meant politically for the increase of fishermen and mariners, and repairing of port towns and navigation, and not for any superstition to be maintained in the choice of meats, be it enacted that whosoever shall, by preaching, teaching, writing, or open speech, notify, that any eating of fish, or forbearing of flesh, mentioned in this statute, is of any necessity for the saving of the soul of man, or that it is the service of God, otherwise than as other politic laws are and be, that then such persons shall be punished as spreaders of false news are and ought to be." And this clause, we believe, has never been repealed, and is still in force. Yet by the 2 and 3 Edw. VI. c. 19, the two archbishops, the bishops, archdeacons, and their officers are empowered to execute the laws respecting the eating of fish; as if their observance were really a matter of religious duty.

Thirdly, there were the laws about rites, excommunication, &c. "Excommunicated persons," says Dr. Burn, "shall be inhibited the commerce and communion of the faithful; and they who communicate with them shall be punished by ecclesiastical censure;" and he lays it down that by commerce is meant buying or selling, or other interchange of wares or merchandise; and that "where a man is excommunicated by the law of holy church, and he sueth an action real or personal, the defendant may plead that he who sueth is excommunicated;"* so that, as Lord Stanhope remarked, no person excommunicated could recover a just debt. "Besides which," continued his lordship, "a writ de excommunicato capiendo may, in various cases, be issued out against the person excommunicated, who may be arrested thereupon and kept in prison. There are various cases in which the said writ may issue; and, by the statute of the 5th Eliz., c. 23, § 13, the said writ de excommunicato capiendo may be awarded in various cases, and, amongst others, in cases of heresy, or error in matters of religion or doctrine, or incontinency, or for a person refusing to have his child baptized, or for refusing to receive the communion as received in the Church of England, or for refusing to come to divine service." Even the statute of the 29 Car. II., c. 9, taking away the writ de hæretico comburendo, contains the following proviso: "Provided always, that nothing in this act shall extend or be construed to take away or abridge the jurisdiction of Protestant archbishops or bishops, or any other judges of any ecclesiastical courts, in cases of atheism, blasphemy, heresy, or schism, and other damnable doctrines or opinions, but that they may proceed to punish the same according to his majesty's ecclesiastical laws, by excommunication, deprivation, degradation, and other ecclesiastical censures, not extending to death, in such sort and no other as they might have done before the making of this act; any thing in this law contained to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding."

By another statute, the 30 Car. II., st. 2, c. 1, it is enacted (§§ 5 and 6) that every peer or member of the House of Peers, or peer of Scotland, or peer of Ireland, or member of the House of Commons, who shall go to court* without having made the Declaration against transubstantiation and the invocation of saints therein contained, shall be disabled to hold any office, civil or military, or to sit in parliament, or to make a proxy in the House of Peers, or to sue or use any action in law, or to prosecute any suit in equity, or to be guardian of any child, or administrator of any person, or capable of any legacy or deed of gift, and be deemed or adjudged a popish recusant convict; that is to say, shall be as excommunicated, shall not come within ten miles of London, and shall not remove above five miles from his habitation in the country. "Many members of the House of Commons," observed Stanhope, "a majority of the House of Lords, and perhaps the whole bench of bishops, are liable to these absurd penalties at this moment; and any person who has incurred these penalties is in a very awkward situation, because the act makes it an incurable recusancy, unless cured in the very next term after such person has been at court. So that, by this law, a very singular circumstance has perhaps taken place, and the whole bench of Protestant bishops may perhaps be at this moment Popish recusants convict." His lordship added, "that, if he thought that the right reverend and learned prelates would not support his bill, he might, by means of this absurd law, clear the House of them, and carry the bill through in their absence; for they could not even vote by proxy."

Stanhope also proposed to include in his measure of repeal certain clauses of the statute 1st Jac. I., c. 4, by which it was declared that no woman, nor any person whatever under twenty-one years of age, except sailors or ship-boys, or the apprentice or factor of a merchant, should be permitted to pass over the seas, except by licence from the king, or from six or more of the privy council under their hands, on pain of the forfeiture of his office and his goods by the officer of the port, of his ship and tackle by the owner of the ship; of the master and all the mariners forfeiting their goods and being sent to prison for a twelvemonth; of the party going abroad, if under the age of twenty-one, forfeiting all his or her lands, goods, money, and estates in trust, and of the party sending him and her abroad forfeiting 100*l.*: the one-half of all these forfeitures going to the king, and the other half to whosoever should sue.

In the concluding part of his speech his lordship made some observations on the canons of the church promulgated in 1603; respecting which, however, he had not thought it necessary to insert any thing in his bill, as he held that they were, in fact, not binding by law either upon the laity or the clergy, although the latter were commonly supposed to be subject to them. He quoted, as specimens of the objectionable character of many things in this code of clerical law, the 3rd canon, which declares that whosoever should affirm that the Church of England is not a true and apostolical church, teaching and maintaining the doctrines of the apostles, shall be held as excommunicated, and be incapable of restoration "but only by the archbishop, after his repentance and public revocation of this his wicked error;" the 4th and 5th, which in like manner excommunicate whoever shall affirm that the form of God's worship in the Church of England containeth any thing in it that is repugnant to the Scriptures, or that any of the Thirty-nine Articles "are in any part superstitious or erroneous, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe unto;" the 65th, which enjoins upon all ordinaries carefully to "see and give order that those who refuse to frequent divine service, or who stand lawfully excommunicate, be, in the parish church, at the time of divine service, upon some Sunday, denounced and declared excommunicate, that others may be thereby both admonished to refrain their company and society, and excited the rather to procure out a writ de excommunicato capiendo, thereby to reduce them into due order and obedience;" the 72nd, which forbids any minister, without the licence of the bishop of the diocese under his hand and seal, to "attempt, upon any pretence whatsoever, by fasting and prayer, to cast out any devil or devils, under pain of the imputation of imposture, or cozenage, or deposition from the ministry;" the 73rd, which says, "Forasmuch as all conventicles and secret meetings of priests and ministers have been ever justly accounted very hurtful to the state of the church wherein they live, we do now ordain and constitute that no priests or ministers of the word of God, nor any other persons, shall meet together, in any private house or elsewhere, to consult upon any matter or course to be taken by them, or, upon their motion or direction, by any other, which may any way tend to the impeaching or depraving of the doctrine of the Church of England, or of the Book of Common Prayer, or of any part of the government and discipline now established in the Church of England, under pain of excommunication ipso facto;" and the 115th, which, after reciting that "the churchwardens are sworn to present both the disorders of persons and the common fame that is spread abroad of them," proceeds as follows: "We do admonish and exhort all judges, both ecclesiastical and temporal (as they regard and reverence the fearful judgment-seat of the highest Judge), that they admit not in any of their courts any complaint, plea, writ, or suits against any such churchwardens for making any such presentments, nor against any such presentments, nor against any minister for any presentment that he shall make; all the said presentments tending to the restraint of shameless impiety; and considering that the rules both of charity and government do presume that they did nothing therein of malice, but for the discharge of their consciences." It had been decided in 1737 by the Court of King's Bench that these canons, never having received the sanction of parliament (although they had been confirmed by the king), do not bind the laity; but Lord Hardwicke, the chief-justice, in delivering this judgment, admitted that the clergy were bound by them. Lord Stanhope, however, argued that the ratification of them by James I. under the great seal was not authorised by the statute, the 25th Hen. VIII., c. 19, under which his majesty professed to perform that act; and that, therefore, they were, even in regard to the clergy, only so much waste paper. They were, nevertheless, he added, extremely useful as records of the persecuting spirit and superstition of past times.*

That the bill might have the better chance of success, a number of provisoes were inserted in it, the more strictly to limit its operation to its professed object. The first of these provisoes was, that nothing in the act should extend to the giving relief to the Papists. And the language which his lordship held upon this head is instructive as to the state of opinion at the time. He "expatiated concerning what he described as the various abominable, execrable, and dangerous principles of Papists, which made them unsafe citizens of the state. But it was, he said, with particular satisfaction that he was in the House the other day when his noble friend near him (Lord Rawdon) presented a petition from persons styling themselves Catholic Dissenters, in which petition those persons utterly disclaimed, reprobated, and protested against the principles of popery. Therefore it appeared to him just that the law should some day draw a line of discrimination between the persecuting Papists and those who publicly and unequivocally disclaim all those abominable and detestable principles." Here we have the most extreme liberalist of his day—the man who professed, to quote the preamble of his bill, "that the right of private judgment in matters respecting religion is and ever must be the unalienable right of mankind, and as such ought always to be holden sacred and inviolable"—nevertheless, warmly advocating restrictions and exclusions on account of doctrinal opinions, and distinctly denouncing all Roman Catholics who would not repudiate the designation of Papists as undeserving of the privileges of free citizens. Nor was Lord Stanhope singular in entertaining these views. They were the common creed even of the most ardent friends of religious freedom at this date. Even Charles Fox expressed himself on the subject of the unlimited toleration of mere opinion with considerable hesitation. In his speech a few days before this, on Mr. Beaufoy's motion for the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, although he seems to have come at last to the conclusion that the legislature ought not to have attacked persons professing the popish religion with penalties and disabilities until they had actually begun to carry into practice their dangerous doctrines, yet, in a preceding passage, he had expressed very nearly the same opinions as Stanhope. After observing that in the position,—that the actions of men and not their opinions were the proper objects of legislation,—he was supported by the general tenor of the laws of the land, he went on:—"History, however, afforded one glaring exception, in the case of the Roman Catholics. The Roman Catholics, or, more properly speaking, the Papists (a distinction which, he trusted, was perfectly understood by all who heard him, and would ever be maintained by the English Roman Catholics in time to come), had been supposed by our ancestors to entertain opinions which might lead to mischief against the state. But was it their religious opinions that were feared? Quite the contrary. Their acknowledging a foreign authority paramount to that of the legislature; their acknowledging a title to the crown superior to that conferred by the voice of the people; their political opinions, which they were supposed to attach to their religious creed, were dreaded, and justly dreaded, as inimical to the Constitution." This, it must be confessed, is very like a defence of the penal laws against the Catholics, at least at the time when they were passed. As for the distinction taken between the persecution of the Catholics for their religious and the persecution of them only for their political opinions, it certainly would have afforded but little satisfaction to any of the objects of the penal laws, either when these laws were first placed upon the statute book, or when Fox thus pronounced their apology or vindication. Nor would it be much to be wondered at

* As an instance of the nonsense, or worse, of many of the old laws relating to ecclesiastical matters, Lord Stanhope quoted the statute of the 18th Edw. III., stat. 3, c. 2, as enacting that a man marrying two wives or one widow shall be tried for bigamy in the spiritual court, and so making it equally penal to marry one widow as to marry two wives. His lordship appears not to have been aware that the bigamy here referred to is the marrying a second wife after the death of the first, or the marrying a woman after the death of her first husband, the only kind of bigamy recognised in the canon law. The statute in question is entitled "A statute of (that is, respecting) the clergy."

that persons should be slow to believe that they were punished merely on account of their political opinions, who found themselves excluded from the rights of citizenship, and almost driven out of the pale of society, because they could not subscribe to declarations and oaths against transubstantiation and the invocation of saints. Other provisoes of the bill were, that it should not repeal any part of the Corporation Act, of the Test Act, or of the 12 and 13 Will. III. c. 2, entitled "An Act for the Further Limitation of the Crown, and better securing the Rights and Liberties of the Subject." Stanhope intimated in conclusion, that, in essaying to procure the repeal of the old laws against recusancy, he was not merely seeking to remove a disfigurement from the statute-book. "The laws which he had mentioned," he said, "might be enforced not only by the church, but by a common informer. And he produced above thirty cases in which the persecuting laws respecting religion had been enforced within the last twenty-six years. Some of these cases related to Catholics, and others to Protestant Dissenters. How shocking and disgusting it was to read, amongst those cases, that poor men's tables, chairs, deal shelves, pewter dishes, bolsters, and beds had been sold by public auction, in order to pay the penalties for not going to church! Others of these laws had been enforced within the last ten years, and some within the last twelve months. No later than yesterday he received a letter inclosing the case of a Protestant Dissenter who had been prosecuted under the laws of recusancy this very year."

The bill having been read a first time and ordered to be printed, the debate upon it was taken on the motion for the second reading, on the 9th of June. The motion was opposed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Bangor (Warren), the Bishop of St. Asaph (Halifax), and, in a very clever speech, by Horsley, Bishop of St. David's. The most forcible objection urged against the measure was grounded upon the vagueness both of some of the propositions assumed in the preamble, and even of some of the enacting clauses. The Archbishop of Canterbury said, "that, although he was ready to allow that there were on the statute-book some acts of a persecuting spirit in matters of religion, which had better be repealed, and as willing as any man to agree to their repeal, he could not but object to the present bill proceeding any farther." His grace, however, seemed also to be of opinion that there were many questions, both in religion and morals, which the law ought not to suffer to be discussed, even with the calmest reasoning, except by those who took the orthodox side. "If," he said, "the atheist were to be allowed to defend his atheism by argument, he saw no reason why the thief might not be permitted to reason in behalf of theft, the burglar of burglary, the seducer of seduction, the murderer of murder, and the traitor of treason." The Bishop of Bangor defended the propriety and wisdom of the law obliging all persons to frequent some place of public worship on Sundays, on the principle, which he said could be proved in various ways, that it was the indispensable duty of every man to worship God in the church. It may be doubted how far some of his lordship's right reverend brethren would have admitted such attendance on divine worship as that contended for to have necessarily any thing to do with this principle. How could those who believed in no other church except the established church hold that any theological principle, at least, was satisfied by compelling people merely "to come to some (licensed) congregation or assembly of religious worship," which, since the passing of the Toleration Act, was all that the law actually did? Such public worship could be no attendance at church at all, according to their views, any more than spending the Sunday in the streets or in the fields. Dr. Warren, in the course of his speech, "alluded to a chapel which was opened many years ago in the east part of the town, where a clergyman of the name of Henley (the famous Orator Henley) publicly preached blasphemy for many years together;" so tender, he stated, were the courts of pronouncing a determination which might bear hard on private judgment in matters of religion, that it was not till after many unsuccessful attempts had been made that the suppression of this chapel was at last effected. The bishop contended that, if the present bill passed, they would have a chapel of this sort in every street. Horsley insisted upon the deliberation and caution with which any repeal of a whole branch of laws ought to be proceeded in. "My objection to the bill upon the table," he said, "is, that I can discover nothing in it of this discretion: it drives furiously and precipitately at its object, beating down every barrier which the wisdom of our ancestors had opposed against vice and irreligion, and tearing up the very foundations of our ecclesiastical constitution. My lords, if this bill should pass into a law, no established religion will be left. My lords, when I say that no established religion will be left, I desire to be understood in the utmost extent of my expressions: I mean, my lords, not only that the particular establishment which now subsists will be destroyed, but that no establishment will remain of the Christian religion in any shape,—nor indeed of natural religion. My lords, this bill, should it unfortunately pass into a law, will leave our mutilated constitution a novelty in the annals of mankind—a prodigy in politics—a civil polity without any public opinion for its basis." As to some matters not at all connected with religion, which were oddly enough intermixed in the bill, his lordship had nothing to say. He had no objection to the noble earl's eating beef, in preference to any other meat, on any day of the year or any hour of the day. But the very first clause of the bill abrogated in a lump all the laws in the statute-book relating to the observation of the Lord's Day. He admitted that perhaps some extravagant severity in the penalties of these laws might call for mitigation; but to the 1 Eliz. c. 2, § 14, no such objection could be made. "This law," said Horsley, "only imposes upon every person who, without a lawful or reasonable excuse, shall absent himself from his parish church or chapel on Sundays or holidays the very moderate fine of one shilling for every offence, over and above the censures of the church. My lords, this fine is too small to be oppressive upon the poorest of the people. Suppose that the common day-labourer be absent from church every Sunday in the year, and that the fine be levied for every offence, my lords, the amount of it in the whole year, even upon the supposition that it may be levied twice on each Sunday, is much less than the offender would probably squander in the same time in riotous pleasures, to the great injury of his family, if he were released from the restraint of this law. This penalty, my lords, is just what the penalty of such a law should be; it is a lighter evil to the individual than he will be apt to bring upon himself by the neglect of that which the law requires to be done: for, my lords, it is a notorious fact, that the common people of this country, if they do not keep the Sunday religiously, keep it in another manner; if they do not go to church, they spend the day in houses of riotous pleasure." When we read such an argument as this, we feel the change of times, and how much we have cast away for ever, in theory at least, if not in practice, of the principles upon the subject of religious liberty that were generally received fifty years ago. Bishop Horsley was one of the ablest men of his day; yet a speaker who should now reason in this way, advocating the expediency of preventing the labouring classes from spending their money improperly by a moderate annual tax of five pounds sterling on such of them as did not go to church, would be thought to be turning the matter into burlesque. The bishop, in continuing his harangue, dwelt upon the abatement of any little severity there might be in the law by the allowance given to lawful and reasonable excuses. A reasonable excuse, he argued, was every excuse which the reason of man may approve, judging not by the laws in being at the time when the statute was passed, but by its own laws and its own maxims. For example, in the present state of manners, great distance from the parish church or chapel must be deemed a reasonable excuse. And, added the right reverend prelate, "in the present state of manners, I conceive, my lords, that the ordinary occupations of life form a reasonable excuse of absence from divine service upon holidays, with the exception of a very few—namely, Christmas Day, Good Friday, the King's accession, and occasional fasts and thanksgivings. . . . With the exception of these few days, the ordinary occupations of life are, as I conceive, a reasonable excuse of absence from church on any holiday. My lords, they are much more; they are a lawful excuse—they are such an excuse as the magistrates before whom an information may be laid are bound by law to take notice of." But surely the bishop could not mean to assert that such an excuse as this could be held a good plea in the contemplation of the law coming from a person who had no occupation whatever, or no real cause to detain him from church except his own inclination. If his lordship's meaning was, that it would be defence enough for any person charged with absenting himself from divine service on a holiday, to answer merely that it was no longer customary for people to go to church on that day, then it would have been better to have said so distinctly—and it would also clearly be better at once to abolish a law which must upon this view be regarded as, to all intents and purposes, a dead letter. In the sequel of his speech Horsley made some observations on the proper limits of that right of private conscience which the existing laws enforcing attendance at church were asserted to violate. "My lords," he said, "the right of conscience is unalienable; but it is not infinite, it is limited. The right of conscience is unalienable, within the limits of a certain jurisdiction. Conscience and the magistrate have their separate jurisdictions; each is supreme, absolute, and independent, within the limits of its own. The jurisdiction of conscience is over the actions of the individual as they relate to God, without reference to society: conscience judges of what is sinful or not sinful in our actions. The jurisdiction of the magistrate is over the actions of men as they respect society: he is the judge of what harm may or may not result to society from our actions; and this harm he has a right to restrain and to punish, in whatever actions he describes it, in defiance, my lords, of the plea of conscience. In the exercise of this right the civil magistrate is supreme and absolute, as conscience is in the exercise of hers. Conscience cannot be conscientiously pleaded against the magistrate in the exercise of this right." And it must be confessed that, however harshly this doctrine may sound, it appears to flow necessarily from the very nature of a political society, which would be reduced to confusion and dissolved if the supreme authority were liable, in any matter whatever, to be set at defiance by even the most conscientious convictions of individuals. The casuistry of the matter does not lie here, but in the question of how far the individual ought to comply with the law when it is opposed to his conscience—whether it is his duty to do what it requires, or to prefer paying the penalty to rendering obedience. That in the one way or the other the authority of the law must be upheld is clear upon the very definition of what a law is. In fact, the law may be regarded as the general conscience of the community, to allow which to be contravened in any case by the private conscience of an individual would manifestly be the height of absurdity and injustice. Thus, in the particular case at present under discussion, the general judgment having determined, possibly for ends which appeared to it of the highest importance, that attendance on divine worship should be universally enforced by fines or other penalties, this regulation was surely not to be set at nought—in other words, to be in effect repealed and annulled—by any individual who should hold, however conscientiously, that it was wrong to obey it. There are various ways in which the difference between such dissenting individuals and the rest of the society may be settled: they may persuade the rest that the law is really objectionable, in which case it will be given up; or, without persuading the other party, they may, by force or stratagem, get the upper hand of them, and compel them to abolish it; or, if they can compass none of these things, they may break off from the community of which they have hitherto formed a part, and try if they can find or form another for themselves in which the laws shall be more to their mind. But meanwhile, as there is no extraneous authority to which the parties are amenable, the strongest of the two evidently both must and ought to have its own way; the law must be maintained, at whatever expense to the consciences of its opponents. Of course it is an important principle of legislation that regulations thus conscientiously objected to by a portion of the community should be resorted to as sparingly as possible; but it is not possible that they should be altogether avoided, so long as the diversity of human opinions upon all sorts of subjects continues to be what it has ever been, and what there is every reason to believe it ever will be, while any freedom of thought shall exist.

The three Welsh bishops, who thus bore the burthen of the debate, all protested against Stanhope's doctrine that the canons were not binding on the clergy; and Horsley even asserted that he received maxim that they were not generally binding on the laity was to be understood with many exceptions and restrictions. But no one of the right reverend prelates appears to have really answered or noticed the noble earl's argument on this head. What Stanhope said was, that the statute of the 25th of Henry VIII., which James I. cited as his authority for ratifying the canons of 1603, only gave an authority to ratify a revision of old canons, which revision was enacted to be made, not by the convocation, but by a committee, half laymen, half clergy; consequently, James's ratification was null and void in law. The bishops chose to suppose that his lordship's objection rested on the act of the 17th of Charles I., abolishing the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the heads of the church, which act they rightly stated was repealed as to that matter, and the ecclesiastical jurisdiction restored, by a subsequent act of the 13th of Charles II.; but when Horsley, after going over the matter, intimated his suspicion that a proviso in this latter statute, declaring that it should not have the effect of confirming any canons not formerly confirmed, allowed, or enacted by parliament, was probably the foundation of his lordship's "singular opinion," Stanhope shook his head in dissent.

In reply, Stanhope said he was determined to persevere with his measures of ecclesiastical reform in the face of whatever opposition; and, if the right reverend bench would not suffer him to remove their rubbish by cartsfull, he would endeavour to carry it off in wheelbarrows; and, if that mode of removal was resisted, he would, if possible, take it away, a little at a time, with a shovel. The question being then put, the motion for the second reading of the bill was negatived, apparently without a division. Stanhope immediately produced another bill, entitled "A Bill to repeal an Act of the 27th of Henry VIII., to prevent vexatious suits relative to prosecutions for tithes from the Quakers;" but, after a short conversation, it was agreed that this measure should not be formally presented till another day. When, upon his lordship remarking that his second bill would probably meet with the same success as his first, Thurlow, nodding his black brows, seemed to scowl from the woollack a cordial assent to that prediction, Stanhope exclaimed, "On another occasion I shall teach the noble and learned lord law, as I have this day taught the bench of bishops religion." The debate on the Tithe Prosecutions Bill was taken on the 3rd of July, on the motion for its being committed. By the 7 and 8 of Will. III. c. 8, it had been enacted that small tithes, under the value of forty shillings, might be recovered by complaint to two justices of the peace; by another statute (c. 34) of the same year the same regulation had been extended to all tithes, great or small, for which Quakers were liable, under the value of ten pounds; and, by the 1 George I. stat. 2, c. 6, it was extended to all other dues or payments to the clergy, such as Easter dues, &c., withheld by persons of that persuasion. Ever since the passing of these laws, the manner in which tithes and other dues were usually recovered from Quakers had been by application to two justices of the peace, who ordered a distress to be made on the goods of the party. But recently, Lord Stanhope stated, some of the clergy had preferred seizing and imprisoning the persons of their Quaker debtors, under the 27 Hen. VIII. c. 20, which authorized parsons, vicars, or curates, by due process of the ecclesiastical laws, to convene any one refusing to pay his tithes, offerings, or other dues, before his ordinary or other competent judge, who, for any contempt, contumacy, or disobedience was to require the assistance of any two justices of the peace for the shire; and then such justices were empowered to attach the party's person, and commit him to ward, there to remain, without bail or mainprise, until he shall have found sufficient surety to give due obedience to the process, decrees, and sentences of the ecclesiastical court. Under this law a Quaker, a man of some property, had, about two months before, been incarcerated in the common gaol of Worcester, for refusing to pay a sum of five shillings, was there still, and to all appearance, if he did not desert his religious principles, must remain in confinement for life. At Coventry six Quakers had been lately prosecuted for Easter offerings, amounting to about fourpence each, and, having been brought into the spiritual court, had been subjected to such expenses as had swollen this original debt of two shillings to very nearly 300*l*. "But, as by their religion they never can pay," continued Stanhope, "nor any of the other Quakers for them, some of them have been excommunicated; the consequence of which is, that they cannot act as executors, that they cannot sue in any court to recover any debt due to them, and, in forty days after excommunication, they are liable to be sent to prison, there to remain till death shall deliver them from a gaol, where they may be dying for years, and perish by inches; and this merely for the sake of a few pence; which few pence even might have been immediately recovered by means of the humane act of King William, had the priest thought fit." Some of these Quakers, his lordship added, were so highly respected at Coventry, that some of their neighbours who were not Quakers had raised money by subscription to stop all further proceedings against them; but this interference, he contended, would have the most fatal effects upon the whole body of Quakers for the future, inasmuch as it would only serve to whet the avarice of the proctors of the spiritual court. His lordship expressed his willingness that the clergy should recover their tithes, even to the last farthing, but not by means that were tyrannical or vexatious; and he therefore proposed, in the present bill, to repeal the act of the 27th of Henry VIII., and to declare that no suit should hereafter be brought or be maintainable in any ecclesiastical court for the recovery of any tithes, dues, or other spiritual profits. Lord Kenyon, however, thought the 3rd of July too late in the session for the introduction of a bill which required the most serious discussion: to leave the right of the clergy to recover their tithes in the hands of a justice of the peace, he also said, was an arrangement not to be borne, and far worse than would be the abolition of tithes altogether. Lord Abingdon, too, delivered something like a sermon against the measure, which he was afraid might raise a confagra-

tion that would endanger the whole fabric both of church and state—although he acquitted its author of any such design, expressing the highest opinion both of Stanhope's talents and of his goodness of heart, founded, as he stated, on his knowledge of him in former days, when they had been bred up together in the same seminary at Geneva; but he implored his old fellow-student not to persist in pointing out, as he was doing, to the numerous incendiaries in the country how to throw all things into anarchy and confusion: on that subject he would say no more at present, but the times, he feared, were coming when he should be forced to speak out more plainly;—and, in the end, on the question being put, the motion for committing the bill was negatived, apparently without a division.

We have gone into the subject of these two bills of Lord Stanhope's at the greater length, partly because the old laws which he attempted to abolish still, we believe, after the lapse of more than half a century, remain most if not all of them on the statute-book, and may be any day enforced. The debates, also, both upon these measures and upon the other propositions that were brought forward in parliament during this period for the alteration of various parts of our ancient ecclesiastical system abound in matter that illustrates the actual state both of religious liberty and religious opinion at the time. We have confined our notices, and shall continue to do so, principally to the facts stated by the various speakers, counting their mere general reasonings to belong rather to moral philosophy than to history.

The next great discussion of this kind took place in the following session in the House of Commons, when the question of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts was once more brought forward on the 2nd of June, 1790. The motion, which was conceived in the same terms with that submitted in the preceding year by Mr. Beaufoy, was, on this occasion, made by Fox, who introduced it by a long speech. It ran, however, for the greater part, merely upon the arguments and considerations which are familiar to everybody in favour of religious toleration, and contained hardly anything worth repeating at the present day. At the moment when it was delivered the mighty political earthquake, the first throes of which were shaking a neighbouring realm, was already gathering around it the hopes and fears of all classes of men in England, and both the most conspicuous leaders among the dissenters and their present distinguished advocate had, ere now, sufficiently indicated, on several occasions, the sympathy which they felt for the regenerators of France. It was a feeling, whether wise or the reverse, the manifestation of which was little likely to recommend either the advocate or his clients to the audience he now addressed. Yet the subject could not be altogether passed over, although Fox dwelt as long as he could upon the loyalty of the dissenters in past times, the zeal with which they had stood forward in support of the constitution at the Revolution, and during the rebellions of 1715 and 1745, before he proceeded to the more delicate topic of their modern politics. "Innovations," he at last observed, "were said to be dangerous at all times, but particularly so now, from the situation of affairs in France. But the hopes of the dissenters were not founded upon the most distant reference to the transactions which had taken place in that kingdom. Their application to the House on the present subject had been made three years ago, when the most sagacious among them could not form anything like a conjecture of what had since happened in that country. . . . Yet," he added, "he saw no reason why the example of France ought not to have its influence: the church there was now suffering for its former intolerance. However he might rejoice in the emancipation of near thirty millions of his fellow-creatures, and in the spirit which gave rise to the revolution, yet he was free to own there were some acts of the new government which he could not applaud. The summary and indiscriminate forfeiture of the property of the church came under this description. But the violence of this proceeding might in some measure be attributed to former ecclesiastical oppressions; and, in particular to the impolitic revocation of the Edict of Nantes. . . . Previous to this period there existed no Test: Protestants and Catholics were indiscriminately admitted into civil and military offices; but by that rash measure liberality and toleration were thrown away, the arts and manufactures were driven into other countries, to flourish in a more genial soil, and under a milder form of government. This should serve as a caution to the Church of England." Afterwards he alluded to certain recent publications of Dr. Priestley and Dr. Price. The former had openly avowed himself hostile to the established church; but this, Fox said, was no worse than what had been done by the present Duke of Richmond and by Pitt himself, both of whom had, a few years ago, endeavoured to alter the existing constitution of parliament, and both of whom were now high in office—one of them, indeed, at the head of the government. After such instances of what little influence opinions had on practice, he jocularly added, Dr. Priestley might, with as much safety, be set at the head of the church as the right honourable gentleman at the head of the treasury. As for Price, he had, he said, in his sermon on the anniversary of the Revolution, "delivered many noble sentiments worthy an enlightened philosopher who was unconfined by local attachments and gloried in the freedom of all the human race;" but Fox did not approve of politics from the pulpit, and, although he agreed with Price in his general principles, he considered that his arguments would have better become a speech than a sermon. In conclusion, he ventured upon a prophecy which was certainly not fitted to make much impression upon the more reflecting among his hearers. "Whatever," he said, "might be the fate of the present question, of this he was fully confident, that, if the Test laws were once repealed, the jealousy of the church would be at an end: if the barrier of partition were removed, the very name of dissenter would be no more."

After the motion had been seconded in a short speech by Sir H. Hoghton, Pitt rose to oppose it, and spoke at great length. He endeavoured to turn to account a recent proceeding of the dissenters, who had published certain resolutions, signed by a Mr. Jeffries, directing their friends to vote at elections for such members as should by their conduct on this question prove themselves to be friends to civil and religious liberty: this, Pitt argued, was attempting to impose a test upon the members of that House, at the very moment that they were seeking relief from a test themselves. Throughout his speech, the premier expressed himself with much more decision than he had done in the debate of the preceding session on the necessity of maintaining the Test and Corporation Acts as indispensable securities of the existing constitution of church and state. On both sides men were warmed and excited by the aspect of the time, and doubt and indifference alike were now giving way everywhere before the eager feelings that were drawing all towards one or other of the two great opposing arrays,—that of the defenders of existing institutions, or that of the reformers and regenerators. Pitt was elaborately and ably answered by Beaufoy; and then, after Mr. Powys had delivered a short speech, in which he made the remark that Fox's principles, if carried out, would open places of trust and power not merely to the Protestant dissenter, but to the Papist, the Jew, the Mahometan, the disciple of Bramah, or of Confucius, and the sectary of every religious persuasion (or, he might have added, of no religion at all), to which Fox responded by a Hear! hear! of assent—so long a way had he now been carried a-head of his hesitating half-admissions of the preceding session,—and Mr. Yorke had also said a few words, Burke rose. Fox had already intimated that his right honourable friend, whose opinions, he said, always had the greatest weight with him, did not think as he did on the present question; and Burke now commenced his speech by stating that on the two former occasions when the question had been agitated he had absented himself from the House, not having brought his mind to any decision on the subject, and even yet he had not been able to satisfy himself altogether, though certainly in a much greater degree than before, when he could not lay hold of any one straightforward principle for the better guidance of his judgment. He was now, however, from information he had lately received, ready to say why he could not vote for his right honourable friend's motion. He defended Fox from an attack that had been made upon him by Pitt, who had said that, if a man of his bold and enterprising character became minister, he might endanger the safety of the state by his countenance of dissenters upon the principles he had that night avowed. The manner in which his right honourable friend had opened the question, Burke observed, and the many very weighty and sound arguments he had brought forward, in a manner so open and clear, ought to have rescued him from such a sarcasm; and he then recalled to Pitt's recollection the much broader and grosser language than any that had fallen from Fox that had been used on one occasion in the House of Lords by his own father, the late Earl of Chatham, in reference both to the ritual and the priesthood of the established religion, when he concluded a passionate defence of the dissenters by exclaiming, "We have a Calvinistic creed, a Popish liturgy, and an Arminian clergy."* Yet Chatham had for some years directed the government of the country with equal glory to the national character and safety to the constitution both in church and state. Turning to the question immediately before the House, Burke began his reply to Fox by a characteristic declaration. "Abstract principles," he said, "as his right honourable friend well knew, he disliked and never could bear; he detested them when a boy, and he liked them no better now he had silver hairs." With the deduction of natural rights, therefore, into which Fox had gone, he did not concern himself: he found himself and his fellow-countrymen in a state of artificial society, which had annihilated all natural rights; and in discussing this question he could only look to the actual circumstances of the times. He then contended that the established church, which he avowed his anxiety to preserve, was at present in real danger; that there was, not a false alarm calculated to answer some purpose of mischief and oppression meditated by the church herself, but strong and warrantable ground of serious apprehension for the church's safety. This he endeavoured to make out by quotations from the proceedings of certain bodies of the dissenters, and the publications of some of their clergy—Mr. Robinson, Mr. Palmer, Dr. Priestley, and others, all breathing the most violent hostility to the establishment, and the determination to exert every effort to effect its overthrow. He denounced the destruction of the French church as a shameful act of spoliation; but pointed to it at the same time as a lesson teaching that every symptom of danger to that of this country ought to awaken apprehension, and make the House proceed in regard to all such propositions as the present with additional caution. Had the question been brought forward ten years ago, he should have voted for the repeal; but at present a variety of circumstances made it one which it was in his opinion imprudent to stir. He did not, however, approve of the existing test, and should be glad to propose the substitution of another, the draft of which he had in his pocket, if the House would grant him a committee to examine into the conduct of the dissenters, and the doctrines respecting the established church which they had recently avowed. If the statements he had made as to that conduct and these doctrines should upon investigation turn out to be unfounded, he would hold himself bound to vote for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts. Other shorter speeches followed from Mr. W. Smith in support of the motion, and from Mr. Wilberforce and Sir William Dolben against it; and then Fox rose to reply. What he had heard, he said, with the greatest concern in the course of the debate was the speech of his right honourable friend (Burke). "It had filled him with grief and shame. Sentiments had been uttered which he could have wished to have remained a secret for ever. Though he was indebted to his right honourable friend for the greatest share of the political knowledge he possessed—his political education had been formed under him—his instructions had invariably governed his principles;—yet, mortified as he had been by his speech of that evening, he had, however, received this consolation from it,—that every principle which he had laid down had been avowed by his right honourable friend in the course of his speech. While he had stated his principles, and had argued from an application of inferences deducible from those principles, his right honourable friend had, on the contrary, taken pamphlets, private letters, anecdotes, conjectures, suspicions, and invectives for the materials of his speech, which he had worked up with all the charms of fancy and the embellishments of oratory for which his right honourable friend was so eminently distinguished. Such had been the grounds upon which he had founded his opposition to the motion under discussion, to which he declared he should have been a friend ten years ago. What did this prove, but that he had retained his opinion upon the subject ten years longer than his right honourable friend?" Fox, however, was well aware that in the part he was now taking he had the feeling both of the House and of the country against him, and that the particular time chosen for urging this claim of the dissenters was generally considered the strongest objection to it. By all who apprehended danger to the existing institutions of the country, and were anxious for their preservation, such a movement at the present moment was regarded as merely a part of the warfare which they believed was about to be waged against whatever their patriotism or their prejudices held dearest and most sacred—as but a prelude to other attacks, which would be the more difficult to be repelled if this should succeed. Fox had admitted in his opening speech the temporary unpopularity to which he should probably subject himself by the course he was taking; and some remarkable indications in the course of the debate showed the extent and the powerful influence of the feeling which existed against the motion. First, one member, Mr. James Martin, member for Tewkesbury, rose and stated that, although the opinion which he had entertained in favour of the repeal remained unchanged, he yet felt himself obliged on the present occasion to vote against the motion in compliance with the positive instructions of his constituents; and afterwards, another member, Mr. Samuel Smith (who sat, we believe, for the city of Worcester*), who had also voted with Beaufoy in the preceding session, made a declaration to the same effect. The result was what might have been anticipated from these and other symptoms: when the House divided, at a late hour, the motion was negatived by a majority nearly nine times as great as the last division had shown, the numbers being, Yeas 105, Noes 294. From the date of this quietus the question of the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, in so far as they affected the English dissenters, was no more heard of in parliament during the present period, nor for many years after.

In the new parliament, however, which assembled in November, 1790, an attempt was made to obtain an exemption from these laws for persons born in Scotland. On the 10th of May, 1791, a petition from the General Assembly of the Scotch Church to that effect having been first presented and read, Sir Gilbert Eliot, who had taken charge of the petition, rose to move that the House would immediately resolve itself into a committee to consider how far the clause of the Test Act imposing upon persons taking office the obligation of receiving the sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England extended, or ought to extend, to persons born in that part of Great Britain called Scotland. It may appear at first sight somewhat remarkable that, although eighty-five years had now elapsed since the union with Scotland, this was the first application that had come from the General Assembly for relief from a statute which, whatever might be urged in support of its expediency as a security for the established church in England, was scarcely to be defended upon the same grounds in so far as it was directed against natives of the northern part of the island, who were the members of a church equally recognised by the law with the Anglican establishment. But the fact is to be explained by the doubt which existed as to whether the Test Act really was operative against natives of Scotland; seeing that it had been declared, by the 4th Article of the Treaty of Union, that there should thenceforth be a communication between the subjects of the two kingdoms of all rights, privileges, and advantages which did or might belong to the subjects of either, excepting only where it was otherwise expressly agreed in the treaty; and by the 25th, that all laws in either kingdom, so far as they were contrary to or inconsistent with the terms of the articles of the said treaty, or any of them, should from and after the Union cease and become void. On the other hand, however, the act for securing the Presbyterian church government in Scotland, which was incorporated with the Act of Union, had only provided that none of the subjects of the kingdom of Scotland should be liable to, but that all and every of them should be for ever free of, any oath, test, or subscription inconsistent with the said Presbyterian government, worship, and discipline, within that kingdom, and that the same should never be imposed upon or required of them in any sort within the bounds of that church and kingdom; and the Act for securing the Church of England, which was likewise made an essential and fundamental part of the compact, had expressly declared that all the acts of parliament previously in force for the establishment and preservation of the Church of England, and the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government thereof—among which, unquestionably, were to be included the Test and Corporation Acts—should still remain and be in full force for ever. Accordingly, the Annual Indemnity Acts had never made any distinction between the natives of Scotland and of other parts of the kingdom in the protection which they extended to the holders of office who had not qualified within the legal time. The present petition of the General Assembly, Sir Gilbert Eliot stated, had originated with an individual clergyman of the Scottish church, a man of learning and highly esteemed for his private worth, who was actuated by no party motive, but had been induced to submit his proposition to the Assembly by the late debate on Mr. Fox's motion for the repeal of the Test Act, in which it appeared to him the relief of the English Dissenters had been resisted almost entirely upon considerations which told rather in favour of extending such relief to members of the Church of Scotland. Having communicated his views to another clergyman, they joined in drawing up a motion, or overture as it is called, which, after receiving an ample discussion, was unanimously adopted by the Assembly, and instructions given to the general committee called the Commission to take the necessary steps for effecting the desired object. In the Commission also, of course, all parties professed to approve of the object; but it appeared that there had been a difference of opinion as to the proper mode of proceeding, and the present petition had only been carried by a vote of nine against eight—numbers indicating, by the by, the slight degree of interest that was taken in the matter, for the Commission consists of all the members of the Assembly, who amount to about four hundred, although it is true, indeed, that it is not usual for any but those residing in Edinburgh or the neighbourhood to attend. Sir Gilbert, after urging that the danger to the established church, which was made an objection to the claims of the English Dissenters, could not be fairly employed as an argument against the present motion, proceeded to encounter the objection founded upon the alleged ratification of the Test Act in the Treaty of Union. He read, we are told, "three or four clauses to prove that the matter was left completely open, and entered into a detail of the proceedings of the Scotch and English parliaments, from which he drew a conclusion that the exemption from the test was considered to be contained in the treaty. Propositions were made, he said, in the Scotch parliament, prior to the Union, to insert in the articles provision for an exemption against the Test Act, which propositions had been negated. An exemption was, however, made, in Scotland, from all future tests; by which it was plain they did not mean to renounce the exemption from tests in other parts: the delicacy of the times rendered it advisable for them to abstain from explicit declarations; but it was evident that they had left it open to the construction of future reason and justice. The parliament which negated the provision for the exemption were known to have gone upon the idea that it had been provided for in the articles as they stood; and the same opinion had been acted upon by the British parliament." But it is evident from the express stipulations of the treaty, which have been quoted above, that this account of the matter would hardly stand a close examination. Without going the length of holding that either this or any other part of the Act of Union was to be considered absolutely fixed and unalterable, we cannot see how the Scotch could pretend that they had not, by adopting the Act for the Security of the Church of England as part of the treaty, distinctly subjected themselves to the provisions of the Test and Corporation Acts in England, in the same manner with all other persons accepting or holding office there, at least until the parliament of the United Kingdom should repeal that part of the treaty. It might be contended, to be sure, that the present motion was, in substance, merely asking parliament to do this, or, at any rate, that, if Parliament was competent to such repeal, it might entertain the present motion. The motion, which was seconded by Francis, was supported by Mr. Pulteney,* Mr. Anstruther, Sir Adam Ferguson, Fox, and Colonel Macleod. Fox's speech was the most remarkable on this side, and went farther, perhaps, or at least was more explicit, than any of his previous declarations on the subject of religious liberty. He professed himself, he said, the friend of toleration without any restriction, and, at the same time, of an established church; and every argument, he thought, that could be advanced in favour of either was applicable to the support of the present motion. There appeared to him to be a considerable degree of doubt whether the Test Act did or did not apply to members of the Church of Scotland, and therefore he conceived the motion for going into a committee, to inquire how the law stood, to be extremely proper. But, admitting that it did apply to Scotsmen as well as Englishmen, still it was only the taking or holding office in England that subjected either to the test. Could anything more strongly illustrate the uselessness and absurdity of the law? "If," said Fox, "a man to the north of the Tweed accepted of an imperial office, he was not to communicate with the church by law established there;

* But who was this member? We have not been able to find the name either in Beatson's 'Chronological Register,' or in the lists given in the Parliamentary History. Yet it frequently occurs in the debates during this and the preceding parliament; and in the last mentioned work it is given in the Index of speakers as William Pulteney.

but, if he accepted of the office on the other side of the Tweed, he was required to do so under heavy pains and penalties. There was no law to prevent the king from residing in Scotland. Suppose he were to do so, he might appoint all his officers of state, without any one of them being obliged to qualify according to the Test Act, and let in all the imaginary dangers to church and state against which it was held up as the impregnable barrier. A person receiving his majesty's orders to raise a regiment in Scotland might there appoint all his officers without any test; but the moment they came into England they must take the test within a time limited, or incur the penalty of outlawry." Reverting afterwards to the general principle on which the motion was founded, he avowed his opinion to be, there were few acts on the statute-book regarding religion which ought not to be completely expunged. "Instead of that," he continued, "they busied themselves in explaining, mitigating, or suspending; and, whenever the only proper remedy was mentioned, the answer was, they are not executed—the very worst character that could be given of them. This had been the answer to all the propositions that had been lately made. Ought not the House at last to see that laws unfit to be executed, that were sometimes the instrument of partial oppression, but never of public benefit, were not fit to remain?" The motion, however, met with the most uncompromising resistance from the ministerial side of the House. The opposition was led by the lord-advocate for Scotland, Mr. Robert Dundas,* nephew and son-in-law of Pitt's staunch right-hand man, the secretary-at-war, in a maiden speech; and afterwards both "Old Harry" himself and Pitt advanced to the rescue of the established constitution in church and state. The only member, however, who seems to have regarded the Act of Union as a complete bar to the motion was the Master of the Rolls (R. T. Arden, Esq.†); and even he, although in the beginning of his speech he declared his opinion to be that the conditions of the treaty of Union were unalterable, appears to have afterwards admitted that the part of the compact which was considered to ratify and confirm the Test and Corporation Acts might be changed if "some very strong reason indeed could be stated." The right honourable secretary-at-war undertook to explain to the House the true and precise situation in which Scotland had stood with regard to the Test Act at the time of the Union. "It was certainly known to the Scotch nation," said Dundas, "that the Test Act existed in England, as the debates that ensued in their own parliament, previous to the settlement of the treaty of Union, clearly demonstrate. For, when the articles of the treaty were sent to Scotland, and before they were returned to England, several propositions were made in the Scotch parliament for relieving the Scotch from the effect of the Test Act, which were all, after serious debate, rejected; and, in order to prove why they were rejected, he would plainly state who were the party, that wished to insert that article into the treaty of union. The party who wished not to insert that article consisted of those who were friends to the Revolution, friends to the Hanoverian succession, and friends to the treaty of Union; in short, they were all the great Whig families in the country. On the other side, those who wished to have the Scotch relieved from the Test Act were the enemies to the Revolution and to the House of Hanover, and who wanted to impede and prevent the treaty of Union; and, what was more, they were people who were no friends to, nor had any communion with, the church of Scotland. This came out by publishing the names of those who divided on the different propositions that had been debated in their own parliament; so that, the truth being known, they acted like wise men, and distinguished their friends from their foes, by which means the Union was brought about, and the conclusion certainly was, that, if a different conduct had been pursued, no union would have taken place." He argued, therefore, that it was quite unfair in his countrymen, after having thus undeniably acquired their share of the advantages of the Union by yielding this point at the time the bargain was made, to turn round now and demand back what they had so given up. On the whole, Dundas, in his strong way, protested that, if the present motion should be successful, he could not but think and say that the dissenters of England, in the refusal that had been given to their repeated applications for relief from the Test Act, had been treated unjustly, harshly, and cruelly. Pitt, who rose after Fox, maintained that the doubts which had been expressed as to how the law really stood were quite absurd: having gone over all the facts and circumstances of the case, he came decidedly to the conclusion, "that historical inference, contemporary exposition, and the practice of eighty years proved it to be law, that members of the church of Scotland were not exempted from the Test Act in England." The grievance, however, he conceived was wholly imaginary, in so far as such persons were concerned: he understood that the general sentiment of members of the Scottish church was that there was no harm in communicating with the church of England; those who objected to do so were for the most part dissenters from the established church of Scotland—in other words, were the same description of persons as the natives of England against whom the Test Act was directed. What was thus asserted was certainly not true to anything like the extent assumed, and, if the fact had been as Pitt supposed, much might still have been said in support of an alteration of the law: but the great majority of the members were satisfied with the reasoning they had heard against the motion; and on a division it was negatived by 149 votes against 62. Three-fifths

But, while nothing was effected by this attempt to extend the religious liberties of the Protestant dissenters, parliament had already during the present session consented somewhat to lighten the disabilities of another class of dissenters, whose grievances indeed were of a much more substantial kind. A considerable number of the English Roman Catholics had recently, with the view of allaying the chief apprehensions to which they seemed to owe their exclusion from the rights of citizenship, come forward with a declaration of their non-belief in certain doctrines, sometimes attributed to their church, namely, the doctrines that princes excommunicated by the pope might be justifiably deposed or murdered by their subjects; that no faith was to be kept with heretics; and that ecclesiastical absolution had the power to dissolve moral obligations. Those who made this declaration styled themselves Protesting Roman Catholics,—perhaps not without some notion of propitiating their Protestant fellow-subjects by the assumption of a name sounding a little like their own, though it may probably, at the same time, have had the effect of keeping back many of the more scrupulous among the members of their own communion, who would have joined them if they had not assumed so heretical-looking a designation. The position which a portion of the English Catholics had thus taken up, however, was thought to be likely to procure them some favour from the legislature; and, accordingly, on the 21st of February (1791), Mr Mitford (afterwards Lord Redesdale) moved in the House of Commons for leave to bring in "a bill to relieve, upon conditions and under restrictions, persons called Protesting Catholic Dissenters, from certain penalties and disabilities to which Papists, or persons professing the Popish religion, are by law subject." Mr. Mitford observed that, in Burn's 'Ecclesiastical Law,' no less a space than seventy pages was occupied with an enumeration of the penal statutes that were still in force against Roman Catholics. What he proposed to do now was to pass a measure in favour of the English Protesting Catholics, which would give them the same relief that had been accorded to the Catholics of Ireland by an act passed by the parliament of that kingdom eight or nine years before. The Irish act alluded to is the 21 and 22 Geo. III. c. 24, passed in 1782, for the relief of persons professing the popish religion, who should have taken an oath prescribed in a previous act, the 13 and 14 Geo. III. c. 35, entitled "An Act to enable his majesty's subjects, of whatever persuasion, to testify their allegiance to him;" which oath, omitting the recognition of the king's ecclesiastical supremacy and the abjuration of that of the pope, bound the party taking it only to the rejection of the opinions, that it is lawful to murder any person on pretence of his being a heretic—that no faith is to be kept with heretics—that princes, when excommunicated, may be deposed or murdered, and to the usual affirmation touching the non-existence of any temporal or civil jurisdiction within this realm in the pope or any other foreign power. By the act of 1782, Roman Catholics who should have taken this oath were declared qualified in Ireland to acquire by purchase, descent, or otherwise, and to dispose of by will, any lands or other heritable property, except advowsons, or manors, or parliamentary boroughs; and were also relieved from the 8 Anne, c. 3, subjecting them to fine and imprisonment for not testifying when they heard mass; from the 7 Will. III. c. 5, and 8 Anne, c. 3, making it unlawful for them to keep horses of the value of 5*l.; from the 9 Geo. II. c. 6, imposing amercements on papists for robberies by privateers; from the 6 Geo. I. c. 10, compelling a papist, when elected a watchman, to find a Protestant watchman in his stead; and from the 2 Anne, c. 6, forbidding them to inhabit Limerick or Galway: and popish ecclesiastics taking the oath within six months, and registering their names and abodes, were discharged of all penalties imposed by the 9 Will. III. c. 1, and the 2 Anne, c. 6 & 7, provided they should not be convicted of officiating in a church with a steeple or bell, or at any funeral in a church or churchyard, or of performing any of the rites or ceremonies of the popish religion, or wearing the habits of their orders, excepting in their usual places of worship or in private families, or of using any symbol of ecclesiastical authority, or assuming any ecclesiastical rank or title. The benefits of the act, however, were not to extend to any one who should have been converted, or, as it was expressed, perverted, from the Protestant religion, nor to popish ecclesiastics who should endeavour to pervert any Protestant. We may here also mention that by another Irish act of the same year, the 21 and 22 Geo. III. c. 32, Roman Catholics taking the above-mentioned oath were allowed to keep schools, notwithstanding the 7 Will. III. c. 4, and the 8 Anne, c. 3, provided they did not receive any Protestant among their scholars, and also provided that they had the authority of the ordinary of the diocese, which he might recall whenever he thought proper; and the right of being guardians to their own children, or to those of any other person of their communion, was granted to all Roman Catholics, except ecclesiastics, notwithstanding the 14 and 15 Char. II. c. 14, the 6 Will. III. c. 3, and the 2 Anne, c. 4. These two bills had been introduced into the Irish House of Commons by Mr. Gardiner (afterwards Lord Mountjoy); and they had been carried through mainly per force of the enthusiasm on the one hand, and the alarm on the other, excited by the volunteer associations. Even these influences, however, had not proved powerful enough to secure the success of a third bill which Gardiner proposed, for permitting marriages between Protestants and Catholics. Mr. Mitford's bill for the relief of the English Protesting Roman Catholics contained an oath to be taken by those who were to receive the benefit of the measure, very nearly of the same tenor with that in the Irish act of the 13 and 14 Geo. III. c. 35; and it enacted that no Catholic taking such oath should be prosecuted as a recusant, on any of the old statutes of Elizabeth and James,* for not resorting to church or keeping any servant not so resorting; nor on any of the statutes of Elizabeth, James I., Charles I., and Charles II.,† for being a papist, or reputed papist, or for professing or being educated in the popish religion, or for hearing or saying mass, or being a priest or deacon, or entering or belonging to any ecclesiastical order or community of the Catholic religion; or being present at or performing, or assisting in the performance or administration of, any rite, ceremony, practice, or observance of the popish religion. It relieved all Catholics taking the oath from the liability to be removed from London, under the 3 Will. and Mary, c. 9; from the penalties they incurred, if peers, under the 30 Char. II., by coming into the presence of the king; and from their obligation of having their deeds and wills registered, according to the 3 Geo. I., c. 18. It enacted that no Roman Catholic should be liable to be summoned to take either the oath of supremacy contained in the 1 Will. and Mary, stat. 1, c. 8, or the declaration against transubstantiation in the 25 Chas. II., c. 2; and it permitted Catholics to practise as barristers or attorneys without taking these oaths, provided they took the new oath prescribed in the bill. These clauses, however, did not open the doors of either House of Parliament to Roman Catholics, who were still bound to take the old oaths in all cases (excepting those specified in the bill) in which that was necessary for the acceptance of any place or office or the performance of any function; as it was to enable any one to take his seat either in the House of Commons or in the House of Lords. The oath of supremacy, too, might still be tendered to any person presenting himself to vote at the election of a member of parliament. The bill further legalized Roman Catholic places of worship, provided they were registered and the door kept unlocked during the time of service; and it also, like the late Irish act, removed the penalties against Catholics for acting as teachers, on condition, however, that they received no children of Protestant fathers among their scholars. They were specially prohibited, too, from keeping school in Oxford or Cambridge.

Such, at least, were the enactments of the bill as it was passed by parliament. It was different, however, in some particulars when it was first brought forward in the House of Commons. A standing order had been passed on the 30th of April, 1772, to the effect that no bill relating to religion, or the alteration of the laws concerning religion, should be brought into the House, until the proposition should have been first considered and agreed unto in a committee of the whole House; and, in conformity with this regulation, it was ordered that Mitford's motion should be referred to such a committee on the 1st of March. The motion to that effect was seconded by Mr. Windham, and Pitt also expressed his hope that the House would at least be unanimous in receiving the bill. Fox regretted that the proposed measure did not go a great deal farther—that it did not comprehend Roman Catholics of every description, and grant to them, besides, every right and privilege enjoyed by Protestants. He expressed himself upon this head with great warmth, declaring that he could not but regard the compromise of principle involved in the bill as shameful in the highest degree. When the House went into committee on the 1st of March, Mitford intimated that, without entering into the discussion of first principles, his own opinion was in favour of extending relief from all the penal and disqualifying statutes to all Catholics; but that he had restricted the scope of the present bill in deference to the popular feeling, which would not have tolerated a more comprehensive measure. Fox, however, repeated his former objection: he contended that the prejudices of the people would probably be as much irritated by the partial relief proposed to be granted as they would have been by a bolder and more liberal measure. "He believed," he said, "that in Ireland all the acts against Roman Catholics were repealed, and no danger had arisen; on the contrary, the Catholics had behaved incomparably well ever since, and had given the most substantial proofs of their loyalty and attachment to government." It would seem from this remark that a great part of Fox's violent dislike to the present bill was founded merely upon its title, or rather upon the description given of it in the motion for leave to bring it in; for, although it professed to relieve only the "protesting" Catholics, it was really substantially the same with the Irish act with which he thus invidiously contrasted it. And we may also suspect that the circumstance of the author of the bill being a Tory, or ministerialist, did not contribute to recommend it to his favourable regards. Fox concluded by moving an amendment embodying his views, which, however, he afterwards withdrew. Burke, who spoke at considerable length, allowed that the doctrines asserted by his right honourable friend, though he could not subscribe to all of them, did the highest honour to his head and heart. But for himself, he held that the way to obtain any desired end was to accept a little of what was wanted when more was not attainable; and also that the surest mode of remedying grievances was to proceed with moderation, and do away a little at a time, rather than to attempt curing them all at once. Pitt could not quite agree with the principles on the subject of religious liberty maintained either by Fox or

Burke; but he also seemed inclined to go farther than the present bill. "It was," he said, "his wish that either in that bill, or in some other which might be brought in during the present session, many of the statutes to which the right honourable gentleman opposite to him had alluded should be repealed; and, amongst these, all those harsh and severe laws which certainly ought not to stand on the statute-book, and which it would be shameful to enforce against the Roman Catholics, or any other description of dissenters, for the offences there alleged as offences to be punished in so extraordinary a manner. It would be proper to repeal those statutes if the present bill, or any measure of the kind, passed; because, in that case, if relief of the nature proposed by his honourable and learned friend who had made the motion was granted to one description of Roman Catholics, and the statutes to which he had alluded were suffered to remain unrepealed, it would have something like the effect of re-enacting them, as it would appear that the legislature, apprised, as they had been, of their existence, thought that the other description of Roman Catholics merited to have such disgraceful statutes remain in force against them." The attorney-general, Sir Archibald Macdonald (afterwards chief baron) also thought that the bill was not sufficiently comprehensive. Several printed papers, he stated, had been put into his hands which had appeared in the course of the controversy now going on between the protesting and the non-protesting Roman Catholics, and in which the latter gave as sensible reasons as he had ever read to show that they had as fair a claim to be embraced in the bill as the former. After Mr. William Smith had assured the House that the Protestant dissenters, though seldom feeling or acting together in regard to anything, were nearly unanimous in favour of the present measure, leave to bring in the bill was granted.

On the 1st of April, when the House was in committee on the bill, after one or two alterations had been made in the wording of the clause containing the oath, Fox objected to a change which had been made since it was first introduced in the name by which the persons for whose benefit it was designed were designated; they were now, it seems, described as Papists, instead of Catholic dissenters: but Mr. Mitford stated that the new appellation was given to them at their own desire. When the report was brought up on the 8th the oath was further amended in the part of it relating to the opinions which were to be abjured; and a clause allowing Catholics who should take the oath to present to church livings was struck out. The clause was supported by Fox and Windham, but Pitt intimated—alluding to the other House—that, if it were left standing, it would certainly obstruct the progress of the bill. Fox seems to have by this time become somewhat more reconciled to the measure. He approved, he said, of the clause, but, if there was to be any strong opposition to it, he would not run the risk of endangering the bill by insisting upon it. He argued, however, that the church of England could be placed in no greater danger, nor have any better reason to complain, although Roman Catholics were allowed to present to livings, than the church of Scotland in consequence of the right enjoyed, and every day exercised, by the king, of presenting to livings in it, although his majesty was obliged by law to be himself a member of the English church. To this Mr. Serjeant Watson answered that the king was by law head of the church of Scotland as well as of the church of England. In the end, Fox said, "he certainly had a mental reservation upon this bill, and was not ashamed to own it, because he knew it would not go so far as it ought to do; and, until another bill was brought in to go much farther, he would not be satisfied that justice was done either to the Roman Catholics or many other dissenters from the established church, whom he thought deserving, from their conduct, of the countenance of the legislature. To this bill he agreed, in hopes that a better and more extensive one, upon the principle of toleration, would soon be brought forward."

The debate on the bill in the Lords took place on the 31st of May, on the motion for the second reading. Scarcely any opposition or objection was made to the general principle of the bill; Dr. Hinchcliffe, the bishop of Peterborough, alone spoke of the danger of the measure, and besought their lordships to proceed with caution, contending that the conduct of the Roman Catholics was no criterion of their principles, and expressing his hope that care would be taken to prevent the keepers of Popish seminaries from attempting to convert the children of Protestant parents; but the terms of the proposed oath were subjected to a good deal of criticism. The most remarkable speech was that delivered by Horsley, who still presided over his first see of St. David's. Horsley, who rose after the Archbishop of Canterbury, professed great charity for the Roman Catholics and a perfect abhorrence of the penal laws, but he doubted whether the present bill had been sent up from the lower House in a shape fit to be sent to a committee. He had no hesitation in saying that the opinions which separated the Roman Catholics of the present day from the communion of the Church of England were not of the dangerous description which might render the extermination of those professing them an object of just policy. He quarrelled with the present bill, not for the relief it gave, but for the partiality of its operation, and its insufficiency for its own purpose. "My lords," said Horsley, "this bill is to relieve Roman Catholics from the penal laws, under the condition that they take an oath of allegiance, abjuration, and declaration; the terms of which oath the bill describes. The bill, therefore, will relieve such Roman Catholics as take this oath, and none else. Now, my lords, it is, I believe, a well-known fact, that a very great number—I believe I should be correct if I were to say a very great majority—of the Roman Catholics scruple at the terms in which this oath is unfortunately drawn, and declare they cannot bring themselves to take it." The Catholics who felt in this way were not Papists in the opprobrious sense of that term; they were ready to swear allegiance to the king, to abjure the Pretender, and to renounce both the pope's civil authority and every other obnoxious doctrine specified in the oath; but they objected to the terms in which some of these doctrines were characterised. In particular they felt strongly averse to apply to the doctrine that princes excommunicated by the pope might be deposed by their subjects the epithets impious, unchristian, and damnable, considering that this doctrine, however universally rejected now, was undoubtedly as universally received in former ages, at least as a speculative truth, though it might have been rarely or never acted upon. Why should the Roman Catholics of the present day be called upon to stigmatise their ancestors for merely holding that erroneous opinion, as devoid of piety, as no Christians, and as persons that had died under a sentence of eternal damnation? The terms in which the pope's civil authority was renounced was also matter of scruple to that division of the Roman Catholics which the right reverend prelate considered as the majority. They thought that the words used in the oath went to a denial of the pope's spiritual authority, which they could not conscientiously abjure. The bill, or at least the oath as it now stood, had been drawn up under the direction of, or in concert with, a body called the Catholic Committee, which was held to represent the party known as the Protesting Catholics. But the measure in its present shape was generally opposed by all the rest of the Catholic body. "The matter in dispute," continued Horsley, "is the propriety of the oath as it stands in this bill; which oath the one party is ready to accept—the other reprobates. The dispute began in terms of mutual respect and great moderation; but, as the dispute went on, both sides, as is the case in all disputes, grew warmer: both sides have now lost all temper; and the quarrel, a religious quarrel, my lords, is raging. The scrupulous Catholics speak of the writings on the other side as schismatical, scandalous, and inflammatory. The Catholic Committee charge the former with inculcating principles hostile to society and government, and to the constitution and laws of the British. My lords, these reproaches are, I think, unmerited on either side; but they are for that reason the stronger symptoms of intemperate heat on both sides." And from all this he contended that the bill, if it should pass into a law, would only inflame the quarrel between the two parties—would only put arms into the hands of one of them by which their opponents might be subjected to the most horrible persecution. He feared greatly, from the state to which matters had been brought, that the oath could not now be amended, so as to be made unobjectionable, in committee. "Look," said his lordship, "at the state of the controversy

among the Roman Catholics. Three of the four Roman Catholic bishops who call themselves the apostolical vicars for the four districts of this country—three out of these four have promulgated an encyclical letter, in which they reprobate the oath as it stands in the present bill; and they go farther,—they advance this principle, that a conscientious Catholic ought not to take any oath declaratory of any opinion upon doctrinal points till it has received the approbation of his ecclesiastical superiors. The gentlemen of the Catholic Committee exclaim against this as an extravagant stretch of authority;—I confess, my lords, I see no extravagance in it; I believe, were I a Roman Catholic, I should think it my duty to submit to it;—but the Catholic Committee are indignant under this usurpation of authority, as they think it, of the apostolical vicars; and a paper has appeared, signed by the gentlemen of the Committee, which I know not very well what to call: my lords, it looks something like an appeal to the Pope; and yet I can hardly suppose that an appeal to him has been actually made, or that this is a copy of a paper sent as a formal appeal to Rome.” The Committee, in this paper, it seems, declared that they appealed “to all the Catholic churches in the universe, and especially to the first of all Catholic churches, the apostolical see, rightly informed.” From all this Horsley contended that in present circumstances the British legislature could not with any good effect stir in the matter; it would be perfectly useless to pass a law giving relief, upon the condition of an oath which one section of the persons to be relieved declared unhesitatingly that they could not take, and which the rest said they must go to Rome and ask the Pope whether they could take or no. The remedy for this would be to find an oath which might be sufficient on the one hand for the security of government, and which, on the other, the Roman Catholics generally would be willing to take. Such, his lordship contended, was the oath contained in the Roman Catholic Relief Bill passed in 1778: that oath had in fact already been taken by the majority of the Roman Catholics, and by the four apostolical vicars themselves. He was very sorry that this oath had not been adopted in the present bill; but from what he had heard he had much doubt whether, if their lordships went into committee, they would be unanimous in substituting that oath for the one actually standing in the bill; and for that reason he feared the bill was incurable.

The general opinion of the House, however, was that the bill should be committed. The Bishop of Salisbury (Dr. Douglas) afterwards spoke in its favour; and both Lord Stanhope and the Marquess of Lansdowne expressed their gratitude to the episcopal bench for their support of the measure. Lansdowne said that, although he had always supported the claim of the Protestant Dissenters to relief from the Test Act as a matter of right, he owned his opinion as to the case of the Catholics had been formerly very different. “Their claim, if they had any, was an indulgence, not a right: but, from a strict observance of their change of character and system in every part of the world, he was now inclined to think them a harmless people, who deserved the same indulgence and had the same right as other sects to protection and toleration.” The Duke of Leeds declared himself a hearty friend to the bill; but, from what he had read on the subject, he could not but think that the prelates were right in their dispute with the Catholic Committee. He did not dislike the oath of 1778; but he preferred that which was taken by the Irish Roman Catholics—namely, as has been above explained, the oath prescribed in the Irish Acts of 1774 and 1782. And in the end this Irish oath, with a very slight alteration, was the one adopted: its substitution was moved by Horsley when the House went into committee on the bill on the 3rd of June; and thus amended the bill was passed into a law without any further opposition.

The next session of parliament was distinguished by the passing of a bill for the relief of another description of dissenters, “the pastors, ministers, and lay persons of the Episcopal communion in Scotland.” Ever since the Revolution of 1688 the Scottish Episcopalians had been regarded by the law as a body hostile to the established government, and had themselves in general maintained an attitude of alienation towards the new order of things. The act of Queen Anne, passed in 1712, indeed, had given to the Episcopal church a toleration and legal existence in Scotland, which it had not had for the preceding twenty-four years, and had enabled its pastors to perform their religious functions without impediment from the Presbyterian clergy.* But, after more than thirty years of comparative freedom from molestation, the conduct of many of the Scottish Episcopalians during the rebellion of 1745 again drew upon them the eye of the government; and, immediately after the suppression of that attempt, parliament passed an Act (the 19 Geo. II. c. 38), “more effectually to prohibit and prevent pastors or ministers from officiating in Episcopal meeting-houses in Scotland without duly qualifying themselves according to law, and to punish persons for resorting to any meeting-houses where such unqualified pastors or ministers shall officiate.” “It is notorious,” said the preamble of this Act, “that for many years last past, during the reign of his present majesty, and of his late majesty King George I., a great number of meeting-houses have been set up and maintained in the city of Edinburgh and other parts of Scotland, by persons professing to be of the Episcopal communion, whereof the pastors or ministers have never taken the oaths to his majesty or his royal father, nor ever did, in express words, during the exercise of divine service, pray for his majesty and the royal family; by means whereof those illegal meetings have greatly contributed to excite and foment a spirit of disaffection amongst numbers of persons in that part of the kingdom against his majesty's person and Government which hath been one of the causes of the wicked and unnatural rebellion lately raised and carried on against his majesty in favour of a Popish pretender;" and it went on to state, that the abuse of so much liberty and forbearance as had been hitherto shown, during the present and the late reign, towards such nonjuring Episcopal ministers, made it absolutely necessary that the laws in force concerning them should be more punctually executed, and also that some further provision should be made to prevent the continuance of so great a mischief. It was, therefore, enacted that the sheriffs should make out lists of the number of Episcopal meeting-houses within their respective jurisdictions—that every minister should, before a certain day, produce a certificate of his having qualified himself by taking the oaths to his majesty appointed by law—that all ministers should, as often as they officiated, pray, at some time during the exercise of divine service, for his majesty by name, and for all the royal family in the same form of words as were directed by lawful authority to be used in the prayers of the Church of England—that, wherever these regulations were not attended to, the meeting-house should be shut up—that any pastor officiating without being qualified, or without praying for the royal family as above directed, should be subject, for the first offence, to imprisonment for six months; for the second, to transportation to some of his majesty's plantations in America for life, and to imprisonment for life if he should return to Great Britain;—and all persons resorting to meeting-houses not registered, or where the clergyman was not qualified or the service performed according to the Act, were made liable to a penalty of five pounds for the first offence, and to two years' imprisonment for the second—all peers of Scotland so offending were disqualified from being either elected as representative peers, or from voting for such—all other persons were disqualified from either voting at elections of members of parliament or being themselves returned as members—and persons holding any office, civil or military, in Scotland, were to forfeit their appointments, and to be incapable of holding any other for the space of a year. It was also enacted by this statute that, in future, no letters of orders of any pastor or minister of any Episcopal meeting or congregation in Scotland should be deemed sufficient, or be admitted to be registered, so as to make it legal for the minister to officiate, except such as should have been granted by some bishop of the church of England or of Ireland; and, by a clause in another act, passed two years later (the 21st Geo. II., c. 34), it was declared that this rule should apply even to such letters of orders as should have been presented for registration before the day originally appointed for the rule to take effect:—regulations which seemed to strike at the very existence of the Scottish Episcopal church as an independent religious body. Notwithstanding these stringent enactments, however, we believe the great majority of the Episcopalians of Scotland, laity as well as clergy, continued nonjurors for about forty years longer, owing their escape from the penalties of the law partly to their own unobtrusiveness and scanty numbers, partly to the milder temper of the times and the greater strength of the government, or the more confirmed tenure of the reigning family, which soon began to feel itself sufficiently well established to make it a matter of very little consequence whether it was prayed for or no every Sunday by a few dozens of small congregations of sectarians scattered up and down in North Britain. But the death of the Pretender in 1788 afforded a fair opportunity to the Scottish Episcopalians, of which they readily took advantage, to relinquish at last their antiquated politics, with some decent show of preserving their consistency; for they argued, ingeniously, that, although the Cardinal York, calling himself Henry IX., still survived, his clerical character took from him his right to the crown; and then, as nobody but themselves took that view of the matter, and there was consequently no other person at the moment claiming to be the true heir, they came to the conclusion that it was no business of theirs to inquire farther; and that, thus left as it were without any other depository for their allegiance, they might as well transfer it to the same quarter with the rest of their fellow-countrymen. Thus at last, after holding out exactly a century, they consented to submit to the Revolution, and began, all but a very few, to pray for his majesty George III. It was in these circumstances that the bill of relief we have mentioned was brought forward in the House of Lords by the Earl of Elgin. The only debate it occasioned took place on the 2nd of May (1792), on the motion for the second reading. The object of the bill was to annul the penalties to which the neglect of certain formalities subjected the Scottish Episcopalians under the existing law; and the principal point discussed was the expediency of repealing the enactment, mentioned above, which required a Scottish Episcopal clergyman to have orders from some bishop of the English or Irish church. Thurlow, the chancellor, contended that this was necessary as a test that these clergymen taught doctrines consonant to the principles of Christianity. This argument was very well answered both by Viscount Stormont and Bishop Horsley. Stormont observed that, for one thing, what the law demanded was in many cases utterly impossible. "If Episcopalian pastors were men of conscience, they could not submit to a second ordination; and, if they did, how would they stand in the eyes of their congregation? The latter would have to say, 'You have passed upon us for twenty or thirty years for what you are not. You have preached to us, and we have listened to you; but we now at last find that before this time you never were duly qualified.' And, even if the Episcopalian pastors were to apply to a bishop of England or Ireland, where would they get a title? If an Episcopalian were to say his friends in England would procure him a meeting, would any of the learned prelates opposite to him deem that a competent title? Most certainly not." Horsley exposed the impertinence and unfairness of the state's interference with the ordination of the Episcopalian of Scotland, a body of dissenters from the established church of that country, by pointing attention to the fact that no such interference was attempted or had ever been thought of in regard to any other description of dissenters. And he added: "The credit of Episcopacy will never be advanced by the scheme of supplying the Episcopalian congregations in Scotland with pastors of our ordination; and for this reason, that it would be an imperfect, crippled Episcopacy that would be thus upheld in Scotland. When a clergyman ordained by one of us settles as a pastor of a congregation in Scotland, he is out of the reach of our authority. We have no authority there; we can have no authority there; the legislature can give us no authority there. The attempt to introduce any thing of an authorised political Episcopacy in Scotland would be a direct infringement of the Union. My lords, as to the notion that clergymen should be originally ordained by us to the ministry in Scotland, I agree with the noble viscount that the thing would be contrary to all rule and order. No bishop who knows what he does ordains without a title; and a title must be a nomination to some thing certain in the diocese of the bishop that ordains. My lords, an appointment to an Episcopal congregation in Scotland is no more a title to me, to any bishop of the English bench, or any bishop of the Irish bench, than an appointment to a church in Mesopotamia." The measure, which passed both Houses without any further discussion, speedily produced a considerable addition to the numbers of the Scottish Episcopalian; and since this date, from consisting principally of the lower classes, that communion has come to include the larger proportion of the aristocracy and higher gentry of the country.

In the Commons this same session an important debate took place on a motion made pursuant to notice by Mr. Fox, on the 11th of May, for leave to bring in a bill to repeal and alter sundry provisions of certain penal statutes respecting religious opinions; namely, that of the 1st of Edward VI. c. 1, entitled "An Act against such as shall unreverently speak against the Sacrament of the Altar, and of the receiving thereof under both kinds;" the 1st of Mary, st. 2, c. 2, entitled "An Act against Offenders of Preachers and other Ministers in the Church;" certain statutes of Elizabeth against the Roman Catholics not included in the late repeal;* and the 9th and 10th of William, c. 32, entitled "An Act for the more effectual Suppressing of Blasphemy and Profaneness." In the first instance the motion appears to have been confined to the repeal of the last-mentioned act only. It had been preceded by the presentation of a petition from the Unitarians, against whose denial of the Trinity that statute was principally levelled, or rather, indeed, particularly directed. For the present, Fox intimated, though he lamented the necessity of so doing, he had abandoned the idea of a repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts. "The persons for whom he now interceded were Unitarians, some following the doctrines of Arius, others of Socinus. They entreated of the House, not to establish them, but to relieve them from statutes of pain and punishment. If these statutes were too bad to be put in practice, they ought not to be suffered to exist. . . . Previously to the year 1641, four persons professing Unitarian doctrines had been burnt. Subsequent to that period lived Mr. Peeble,* who was considered as the founder of Unitarianism; he suffered persecution for his religious opinions from Cromwell and Charles II., and, though his character was unexceptionable, the persecution against him did not in the smallest degree relax. But, though the Unitarians were not now persecuted by the legislature, they were in a manner under the lash of divines of the established church. Dr. South, in speaking of them, had traced their pedigree, from wretch to wretch, back to the devil himself. These descendants of the devil were his clients. This was the language of former days. More modern times had produced greater moderation; still, however, invective had not ceased. Dr. Halifax,† speaking of Dr. Priestley, had said that, now he had stated his opinions, he had completed his crimes. Thus a declaration of an opinion had been gravely stated to be criminal. Posterior to Dr. Halifax, Dr. Horsley had contended that even the moral good of the Unitarians was sin; and, however they served God, loved their kindred, and relieved the distressed, they were sinful because they were heretics." Fox maintained that it was the grossest of all insults to tell people thus treated that they were not persecuted—although he does not appear to have had any scheme for absolutely prohibiting and putting down the expression of such theological views as those of Halifax and Horsley, however objectionable he might think them. Nor, indeed, did it show a very clear understanding of what he was talking of to call the utterance of such sentiments persecution in any sense. In conclusion, he described the laws which he wished to have repealed. Among others he would do away with the restrictions and disabilities that still affected the Roman Catholics, notwithstanding the late bill that had been passed for their relief. By that bill, he observed, "it should be remembered that a certain oath was required to be taken; to this oath he believed there was no objection amongst any of the Catholics; but were gentlemen aware that, among the poorer sort, many, from negligence and from economy (for some of them must travel a considerable distance before they came to a magistrate), would omit the taking of this oath? The consequence was that themselves and posterity were liable to all the penalties and disabilities of the ancient statutes. . . . He believed that, if the House were to speak out fairly, there would be less objection, on constitutional sentiments, to the admission of Catholics into it than dissenters. For himself, he objected to neither; but he believed that those who did object feared more the principles of dissenters, who had, than those of Catholics, who had not, the right of sitting in that House: the one class were supposed to be republicans, the other were distinguished for an attachment to monarchy." He then stepped aside to advert to the Marriage Act, "an act," he said, "to which he was radically so much an enemy, that he should, whenever he had the least encouragement, make a third attempt to obtain its repeal: he had made two, and had succeeded in that House, but had always been thwarted in the House of Lords." In the meanwhile he proposed to do away with at least a portion of those laws which prevented a man from speaking, not in the way of ribaldry or ridicule, but advisedly and solemnly, what he thought on subjects of religion. We have omitted any notice of the bulk of the speech, which was made up of an elaborate exposition of the common arguments in favour of toleration, which Fox declared he wished to be universal; although, if he had been cross-questioned, he probably would have found himself forced to admit certain limitations of his principle, which would have taken the wind out of much of his reasoning. He was, for instance, a professed friend to an established church—which, in a declaimer for universal toleration, was much the same thing as an admission of the necessity of laws and government would be in a preacher of universal licence. There are very few principles of universal application in human affairs: statesmanship consists in saying to every principle that can be proposed or propounded, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther."

Fox was answered by Burke, now no longer his friend and associate either politically or personally, in a speech, a note of part of the materials for which was found among his papers, and is published in his works. Burke scouted the notion of deciding the question by general principles. "No rational man," he said, "ever did govern himself by abstractions and universals. I do not put abstract ideas wholly out of any question, because I well know that under that name I should dismiss principles; and that, without the guide and light of sound, well-understood principles, all reasonings in politics, as in everything else, would be only a confused jumble of particular facts and details, without the means of drawing out any sort of theoretical or practical conclusion. A statesman differs from a professor in a university: the latter has only the general view of society; the former, the statesman, has a number of circumstances to combine with those general ideas, and to take into his consideration. Circumstances are infinite, are infinitely combined; are variable and transient: he who does not take them into consideration is, not erroneous, but stark mad—'dat operam ut cum ratione insaniat'—he is metaphysically mad. A statesman, never losing sight of principles, is to be guided by circumstances; and, judging contrary to the exigencies of the moment, he may ruin his country for ever." He then stated various considerations with the view of showing that a check upon the publication of opinions might possibly sometimes be expedient. And, as for the case before the House, he contended that the name assumed by the chief petitioners for relief, the Unitarians, being altogether new to the records of parliament and the history of the country, the House was entitled, and it was its duty, to see by what people, of what character, and under what temporary circumstances, the business was brought before it—to ascertain whether there were any, and what mixture of political dogmas and political practices with their religious tenets—of what nature these political ingredients were, and how far they were at present practically separable from the religious opinions known by the name of Unitarianism. He contended that they were in reality a political faction—that the main purpose of their association, and of their eager proselytising, was to collect a multitude sufficient by force and violence to overturn the established church—that their designs against the church were concurrent with a design to subvert the state—that the model on which they desired to reconstruct the political edifice in this country was, by their own avowal, the new revolutionary French model; and then he proceeded at great length to examine what had already been the deplorable effects of that scheme in the country where it had been actually set up, in regard to toleration itself—to religious belief and practice—to civil happiness—to virtue, order, and real liberty—to commercial opulence—and to national defence—endeavouring to show that in all these respects its operation had been, in the highest degree, destructive and disastrous. From all this he drew the conclusion that, at any rate, the present moment was not the time for parliament stepping forward to confer favours and encouragements upon the Unitarians, and to give them a measure of liberty and power they had not hitherto possessed. He recommended rather deliberation, and even an excess of caution, as safer than such precipitate liberality. Whatever may be thought of this counsel and of the line of argument by which it was supported, there can be no doubt that the question before the House was discussed with a much more direct reference to its true character in this speech than it had been in that with which it was introduced: the case of the Unitarians was eagerly taken up by Fox, as the admirer of the French Revolution, with which they also generally sympathised, of which Priestley and some of their other leaders had been the most enthusiastic and wholesale applauders in this country, and with the avowed principles of which both the abolition of all restrictions on religious profession, and Unitarianism itself as a system of religious doctrine, were naturally allied: the claims put forward were distasteful to Burke, and to those who thought and felt with him, for exactly the same reasons. The motion was of course supported by Mr. W. Smith, himself a Unitarian, and also by Mr. Adam and by Lord North, who still counted himself of the same political party with Fox, although he stated that, if his right honourable friend had proposed the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, he should not have been able to go along with him, any more than he had been on former occasions: it was opposed by Mr. Mitford and Pitt; and then Fox rose to reply. He addressed himself almost exclusively to what had been said by Burke. The two former friends still, it may be noticed, sat on the same bench, that next the table on the opposition side of the House. His motion, Fox said, certainly had nothing to do with France, which it was the fashion with some gentlemen to cram into every debate. "His opinions of the French Revolution were precisely the same now as they had ever been. He considered that event as highly advantageous to this country, and to the world in general; and the right honourable gentleman knew his disposition too well to suppose that any temporary or accidental defeat that the French might suffer in their struggle for liberty would stagger his mind with regard to their success in the result." Paine's 'Rights of Man,' to which, among a multitude of other publications of the day, Burke had referred, Fox admitted was a libel upon the constitution of Great Britain; but Burke's own book—his 'Reflections on the French Revolution'—was, he said, a libel on every free constitution in the world. And then he attacked Burke as an apostate to his former principles: only in the last session he had, he believed, in the discussions on the Catholic Relief Bill, expressed a wish that all the sanguinary laws inflicting death in matters of religion were repealed; but "the right honourable gentleman, indeed, might have altered his opinion, as he had lately done, very suddenly, on various topics." The idea that repealing the statutes in question might give umbrage to the people, Fox treated as a consideration not worth attending to. He did not think that popular prejudice should deter the House from acting upon its own opinion: "the House," he said, "of late seemed inclined to become the slave of popularity." This philippic, however, did not prevent the motion from being negatived by a majority of more than two to one—the numbers being, ayes 63, noes 142.

The next session of the same parliament, nevertheless, was distinguished by the extension to the Roman Catholics of Scotland of the same measure of relief which had already been granted to those of Ireland and of England. The bill by which this was accomplished was moved for in the House of Commons on the 23rd of April, 1793, by the lord-advocate (Mr. Robert Dundas), who, in his speech, stated that, by one of the statutes affecting the Scotch Roman Catholics, "an oath, called a formula or solemn declaration, was imposed upon them, which they could not take without renouncing the religion they professed; and, if they refused to take it, their nearest Protestant relation might deprive them of their estates." Although this law was too odious to be often carried into execution (a reason of itself why it should not be allowed to exist), yet there was then a suit founded on it actually depending in the courts of law in Scotland. "A Roman Catholic gentleman," said his lordship, "as respectable and amiable in character as any man in this or any other kingdom, was possessed of an estate of 1000*l.* a-year, which had been in his family for at least a century and a half: this gentleman, loved and respected by all who knew him, was now on the point of being stripped of his property by a relation, who could have no other shadow of claim to it than that which he might derive from this penal law, which he was endeavouring rigidly to enforce. In the courts as much delay as possible was thrown in his way; but it was to be feared that he must succeed at last, and reduce to beggary a gentleman in every respect a most meritorious subject." Whether the relieving measure came in time to operate in this particular case does not appear; but the motion for leave to bring in a bill, substituting a new form of objuratation and declaration for his majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in Scotland, was unanimously agreed to, and the bill passed through all its stages in both Houses without opposition.*

The attempt to break down still more of the existing statutory defences (or supposed defences) against the ancient religion was renewed in the next session by Mr. Sheridan, who, on the 26th of May, 1794, moved in the Commons for leave to bring in a bill "to prevent certain qualifications, at present established by law, from being required, for the future, from persons who shall bear military offices." This matter had been incidentally brought into discussion some weeks before in the course of a debate on the second reading of a bill introduced by ministers, "to enable subjects of France to enlist as soldiers in regiments to serve on the continent of Europe, and in certain other places, and to enable his majesty to grant commissions to subjects of France to serve and receive pay as officers in such regiments, or as engineers, under certain restrictions." On that occasion Sheridan, in opposing the government bill, had said,—"To many it might seem of no trifling consequence to have such a body of French Roman Catholics, without test or regular allegiance, at the disposal of the executive government: to him their opinions in respect to religion were of no very great importance. Let it be recollected, however, that if, in this age of liberality and religious tolerance, it was not deemed unsafe to entertain in the kingdom an army of, possibly, 30,000 Roman Catholic foreigners, what an insult did we offer to the Roman Catholics of England in continuing those oppressive and degrading restrictions" to which they were still subject! He then intimated that if the present bill should pass he should think it his duty to bring under the review of parliament, without loss of time, the situation of the English Roman Catholics, as well as all the other dissenters; and the object of his motion would be, that all tests on account of religious opinions should be abolished. The Emigrant Corps Bill, as it was called, though perseveringly opposed, was carried through all its stages by great majorities; and Sheridan, accordingly, now came forward to redeem his pledge. He observed that, by an act passed the preceding year in the Irish parliament,* Roman Catholics were permitted to serve in the army in Ireland as officers under the rank of the staff. "Now," he continued, "supposing that any of these officers should be ordered upon duty to England, can anything be more absurd and preposterous than that those men should be subject to heavy penalties for bearing the king's commission, which they do in strict conformity to the laws of their own country?" He then called attention to some remarkable declarations that had been made in the course of the discussions on the Irish act. One member of the House of Commons, Mr. Hobart, who might be presumed to be well acquainted with the intentions of the government, had expressly announced that a similar measure was in contemplation in England; and in the Upper House the lord chancellor had said that "it was not to be supposed that his majesty would appoint men on such posts before the laws of the empire should qualify them to act in every part of it, and that it was more than probable that a similar law would be passed in England before the expiration of two months." Sheridan went on to remind the House that Roman Catholics did not stand in the same situation with Protestants in regard to the disabilities which he now proposed to remove. A Protestant dissenter, besides the protection which he derived from the Annual Indemnity Act, might accept of a commission in the army, if he chose to run the risk of incurring the penalties; a Roman Catholic, if he offered himself to the service, would be at once rejected. "A Mr. Weston, a Roman Catholic," said the right honourable gentleman, "who had been appointed a lieutenant-colonel in one of the new-raised corps, which he himself contributed largely to raise, has been superseded in his command by ministers, or at least his commission has been refused to be signed. This gentleman is, as far as I can learn, one of the most respectable men in the county where he resides; and, what is more extraordinary, strongly attached to the right honourable gentleman (Pitt) and his measures—in which, to be sure, he differs something from me." Opposed as he was to test acts and disqualifying laws in toto, Sheridan said that he should not at present attempt more than he thought was likely to be granted, and therefore he would leave the question of civil employments untouched. But this limitation of the proposition as originally announced was of no avail. Ministers resisted it, not directly, indeed, or on the principle, but by the previous question, which was moved by the home secretary (Mr. Dundas), on the ground, as he said, that Sheridan's arguments evidently applied to the case of dissenters of all descriptions, and he did not conceive the present to be a proper time for the advancing of claims upon which the House had already repeatedly pronounced its decision. Fox said a few words in support of Sheridan's motion. Mr. William Smith stated that it had not been brought forward in concurrence with the wishes of his friends the Protestant dissenters; and, in the end, the previous question was put and carried. This, we believe, was the last attempt that was made in parliament to abrogate any part of what remained of the disabilities affecting the Roman Catholics during the present period.

Two or three minor matters, however, still remain to be noticed to complete the religious history of the period. Among these may be first mentioned the successive attempts that were made to give additional strictness or efficiency to the law for the observance of the Sabbath. The first bill with this object was brought forward in the House of Commons by Mr. Mainwaring, in March, 1794: in the short speech with which he introduced the subject he dwelt principally on the expediency of raising the amount of the penalties inflicted by the existing statutes; and the measure appears to have been defeated, or dropped, without much farther debate. A similar bill which was introduced in the next session reached a second reading, the motion to that effect being carried on the 26th of March, 1795, by a majority of 25 to 21; but the motion for committing it was negatived on the 13th of April following, by 44 to 43. From the report of a short debate which took place on the motion for the second reading, it appears that one of the provisions of the bill went to substitute fine and imprisonment for the pecuniary penalties of the old law, and another to constitute the offence of violating the Sabbath a misdemeanor, subjecting the party to an indictment. Mr. Michael Angelo Taylor, who led the opposition to the measure, further objected, that, whereas by the Act of the 29th of Charles II., which the present bill proposed to amend, no penalty could be incurred unless information were given in ten days, it was now to be enacted that there should be no limitation of time to the preferring of an indictment; "so that, if any person were to have his hair dressed, or took a boat, or rode out the next Sunday after the passing of the bill, he might be punished at any period of his life." On the other hand it was argued that the existing law had been ineffectual. Mr. Eliot observed, that the observance of the Sabbath was notoriously declining: "in the present year the building of great edifices was carried on openly, and in defiance of decency, on a Sunday. Another circumstance which was very offensive in the eye of decorum was, the great number of public waggons which travelled the road on a Sunday. Some few years ago no such thing as a public waggon was seen on the road on the Sabbath-day, whereas nothing was now more common." These statements afford materials for comparison with the state of things at the present day, and may be taken as proving that the decorum of the Sunday is at least as well observed now as it was half a century ago. Mr. Courtenay urged another objection to the bill: "under pretence," he observed, "of enforcing a stricter observance of the Lord's Day by the middling and lower class of people, it gave licence to another numerous set of men to break in upon that observance in a manner which they were restricted from by the act of Charles II. In pursuance of that act, and by the common law, no bailiff or sheriff's officer could execute any writ, process, or execution on a Sunday. By this act they were empowered to execute all such processes for offences committed on that day." Even limited as it appears to have been, this was certainly a most dangerous proviso, and would probably have violated and impaired the sacredness of the Sabbath, considered as the one day in seven of universal rest, and freedom, and security, more seriously than all the other abuses the bill was intended to put down. Among the members who supported the general principle of the bill, however, some, such as Pitt and the Master of the Rolls, expressed themselves as opposed to several of its enactments. After this failure no further attempt of the same kind appears to have been made for some years. But a part of the subject was again brought before the House of Commons in 1799, by Lord Belgrave, who, on the 27th of May in that year, moved for and obtained leave to bring in a bill "for the suppression of the sale and circulation of newspapers on the Lord's Day." In the speech with which he introduced his motion, Lord Belgrave stated that Sunday newspapers first appeared about the year 1780; "but they had not met with much success till within the last year or two, when a paper called the 'Observer' had got into a considerable circulation." Much expectation had also lately been excited by the announcement of an additional Sunday newspaper, to be entitled the 'Volunteer.' The sale of a newspaper, as of any other article on a Sunday, was indeed already contrary to law; it was punishable by a penalty of five shillings and the forfeiture of the article; "but the forfeiture, in fact, amounted to nothing, on account of the manner in which it was to be sued for, and the penalty was evidently too small. He should propose to increase the penalty from 5s. to 40s. If it applied to the whole sale, he would propose 20l.

on the sale of the article altogether; and, in respect to the circulation of these newspapers, he would propose to make it a breach of the peace, and the person found circulating them liable to instant commitment by any magistrate, or peace-officer, or churchwarden." The motion that this bill should be read a second time on the Wednesday following was carried on the 30th of May, after a short debate, by a majority of 25 to 22; but, when it was moved on the 11th of June that it should be read a second time then (the order of the day to that effect having apparently been postponed from the said Wednesday), the motion was supported only by 26 votes against 40; and the bill was accordingly lost. At this time, it may be gathered from the debates on this measure, the Sunday newspapers found it expedient to recommend themselves to their readers by making their leading articles a sort of religious discourses. Lord Belgrave, in one of his speeches in support of the bill, said, "It had been pleaded, in extenuation, that the Sunday papers contained sermons, &c.; but, so far from this being a recommendation, he considered it as an evil, inasmuch as it induced people to neglect going to church." And Mr. Windham, speaking on the same side, observed, "Addison, in the Spectator, selected in his Saturday papers subjects of morality and religion; so did the editors in their Sunday papers; but he could not give the latter credit for their motives: this he considered as a mere selfish plan of theirs, at first introduced till such time as they found their papers were tolerated and better established." It must certainly be admitted, at any rate, that they have long ago discontinued the practice.

One of the strangest subjects ever submitted to a legislature was brought before the House of Commons in March, 1795, by Mr. Nathaniel Brassey Halhed, one of the members for Lymington, and the author of the 'Code of Gentoo Laws,' and other learned works on Oriental subjects; who, on the 30th of that month, startled the House by giving notice that he would, the next day, "bring forward a motion respecting the prophecies of Richard Brothers." Brothers, who had been a lieutenant in the navy, took up the profession of a prophet in 1792; at least it was on the 12th of May in that year that he first made himself known in that capacity to the public by addressing letters to the king, the ministers, and the Speaker of the House of Commons, announcing that by the command of God he should come to the parliament-house five days after, to intimate to the members that the time was come for the fulfilment of the 7th chapter of Daniel, and to warn them to look after their own safety. Accordingly, on the 17th he presented himself at the door of the House of Commons; but the door-keepers treated him and his divine mission with very little ceremony:—he was dismissed, according to his own account, with unfeeling contempt and incivility. After this he prophesied away for some time at a great rate, predicting, in published letters to the king, the queen, and other eminent personages, that Louis XVI. of France would be put to death (six months before the event actually happened, indeed, but not till long after it had become in the highest degree probable that it would happen), that the Empress Catherine of Russia would also die by the hands of the executioner, and a variety of other remarkable events; some few of which, or something like them, could hardly fail to come to pass in that busy time of political convulsions and changes. At last he announced that King George of England would ere long be obliged to resign his crown to him (Richard Brothers); and upon this the government (which surely must at the moment have been as mad as the prophet) had him committed to Newgate on a charge of high treason! Instead of bringing him to trial, however, upon that charge, the more rational course was eventually taken of impannelling a jury, under a commission de lunatico inquirendo, to ascertain if he was in his senses. He was consigned to safe custody as a lunatic, in conformity with the verdict of this jury; but this was not till after Mr. Halhed, who had for some time been one of his avowed disciples and followers, made his first motion. After a brief exordium he proceeded to express to the House the very great surprise he had felt on learning that Richard Brothers had, on the 10th of that month, been taken up by a warrant from the secretary of state, and was then in custody on suspicion of treasonable practices. “I say,” he continued, “I may well be surprised, because I, who am conscious that not a thought, word, or action of my life ever had the remotest tendency towards such crimes, have been for near two months back in the habit of seeing him very frequently, without perceiving in him the slightest symptom that could indicate any bad designs; and because I had latterly observed that his house, in the forenoon, was constantly filled by persons of quality and fortune, of both sexes, and the street crowded with their carriages.” “As a private man,” he went on to observe, “Mr. Brothers is certainly a most unexceptionable character; and I have heard he was always much respected and esteemed in the navy. To his affability, moderation, and good sense in society it is impossible but all those who have visited him must bear concordant testimony.” And all this was probably true enough. Even his books and pamphlets, with all their pervading insanity, show Brothers to have been a man of considerable natural talent, and shrewd and sensible enough on all subjects but one. Halhed himself, who must be regarded as equally mad in the same point of the compass, showed tact and discretion, as well as ingenuity, in much of his present speech. He argued the question of Brothers’s imprisonment for a long time without committing himself by any expression which implied an acquiescence in his client’s prophetic pretensions. He had heard, he said, that Mr. Brothers’s arrest proceeded upon a passage in one of his books relating to the king. This was the prophecy about the transference of the English crown from the head of King George to that of the prophet, which was contained in the last edition of his work entitled ‘A Revealed Knowledge of the Prophecies and Times,’ published on the 20th of February in the present year. It ran as follows:—“The Lord God commands me to say to you, George the Third, King of England, that, immediately on my being revealed in London to the Hebrews as their prince, and to all nations as their governor, your crown must be delivered up to me, that all your power and authority may cease.” “Now,” argued Halhed, “it is fair to say, that, if I were to premise a palpable impossibility to such a proposition, I might make a similar demand on the king. I do not mean that it might not be deemed indecent or insulting; but we see greater and more scandalous liberties taken every day with his majesty in pamphlets, newspapers, print-shops, &c. If, for instance, I were to assert that, on some future day, I should ascend to the top of St. Paul’s, and from thence fly over London, and, in sight of all its inhabitants, to Westminster Abbey, after which the king must seat me on his throne, and kiss my great toe, most people, I allow, would think me mad; but I certainly should not dream of being apprehended for treason. What has Mr. Brothers said? He has said that he shall be revealed to the people of London by a sign similar to that of Moses, namely, turning a common hazel-stick into a serpent, and reconverting it into a rod—a fact full as impossible to all human comprehension as my flying from St. Paul’s to Westminster Abbey; and that he shall then be visibly accompanied by an angel, in the form of fire; after which the king must do so and so. The whole, therefore, depends on the previous performance of a fact which, certainly, no one member of administration deems within the verge of possibility.” He added that Mr. Brothers had actually renounced seeing all indiscriminate visitors two days before he was arrested; “and I presume,” he continued, “it will hardly be said that four or five unambitious men, of whom I was one, having occasional admittance to pass an hour with him in a morning, could have any serious designs to overturn the state and to dethrone the king." The madness, however, came out by degrees. Halhed next proceeded to remark that, as far as his knowledge extended, all the prophecies that Brothers had yet recorded in print had either actually been fulfilled, or remained in a state in which it could not with any propriety be asserted that their accomplishment was impossible. "This I roundly maintain, and defy any man to prove the contrary," exclaimed the zealous disciple, waxing more vehement, and grasping his oracle's mystic volumes, "that out of his prophecies, as here published, not one has hitherto turned out to be false; and all the miserable attempts, in miserable pamphlets, to fritter them away, or demonstrate their failure, have ended in the disgrace of their authors." As for himself, indeed, he was but a recent convert: he had seen the prophet's books for the first time on the 5th of January last, and their author himself on the 10th of the same month. He had read his works, and compared them with the Scriptures, as advised: indeed, having a good deal of leisure, he had taken considerable pains on the subject, and by frequent perusal had discovered a variety of connexions and coincidences between one part and another of the said works, and between the whole and the Scriptures, which, at first sight, had totally escaped his attention. One thing, Halhed confessed, troubled him greatly—the reception which the prophet had met with when he presented himself at the door of the House, and the yet unfulfilled denunciations which he had emitted against the present parliament. Had he not now been in custody, he should certainly have moved that he should be admitted to the bar of the House, and there be suffered to declare to them anything he might have in command from God to say. In the circumstances he had determined upon another course. "I have," he concluded, "taken the liberty to bring with me a complete copy of Mr. Brothers's works, which I have had bound for my own use, and in which I have inserted with my own hand a very great number of notes, elucidations, and similar passages from the Scriptures. . . . I venture, with all humility, to offer my opinion, that much labour of reference and comparison (which is not always a pleasant task) would be saved to those honourable gentlemen who should deem the whole worthy of their attention, by the pains I have taken in adjusting and arranging the various correspondent passages; and, with this view, I beg leave to observe that, if my motion for laying the book on your table be granted, I shall then move that it be printed for the use of the members." It was more than could have been looked for that this mad speech should have been heard to the end without interruption: of course there was no other member crazy enough to second Halhed, and his motion consequently fell to the ground. A few weeks later, however, he returned to the charge; and on the 21st of April, having given the usual notice on the previous day, he introduced a new motion on the same subject by another long lunatic oration. When he reflected, he said, on his motion of the 31st of March, he owned he was both surprised and concerned that it should have experienced so little attention. When he considered the exceeding variety of tempers, dispositions, characters, and pursuits necessarily existing among so many different persons, that he should not have found one gentleman to second him was, he confessed, a subject of some astonishment. However, though his motion of that day so surprisingly fell to the ground, he trusted it did not wholly fail of its intended effect. Many gentlemen, he was convinced, did read Mr. Brothers's books during the interval of the recess, and some he knew to have applied for and received them from the author himself previously to that period. He now came forward to demand substantial redress for the incarceration and other sufferings and indignities to which the prophet had been subjected. The only passage in his works which he had any reason to suspect as in the remotest degree liable to the imputation of a treasonable tendency, he (Halhed) had clearly explained in his former speech. "And the more pointedly to evince my perfect conviction of the innocence of these books, as far as treason is concerned," cried the ardent orator, "I here, in the face of the House, adopt the whole of them as my own. I subscribe to every assertion in them from the first to the last; I make myself a conscientious, a willing accomplice in all the guilt contained in them—habētis confitentem rerum; and I desire nothing more than to be proceeded against legally, and up to final judgment and sentence, upon those grounds." "If now," he added, taking breath after this explosion, "there be treason lurking in these publications, I am committed beyond all evasion, and gentlemen know what to think of me." But there was really no treason in Mr. Brothers's writings. As little was there any in his life. He was neither the institutor of any club that could be called treasonable, nor even (Halhed professed here to speak authoritatively) member of any club at all. Neither was Mr. Brothers a preacher of any kind (although he was a prophet). "He never assembled," said his advocate, "nor thought of assembling, any congregation whatever; and he had neither more intention nor more appearance of collecting an assembly for seditious purposes, or for any purpose whatever beyond that of general conversation, than you, Sir, have at your levee, or the president of the Royal Society at his breakfasts. Mr. Brothers was generally at home a few hours in the morning. Inclination, curiosity, example, occasionally belief in his predictions, induced various persons to call upon him, and he was never denied to them. Members of parliament and ladies of quality have met there without blushing and without offence. Sometimes he was civilly treated, very often cavilled at, and not seldom abused; but he was uniformly calm, obliging, and consistent with all. It follows," added Halhed, with naïveté enough, "that, if there be no treason, there must be much insanity about him." This was, of course, on the supposition that he had been properly placed in custody. But Halhed contended that, if the prophet's books had, in conformity with his former motion, been laid upon the table of the House, no more or better evidence than what they contained could have been desired to evince to the satisfaction of every reasonable man that the writer had not the slightest tincture of insanity about him. The pervading purpose of these books was, to bring about the restoration of peace; and the infinite importance of that object was urged and explained in a thousand passages with all the force of the most versatile genius. Halhed would refer only to one passage: it was in the forty-first page of his Second Book; "and a more striking example," said he, "of sound abilities and correct imagination, I am well persuaded, could nowhere be selected from Demosthenes or Cicero, or any other of the best of human authors, ancient or modern." Descending from these altitudes, however, the learned member argued forcibly, and to appearance fairly enough, on the question of Brothers's arrest and detention, as affecting the rights and liberties of the subject; but everybody seems to have considered him too clearly wrong in the head to be safely followed even on any particular point as to which he might chance to be in the right. So, when he gave in his motion, which was, "That a copy of the warrant of the Secretary of State, for the apprehending of Richard Brothers, be laid before this House, together with a copy of the information on which that warrant was grounded," and the Speaker asked, with solemn formality, "Who seconds this motion?" there was no response; upon which the Speaker said, "As this motion is not seconded, it cannot be put from the chair." But neither Brothers nor his friend Halhed, we believe, was ever cured, though both lived for many years after this date. Brothers, being found to be harmless, was liberated after a short confinement—and, among other things, he afterwards published, in 1798, "A Letter to Miss Cott, the recorded daughter of King David, and future Queen of the Hebrews;" and, in 1802, "A Description of Jerusalem, with the Garden of Eden in the Centre;" but, although a determined few continued to believe in him to the end, the spread of the madness appears to have stopped at an early stage. The non-fulfilment of his prophecy of the restoration of the Jews, which he declared was to take place, under himself as their leader and prince, in the year 1798, and in the prospect of which many persons, thinking they might be better off there than in England, sold all they possessed with the view of going to settle in the Holy Land, must have given a considerable blow to his reputation; but what probably did most to lose him any hold he had on the popular mind was the entire failure of his famous earthquake, which was to swallow up London. This said London earthquake has, however, been the favourite catastrophe of all the English prophets of modern times, and nothing seems to answer better in producing the sort of excitement favourable to the preten-sions of such impostors and enthusiasts, until the time for its happening arrives. Halhed also, putting aside and abandoning all the studies of his preceding life—his Persian and Bengalee, his investigations of Indian laws and history and his imitations of the epigrams of Martial—seems to have employed himself for the rest of his days in trying to penetrate still farther into the profundities of his gifted friend, and pamphleteering away as his champion. He retired from the uncongenial atmosphere of the House of Commons at the expiration of the present parliament, in May, 1796. This remarkable affair may suffice as a sample of the religious delusion and fanaticism of the period before us, always an important part of the history of religion.

The proceedings on a measure for the relief of the Quakers, which was first brought forward in Parliament by Mr. Sergeant Adair, in April, 1796, afford some curious illustration of the state of opinion at the time. Having, on the 21st of April, presented a petition, described as from the people called Quakers, in which it was set forth that seven of their brethren were then prisoners in the gaol of York for non-payment of tithes, and the House was requested to bestow a serious consideration on their case, and grant such relief as might appear proper, Adair, on the 26th, moved for leave to bring in a bill for that purpose. The measure, he explained, in so far as this part of its object was concerned, would consist simply in extending the provisions of an act of the 7 and 8 of William III. from the case of tithes of the amount of 10*l.* to that of tithes of any amount. By the act of William tithes to the amount of 10*l.* might be recovered from a Quaker by distraint upon his goods under the order of a justice of peace; and this had been ever since the plan generally followed in enforcing payment of such tithes. When the amount, however, was higher than 10*l.*, the tithes could only be recovered by process in the ecclesiastical courts, or in the court of exchequer, and, if he refused to make payment, by arrest and incarceration of the party. This distinction the bill proposed to do away with, bringing the recovery of tithes generally under the principle of the act of William; and it was also provided by another clause that the solemn affirmation of a Quaker should be evidence in criminal cases, in the same way as it already was in civil cases. The Quakers, it appears, at this date did not object to being compelled to pay tithes by the seizure and sale of their goods; they would not voluntarily be parties to the payment, but all they complained of was, that the law allowed payment to be enforced, in certain cases, by the seizure of their persons as well as of their goods. Mr. Wilberforce was the first to rise, after Adair had sat down, and to express his hearty approbation of the principle of the bill; and he was followed to the same effect by Pitt, Sir William Dolben, and other members. The only member who made any objection to the measure was the ultra-Whig Francis, who doubted whether in some cases the scruples founded on religious considerations against the payment of tithes might not be professed where they were not seriously felt by persons hoping to pass for victims or martyrs; "and then, generally, whether it might not deserve consideration, how far it might be safe for the legislature to encourage the plea of religious scruples against obedience to the laws, how far that indulgent principle ought to be carried, and by what general limit it ought to be confined in its application." Even Francis, however, thought that undoubtedly the public ought to have the benefit of the evidence of Quakers in criminal trials, as proposed by the bill. In the end the motion was unanimously agreed to; and the bill, having been brought in the next day, appears to have proceeded without encountering any opposition till the 10th of May, when, on the order of the day being read for going into committee upon it, Francis again rose and called the attention of the House to what he described as the fact, that the scruples of conscience on which the measure professed to be founded "did not proceed from the individuals themselves, but from the operation of a higher power, which, at the yearly meeting, prescribed rules and orders in the manner of a government, and excommunicated the persons who did not obey them." Other objections were also started by one or two members, both now and on the second reading; but no serious opposition was attempted, and the bill was passed by the Commons on the 14th, and the day following read a first time in the Lords. On the 16th, however, when the order of the day for the second reading was read, the Archbishop of Canterbury (Moore) rose and observed that the bill involved a question of right of very great importance, and had been introduced at so late a period of the session, that he should move that it be read a second time that day three months; and, after a few words from the Duke of Norfolk, the Bishop of Rochester, and the Lord Chancellor, this motion was agreed to. The measure was consequently lost for the present session and the present parliament. But it was the first subject brought forward in the House of Commons, after the address of thanks, in the new parliament, which assembled in the beginning of October. On the 17th of that month leave to bring in another bill containing the same provisions with the former, was moved for by Mr. Sergeant Adair, in a short speech, in which he again explained to his new hearers the grounds and objects of the measure. "The Quakers," he said, "did not object to the payment of tithes, provided they were not made active in their obedience to the law by which tithes were claimed of them; but their scruples of conscience led them to think it a breach of the divine law for them to be active in their obedience to a civil institution which they considered as repugnant to divine authority; and, as our law now stood, the process might be such as to compel them to be thus active against their conscience: they, therefore, were subject to perpetual imprisonment

when an attachment was issued against their persons for the non-payment of tithes." The motion, which was seconded by Mr. Abbot (afterwards Speaker, then newly become a member of the House), was agreed to; and the bill, being brought in, was read a first and second time without encountering any opposition. But when the order of the day for going into committee upon it was read, on the 24th of February, 1797, a brisk fire was opened upon it. Adair had laid himself somewhat open by at least some of the grounds on which he had advocated the measure, and advantage was taken of his unguarded expressions with eminent dialectic skill by Sir William Scott (afterwards Lord Stowel), in a speech in opposition to the motion, "That the Speaker do now leave the chair." The present bill professed to be brought in for the relief of the Quakers, and to be the same in principle with the act of the 7 and 8 of William III.; but Scott, having desired that statute to be read, contended that so far from its intention being to relieve the Quakers from the persecution of other men, it was manifestly meant to relieve other men from the persecution of the Quakers—it was an additional means or power given to the tithe-owner to recover his property in certain cases from those who detained it from him under the pretence of religious scruples. But the present bill had also been recommended on the ground that it would facilitate the recovery of tithes. "If the Quakers really held it unlawful to pay tithes, how came they to apply for a bill, the object of which was to facilitate the recovery of them? The argument stood thus:—The Quakers considered themselves as unjustifiable in paying tithes, except they were compelled; the House was, therefore, desired to accommodate the mode of compulsion to their wishes. He then put the case either way—that they did pay tithes at present without compulsion, or that they did not. If they did not, their refusal was a persecution of the holder of tithes, and the remedy ought to be a prompt and efficacious one, otherwise the tithe-owner would be an owner, not of tithes, but of suits. The fact, however, he believed to be notoriously otherwise, and that the Quaker at present paid tithes, not from actual compulsion, but under the apprehension of compulsion. Since this was the case, why should the remedy be placed at a greater distance, and thus rendered less prompt and less efficacious?" Then as for the actual sufferings of the Quakers from the existing law, Scott maintained that they were of the most insignificant amount. From inquiries which he had instituted, he had ascertained that for the last twenty years there had not been one prosecution for tithes carried on against a Quaker in the diocese of Canterbury; that in the diocese of Bristol one had been commenced, in consequence of which the tithes were immediately paid; that there had been one in the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry against six Quakers, but that no imprisonment had taken place; and that in the diocese of Worcester there had been only one, in consequence of which the Quaker was imprisoned, but he was liberated owing to an error in the writ. There had, besides, been some, but very few, in the Court of Exchequer during the same period.* In answer to this speech Adair found it necessary to explain that the Quakers had not petitioned for the particular relief provided by his bill. "The Quakers had petitioned for relief as to the imprisonment of their persons. In his situation as a member of parliament, he was to consider what was wise and proper to be done, not what was agreeable to the wishes of the petitioners. The Quakers were not answerable for what the bill contained; he alone was responsible for its contents." It may be doubted, however, if the case was much advanced in the favour of the House by the obtusion of this delicate distinction between the active and the passive in the grammar of morality, which seemed to be so great a favourite with the Quakers, but which would sound to ordinary ears very like a distinction merely between principle and prudence, between manliness and sneaking, between honesty and roguery. One or two honourable members expressed their want of sympathy with Quakerism with great gusto in the course of the debate. A Mr. Fraser said, "The Quakers were a body who evinced the utmost obstinacy and inveteracy in opposition to the laws. They never went to law, but had a mode of deciding their own disputes without any application to courts of justice." And, after all, it is not so unnatural a notion, and may be one that is oftener entertained than expressed (especially among barristers and attorneys), that going to law is one way of showing respect for the law, and giving evidence that one is a good subject. When the question was put it was found that the numbers were equal, 33 on each side; but the Speaker, though against his own opinion, gave his casting vote in favour of the motion, and the House went into committee. The bill, however, rapidly lost favour; and at length, on the 6th of March, it was thrown out by a vote in which the noes numbered 28 and the yeas no more than 12. On this occasion the attorney-general (Sir John Scott, afterwards Lord Chancellor Eldon, the brother of Sir William Scott) stated that he had at first entertained sentiments in favour of the measure, but had changed his opinion upon more mature consideration.†

The only other matter connected with the history of religion that remains to be noticed under the present period, is a measure styled the Monastic Institutions Bill, which was brought forward in 1800. On the 22nd of May in that year,

* Later in the debate, the following statement was made by another speaker. Mr. Burton:—"In the last twenty-two years only three suits against Quakers, and since the time of Queen Anne only seven suits, had gone so far as a hearing, and then, generally, there was the plea of a modus, which would still be brought into the ecclesiastical court, even if the bill should pass. The persons imprisoned at York were there for costs; and even these might have been released upon the insolvent act, if they had not chosen, perhaps for the purposes of this bill, and probably with sufficient recompense from their brethren, to remain there under the character of martyrs."

† We do not know how far this bill of Mr. Sergeant Adair's may have resembled in its provisions that brought forward seven years before by Lord Stanhope, in the Upper House, for a similar object. See ante, p. 572.

the House of Commons having resolved itself into a committee of the whole House to consider the late act passed for the relief of the Roman Catholics in 1791,* Sir Henry Paulet St. John Mildmay, one of the members for Westbury, rose to move certain resolutions, which he stated had been suggested to him by his local residence in a populous city (Winchester), in which many of the priests and other emigrants from France had taken up their abode. He professed to be highly gratified with the humane and hospitable reception that had been given in England during the last ten years to these unfortunate exiles, who had preferred expulsion from their native country, and the sacrifice of all their temporal interests, to the abandonment of their religious principles; and he also admitted that they, on their part, had generally justified the protection they had met with by their peaceful demeanour and their unassuming and unobtrusive gratitude. Nor would he interfere with the free practice of their religion by the Roman Catholic emigrants, so long as it was so conducted as not to be inconsistent with the safety of the church and state. "The various asylums," he continued, "with which this country abounds for the reception of these unfortunate fugitives are highly to the honour of this country; but, however to our honour it may be to have afforded protection to such individuals, and to have tolerated them in the private exercise of their religious duties, I cannot conceive that it ever was the intention of government to encourage the permanent re-establishment of monastic institutions in this Protestant country. However to our honour it may be to have suffered those individuals who had previously bound themselves to the duties of a monastic life to discharge in this country those vows whence, in their mind, no human power could release them, I think such indulgence ought to expire with the life of the present incumbents; that we ought not to suffer the vacancies which may happen to rise in such communities to be filled up by subjects of this country actually professed since their residence here; and that we should on all grounds carefully guard against the admission of any new members into these societies, whose first obligation on entering into them is subversive of those laws and liberties which the wisdom and policy of our ancestors long since introduced amongst us. It falls within my own observation to know that, in each of the two monastic societies established at Winchester, several different persons have been suffered actually to profess themselves, and to take both veils, since their residence there; and a great variety of similar instances might be produced, from different parts of the country, where these monastic societies have been established." He did not mean to assert that such proceedings had as yet gone to any alarming extent, but he thought they ought to be checked in the bud; else the time might come when it would be lamented that parliament, by voting money for the subsistence of the emigrants, had in some degree made itself a party to the revival of what seemed to Protestants "the most unnatural part of the Romish faith." Another subject to which he wished to call attention was the recent foundation throughout England of a great number of Roman Catholic schools, many of them engrafted on and under the immediate superintendance of the monastic establishments. To each of the two monasteries established at Winchester was annexed a school for the education of female children, which was not in existence previous to the institution of these convents. "I am a friend," said Sir Henry, "to toleration in matters of conscience; but I think that, having admitted 5000 priests into this country, of a persuasion inimical to the religion established by law, and continuing to subsist here at the public expense, it is our duty to be particularly careful to give no offence to the regular church, and to see that the interests of the Protestant communion do not suffer by our humanity and indulgence. I do not say that, in either of the two instances to which I have adverted, the children of Protestant parents have been admitted into these seminaries, though I could prove that they have been admitted elsewhere: but I do say that such attempts have been made; and, if they have not succeeded, it has been entirely owing to the strict and steady principles of those on whom the experiment has been tried." The existing laws did, in some degree, provide against this last danger; but not, he thought, sufficiently. To meet the whole evil, he therefore moved the two following resolutions: 1. "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the temporary residence in this kingdom of certain monastic societies should be permitted, subject to the provisions of an act passed in the 31st of his present majesty, entitled, &c. (the Roman Catholic Relief Act of 1791); and that the admission of any new members into such societies should be prohibited; and that the names and numbers of the persons belonging thereto should be annually returned to the court of quarter-sessions of the county in which they reside. 2. That all persons undertaking the public education of youth in the Romish faith should also return annually to the court a list containing the names and number of their pupils, together with the names and places of abode of their respective parents; and that a power be given to magistrates appointed by the quarter-sessions to inspect such institutions at pleasure." These resolutions, the first of which was borrowed from a regulation in the act passed for the government of Canada in 1763, were of course submitted for the purpose of being embodied in a bill. They were agreed to after a very short debate, in which, one member, Mr. Hobhouse, having expressed his opinion that the Alien Act possessed all the power that was necessary to prevent the abuses complained of, Pitt replied that "he could not agree that an act which enabled government to turn out of the kingdom any person whom it might suspect of designs against the tranquillity of the kingdom, could with propriety be enforced in the case under consideration." As for the resolutions, he professed to admire the liberal principles on which they were framed: "they did not infringe on the principles of toleration sanctioned by the laws and constitution of this country: it was no part of those principles to allow the establishment of monastic institutions." The next day, when the resolutions were reported, Mr. Windham objected to the proposed measure as being altogether unnecessary, and as having no other recommendation than that it would do no harm; but the report was agreed to by the House, and a bill in pursuance of the resolutions ordered to be brought in, which it accordingly was by Sir Henry Mildmay on the 5th of June. It was read a second time on the 11th, without any debate that has been recorded; but on the 23rd, when the order of the day was read for going into committee upon it, the motion was opposed by Windham in a speech of some length. The strain of his first objection preserves a curious reminiscence of the state of the public mind in England at the moment in reference to much more momentous matters than modern monachism. "Could it be believed," he exclaimed, "that, at the present moment especially, when the powers of Europe were trembling in the scale, awaiting the decision of a day, perhaps an hour, when the next dispatch, perhaps, will bring accounts of some battle, on the issue of which may depend the fate of revolutionary France;—at a moment when those priests, from whom some gentlemen appear to dread so much, are looking eagerly forward to the near approach of their delivery, and of their return to their native soil, to take possession of all their honours;—was it at such a moment that the House of Commons of Great Britain thought fit to apprehend serious danger to the religious faith of the people of England from the progress of Catholic opinion?" Alas for this sanguine speculation! Nine days before the words were uttered the battle of Marengo had been already fought (although the disastrous news had not yet reached this country), and Piedmont and Austrian Italy were now at the feet of the victorious French republic. Windham proceeded to combat what he treated as the exaggerated prejudices commonly entertained against the Roman Catholic religion, and monasteries in particular. "He could not see why monks were to be considered worse than the gentlemen of that House, who lived on their estates without labour. Might not a society of ancient ladies be as usefully employed in a convent as if they were distributed in parties at different card-tables?" As for the taking of vows that had been spoken of, he believed the fact to be that the only persons who took their vows in this country were such as had served their novitiate, or the greater part of it, on the continent. "Thus, then, no acquisition was made from the natives of Great Britain; and, as to the alarm about converts, he could only say that the church must increase its diligence, if it had relaxed it. The divines of the established church should feed their flocks with spiritual food, and thus enable them to withstand the poison of delusion. Instead of this, they are too fond of raising the cry that the church is in danger. If proselytism exists, it is a disgrace only to the clergyman in whose parish it takes place. What, if they do their duty, can members of the church of England fear? They meet their antagonists on more than equal terms. Should any one, indeed, attempt to preach up the Rights of Man, or teach insubordination to lawful authority, to silence him would be a work of necessity; but popery has nothing in it of this dangerous tendency, and may be met fairly in the field of argument." "Penal laws," he afterwards said, "can never defend the country against popery. I cannot help making the remark here, that opinion may be too much under the protection of law. A little opposition is no bad thing;—it makes persons attentive to their duty, and may be as useful in the church as in the senate." Windham, rather an ingenious than a profound thinker, usually spoke more from temper, or the humour of the moment, than from any systematic views or convictions: but his nature was noble and generous, so that his passions and prejudices were at least as good as most men's principles; and the universal feeling that there was no selfishness or gall about him, made him be borne with in the utterance of many blunt truths, or half-truths, which hit hard enough sometimes upon his own party, and which would have left rankling sores coming from any other tongue. In reply to this speech Mildmay defended his bill in the best way he could. It introduced no new principle, he contended, into the criminal law of the country. The establishment of monastic communities was distinctly prohibited in the Relief Bill of 1791, the motion for bringing in which Windham himself had seconded in a speech replete with the most satisfactory arguments. He spoke of an opposition to the measure which had been industriously fomented out of doors; but this, he said, was, in his mind, an additional reason why the House should adopt it. "Can it be expected," he asked, "that we are to sit still, and tamely see the constitution of this country undermined by a set of men whom we have received here from motives of compassion, and to take no steps to prevent it, merely from the apprehension of inflaming the public mind against the Catholics?" The professions of the superiors of the Roman Catholic schools themselves, he observed, and their own advertisements, showed that they undertook indiscriminately the education both of children of their own communion and of those of Protestant parents; and in some instances they professed to educate the children of the indigent gratuitously. "This," said Mildmay, "appears to me to be offering bribes and temptations to obtain the instruction of Protestant children; and, so long as we profess the Reformed religion, such practices ought not to be suffered. I am in possession of an official letter from the Bishop of St. Pol de Leon to the Bishop of Winchester, in consequence of very heavy complaints that were made by his lordship to the French bishop on the subject to which I have called the attention of the House. In his answer, the Bishop of Leon does not apologise for the conduct of the emigrants, but tells us distinctly that he considers them perfectly justified under the letter of our existing laws." The Hon. Dudley Ryder (afterwards Earl of Harrowby) also spoke in favour of the measure, which he maintained was "an enabling bill, and not a bill to coerce, to restrain, and to punish." The existence of monasteries in this country was already directly contrary to several statutes. The present bill—his only objection to which was that it carried toleration too far—"would operate as a protection to the Catholics, and would reconcile the populace to their residence in Great Britain." On the other side, Mr. (afterwards Sir Benjamin) Hobhouse, then sitting for Blethingley, delivered a speech of some length, from which we may glean a few facts. He commenced by asserting that it had been the policy of our law to inflict penalties and disabilities upon persons professing the Roman Catholic faith, not on account of their religious tenets, but on account of their political opinions only. The Roman Catholics among our own subjects had now, with very few exceptions, entitled themselves to the benefits of the act of 1791, by making the declaration therein prescribed. In regard to the foreign monastic establishments that had been transferred to this country, and the schools or seminaries connected with them, Mr. Hobhouse made the following statement:—"The societies of English ladies who were bound by religious vows abroad, and who have resided in this country since 1794, consisted of seventeen in number, and contained, in the whole, rather more than 200 persons, including a few French or Flemish servants. Those ladies were, for the most part, sprung from some of the most respectable families in the kingdom. The societies of foreign ladies were four in number, and consisted of about 50 individuals. Of male societies there were only four, three of which were entirely composed of English from Douay and Bornhem. With respect to the French emigrant clergy, probably not 500, out of the 5000 now in England, belonged to any religious order." Nor was it probable that any increase was taking place in the numbers of the persons of either sex, resident in England, who were thus bound by monastic vows: of the women, at least, it had been ascertained that 60 had died since 1794, and only 20 had been added in their room. As for property, they had none or next to none. "They lost their houses and moveables by the violence of our enemies. Their funds, which were lodged in the Bank of Vienna, our magnanimous ally the emperor had seized, and transferred the poor wanderers over to our charity and compassion. To the bounty of individuals, and the money they received for the education of children, they were indebted for their subsistence. . . . It was certainly true that many of them took pupils, but they confined themselves to the children of Roman Catholics, conformably to the injunctions of the law. He had the authority of the most respectable abbesses and directors for saying, that they never knowingly admitted the child of any Protestant. Only two instances had occurred in which this rule was violated; but both were the result of deception; and, the moment the children were discovered to belong to Protestant parents, they were dismissed." The fact was, he afterwards stated, that "the Roman Catholic families, who used to send their children abroad for education, now placed them for the purposes of instruction in these religious houses." After the delivery of this speech, which was well calculated to make an impression on the House, or on the country, Sir William Scott spoke from the ministerial side against the bill, although he desired, he said, to prevent the extension of the schools and monastic institutions, and was favourable to the adoption of some temporary regulations for that purpose; and he was followed by Mr. (afterwards Lord) Erskine, from the ranks of the Whig opposition, in support of the measure. Scott admitted that the accounts that had been given of the numbers of the monastic persons, although they rested on general assertion, and could not be received as absolutely correct till confirmed by official returns, were probably very near the truth; but "with respect to the males," he observed, "there was one fallacy, which he wished to detect. These institutions were looked on as consisting of monks, whereas they were composed either of secular priests exclusively, or of secular priests and religieux, a distinct description of persons from those in the contemplation of the bill." Erskine argued that, looking to the nature of the title by which the reigning family sat upon the throne, it was impossible to brush away at once all the legal disabilities to which the Roman Catholics remained subject; "but, as to the bill itself, although it took caution against the growth of Catholic influence, it would, if passed into law, be an enabling statute, as without it these foreign Catholics would be subject to severities from which they would now be exempted. Monasteries, since the Reformation, were not English institutions; they could not be retired from view, like Protestant establishments. The worship of their votaries was not only open to the magistrates, but to all who chose to be present; and, if they barred their doors, they were subject to all the penalties of the ancient laws. . . . Without the bill these foreigners could not have remained a single hour in England, independently of the Alien Act, without a licence from the crown; and he could not therefore but insist that, if it passed into a law, it would be an enabling statute, because, though the licence was still necessary, yet, when thus sanctioned and encouraged by parliament, its permanent operation was certain." In fact, however, if the royal licence Erskine talked of was really required, it was in the circumstances sure to be granted, without hesitation and as a matter of course, whether the present bill should be passed or no. Sheridan, who spoke next, without meddling with his friend Erskine's law, deprecated the measure in strong terms, as "fraught with everything that must insult the pride and alarm the feelings of the Roman Catholics of this country." "As to the objects of the bill," he observed, "or rather those who were supposed to be the objects of it, there was no power to remove them, for they were natural-born subjects of this realm, and could not be put under the operation of the Alien Act. The friends of the bill confounded vows with legal obligations; whereas there was, in this country, no legal power of attaching any civil punishment to those who broke their vows. Any number of ladies might meet together, and make a vow that they would die old maids; but they could not be bound by law to observe that vow." Afterwards he "proceeded," continues the report, "to read a number of documents, by which it appeared that the mistresses of the Roman Catholic boarding-schools had been asked the question, whether they had any Protestant young ladies under their care, or whether they were in the habit of admitting them as pupils? The uniform answer was, None, none; never. They were also asked, if they offered to educate, or did really educate, Protestant young women for nothing? They never were guilty of such a thing, except in one or two instances, and then the young women were Catholics, not Protestants. A foolish alarm had also been sent abroad respecting the number of emigrant clergy now in this country; they were said to amount to 5000; and persons had even been absurd enough to say, that in one country alone they had converted 2000 housemaids. How this wonderful conversion was brought about he could not well conceive: the emigrant priests spoke but little English, and our housemaids spoke as little French." He then stated that of the seventeen convents established in the country only nine took in pupils. All the documents from which he made these statements he was ready to lay before the House; and his wish was that a committee might be appointed to inspect them, and to report whether they saw any necessity for the present measure. In conclusion Sheridan said, "Nothing, in his mind, could be more inauspicious than such a bill at this time, when we were on the point of a union with a country three-fourths of whose inhabitants were Catholics. This bill was not worthy of being, as it were, the legacy of the last English parliament to its successors. It was hurtful to the feelings of the Catholics, incompatible with our professions of liberality, not countenanced by the spirit of our constitution, and possibly introductory of great public mischief, as well as private vexation." The motion for going into committee, however, after a few words in its support from Mr. Perceval, was carried by a majority of 52 to 24; and the bill was accordingly committed the next day, and on the 4th of July it was read a third time and passed. It was now ordered to be entitled

"An Act to prevent any addition to the number of persons belonging to certain foreign religious Orders, or Communities, lately settled in this Kingdom, and to regulate the Education of Youth by such persons."

Being now sent up to the Lords, the bill was read there a first and second time without opposition; but, on the motion for committing it, Horsley, now transferred to the see of Rochester, opened the attack upon it in a speech of great ability, force, and clearness. His objection to the measure he declared to be, that in one respect it was unnecessary, and in another unconstitutional. "It is unnecessary," he said, "as a means of security against the dangers it foresees, not because the apprehension is altogether groundless, but because the security is already provided by the existing laws; and, in regard to the new power which it would give to the crown, it is perfectly unconstitutional." On the subject of the existing laws relating to Roman Catholics, he observed, in the first place, that they all applied equally, without any difference or discrimination, to the natural-born subjects of his majesty and to aliens. So also did the statutes that had been recently passed for the relief of the Roman Catholics from some penalties, upon certain conditions. Further, by these late statutes not one of the old penal statutes was repealed (except, indeed, certain clauses in an act of the 11 and 12 of William III., subjecting any popish ecclesiastic who should say mass, or any papist who should keep a school, to perpetual imprisonment, granting a reward of 100*l.* for the conviction of a popish ecclesiastic, and creating certain disabilities of taking lands by descent, devise, or limitation; which were repealed by the act of 1778). The act of 1791 only declared that any Roman Catholic who should have subscribed a certain oath and declaration should no longer be liable to prosecution for certain overt acts of popery therein named: if he refused or neglected to take and subscribe the said oath and declaration, the unrepealed statutes still remained in full force against him. What then were the restraints imposed by these statutes? By the 3 Jac. I., cap. 4, §§ 22 and 23, and also by the 23 Eliz. cap. 1, it was high treason for any person within the king's dominions either to reconcile or to be reconciled to the Pope or see of Rome. No person, indeed, who had complied with the conditions of the act of 1791 could now be prosecuted for being reconciled to Rome; but Horsley maintained that there was nothing in that act, or in any other upon the statute-book, which affected the offence of converting or attempting to convert any other person to the popish faith: that was still high treason. But, after all, this was not one of the dangers against which the bill pretended to provide. It was principally directed against the danger apprehended from the impunity given by the act of 1791 to Roman Catholic tutors and schoolmasters, and of which it was supposed that the fugitives from France might avail themselves. Horsley admitted it to be the fact that among these fugitives were many regulars of both sexes. "The monks, however," he said, "are very few; and the far greater proportion both of monks and nuns are the natural-born subjects of his majesty—English monks and English nuns, who were settled in convents of their own in France and Flanders, because they could make no such settlement in their own country. . . . With these some French monastics of both sexes have made their escape; and they are now all settled in different parts of the country, in houses in which the remaining members of each convent live in common." The communities of monks were, one of English Benedictines, settled at Acton Barnell, near Shrewsbury; another of the same order, at Vernon Hall, near Liverpool; one of English Franciscans, near Northallerton; and one of English Dominicans, at Carshalton, in Surrey. The individuals collected in these four establishments were no more than 26 in number; and these, with the addition of five Cistercians of the order of La Trappe, settled near Wareham, and five Carthusians near Wardour Castle, made the sum total of monks, English and French, settled in England. The nuns were more numerous, consisting of the surviving members of twenty-two convents in all, of which eighteen were English and only four French. The English houses the right reverend prelate did not enumerate: the French he stated to be, the Bernardine Dames, from the Abbey Desprez at Douay, settled at Pentonville, near Islington; the ladies of the order of St. Francis de Sales, settled near Little Chelsea; the Benedictine Dames of Montargis, at Bodney Hall, in Norfolk; and the Hospitalières of Cambray, at or near Ilford, in Essex. Altogether, the number of nuns, both French and English, certainly did not exceed 360 persons. "My lords," continued Horsley, "all these persons (with the exception of the ten French monks*) have qualified themselves to be teachers of youth according to the statute of the 31st of the king; and they have opened schools at their respective habitations—the monks for boys, and the nuns for young ladies. My lords, I, for my part, am well pleased that the Roman Catholics of this country are at last furnished with the means of education for their sons and daughters within the kingdom. It was a cruel and a weak policy to compel the Roman Catholics to send their children abroad for that liberal education which they could not receive at home; and I believe your lordships will agree with me that a Roman Catholic education at home is a much better thing than a Roman Catholic education in a foreign country. For this reason I rejoice at the institution of respectable Roman Catholic schools in different parts of the kingdom." He then showed that by the act of 1791 no person professing the Roman Catholic religion who should receive into his school the child of any Protestant father could have any benefit from that act; it was especially so provided by the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th clauses; consequently a person so offending was subject to the penalties of all the subsisting statutes against popish schoolmasters; to the forfeiture of 10*l.* a month and one year's imprisonment, besides being disabled from ever again acting as a teacher, by the 23 Eliz. c. 1, § 6; and to a fine of forty shillings for every day he might have kept school, by the 1 Jac. c. 4, which latter statute further encouraged informations by providing that half the penalty should go to the king and half to the person suing. Then, as for the other danger apprehended by the framers of the bill, namely, that, in consequence of the settlements of these monks and nuns from France, monastic institutions might gain a permanent establishment in this country, "My lords," said Horsley, addressing himself to the case of the nuns, of whom alone the numbers could inspire any alarm, "if any ten, or twenty, or a larger number of these ladies should choose to take a great house, where they may live together as they have been used to do all their lives, and lead their lives according to their old habits,—getting up in the morning and retiring at night at stated hours, dining upon fish on some days of the week, upon eggs on others,—I protest I can discover no crime, no harm, no danger in all this; and I cannot imagine why we should be anxious to prevent it." But it was feared they might inveigle English women to join them, and so monastic institutions might be permanently re-established in the country. To show the groundlessness of this apprehension Horsley quoted the 17th section of the act of 1791, which provided that nothing contained in that act should make it lawful to found, endow, or establish any monastic society in this country, and that all uses, trusts, and dispositions, whether of real or personal property, which might have been deemed superstitious or unlawful previously to the passing of the act, should continue to be so deemed and taken. Now, by the 1 Geo. I., sess. 2, c. 50, property of any kind, or granted in any way, devised, bequeathed, or settled upon trust, so that the profits might be applied to any abbey, priory, convent, nunnery, college of Jesuits, or seminary or school of popish education, was forfeited to the king for the use of the public. "I think, my lords," observed Horsley, "there is little danger that any monastic society without funds of any sort for its subsistence will be of long duration." In point of fact, he went on to explain, only two cases had occurred among the English nuns of professions having been made in this country; and in both instances the parties were young ladies who had been upon their probation abroad before the storm fell upon the convents there. But nothing even of this kind was likely to occur again, or, at any rate, if it should, it was already punishable by law. While Horsley was relating the circumstances of the two cases, he was stopped by the Chancellor (Lord Loughborough), who observed that it would be better not to go into the details, "since, whatever might be said in extenuation, the thing was certainly a high offence against the laws, and the discovery of particular instances might subject the persons concerned to severe prosecutions." Horsley stated that he had the greatest reason to believe, and could almost venture to assure the House, that the vicars apostolic, well aware of the illegality of the practice, had cautioned their people against it, and would use their utmost influence to prevent it in future. Nor did he suppose that any worse cases had occurred among the French sisterhoods, or that there was any greater probability that the thing would be repeated among them than among the English nuns. He then proceeded to consider the means of security proposed to be provided by the bill, which he denounced as most unconstitutional. It was true enough, as the preamble declared, that it was expedient to permit, under certain restrictions, the residence here of these foreign religious persons; "for," said his lordship, "with respect to the far greater part of them, their residence, upon the condition of their taking the oaths required by law, cannot but be permitted. The nuns in the proportion of nine to two, and the monks in the proportion of twenty-six to ten, are natural-born subjects; and, having taken the oaths, have a right to reside here, in their own country, without any restrictions." The fact being, then, that here they were, and could not be sent away, the bill proceeded to enact that the king might grant them his royal licence and authority to continue to reside (which with respect to the great body of them was wholly unnecessary), and "to perform and observe, within their respective houses, the rites and ordinances of their respective institutions, any law or statute to the contrary notwithstanding." This Horsley maintained to be perfectly unconstitutional. Under this provision the superiors of these religious houses would be empowered by his majesty's royal licence, under pretence of administering penance, to imprison and otherwise maltreat the persons of his majesty's subjects. Further, a Roman Catholic monastery could not be founded without the interposition of the bishop or other superior authority of the Roman Catholic church: so by the proposed licence the king was to give, not barely a religious, but a civil or political effect to such acts of the popish hierarchy. Nay, more; the Roman Catholic bishop, or vicar apostolic, could not act in such a matter of himself; he must be specially empowered by a bull of the pope. "Your lordships know," continued Horsley, "that the importation, or putting in use, of any faculty, dispensation, bull, or instrument whatever, of the see of Rome, is prohibited by a multitude of statutes, under the highest penalties; but, with all these prohibitions of the law, the king by this bill will be empowered, in the instance of settling a monastery or convent here, to dispense." This he likened to the dispensing power claimed and attempted to be exercised by James II. In conclusion, the right reverend prelate stated that the only part of the bill of which he did not wholly disapprove was the clause requiring Roman Catholic schoolmasters and schoolmistresses of a certain description to make an annual return of their schools to the clerk of the peace. But even this he would rather have made part of a general bill for the regulation of all schools—a matter which, he declared, loudly called for the attention of the legislature. “Time was, my lords,” he exclaimed, “when schools were under some control; but, since the statute of the 19th of the king, for the further relief of Protestant dissenting ministers, they have been under none. A schoolmaster has only to declare that he is a Christian, and a Protestant dissenting from the established church of England, and to profess his general belief in the Holy Scriptures in the terms required of dissenting ministers,—and no one has a right to ask him, ‘Why have you opened school here? Whom do you teach? or, What do you teach them?’ My lords, the consequence is, that schools of much worse things than popery abound in all parts of the kingdom,—schools of Jacobinical religion, and of Jacobinical politics; that is to say, schools of atheism and disloyalty,—schools in the shape and disguise of charity schools and Sunday schools, in which the minds of the children of the very lowest orders are enlightened, that is, taught to despise religion and the laws and all subordination. Books have been composed for the use of such schools, of the most dangerous tendency. I know that this is going on in various parts of the kingdom, and particularly in the neighbourhood of the metropolis.” The system of Sunday schools, generally regarded as having been founded by Mr. Robert Raikes, the editor and proprietor of the Gloucester Journal, had been in operation for nearly twenty years by this time, and had no doubt been productive of much good; the instances, if any, in which it had been abused to the purposes stated in this burst of fervent high church and state zeal must have been very rare. Having thus cleared his breast, the right reverend prelate sat down, after formally moving that the bill should be committed for that day three months. His speech probably determined the fate of the measure. The Bishop of Winchester (Brownlow North, a younger brother of Lord North) ventured a few feeble words in its support; and Lord Loughborough, the Chancellor, also expressed his opinion that it contained some good provisions, and might be amended so as to be highly useful; but another minister, Lord Grenville, the foreign secretary, agreed with Horsley in denouncing it as both unnecessary and mischievous; and the motion for committing it that day three months—in other words, for throwing it out—was agreed to, apparently without a division.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUTION, GOVERNMENT, AND LAWS.

T will be convenient to consider the History of the Legislation during this period under the following heads:—

I. CONSTITUTIONAL LEGISLATION.

II. LEGISLATION RELATING TO PROPERTY, REAL AND PERSONAL.

III. CRIMINAL OR PENAL LEGISLATION.

IV. MISCELLANEOUS LEGISLATION.

Some such classification as the above is rendered necessary by the great extent of the legislation of the period; the legislation of the first forty years of the reign of George III. being about equal in bulk to all the legislation from the foundation of the monarchy down to the commencement of George III.'s reign.

I. CONSTITUTIONAL LEGISLATION.

Under this head we shall include such legislation as concerns the sovereign power itself, and the extent and distribution of the various powers lodged in the respective limbs or branches of that sovereign power. It is extremely difficult in jurisprudence (almost as difficult as to make definitions which shall be perfect) to make classifications which shall not trench upon or run into each other. Thus, under the head of Criminal Legislation, we shall find ranged, for convenience, several offences which, under the aspect of offences against the state or constitution, might be classed under the head of Constitutional Legislation.

In the case of the impeachment of Warren Hastings, it was determined that an impeachment did not abate by a dissolution of parliament. In his 'History of British India,' Mr. Mill says that almost all the lawyers in the House, Mr. Erskine among them, contended vehemently that the dissolution of parliament abated the impeachment.*

* Hist. of British India, vol. v, pp. 171, 172, &c.

But this is not quite a fair statement of the fact. Although in the Commons the majority of the eminent names among the lawyers does certainly appear on the side he mentions, in the Lords the majority was the other way; for Lords Loughborough, Camden, and Mansfield voted against the abatement of the impeachment. Whatever argument, therefore, there might be raised against the lawyers as a class, from the fact of their maintaining, on this occasion, that the dissolution of parliament did or did not abate the impeachment, is inconclusive. And the attempt to draw such an inference here only shows how much even sharp-sighted men will be misled in their logic by their dislikes. In order to comprehend the grounds of the decision which was come to on this point, it will be necessary to go back to the earlier stages of the history of the English parliament.

It is to be remembered, then, that originally—that is, soon after the Conquest—the Commune Concilium, or Aula Regis, contained within itself all the powers which are now distributed among the various courts of law and equity, the two houses of parliament, the privy council, and the cabinet council. In other words, this great court or council exercised at once the legislative, the judicial, and the administrative or executive functions. In process of time, as the laws became complicated and voluminous, a portion of the judicial functions was transferred to the common law judges; leaving, however, a residuum in the sovereign power, z. e. in the king and his council—in other words, the Commune Concilium, or Aula Regis, above-mentioned. In cases where the common law did not provide a remedy, the resort was to the king in council. Then, after a while, another portion of the judicial functions was separated from the great council, and lodged in the chancellor,* leaving still a further residuum in the great council; part of which residuum is now exercised by the Privy Council and part by the House of Lords.† For, though the House of Commons is also a limb, and a very important one, of the sovereignty, it does not appear ever to have exercised, by itself alone, strictly judicial functions, except in cases where its own members were specially concerned; which may be partly accounted for by the fact that the Commons were not constituent members of the great national council till that council had lost somewhat of its primary character of a court of justice.

Lord Chief Justice Hale‡ has indeed shown from ancient records that (according to the distinction between the plenum parlamentum—consisting of the king and both houses of parliament, and sometimes applied to both houses only—and the curia parliamenti, curia in parlamento coram nobis, &c., meaning the Upper House of parliament,) errors of inferior courts were examined in two ways, or kinds of courts, viz. in pleno parlamento, and in the Lords' House. The examination of errors in pleno parlamento, and the decision thereof by consent of both houses, he calls an extraordinary way, because “of latter ages much disused.” The other he calls ordinary, because the method then and for some ages past “most if not altogether in use.” He then cites many ancient instances from the rolls of parliament, where, upon petition of parties unduly attaint, or their heirs, the records of the attainders were brought in plenum parlamentum, and errors assigned and judgments thereupon reversed. He then adds that, touching reversal and affirmance by writ of error in pleno parlamento, which was not so usual as petitions, the only precedent that he had found was that in Rastall's Entries, title Error en Parlement, which appears, he says, “to be a writ of error brought in the par-

* It appears to have been the opinion of Lord Chief Justice Hale and of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, that the judicial power of the chancellor was the residuum of the judicial power left in the Aula Regis, or Commune Concilium, after the separation of the common law courts from that great court. See Mr. Justice Story's 'Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, as administered in England and America,' vol. i. p. 42.

† See Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. i. p. 229, et seq.; also vol. iii. p. 57. Lord Erskine, in his celebrated speech on the motion for a new trial in the case of the proceedings against the Dean of St. Asaph, said: “In the reign of King Edward I., when this great office (that of Chief Justiciary) was abolished, and the present courts at Westminster established by a distribution of its powers, the barons preserved that supreme superintending jurisdiction, which never belonged to the justiciar, but to themselves only, as the jurors in the king's courts: a jurisdiction which, when nobility, from being territorial and feudal, became personal and honorary, was assumed and exercised by the peers of England, who, without any delegation of judicial authority from the crown, form to this day the supreme and final court of English law, judging in the last resort for the whole kingdom, and sitting upon the lives of the peerage, in their ancient and genuine characters, as the pares of one another.” 21 St. Tr. 975.

liament of 1 Hen. VII., upon a judgment given in the King's Bench in the time of Edward IV. The writ was to remove the record coram nobis in parlamento, ut, inspectis recorde et processu prædictis, nos, de consilio et advisamento dominorum spiritualium et temporalium et COMMUNITATIS in parlamento nostro prædicto existentium, ulterius pro errore illo corrigendo fieri faciamus, quod de jure et secundum legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ fuerit faciendum.” He then makes the following observations on this particular case:—

“This writ seems to be in that very case of 1 Hen. VII. 19, Howerdine's case; and the time of its issue and the first letters of some of the names seem to accord with the parties in that record: upon which case, notwithstanding, the judges there agree that the Commons ought not to have a voice, but only the Lords, with the advice of the judges; and possibly there might be a new writ brought accordingly. But surely such a writ as this, though not in the usual form that obtained in latter ages, might issue; and upon such a writ the Commons would have been interested in the judgment, as well as in the cases of the proceeding upon petition of error above mentioned, where the Commons had also a concurrent voice, though this hath been long disused.” His lordship comes to the following conclusion on the subject:—“Although in ancient times there were petitions, and possibly some writs of error, which did interest the Commons in point of judicature, or at least consent or disassent to the judgment; yet these two things are to be noted:—1. That, even in the ancientest times whereof we have any memorials of record, as the times of Edw. I., Edw. II., and Edw. III., the petitions and writs of error in the House of Lords were more frequent, and more frequently there determined, than in pleno parlamento. 2. That from the beginning of Richard II.'s time downward to this day there are very few if any petitions or writs of error brought before both houses or determined by them, but only in the House of Lords, except that one instance in Rastall's Entries above mentioned, which, nevertheless, is encountered by the opinion of the judges in 1 Hen. VII. 19. And this especially after the beginning of the reign of Hen. IV., where the judicature of the House of Lords was so liberally asserted by the Commons, Rot. Parl. 1 Hen. IV. n. 79.* And Mr. Hargrave, in his Introductory Preface to Lord Chief Justice Hale's work on the Jurisdiction of the Lords' House of Parliament, mentions a very valuable though unfinished manuscript of Lord Hale's, entirely in his own handwriting, entitled ‘Preparatory Notes touching the Rights of the Crown.’ “So far,” observes Mr. Hargrave, “as these ‘Preparatory Notes’ touch upon the House of Lords separately, the judicative power of the Lords is described much in the same manner as in the former collections; † equally conjoining them and the king's consilium ordina- rium into one great judicative council, and equally describing the judges and other members of the consilium ordinarium as co-judges. But when he comes to treat of the House of Commons, he writes doubtfully as to the necessity of their concurrence in judicature. On the one hand he cites the ancient form of the writ of error from Rastall's Entries, 302, where the Commons are mentioned equally with the Lords, and the records of the reversal of the judgments against Mortimer and Lancaster in 1 Edw. III., and of the judgment against Maltraver, as precedents of the concurrence of the Commons. On the other hand he cites the memorable roll of parliament of 1 Hen. IV., to which we have already so much adverted, as a 'shrewd record to the contrary.' But he professes to avoid determining the point, and to spare the dispute of it; noticing, however, that, according to that record, the king has at least a negative voice in matters judicative."*

There appears to be little weight in the explanation of Blackstone, that the representatives of the people, or House of Commons, cannot properly judge of crimes committed by powerful men against the state or nation, because their constituents are the parties injured, and can therefore only impeach. This proceeds on the supposition that the peers are not equally injured by the acts of a state criminal, which is quite fallacious. If Strafford had succeeded in making Charles I. what Richelieu made Louis XIV., the injury to the peers would have been as great (or greater, for they had more to lose) as to the people. However, the Peers may be supposed to possess more of the qualities of the judicial character than the Commons, from their position, as being less likely to be influenced by popular passions, and having, besides, among them several men who have been accustomed by their profession to the performance of judicial duties.

In the debate on the question as to whether the impeachment had abated by the dissolution, the lord chancellor (Thurlow) argued that it had abated, because one of the parties to the prosecution, namely, the Commons, had become extinct. "If it were

alleged that the whole people of England were the real prosecutors, as the acts of the Lower House of Parliament were the acts of the people, he had two things to reply. The first was, that the acts of the House of Commons could not be regarded as the acts of the people of England, because the House of Commons did not actually represent the people of England; it represented them no more than virtually. The next thing was, that their lordships' House of Parliament knew nothing about the people as an acting body in the state; they knew only the House of Commons, the acts of which, he had shown, were not the acts of the people. The people, therefore, were not parties to an impeachment."

It was decided, however, that the impeachment did not abate, principally on the following grounds. The high Court of Parliament was affirmed to exist at all times; "and, although, from a dissolution, or other causes, it might not always be sitting to do justice, it was always open for the reception of appeals and writs of error. The peers, who were the judges, it was said, had their authority inherent in their order, and independent of the actual sitting of parliament; and the prosecutors were not merely the members of the House of Commons, but all the commons of England, who, though they might be deprived of their organ by a dissolution, did not thereby lose their right of acting, and might resume the exercise of that right as soon as they were furnished with a new organ by the assembling of a new parliament."*

On this decision, Mr. Justice Coleridge, in his edition of Blackstone's Commentaries, makes the following observations: "It cannot be denied, on the one hand, that there are some difficulties in coming to this conclusion: but, on the other, it is certain that the right of impeachment would have lost half its value, if a contrary determination had been come to; and it seems also certain that, in former times, when the duration of a parliament seldom exceeded a month, impeachments must have been absolutely nugatory, if a dissolution had abated them."†

In the preceding Book an account has been given of the changes that took place in the constitution of Ireland during the period preceding the present. As we have there seen, the statute of 6 Geo. I. having been first repealed by the statute 22 Geo. III. c. 53, it was, by stat. 23 Geo. III. c. 28, declared that the parliament and courts of Ireland had an exclusive right as to all matters of legislation and judicature in that country. This was followed, within twenty years, by the important statute which incorporated Ireland with Great Britain, as an integral part thereof, under the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The following correct and comprehensive abstract is given by a recent writer of the most important of the articles of the Act of Union with Ireland, 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 67:—

* Ann. Reg. for 1791, vol. xxxiii. See also Obyn's Digest, Parliament (P. 2), where the same doctrine is laid down as to the effect of a dissolution upon an impeachment.

"1. That the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland shall, on the 1st day of January, 1801, and for ever after, be united into one kingdom, by the name of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"2. That the succession to the imperial crown shall continue in the same manner as that to the crown of Great Britain and Ireland stood before limited.

"3. That there shall be one parliament, styled the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"4. That the lords spiritual of Ireland, by rotation of sessions, and twenty-eight lords temporal of Ireland, elected for life by the peers of Ireland, shall sit in the House of Lords; and one hundred commoners (to whom five more have now been added by a recent Act of Parliament*), shall be the number to sit in the House of Commons on the part of Ireland; that a peer of Ireland not elected one of the twenty-eight may sit in the House of Commons, but, while so sitting, shall not be entitled to privilege of peerage, or to be elected one of the twenty-eight, or to vote at such election; and that all the lords spiritual and temporal of Ireland (except those temporal peers who may be members of the House of Commons) shall have all privilege of peerage as fully as those of Great Britain; the right of sitting in the House of Lords (with its attendant privileges) only excepted.

"5. That the churches of England and Ireland shall be united into one Protestant episcopal church, to be called the United Church of England and Ireland; that the doctrine, worship, and discipline shall be the same, and that the continuance and preservation of the united church as the established church of England and Ireland shall be deemed an essential and fundamental part of the Union; and that in like manner the church of Scotland shall remain the same as established by the acts of Union of England and Scotland.

"6. That the subjects of Great Britain and Ireland shall be entitled to the same privileges, with regard to trade and navigation, and also in respect of all treaties with foreign powers.

"7. That the future expenditure of the United Kingdom shall be defrayed in such proportion as Parliament shall, from time to time, deem reasonable, according to certain rules prescribed for that purpose in the Act.

"8. That all the laws and courts of each kingdom shall remain the same as already established, subject to such alterations by the United Parliament as circumstances may require, but that all writs of error and appeal which might then have been decided in the House of Lords of either kingdom shall be decided by the House of Lords of the United Kingdom.

"Since the Union all acts of parliament extend to Ireland, whether expressly mentioned or not, unless that portion of the United Kingdom be expressly excepted, or the intention to except it be otherwise plainly shown."*

By stat. 30 Geo. III. c. 10 (An Act for the better support of the Dignity and Independence of the Speaker of the House of Commons), a sum was directed to be issued at the Exchequer, which, together with the fees and allowances of 5*l.* per day, then payable on account of the office of Speaker, might amount to the clear yearly sum of 6000*l.* And it was also enacted that the Speaker should not hold, in his own name, or in the name of any person or persons in trust for him, or for his benefit, any office or place of profit under the Crown during pleasure.

II. LEGISLATION RELATING TO PROPERTY, REAL AND PERSONAL.

We now proceed to give an account of some of the principal enactments made during the present period regarding property, whether real or personal.

One of the most important of the enactments affecting real property was the statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98, commonly called the Thellusson Act, by which certain limits were prescribed to the accumulation of property. This statute arose out of the abuse which was thought to have been made of the rule respecting trusts for accumulation of the rents and profits of land, in the case of Mr. Thellusson's extraordinary will. To understand this act, it will be necessary to advert shortly to the learning concerning executory devises, future uses, and future trusts, and the rules established for the purpose of prescribing the boundaries within which those executory devises, &c. must be confined.

The essential character of executory devises, which prevents them, unlike contingent remainders, from being barred or destroyed by any alteration whatsoever in the estate out of which, or after which, they are limited, gave rise to an invariable rule with respect to the contingency upon which an estate of this sort is permitted to take effect. This rule is, that such contingency must happen within a short, or at least a limited, space of time; otherwise it would be in the power of a testator to render an estate unalienable for several generations: a power which the English law denies to every man, as the exercise of it would tend to render property in a great measure useless to the general purposes of a commercial country. For every executory devise, so far as it goes, creates a perpetuity; that is, an estate unalienable till the contingency be determined one way or another.† The period within which the contingency must happen and the executory devise take effect is confined to a life or lives in being, including among those lives children then in ventre sa mere, and twenty-one years beyond the death of such life or lives and the time of gestation, so as to allow for the birth of a child in ventre sa mere.* Availing himself of this rule, by which it was in the power of the owner of the estate to suspend not only the ownership of the inheritance for the limited time, but also to suspend the right to the intermediate enjoyment, so as to accumulate the income and add it to the principal, and thus aggrandize the remote issue of the family at the expense of the present, and perhaps the two or three succeeding generations, Mr. Thellusson fixed on the lives of all his sons, and all his grandsons born in his lifetime, or who should be living at his death, or then in ventre sa mere (for such seems to be the construction of his will), as the period during which the income of his property should accumulate for the benefit of those persons who, at the end of that period, should answer the description of the heirs male of the respective bodies of his three sons. The property consisted of a landed estate of about 4000*l.* a-year, and personalty considered to be above half a million sterling; the probable amount of the accumulated fund was calculated at 19,000,000*l.*, without taking into account the possible minority at the end of the term, which might involve the accumulation of a much greater sum.†

The will gave rise to two suits in Chancery; one, on a bill brought by the widow of Mr. Thellusson, and his sons and daughters, and the husbands of the daughters, to invalidate the trusts, created by the will, of the testator's general real estate and the residue of his personal estate, and to substitute a resulting trust for his heir and next of kin; the other, on a cross bill by the acting trustees and executors, to substantiate the trusts of the will, and to direct the manner of carrying them into execution.

The causes were heard in Lincoln's Inn Hall, in December, 1798, before the lord chancellor Loughborough, assisted by Sir Richard Pepper Arden, Mr. Justice Buller, and Mr. Justice Lawrence. The lord chancellor decreed the devises and limitations to be valid, and gave directions accordingly. The widow and children appealed to the House of Lords. The appeal was heard in the House of Lords on the 25th of June, 1805, and several other days; and, after the argument had been heard, certain questions, embracing the leading points of the case, were, on the motion of Lord Eldon, who had succeeded Lord Loughborough as chancellor, proposed to the judges. The unanimous opinion of the judges, pronounced by Lord Chief Baron Macdonald, was favourable to the trusts of the will; and, upon the motion of the lord chancellor, the decree was affirmed. ‡

The above will being, however, considered, though within the letter, as an abuse of the rule of law, and a contrivance to avoid its principle, the act in question, the statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 98, was passed, which enacts, "That no person or persons shall, after the passing of this act, by any deed or deeds, surrender or surrenders, will, codicil, or otherwise howsoever, settle or dispose of any real or personal property, so and in such manner that the rents, issues, profits, or produce thereof, shall be wholly or partially accumulated, for any longer term than the life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settler or settlers; or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settler, deviser, or testator; or during the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who shall be living, or in ventre sa mere, at the time of the death of such grantor, deviser, or testator; or during the minority or respective minorities only of any person or persons who, under the uses or trusts of the deed, surrender, will, or other assurances, directing such accumulations, would, for the time being, if of full age, be entitled unto the rents, issues, and profits, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce so directed to be accumulated: and, in every case where any accumulation shall be directed otherwise than as aforesaid, such direction shall be null and void, and the rents, issues, profits, and produce of such property so directed to be accumulated, shall, so long as the same shall be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed." But, by sect. 2, it is provided that the act shall not extend "to any provision for payment of debts of any grantor, settler, or deviser, or other person or persons, or to any provision for raising portions for any child or children of any grantor, settler, or deviser, or any child or children of any person taking any interest under any such conveyance, settlement, or devise, or to any direction touching the produce of timber or wood upon any lands or tenements; but that all such provisions and directions shall and may be made and given as if this act had not passed."

Upon the construction of this act it has been settled that limitations on trusts for accumulation, which do not violate the common-law rule against perpetuities, but exceed the period prescribed by the statute, are void only for the excess beyond that period.* But, on the other hand, if the trust for accumulation exceed the limit fixed by the law before the statute, it is altogether void, and incapable of taking effect even for the period allowed by the statute.† It is also to be observed that the act does not at all affect the rule respecting the property itself, but merely limits the extent to which the income of that property may be accumulated.

Some of the principal questions connected with the subject have arisen on the construction of the clause as to the destination of the income directed to be accumulated, after the expiration of the period for which the accumulation can take place conformably to the statute. The result of the cases seems to be that the income, which the statute forbids to be accumulated, must go as in case of intestacy.* The above act, which was framed by Lord Loughborough, has been characterised by Lord Brougham as "an act which, though it has not often received the aid of judicial interpretation, has hardly ever been discussed in courts either of law or equity without the judge having occasion to observe upon the inartificial, and, in several respects, ill-defined language, in which its provisions are expressed." †

By the statute 25 Geo. III. c. 35, entitled 'An Act for the more easy and effectual sale of lands, tenements, and hereditaments of crown debtors, or of their sureties,' the court of exchequer, on application of his majesty's attorney-general in a summary way, was authorised to order the estate of any debtor to his majesty, his heirs and successors, and the right and interest of such debtor in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, which should be extended under any writ of extent, or so much thereof as should be sufficient to satisfy the debt for which the same should have been so extended, to be sold in such manner as the said court should direct; and the act directed the conveyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments so decreed to be sold, to be made to the purchaser by his majesty's remembrancer in the said court of exchequer or his deputy, under the direction of the said court, by a deed of bargain and sale, to be inrolled in the same court. The surplus, if any, of such purchase-money, after payment of the debt and all costs incurred by the crown in enforcing the payment of such debt, was to be paid to the person or persons entitled thereto.

By the statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 56, entitled 'An Act for relief of persons entitled to entailed estates to be purchased with trust moneys,' it is enacted that, where money under the control of a court of equity, or of or to which any individuals as trustees are possessed or entitled, shall be subject to be invested in the purchase of freehold or copyhold premises, to be settled in such manner that it should be competent to the first tenant in tail to bar estates tail and remainders, it shall not be necessary to have such money actually so invested; but the court, on petition of the first tenant in tail, and the person or persons having any antecedent particular estate or estates (being adults, or, if femes covert, being separately examined in court or upon commission), may order such money to be paid to them, or applied as they shall appoint.

We have before mentioned ‡ that the law of insurance might almost be said to have grown up under Lord Mansfield's administration of the chief justiceship of the King's Bench. By the statute of the 43rd of Elizabeth* a particular court (a court now entirely disused) for the trial of causes relative to policies of insurance in a summary way was erected; and to that end the statute ordained that a commission should issue yearly, directed to the judge of the Admiralty, the recorder of London, two doctors of the civil law, two common lawyers, and eight merchants, empowering any five of them to hear and determine all such causes arising in London; and it also gave an appeal from their decision, by way of bill, to the court of chancery. Since the above-mentioned statute various enactments have from time to time been made respecting the subject of insurance. Of these the principal were, the 13 and 14 Charles II. c. 23, entitled "An additional Act concerning matter of assurance used amongst merchants;" the 6 Geo. I. c. 18, whereby his majesty is empowered to grant charters to two distinct companies for assurance of ships, and for lending money on bottomry; the 19 Geo. II. c. 37, which prohibits all contracts of insurance on ships, and on merchandises or effects laden thereon, by way of gaming or wagering. Mr. Millar, in his 'Treatise on Insurance,'* observes, that the object of insurance, strictly speaking, is not to make a positive gain, but to avoid actual damage and harm from the event provided against; and that by the ordinances of almost all the commercial states in Europe wagers upon mercantile adventure are totally prohibited. He also notices the distinction between an insurance against positive loss and upon expected profit, a distinction overlooked in this country, though the French regulation prohibits merchants purchasing insurance on the expected profits of their goods, and by the ordinance of Coningsberg all insurances on expected gain of future freight moneys, securing wagers, are forbidden. By the 14 Geo. III. c. 48, the above rule is extended to insurances upon lives, all such insurances being thereby prohibited, except in cases where the persons insuring shall have an interest in the life or death of the persons insured. By the statute 25 Geo. III. c. 44, no policy of insurance on ships or goods is to be made without inserting the names of the persons really interested therein, or the names of the persons who shall effect the same as the agents of the persons severally interested therein. The above act was repealed by the 28 Geo. III. c. 56, which enacts that "it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to make or effect, or cause to be made or effected, any policy or policies of assurance upon any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, or upon any goods, merchandises, effects, or other property whatsoever, without first inserting or causing to be inserted in such policy or policies of assurance the name or names, or the usual style and firm of dealing, of one or more of the persons interested in such insurance, or without instead thereof first inserting or causing to be inserted in such policy or policies of assurance the name or names, of the usual style and firm of dealing, of the consignor or consignors, consignee or consignees, of the goods, merchandises, effects, or property so to be insured; or the name or names, or the usual style and firm of dealing, of the person or persons residing in Great Britain, who shall receive the order for and effect such policy or policies of assurance, or of the person or persons who shall give the order or direction to the agent or agents immediately employed to negotiate or effect such policy or policies of assurance." In the case of *Bell v. Gibson it was held sufficient that the broker for the plaintiff, who effected the policy, was therein called agent, without stating for whom.

The statute 36 Geo. III. c. 90, entitled "An Act for the relief of persons equitably and beneficially entitled to, or interested in, the several stocks and annuities transferable at the Bank of England (14th May, 1796),"† enacts that, when trustees, in whose names stocks shall be standing at the Bank, shall be absent, out of the jurisdiction or not amenable to the process of the courts of Chancery and Exchequer, or shall be bankrupts, or lunatics, or shall refuse to transfer the stock, &c., or it shall be uncertain whether such trustees are living, the said courts, in any cause depending therein, may order the stock to be transferred, and the dividends paid, and, when all the trustees cannot be found, may order the forthcoming ones to transfer stock, &c. The second section orders that, if bankrupts refuse to transfer stock standing in their own right, the lord chancellor may order it to be transferred to the assignees. By the third section, stock standing in the names of lunatics, or their committees, may, in certain cases, be ordered by the lord chancellor to be transferred into the names of any new committees or otherwise. By the fourth section the act is declared to be an indemnity to the Bank of England for all things done pursuant thereto. Three or four years after, the statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 36, was passed, to enable courts of equity to compel a transfer of stock in suits without making the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or the United Company of Merchants trading to the East Indies, or the Governor and Company of Merchants of Great Britain trading to the South Seas or other parts of America, party thereto.

By the 38 Geo. III. c. 87, entitled "An Act for the administration of assets, in cases where the executor to whom probate has been granted is out of the realm (28th June, 1798)," if, at the expiration of twelve months from a testator's decease the executor to whom probate is granted shall not reside within the jurisdiction of his majesty's courts, any creditor, next of kin, or legatee, may, on making the affidavit thereinafter mentioned, obtain special administration on a five-shilling stamp.

The act also contains provisions for the collecting of outstanding debts; for the transfer of stock belonging to the estate of the deceased; and for the case where an infant is sole executor, in which case administration with the will annexed is to be granted to the guardian of such infant, till the infant is twenty-one.

By the 27 Geo. III. c. 38, entitled "An Act for the encouragement of the arts of designing and printing linens, cottons, calicoes, and muslins, by vesting the properties thereof in the designers, printers, and proprietors, for a limited time," from June 1, 1787, the proprietor of any original pattern for printing linen is to have the sole right of printing it for the time of two months, to commence from the day of the first publishing thereof; the name of the printer or proprietor to be printed at each end of every piece of linen, cotton, &c. By the 34 Geo. III. c. 23, the term was extended to three months, and the former act (except so far as varied by the latter act) was made perpetual. The time here granted will appear very short when compared with that in the case of the copyright of books; yet, when the difference in the natures of the respective species of property is considered, there may be found to be some proportion between the respective cases. The period of duration of the designs treated of in the two statutes above mentioned may be estimated as bearing, to the period of duration of a literary composition, somewhat the proportion of two or three months to fourteen or twenty-eight years.

By the 38 Geo. III. c. 71, entitled "An Act for encouraging the art of making new models and casts of busts, and other things therein mentioned (21st June, 1798)," the sole right and property of making models or casts of any bust, or any part of the human figure, or any statue of the human figure, or the head, or any part, or the statue of any animal, is vested in the original proprietor for fourteen years. Persons making copies of any model or cast without the written consent of the proprietor may be prosecuted for damages, by a special action on the case, except such persons as shall purchase the same of the original proprietor.

We may here notice several statutes of considerable importance passed during the present period, which are at least closely connected with the transfer of property.

By the statutes 20 Geo. III. c. 28; 23 Geo. III. c. 58; and 29 Geo. III. c. 51, a stamp duty was imposed on the receipt or other discharge for any legacy left by any will, or other testamentary instrument, or for any share or part of a personal estate divided by force of the statute of distributions, or the custom of any province or place. The 36 Geo. III. c. 52, was then passed, which repeals the duties imposed on the receipt by the previous acts, and imposes new duties on the legacy itself. Section 2 enacts "that upon every legacy, specific or pecuniary, or of any other description, of the amount or value of 20*l.* or more, given by any will or testamentary instrument of any person who shall die after the passing of this act, out of the personal estate of the person so dying, and also upon the clear residue and upon every part of the clear residue of the personal estate of every person who shall so die, whether testate or intestate, and leave personal estate of the clear value of 100*l.* or upwards, which shall remain after deducting debts, funeral expenses, and other charges, and specific and pecuniary legacies (if any), whether the title to such residue, or to any part thereof, shall accrue by virtue of any testamentary disposition, or upon intestacy, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid unto and for the use of his majesty, his heirs and successors, the several duties after the rates and in manner following; (that is to say), where any such legacy, or any residue or part of residue of any such personal estate, shall be given or shall pass to or for the benefit of a brother or sister of the deceased, or any descendant of a brother or sister of the deceased, there shall be charged a duty of 2*l.* for every 100*l.* of the value of any such legacy, or residue or part of residue, and so after the same rate for any greater or less sum; and where any such legacy, or any residue or part of residue of any such personal estate, shall be given or shall pass to or for the benefit of a brother or sister, of a father or mother of the deceased, or any descendant of a brother or sister, of a father or mother of the deceased, there shall be charged 3*l.* for every 100*l.* of the value of such legacy, or residue or part of residue, and so after the same rate for any greater or less sum; and where any such legacy, or any residue or part of residue of any such personal estate, shall be given or shall pass to or for the benefit of a brother or sister, of a grandfather or grandmother of the deceased, or any descendant of a brother or sister of a grandfather or grandmother of the deceased, there shall be charged a duty of 4*l.* for every 100*l.* of the value of such legacy, or residue or part of residue, and so after the same rate for any greater or less sum; and where any such legacy, or residue or part of residue of any such personal estate, shall be given or shall pass to or for the benefit of any person in any other degree of collateral consanguinity to the deceased than is hereinbefore described, or any stranger in blood to the deceased, there shall be charged a duty of 6*l.* for every 100*l.* of the value of such legacy, or residue or part of residue, and so after the same rate for any greater or less sum: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to charge with any duty any legacy, or any residue or part of residue of any personal estate, which shall be given or shall pass to or for the benefit of the husband or wife of the deceased, or to or for the benefit of any of the royal family." By section 6 the duties were to be paid by the executors or administrators on retaining or paying the legacies. By section 8 the value of any legacy given by way of annuity was to be calculated, and the duty chargeable thereon was to be charged, according to the tables in the schedule thereunto annexed, and the duty was to be paid by instalments. Section 28 imposed a penalty of 10*l.* per cent. for paying or receiving legacies without stamp receipts. And by section 27 no written receipt for any legacy or part of any legacy, or for the residue of any personal estate or any part of such residue, in respect whereof any duty was thereby imposed, shall be received in evidence, or be available in any manner whatever, unless the same shall be stamped as required by the act.*

Before the statute 37 Geo. III. c. 136, if an instrument was unstamped or improperly stamped, the defect could only have been rectified by the payment of the accumulated penalties which were inflicted by the several acts imposing stamp-duties; and a stamp exceeding was in many cases equally fatal with one falling below the required standard.† To remedy this evil the statute 37 Geo. III. c. 136, was passed, to enable the commissioners of stamp-duties to stamp deeds and other instruments, bills of exchange, promissory and other notes, in the cases therein mentioned. By section 1 it is enacted that instruments (except bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other notes, drafts, or orders) on stamps of a different denomination, but of an equal or greater value than the proper stamp, on production at the stamp-office, and payment of the legal duty and 5*l.* penalty, may be stamped with the proper stamp. Section 5, after reciting the statute 31 Geo. III. c. 25, whereby it was enacted "that all vellum, parchment, and paper, before any bill of exchange, promissory note, or other note liable to any stamp-duty by the said act imposed, should be engrossed, printed, or written thereon, should be brought to the head office for stamping such vellum, parchment, and paper; and that it should not be lawful for the commissioners for managing the duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, or their officers, to stamp any vellum, parchment, or paper, at any time after any bill of exchange, promissory note, or other note, draft, or order, should be written thereon, under any pretence whatsoever;" enacts that bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other notes, drafts, or orders, made after the passing of that act, and liable to any stamp-duty under the above-recited act, if on stamps of equal or superior value to the stamp required, though of a different denomination from the legal, may be properly stamped, on payment of the duty and a penalty. It may be useful to add here, though somewhat by anticipation, that the 5th section of the statute 43 Geo. III. c. 127, An Act for consolidating the duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, in Great Britain, after reciting that by statute 37 Geo. III. c. 136 it is enacted that "it shall be lawful for the said commissioners or their officers, upon payment of the duty and a penalty of 5*l.* in the said act mentioned, to stamp any vellum, parchment, or paper, whereupon any instrument, matter, or thing (except bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other notes, drafts, or orders) shall have been or shall be engrossed, printed, or written, liable in respect thereof to be stamped with a stamp or stamps of a particular denomination or value, and whereon there is or shall be impressed any stamp or stamps of a different denomination, but of an equal or greater value, in certain cases therein mentioned; and that it was expedient to permit the same to be done without the payment of the said penalty;" enacts "that it shall be lawful for the said commissioners or their officers, from and after the passing of this act, to stamp any such vellum, parchment, or paper (except as aforesaid), in any of the cases hereinbefore mentioned, without payment of the said penalty of 5*l.* required by the said recited act; and every instrument, matter, or thing so stamped shall have and be deemed of the like force and validity as if the said penalty of 5*l.* had been paid pursuant to the directions of the said act." The statute 48 Geo. III. c. 149, § 4, enacts "that no stamp appropriated to denote the duty charged on any particular instrument, and bearing the name of such instrument on the face thereof, shall be used for denoting any other duty of the same amount, or, if so used, the same shall be of no avail."

The more recent statutes 50 Geo. III. c. 35, § 16, and 55 Geo. III. c. 184, § 10, have, observes Mr. Collins,* "relieved the subject from a good deal of difficulty." The latter statute declares, "that from and after the passing of this act all instruments for or upon which any stamp or stamps shall have been used of an improper denomination or rate of duty, but of equal or greater value in the whole with or than the stamp or stamps which ought regularly to have been used thereon, shall nevertheless be deemed valid and effectual in the law, except in cases where the stamp or stamps used on such instruments shall have been specially appropriated to any other instrument, by having its name on the face thereof."

III. CRIMINAL LEGISLATION.

The effect of the French revolution in England is very discernible in the number and character of the acts relating to political offences passed during the present period. The alarm and consequent activity of the government are manifested by the rapid succession of such enactments as the following:—"An Act for the safety and preservation of his majesty's person and government against treasonable and seditious practices and attempts [18th December, 1795]" †; "An Act for the more effectually preventing seditious meetings and assemblies [18th December, 1795]" ‡; "An Act for the better prevention and punishment of attempts to seduce persons serving in his majesty's forces by sea or land from their duty and allegiance to his majesty, or to incite them to mutiny or disobedience [6th June, 1797]" §; "An Act for more effectually preventing the administering or taking of unlawful oaths [19th July, 1797]" ¶; "An Act for the more effectual suppression of societies established for seditious and treasonable purposes, and for better preventing treasonable and seditious practices [12th July, 1799]" †; "An Act to repeal so much of an act passed in the seventh year of the reign of Queen Anne, and also so much of an act passed in the seventeenth year of the reign of his late majesty King George the Second, as puts an end to the forfeiture of inheritances upon attainder of treason, after the death of the Pretender and his sons [12th July, 1799]" ‡; "An Act for regulating trials for high treason and misprision of high treason in certain cases [28th July, 1800]" §.

By the statute 30 Geo. III. c. 48, the punishment of burning women for high or petit treason is abolished, and hanging by the neck is substituted instead of it.

By the first section of the statute 36 Geo. III. c. 7 (enacted only for the life of George III., but made perpetual by the statute 57 Geo. III. c. 6), in consideration of "the daring outrages offered to his majesty's most sacred person, in his passage to and from parliament at the opening of the session, and also the continued attempts of wicked and evil-disposed persons to disturb the tranquillity of his majesty's kingdom, particularly by the multitude of seditious pamphlets and speeches daily printed, published, and dispersed, with unremitting industry, and with a transcendent boldness, in contempt of his majesty's royal person and dignity, and tending to the overthrow of the laws, government, and happy constitution of these realms," it was enacted that, if any person or persons whatsoever, within the realm or without, shall compass or intend death, destruction, or any bodily harm tending thereto, maiming or wounding, imprisonment or restraint of the king, or to depose him from the style, honour, or kingly name of the imperial crown of these realms, or to levy war against him within this realm, in order by force or constraint to compel him to change his measures or councils, or in order to put any constraint upon or intimidate both houses or either house of parliament, or to move or stir any foreigner with force to invade this realm or any of his majesty's dominions, and such compassing or intentions shall express by publishing any printing or writing, or by any other overt act; being legally convicted thereof, upon the oaths of two lawful and credible witnesses, upon trial, or otherwise by due course of law, then every such person shall be adjudged a traitor, and suffer death and forfeit as in cases of high treason. Mr. Justice Coleridge remarks that perhaps all the offences enumerated in this statute were already chargeable as overt acts of compassing the death of the king; but this makes them substantive treasons.¶

The statute 36 Geo. III. c. 8, was only to continue in force for three years from the day of its passing, and until the end of the then next session of parliament, and therefore expired at the end of that time; but some of its provisions were continued and extended in the statute 39 Geo. III. c. 79, particularly those against places for lecturing, debating, or reading books, pamphlets, newspapers, or other publications, where money should be paid for admission, unless previously licensed. The reason given for this clause in the first-mentioned act, and repeated in part in the latter, illustrates the state of public feeling at the time, and is as follows: "Whereas certain houses, rooms, or places within the cities of London and Westminster, and in the neighbourhood thereof, and in other places, have of late been frequently used for the purpose of delivering lectures and discourses on and concerning supposed public grievances, and matters relating to the laws, constitution, and government and policy of these kingdoms, and treating and debating on and concerning the same; and, under pretence thereof, lectures or discourses have been delivered, and debates held, tending to stir up hatred and contempt of his majesty's royal person, and of the government and constitution of this realm as by law established."

The above statute, 36 Geo. III. c. 8, contains a form of proclamation to be made for the dispersion of rioters, in the same words as that of 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5 (Riot Act); and, as we omitted to give the last-named act its due notice in its proper place, it may be useful to devote a few words to it here. The riotous assembling of twelve persons, or more, and not dispersing by proclamation, was first made high treason by statute 3 and 4 Edw. VI. c. 5; which statute was repealed by statute 1 Mar. c. 1, with the other treasons created since the 25 Edw. III.; but was in substance re-enacted by statute 1 Mar. st. 2, c. 12, which made the same offence a simple felony. These statutes specified the nature of the riots they were meant to suppress; and, if the persons were commanded by proclamation to disperse, and they did not, it was by the statute of Mary made felony, but within the benefit of clergy; and the act indemnified the peace-officers and their assistants, if they killed any of the mob in endeavouring to suppress such riot. This act was at first made only for a year, but was afterwards continued for the queen's life; and it was revived (1 Eliz. c. 16) and continued during the life of Elizabeth also; and then expired. "From the accession of James I." observes Blackstone, "to the death of Queen Anne, it was never once thought expedient to revive it."* And it might be a curious and not altogether unimportant speculation to inquire what effect this may have had on the momentous events that fill the history of the seventeenth century in England. Guizot has especially particularised, as one of the elements of political advancement before the other nations of the earth that were peculiar to the people of England, the right of assembling, and of being armed, one of the most precious heir-looms that had come down to them from the free and warlike barbarians from whom they were descended. There is, to be sure, a vast difference between the orderly, though armed, assembling of a nation, and the riotous assembling of such portions of a nation as assembled in the No Popery riots of 1780 in London. Still, if the acts specified above had been in force in the reign of Charles I., we are inclined to think that they would have thrown difficulties in the way of the party opposed to the king, at least at the commencement of their career. After things got so far as they had done when Oliver Cromwell began to drill and preach to his Ironsides, such statutes, indeed, would have been little regarded; but they might have somewhat retarded the progress of things to that point.

In the first year of George I. the provisions of the former statutes against riotous assembling were renewed and made perpetual, with large additions. For, whereas the former acts expressly defined and specified what should be accounted a riot, the statute 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 5 (commonly called the Riot Act), enacts, generally, that, if any persons, to the number of twelve or more, are unlawfully assembled to the disturbance of the peace, and be commanded by proclamation by one justice of the peace, sheriff, or under-sheriff of a county, or the mayor, bailiff, or other head-officer of a town, to disperse, and, notwithstanding such proclamation, shall continue together for one hour afterwards, such continuing together shall be felony without benefit of clergy. By the second section it is enacted that the justice of the peace, or other person authorised by the act to make the said proclamation, shall, among the said rioters, or as near to them as he can safely come, with a loud voice command silence, and then make proclamation in these words, or like in effect:—

"Our Sov'reign Lord the King chargeth and commandeth all persons, being assembled, immediately to disperse themselves, and peaceably to depart to their habitations, or to their lawful business, upon the pains contained in the act made in the first year of King George, for preventing tumults and riotous assemblies.—God save the King."

"If the reading of the proclamation," says Blackstone, "be by force opposed, or the reader be in any manner wilfully hindered from the reading of it, such opposers and hinderers are felons without benefit of clergy; and all persons to whom such proclamation ought to have been made, and knowing of such hinderance, and not dispersing, are felons without benefit of clergy. There is the like indemnifying clause, in case any of the mob be unfortunately killed in the endeavour to disperse them; being copied from the act of Queen Mary. And, by a subsequent clause of the new act, if any persons, so riotously assembled, begin, even before proclamation, to pull down any church, chapel, meeting-house, dwelling-house, or outhouses, they shall be felons without benefit of clergy."*

Thus the punishment of persons unlawfully assembling, if to the number of twelve, may be capital, according to the circumstances: but the punishment of persons so assembling, from the number of three to eleven, is fine and imprisonment only. The same is by the common law the punishment in riots and routs; to which the pillory has in aggravated cases been sometimes super-added.* The distinction between a riot, a rout, and an unlawful assembly, seems at common law to be this:—A riot is where three or more actually do an unlawful act with violence; or even do a lawful act, as abating a nuisance, in a violent and tumultuous manner.† A rout is where three or more assemble for an unlawful design, and move in it, but do not execute it.‡ An unlawful assembly is, when three or more assemble to do an unlawful act, but do nothing.§

At common law every sheriff, under-sheriff, and every other peace-officer, as constables, &c., may and ought to do all that in them lies towards the suppressing of a riot, and may command all other persons whatsoever to assist them therein. “And by the statute 13 Hen. IV. c. 7, any two justices, together with the sheriff or under-sheriff of the county, may come with the posse comitatus, if need be, and suppress any such riot, assembly, or rout, arrest the rioters, and record upon the spot the nature and circumstances of the whole transaction; which record alone shall be a sufficient conviction of the offenders. In the interpretation of which statute it hath been holden, that all persons, noblemen, and others, except women, clergymen, persons decrepit, and infants under fifteen, are bound to attend the justices in suppressing a riot, under pain of fine and imprisonment; and that any battery, wounding, or killing the rioters, that may happen in suppressing the riot, is justifiable.”||

But, though, as we have seen above, it is not difficult to distinguish between the legal meanings of the respective words riot, rout, and unlawful assembly, to say absolutely, and without mere reference to this technical distinction, what shall constitute an assembly of persons unlawful is by no means so easy a matter. This becomes not merely a legal, but a constitutional question of much nicety. At common law, an unlawful assembly is, according to the general opinion of lawyers, an assembling together of persons having an intention to do a thing, which, if it were executed, would make them rioters, but neither actually executing it, nor making a motion towards its execution.¶ Mr. Serjeant Hawkins, however, considers this much too narrow a definition; and thinks that any meeting of great numbers of people, with such circumstances of terror as cannot but endanger the public peace, and raise fears and jealousies among the king’s subjects, seems properly to be called an unlawful assembly; as where great numbers, complaining of a common grievance, meet together armed in a warlike manner, in order to consult together concerning the most proper means for the redress of such grievance.* According to this definition or opinion, it is tolerably plain that the English constitution would be deprived of one of, according to M. Guizot, its most peculiar and characteristic elements—an element which that profound inquirer into the philosophy of history considers as having materially aided in placing England so far in advance of the other European nations as regards free institutions—the right of assembling armed. If the above definition of an unlawful assembly had been attempted to be carried into effect about the time that Mr. Attorney-general Noy’s writ of ship-money was produced, we are inclined to think that it would have shared the same fate as that attempted revival of an obsolete prerogative.

By the statute 39 Geo. III. c. 79 (which was amended by the statute 57 Geo. III. c. 19), all societies are to be deemed unlawful, the members whereof shall be required to take any oath unlawful under the statute 37 Geo. III. c. 123, or any oath, test, &c. not authorised by law; or which shall have any members, committees, &c. not known to the society at large, or the names of all the members whereof shall not be entered in regular books, or which shall act in separate or distinct branches; and the members thereof, and persons corresponding with or supporting them, shall be deemed guilty of an unlawful combination or confederacy.† The act was not to extend to freemasons’ lodges,‡ nor to Quakers’ meetings, &c.§ Offenders under the act may be proceeded against, either summarily before one justice of the peace, or by indictment: persons convicted before one justice, to forfeit 20*l.* or suffer three months imprisonment; and persons convicted on indictment, to be transported for seven years.|| Printers are to give a notice to the clerk of the peace, who shall grant a certificate and file the notice, and transmit an attested copy to the secretary of state, under a penalty of 20*l.* for keeping presses or types without notice, or using them in any place not expressed therein:¶ a similar provision follows regarding persons carrying on the business of a letter-founder, or maker or seller of types for printing, or of printing-presses. And the following reason is assigned for these clauses of the act:—“Whereas many societies, established of late years for treasonable and seditious purposes, and especially the said societies of United Englishmen, United Scotsmen, United Irishmen, and United Britons, and the said society called the London Corresponding Society, and other corresponding societies, have at various times caused to be published, in great quantities, divers printed papers of an irreligious, treasonable, and seditious nature, tending to revile our holy religion, and to bring the profession and worship thereof into contempt among the ignorant, and also to excite hatred and contempt of his majesty's royal person, government, and laws, and of the happy constitution of these realms as by law established, and utterly to eradicate all principles of religion and morality; and such societies have dispersed such printed papers among the lower classes of the community, either gratis or at very low prices, and with an activity and profusion beyond all former example; and whereas all persons printing or publishing any papers or writings are by law answerable for the contents thereof, but such responsibility hath of late been in a great degree eluded by the secret printing and publication of such seditious, immoral, and irreligious papers or writings as aforesaid, and it is therefore highly important to the public peace that it should in future be known by whom any such papers shall be printed."

The name and abode of the printers are to be printed on every paper or book; and printers are to keep a copy of every paper they print, and write thereon the name and abode of their employer.* This clause was not to extend to impressions of engravings, or the printing by letter-press of names and addresses, &c., or to any papers for the sale of estates or goods by auction or otherwise,† nor to alter any rules or provisions respecting newspapers.‡ It may be added here, as having close connection with the subject, though not strictly within the period, that the 23rd section of the statute 57 Geo. III. c. 19, declares unlawful any meeting of more than fifty persons within the distance of one mile from the gate of Westminster Hall (except such parts of the parish of St. Paul's, Covent Garden, as are within the said distance), to petition for any alteration of matters in church or state, on any day on which the two Houses or either House of Parliament shall meet and sit, or on which his majesty's Courts of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, or any of them, or any judge of any of them, shall sit in Westminster Hall.

By the 37 Geo. III. c. 70 (made perpetual by 57 Geo. III. c. 7), any person who shall attempt to seduce any person or persons serving in his majesty's forces, by sea or land, from his duty and allegiance to his majesty, or to invite such person or persons to mutiny, shall, on being legally convicted of such offence, be adjudged guilty of felony, and shall suffer death, as in cases of felony, without benefit of clergy.

By the 37 Geo. III. c. 123 (rendered more effectual by 52 Geo. III. c. 104), persons administering or taking unlawful oaths, that is, oaths or engagements purporting or intended to bind the person taking the same to engage in any mutinous or seditious purpose, or to disturb the public peace, "or to be of any association, society, or confederacy formed for any such purpose, or to obey the orders or commands of any committee or body of men not lawfully constituted, or of any leader or commander or other person not having authority by law for that purpose, or not to inform or give evidence against any associate, confederate, or other person; or not to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or confederacy; or not to reveal or discover any illegal act done or to be done; or not to reveal or discover any illegal oath or engagement which may have been administered or tendered to or taken by such person or persons, or to or by any other person or persons, or the import of any such oath or engagement, shall, on conviction thereof by due course of law, be adjudged guilty of felony, and may be transported for any term of years not exceeding seven years; and every person who shall take any such oath or engagement, not being compelled thereto, shall, on conviction thereof by due course of law, be adjudged guilty of felony, and may be transported for any term of years not exceeding seven years."

The clause against administering of an oath to any person, purporting to bind him not to reveal or discover any unlawful combination or conspiracy, nor any illegal act done by them, has been held to extend to a combination for raising wages.* Against those combinations of workmen to raise wages were likewise made the statutes 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 106, and 5 Geo. IV. c. 95; which, together with the other laws relating to the combination of workmen, were repealed by the statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 129.

By the statute 39 Geo. III. c. 93, so much of the statute 7 Ann. c. 21 (viz. § 10), and also so much of the statute 17 Geo. II. c. 39, as put an end to the forfeiture of inheritance upon attainder of treason, after the death of the Pretender and his sons, was repealed.

By the statute 39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 93, in cases of high treason and misprision of treason, where the overt act alleged in the indictment shall be assassination of the king, or any direct attempt against his life, &c., the offender shall be tried in the same manner as if charged with murder, but punishable as in cases of high treason.

The number of statutes passed during this period against riots, and offences attended with riot and violence, is considerable. The titles of these acts will be sufficient to show their general character, which is all that can be attempted here:—
"An Act for the better and more effectual protection of stocking-frames, and the machines or engines annexed thereto or used therewith; and for the punishment of persons destroying or injuring of such stocking-frames, machines, or engines, and the framework-knitted pieces, stockings, and other articles and goods used and made in the hosiery or framework-knitted manufactory; or breaking or destroying any machinery contained in any mill or

mills used or any way employed in preparing or spinning of wool or cotton for the use of the stocking-frame.*—“An Act for better preventing offences in obstructing, destroying, or damaging ships or other vessels, and in obstructing seamen, keelmen, casters, and ship carpenters from pursuing their lawful occupations [17th June, 1793].”† —“An Act to prevent obstructions in the free passage of grain within the kingdom [18th December, 1795].”‡—“An Act for the security of collieries and mines, and for the better regulation of colliers and miners [9th July, 1800].”§

The present period is fertile in statutes relating to the subject of forgery. The earlier statutes on this subject are directed against the forger of false deeds;|| or against such as shall levy any fine, or suffer any recovery, or acknowledge any statute, recognizance, bail, or judgment in the name of any other person or persons not being privy and consenting thereto.¶ But the later statutes since the commencement of the national debt and the invention of bills of exchange are chiefly directed against the forging of powers to transfer stock;  against the forging the acceptance of bills of exchange, or the numbers or principal sums of accountable receipts for notes, bills, or other securities for payment of money, or warrants or orders for payment of money or delivery of goods.†† The establishment of the Bank of England and the system of banking generally has likewise produced statutes against the forging of the notes or bills of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England; ‡‡ and against the forgery of the notes and bills of exchange of persons carrying on the business of bankers. §§

The definition given by Blackstone|| of forgery is, “the fraudulent making or alteration of a writing to the prejudice of another man’s right;” which definition, observes Mr. Justice Coleridge, in his note to the passage in Blackstone, “seems too confined, if by the words ‘to the prejudice,’ &c., it is intended to convey a notion that some one’s right must actually be prejudiced by the forged writing; because it is clear that the offence is complete before publication of the instrument, and that it is enough if the counterfeiting be such whereby another may be prejudiced. (East’s P. C. c. xix. s. 7.) In the short account which the author gives of this offence in the text, he principally confines himself to the cases in which forgery may be committed; and, formidable as his list may appear, yet it may give the reader some idea how it might have been increased, to mention that Mr. Hammond, in the title ‘Forgery,’ of his ‘Criminal Code,’ has enumerated more than four hundred statutes which contain provisions against the offence.”

In a former Book* we carried down the subject of benefit of clergy to the statute 6 Geo. I. c. 25, whereby persons convicted of any larceny, grand or petit, who by the law then should be entitled to the benefit of clergy, and liable only to the penalties of burning in the hand, or whipping, might, at the discretion of the court, instead of such burning in the hand, or whipping, be transported to America (or by statute 19 Geo. III. c. 74, to any other parts beyond the seas), for seven years; and if they returned within that time, it should be felony without benefit of clergy. By the statutes 16 Geo. II. c. 15, and 8 Geo. III. c. 15,† other provisions were made for the more speedy and effectual execution of the laws relating to transportation. By the statute 19 Geo. III. c. 74, all offenders liable to transportation might, in lieu thereof, at the discretion of the judges, be employed, if males (except in the case of petty larceny), in hard labour for the benefit of some public navigation; or, whether males or females, might in all cases be confined to hard labour in certain penitentiary houses, to be erected by virtue of the said act, for the several terms therein specified, but in no case exceeding seven years, with a power of subsequent mitigation, and even of reward, in case of their good behaviour. In respect to the penitentiary houses this act was never carried into execution. But in 1792 a proposal made to Mr. Pitt by Mr. Jeremy Bentham, and framed on his panopticon plan of arrangement, was embraced with enthusiasm by Mr. Pitt and his colleagues in office; and in 1794 an act‡ passed for the purpose of carrying the plan into effect. Notwithstanding this act, however, and notwithstanding all the influence of Mr. Pitt and his colleagues, Mr. Bentham’s plan was never carried into effect, by reason of the opposition of some (to everybody out of the cabinet) secret influence. Of the opposition thus exerted it is difficult to conjecture a

† “The 5 Geo. IV. c. 84, repeals the 16 Geo. II. c. 15, and 8 Geo. III. c. 15, as well as several other later statutes, so far as regards the present subject; its object is two-fold—to regulate what is called the punishment of the hulks, and that of transportation. The first of these was introduced by the 16 Geo. III. c. 43, a temporary act, when the disturbances in the American colonies had interrupted the transportation of convicts to that country. The 19 Geo. III. c. 74, was also temporary, as far as regarded the hulks, and for many years confinement in them has ceased to be a punishment which may be formally pronounced for any offence; but male offenders under sentence of death, and deprived during pleasure, or under sentence of transportation, have been, and by the recent act still may be, sent to them temporarily, or until transportation; and it very commonly happens that those who are sentenced to transportation for seven years only pass the whole of the period in the hulks. In 1812 a report upon the state of the hulks was made to the House of Commons by the committee then sitting on the laws relating to penitentiaries, and in consequence of their suggestions several useful measures of reform and regulation were adopted. These are carried on by the recent act; each hulk is placed under an overseer, who is to reside in it, with a sufficient number of officers and guards; he is invested with the same power as a gaoler over his prisoners; like him is answerable for their escape; may inflict moderate punishment for disorderly conduct; is to see them fed and clothed, and to keep them to labour according to his instructions. Over the whole is placed a superintendent (with an assistant or deputy, if necessary), who is to inspect them all minutely four times in the year at least, ascertain their condition, examine into the behaviour both of the overseers and prisoners, the amount of the earnings, and the expenses of the establishment; upon all which he is to make two reports, at least, in the year, to the secretary of state, which are to be laid before parliament.”—Note by Mr. Justice Coleridge, 4 Blackst. cause—unless it might be that his majesty George III. had a mind to plan a penitentiary as well as Mr. Jeremy Bentham, and, having more power than Mr. Bentham, was enabled to have his plan adopted in the room of Mr. Bentham's. The result, however, is, that a site for the penitentiary was purchased in a bad and unhealthy situation (Millbank), for double the sum for which a site in a good and healthy situation (Battersea Rise, as proposed by Mr. Bentham) might have been purchased. In this instance an article dear and bad was substituted for one cheap and good. Mr. Bentham's plan for 1000 prisoners would have cost the public between 20,000*l.* and 30,000*l.*; the present plan, for 600, has already cost at least ten times that sum.

It will be convenient to finish this subject here, though it runs into the next period; and to mention that, in 1812, an act was passed "for the erection of a penitentiary house for the confinement of offenders convicted within the city of London and county of Middlesex; and for making compensation to Jeremy Bentham, esquire, for the non-performance of an agreement between the said Jeremy Bentham and the lords commissioners of his majesty's treasury, respecting the custody and maintenance of convicts (20th April, 1812)."^{27*} This act provided for the erection of a penitentiary house at Millbank, for the purpose of confining offenders convicted in London and Middlesex only; but by statute 56 Geo. III. c. 63, the penitentiary house at Millbank was made applicable to the kingdom at large. In the early part of 1823 it contained nearly 900 prisoners, and about that time a very alarming sickness made its appearance amongst them. The acts which more particularly regulate the penitentiary are the 56 Geo. III. c. 63, and 59 Geo. III. c. 136. It is much to be regretted that Mr. Bentham's plan did not receive, at least, a fair trial; and the more so, as it was so much more economical than the one adopted in lieu of it.

By the statute 19 Geo. III. c. 74, it is also enacted that, instead of burning in the hand, the court may in all clergyable felonies, impose a pecuniary fine; or may (except in the case of manslaughter) order the offenders to be once or oftener, but not more than thrice, either publicly or privately whipped; such private whipping (to prevent collusion or abuse) to be inflicted in the presence of two witnesses; and, in case of female offenders, in the presence of females only. The fine, or whipping, is to have the same consequences as burning in the hand; and the offender so fined or whipped shall be equally liable to a subsequent detainer or imprisonment. It would leave the subject very incomplete not to add here that the punishment of publicly whipping females was abolished by 57 Geo. III. c. 75; and that the 1 Geo. IV. c. 57, repealed that act, and enacted that female offenders should not suffer the punishment either of public or private whipping.

By the statute 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, § 3, benefit of clergy is not allowed in any case of offences committed on the high seas; but by the statute 39 Geo. III. c. 37, reciting part of the above act of Hen. VIII., all offences whatsoever, committed on the high seas, are made liable to the same punishments as if committed on shore, and are to be tried in the same manner as felonies are directed to be tried in the act therein recited; and persons tried for murder or manslaughter, and found guilty of manslaughter only, shall be entitled to the benefit of clergy, and be subject to the same punishment as if they had committed such manslaughter on land.

In the preceding Book we entered somewhat fully into the consideration of the question as to the right of juries to include in their verdict the point of law as well as of fact, first, generally, and secondly, in the particular case of libel.* But, whatever the rule of the common law may have been upon the subject, the general practice for a number of years had been to consider the question of criminality, in cases of libel, as a question of pure law for the determination of the judge. In the case, which we mentioned on a former occasion,† of The King v. The Dean of St. Asaph,‡ and in the subsequent case of The King v. Withers,§ the law was declared by the court to be that, on the trial of an indictment for a libel, the only questions for the consideration of the jury are the fact of publishing and the truth of the innuendos; and that whether the subject-matter be or be not a libel is a question of law for the consideration of the court. But, since this important question, involving the state of the law and practice both before and since the passing of Mr. Fox's bill of 1792, cannot, as Mr. Justice Coleridge has remarked,|| be fully understood without reference to all the proceedings in the trial of the Dean of St. Asaph, it will be necessary to enter more fully than we have done into the details of that trial. And this is the less to be regretted, not only as it appears necessary to the full comprehension of a very important subject, but also as the trial gave occasion to that speech of Lord Erskine's of which Fox repeatedly declared that he thought it the finest argument in the English language.* Whether it was so or not, any composition, whether written or spoken, which was so characterised by such a man as Charles James Fox, must undoubtedly possess merits sufficient to render it well worth perusal; and, at all events, it is held in high professional estimation, as displaying perhaps the most perfect example of argument and eloquence united ever exhibited in Westminster Hall.

As we have already stated,† on the trial of the case at the Shrewsbury summer assizes in 1784, the jury, after a good deal of rather sharp discussion between the judge, Mr. Justice Buller, and the counsel, Mr. Erskine (from which we concess the impression upon the whole left on our minds was that the judge endeavoured to make the verdict mean more than the jury intended it should), ultimately returned a verdict that the dean was guilty of publishing, but whether it was a libel or not they did not find. On the 8th of November, the second day of the ensuing term, Mr. Erskine moved the Court of King's Bench to set aside the verdict, on the ground of a misdirection of the judge, who had told the jury that the matter for them to decide was, whether the defendant was guilty of the fact or not.‡ Mr. Erskine began by stating to the court the substance of the indictment against the Dean of St. Asaph, which charged the publication with an intention to incite the people to subvert the government by armed rebellion; the mere evidence of the publication of the Dialogue, which the prosecutor had relied on to establish that malicious intention; and the manner in which the defendant had, by evidence of his real motives for publishing it, as contained in the advertisement, rebutted the truth of the epithets charged by the indictment. He then stated the substance of his speech to the jury at Shrewsbury, maintaining the legality of the Dialogue, the right of the jury to consider that legality, the injustice of a verdict affixing the epithet of "guilty" to a publication without first considering whether the thing published contained any "guilt," and, above all, the right which the jury unquestionably had (even upon the authority of those very cases urged against his client) to take the evidence into consideration by which the defendant sought to exculpate himself from the seditious intention charged by the indictment.*

And we may remark upon this, that certainly the verdict "Guilty of publishing," but whether a libel or not the jury do not find," appears a contradiction in terms, leaving the point about which alone there was any question of guilt untouched, and affixing the epithet guilty to an act to which, with the other point undecided, it was wholly inapplicable. The act of publishing is legally as innocent an act as the act of breathing, or the act of walking, or the act of preaching. This last will afford an illustrative case. In the year 1670 Penn and Mead,† two Quakers, being indicted for seditiously preaching to a multitude tumultuously assembled in Gracechurch-street, were tried before the recorder of London, who told the jury that they had nothing to do but to find whether the defendants had preached or not; for that whether the matter or the intention of their preaching were seditious were questions of law, and not of fact, which they were to keep to at their peril. The jury found Penn guilty of speaking to people in Gracechurch-street; and, on the recorder's telling them that they meant, no doubt, that he was speaking to a tumult of people there, he was informed by the foreman that they allowed of no such words in their finding, but adhered to their former verdict. The recorder refused to receive it, and desired them to withdraw, on which they again retired, and brought in a general verdict of acquittal, which the court considering as a contempt, set a fine of forty marks upon each of them, and condemned them to lie in prison till it was paid. Edward Bushel, one of the jurors, refused to pay his fine, and, being imprisoned in consequence of the refusal, sued out his writ of habeas corpus, which, with the cause of his commitment (viz. his refusing to find according to the direction of the court in matter of law), was returned by the sheriffs of London to the Court of Common Pleas, when Lord Chief Justice Vaughan delivered his opinion as follows:—"We must take off this veil and colour of words, which make a show of being something, but are in fact nothing. If the meaning of these words, finding against the direction of the court in matter of law, be, that if the judge, having heard the evidence given in court (for he knows no other), shall tell the jury, upon this evidence, that the law is for the crown, and they, under the pain of fine and imprisonment, are to find accordingly, every man sees that the jury is but a troublesome delay, great charge, and of no use in determining right and wrong, and therefore the trials by them may be better abolished than continued; which were a strange and new-found conclusion, after a trial so celebrated for many hundreds of years in this country." He then applied this doctrine with double force to criminal cases, and discharged the juror from his commitment.

This puts the question in its proper light. If the jury are not to determine questions of evidence, what are they to determine? The question whether Penn preached or did not preach is not more a question of evidence than the question whether he spoke or preached to a tumult of people. If it should be held that the jury may decide whether he spoke or did not speak, but not whether the people to whom he spoke were a tumult of people or not a tumult of people, every man sees, to borrow the language above cited of Lord Chief Justice Vaughan, that the jury is but a troublesome delay, great charge, and of no use in determining right and wrong. Whether a well-educated and powerful-minded judge is not likely to be far better qualified for weighing evidence than a jury, except under such circumstances as almost inevitably render the judge not wholly impartial and unprejudiced, as in the case of prosecution for political offences, is another question, which we are not called upon to discuss here. But the question we are here discussing is whether, if there is to be a trial by jury, that trial shall be a substantial reality, or shall only "make a show of being something, while it is in fact nothing."

Now it is to be observed that this case is almost, as the lawyers say, "on all fours" with the case of the Dean of St. Asaph. In the latter case, as in the former, we think it clear that the original intention of the jury was a general verdict of acquittal. Observe the terms in which they announce their verdict:—

"Associate.—Gentlemen, do you find the defendant guilty or not guilty?"

"Foreman.—Guilty of publishing only."

"Mr. Erskine.—You find him guilty of publishing only?"

"A Juror.—Guilty only of publishing."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—I believe that is a verdict not quite correct. You, gentlemen of the Jury, must explain, one way or the other, whether you find the meaning of the innuendos. The indictment has stated that G. means Gentleman; F., Farmer; the King, the King of Great Britain; and the Parliament, the Parliament of Great Britain.*

"One of the Jury.—We have no doubt of that."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—If you find him guilty of publishing, you must not say the word only."

"Mr. Erskine.—By that they mean to find there was no sedition."

"A Juror.—We only find him guilty of publishing; we do not find anything else."

"Mr. Erskine.—I beg your lordship's pardon, with great submission. I am sure I mean nothing that is irregular. I understand they say, 'We only find him guilty of publishing.'

"A Juror.—Certainly; that is all we do find."

"Mr. Broderick.—They have not found that it is a libel of and concerning the king and his government."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—If you only attend to what is said, there is no question or doubt. If you are satisfied whether the letter G. means gentleman, whether F. means farmer, the King means King of Great Britain, the Parliament, the Parliament of Great Britain—if they are all satisfied it is so—is there any other innuendo in the indictment?"

"Mr. Leycester.—Yes; there is one more, upon the word votes."

"Mr. Erskine.—When the jury came into court, they gave, in the hearing of every man present, the very verdict that was given in the case of the King against Woodfall: they said, 'Guilty of publishing only.' Gentlemen, I desire to know whether you mean the word only to stand in your verdict."

"One of the Jury.—Certainly."

"Another Juror.—Certainly."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Gentlemen, if you add the word only, it will be negating the innuendos; it will be negating, that by the word King it means King of Great Britain; by the word Parliament, Parliament of Great Britain; by the letter F. it means Farmer; and G., Gentleman: that I understand you do not mean."

"A Juror.—No."

"Mr. Erskine.—My Lord, I say that will have the effect of a general verdict of guilty. I desire the verdict may be recorded. I desire your Lordship, sitting here as judge, to record the verdict as given by the jury. If the jury depart from the word only, they alter their verdict."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—I will take the verdict as they mean to give it: it shall not be altered. Gentlemen, if I understand you right, your verdict is this—you mean to say guilty of publishing this libel?"

"A Juror.—No; the pamphlet: we do not decide upon its being a libel."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—You say he is guilty of publishing the pamphlet, and that the meaning of the innuendos is as stated in the indictment?"

"A Juror.—Certainly."

"Mr. Erskine.—Is the word only to stand part of your verdict?"

"A Juror.—Certainly."

"Mr. Erskine.—Then I insist it shall be recorded."

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Then the verdict must be misunderstood. Let me understand the jury."

"Mr. Erskine.—The jury do understand their verdict."

* 21 St. Tr. 950. In a note it is added, that the Report published by Mr. Gurney differs considerably from that given in the "Speeches of the Hon. Thomas Erskine." The latter is adopted here.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Sir, I will not be interrupted.

"Mr. Erskine.—I stand here as an advocate for a brother-citizen, and I desire that the word only may be recorded.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Sit down, Sir; remember your duty, or I shall be obliged to proceed in another manner.

"Mr. Erskine.—Your lordship may proceed in what manner you think fit. I know my duty as well as your lordship knows yours. I shall not alter my conduct.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Gentlemen, if you say guilty of publishing only, you negative the meaning of the particular words I have mentioned.

"A Juror.—Then we beg to go out.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—If you say guilty of publishing only, the consequence is this, that you negative the meaning of the different words I mentioned to you. That is the operation of the word only. They are endeavouring to make you give a verdict in words different from what you mean.

"A Juror.—We should be very glad to be informed how it will operate.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—If you say nothing more, but find him guilty of publishing, and leave out the word only, the question of law is open upon the record, and they may apply to the Court of King's Bench, and move in arrest of judgment there. If they are not satisfied with the opinion of that court, either party has a right to go to the House of Lords, if you find nothing more than the simple fact: but if you add the word only, you do not find all the facts; you do not find, in fact, that the letter G. means Gentleman; that F. means Farmer; the King, the King of Great Britain; and Parliament, the Parliament of Great Britain.

"A Juror.—We admit that.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Then you must leave out the word only.

"Mr. Erskine.—I beg pardon: I beg to ask your lordship this question—Whether, if the jury find him guilty of publishing, leaving out the word only, and if the judgment is not arrested by the Court of King's Bench, whether the seditious does not stand recorded?

"Mr. Justice Buller.—No, it does not, unless the pamphlet be a libel in point of law.

"Mr. Erskine.—True; but can I say that the defendant did not publish it seditiously, if judgment is not arrested, but entered in the record?

"Mr. Justice Buller.—I say it will not stand as proving the seditious. Gentlemen, I tell it you as law; and this is my particular satisfaction, as I told you when summing up the case. If in what I now say to you I am wrong in any instance, they have a right to move for a new trial. The law is this: if you find him guilty of publishing, without saying more, the question whether libel or not is open for the consideration of the court.

"A Juror.—That is what we mean.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—If you say, guilty of publishing only, it is an incomplete verdict, because of the word only.

"A Juror.—We certainly mean to leave the matter of libel to the court.

"Mr. Erskine.—Do you find seditious?

"A Juror.—No; not so. We do not give any verdict upon it.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—I speak from adjudged cases. I will take the verdict when you understand it yourselves in the words you give it. If you say, guilty of publishing only, there must be another trial.

"A Juror.—We did not say so; only guilty of publishing.

"Mr. Erskine.—Will your lordship allow it to be recorded thus, only guilty of publishing?

"Mr. Justice Buller.—It is misunderstood.

"Mr. Erskine.—The Jury say, only guilty of publishing. Once more, I desire that that verdict may be recorded.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—If you say, only guilty of publishing, then it is contrary to the innuendos. If you think the word King means the King of Great Britain; the word Parliament, the Parliament of Great Britain; the G. means Gentleman; and the F., Farmer; you may say this—Guilty of publishing; but whether a libel or not, the jury do not find.

"A Juror.—Yes.

"Mr. Erskine.—I asked this question of your lordship in the hearing of the jury—Whether, upon the verdict you desire them to find, the seditious, which they have not found, will not be inferred by the court if judgment is not arrested?

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Will you attend? Do you give it in this way—Guilty of the publication, but whether a libel or not you do not find.

"A Juror.—We do not find it a libel, my Lord; we do not decide upon it.

"Mr. Erskine.—They find it no libel.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—You see what is attempted to be done?

"Mr. Erskine.—There is nothing wrong attempted upon my part. I ask this once again, in the hearing of the jury, and I desire an answer from your lordship as judge, whether or no, when I come to move in arrest of judgment, and the court enter on judgment, and say it is a libel, whether I can afterwards say, in mitigation of punishment, the defendant was not guilty of publishing it with a seditious intent, when he is found guilty of publishing it in manner and form as stated; and whether the jury are not thus made to find him guilty of seditious, when, in the same moment, they say they did not mean to do so? Gentlemen, do you find him guilty of seditious?

"A Juror.—We do not; neither one nor the other.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—Take the verdict.

"Associate.—You say, Guilty of publishing; but whether a libel or not you do not find?

"A Juror.—That is not the verdict.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—You say, Guilty of publishing; but whether a libel or not you do not find: is that your meaning?

"A Juror.—That is our meaning.

"One of the Counsel.—Do you leave the intention to the Court?

"A Juror.—Certainly.

"Mr. Cowper.—The intention arises out of the record.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—And, unless it is clear upon the record, there can be no judgment upon it.

"Mr. Bearcroft.—You mean to leave the law where it is?

"A Juror.—Certainly.

"Mr. Justice Buller.—The first verdict was as clear as could be: they only wanted it to be confounded."*

MR. JUSTICE BULLER.

It seems clear that all this amounted to a manifest intention on the part of the jury to return a general verdict of acquittal, out of which they were partly mystified, partly brow-beaten by the special pleading and authority of the learned judge. In fact, as we have seen, when the verdict "Guilty of publishing, but whether a libel or not you do not find," was put into their mouths, one juror had the courage to say distinctly, "That is not the verdict." Moreover, if, as the court maintained, the question of libel or no libel was clearly a question for the determination of the judge, with which the jury had nothing to do, why add the words "but whether a libel or not, the jury do not find." The manner and form in which these words are added to the substantive part of the verdict, imply that the jury had the power, if they chose to exercise it, of deciding the question of libel or no libel. The extract given above, though somewhat long, appears necessary to make this important question intelligible; for it throws considerable light upon the anomalous state into which the practice of the courts as regarded libel had fallen before the introduction of Mr. Fox's bill. It is certainly not very easy to perceive the repugnancy which Mr. Justice Buller strives to establish between the words of the verdict, "Guilty of publishing only," and the meaning of the different words mentioned, viz. that the letter G. means Gentleman, that F. means Farmer, the King, the King of Great Britain, and Parliament, the Parliament of Great Britain. The learned judge tells the jury that if they say "Guilty of publishing only," they thereby negative the meaning of the different words above mentioned. We cannot say that we see this consequence as flowing from those premises. The jury had read the Dialogue which was the subject-matter of the prosecution, and they knew as well as the judge what was the meaning of the innuendos. Nevertheless, it did not appear to them that the publication was a libel. The assertion of the judge, that the verdict, "Guilty of publishing only," negatives the meaning of the above-mentioned words, seems grounded on the assumption that the publication was libellous; in other words, on taking for granted the whole question at issue. Mr. Justice Buller said that the effect of adding the word only to the verdict was, that, if the jury added that word, they did not find all the facts. Here the learned judge would seem to have entrapped himself by assuming too much even for his own argument. Whatever difference of opinion might have existed as to the legal competency of the jury to meddle with the question of law, there existed none as to the question of fact being their peculiar province. Now, for the sake of argument, giving to the adverb only the meaning here claimed for it by Mr. Justice Buller, what is the meaning of the conclusion, that, if the jury added the word only to their verdict, it would amount to their not finding all the facts? Let it be granted that they did not find all the facts. What follows? They sit there as judges of the facts, at least. And what does that mean, but having the power to determine whether certain evidence is strong enough to establish certain facts, or is not? And what else does the not finding all the facts mean but the finding that there is evidence sufficient to establish some of the facts, but not evidence sufficient to establish others of the facts? If a jury are not to do this, they are a mere word, a mockery—and not merely a mockery and nothing more, for they are a very cumbrous, troublesome, and costly mockery. The repugnancy in the verdict alluded to above, as asserted by the judge, might be this: that the jury's admission of the meaning of the innuendos (as above explained) implied their admission of all the facts contended for by the judge; while their addition of the word only to their verdict implied a non-admission of all the facts in the sense of the learned judge. But we apprehend that the jury might very well admit the meaning of the innuendos, without being held thereby to have admitted all the facts. If when we use the terms "question of law," and "question of fact," is to be understood in the one case a question of pure law, and in the other a question of pure fact, we see that, when the question has for its subject-matter the construing the meaning of certain words singly, or of certain combinations of words joined together so as to form sentences, it can only be a question of pure law where the law has affixed certain defined and unambiguous significations to certain words, or combinations of words, as, for example, to the language of pleading and conveyancing. Where the law has not done this, the question is no more a question of pure law than the question of the meaning of the words of an Egyptian inscription, a Greek chorus, or a German metaphysician, is a question of pure law. Applying these principles to the case before us, we find that the question of the meaning and intent of the 'Dialogue between a Gentleman and a Farmer' is just as little a question of pure law, and just as much a question of fact, as the questions of publication, and of the meaning of the innuendos, as they are called. Consequently, the logical net in which the learned judge seemed to think the jury were entangled would seem to have extended over more than the jury; and the logical process by which his lordship endeavoured to show that the jury had fallen into an absurd and inconsistent conclusion appears insufficient for that purpose.

It has been contended, in favour of the practice of considering the criminality of a paper charged to be a libel as a question of pure law for the determination of the judge, that this was the most favourable course for the defendant, because the question of criminality must then be either on the record, or in the direction of the judge; and of course always subject to reconsideration for the defendant by writ of error, or on motion for a new trial. "In fact, however," observes Mr. Justice Coleridge, in one of the notes to his edition of Blackstone's 'Commentaries,'* "it was attended with this heavy disadvantage to him, that, whenever the publication and the meaning of the paper as charged were found against him, he was almost uniformly convicted in the first instance, for the very reason that such conviction was so reviewable." The above argument, too, savours somewhat of the character of the argument used by Mr. Justice Buller on the trial of the Dean of St. Asaph at Shrewsbury, viz. "that, if he should declare it to be no libel, and the jury, adopting that opinion, should acquit the defendant, he should thereby deprive the prosecutor of his right of appeal upon the record, which was one of the dearest birthrights of the subject." Upon which Mr. Erskine, in the speech on his motion for a new trial, made the following observations:—"The learned judge then said, that as to whether the Dialogue, which was the subject of the prosecution, was criminal or innocent, he should not even hint an opinion; for that, if he should declare it to be no libel, and the jury, adopting that opinion, should acquit the defendant, he should thereby deprive the prosecutor of his right of appeal upon the record, which was one of the dearest birthrights of the subject. That the law was equal as between the prosecutor and defendant; and that there was no difference between criminal and civil cases. I am desirous not to interrupt the state of the trial by observations; but cannot help remarking, that justice to the prosecutor, as standing exactly in equal scales with a prisoner, and in the light of an adverse party in a civil suit, was the first reason given by the learned judge why the jury should at all events find the defendant guilty, without investigating his guilt. This was telling the jury in the plainest terms, that they could not find a general verdict in favour of the defendant without an act of injustice to the prosecutor, who would be shut out by it from his writ of error, which he was entitled to by law, and which was the best birthright of the subject. It was, therefore, an absolute denial of the right of the jury, and of the judge also; as no right can exist which necessarily works a wrong in the exercise of it. If the prosecutor had by law a right to have the question on the record, the judge and jury were both tied up at the trial; the one from directing, and the other from finding, a verdict which disappointed that right. If the prosecutor had a right to have the question upon the record, for the purpose of appeal, by the jury confining themselves to the fact of publication, which would leave that question open, it is impossible to say that the jury had a right likewise to judge of the question of libel, and to acquit the defendant, which would deprive the prosecutor of that right. There cannot be contradictory rights, the exercise of one destroying and annihilating the other. I shall discuss this new claim of the prosecutor upon a future occasion; for the present, I will venture to say, that no man has a right—a property—or a beneficial interest in the punishment of another. A prosecution at the instance of the crown has public justice alone, and not private vengeance, for its object: in prosecutions for murder, and felonies, and most other misdemeanors, the prosecutor can have no such pretence, since the record does not comprehend the offence. Why he should have it in the case of a libel, I would gladly be informed."*

And again, in his speech on the 15th of November, when cause was shown by the counsel for the crown why there should not be a new trial:—"If the prosecutor in every case has a birthright by law to have the question of libel left open upon the record, which it can only be by a verdict of conviction on the single fact of publishing, no legal right can at the same time exist in the jury to shut out that question by a verdict of acquittal founded upon the merits of the publication, or the innocent mind of the publisher. Rights that are repugnant and contradictory cannot be co-existent. The jury can never have a constitutional right to do an act beneficial to the defendant, which when done deprives the prosecutor of a right which the same constitution has vested in him. No right can belong to one person, the exercise of which in every instance must necessarily work a wrong to another. If the prosecutor of a libel has in every instance the privilege to try the merits of his prosecution before the judges, the jury can have no right in any instance to preclude his appeal to them by a general verdict for the defendant.

"The jury, therefore, from this part of the charge, must necessarily have felt themselves absolutely limited (I might say even in their powers) to the fact of publication* because the highest restraint upon good men is to convince them that they cannot break loose from it without injustice; and the power of a good subject is never more effectually destroyed than when he is made to believe that the exercise of it will be a breach of his duty to the public, and a violation of the laws of his country.

"But, since equal justice between the prosecutor and the defendant is the pretence for this abridgment of jurisdiction, let us examine a little how it is affected by it. Do the prosecutor and the defendant really stand upon an equal footing by this mode of proceeding? With what decency this can be alleged I leave those to answer who know that it is only by the indulgence of Mr. Bearcroft, of counsel for the prosecution, that my reverend client is not at this moment in prison,* while we are discussing this notable equality. Besides, my lord, the judgment of this court, though not final in the constitution, and therefore not binding on the prosecutor, is absolutely conclusive on the defendant. If your lordships pronounce the record to contain no libel, and arrest the judgment on the verdict, the prosecutor may carry it to the House of Lords, and, pending his writ of error, remains untouched by your lordships' decision; but, if judgment be against the defendant, it is only at the discretion of the crown (as it is said), and not of right, that he can prosecute any writ of error at all; and, even if he finds no obstruction in that quarter, it is but at the best an appeal for the benefit of public liberty, from which he himself can have no personal benefit; for the writ of error being no supersedeas, the punishment is inflicted on him in the meantime. In the case of Mr. Horne, this court imprisoned him for publishing a libel upon its own judgment, pending his appeal from its justice; and he had suffered the utmost rigour which the law imposed upon him as a crime [criminal?], at the time that the House of Lords, with the assistance of the twelve judges of England, were gravely assembled to determine whether he had been guilty of any crime. I do not mention this case as hard or rigorous on Mr. Horne, as an individual—it is the general course of practice; but surely that practice ought to put an end to this argument of equality between prosecutor and prisoner. It is adding insult to injury to tell an innocent man who is in a dungeon, pending his writ of error, and of whose innocence both judge and jury were convinced at the trial, that he is in equal

* Lord Mansfield ordered the deau to be committed on the motion for the new trial; and said, he had no discretion to suffer him to be at large, without consent, after his appearance in court, on conviction. scales with his prosecutor, who is at large, because he has an opportunity of deciding, after the expiration of his punishment, that the prosecution had been unfounded and his sufferings unjust. By parity of reasoning, a prisoner in a capital case might be hanged in the meantime for the benefit of equal justice; leaving his executors to fight the battle out with his prosecutor upon the record, through every court in the kingdom; by which at last his attainder might be reversed, and the blood of his posterity remain uncorrupted. What justice can be more impartial or equal?"*

Mr. Erskine grounded his motion for a new trial on the following four propositions:—†

1. That, when a bill of indictment is found, or an information filed, charging any crime or misdemeanor known to the law of England, and the party accused puts himself upon the country by pleading the general issue, "Not Guilty," the jury are GENERALLY charged with his deliverance from that CRIME, and not SPECIALLY from the fact or facts in the commission of which the indictment or information charges the crime to consist; much less from any single fact, to the exclusion of others charged upon the same record.

2. That no act which the law in its general theory holds to be criminal constitutes in itself a crime, abstracted from the mischievous intention of the actor; and that the intention, even where it becomes a simple inference of reason from a fact or facts established, may and ought to be collected by the jury, with the judge's assistance: because the act charged, though established as a fact in a trial on the general issue, does not necessarily and unavoidably establish the criminal intention by any abstract conclusion of law; the establishment of the fact being still no more than evidence of the crime, but not the CRIME ITSELF, unless the jury render it so themselves by referring it voluntarily to the court, by special verdict.

3. The two former propositions, on which his motion was founded, applying to all criminal cases, and a distinction having always been taken between libels and other crimes by those who support the doctrines he was combating, Mr. Erskine maintained that an indictment for a libel, even where the slander of an individual is the object of it (which is capable of being measured by precedents of justice), forms no exception to the jurisdiction or duties of juries, or the practice of judges in other criminal cases; that the argument for the difference, viz. because the whole crime always appears upon the record, is false in fact, and, even if true, would form no solid or substantial difference in law.‡ Mr. Erskine then cited the famous case put by Algernon Sidney, as the best illustration of this proposition. The case put was this: "Suppose a bookseller, having published the Bible, was indicted in these words: 'That, intending to promote atheism and irreligion, he had blasphemously printed and published the following false and profane libel.—There is no God.' The learned judge said, that a person unjustly accused of publishing a libel might always demur* to the indictment; this is an instance to the contrary; on the face of such a record, by which the demurrer can alone be determined, it contains a complete criminal charge. The defendant, therefore, would plead Not guilty, and go down to trial, when the prosecutor of course could only produce the Bible to support the charge, by which it would appear to be only a verse in the proverbs of Solomon, viz. 'The fool has said in his heart, There is no God,' and that the context had been omitted to constitute the libel. The jury, shocked at the imposition, would only wait the judge's direction to acquit; but, consistently with the principles which have governed in the Dean of St. Asaph's trial, how could he be acquitted?—The judges must say, You have nothing to do but with the fact, that the defendant published the words laid in the information. But, says the adversary, the distinction is obvious; reading the sacred context to the jury would enable them to negative the innuendos which are within their province to reject, and which, being rejected, would destroy the charge. The answer is obvious: such an indictment would contain no innuendo on which a negative could be put; for, if the record charged that the defendant blasphemously published that there was no God, it would require no innuendo to explain it. Driven from that argument, the adversary must say, that the jury by the context would be enabled to negative the epithets contained in the introduction, and could never pronounce it to be blasphemous. But the answer to that is equally conclusive; for it was said, in the case of the king against Woodfall, that these epithets were mere formal inferences of law, from the fact of publishing that which, on the record, was a libel. When the defendant was convicted, it could not appear to the court that the defendant only published the Bible. The court could not look off the record, which says, that the defendant blasphemously published that there was no God. The judge, maintaining these doctrines, would not, however, forget the respect due to the religion of his country, though the law of it had escaped him. He would tell the jury, that it should be remembered in mitigation of punishment; and the honest bookseller of Paternoster Row, when he came up in custody to receive judgment, would be let off for a small fine, upon the judge's report, that he had only published a new copy of the Bible; but not till he had been a month in the King's Bench prison, while this knotty point of divinity was in discussion. This case has stood invulnerable for above a hundred years, and it remains still for Mr. Bearcroft to answer." After some further observations on this

* The technical meaning of the terms "demur," "demurrer," both in common law and equity pleadings, is an admission by one party of the truth of the facts, as stated by the opposite party, but a denial of the inference of law drawn from those facts by that opposite party. See Stephens's Pleading, pp. 64, 65, 78, 79, &c.; Milford's Pleadings in Equity, p. 86.

head, Mr. Erskine thus continued: "If the court shall grant me a rule, I mean to contend, 4thly, that a seditious libel contains no question of law; but, supposing the court should deny the legality of all these propositions, or, admitting their legality, resist the conclusion I have drawn from them, then the last proposition, in which I am supported even by all those authorities on which the learned judge relies for the doctrines contained in this charge, is this:

"5. That in all cases where the mischievous intention (which is agreed to be the essence of the crime) cannot be collected by simple inference from the fact charged, because the defendant goes into evidence to rebut such inference, the intention becomes then a pure unmixed question of fact, for the consideration of the jury."*

Lord Mansfield, in delivering the judgment of the court in this famous case, made some interesting observations, to the effect that, from the Revolution down to that time, nearly a hundred years, the direction of every judge, as far as it could be traced, had been consonant to the doctrine of Mr. Justice Buller, viz. that the matter for the jury to decide was, whether the defendant was guilty of the fact or not; and that no counsel had complained of it by an application to the court. "Counsel for the Crown," observed his lordship, "to remove the prejudices of the jury, and to satisfy the by-standers, have expatiated upon the enormity of the libel. Judges, with the same view, have sometimes done the same thing; both have done it wisely with another view, to obviate the captivating harangues of defendants' counsel to the jury, that they can and ought to find that, in law, the paper is no libel. But the formal direction of every judge, under which every lawyer has so far acquiesced as not to complain of it to the court, seems to me, ever since the Revolution, to have been agreeable to the direction given in this case. It is difficult to cite cases; the trials are not printed; unless a question arise, notes are not taken; nobody takes a note of a direction of course not disputed. We must, as in all cases of tradition, trace backwards, and presume, from the usage which is remembered, that the preceding usage was the same."† His lordship then alluded to the case of the 'Craftsman,' of which he gave the following interesting account, from personal observation: "The 'Craftsman' was a celebrated party paper, written in opposition to the ministry of Sir Robert Walpole, by many men of high rank and great abilities; the whole party espoused it. It was thought proper to prosecute the famous Hague letter; I was at the trial; it happens to be printed in the 9th vol. of 'State Trials,' 255.‡ There was a great concourse, great expectation; and many persons of high rank were present to countenance the defendant. Mr. Fazakerley and Mr. Bootle were the leading counsel for the defendant; they started every objection and laboured every point; and, when the judge overruled them, he usually said, 'If I am wrong, you know where to apply.' The judge was Lord Chief Justice Raymond, who had been eminent at the bar in the reign of Queen Anne, solicitor and attorney-general in the reign of George I., and intimately connected with Sir Edward Northey, so that he must have known what the ancient practice had been. The cause was so blended with party passion that it required his utmost attention; yet, when he came to sum up, and direct, he did it as of course, just as Mr. Justice Buller did on this occasion. Mr. Fazaakerley and Mr. Bootle, very able lawyers, and connected in party with the writers of the 'Craftsman,' never thought of complaining to the court. The other trials before Lord Raymond are not printed, nor to be found in any notes; but, to be sure, his direction in all was to the same effect. I recollect one, where the 'Craftsman' was acquitted, from a ballad made by Mr. Pulteney:—

'For Sir Philip well knows that his innuendos
No longer will serve him, in verse or in prose;
For twelve honest men have decided the cause,
Who are judges of fact, though not judges of laws.'*

After the trial of Mr. Almon, in 1771, for the republication of 'Junius,' Mr. Burke brought a bill into parliament to settle the point. It was thrown out; but in 1791 Mr. Fox brought in a bill almost in terms the same, which was finally passed in 1792.† By section 1 the jury, on the trial of an indictment or information for libel, may give a general verdict upon the whole matter put in issue, and shall not be required by the court to find the defendant guilty merely on the proof of the publication, and of the sense ascribed to the paper in the indictment or information. The 2nd section provides that the court shall give their opinion and directions to the jury on the matter in issue between the king and the defendant or defendants, as in other criminal cases; and the 3rd section provides that the jury may, as in other criminal cases, find a special verdict. The 4th section provides that the defendants may move in arrest of judgment, as before the passing of that act.

In the course of the debates upon this bill the following question (among others) was put by the Lords to the Judges: "Supposing the publication clearly proved, and the innocence of the paper as clearly manifest, is it competent for the judge to recommend a verdict of Not guilty?" The answer was in the affirmative; "but," it is added, "no case has occurred in which it would have been, in sound discretion, fit for a judge, sitting at Nisi prius, to have given such direction or recommend-

* 2 Term Reports, 428 note, (a). There is a somewhat more full report of Lord Mansfield's judgment in vol. xxi. of Howell's State Trials, pp. 1033, et seq. In a note to the 'Speeches of the Hon. Thomas Erskine,' we are informed that it appears, by a pamphlet printed in 1754, that Lord Mansfield made rather an important mistake in quoting the stanza, which ran thus:—

"Sir Philip well knows
That his innuendos
Will serve him no longer, in verse or in prose:
For twelve honest men have determin'd the cause,
Who are judges alike of the facts and the laws."

ation to a jury." And the line of argument that follows is that, even in apparently the clearest cases, the judge may be wrong, and that therefore the safe course for him is that which leaves his direction open to review. "It is obvious," observes Mr. Justice Coleridge, "that this was full of practical hardship to the defendant, and that it was a declining from that proper responsibility in the judge, which the public has a right to expect, and without which trials at Nisi prius in general would lose half their value."*

We conclude these observations on the law of libel with the following remark of Mr. Justice Coleridge, in the note above referred to: "The advocates of the bill, both in and out of parliament (and no one more powerfully than its real author, the late Lord Erskine), uniformly contended that it was to prevent and not to produce an anomaly in the criminal law, and that their sole object was to give the jury the same power, and no other, in a trial for libel as in a trial for murder. This should be always borne in mind, and so long as it is, the bill will be productive of great benefit: but the object of the bill is very easily misrepresented, for the bill itself rests upon a somewhat subtle proposition; and it is not to be wondered at if juries have been sometimes persuaded that in cases of libel they were invested with new and extraordinary powers, while, in the words of John Lilburn, the judge was reduced to a mere cypher. Whenever this happens, the bill is indirectly the source of much mischief."†

IV.—MISCELLANEOUS LEGISLATION.

Formerly, acts of parliament were considered to have passed, and their operation to have commenced, on the first day of the session in which they were passed: but by the statute 33 Geo. III. c. 13, all acts, private as well as public, commence their operation (except where another period of commencement is provided) from the day on which they receive the royal assent, which day is directed to be indorsed on every act immediately after the title, and to be considered as part of the act. The correct mode of describing a statute made previously to the above statute 33 Geo. III. c. 13, is to describe it as of the year in which the session began, even although it was in fact passed in a subsequent year of the reign, the session having extended into that subsequent year. But statutes passed since the above act of Geo. III., being referred to the date of the royal assent as the period of their commencement, will be correctly described as of the year when they received the royal assent, though the session in which they passed extended into that year from another: if the royal assent was given in the latter of the two years, it would be inaccurate to describe them as of the former year alone. The following two examples, the first of incorrect, the second of correct description of an act of parliament, are given in an able article on this subject in 'The Jurist' of April 2, 1842: "Thus, the Copyhold Commutation Act, 4 and 5 Vict. c. 35, appears to be improperly described in some of the forms that it provides, as an act passed in the fourth year of the reign, the royal assent having been given to it on the 21st of June, 1841, the second day of the fifth year. On the other hand, the act relating to the qualification of members of parliament (1 and 2 Vict. c. 48, royal assent July 27, 1838) is correctly mentioned, in the form of declaration therein prescribed, as an act passed in the second year of the reign."

"And in either case," continues the same writer, "whether the statute was passed before or since the act of Geo. III., it is, in pleading, fatal, and in any kind of document inaccurate, to describe a statute as passed in two years of a reign, though the session of parliament in which it was passed extended from the one year into the other. But in all cases where the session extended from one year into another, whether the statute was passed before or after the act of Geo. III., and whether it was passed in the first or the second of the two years, the most safe and accurate method, and that prescribed by the court in the cases both of R. v. Biers,* and Gibbs v. Pike,† is to describe it as 'passed in the session of parliament held' in those years; for this, it is evident, will prevent the possibility of any exception being taken to the correctness of the statement, or of any confusion with the acts of another session. This mode of statement is followed in the act for the further amendment of the law, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42 (an act whose authorship is attributed to one of the most distinguished ornaments of the bench), which, in § 16, refers to 'the statute passed in the session of parliament held in the eighth and ninth years of the reign of King William the Third, intituled,' &c." In the same paper is mentioned a peculiar exception to these rules that came under consideration in the case of Rann v. Green.‡ The declaration described a statute on which the action was brought to be a statute of the 4th of Philip and Mary, whereas the record, when produced in evidence, appeared to be of the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary. It was contended that the former was the true description of the statute, it being made in the fourth year of their joint reign. Lord Mansfield said, "It is impossible to get over this objection. The only question is, whether this is a variance in the description of the material ground of action. In some reigns, as in Car. II. and Geo. II., it happens that the parliament meets in one year of the reign, and continues during part of the next year. In that case the method is to entitle the acts passed of both years. But, in point of law, acts of parliament which do not, in words, confine the commencement to a particular day, or where the commencement does not appear from the subject-matter, refer to the first day of the session; and, therefore, supposing this to be an act of the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary, according to such method, it would in truth be a statute of the 4th, and ought to be so set forth. But in this case it is different. Philip, by act of parliament, has the style of king; but his being so entitled does not annihilate the first year of the reign of Queen Mary. Therefore from that time the statutes are entitled the 1st and 2nd, the 2nd and 3rd of Philip and Mary, and so on; that is, the 1st of Philip and 2nd of Mary, &c. Here the declaration describes the statute to be of the 4th of Philip and Mary. Upon the parliament roll being produced, it appears to be an act passed in the 4th and 5th of Philip and Mary. The statute, therefore, described in the declaration is different from the statute produced; and, in fact, there is no act in the statute-book of the 4th of Philip and Mary." The following additional remarks and suggestions, which we copy from the same paper, will be found to be practically useful. "The decisions we have been considering have all taken place on matters of pleading; and, though there may not be the same motives for exacting the observance of this scrupulous correctness in other documents, for example, in those that occupy the attention of the conveyancing draftsman, as the same fatal consequences are not risked, yet, even there, the nicest accuracy and propriety of verbal details might be advantageously studied, by following the method of describing a statute recommended in R. v. Biers, wherever it may be consistent with the desirable perspicuity and terseness of expression. In the conveyance by release, indeed, the inconvenience of lengthening the parenthetical mention of the statute 4 and 5 Vict. c. 21, interposed between the nominative and the verb in the operative part of the deed, would seem to present a sufficient reason for adhering to the usual form of referring to it as 'an act passed in the fourth year of the reign of her present majesty,' &c.; since, as we have seen, that mode of stating it (the act having received the royal assent on the 18th of May, 1841) seems to be fully warranted, even on the strict principles of pleading, by the authorities to which we have called our readers' attention. In the case, however, of statutes which received the royal assent in the latter of two years in which the session was holden, convenience requires that they should be described as of both years, in order to distinguish them from statutes in a subsequent session commencing or held in the same year; and, consequently, that the method should be adopted of stating them as statutes 'passed in the session of parliament held in the —th and —th years of the reign,' &c. The plan of describing the statutes passed in the first of the two years in which the session was held as statutes of that first year alone, and those passed in the second year as statutes of both years, has also this advantage, that it agrees with the mode adopted by the queen's printer in the copies printed by him; and this authority has been referred to, as at least presumptive evidence of the authentic text of the title of a modern statute, in the case of Rex v. Barnett (3 Camp. 345), where the title of a statute (one in the 5th year of Elizabeth), in the copy of the act lately printed by the king's printer, being different to [from] that in Ruffhead's edition of the statutes, Lord Ellenborough said that, in the case of a recent statute, he should have acted upon the copy printed by the king's printer; but, with regard to a statute of Queen Elizabeth, he should consider Ruffhead to be correct till the contrary was proved by an examination of the parliament roll."

The history of the National Finances during the present period is marked by some very important operations on the part of the legislature and the government, which collectively, and in conjunction with the events of the time, wrought great changes in our system of taxation and revenue.

The commencement of peace and of Mr. Pitt's administration was signalled by both a revision and readjustment of some of the old taxes and the imposition of a good many new ones. As soon as he found himself in possession of real power, as well as of place, by his commanding majority in the new House of Commons, which assembled in May, 1784, he set vigorously to work with his financial reforms. On the 21st of June, the House having on his motion resolved itself into a committee to consider of the laws for the prevention of smuggling, he rose to bring forward his famous scheme for what was called the Commutation Tax, being a tax to be levied on windows in lieu of the greater portion, which he proposed to abolish, of the existing tax on tea. The article of tea he described as the staple of smuggling; an illicit trade was also carried on in other commodities, but its extent was insignificant compared with the smuggling of tea. At this time all the tea sold by the East India Company was no more than 5,500,000 lbs., while the quantity consumed within the kingdom was calculated to amount to above 13,000,000 lbs. The duties to which the article was subject more than doubled its cost to the fair dealer: they amounted to 119 per cent. upon its price at the Company's sales, producing a revenue to the government of nearly 800,000*l.* Of this sum Pitt proposed to sacrifice about 600,000*l.*, and to raise for the future only about 170,000*l.* on tea, by a tax of 12½ per cent., recovering the 600,000*l.* by means of a tax on windows. The measure was warmly opposed, but it was carried; and, in so far as regarded the putting down of the illicit trade in tea, it had all the success that the minister anticipated. The immediate effect was that the legal imports of tea were almost trebled. We may here notice, however, that in a few years the exigencies of the war with France compelled a gradual return to the old system of a high duty upon this article; till, from 25 per cent., to which the tax was raised in 1795, it at last mounted to 96 per cent. in 1806, and to 100 per cent. on all except the cheapest descriptions of teas in 1819.

But Pitt's Commutation Act had nevertheless driven the trade into a legitimate channel, from which it never again deviated to anything like the same extent as before. This successful experiment in the case of tea was afterwards followed up by similar diminutions of the duties on wines, tobacco, and other articles on which the smuggler had in like manner laid his hands.

When he opened the budget, on the 30th of June following, Pitt announced a long catalogue of other new taxes which he proposed to add to that on windows. As finally arranged, they were laid on candles, bricks, tiles, hats, horses, British linens and cottons, and the bleaching and dyeing of those fabrics; ribands, gauzes, paper, hackney-coaches, gold and silver plate, lead exported, raw and thrown silk imported, the postage of letters, licences for retailing beer, &c., and for making and dealing in various excisable commodities, and qualifications for shooting;—the whole being calculated to produce a revenue of 930,000*l.*, so as to give an excess of 650,000*l.* over the interest of a loan at the same time contracted of 6,000,000*l.* The next session lengthened this list by taxes on male servants (in addition to that already existing), on female servants, on salt, on retail shops, on post-horses, on gloves, on pawnbrokers' licences, on coachmakers, on dogs, on wheeled carriages, on bachelors, on attorneys, and on warrants of attorney. In his speech on opening the budget this year (9th May, 1785), Pitt expressed, in strong terms, the reluctance with which he found himself compelled to press on the country with these additional imposts. "The accumulated burthens," he said, "that had for a series of years been heaped upon the people made them, no doubt, hope and expect that the era of peace would be a time of retrenchment and a day of ease. Hard, therefore, was the task of a minister whose duty, from his situation, led him to the necessity of still adding, even under these circumstances, to those taxes and to those burthens. He had therefore to hope for the indulgence of the committee. After taxes the most palatable, after taxes the most popular, and when the resources of each had been drained to their utmost, the means by which money was to be raised could not meet with that general agreeable reception which, otherwise, might be expected. Some, indeed, still existed, which possibly might be called productive; but the means, in his opinion, though in one degree palatable, yet, in another, were pernicious. They disguised the poison at the very time they administered the supposed remedy; and, by disguising, aggravated to a certainty the burthens of the people." His painful task he had set out by describing as forced upon him by the necessity of "providing for the exigencies of the late calamitous and unprofitable war, in order to bring back the country to its former vigour and importance, and give stability to its strength and prosperity." But "he must," he said, "remind the committee, that, however unwelcome the task of imposing them, yet from these burthens one great, one long wished-for event was to arise—a real fund towards paying off the national debt; and he remained most strongly confirmed in opinion of a probability that this event would finally happen.”

In a short speech delivered about a month before this (on the 11th of April), Pitt had laid before the House the general state of the national income and expenditure, and had endeavoured to show that, from the rate at which the productiveness of the taxes was increasing, there was reason to expect a future annual surplus of not less than 1,840,000*l.* for a sinking fund. The original sinking fund, established in 1717, in the administration of Sir Robert Walpole, and usually designated by his name, although the idea was that of his colleague, the first Earl Stanhope,* still remained in nominal existence, but had not for some years past exerted even any apparent effect in the reduction of the debt. Its average annual amount in the beginning of the reign of George III. was somewhat above 2,000,000*l.*; by 1776 it had risen to 3,166,517*l.*; and even under the check given to consumption and commercial activity during the colonial war, the produce of the fixed taxes which had been formally set apart for this object was 2,685,689*l.* in 1777; 2,442,063*l.* in 1778; 2,267,399*l.* in 1779; and 2,403,017*l.* in 1780. But these sums had all been absorbed by the urgent demands of the public service. It is calculated, by Dr. Price, that from the date of the first alienation of this sinking fund, in 1733 † to the year 1786, the whole amount of debt paid off by it was no more than about 8,500,000*l.*—namely, 3,000,000*l.* in 1736 and 1737; 3,000,000*l.* during the peace between 1748 and 1756; and 2,500,000*l.* in the peace between 1763 and 1775. “On the whole,” observes Dr. Hamilton, “this fund did little in time of peace, and nothing in time of war, to the discharge of the national debt. The purpose of its inviolable application was abandoned, and the hopes entertained of its powerful efficacy entirely disappointed. At this time the nation had no other free revenue except the land and malt taxes, granted annually; and, as the land tax during peace was then granted at a low rate, ‡ the produce was inadequate to the expense of a peace establishment on the most moderate scale. This gave occasion to the encroachments on the sinking fund. Had the land tax been always continued at four shillings in the pound, it would have gone far to keep the sinking fund, during peace, inviolate.”§

It was not, however, till the 7th of March, 1786, in the next session of parliament, that Pitt brought forward his plan for a new sinking fund. || The bill, which was immediately introduced for carrying it into effect, met with little opposition, except in the Upper House from Earl Stanhope, who had a project of his own which he wished to substitute; and it received the royal assent on the 26th of May, under the title of ‘An Act for vesting certain sums in Commissioners, at the end of every quarter of a year, to be by them applied to the Reduction of the National Debt.’* By this act, to quote the abstract of its provisions given by Dr. Hamilton, “the various branches of revenue then existing were united under the name of the Consolidated Fund. One million, taken from that fund, was vested annually in the hands of commissioners for the redemption of the national debt, to be applied for purchasing capital in such stocks as they should judge expedient at the market prices. To this fund was to be added the interest of the debt redeemed, and annuities fallen in by the failure of lives, or the expiry of the terms for which they were granted; and life annuities unclaimed for three years were considered as expired, and added to the sinking fund. When this fund amounted to four millions, it was enacted that the interest of the redeemed debt, and annuities fallen in, were no longer to be applied to it, but remain at the disposal of parliament.” † The commissioners appointed by the act were the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Master of the Rolls, the Accountant-general of the Court of Chancery, and the Governor and Deputy-governor of the Bank of England.

|| It was one of three different schemes which had been communicated to him by Dr. Price. The three schemes are printed in ‘A Review of the Writings of Dr. Price on the subject of the Finances of this Kingdom,’ by William Morgan, Esq., F.R.S. (Price’s nephew); 8vo. 1792, and 2nd edit. 1795.

The consolidated fund established by this act is not to be confounded with another measure, the general consolidation of the customs and excise duties, which was effected in the following year by the 27 Geo. III. c. 13, commonly called the Consolidation Act. The various duties in question, imposed at different times and upon all sorts of principles, had grown to such a mass of intricacy and confusion, that “merchants and other individuals,” it has been stated, “finding it impossible to obtain the knowledge of the amount, or even the number, of the duties they had to pay, were obliged to leave it entirely to those clerks of the custom-house or excise-office who, by constant practice, had acquired a dexterity in it, to determine the amount of the duties payable.” ‡ By the Consolidation Act all the existing duties and drawbacks were at once repealed, and others imposed, each of which was stated in one distinct sum, and apportioned upon the value or quantity of the article. The act encountered some opposition in its passage through parliament, directed principally against a part of it which was occupied with regulations for carrying into effect the treaty of commerce shortly before concluded with France; but when his plan for the consolidation of the duties was first announced by Pitt, on the 26th of February, 1787, it was warmly welcomed from all sides. As soon as the minister had resumed his seat, Burke rose and said “that, upon the whole, the measure proposed was, in itself, so obviously necessary, beneficial, and desirable, and the right honourable gentleman had opened it with such extraordinary clearness and perspicuity, that he thought it did not become him, or those who, like him, unfortunately felt it to be their duty frequently to oppose the measures of government, to content themselves with a sullen acquiescence; but it behoved them to rise up manfully, and, doing justice to the right honourable gentleman's merit, to return him thanks, on behalf of themselves and the country, for having in so masterly and intelligible a manner brought forth a plan of consolidation of duties which promised ease and accommodation to the merchants, and all those concerned in the trade and commerce of the country, and advantage and increase to the revenue."

On the 17th of February, 1792, Pitt submitted to the House of Commons a plan of a second sinking fund; which was also adopted by the legislature, and an act passed for carrying it into effect.* Its principle was to make every future loan carry with it the means of its own liquidation in about forty-five years, by one per cent. of its amount being set apart for that purpose, and the dividends on the capital thus redeemed being added to the fund: the per centage on annuities for lives, or for a longer term than forty-five years, being taken on their estimated value after that term. At the same time the former sinking fund (which was appointed to be applied exclusively to the redemption of the old debt) was assisted by a grant of 400,000*l.*, to which 200,000*l.* was afterwards annually added.

Such were the principal arrangements under which the financial system of the kingdom had been placed when the war with France broke out in the beginning of the year 1793. The declaration of war was made by the French government, on the 1st of February; and we will now state what had been the results of the system, thus established by Mr. Pitt, up to that epoch.

First, with regard to the produce of the taxes. In 1784, the last year of the old system, which had subsisted during the war with America, the revenue raised by taxation amounted only to 12,905,519*l.*; in 1785, after the first of Pitt's new taxes had come into operation, it rose to 14,871,520*l.*; in 1786 it was 15,096,112*l.*; and from that point it went on steadily increasing till, in 1792, it reached the sum of 17,382,435*l.*† All this time the land tax had been levied at the rate of 4*s.* in the pound, as it had been ever since 1776.‡

Then, with regard to the debt. At the close of the American war in 1783, its entire amount, including 9,600,000*l.* of unfunded debt, bearing an interest of 288,000*l.*, was 249,851,628*l.*, and that of the interest or annual charge upon it 9,451,772*l.* Between this date and the commencement of the war with France in 1793, the purchases of the commissioners of the sinking fund had amounted in all to 10,242,100*l.* (all in the 3 per cents.), clearing away an annual charge for interest to the extent of 307,263*l.* † but, as the unfunded debt had in the meantime been increased to 16,129,487*l.*, bearing an interest of 483,884*l.*, and there were besides annuities for lives or terms of years, making an additional annual charge of 1,293,870*l.*, the entire amount of the debt at the beginning of the year 1793 may be stated to have been 244,118,635*l.*, and that of the interest upon it 9,302,328*l. Thus the principal of the debt had been reduced during the nine years of peace by no more than between five and six millions, and its annual pressure scarcely at all—there being hardly a difference of 150,000*l.* between the interest paid upon it in 1783 and in 1792.

The new taxes, however, aided by the return to a state of peace, had the effect of substituting a full for a straitened exchequer. The entire annual income of the state for 1783 amounted only to about 12,231,206*l.*, while the expenditure was 13,300,284*l.*, leaving a deficit of above a million.† But in 1785 this deficit was converted into a surplus of 919,290*l.* ‡ and by 1792 the revenue had come to exceed the expenditure by 2,031,000*l.* § The produce of the taxes appropriated to form the sinking fund amounted this year to 1,669,582*l.* || During this period of peace the annual cost of the ordinary establishments of the country, or, in other words, the entire public expenditure, with the exception of the interest of the debt, appears to have been about 4,000,000*l.*

The new sinking fund for the liquidation of future loans, established in 1792, was suggested by the minister in anticipation of the coming war, for which alone in the then state of the finances the loans it was to provide for discharging, and out of which it was to grow, could have been contemplated as likely to become necessary. But this was only one of many new financial measures to which the government soon found itself driven by the altered state of affairs. Every successive budget now brought its load of additional taxes; that of 1794, taxes on brandy, rum, and British spirits, bricks and tiles, slate and stone carried coastwise, glass, paper, and attorneys; that of 1795, taxes on legacies, horses, tobacco, printed calicoes, salt, sugar, with a general additional 10 per cent. on the previous assessed taxes; that of 1796, taxes on dogs, tea, sales by auction, bricks, spirits, sugar, houses, servants, postage of letters, stage-coaches, booking of carriers' parcels, canal conveyance, besides another general augmentation of all the old excise and customs duties; that of 1797, taxes on stamps, copies of deeds, transfers of property, newspapers, plate, probates of wills, and the produce of turnpikes; that of 1798, a general trebling of the assessed taxes; that of 1799, an income tax of ten per cent.; that of 1800, more taxes on tea, and on British and foreign spirits; that of 1801, more taxes on tea, paper, calicoes, tin, timber, pepper, sugar, raisins, horses, stamps, conveyances of property, postage of letters, and exports and imports generally. These enumerations, collected from the speeches of the chancellor of the exchequer, are possibly neither complete nor perfectly correct in all the items given, but they will serve sufficiently to illustrate the system that was pursued.

The sums raised by taxes in each of the years of the first war with France were as follow:—in 1793, 17,656,418*l.*; in 1794, 17,170,400*l.*; in 1795, 17,308,811*l.*; in 1796, 17,858,454*l.*; in 1797, 18,737,760*l.*; in 1798, 20,654,650*l.*; in 1799, 30,202,915*l.*; in 1800, 35,229,968*l.*; in 1801, 33,896,464*l.*; and in 1802, 35,415,096*l. Loans were also contracted every year:—in 1793, a loan of 4,500,000*l.*, creating a capital of 6,250,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 190,312*l.*; in 1794, a loan of 11,000,000*l.*, creating a capital of 13,750,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 509,687*l.*; in 1795, loans of 36,000,000*l.*, creating a capital of 50,095,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 1,731,037*l.*; in 1796, loans of 25,500,000*l.*, creating a capital of 30,918,668*l.*, with an annual charge of 1,364,785*l.*; in 1797, a loan of 14,500,000*l.*, creating a capital of 28,275,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 933,963*l.*; in 1798, loans of 20,000,000*l.*, creating a capital of 39,624,250*l.*, with an annual charge of 1,248,818*l.*; in 1799, a loan of 15,500,000*l.*, creating a capital of 27,125,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 825,955*l.*; in 1800, a loan of 20,500,000*l.*, creating a capital of 32,185,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 980,033*l.*; in 1801, a loan of 28,000,000*l.*, creating a capital of 49,210,000*l.*, with an annual charge of 1,498,444*l.* And the permanent debt was besides augmented by the funding of exchequer and navy bills to the amount of 1,926,526*l.*, in 1794; of 1,609,898*l.*, in 1795; and of 26,026,900*l.*, in 1796.† Altogether, it appears that, during the war with France, from 1793 to the peace of Amiens in 1802, both the principal and interest of the debt were more than doubled: the former being increased from 244,118,635*l.* to 520,207,101*l.*; the latter from 9,302,328*l.* to 18,643,725*l.*‡ There were also raised for the Emperor of Germany, on the guarantee of the British government, a loan of 4,600,000*l.*, in 1795, and another of 1,620,000*l.* in 1797, occasioning together an annual charge of 458,931*l.*, the whole of which his Imperial majesty left to be borne by this country.

But Pitt's confidence seems actually to have grown almost as fast as the debt. Armed with his sinking fund, he talked as if he believed he had gotten possession of Aladdin's lamp, and could work miracles. In opening the budget in 1799 he admitted that there would be an interval of great stress upon the country from that time till the year 1808, when, he said, the debt would arrive at its maximum; but it would not be difficult, he added, to provide taxes for these eight years. And then he "entered," says the report of his speech, "upon a detail of calculations which went to show that the whole of the national debt might be extinguished in the space of thirty-three years of peace; that, supposing the war to continue even so long, it could be carried on without the creation of new debt; and that, in case the war should soon be terminated, and that an interval of ten years should happen between the conclusion of one and the commencement of another war, in that period of peace the sinking fund would discharge seventy millions of debt, and enable the country to enter into another war with superior means." And not only did the prevailing financier's own "undoubting mind believe the magic wonders that he sung," but the great majority of the nation along with him.

The arrangement made in 1792, by which every loan provided its own sinking fund, was departed from in 1798; and from that date down to 1802 loans to the amount of 86,796,375*l.* were raised without the one per cent. being set apart for their liquidation. These loans were eventually charged upon the income-tax imposed, as above-mentioned, in 1799. In 1798, also, an act was passed making the land-tax perpetual at four shillings in the pound upon the old valuation of 1692; but at the same time empowering the owners of estates to redeem their property from the tax by the purchase of as much capital in the three per cents. as should yield an equivalent dividend. The purchases of land-tax under this act amounted in the first year to 13,059,586*l.*, and in the second year to 3,034,216*l.; but after that the transference of capital in this way did not amount to much. "This plan," observes Dr. Hamilton, "is, in effect, no other than a transfer of part of the capital of the funded debt from the former stockholders to the landed proprietors. These last pay a value for the capital with which they redeem their land-tax, and their relief from that tax is equivalent to their receiving a dividend to the same extent. The landholders may still be considered as subjected to the land-tax at its highest rate; though some of them pay it by drawing a dividend for capital in the funds, which they have purchased for value, and have thereby become stockholders to that extent. The public revenue may still be considered as drawing the whole of the land-tax, and paying the whole of the dividends. We cannot therefore consider the part of the national debt redeemed by the purchase of the land-tax as affording any relief to the public burthens." In other words, while the state was relieved from the payment of the interest on a portion of the debt, it sustained an equivalent annual loss by the extinction of a corresponding portion of the land-tax.

This arrangement, however, led to a change in the mode of granting the supplies followed up to this date, according to which parliament, by way of holding the crown in some sort of dependence, had been accustomed to keep the land-tax and the malt-tax, as it were, in its own hands, by voting them for only a year at a time. Now that the land-tax was made perpetual, part of the sugar and tobacco duties and some others were, in lieu of it, made annual taxes along with the land-tax. The land and malt taxes used to yield only about 2,700,000*l.* annually, which was much less than the substituted annual taxes soon came to produce.

But the boldest, or the most desperate, of all Pitt's financial measures had been adopted before this time in the order of council issued on Sunday, the 26th of February, 1797, for suspending payments in specie by the bank. This act of the government really amounted to the universal substitution of a fictitious for a real currency, or, in other words, to the novel experiment of resting the entire pecuniary system of the kingdom on the shadowy basis of credit. Yet, after all, it was only an extension of the same principle on which the public funds had stood ever since there had been a national debt—a principle which the rapid growth of that debt was, of itself, every day carrying farther and farther. If the body of the national creditors, with claims already amounting to not much less than four hundred millions of pounds sterling, were contented with nothing more to depend upon than the good faith and stability of the government, why might not the holders of the paper-money of the bank, which was probably not a twentieth part of that amount, be satisfied and sufficiently safe with the same security? It was found in point of fact that the experiment was more alarming in appearance than really dangerous: it produced, no doubt, a revolution in prices and in the value of money, but even this came gradually, and with so equable and general a diffusion as to allow speculations and transactions to be adjusted to it, and, for the most part, to compensate for the loss it occasioned in one direction by a gain in another. On the other hand it may reasonably be doubted if any less decisive movement could have either saved the country at the moment, or enabled it to accomplish so triumphantly as it did the tremendous exertions that were demanded from it in succeeding years. And, to crown all, after the suspension had lasted for the long space of twenty-one years, our financial system was still found to be strong enough to bear, though not certainly without a strain and an effort, that return to cash payments which might then have well been deemed as impracticable as it seemed to many to be unnecessary.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF THE NATIONAL INDUSTRY.

THE commercial history of the present period naturally divides itself into two distinct portions, corresponding to the nearly equal spaces of time, during the one of which we were in a state of peace, during the other in a state of war. The former may be considered as ranging over the eight years from 1785 to 1792 inclusive.

There can be no doubt that this was a time of decided economical advancement, and of great and generally diffused prosperity, both in England and throughout Europe. The old effect of the temporary check given to speculation and industry by the pressure of war, as if that impediment operated like a dam thrown across a river, only accumulating a force of water which never could have otherwise been obtained,—or like the curb applied to a high-mettled steed,—or like the iron gripe of winter, concocting the earth, and renovating those powers of vegetation which it seems for the moment to destroy—was now everywhere felt. Enterprise awoke from its lethargy like a giant refreshed by sleep; capital, long kept stationary and inactive, not only returned with a new spirit to its old channels, but found for itself many new vents, which it might have been long enough in discovering if its customary flow had suffered no interruption, and some of which were probably created by the general break-up of established relations wrought by the war. In short, it was the common natural phenomenon of the clearest sky and purest air after the stormiest weather, or the highest health after a fit of sickness, which, besides rinsing the system, has given it rest to acquire a tone it never would have acquired if the wear and tear of its ordinary movements had not been so arrested.

The most comprehensive and authentic measure we possess of the progress of our foreign trade—which again may be taken as an index of the general state of our commercial and industrial activity—is the official register of exports and imports; which, however, must still be read with the recollection of what was explained in the last Book, that down to the year 1798 it indicates quantities only, and not values.* And it is also to be remembered that throughout the present period Ireland is regarded in these accounts as a foreign country. It appears, then, that in 1782, the last year of the American war, the total amount of the imports into Great Britain was 10,341,628*l.*, and of the exports thence to all parts of the world 13,009,458*l.*; that in 1783 the imports were 13,122,235*l.*, the exports 14,681,494*l.*; that in 1784 the imports were 15,272,877*l.*, the exports 15,101,491; and that for the next eight years the amounts were as follows:—in 1785, imports 16,279,419*l.*, exports 16,117,168*l.*; in 1786, imports 15,786,072*l.*, exports 16,300,730*l.*; in 1787, imports 17,804,024*l.*, exports 16,869,789*l.*; in 1788, imports 18,027,170*l.*, exports 17,472,238*l.*; in 1789, imports 17,821,102*l.*, exports 19,340,548*l.*; in 1790, imports 19,130,886*l.*, exports 20,120,121*l.*; in 1791, imports 19,669,782*l.*, exports 22,731,995*l.*; in 1792, imports 19,659,358*l.*, exports 24,905,200*l.*† Thus we see that in the ten years of peace, from 1782 to 1792, the entire foreign trade of the country may be said to have very nearly doubled: indeed, it would probably be found to have increased in more than that proportion, if we had the means of ascertaining the value (which is the true essential measure) of our exports and imports, as well as their mere quantity.

The growth of our foreign trade thus indicated is borne out by the account of the tonnage of the ships entered inward and cleared outward during the same period, which is as follows:—In 1782, inward 777,253 tons, outward 851,512 tons; in 1783, inward 1,135,674, outward 1,039,045; in 1784, inward 1,215,702, outward 1,050,487; in 1785, inward 1,241,761, outward 1,182,479; in 1786, inward 1,264,356, outward 1,236,219; in 1787, inward 1,316,501, outward 1,349,419; in 1788, inward 1,558,172, outward 1,540,686; in 1789, inward 1,589,009, outward 1,591,838; in 1790, inward 1,705,975, outward 1,548,207; in

* See vol. i. p. 548.

† From the Official Abstracts, as printed in full in Macpherson's 'Annals of Commerce,' under the respective years. The amounts for some of the earlier years differ somewhat from those given in vol. i. pp. 567, 568, which were taken from the Chronological Table in Chalmers's 'Historical View,' opposite to p. 315. In the Continuation of Anderson, vol. iv., 1789, the figures are different from those given either by Macpherson or Chalmers. We have followed Macpherson's account in the text, as being the only complete one of the three; and, for our present purpose, the variations between it and the others are of little consequence.

To this may be added the number and tonnage of the vessels belonging in each of the years to all the ports of Great Britain; which were, in 1782, 7936 vessels, measuring 615,281 tons; in 1783, 8342 of 669,802; in 1784, 9111 of 793,147; in 1785, 9753 of 859,606; in 1786, 10,382, of 932,018; in 1787, 10,411 of 1,087,874; in 1788, 11,222 of 1,204,484; in 1789, 11,496 of 1,229,644; in 1790, 12,060 of 1,267,025; in 1791, 12,526 of 1,329,968; in 1792, 12,776 of 1,348,884.† Once more here are the figures doubled within the ten years; but it is probable that the real increase was even greater than this, for after 1787 the system of measurement was made much stricter, and the legal description of what constituted a British vessel more rigidly defined and limited, by the two shipping and registry acts, the 26 Geo. III. c. 60, and 27 Geo. III. c. 19, passed in that and the preceding year. As the account stands, however, it exhibits not only an increase in the proportion of two to one between the last year of the war and the last year of the succeeding peace, but a steadily progressive advance throughout the ten years. The expansion of our foreign commerce appears to have, during that time, not once received a check. And that which makes the most exhilarating prosperity, whether to nations or individuals, is not the actual wealth they may possess, but the fact that they are every day growing richer—that they are going forward and not falling back: communities at least can hardly ever remain stationary.

The Customs duties do not furnish quite so distinct an index of the progress of our foreign trade during this space of time for various reasons. In 1784 the duty called petty custom, and other additional duties levied upon the goods of aliens, and also a duty of one per cent. on all trade in the Mediterranean Sea beyond Malaga, were repealed by the 24 Geo. III. sess. 2, c. 16, which set forth that such duties and restrictions were, “by the alteration of the trade now carried on between this kingdom and foreign states, in some cases become an unnecessary burden upon commerce, without producing any real advantage to the public revenue;” and in 1787 the inextricable confusion of the old rates was wholly swept away, and a new and simplified system established by the Consolidation Act, the 27 Geo. III. c. 13.‡ In 1786, also, the wine duties were altered and placed under new regulations (by the 26 Geo. III. c. 59); and in 1789 a similar extensive change was made in regard to the duties on tobacco and snuff, the greater part of which were transferred from the Customs to the Excise (by the 29 Geo III. c. 68). The net amount of Customs paid into the Exchequer is stated to have been, in 1782, 2,861,563*l.*; in 1783, 2,848,320*l.*; in 1784, 3,326,639*l.*; in 1785, 4,592,091*l.*; in 1786, 4,076,911*l.* But the Customs revenue for the two last-mentioned years was somewhat increased beyond its due amount by certain payments having been then received from the East India Company which were properly due in 1782 and 1783. In 1787 the net amount of Customs was 3,673,807*l.*; in 1788, 3,780,770*l.*; in 1789, 3,710,343*l.*; in 1790, 3,782,822*l.*; in 1791, 3,952,507*l.*; in 1792, 4,027,230*l.* It is to be remembered that the system of drawbacks, or the remission of duties upon the re-exportation of many commodities, in great part destroys the utility of the Customs revenue as an index of the fluctuations of our foreign trade, which may expand or contract considerably in several of its departments without much affecting the revenue. To make the Customs a true measure of the trade, the gross receipts ought to be given, with the addition of the drawbacks, and also of the bounties.

The only important commercial arrangement with any foreign country that was made by Great Britain during this interval of peace was that entered into with France by the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation signed at Versailles on the 26th of September, 1786, and confirmed in the following year by parliament, both Houses of which, on the 8th of March, 1787, concurred in an address, thanking his majesty for this additional proof of his constant attention to the welfare and happiness of his subjects, and soon after (by the act of the 27 Geo. III. c. 13, passed 25th April) adopted the necessary measures for carrying the provisions of the treaty into effect. This treaty, commonly named after Mr. William Eden (afterwards Lord Auckland), by whom it was negotiated, was founded on principles more liberal than had ever before, or have ever since, been recognised in any similar compact between England and France. It commenced with a joint declaration by his Britannic Majesty and his Most Christian Majesty of their desire to establish “a system of commerce on the basis of reciprocity and mutual convenience, which, by discontinuing the prohibitions and prohibitory duties which have existed for almost a century between the two nations, might procure the most solid advantages on both sides to the national productions and industry, and put an end to contraband trade, no less injurious to the public revenue than to that lawful commerce which is alone entitled to protection.” In the spirit of this profession it was stipulated, in the first place, that there should be “a reciprocal and entirely perfect liberty of navigation and commerce between the subjects of each party, in all and every the kingdoms, states, provinces, and territories subject to their majesties in Europe, for all and singular kinds of goods in those places;” and by the second article it was declared that, even in the case of a rupture breaking out between the two crowns—“which rupture,”

The Chronological Account, in Chalmers, gives the tonnage of the ships cleared outwards; and, although his figures do not quite coincide with Macpherson's, the differences are not considerable.

said the treaty, "shall not be deemed to exist until the recalling or sending home of the respective ambassadors and ministers"—the subjects of either power residing in the dominions of the other should be allowed to remain and continue their trade, without any manner of disturbance, so long as they behaved peaceably and committed no offence against the laws of the country; "and in case," it was added, "their conduct should render them suspected, and the respective governments should be obliged to order them to remove, the term of twelve months shall be allowed them for that purpose, in order that they may remove with their effects and property, whether intrusted to individuals or to the state." The third article bound the subjects of either party to abstain from all acts of hostility against those of the other, either by sea or land, and to accept of no patent or commission for privateering from any princes or states enemies to the other party; either government, as often as required by the other, engaging to visit transgressors with the severest penalties in its power to inflict. If such an agreement as this had subsisted between the two countries during the peace that succeeded the Seven Years' War, the private adventurers who flocked from France to assist the Americans at the commencement of their rebellion could not have been permitted by their government to gratify their peculiar sympathies in that manner; and the insertion of the article in the present treaty may be regarded as a condemnation, or renunciation at least, by the French court, of the policy which it had then pursued. By the next article liberty was secured to the subjects of either sovereign, "without licence or passport, general or special, by land or by sea, or any other way," to enter, return from, pass through, or remain in, any dominions, towns, or other places whatsoever in Europe belonging to the other, therein to purchase whatever they pleased; "and they shall mutually," said the article, "be treated with all kindness and favour." The fifth article put English and French subjects on the same footing as to the right of coming with ships and merchandizes to all places belonging to either government in Europe, to hire houses, to warehouse their goods, &c., subject to no other impositions or duties than were provided by the treaty, or were payable by the native-born as well as the foreign trader. "In matters of religion," it was added, "the subjects of the two crowns shall enjoy perfect liberty: they shall not be compelled to attend divine service, whether in churches or elsewhere; but, on the contrary, they shall be permitted, without any molestation, to perform the exercises of their religion privately in their own houses, and in their own way. Liberty shall not be refused to bury the subjects of either kingdom who die in the territories of the other, in convenient places to be appointed for that purpose; nor shall the funerals or sepulchres of the deceased be in anywise disturbed." Then followed the tariff, or list of duties on certain goods and merchandises, of which the following were the chief items:—The wines of France, imported direct from France into Great Britain, to pay the same duties then paid by the wines of Portugal (the same abandonment of the principle of the famous Methuen Treaty which had proved fatal to the treaty of commerce entered into by the two governments after the peace of Utrecht); the duty upon French vinegars (to be reduced by rather more than one-half (from 67*l.* 5*s.* 3½*d.* per ton to 32*l.* 18*s.* 10¾*d.*); the duty on French brandies to be reduced from 9*s.* 6½*d.* to 7*s.* per gallon; olive-oil, direct from France, to pay no higher duty than that paid for the same from the most favoured nations; beer to pay reciprocally an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent.; the duties on hardware, cutlery, cabinet-ware, turnery, and all works of iron, steel, copper, and brass, not to exceed 30 per cent. ad valorem; all sorts of cottons, and also of woollens, manufactured in the dominions of the two sovereigns in Europe, to pay in both countries an import duty of 12 per cent. ad valorem (fabrics of cotton or wool mixed with silk, however, remaining prohibited on both sides); French and English linens to pay reciprocally no higher duties than were then paid by those of Holland or Flanders imported into Great Britain; cambrics and lawns to pay reciprocally an import duty of 5*s.* per demi-piece of 7¾ yards; saddlery, a reciprocal ad valorem duty of 15 per cent.; gauzes, one of 10 per cent.; and millinery, porcelain and earthenware, and glass (including plate-glass), one of 12 per cent. "The duties above specified," said a subsequent article, "are not to be altered but by mutual consent; and the merchandises not above specified shall pay, in the dominions of the two sovereigns, the import and export duties payable in each of the said dominions by the most favoured European nations at the time the present treaty bears date; and the ships belonging to the subjects of the said dominions shall also respectively enjoy therein all the privileges and advantages which are granted to those of the most favoured European nations." In case either government should afterwards grant any additional advantages in navigation or trade to any other European nation, it was stipulated that the subjects of the other should participate therein; without prejudice, however, to advantages which they might reserve, France in favour of Spain, in compliance with the Family Compact signed 10th May, 1761; England in conformity to her convention of 1703 with Portugal (the Methuen Treaty). Then followed various regulations which need not be quoted. By the 16th article it was agreed that foreign privateers, not being subjects of either crown, who had commissions from any other prince or state at enmity with either nation, should not be allowed either to arm their ships in the ports of either of the two kingdoms, or to sell or exchange what they had taken, or even to purchase victuals, except only such as should be necessary for their going to the nearest port belonging to the power by whom they were commissioned. On the other hand, the subjects of either of the two contracting powers were to have full liberty to sail with their ships to the ports of countries at war with the other; and it was stipulated that everything should be deemed free which should be found on board such ships, "although the whole lading, or part thereof, should belong to the enemies of their majesties," with the exception only of the following commodities, which were to be considered contraband or prohibited: namely, "arms, cannon, harquebusses, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, saucises, carcasses, carriages for cannon, musket-rests, bandoleers, gun-powder, match, saltpetre, ball, pikes, swords, head-pieces, helmets, cuirasses, halberts, javelins, holsters, belts, horses and harness, and all other like kinds of arms and warlike instruments fit for the use of troops." But, it is expressly added, after this curious enumeration of the military weapons and artillery of the day, "these merchandises which follow shall not be reckoned among contraband goods: that is to say, all sorts of cloth, and all other manufactures of wool, flax, silk, cotton, or any other materials; all kinds of wearing apparel, together with the articles of which they are usually made; gold, silver, coined or uncoined, tin, iron, lead, copper, brass, coals; as also wheat and barley, and any other kind of corn and pulse; tobacco, and all kinds of spices; salted and smoked flesh, salted fish, cheese and butter, beer, oil, wines, sugar, all sorts of salt, and of provisions which serve for sustenance and food to mankind; also all kinds of cotton, cordage, cables, sails, sailcloth, hemp, tallow, pitch, tar, and rosin, anchors and any parts of anchors, ship-masts, planks, timber of all kinds of trees, and all other things proper either for building or repairing ships. Nor shall any goods whatever, which have not been worked into the form of any instrument or furniture for warlike use, by land or by sea, be reputed contraband, much less such as have been already wrought and made up for any other purpose." This was giving as limited a definition to warlike stores as the thing could well bear, and as large an interpretation to the rights of neutrality (only, however, between the two nations) as could be allowed without extinguishing all distinction between a neutral power and an enemy's ally. It may interest our readers at the present moment to quote the regulation established for the exercise of the right of search by any man-of-war or privateer of the one country meeting a ship belonging to the other, "either on the coast or on the high seas:"—a previous article having provided that all merchant-ships in war-time should be furnished with "sea-letters or passports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the ship, as also the name and place of abode of the master or commander," and, if laden, "also with certificates containing the several particulars of the cargo, the place from whence the ship sailed, and whither she is bound;" the 26th article says, "the said men-of-war and privateers, for preventing any inconveniences, are to remain out of cannon-shot, and to send their boats to the merchant-ship which may be met with, and shall enter her to the number of two or three men only, to whom the master or commander of such ship or vessel shall show his passport containing the proof of the property of the ship, made out according to the form annexed to this present treaty; and the ship which shall have exhibited the same shall have liberty to continue her voyage, and it shall be wholly unlawful any way to molest or search her, or to chase or compel her to alter her course." Ships going to an enemy's port, "concerning whose voyage, and the sort of goods on board, there may be just cause of suspicion," were to be obliged, both on the high seas and in ports and havens where they might put in, to exhibit not only their passports, but their certificates. Contraband or alleged contraband goods, if discovered in the certificate, were not to be seized. "It shall be unlawful," says the 28th article, "to break up or open the hatches, chests, casks, bales, or other vessels found on board such ship, or to remove even the smallest parcel of the goods . . . unless the lading be brought on shore, in the presence of the officers of the court of admiralty, and an inventory made by them of the said goods; nor shall it be lawful to sell, exchange, or alienate the same in any manner, unless after due and lawful process shall have been had against such prohibited goods, and the judges of the admiralty respectively shall, by sentence pronounced, have confiscated the same, saving always as well the ship itself as the other goods found therein, which by this treaty are to be accounted free; neither may they be detained on pretence of their being mixed with prohibited goods, much less shall they be confiscated as lawful prize; and if, when only part of the cargo shall consist of contraband goods, the master of the ship shall agree, consent, and offer to deliver them to the captor who has discovered them, in such case the captor, having received those goods as lawful prize, shall forthwith release the ship, and not hinder her by any means from prosecuting her voyage to the place of her destination." In short, in regard both to this and to all other matters, everything was arranged, as far as possible, upon the principle of a perfect reciprocity of rights and advantages, or of the subjects of either government being entitled to the same treatment from the other as from their own. The treaty was to last, without revision or alteration, for the space of twelve years.

From the tables of imports and exports it appears that the trade between Great Britain and France stood as follows, for each of the ten years of the peace:—In 1783, imports from France, 87,119*l.*, exports thither 98,166; in 1784, imports 141,568*l.*, exports 495,572*l.*; in 1785, imports 211,791*l.*, exports 604,313*l.*; in 1786, imports 266,121*l.*, exports 612,519*l.*; in 1787 (the first year under the treaty), imports 577,012*l.*, exports 986,906*l.*; in 1788, imports 452,986*l.*, exports 1,259,672*l.*; in 1789, imports 556,060*l.*, exports 1,290,171*l.*; in 1790, imports 605,371*l.*, exports 872,323*l.*; in 1791, imports 546,057*l.*, exports 1,131,376*l.*; in 1792, imports 717,634*l.*, exports 1,228,165*l.* Comparing, therefore, the last year of the peace with the first, it may be said that the commercial intercourse between the two countries was, not doubled, but decupled in the course of that interval; or if, discarding the first twelve months after the cessation of hostilities, we start from 1784, we find our imports from France to have become, in 1792, five times as great as in that year, and our exports thither between twice and three times as great. The commercial treaty may be said to have doubled both the imports and the exports within a year after it came into operation. After 1789 the convulsed or uncertain state of things in France, no doubt, tended to check the further development of trade; but still it maintained itself at the height to which it had grown: if there was a falling off in the exports in 1790, they recovered their former amount in the course of the next two years. In 1792 the exports to France from Great Britain consisted of British merchandize to the value of 743,280*l.*, and foreign produce to that of 484,885*l.* This amount of goods was carried out in 1317 British vessels, measuring 107,821 tons, and navigated by 7912 men; and in 166 foreign vessels of the burthen of 8421 tons, and carrying 1010 men. The imports from France in that year were brought in 1413 British ships, of the burthen of 91,428 tons, and manned by 7659 sailors; and in 330 foreign ships of 12,362 tons burthen, and carrying 2195 men. So that altogether the French trade at this time employed 2730 British vessels, measuring 199,249 tons, and manned by 15,571 seamen; besides 496 foreign vessels, of the burthen of 20,783 tons, and manned by 3205 hands. In this account, however, repeated voyages of the same vessel are reckoned as voyages by different vessels; the actual quantity of shipping engaged in the trade, therefore, was, no doubt, considerably less than it is here made to appear.

The progress of our trade with other parts of the world during the space of time under review will be sufficiently indicated by the following notices:—

IRELAND:—in 1785, imports from, 2,012,288*l.*, exports to, 2,168,613*l.*; in 1788, imports 2,184,963*l.*, exports 2,424,899*l.*; in 1792, imports 2,622,732*l.*, exports 2,372,866*l.* In the last of these years the exports consisted of British merchandize to the value of 1,512,843*l.*, and foreign produce to that of 860,022*l.*; carried out in 6354 British and Irish vessels, measuring 508,372 tons, and manned by 30,192 seamen: the imports were brought in 4194 British and Irish ships, measuring 294,698 tons, and manned by 20,434 seamen, and in 15 foreign ships, measuring 2026 tons, and manned by 134 seamen.

One great branch of our commerce now stood, of course, upon a footing altogether new—that with our former colonies in North America, now become the United States. But, although a successful revolt had broken the political tie that had hitherto united these settlements with the mother country, even that separation and the fierce struggle by which it was brought about could not destroy the natural bond that attached a young community, almost exclusively occupied in agriculture, to the greatest manufacturing community, and the most diffused maritime and colonial empire, in the world. Great Britain was still, as formerly, by far the most convenient market for the people of the United States; and they, no longer our dependent colonists, were yet as much as ever our most valuable customers. In the general feeling that such was the case, no time was lost by the British parliament, after the restoration of peace, in passing an act (the 23 Geo. III., c. 26) repealing all the prohibitory commercial acts made during the war; and by another act of the same session (the 23 Geo. III., c. 39) it was declared that, for a limited time, no manifest, certificate, or other similar document should be required from any vessels belonging to the United States on arriving in or clearing out from a British port; and, the king being meanwhile authorised to regulate the manner in which the trade should be carried on, a royal proclamation was immediately issued (on the 14th of May, 1783) for the admission, till further orders, into the ports of Great Britain, of any unmanufactured commodities, the produce of the United States, either in British or American ships, without the usual certificates, and on payment of the same duties as were payable on the same articles imported from British America. The same drawbacks and bounties were also allowed on goods coming from the United States as on those from the British possessions; and the benefit of the order was extended to all American vessels that had arrived since the 20th of January. But this by no means satisfied either the Americans or many zealous persons at home. "Britain," says Macpherson, "instead of being ruined for want of commerce with America, as had been predicted (and, indeed, contrary to a received maxim, that a trade once turned out of its channel cannot be recovered again), was in danger of suffering from the too great ardour of the merchants for forming new connexions in that continent, many of which, as they found to their cost, were with people who could never have obtained credit for a shilling from those among whom they resided. Many of these adventurers, immediately upon their arrival in America, converted their goods into ready money at any prices, and then shipped themselves off for the continent of Europe, or hid themselves in the boundless back countries of America under the new-assumed character of land-jobbers. It appears from Mr. Coxe's 'View of the United States of America,' p. 34, that in the year 1787 the remains of the excessive importations of the four preceding years were constantly offered for sale at prices lower than their cost in Europe, which was a great injury to the fair importers and manufacturers in America. It is certain that considerable quantities of European goods were carried from America during those years to the West Indies, and sold, even there, under the European prices." This, however, is no more than what is always apt and almost sure to happen on the opening of a new commerce; though it may be admitted that the nature of the country in America, and the constitution of society there, offered, as they still do, superior facilities for bold adventurers in this line. But there also arose a controversy as to the extent of the commercial rights which it would be advisable to grant permanently to the United States, the main point in dispute being whether the Navigation Act should be now enforced in regard to them as in regard to all other foreign states, and should exclude their vessels from admission to our West India Islands. Any claim of right to such admission the American republicans certainly no longer possessed, any more than the inhabitants of Spanish America or the people of France. But an exemption in their favour from the rigours of the Navigation Act was urged, in the particular circumstances of the case, on grounds of expediency; and this view had the general support of the West India interest. The question was discussed in numerous pamphlets; and some of the governors of the West India Islands actually went the length of freely admitting American vessels into their ports in the same manner as they had been admitted before the war. It was asserted by the advocates of this policy, to quote Macpherson's summary of their arguments, which affords a good view of the nature and circumstances of the trade between the West Indies and the American continent, "that the planters had been very scantily supplied with provisions and lumber during the war; that a considerable part of their supply was derived from intercepted cargoes which were destined for the foreign islands, a resource which the peace put an end to, as it did also to the supplies from Florida, which was now yielded to Spain; and that they had been compelled by necessity to convert their land to provision-grounds, and to draw off their slaves from their proper plantation employments to cultivate provisions and cut lumber; that the provisions and lumber procured either by importation, capture, or their own labour, were obtained at such an enormous expense, that nothing but the hopes of soon seeing a change for the better could support them under it, but that a long continuance of it must be absolutely ruinous. Lastly, they urged, as a proof of the bad consequence to Great Britain of turning their industry out of its proper channel, that in the year 1777, before any of our islands were taken by the enemy, the quantity of sugar imported into England was short of that in the year 1774 (when part of the sugars went to the American colonies) full 45,000 hogshheads, the value of which was nearly a million of money, the freight of which would have been 150,000*l.*, and the duties payable to the public above 100,000*l.* It was asserted that the rum, of which near eight millions of gallons were annually made in the West India Islands, and which, being an acceptable present to the Americans, used to be the principal resource for the supply of plantation necessaries, must now become a dead stock in the hands of the planters, as the consumption of Great Britain did not much exceed half a million of gallons.* With respect to a supply of corn from

* These accounts are extracted from the official tables of imports and exports for the three years, and from the account of the shipping for 1792, as printed by Macpherson, in 'Annals of Commerce,' vol. iv., pp. 99, 182, 261, and 262. Owing, however, to the form in which the tables are drawn up, in distinct columns throughout for Scotland and England, almost every number we have given has been obtained by computation, and we have neglected shillings and pence. Some difficulty also has been occasioned by all the tables not being constructed upon the same principle; the account of shipping, in particular, is probably not to be perfectly reconciled with that of the imports and exports for the same year. For the year 1792 the shipping account (which consists of twenty-five columns) has quite a different distribution of countries from the table of imports and exports; but in our comparison we have not found any absolute discrepancy, except only that there is no head in the table of imports and exports to which we can refer the entries in the shipping account opposite to Florida and Honduras, from which, according to that account, there were entered inwards, in 1792, 47 British ships, measuring 10,801 tons, and navigated by 548 seamen; and to which there were cleared outward 20 British ships, measuring 5157 tons, and manned by 272 seamen. In the table of imports and exports for 1785 there are also the following entries, which we have not been able to include in our summary: America in general, imports from, 18,823*l.*, exports to, 31,863*l.*; and Prize goods, imports 34,076*l.*, exports 30,941*l.*

* Macpherson shows, in a note, that there must be a good deal of exaggeration in this statement, inasmuch as the average quantity of rum imported into Great Britain in the ten years from 1773 to 1782 inclusive was 2,068,842 gallons, of which there were exported annually, on an average, 617,939 gallons, leaving 1,444,903 gallons for home consumption; while, on the other hand, the quantity exported to the continent of North America from all the islands, on an average of three years preceding the war, did not exceed 2,900,000 gallons annually.

Canada, it was observed that, though that country had had plentiful harvests from the year 1772 to 1778, and particularly in 1774, yet these years of plenty were followed by such a succession of defective crops, that from 1779 to 1782 inclusive, the exportation of corn and bread was prohibited, and the province even received some supplies from other quarters. Hence it was evident that there never could be any dependence upon Canada for a regular supply. As to Nova Scotia, it was not alleged that it had ever been capable of raising corn for its own consumption.* These representations, and the clamour that was raised, produced such an effect, we are told, that "even the government was like to be carried away with the stream, and on the point of confirming by law those concessions with respect to the commerce of the West Indies which were hitherto granted by mistake, or connivance, of some servants of the crown,"† when the meditated course of policy was prevented by the strong considerations urged in two pamphlets, the first entitled 'Observations on the Commerce of the American States,' by Lord Sheffield; the other, which appeared soon after, entitled 'Opinions on interesting Subjects of Public Law and Commercial Policy arising from American Independence,' by Mr. George Chalmers. "Both these authors," says Macpherson, "insisted strongly, that Britain and Ireland, with the remaining continental colonies, were fully sufficient to supply the British West India Islands with provisions and lumber, as they had done during the war, even if all the States of America should unite in refusing to sell those articles to our vessels, which was, however, by no means to be apprehended; and that the manufacturers and merchants of Britain could have nothing to dread from the menaced refusal of America to admit British goods, because goods must ever find their market in proportion to their quality and price, independent of all resolutions, and even laws."‡ Of course, the ground on which Sheffield and Chalmers rested their opposition to the demand of the Americans was the importance of maintaining inviolate the system of the Navigation Act, the palladium, as it had been generally regarded, of our naval power. In the end the government took a middle course. On the 2nd of July a proclamation by the king in council was issued, permitting British subjects to carry in British vessels all kinds of naval stores, lumber, live-stock, corn, flour, and bread from the United States of America to the West India Islands; and also to export rum, sugar, molasses, chocolate, nuts, coffee, ginger, and pimento from the islands to the States, under the same duties and regulations as if the commodities were cleared out for a British possession. "This order," says Macpherson, "was considered by the administration as an indulgence, both to the Islands and to the United States; but it was not received as such by either of them. The West India planters cried out, that the islands must inevitably be ruined, if there were not as free and unrestrained an intercourse between them and the continent, and as free admission of American vessels, as there was when the latter was under the British dominion; and the Americans were so much offended by it, that the assemblies of three of the States actually made a requisition to the Congress that they would prohibit all commercial intercourse with the British colonies."* The British government, however, would not be moved from its restrictive and cautious policy. Three other temporary orders were issued in the course of the year: the first, on the 6th of June, permitting American tobacco to be imported into London, Bristol, Liverpool, Cowes, Whitehaven, and Greenock, and to be warehoused under the custody of the revenue officers, the importer paying down five per cent. on the value as part of the duty; the second, on the 5th of November, dispensing with that immediate payment; the third, on the 26th of December, by which time the preceding orders had expired, renewing that of the 2nd of July with regard to the intercourse between the United States and the West Indies, but relaxing the former regulations for the British trade so far as to permit the importation of any unmanufactured goods not prohibited by law, except oil, and also of pitch, tar, turpentine, indigo, masts, yards, and bowsprits, being the produce of the United States, either by British or American subjects, and either in British or American vessels. And those orders in council, and the act of parliament by which they were authorised, were annually renewed or continued, with little alteration, throughout the next five years. Meanwhile the Americans persisted in urging their claims to have both trades placed upon a more liberal system; and some attempts were even made at retaliation. In 1784 the Congress recommended to the legislatures of the different states the adoption of a resolution prohibiting for fifteen years the importation and exportation of every species of merchandise in any vessels belonging to foreign powers which had not connected themselves with the government of the United States by commercial treaties. "The people of Boston," writes the historian of our commerce under the year 1785, "were highly offended by the exclusion from the ports of the West Indies, by the high duties on rice, oil, and tobacco, and by the regulations for the British fisheries in the American seas. They were also greatly alarmed at the establishment of British factors in their country (a measure rendered necessary by the enormous deficiencies of some of those who assumed the character of merchants in America immediately after the peace), and they presented a petition (22nd April, 1785) to the Congress for regulations to counteract those of Great Britain; which was soon followed by an act of the commonwealth of Massachusetts (June 23rd) for the regulation of navigation and commerce, whereby they prohibited the exportation of any American produce or manufacture from their ports in vessels owned by British subjects after the 1st of August, 1785, with a provisional exception in favour of those British settlements whose governors should reverse their proclamations against the admission of American vessels into their ports. They also enacted several extra duties to be paid by vessels belonging to foreigners, and particularly by British subjects, with a permission, however, for new vessels, built in Massachusetts, though partly or wholly owned by British subjects, to take in cargoes upon equal terms with the citizens of the United States, but only for their first departures.* But a measure such as this, proceeding from a single state, was not likely to have any effect in driving the British government from the position it had taken up; and, if it was not to operate in that way, it could only make matters worse, still farther limiting and impeding the trade, and directly tending indeed to put an end to the interchange of commodities between the two countries altogether. Just before this, in March, 1785, an act had been passed by the English parliament (the 25 Geo. III. c. 1), permitting bread, flour, and live-stock, but no other articles upon any pretence whatever, to be imported for a time into Newfoundland and the adjacent islands from the United States of America in British vessels, navigated according to law, and provided with licences, which were to be in force for a term of seven months, from the commissioners of the customs in Great Britain. This concession was granted in consequence of what had happened in the early part of the preceding year, when, the settlers at Newfoundland being in great distress for want of provisions, a supply arrived in some British ships from the United States, which the governor and council, after some deliberation, had in the circumstances allowed to be landed and sold. On the other hand, in the act passed in 1787 (the 27 Geo. III. c. 7), for continuing the temporary acts regulating the commercial intercourse with America, while the importation of provisions and lumber into any of the British West India Islands from the foreign West India Islands was permitted in cases of emergency and distress on the responsibility of the governor and council, the admission of the produce of the United States was more rigorously prohibited than ever, the penalty for the importation of such produce into any British possession contrary to law, or to the orders of the king in council, being now made the forfeiture of both cargo and vessel. At last, however, in 1788, an act was passed permanently permitting the importation into the West Indies, in British vessels, of tobacco, pitch, tar, turpentine, hemp, flax, masts, yards, bowsprits, lumber, horses, cattle and other live-stock, bread, flour, peas, beans, potatoes, wheat, rice, oats, barley, and other grain, the produce of the United States; and the exportation from the West Indies to the States of any goods or produce which might be lawfully exported to any foreign country in Europe, and also of sugar, molasses, coffee, pimento, cacao (or chocolate nuts), and ginger. The jealousies and animosities not unnaturally excited by these contentions now gradually subsided, and seem to have passed away much sooner and more completely than might have been anticipated. So early as under the year 1789, we find the recorder of the facts belonging to this department of our history writing as follows:—"The ill will engendered by the American war was now turned into friendship and harmony between Great Britain and the American states, the influence of which extended to the most distant British possessions. Earl Cornwallis, governor-general of India, about the beginning of this year, or the end of the last, gave orders that American vessels should be treated at the Company's settlements in all respects as the most favoured foreigners. The ship Chesapeake, the first American that was allowed to trade, or to show her colours, in the river Ganges, was moreover favoured by the supreme council of Bengal with an exemption from the government customs, which all foreign vessels are bound to pay."* The general diffusion of these better feelings was already preparing the way for an harmonious commercial arrangement between the two countries, which, as we shall find, was completed a few years later.

A very complete view of the trade of the British West India Islands for the year 1787 was published in 1789, in a series of tables, by the Board of Trade. According to this account the entire imports of the islands for that year were as follows:—From Great Britain, British and Irish goods 1,441,048*l.*, India goods 23,570*l.*, foreign goods 174,085*l.*, in all 1,638,703*l.*; from Ireland, Irish goods 19,914*l.*, British goods 111*l.*, foreign goods 135*l.*, in all 20,160*l.*; from Newfoundland, 890 barrels of wet fish, and 64,123 quintals of dry fish; from the foreign West Indies, 1,943,000 lbs. cotton, 64,750 lbs. cacao, sundry woods, cattle, hides, &c., and some dollars; and, finally, from Africa, 20,978 negroes. The exports are made to have consisted of sugar 2,002,736 cwt., rum 5,270,496 gallons, molasses 68,052 gallons, cotton 9,544,121 lbs., indigo 41,064 lbs., coffee 34,446 cwt., cacao 4234 cwt., pimento 616,444 lbs., ginger 10,546 cwt., dye-woods 12,726 tons, mahogany and other hard woods 16,929 tons, and 5531 hides, together with a few other articles not particularized. The value of the entire exports of each of the islands, calculated, not by the old Custom-house rates, but according to the actual prices current in London at the time, is stated as follows: Jamaica 2,136,442*l.* (principally sugar, rum, cotton, indigo, pimento, and dye-woods), Tortola 106,960*l.* (principally sugar, rum, and cotton), Anguilla 12,993*l.* (principally cotton), St. Christopher's 510,014*l.* (principally sugar, rum, and cotton), Montserrat and Nevis 214,142*l.* (the same), Antigua 592,597*l.* (the same), Dominica 302,987*l.* (principally sugar, molasses, cotton, indigo, and coffee), St. Vincent's 192,162*l.* (principally rum and cotton), Grenada 614,908*l.* (principally sugar, rum, and cotton), Barbadoes 539,606*l.* (principally sugar, rum, molasses, cotton, and ginger). The entire amount was made up to 5,389,054*l.* by the addition of the Bay of Honduras 106,243*l.* (principally mahogany and dye-woods, with a little cotton and cacao). There are no returns from the Bahamas and Bermuda. "The loyalists from North America," Macpherson observes, "had just begun to bring the cotton of the former into consideration; and the inhabitants of the latter were beginning to follow their example, as far as the narrow limits of their island would permit.*" The exports were, of course, principally to Great Britain; the only other parts of the world with which any export trade was carried on were Ireland, British America, the United States, the foreign West India Islands, and Africa.† The exports to the United States, according to this account, were from Jamaica 60,096*l.*, from Tortola 1499*l.*, from St. Christopher's 15,513*l.*, from Montserrat and Nevis 13,982*l.*, from Antigua 44,680*l.*, from Dominica 7164*l.*, from St. Vincent's 5712*l.*, from Grenada 24,597*l.*, and from Barbadoes 23,218*l.*; all principally in rum. To Africa the only exports noticed are, from Jamaica 8600 gallons of rum, from Nevis one ship of the burthen of 102 tons, cargo not mentioned, and from Barbadoes 100 gallons of rum. To Great Britain the exports from all the islands were, sugar 1,926,121 cwt., rum 2,251,341 gallons, molasses 37,472 gallons, cotton 9,396,921 lbs., indigo 39,414 lbs., coffee 30,365 cwt., cacao 3954 cwt., pimento 606,994 lbs., ginger 9159 cwt., dye-woods 12,637 tons, mahogany and other hard woods 7569 tons, and 5180 hides. To Ireland there were exported, sugar 26,182 cwt., rum 209,264 gallons, and cotton 1259 cwt. According to a further account, the total value of the exports to Great Britain, which in 1787 was 3,749,447*l.* (calculated by the custom-house rates), rose in 1788 to 4,253,879*l.* The real or market value was, probably, about a fourth greater.

The publication of these statements with regard to the value of the West India Islands and their trade arose out of the strong feeling that about this date began to be excited on the subject of the trade in negro slaves. After the restoration of peace with the colonies, general attention was attracted to this subject in London by swarms of American negroes, whom the events of the war had emancipated, appearing in the streets, begging for employment or for bread, to such an extent as to be a serious public nuisance. In 1787 about 700 of these destitute blacks were collected for the purpose of being sent out in government transports to Sierra Leone; and, although a large proportion of them died, or deserted, or had to be discharged as unmanageable, before the vessels sailed, about 400 of the number were actually conveyed to Africa; where, however, the settlement that was thus attempted to be formed did not prosper. The following year, after the question had begun to be agitated in parliament, the Board of Trade (or, as it was then called, the Committee of the Privy Council for Trade and Plantations) was directed to inquire into the state of that part of Africa whence the slaves were brought, the manner of obtaining them, the transportation and sale of them, and the effects of the trade upon the colonies and the general commerce of the kingdom; and upon these various points a great mass of information was collected by the board, which was embodied in the same Report, presented about a year after to the king in council, in which are contained the accounts abstracted above of the exports and imports of the West India Islands. With the details given in the report in regard to the condition of the African tribes, the purchase or capture of the slaves, their conveyance to America, and their treatment there, the public mind has long been sufficiently familiar; but some accounts which it contains of the statistics of the trade in negroes, as it was at this date and had been for a long course of years carried on, deserve notice with reference to our present object. The English slave-trade, at this time, belonged chiefly to the two ports of Liverpool and Bristol. Of 137 vessels engaged in it in the year 1787, eighty belonged to the former of these ports, thirty to the latter. There is no complete account of the number of vessels annually employed in the trade before the year 1760; but for the twenty-seven years subsequent to that date, it had ranged from 28, measuring 3475 tons, in 1779, to 192, measuring 20,296 tons, in 1771. The traffic appears to have been depressed by the war from 1776 to 1783, but it revived with the return of peace: the 137 vessels, which, as we have seen, it employed in 1787, were of the burthen of 22,263 tons, which was the highest tonnage then on record. From 1776 down to 1782 inclusive, the value of the cargoes exported to Africa in the slaving vessels ranged from 470,779*l.*, which it was in 1776, down to 154,086*l.*, in 1778; but previously, from the year 1763, the amount had usually been between 450,000*l.* and 800,000*l.*; in 1772 it had been 866,394*l.*; in 1774, 846,525*l.*; in 1775, 786,168*l.*; and since the peace it had again become as great as formerly, having been 888,738*l.* in 1786, and 668,255*l.* in 1787. And, as the total exports from Great Britain to Africa, which according to the official tables were that year 735,447*l.*, were, in 1790, 929,203*l.*—in 1791, 856,082*l.*—and in 1792, 1,367,928*l.*, we may presume that that portion of them, amounting to nine-tenths of the whole, which was carried out by the slave-ships, and for the purposes of the slave-trade, shared in this increase. Of the 668,255*l.* worth of goods carried out by the slave-traders in 1776, 401,593*l.* consisted of British merchandise, 186,258*l.* of India goods, and the remaining

80,403*l.* of foreign merchandise. The India goods are not particularized: of the other descriptions the principal articles are stated to have been, woollens to the value of 138,330*l.*; cottons to that of 51,636*l.*; iron ware, chiefly guns, cutlasses, &c., to that of 43,515*l.*; gunpowder to that of 37,923*l.*; British linens to that of 18,200*l.*; foreign linens to that of 13,043*l.*; bugies (glass beads) to that of 12,916*l.*; wrought copper to that of 12,269*l.*; foreign bar-iron to that of 10,947*l.*; lead shot to that of 1408*l.*; together with 290,542 gallons of British spirits, valued at 20,417*l.*, and 64,584 gallons of rum, valued at 19,406*l.* The entire value of the imports from Africa to England in 1787 was 117,817*l.*, consisting of red-wood to the value of 62,480*l.*; ivory to that of 15,335*l.*; gum-arabic to that of 6388*l.*; Senegal gum to that of 5184*l.*; bees'-wax to that of 3819*l.*; and sundry trifling quantities of cam-wood, ebony, ostrich feathers, &c. These commodities were brought home in 46 vessels, measuring altogether 6630 tons, and having no concern in the slave-trade. The 137 slavers of course proceeded with their human cargoes from the African coast to the West Indies, and then returned to England laden with the produce of the islands. About this time a slave is said to have cost from 8*l.* to 22*l.* in Africa, and to have brought from 28*l.* to 35*l.* in the West Indies: about a century before the price is stated to have been about 3*l.* in Africa, and from 15*l.* to 17*l.* in the West Indies. The entire number of negroes annually exported from the west coast of Africa is supposed to have been, when the Board of Trade instituted its inquiry into the subject, not less than 74,000, namely, by the British 38,000, by the French 20,000, by the Portuguese 10,000, by the Dutch 4000, and by the Danes 2000; but of these many were conveyed to the Spanish and other foreign possessions in the new world. We have seen that the importation into the British West Indies in the year 1787 was about 21,000, and of these about 5000 appear to have been re-exported to the foreign West India Islands and to the United States. In the first three years after the war, however (1783, 1784, and 1785), 36,158 negroes were landed in Jamaica alone, of which only 9118 were re-exported, namely, 395 to the United States, the rest to the foreign West India Islands. In 1789 the entire number imported into all the British Islands was 21,425, of whom 8764 were re-exported; in 1790 it was 21,889, of whom 7542 were re-exported; in 1791 it was 30,763, of whom only 1427 were re-exported.

We will now shortly notice the progress made during this time of peace by some branches of our trade, which, although not actually carried on in the country, may nevertheless be described as domestic, inasmuch as they did not bring us into any direct intercourse with foreign nations.

Considerable exertions continued to be made for the encouragement and extension of the herring, pilchard, and cod fisheries, in our own and the neighbouring seas. In 1785 parliament passed an act (the 25 Geo. III. c. 58) raising the bounty on the exportation of salted pilchards caught during the succeeding twelvemonths, with the view of reviving that fishery, which had formerly been carried on to a considerable extent on the south-west coast of England, but had lately declined; and by a subsequent act (the 26 Geo. III. c. 45) this encouragement was continued, under somewhat modified regulations, till June, 1791. In 1790 the pilchard fishery on the coast of Cornwall is stated to have been unusually abundant; the little town of Mevagissey is recorded to have cured 10,000 hogsheads, "which," observes Macpherson, "would have been a fund of wealth to the inhabitants, if the high price of salt, whereof six bushels are required to every hogshead, did not carry off the greatest part of the proceeds."* The following year, however, we find the parliament (by the 31 Geo. III. c. 44) still further encouraging the pilchard fishery by a new bounty on exportation. For the ten years preceding 1756 the annual export of pilchards is said to have averaged 30,000 hogsheads, and to have employed about 3000 Cornish fishermen, besides about 4000 or 5000 people on shore. The fish were exported principally to the Mediterranean, in vessels which brought back salt, staves, and other materials for the fishery. "Pilchards," says Macpherson, under the year 1782, "are so much in request in the Italian states, that the orders from them for lead, tin, copper, leather, &c. have been often conditional, that, if such a quantity of pilchards could not be sent, the other articles could not be received; and the Venetian government allowed British vessels importing a certain quantity of pilchards to take in currants at their islands, though the carriage of that fruit was restricted to their own vessels." Afterwards, however, the quantity of pilchards annually exported fell off to only 12,000 or 13,000 hogsheads.

The herring fishery on the Yarmouth coast employed only 94 vessels in the year 1782; "whereas," says Macpherson, "in the year 1760 it employed 205, of from 30 to 100 tons, and gave employment to about 6000 men, women, boys, and girls, besides 30 or 40 vessels from Folkestone, Hastings, &c., which have now deserted it entirely. For about twenty years preceding 1760, the annual capture of herrings on the Norfolk coast was above 47,000 barrels, of which above 38,000 were exported. The fishery which the people of Yarmouth, with the assistance of the Shetland fishermen, used to carry on, in about 200 vessels of from 40 to 60 tons, in the neighbourhood of Iceland, where the cod most saleable in the Spanish and Italian markets are caught, has been annihilated by the operation of the salt-laws."† From 1777 to 1782 the total quantity of herrings cured in England appears to have varied from 23,890 barrels, which it was in the first of these years, to 35,359, which it was in the last. The cod exported was 3473 cwt. in 1777, 495 cwt. in 1779, 6905 cwt. in 1781, and 1341 cwt. in 1782. The Scottish herring-fishery, on the other hand, had risen as the English declined. In 1751 the Scottish fishery employed only 2 vessels, measuring together 148 tons, and employing 33 men and boys; and the quantity of herrings taken was only 213 barrels. The first slight impulse appears to have been received in 1760, when the number of vessels was 13, measuring 554 tons and manned by 130 hands, and the quantity of herrings taken 3089 barrels. A few years before, in 1757, the bounty had been raised from 30s. to 50s. per tun, at which rate it continued down to the year 1770, though for a part of this period it is said to have been very irregularly paid. However, in 1762 the fishery employed 49 vessels, 87 in 1763, 119 in 1764, 157 in 1765, 261 in 1766, and 266 in 1767, in which last year the quantity of herrings taken was 28,328 barrels, upon which bounties were paid to the amount of 31,584.* After this there was a falling off for two or three years; but even under the system of a reduced bounty the fishery soon began to revive, till in 1775 the number of vessels employed was 281, and the quantity of herrings taken 53,466 barrels; and in 1776 the number of vessels was 294, and the herrings taken 51,863 barrels. "Campbelltown (in Argyleshire), the chief rendezvous of the fishery," Macpherson observes, "was raised by it, from having only 4 small vessels and 3000 or 4000 inhabitants in the year 1750, to the possession of 62 stout vessels, carrying 750 men, and a population of above 7000 inhabitants, in the year 1777. But that increase is a small object, in point of national utility, when compared with the increase of seamen produced by the bounty: it being calculated that two-thirds of the seamen who man the shipping of the Clyde, besides a considerable proportion of those in the vessels belonging to Liverpool, Bristol, and even London, and great numbers in the navy, have been bred in that fishery.† After the commencement of the American war, however, the rise in the prices of barrels, salt, naval stores, and in seamen's wages, which had advanced by the year 1779 from 100 to 400 per cent., pressed so hard upon this branch of adventure that the number of vessels, or busses, employed in the fishery, gradually declined from 240, manned by 2600 hands, in 1777, to 147, manned by 1667 hands, in 1782, and the quantity of herrings taken from 43,313 barrels in the former year, to only 13,457 in the latter. But the trade

* The numbers given in all these accounts, as of barrels taken throughout, include only those taken in the first voyage of each season, or that called the bounty voyage; and nearly the whole of this quantity appears to have been usually exported. "But," observes Macpherson, "as the busses often made a second, and sometimes even a third, voyage, and as the herrings taken in those after voyages are believed to be, one year with another, equal to those taken in the bounty voyages, the real quantity of herrings caught and cured by the busses may be fairly estimated at double the quantity here stated. The number of herrings taken by boats, and consumed fresh, or slightly salted, in the country, of which no account is taken, must also be prodigiously great, especially when an extraordinary plenty, and consequently low price, encourages the cadgers (hizglers) to carry them as far as possible into the inland parts of the country."—Annals of Commerce, iii. 722.

was one which, from the nature of things, did not admit of a condition of steady prosperity; and even the bounties paid by the public, with the object of encouraging and sustaining it, although they no doubt occasioned its being carried on to an extent which it would not otherwise have attained, at the same time only gave it more of an uncertain and gambling character. Macpherson himself, with all his zeal in favour both of the fisheries and of the bounty system, cannot altogether shut his eyes to this view of the matter. "The precarious nature of the fishery," he observes, under the year 1782, "appears very strongly from the great inequality of the exportation from the same port. Campbelltown, which in the year 1755 exported 24,436 barrels, and has been generally one of the chief ports of Scotland for the exportation of herrings, exported this year only 396 barrels. Stranraer (in Wigtonshire) in the year 1758 exported 13,121 barrels, and has in some years exported none at all. Cod is chiefly imported from Shetland, next to which Campbelltown, and of later years sometimes Stornoway and Aberdeen, have been the chief fishing-places for the exportation of cod.*"

The Irish herring-fishery appears to have been that which was carried on with the greatest spirit and success in the early years of the war. Large importations of herrings had long been made to Ireland from the East Country, or the coasts of the Baltic, to be thence re-exported to the West Indies, where they formed the principal food of the negroes; but, while from 1764 to 1773 this importation from abroad averaged 25,365 barrels annually, besides 16,657 barrels from Great Britain, the total average importation from all parts from 1779 to 1783 had fallen to 12,277 barrels, and at the same time the quantity exported had greatly increased. In 1781 there were 147 bounty vessels fishing in Loch Swilly, besides 117 others from Liverpool and the Isle of Man. "The Irish," says Macpherson, "have great advantages in the herring-fishery. The arrival of the herrings, so precarious upon the extensive west coast of Scotland, is certain on the north-west coast of Ireland, and they swim close to the shore. The fishing is free from restrictions, and the adventurers either fish themselves or purchase from the fishers, as they find most convenient, whereby they are often enabled to complete their loading in two or three days, and to make several trips during one fishing season, which generally lasts six weeks or two months. And thus they can obtain a greater quantity of fish in the same space of time, and also run their cargoes much earlier to a market, than the British fisherman, who is tied down by restrictive laws to lose a great deal of time, and support a very heavy expense, that he may be entitled to the bounty." He adds that the certainty and greater abundance of herrings had induced many of the fishermen of England and Scotland to prefer the Irish fishing-grounds to those of their own coasts.†

For some years the multitude of herrings on the Swedish coast had been so great that, after as many were eaten and salted for future consumption and exportation as could be so disposed of, many millions of them were boiled for oil, of which one barrel was obtained from eighteen barrels of herrings. About 16,000 barrels of this herring-oil were made in the year 1781, of which between 14,000 and 15,000 barrels were exported to the Baltic, Holland, and Spain. But under the year 1784 we read, "This year no herrings appeared upon the coast of Sweden. But on the west coasts of Ireland and Scotland the abundance of those heaven-directed visitors was inconceivably great. On the Irish coast the fishermen generally loaded their boats with a single haul of a net, and each boat cleared 5*l.* in the three months of the summer fishing, though the herrings were sold during the first month (July) for about 10*d.* a thousand, or from 4*d.* to 6*d.* for as many as a horse could carry; though millions were boiled down for oil, and millions were thrown away. On the coast of Scotland as many herrings were caught in one inlet of the sea, called Loch Urn, in Inverness-shire, in seven or eight weeks, as, if they could have been brought to market, would have sold for 56,000*l.; after which, the stock of salt and casks being expended, the people, who seem to have known nothing of the method of making oil of them, or were prevented by the want or high price of fuel, gave up the fishery." This year, it is stated, the foreign vessels employed in the herring fishery on the north and west coasts of Scotland were no fewer than 275, carrying 3765 men; namely, 166 from various ports of Holland, 44 from Emden, 29 from Hamburg and Altona, 24 from Ostend and Nieuport, 7 from Dunkirk, together with 3 Danish yaggers and 2 Dutch store-ships.

The next year a new act was passed for the regulation of the fisheries (the 25 Geo. III. c. 65), which removed some restrictions under which the bounties had hitherto been paid: busses or vessels of the burthen of 80 tons or more were now allowed to receive bounty for that amount of tonnage; all the vessels were permitted to proceed direct to the fishery, without being compelled to muster at a general rendezvous; and liberty was given to employ the salt shipped for curing herrings in curing cod, ling, or hake (which fish, so cured, however, were not to be entitled to any bounty on exportation). Another act was passed in 1786, reducing the bounty to 20*s.* per ton; and a third the year after that, making some other alterations, which need not be detailed. It appears to have been only in the Scotch fishery that the bounty was operative to any material extent. According to a table which Macpherson inserts under the year 1800, "extracted," he says, "partly from various accounts laid before the committee of the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the state of the fisheries, who bestowed much attention on that important object in this and the preceding year, and partly from the books of the inspector-general of imports and exports," there were no vessels engaged in the English fishery "on the tonnage bounty" in any of the years 1783, 1784, and 1785, and only from one to six in any of the seven following years, except in 1788, when the number was 15, and 1789, when it was 16. Yet the exportations of herrings from England throughout the ten years are stated to have varied from 12,116 barrels of white herrings in 1785 to 25,630 in 1792, and from 12,914 barrels of red herrings in 1789 to 40,270 in 1784. In the Scotch fishery, on the other hand, the number of vessels engaged on the bounty system appears to have increased progressively from 154, measuring 7307 tons, and manned by 1696 hands, in 1783, to 332, measuring 15,525 tons, and employing 3738 hands, in 1792; while the quantity of herrings cured for the bounty rose during the same time from 13,603 barrels to 81,851. In 1792 also 25,822 barrels of herrings are stated to have been cured in Scotland "not on the tonnage bounty."* Some of the parties engaged in the Yarmouth fishery began, it seems, in the year 1787 to fit out vessels for the deep-sea fishery, under the encouragement of the act passed the preceding year, one of the clauses of which allotted premiums of 80, 60, 40, and 20 guineas, to be paid, in addition to the tonnage bounties, to the four vessels which should bring to land the greatest quantities of herrings from the north and north-east coasts of the kingdom between the beginning of June and the end of November. "Their fishermen," Macpherson relates, under the year 1789, "proceeded to Shetland, and sometimes so far beyond it that they fell in with floating ice. They followed the Dutch method of shooting their nets in deep water from the vessels, and not in lochs or bays from their boats, as the British buss-fishers do. In the second and third years of their fishing they believed their herrings to be nothing inferior to those of the Dutch in respect to curing; and they sent the most of them to Hamburg, where, happening to be the first that arrived, they brought a price equal to that of the early Dutch herrings, and, after the arrival of the Dutch, they were still able to stand the competition with them. This year some of the Yarmouth pickled herrings were sent even to Rotterdam, and the owners had no reason to complain of their sales. But, the expense of this mode of fishing, though it had hitherto been attended with such auspicious prospects, being greater than the usual returns could indemnify, and the adventurers being disappointed in obtaining the bounties they thought themselves entitled to, they gave it up." †

An account of the fishery and trade of Newfoundland from the end of the war, drawn up from official returns by the admirals commanding on that station, was published by the Board of Trade in 1792. According to this statement the number of British fishing-vessels engaged in the fishery had increased from 236 in 1784 to 389 in 1788, but had after that declined till it was only 276 in 1792; the British sack-vessels, which were only 60 in 1784, were 173 in 1786, and 161 in 1792; the British colony-vessels were 50 in 1784, 34 in 1786, 28 in 1788, 70 in 1789, and 57 in 1792; the bye-boats were 344 in 1784, and 584 in 1791; and the boats belonging to the inhabitants, which were only 1068 in 1784, were 2090 in 1788, and, although the number afterwards fell off, were still 1259 in 1791. In 1792 the bye-boats and boats of the inhabitants are reckoned together as 1997. The number of people residing throughout the winter in the island, which was 10,701 in 1784, had increased to 19,106 in 1789, but by 1791 had fallen off to 16,097. The exports in 1791 consisted of 751,296 quintals of dried cod (of which 29,717 were sent to the British islands, 57,177 to the West Indies, the remainder to Spain, Portugal, Italy, and Madeira); 20,825 quintals of cork fish (all to the British islands); 5046 tierces of salmon (mostly to the south of Europe); 1725 barrels of herrings (mostly to the West Indies); 2122 tons of oil (mostly to the British islands); 28,964 seal-skins (all to Great Britain and Ireland); 40,544 feet of planks and boards (to the same quarter); 29,000 shingles (to the West Indies); 16,948 staves (to the British islands). These commodities formed the cargoes of 523 ships, measuring 58,420 tons, and manned by 4289 seamen; 288 of the number clearing out for the Roman Catholic countries in the south of Europe, 140 for the British islands, 47 for the West Indies, 35 for the British possessions in North America, and 13 for the United States.

The Greenland or Northern whale-fishery received a great impulse from the cessation of the war. In 1781 the vessels engaged in this trade were only 34 from England and 5 from Scotland, measuring altogether 11,318 tons. The next year the bounty was raised from 30s. to 40s. per ton; but the number of vessels was still only 44 (including 6 from Scotland) in 1782, and 51 (including 4 from Scotland) in 1783. In 1784, however, the number was 89 from England and 7 from Scotland; in 1785, 136 from England and 13 from Scotland; in 1786, 162 from England and 23 from Scotland; and even in the next year, when the bounty was again reduced to 30s., the number was 219 from England and 31 from Scotland, measuring altogether 73,337 tons.* In 1788, it was still 216 from England and 31 from Scotland. After this, however, there was a considerable falling off; the account of shipping for 1789 exhibiting only 133 vessels cleared out for Greenland from England and 28 from Scotland; that for 1790, only 93 from England and 23 from Scotland; that for 1791, the same numbers; and that for 1792, only 73 from England and 20 from Scotland, measuring altogether 26,983 tons, or little more than a third of the quantity of shipping employed in the trade five years before. With the view of checking this decline, acts modifying the regulations under which the fishery should be conducted were passed by parliament in 1789, and again in 1791; but the result showed that the branch of enterprise which it was thus attempted to foster was really of too uncertain and precarious a nature to sustain itself without the artificial prop of the bounty system, according to the extension or restriction of which it was plain that the trade would usually expand or contract.

Meanwhile, a new whale-fishery, which had sprung up some years before the commencement of the present period, was now annually attracting adventurers to an opposite region of the globe. The South Sea whale-fishery took its rise, in some degree, as Macpherson observes, from the American war, with the breaking out of which the commencement of the prosecution of this trade by the English coincides. "The American whale-fishers," the historian relates, "when they found the whales scarce in their own seas, used to stretch over to the coast of Ireland, and often as far as Africa, Brazil, and even the remote Falkland Islands, in pursuit of the spermaceti whales, the most valuable of the cetaceous tribes. That fishery being given up in consequence of the war, many of the harpooners were induced to enter into the service of the British merchants, who fitted out vessels for the Newfoundland and Southern whale-fisheries. For the latter, which was quite a new business in this country, there were equipped 15 vessels of about 170 tons, and each carrying four American harpooners; and, though their acquisitions were only about 40 or 50 tons of oil for each vessel, yet the superior quality, and the price of it advanced by the war from 35% to 70% per ton, were sufficient to encourage the merchants to persevere in the business."† Acts establishing bounties for the encouragement of the South Sea whale-fishery were passed by parliament in 1786, 1788, and 1789. It appears that the vessels engaged in this trade, which till 1781 all belonged to London, were 12 in 1776, 13 in 1777, 19 in 1778; after which the number fell to 4 in 1779, and was never higher than 9, which it was in 1783, till 1785, when it was 11. The number for 1786 is not given;‡ but it was 28 in 1787, 42 in 1788, 45 in 1789, 33 in 1790, 75 in 1791, and 42, of 9544 tons burthen and carrying 816 men, in 1792. No Scotch vessels took part in this fishery.

At the same time that the political constitution and government of the East India Company were † In the table printed by Macpherson, Annals of Commerce, iv. 180, from which we extract the figures in the text, both the number of vessels and the tonnage for 1786 are set down at 0. But this must be either a misprint or must be intended to indicate merely that the proper figures cannot be ascertained, for the other columns of the table show that the trade for that year was very considerable: the bounty paid amounted to 24000*l.*, and the returns from the fishery were 1113 tons of oil, 357 cwt. of whale-fins, and 772 seal-skins. All these numbers are very greatly larger than those for the preceding year, when 11 vessels are stated to have engaged in the fishery.

regulated upon a new principle by the act of 24 Geo. III. sess. 2, c. 25, passed on the 13th of August, 1784, a great change was wrought in the principal branch of the Company's trade by the act reducing the duties on tea, called the Commutation Act (the 24 Geo. III. sess. 2, c. 38), passed on the 20th of the same month.* In the nine years preceding 1780 the importations of tea from China into Europe had been 118,783,811 pounds in 107 ships belonging to the Continent, and only 50,759,451 pounds in 79 ships belonging to the Company; that is to say, the average annual importation by the Company had been only 5,639,939 pounds, while the supply annually brought by other parties was 13,198,201 pounds. At the same time, it was calculated, from the inquiries that were made in the best informed quarters, that the consumption of the article in the British dominions and on the Continent was directly the reverse of what these quantities would indicate—that the people of the Continent certainly did not use more than 5,500,000 pounds of tea in the year, and the subjects of Great Britain at least 13,300,000 pounds. And it was also well known that several millions of pounds of the leaves of sloe, ash, and other trees were sold for tea in this country; so that the total quantity of the commodity, genuine and fictitious, that was consumed in the British dominions was supposed to be probably not much less than 18,000,000 pounds, of which between 12,000,000 and 13,000,000 must have been smuggled or counterfeit.† When the ad valorem duty was reduced by the Commutation Act from about 120 per cent. to 12½ per cent., the Company's sales increased at once to nearly three times their former amount. The quantity of tea sold by the Company in 1785 was 16,307,433 pounds; in 1791 it was 16,989,748; in 1792 it was 17,294,205. The importations by the Company, of course, rose in the same proportion; on the other hand, the quantity annually imported direct from China into the Continent of Europe went on decreasing, till from 19,072,300 pounds, which it was in 1784, it had fallen to 2,291,560 pounds in 1791. At the same time the demand for British goods, and especially woollens, became every year greater in China. In 1785 the woollens exported to China consisted only of 4534 pieces of cloth, of 60,000 pieces of long ell, and of 332 pieces of camlet; in 1791 they consisted of 6456 pieces of cloth, 150,000 pieces of long ell, and 2340 pieces of camlet. In the former of these years no tin was exported; in the latter the quantity sent out was 1200 tons. The exportation of tin commenced in 1789. Altogether, the prime cost of the woollen goods exported by the Company to China, India, Bencoolen, and St. Helena, which was only 238,946*l.* in 1784, had grown to be 580,093*l.* in 1791, and 675,285*l.* in 1792. Of this latter sum the portion paid for goods sent to China was 587,421*l.* The value of the entire merchandise exported by the Company, which in 1784 was 418,747*l.* in 27 vessels, was in 1792 1,031,262*l.* in 43 vessels. On the other hand, the quantity of bullion sent out gradually declined from 724,317*l.* in 1785 to 489,192*l.* in 1788; and then, after rising in 1789 to 787,078*l.*, fell again to 532,705*l.* in 1790, to 530,557*l.* in 1791, and to 10,943*l.* in 1792.* The entire value of the Company's imports, which in 1783 was 3,000,978*l.*, and which in 1784 was 4,204,981*l.*, was 4,647,974*l.* in 1785, 5,141,532*l.* in 1791, and 5,050,819*l.* in 1792. But during this space what was called the private trade also made a rapid progress, and became of large amount: this was the trade carried on by the commanders and officers of the Company's ships, and by their servants and the free merchants residing by their permission in India, who were allowed to export and import goods on their own account in whatever spare room was left in the ships after the cargoes belonging to the Company had been taken on board. In this private trade, the value of the imports, which in 1783 was only 144,176*l.*, and in 1784 400,784*l.*, had by 1787 risen to 918,389*l.*, and was 930,930*l.* in 1790, 709,455*l.* in 1791, and 703,578*l.* in 1792. The progress of the entire trade will be most distinctly indicated by exhibiting its state for the three years immediately preceding 1785, and during the three years ending with 1792:—In 1782, total exports 547,092*l.* in 24 ships, total imports 3,353,174*l.*; in 1783, exports 405,442*l.* in 13 ships, imports 3,145,154*l.*; in 1784, exports 418,747*l.* in 27 ships, imports 4,605,765*l.*; in 1790, exports 1,461,488*l.* in 25 ships, imports 6,035,438*l.*; in 1791, exports 1,505,516*l.* in 28 ships, imports 5,850,987*l.*; in 1792, exports 1,042,205*l.* in 43 ships, imports 5,754,397*l.* It is to be remembered that there was no bullion exported in the former three years, and only the amount of 10,943*l.* in 1792.

The increase of the trade demanding the employment of a larger capital, the Company was empowered in 1786 (by the 26 Geo. III. c. 62) to add 800,000*l.* to its stock; and this, being subscribed for at 155 per cent., produced an actual additional capital of 1,240,000*l.* In 1789 another act (the 29 Geo. III. c. 65) authorised the augmentation of the capital of the Company by the sum of 1,000,000*l.*; which, being subscribed for at 174 per cent., produced 1,740,000*l.* The Company's nominal capital was now 5,000,000*l.*, upon which the proprietors were paid a dividend of 8 per cent., as they had been ever since 1778.

We will close these details of the state of the several branches of our commerce in 1792, and of the progress it had made during the preceding eight years of peace, by collecting from some curious tables and statements given by George Chalmers, in his 'Historical View of the Domestic Economy of Great Britain and Ireland,' the leading particulars of the commercial condition of the country at the commencement of the war with France in 1793, as compared with what it was at the commencement of the American war in 1774.

Taking the averages of the six years ending with 1774, and of the six ending with 1792, it appears that the value of British manufactures annually exported to the different countries of the world had increased between the one date and the other as follows:—to Ireland, from 1,024,231*l.* to 1,352,291*l.*; to Guernsey and the other Channel islands, from 36,201*l.* to 73,342*l.*; to the Isle of Man, from 2893*l.* to 17,717*l.*; to Greenland, from 0*l.* to 75*l.*; to New Holland, from 0*l.* to 3179*l.*; to the East Indies, from 907,240*l.* to 1,921,955*l.*; to the West Indies, from 1,209,265*l.* to 1,845,962*l.*; to British America, from 310,946*l.* to 697,205*l.*; to the United States, from 2,216,824*l.* to 2,807,306*l.*; to Africa, from 449,364*l.* to 568,663*l.*; to Holland, from 741,886*l.* to 746,715*l.*; to Italy and Venice, from 618,817*l.* to 722,221*l.*; to Portugal and Madeira, from 578,951*l.* to 643,553*l.*; to Germany, from 431,223*l.* to 763,160*l.*; to Flanders, from 332,667*l.* to 386,054*l.*; to the Straits and Gibraltar, from 136,713*l.* to 250,228*l.*; to Russia, from 132,257*l.* to 278,054*l.*; to Denmark and Norway, from 97,034*l.* to 160,131*l.*; to France, from 87,164*l.* to 717,807*l.*; to Turkey, from 65,189*l.* to 73,026*l.*; to the East Country, from 62,996*l.* to 78,674*l.*; to Sweden, from 22,090*l.* to 41,575*l.* The only instance of decrease was in the exports to Spain and the Canaries, the value of which had declined from 878,066*l.* to 605,055*l.* On the whole, the average exports to the British dominions in Europe had risen from 1,063,327*l.* to 1,443,361*l.*; those to countries beyond Europe, from 5,093,639*l.* to 7,844,345*l.*; those to all foreign European countries, from 4,185,053*l.* to 5,466,253*l.*; making a total increase of from 10,342,019*l.* to 14,753,959*l.*, or of not much less than 50 per cent. in the eighteen years, the first eight of which had been years of war and only the last ten years of peace.

Another account shows the quantity of the shipping cleared outwards from Great Britain at the commencement, the middle, and the close of this period of eighteen years. On the average of the years 1772, '73, and '74, British 899,631 tons, foreign 66,443; total, 966,074; value of cargoes, 17,128,029*l.*: on the average of 1785, '86, and '87, British 1,156,306 tons, foreign 122,301; total, 1,278,607; value of cargoes, 16,429,497*l.*: on the average of 1790, '91, and '92, British 1,499,105 tons, foreign 169,684; total, 1,668,789; value of cargoes, 22,585,772*l.* In 1791 the entire quantity of shipping belonging to the British dominions consisted of 15,647 ships, measuring 1,511,401 tons, and manned by 117,113 hands; in 1792, of 16,079 ships, measuring 1,540,145 tons, and manned by 118,286 hands; in 1793, of 16,329 ships, measuring 1,564,520 tons, and manned by 118,952 hands. Of the ships in the last of these years, 10,779 belonged to England, 2122 to Scotland, 1181 to Ireland, 1889 to the colonies, 177 to the Isle of Man, 92 to Jersey, and 89 to Guernsey. The royal navy, which in 1760 amounted to 300,416 tons, had declined to 276,046 tons in 1774, but had risen to 433,239 tons in 1792; in which year it consisted of 7 first-rates, 21 second-rates, 112 third-rates, 21 fourth-rates, 103 fifth-rates, 42 sixth-rates, and 192 sloops, &c., making a total of 498 vessels of all kinds.*

As a final index of the increase of the commercial activity of the nation, and the general progress of our economical prosperity, during the interval between the war of the American and the war of the French revolution, we may notice the growth of the post-office revenue. Macpherson, in his 'Annals of Commerce,' has given a table, drawn up, in the latter part of it, under the direction of the secretary and accountant-general of the post-office, which exhibits both the gross and net annual revenue from 1783, and also presents a view of the history of the establishment from the earliest date. In 1652, according to this account, the revenues of the post-offices of England, Scotland, and Ireland were farmed for 10,000*l.* At this time there were only two rates of postage: 2*d.* for a letter carried not more than eighty miles; 3*d.* for one carried beyond that distance. In 1663 the post-office was farmed for 21,000*l.*; and in 1685 the revenue was estimated at 65,000*l.* This, however, was probably the gross revenue; for, on the average of the four years from 1707 to 1710 inclusive, the net annual revenue is stated to have been only 58,052*l.* In 1711 the rates of postage were augmented 50 per cent.; and on the average of the four years from 1711 to 1714 inclusive, the annual net revenue was 88,223*l.* for England and 2000*l.* for Scotland, or in all 90,223*l.* In 1722 the gross revenue was 201,804*l.*; but this included 33,398*l.* for franks, while the management or expenses of the establishment amounted to 70,396*l.*; so that the net revenue or actual produce was no more than 98,010*l.* For the year ending 5th April, 1755, the gross revenue was 210,663*l.*; but whether this included the rates that would have been chargeable on franks does not appear. The privilege of franking was considerably limited in 1764 (by the 4 Geo. III. c. 24); and in the year ending 5th April, 1765, the gross revenue of the post-office was 281,535*l.* In that ending 5th April, 1775, it was 345,321*l.* In 1783 the gross revenue was 416,668*l.*, the net produce 159,858*l.* In 1784 the privilege of franking was further limited (by the 24 Geo. III. sess. 2, c. 37), the rates of postage were raised, and the expenses were also reduced, as well as additional rapidity, punctuality, and security given to the conveyance of letters by the establishment of mail-coaches, and the other improvements in-introduced by Mr. Palmer.* For that year the gross revenue of the post-office was 438,734*l.*, the net produce 197,655*l.* In 1785 the gross revenue was 486,178*l.*, the net produce 265,679*l.* And from this point the returns continued steadily to increase, till in 1792 the gross revenue was 607,881*l.*, the net produce 368,784*l.*† This would indicate an augmentation of correspondence since 1784 to the extent of not much less than 40 per cent.

But this onward course, in which things had been proceeding so steadily for eight or nine years, was, towards the close of the year 1792, checked and brought to a stand-still at once. In the month of November in that year, the Gazette announced the unprecedented number of 105 bankruptcies. No such wide-spread commercial ruin had ever before been known in England in the worst of times. In the beginning of the eighteenth century the average number of bankruptcies in England was not 40 a-year. From 1710 to 1720 the number was as often considerably under as somewhat above 200. It was 415 in 1726, 446 in 1727, and 388 in 1728; but after these three years it again declined, till, in 1745, it was only 200, and in 1746 only 159; nor was it ever so high as 300 till the year 1764, when it was 301. It was 525 in 1772, and 562 in 1773; but in 1774 it fell again to 360. In 1778 the extraordinary number of 675 bankruptcies occurred; but, for the next six years, the average number was only about 500 annually. It rose gradually with the extension of trade; but, although it was 604 in 1791, the rate at which it proceeded for the first ten months of 1792 would not have made it more than 570 for the whole of that year. What occasioned the shock and panic in the public mind was, the suddenness with which the monthly number of bankruptcies mounted to 105 in November, from having been not so many as 50 per month, on an average, since the beginning of the year. The greatest number of bankruptcies that had ever before this occurred in one month was 83, which was the number in November, 1788.†

Referring to these facts, "we may see," observes Chalmers, "that the commencement of Queen Anne's war did not greatly incommode our traders. The bustle and business of her hostilities appear to have increased the number of bankrupts. The rebellion of 1715 seems to have made none. The South Sea year, 1720, appears to have involved our merchants in the burst of bubbles, though it was public rather than private credit which was chiefly affected during this unhappy year of visionary projects. Our bankruptcies now regularly increased with the augmentation of our trade. The rebellion of 1745 overturned none of our commercial houses. The war of 1756 seems to have done a little more mischief, though that mischief seems to have decreased as hostilities went on. The peace of 1763 augmented the number of bankruptcies, though the commercial distresses of that period seem to have been more in sound than in reality. With our traffic and business, our bankruptcies continued to increase in number and magnitude. We perceive how many they were augmented during 1772 and 1773, when our circulation was impeded at a moment of uncommon prosperity. * We see a smaller number of bankruptcies in 1781, when our trade was the most depressed during the American war, than in 1772 and 1773. The two most prosperous years which this nation had ever known were 1791 and 1792; yet, strange to tell, the number of our bankruptcies was larger than the amount of them in 1781, the most disastrous year of the American war."*

The alarm, however, excited by the large number of the bankruptcies which took place in November, 1792, did not arrive at its height till the spring of the following year. In December, 1792, the bankruptcies were only 47; but in January, 1793, the number was 77, in February 87, in March 105, in April 188, in May 209, in June 158, in July 108: thus, for the five months from March to July inclusive, making an average of about 154 a month, or at the rate of 1850 a year. The actual number of bankruptcies in the year 1793 was 1304, which was considerably more than twice the number that had happened in any preceding year, with the exception only of the year 1778, when rather more than half as many had happened.

Many of the houses that came down in this commercial storm of the spring and summer of 1793 were of old standing and great eminence; and their liabilities were of an amount proportioned to the extent to which their business had been carried on, and the confidence that had been universally reposed in their wealth and stability. Chalmers, who endeavours to show that the shock thus given to the system of the national credit and trade had nothing to do with the war between England and France, which, after having been for some time manifestly inevitable, broke out in the beginning of February in this year, has preserved some interesting details of the commencement and progress of the panic. "The first bankruptcy," he states, "which created suspicion, from its amount, was the failure of Donald and Burton, on the 15th of February, 1793. They were engaged in the most uncertain of all traffics—in the trade of corn—in speculations on American corn; but they had sustained no loss from the war. On Tuesday evening, the 19th of February, the Bank of England threw out the paper of Lane, Son, and Fraser, who had never recovered the shocks of the American war; and next morning they stopped payment, to the amount of almost a million of money. This great failure involved the fate of several very substantial traders; but none of these houses had sustained any damage from the war. Suspicion was now carried up to alarm; and every merchant and every banker who was concerned in the circulation of negotiable paper met with unusual obstructions in their daily business; yet it was not till the 16th of March that the long-established house of Burton, Forbes, and Gregory stopped, which was followed, on the 18th, by the failure of their correspondents, Caldwell and Company, of Liverpool, to the amount of nearly a million. Still, neither of these great circulators of paper had sustained any loss from the war; and, as suspicion had been carried up to alarm, alarm was now magnified into panic.* The real cause of the mischief Chalmers finds in the great number and reckless operations of the country banks, which within the last few years had risen in almost every market-town. Of 279 of these establishments, of which he had a list, no fewer than 204 issued what were called optional notes, that is, notes which the bank reserved to itself the option of paying either in London or in the country; and of these 71 stopped payment in this year, 1793. "Their notes," says Chalmers, "came oftener, and in greater numbers, to London, than were welcome in the shops of London. These notes became discredited, not only in proportion as the supply was greater than the demand for them, but as the banks were distant and unknown. The projects and arts by which those notes were pushed into the circle of trade were regarded with a very evil eye by those who, in this management, saw great imprudence in many, and a little fraudulence in some. When suspicion stalked out to create alarm, and alarm ran about to excite panic, more than 300 country banks in England sustained a shock; all were shaken; upwards of 100 stopped; some of which, however, afterwards went on in their usual course of punctual payments."† The entire number of country banks in England and Wales, at this time, has been variously stated at from 280 to above 400.‡ The bankrupts of the disastrous spring and summer of 1793 were chiefly, Chalmers asserts, country bankers and country traders. Few foreign merchants, he affirms, failed. Macpherson also agrees that the country banks, "which were multiplied greatly beyond the demand of the country, . . . and whose eagerness to push their notes into circulation had laid the foundation of their own misfortunes, were among the greatest sufferers, and consequently the greatest spreaders of distress and ruin among those connected with them." "And they were also," he adds, "the chief cause of the great drain of cash from the Bank of England, exceeding every demand of the kind for about ten years back."§

The table of the gross revenue from 1786 to 1793, in Chalmers's Historical View, p. 208, gives considerably smaller sums under each year: the difference is probably occasioned by the revenue of the Scotch post-office being included in the one account and not in the other. The statements of the gross revenue for 1784 and 1785, given in the preceding Book (vol. i. pp. 571, 572) must be understood as referring to England only.

quarters were made to the government; and at length, on Monday the 22nd of April, Mr. Pitt called together a number of gentlemen, at his house, to take their opinion as to a proposition for the revival of commercial credit, and the restoration of confidence by a parliamentary advance of exchequer bills to parties possessed of real capital.* There was much disunion and difference of opinion at this meeting; but in the end it was agreed that eleven of the leading merchants present, being principally those who had expressed the greatest difficulties in seeing their way to any remedy for the universally admitted evil, should assemble again on the following day at the Mansion-House, to take the plan submitted by the minister into further consideration. At this second meeting it was, after another long discussion, unanimously agreed, "that the interposition of parliament was necessary, and that an issue of exchequer bills, under certain regulations and stipulations, was the best practicable remedy." A representation to this effect having been drawn up, a copy of it was immediately laid before Mr. Pitt, who lost no time in calling the attention of the House of Commons to the subject; and on the 25th, on his motion, a select committee was appointed, "to take into consideration the present state of commercial credit, and to report their opinion and observations thereupon to the House." The report of the committee was brought up by the chairman (the Lord Mayor) on the 29th. It embodied a statement which had been made to the committee by the chancellor of the exchequer (Pitt), to the effect that, according to representations which had been made to him from many different quarters, the failures which had taken place had begun by a run on those houses which had issued circulating paper without being possessed of sufficient capital, but the consequences had soon extended themselves so far as to affect many houses of great solidity, and possessed of funds much more than sufficient ultimately to answer all demands upon them, although these funds could not be converted into money or negotiable securities in time to meet the pressure of the moment. The mere sudden discredit of the paper issued by many of the country banks, Pitt went on to observe, had of itself produced a deficiency of the circulating medium, occasioning material inconvenience in mercantile transactions. Then, in addition to this, the circumstances in which they were placed had induced bankers and others to keep in their hands greater quantities of money than usual, so that large sums were in this way kept out of circulation, and much difficulty was experienced in procuring the usual advances on bills of exchange; particularly on those of long date. Finally, many persons possessed of large stocks of goods could at the present moment neither dispose of them nor raise money on their credit; in consequence of which the usual orders to manufacturers were interrupted, and numbers of their working people, thrown out of employment. It is said that many of the workmen who were discharged and thrown idle at this crisis enlisted in the army, and many others emigrated to foreign countries.* The statement made by the chancellor of the exchequer, the report proceeded to relate, was borne out by facts which several members of the committee mentioned as having fallen under their personal information. Mr. Thornton, for instance, was acquainted with the situation of five or six mercantile houses, possessed of quantities of goods abundantly sufficient to cover their liabilities, but which they could neither sell nor convert into money, so that they were under very great apprehension of being shortly obliged to stop payment. He had been lately appointed a trustee for winding up the affairs of a London firm, with extensive connexions in the country, which, after suspending payments for three weeks, had been enabled to pay its acceptances, and within a twelvemonth would discharge all its debts, and probably find itself in possession of a surplus of 100,000*l.* Other cases of a similar kind were mentioned by Mr. Alderman Anderson and Mr. Chiswell. Mr. Gilbert Innes, a director of the Royal Bank of Scotland, being examined by the committee, stated that that country was in very great distress—that the two chartered banks there would not be able much longer, with prudence to themselves, to furnish the necessary accommodation and support either to different mercantile and manufacturing establishments or to the country banks; and consequently, if something was not immediately done by government, a very general commercial ruin might be expected, involving many houses of undoubtedly ample means. The distress which threatened the Scotch manufacturers arose not so much, in Mr. Innes's opinion, from a failure of the usual markets for their goods, as from the difficulty of discounting, either in London or in Scotland, the long-dated bills received from the purchasers of their goods. Great quantities of manufactured goods belonging to Scotch manufacturers were then in London, which used when sold to be paid for in bills at three months for a small part, and at from six to fourteen months for the rest, but which now either remained unsold or were disposed of at a loss for cash, in consequence of the long-dated bills not being negotiable. The Scotch manufacturers frequently borrowed money for the purposes of their business on personal bonds, a great part of which money had been called for at Whitsunday next (the 15th of May); and from the state of credit in Scotland this witness had reason to think that the manufacturers would not, as usual, be able to answer this call by borrowing again on their former securities. Innes believed that the quantity of paper circulated by the country banks in Scotland had of late been considerably diminished, and their discounts on bills of exchange greatly so since the present troubles began; but the circulation of the metropolitan bank with which he was connected was, he stated, nearly the same as usual, and the assistance given by it to the country greatly superior to what it had given at any former period. Mr. Macdowal, member for Glasgow, and also a member of the committee, stated that he had just returned from that city, where he had found "all the commercial houses and manufacturers in the greatest distress, from the late stagnation of commercial credit and total want of private confidence." The banks at Glasgow, Paisley, and Greenock had not for some time past discounted to any extent, from their notes being poured in upon them for gold, and from the alarm which the state of credit in London had occasioned. In Glasgow, Paisley, and the places connected with them in different parts of Scotland, there were about 160,000 men, women, and children dependent for employment upon the manufacturers; and in Glasgow a very great number of these working-people had been already discharged. Looking to the whole case, the committee came unanimously to the conclusion that it was advisable to adopt the plan which had been proposed, of assisting houses possessed of sufficient means, and which could give the necessary security, by advances of public money; and the report recommended that the amount of exchequer bills to be issued for this purpose should be 5,000,000*l.* instead of 3,000,000*l.*, as originally suggested. When the report was read in the House, a short debate took place on the question that it should be referred to a committee of the whole House on the following day. Fox said that he did not feel disposed to give his consent to the proposed measure, but yet he confessed, under the present circumstances of the country, he wanted nerves to give it a decided opposition. "It seemed to him a business of a very anomalous nature, nor had he ever heard of a system in any shape similar having been hitherto adopted or thought of." Both he and Mr. Grey also objected to the unconstitutional influence and control which the plan would enable the government to exercise over the commerce of the country; and they urged that, if the proposed advances of money to parties in difficulty really were expedient, they ought to be left to be made by the Bank, whose proper business it was to lend money to all who could offer it sufficient security. On the next day, the 30th, the subject was again warmly discussed, when Fox reiterated his objections at greater length, and was supported by Francis, and M. A. Taylor; but nobody ventured formally to move a negative to Pitt's proposition, that his majesty should be enabled to direct exchequer bills, to the amount of 5,000,000*l.*, to be issued to commissioners, to be by them advanced, under certain regulations and restrictions, for the assistance and accommodation of such persons as should be desirous of receiving the same, on due security being given for the repayment of the sum so advanced within a time to be limited. The minister and his friends expressed perfect confidence in the efficacy of the measure, if it should be only brought into operation without any considerable delay. Pitt said "that, from the nature of the business, the Bank had declined interfering, because the species of the security to be given was not such as the Bank had been accustomed to receive. The measure now proposed was of a temporary nature. The practice of the Bank upon discount was permanent. The Bank took securities for what business they transacted in this way at two months. The security to be given here was not determinable at that time, and the deposit was of a nature which the Bank had not been accustomed to act upon." The resolution having been agreed to, it was reported to the House the next day, and a bill pursuant to it brought in, which underwent some discussion two days after on the motion for committing it, but was carried triumphantly through all its stages. The advances, which were to bear interest at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ per day on the 100*l.*, and were to be in sums of not less than 4000*l.*, were authorised to be made on security approved by the commissioners, or on the deposit of goods of double the value of the sums advanced, to be lodged in warehouses, to the satisfaction of the commissioners, if in London, or of the principal officers of the customs or excise, if in Bristol, Hull, Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, or Leith.

It is admitted on all hands that the effect of this measure was immediate and powerful. "The very first intimation," says Macpherson, "of the intention of the legislature to support the merchants operated all over the country like a charm, and in a great degree superseded the necessity of the relief by an almost instantaneous restoration of mutual confidence."* The entire number of applications for advances out of the 5,000,000*l.* granted by parliament was 332; and the entire amount applied for was only 3,855,624*l.* The applications by 45 parties for 1,215,000*l.* of this sum were afterwards withdrawn or not persisted in; and 49 applications, for 438,324*l.*, were rejected, as not coming within the intention of the act, or from the inability of the parties to give the required security; so that the whole amount that was actually advanced was 2,202,200*l.*, to 238 applicants. According to an account printed by Chalmers, the following were nearly the sums granted to the different parts of the kingdom:—To London, 989,700*l.*; to Glasgow, 319,730*l.*; to Manchester, 246,500*l.*; to Liverpool, 137,020*l.*; to Bristol, 41,500*l.*; to Leith, 25,750*l.*; to Paisley, 31,000*l.*; to Dundee, 16,000*l.*; to Edinburgh, Perth, and Banff, 4000*l.* each; and to other places, 310,000*l.*† (or rather 383,000*l.*, if we are to account for the distribution of the entire amount advanced). Of the 2,202,000*l.* every farthing was repaid, together with interest amounting to 13,033*l.* (or 4348*l.* beyond the expenses of management); and of the 238 persons who were assisted, only two became bankrupt. Long before the end of the year confidence was perfectly restored, and the facility of raising money both in London and in the country had become as great as it usually is in a healthy state of the commercial system. The bankruptcies announced in the Gazette for the last five months of the year 1793 were only at the rate of about $\frac{7}{10}$ a month, or not half as many as the preceding five months had produced.

In Scotland, Chalmers affirms, the commercial distress during this crisis, though great, was much less than in England. Adam Smith has given an account of the act of parliament passed in 1765 (the 5 Geo. III. c. 49) which suppressed the ten and five shilling bank-notes till then circulated in Scotland, and also what were there called optional notes, that is, notes containing a clause by which the bank "promised payment to the bearer, either as soon as the note should be presented, or, in the option of the directors, six months after such presentment, together with the legal interest for the said six months." "The directors of some of those banks," continues Smith, "sometimes took advantage of this optional clause, and sometimes threatened those who demanded gold and silver in exchange for a considerable number of their notes, that they would take advantage of it unless such demanders would content themselves with a part of what they demanded. The promissory notes of those banking companies constituted at that time the far greater part of the currency of Scotland, which this uncertainty of payment necessarily degraded below the value of gold and silver money. During the continuance of this abuse (which prevailed chiefly in 1762, 1763, and 1764), while the exchange between London and Carlisle was at par, that between London and Dumfries would sometimes be 4 per cent. against Dumfries, though this town is not thirty miles distant from Carlisle."* The Act of 1765 at once restored the exchange between England and Scotland to its natural state; and Chalmers attributes to the greater circumspection introduced from that era into the banking system of the latter country much of the comparative stability which it was now found to possess. The following account is given in a letter which he quotes from a Glasgow correspondent:—"The distress began to be felt here in a few days after it began in London in the month of February last; but we had no failures till the 28th of March, when the banking-house of Murdoch, Robertson, and Co. were made bankrupts for about 115,000*l.* This was followed by the banking-house of A. G. and A. Thompsons, who owed about 47,000*l.* The first will pay every shilling to their creditors; and it is supposed that the last will do so also. One or two more of the country banks in the west of Scotland were under temporary difficulties, but made no pause; and, having got assistance, they went on; and, as all the other banks did, drew in their funds and lessened their engagements. Some of the banks here did certainly continue to discount some bills, but in a less degree than formerly. All of † Historical View, p. 232. Chalmers says that the account is, he believes, sufficiently accurate to show to what parts of the country the principal relief was granted.

the banks were under the necessity of allowing many of such bills as they held to be renewed at two or three months' date, either in whole or in part, according to circumstances, which, in fact, was the same thing as a new discount. In this way all our banks have been going on to this hour, by making renewals when they could not obtain payment, endeavouring to lessen the amount at every renewal, so as gradually to draw in their funds."* It is pretty evident from this statement, however, that the utmost the generality of the Scotch banks were able or even attempted to do was to take care of themselves; the accommodation which they had been accustomed to give to the public appears to have been all at once, not merely restricted, but entirely withdrawn.

Chalmers conceives that the increase in the number of bankruptcies which took place in 1792 and 1793 was, in great part at least, a natural consequence of the extraordinary commercial activity and prosperity of the preceding eight or nine years; and to illustrate this view of the matter he refers to a statement made by Lord Kaimes, which in his lordship's own words is as follows:—"In Scotland, an innocent bankrupt, imprisoned for debt, obtains liberty by a process called cessio bonorum. From the year 1694 to 1744 there were but twenty-four processes of that kind; which shows how languidly trade was carried on while the people remained still ignorant of their advantages by the Union. From that time to the year 1771 there have been thrice that number every year, taking one year with another; an evident proof of the late rapid progress of commerce in Scotland. Every one is roused to venture his small stock, though every one cannot be successful."† That is to say, apparently, that, while the average number of bankruptcies in Scotland during the half century ending with 1744 was not quite one in the two years, the average number in the next quarter of a century was seventy-two annually, or a hundred and forty-four times as many as before. Of course, where there is no trade there can be no bankruptcies; and a busy and extending trade, with its elements of speculation and adventure, will produce more than its due proportion of bankruptcies, as compared with a trade which neither overflows its old channels nor seeks new ones. If bankruptcies really increased in Scotland after 1744 at the rate Kaimes seems to assert, the commerce of the country must have begun from that epoch not only to extend itself rapidly beyond its ancient limits, but altogether to change its character. The natural growth and expansion of the commercial system of England may be held sufficient to account for the gradual augmentation in the annual number of bankruptcies from 1762, for example, when it was 205, to 1792, when it was 628—or the prosperity of the seven years from 1784 to 1791 may of itself have been enough to raise the number in that interval from 517 to 604;

but it must have been something else than this constantly operating cause which suddenly more than doubled it two years after. If, indeed, the prosperity was in a great degree only apparent or hollow, it would be easy to understand how the crash should have been the greater the longer it was deferred—how the downfall of the house of cards should have made the more wide-spread ruin the higher it had been raised. And this appears to have actually been the case in so far as the system of trade which had arisen was kept up by a paper currency not representing any real capital. Such support is like that given to the physical system of an individual by alcohol or opium.

Another consolatory view which Chalmers takes is, that this crisis was upon the whole certainly productive of more good than evil. This is explained in a passage which he gives from another letter of his Glasgow correspondent, written in the end of the year 1793:—"The truth is, that most of us are of opinion that the late stagnation has been exceedingly useful to our trade; and that, if it does not proceed too far, it will be attended with the most beneficial consequences to men of real capital. For previous thereto the sales were so rapid, the returns so quick, and money so abundant, that much business was established upon little better than mere paper circulation, or speculation alone, which is now at an end. The wages of our labourers, too, had got to such a height, that we must in all probability have been gradually undermined in foreign markets by foreign manufacturers; and, if this had once occurred, it would have been much more difficult to recover from than any temporary shock like the present. Besides, these high wages occasioned much idleness and dissipation; and much of the time of our workmen was consequently spent in alehouses, where they became politicians and government-mongers, restless and discontented. Upon the whole, therefore, we may say with truth, that all which has hitherto happened has been for the best."* All this, however, only goes to show that the storm that cleared the atmosphere was needed for that purpose—not that the destruction it wrought was a good thing in itself.

This storm, however, which had almost wrecked the commerce and navigation of England, Chalmers considers to have, even at the time, very little deranged the trade of Scotland. The total official value of the exports from Scotland, which had been 1,170,076*l.* in 1789, and 1,230,884*l.* in 1792, was in 1793 only brought down to 1,024,751*l.* Of the shipping of that country the entire tonnage, which was 154,409 tons in 1790, and 157,098 in 1791, was 154,857 in 1792, and 155,315 in 1793. The quantity of linen cloth manufactured in Scotland for sale, which was 18,739,725 yards in 1791, rose to 21,065,386 in 1792, and was still 20,676,620 in 1793. From these facts this writer infers "that the commercial affairs of Scotland were little embarrassed by the impeded circulation in 1793, and still less by the commencement of war." "And," he concludes, "I am inclined to believe that, had not any unusual bankruptcies happened in England during 1793 from the imprudent management of country banks, her trade and shipping had been little lessened by sudden hostilities."*

* Historical View, p. 233.

The history of our foreign trade during the war will be most conveniently and distinctly traced by taking first and by itself the space of four years that elapsed before the suspension of cash payments by the Bank. In the year 1793, the last of the peace, the official value of the total imports into Great Britain, as we have seen, was 19,659,358*l.*; that of the exports thence to all parts of the world, 24,905,200*l.*† For the first four years of the war the annual imports and exports are stated to have been as follow:—in 1793, imports 19,255,116*l.*, exports 20,388,828*l.*; in 1794, imports 22,276,915*l.*, exports 26,748,083*l.*; in 1795, imports 22,736,889*l.*, exports 27,123,338*l.*; in 1796, imports 23,187,319*l.*, exports 30,518,913*l.* So that, with the exception of the first year of hostilities only, our trade would appear, by these accounts, to have been not only steadily progressive during this space, but to have advanced at a much more rapid rate than even in the previous season of peace. From 1793 to 1796, taking imports and exports together, the augmentation is made to have amounted to not less than 36 per cent., or more than one-third, which was very nearly double the augmentation that took place in the three years from 1789 to 1792.

The statement of the tonnage of the ships entered inward and cleared outward, however, in these four years scarcely bears out these accounts of imports and exports. The tonnage of the ships entered inward in 1792, was, as stated in a preceding page, 1,891,711 tons; of those cleared outward, 1,739,300.‡ For the four following years the amounts, as they are to be collected from the official tables, were—in 1793, inward 1,675,327 tons, outward 1,427,234; in 1794, inward 1,786,091, outward 1,600,817; in 1795, inward 1,632,815, outward 1,528,017; in 1796, inward 1,995,018, outward 1,632,984. According to this indication the entire increase of trade from 1793 to 1796 would be only about 16 per cent. Still, this account also establishes the fact that there was an increase, and one of considerable amount.§ The net revenue of the customs, which had been 4,027,230*l.* in 1792, was 3,978,645*l.* in 1793, 3,565,117*l.* in 1794, 3,569,560*l.* in 1794, 3,651,757*l.* in 1795, and 4,111,105*l.* in 1796. But, for the reasons already explained, very little can be made of this last series of figures as an index of the progress of our foreign trade.*

The effect of the commencement of hostilities with France, of course, was at once to extinguish nearly the whole of the large and growing trade which had for some years been carried on directly between the two countries, under the treaty of 1786. The treaty itself was at an end; and to the natural difficulties interposed by the war were added positive prohibitions by the one power against the exportation of almost every species of goods which the other would receive, and the importation of nearly everything which the other would allow to leave its dominions. The trade, accordingly, in so far at least as indicated by the entries at the Custom-house, was speedily reduced to a very small matter. In 1792, as we have seen, our imports from France were valued at 717,634*l.*, our exports thither at 1,228,165*l.* In 1793 the imports are stated in the accounts of the inspector-general at 121,027*l.*, the exports at 228,887*l.*; in 1794, the imports at 167*l.*, the exports at 34,543*l.*; in 1795, the imports at 10,362*l.*, the exports at 78,652*l.*; in 1796, the imports at 14,655*l.*, the exports at 7,975*l.* No doubt, however, the actual trade continued to be much greater than it would appear to have been from these figures: considerable quantities of British manufactured goods, in particular, are known to have throughout the war constantly found their way into the dominions of France, in violation and defiance, for the greater part, of the laws of both countries.

Flanders, or the Netherlands, had been overrun by France, and wrested from the possession of the house of Austria, before the war with England began; yet for some years our trade with the Flemings still continues to make a large figure in the annual official accounts. Our imports from Flanders, which in 1792 had amounted to 132,289*l.*, are still set down in 1793 at 120,180*l.*, and in 1794 at 76,820*l.*; and our exports thither, which in 1792 had been 1,031,092*l.*, only fell to 776,189*l.* in 1793, and to 671,882 in 1794. Up to this time the Netherlands appear to have been still regarded by the English government as part of the dominions of our ally, the emperor; and the customary amount of the exports and imports was only reduced by the French occupation of the country, and perhaps its still unsettled or uneasy state under its new masters. In 1795, however, the trade with Flanders, having been generally prohibited and declared illegal, disappears from the inspector-general's returns as completely as the trade with France: the imports for that year are fact the amount of foreign (under which is included colonial) merchandise exported in 1796, as stated in the official account, exhibits no remarkable increase upon its amount for some years preceding. It is 10,022,680*l.* in 1794, 10,785,125*l.* in 1795, and 11,416,693*l.* in 1796. And the next year the increase was still greater than this.

§ In the chronological account given by Chalmers (Historical View, opposite to p. 315), the tonnage of the ships cleared outward in 1796 is made 1,732,980 tons. The excess of about 100,000 tons over the amount to be collected from the detailed account of Macpherson (Annals of Commerce, iv. 400), is on the British ships: both statements agree in making the tonnage of the foreign ships cleared outward 478,358 tons. If we follow this statement of the shipping in Chalmers, the augmentation of trade thereby indicated in the three years from 1793 to 1796 would be above 20 per cent. The accuracy of the official account of exports for 1796 was, it seems, objected to in the House of Commons, and, when a member pointed out particularly the article of coffee, as stated to be exported to the incredible value of 6,000,000*l.*, Mr. Pitt allowed that there might be a mistake in that article (Macpherson, Annals of Commerce, iv. 381, note). But in set down at only 4,287*l.*, the exports at only 13,508*l.* In 1796 the imports were 7,067*l.*, the exports 65,054*l.* This slight improvement, which was maintained and extended in subsequent years, is to be attributed to a proclamation by the king in council, which was issued in the beginning of September in that year, permitting all kinds of British and foreign merchandize, except military and naval stores, to be exported from Great Britain in vessels belonging to any friendly power, to the Netherlands, and also to Holland and any part of Italy. "The Dutch government," Macpherson states, "considering this indulgence as a scheme for draining their country of its ready money, issued a counter-proclamation, in the strongest terms enjoining their countrymen not to engage, in such a trade, and strictly prohibiting the entry of British goods in their ports. They also required the French republic to adopt a similar resolution. But the French, though they had already prohibited the importation of British manufactures, finding it convenient to wink at a clandestine importation of them, were unwilling to follow the example of their allies in enforcing a strict adherence to a line of conduct, which, it is said, they themselves recommended to them. At last, on the Dutch threatening to withdraw their prohibition, the French government not only prohibited the importation of British merchandize, but also ordered that all British goods which were already in the country should be exported, and that all persons attempting to evade the prohibition should be stigmatized in the public papers as brokers of England and destroyers of French industry."* The effect of this prohibition, which had been for some time threatened or apprehended, although it was not issued till the 2nd of November, 1796, may be partly seen in the insignificant amount, as just stated, of our exports to France in that year.

The first foreign state, after France, our commercial intercourse with which was in like manner all but annihilated by the war, was Holland, which was conquered by the French in the early part of the year 1795. In 1792, the official value of our imports from Holland had been 801,534*l.*, that of our exports thither 1,516,449*l.*† In 1793 the imports are set down at 806,305*l.*, the exports at 1,616,782*l.*; and in 1794 the imports had increased to 1,013,351*l.*, the exports to 1,640,915*l.* But in 1795 the imports were only 119,586*l.*, the exports only 111,115*l.* In 1796, however, the imports, according to the official account, had risen again to 309,933*l.*, and the exports to 516,267*l.*

In the course of the same year 1795, France, on the 5th of April, concluded a treaty of peace and alliance with Prussia, and on the 23rd of July, a similar treaty with Spain, which latter power, on the 5th of October, 1796, further declared war against England. On the 1st of March, 1795, also, the Duke of Tuscany had proclaimed his secession from the coalition against the French republic; in the summer of the same year the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel had made peace with France; and in the course of 1796 the King of Sardinia, the Duke of Parma, the Duke of Modena, the Pope, the King of Naples, and all the other princes and states of Italy, as well as some of those of Germany, had been forced to follow these examples. "The French government," observes Macpherson, "in their treaties with all those powers stipulated the most favourable terms for the commerce of France; and they expressly insisted on an exclusion of British vessels from their ports as the condition of their pacification with some of them. As they rightly considered the British commerce as the feeder and support of the war, they took possession of the port of Leghorn, the capital station of the British trade in the Mediterranean sea, and seized all the British property found in it. The ports of all the continent of Europe were now shut against the admission of British merchandise by authority of their sovereigns, except the British port of Gibraltar, those of Turkey, Portugal, Germany, and the three northern powers."

On the other hand, in the course of these first four years of the war, various acquisitions were made by Great Britain beyond the boundaries of Europe. In 1793 we took from the French the island of Tobago in the West Indies (15th April), and Pondicherry, Chandernagore, and all their other settlements in the East Indies. In March and April, 1794, the French West India islands of Martinique, St. Lucie, and Guadaloupe, with its dependencies, surrendered to Sir John Jervis and Sir Charles Grey; and, though Guadaloupe was retaken by the French in December following, and St. Lucie in July, 1795, the latter was recovered in May, 1796. From the Dutch, again, we took Malacca, Ceylon, and the Cape of Good Hope, in the latter part of 1795, and Amboyna and Demerara in the spring of the year following. Within Europe, also, we acquired, in June, 1794, the sovereignty of Corsica, which we held till the beginning of the year 1797. These changes ought to be kept in mind in reviewing the progress of our foreign trade for the first four years after the commencement of the war.

By comparing the account of imports and exports for the year 1796 with that for 1792, it appears that, in addition to France, Holland, and Flanders, already mentioned, the only foreign countries our trade with which suffered any diminution during this interval were the following:—

ITALY (exclusive of Venice):—from which the imports were 1,004,288*l.* in 1792, and only 299,796*l.* in 1796; and to which the exports were 946,119*l.* in 1792, and 747,969*l.* in 1796.

SPAIN:—the imports from which were 897,839*l.* in 1792, and 809,880*l.* in 1796; the exports to which were 794,101*l.* in 1792, and 546,125*l.* in 1796.

* Annals of Commerce, iv. 380.

† See ante, p. 633.

 Annals of Commerce, iv. 381.

PORTUGAL AND MADEIRA:—from which the imports were 977,819*l.* in 1792, and 677,772*l.* in 1796; and the exports to which were 754,622*l.* in 1792, and 876,000*l.* in 1796.

TURKEY AND EGYPT:—from which the imports were 290,599*l.* in 1792, and 150,182*l.* in 1796; and the exports to which were 273,785*l.* in 1792, and 155,510*l.* in 1796.

AFRICA (including Sierra Leone and the Cape of Good Hope):—the imports from which were 82,912*l.* in 1792, and 120,396*l.* in 1796; but the exports to which were 1,367,918*l.* in 1792, and only 614,307*l.* in 1796.

In none of these cases, however, was the decrease of any considerable amount, except only in the imports from Italy and the exports to Africa; and, although our trade with Portugal, Turkey, and Africa may have been depressed by the state of things arising out of the war, we were in no degree shut out by the war from our customary intercourse with those parts of the world.

There was, indeed, likewise some slight falling off in the following branches of the trade carried on between Great Britain and the other portions or dependencies of the empire:—

BRITISH AMERICA:—from which the imports were 255,797*l.* in 1792, and 268,776*l.* in 1796; but to which the exports were 1,119,991*l.* in 1792, and only 1,017,620*l.* in 1796.

GIBRALTAR (with the Straits):—the imports from which were 13,153*l.* in 1792, and 28,593*l.* in 1796; but the exports to which were 197,224*l.* in 1792, and only 141,936*l.* in 1796.

ISLE OF MAN:—from which the imports were 27,342*l.* in 1792, and 31,310*l.* in 1796; but the exports to which were 37,527*l.* in 1792, and only 36,446*l.* in 1796.

But all this—the nearly entire loss of the trade with France and the Netherlands, the great diminution of that with Holland and that with Italy, the decrease in that with Spain and the more considerable falling off in that with Africa, the insignificant decline in that with Portugal and that with Turkey, and the other still more trifling differences, of a merely accidental or temporary kind, which turn up against 1796 on a comparison of the two years—is much more than counterbalanced by the gain in the following cases:—

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:—imports from, 1,038,706*l.* in 1792, 2,080,970*l.* in 1796; exports to, 4,271,418*l.* in 1792, 6,054,238*l.* in 1796.

RUSSIA:—imports from, 1,708,670*l.* in 1792, 2,110,083*l.* in 1796; exports to, 800,761*l.* in 1792, 766,896*l.* in 1796.

GERMANY:—imports from, 650,436*l.* in 1792, 2,082,275*l.* in 1796; exports to, 2,139,110*l.* in 1792, 8,173,989*l.* in 1796.

PRUSSIA AND POLAND:—imports from, 603,933*l.* in 1792, 1,304,386*l.* in 1796; exports to, 167,036*l.* in 1792, 596,379*l.* in 1796.

DENMARK AND NORWAY:—imports from, 186,648*l.* in 1792, 243,928*l.* in 1796; exports to, 312,720*l.* in 1792, 509,783*l.* in 1796.

SWEDEN:—imports from, 338,669*l.* in 1792, 347,336*l.* in 1796.

VENICE:—imports from, 65,331*l.* in 1792, 75,257*l.* in 1796; exports to, 17,112*l.* in 1792, 25,882*l.* in 1796.

CANARIES:—imports from, 10,222*l.* in 1792, 15,751*l.* in 1796; exports to, 17,277*l.* in 1792, 16,724*l.* in 1796.

FOREIGN WEST INDIES:—imports from, 280,484*l.* in 1792, 356,481*l.* in 1796; exports to, 106,623*l.* in 1792, 107,328*l.* in 1796.

BRITISH WEST INDIES:—imports from, 4,128,047*l.* in 1792, 4,541,217*l.* in 1796; exports to, 2,784,310*l.* in 1792, 3,954,816*l.* in 1796.

EAST INDIES and other parts of Asia:—imports from, 2,701,433*l.* in 1792, 3,372,689*l.* in 1796; exports to, 2,425,947*l.* in 1792, 2,358,707*l.* in 1796.

NEW HOLLAND and Southern Whale Fishery:—imports from, 114*l.* in 1792, 0*l.* in 1796; exports to, 11,940*l.* in 1792, 18,669*l.* in 1796.

GREENLAND and Northern Whale Fishery:—imports from, 63,777*l.* in 1792, 106,867*l.* in 1796; exports to, 695*l.* in 1792, 358*l.* in 1796.

IRELAND:—imports from, 2,622,732*l.* in 1792, 2,764,877*l.* in 1796; exports to, 2,372,866*l.* in 1792, 2,897,069*l.* in 1796.

GUERNSEY and other Channel Islands:—imports from, 58,852*l.* in 1792, 228,979*l.* in 1796; exports to, 92,130*l.* in 1792, 196,631*l.* in 1796.

In some of these instances it is easy to see that the increase was partly the consequence of the stoppage or diminution of the trade with some other country. Thus, no doubt, the commerce which had formerly been carried on directly with Holland, the Netherlands, and Italy, was now in part carried on indirectly through Germany and Prussia. In other cases a freer intercourse than formerly had been promoted, or sought to be promoted, by special arrangements or treaties of commerce.

A commercial treaty, which had been concluded with Russia in 1766, after having been allowed by the Russian government to expire, was renewed for six years in 1793; but no sooner had this been done than an imperial ukase was issued (on the 8th of April) absolutely prohibiting the importation of many of the principal articles of British manufacture, such as wrought iron of all sorts, wrought copper, gilt and plated ware, watches, coaches, striped and flowered casimirs, spagnolettes, and plushes, gauzes, and all ribands of more than one colour; and this was followed (on the 13th of December) by the prohibition of all other striped or woollen goods. "The consequence of these edicts," says Macpherson, "was, that many of the Russian merchants were reduced to bankruptcy, or obliged to return the goods they had purchased, instead of making the stipulated payment, to the importers, who in vain applied to the empress to restore the duties they had paid for the right of selling the goods in her dominions; so that prodigiously heavy losses fell upon the British merchants, the very best customers of Russia, and upon the British manufacturers, who had put goods suitable for the Russian market in hand in a dependence on receiving the customary orders for them. It is difficult to account for this conduct of the wise and magnanimous Catherine. She could not intend to depress the British manufactures in favour of those of France, for she had already cut off all communication with that country; and, if she proposed by the prohibition of such goods to encourage or push forward the manufacture of such articles in her own dominions, the measure was at least premature.* At this time more than half of the entire foreign trade of Russia was with Great Britain. Of 800 foreign (besides 48 Russian) vessels which arrived at St. Petersburg in 1793, no fewer than 536 were British, as were 542 of 877 which in the same year cleared outwards from that port. Although, however, the prohibitory regulations of the government of Russia appear to have for a time checked or somewhat diminished the importation of British manufactures into that empire, the trade between the two countries in Russian produce, as we have seen, went on increasing, and giving every year more employment to British shipping. And at last, in February, 1797, a new commercial treaty was concluded between the two countries, to last till 1807.

But the most important treaty of commerce the account of which belongs to the space of time now under review was that concluded with the United States of America. In the beginning of November, 1793, with the view of preventing the importation by the French of the produce of their West India islands, which, after the commencement of the war, was managed by the produce being first sent to the continent of America, and thence conveyed to France in the neutral vessels of the United States, an order of the king in council was issued for seizing and detaining all vessels carrying either any produce of the French colonies, or provisions or other supplies for the use of those colonies. It is said that so many as 600 American vessels were seized or detained in English ports, under this order, between the 6th of November, 1793, and the 28th of March following; and it spread the greatest alarm among the merchants connected with the United States, who declared their apprehension that it would occasion an immediate rupture with that country. The American government, also, soon took up the matter, and, after having, on the 26th of March, 1794, laid an embargo for thirty days on all British vessels in their ports, dispatched Mr. Jay, as envoy extraordinary to the Court of St. James's, to demand redress. Upon this the order in council was revoked; and negotiations were entered upon, in a conciliatory spirit, which ended in the conclusion of a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between the two countries. Of this treaty the following were the most material articles:—The river Mississippi (in conformity with a similar arrangement in the treaty of peace of 1783) was declared to be entirely open to the subjects of both governments, who might equally use all the landing-places on its east side. Provision was made for ascertaining and settling, by a joint survey and amicable negotiation, the northern boundary of the territory of the United States, between the Lake of the Woods and the river Mississippi (the still undetermined division of the Oregon country). It was also agreed that commissioners should be appointed on both sides to determine which of the branches of the river St. Croix ought to be fixed as the boundary between the British provinces in the north-east and the United States (the question, or equivalent of the question, that has only just been settled). The 10th article ran as follows:—"Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares nor moneys which they may have in the public funds or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or national differences, be sequestered or confiscated; it being unjust and impolitic that debts and engagements, contracted and made by individuals having confidence in each other, should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority, on account of national differences and discontents." A reciprocal and entirely perfect liberty of navigation and commerce being mutually agreed upon, it was arranged that during the continuance of the war, and for two years after its termination, the citizens of the United States might carry, in vessels of their own not exceeding the burthen of 70 tons, to the British West Indies, all such produce or manufactures of the United States as could be lawfully carried from the States to the islands by British vessels; and also that the American vessels might carry back from the islands to the States all such West Indian produce as British vessels might carry to the same quarter; the same duties being levied by each government upon the ships of the one country as upon those of the other engaged in this trade. The United States, however, engaged to prohibit the carriage, in American vessels, of molasses, sugar, coffee, cacao, or cotton (the produce of the British West Indies, it must, apparently, be understood, although it is not so expressed), either from the islands or from the United States to any other part of the world. The liberty of trading in the ports of the British territories in the East Indies was granted to American vessels, the government of the United States engaging that such vessels should carry the goods brought away by them from India to no part of the world but their own ports in America. By the 15th article it was agreed that no higher duties should be charged in the ports of either country upon vessels belonging to the other than were paid by the like vessels or merchandise of all other nations. "Nor," continued the article, "shall any prohibition be imposed upon the exportation or importation of any articles to or from the territories of the two parties respectively which shall not equally extend to all other nations. But the British government reserves to itself the right of imposing on American vessels entering into the British ports in Europe a tonnage duty equal to that which shall be payable by British vessels in the ports of America; and also such duty as may be adequate to countervail the difference of duty now payable on the importation of European and Asiatic goods when imported into the United States in British or in American vessels." Both parties further agreed to treat for a more exact equalization of duties. If a vessel should be taken or detained on suspicion of having enemy's property on board, or of carrying to an enemy any contraband articles, it was stipulated that only the illegal portion of the cargo should be condemned and made prize of. * By the 21st article the two governments bound themselves not to permit their subjects or citizens to accept commissions from the enemies of the other, nor to permit such enemies to enlist any of their subjects or citizens into the military service; any subject or citizen found acting contrary to this article being made punishable as a pirate. And by subsequent articles they agreed that neither would permit privateers commissioned by the enemies of the other either to arm or to trade in their ports; nor would either allow a vessel belonging to the other to be taken within any of its bays, or within cannon-shot of its coasts. In case of a rupture between the two countries, the subjects or citizens of the one residing in the dominions of the other were to have the privilege of remaining and continuing their trade, so long as they committed no offence against the laws; and, even if their conduct should induce the government to order them to depart from the country, they were to be allowed twelve months to remove their families and effects. Each party, by the 27th article, agreed to deliver up to justice all fugitives charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of the other. Other articles provided for the settlement, by commissioners appointed by the two governments, of various claims made by the one against the other, arising out of the events of the war; especially the claims of the United States on account of damages their citizens were alleged to have sustained by irregular and illegal captures or condemnations of their vessels and property by British cruisers; and those made by subjects of Great Britain, who complained that their vessels had been taken within the jurisdiction of the United States, or by vessels originally armed in the ports of that country. The revocation of the order in council of November, 1793, had, before the commencement of the negotiations, removed a principal source of complaint on the part of the Americans; but nothing was settled by the treaty as to other matters which had been the subjects of remonstrance by the government of the United States: among others, the standing provocation and cause of after-quarrel, the asserted impressment of American seamen by British ships of war.

This treaty, which was signed by Lord Grenville and Mr. Jay on the 19th of November, 1794, "was very far," says Macpherson, "from being satisfactory to the people of the United States, who complained that their trade with the British West Indies would be so hampered with the restrictions of it that it would never be of any advantage to them." They also observed that the chief points in dispute between the two countries were still as far from being decided as ever. On the other hand, it was remarked on this side of the water that the article restricting the trade of the United States with the British West Indies to vessels not exceeding seventy tons was equivalent to an act for creating a nursery of seamen for America."* This last objection was founded on the notion that small vessels require a considerably greater number of men than large ones in proportion to the quantity of goods carried by them. Although ratifications of the treaty by the two governments were exchanged on the 25th of October, 1795, it was not ratified by the American House of Representatives till the 30th of April, 1796; nor was the act for carrying its provisions into full effect passed by the British parliament till the 4th of July, 1797.

The suspension of cash payments by the Bank of England, in February, 1797, affecting, as it could not fail to do, the money prices of all commodities in the home market, makes as marked an epoch in the history of our commerce as it does in that of the national finances. The circumstances which led to and accompanied this memorable event have already been briefly noticed in our First Chapter; but some additional details are required fully to explain the causes or state of things by which so remarkable a crisis was brought about. From papers which were laid before parliament, it appears that the first formal intimation of a pressure, or apprehended pressure, was made by the Bank to government in the beginning of 1795. A resolution of the directors, on the 15th of January in that year, expressed their determination not in future to allow the sum to be advanced at any time upon treasury bills to exceed 500,000*l.*, alleging as a reason the uneasiness they felt at the heavy amount of the loans then about to be raised, 6,000,000*l.* (the actual sum was 4,600,000*l.*) for a foreign power (the emperor), besides 18,000,000*l.* for ourselves. On the 16th of April we find them reiterating this determination, and at the same time complaining that their actual advances were still allowed to stand at between 1,500,000*l.* and 2,000,000*l.*, notwithstanding a promise of the chancellor of the exchequer three months before that the excess over 500,000*l.* should certainly be paid off after the receipt of the first payment on the new loan. All their applications remaining unattended to, on the 30th of July they passed a resolution threatening to give orders to the cashiers to refuse payment of all treasury bills whenever the advance should amount to the limit they had fixed. A few days after this (on the 6th of August) came an application from Pitt for a further accommodation (it appears to have been to the extent of 2,500,000*l.*) on the security of the growing surplus of the consolidated fund: this the directors declined taking into consideration till the minister should have given them full satisfaction on the subject of the advances on treasury bills, "which," remarks the resolution, "is not even touched upon in his letter." The loan was eventually granted only on Pitt's assurance that he would take care the conditions insisted upon by the Bank, including the reduction of the advances on bills to 500,000*l.* by the end of November; should be punctually complied with. The arrangement was made, as the directors remind him in a subsequent communication, dated the 8th of October, "with extreme reluctance on their part, on his pressing solicitations and statement that serious embarrassments would arise to the public service if the Bank refused." In this communication the directors for the first time enter upon a full exposition of the grounds of their apprehensions. They mention "the very large and continued drain of bullion and specie which the Bank has lately experienced, arising from the effects of the loan to the emperor and other subsidies," and "the prospect of the demand for gold not appearing likely soon to cease;" and then they say, "In addition to the above causes, it may be proper to state that large sums are likely soon to be called for by the claimants of the cargoes and freights of the neutral ships taken and about to be reimbursed; many of whom, as they [the directors] are credibly informed, are instructed by their owners and proprietors to take back their returns in specie or bullion. The present price of gold being from 4*l.* 3*s.* to 4*l.* 4*s.* per ounce, and our guineas being to be purchased at 3*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.*, clearly demonstrates the grounds of our fears." Matters continued in the same state for the rest of this year; the drain of specie went on; and on the 12th of December the advances by the Bank on the bills drawn by the treasury amounted to 2,670,000*l.* At a meeting of the directors on the 28th of January, 1796, when it was stated that a notice had come from the Treasury, intimating that bills to the amount of 201,000*l.* would be presented for payment at the Bank on the 3rd of February, it was resolved unanimously "that the governor do give directions to the cashiers not to advance any money for the payment of these bills, nor to discharge any part of the same, unless money shall be sent down for that purpose." Pitt was accordingly obliged to provide the money. After this the governor and other directors had repeated interviews with Pitt. At one of these conferences, on the 5th of February, we are told, "Mr. Pitt read some extracts of letters from the British resident and others at Hamburg, which mentioned that large quantities of English guineas were imported thither by the packets from Yarmouth; and one mentioned that the guineas were melted down on their arrival there." Pitt observed that attention should be paid to this matter at the outports. The amount advanced by the Bank upon the Treasury, however, now underwent some reduction: on the 14th of June, 1796, it is stated at 1,232,649*l.* Pitt having, a few days after this, again addressed the directors in the most importunate terms, and wrung from them a further advance of 800,000*l.*, and also an engagement (from which they at first shrunk in utter dismay) to let him have as much more by the end of the following month, they accompanied their most reluctant acquiescence in the last of these demands, on the 28th of July, with a memorial, in which they said that they thought they should be wanting in their duty if they did not take the occasion of making "most serious and solemn remonstrance, which, for the satisfaction of their court, they desire may be laid before his majesty's cabinet;" adding that, by what they had consented to do, they rendered themselves totally incapable of granting any further assistance to government during the remainder of the year, and unable even to make the usual advances on the land and malt tax bills for the ensuing year, should those bills be passed before Christmas. On the 3rd of November, nevertheless, they agreed, at Pitt's request, to advance him 2,750,000*l.* on the land and malt taxes, on condition that their advances on the treasury bills, now amounting to 1,513,345*l.*, should be paid thereout. Pitt seems to have got the money, but not to have repaid the advances; for on the 1st of February, 1797, we find the directors again representing, in a very uncomfortable tone, that the said advances now amounted to 1,554,635*l.*, and would, in a few days, be augmented to 1,819,818*l.* But now came, in addition to all other causes of alarm, the proposal of a loan of 1,500,000*l.* to Ireland. On the 10th of February, the directors, taking this threatening certainty, as they describe it, into their most serious consideration, and looking to the evils which would probably follow on such a measure to their establishment, "by the sending over to that country a great part of the sum in specie," resolved to apply to the minister for the repayment, or at least considerable reduction, of the debt due by government to the Bank, as the only means of defence they could devise against the mischiefs they dreaded from this Irish loan. The entire sum owing them by the government they made to be 7,186,445*l.*, besides about 400,000*l.* arrears of interest: the items being—arrears of advances on malt and land tax, for 1794, 1795, and 1796, 3,220,000*l.*; advances on exchequer bills, 2,291,800*l.*; and advances on treasury bills, 1,674,645*l.* The money for Ireland was eventually found by increasing the loan to be raised for Great Britain from 13,000,000*l.* to 14,500,000*l.* But no sooner had this been settled than another black and fast-spreading cloud appeared in the sky to raise the alarm of the directors to a higher pitch than ever. A resolution, or minute, of a meeting of the court on the 21st of February states the great uneasiness inspired by the large and constant decrease of the cash in the coffers of the Bank; and expresses the conviction impressed upon the court, "by the constant calls of the bankers from all parts of the town for cash, that there must be some extraordinary reasons for this drain, arising probably from the alarm of an expected invasion." It was resolved to send a deputation to the chancellor of the exchequer, to ask him that he would, "if possible and proper, strike out some means of alleviating the public alarm, and stopping this apparent disposition in people's minds for having a large deposit of cash in their houses." Pitt said he could not think there was any good ground for the apprehension of an invasion, which had spread so generally—although he "could not answer that no partial attack on this country would be made by such a mad and desperate enemy as we had to deal with;" and he advised the deputation to endeavour to obtain a supply of gold from abroad, which they told him they would if they could, having already had the matter under consideration. Orders were accordingly sent to Hamburg for the purchase of gold. The drain, however, still continued, or increased; and on the 24th a deputation from the court of directors again sought an interview with the minister, at which, laying before him the state of things, and their alarm for the safety of the house, they asked him "how far he thought the Bank might venture to go on paying cash, and when he would think it necessary to interfere before our cash was so reduced as might be detrimental to the immediate service of the state." From an account afterwards printed, it appears that the stock of cash and bullion in possession of the Bank, which had been 8,608,000*l.* in March 1794, had declined to 7,940,000*l.* in March 1795, to 2,972,000*l.* in March 1796, to 2,508,000*l.* in December 1796, and was now, on Saturday the 25th of February, 1797, reduced to 1,272,000*l.* In this critical state of affairs a dispatch was sent to the king, requesting him to come immediately to town to be present at a privy council, which was accordingly held on the next day, Sunday the 26th, at St. James's; and then, after an interview with the governor and other directors of the Bank in Downing-street, at which there is said to have been a warm discussion, the leading members of the administration, namely, the lord chancellor (Loughborough), the lord president (Earl of Chatham), the Duke of Portland (secretary of state for the home department), the Marquis Cornwallis (master-general of the ordnance), Earl Spencer (first lord of the admiralty), the Earl of Liverpool (chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster), Lord Grenville (foreign secretary), and the chancellor of the exchequer (Pitt), met again, and drew up a minute, declaring that upon the representations of the chancellor of the exchequer, as to the effects of the unusual demands for specie that had been made upon the metropolis, "in consequence of ill-

founded or exaggerated alarms in different parts of the country," it was the unanimous opinion of the board that it was indispensably necessary for the public service that the directors of the Bank of England should forbear issuing any cash in payment, until the sense of parliament could be taken on that subject, "and the proper measures adopted thereupon for maintaining the means of circulation, and supporting the public and commercial credit of the kingdom at this important juncture." It was ordered that a copy of the minute should be transmitted to the directors; "and they are hereby required," it was added, "on the grounds of the exigency of the case, to conform themselves thereto, until the sense of parliament can be taken as aforesaid." The order of council was published by the directors on Monday morning, accompanied by a notice of their own, in which they stated that the general concerns of the Bank were in the most affluent and flourishing condition, and were such as to preclude every doubt as to the security of its notes; and thus, in one night, all people found their money converted into leaves of paper, intrinsically of no more value than the leaves into which the magic coins, that glittered so brightly when deposited in the chest, are when next inspected discovered to have withered away, in the Eastern tale.

For all practical purposes, however, the value of the now inconvertible bank-notes underwent at first very little, if any, change. "The actual arrival," says Macpherson, "of an event, which, by all persons who had ever contemplated a probability of its happening, had been dreaded as the death-blow to the commercial prosperity of the country, produced considerable alarm; but it was infinitely short of what might have been expected." Now that the bold step had been ventured upon, the most spirited and energetic measures were taken to sustain public credit under so great a shock. The principal merchants and bankers of London immediately assembled at the Mansion House, and, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, resolved unanimously that they would readily receive bank-notes in all payments to be made to them, and would use their utmost endeavours to make all their own payments in the same manner. This resolution was signed in a few days by above three thousand merchants, bankers, and other persons engaged in trade. On the following day a similar paper was signed and published by the lords of privy council. "And in a few days," it is stated, "all transactions of every kind went on as if nothing had happened; and people in general did not perceive, at least not immediately, that there was any difference between bank-notes, not convertible into money of solid gold and silver, and that money itself."* Bills were immediately brought into parliament, and were carried expeditiously through both Houses, authorising the Bank of England to issue promissory notes payable to the bearer for sums under five pounds, and suspending the act of 1775, against the circulation of notes under the value of twenty shillings in England, and also that of 1765, which prohibited such notes in Scotland. But even before the proceeding had thus obtained the sanction of the legislature the directors of the Bank of England had begun the issue of one and two pound notes, "which," says Macpherson, writing in 1805, "have continued ever since to be almost the only currency for making small payments in London and the neighbouring country." And he adds, "As a further substitute for British guineas, they also introduced into the circulation of this country a great quantity of Spanish dollars, which, with a miniature impression of his Britannic majesty's head stamped upon them, they issued at the price of 4s. 9d. They continued in circulation till the 31st of October, 1797, during which time prodigious numbers of dollars were imported into the country, and stamped so like those stamped for the Bank at the Mint, that they could scarcely ever be distinguished. At the time of calling them in, the directors of the Bank found it necessary, after their clerks had done all in their power to distinguish the counterfeit stamps from their own, to submit to the loss, and receive all stamped dollars indiscriminately at 4s. 9d.; whereby, it was said, considerable sums were made by some unprincipled people, who had made a business of dealing in dollars."* The indignant historian does not seem to perceive that the Bank itself had been here carrying on precisely the same traffic which he reprobates as so unprincipled in other dealers—importing dollars to pass them off for more than they cost or were worth—and that in being thus obliged to take in a few more high-priced dollars than they had issued they were only foiled at their own weapons. Some accommodation was also given by a new coinage of penny and twopenny pieces in copper. "They were executed," says Macpherson, "by Messrs. Boulton and Watt, of Soho, near Birmingham, and have been admired for the elegance of the figure of Britannia, who has the olive-branch (the emblem of peace) in her right hand, as before, and in her left, instead of the hasta (or spear), she now wields Neptune's trident, a ship under sail appearing at sea in the distance. The letters of the legend (or inscription) are not raised, as usual, but sunk into the surface of a border, which rises above that of the coin, in order to protect the figures from being worn away."†

The parliamentary sanction of the order in council issued on the 26th of February was not obtained till the 3rd of May, when an act (the 37 Geo. III. c. 45) was passed confirming whatever had been done by the governor and company of the Bank in pursuance of the said order, indemnifying them for the illegality of their refusal to give cash for their notes, declaring any suits brought against them on that account to be void, and of no effect; and also extending the suspension of cash payments to the 24th of June. A succession of subsequent statutes, however, continued the restriction throughout the present period; so that from this date an inconvertible paper-money remained the basis of the national currency.

But, as we have said, the natural effects of this change upon prices, and in other respects, do not appear to have been felt to any considerable extent for some time. It is supposed that the quantity of gold in circulation, at the time of the suspension, may have been about 22,000,000*l.* Of this amount probably not less than 5,000,000*l.* was hoarded, or withdrawn from the circulation without being sent out of the country; and there was still a subsisting currency of guineas, and other gold coins, which, although it had been constantly diminishing, was estimated as being even at so late a date as 1811 not much less than 3,000,000*l.*; so that the entire amount of gold set free to augment the quantity of that commodity in the foreign market could not have exceeded 13,000,000*l.* or 14,000,000*l.* sterling.* The quantity of gold, coined and uncoined, in Europe, Asia, and America, was probably not much less than a hundred times this amount;† and therefore the value of money could only have been diminished (or, in other words, prices could only have been raised) abroad to the insignificant or nearly imperceptible extent of little more than one per cent., by the immediate and direct operation of this change in the system of the English currency. In England, again, it may be doubted if it really produced any rise of prices at all at first. For some years after the suspension of cash payments, the issues of the Bank were so limited that its paper does not appear to have undergone any depreciation whatever; nor down to 1810 did the average excess of the market above the mint price of gold rise to more than about 4 per cent. It has indeed been argued that the rise of prices occasioned by the substitution of a fictitious for a real currency is not to be measured by this depreciation, and that it was actually much greater than such an indication would make it; but this notion appears to rest on no intelligible grounds. It probably never would have been taken up had it not been that there did take place, in point of fact, some time after the suspension, a progressive rise of prices, affecting most of the articles of primary necessity, but occasioned by causes with which the issues of the Bank had nothing to do.

Mr. Tooke, in an historical review of the state of prices and of the circulation from 1793 to 1803, has conclusively established the following among other facts and deductions:—"That, in consequence of the two very deficient harvests of 1794 and 1795, a great rise of the prices of provisions took place in 1795 and 1796, coincidently with a remarkable contraction of the Bank circulation; and that there was, coincidently with an enlargement of the circulation, a rapid fall of the prices of provisions, and a complete subsidence of them, at the close of 1798, to the level of what they had been at the commencement of 1793;" "That, while from 1796 to the close of 1798 the prices of provisions, and of European produce generally, were falling, the prices of all Transatlantic produce were rapidly rising;" "That the great fall of the prices of corn, and of European produce generally, from 1796, to the close of 1798 took place coincidently with a progressively increasing government expenditure, defrayed chiefly by loans;" "That the prices of provisions, which at the beginning of 1799 were as low as they had been on an average of some years anterior to 1793, advanced, in common with other articles of European produce, to an unprecedented height, as a necessary consequence of the two very deficient harvests of 1799 and 1800, combined with actual and apprehended obstructions to importation;" "That, coincidently with the great rise in the prices of provisions, and of European produce, in 1799 and 1800, a very great fall took place in all Transatlantic produce, thus negating the inference of the operation of a common cause, such as that of mere increase of money." Finally, Mr. Tooke has shown that, except in the case of articles constituting naval and military stores, not a trace can be found, from 1793 to the peace of Amiens, of the operation of war-demand upon prices, any more than of that of depreciation of the value of the currency, "understanding, by that term, a rise of prices caused by an increase of money, and not by a relative scarcity of commodities."*

* See 'A History of Prices, and of the State of the Circulation, from 1793 to 1837, by Thomas Tooke, Esq., F.R.S.' 3 vols. 8vo. Lond. 1838. Vol. i. pp. 130, &c.

The only qualification we should be disposed to offer to these views of Mr. Tooke would be to suggest that the coincidence of a rise in the prices of Transatlantic produce with a fall in the prices of provisions in the period from 1796 to 1799, and of a fall in the prices of Transatlantic produce with a rise in the prices of provisions in 1799 and 1800, may possibly have been in part occasioned by a cause to which we do not find that he anywhere adverts, namely, the greater amount of income in the one case, and the less in the other, left free for the purchase of articles that were not of first necessity. The prices of all other things appear to be governed, to a certain extent, by the price of provisions and of other absolute necessities. When provisions are scarce and dear, there is less money to be laid out on articles of luxury, the prices of which, accordingly, other things remaining the same, are depressed; and the contrary when provisions are plentiful and cheap. The general facts brought out by Mr. Tooke's investigations, however, remain unaffected by this consideration; and they are very material to be kept in recollection in looking at the progress of our foreign trade during the small portion of the present period that still remains to be gone over.

* History of Prices, i. 176-254.

1797 to the peace were principally the following: In February, 1797, we took from Spain the important island of Trinidad. In the spring of 1799, the capture of Seringapatam and the conquest of Mysore made a considerable addition to our Indian empire. In the autumn of the same year we obtained possession of the Dutch colony of Surinam, in South America. Early in 1800 we took from the French the island and fort of Goree, in Africa; and in the latter part of the same year their recent conquest, Malta, fell into our hands, and also the Dutch West Indian island of Curaçoa.

The total official value of our imports, which in 1796, as we have seen, was 23,187,319*l.*, fell in 1797 to 21,013,956*l.*; and that of our exports from 30,518,913*l.* to 28,917,010*l.* In 1798, however, the imports rose to 27,857,889*l.*, and the exports to 33,591,777*l.*; in 1799, the imports were 26,837,432*l.*, the exports 35,991,329*l.*; in 1800, the imports were 30,570,605*l.*, the exports 43,152,019*l.* On the whole, therefore, the imports had increased in these four years very nearly 33 per cent., and the exports more than 41 per cent. The increase of the entire foreign trade was from 53,706,232*l.* to 73,722,624*l.*, or between 35 and 36 per cent.

We will now subjoin a view of the extent of our trade with the different parts of the world in the year 1800, as compared with the year 1796; adding under each country a notice of the principal articles imported from it and exported to it, collected from a more detailed statement which Macpherson gives as extracted by himself from the Custom-house registers, and which he says will be found to differ very much from the accounts commonly given.*

IRELAND:—The official value of the imports from Ireland had declined from 2,764,877*l.* in 1796, to 2,312,823*l.* in 1800; but that of the exports thither had increased from 2,897,069*l.* to 3,741,499*l.* The imports in 1800 consisted of cattle, hides, beef, pork, tobacco, 32,152,399 yards of linen, some linen and woollen yarn, a few potatoes, &c.; the exports, of coals (to the value of 360,000*l.*, mostly from Scotland), woollen, cotton, and silk manufactured goods, cotton yarn to the value of 80,458*l.*, leather, ironmongery and hardware, earthenware, 106,000 barrels of herrings (mostly from Scotland), bottles and window-glass, salt, cheese, &c.; together with rum, brandy, wine, sugar, tea, drugs, dye-stuffs, and numerous other articles of foreign and colonial produce.

ISLE OF MAN:—The imports, consisting of red and white herrings, Irish linen, and linen yarn, had increased from 31,310*l.* to 37,109*l.*; the exports, consisting of coals, flour, cottons and woollens, sugar, tea, rum, &c., from 36,446*l.* to 54,056*l.*

GUERNSEY and the other Channel Islands:—Imports had increased from 228,979*l.* to 238,007*l.*; exports, from 196,631*l.* to 210,272*l.* "Guernsey," says Macpherson, "is a kind of storehouse for merchandise imported from foreign countries and lodged there, in order to save the advance of the duties, till they [the goods] are wanted; and hence the imports consist of all kinds of foreign goods, but chiefly Portugal, French, and Spanish wines, brandy, &c.; also some dye-stuffs and drugs; paving-stones; cyder; worsted stockings from Jersey, 5935 dozen pairs." Among the exports to these islands are enumerated 196 cows and oxen to Alderney, flour, 2007 tons of wool to Jersey, provisions, cloths, and the other ordinary necessaries, India piece-goods, German, Irish, and Russian linens, rum, geneva, &c.

GREENLAND, and the Northern Whale Fishery:—Imports, consisting of train and spermæcti oil, whalebone, and seal-skins, had increased from 106,867*l.* to 125,804*l.*; exports (rum, for ship stores), from 358*l.* to 761*l.*

NEW HOLLAND, and the Southern Whale Fishery:—Imports (same as from the Greenland seas, with a little wood and some birds) had increased from 0*l.* to 89,232*l.*; exports, consisting of brandy, geneva, and wine for ship stores, and of wrought iron, hardware, cloths, groceries, &c., from 18,669*l.* to 25,617*l.*

EAST INDIES, and other parts of Asia:—Imports had increased from 3,372,689*l.* to 4,942,241*l.*; exports, from 2,358,707*l.* to 2,835,063*l.* The imports consisted of tea, indigo, sugar, coffee, books, canes, drugs, gums, oils, cochineal, China ink, galls, turmeric, seed-lack, ivory, fans, cane-mats, cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmeg, pepper, Cayenne pepper, ginger, sago, rice, cassia; ebony, sandal, satin, and sapan woods; preserved fruits, mother of pearl, cowries, carnelian stones, saltpetre, arrack, Carmania and goats' wool, raw silk, calicoes and muslins, and many varieties of piece-goods for re-importation, the sale of them in Great Britain being prohibited. The exports comprehended most of the ordinary articles of consumption, whether necessaries or luxuries; among other things, 14,836*l.* worth of books, a large amount of ship-chandlery of all kinds, for the building of vessels in India, some woollens, silks, and cottons, 8000 yards of British muslins, tin and other metals, coaches and chaises, French, Portugal, Rhenish, and Spanish wines, rum, brandy, and geneva.

GIBRALTAR, with the Straits:—Imports had increased from 28,593*l.* to 35,665*l.*; exports, from 141,936*l.* to 294,557*l.* The imports were currants, drugs, and dye-stuffs from the Straits; barilla, brimstone, quicksilver, cochineal, indigo, and other dye-stuffs, almonds, raisins, and other fruits, oil, Portugal, Spanish, Italian, Cyprus, and Madeira wines, some cotton, and 33,748 lbs. of Spanish wool from Gibraltar. Nothing was exported to the Straits; but to Gibraltar were sent all the ordinary articles of consumption, the place itself producing nothing. Some trade was also carried on in 1800 with our recently acquired possessions of Minorca and Malta. The imports from Minorca, estimated at 13,500*l.*, consisted of barilla, lemons and oranges, with a little oil, thrown silk, cotton, and oil; the exports thither, of a few woollen goods, some herrings, a small quantity of refined sugar, and several other such articles. From Malta there were no imports; but the place figures in the table of exports for this year on the strength of a shipment to it of 28*l.* worth of bottled beer.

AFRICA, including Sierra Leone and the Cape of Good Hope:—Imports had declined from 120,396*l.* to 96,563*l.*; but exports had increased from 614,307*l.* to 1,099,656*l.* There were no imports from Sierra Leone; those from the Cape consisted of some wine, cotton, and skins; those from the rest of Africa, of gums, camwood, ebony, redwood, ivory, a few ostrich feathers, and some skins. The exports were guns, to the number of 80,806, cutlasses, gunpowder, rum, brandy, geneva, and British spirits, beer, woollens, cottons, and linens, India piece-goods to a large amount, earthenware, glass, provisions, and a few other necessaries.

BRITISH AMERICA:—Imports had increased from 268,776*l.* to 393,696*l.*; exports had declined from 1,017,620*l.* to 975,986*l.* The imports consisted of skins, or furs, feathers, and castoreum, from Hudson's Bay; a small quantity of fish, train-oil, and seal-skins from Newfoundland; pearl-ashes, pot-ashes, wheat, flour, castoreum, train-oil, skins, masts, boards, and other lumber from Canada; skins and lumber from New Brunswick; tar and turpentine, skins, lumber, and pearl-ashes from Nova Scotia. The principal exports were guns, gunpowder, cordage, sailcloth, salt, copper, steel, wrought brass, wrought leather, cottons, silks, woollens, hats, haberdashery, wines, spirits, spiceries, groceries, and other foreign or colonial produce. There was also a small trade now carried on with Nootka Sound, in which woollens, cottons, tea, coffee, sugar, and a few other articles of consumption were exported in 1800 to the value of 37,497*l.*; but the sea-otter furs, the only commodity obtained from the country, were all carried across the Pacific to China.

BRITISH WEST INDIES:—Imports had increased from 4,541,217*l.* to 5,805,787*l.*; exports had diminished from 3,954,816*l.* to 3,416,966*l.* The imports were sugar, rum, coffee, chocolate, ginger, pimento, cotton, indigo, dyeing woods, mahogany, cedar, ebony, castor-oil, turmeric and some other drugs, tamarinds, &c., and also some hides, tobacco, and other articles obtained from wrecks and prizes. The exports consisted of all the ordinary descriptions of manufactured goods, and of colonial and foreign produce.

FOREIGN WEST INDIES (including Demerara, Surinam, and the Islands conquered from the French, Spanish, and Dutch):—Imports had increased from 356,481*l.* to 3,034,491*l.*; exports, from 107,328*l.* to 1,081,612*l.* The articles, both of import and export, were nearly the same as in the trade with the British islands; no merchandise, however, being sent out from England to Cayenne, Cuba, St. Croix, St. Domingo, or St. Martin. Some hides, unwrought copper, and vultures' feathers were imported from Buenos Ayres, to which also there were no exports; and this small trade is probably included under the head of Foreign West Indies in the official account. From Honduras there were brought mahogany and other woods in 1800 to the value of 16,777*l.*; and there were exported thither rum, Irish beef, pork, and linens, with other provisions and necessaries, to that of 2301*l.* From Florida, also, were imported indigo, cotton, train and spermaceti oil, skins, &c., to the value of 10,116*l.*; the exports, to the value of 28,946*l., consisting chiefly of low-priced woollens, linens, and cottons, &c., partly British, partly Irish and German. "Ever since the peace of 1783," says Macpherson, in a note, "a few houses in London have carried on a trade with Florida, by sending British vessels under licences obtained from the British and Spanish governments; and the war has not interrupted the trade. The cotton of that country is of the quality of the Upland cotton of Georgia, but much inferior to the Sea-island cotton of that state." This was written in 1805.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA:—Imports had increased from 2,080,970*l.* to 2,358,216*l.*; exports, from 6,054,238*l.* to 6,885,500*l.* The imports consisted of pearl-ashes, pot-ashes, flour, wheat, Indian corn and rye-meal, sassafras, shumack, ginseng, snake-root, sarsaparilla, spermaceti-oil, whalebone, turpentine and turpentine-oil, tar, pitch, and rosin, oak, fir, and other timber, staves and other lumber, hides and peltry, cochineal, indigo, fustic, logwood, redwood, lignum vitæ, mahogany, bark, sugar, coffee, cotton, rice, and tobacco: the exports, of books and stationery, wrought brass, copper, iron, and silver, pewter, lead, steel, tin, tinned plates, coals, salt, earthenware, bottles and glass; woollen, cotton, and silk manufactures; beaver, felt, and chip hats; thread, haberdashery; English, Scotch, and Irish linens; sailcloth, apothecaries' ware, wearing-apparel, copperas, painters' colours, guns, gunpowder, flints, watches, musical instruments, beer, grindstones, with drugs, dye-stuffs, cinnamon and other spices, India piece-goods, Russia and German linens, geneva, French and other wines, and a few articles of grocery.

FRANCE:—Imports had increased from 14,655*l.* to 110,415*l.*; exports, from 7975*l.* to 1,325,419*l.* The imports in 1800 are stated to have consisted of books, maps, pictures, &c., millstones, verdigris, cochineal, valonia, 234 weys of salt for Scotland, seeds, brandy, starch, tallow, rye-meal, some wheat, barley, and other grains, 150 cwt. of bread, beef, pork, bacon, butter, and tanned ox, cow, and calf hides: the exports, of a small quantity of printed cotton and linen goods, sugar, coffee, cacao, tobacco, India piece-goods, cinnamon, cloves, pepper, pimento, ginger, and other spices, cassia lignea, rhubarb, and other drugs, indigo, logwood, and other dye-stuffs.

FLANDERS:—Imports had increased from 7067*l.* to 34,656*l.*; exports, from 65,054*l.* to 808,826*l.* The imports consisted of tanned hides, seeds, and 371 tons of rags; the exports, of refined sugar, some copperas, and numerous kinds of colonial and foreign produce, but in very small quantities.

HOLLAND:—Imports had increased from 309,933*l.* to 972,599*l.*; exports, from 516,267*l.* to 3,208,613*l.* The imports were books, maps, drawings, paintings, prints, corn, oak-bark, juniper-berries, flax, hemp, madder, flower-roots and trees to the value of 1074*l.*, seeds, geneva, butter, cheese, bacon, potatoes, a few linens, and 61,000 tons of rags: the exports, some cotton and woollen goods, train-oil, and a great variety of articles of foreign and colonial produce.

PORTUGAL AND MADEIRA:—Imports had increased from 677,772*l.* to 927,257*l.*; exports, from 876,000*l.* to 1,199,023*l.* The imports were, from Madeira 494 tons of wine (besides much more brought home by circuitous routes), and from Portugal, 19,328 tons of Port wine, Madeira, French, and Spanish wines, 1,663,582 lbs. of Spanish wool, some cotton, 6000 dozen of goat-skins, other skins, Indian and other hides, almonds, figs, raisins, and other fruits, 33,518,701 lemons and oranges, annatto, orchil, argol, cochineal, Brazil-wood, indigo, madder, and other dye-stuffs; balsam capivi, ipecacuanha, gum arabic, gum Senegal, and other gums and drugs, brimstone, cork, and some wheat and flour, which Macpherson describes as "very unusual exports from Portugal." Our exports to Portugal and Madeira comprised the usual articles of domestic, colonial, and foreign manufactures and produce, among which are mentioned 1021 cannon, 4413*l.* worth of Irish linens, and 1584 quarters of wheat, as well as various other commodities, such as cottons, drugs, dye-stuffs, spices, &c., also enumerated among the imports.

TURKEY:—Imports had increased from 150,182*l.* to 199,773*l.*; exports, from 155,510*l.* to 166,804*l.* The imports were cotton and cotton yarn, raw silk, goats' hair, mohair, goat-skins, carpets, copper, coculus Indicus, tragacanth, opium, senna, and other drugs, berries, galls, madder, valonia, and other dye-stuffs, box-wood, currants, figs, raisins, and other fruits: the exports, lead, tin, iron, 170 cannon and other wrought-iron goods, watches, some cottons and woollens, India piece-goods, sugar, coffee, indigo, and other colonial produce.

RUSSIA:—Imports had increased from 2,110,083*l.* to 2,382,098*l.*; exports, from 766,896*l.* to 1,025,334*l.* The imports were, 410,260 tons of tallow, pearl-ashes, pot-ashes, and weed-ashes, bristles, cordage, flax, and hemp, bar-iron, cast iron, 24 tons of wrought iron, linens, diapers, drilling, and sheeting, pitch and tar, bread, bacon, beef, and tongues, lint-seed, bees'-wax, isinglass, rhubarb, and some other drugs, skins of hares, seals, and calves, timber, boards, and staves, 28 tons of rags, and some corn: the exports, alum, coals, slates, salt, sal-ammoniac, spelter, tin, watches, musical instruments, horses, herrings, woollen, cotton, and silk goods of all kinds, India calicoes and muslins, and other common articles of consumption.

GERMANY:—Imports had increased from 2,082,275*l.* to 2,352,197*l.*; exports, from 8,173,989*l.* to 12,664,591*l.* Our trade with Germany was therefore at once the greatest and the most rapidly growing branch of our foreign commerce. Our imports from this country in 1800 consisted of linen-yarn to the amount of 3,000,000 lbs., cotton, silk, wool, flax, hemp, linens, cambrics, canvas, lawns, holland's, tabling, &c., goat, ox, and horse hair, 2378 lbs. of human hair, hides, chip and straw hats, 3002 tons of rags, some paper, goose-quills, timber, boards, &c., oak-bark, brimstone, books, maps, prints, pictures, 3195 wooden clocks, cork, bees'-wax, calf, bear, coney, goat, sheep, and seal skins, oil of turpentine, verdigris, copperas, succus liquoritiæ, gums, arsenic, antimony, and other drugs, hops, juniper-berries, seeds, wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, rye, rye-meal, wheat-flour, butter, cheese, beef, pork, tongues, potatoes, brandy, geneva, and other spirits, Rhenish, Tokay, French, and Spanish wines. Our exports thither were equally numerous and various, comprising of our domestic produce and manufactures, cotton goods to a large amount, cotton-yarn to the value of 365,945*l.*, woollens, silks, lead, pewter, tin, tinned plates (which, half a century before, we used to import from Germany), wrought brass, copper, and iron, silver plate and plated ware, coals, earthenware, glass, cabinet-ware, coaches, horses, watches, musical instruments, books and stationery, wearing-apparel, tanned leather, wrought leather, gloves, haberdashery, hats, bark, train-oil, whalebone, painters' colours, copperas, oil of vitriol, sal-ammoniac, and other drugs, refined sugar, molasses, herrings red and white, cod, oysters, and the following articles of colonial and foreign merchandise:—mother-of-pearl, walking-canes, aloes, rhubarb, borax, camphor, cassia lignea, castoreum, jalap, and other drugs, gum senegal and other gums, cochineal, indigo, annatto, Brazil wood, fustic, logwood, madder, and other dye-stuffs, mahogany and other West India woods, ivory, cinnamon, cloves, pepper, ginger, and other spices, cacao, coffee, sugar, tea, sago, currants, turmeric, Indian hides, ox and cow hides, skins of deer, otter, bear, fox, mink, wolf, &c., horns, lint-seed oil and other oils, rum, brandy, arrack, French, Spanish, and other wines, tobacco, whalebone, cotton, cotton-yarn, India piece-goods, and a few Irish linens. Macpherson observes that much of the commerce of Germany was "for account of the nations involved in the war."

PRUSSIA AND POLAND:—Imports had increased from 1,304,386*l.* to 1,733,945*l.*; exports, from 596,379*l.* to 842,353*l.* The imports consisted of pearl-ashes, weed-ashes, spruce-beer (1054 barrels from Prussia, 1093 barrels from Poland), wheat, barley, oats, peas, beans, rye, flax, hemp, linen, timber, boards, staves, &c., madder, bristles, mill-stones, wool, hides, goose-quills, cheese, lint-seed, and some skins; the exports, of iron, lead, tin, earthenware, woollens, cottons, and other ordinary articles of consumption.

DENMARK AND NORWAY:—Imports had fallen off from 243,928*l.* to 241,561*l.*, if so insignificant a difference can be so described; exports had increased from 509,783*l.* to 540,697*l.* The imports in 1800 were oak-bark, cordage, hides of horses and oxen, bar iron, kelp, rock moss, furs and peltry, tar, timber and boards, 34,666 lbs. of cotton, 10,000 lbs. of indigo, some salted beef, pork, and butter, and, in this year of scarcity, the unusual article of corn. The exports included lead, tin, coals, glass, salt, cottons and woollens of all kinds, hats, Scotch linens, sugar, coffee, tobacco, and the other usual commodities.

CANARIES:—Imports, consisting in 1800 of barilla, copper, some drugs and gums, orchilla, 47 tons of Canary wine, and 553 tons of Spanish wine, were estimated at 48,536*l.*, whereas in 1796 the value put upon our imports from the Canary islands was only 15,751*l.*; which made the entire trade still greater in 1800 than in 1796, although in 1796 our exports thither were valued at 16,724*l.*, and in 1800 there were none.

The only parts of the world our trade with which, upon the whole, appears to have declined in the interval between these two years, were the following:—

SPAIN:—Imports had fallen from 809,880*l.* to 655,652*l.*; exports had fallen from 546,125*l.* to 3382*l.* Our imports from Spain in 1800 consisted of barilla, cork, black lead, succus liquoritiæ, mahogany, shumack, 5,995,624 lbs. of Spanish wool, 10,517,750 lemons and oranges, figs, currants, chestnuts, hazel-nuts, walnuts, almonds, anise-seed, oil, brandy, beans, and some wheat; our direct exports thither were only some cinnamon and cacao.

ITALY (exclusive of Venice):—Imports had increased from 299,796*l.* to 357,736; but exports had fallen from 747,969*l.* to 568,731*l.* The imports in 1800 were, books, drawings, &c., barilla, brimstone, cork, cream of tartar, essence of lemons, manna, senna, and other drugs, juniper-berries, perfumed oil, argol, galls, madder, and other dye-stuffs, anchovies, almonds, figs, prunes, nuts, currants, raisins, &c., ordinary and salad oil, chip and straw hats, bugles (or glass beads), raw, thrown, and waste silk, lambs, goats, and kids' skins, 695 tons of rags, 439 cwt. of cheese, brandy, statuary to the value of 1368*l.*, marble, and cotton. The exports consisted of alum (a commodity with which in the middle ages Genoa used to supply all Europe), wrought brass, iron, and silver, plated ware, woollens of all sorts, cottons to a considerable amount, a few linens, earthenware, glass, hardware, tinned plates, dry cod, red and white herrings, 32,881 hogsheads of pilchards, tanned and wrought leather, dye-stuffs, spiceries, cacao, coffee, sugar, foreign iron, India piece-goods, rum, tar, tobacco, whalebone, and foreign ox-gut. "What," exclaims Macpherson, "would the merchants of Italy in the middle ages have said to any person who would have ventured to predict that a country which they knew good for nothing but feeding sheep and cattle, and furnishing wool, hides, lead, and tin, should ever supply them with Oriental produce and manufactures, and many other comforts and luxuries of life!"

VENICE :—Imports had fallen off from 75,257*l.* to 54,028*l.*; exports, from 25,882*l.* to 17,798*l.* The imports and exports in the trade with Venice were of the same description as in that with the rest of Italy.

SWEDEN :—Imports had declined from 347,336*l.* to 309,279; exports, from 121,512*l.* to 78,839*l. The imports in 1800 consisted of some corn and bread, 313 barrels of herrings, flax, har and cast iron, a very small quantity of wrought iron, rock moss, pitch and tar, timber, boards, staves, &c.; the exports, of coals, lead, tin, painters' colours, cotton and woollen goods, sugar, coffee, tobacco, spices, drugs, dye-stuffs, East India calicoes, rum, and other spirits.

This account sufficiently demonstrates that the war, so far from destroying or diminishing our foreign trade, did not even check its expansion, nay, did not prevent it from enlarging and extending itself faster perhaps than it had ever done in a time of the profoundest tranquillity. It may be doubted if our trade would have been so great as it was in the year 1800 had the country been at peace for the whole of the preceding seventeen years, instead of having been engaged for nearly the latter half of that time in the most general and most costly war it had ever waged. In truth, after the recovery of our commercial system from the momentary shock occasioned by the commencement of hostilities with France, the new state of things proved, upon the whole, highly favourable to the extension of our trade. Difficulties were interposed in the way of our direct intercourse with some parts of the continent; but even to most of these interdicted quarters our manufactures still found their way in large quantities by circuitous routes, and we soon made ourselves so completely masters of the great highway of nations, the ocean, that our ships traversed it in all directions almost as freely as they had ever done in time of peace, while the flags of our rivals scarcely dared anywhere to show themselves, and our acquisitions of territory, besides, in the West Indies and elsewhere, opened to us several new and important markets. But the extension of our trade was, of course, also the extension of our manufactures, by which it was in great part fed and sustained. And herein, also, other countries, which experienced its actual ravages, were rendered by the war more dependent than ever upon this country, the only considerable seat of industry in Europe which it left unviolated and undisturbed.

The figures given in the above review of the progress of our trade with the different parts of the world are, as has been explained, the official values of the commodities imported and exported, or the values calculated according to the same unvarying rate or price of a certain quantity of each. The sums so obtained serve very well to indicate the comparative quantities of goods sent out of the country and brought into it at different times; but this method of calculation disregards altogether both differences of quality and fluctuations of price in whatever way arising, and it gives no view of the real value of the exports and imports in any particular year. Since 1798, however, it has been attempted in the official accounts to estimate this real value also. For that year we have only such an estimate of the value of the British merchandise exported; which is set down as having been actually worth 33,148,682*l.* instead of 19,672,503*l.*, as it stands registered according to the standard rates. In 1799 the real marketable value of the imports was, according to the report of the inspector-general, 49,002,170*l.*; of the exports of all kinds 50,290,190*l.* And in 1800 the real value of the imports is stated to have been 55,400,416*l.*; of the exports 55,830,843*l.* In all these years, too, the excess of the real over the official value was rendered less than it ought to have been by what the report of the inspector-general calls "an old established error in rating coffee for exportation very much above its real value"—so much in fact as to make the official higher than the real value of the whole foreign merchandise exported. This may serve to explain a statement with regard to the exports of coffee noticed in a preceding page.*

The total amount of the mercantile marine of the empire in 1800 is stated to have been 17,885 vessels of all sizes, measuring 1,855,879 tons, and navigated by 138,721 hands. Of these vessels 12,198 belonged to England, 2155 to Scotland, 1003 to Ireland, 2161 to the colonies, 130 to Guernsey and the other Channel islands, and 238 to the Isle of Man. There entered inward in this year 10,496 British vessels, measuring 1,379,807 tons, and 5512 foreign vessels, measuring 763,236; and there cleared outward 11,856 British vessels, measuring 1,444,271 tons, and 4893 foreign vessels, measuring 685,051 tons.† There were built and registered in the several ports of the British dominions in the course of this year 965 vessels, measuring in all 126,268 tons.

In 1801, the last year of the war and of the period under review, the 'Chronological Table' in Chalmers makes the total official value of the exports to be only 37,786,857*l.*; but the amounts given in this table for the two preceding years are greatly lower than those we have quoted above from the statements of the inspector-general (33,640,357*l.* instead of 35,991,329*l.* in 1799, and 38,120,120*l.* instead of 43,152,019*l.* in 1800); so that Chalmers has evidently applied some principle of reduction to these statements, at least as quoted by Macpherson. As both accounts agree in the values assigned to the exports from Scotland, it may be conjectured that the acknowledged error in the rating of exported coffee, which we have just noticed, is corrected or allowed for by Chalmers. The official value of the imports for 1801 would, according to his table, be 32,795,557*l.*; but this sum is deduced by subtracting what he calls the favourable balance of trade from the exports, so that it involves the same discrepancy that has been already explained. Other accounts differ from both Macpherson and Chalmers. Thus, in a table given in the article 'Great Britain,' in the 'Penny Cyclopædia' (vol. xi. p. 417), the total official value of the imports for 1801 is stated as 31,786,262*l.*; that of the exports as 35,264,650*l.* Mr. Macculloch, again, in a table in his 'Dictionary of Commerce' (second edition, p. 672), makes the official value of the imports for this year to have been only 28,257,781, and that of the exports 34,381,617*l.* The declared or real value of British and Irish produce and manufactures exported from Great Britain in 1801 is set down in the Cyclopædia at 39,730,659*l.*; by Mr. Macculloch at 36,929,007*l.* This may serve as a sample of the utter confusion in which the whole matter remains.*

The number of bankruptcies in each year, from 1794 to the end of the present period, seems to corroborate other facts in indicating a steady increase of trade throughout that space. The number was 812 in 1794, 718 in 1795, 747 in 1796, 869 in 1797, 729 in 1798, 599 in 1799, 740 in 1800, 893 in 1801.† Here we see the tendency to augmentation on the whole, but no instance of anything resembling the sudden expansion by which the number of bankruptcies, which was 628 in 1792, rose to be 1304 in the disastrous year following. The reduction of the number in 1798, and the two following years, may be taken as sufficient evidence that even the licence accorded to the bank to issue inconvertible paper gave at first no undue or dangerous impulse to speculation: if it had, the diminution of bankruptcies during these three years would, at least, have been succeeded by a much more than proportionate increase afterwards, which was not the case. The number in 1802 was only 853, and in 1803 no more than 906; a rate of increase not greater than might be looked for, as the natural effect of the growth and enlargement of our trade. On the whole, therefore, any variation traceable in the number of the bankruptcies, during the ten years that followed 1793, probably represents this steady commercial progress much more than the operation of any other influencing cause—whether unsound or excessive speculation on the one hand, or the occasional occurrence of seasons of difficulty and depression, financial or general, on the other.

* As the table in Mr. Macculloch's Dictionary (also repeated in his Statistical Account of the British Empire, first edition, ii. 156), is stated to be founded upon official documents (namely, Parl. Paper, No. 243, sess. 1830, and Finance Accounts), we may add here the sums it gives for the years 1800 and 1799 (with which it commences), for comparison with those quoted in the text from Macpherson and Chalmers:—1799, official value of imports 25,122,203*l.*; of exports 27,317,087*l.*: 1800, official value of imports 24,066,700*l.*; of exports 29,556,637*l.* The declared or real value is only given for the exports of British and Irish produce and manufactures. The table in the Penny Cyclopædia, for which no authorities are referred to, goes back only to the year 1801.

The progress of the post-office revenue has been stated in a preceding page up to the year 1792 inclusive.* In 1793 the gross revenue was 652,868*l.*; the nett produce 397,086*l.* In 1795 the gross revenue was 745,238*l.*; the nett produce 414,548*l.* This year further restraints and limitations were placed upon franking, by the act 35 Geo. III. c. 53, and in 1796 the gross revenue rose to 811,539*l.*; the nett produce to 479,487*l.* Then an augmentation of the rates of postage was made by the act 37 Geo. III. c. 18. Still the revenue went on steadily increasing; its gross amount in 1800 being 1,083,950*l.*, its nett produce 720,981*l.*; and in 1801, its gross amount being 1,144,900*l.*, its nett produce 755,299*l.*, or not much less than four times what it was before the introduction of Mr. Palmer's improvements in 1784.†

Before the commencement of the present period the quantity of Bank of England paper in circulation at any one time, including both notes and post-bills, was usually under 7,000,000*l.* In 1786 it rose for the first time to above 8,000,000*l.*; and, according to the accounts made up to 31st of August in each year, it continued from this date to be gradually augmented till in 1791 it attained to the amount of 11,672,320*l.* This increase, however, was certainly not more than in proportion to the increase of the commerce of the country. In the first years of the war the circulation of the Bank suffered some contraction; so that by the year 1796 it had fallen to 9,246,790*l.* Then came the exemption from cash payments; under which new state of things the issues of bank paper increased during the remaining years of the present period as follows:—11,114,120*l.* in 1797; 12,180,610*l.* in 1798; 13,389,490*l.* in 1799; 15,047,180*l.* in 1800; 14,556,110*l.* on the 31st of August, 1801. The dividends received by the proprietors of bank stock continued throughout the present period to be 7 per cent., as they had been ever since 1788. In the year 1800, by the act 40 Geo. III. c. 28, the charter of the Bank was continued (from 1806) till twelve months' notice after the 1st of August, 1833; the Bank advancing to government the sum of 3,000,000*l.* without interest for six years (a period subsequently prolonged till six months after the conclusion of the new war with France that broke out in 1803).

In 1793 the charter of the East India Company was renewed for twenty years, or till the 1st of March, 1814. The act passed for that purpose (the 33 Geo. III. c. 52), under the notion that the trade and territorial revenues of the company might henceforward be relied upon for the production of a clear annual revenue of at least full 1,200,000*l.*, directed that of this surplus 500,000*l.* a-year should be set aside for the reduction of the company's debt in India to 2,000,000*l.*; and that 500,000*l.* more should be annually paid into the Exchequer to be appropriated for the public service as parliament should think fit to order. The anticipation of any such surplus revenue, however, proved entirely fallacious; and this contribution to the public expenses was only paid for one year. The act renewing the charter had been preceded the same year by another act (the 33 Geo. III. c. 47) authorising the company to add another million to their capital; and, as the new stock was subscribed at 200*l.* per cent., it produced 2,000,000*l.* in money. This made the nominal capital of the company (or that upon which the dividends are paid) 6,000,000*l., at which it still continues.

* See ante, p. 645.

† Macpherson, Annals of Commerce, iv. 548. A table of the nett produce in Chalmers, Historical View, p. 281, gives somewhat lower amounts under each year, apparently from including only the English post-office.

The act of 1793, which renewed the charter, also made provision for partially opening the trade with India to private individuals. Any British subject residing in any part of the king's European dominions was allowed to export to Bengal, Malabar, Coromandel, or Sumatra, but only in the company's ships, any article of the produce or manufacture of the British dominions in Europe, except military stores, ammunition, masts, spars, cordage, anchors, pitch, tar, and copper; and on the other hand liberty was given to the company's civil servants in India, and to the free merchants living in India under the company's protection, to ship in the company's ships, on their own account and risk, all kinds of India goods, except calicoes, dimities, muslins, and other piece-goods:—those they were not to ship without a licence from the company. It was directed that, for the purposes of this private trade, the company should in every year set apart at least 3000 tons of their shipping; the owners of the goods paying for their freight at the rate of 5*l.* outward, and 15*l.* homeward in time of peace, and at higher rates in time of war, if the company, with the approbation of the Board of Control, should see good to exact such.

Scarcely any goods were sent out to India by the manufacturers of Great Britain under the act of 1793. "But the merchants residing in India," says Macpherson, "as soon as they understood that a legalised extension of their trade was in the contemplation of the legislature, and without waiting to know the regulations of it, built a considerable number of ships, which they proposed to employ in the trade between India and England, though Lord Cornwallis, then governor-general, and Sir John Shore, his successor, both informed them that there could not be employment for their ships in the way they expected. In the year 1795, when seven of the largest of the company's ships were taken into his majesty's service, and the company at the same time ordered large quantities of rice to be brought from India, in order to afford relief to this country, then distressed by a scarcity of corn, twenty-seven of these India-built ships were taken into the company's service, at the rate of 16*l.* per ton for rice and heavy goods, and 20*l.* for fine goods. All of these ships carried goods to London for account of the private merchants settled in India, and also carried British goods to India for them. The owners of the India-built ships now thought that they had reason to believe them regularly established in the trade; but, as the emergency which called them into employment no longer existed, it was impossible to allow them to supersede the ships, built and equipped in a superior manner expressly for the service of the company, which they were under engagements to employ for a stipulated number of voyages."* This gave rise to a long contest between the company and the private merchants, the result of which was, that the company were forced at last to make various concessions beyond the provisions of their charter. The progress of the trade, from 1792 to the close of the present period; will be most distinctly indicated by the following notice of the exports and imports:—Total exports from England in 1793, 1,266,036*l.* (including only 10,290*l.* of bullion); in 1797, 1,739,510*l.* (including 627,858*l.* of bullion); in 1798, 2,634,502*l.* (including 1,217,748*l.* of bullion); in 1801, 2,512,779*l.* (including 435,595*l.* of bullion). Total imports to England in 1793, 5,769,547*l.* (of which on account of private trade, 882,620*l.*); in 1795, 8,098,495*l.* (of which private trade, 1,189,296*l.*, and what is called neutral property 380,230*l.*); in 1797, 6,053,401*l.* (of which private trade, 1,204,901*l.*, and neutral property 129,678*l.*); 1798, 10,315,256*l.* (of which private trade, 1,629,959*l.*, and neutral property 348,231*l.*); 1801, 9,153,511*l.* (of which private trade, 2,305,235*l.*, and neutral property 220,775*l.*).† What is called neutral property in this account would appear to be goods sent home to England in the company's ships, by subjects of the United States, and other friendly powers, to whom a general permission to trade with the territories under the government of the company, under certain regulations, was granted by acts passed in 1797, after it had been practically enjoyed for some preceding years.

We now proceed to the History of the Useful Arts during the present period, commencing with agriculture, the most important of all. In agriculture we must not expect the sudden revolutions which sometimes take place in the other useful arts. Indeed, it is often conducted for ages with scarcely any variation. There is little to distinguish the present short period from the one immediately preceding it, so far as this art is concerned;

* Mr. Macculloch, in his Commercial Dictionary, second edition, art. 'East India Company,' p. 533, states that in 1796 leave was given to the company by parliament to add two millions to their capital stock by creating 20,000 new shares; and that, as these shares sold at the rate of 173*l.* each, they produced 3,460,000*l.* An act to the effect mentioned was passed in March, 1797, but it was never taken advantage of by the company. It seems to be confounded in this statement with the act of 1789 (see ante, p. 643), under which additional stock to the amount of one million was subscribed for at the rate of 174 per cent.

but there are nevertheless a few circumstances connected with it that require a brief notice. After the peace of Paris in 1763, there was manifested a strong spirit of agricultural improvement, the effects of which have been adverted to in the preceding Book;* and at the commencement of the present period the close of the war with the American colonies left the nation equally at liberty to pursue a similar course with still greater ardour. To engage extensively in agricultural pursuits was at this time regarded as one of the most patriotic duties to which persons of rank and wealth could devote their attention. Their example and influence were not without effect, and the number was constantly increasing of those who endeavoured to augment the capabilities of the soil by availing themselves of scientific discoveries and the improvement of the arts. New processes of cultivation were tried, and every branch of rural economy was investigated, with the view of ascertaining if anything in it could be amended. The improvement of live-stock, especially cattle and sheep, which Bakewell had carried to so high a point in the preceding period, was as zealously pursued by many other breeders; and the success which attended their efforts is one of the most striking examples of agricultural improvement which we have now to notice. Culley, who was himself a great improver of live-stock, and who wrote a useful little work on the subject in 1809, shows that it was no mean advantage which these men conferred on the nation. Although his work was published several years after its close, yet it was during the present period that the changes of which he speaks had taken place. Before its termination, there were, he says, oxen which were "more like an ill-made black horse than an ox or a cow;" and the flesh, which did not in his opinion deserve to be called beef, was "as black and coarse-grained as horse-flesh." Such an animal could scarcely be fattened for the butcher, as nearly all the food which it consumed went to the support of "offal." As to sheep, he says, while the old sorts required three years, or even a still longer time, the improved breeds could be made fit for market in two years—making, in this way only, a saving of above thirty per cent. In cattle it was calculated that a similar saving of twenty-five per cent. was effected; and in both cases the meat obtained, at a less expense of food, and in a shorter space of time, was far superior in quality and quantity to that of the old breeds, in which the difference between the coarser and finer parts amounted to one hundred per cent., while the quantity of bone was very great. Other departments of rural economy were already in a state only requiring favourable circumstances to bring the improvements which had been already introduced into more general practice. The character of the harvests during several years of the period, and the increase of population, had this effect.

The frequent recurrence of unfavourable seasons from 1766 to 1775 having occasioned high prices,

an immense quantity of land (not less than 1,207,000 acres) was enclosed in the ten years ending with 1779, and much of it was brought into cultivation. In the twenty years from 1780 to 1799, although the population was increasing more rapidly, the number of acres enclosed was very little more (1,308,270 acres) than in the ten years from 1770 to 1779. The seasons were more favourable in the earlier part of the present period; and in six of the years from 1780 to 1789, wheat was exported, the average price in the home market being at or under 44s. the quarter, when the exporter could claim the bounty of 5s. the quarter. In 1791 the corn-law of 1773 was altered, a clamour having been raised respecting its tendency to render England dependent upon foreigners. It was now enacted that the nominal duty of 6d. the quarter should be paid only when wheat was at or above 54s. the quarter, instead of 48s., as under the former law. The bounty on exportation was continued; but the year following was the last in which the agriculturists of this country found it necessary to resort to foreign markets to obtain relief from an overabundant supply of grain. Although it was not repealed until 1815, yet during this long interval prices never sank so low as to entitle the exporter to claim the bounty. In 1793, '94, '95, the country was visited with a succession of unfavourable harvests; and in 1800 famine was literally at our doors. In June, 1795, the price of wheat rose to 134s. 5d. the quarter. In 1800 the harvest was estimated to be one-third deficient. At both of these seasons of scarcity very active measures were taken by the government and parliament to ensure a supply of corn. Importation was encouraged by enormous bounties; and in 1795 neutral vessels, laden with corn, were seized, and compelled to sell their cargoes to the government agents. In 1800 some regulations were also established by parliament for ensuring the economical consumption of corn and grain. Bread was not allowed to be sold by bakers until twenty-four hours after it was baked. The distilleries and starch-manufactories were prohibited using grain. The hair-powder tax was imposed. Proclamations were also issued urgently impressing on the public the duty of economy in the use of bread and flour. Substitutes for wheaten bread were recommended. The Board of Agriculture made experiments in bread-making, and produced eighty different kinds; and through its influence the cultivation of the potato was greatly extended. In March, 1801, wheat was 156s. 2d. the Winchester quarter (or 20s. the imperial bushel); but fortunately the new harvest proved tolerably abundant, and by the end of the year the price had fallen to 75s. 6d., though this was still nearly double the average price of one of the earlier years of the period (1786), when it was 38s. 6d. The import of wheat in 1800 was 1,424,766 quarters, and in 1801, 1,396,359. In 1800 Lord Hawkesbury estimated the quantity of wheat grown in England at 6,800,000 quarters, which, he said, was insufficient for the consumption of the country, and required, on an average, an importation equal to one-twentieth of the consumption. The high prices of these years attracted much additional capital to agriculture. Arthur Young estimated that, in 1795, a sum of twenty millions sterling, above the yearly average of the preceding twelve years, found its way into the pockets of the farmers. In 1800 and 1801 the high prices led to a renewal of the same process; and as rents had not yet been generally raised, the farmers made large profits. More land was put under the plough, and the enclosure of commons also added to the quantity of cultivated soil. In the ten years from 1800 to 1809, 1,550,000 acres of common lands were enclosed. Thus it happened, that when the seasons again became favourable, and prices fell, an outcry was raised against the corn-law of 1791, which was altered two years after the close of the present period, when the price at which the nominal duty of 6*d.* was payable was raised to 6*s.* the quarter. From 1773 to 1804 the scale of protection had ascended from 4*s.* first to 5*s.* and then to 6*s.* The successive alternation of high and low prices was probably, in the then existing state of agriculture, of greater efficacy in stimulating its powers than a uniform high price would have been. At one period a high rate of profit diverted a fructifying stream of capital to this branch of industry; and at another low prices stimulated industry, and led to the abolition of old, slovenly, and expensive practices.

But of all the elements of agricultural prosperity which were in activity during the present period, undoubtedly the most valuable was that arising from the growth of commerce and manufactures. The increase of the population of England from 1780 to 1801 rather exceeded 1,500,000; and a larger proportion of this additional number than in any former period consisted of non-agricultural consumers. Our rising and thriving manufactures, especially those of cotton, were rapidly creating masses of profitable consumers of agricultural produce. Canals, which were comparatively unknown at the close of the American war, were increasing in number, and, extending to the remoter parts of the country, were the means of bringing its produce into the richest markets. If the population had not been steadily advancing, the tendency to uniformity of price would have been at first only a partial gain; but, as it was, every part of the country was immediately benefited. Agriculture was particularly benefited by the increased demand for animal food from the manufacturing towns and villages. Live-stock increased in value, to feed which the most improved practices of modern husbandry were forced into operation. Green crops, clover, artificial grasses, turnips, potatoes, and other roots were substituted for fallows. The land was subjected to a greater variety and a better rotation of crops, and under a less exhausting system of cultivation there was a greater abundance of manure, so that it was constantly kept in a higher state of fertility, and yielded annually a larger return, than it could have done under the ancient practice of taking successive corn-crops followed by fallows.

In this brief notice of the state of agriculture and the chief causes which led to its improvement in the period now under notice, the Board of Agriculture (established by Sir John Sinclair, and incorporated in August, 1793) must not be forgotten. Its secretary was Arthur Young, whose 'Agricultural Tours,' mentioned in our account of the preceding period, had a powerful effect in directing the public mind to practical inquiries on his favourite subject. The 'Annals of Agriculture' were commenced by him in 1784, and continued to appear till 1808. One of the first proceedings of the Board of Agriculture was to institute a survey of all the English counties on a uniform plan, which brought out, for the information of the class most interested in adopting them, all those improved practices originating in individual enterprise and intelligence, or those peculiar to the district, and which had hitherto been carried on in an isolated manner. The 'Surveys' were first printed for private circulation amongst the most intelligent agriculturists in the kingdom, as well as in each particular county; and, after undergoing correction and revision, they were subsequently published under the authority of the Board. As a whole they are very imperfectly and unequally executed, but they were useful in promoting the great work of that day—the development of the agricultural resources of the country. The Board of Agriculture was assisted by an annual grant from parliament; and during the years of scarcity it took upon itself to suggest and, as far as possible, provide remedies against the dearth. The Board collected information, and made reports to the minister on the state of the crops; and the statistics of agriculture which came into its possession were also at times made use of by the government. The Board encouraged experiments in agriculture by prizes to the successful improver on old practices; and the influence which it possessed over the provincial agricultural societies excited and combined the efforts of all in one direction. The two great agricultural fêtes of this period (the 'sheep-shearings' at Holkham and Woburn, at which hundreds of the most eminent agriculturists of the kingdom were annually assembled) were also not a little serviceable in stimulating the national taste in favour of agriculture. King George III. himself was also strongly attached to the same pursuit, and his extensive farms at Windsor occupied much of the time not devoted to the cares of state. His majesty was so decidedly in favour of working oxen in preference to horses, that not a single horse for tillage was worked upon these farms, but the number of working oxen employed was about two hundred. The economy or advantage of the two practices was the agricultural questio vexata of the period, but it has long been determined in favour of the horse.

We have thus briefly adverted to the most prominent circumstances which affected agriculture at the close of the eighteenth century. To have entered into details would have been to write a treatise on husbandry. The instrument most generally defective was probably the plough, and, after all the vicissitudes of the present century, it still remains, in some places, a cumbrous implement;* and, if the form be improved, it is still used as if it had lost none of its ancient clumsiness, and twice as many horses are employed in it as are really necessary. It is surprising that a practice of this nature should have prolonged its existence forty years after the close of the period of which we have been treating. Perhaps no isolated case could, however, now be found quite so bad as the nearly universal practice in reference to ploughing at the close of the last century. Middleton, in his Middlesex 'Survey,' says:—"In May, 1796, I saw, in one day, two teams with six horses in each, and three men to attend each team, namely, one to hold the plough and two to drive the horses, ploughing, with a wide furrow, about three-quarters of an acre per day. . . . I have seen a barley soil receive the last ploughing, previous to sowing turnips, with a team of five horses, and two men to attend them; and at the same time a team of six horses in length, with three men attending, were giving the first ploughing to a fallow." In the 'Farmers' Magazine' for July, 1800, there is a letter from "a Scots farmer, during a tour through England," in which the Hertfordshire plough is described:—"Our old Scottish plough," he says, "is but a child in comparison with this giant. Five horses are usually employed in the draught, and yet, strange to tell, the furrow we saw did not exceed four inches in deepness. I have seen land ploughed full deeper with one horse." In the 'Survey' of Northumberland, published in 1800, the author has some remarks on the strength of that prejudice which "continues the use of five horses, and heavy, clumsy, unwieldy wheel-ploughs, where a single swing-plough, and two horses yoked double, and driven by the holder, would do the same quantity of work equally well, and at one-third the expense!"

The nearer we approach to our own times, the more difficult does it become to present a condensed yet comprehensive view of the progress of that manufacturing industry to which the British empire owes so much of its greatness. Besides other reasons, in the infancy of national manufactures every useful invention presents, owing to its comparative isolation, an object to which the historian may direct his attention; while, under circumstances of more advanced progress, even greater improvements cease to be prominent or striking, simply because they are, as it were, surrounded by others of nearly equal magnitude. In like manner, the first establishment for the introduction of a new manufacture, and the name of its founder, assume a distinctness and prominence in history which cannot be given to their successors, although they may contribute in a far more important degree to the extension of the national resources. If, therefore, the period now under review should appear deficient of the prominent features which distinguished that immediately preceding it, such as the introduction of navigable canals, the improvement of the steam-engine, and the invention of automatic cotton-spinning, it should be remembered that the absence of such remarkable changes is indicative rather of the extent of the progress already realised, than of any falling-off in the spirit of improvement.

According to the method we followed in the last Book, our review of the productive industry of the British isles, from the close of the American war to the peace of Amiens, will be prefaced by a notice of that class of public improvements which tends to facilitate commercial intercourse. In allusion to these and other measures of kindred character, such as enclosures, draining, paving, and parochial improvements, Chalmers observes that, from the restoration of peace in 1783 till the commencement of the war in 1793, domestic meliorations had been carried on with equal vigour and success; but that during the succeeding war our domestic improvements were pursued with still greater knowledge and more useful efficacy. In illustration of these assertions, he states that the number of acts of parliament relating to roads and bridges, in the eight years from 1785 to 1792, was 302, and in the next period of eight years, from 1793 to 1800, 341. The numbers of acts relating to canals, harbours, &c., in the same periods, were, respectively, 64 and 132; of those relating to enclosures, draining, &c., 245 and 589; and of those for paving and other parochial improvements, 139 and 62;—making the total number of acts relating to local improvements 750 and 1124 in the two periods respectively. Thus, during a space of time (1785 to 1800 inclusive), nearly coincident with the period under review, 1874 acts of parliament in all were passed for the promotion of the above important objects; of which 643 related to roads, bridges, &c.; 196 to canals, harbours, and similar works; 834 to enclosures, draining, &c.; and the remaining 201 to paving and parochial improvements. With such facts before our eyes, we may well join with Chalmers in admiration at the augmented energy of the spirit of domestic improvement, in the midst of an expensive and exciting war. "The world will," he observes, "contemplate this enterprise with wonder. Millions, and tens of millions, have been raised upon the people, for carrying on an interesting war, yet they have found money, as they had skill and industry, to improve 'this island of bliss amid the subject seas.'" "Great Britain," he proceeds, "as it has been more improved during every war, is worth more, at the conclusion of it, than when hostilities began; and this happy isle, where the foot of the foe never treads, if it were brought to the hammer, would sell for more than it would have fetched at any former period, in proportion to its additional improvements.”*

The wretched condition of many even of the principal roads in England, early in the reign of George III., has been fully noticed in the preceding Book; † and we shall have occasion to observe that, at a period subsequent to that under consideration, right principles of road-making did not extend at a rate at all proportionate to the extension of turnpike-roads. There is, nevertheless, sufficient evidence to prove that very considerable improvement was made in the condition of the principal highways, between the time when their disgraceful state excited the indignation of Arthur Young and the close of the eighteenth century. A convincing proof of this amelioration is afforded by the substitution of mail-coaches for messengers on horseback, and in the comparative speed and regularity which, according to the advocates of that important measure, had been previously attained by the ordinary stage-coaches and diligences. The change alluded to was commenced in 1784, ‡ the first mail-coach upon Mr. Palmer's plan having left London for Bristol on the evening of the 2nd of August in that year. Notwithstanding the existence of opposition which now appears almost incredible, and which checked the progress of the plans introduced for accelerating the speed of the mails, as well as those for improving the internal management of the Post-Office, it appears, by a statement made by Mr. Palmer before a parliamentary committee in 1797, that down to that time three hundred and eighty towns, which had previously had but three posts a week, and forty which had had no post at all, were supplied with daily posts; and that the mails were conveyed upon many of the cross post-roads in one-third or even one-fourth of the time required before the adoption of his improvements. But more direct evidence of the improvement of the highways is not wanting. Adam Walker, in a tour published in 1792, which contains some interesting notices of the manufacturing district of Lancashire, adverts to some of the very roads upon which Young had been so justly severe about twenty years before. He states that, down to the middle of the eighteenth century, a causeway of round pebbles, about two feet wide, was all that man or beast could travel upon through both Cheshire and Lancashire; that as trade increased, and turnpikes became more general, the ruts were filled up with pebbles and cinders; but that, with such repair, the roads were not rendered passable in winter for coaches or chaises. “Indictments and lawsuits,” he proceeds to say, “at last produced a broad pavement, which would suffer two carriages to pass each other; and this was thought the ultimate perfection that a country without gravel could go to; and the narrow pavement became covered with grass. In this state the roads have continued many years, to the great profit of the coachmaker, and the cure of indigestion: but now both the broad and narrow pavements are pulling up, the pebbles breaking into smaller pieces, and their interstices filling up with sand.” “So far as this method has proceeded,” observes Walker, “the roads are become as good as in any part of England; and, no doubt, the utility will soon become general, enforced by so spirited and liberal a people as inhabit these counties.”* The comparative excellence of many of the principal highways of this country is frequently referred to with admiration by M. Faujas Saint-Fond, an intelligent Frenchman who visited Great Britain “for the purpose of examining the state of the arts, the sciences, natural history, and manners,” about the time of the commencement of the French revolution. Of the road from London to Stilton he observes, “Nothing can surpass the beauty and convenience of the road during these sixty-three miles: it resembles the avenue of a magnificent garden;” † and, excepting in the county of Derby, this traveller scarcely ever complains of the state of the roads. He frequently alludes to heaps of stones laid beside the roads for their repair. It should be observed, however, that the observations of Saint-Fond appear to have been chiefly made upon the principal roads, which were probably the best kept. Respecting the roads of Ireland we have little information; but Arthur Young states, as the result of his observations in 1776 and the two following years, that, although the turnpikes were generally left in a state disgraceful to the kingdom, the bye-roads were admirable, and could not fail to strike an English traveller exceedingly, on account of their superiority to those of the sister country. ‡ He attributes their superior preservation in a great degree to the use of light one-horse carts or cars, instead of the heavy team-waggons common in England.

The last fifteen years of the eighteenth century produced few improvements worthy of notice in the construction of railroads, which were, however, though very gradually, coming into more general use. The earliest of what may be distinguished as public railways, constructed by joint-stock companies for traffic in general merchandise, was that known as the Surrey Iron Railway, which extends from the river Thames, at Wandsworth, to Croydon; but, although the act of parliament authorising its construction received the royal assent May 21, 1801, this road was not opened until 1805. Several of the canal acts passed between 1776 and the close of the century contain provisions for the construction of short railways, either to connect mines, limekilns, quarries, or manufactories with the canals, or as inclined planes to connect two portions of canal, in lieu of a series of locks; and some very useful private railways were made during the period under review, for the use of individual commercial establishments.* One of the latter class, that completed in July, 1801, between the slate quarries of Lord Penrhyn, in Caermarthenshire, and Port Penrhyn, the place of shipment, is interesting from the novelty of its construction; the rails being made of an oval section, with the longer axis placed vertically, instead of being of the old flat form now known as tram-plates or plate-rails. By this arrangement, which was contrived by Mr. Benjamin Wyatt, the strength of the iron was applied in a much more advantageous way than formerly, while the rounded surface of the rails kept them free from the lodgment of stones and dirt. The wheels of the carriages, which were of very small dimensions, were grooved to fit the rails; and so great was the saving of labour effected by this railway, that ten horses were able to perform upon it an amount of work which required four hundred on the common road previously used.† Perhaps this is the first road to which the name of edge-railway can be properly applied, if we except the primitive wooden railways, which are the only kind mentioned by Saint-Fond as in use at the time of his visit to the neighbourhood of Newcastle-on-Tyne.‡ The ingenious foreigner was much pleased with these roads, which, he states, were often several miles long, and were extended on to wooden platforms projecting over the water at the shipping places, at such an elevation as to allow the ships to pass beneath them. The arrangements for emptying the waggons by opening the bottom, and for conducting the coal along inclined shoots immediately into the hold of the vessel, resembled those still in common use. The wooden rails were formed with a rounded upper surface, like a projecting moulding, and the waggon-wheels were "made of cast-iron, and hollowed in the manner of a metal pulley," that they might fit the rounded surface of the rails. After alluding to the arrangements mentioned in the last Book, § by which the force of gravity is made to reduce or even to supersede the labour of horses, Saint-Fond observes, "The great economy produced by these ingenious contrivances, which save the expense of employing a multitude of men and horses, enables the English to sell the coal which they export in such abundance to all our ports, on the ocean and the Mediterranean, at a lower price than it can be afforded from our own [the French] mines, in all cases where we have to bring it more than three or four miles by land." "Marseilles," he proceeds, "affords an example in point. This town, which consumes immense quantities of combustible matter in its great soap-manufactories, is within four or five leagues of a great number of coal-mines. This coal is indeed of an indifferent quality, but it is, notwithstanding, employed with advantage in the furnaces of soap-works. Would any one believe that the excellent coal of England, which lasts double the time and gives double the heat, when sold duty free in the port of Marseilles, is cheaper than the former." "Such instances as this," adds the enlightened Frenchman, "ought doubtless to give us very important lessons."* The only further circumstance requiring to be noticed here, in connexion with the progress of railroads, is the introduction of a more durable mode of construction, by the substitution of square blocks of stone, in lieu of pieces of timber, as sleepers, or supports for the rails; an improvement which, according to Day,† was introduced by Mr. Barnes, in 1797, in a colliery-railway near Newcastle-on-Tyne.

* Tredgold observes, in his 'Practical Treatise on Railroads,' 1825 (p. 22), in his description of the Cardiff and Merthyr railway or tram-road, which was formed on account of the deficiency of water in the upper part of the Glamorganshire canal, that "the act of parliament for this tram-road was obtained in 1794 (35 Geo. III.) by Messrs. Hompry, Hill, and Co.; and it appears to have been constructed under the first act ever granted for this species of road." We have, however, been unable to find such an act, either public or private, notwithstanding a diligent search.

The period embraced by this Book was one of great activity in the improvement of inland navigation. The important benefits arising from the construction of navigable canals were now no longer problematical, but had become matter of experience; while the incredulity which had opposed itself to the bold ideas of Brindley was silenced by the successful accomplishment of the great works of that engineer, and others whose talents had been called into activity by his example. This altered state of feeling on the part of the public, combined with the general increase of the manufactures and trade of the country, was productive of such activity in this kind of speculation in 1793 and 1794, that, within those two years only, acts of parliament were obtained for thirty-six new schemes for canals, "which," observes Phillips, "with other bills, for extending and amending rivers, &c., make forty-seven acts in that period relative to the inland navigation of this country." He adds that the expenditure involved in the undertakings of the above period amounted to the enormous sum of 5,300,000*l.*, and that the advantage was increased by the circumstance of this amount being expended at home, and chiefly among the industrious poor.‡

Of the numerous water communications effected during the space of time under consideration, it may suffice to mention a few of the most important. By lines of canal connecting the rivers Thames, Trent, Severn, and Mersey, which, by nearly dividing England into four parts, offered remarkable facilities for such a navigation, the great ports of London, Hull, Bristol, and Liverpool were not only rendered accessible to each other, but also to a great number of towns in the interior. In Scotland the completion of the Forth and Clyde canal opened a passage completely across the country, and, by connecting the inland districts with the ocean on either side, conferred an important benefit on its commercial interests. Such a canal had been proposed as early as the time of Charles II., when it was abandoned on account of the expense, which was estimated at 500,000*l.* The scheme was frequently revived between that time and the year 1768, when a company was incorporated for the purpose of executing the work, which was immediately commenced, and carried on with spirit until 1775, when it was suspended owing to the exhaustion of the company's funds. From a memorial presented to the lords of trade in 1779, it appears that the canal had been so far completed as to enable vessels fit to navigate the open seas to proceed from any part of the east side of Britain to Glasgow, but that the company were in debt and were obliged to charge tolls which were found too heavy for bulky goods of small value. A great number of noblemen and gentlemen of Great Britain and Ireland now joined in a recommendation that the undertaking should be completed by Government, on the ground of its importance to England and Ireland, as well as to Scotland, in reducing both coasting and foreign navigation, and avoiding the necessity of sailing round the northern extremity of Scotland, which was, in time of war, very hazardous at all seasons of the year, and in winter almost impracticable. Government assistance was not, however, granted until 1784, after which the works were resumed; and on the 28th of July, 1790, "the union of the two firths," says Macpherson, "was celebrated by Mr. Spiers, president of the committee of management, and Mr. Whitworth, the engineer, accompanied by the committee and the magistrates of Glasgow, by launching a hogshead of the water of the Forth into the Clyde;" "a ceremony," observes this writer, "of much more propriety and meaning than the annual marriage of the dukes of Venice with the Adriatic sea." The first sea-vessel passed through the canal in August of the same year; in May, 1791, a vessel called the 'Experiment' sailed from Dundee to Liverpool in four days by taking this course; and in the following year the brig 'George' passed from North-Queensferry to Madeira and back again, making use of the canal. The writer we have just quoted observes, in relating these circumstances, that thus "we see the intercourse of distant nations promoted by a canal occupying nearly the same ground on which the barbarous Romans erected their unavailing fence to obstruct the intercourse of brethren."* This canal, in a length of about thirty-five miles, has thirty-nine locks, by means of which it rises to an elevation of about 156 feet from the sea. In one place it crosses the river Kelvin by an aqueduct sixty-five feet above the water-line, or eighty-three feet from the bed of the river to the top of the masonry.

* Annals of Commerce, iii., 477, 641; iv., 203, 204.

Another ship canal, of less than half the length, but capable of receiving much larger vessels, was made a few years later between Gloucester and the river Severn, near Berkeley.

The gigantic works of Telford principally belong to the space of time to be treated of in the next Book, but the Ellesmere canal, one of the first extensive undertakings committed to him, was chiefly executed between 1793 and the close of the present period. This canal consists of a series of navigations, extending collectively to a length of more than one hundred miles, connecting the rivers Severn, Dee, and Mersey; and it passes over a country so uneven as to require the construction of works which, from their magnitude, surpass those of Brindley nearly as much as the latter had surpassed all previous achievements in civil engineering in this country. In the valleys of the Ceriog, or Chirk, and of the Dee, especially, aqueducts were erected in the construction of which all existing precedent was boldly departed from. It had been usual in such structures to make the bed for the canal of puddled clay, or clay mixed up with water and fine gravel or sand, and applied in such a manner as to form an impervious lining within the masonry of the bridge; but, in addition to the great expense of such an aqueduct, there was considerable risk of accident in frosty weather, owing to the expansion of the moist puddle. The Chirk aqueduct, being of very large dimensions, would have presented great difficulties but for the happy contrivance of Telford, who made the canal bed of flanged cast-iron plates resting on the masonry. This aqueduct, which was completed about 1801, at a cost of 20,898*l.*, consists of ten arches of forty feet span, and crosses the river at an elevation of seventy feet. The aqueduct bridge across the valley of the Dee, commonly called the Pont-y-Cysylte, is of still greater extent and elevation, and of simpler construction, consisting of a great trough of cast-iron plates laid on a series of eighteen piers or pillars of masonry, without stone walls on the sides to give the appearance of an ordinary bridge. The piers rise to the height of one hundred and twenty-one feet above low water, and are built solid to the height of seventy feet, above which they are hollow, but strengthened with interior walls. The trough is about one thousand feet long and nearly twelve wide, and it contains a towing-path supported upon cast-iron pillars. At one end of the aqueduct is an embankment of earth fifteen hundred feet long, and in some parts as much as seventy-five feet high. The aqueduct and embankment together cost 47,018*l., and their construction occupied about ten years, from 1795 to 1805.

* The above details are taken from the 'Life of Thomas Telford,' written by himself, and edited by his friend and executor, Mr. Rickman. The Baron Dupin, who gives a minute description of this extraordinary work in his 'Commercial Power of Great Britain,' mentions it in the following manner in his 'Memoirs on the Marine Bridges and High-roads of France and England':—"After a long and fatiguing walk," he observes, "I entered the valley on a fine autumnal evening, almost at the moment of sunset: never did a more magnificent scene burst upon my sight. In the midst of a vigorous vegetation, still retaining all its freshness, columns of smoke and

PONT-Y-CYSYLLE.

When Telford first proposed the use of iron for aqueducts, for a comparatively small structure on the Shrewsbury canal, it was feared by many that the effect of changes of temperature in causing expansion and contraction of the material would prove a fatal objection; but experience has fully confirmed his opinion of its fitness. He also introduced cast iron for many other engineering purposes to which it had not previously been applied, as in the framing of lock-gates; and in one instance, where the lock was dug in a quicksand, for the construction of the chamber also. In the years 1795 and 1796 he built an iron bridge, of very superior design to that of Colebrook Dale,* over the Severn, at Buildwas. It has a very flat arch of a hundred and thirty feet span, and is especially deserving of notice from the circumstance of the engineer having introduced the principle of trussing, so as to make the structure more nearly resemble a wooden bridge than one of masonry; and this principle has been frequently followed since.

flame, perpetual eruptions from the craters of industry, furnaces, forges, limekilns, and heaps of coal ignited to become, by the very operation of ignition, a perfect combustible; manufactories, country-houses, and villages, placed in the form of an amphitheatre, on the sides of the valley; below, a rapid torrent; above, the canal-bridge, placed, as if by enchantment, on lofty and slender pillars of an elegant and simple construction; and this magnificent work the fruit of the happy and bold efforts of one of my friends. Lost in the contemplation of these beauties of art and nature, which by the fading away of the declining light changed their appearance every moment, I stood as it were in ecstasy, till the close of twilight obliged me to retire and seek an asylum at some miles' distance."

other means, was boldly followed by his immediate successors in canal-making. Several tunnels of much greater length than that of Harecastle hill* were made before the close of the eighteenth century; some of them being from two to three miles long. That at Sapperton, on the Thames and Severn canal, is nearly two miles and a half long, and 250 feet below the summit of the hill. It is large enough for the passage of boats of 70 tons burden, drawing four feet of water. The works, which were executed under the care of Mr. Whitworth, one of the principal canal engineers of his time, were visited by George III. and his queen on the 19th of July, 1788; the first boat passed through the tunnel on the 20th of April, 1789; and the canal was opened for use in the following November.† The successful accomplishment of such subterraneous works even led to a project, for the execution of which a company was incorporated in 1799, for a dry tunnel, or subaqueous road, beneath the river Thames, between Gravesend and Tilbury: but, although the works were actually begun, they were speedily abandoned; and, though a similar work was commenced much nearer the metropolis in 1804, and slowly proceeded with for some years, it remained for another generation to see the almost insuperable difficulties of such a scheme successfully grappled with by the genius of a Brunel. How little these difficulties were appreciated by the projectors of the Gravesend tunnel may be conceived from the fact that their proposed capital was only 30,000*l.*, with power to increase it, if necessary, to 50,000*l.* Nothing, however, can give a more striking idea of the dauntless spirit which displayed itself in such works, in this early stage of modern civil engineering, than the collieries of the Duke of Bridgewater, whose canal and earlier works at Worsley have been mentioned in a former chapter.* In 1800 the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce awarded their gold medal to his grace for his "great exertions in inland navigation;" and on that occasion the Rev. Francis H. Egerton communicated to the society an interesting description of the subterraneous works at Walkden Moor, between Worsley and Bolton, in Lancashire, from which it appears that the duke's navigation extended, in various directions, to the total length of forty miles upon one level, without a lock, above ground: in addition to which there were about twelve miles of tunnelling upon the same level, which, together with eighteen miles of the Grand Trunk Canal, also upon the same level, made a total of seventy miles of navigable canal, available for the conveyance of coals from the mines, without the trouble or delay of a single lock. In addition to the twelve miles of tunnel on the level of the open canal, there were, at the time referred to, six miles more upon a higher level, thirty-five yards and a half above the former, yet from thirty-eight to sixty-one yards below the surface of the earth. The whole of these excavations were more than ten feet wide, between eight and nine feet high, and had three feet seven inches depth of water. Until shortly before the date of the paper, the coal* collected in the upper level was conveyed to the boats on the lower canal by unloading, and letting it down vertical shafts in tubs; and the boats employed in the upper story of tunnelling had to be hauled up to the surface of the ground at Walkden Moor, whenever they needed repair. These serious inconveniences were remedied by the construction, in a place where the strata offered remarkable facilities for the purpose, of a subterraneous inclined plane about a hundred and fifty yards long, descending from the upper to the lower level. A railway was laid on this inclined plane, and the boats to be transferred from one level to the other were floated (at the upper end by means of a lock) on to low carriages or cradles. Being then connected with a rope passing round a roller at the top, the loaded boat, weighing, with its cradle, about twenty-one tons, quickly descended to the lower level, drawing the empty boat, with its cradle; weighing together about nine tons, up the plane, to be floated to the proper point for receiving a fresh supply of coal. Thirty loaded boats were by this means conveniently let down, and as many empty ones were drawn up, within eight hours. This inclined plane was commenced in September, 1795, and finished in October, 1797; and it is stated to have been the contrivance of the Duke of Bridgewater himself.* In some cases boats were passed from one level to another by similar means, instead of by locks, upon ordinary open canals. Macpherson mentions an instance of this kind, under the year 1788, in a navigable communication between the Donnington Wood Canal and the river Severn, in which the barges were raised, by three inclined planes, to a perpendicular height of four hundred and fifty-five feet; but in this instance the moving-power was supplied by steam-engines, or, as they were then called, fire-engines.†

In concluding this brief notice of the progress of canals, it may be stated that, between 1758 and the close of the present period, about one hundred and sixty-five acts of parliament were passed for making, altering, and amending canals in Great Britain, at an expense, provided by private individuals or companies, of 13,008,199*l.* The navigations thus formed amounted to about 2896½ miles, without including forty-three private canals, of which neither the length nor the cost is stated.‡ It may be readily imagined that many of these undertakings, however beneficial to the country, proved anything but remunerative to their owners; but the brilliant success of others served to encourage new speculations. Under the year 1792, Macpherson mentions that the canal commenced in 1769, between the coal-works at Wednesbury and Birmingham, had reduced the price of coal from 13*s.* to 8*s.* 4*d.* per ton; and that the value of the shares, which were issued at 140*l.*, had risen to 370*l.* in 1782, and in 1792 to 1170*l.* In the latter year, also, the 100*l.* shares in the Birmingham Canal rose to upwards of 1000*l.*§

A remarkable feature in the history of civil engineering, towards the close of the eighteenth century, was the practical application of the diving-bell—an invention of much earlier origin, but which appears to have been first applied in submarine building operations in 1779, when Smeaton employed it in repairing the foundations of Hexham bridge.|| He used it again in 1788, in* the much more important works at Ramsgate harbour; and since that time it has been frequently applied with great advantage.

While England is the principal field to be regarded in these notices, symptoms of a like spirit of improvement in other countries claim a brief mention. Macpherson, under the year 1785, observes, that the general spirit of improvement which then manifested itself may perhaps in some degree have been "the effect of the war, which brings people of different nations, of those classes who do not move from home in time of peace, to mix together, whereby they have opportunities of remarking the improvements and advantages unknown, but attainable, in their own countries."

|| The Report in which Smeaton recommended the use of this apparatus contains an interesting and simple explanation of the principle on which it acts. It is dated September 16, 1778, and is printed in the collected edition of his Reports, vol. iii. p. 279.

He mentions, as illustrations of this movement, the commencement, in 1784, of a grand canal, intended to effect a communication between the Bay of Biscay and the Mediterranean Sea, in Spain, which was intended to be 420 miles long, 9 feet deep, and to pass over an elevation of 3000 feet. Political troubles intervened, however, to check all such efforts at improvement in that kingdom. In Russia a canal was made between the Twertz, or Twerza, a branch of the river Volga, and the Mista, or Msta, which, though short in itself, completed, with the help of rivers and lakes, an inland navigation of 1434 miles, between the Caspian and the Baltic Seas. In Denmark, also, a very useful ship canal was cut across the peninsula of Jutland, connecting the Baltic Sea with the ocean.* Several important public works, undertaken in France early in the present period are mentioned by Arthur Young, who published an account of his travels in that country during the years 1787, 1788, and 1789; but they appear to have been executed with little discretion. Of the neighbourhood of Narbonne he observes:—"The roads here are stupendous works. I passed a hill, cut through to ease a descent, that was all in the solid rock, and cost 90,000 livres (3937/.), yet it extends but a few hundred yards. Three leagues and a half from Sejean to Narbonne cost 1,800,000 livres (78,750/.)." "These ways," he proceeds, "are superb even to a folly. Enormous sums have been spent to level even gentle slopes. The causeways are raised and walled on each side, forming one solid mass of artificial road, carried across the valleys to the height of six, seven, or eight feet, and never less than fifty wide. There is a bridge of a single arch, and a causeway to it, truly magnificent: we have not an idea of what such a road is in England. The traffic of the way, however, demands no such exertions: one-third of the breadth is beaten, one-third rough, and one-third covered with weeds. In thirty-six miles I have met one cabriolet, half-a-dozen carts, and some old women with asses." A little farther on he notices the striking contrast between the splendour of the roads and the poverty of the people:—"Women without stockings, and men without shoes; but, if their feet are poorly clad, they have the superb consolation of walking upon magnificent causeways. The new road is fifty feet wide, and fifty more dugged away or destroyed to make it."† With so lavish a disregard of expenditure, it can excite little surprise to find, as we do, by the same authority, that the works of the great canal of Picardy were standing still for want of money; and, with so little attention to the real wants of the country, it could hardly be expected that the capital expended upon public works in France should produce either the pecuniary return or the benefit to the commercial interest generally which accompanied those undertaken in Great Britain.

The inventions of Watt having been described in a previous volume,* it is only necessary in this place to notice a few facts relating to their history down to the close of the century. In the case of the man whose discoveries, as has been observed, "have taught us to wield, almost at will, perhaps the mightiest instrument ever intrusted to the hands of man,"† moral difficulties were found, as they have proved in many other instances, far less easy to overcome than those of a physical nature. It has been mentioned in the former notice, that in 1775 the term of Watt's patent was extended for a period of twenty-five years; notwithstanding the opposition, as he himself states in a letter to his father, of "many of the most powerful people in the House of Commons,"‡ but we find that, after he had gained this victory in parliament, his rivals and opponents did not leave him to reap the fruit of his exertions in peace, but merely changed their mode of attack from time to time, according to circumstances. The miners of Cornwall had no sooner experienced the advantages of the improved steam-engines, than they endeavoured, by the most unworthy devices, to evade the payment of that portion of the saving effected by them for which the patentees had stipulated. On the slightest pretexts some of these men declared their engagements to be dissolved, and thus Messrs. Boulton and Watt were continually involved in expensive and annoying legal processes. Arago mentions Roy, Mylne, Herschel, Deluc, Ramsden, Robison, Murdoch, Rennie, Cumming, More, and Southern as men who, under these circumstances, publicly and powerfully defended the rights of persecuted genius. Mild and amiable as Watt was, seven years of litigation occasioned him such deep vexation that he occasionally expressed himself in terms which indicate his sense of the injustice done to him. "We have been so beset with plagiarists," he observes, in a letter to Dr. Black, quoted by Arago, "that, if I had not a very good memory of my doing it, their impudent assertions would lead me to doubt whether I was the author of any improvement on the steam-engine; and the ill-will of those we have most essentially served, whether such improvements have not been highly prejudicial to the commonwealth." When the opposition on the plea of want of originality or merit was completely silenced, a fresh attack was made upon the rights of the patentees, on the pretence that Watt's written description of his invention, given at the time of obtaining his first patent, was imperfect. As this specification was drawn up when he had no experience beyond that derived from the construction of the model at Kinneil,* it could not be otherwise, if, according to the view which appears to have been taken by the opponents of the patent, the specification was to be considered as a description and explanation of the complete machine. Such, however, as must appear upon careful consideration of the circumstances, is a most incorrect as well as illiberal view of the case. Watt did not pretend to be the inventor of the steam-engine, but of certain improvements in its construction, of which the principal were the closing of the cylinder, so as to prevent the influx of cold air, and the adoption of a separate vessel for condensing the steam, so that the cylinder might not be cooled by that operation. These were improvements of so clear and tangible a character as to be unaffected by a change in the precise form or position of the condenser, or by the introduction of new or modified members in other parts of the machine. The minor alterations suggested by experience should, therefore, be regarded rather as additions to, than as modifications of those to which an exclusive right was granted by his patent; although, from their intimate connection with the more essential features of his machine, the exclusive right to the latter secured a virtual monopoly in the whole. Taking this view of the subject, it can hardly fail to excite surprise to find that, after a lapse of twenty years, "or rather," as Stuart observes, "after a series of experiments in which he had been engaged for twenty years, to develop his ideas, the splendid result of his genius and perseverance—the perfect machine—was raised up in judgment against him, to prove that between the years 1790 and 1800 the engines which were sent from Soho were more perfect than could be fabricated from the description he gave of the one he erected in 1769!" "Generous rivals!" he adds, "nay, several of his adversaries confessed that the machine was yet the subject of expensive and elaborate experiments: for they had, it seems, seen recent engines with very varied proportions; and they went so far as to acknowledge that some of the parts which Watt had introduced did not appear to them to be essential to the precise, or effective action of the machinery; yet these parts were pointed out as having no existence in the document of 1769; and, because they had not, Watt, in their opinion, was not entitled to the reward of his admirable invention."* It is lamentable to find among the assailants of the patent the ingenious and worthy Bramah, whose high talents entitle him to honourable mention in this portion of our history, and whose integrity and just appreciation of the beautiful contrivances of Watt render his printed letter to the judge who presided at a trial in which he appeared as a witness a most interesting document in favour of the invention which he attacked solely on the discreditable ground above stated. Though Watt came off victorious, it is probable that the harassing opposition to which he had been so long subjected had some influence in determining him to retire from business on the final expiration of his patent in 1800, when his son and the son of his colleague took the management of the works at Soho. Strange, indeed, it is to turn from the record of such proceedings as the above to the bursts of enthusiastic admiration which, after the death of Watt, seemed to exhaust the powers of language in eulogising the man and his imperishable inventions, and to prompt the most eminent of his countrymen in politics, in literature, and in science to raise statues to his memory—"Not," as eloquently expressed by Lord Brougham upon that erected in Westminster Abbey, "to perpetuate a name which must endure while the peaceful arts flourish, but to show that mankind have learnt to honour those who best deserve their gratitude."

‡ M. Arago says, in his Historical Eloge of James Watt (we quote from Muirhead's translation, published in quarto by Murray), "It seemed to me matter of curious inquiry to what class in society belonged those parliamentary personages of whom Watt here speaks, and who refused to the man of genius a small portion of the riches which he was about to create. Judge of my astonishment when I found at their head the celebrated Burke." On this, M. Arago indulges in some strictures, which better information would have shown him to have been uncalled for; for Muirhead states in a note (on p. 76), that "Mr. Burke's opposition is believed to have arisen, not from any hostility to Mr. Watt or his patent, but simply from a sense of duty in defending what he conceived, or what were represented to him to be, the claims of a constituent."

We possess no statistical data to show the progress of the application of the steam-engine to the assistance of manufacturing industry, but it is evident that it was not so rapid as the extent of its powers might lead us to suppose. As will be seen from the account of the progress of the cotton manufacture in a subsequent page, the application of the steam-engine to the direct or immediate impulsion of the machinery of a cotton-mill was commenced in 1785, although it was not until 1789 that one was erected for that purpose in Manchester, where its introduction began a new era in that department of industry. Even down to the time when the inventions of Watt became common property, at the close of the century, their introduction had made comparatively slow progress in districts where, from the cheapness of fuel, economy was not so imperatively called for as in the mining districts of Cornwall; and the imperfect machines of Newcomen and Savary were still generally used. "In London, at the expiration of the patent," observes Stuart, "not more than a power equal to the energy of 650 horses was exerted by Watt's engines; in Manchester about 450 horse-power; and at Leeds about 300 horse-power; and at the same time not more than four steam-engines, of any importance, were at work in the whole continent of America,"* one of which supplied New York with water, and two belonged to the corporation of Philadelphia. In the next five years, according to the same authority, the number of Watt's engines in London was doubled, and a greater number had been made at Soho than in the same space of time before the manufacture was thrown open to competition.

Though the advantages of steam locomotion were not experienced till a subsequent period, the talents of several ingenious men in England, France, and North America were directed towards this object, especially in navigation, towards the latter end of the eighteenth century.† We can here only notice the experiments of Messrs. Patrick Miller, James Taylor, and William Symington, by whose joint efforts, more than by any other attempts of so early a date the practicability of steam navigation was established. A full and very interesting account of their experiments, and of the probable share of credit due to each, is contained in a volume recently published by Mr. John Scott Russell,‡ from which it appears that in October, 1788, a small pleasure-boat, in which a steam-engine had been mounted in a temporary manner, was launched upon the lake at Dalswinton, in Dumfries-shire, the residence of Mr. Miller; and it moved satisfactorily at the rate of five miles an hour, to the no small amusement of the country-people, who assembled from all quarters to witness the wonders of "a boat driven by reek," or smoke. Mr. Russell, whose practical knowledge imparts much value to such a statement, expresses his belief "that there has never since that time been constructed a model steam-vessel, on the same scale, that has attained a greater velocity." The second experiment of this scientific triumvirate was made in the following year, on the Forth and Clyde Canal, with a vessel sixty feet long, propelled by an engine made for the purpose at the Carron works; and in this case, we are informed, "the vessel was propelled with perfect success, at the rate of nearly seven miles an hour; being about as great a velocity as it has been found possible to obtain by steam-boats on canals, even at the present day."§ That so grand an invention should, after experiments of so satisfactory a character, have lain idle for many years, is a somewhat surprising fact. Mr. Miller, whose patriotic spirit and ardent attachment to science were displayed also in other cases, was a man advanced in life, and had retired from business to his country-seat, from the quiet of which he was not likely to be drawn, without the prospect of personal benefit, to wage war with the prejudices which would then have opposed, as they did at a later period, an attempt to introduce so startling an innovation; and neither Taylor, who was a tutor in his family, nor Symington, who was an ingenious mechanic, possessed the wealth and influence necessary for such an undertaking. The project, therefore, remained stationary for more than ten years, when it was revived under the patronage of Lord Dundas, who was an extensive proprietor in the Forth and Clyde Canal, and who employed Symington to construct a tug-boat impelled by steam, as a substitute for the horses employed in towing vessels. This vessel was tried in March, 1802, and acted well; but the invention was once more allowed to fall into obscurity, in consequence of an idea that the agitation of the water by the paddle-wheels would injure the banks of the canal. To the above experiments, however, the subsequent successful introduction of steam navigation, both in North America and in Scotland, may be distinctly traced.

In the history of mining there is not much to claim our notice in the present period. The construction of canals, and the general increase of manufacturing industry, greatly increased the consumption of coal; and few things appear to have struck the French traveller Saint-Fond more than the activity of the English in raising and distributing the produce of their collieries, and the national advantages derived from them. He rejects also the idea of any serious harm arising from the extensive use of coal in London, regarding the ventilation produced by so many large fires as compensating for the evils occasioned by the noxious exhalations of burning coal; and he further endeavours to rouse his countrymen to a just sense of the benefits which they might derive from their own deposits of mineral fuel, even though its general use should put the "fashionables of Paris, like those of London, to the trouble of changing their linen twice a-day."* This writer's account of the waggon-ways laid down for the transport of coal about Newcastle has been noticed in a previous page; and he states that the collieries of that district, besides forming immense magazines of fuel for the rest of England, were also the source of an extensive and profitable foreign commerce. Referring to the advantages of the coal-trade as a nursery for the navy, he states that, in time of war, more than a thousand coal-vessels had been armed, and supplied with letters of marque, by which means much harm had been done to the enemy's commerce.† Macpherson gives, on the authority of published letters addressed to Pitt, on the subject of the taxes on coal, a summary of the persons employed in the collieries of Northumberland and Durham, and in the trade connected with them, in the year 1792, from which it appears that the number of men and boys employed in working the coal, conveying it to the river, and loading the keels in which it was conveyed to the ships, in the coal-works of the Tyne alone, was 6704; the keelmen, with their boys and coal-boatmen, amounted to 1547; the seamen on board the coal-ships to 8000; the coal-factors, merchants, clerks, lightermen, meters, &c., to 2000; and other persons employed more or less indirectly, including purveyors of provisions and stores for the keels and ships, to 3649: making a total of 21,900. Their families are estimated at 16,575; making a grand total of 38,475 persons supported by the coal-works on the Tyne. In those upon the river Wear, about 3000 persons were employed underground, and about 15,000 altogether; which, allowing 11,250 for their families, makes 26,250 persons supported by those collieries. The coal-works in Cumberland and on the Firth of Forth,* according to the same authority, were supposed to employ upwards of 6000 pitmen, labourers, and seamen, whose families are estimated at 4500 persons; so that more than 75,000 persons were supported directly or indirectly by these principal collieries. The capital invested in the coal-trade of Northumberland at this time was supposed to be about 3,130,000*l.*; of which 1,030,000*l.* was allowed for fifty collieries, with their keels; 1,400,000*l.* for the shipping; and the remaining 700,000*l.* for the capital of the coal-buyers and factors in London.† It may be observed that the numbers above given are not so large as might be expected from other statements in Macpherson and Anderson, quoted in our notice of the coal-trade in the preceding period;‡ but the above is evidently a cautious estimate, and, so far as the number of persons supported by the collieries is concerned, it is probably below the truth. The gradual increase in the consumption of coal is shown by the fact that, according to official documents quoted by Macpherson,§ the average annual importation into London was 774,664 chaldrons in the five years from 1786 to 1790; 789,890 chaldrons in the next period of five years; and 853,129 chaldrons in the five years ending with 1800. The number of voyages made from Newcastle and Sunderland, by vessels in the coal-trade, in the twenty years from 1780 to 1799, was 214,700, of which 59,833 were to London; and the number of vessels employed in the trade from Newcastle and Sunderland to London in May, 1800, was 597; these being, it is stated, generally larger than those employed in the coasting and foreign coal-trade.

Saint-Fond, in his account of the neighbourhood of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, makes some remarks on the methods adopted for converting to a profitable use the coal-dust which accumulated in immense quantities at the pits, and for which there was no sufficient demand, notwithstanding its extensive use in glass-houses, lime-kilns, brick-kilns, and forges. At Liege such coal was mixed with clay, and kneaded into balls or lumps, which were used as fuel for domestic purposes; but the high price of labour and the cheapness of superior coal prevented the extensive imitation of this practice in England. The pulverised coal was therefore employed in a different way, by taking advantage of its agglutinating properties, and converting it into coke, which was used as a fuel for chamber-fires, as well as in the manufacture of iron. Similar means for condensing coal-dust were, Saint-Fond states, in use in France before the Revolution, and even some improvements had been there effected upon the English process. The coal thus prepared was called purified or dephlogisticated coal, and was much used in Paris for a time; but it is stated in a note, that since the commencement of the Revolution none of the purified coal had been taken to Paris; the establishments for its preparation had been broken up; and the destruction of the forests was going on without any check; an evil which the intelligent Frenchman deeply deploras.* The manufacture of coke and coal-tar had been suggested to the English by the German chemist Becher, about the year 1682; but, as we mentioned in the preceding Book,† it was not established on an important scale until shortly before the commencement of the present period. Mr. William Pitt, of Pendeford, near Wolverhampton, in a communication to the Society of Arts in 1790, alludes to three great establishments then in successful operation under the patent or privilege granted to the Earl of Dundonald in 1785, at Mr. Wilkinson's great works at Bradley; at Tipton; and at the Dudley Wood colliery and iron works. "The iron-masters," observes Mr. Pitt, "furnish the tar-works with raw coal, gratis, and receive in return the cokes produced by such coal; and the proprietors of the tar-works have the smoke only [or rather the tar made from it] for their labour and interest of capital."‡ The success of this plan led Mr. Pitt to devise a method for extracting tar from the smoke of steam-engines, and thereby destroying a nuisance which has since occupied the attention of many ingenious men, though with little practical effect.

Notices of the advancing state of British iron-manufactures abound in works which treat on the commerce and industry of the period under review. Lord Sheffield, in his 'Observations on the Manufactures, Trade, and Present State of Ireland,' which were published in 1785, treats of manufactures of steel and iron at considerable length, considering them to be an object of the greatest national importance, although they had, as he observes, "been in a great degree rescued within a few years almost from ruin, by the ingenuity and spirit of a few men, who deserve, at least, as well of their country as any of its most favourite patriots." The history of the progress of the iron manufacture appears somewhat complicated, owing to the error, which Lord Sheffield states that he himself fell into in his work on the commerce of the American States, of considering both pig and bar iron as raw materials, whereas they are really manufactured articles, and the latter a manufacture far advanced. The smelting of iron ores, and production of pig iron and articles of cast iron, by means of pit coal, was an improvement brought into extensive exercise before the year 1785, as shown in the last Book.* The use of the same fuel for converting pig iron into bar iron of good quality was an object not accomplished on an important scale until somewhat later. Even the former improvement, however, required much time to become general. According to a recently published summary, † founded on official documents, there were, in 1740, when wood charcoal was the only fuel used for the purpose, 59 blast-furnaces for smelting iron ores in Great Britain, and their annual produce was 17,350 tons of cast iron, or, on an average, about 294 tons per annum from each furnace. By the year 1788, there remained only 24 charcoal blast-furnaces, producing 13,100 tons of iron annually, or about 546 tons each, on an average; this great increase in the quantity produced by each furnace being chiefly attributable to the substitution of cylinder blowing-machines, worked with pistons, for the common wooden bellows. At the same time there were 53 blast-furnaces in operation with coke made from pit coal, furnishing 48,800 tons of iron annually, or about 920 † tons each, on an average. This statement makes the total number of furnaces at that time 77, and their gross produce 61,900 tons. By 1796 the wood charcoal process was almost entirely given up; and parliamentary returns show that there were then 121 blast-furnaces, producing at the rate of 124,879 tons annually, which gives an average of 1032 tons yearly from each furnace. In 1802 the number of furnaces was 168, and the produce about 170,000 tons, which gives a somewhat lower average from each. The progress of the application of pit coal to the refining of pig iron, or the manufacture of bar or malleable iron, cannot be shown with equal precision. "This operation," says Dr. Ure, "was formerly effected by the agency of wood charcoal, in refineries analogous to those still made use of in France; but, when that kind of fuel began to be scarce in this island, it came to be mixed with coke in various proportions." "The bar iron thus produced," he adds, "was usually hard, and required much time to convert; so that an establishment which could produce twenty tons of bar iron in a week was deemed considerable." The great importance of such improvements as should enable English bar iron to compete successfully with that imported from Russia and Sweden is shown by the statements of several writers. Lord Sheffield, writing at the commencement of the period under review, states that from 50,000 to 60,000 tons of pig iron, and between 20,000 and 30,000 tons of bar iron, were made annually in Britain; while the demand for the latter was from 70,000 to 80,000 tons, of which between 50,000 and 60,000 tons were imported, the value of which was so much money paid for foreign labour. To add to this evil, the price of foreign iron was rising rapidly, partly owing to the immense destruction of the forests which supplied fuel. He adds that the value of labour would rise with the decrease of vassalage and the increase of civilization; and observes that the surprisingly low price of iron in Russia at the time he wrote "is partly accounted for by this circumstance, that the empress grants a district with the peasantry on it; and, the person to whom it is granted not paying for the latter, as is usual in other countries where negroes are employed, the price of their labour is merely the expense of keeping them." While he conceives that recent improvements justified the hope that the better sorts of iron might ere long be successfully manufactured at home, this writer expresses a belief, "that if the duty on the import of foreign iron was removed, many great iron-works would be immediately discontinued." "Works would be neglected," he observes, "which within a few years have cost immense sums, but would become useless and of no value, to the ruin of those men who with great spirit have invested their fortunes in them, under the faith and expectation that the duties on foreign iron would continue." Lord Sheffield, nevertheless, considers that the exertions of the ingenious men then engaged in the business might in a few years enable them to stock the home market, and allow the duty to be taken off foreign iron, because it would no longer be worth while to import it; and he refers to an improved method of making coke bar iron, introduced by Messrs. Wright and Jesson, by which the quality had been improved and the quantity increased. This increase appeared likely to continue, "for, as nearly the same number of furnaces are," he observes, "kept up as were during the war, and few cannon are now making, the immense quantity of cast iron which was annually absorbed by these instruments will now be converted into bar iron, and many of the cannon themselves will be literally turned into ploughshares, hoops, and nails."* Macpherson, in noticing, under the date 1785, the efforts of Mr. Cort to compete with the Swedish bar iron, follows up his remarks on the national importance of the object aimed at by relating that, "in consequence of the scarcity and high price of fuel, and of the high price of labour, some English proprietors of iron-works about this time transferred their capitals from England to Russia, where they erected extensive works for rolling and slitting iron, and for tinning sheet iron." "So true is it," he adds, "that heavy taxes, the principal cause of the high price of labour, will devour themselves by diminishing the number of contributors to them. Nor is this the whole of the evil: foreigners are thereby instructed in the process of manufactures, the superiority of which has made Great Britain the first commercial nation in the world."* Some-what later, in 1787, the Society of Arts offered a premium for the making of fine bar iron with pit coal, considering, like Lord Sheffield, that the great improvements recently effected by the spirited exertions of British iron manufacturers rendered the accomplishment of the desired object probable.†

The precise share of credit due to Cort and other manufacturers in the improvement of the iron manufacture is not very distinctly recorded, nor is it of material consequence. Dr. Ure, who states that Great Britain is indebted to Mr. Cort for the methods now practised, tells us that he succeeded, after many unsuccessful experiments, "in converting cast iron into bar iron, by exposing it on the hearth of a reverberatory furnace to the flame of pit coal." This method, however, did not answer perfectly, the quality of the metal produced by it being very uncertain; and it was improved upon by causing the operation of the reverberatory furnace, which is called puddling, to be preceded by a kind of refinery with coke, to prepare the iron for becoming malleable. Among Cort's other improvements, he substituted the use of drawing-rollers or cylinders for the extension of bars under the hammer, an improvement of great importance in facilitating the manufacture of wrought iron.‡ Mr. Holland, who describes Cort as an iron-master in the county of Gloucester, states that, "although he secured his practice by a patent, he was unsuccessful, and ruin overtook him before he could turn to his own advantage that scheme which was presently matured, and became so profitable in the hands of others." "The first individual who succeeded," he adds, "and derived from it a princely fortune, was a resident of South Wales, who had the judgment to perceive and the spirit to patronise the ingenuity of a person who, acting as his engineer, carried toward perfection the art of puddling. The process was quickly introduced into every part of the country where the iron trade was carried on: besides, as the invention, by superseding foreign iron, made some noise, and at the same time promised well, many individuals became impressed with the idea not merely that iron was the most valuable of metals, but that its preparation was the direct way to wealth. The infatuation was too powerful to be withstood; the business was rushed into with capitals of from 10,000*l.* to 100,000*l.*—iron works multiplied rapidly, the quantity produced exceeded the consumption, competition reduced the price below the expense of manufacturing, and not a few adventurers had to tell a tale of disappointment and ruin."§

from the statement of Lord Sheffield, intended to show how ruinous a proposed tax on coal would have been to the iron manufacture, that one company in Shropshire consumed 500 tons of coal daily, and that many of the manufacturers intended to throw up their works if the tax had been imposed. The 'Statistical Account of Scotland,' published in 1792,† states that about that time the Carron iron works, the establishment of which is noticed in the preceding Book,‡ gave employment to about 1000 workmen, consumed 136 tons of coal daily, and had five blast furnaces, sixteen air furnaces, and three cupola furnaces, and a steam-engine which consumed sixteen tons of coal in twenty-four hours, raised four tons and a half of water at a stroke, and made seven strokes per minute. The population of the parish had risen from 1864, in 1755, to upwards of 4000, in 1790. Saint-Fond, who styles this the greatest iron-foundry in Europe, gives a very interesting description of its numerous buildings and powerful machinery. He was particularly struck with the extent and singular appearance of the coking fires, which differed materially from those at Newcastle, in consequence of the coal being in large pieces. "There is," he says, "such a numerous series of these places for making coke to supply so vast a consumption, that the air is heated to a considerable extent, and that during the night the sky is entirely illuminated with the flames." "When one observes," he adds, "at a little distance, so many masses of burning coal on one side, and so many volumes of flame darting to a great height above the high furnaces on the other—and at the same time hears the noise of weighty hammers striking upon resounding anvils mingled with the loud roaring of bellows,—one doubts whether he is at the foot of a volcano in actual eruption, or whether he has been transported by some magical effect to the brink of the cavern where Vulcan and his Cyclops are occupied in preparing thunderbolts."§ The British government alone were no inconsiderable patrons of the iron manufacture, for about 1795 the average quantity of metal purchased by the Board of Ordnance in the form of cannon, mortars, carronades, shot, and shells, taking the account of three years, was estimated at nearly 11,000 tons annually. The East India Company took annually about 5000 or 6000 tons, and armed trading-vessels not belonging to that body were said to purchase about 10,000 tons; thus making a total demand for such articles to the amount of about 26,000 tons annually.|| A remarkable instance of the extent of another branch of the manufacture is related by Macpherson under the date 1788, in an order given to the celebrated English manufacturer, Mr. Wilkinson, for iron piping to the extent of forty miles, to be used for supplying Paris with water. The Society of Arts, in mentioning this order, states that the steam-engines required for the water-works were also supplied from England, and designates the whole "the largest and most useful apparatus modern times can boast of."* The extended use of cast iron in engineering works has been already noticed in connexion with the labours of Telford; but one other structure, the cast iron bridge over the river Wear, at Sunderland, claims special notice on account of its extraordinary dimensions. The arch, which is a segment of a very large circle, is of 236 feet span, and 94 feet above the level of the water, so that vessels of 300 tons burden can pass under it, by lowering their top-gallant masts. It was projected by, and principally erected with the capital of, Mr. Rowland Burdon, who designed it about the year 1790, and obtained an act of parliament for building it two years later; and the total cost of the undertaking, including the purchase of ferries and other incidental expenses, was 41,800.† Iron appears to have been first used for the construction of boats about 1787, by Mr. Wilkinson; and shortly afterwards sheet copper was tried for a similar purpose.‡ The manufacture of cast iron pots and pans for culinary and various other purposes, for the method of casting, annealing, and tinning of which a patent had been granted in 1779 to a person named Taylor, of Birmingham,§ had now attained considerable importance. Large pans, or coppers, for the use of the sugar manufactories in the West Indies, are among the articles enumerated by Saint-Fond as the productions of the Carron foundry.

Lord Sheffield states that, although the destruction of the woods had almost put an end to the iron works of Ireland, recent improvements in making iron had encouraged their revival. Some steam-engines, he adds, were then erecting, and the Irish manufactures of iron were rapidly increasing. On a subsequent page he says, "It has been generally supposed that Ireland has great disadvantages in working iron mines, when compared with Great Britain; but the reason does not appear, unless it should arise from want of capital: in general it may be observed that the private capitals of English manufacturers at present combat the purse of Ireland, in the hands of a bountiful and liberal parliament; but, if Englishmen will employ their capitals in Russia, why should they not employ them in Ireland?"|| In France, also, iron manufactures were making some progress when the Revolution broke out. Saint-Fond, after alluding to the coking establishments of his own country, says, "Thanks to the government and to a rich and enterprising company, an iron-foundry, which will soon rival the best works of that kind in England, is established at Creuzot, near Montcenis, in Burgundy; and, though the place in which it is erected was originally sterile and solitary, it is now covered with habitations. The abundance of coal, the simple mode of preparing it as a substitute for wood, and the models furnished by the ingenious Wilkinson, have performed wonders, and have given birth to an establishment which is truly worthy of a great nation." In a subsequent passage he speaks of the machines for boring cannon in this foundry as little, if at all, inferior to those of Carron. They were impelled by water, which was raised by steam-engines.*

The extent of the iron manufactures of France in 1789 is shown by Chaptal's valuable work on the commerce and manufacturing industry of that country, from which it appears that there were at that time 202 high furnaces and 76 of the kind known as Catalan forges (forges à la catalane), for the smelting of iron ore, and 792 refining furnaces. The smelting furnaces produced altogether, in the above year, 61,549,500 kilogrammes, or about 30,295 tons, of pig iron (font en gueuse), and 7,579,200 kilogrammes, or about 3730 tons, of cast iron (fonte moulée); and the above quantity of pig iron yielded, by refinery, 46,805,900 kilogrammes, or about 23,037 tons, of marketable iron.† Brissot, in his treatise upon the commerce of North America, which was published shortly after the close of the war of independence, states that the inhabitants of the United States had attempted to make iron and steel, and that many manufactories had been set up at New York, in New Jersey, and in Pennsylvania. In this case the destruction of the forests for fuel was a positive advantage, since it prepared the ground for agricultural operations. "It is impossible," says a writer quoted by Brissot, speaking of New Jersey, "to travel across this province without meeting with some little iron forges. If a proprietor has a great marsh full of wood, and that he wishes to clear it, he begins by making a dyke at one extremity to stop the water of the rivulets which run across it. He fixes in this water the wheels necessary for the manufacture of iron, &c." "And in a small number of years," he adds, "the traveller, who had seen in passing by nothing but a vast pond full of trees thrown down, and had heard the noise of hammers and anvils, sees well-enclosed fields, vast meadows," &c. Brissot considered that, having iron mines, abundance of the best fuel, and English industry to direct their operations, the North Americans would not be long before they might renounce foreign aid in manufactures of iron, perhaps with the exception of nails, which would long be made cheaper in Europe, owing to the low price of labour. They had, however, commenced even this manufacture in one of the States. The following compliment to British manufactures, coming from a Frenchman, is too gratifying to be passed over. After stating that both during the war and since the peace some exports of iron had been made from France to the United States, but that they had not succeeded, Brissot adds, "Accustomed, according to the principles of monopolisers, who have hitherto directed our foreign commerce, to furnish our colonies with brittle utensils, and otherwise very imperfect, our merchants were willing to treat the independent Americans like their slaves in their islands; and the Americans refused our merchandise. They said, that we did not even know how to make nails; and, in strict truth, they were right in their assertion. They preferred the iron and steel of England, although the duties on exportation increased their dearness."*

The importance attained during this period by the manufactures of copper is indicated by the fact that, in the year 1791, the quantity of wrought copper exported from this country amounted to 3082 tons, and the value to 358,844*l.*, in addition to which the exports of brass and plated goods amounted to 2324 tons, valued at 209,769*l.*: thus making the total quantity of exported goods, composed wholly or partially of copper, 5406 tons, amounting in value to 568,613*l.*† By referring to the statistics of the Cornish copper-mines in the preceding period,‡ it may be seen how greatly the produce must have increased. From another authority it appears that, from 1796 to 1800, the average annual produce of these mines was 5174 tons of pure copper, and that in the next quinquennial period it was somewhat more. § The mines of Anglesea, and those in other parts of England and Wales, also yielded so plentifully, that this country, instead of being, as formerly, dependent upon foreigners for the greater part of her supplies, became, previously to 1793, one of the principal markets for the supply of copper to others; and this notwithstanding the greatly increased demand at home for maritime purposes. || What was the gross produce of the British copper-mines we are not informed; but, according to a tabular statement given by M'Culloch, the produce of ore from the Cornish mines, in 1801, was 56,611 tons, which yielded nearly 5268 tons of fine copper. The value of the ores is given as 476,313*l.* 1*s.*, and the average standard price of copper as 117*l.* 5*s.* per ton, which, as will be seen by reference to the preceding Book, is considerably higher than at the commencement of the present period. It is stated in Rees's Cyclopædia, that from the time when the price fell, in consequence of the discovery of the Anglesea mines, it never exceeded 84*l.* per ton until 1791. In the next year it reached 100*l.* per ton, and in 1799 it rose to 124*l.* In the early part of the last-mentioned year sixty copper-mines were at work in Cornwall; but most of them were recently opened, and one-half of the number had not begun to yield ores. The mining district of Devonshire was then rising to some importance. The tin-mines of that district had gradually sunk into insignificance; and, although copper had been discovered there, "it is probable," observes the author of the article above referred to, "that before 1800 the mines of Devon, which are mostly situate within a few miles of the town of Tavistock, did not yield more in any one year than about 100 tons of fine copper; and even this was a very recent discovery." After the above date the Devonshire mines increased considerably in productiveness. In 1799 the Birmingham manufacturers of articles in which copper formed a part became so alarmed at the high price of that metal, that they applied to parliament, desiring to have restrictions imposed upon its exportation, and such regulations laid on the trade as would, in effect, have kept the price below a certain maximum rate. Their demand was warmly supported by the premier; and "the contest that ensued between the miners and the manufacturers," to quote the language of the author of the article 'Mining' in Rees's Cyclopædia, "produced many curious documents, which were laid before the committee of the House of Commons appointed to investigate the subject, and from which we are now enabled to state particulars of the mines of Cornwall more exactly than could have been obtained had not such an occasion called them forth. The matter came fully before parliament, the good sense of which defeated the impolitic wishes of the proposers of the restrictions, and left a ministry unaccustomed to defeat in a minority on the question."

A very full account of the extensive copper works connected with the Parys mountain, near Amlwch, in Anglesea, is contained in the 'Journal of a Tour through North Wales, and part of Shropshire,' published in 1797, by Arthur Aikin, who for many years, at a subsequent period, filled the office of secretary to the Society of Arts. From this work it appears that the poorer ores were smelted at Amlwch, while those of richer quality were sent to furnaces belonging to the same company at Swansea, and at Stanley near Liverpool. The number of smelters employed near the mines was about 90, and of miners about 1200, who worked by the piece, and earned generally from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 8*d.* per diem. The produce was fluctuating; but Aikin says, "The Parys mine has furnished from 5000 to 10,000 tons [of ore] per quarter, exclusive of what is procured from the sulphate of copper in solution; and, as the two mines employ nearly equal numbers of workmen, they probably afford about the same quantity of ore." Among the adjuncts to the copper works were a manufacture of sulphur, which was produced in the operation of roasting the ore, melted, refined, and cast into cones for sale; and a rolling-mill for grinding the materials for fire-bricks. A separate company manufactured green vitriol and alum at the same place. About thirty years previously there were not more than half-a-dozen houses in the whole parish, but the works gave support at this time to a population of 4000 or 5000 persons, of whose character Aikin gives a very gratifying account. "I am acquainted," he says, "with no place the manners of which are so unexceptionable (as far, at least, as a stranger is enabled to judge of them) as Amlwch; and the favourable opinion which I was led to entertain of them, on first visiting the town last year, is confirmed by what I have observed at present. Not a single instance have I known of drunkenness, not one quarrel have I witnessed during two very crowded market-days, and one of them a day of unusual indulgence, that I passed at this place; and I believe no gaol, or bridewell, or house of confinement exists in the town or neighbourhood. Most of the miners are Methodists, and to the prevalence of this religious sect is chiefly to be attributed the good order that is so conspicuous.*" In a subsequent part of the same work, Aikin describes the copper and brass works at Holywell, belonging to the Anglesea companies. Here the copper was received from Swansea and Stanley in the form of solid blocks, or pigs; remelted and cast into plates, which were cut into strips by strong shears worked by a water-wheel; then extended, and made smooth and of uniform thickness, by rolling between iron cylinders; hardened; heated to redness; suddenly cooled in water; and, if necessary, again rolled out and polished. The sheets of copper thus prepared were applied to many different purposes. "Some," observes Aikin, "are cut out in a circular form, and carried to the battering-mills, where they are subjected to the rapid action of hammers moved by water; and, as the workman turns the plate round and round under the hammer, it is made to assume the form of a basin of any size or depth. These are afterwards annealed in a furnace heated to a full red heat. Copper pans of very large dimensions are beat out in this manner." Other plates were cut into strips for the manufacture of wire, which is stated to have been one of the most curious and entertaining parts of the business. "But the greater part of the copper sheets," says our author, "are used in this form for sheathing large ships. They are applied only of a single thickness, and joined together by copper bolts. The sheets are of different degrees of thickness: the greatest for men-of-war and Indiamen; the least for cutters, or even long-boats, which have of late been coppered." "The arts and manufactures also," he adds, "create a large demand for plates and sheets of copper; and not a few are purchased by the East India Company, who export them to China, where they are used to dry tea upon." Besides the manufacture of plates, there was in this establishment a forge or furnace for casting various articles of brass and copper, both for ordinary purposes, "and also for bracelets, and certain pieces in the form of a horse-shoe," which were exported in vast quantities to Africa, where the former were worn by the natives for ornament, and the latter used as money, under the name of manillas. Large copper bolts for ship-building, sometimes as much as eight or ten feet long, were also among the articles fabricated at Holywell. Many of the copper plates exported from this place were beautifully polished in a lathe; and some of the pans, made very broad and shallow, were sent to Africa, to be used in the manufacture of salt from sea-water, by evaporation in the sun. All the copper and brass articles were shipped on the Dee, just below the manufactory, and sent to the great warehouses of the company at Liverpool, whence many were distributed to London, America, India, and various other places; and the whole of the moving-power required by the various machines was supplied by the stream from the holy well of St. Winifred (whence the town takes its name), to great water-wheels of cast-iron.*

Considerable changes took place in the British tin-trade towards the close of the eighteenth century, at which time the produce of the mines was gradually increasing, though not to any great extent. The revival of trade, consequent upon the restoration of peace with the North American colonies, occasioned some advance in the price of tin; but this circumstance, by bringing too plentiful a supply into the market, produced after a time a depression of price, which was very severely felt among the Cornish miners.† About the same time, also, the importation of Banca tin, which was first brought to this country in 1787,‡ aided the fall in the price of British tin, and would probably have affected it still more but for the nearly simultaneous opening of a new and most important market in China, by the East India Company,§ the circumstances of which are related in the 'Transactions of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce,' for the year 1792. The preface to that volume speaks of the event as "the revival of the tin-trade from Great Britain to India and China;" and a pamphlet quoted by Anderson|| under the year 1677, which he says was "possibly by Sir Josiah Child," shows that tin was at that time exported by the East India Company. The re-opening of the trade was ef-

The town of Holywell derived some importance also from lead-mines in the neighbourhood, and from various other manufactures which were carried on there by the assistance of its celebrated stream, "now as much frequented and esteemed," observes Aikin, "for the purposes of manufacture, as it used formerly to be for its miraculous healing powers." In its short course, of about a mile, to the Dee, the stream from the sacred spring is, he says, "made subservient to the purposes of manufacture, by turning water-mills for corn, cotton-works, forges, smelting-works, and other machinery: so that, though its reputed value for the cure of diseases is nearly lost, its real importance is increased ten-fold by the assistance which it gives to manufacture." Aikin entered a lead-mine near this place, by a canal-tunnel 1300 yards long. The veins were rich, and the works gave employment to about sixty miners.

ected by Mr. George Unwin, who, in a letter addressed to the Society in 1791, describes himself as "Supervisor of the Exports of Tin beyond the Cape of Good Hope." He states, in this communication, that his plan had met with the most wonderful success both in India and China, especially in the latter market, where, in the previous year, between 700 and 800 tons of Cornish tin had met with a ready sale, "and produced a balance of about 35 per cent. to pay all charges, with a requisition to this country to increase the quantity for the China market to upwards of 1200 tons." In consequence of this new demand the price of tin in Cornwall rose, according to Unwin's account, from 58s. to 72s. per cwt.; and, he adds, "for these two years past the tin-trade of Cornwall is now in the most flourishing state possible, and every man, woman, and child who can work in tin-works, may find constant employment." "So brisk," he further says, "is the home trade, that the East India Company will not be supplied with the quantity recommended to be sent out this season to the China market alone." The precise effect of this new commerce upon the mining interest of Cornwall is shown by a statement appended to his letter, from which it appears that the quantity of block tin made in that county in the year ending Michaelmas, 1789, was about 3000 tons, which, at the market price of 58*l.* per ton, amounted to 174,050*l.*, while in the next year but one—the twelve months ending Michaelmas, 1791—although the quantity raised was about the same, the balance of price in favour of the county was 33,950*l.*, because 800 tons were purchased for India and China, at the rate of 62*l.* per ton, producing 49,600*l.*, and the remaining 2200 tons were sold in the European market at the advanced price of 72*l.* per ton, producing 158,400*l.*: thus making the total value 208,000*l.* Mr. Unwin states that he had laboured indefatigably for nearly three years to bring about this commercial revolution; and the Society of Arts presented their gold medal to him in acknowledgment of their high sense of his public services. In a note dated November, 1791, he says that the Company had contracted for a supply of from 800 to 1200 tons, for the following season, at 71*l.* per ton, delivered on board their vessels* (in London, it would appear from another authority); but on the renewal of their charter in the following year they agreed to take 800 tons annually at 75*l.*, and offered to purchase half as much more at 68*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* per ton.† Between 1783 and 1790 the proportion of British tin exported was seven-tenths of the produce of the mines, and in the next ten years it was three-fourths of the whole; after this the proportion of exports to home consumption rapidly diminished, owing to the greatly increased demand for various domestic manufactures. The average annual consumption in this country from 1783 to 1790 was 926 tons, and from 1791 to 1800 only 754 tons; but it subsequently increased so much that the average for the next decennial period was 1118 tons. As the most accessible portions of ore were those first operated upon by the miners, it became necessary, in order to meet the continued and increasing demand for tin, to go deeper and deeper, and often to work mines under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and danger; sometimes in situations where nothing but the gigantic power of the steam-engine could prevent the works from being overwhelmed by the influx of water either from springs or from the sea.*

According to the statements of Rees, the total quantity of tin raised in Cornwall and Devonshire from 1780 to 1790 was 29,583 tons, or 2958 tons annually on an average; and the total quantity from 1790 to 1800 was 32,450 tons, which gives an annual average of 3245 tons. The average price per ton in the former period was 68*l.* 2*s.* per ton, which makes the entire annual value about 201,289*l.*, and in the latter period 73*l.* 1*s.* per ton, making the annual value about 237,047*l.*† The importance

* As one instance among many which might be referred to of the dauntless ingenuity and perseverance of the Cornish miners in the pursuit of ore under the greatest difficulties, we may notice a singular tin-mine near Penzance, known by the name of the 'Wherry mine.' The following details respecting this curious work are condensed from No. 698 of the 'Penny Magazine,' which work refers to a paper by Mr. John Hawkins, in one of the early volumes of the Cornwall Geological Society's 'Transactions,' as its authority. In many other cases the workings or excavations of mines have been carried to a considerable distance under the sea, although the shafts by which they are approached open on dry land; but in this mine the shaft itself, as well as the galleries or lateral excavations, was situated in the midst of the sea. The first attempts to work the ore at this place, where it had been discovered owing to small veins being visible upon a rocky shoal which was left exposed at low water, were made about the beginning of the eighteenth century; but, after excavating to a very small extent, the original miners abandoned their works. About 1778 an enterprising miner named Thomas Curtis, who had only a capital of ten pounds at command, renewed the attempt, the difficulties of which may be conceived from the facts that the shoal lay about 120 fathoms from the beach; that the rock was covered with water for about ten months in the year; that the depth of water on it was as much as 19 feet at spring-tides; and that the prevailing winds occasioned a great surf even in summer, and in winter caused the sea to burst over the rock in such a manner as to render all attempts to carry on mining operations unavailing. Curtis could only work at his excavation, in the first instance, during the short time that the rock was exposed at low water, and even this time was abridged by the necessity of emptying the excavation of water before proceeding to work; but after three summers had been thus spent in sinking the pump-shaft, he was enabled to construct a turret of timber, twenty feet high and twenty-five inches square, over the mouth of the shaft, so as to exclude the water from it. This turret was supported by inclined bars of iron; and at its upper extremity a platform was fixed to support a windlass. The sea was not, however, completely excluded by the turret, for it not only made its way into the shaft, but also, by crevices in the rock, into the lateral workings. Owing to these and other difficulties, the mine could only be worked during the short interval of fair weather in summer; yet the rich quality of the ore rendered the undertaking highly profitable to Curtis and others who had assisted him with means to carry on his undertaking. In 1792 tin was raised to the value of 3000*l.*, and there was every prospect of the workings being greatly extended. Subsequently, a steam-engine was erected on the shore to aid the operations of the mine, and a wooden bridge was constructed to support the machinery connecting it with the shaft, and to afford readier means of communication with the shore, for the conveyance of the ore, &c. "Thus," observes our authority, "did this most singular mine continue to be worked, till it had yielded 70,000*l.* worth of tin-ore, when a period was put to its usefulness, almost as remarkable as the circumstances connected with its origin. An American vessel broke from its anchorage in Gwasas Lake (the name of a small bay or anchorage near Penzance), and, striking against the stage constructed out in the sea on the shoal, demolished the machinery, filled the mine with water, and thus put an end to the adventure."

† The above statements of annual value are obtained by computation from the price per ton, and do not agree with the figures of Rees; but the discrepancies are such as may have been occasioned by clerical or typographical errors in his work.

* Down to this point the account of the tin-trade to China is founded upon the papers printed in the 'Transactions of the Society of Arts,' vol. x. pp. 249-255; but the subsequent details are from the 'Penny Cyclopaedia,' art. 'Tin Trade.'

† In order to encourage this trade, an Act was passed in 1790 (30 Geo. III. c. 4), exempting the East India Company from the payment of duty on unwrought tin exported by them to any country beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

of our manufactures of tin about 1787 is referred to in the proceedings of the General Chamber of Manufacturers of Great Britain upon the French treaty. The committee of manufacturers complain of the omission from the treaty of "a class of manufactures formed of a material for which this island was pre-eminently renowned from its first discovery;" and they add, "your committee allude to our manufactures of tin, which has of late been worked up into so many new shapes by the invention of English artificers." "This misision," they proceed to observe, "is the more remarkable, because unwrought tin is one of the articles admitted from England into France, even by the prohibitory edict of July the 17th, 1785."*

The manufacture of pewter received some check during the present period, probably less from the advance in the price of tin, which appears to have had some effect, than from the great improvements effected in the manufacture of domestic utensils of earthenware, and their consequent introduction into houses of almost every class. While, however, plates and dishes of pewter were thus gradually falling into disuse, a superior alloy of somewhat similar character, called Britannia metal, or sometimes Prince's metal, was coming to be extensively applied to the fabrication of almost every kind of article produced by the silversmith for table furniture; an application to which strong inducements were offered by the extreme facility with which it may be converted into any required form by casting, rolling, stamping, or moulding with suitable implements; its moderate price; and its near resemblance to silver in appearance. Mr. Holland states that the composition and application of this alloy on a large scale was commenced at Sheffield, which is still the principal seat of the manufacture, about the year 1770, by two individuals named Jessop and Hancock.†

Respecting manufactures of lead we possess no statistical data for the period under consideration, nor is there anything remarkable to state respecting the processes of mining and smelting. Saint-Fond mentions the lead-works of Tindrum, or Tyndrum, which are on the border of Argyleshire and Perthshire; but he states that they were very negligently managed. A mixture of charcoal and turf was used in smelting the ore; but in what proportion he was not informed. The ingenious Frenchman appears to have found the managers of these works somewhat chary of imparting information, for he observes, in connexion with them, that "the English, as well as the Dutch, are very reserved in explaining their processes, even in the most simple arts, which they always exercise with a kind of mystery." "It is not so," he adds, "in France: there the managers of the most interesting establishments are, in general, very complaisant, and frankly communicate to a stranger all the information he can desire."* The manufacture of lead shot was greatly improved by the process patented in 1782 by a plumber of Bristol, named Watts, who mixed a small quantity of arsenic with the lead, in order to make it more solid and more certain to form spherical particles when poured through a cullender or perforated plate, and also introduced the practice of dropping the shot, as it is formed, from the top of a high tower, so as to insure the setting of the metal before it reaches the water into which the newly made shot falls. The idea of making shot by thus pouring melted lead from a great elevation is said to have originated in a dream; and the experiment was first tried at the tower of the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, at Bristol. Watts secured his invention by patent, and then sold it, it has been stated for 10,000*l.*, to parties possessed of sufficient capital to enable them to bring it into profitable operation. The process has long since become public property; and the lofty slender towers erected in several towns for the manufacture of shot form by no means the least remarkable of the many structures called into existence by various branches of manufacturing industry.†

Of the metalline manufactures not already treated of, that of steel claims some notice, especially in connexion with the introduction of cast steel, which was first manufactured by a person named Huntsman, of Attercliffe, near Sheffield, in or about the year 1770.‡ "He pursued the experiment," observes Mr. Holland, "with complete success, and was for some time the only noted manufacturer of an article which, bearing his name, is still held in high estimation. His success gave rise to competition, and Mr. Booth, of Brush House, established extensive and successful works at Rotherham." "The refining of steel, however," he adds, "has decayed at the latter place, in consequence of the amazing extent to which the art is practised and the business carried on in the neighbouring town of Sheffield." The superior qualities of cast steel have led to its extensive substitution for bar or shear steel in the manufacture of cutting instruments and various other articles, and, to adopt the language of the writer just quoted, Sheffield "has not only become by far the largest laboratory and emporium in the world for cast steel, but, in consequence of being the seat of the cutlery and edge-tool trades in general, the facilities for experiment and adaptation on the spot

* Travels, vol. ii. p. 152.

† Mr. Holland states that Watts proposed with the sum of money which he received for his patent to build a crescent at Clifton, but that "the situation chosen was a huge rock, and the whole sum was expended in making excavations and in raising immense walls for foundations, which long bore the name of Watts's folly, and upon which walls Trafalgar Place was afterwards erected."—Manufactures in Metal, iii. 85.

‡ This statement must not be taken too literally, for the celebrated wootz, or Indian steel, is a kind of cast steel; and Mr. Holland even quotes an obscure passage in Aristotle which appears to allude to such a substance. The above date is given on the authority of the Penny Cyclopædia, art. "Steel." Mr. Holland does not give the date, but states that Huntsman conceived the idea of reducing steel to a fluid "about fifty years since," which statement, being published in 1831, would make the invention appear still more recent. The subsequent statements respecting Huntsman's improvement are from Holland, vol. i. pp. 235, 236.

have enabled the Sheffield steel-makers to surpass all others in the perfection to which they have carried this important branch of our national industry." "It is," he adds, "a remarkable fact, that this very town, which was formerly indebted to Styria for the steel used in its manufactures, now exports a material of its own conversion to the Austrian forges, and other places on the continent of Europe."

It is a somewhat curious fact that scarcely anything is known directly respecting the early fabrication of military weapons in England; and that Hutton and Hunter, the historians of the principal seats of the manufacture of cutlery in this country, should have been unable to produce satisfactory evidence of their inhabitants having been, as there is reason to think they probably were, engaged in the manufacture of arms. In Hunter's account of the early manufactures of Sheffield, it is stated that of the manufacture of arms at Sheffield we have no direct information, and that "all the articles enumerated in the ordinances for the government of Hallamshire, and in the later act of incorporation, are instruments of peace." "And yet," it is added, "in an age when there was so large a demand for weapons of that description, which could be conveniently made along with what are known to have been among the manufactures of Sheffield, it is probable enough that her artists might be employed in their fabrication."* About the year 1689 some efforts were made to improve the manufacture of swords for the army, and a company was incorporated for making hollow sword-blades in Cumberland and the adjacent counties. This company was empowered to purchase lands, to erect mills, and to bring over and employ a great number of German artificers; but the project failed, and the original patentees sold their rights to a company of London merchants, who, apparently in disregard of the object for which the original association was formed, availed themselves of the powers of the patent to purchase lands out of the forfeited estates in Ireland, to the annual value of 20,000*l*.† In order to protect the British manufacture of such weapons, the importation of foreign swords from Germany and other countries was prohibited by an act passed in the reign of James II.,‡ under heavy penalties; but the effect of this restriction appears to have been to bring the manufacture into a very low state, since the parsimony of the sword-cutlers led them, when unchecked by foreign competition, to employ inferior materials and workmanship. To so dis-

† Anderson's History of Commerce, edit. of 1787-9, ii. 587. It is there further stated that the Irish Parliament, in the reign of Queen Anne, knowing that the company had purchased these lands at a very low rate, would not permit them to take conveyances of lands in their corporate capacity, lest they should prove too powerful a body in the kingdom. They were thus compelled to sell off their Irish estates, and thus the corporation was dissolved. "Yet," he adds, "a private copartnership of then well-known bankers in London, possessed of their obsolete charter, had the appellation of the Sword-Blade Company till after the year 1720, though long since broken up."

graceful a state was the home manufacture thus brought, that, about the year 1783, it has been stated that "an English officer would not trust his life to the hazard of the probable failure of his English sword-blade, upon any consideration whatever;" and consequently the London sword-sellers petitioned the lords of the treasury for permission to import German swords free of duty, a measure which, by drawing public attention to the subject, led to great improvements. In consequence of this petition, the Earl of Surrey (afterwards the fourteenth Duke of Norfolk) addressed a letter, dated October 1, 1783, to Mr. Eyre, of Sheffield, requesting such information from any of the Sheffield manufacturers as might enable him, as he expressed it, "to remove so disgraceful a reflection on English ingenuity" as that implied in the application. Eyre forwarded an extract of this letter to Mr. Thomas Gill, an ingenious Birmingham manufacturer, who, in the following December, memorialised the lords of the treasury, stating that he could make swords of as good quality as those of Germany, and requesting a comparative trial. The public trial desired by Gill was delayed by circumstances which it is unnecessary here to enter into, but it was brought about a few years later owing to the demand for 10,000 horsemen's swords for the East India Company, in 1786. The company divided their orders between English and German manufacturers, and, on the petition of Mr. Gill, who made some of the swords, a public examination of their quality was determined on. Every blade was, accordingly, tested by a machine recommended by Matthew Boulton, of Soho, for trying the temper by forcing it into a curve to such an extent as to reduce the length from thirty-six inches to twenty-nine inches and a half; and the result of this severe trial was that 2650 of Gill's swords bore the test, while only four were rejected. Of the German swords the proportionate number rejected was as thirteen to one of those made by Gill, the respective numbers being 1400 received and 28 rejected; while of the swords furnished by other British cutlers only 2700 were received to 1084 rejected, the state of the manufacture being so low that rather more than two-sevenths of the whole number of blades furnished by the ordinary sword-cutlers were unfit to bear the required test. In addition to the above-mentioned trial, Gill proved the excellent quality of his swords by striking them flat-ways upon a slab of cast-iron, and edgeways upon a cylinder of wrought-iron. For the latter purpose a gun-barrel was frequently used; and it is stated that the swords were so tough, though made of cast steel, that, after cutting a gun-barrel asunder, the blade might be wound round the barrel like a riband and afterwards restored to its original straightness, excepting at the point. Such was the celebrity obtained by Mr. Gill's swords that even German officers applied to him for them; and he did not confine his attention to the improvement of their more essential qualities, but devoted it also to the

The manufacture of guns, which has since become so important a branch of the industry of Birmingham, appears to have been established at that place about the beginning of the eighteenth century. Tradition, according to Hutton, tells that king William III. was once lamenting that guns were not manufactured in his own dominions, but that he was obliged to procure them from Holland at a great expense and with greater difficulty. Sir Richard Newdigate, one of the members for the county, being present, told the king that genius resided in Warwickshire, and that he thought his constituents would answer his majesty's wishes. "The king," Hutton adds, "was pleased with the remark, and the member posted to Birmingham. Upon application to a person in Digbeth, whose name I forget, the pattern was executed with precision, and, when presented to the royal board, gave entire satisfaction. Orders were immediately issued for large numbers, which have been so frequently repeated that they never lost their road; and the ingenious artists have been so amply rewarded that they have rolled in their carriages to this day." "Thus," quaintly observes our author, "the same instrument which is death to one man is genteel life to another."† The extent of the gun manufacture about the year 1787 is indicated by an account given by Macpherson of the principal articles exported to Africa in that year, from which it appears that the "iron-ware, including guns, cutlasses," &c., supplied to that market amounted to the value of 43,515*l*. He adds, in a note, that "it was said that the manufacture of Birmingham guns for the African market gives employment to between four and five thousand persons."‡ Saint-Fond, in a note, the object of which is to induce his countrymen to allow the importation of British manufactures on payment of duty, and to apply a portion of such duty to the encouragement of those of France, observes that by such policy, and owing to the intelligence and attention of the minister Benezec, the French had, at Versailles, "a manufactory of fire-arms of a finer finish and more exquisite workmanship, and also at a much cheaper price, than any made in London."§

The manufacture of locks has long formed an important branch of British industry; the locks of Wolverhampton, at which place the manufacture was formerly carried on almost exclusively, having been in repute two or three centuries ago. Dr. Plot, in his 'Natural History of Staffordshire,' published in 1686, notices the pre-eminence of the blacksmiths of Wolverhampton, in making locks for doors. "They make them," he says, "in suits, six, eight, or more in a suit, according as the chapman bespeaks them, whereof the keys shall neither of them open each other's lock, yet one master-key shall open them all; so that, these locks being set upon the doors of a house, and the inferior keys kept by distinct servants, though neither of them can come at each other's charge, yet the master can come at them all." Nor was this all that was accomplished by the ingenuity of the locksmiths, for we are informed that the master could, by a peculiar or extraordinary turn of his key, render the lock incapable of being opened by that in the possession of the servant; and that they could construct locks which would show how often they had been opened and shut, even to 300, 500, or 1000 times. Others were made with chimes to play at any hour to which they might be set. "And these locks," he adds, "they make either with brass or iron boxes so curiously polished and the keys so finely wrought, that 'tis not reasonable to think they were ever exceeded, unless by Tubal-Cain, the inspired artificer in brass and iron."* Ingenious as were these and many later contrivances, they were completely eclipsed, in point of security, by the celebrated lock patented about the year 1784 by Joseph Bramah, the inventor of many other highly ingenious and valuable machines. The principle of security adopted in this lock appears, from a paper read in 1827 by Mr. Ainger to the Royal Institution,† to have been known to the ancient Egyptians at least four thousand years since; but it does not appear to have been known in England, or even in Europe, until re-invented about 1774 by Mr. Barron, whose patent lock, in addition to the ordinary security afforded by wards, or obstacles so placed as to interfere with the passage of any but the proper key, had two or more tumblers, or pieces of metal so disposed as to prevent the bolt from moving unless while they are held away from it by the action of the key. Bramah, by a different application of the same principle, and without the use of wards, which, from circumstances which it is unnecessary here to explain, cannot in any case afford perfect security, was enabled to construct locks which baffled the ingenuity of the most ingenious pickers, and which might be infinitely varied, so as to prevent the possibility of unlocking by any but the proper key.‡ These contrivances may be fairly consi-

‡ By the use of twelve tumblers in a lock of this construction the apparatus may be so varied that, by simply changing their places, without any alteration in their form or size, the same lock may be made to require 479,001,500 different keys; or that number of locks may be made precisely alike in external appearance and in the form and size of their component parts, yet so essentially different that the key made for one would not open any of the others. The addition of a thirteenth tumbler increases the number of changes to 6,227,019,500; and even higher numbers might be attained, if necessary, in addition to which differences in the size and form of the parts afford the power of producing infinite variety. Stuart, in a note on pp. 401, 402, of his amusing Anecdotes of Steam-engines, states that "the report that one of these locks had been readily opened, before a committee of the House of Commons, by means of a common quill, was a gross misrepresentation of the fact; the quill having, in reality, been previously cut into the required shape from the true key, an dered as marking an era in a not unimportant branch of our manufactures in metal, and as having led to an almost endless variety of ingenious inventions in the same department.

Considering the apparently trivial character of the article, the history of the buckle manufacture is somewhat curious. Buckles are enumerated in the authorities quoted in the preceding Book * as forming an important item in the manufactures of Sheffield and Birmingham, and the manner in which they are noticed by Hutton indicates the extent of the manufacture about 1781. "This offspring of fancy," he observes, "like the clouds, is ever changing; the fashion of to-day is thrown into the casting-pot to-morrow. The buckle seems to have undergone every figure, size, and shape of geometrical invention." He adds that the large square buckle was the ton of 1781, and that the ladies adopted the reigning taste; and he says, in allusion to this monstrosity, "It is difficult to discover their beautiful little feet, covered with an enormous shield of buckle, and we wonder to see the active motion under the massive load: thus the British fair support the manufactures of Birmingham, and thus they kill by weight of metal."† In a recent edition of Hutton's work, with additions, some particulars of the buckle manufacture are given from a communication by Mr. James Luckcock to the 'Birmingham Chronicle,' of February 14, 1824, from which it appears that the business received an impulse about 1778 owing to the introduction of a new mode of plating, and that about 1788 there were from 4000 to 5000 persons engaged in the production of shoe buckles in Birmingham and its neighbourhood. From calculations founded upon the supposition that 4000 were thus employed, Mr. Luckcock, who had been some years in the trade and may therefore be deemed competent to supply the data for such a calculation, computes that the quantity made annually during the most prosperous period of the shoe buckle trade was about 2,496,000 pairs, which he supposes to have sold, on an average, at 2s. 6d. per pair.‡ Changes of fashion soon afterwards produced most disastrous consequences to the large class of industrious artisans thus employed. In 1791 the buckle manufacturers of Birmingham, Walsall, and Wolverhampton sent a deputation to the Prince of Wales (afterwards George IV.) with a petition stating the distressed situation of thousands of persons who had been engaged in various departments of the buckle manufacture, in consequence of the then prevalent fashion of wearing shoe-strings. The Prince, sympathising with them, not only resolved to wear buckles himself, but also ordered his household to do the same;

but neither his example nor his influence were sufficient to stem the tide of fashion, and in a few years the use of shoe buckles was discontinued, excepting among the aged.* The importance of the manufacture of shoe buckles and chapes at Walsall is also mentioned in Shaw's 'History and Antiquities of Staffordshire,' where it is stated that saddlers' ironmongery and nails were also much made in the neighbourhood. These staple manufactures, it is added, suffered much depression during the American war of independence; they were again flourishing during the peace, but declined on the renewal of war. The decline of the buckle trade, however, which is said to have been formerly the chief support of the town, is attributed to other causes, among which were the high price of copper, brass, and tin, and the disuse of buckles in the army. Many of the workmen had, it is stated, been compelled to learn new trades.† During the palmy days of this manufacture, the village of Bolsover, in Derbyshire, now remembered chiefly for the remains of its castle, was celebrated for the production of superior steel buckles, respecting the excellent temper of which it is still traditionally reported in the neighbourhood, that, though the wheel of a loaded cart should pass over a Bolsover buckle, it would not, in consequence of its elasticity, suffer any permanent alteration of shape.‡ Respecting a kindred manufacture, Macpherson relates, under the year 1796, that, the makers of metal buttons having represented that their manufacture had for many years been a great and, until recently, an increasing branch of trade in this kingdom, but that it had fallen off considerably and was in danger of being lost to the country in consequence of fraudulent practices, such as the stamping of inferior buttons in such a manner as to make them appear like those of better quality, an act § was passed to regulate the manufacture and to prescribe the quantities of gold to be put on to gilt, double-gilt, and treble-gilt buttons respectively.¶ Referring to the somewhat disparaging manner in which some travellers, and even Englishmen, had alluded to such apparently trivial manufactures as the above, Saint-Fond observes, that at Birmingham the traveller might have "a comprehensive view of a most active and varied industry exercised in the different arts of utility, of pleasure, and of luxury;" and notices the manufactories constantly occupied at that place in the making of copper sheathing; those of plate tin and plate iron, which, he says, rendered France tributary to England; and "that varied and extensive hardware manufacture which employs to so much advantage more than 30,000 hands, and compels all Europe and a part of the new world to supply themselves with these articles here, where everything is made in greater perfection, with more economy, and in greater abundance experiment which was only made to show the perfection of the workmanship, and the very small force required to overcome the resistance, when properly applied." "It has been subsequently stated," he adds, "that one of these locks had been in use for many years, and had been opened and locked not less than 400,000 times, and apparently was as perfect as when it was first constructed."

than in any other country." "The population of Birmingham" he further states, "increased so much during the American war, that at least three hundred new houses were, during that period, added annually to the town;" and this rate of increase, he adds, was doubled on the conclusion of peace.*

The art of coining, though almost universally practised among civilized nations, remained in a singularly imperfect state until the ingenuity of the proprietors of the Soho works was directed to its improvement; but it was raised by Boulton to a state of perfection which left very little for subsequent mechanicians to accomplish. The first coining-mill impelled by the power of steam was erected at Soho about the year 1788,† when a medal about the size of a guinea was struck as a specimen. The boundless power attainable by the use of the steam-engine and the extreme accuracy of the coining machinery not only rendered it easy to strike the coins with greater precision than before, but also reduced the cost of the operation. A still more important advantage consisted in the almost insuperable difficulties placed in the way of the forger by the greater perfection with which the genuine coins were struck, an advantage which, as tending to diminish crime, led the enthusiastic Dr. Darwin to say that, "if a civic crown was given in Rome for preserving the life of one citizen, Mr. Boulton should be covered with garlands of oak."‡ We have mentioned in a preceding page the new coinage of copper, consisting of twopenny pieces (which, being found inconvenient, were subsequently withdrawn from circulation), pennies, halfpennies, and farthings, executed by Boulton and Watt in 1797.§ Of this coinage many pieces, some of which are dated 1799, yet remain in circulation, being distinguished from the copper money of later date by their greater size and weight. Before this, contract silver money had been coined at Soho for Sierra Leone and the African Company, and copper money for the East India Company and the Bermudas; and in 1799, in consequence of an application from the Emperor of Russia for the machinery of a mint, Boulton was authorised by an act of parliament || to export all the apparatus, necessary for such an establishment, and to send workmen with it to Russia. From an account of the Soho works published in Shaw's 'History and Antiquities of Staffordshire,'¶ it appears that the coining machinery in operation at the close of the eighteenth century had eight presses or stamping machines, each of which was capable of striking from 70 to 84 pieces of the size of a guinea per minute; so that from 30,000 to 40,000 coins might be produced in an hour; and in addition to the actual coining apparatus the machinery was made to perform every operation pertaining to it, such as the rolling of the metal into sheets of the required thickness, fine-rolling to render the surface perfectly smooth, cutting out the blanks or circular pieces of metal of the size required for coins, and shaking them in bags to rub off the rough edges. Nor has the utility of such apparatus been confined to the fabrication of money and medals: the application of similar machinery to the production of numberless articles of metal, for the purposes of utility and ornament, has been one of the most important improvements to which the country owes its pre-eminence in metalline manufactures. In France the use of this invaluable machine appears to have been placed under oppressive restrictions. Briot, who attempted to introduce it in lieu of the old process of striking the die with a hammer, in the seventeenth century, had been compelled by persecution to leave his native country; and had consequently brought his inventions to England, where they were more favourably received; * and Brissot states that another Frenchman named Warin had experienced the like persecution for a similar attempt. He also alludes to the more recent improvements of M. Droz as having met with a like reception.†

In the Preface to the fourth volume of the 'Transactions of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce,' published about 1785, allusion is made to "the great exportation of clocks and other similar machines to Turkey and the East Indies, and even to Germany," as affording a reason for the encouragement given by the society to improvements in that department of mechanical ingenuity; and the high reputation of British clocks and watches is alluded to by Brissot, who considered that the United States would probably require many watches from Europe, and asks his countrymen whether they shall remain behind the English and Swiss in clockwork. Paris, he states, had produced some distinguished artists in that line. France possessed at that time a Swiss, M. Breguet, whose talents are said to have been equal, if not superior to those of the most celebrated English watchmakers. "Let government consult him," says Brissot, "and he will soon indicate certain means whereby France may have a national manufacture of clock and watch work." He adds that Breguet had "presented to the ministry a profound memorial upon this subject."‡ Additional duties were laid upon articles of gold and silver plate, by an act passed in 1797,§ and in the following year the watchmakers appealed to parliament, setting forth the injury thus inflicted on them. The new duties upon watch-cases, they stated, put it entirely out of their power, notwithstanding the acknowledged superiority of their workmanship, to compete with foreign watchmakers, who had their cases so very much cheaper. "They, moreover, complained," says Macpherson, "that, while their export trade was thus annihilated by the additional duty, their home trade also was reduced almost to nothing in consequence of another act imposing duties on all persons using watches and clocks, together with the operation of a more recent act for the duplication and triplication of those duties, which had obliged many of their customers to give up the use of clocks and watches altogether; in consequence of which many of the workmen employed in the very numerous departments of their business, together with their families, were reduced to the necessity of applying to their parishes for subsistence." To show the great decrease in their business since the imposition of the additional duties, they submitted a statement of the number of gold and silver watch-cases marked at Goldsmiths' Hall, in London, from 1791 to 1797, from which it appears that in the five years from 1791 to 1795 337,828 silver and 15,223 gold cases were thus marked, giving an annual average of 67,565 of silver, and 3044 of gold. The number of silver cases in the last of these five years was 76,159, and in the following year, 1796, it was 92,828½, while the number of gold cases was 3341. In the next year, 1797, the numbers were respectively 67,464 and 1692; while the returns for the several quarters show still more decidedly the operation of the oppressive duty on plate, which came into operation on the 5th of July, 1797. Of silver cases the numbers for the first, second, third, and fourth quarters of that year were 19,857, 20,424½, 16,522½, and 10,660, respectively; and of gold cases the numbers for the same periods were 617, 515, 404, and 156, respectively. In consideration of the grievances thus complained of, an act* was passed in 1798 to exempt gold and silver watch-cases not only from the duties imposed by the act 37 Geo. III. c. 90, but also from those imposed by the act 24 Geo. III. c. 53, and also to grant a drawback on the exportation of such cases prior to March, 1799. At a later period of the session, in an act † for altering the duties on windows, the obnoxious duty on the use of clocks and watches, which had remained in force only about three quarters of a year, was repealed; and on the representation that the allowance of a drawback was ineffectual, because the charges incurred in obtaining it were so high, that no ordinary exportation of watches (seeing that they were never ordered in large quantities at once) could support the expense, watchmakers were further allowed, ‡ in common with goldsmiths, the liberty of making watch-cases of gold of inferior standard, such as was used by foreign watchmakers. All articles of such inferior gold, having only 18 carats fine gold to 6 carats alloy, instead of 22 carats fine to 2 alloy, were to be stamped with a crown and the figures 18, instead of the lion, which distinguished the usual standard. Macpherson observes, in a note appended to the statements referred to above, that there was, he believed, no account kept of the metal and other cases for watches; but he conceives that, if they were all brought together, they would justify a conjecture that the value of the watches and marine chronometers made in London and its neighbourhood, independent of clocks, was upwards of 1,000,000*l.* a-year; "nor," he adds, "can that sum be thought too great, when it is recollected that the watchmakers of London make watches not only for all the British dominions, but also for all the civilized part of the world."[§]

Perhaps this may be the most fitting place for resuming the narrative of the progress of improvements in marine chronometers, commenced at the close of the chapter on national industry in the preceding Book.† The inventions of Harrison, of which an account is there given, so materially altered the circumstances of the case they were intended to meet, that in the year 1774 a new act was passed, repealing all previous acts of parliament for providing rewards for the discovery of the longitude, and substituting others guarded by very stringent regulations. This act contemplated future improvements by means of more exact timekeepers, and also by the formation of superior astronomical tables; but its conditions are such as to favour the rumour that some of the parties engaged in drawing up the bill were determined to exclude timekeepers from all participation in the benefits held out, by laying down conditions which would be almost utterly impracticable, and which led a parliamentary committee, who reported on the subject in 1793, to state that, if they were enforced to the full extent of which they were capable, it was to be feared that few artists would "engage in an undertaking so discouraging and precarious, or quit the certain gains of their profession for the hope of rewards, which must at last depend for their attainment on the discretion of those by whom they are to be dispensed." The requirements of this act, with reference to timekeepers, were, that two of the same construction should be tried together—first, for twelve months, at the Royal Observatory; secondly, in two voyages round the island of Great Britain, in contrary directions, and in such other voyages to different climates as the commissioners should think fit to direct and appoint; and, finally, that, after their return from such voyages, they should be again deposited at the Royal Observatory for any required period not exceeding twelve months. The rewards held out were 500*l.* for a time-keeper that should keep the longitude within one degree of a great circle, or sixty geographical miles; 750*l.* for one that would keep the longitude within two-thirds of that distance; 10,000*l.* for one that would keep the longitude within half a degree, or thirty geographical miles; the above degrees of accuracy to be maintained in all voyages for the space of six months. Before the passing of this act, Thomas Mudge, an ingenious watch-maker, had retired from his ordinary business to devote himself wholly to the improvement of marine time-keepers, or, as they are now most commonly called, chronometers. Having completed one machine in 1774, he submitted it to the commissioners of longitude, who voted 500*l.* to encourage him to make a second, in order that the two might be tried according to the new act. In 1777 Mudge completed two new chronometers resembling the first in principle, and they were placed in the hands of the astronomer royal, Dr. Nevil Maskelyne, who, at the close of the trial, in 1790, reported unfavourably of their performance. Mudge therefore petitioned parliament, who appointed a committee in 1793 to investigate his case, and the result of the committee's report was, that he received 2500*l.* in addition to the 500*l.* voted to him some years previously. During a parliamentary investigation of Harrison's case, in 1767, Mudge had stated in evidence that the recent success of that artist had led to experiments for the improvement of marine watches in France; and also had expressed a doubt whether a sufficient number of timekeepers upon Harrison's plan could be made in order to bring them into common use, because, he said, "in the present state of mechanism in this kingdom, there is a great scarcity of good workmen in the watch-making business." That the attention excited by Harrison's efforts had the effect of leading many other ingenious men to devote their talents to the same object is evident from the statement made by Dr. Maskelyne in 1792, in one of the pamphlets called forth by the controversy on Mudge's case, that he had received chronometers for trial at the Observatory from Harrison, Kendal, Arnold, Mudge, Coombe, Earnshaw, and Brooksbanks; and that considerable numbers of time-pieces of this character had been made by some makers may be presumed from the statement of Mr. Josiah Emery before the parliamentary committee of 1793, that he had made upwards of thirty, at prices ranging from one hundred to one hundred and fifty guineas. Mudge died in 1794, shortly after receiving his reward; but his son endeavoured to establish a manufacture of marine time-keepers. Of the improvements introduced by Mudge, Arnold, and other labourers in this department of mechanical science, it is unnecessary here to speak more particularly; but with reference to the production of marine time-keepers on a sufficiently extensive scale to be important as a branch of national industry, it may be stated, on the authority of a gentleman well acquainted with the subject, that Arnold, who died soon after the close of the present period, "was, without doubt, the first who introduced the manufacture of chronometers in this country, and that Earnshaw and all the other makers rose on his base."*

† Vol. i. pp. 601-603. It is there stated, in accordance with the accounts of Harrison in the Penny Cyclopaedia and some other works, that the last moiety of his long-delayed reward was paid in 1767; but it appears from an item in a list of supplies granted by parliament in 1773, printed in the Annual Register for that year, that the last portion of the reward, amounting to 8570*l.*, was not paid until the 14th of June in that year, which was about forty-five years after the commencement of his experiments, and more than eleven years after, according to the plain terms of the act offering the reward, he accomplished the required object. A much fuller account of Harrison's inventions, and of the proceedings relating to them, is given in a paper on the Marine Chronometer in the Companion to the Almanac for 1842, which may also be referred to for further particulars respecting the subsequent history of that invaluable machine, the modern perfection of which has almost entirely superseded the necessity of astronomical observation for determining the longitude.

Of the excellence of various other kinds of scientific apparatus, as constructed by English artists during the period under review, many proofs might be collected. "In England," observes Saint-Fond, "the makers of instruments used in the sciences enjoy merited consideration. They are, in general, men of great information; and they spare neither time nor expense to carry their workmanship to the highest degree of perfection." "The demands of the navy," he adds, "and the great number of persons whose wealth enables them to pay well for the best constructed instruments, are among the causes which have concurred to form artists of high reputation, and who have served as instructors to others." Of Ramsden he speaks very highly, as one who possessed "all the modesty and simplicity of manners of a man of great talents;" and he mentions several other artists of eminence in the same line. His interesting work also contains notices of the noble telescopes of Herschel; and, in reference to their extraordinary reflectors, he states that Herschel assured him "that he had made more than one hundred and forty mirrors with his own hands, before he reached that degree of perfection to which he at last brought them,"—a circumstance strikingly illustrative of the difficulties with which the followers of science were surrounded before such mechanical processes attained their present state of comparative perfection.†

The progress of improvement in the manufacture of pottery has been so fully detailed in the preceding Book,‡ that it is unnecessary, at present, to revert to it at any length. There is, however, one important branch of that manufacture which, from its connection with other branches of industry, deserves notice, and which formed one of the many useful objects promoted by the patriotic efforts of the Society of Arts during the earlier and more active portion of their career. This is the manu-

* From a MS. communication with which the writer has been favoured from Mr. E. J. Dent, the gentleman above alluded to, it appears that the original time-pieces of Harrison are preserved at the Royal Observatory at Greenwich. They were, a few years since, found to be in a very dilapidated condition from neglect and exposure, on which Messrs. Arnold (son of the above) and Dent obtained permission to repair them at their own expense. Respecting the first of these machines, which is an exceedingly curious piece of mechanism, Mr. Dent remarks that "this ever to be respected piece of antiquity was left to perish in a store-room, at the Royal Observatory; and from exposure to the atmosphere the brass had become so brittle, that in many parts it would not allow of being taken in pieces." So admirable was its workmanship, that, although, with the exception of the escape-wheel, all the wheels and their axes were of wood, being simply flat discs with wooden teeth, friction was so perfectly guarded against, that on the removal of part of the escapement, the train of wheels commenced running with great velocity, though they had not revolved, in all probability, for a century before.

† Travels, vol. i. pp. 92-94, 67-77. Though belonging more properly to the history of science, we cannot refrain from drawing attention to Saint-Fond's pleasing account of the astronomical labours of Herschel, and of the interesting co-operation of his sister, Miss Caroline Herschel, in his scientific pursuits.

ufacture of crucibles and earthen retorts for the use of chemists, assayers, and melters of metals—a class of utensils which were formerly imported from abroad, but which have since become a considerable branch of British manufacture. The Society state, about the year 1782, that, having bestowed some rewards to promote the discovery of suitable materials for making such vessels in this country, they were pleased to find that a manufactory for them had been established at Chelsea, where they were made not only for home consumption, but also, to a considerable extent, for exportation. They further state, “that those kind of crucibles, or melting-pots, called black lead or blue pots, which are the only sorts made use of in Cornwall for assaying tin ores, were not to be obtained from any part of Europe, except a small place called Hafner’s Zal (i. e. Potters’ Place), or Passou, near Regensburg [Ratisbon] in Germany, where the only manufactures of this kind were carried on.” “This inconvenience,” they add, “laid the tinsmelters of Cornwall very frequently under great difficulties, not only with regard to the advanced price in time of war, but, for want of an importation of the pots, a stop has often been put to many of their works.” Similar pots were, at the time when the Society commenced the publication of their ‘Transactions,’ made at Chelsea; and it appeared from certificates from some of the most respectable assay-masters in Cornwall that they answered every purpose. Many of the principal refiners, and the workmen of the mint, it is stated, used no other than pots of British manufacture.* Of British porcelain, as the subject must be taken up in the next Book, it is unnecessary at present to say anything, except to notice the statement made by the merchants of Liverpool in 1792, when they were endeavouring to obtain some participation in the advantages of East Indian commerce, that the monopoly of the East India Company had more than once destroyed the manufacture of porcelain, the commanding capital of the company having put it in their power, by sacrificing their profits on articles with which any of the manufactures of this country came in competition, to crush such manufactures in their infancy. Macpherson, however, in a note on this passage, observes that the British porcelain had nevertheless stood its ground, and attained such superior elegance that it was shipped for America, where the Chinese porcelain could be had much cheaper than in this country, and that it was even carried to China itself.† The great success of Wedgwood in the manufacture of stoneware soon excited the ingenuity of foreign manufacturers. Saint-Fond, after observing that France possesses all the materials requisite to imitate to perfection the English stoneware, alludes to a manufactory at Montereau, the productions of which, though not equal to those of England, were susceptible of much improvement, especially by the use of pit-coal. Some citizens of Geneva, he adds, who commenced their labours with more intelligence and greater means, had accomplished their object after repeated experiments. They wished to transport their establishment to the department of Isère, but their applications to the French government had been unsuccessful. A manufacturer named Olivier, at Paris, had pretty well imitated the best productions of Wedgwood; but Saint-Fond states that the condition of the public finances had not allowed of giving him the encouragement he merited.*

The proprietors of the British plate-glass-works, near St. Helen’s, Lancashire, petitioned parliament in 1785, complaining that, although they had expended 100,000*l.* on their undertaking, and had succeeded in making glass in all respects equal to that of France, they had not, in consequence of the pressure of taxation, and from various circumstances incidental to a new manufacture, been able to declare any dividend. The French manufacture, they stated, was not only entirely exempt from taxation, but was also encouraged by many privileges, while they had even to pay duty upon their waste glass, and had done so to the amount of 7000*l.† In 1787 their position was somewhat improved by an act‡ imposing additional duties on the importation of various kinds of French glass, and making several alterations in the mode of levying duties upon British glass; and in 1789 the company set up a steam-engine, capable of performing the work of 160 men, for grinding and polishing their plates. Macpherson, in the ‘Commercial Gazetteer’ appended to his ‘Annals of Commerce,’ states that plates were then (about 1805) made by this company 133 inches by 72, 139 inches by 60, and 144 inches by 54; and that there was also, at the same place, a manufacture of window-glass and of small plates, formed by blowing.§ Saint-Fond notices with admiration the glass-works of Parker, where, he says, visitors would “see to what varied extent that substance, pure as the clearest spring-water, and more delightful to the eye than crystal, may be fashioned, in the hands of skilful artists, into cups, vases, basins, and bottles of every form.” And he alludes also to the glass-houses at Newcastle-on-Tyne, where similar articles were made.|| He adds that the English glass-works had been imitated successfully in France, the first attempts at such improved manufacture having been made in the park at St. Cloud, at the instigation and under the auspices of Marie Antoinette. That manufactory was subsequently removed to Creuzot, near Montcenis, in Burgundy, where it received the name of the queen's manufactory. "It is," he says, "formed on the most extensive scale, very excellent glass-works are made there, and it has already given rise to similar manufactories at Paris and other places." Brissot also makes honourable mention of the superiority of English glass wares, which, he says, formed a great object of exportation. "America," he observes, "ought to prefer English glass to ours [the French], because we ourselves prefer it to that of our own manufactory, common bottles excepted, which we make better, and which are of a finer glass than that of the English." The alarming consumption of wood-fuel, so often referred to by this writer, as well as by Saint-Fond, is urged as a reason for discouraging the glass-manufacture in France, because, observes Brissot, "our own consumption of glass-ware, much greater than that of the English, may already be too considerable, if it be compared with the means to which the ever-growing scarcity of combustibles reduces us." He therefore deems it far better to allow the importation of foreign glass into France; and he encourages the Americans to attempt the manufacture on as large a scale as possible, on account of their immense forests.

|| Travels, i. 100, 101; 135, 136. In connexion with the last-mentioned establishment, Saint-Fond commends the prudence of the English in erecting their manufactories in a very plain and simple style. “This modest simplicity,” he observes, “is of great advantage to the country: it encourages active and industrious men to embark in trade, who would otherwise be unwilling to form large establishments, being alarmed by the expenses which extensive works require, when constructed on a magnificent scale.” “It is,” he adds, “a taste for pomp and grandeur which almost always ruins the manufactures of France, and prevents those new ones which we want from being established: men are afraid to involve themselves in ruinous expenses for mere warehouses and workshops. It must be acknowledged that the English and Dutch are much more prudent, and exhibit examples in this way which we ought to imitate. Architecture is a pest in establishments of this kind.” It had been well for many a disappointed capitalist if this commendable economy had been more universally regarded in more recent instances.

In reference to the progress of that important branch of national industry which, perhaps more than any other, distinguished the preceding period—the cotton manufacture—Macpherson observes, under the date of 1785, "The rapid increase in the number of spinning-engines, which took place in consequence of the expiration of Arkwright's patent,† forms a new era, not only in manufactures and commerce, but also in the dress of both sexes. The common use of silk, if it were only to be worn while it retains its lustre, is proper only for ladies of ample fortune; and yet women of almost all ranks affected to wear it, and many in the lower classes of the middle ranks of society distressed their husbands, parents, and brothers, to procure that expensive finery. Neither was a handsome cotton gown attainable by women in humble circumstances; and thence the cottons were mixed with linen-yarn to reduce their price." "But now," he proceeds, "cotton-yarn is cheaper than linen-yarn; cotton goods are very much used in place of cambrics, lawns, and other expensive fabrics of flax; and they have almost totally superseded the silks. Women of all ranks, from the highest to the lowest, are clothed in British manufactures of cotton, from the muslin cap on the crown of the head to the cotton stocking under the sole of the foot. The ingenuity of the calico-printers has kept pace with the ingenuity of the weavers and others concerned in the preceding stages of the manufacture, and produced patterns of printed goods, which for elegance of drawing exceed everything that ever was imported, and for durability of colour generally stand the washing so well as to appear fresh and new every time they are washed, and give an air of neatness and cleanliness to the wearer beyond the elegance of silk in the first freshness of its transitory lustre. But even the most elegant prints are excelled by the superior beauty and virgin purity of the muslins, the growth and the manufacture of the British dominions." "With the gentlemen," he adds, "cotton stuffs for waistcoats have almost superseded woollen cloths, and silk stuffs, I believe, entirely; and they have the advantage, like the ladies' gowns, of having a new and fresh appearance every time they are washed. Cotton stockings have also become very general for summer wear, and have gained ground very much upon silk stockings, which are too thin for our climate, and too expensive for common wear for people of middling circumstances."* If such a statement could be made at the commencement of the nineteenth century (Macpherson's 'Annals' were published in 1805), how much more forcibly would the present extent of the various branches of the cotton manufacture, to say nothing of the other almost innumerable departments of industry which have been affected by it, illustrate the importance of the great movement in which Arkwright bore so distinguished a part. Viewing this movement as intimately connected with the rise and growth of the factory system generally, as well as of the staple manufacture of the country, it may perhaps be safely pronounced the greatest that ever took place in the productive industry of the British or any other nation. Of its effect upon the habits and social position of the manufacturing population, perhaps no better illustration could be selected than that quoted by Baines† from a work written by William Radcliffe, a man practically acquainted with the subject on which he wrote, upon the 'Origin of the new system of Manufacture, commonly entitled Powerloom Weaving,' as "a strongly drawn picture of the cottage of the domestic manufacturer before spinning-machinery was invented," and "a familiar, striking, and just history, illustrated by a single specimen, of the growth of the great manufacturing villages and towns which are now thickly spread over the cotton districts of Lancashire and Cheshire." Radcliffe's narrative refers to the parish of Mellor, fourteen miles from Manchester, where, in 1770, the land was occupied by between fifty and sixty farmers, whose rents, to the best of his recollection, did not exceed 10s. per acre. Of these there were but six or seven who raised their rent directly from the produce of their farms, while all the rest obtained the means of paying it partly in some branch of trade, such as spinning and weaving woollen, linen, or cotton. The cottagers were employed entirely in this manner, except for a few weeks in the harvest. "Being," says Radcliffe, "one of those cottagers, and intimately acquainted with all the rest, as well as every farmer, I am better able to relate particularly how the change from the old system of hand-labour to the new one of machinery operated in raising the price of land. Cottage rents at that time, with convenient loom-shop, and a small garden attached, were from one and a half to two guineas per annum. The father of a family would earn from eight shillings to half-a-guinea at his loom, and his sons, if he had one, two, or three alongside of him, six or eight shillings each per week; but the great sheet-anchor of all cottages and small farms was the labour attached to the hand-wheel; and when it is considered that it required six to eight hands to prepare and spin yarn, of any of the three materials I have mentioned, sufficient for the consumption of one weaver, this shows clearly the inexhaustible source there was for labour for every person from the age of seven to eighty years (who retained their sight and could move their hands), to earn their bread, say one to three shillings per week, without going to the parish." "From the year 1770 to 1788," he proceeds to observe, "a complete change had gradually been effected in the spinning of yarns; that of wool had disappeared altogether, and that of linen was also nearly gone; cotton, cotton, cotton, was become the almost universal material for employment; the hand-wheels were all thrown into lumber-rooms; the yarn was all spun upon common jennies; the carding for all numbers up to 40 hanks in the pound was done on carding-engines; but the finer numbers of 60 to 80 were still carded by hand, it being a general opinion at that time that machine-carding would never answer for fine numbers. In weaving, no great alteration had taken place during these eighteen years, save the introduction of the fly-shuttle, a change in the woollen-loom to fustians and calico, and the linen nearly gone, except the few fabrics in which there was a mixture of cotton. To the best of my recollection there was no increase of looms during this period, but rather a decrease." The next fifteen years, from 1788 to 1803, Radcliffe calls the golden age of this great trade. "Water-twist and common jenny yarns had," he says, "been freely used in Bolton, &c. for some years prior to 1788; but it was the introduction of mule yarns about this time, along with the other yarns, all assimilating together and producing every description of clothing, from the finest bookmuslin, lace, stocking, &c., to the heaviest fustian, that gave such a preponderating wealth through the loom." The families of cottagers, and small farmers who had long been partially engaged in the various branches of the manufacture, profited, with others, by this extension of the trade; for the new branches of employment, and the increasing demand for every kind of fabric produced by the loom, put all hands in request, of every age and description. "The fabrics made from wool and linen vanished, while the old loom-shops being insufficient, every lumber-room, even old barns, cart-houses, and out-buildings of every description, were repaired, windows broken through the old blank walls, and all fitted up for loom-shops. This source of making room being at length exhausted, new weavers' cottages, with loom-shops, rose up in every direction; all immediately filled, and, when in full work, the weekly circulation of money, as the price of labour only, rose to five times the amount ever before experienced in this district, every family bringing home weekly 40, 60, 80, 100, or even 120 shillings per week!" "It may," remarks Radcliffe, "be easily conceived that this sudden increase of the circulating medium would, in a few years, not only show itself in affording all the necessaries and comforts of life these families might require, but also be felt by those who, abstractedly speaking, might be considered disinterested spectators. But in reality they were not so, for all felt it, and that in the most agreeable way, too; for this money in its peregrinations left something in the pockets of every stone-mason, carpenter, slater, plasterer, joiner, &c., as well as the corn-dealer, cheesemonger, butcher, and shopkeepers of every description. The farmers participated as much as any class, by the prices they obtained for their corn, butter, eggs, fowls, with every other article the soil or farm-yard could produce, all of which advanced at length to nearly three times the former price. Nor was the portion of this wealth inconsiderable that found its way into the coffers of the Cheshire squires who had estates in this district, the rents of their farms being doubled, and in many instances trebled." The prosperity of the cotton-manufacturing districts about the year 1791 is also referred to with admiration by an intelligent British tourist, whose work has been quoted on a previous page, and who says, "To see barren hills and valleys laugh and sing under the influence of an auspicious trade must give the benevolent heart the most agreeable sensations. Villages swarming with strong, healthy, and beautiful children, well fed, though they may at this time of the year (Walker's tour was made in the summer) despise shoes and stockings, is another instance; for these may be considered as the offspring of trade. Handsome country-houses on every hill, elegantly furnished, and surrounded by as elegant pleasure-grounds,—and a great part of the old town (of Manchester) pulled down to make room for spacious and ornamental mansions:—these are thy blessings, O Commerce!—these are thy rewards, O Industry!"* Manchester had, he states, doubled in size, and more than doubled in population, within the preceding thirty years; and from another authority it appears that the population of Lancashire, which was only 166,200 in 1700, and 297,400 in 1750, had risen to 672,565 in 1801; † this rapid rate of increase being mainly attributable to the manufactures of that district. Walker also notices the substitution of cotton-manufactures for those of earlier date in the country. "The silk-mills of Knutsford, Macclesfield, &c.," he observes, "are principally converted into cotton-mills; that material having taken the lead of silk in the fashion of the present time." The activity of the cotton-trade appears indeed to have been so great as to lead Walker to fear that the market would be overstocked; for he proceeds: "It is impossible so many mills should find employment for any length of time, for there is scarcely a stream that will turn a wheel through the north of England that has not a cotton-mill upon it. At present they are fully employed, and long may they continue so!—but this I much fear." ‡

* Commerce of America with Europe, pp. 147-151. In a previous section of this work (p. 106), on the commerce in wines, Brissot remarks that "the Americans prefer, in general, the wine which is carried to them in bottles, because they believe it less subject to become sharp, or to change on the voyage." And he proceeds to say, "On the first view, it seems advantageous to France to furnish its wines with this envelope, because it is a new opening for its glass-ware; but if it be recollected what a prodigious quantity of combustibles glass manufactures require, to the sensible destruction of forests, it appears imprudent to encourage a commerce which cannot but augment it rapidly."

From statistical data given by Macpherson, on the authority of a pamphlet published in 1788, entitled 'An Important Crisis in the Calico and Muslin Manufactory in Great Britain explained,' it appears that there were at that time 119 cotton-mills in England, 4 in Wales, 19 in Scotland, and 1 in the Isle of Man, making 143 in the whole; the estimated cost of their erection being 715,000*l.* Of these Lancashire contained 41; Derbyshire, 22; Nottinghamshire, 17; Yorkshire, 11; Cheshire, 8; Staffordshire, 7; Westmoreland, 5; Berkshire, 2; and the rest of England, 6. Lanarkshire had 4; Renfrewshire, 4; Perthshire, 3; Edinburghshire, 2; and the rest of Scotland, 6. In addition to the above there were 550 mule-jennies of 90 spindles each, and 20,700 hand-jennies of 80 spindles each, for spinning yarn for the shoot or weft, the cost of which, with their auxiliary machinery, and the buildings containing them, was estimated to be about 285,000*l.*; which, with the cost of the mills, as stated above, makes a capital of about 1,000,000*l.* invested in such mechanism.§ Of these 143 cotton-mills it is stated in another work,* apparently on the same authority, that nearly two-thirds had been erected within the preceding five years. In 1785, on the trial concerning the validity of the patent of Arkwright, it was stated by Mr. Bearcroft, the counsel engaged against him, that 30,000 persons were employed in establishments set up in defiance of the patent, and that near 300,000*l.* had been expended upon the buildings and machinery of such mills. †

ford, places previously of the most trifling importance, were planted there in consequence of the facilities afforded by those situations for obtaining water-power in abundance; ‡ and in many other instances the same reason led to the establishment of cotton factories on sites so secluded as to render it necessary to procure working hands from a distance. Mr. Kennedy, in a paper 'On the Rise and Progress of the Cotton Trade,' published in the Memoirs of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchester, § states that Watt's engine began to be understood and introduced in that part of the kingdom about 1790, in consequence of which new life was imparted to the cotton trade: "water-falls became of less value; and, instead of carrying the people to the power, it was found preferable to place the power among the people, wherever it was most wanted." From notices collected by Mr. Baines and Dr. Ure, it appears that the first steam-engine constructed by Boulton and Watt to impart direct rotatory motion to the mechanism of a cotton-mill, without the intervention of a water-wheel, was that erected in 1785 at the works of Messrs. Robinson, at Papplewick, Nottinghamshire. In 1787 they erected one engine for Messrs. Puls, cotton-spinners, at War-

§ Annals of Commerce, iv. 133. Mr. Baines shows, in his 'History of the Cotton Manufacture,' pp. 216-219, that some of the statements which have been frequently reprinted in works on the progress of British manufactures, on the authority of the above-mentioned pamphlet, are very erroneous; but he considers that the account of the number of mills probably approached to correctness. The author of this pamphlet, which Baines styles 'an ephemeral brochure,—a mere budget of blunders and prejudices,' states the value of the manufactures of cotton, in material and labour, to have been only 300,000*l.* in 1767, and to have risen to 7,500,000*l.* in 1787; thus making out an increase of more than thirty-seven-fold in the value of the manufactured articles, while Baines affirms that the increase in the quantity of raw material consumed was certainly not seven-fold. There appears to be a great error in each part of the estimate, for the official return of exports of cotton goods in 1766 amounts to 220,759*l.*; and, in the same year, Postlethwayt estimated the whole value of the goods manufactured in England at 600,000*l.* Assuming that the proportion exported continued about the same in 1787, when the official value of the exports was 1,001,457*l.*, the total value of the manufactures for that year would be 3,304,371*l.* Even on this calculation, the increase in twenty years would be five-and-a-half fold, a reality which, as Baines observes, is sufficiently striking without the aid of exaggeration.

‡ The first cotton-mill at Belper, which was built about the year 1776 by Jedediah Strutt, had three water-wheels of extraordinary dimensions. Two of them were made chiefly of iron, 21 feet 6 inches in diameter, and 15 feet long or wide; and the third, which was intended for use during floods, was 18 feet in diameter, and more than 40 feet long.—Davies's New Historical and Descriptive View of Derbyshire.

ington, and three others in Nottingham. It was not, however, till 1789 "that the calico trade of Manchester," according to Dr. Ure's account, "gave birth to a factory moved by steam, when Mr. Drinkwater mounted a handsome mill with one of Watt's engines."* "In 1790," he proceeds to say, "Sir Richard Arkwright followed his example, in a mill erected at Nottingham. The same year a second engine, for cotton-spinning, was fitted up in Manchester for Mr. Simpson, and also at Papplewick for Messrs. Robinson." "It ought to be mentioned," he adds, "that Sir Richard had tried steam-power at an earlier period; but, out of an ill-judged economy, he had adopted Newcomen's machines, rendered rotatory by a heavy fly-wheel; but, seeing his error, he replaced them by engines of Watt's construction." In Scotland, the first steam-engine for spinning cotton was put up at Springfield, Glasgow, in January, 1792, by Messrs. Scott, Stevenson, and Co.†

Instances might be multiplied, were it necessary, of the extensive and profitable character of the new establishments called into existence by the introduction of cotton-spinning by machinery, in various parts of Great Britain. To allude to one only, that of the first Sir Robert Peel, son of the Mr. Peel whose experiments in calico-printing are mentioned in the preceding Book;‡ in this case we find a person of comparatively humble origin rising, by means of the cotton manufacture, to so elevated a position in the commercial world, that when, in 1798, parliament empowered the government to raise voluntary contributions towards the expenses of the war, he and his partner, Mr. Yates, paid into the exchequer 10,000*l.*, as the quota for their calico and print works at Bury, in Lancashire. Macpherson, in narrating this circumstance, asks triumphantly if there is any other country on the face of the globe that can produce a manufacturer

* An atmospheric pumping-engine had been set up a few years previously to raise water for turning a wheel at the mill of Messrs. Arkwright, Simpson, and Whitenburgh, at Shude Hill, Manchester. Mr. Baines says (p. 226) that this engine was erected in 1783; but Dr. Ure, who designates the establishment "the oldest mill in Manchester," states that it was erected about the year 1780.—Cotton Manufacture of Great Britain, i. 273.

who can spare such a sum? Yet many were found in England capable of performing similar acts of liberality, although, as the donation of a single firm, the above sum appears to have stood unrivalled. In a contemporary memoir of Sir Robert Peel it is said to have been "very well known that, had a disposition proportionally liberal shown itself in other individuals of the community, equally competent," the sum subscribed by the Peel family would, as originally intended, have been forty-five thousand pounds.* From this memoir it appears that about the same time Mr. Peel placed himself at the head of a corps of volunteers formed at Bury, consisting of six companies, most of the members of which were his own artificers. He also established extensive works at Tamworth, and in the adjacent village of Fazeley, for carrying on every stage of the cotton manufacture, including spinning, weaving, bleaching, and calico-printing.†

One of the interesting features of the history of the cotton manufacture in the period under review is the establishment, on the east bank of the Clyde, of the manufacturing village of New Lanark, which commenced about the year 1785, with the erection, by Mr. David Dale, a public-spirited citizen of Glasgow, of four cotton-mills, impelled by water-power; in which, besides other spinning machinery, mule-jennies were first set to work by inanimate power, about the year 1790, by the ingenuity of Mr. William Kelly. In 1793, the number of persons employed in and in connexion with these works was 1658, about one-half of whom were under 13 years of age. To accommodate those employed in the mills, Mr. Dale built the village of New Lanark, where he employed three school-masters for the instruction of the young labourers, and of the children too young for work; and he bestowed the most praiseworthy and paternal attention on the health, education, and morals of those in his employment. In 1799 he sold these extensive works to a company of gentlemen from Manchester.‡ Similar exertions for the benefit of the juvenile portion of factory operatives were made in England by Mr. Peel and others of the more enlightened manufacturers; but in too many cases very different treatment was experienced by children employed in such works, many hundreds of which were sent from workhouses in London and elsewhere. Walker, who expresses a doubt as to the propriety of such infant labour, mentions in his 'Tour' a cotton-factory at Caton, in the valley of the Lune, whither many young children were sent from the workhouses of the metropolis. The improvements in the spinning of fine yarns, suitable for the manufacture of muslin, gave an impulse, about 1785, to the manufactures of Paisley, where that department of the cotton-trade was carried on to a considerable extent shortly after that date.* At Perth, also, machines for carding and spinning cotton were introduced during this period. Saint-Fond states that the first of them were in the manufactory of an individual who had caused them to be constructed at Manchester; and he adds that, owing to the jealousy of the manufacturers of that place, the machines had to be conveyed out of the town during the night. In a subsequent chapter of his work, Saint-Fond tells us that, notwithstanding the desire of his kind conductors to oblige him, every attempt to obtain admission to the Manchester cotton-mills was vain. The vigilance of the manufacturers was at this time redoubled, on account of a suspicion that a French colonel, who had visited the town shortly before, wanted to procure plans of their machinery to carry to France. "Since that period," he says, "no strangers, not even the most respectable citizens of the town, were permitted to enter the works."†

† Macpherson, in a note appended to his mention of Mr. Peel's magnificent donation (Annals, iv. 440), states that he gave employment and comfortable subsistence to 6800 men, women, boys, and girls; but from the manner in which this statement is alluded to in p. 79 of the same volume, it would appear to apply to the year 1785. The memoir above quoted, in the 'Public Characters' (p. 31, note), states that Sir Robert Peel employed not less than 15,000 persons.

The gross errors which have been detected in many of the early statistical accounts, relative to these as well as to other manufactures, render it very difficult to make any satisfactory statement as to the rate of progress made by them in any particular period; but some data extracted from Mr. Baines's valuable work may suffice to indicate the extent of the extraordinary impetus given to the cotton manufacture by the invalidation of Arkwright's patent, and the invention of the mule-jenny and other machines employed in its various branches. "Nothing like it," observes this writer, "has been known in any other great branch of industry. Capital and labour rushed to this manufacture in a torrent, attracted by the unequalled profits which it yielded. Numerous water-mills were erected, and filled with water-frames; and jennies and mules were made and set to work with almost incredible rapidity. The increase of weavers kept pace with the increase of spinners; and all classes of workmen in this trade received extravagantly high wages,—such as were necessary to draw from other trades the amount of labour for which the cotton-trade offered profitable employment, but such as it was impossible to maintain for any lengthened period." The imports of cotton wool in the five years from 1771 to 1775 had been, on an average, 4,764,589 lbs. annually; in the next quinquennial period the average had risen to 6,766,613 lbs.; and in the next, to 11,328,989 lbs., the amounts for the respective years of this latter period fluctuating between 5,198,778 lbs. in 1781 and 18,400,384 lbs. in 1785. In the next period of similar extent the annual average was 25,443,270 lbs.; the least importation being in 1786, when it amounted to 19,475,020 lbs., and the greatest, amounting to 32,576,023 lbs., in 1789. From tables in another part of Mr. Baines's work, founded on official documents, it appears that the average importation from 1791 to 1795 was

26,683,001 lbs., that of the highest year, 1792, being 34,907,497 lbs., and that of the lowest year, 1793, being 19,040,929 lbs.; and that in the next five years, from 1796 to 1800,* the average had risen to 37,350,275 lbs., the lowest year being 1797, when the importation was 23,354,371 lbs., and the highest 1800, when it amounted to 56,010,732 lbs. In order to ascertain the precise quantity retained for home consumption, or rather for home manufacture, the exports of cotton wool, which were very variable, but always of comparatively trifling extent, should be deducted from the above quantities. These appear, from the same authority, to have averaged 260,996 lbs. per annum from 1781 to 1785; 678,334 lbs. from 1786 to 1790; 1,112,832 lbs. from 1791* to 1795; and 1,433,288 lbs. from 1796 to 1800. The average for the last of these periods was, however, swelled greatly by the exportation of 1800, which amounted to 4,416,610 lbs.; an amount greater than that of any subsequent year down to 1810. From the above and some other data given in his work, Mr. Baines infers that, within the first fifty years of the eighteenth century, the quantity of cotton-wool imported had little more than doubled, while within the last twenty years of the century it multiplied more than eight-fold; making the rate of progression ten times as great in the latter period as in the former. He also gives, in a subsequent chapter, a table showing the rate of increase in the import of cotton-wool in each decennial period from 1741 to 1831, from which it appears, to adopt his own words, that, while "from 1697 to 1741 the increase was trifling, between 1741 and 1751 the manufacture, though still insignificant in extent, made a considerable spring; during the next twenty years the increase was moderate; from 1771 to 1781, owing to the invention of the jenny and the water-frame, a rapid increase took place; in the ten years from 1781 to 1791, being those which immediately followed the invention of the mule and the expiration of Arkwright's patent, the rate of advancement was prodigiously accelerated, being nearly 320 per cent.; and from that time to the present, and especially since the close of the war, the increase, though considerably modified, has been rapid and steady far beyond all precedent in any other manufacture." For comparison with the above statements, Mr. Baines presents a series of facts relative to the exportation of cotton goods, which exhibit a similarly rapid rate of increase. "Less than a century ago," he observes, writing about the year 1835, "the cotton exports of the country were so insignificant, that they are not mentioned by any writer of that period in treating of the commerce between England and foreign countries. Even half a century since they were as yet a small branch of trade compared with the woollen; but about that period they increased with unparalleled rapidity, and at the beginning of the present century they nearly overtook the woollen exports in amount." In 1697 the official value of British cotton goods of all sorts exported from this country was only 5915*l.*; in 1701 it amounted to 23,253*l.*, but in 1710, 1720, 1730, and 1741, the amounts were, respectively, 5698*l.*, 16,200*l.*, 13,524*l.*, and 20,709*l.* In 1751 the cotton goods exported rose to 45,986*l.*, and in the three years 1764, 1765, and 1766, they averaged 223,153*l.* per annum. In 1780 they were 355,060*l.*, in 1785, 864,710*l.*; and in the five years from 1786 to 1790, during which the increase was tolerably steady, the annual average was 1,232,529*l.* From 1791 to 1795 the annual exports averaged 2,088,525*l.* in official value; and in the next corresponding period, 1796 to 1800, the average was 4,073,382*l.* annually; the amount for the last year of that period being 5,406,501*l.*, and those for the succeeding years maintaining a steady, though for some time not a very rapid increase. Thus, Mr. Baines observes, in continuation of his similar estimate of the increase in the importation of raw cotton, "within the first fifty years (of the eighteenth century) the value of the cotton exports nearly doubled; within the last twenty it multiplied fifteen-and-a-half fold. The rate of progression, therefore, was nearly twenty times as great in the latter period as in the former." "Such," he adds, "are the effects of machinery."*

In connexion with the above statistics we may advert for a moment to the sources of the rapidly increasing supplies of cotton-wool. Mr. Baines states that, in the infancy of the cotton manufacture, England obtained her supply of the raw material from the Mediterranean and the Levant, but that in the eighteenth century the largest supplies came from the West Indies and South America; and Dr. Ure says that, prior to the year 1794, almost all the cotton-wool consumed in the British manufactures was obtained from the West Indies and Guiana, with the exception of a little from India and the Levant for the fustian trade, and a still smaller quantity from the Brazils and the Isle of Bourbon for the finer muslin yarns. Brazilian cotton was, according to Mr. Baines, first imported in 1781, in a very dirty state, but it was soon found to be superior in fineness and staple even to that of Demerara, and consequently there arose a considerable demand for it, at a higher price than most other kinds; and the cotton of the Isle of Bourbon, which was received by way of Ostend, and was considered of the finest quality then known, is said to have sold at from 7*s.* 6*d.* to 10*s.* per lb. in the year 1786.† From an approximate statement,

* Baines's History of the Cotton Manufacture, pp. 214-216 and 347-350. Many of the above figures are obtained by computation from the tables given in this work, which are all stated to be founded on official documents. An official return of the imports of various articles used in British manufactures, which is printed by Macpherson (Annals, iv. 470), does not, in the item of cotton-wool, perfectly agree with the figures in Baines, but the variations are of trifling importance.

† The price of other kinds of cotton-wool from the West Indies, including Surinam and Berbice, in the same year, ranged from 1*s.* 10*d.* to 3*s.* 6*d.* per lb., exclusive of duty, according to a table quoted by Baines (p. 313) from Tooke's work on High and Low Prices. Baines states, on the authority of Bryan Edwards, that the finest grained and most perfectly cleaned cotton brought to the English market about 1780, was from the Dutch plantations of Berbice, Demerara, and Surinam, and of the Island of Cayenne.

given by Dr. Ure, of the imports of cotton-wool from various parts of the world in 1787, it appears that of 22,800,000 lbs. (a quantity somewhat smaller than that assigned to the same year in the returns from which the preceding statistical particulars are derived), about 6,800,000 lbs. were brought from the British West Indies, about 6,000,000 lbs. from the French and Spanish colonies, 1,700,000 lbs. from the Dutch colonies, 2,500,000 lbs. from those belonging to Portugal, 100,000 lbs. from the Isle of Bourbon, and 5,700,000 lbs. from Smyrna and Turkey. Considering the immense extent since attained by the cotton-wool trade of the United States, it is curious to read the statement quoted by Mr. Baines, from Smithers's 'History of Liverpool,' that "in 1784 an American vessel arrived at Liverpool, having on board eight bags of cotton, which were seized by the custom-house officers, under an impression that cotton was not the produce of the United States!" By the year 1801 the exports of cotton from the United States exceeded 20,000,000 lbs.* It may be added, although, as before stated, from a somewhat questionable authority, the pamphlet published in 1788, under the title of 'An Important Crisis in the Calico and Muslin Manufacture in Great Britain explained,' that the cotton imported in 1787, which is there estimated at 22,600,000 lbs., or very little over what appears, by the official returns, to have been retained for home consumption in that year, was worked up in about the following proportions:—11,600,000 lbs. in calicoes and muslins; 6,000,000 lbs. in fustians; 2,000,000 lbs. in cotton goods having an admixture of silk or linen; 1,500,000 lbs. in hosiery; and 1,500,000 lbs. in candlewicks. On the last item Mr. Baines † observes that the quantity set down for candlewicks alone is nearly as great as the whole importation at the commencement of the century; and he adds that, if the estimate even approaches to correctness, it leads to the inference that a considerable proportion even of the small imports from 1700 to 1750 have been used for candlewicks, and for other minor purposes.

Of the improvements effected during this period in the mechanism employed in the cotton manufacture it is unnecessary to say much, most of them being of a character which, however important in economising labour and improving the quality of the goods produced, are not sufficiently prominent to claim notice in a brief account intended for the general reader. Of the manner in which many of these improvements were effected an idea may be conveyed by quoting the words of Mr. Kennedy respecting the progressive improvement and extension of the mule-jenny, originally contrived by Crompton.‡ "The art of spinning on Crompton's machine," he observes, "was tolerably well known, from the circumstance of the high wages that could be obtained by those working on it, above the ordinary wages of other artisans, such as shoemakers, joiners, hatmakers, &c., who on that account left their previous employment; and to them might be applied the fable of the town in a state of siege; for if, in the course of their working the machine, there was any little thing out of gear, each workman endeavoured to fill up the deficiency with some expedient suggested by his former trade: the smith suggested a piece of iron, the shoemaker a welt of leather, &c., all which had a good effect in improving the machine. Each put what he thought best to the experiment, and that which was good was retained."* Even the construction of a self-acting mule, or one requiring no manual aid beyond that of the children required to join the broken threads, an object which has only been successfully accomplished within these few years, was attempted before the close of the eighteenth century. The earliest machine of this nature was invented by the late William Strutt, F.R.S., son of Jedediah Strutt, before the year 1790, according to a memoir by his son, the present Edward Strutt, M.P.; but the inferior workmanship of that time appears to have prevented the successful application of the improvement. Mr. Kelly, of the Lanark mills, whose application of water-power to the working of ordinary mules has been alluded to in a previous page, also constructed a self-acting mule about 1792.† Of the effect of successive improvements in spinning-machinery, and the competition of a rapidly extending manufacture, in reducing the price of yarn, an idea may be formed from a tabular view given by Baines of the price of cotton-yarn, No. 100, in 1786 and succeeding years, which shows that the quality of yarn which brought 38s. per lb. in 1786 was reduced to 29s. 9d. per lb. in 1791, to 19s. in 1796, and to 8s. 9d. in 1801.‡

The spirit of improvement which had revolutionised the art of spinning was next directed to that of weaving, but with less striking success, many years having elapsed after the introduction of power-looms before they obtained very extensive employment. Mr. Baines refers to a loom worked by water-power, which was contrived by M. De Gennes as early as the seventeenth century, and which, from the description in the 'Philosophical Transactions' for 1678, § appears to have aimed at accomplishing the advantages realized by the modern power-loom. It does not appear ever to have come into use; and a weaving factory which was erected at Manchester, in 1765, by Mr. Gartside, and probably, according to Baines, filled with swivel-looms of the construction invented by M. Vauconson, failed to produce any advantage, because a man was required to superintend each loom.* The first practically useful power-loom, or machine for automatic weaving, appears to have been that of the Rev. Dr. Edmund Cartwright, who, being at Matlock, in Derbyshire, in the summer of 1784, fell into the company of some Manchester gentlemen, whose conversation turned upon Arkwright's spinning-machinery. One of the company observed that, on the expiration of Arkwright's patent, so many mills would be set up and so much cotton would be spun, that hands would never be found to weave it, to which Cartwright replied, that Arkwright must then set his wits to work to invent a weaving-mill. In the conversation occasioned by this remark, the Manchester gentlemen declared such a contrivance to be impracticable, and adduced arguments in support of their opinion which Cartwright, who had never seen a person weave, and was totally ignorant of the subject, was unable either to answer or to understand. He nevertheless controverted the idea of automatic weaving being impracticable; and, having thus had his attention directed to the subject, he soon afterwards constructed a loom for the purpose, with which a coarse piece of cloth was produced. In a letter to Mr. Bannatyne,† from which the above details are taken, Dr. Cartwright thus speaks of his first machine: "As I had never before turned my thoughts to anything mechanical, either in theory or practice, nor had ever seen a loom at work or knew anything of its construction, you will readily suppose that my first loom was a rude piece of machinery. The warp was placed perpendicularly, the reed fell with the weight of at least half a hundredweight, and the springs which threw the shuttle were strong enough to have thrown a Congreve rocket. In short, it required the strength of two powerful men to work the machine at a slow rate and only for a short time. Conceiving, in my great simplicity, that I had accomplished all that was required, I then secured what I thought a most valuable property by a patent, 4th of April, 1785. This being done,

I then condescended to see how other people wove, and you will guess my astonishment when I compared their easy modes of operation with mine. Availing myself, however, of what I then saw, I made a loom in its general principles nearly as they are now made; but it was not till the year 1787 that I completed my invention, when I took out my last weaving patent, August 1st of that year." In consequence of this invention, Dr. Cartwright endeavoured to establish a manufactory with power-looms at Doncaster, where he then resided; but this attempt proved unsuccessful. About 1790, according to Baines's narrative, Messrs. Grimshaw, of Gorton, having obtained a licence from Cartwright, erected a weaving-factory at Knott Mills, Manchester, and expended much money in attempts to improve the power-loom, but their efforts were stopped by their factory being burnt down. A contemporary memoir of Dr. Cartwright, in the 'Public Characters' of 1800-1801, states that the licence or contract was for 500 looms, and that the mill built for their reception was on a larger scale than any other manufacturing mill at that time in existence. This authority adds, that, "as soon as it was understood what the mill was designed for, anonymous letters were written to the proprietors threatening its destruction, which, indeed, took place in less than a month after the looms were set to work." Returning to Baines's narrative of the early progress of power-loom weaving, we find that in 1794 a power-loom was invented by Mr. Bell, of Glasgow, which, like its predecessors, was soon abandoned; and that in 1796 Mr. Robert Miller, of Glasgow, patented a similar machine, which was, in 1801, adopted by a spirited individual named Monteith, who fitted up a mill with 200 looms at Pollokshaws, near Glasgow; but it is added that several years elapsed before the business was made to answer.* Macpherson notices another labourer in the same field, Stephen Dolignon, whose loom, which was adapted for working by any inanimate power, possessed what he styles "an instinctive capacity of knowing when any thread of the warp or weft is broken," and accordingly stopping of itself until the damage was repaired. "Six of these looms," he says, "may, with ease, be attended by a girl of fifteen years of age, or an infirm or aged person of either sex." Dolignon died in 1797, soon after completing his invention, which consequently fell into disregard. Macpherson, however, dwells with admiration upon its powers, and pleads for it as an advantage which it possessed over most machinery for the abridgment of labour, that its general use could give no alarm to the people engaged in the manual fabrication of the goods which might be made by it; because a weaver who had been accustomed to work upon one loom might, as the expense of the machinery was moderate, set up and superintend six looms to be worked by weights or other means, so as immediately to furnish six times the former quantity of cloth at one-half the cost of weaving, and yet to earn three times as much as by the common loom. "Thus," he adds, "the use of this machinery, instead of threatening them with loss of employment, may, in the very first instance, be a blessing, and a fund of wealth to the British operative weavers, who need only such assistance to counteract the enormous expense of living to enable them to become the manufacturers for the whole world."† It may be here mentioned that the want of efficient mechanism for dressing the yarn was one of the principal obstacles to the success of the early power-looms; the interruptions occasioned by performing that operation by hand seriously retarding the action of a machine impelled by a constant unvarying force, although of comparatively little consequence in the case of the common hand-loom.

In connexion with improvements in the art of weaving we may advert to the patriotic efforts of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce "to encourage the making in the loom an imitation of that species of needlework long known by the name of Marseilles Quilting," an object which, when first proposed, was generally regarded as visionary and impossible. The Society nevertheless offered premiums for its accomplishment, and in the first volume of their 'Transactions,' published in 1783, they report that the manufacture was thoroughly established, and applied to linen, woollen, cotton, and silk. "There are," they observe, "few persons of any rank, condition, or sex in the kingdom (and, we may add, within the extent of British commerce, so greatly is it exported) who do not use it in some part of their clothing; so that we may safely say, if the whole fund and revenue of the Society had been given to obtain this one article of trade, the national gain in return should be considered as very cheaply purchased."‡

Great progress was made during the period embraced in this Book in the weaving of muslins, which had been attempted at Paisley as early as the year 1700, but soon discontinued in consequence of the extensive importation of such articles from India. Dr. Ure, after noticing this circumstance, observes that "the germ, after lying dormant for eighty years, rapidly expanded into a flourishing business, showing a singular aptitude in the people of that town for this elegant branch of the cotton-trade." § He further states that muslins were manufactured at Zurich and St. Gall, in Switzerland, long before they were made (to any important extent) in this country. When, however, British mule-jennies were brought into action, they speedily enabled England to outstrip all foreign competitors in that fabric. Baines states that the manufacture of muslin was attempted both in Lancashire and at Glasgow about the year 1780, § with weft spun by the jenny, but that the attempt failed, owing to the coarseness of the yarn. "Even with Indian weft," he adds, "muslins could not be made to compete with those of the East. But when the mule was brought into general use, in 1785, both weft and warp were produced in this country sufficiently fine for muslins; and so quickly did the weaver avail himself of the improvement in the yarn, that no less than 500,000 pieces of muslin were manufactured in Great Britain in the year 1787." Dr. Ure states that the muslin trade received a great stimulus at Stockport about the year 1790, owing to the efforts of the late Samuel Oldknow, who took new ground by copying fabrics imported from India, whence this country was at that time supplied with all the finer fabrics. "He was," says Dr. Ure, "very successful in carrying on the ingenious processes which he had devised; but, the French revolution creating a panic and general stagnation for a time, he abandoned this branch of the trade, and betook himself to his large water-mill at Mellor, which was built in the year 1790." It is added that, on Oldknow retiring from the manufacture of fine muslin, Messrs. Horrocks, who had just established themselves at Preston as mule-spinners, took it up, became extensive manufacturers of cloth similar to that made by Oldknow, and supplied the same market, London. On the subsiding of the panic caused by the French revolution, a market sprung up on the Continent for yarns of all kinds, but principally for muslin yarns up to the highest numbers or finest qualities that could be produced. The 'Encyclopædia Britannica' states that muslin began to be made nearly at the same time at Bolton, Glasgow, and Paisley; each place adopting the peculiar description of fabric which resembled most those goods which it had been accustomed to manufacture, a judicious arrangement which enabled each place to maintain a superiority in one particular article. In a report made in the year 1793 by a select committee of directors of the East India Company upon the British cotton manufacture, it is said that "every shop offers British muslins for sale equal in appearance and of more elegant patterns than those of India, for one-fourth, or perhaps more than one-third, less in price;" a testimony to the excellence of British manufactures which carries more weight than almost any other that could be adduced.*

Respecting the rise of another branch of the British cotton-manufacture, that of lace, Dr. Ure states that the first machine for making lace with a stocking-frame was constructed in 1777, and that its invention had been claimed both for Mr. Robert Frost and for a poor workman of Nottingham named Holmes. He adds that this was, ere long, superseded by the point-net machine, the ingenious invention of Mr. John Lindley, senior, increasing." "In the year 1783," he adds, "there were above a thousand looms set up in Glasgow for that most beneficial article, in which the skill and labour of the mechanic raise the raw material to twenty times the value it was of when imported."—Annals of Commerce, iv. 80.

on whose death a patent was obtained for an improvement on the same principle, by Mr. Taylor, of Chapelbar; and that a further improvement on the machine was effected by Mr. Hiram Flint. Upon this account Messrs. Boden and Morley, late-manufacturers at Derby, remark, in a communication to Dr. Ure, that various kinds of net-work were made from the stocking-frame prior to the date above given, none of which, however, much resembled lace-net, until the invention of a fabric called square-net, for which Frost had a patent. "This," they add, "was soon superseded by the invention of point-net, the most perfect description of net-work ever produced from the stocking-frame," which is generally supposed to have been invented by Holmes. "This invention, however," they say, "only went to show that by a new and particular mode of arrangement of the loop upon the stocking-frame a beautiful kind of net-work could be made, but how this was to be accomplished with facility was still wanting. This was effected by the addition or appendage to the stocking-frame called the point-net machine, and which appears to have been the result of the united ingenuity of several individuals. Two persons of the names of Flint and Morris are supposed to have assisted, but what share they had in it it is difficult to determine." Dr. Ure observes that "at the beginning of the present century nearly the whole of machine-made lace was produced from these point-net machines—mechanisms probably more delicate than any other ever used for manufacturing purposes, either in this country or elsewhere." There were, he says further, not less than 1000 such machines then in active work.*

In the last Book mention was made of the repeal, in 1774, of an act which had prohibited the printing of British calicoes, and the imposition of a duty of 3*d.* per square yard upon them. By three several additions of five per cent. upon the amount of duties charged upon exciseable articles, the last of which was made in 1782, fifteen per cent. was added to this duty; and in 1784, when other new taxes were imposed by Mr. Pitt, an act † was passed laying a further duty of 1*d.* per yard on both cotton and mixed goods, bleached as well as printed, if under 3*s.* per yard in value, and 2*d.* per yard if above that value; and charging the additional fifteen per cent. upon this extra tax as well as upon the original 3*d.* per yard. This act also compelled bleachers to take out licences, which were taxed. "These impositions," says

* Cotton Manufacture of Great Britain, ii. 342, 343; 450, 451. A somewhat different account is given in Mr. McCulloch's Dictionary of Commerce, art. 'Lace,' on the authority of a work on Hosiery and Lace, by Gravenor Henson. He states that a frame-work knitter of Nottingham, named Hammond, about the year 1768, was the first who made lace by machinery, the idea having struck him while looking at the broad lace on his wife's cap, that he could fabricate a similar article by means of his stocking-frame. Mr. McCulloch further states that "the first machine ostensibly for lace (introduced at Nottingham about the same period by A. Eise and Haryey, of London) was called a pin-machine, for making single-press point-net in imitation of the Brussels ground;" that "in 1782, the warp-frame was introduced, which is still in use for making warp-lace; and that in 1799, after many attempts, the bobbin-net machine was invented," although it was not completely successful until it was improved by Mr. Heathcoat, several years later.

† 24 Geo. III., c. 40 (second session).

Baines, "excited great alarm and discontent throughout Lancashire and all the cotton-manufacturing districts of England and Scotland; petitions to the House of Commons and memorials to the Lords of the Treasury were sent up, representing that these new duties would crush the rising manufacture, and render the English altogether unable to compete with Indian goods brought from a country producing the raw material and every article used in the manufacture, and where labour was exceedingly cheap. Deputations were also sent from Manchester, Bolton, and other places, to remonstrate with the minister; the manufacturers were heard by counsel at the bar of the House, in the session of 1785, and much evidence was given; and so forcible were the representations made, that Mr. Pitt reluctantly consented to bring in a short bill* repealing all the new duties imposed by the bill of the preceding year on the linen and cotton manufactures. The repeal was celebrated as a jubilee in Lancashire, and when Mr. Thomas Walker and Mr. Richardson, who had been especially active in the application to government, returned from London, they were honoured with a triumphal entrance into Manchester, being met by a procession which extended nearly from that town to Stockport (about seven miles) and which is celebrated as one of the most joyous and splendid processions ever seen in Lancashire. The inhabitants of Manchester and Bolton presented silver cups to these gentlemen, with inscriptions acknowledging their valuable exertions."† The necessities of government, however, were so pressing that heavy duties were again imposed upon printed, though not upon bleached goods, by another act‡ passed at a later period in the same session, which rendered all such goods, if formed wholly or partially of cotton, liable to a duty of 2*d.* per yard in addition to the 3*d.* imposed by the act of 1774, if the value exceeded 1*s.* 8*d.*, and was under 3*s.* per yard; or to a duty of 4*d.* per yard if the value exceeded the latter amount. * Thus, with the additional fifteen per cent. above mentioned, the total duty on the former class of goods was 5½*d.*, and that on the latter class something less than 8½*d.* per yard. On the consolidation of the customs and excise duties in 1787 all these duties were abolished, and cotton, linen, or mixed goods of every kind were subjected to a duty of 3½*d.* per square yard when printed or dyed, the whole of which was to be returned on such goods as might be exported. Foreign calicoes or muslins printed in this country were to be liable to double the above duty.

In order to encourage the foreign trade in British cotton goods an act was passed in 1783§ to allow bounties upon their exportation; and by another act|| of the same session drawbacks were allowed upon soap, starch, and other necessary articles used in dressing or finishing any goods made of flax or cotton (with the exception of linens, which previously had a similar privilege), the high duties upon such articles having proved a serious obstruction to the growth of those manufactures. These acts, being for limited periods, were repeatedly renewed before the close of the century. The high duties charged on the importation of foreign muslins, calicoes, and nankeens having been found to encourage smuggling, were, in 1783, commuted into a duty of eighteen per cent. upon their selling value, of which ten per cent. was to be returned on exportation.* A few years later, owing partly to the great increase of the home manufacture, and partly to the accumulation of an unusually large stock of goods in the warehouses of the East India Company, a competition arose between the British and foreign fabrics which greatly depressed the prices of both, and so alarmed the manufacturers of this country, that they presented a memorial to the Board of Trade charging the company with having purposely augmented the quantity of their imports, and lowered their prices, in order to ruin them and to destroy British industry, that they might favour their own subjects in Hindostan, and increase their commerce. The substance of this memorial was communicated to the East India Company, whose answer convinced the Lords of the Privy Council that the imposition of such restrictions as the manufacturers called for upon their sales of foreign cotton goods would be prejudicial to the home manufacture, would throw their trade into the hands of foreigners, and would lead to very extensive smuggling for home consumption. "And, indeed," observes Macpherson, "when we consider that all East Indian goods are sold by public sale, it is evident that the demand must entirely regulate the price, which is fixed by the buyers themselves; for no one can suppose that the Company refused to take as good a price as they could get." "Neither," he adds, "was the glut of goods, which now came into the market and pressed so hard upon the manufacturers at the time, permanently hurtful to them, but rather highly beneficial; for it called into employment a vast number of hawkers of muslins, &c., who, by dint of low prices, diffused a taste for those goods in the remotest villages of the kingdom, where they had scarcely ever been seen before, and thereby paved the way to a greatly extended demand for the productions of the British as well as the Indian looms, by which the regular sales of both are augmented at least a hundred-fold."† Notwithstanding the able defence offered by the East India Company on this occasion, the rates of duty upon imported cotton goods were repeatedly raised between 1787 and the close of this period. From a statement given by Baines on government authority it appears, that in 1787 white calicoes were charged 5*s.* 3*d.* per piece (a piece being ten yards long when not more than a yard and a quarter wide, and six yards long when above that width), and 16*l.* 10*s.* per cent. on the value; and East India muslins and nankeens were charged 18*l.* per cent., ad valorem. These rates were gradually increased until, in 1802, they amounted to 6*s.* 8*d.* per piece, and 27*l.* 1*s.* 1*d.* per cent. ad valorem, in the former, and 30*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.* per cent. ad valorem, in the latter case. Dyed East India goods were totally prohibited.*

Having, in a previous page, given an estimate of the number of establishments engaged in the cotton-manufacture about 1787, shortly after the commencement of the period embraced in this Book, it would have been desirable, for the sake of comparison, to present a similar statement for the close of the century. For this, however, there do not appear to be sufficient data; and Macpherson, after giving some conjectural estimates of the extent of the manufacture, under the year 1800, confesses himself obliged to adopt the opinion expressed to him by a gentleman who was at the head of some of the greatest manufacturing establishments in the kingdom, that the object was beyond the reach of individual investigation. For Scotland, as being a much narrower field than the whole island of Great Britain, such data could be more readily obtained; and he therefore gives, on the authority of Brown's 'History of Glasgow,' an estimate, made in 1796, of the Scottish cotton-manufactures, which he deems a near approximation to the truth, and from which it appears that the number of water-mills was then increased to 39, more than double the number reported nine or ten years previously. These mills worked 124,800 spindles, and their cost, including both machinery and spindles, may have averaged 10,000*l.* each, making 390,000*l.* in the whole. There were also 1200 common jennies of 84 spindles each, which, at 6*l.* per jenny, would cost 7200*l.*, and 600 mule-jennies of 144 spindles each, the cost of which is given as 30*l.* each, or 18,000*l.* in the whole: thus making a grand total of 312,000 spindles, "working," it is stated, "by day and night," and a total capital in machinery and buildings, including 75,000*l.* for the buildings containing the jennies, of 490,200*l.* The number of people employed, of both sexes, is estimated at 25,000, the greater part of whom were under fifteen years of age. In addition to these spinners, there were in Scotland, it is stated, 38,815 weavers employed in the cotton-manufacture; 12,938 women employed in winding warp and weft; and, supposing one-third of the muslin produced to be adorned with tambouring or needle-work, 105,000 women and girls, mostly the latter, employed in that department; thus making a grand total of 181,753 persons deriving subsistence immediately from the cotton-manufacture in Scotland. Macpherson adds that it had increased very much between 1796 and 1800.†

is very briefly noticed in the preceding Book,* where it is shown that it had existed for a very few years only before the commencement of this period. Lord Sheffield, however, in 1785, observes, that, though the manufacture could hardly be said to have been above four or five years in Ireland, it seemed "already to have taken root, and to be well established." "It is computed," he adds, "that near 30,000 people are employed in it: if it be true, its progress indeed has been rapid; but it cannot be supposed that the fabrics of Manchester are yet materially rivalled, except it should be in the home consumption of Ireland." Those fabrics which were composed of a mixture of linen and cotton were said to be made better in Ireland than in England. The cotton manufacture was, in this early stage, liberally encouraged by the Irish government, and it was consequently established in several parts of the kingdom at once. One person in Dublin had, within three years, made 95 carding-machines, 394 jennies for 70 threads each, and more than 50 jennies for spinning wool. "The principal establishment of this manufacture," observes Lord Sheffield, "is at the new town called Prosperous, in the county of Kildare, on the borders of the bog of Allen, now a considerable place (a note adds that it had about 3000 inhabitants), but where there was only one small cottage four years ago." This establishment owed its foundation to the public spirit of Captain Brooke. Several other factories are mentioned by the same writer, who notices a disadvantage which they laboured under from the dissolute and unsteady character of many of the Englishmen employed in teaching or superintending the workpeople, most of whom were induced to go to Ireland on account of debts contracted at home. He also alludes to the growing evils of infant labour, observing that many children, as young as five or six years, were employed at wages varying from sixpence to thirteen pence per week, and that they were sometimes employed all night. "The machinery," he adds, "moves smoother if kept constantly at work: it therefore goes day and night, and consequently requires constant attendance."† Dr. Ure states that in 1800, only twenty-three years from the commencement of the enterprise by Joy and MacCabe,‡ "it appeared in evidence before parliament that the cotton manufacture which they had introduced, gave employment to 13,500 working people, and, including all manner of persons occupied in various ways, to 37,000, within a circuit of only ten miles, but comprehending within its bounds the towns of Belfast and Lisburn." Nor were these advances confined to the department of spinning;

‡ The first of these persons is the Robert Joy mentioned in p. 598 of our first volume, and MacCabe was one of his partners. It does not appear, from Dr. Ure's statement, at what precise time they succeeded in establishing the cotton manufacture at Belfast, but from the above remark it would seem to have been about 1777. From the passage quoted in vol. i. it appears that Joy conceived his plan some years earlier. The above details are from the first volume of the Cotton Manufacture of Great Britain, p. 287.

the manufacture of cottons, dimities, and Marseilles-quilting having been introduced and encouraged by Joy and the other projectors, who assisted and succeeded him; and it is stated that in less than ten years from their first introduction into the country, several thousand looms were employed in the manufacture of cotton in the towns of Belfast, Lisburn, and Hillsborough.

An account of the rise and progress of the cotton manufacture in North America, in a work recently published by Mr. James Montgomery,* states that as early as the year 1787 a society was formed in Philadelphia "for the Encouragement of Manufactures and the Useful Arts," by which some progress was made, though with very rude machinery, in the manufacture of various linen and cotton goods. Shortly before this society was formed, two mechanics named Barr, from Scotland, had been employed by Mr. Orr, of East Bridgewater, in the state of Massachusetts, to make machinery for carding, spinning, and roving; and in 1786 they received a public reward for their exertions. Another machine was made in 1787, for the same gentleman, by an English midshipman named Somers; and these machines, the first, it is believed, that were ever made in the United States for the manufacture of cotton, were publicly exhibited and explained by Mr. Orr. The first important company for the manufacture of cotton goods was formed at Beverley, Massachusetts, in 1787; but "the difficulties under which they laboured; the extraordinary loss of materials in the instruction of their servants and workmen; the high prices of machines unknown to their mechanics, and both intricate and difficult in their construction, together with other incidents which usually attend a new business, were such, that the company were put to the necessity of applying to the state legislature for assistance, to save them from being compelled to abandon the enterprise altogether." In their petition, dated June 2, 1790, they stated that their expenditure had already amounted to nearly 4000*l.*, and that a further outlay was necessary, to enable them to meet which the sum of 1000*l.* was granted by the state. Cotton-spinning was commenced in Rhode Island in 1788; but some of the first machines, which were made from information derived, through Mr. Orr, from emigrants, were so imperfect, that an attempt to drive them by means of a water-wheel failed. While these and other efforts were making under every disadvantage arising from inexperience and the rudeness of the mechanism employed, England was enjoying all the benefits occasioned by the extensive use of Arkwright's and Crompton's beautiful machines, which the jealous vigilance of the British government endeavoured to retain for the sole use of this country. Every effort to obtain models or drawings of the machinery used in England proved, for a considerable time, utterly vain; and the difficulties of those who were striving to establish the cotton-manufacture in the United States were increased by circumstances which, by embarrassing the British manufacturers, led to the exportation of great quantities of their goods at reduced prices. Many of these were sent to the United States, where agents were appointed to manage the sales, and, in order to encourage the trade, long credits, sometimes extending to eighteen months, were given. Such were the circumstances of the cotton-manufacture in the United States in 1790, when the main difficulty was removed by Mr. Samuel Slater, who has, Montgomery observes, been justly called the Father of the Cotton Manufacture of America. Slater was a native of Belper, in Derbyshire, and was brought up in the establishment of Mr. Jedediah Strutt, at Milford. After the expiration of the term of his apprenticeship, he was for some time employed by Mr. Strutt in superintending new works which he was erecting. Having heard rumours of the anxiety of the American government for information respecting British cotton-machinery, he formed the determination of emigrating to the States, where he hoped to bring his practical knowledge and experience into profitable exercise. He continued for some time with Mr. Strutt after forming this determination, in order to prepare himself for his difficult undertaking; it being necessary that he should, without the aid of any patterns or drawings, which would have been discovered by the vigilance of the custom-house officers, "be fully qualified to superintend the building and arrangement of the mills, the construction of the machinery; and to direct the details of the manufacture, without the aid of a single individual." He went to New York towards the close of the year 1789; but he soon left that city for Providence, in Rhode Island, where he entered into engagements with Messrs. Almy and Brown, who had been connected with some of the earlier experiments which have been alluded to. Having constructed the first machinery for carding and spinning cotton upon Arkwright's principle, almost entirely with his own hands, he set it in operation about the close of the year 1790, at the village of Pawtucket, near Providence; the machinery, which had 72 spindles, being worked by the water-wheel of an old fulling-mill. In 1793 Messrs. Almy, Brown, and Slater built a small mill at Pawtucket, and they subsequently extended their operations as their prospects improved. Montgomery observes that "Mr. Slater laboured under every disadvantage in the construction of his machinery; for, although he had perfect confidence in his own remembrance of every part and pattern, and in his ability to perfect the work according to his agreement, yet he found it difficult to get mechanics who could make anything like his models." His greatest difficulty was to get card-sheets suitable for his machinery, but his perseverance overcame that and all other difficulties; "and his case," it is observed in the work from which these facts are obtained, "furnishes another bright example of the never-failing success which always attends patience and perseverance in the pursuit of any laudable object."* Another important point in the history of the cotton manufacture in America is the invention, in 1793, of an ingenious machine called the saw-gin, for separating cotton-wool from the seeds which are enveloped in it as it grows. Before the invention of this machine "the wool of the green-seeded cotton could not be separated from the seed," observes Dr. Ure, "unless with a degree of labour very discouraging to the growth of that hardy and productive article." Mr. Eli Whitney directed his attention to the contrivance of a machine for effecting this object, and succeeded in producing one which would separate more cotton from the seed in one day by the labour of one man than could be done by the previous methods in a month. "The construction of this instrument," according to the authority just quoted, "was an event of such consequence as to excite an universal interest in the State of Georgia, where Mr. Whitney then lived in narrow circumstances, under the roof of an hospitable friend. Neither the sentiments of justice nor the fear of the law could restrain the eager crowds from breaking into his workshop by night, and carrying off his wonder-working tool." In this dishonourable way the public acquired possession of the invention before it was completed to the satisfaction of Whitney, and before he could obtain the protection of a patent, which, however, he immediately procured. The numerous surreptitious machines which were made with such slight variations as might afford a colourable plea for depriving him of his patent right involved him in vexatious and almost ruinous litigation; but at length, in 1801, the legislature of South Carolina purchased a licence for the use of the machine in that State for the sum of 5000 dollars, and in the next year a similar arrangement was made for North Carolina, where a tax of 2s. 6d. per saw was laid upon the machines for a period of five years, for the benefit of the patentee. Much, however, of the money thus raised in the Carolinas was expended in fruitless litigation with the piratical invaders of his privilege in Georgia; so that this ingenious inventor, whose machine is said to have raised the value of land in the Southern States from fifty to one hundred per cent., was in the end most inadequately rewarded.†

Lord Sheffield, writing about the commencement of the year 1785, observes that France was then taking every step to rival and surpass our cotton-manufactures. "The French," he says, "have got our spinning-machines for cotton, and, if they have as much of the spirit of manufacture and steadiness, they will be able from the lower price of labour to undersell us." He adds that Rouen had been greatly injured by the superiority of Manchester goods, but that it was beginning to revive. "Two mills on Arkwright's principle," he states, "are now erecting in the neighbourhood of Rouen: they have already most of his machinery, and, lest capital should be wanting, government supplies to a considerable amount, and Mr. Holker,* whose abilities this country so foolishly lost, is at the head of the manufacture with a considerable pension from the court of Versailles."† Spinning-machines were also, according to the same authority, set up in the neighbourhood of Lyons; and Saint-Fond, writing before the close of the century, states that such were erected in several departments, where they were constantly employed. Dr. Ure gives, in the brief notice of the French cotton-manufacture in the preface to his 'Cotton Manufacture of Great Britain,' an account of the quantity of cotton-wool consumed in France in 1798 and several succeeding years, from which it appears that in the five years from 1798 to 1802 the quantity averaged 12,228,800 lbs. In 1798 it was 18,000,000 lbs., and in 1800 only 6,726,000 lbs. After many unsuccessful attempts, a spinning-mill, the first set up in Saxony, was erected in 1799 at Schemnitz, by Messrs. Barnard and Brothers, aided by an English mechanic.‡

Respecting the linen-manufacture very little need be said in this Book. The various acts enumerated in a previous page § for granting bounties on the exportation of cotton goods, for allowing drawbacks on articles used in their manufacture, and for imposing duties upon them, all apply in a similar manner to fabrics of linen; and these are all that need be noticed in the legislative history of the manufacture. The introduction of automatic machinery in almost every branch of the cotton-manufacture naturally led to experiments for the purpose of obtaining similar advantages in the production of other textile fabrics. The mechanical difficulties attending the spinning of flax by machinery were not, however, successfully met by any contrivance invented during this period. Saint-Fond, in his account of the manufactures of Perth, notices the perfection of the weaving process, to insure which he states that the manufacturers made use of a kind of small microscope for examining every piece of cloth. The wholesale dealers, as well as the manufacturers, made use of this instrument, which they seem to have desired to keep secret. Saint-Fond, however, pro-

* This appears to be the person to whom Saint-Fond refers as an intelligent Englishman who introduced cotton machinery into France and disputed the merit of the invention with Arkwright (Travels, vol. ii. pp. 261, 262, note). Dr. Ure states that "the first spinning-machine in France on the factory construction was a mule introduced thither from England in the year 1787, by M. de Calonne, minister of state." "This machine," he adds, "and others made in imitation of it, were set to work at Rouen, Paris, St. Quentin, Lille, Amiens, and also at Montpellier, which was the ancient seat of the household cotton-trade." He further states that soon after this period an attempt was made to spin water-twist at Louviers.—Cotton Manufacture of Great Britain, vol. i., Preface, p. xxvii.

cured one, which he took to France, where they were soon multiplied. He notices an extraordinary loom for weaving very large bed-sheets in one piece, and speaks of the excellent quality of the table-linen made at this place, of which he was glad to take some specimens to France by way of models or patterns for their imitation. In continuation of the statements in the preceding Book,* it may be stated that the quantity of linen-cloth stamped for sale in Scotland, as shown by a table in Macpherson,† advanced moderately and with tolerable regularity from 17,275,075 yards in 1785 to 24,235,633 yards in 1800; the value increasing in the same time from 835,081*l.* to 1,047,598*l.* This is, it should be remembered, exclusive of the quantity made in families for domestic use, which Macpherson conceives must have amounted to several millions of yards annually. Lord Sheffield laments that the quantity of linen made in England and Ireland was not ascertained and made public, as was done with regard to that made in Scotland; and the absence of such data compelled Macpherson to rest his estimate of the English linen-manufacture upon mere conjecture. The former authority, in 1785, states that this branch of English manufacture was said to be nearly equal to that of both Ireland and Scotland; but Macpherson, under the year 1800, remarks that, as it was an object of subordinate importance, the annual amount was probably rather under 1,000,000*l.* or less than that of Scotland alone. In the account of the linen manufacture given in Lord Sheffield's work on Irish manufactures and trade it is observed that, not a great many years before it was published, linen-yarn was sent from the British dominions to be wove in Holland. "It was," says his lordship, "common to send cloth to be bleached there; and it is not long since the better sort of the people of this island wore Dutch Holland for shirts: this is now nearly at an end, yet the value of foreign linens, exclusive of Irish, imported into England, exceeds that of any other foreign manufacture." The value of the imports of foreign linens was computed to be, at the time Lord Sheffield wrote, about 1,000,000*l.*; that of the imports from Ireland, on an average of four years ending March, 1788, was nearly 1,500,000*l.*; and the amount brought from Scotland was supposed to be near 500,000*l.* Of these quantities there were re-exported to the value of 400,000*l.* annually, one-half of which was said to consist of foreign goods.‡

In the history of the still highly important woolen manufacture, the first circumstance to be noticed in this period is the deterioration which appears to have taken place in the quality of British wool. Macpherson, in some remarks upon this subject under the year 1790, after quoting many authorities, to which it is unnecessary to refer more particularly, to show the pre-eminence formerly accorded to English wool, adds, "As it thus plainly appears that Spanish wool has not attained the superiority over other European wools, till lately,* and that British wool was universally esteemed the very best in Europe as late as the beginning of the seventeenth century, it may be asked, what has now become of the breed of the sheep which produced wool of such superior quality?" The answer, he holds, must be that they have degenerated; a circumstance which, according to the opinion of some who had studied the subject, was in some degree occasioned by the enactment of laws to prevent the exportation of wool—laws intended to benefit the manufacturer, but which had had the effect of turning the attention of farmers rather to increasing the weight of the carcase than to improving or maintaining the quality of the fleece, and had therefore led to the degeneracy of British wool, and the importation of foreign wool of finer quality. The subject was warmly taken up about this time by the Bath Society for the Encouragement of Agriculture, Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, by whom the respective merits of various breeds of sheep were compared, with a view to selecting the most advantageous. The Highland Society also directed their attention to the improvement of the fine wool produced by the ancient British breed of sheep, which remained common in the Shetland islands, where, however, from ignorance or carelessness, the value of the finest wool was destroyed by mixing it with that of inferior quality. So deficient were the possessors of this most precious wool, as the best quality of that produced by Shetland sheep is styled, that, according to the report of a committee of the Highland Society, quoted by Macpherson, they worked up the finest along with the coarse wool of inferior sheep in knitting stockings, which they sold at from 3*d.* to 3*s.* a-pair, while stockings composed entirely of the finest wool sold as high as two guineas a pair; whence it frequently happened that some of them contained as much fine wool as was worth more in a raw state than the price of the manufactured stockings.† The extreme jealousy felt on the subject of the exportation of wool is curiously illustrated by an act‡ passed in 1788, in consequence of the clamour of the wool-manufacturers, who alleged that not less than 13,000 packs of wool were clandestinely exported every year to the Continent, and demanded more rigorous laws against the smuggling of that article. Macpherson states§ that Sir Joseph Banks and Mr. Arthur Young proved that the exportation was much less than the manufacturers asserted; but the latter parties gained their object, and the most stringent regulations, enforced by penalties and imprisonment, were enacted against exportation. Even the carriage of wool, not only from one British port to another, but also from place to place upon the land, was guarded by a multitude of restrictions; and the operation of sheep-shearing was not to be carried on at any place within five miles of the sea, excepting under the superintendence of a revenue-officer. On the other hand, the importation of Spanish wool was encouraged by an act of 1799,* permitting its importation from any, place whatever, in vessels belonging to any neutral country, notwithstanding the provisions of a previous act for preventing trade and intercourse with countries in a state of hostility with Britain; in consequence of which act a supply of Spanish wool was maintained, chiefly from Hamburg. From a return presented to parliament in the above year, it appears that the average imports of Spanish wool, in four quinquennial periods ending respectively on the 5th of January, 1776, 1787, 1792, and 1799, had been 1,578,605 lbs., 1,975,327 lbs., 3,174,429 lbs., and 3,800,583 lbs., annually. This extensive demand for Spanish wool led to attempts to naturalize the Merino sheep from which it was obtained in this country, and also to improve the British breeds by crossing them with the Merino. The king had, for several years, kept a flock of these sheep with great care, and with such success as to obtain a considerable quantity of wool equal in quality to any imported Spanish wool. The manufacturers, however, apprehending that the Merino wool must necessarily degenerate in this country, were unwilling to offer an adequate price for it, in consequence of which the king was obliged, for some years, to have it manufactured into cloth at his own expense; and in 1796 and the succeeding years the wool was offered for sale at any price which the manufacturers would give, in order that their prejudices might be removed by practical experience of its superiority. His majesty also presented one hundred Merino rams, and many ewes, to different persons; and, to render the introduction of this valuable breed of sheep still more general, he ordered many to be publicly sold. Macpherson, after relating these circumstances, states that the introduction of the Spanish breed of sheep had been an object of the attention of the government of France for about thirty years at the close of the eighteenth century, and that the sheep and wool were annually sold by auction.†

In the mechanical processes of the woollen manufacture, the principal improvement that calls for notice under this period is the invention, by Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Cartwright, whose experiments in power-loom weaving have been noticed elsewhere, of machinery for combing wool, for which he obtained three patents in the years 1790 and 1792. By this invention one man and five or six children, attending the machine, were enabled to do as much work as thirty men could do in the old way; and in a memorial read to the Society of Arts in 1800 the inventor stated that his machinery had already effected a saving of 40,000*l.* a year to the manufacturers, which would probably ere long be greatly increased.* Macpherson also mentions machinery for the same purpose, to be worked by water, patented by Mr. William Toplis, in 1794, by which the work was performed in a superior manner, and the interest of the manufacture was greatly promoted. The introduction of such machinery was warmly opposed by the wool-combers, whose opposition, however, proved fruitless; but, in 1795 an Act‡ was passed to relieve them, by allowing them to take up and exercise any other trade, without any obstruction from a statute of the time of Elizabeth, which prohibited the exercise of certain occupations to persons who had not been regularly apprenticed to them. Cartwright's invention for a long time failed to bring a suitable return to him, as his machinery was by some pirated and worked in secret, and by others openly imitated, and even patented, with mere variations; but in the spring of 1800 his patent-right was established by a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, which awarded him damages from a party that had infringed it, to the amount of 1000*l.* The seventh volume of the 'Transactions' of the Society of Arts contains several letters respecting attempts making about the year 1787 to spin wool much finer than was commonly done; but the experiments appear to have been upon the smallest scale.

An interesting account of the Welsh woollen manufacture towards the close of this period is given, on the authority of a friend well acquainted with the subject, in Aikin's 'Journal of a Tour through North Wales and part of Shropshire;' † from which it appears that the articles manufactured were webs, flannels, stockings, wigs, gloves, and socks. The webs called strong cloth, or high-country cloth, were made in Merionethshire, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Dolgelle or Dolgelly and Machynlleth, at which latter place, the writer remarks, "a manufactory on a small scale has lately been established; a circumstance only worth notice as marking the commencement of a change in preparing the wool, which will probably soon become general." "Almost every little farmer," he adds, "makes webs, and few cottages in these parts are without a loom; all kinds of wool are used indiscriminately, and a considerable quantity of refuse from the wool-staplers and skinners is collected from all quarters for this purpose." Small cloth, or low-country cloth was made in Denbighshire, solely within the parish of the Glynn, a large tract of country including Llan-gollen and Corwen. It appears to have remained a purely domestic manufacture, for we are informed that there was no established factory for it. Flannels, however, constituted the most important

* As we find no notice of this memorial in the Society's 'Transactions,' the above and most of the other statements on the subject of wool-combing are taken from Macpherson, vol. iv. pp. 291, 292, and 350. of the Welsh manufactures. They were chiefly produced in Montgomeryshire, but not confined to that county, being made in various places within a circle of about twenty miles round Welshpool. In this, as in other departments of the woollen manufacture, the factory system had made so little progress, that there was but one flannel manufactory of any note in Wales. This establishment, which had existed about seven years, was at Dolobran, near Pool, and was said to be a parish concern. There were a few other infant factories at Newtown, Machynlleth, and other places, but they were of little importance. In Shropshire, where also the flannel manufacture was carried on, the greater wealth of those engaged in it had led to the more general introduction of machinery instead of manual labour. "Several individuals in Shrewsbury and its neighbourhood," observes our authority, "employ themselves successfully in this business; but by far the greatest undertaking of the kind is a factory about four or five miles from Shrewsbury, at a place called the Isle, belonging to Messrs. Cooke and Mason, and erected three years ago." The machinery was impelled by water-power derived from the river Severn. It is remarked that the increasing demand for Welsh woollens, and the competition existing among the drapers of Shrewsbury, placed the Welsh manufacturers in a very advantageous position; since they had been enabled to raise the prices of their goods, for which they could always command ready money, while they were in a great measure saved from the trouble and expense of distributing them to the English markets. The scanty population of the manufacturing districts, and the possession of numerous streams admirably adapted for impelling the machinery of water-mills, are urged as indicative of the advantages to be derived from the use of mechanical in aid of manual labour; and in conclusion it is observed—"With the general adoption of machines the manufacturers will become large capitalists, as is already the case in Lancashire and Yorkshire; and the influx of money will enable the farmers to improve their breed of sheep, and bestow some culture on the extensive mountainous tracts that, as yet, have been committed to the care of nature alone. The present infant factories contain the rudiments of future prosperity; one successful effort will produce many other vigorous exertions; the manufacturers, become rich, will not abandon to the English drapers the advantages of preparing their rough goods for the foreign and domestic markets, nor to the London and Liverpool merchants the profits of exporting them; and, though one attempt to erect Barmouth into a magazine for supplying foreign markets with Welsh manufactures has failed, a second may succeed, and thus the whole profits of an extensive national concern will circulate through, and invigorate, every part of the province where it originates."

The manufacture of woollen cloths in the West Riding of Yorkshire, as shown by a table given by Macpherson,* went on steadily increasing from 1785 to the close of the century; the quantity milled at the fulling-mills in that district having been, in 1785, 157,275 pieces, containing 4,844,855 yards of broad, and 116,036 pieces, containing 3,409,178 yards of narrow cloth; in 1790, 172,588 pieces, or 5,151,677 yards of broad, and 140,407 pieces, or 4,582,122 yards of narrow cloth; in 1795, 250,993 pieces, or 7,759,907 yards of broad, and 155,087 pieces, or 5,172,511 yards of narrow cloth; and in 1800, 285,851 pieces, containing 9,263,966 yards of broad, and 169,262 pieces, containing 6,014,420 yards of narrow cloth. Kerseymeres, which had become an article of considerable importance, are not included in the account from which the preceding figures are obtained. Since there do not exist any regular official accounts of other branches of the woollen manufacture, the various estimates which have been made respecting it necessarily rest in some degree upon conjectural data, and must therefore be received with caution. Macpherson appends to the statement just quoted some calculations founded upon evidence laid before a Committee of the House of Commons in 1800, from which it would appear that 72,734 packs of wool, of 240 lbs. each, of the average value of 11*l.* per pack, or 800,074*l.* in the whole, had been in the preceding year manufactured in the above district into 272,755 pieces of broad cloth, of the value of 3,795,157*l.*, an estimate which makes the average value more than 13*l.* 18*s.* per piece, which Macpherson thinks must be too high, unless the proportion of fine goods was greater than can be reasonably supposed; while the narrow cloth manufacture had consumed 30,028 packs, averaging 14*l.* each, making the total value of the raw material used in this branch 420,392*l.*; and the value of the cloth produced was 1,081,008*l.*, or 6*l.* per piece on an average,—the number of pieces produced being 180,168.† Thus the total value of the broad and narrow cloth was 4,876,165*l.*, while that of the blankets and other goods, apparently including kerseymeres, was supposed to exceed 1,600,000*l.*, and that of the stuffs and worsted goods was estimated at 1,400,000*l.*; making the whole woollen manufacture of the West Riding of Yorkshire amount to 7,876,165*l.* Some of the same parties who furnished the data for the above calculations estimated the annual quantity of wool produced in the kingdom at 600,000 packs, which, at the medium value of 11*l.* per pack, would amount to 6,600,000*l.* The increase of value given by the manufacture varied from two to nine-fold; but, assuming the average increase to have been three-fold, the total value of the woollen

† As the number of yards of broad cloth was 8,806,688, and of narrow cloth 6,377,277, the average price per yard for the former appears to have been about 8*s.* 7*d.*, and for the latter rather more than 3*s.* 4*d.*; prices which may appear too low, but which are corroborated by the evidence of Mr. Gott, a manufacturer and merchant of Leeds, who stated, on the above occasion, that the average price of the broad cloth exported to Ireland was about 6*s.* 8*d.* per yard, and of the narrow cloth about 3*s.* 4*d.* per yard. The width of the former was from 48 to 63 inches, and of the latter from 27 to 32 inches.

manufactures of the kingdom would have been about 19,800,000*l.* One manufacturer stated, on this occasion, that the introduction of machinery had so greatly abridged labour in the various processes which precede weaving, that thirty-five persons were able to perform in 1800 as much work as would in 1785 have required 1634 persons; or, in other words, that by the mechanism introduced within the preceding fifteen years one person could perform more than forty-six could have done previously. The capital invested in machinery and buildings appropriated to the woollen manufacture was, by the same authorities, estimated at about 6,000,000*l.* and the total number of persons employed in it, of all ages and of both sexes, was supposed to be about 3,000,000; but the latter of these calculations, at least, was probably much too high. Macpherson states that other estimates made the number of persons employed only 1,000,000, or 1,500,000.* The foreign demand for British woollen manufactures increased on the whole, though it suffered considerable fluctuations, during this period. According to an official return of exports of woollen goods for the ten years from 1790 to 1799, the value in the first of those years was 5,190,637*l.*, and in the last 6,876,939*l.*, but in 1793 it was as low as 3,806,536*l.*† Of the quantity just mentioned as exported in 1799, goods to the value of 2,803,490*l.* were sent to the United States, 916,190*l.* to Ireland, 668,161*l.* to the East Indies, 568,788*l.* to Portugal and Madeira, 552,726*l.* to the West Indies, 427,053*l.* to Germany, 324,739*l.* to the British colonies in North America, 259,683*l.* to Africa, and smaller quantities to various other places.‡ Macpherson states that the foreign demand for British woollen goods had, by the end of the century, extended beyond the power of the country to supply it, and that many more orders had been sent to the manufacturers than they could find wool to execute; and he ascribes the increased demand partly to the failure of some manufactures on the continent, in consequence of the convulsions of war, and partly to the augmentation of the military establishments of every country in Europe. The deficiency of wool he conceives to arise from the increase of inclosures for the growth of corn to supply an increased population, and to meet the unprecedented consumption in the army and navy.§

The first circumstance to be noticed in the history of the silk manufacture during the period embraced in this Book is the change effected in the supply of raw silk by the agency of the East India Company. Mr. Robert Wissett, a gentleman in the Company's service, to whose exertions

‡ In Adam Walker's notice of the woollen manufactures of Kendal, in the Tour frequently quoted in this chapter, the weaving of blankets for the North American Indians is mentioned. They, as well as some other fabrics, were made of the coarse wool procured from the neighbouring mountains.—Remarks made upon a Tour, &c., p. 113. ; ;

this change was mainly to be attributed, observes, in a letter to the Society of Arts, in 1795, that, although the British silk manufactures had been established in full vigour for more than a century, our sole dependence for the raw material had, till within the last twenty years, been entirely placed upon foreign powers; "and indeed," he says, "notwithstanding the great exertions that have been recently made by the East India Company, it will be seen that, even at the present period, we are obliged to have recourse to Italy and other parts of the continent for not less than 800,000 lbs. weight of this commodity, at an expense of upwards of 1,000,000*l.* sterling per annum, one-half of which is imported in a thrown state: that is, having undergone the preparatory operation of twisting, to render it more fit for the use of the weaver in the article of warp." Mr. Wissett had satisfied himself that the culture of silk in Bengal might be considerably extended, and also that Bengal raw silk might be advantageously thrown in this country, so as to supersede the necessity for a considerable portion of that imported from Italy; he had therefore recommended the subject to the attention of his employers, and the experiments made down to the date of his letter had, he states, fully established the practicability of the measure.* In order to illustrate this point it may be well to state, on the authority of Mr. Porter's treatise on the Silk Manufacture, that the production of raw silk in Bengal, for the purpose of exportation, was of very trifling amount until the middle of the eighteenth century; and that the quality of the silk so produced was, in a great measure, owing to the imperfect manner in which it was wound, so inferior, that it obtained a price equal to only one-third or one-half the price of Italian silk. The total quantity received from India and China in 1750 was only 43,876 lbs.; but soon after that period the East India Company endeavoured to increase the production, and in 1772, in order to improve the quality of Bengal silk, and to render it acceptable to the English manufacturer, they sent out proper machinery for winding silk upon the Italian system, and competent persons to superintend the operation. Owing to unfavourable circumstances, no material advantage was derived from this measure for the first few years; but the importation from Bengal, which in 1773 was only 145,777 lbs., rose to 515,913 lbs. in 1776, and averaged 560,283 lbs. in the ten years from 1776 to 1785.† The amount produced by the sale of this silk was, in the ten years, 3,449,757*l.*, but there was a loss upon the sale every year, which, in the whole of that period, amounted to 884,744*l.* In the next seven years, 1786 to 1792, the average annual quantity fell to 319,832 lbs., but the trade was conducted with some profit, the sum cleared by the Company being 117,450*l.* out of a total receipt of 1,755,083*l.* It happened unfortunately for the silk trade, that, about the same time that the natives of Bengal were extending their mulberry plantations for the rearing of silk-worms, and adopting the Italian mode of filature to improve the quality of their silks, the astonishing increase of the British cotton manufacture occasioned such a falling off in the demand for silk goods, that, in the year 1793, about 18,000 persons in and near Spitalfields were deprived of their accustomed employment,* and the silk-throwing or twisting-mills in this country were rendered in a great measure useless. Down to that time the English throwing-mills had been chiefly employed in the production of the simpler kinds of silk called singles and tram, the former of which is simply raw silk twisted to give it firmness, while the latter is a compound thread formed of two or more threads of raw silk twisted together, and commonly used for the web or shoot of woven goods; and the quantity of organzine, or silk thread suitable for the warp, made in this country was not more than about 50,000 lbs. annually, or less than one-eighth of the quantity imported, which came chiefly from Italy, although in the years 1779 to 1783 it was, for the most part, brought by a circuitous route, so that it appears in the Custom-house accounts as from Ostend, Flanders, &c. All these circumstances combined led to the accumulation, in the warehouses of the East India Company, of a great quantity of Bengal silk, and determined the directors to devise measures for bringing it into more general use, by having a portion of it converted into organzine in this country, a scheme which the English throwsters were willing to encourage, because it promised them more regular employment. The merchants interested in the importation of Italian organzine raised a great clamour against what they styled "the attempt of the East India Company to become manufacturers in Great Britain;" but, though for a time they succeeded in inducing some of the manufacturers to join in their opposition, it soon became evident that the result of the measures must be beneficial in rendering us independent of foreigners for supplies of organzine, and in providing increased employment for native capital and labour. After a sufficient trial, some of the principal silk manufacturers addressed a letter to the directors of the East India Company, in February, 1796, requesting them to persevere in throwing their silk, as a measure which would lower the price of the raw material, and protect them against the fluctuations of price which were so frequent and distressing in their trade. The result of this important step was a great extension of the silk trade of the company, and a considerable improvement in the quality of their imports; and Macpherson observes, that "every pound of silk imported from Bengal may be esteemed, in respect to the balance of trade, and considering Bengal a British territory, a saving of 20*s.*, and every pound of silk organized in this country, as a further saving of 7*s.* to the British dominions."† The change actually effected in the supply of raw silk was not, however, so great as might be expected within this period, for it appears, by a parliamentary return made in 1799, that in the several periods of five years each, ending respectively on the 5th of January, 1776, 1787, 1792, and 1799, the average annual imports of thrown silk were 361,359 lbs., 369,303 lbs., 398,519 lbs., and 342,201 lbs.; while the imports of raw silk from Bengal were 182,581 lbs., 486,848 lbs., 350,003 lbs., and 291,647 lbs. respectively. In the same periods the imports from China were 160,265 lbs., 189,835 lbs., 190,452 lbs., and 93,198 lbs.; and those from Italy and Turkey were 197,621 lbs., 167,285 lbs., 242,729 lbs., and 135,789 lbs. respectively. The continued dependence of this country upon Italy for organized silk is also indicated by the repeated renewal of an act originally passed in 1795,‡ to allow its importation by any person, and in any vessels belonging to friendly states. No tram silk was to be admitted under the provisions of this act, nor any organzine above a certain size; and the thrown silks of Turkey, Persia, the East Indies, and China were also excluded. Many other acts were passed during this period with reference to the silk manufacture, chiefly for the purpose of more rigidly enforcing the exclusion of foreign manufactured silks, and encouraging the home manufacture. Whatever might have been the effect, for a time, of the exclusive system which was so long persisted in, in fostering the silk manufacture of this country, the advantages expected from it were, as observed by Mr. M'Culloch, "effectually countervailed by the turbulent proceedings of the workmen, who succeeded, in 1773, in obtaining from the legislature an act which, by itself, was quite sufficient to have destroyed even a prosperous trade." This act,‡ which is commonly called the Spitalfields Act, empowered the weavers of Middlesex to demand a certain rate of wages, to be determined by the magistrates at quarter-sessions, without regard to the power of the masters to pay it; "and," to adopt the language of the writer just quoted, "while both masters and men were restricted from giving or receiving more or less than the fixed price, the manufacturers were liable in heavy penalties if they employed weavers out of the district." Mr. M'Culloch adds: "The monopoly which the manufacturers had hitherto enjoyed, though incomplete, had had sufficient influence to render inventions and discoveries of comparatively rare occur-

* Transactions of the Society of Arts, xiv. 327-329.

† Macpherson, in noticing this subject in his Annals of Commerce, vol. iv. pp. 290, 291, states that there was in the silk trade a great pound of twenty-four ounces, and a small pound of sixteen ounces; but that in the table which he gives, from which the figures in the text are taken, all the quantities are given in pounds of sixteen ounces.

* It is stated that 4500 looms were standing idle, which gave employment, when in full work, to the above number of persons, more than half of whom were women and children. Many of these, being accustomed to similar employment, could easily turn their hands to throwing silk.—Macpherson, Annals, iv. 290, note.

rence in the silk trade; but the Spitalfields Act extinguished every germ of improvement. Parliament, in its wisdom, having seen fit to enact that a manufacturer should be obliged to pay as much for work done by the best machinery as if it were done by hand, it would have been folly to have thought of attempting anything new! While, however, this act proved ruinous to the parties for whose protection it was enacted, and continued in force for about half a century, by driving the most valuable branches of the manufacture from Spitalfields to places where the rate of wages was determined by competition, its operation was beneficial to other manufacturing districts, and contributed to the growing prosperity of Macclesfield, Manchester, Norwich, Paisley, &c.* In 1792 an act † was passed, to extend the provisions of this mischievous statute to fabrics of silk mixed with other materials, as well as to goods consisting wholly of silk. The injurious effects of this attempt to compel the payment of an unnatural rate of wages were not immediately evident; but they appeared in full force during the competition between silk and cotton goods at the commencement of this period. The great number of hands thrown out of employment about 1793 has been already alluded to; and, although the manufacture experienced some revival before the close of the century, the weavers of Spitalfields have since suffered even more severely from the same cause.

In Lord Sheffield's account of the manufactures of Ireland at the commencement of this period, it is observed that the Irish silk manufactures were by no means to be despised; and the case of Paisley is referred to, to show that "a rich country in possession of a manufacture, of skill, and of industry cannot always maintain herself against a poor country." It had not, it is stated, appeared probable twenty-five years previously that Paisley could ever arrive at any formidable competition with Spitalfields; yet, about 1785, gauzes were made at Paisley to the annual value of near 400,000*l.*, while very few were made at Spitalfields; and, as Paisley afforded her gauzes cheaper than any other part of the world, France and the whole of Europe were supplied from that place. According to Lord Sheffield, many of the silk manufactures of Ireland were excellent; her white damasks and lutestrings were very good; her silk pocket-handkerchiefs, "at least as good as any;" her mixed fabrics were beautiful; her colours superior to those of England; and her tabinets and poplins were well known and admired every where. It was computed that there were 1500 silk manufacturers in Dublin; but, though the manufacture was increasing, the importation of manufactured silks, chiefly from Britain, was also on the increase. ‡

a communication to the Society of Arts in 1791, respecting a manufacture then recently introduced by Mr. Philip James Knights, of Norwich, in imitation of East India shawl-counterpanes. "He has," observes a correspondent of the Society, "brought the manufacture to so great perfection in shawls, waistcoat shapes, &c., that they can hardly be distinguished from Indian, though they can be afforded at one-twentieth part of the price usually given for the same articles that are brought from India." A counterpane was laid before the Society woven in one piece, four yards square, while nothing of equal fineness had been previously made in this country more than a yard and a half wide. Though it might be sold for 20*l.*, it is described as equal in beauty, and superior in strength, to India counterpanes which sold as high as two hundred guineas. The principal consumption of this cloth was for ladies' train-dresses, and for long scarfs in imitation of those of India, which were sold at from 60*l.* to 80*l., while those made by Mr. Knights were sold for as many shillings.

The stocking manufacture is one of the many branches of industry which experienced great change and extension through the introduction of Arkwright's cotton machinery. In a notice of the manufactures of Nottingham, the principal seat of the hosiery trade, in the 'Commercial Gazetteer,' appended to his 'Annals of Commerce,' Macpherson observes that thread-stockings, which were formerly in great demand, especially for the West Indies, had been quite neglected since cotton-yarn had been brought to a moderate price. The stocking manufacture was spread over the adjacent country, and into the neighbouring counties of Derby and Leicester; but most of the finer silk and cotton goods were made at Nottingham. The manufacture was, as it still remains, in a great measure a domestic one; the master manufacturers giving out yarn, whether of wool, cotton, or silk, to the workmen, and receiving back the finished work, weight for weight, which they kept in the rough until orders arrived from their customers. At Aberdeen, according to the same authority, knitted stockings were manufactured to the value of more than 100,000*l.* annually, of which about two-thirds were exported to Holland and Germany, and the remainder were sent to England, Portugal, and America. At Banff, also, stockings were made to a considerable extent. Formerly the principal manufacture of the town was thread for stockings, which was sent to Nottingham and Leicester to be manufactured; but, since the decline of that branch of trade, the Messrs. Robinson, of Banff, had patented an improved stocking-frame, and had introduced the manufacture in silk, cotton, and worsted, in addition to the spinning and throwing formerly carried on there. They employed 560 persons, and supplied chiefly the London market.

The passing of certain acts of parliament affecting the arts of bleaching and calico-printing has been mentioned in our notice of the legislative history of the cotton-manufacture during this period; but we have still to notice a few other particulars respecting those arts. In bleaching, a change was effected by the application of chemical science, so great as to be comparable only to the revolution produced about the same time in other departments of manufacturing industry by the application of mechanical science. 'As performed in the middle of the eighteenth century, down to which time the process had undergone little change, the operation of bleaching occupied six or eight months, and consisted in alternately steeping the cloth in alkaline leys, washing it clean, and spreading it upon grass for several weeks at a time. The art was, moreover, so imperfectly understood in this country, that nearly all the linens manufactured in Scotland were sent to Holland to be bleached in the fields in the neighbourhood of Haarlem. The application of diluted sulphuric acid, in lieu of the weaker acid of sour milk, in a part of the process, saved so much time as to reduce the whole operation of bleaching from eight months to four; the sulphuric acid being as effectual in one day as the sour milk in six or eight weeks. This improvement was introduced by Dr. Home, of Edinburgh, about the middle of the century. It was, however, eclipsed a few years later by the application of chlorine or oxymuriatic acid. This acid, which was originally called dephlogisticated marine acid, was discovered about 1774, by Scheele, a celebrated Swedish chemist, who observed its property of destroying vegetable colours from its effect upon the cork of a phial in which some was kept. Berthollet, in France, conceived the idea of applying it to the art of bleaching; and, after making some successful experiments, he read a paper on the subject before the Academy of Sciences, at Paris, in the year 1785. In the following year Watt visited France on business connected with the application of the steam-engine to hydraulic works, and on his return he introduced the new process, with some improvements of his own, at the bleach works of his father-in-law, Mr. Macgregor, near Glasgow.* About the same time Mr. Thomas Henry, of Manchester, guided solely by Berthollet's paper, which was published in the 'Journal de Physique,' was actively engaged on the same subject. These gentlemen appear to have unreservedly communicated to each other the progress of their experiments, and to them may be attributed the introduction into the neighbourhood of Glasgow by the one, and into Lancashire by the other, of a process by which, it has been remarked, "bleaching is as well performed in a few hours, and in the space of a hundred yards square, as on the old process would have occupied weeks of exposure upon a hundred acres of land."* Without this wonderful saving of time and capital, observes Mr. Baines, the quantity of cotton goods now manufactured could scarcely have been bleached. Mr. Tennant, of Glasgow, as well as Mr. Henry, employed lime with the oxymuriatic acid, to remove its noxious smell, and took out two patents, in 1798 and 1799, for improvements connected with the process. The first of these was set aside in 1802, but the second was not contested; and, under it, Mr. Tennant established an extensive manufacture of chloride of lime, now commonly called bleaching-powder.

Improvements in the art of dyeing, and in the modes of obtaining a supply of materials, occupied much of the attention of the early members of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce, who, prior to the publication of their first volume of 'Transactions,' in 1783, had expended upwards of 1500*l.* in promoting the culture and preparation of madder in this kingdom; the foreign growers and importers having, on the supposition that it could not be produced in England, raised that necessary article to an exorbitant price. English madder was, in consequence of these exertions, produced of quality equal to the foreign; and, though experience has shown that it cannot be cultivated so cheaply as to compete with the foreign, the effect of the experiment was to reduce the price of that procured from Holland and other countries, the growers having been convinced that we could raise any quantity, and of the best kind, whenever the price should rise to an amount sufficient to engage the attention of British husbandmen; and thus an important saving was effected for those engaged in dyeing and calico-printing. The dyeing or colouring of leather in the Oriental manner was an object promoted by the Society, who reported at the same time that a manufacture of considerable extent was established in England, where coloured leathers were prepared superior to those imported, and that considerable quantities had been exported to foreign markets. The art of dyeing cottons of the colour known as Turkey red had been, they further state, formerly unknown in these kingdoms, but, by the attention of manufacturers to the premiums offered for its discovery, it could then (in 1783) be done of as beautiful and lasting a colour as that imported.

* Penny Cyclopaedia, art. 'Bleaching,' from which, and from Baines's History of the Cotton Manufacture, pp. 246-249, the materials of the above notice are chiefly derived. Mr. Baines observes, as an illustration of the facility of the modern process, that "it is recorded that a bleacher in Lancashire received 1400 pieces of grey muslin on a Tuesday, which, on the Thursday immediately following, were returned to the manufacturers, at the distance of sixteen miles, and were packed up and sent off on that very day to a foreign market." It has been narrated to the writer as an amusing fact, that a celebrated Scotch clergyman, still living, took an opportunity, during the infancy of the modern system, to remove some cloth, secretly from the bleach-ground of one of his humble countrywomen, and, having bleached it by the new chemical process, returned it in like way, after a few days. The consternation of the quæ-wife on discovering the supposed loss of her cloth was thus cut short by her bewildered surprise at finding it restored in a bleached state in so incredibly short a time as to leave her no explanation of the mystery excepting on the supposition of fairy agency.

from the Levant.* Macpherson, however, gives a somewhat different account, for he states that the art of producing that beautiful colour upon cotton was introduced in 1785 in Glasgow, by Mr. Charles Mackintosh, by means of an artist from Rouen. "It was soon," he says, "brought to such perfection, that cotton pullicate handkerchiefs were dyed with colours equal in beauty and fastness to those of India; and in five or six years thereafter 1500 looms were employed in that one article." He adds, that, though Glasgow claimed the honour of being the first place in Great Britain to acquire the art, it was disputed by Manchester in favour of the Messrs. Borell, who obtained a premium of 2500*l.* from parliament as the introducers of the art; and also that it is certain that Mr. Wilson, an eminent dyer of that town, obtained from the Greek dyers of Smyrna the secret of this curious dye, which he applied chiefly upon velvets and velverets; but Macpherson did not know when Wilson began to practise the art.†

The old method of calico-printing, which is still continued for certain descriptions of work, was by means of engraved blocks of sycamore, which, being only about ten inches long and five wide, had to be applied many times in order to print a piece of cloth. The back of the block was furnished with a handle by which it was applied alternately to a piece of woollen cloth saturated with the colour, and to the calico to be printed; and the necessary degree of pressure was applied by striking it with a mallet. One colour only was printed at once, and when others were necessary to complete the pattern, the operation was repeated with different blocks. "In order to produce more delicate patterns than could be engraved on wood," Mr. Baines states that "copper-plates were introduced in the neighbourhood of London, and the cloth was thus printed from flat plates, with the kind of press used in copper-plate printing." "Each of these modes," he adds, "was tedious, as no more of the cloth could be printed at once than was covered with the wooden block or copper-plate; and a single piece of calico, twenty-eight yards in length, required the application of the block 448 times." The important invention now to be noticed is the printing from copper cylinders, several feet long (according to the width of the cloth to be printed), and three or four inches in diameter, engraved with a pattern along their whole length, and round the whole of their circumference. This method, as the writer quoted above justly observes, "bears nearly the same relation in point of dispatch to block-printing by hand as throstle or mule-spinning bears to spinning by the one-thread wheel." The engraved cylinder is mounted horizontally in a machine which contains apparatus for charging it with colour, and for conducting the calico or muslin to be printed over its surface to receive the impression, and then over heated boxes by which it is dried; so that by one continuous operation a piece of cloth may be printed and dried in one or two minutes. Further than this, two, three, four, or even five cylinders may be mounted in the same machine, each bearing a certain part of the pattern to be produced, and printing the cloth successively in as many different colours; so that one passage through the machine may produce the same effect as 448, 896, 1344, 1792, or 2240 applications of the hand-blocks, according as one, two, three, four, or five cylinders may be employed; and one cylinder printing-machine, attended by a man and a boy, is capable of producing as much work as could be turned out by one hundred printers, with as many boys to assist them, on the old plan. Mr. Baines states that, in consequence of the great facilities thus afforded, three-fourths of the prints executed in this country are printed by the cylinder-machine. "This great invention," he adds, "is said to have been made by a Scotchman of the name of Bell, and it was first successfully applied in Lancashire, about the year 1785, at Mosney, near Preston, by the house of Livesey, Hargreaves, Hall, and Co., celebrated for the extent of their concerns, and the magnitude of their failure in 1788, which gave a severe shock to the industry of that part of the country."* In 1787 an act † was passed to encourage the art of calico-printing by granting to the proprietors of original patterns or designs for printing on calicoes, muslins, and linens, an exclusive right to them for two months after the day of publication. This act was for a limited period only, but it was renewed in 1789, and in 1794 the term of copyright was extended to three months from the day of publication, and the operation of the act was rendered permanent.‡ From returns given in Macpherson's 'Annals,' § it appears that in the year 1800, 28,692,790 yards of British calicoes and muslins were printed in England and Wales, and 4,176,939 yards in Scotland; the duty on which amounted to 479,350*l.* 4*s.* 3½*d.*; and, as he states that, in an estimate laid before the House of Commons, the duty was assumed to be one-tenth of the value, it would appear that the value of the goods produced was about 4,793,500*l.* In the same year 3,232,073 yards of linens and stuffs were printed in England and Wales, and 1,220,714 yards in Scotland; and the quantities of foreign calicoes and muslins printed in the same divisions of the kingdom were 1,577,536 and 78,868 yards, respectively; the duty upon these being 7*d.* per yard, or double what was charged upon goods of British manufacture. ||

In concluding this Chapter, several arts and manufactures which have not appeared to require distinct notice may be briefly adverted to, as illustrating the very general influence of the spirit of improvement by which the national industry was distinguished in the reign of George III., and the feeling entertained all over the world of the superiority belonging to the productions of the British empire.

Although our leather manufactures be a branch of industry in which, until recently, fewer changes were made than in almost any other of equal importance, both Brissot and Saint-Fond attribute the highest qualities to the productions of British tanners. The former writer speaks of English leather-work of all kinds as possessing a neatness, a "seducing appearance," which the French had not yet approached; and he assigns as a reason for this excellence the wealth and high respectability of English tanners generally, which enabled them always to allow their leather a sufficient time for undergoing the tedious operations of the tan-yard to the greatest advantage; while the poorer tanners of France were continually pressed by necessity to hurry over their operations, at the expense of the quality of their leather.* Saint-Fond refers to the same circumstances in explanation of the high reputation of British leather, and he mentions particularly the excellence of the kind known as Turkey leather, a manufactory of which, in the neighbourhood of London, he was allowed to inspect.† Some attempts were made before the close of the eighteenth century to expedite the process of tanning by the use of concentrated solutions of bark, as recommended by M. Seguin,‡ a French chemist; but, while the new system has been extensively adopted, and has shortened the process very materially, it has not been found so advantageous as was originally expected. The very circumstances which led to the high character of British leather had the effect of checking the introduction of any startling innovation in the processes of the tan-yard, because they confined the business to a class of men who were not speculative either from habit or necessity.

Much attention was devoted, towards the latter end of the eighteenth century, to the improvement of the rope manufacture, and several patents were taken out for that purpose between 1783 and the close of this period. The objects aimed at were the substitution of machinery in lieu of manual labour in various departments of the manufacture, and the improvement of cordage by arranging the several parts of the rope so that every yarn and strand of which it consisted might bear its due proportion of strain. This improvement was most effectually attained by the apparatus patented by Captain Huddart, in 1793, which provided for a variation in the length of the individual yarns, according to their position near the centre or near the circumference of the strand.

About the commencement of this period the

Earl of Dundonald introduced some important improvements in the preparation of salt for curing fish, meat, and butter;* and Saint-Fond† gives an account of an extensive establishment for the manufacture of sea-salt, formed at Prestonpans, in Scotland, by Dr. Swediaur, a German physician, who had long resided in London, but had removed to Prestonpans, where he devoted himself to chemical pursuits. Much sea-salt was made at that place by artificial evaporation in large iron boilers, for exportation as well as for home consumption. Of the manufactory of sulphuric acid, or oil of vitriol, at the same place, the establishment of which is mentioned in the preceding Book,‡ Saint-Fond states that it was the greatest of the kind in Britain, and that everything about it was enveloped in mystery, the buildings, and even a small harbour for the vessels which brought the sulphur, being surrounded by high walls. The production of copperas from the pyritous substances found in coal-mines in the neighbourhood of Newcastle-upon-Tyne is mentioned by the same author as one of the numerous branches of industry exercised at that place.§ Another chemical process of some importance in the arts was the preparation of a yellow colour for painting, from British materials. For this process, and some others of similar character, Mr. James Turner had, as narrated by Macpherson under the year 1792, obtained a patent; and, as his inventions were considered highly beneficial to the country in superseding the use of foreign yellow paints, and supplying a superior article at a lower price, of which considerable quantities were exported, while he had hitherto failed, owing to invasions of his patent, to derive any advantage from it himself, the term of his privilege was prolonged, by the act 32 Geo. III., cap. 72, for a term of eleven years from June, 1792, on condition that he should not charge more than five guineas per cwt. for his colour, nor assign shares in his patent to more than five persons.||

A considerable impulse was given during this period to the sugar-manufacture of the West Indies, by the introduction of new kinds of sugarcane from Otaheite and other places, which proved far more productive than those previously cultivated. Some of the earliest experiments were made in the French island of Guadaloupe, by a planter named Pinnel; and the first trial of the new canes in any British colony was made in the year 1793, by a gentleman of Montserrat, to whom Mr. Pinnel had given some of his plants. So manifest was the superiority of the new canes that, "generally under the name of the Bourbon canes,"

§ Travels, i. 146-149. Saint-Fond states that France had formerly laid out much money for this substance, of which the dyers of Rouen, Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles consumed great quantities. Two manufactories had, however, been recently established at Alais, in Languedoc, and it is stated that the French copperas was equal to that of England when made with equal care, although a contrary opinion was commonly entertained.

observes Macpherson, they "were soon spread over all the British West Indies, where they very quickly superseded the old canes, and with such advantage to the proprietors of sugar-plantations, whom they have inspired with the most splendid hopes, that the introduction of them will undoubtedly constitute an important era in the history of the West Indies."* The production of sugar from the juice of the sugar-maple was also now attaining some importance. Macpherson says that it appears to have been first attempted about the year 1752; but this must be an error, as An Account of the Method of Making Sugar from the Juice of the Maple-tree in New England, by Paul Dudley, had been published in No. 364 of the Philosophical Transactions, in the year 1720. It appears, however, to have formed a comparatively trifling branch of rural economy among the farmers of New England until the war with the mother-country occasioned a difficulty in obtaining a supply of West India sugar, when many persons turned their attention to its preparation on an extensive scale. After the peace, the manufacture was still encouraged by many who disapproved of slave-labour, and by those who deemed it an important object to provide employment for farm-servants during the winter season, when their ordinary labours did not require so many hands as at other seasons of the year. About the year 1790, the making of maple-sugar was taken up in the middle states of America as an important national object, and some refined maple-sugar was produced in Philadelphia, which was pronounced equal to any loaf-sugar made from the muscovado or raw sugar of the West Indies.†

For a very long period England was in a great measure dependent upon foreign manufacturers, especially upon those of France, Holland, and Genoa, for a supply of paper: the home manufacture having been, down to the Revolution of 1688, almost entirely confined to coarse brown paper.‡ Some impulse had been given to this branch of industry by improvements introduced by the artisans expelled from France by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and Anderson states, under the year 1690, that the war with France, by occasioning high duties on foreign paper, led to the manufacture in this country of white and printing paper to an important extent. In a subsequent page, in noticing several new projects of the years 1694 and 1695, the same writer says, "White, blue, and brown paper, we have had the good fortune to improve wonderfully; and, although we cannot reach the French perfection, we come pretty near it."§ The British paper manufacture continued to increase and improve, until, in an estimate of the annual produce of the principal manufactures of Great Britain about the year

1783, it was stated to amount to about 780,000*l., and to be still increasing. How greatly the quality of our writing-paper had improved by the commencement of this period may be assumed from the remark of Brissot, that the French writing-paper would not long remain unequal to that of England, if, indeed, it would not surpass it, which was not improbable, since he states that the paper manufacture was daily improving in France,† and that rags were not so scarce and dear there as in England. Rags were, he adds, an article of illicit commerce between the two countries, notwithstanding the existence of very severe prohibitory laws. The Society of Arts devoted much attention to the improvement of various branches of this manufacture in England, and in 1783 they reported, that under their encouragement four branches of the manufacture had been established or promoted, these being—paper from silk rags, suitable for drawing in chalk or crayons; paper for copper-plate printing, which had been imported from France at considerable expense until its production in this country had been encouraged by the Society; and embossed and marbled papers, both of which were articles of foreign manufacture. Marbled paper, especially, had been imported in great quantities, but was then, the Society state, made in England in such perfection as to become an article of exportation. So great was the progress of improvement in the second of the above-mentioned branches, that in 1787 some persons, accustomed to use French paper, declared that manufactured by Mr. Bates (who had received a gold medal from the Society for his improvements) to be in several respects superior to the imported plate-paper, and very nearly, if not quite, equal to it for taking impressions of the most delicate engravings.‡ The Transactions of the Society also record many experiments made on the manufacture of paper from various substances not usually employed for the purpose, and Macpherson relates, under the year 1800, that, among other expedients resorted to as remedies for the scarcity of paper (or rather of rags, the usual material of paper), was a method of discharging the ink from printed or written paper, grinding it to a pulp, and remanufacturing it. Experience has shown that, under ordinary circumstances, very little advantage arises from this regenerating process; but it was then considered so important, that an act § was passed to permit the importation of foreign waste-paper, if rendered unfit for any other purpose than to be remanufactured, without paying any other duty than that imposed by the convoy

* For the sake of comparison, it may be stated that this estimate, which is referred to on p. 559 of our first volume, makes the annual value of the manufacture of hemp 890,000*l.*, that of glass 630,000*l.*, of porcelain 1,000,000*l.*, and of cotton only 260,000*l.*

† Brissot states, in a note, that the manufactory of M. M. Johannot d'Annonay produced finer paper than any other in Europe, and that there was a greater demand for it, from Russia, England, and Holland, than the manufacturers could furnish. The Messrs. d'Annonay generously offered to communicate their process to all the paper manufacturers in the kingdom, and many profited by their liberality.—Commerce of America with Europe, 166, 167.

act.* The manufacture of paper by machinery was commenced about 1799, by Louis Robert, at Essonne, in France;† but the history of this great improvement belongs more properly to a later period.

In the history of printing, one of the chief circumstances to be noticed is the revival of the stereotyping process, under various modifications, in this kingdom, as well as in France.‡ About the year 1780 it was re-invented by Mr. Tilloch, who for many years edited the 'Philosophical Magazine,' he being at the time unacquainted with the earlier experiments of Ged; and he, in connexion with Foulis, the printer to the University of Glasgow, produced several works by the new process, some of which were circulated without any intimation that they were not printed in the usual way; but, satisfactory as were the experiments of Tilloch and Foulis, they did not lead immediately to the general adoption of stereotype printing. Several similar plans were brought forward in France towards the close of the eighteenth century, and some of them were applied to the printing of assignats, in order to render them more difficult of imitation.§ An attempt was also made in this country to introduce a mode of printing with types bearing whole words or syllables, instead of single letters, and the edition of Anderson's 'History of Commerce,' published in 1787-1789, in four quarto volumes, and some other works, were printed in this way, or logographically, as it was styled; but, notwithstanding the sanguine anticipations of its promoters, the scheme was eventually abandoned.

Perhaps no fitter conclusion can be made to this Chapter, which, from its limited extent, cannot give more than an imperfect sketch of the great subject with which it is occupied, than by selecting a few facts from an interesting document printed by Macpherson at the close of his 'Annals of Commerce,' as a proper sequel to his retrospect of the great and regularly increasing commercial and general correspondence of this country. The document referred to is an estimate drawn up by Sir Frederic Eden, at the time chairman of the Globe Insurance Company, of the insurable property in Great Britain and Ireland.

As many of its details are necessarily founded on conjectural data, they must be received with caution; but, extracting only such parts as have a direct bearing upon the subject of the national industry, we find that this estimate makes the value of "machinery, such as steam-engines, spinning works, &c.," in England alone, about 40,000,000*l.*; and that the annual value of British manufactures for home consumption alone is computed to amount to 76,000,000*l.*; besides which, 40,000,000*l.* is set down as about the value of British manufactures exported in 1800—making a total of 116,000,000*l.* In that part of the statement which contains the estimates of particular branches of manufacturing industry, the value of goods retained for home consumption only is given, and the principal items are as follow:—Woollen goods (after deducting 8,000,000*l.* for the value of exports), about 11,000,000*l.*; cotton goods (after deducting 4,000,000*l.* for exports), 6,000,000*l.*; flaxen and hempen goods, 2,000,000*l.* each; silk goods, 3,000,000*l.*; leather goods, of all kinds, 12,000,000*l.*; glass, 2,000,000*l.*; porcelain and pottery, 2,000,000*l.*; paper, 1,500,000*l.*; hardware, probably above 6,000,000*l.*; beer, 10,000,000*l.*, the annual consumption being 200,000,000 gallons, and the supposed price 1*s.* per gallon; spirits, 4,000,000*l.*, the annual consumption being 10,000,000 gallons, at an average price of 8*s.* per gallon; soap, more than 1,500,000*l.; salt 1,000,000*l.*; and candles, of wax and tallow, above 2,000,000*l.* The annual value of the principal agricultural crops is given as 52,000,000*l.* in all; and the value of shipping belonging to Great Britain and Ireland is estimated at 20,000,000*l.* Of the last item a part only is considered as insurable from loss by fire; and the total amount of property of all kinds insurable from fire in Great Britain is computed to have been, at the commencement of the present century, 537,250,000*l.* The property of every kind insurable in Ireland is estimated at 53,725,000*l.*, which raises the total for the United Kingdom to 590,975,000*l.*, independently of stocks of coal, alum, and other minerals; boats and other fresh-water craft; arsenals, offices, and other public buildings, of the value of which, it is stated, no estimation could be made.†

* This calculation is given as "reckoning for 2,260,802 families, at 3*d.* per week," but it appears, by computation, that these data would make the total value more than 1,700,000*l.*

CHAPTER V.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND THE FINE ARTS.

NE event, coincident with the close of our last period, marks that point of time as the expiration also of a notable period in our literature, the death of Samuel Johnson, on the 13th* of December, 1784. We may call it the end of a reign in the chronology of that matter; indeed, the end of kingship altogether in our literary history. For King Samuel has had no successor; nobody since his day, and that of his contemporary Voltaire, has sat on a throne of literature either in England or in France.

Of the literary figures of the last period, however, many continued to be conspicuous during a portion or throughout the whole of the present. Burke, the most eminent of them all, survived till 1797; and, having already raised himself to distinction by his publications and speeches in connexion with the American war, won his highest fame in the finishing part of his career by his wonderful oratorical displays on the impeachment of Hastings, and his writings, outblazing everything he had before produced, on the French revolution. Adam Smith did not die till 1790; his countryman, Dr. Robertson, not till 1793; Robertson's illustrious brother historian, Gibbon, not till 1794. Of the poets and cultivators of light literature, or the belles lettres, who have been already mentioned, Thomas Warton lived till 1790, Ossian Macpherson till 1796, Mason and his friend Horace Walpole till 1797, Joseph Warton till 1800. Other writers, again, who first became known before the close of the Johnsonian era, and our notices of whom will be found in the preceding Book, outlived the present period, some by many years. Thus Beattie only died in 1803; Anstey, the author of the New Bath Guide, in 1805; John Home, the author of Douglas, in 1808; Bishop Percy and Richard Cumberland in 1811; Adam Ferguson, the historian of the Roman Republic, in 1816; Richard Brinsley Sheridan the same year; Sir Philip Francis, presumed to be Junius, in 1818; Miss Sophia Lee in 1824; Henry Mackenzie in 1831; Miss Burney (afterwards Madame d'Arblay) not till 1840. But these writers, and others whose names might be added, had all produced the works by which they were first made known, most of them those to which they chiefly owe their reputation, before the date at which we are now arrived.

It is a somewhat remarkable fact that, if we were to continue our notices of the poets of the last century in strict chronological order, the first name we should have to mention would be that of a writer, who more properly belongs to what may be called our own day, and to the very latest era of our poetry. Crabbe, whose Tales of the Hall, the noblest production of his powerful and original genius, appeared in 1819, and who died so recently as 1832, published his first poem, The Library, in 1781; some extracts from it are given in the Annual Register for that year. But Crabbe's literary career is divided into two parts by a chasm, or interval during which he published nothing, of nearly twenty years; and he can only be fully and fairly appreciated under the next period.

One remark, however, touching this writer may be made here: his first manner was evidently caught from Churchill more than from any other of his predecessors. And this was also the case with his contemporary Cowper, the writer who throws the greatest illustration upon this age of our English poetry. William Cowper, born in 1731, twenty-three years before Crabbe (we pass over his anonymous contributions to his friend the Rev. Mr.

Newton's collection of The Olney Hymns, published in 1776), gave to the world the First Volume of his Poems, containing those entitled Table-Talk, The Progress of Error, Truth, Expostulation, Hope, Charity, Conversation, and Retirement, in 1782; his famous History of John Gilpin appeared the following year, without his name, in a publication called 'The Repository;' his second volume, containing The Task, Tirocinium, and some shorter pieces, was published in 1785; his translations of the Iliad and the Odyssey in 1791; and his death took place on the 25th of April, 1800. It is related that Cowper's first volume attracted little attention: it certainly appears to have excited no perception in the mind or eye of the public of that day that a new and great light had arisen in the poetical firmament. The Annual Register for 1781, as we have said, gives extracts from Crabbe's Library; a long passage from his next poem, The Village, is given in the volume for 1783; the volume for 1785 in like manner treats its readers to a quotation from The Newspaper, which he had published in that year; but, except that the anonymous History of John Gilpin is extracted in the volume for 1783 from the Repository, we have nothing of Cowper's till we come to the volume for 1786, which contains two of the minor pieces published in his second volume. Crabbe was probably indebted for the distinction he received in part to his friend and patron Burke, under whose direction the Register was compiled; but the silence observed in regard to Cowper may be taken as not on that account the less conclusive as to the little or next to no impression his first volume made. Yet surely there were both a force and a freshness of manner in the new aspirant that might have been expected to draw some observations. Nor had there of late been such plenty of good poetry produced in England as to make anything of the kind at all a drug in the market. But here, in fact, lay the main cause of the public inattention. The age was not poetical. The manufacture of verse was carried on, indeed, upon a considerable scale, by the Hayleys and the Whiteheads and the Pratts and others (spinners of sound and weavers of words, not for a moment to be compared in inventive and imaginative faculty, or in faculty of any kind, any more than for the utility of their work, with their contemporaries the Arkwrights and Cartwrights); but the production of poetry had gone so much out, that, even in the class most accustomed to judge of these things, few people knew it when they saw it. It has been said that the severe and theological tone of this poetry of Cowper's operated against its immediate popularity; and that was probably the case too; but it could only have been so, at any rate to the same extent, in a time at the least as indifferent to poetry as to religion and morality. For, certainly, since the days of Pope, nothing in the same style had been produced among us to be compared with these poems of Cowper's for animation, vigour, and point, which are among the most admired qualities of that great writer, any more than for the cordiality, earnestness, and fervour which are more peculiarly their own. Smoother versification we had had in great abundance; more pomp and splendour of rhetorical declamation, perhaps, as in Johnson's paraphrases from Juvenal; more warmth and glow of imagination, as in Goldsmith's two poems, if they are to be considered as coming into the competition. But, on the whole, verse of such bone and muscle had proceeded from no recent writer,—not excepting Churchill, whose poetry had little else than its coarse strength to recommend it, and whose hasty and careless workmanship Cowper, while he had to a certain degree been his imitator, had learned with his artistical feeling infinitely to surpass. Well, Churchill's vehement invective, with its exaggerations and personalities, made him the most popular poet of his day: Cowper, neglected at first, has taken his place as one of the classics of the language. Each has had his reward—the reward he best deserved, and probably most desired.

As the death of Samuel Johnson closes one era of our literature, so the appearance of Cowper as a poet opens another. Notwithstanding his obligations both to Churchill and Pope, a main characteristic of Cowper's poetry is its originality. Compared with almost any one of his predecessors, he was what we may call a natural poet. He broke through conventional forms and usages in his mode of writing more daringly than any English poet before him had done, at least since the genius of Pope had bound in its spell the phraseology and rhythm of our poetry. His opinions were not more his own than his manner of expressing them. His principles of diction and versification were announced, in part, in the poem with which he introduced himself to the public, his Table-Talk, in which, having intimated his contempt for the "creamy smoothness" of modern fashionable verse, where sentiment was so often

And truth cut short to make a period round,"

he exclaims,

"Give me the line that ploughs its stately course
Like a proud swan, conquering the stream by force;
That, like some cottage beauty, strikes the heart,
Quite unindebted to the tricks of art."

But, although he despised the "tricks" of art, Cowper, like every great poet, was also a great artist; and, with all its in that day almost unexampled simplicity and naturalness, his style is the very reverse of a slovenly or irregular one. If his verse be not so highly polished as that of Pope,—who, he complains, has "Made poetry a mere mechanic art,

And every warbler has his tune by heart,"—

it is in its own way nearly as "well disciplined, complete, compact," as he has described Pope's to be. With all his avowed admiration of Churchill, he was far from being what he has called that writer—

"Too proud for art, and trusting in mere force."

On the contrary, he has in more than one passage discarded on "the pangs of a poetic birth"—on "the shifts and turns,

The expedients and inventions multiform,
To which the mind resorts, in chase of terms,

and the other labours to be undergone by whoever would attain to excellence in the work of composition. Not, however, that, with all this elaboration, he was a slow writer. Slowness is the consequence of indifference, of a writer not being excited by his subject—not having his heart in his work, but going through it as a mere task; let him be thoroughly in earnest, fully possessed of his subject and possessed by it, and, though the pains he takes to find apt and effective expression for his thoughts may tax his whole energies like wrestling with a strong man, he will not write slowly. He is in a state of active combustion—consuming away, it may be, but never pausing. Cowper is said to have composed the six thousand verses, or thereby, contained in his first volume in about three months.

Not creative imagination, nor deep melody, nor even, in general, much of fancy or grace or tenderness, is to be met with in the poetry of Cowper; but yet it is not without both high and various excellence. Its main charm, and that which is never wanting, is its earnestness. This is a quality which gives it a power over many minds not at all alive to the poetical; but it is also the source of some of its strongest attractions for those that are: Hence its truth both of landscape-painting, and of the description of character and states of mind; hence its skilful expression of such emotions and passions as it allows itself to deal with; hence the force and fervour of its denunciatory eloquence, giving to some passages as fine an inspiration of the moral sublime as is perhaps any where to be found in didactic poetry. Hence, we may say, even the directness, simplicity, and manliness of Cowper's diction—all that is best in the form, as well as in the spirit, of his verse. It was this quality, or temper of mind, in short, that principally made him an original poet; and, if not the founder of a new school, the pioneer of a new era of English poetry. Instead of repeating the unmeaning conventionalities and faded affectations of his predecessors, it led him to turn to the actual nature within him and around him; and there to learn both the truths he should utter and the words in which he should utter them.

After Cowper had found, or been found out by, his proper audience, the qualities in his poetry that at first had most repelled ordinary readers rather aided its success. In particular, as we have said, its theological tone and spirit made it acceptable in quarters to which poetry of any kind had rarely penetrated; and where it may perhaps be affirmed that it keeps its ground chiefly perforce of this its most prosaic peculiarity; although, at the same time, it is probable that the vigorous verse to which his system of theology and morals has been married by Cowper has not been without effect in diffusing not only a more indulgent toleration but a truer feeling and love for poetry throughout what is called the religious world. Nor is it to be denied that the source of Cowper's own most potent inspiration is his theological creed. The most popular of his poems, and also perhaps the one of greatest pretension, is his Task: it abounds in that delineation of domestic and every-day life which interests every body, in descriptions of incidents and natural appearances with which all are familiar, in the expression of sentiments and convictions to which most hearts readily respond: it is a poem, therefore, in which the greatest number of readers find the greatest number of things to attract and attach them. Besides, both in the form and in the matter, it has less of what is felt to be strange and sometimes repulsive by the generality; the verse flows, for the most part, smoothly enough, if not with much variety of music; the diction is, as usual with Cowper, clear, manly, and expressive, but at the same time, from being looser and more diffuse, seldom harsh or difficult than it is in some of his other compositions; above all, the doctrinal strain is pitched upon a lower key, and, without any essential point being given up, both morality and religion certainly assume a countenance and voice considerably less rueful and vindictive. But although The Task has much occasional elevation and eloquence, and some sunny passages, it perhaps nowhere rises to the passionate force and vehemence to which Cowper had been carried by a more burning zeal in some of his earlier poems. We would refer, for example, to the fine declamation in that entitled Table-Talk, on the divine vengeance which a nation draws down upon itself by vice:—

What burns at home, or threatens from afar,
Nature in arms, her elements at strife,
The storms that overset the joys of life,
Are but his rods to scourge a guilty land,
And waste it at the bidding of his hand.
He gives the word, and Mutiny soon roars
In all her gates, and shakes her distant shores;
The standards of all nations are unbar'd;
She has one foe, and that one foe the world:
And, if he deem that people with a frown,
And mark them with a seal of wrath press'd down, Obduracy takes place; callous and tough,
The reprobated race grows judgment-proof;
Earth shakes beneath them, and heav'n roars above;
But nothing scares them from the course they love.

They trust in navies, and their navies fail—
God's curse can cast away ten thousand sail!
They trust in armies, and their courage dies;
In wisdom, wealth, in fortune, and in lies;
But all they trust in withers, as it must,
Whom He commands, in whom they place no trust.
Vengeance at last pours down," &c.

But, even when it expresses itself in quite other forms, the fervour which inspires these earlier poems occasionally produces something more brilliant or more graceful than is any where to be found in The Task; as, for instance, in the comparison between Voltaire and the Cottager, in that called 'Truth,' and the exquisite version, so high-wrought and yet so severely simple, of the meeting of the two Disciples with their Master on the road to Emmaus in that entitled 'Conversation.' For one thing, Cowper's poetry, not organ-toned or informed with any very rich or original music, any more than soaringly imaginative or gorgeously decorated, is of a style that requires the sustaining aid of rhyme: in blank verse it is apt to overflow in pools and shallows. And this is one among other reasons why, after all, some of his short poems, which are nearly all in rhyme, are perhaps what he has done best. His John Gilpin, universally known and universally enjoyed by his countrymen, young and old, educated and uneducated, and perhaps the only English poem of which this can be said, of course at once suggests itself as standing alone in the collection of what he has left us for whimsical conception and vigour of comic humour; but there is a quieter exercise of the same talent, or at least of a kindred sense of the ludicrous and sly power of giving it expression, in others of his shorter pieces. For tenderness and pathos, again, nothing else that he has written, and not much that is elsewhere to be found of the same kind in English poetry, can be compared with his Lines on his Mother's Picture. This, indeed, is no doubt, as a whole, his finest poem—at once springing from the deepest and purest fount of passion, and happy in shaping itself into richer and sweeter music than he has reached in any other. It shows what his real originality, and the natural spirit of art that was in him, might have done under a better training and more favourable circumstances of personal situation, or perhaps in another age. Generally, indeed, it may be said of Cowper, that the more he was left to himself, or trusted to his own taste and feelings, in writing, the better he wrote. In so far as regards the form of composition, the principal charm of what he has done best is a natural elegance, which is most perfect in what he has apparently written with the least labour, or at any rate with the least thought of rules or models. His Letters to his friends, not written for publication at all, but thrown off in the carelessness of his hours of leisure and relaxation, have given him as high a place among the prose classics of his country as he holds among our poets. His least successful performances are his translations of the Iliad and Odyssey, throughout which he was straining to imitate a style not only unlike his own, but, unfortunately, quite as unlike that of his original—for these versions of the most natural of all poetry, the Homeric; are, strangely enough, attempted in the manner of the most artificial of all poets, Milton.

Neither, however, did this age of our literature want its artificial poetry. In fact, the expiration or abolition of that manner among us was brought about not more by the example of a fresh and natural style given by Cowper, than by the exhibition of the opposite style, pushed to its extreme, given by his contemporary Darwin. Our great poets of this era cannot be accused of hurrying into print at an immature age. Dr. Erasmus Darwin, born in 1721, after having risen to distinguished reputation as a physician, published the Second Part of his Botanic Garden, under the title of The Loves of the Plants, in 1789; and the First Part, entitled The Economy of Vegetation, two years after. He died in 1802. The Botanic Garden, hard, brilliant, sonorous, may be called a poem cast in metal—a sort of Pandemonium palace of rhyme, not unlike that raised long ago in another region;

“where pillars round
Were set, and Doric pillars, overlaid
With golden architrave; nor did there want Cornice, or frieze, with bossy sculptures graven:
The roof was fretted gold.”

The poem, however, did not rise exactly “like an exhalation.” “The verse,” writes its author's sprightly biographer, Miss Anna Seward, “corrected, polished, and modulated with the most

sedulous attention; the notes involving such great diversity of matter relating to natural history; and the composition going forward in the short recesses of professional attendance, but chiefly in his chaise, as he travelled from one place to another; the Botanic Garden could not be the work of one, two, or three years; it was ten from its primal lines to its first publication.” If this account may be depended on, the Doctor's supplies of inspiration must have been vouchsafed to him at the rather penurious rate of little more than a line a day. At least, therefore, it cannot be said of him, as it was said of his more fluent predecessor in both gifts of Apollo, Sir Richard Blackmore, that he wrote “to the rumbling of his chariot wheels.” The verse, nevertheless, does in another way smack of the travelling-chaise, and of “the short recesses of professional attendance.” Nothing is done in passion and power; but all by filing, and scraping, and rubbing, and other painstaking. Every line is as elaborately polished and sharpened as a lancet; and the most effective paragraphs have the air of a lot of those bright little instruments arranged in rows, with their blades out, for sale. You feel as if so thick an array of points and edges demanded careful handling, and that your fingers are scarcely safe in coming near them. Darwin's theory of poetry evidently was, that it was all a mechanical affair—only a higher kind of pin-making. His own poetry, however, with all its defects, is far from being merely mechanical. The Botanic Garden is not a poem which any man of ordinary intelligence could have produced by sheer care and industry, or the faculty of writing which could be acquired by serving an apprenticeship to the trade of poetry. Vicious as it is in manner, it is even there of an imposing and original character; and a true poetic fire lives under all its affectations, and often blazes up through them. There is not much, indeed, of pure soul or high imagination in Darwin; he seldom rises above the visible and material; but he has at least a poet's eye for the perception of that, and a poet's fancy for its embellishment and exaltation. No writer has surpassed him in the luminous representation of visible objects in verse; his descriptions have the distinctness of drawings by the pencil, with the advantage of conveying, by their harmonious words, many things that no pencil can paint. His images, though they are for the most part tricks of language rather than the transformations or new embodiments of impassioned thought, have often at least an Ovidian glitter and prettiness, or are striking from their mere ingenuity and novelty—as when he addresses the stars as “flowers of the sky,” or apostrophises the glowworm as “Star of the earth, and diamond of the night.” These two instances, indeed, thus brought into juxtaposition, may serve to exemplify the principle upon which he constructs such decorations: it is, we see, an economical principle; for, in truth, the one of these figures is little more than the other reversed, or inverted. Still both are happy and effective enough conceits—and one of them is applied and carried out so as to make it more than a mere momentary light flashing from the verse. The passage is not without a tone of grandeur and true pathos:—

Mark with bright curves the printless steps of time;
Near and more near your beamy cars approach,
And lessening orbs on lessening orbs o’erreach:—
Flowers of the Sky! ye too to age must yield, Frail as your silken sisters of the field!
Star after star from heaven’s high arch shall rush,
Suns sink on suns, and systems systems crush, Headlong, extinct, to one dark centre fall,
And death and night and chaos mingle all!
—Till o’er the wreck, emerging from the storm,
Immortal Nature lifts her changeful form,
Mounts from her funeral pyre on wings of flame,
And soars and shines, another and the same.”

There is also a fine moral inspiration, as well as the usual rhetorical brilliancy, in the following lines:—

“Hail, adamantine Steel! magnetic Lord!
King of the prow, the ploughshare, and the sword!
True to the pole, by thee the pilot guides
His steady helm amid the struggling tides, Braves with broad sail the immeasurable sea,
Cleaves the dark air, and asks no star but thee!”

Here, to be sure, we have another variation of the same thought according to which the stars have elsewhere been presented shining on earth as glowworms and blooming in the sky as flowers; and this may be considered to show some poverty of invention in the poet, or an undue partiality for the stars; but this last metaphor, making a star of the mysterious loadstone, in the dark night and on the immeasurable sea—a guiding and, as it were, living, though lustreless star—is more uncommon and surprising, and evinces more imagination, than the other figures. Bursts such as these, however, are of rare occurrence in the poem. Its sounding declamation is for the most part addressed rather to the ear than to either the imagination or the fancy. But the mortal disease inherent in Darwin’s poetry is, that it is essentially unspiritual. It has no divine soul: it has not even a heart of humanity beating in it. Its very life is galvanic and artificial. Matter only is what it concerns itself about; not to spiritualize the material, which is the proper business and end of poetry, but to materialize the spiritual is its constant tendency and effort. It believes only in the world of sense; and even of that it selects for its subject the lowest departments. Not man and his emotions, but animals, vegetables, minerals, mechanical inventions and processes, are what it delights to deal with. But these things are mostly, by doom of nature, incapable of being turned into high poetry. They belong to the domain of the understanding, or the bodily senses and powers, not either to that of the imagination or that of the heart. Dr. Darwin himself probably came to suspect that there were some subjects of which poetry could make nothing, some regions of mental speculation in which she could only make herself ridiculous, when he saw how grotesquely, and at the same time how exactly in many respects, the style and manner of his ‘Loves of the Plants’ were reflected in the ‘Loves of the Triangles.’

It must be regarded as a real misfortune for Dr. Darwin’s fame, though a ludicrous one, that he should have had such a biographer and commentator upon his works as Miss Anna Seward. Anna has herself a claim upon our notice as one of the poetical lights of this age. Besides various contributions to magazines, she emitted separately and with her name, in the last twenty years of the century, a succession of elegies, monodies, odes, sonnets, poetical epistles, adieus, &c., about Captain Cook, Major André, Lady Miller of Bath-easton, and other persons and things, which were generally read in their day, and were, after her death, in 1809, at the age of sixty-two, collected and republished in three octavo volumes under the care of Walter Scott, who had formed her acquaintance in the early part of his career, and upon whom she had imposed the honour of being her literary executor. A selection from her Letters, which she had bequeathed to Constable, the Edinburgh bookseller, appeared about the same time in six volumes. But decidedly her most remarkable performance, and the one by which her name is likely to be the longest preserved, is the octavo volume she gave to the world in 1804, under the title of ‘Memoirs of the Life of Dr. Darwin, chiefly during his residence at Lichfield, with Anecdotes of his Friends, and Criticisms on his Writings.’ Here we have Anna herself, as well as her friend, the poetic Doctor, at full length. Anna's notion is, that the Botanic Garden ought to have been her poem, not Darwin's, if matters had been fairly managed. The Doctor, it seems, about the year 1777, purchased "a little, wild, umbrageous valley, a mile from Lichfield, irriguous from various springs, and swampy from their plenitude." This he soon dressed up into a very neat imitation of Paradise, and then, having till now "restrained his friend Miss Seward's steps to this her always favourite scene," he allowed her to visit it, when, the lady informs us, "she took her tablets and pencil, and, seated on a flower-bank, in the midst of that luxuriant retreat, wrote the following lines, while the sun was gilding the glen, and while birds of every plume poured their song from the boughs." Now, be it observed, the Doctor was not even with her on the flower-bank: it was intended that they should have gone to see Paradise together, "but a medical summons into the country deprived her of that pleasure." The lines, therefore, were wholly the produce of her own particular muse and her own black-lead pencil. They are substantially the commencing lines of the First Book of the Botanic Garden. When the authoress presented them to Darwin, he said that they ought to form the exordium of a great work, and proposed that Anna should write such a work "on the unexplored poetic ground of the Linnean system," to which he would provide prose notes. Anna answered, modestly, "that, besides her want of botanic knowledge, the plan was not strictly proper for a female pen"—but that she thought it was just the thing for "the efflorescence of his own fancy." It would appear that, soon after this, Darwin began the composition of his great poem; but previously, the lady tells us, a few weeks after they were composed, he "sent the verses Miss S. wrote in his Botanic Garden [that is, the Lichfield paradise, so called] to the Gentleman's Magazine, and in her name." "From thence," she proceeds, "they were copied in the Annual Register [where we have not been able to find them]; but, without consulting her, he had substituted for the last six lines eight of his own. He afterwards, and again without the knowledge of their author, made them the exordium to the first part of his poem, published, for certain reasons, some years after the second part had appeared. No acknowledgment was made that those verses were the work of another pen. Such acknowledgment ought to have been made, especially since they passed the press in the name of their real author. They are somewhat altered in the exordium to Dr. Darwin's poem, and eighteen lines of his own are interwoven with them." The lines having been only forty-six originally, and twenty-six of those in the Doctor's exordium being thus admitted to be of his own composition, it might seem that the theft was reduced to a somewhat small matter; but Miss Seward, not unreasonably, holds that in thus rifling her poem, probably of its best verses, Darwin did her the same injury as if he had appropriated the whole; and therefore in returning, in a subsequent page, to this "extraordinary, and, in a poet of so much genius, unprecedented instance of plagiarism," and quoting against him one of his own critical canons, that "a few common flowers of speech may be gathered as we pass over our neighbour's ground, but we must not plunder his cultivated fruit," she bitterly charges him with having "forgotten that just restraint when he took, unacknowledged, forty-six entire lines, the published verses of his friend, for the exordium of the first part of his work." After all, it has been doubted by the world if that scene of the flower-bank and the tablets was anything more than a pleasant dream of Anna's, or if she had anything to do with the authorship of the forty-six verses at all, beyond allowing them to be published with her name in the magazines. She has been proved to be incorrect in her recollections of other matters, about which she was as obstinate as she was about this: her memory had the worst defect, of being apt to remember too much.

Miss Seward's own poetry, with much more sentimentality and much less sense and substance, belongs to the same school with Darwin's. Her's is the feeble commonplace of the same laboured, tortuous, and essentially unnatural and untrue style out of which he, with his more powerful and original genius, has evolved for himself a distinctive form or dialect. This style has subsisted among us, in one variation or another, and with more or less of temporary acceptance, in every era of our poetry. It is mimicked by Pope, in his "Song by a Person of Quality, written in the year 1733;" it is the Euphuism of the Elizabethan age, gently ridiculed by Shakspeare, in his Love's Labour's Lost, though then made brilliant and imposing by the wit and true poetic genius of Lifty; it is the same thing that is travestied by Chaucer in his Rime of Sir Thopas. Perhaps, however, it had in no former time made so much din, or risen to such apparent ascendancy, as at the date of which we are now speaking, the last years of the eighteenth century. Nor had it ever before assumed a shape or character at once so extravagant and so hollow of all real worth or power. The first impulse seems to have been caught from Italy, the foreign country whose literature has in every age exercised, for good or for evil, the greatest influence upon our own. The writers of what is called the Della Cruscan school had their predecessors and progenitors in Lady Miller and her friends,* whose 'Poetical Amusements at a Villa near Bath,' as they were called when printed, were given to the world between 1770 and 1780. Lady Miller, when she set up her Parnassus and Wedgwood-ware vase at Batheaston, had just returned from a tour in Italy with her husband, of which she published an account, in three Volumes of 'Letters,' in 1776. Miss Seward was one of the contributors to this Batheaston poetry. It does not seem, however, to have attracted much notice beyond the circle in which the writers and their patroness moved; at most it was regarded as belonging rather to the provincial than to either the national or the metropolitan literature of the time. In the Della Cruscan school the thing came to a head. "In 1785," as the matter is recorded in the Introduction to the Baviad and Mæviad, "a few English of both sexes, whom chance had jumbled together at Florence, took a fancy to while away their time in scribbling high-flown panegyrics on themselves; and complimentary canzonettas on two or three Italians, who understood too little of the language in which they were written to be disgusted with them." Among them were Mrs. Piozzi, the widow of Johnson's friend Thrale, now the wife of her daughter's music-master; Mr. Bertie Greathead, a man of property and good family; Mr. Robert Merry, who specially took to himself the designation of Della Crusca; Mr. William Parsons, another English gentleman of fortune; &c. These people first printed a volume of their rhymes under the title of The Florence Miscellany. Afterwards they and a number of other persons, their admirers and imitators, began to publish their lucubrations in England, chiefly in two new daily newspapers, called The World and The Oracle; from which they were soon collected, and recommended with vast laudation to the public attention, in a volume entitled The Album, by Bell the printer. "While the epidemic malady was spreading from fool to fool," continues Gifford, "Della Crusca came over, and immediately announced himself by a sonnet to Love. Anna Matilda wrote an incomparable piece of nonsense in praise of it; and the two 'great luminaries of the age,' as Mr. Bell calls them, fell desperately in love with each other. From that period not a day passed without an amatory epistle, fraught with lightning and thunder, et quicquid habent telorum arma mentaria cœli. The fever turned to a frenzy: Laura Maria, Carlos, Orlando, Adelaide, and a thousand other nameless names caught the infection; and, from one end of the kingdom to the other, all was nonsense and Della Crusca." After this had gone on for some time, Gifford took up his pen, and, in 1794, produced his 'Baviad,' which, in 1796, was followed by its continuation, the 'Mæviad.' It is only in these two poems that the memory of most of the unhappy Della Cruscan songsters has been preserved—an immortality which may be compared with that conferred by the Newgate Calendar. We may transfer to our historic page the principal names, in addition to those already mentioned, that figure in these celebrated satires—adding a few particulars as to some of them, gleaned from other sources. A few of the writers, we may remark, that got bespattered in the course of Gifford's somewhat energetic horse-play, have survived and recovered from his corrosive mud and any connexion they may have had with the Della Cruscan folly:—such as the dramatists O'Keefe, Morton, Reynolds, and Holcroft; the younger Colman, who had already, in 1795, produced his Sylvester Daggerwood, besides other dramatic pieces; Mrs. Cowley, the clever authoress of the Belle's Stratagem;* and no less a person than the prince of biographers, James Boswell, of whose Johnsonianism, however, people in general as yet discerned only the ludicrous excess;—not to speak of such rather more than respectable rhymers as Edward Jerningham, the author of numerous plays and poems; Miles Peter Andrews, famous for his prologues and epilogues, which were occasionally lively as well as rattling; and perhaps we ought also to add, in a proper spirit of gallantry, the somewhat too famous Mrs. Robinson, who, with all her levity, intellectual as well as moral, was not without some literary talent and poetical feeling. Mrs. Piozzi too, of course, though not the wisest of women, must be held to have been by no means all ignorance and pretension. But the general herd of the Della Cruscans may be safely set down as having been mere blatant blockheads. Of some of the fictitious signatures quoted by Gifford we find no interpretation: such as Arno, Cesario, Julia, &c. Others of the names he mentions are real names. Topham, for instance, is Mr. Edward Topham, the proprietor of The World; 'monosoph Este,' as he calls him, is the Rev. Charles Este, principal editor of that paper; Weston is Joseph Weston, a small magazine critic of the day. Two of the minor offenders, to whom he deals a lash or two in passing, are James Cobbe, a now-forgotten farce-writer; and Frederic Pilon, who was, we believe, a player by profession. The more conspicuous names, besides Merry and Greathead, are Mit Yenda, or Mot Yenda, stated to be the anagram of a Mr. Timothy or Thomas Adney, of whom we know nothing; Edwin, which stands for a Mr. Thomas Vaughan, the same person, we suppose, who wrote a farce called The Hotel, and one or two other things of the same sort, about twenty years before this time; and especially Tony or Anthony Pasquin, the nom de guerre of a John Williams, the author of loads both of verse and prose. If we may judge by a collection of the 'Poems,' as they are called, of this Williams, or Pasquin, published, in two volumes, in 1789—a second edition, with a long list of subscribers, sparkling with titled names—Gifford's representation of the emptiness, feebleness, and sounding stupidity of the Della Cruscans is no exaggeration at all. Nothing, certainly, was ever printed on decent paper more worthless and utterly despicable in every way than this poetry of the great Anthony Pasquin, who, in quite a lofty and patronising style, dedicates one of his volumes to Mr. Pitt, and the other in part to Sir Joshua Reynolds, in part to Warren Hastings (so economically does he distribute the precious honour);—who has all these three distinguished persons among his subscribers, in company with most of the rank and eminence of the time;—and whom his friends and admirers, West Dudley Digges, W. Whitby of Cambridge, Thomas Bel-lany, Frederick Pilon, William Upton, and J. Butler—all, he tells us, “of high estimation in the world of literature,”—in a series of introductory odes and other rhyming laudations, extol, as another Martial and Juvenal combined,—the reformer of the age—the scourge of folly—animating the just criticism of Persius with a brighter fire than Churchill’s—“at once the Pride and Terror of the Land”—a Dryden come to life again—the greatest wit since Butler—a giant, magnanimous and proud, fit only to contend with giants. “Our children’s children,” exclaims Dudley Digges,

Shall raise the sculptur’d tomb and laurel’d bust;
Inscribe the stone with monumental woe,
While the big tears in gushing torrents flow!”

“Resistless bard!” Pilon breaks out—

Thou shalt be universally renowned!
Well may you tread all competition down:
Originality is all your own.”

But far beyond this is the fine frenzy of William Upton. “Pasquin!” roars out this idiot striving to get in a passion—

“Pasquin! Can nought thy daring pen impede,
Or stem the venom of thy critic gait?
Shall thy effusions make whole legions bleed,
And thou sit smiling as their numbers fall?
By heaven! I’ll probe thee to the heart’s warm core,
If Thespis hurl again his satire round,
E’en thy existence, by the gods, I’ve sworn
To bring, by strength Samsonian, to the ground!
For know, that giants should with giants vie,” &c.

And afterwards—

“Imperious tyrant, doth my threats affright
Thy yet ungovern’d and undaunted soul?
Or rather fill thee with renewed delight,
Such as when Paris lovely Helen stole?”

So much for contemporary praise—at least when estimated by the number and vehemence rather than by the true worth and authority of the voices! This man Upton, too, had published at least one volume of rhymes of his own, and no doubt was looked upon by many others as well as by himself as one of the poetical luminaries of the age. The matter we have quoted, however, may serve to give a right notion of the whole of this singular phenomenon—of what the Della Cruscan poetry was, and also of the nature and extent of the celebrity and admiration which it for a time enjoyed. Of course, it could not deceive the higher order of cultivated minds; but even in what is called the literary world there are always numbers of persons easily imposed upon as to such matters, and at the same time favourably placed for imposing upon others; poetical antiquaries, editors, and commentators, for example, who, naturally enough, take themselves, and are taken by the multitude, to be the best judges of the article which it seems to be in a manner their trade to deal in, but who, in truth, for the most part do not know good poetry from bad, or from no poetry at all. Witness the manner in which about this very time some of the most laborious of the Shakspearian commentators, and other literati of high name, were taken in by the miserable forgeries of Ireland. No wonder, then, that Tony Pasquin too had his literary as well as fashionable admirers. No doubt his chief acceptance, and that of the other Della Cruscan warblers, male and female, was with what is (or rather was, for the phrase in that sense is now gone out) called the town—in other words, the mere populace of the reading world, whose voice is not, and cannot be, more potential for any enduring effect than that of any other mob; yet the discreditable infatuation—the parallel of that of Queen Titania for Bottom the weaver, with his ass’s head—

Mine ear is much enamour’d of thy note”—

might have lasted considerably longer, and even spread farther than it did, had it not been checked by Gifford’s vigorous exposure and castigation. He himself intimates, in the Preface to the Macviad, that he had been charged with breaking butterflies upon a wheel; but “many a man,” he adds, “who now affects to pity me for wasting my strength upon unresisting imbecility, would, not long since, have heard their poems with applause, and their praises with delight.” On the other hand, their great patron, Bell, the printer, accused him of “bespattering nearly all the poetical eminence of the day.” “But, on the whole,” he says, “the clamour against me was not loud; and was lost by insensible degrees in the applause of such as I was truly ambitious to please. Thus supported, the good effects of the satire (glorious loquor) were not long in manifesting themselves. Della Crusca appeared no more in the Oracle, and, if any of his followers ventured to treat the town with a soft sonnet, it was not, as before, introduced by a pompous preface. Pope and Milton resumed their superiority; and Este and his coadjutors silently acquiesced in the growing opinion of their incompetency, and showed some sense of shame.”

Of the forgeries of William Henry Ireland it is only necessary to record that, after the pretended old parchments had been exhibited for some months in Norfolk-street, where they were beheld and perused with vast reverence and admiration by sundry eminent scholars and critics, their contents were printed in December, 1795, in a magnificent two-guinea folio, published by subscription among the believers, with the title of ‘Miscellaneous Papers and Legal Instruments, under the hand and seal of William Shakspeare, including the Tragedy of King Lear, and a small fragment of Hamlet, from the original MSS.’; that the professed editor was Samuel Ireland, the father of the fabricator; that the tragedy of ‘Kynge Vorrtygerne,’ an additional piece of manufacture from the same workshop, was brought out at Drury Lane in March following; that Malone’s conclusive ‘Inquiry into the Authenticity’ of the papers appeared just in time to herald that performance; that young Ireland himself the same year acknowledged the imposition (at the same time acquitting his father of all share in it) in his ‘Authentic Account of the Shakspeare Manuscripts’ (afterwards extended in his 'Confessions relative to the Shakspeare Forgery,' published in 1805); and that, notwithstanding all this, George Chalmers came out in 1797, with 'An Apology for the Believers,' which he followed up with another thick octavo, entitled 'A Supplemental Apology,' two years after. Malone's exposure, founded entirely on evidence external to the merits of the poetry thus impudently attributed to Shakspeare, was, as we have said, demonstrative enough; but it ought not to have been required: the wretched rubbish should have been its own sufficient refutation. Vortigern, indeed, was damned, after Malone had sounded his catcall; but that persons occupying such positions in the literary world as Pye, the poet laureate, Boswell, John Pinkerton, George Chalmers, Dr. Parr, &c., should have mistaken, as they did, the poetry of Ireland for that of Shakspeare, could only have happened in a time in which there was very little true feeling generally diffused, even among persons to whom the public naturally looked up for guidance in such matters, either of Shakspeare or of poetry. The Shakspeare papers were a very proper and natural sequel to the Della Cruscan poetry.

Contemporaneously with Gifford's Baviad and Mæviad appeared another remarkable satirical poem, The Pursuits of Literature, now known to have been written by the late Thomas James Mathias, the author of many other pieces both in verse and prose (among the rest, of a number of poetical compositions in Italian, published in the latter part of his life), although, we believe, it never was publicly acknowledged by him. The First Part, or Dialogue, of the Pursuits of Literature came out in May, 1794; the Second and Third together, in May, 1796; The Fourth and last in July, 1797. The Four Dialogues were collected and republished together in January, 1798: this is called the fifth edition; and before the end of the same year two more editions had been called for. The poem, which consists in all of only between 1500 and 1600 lines, spread over a volume of 450 pages, takes a general survey both of the literature and politics of its day; but the interest of the work lies chiefly in the prose prefaces and notes, the quantity of which amounts to about ten times that of the verse. And, in truth, the prose is in every way the cleverest and most meritorious part of the performance. Mathias's gift of song was not of a high order; his poetry is of the same school with Gifford's, but the verse of the Pursuits of Literature has neither the terseness and pungency nor the occasional dignity and elegance which make that of the Baviad and Mæviad so successful an echo of Pope—the common master of both writers. The notes, however, though spleetic, and informed by a spirit of uncompromising partisanship, are written with a sharp pen, as well as in a scholarly style, and, in addition to much Greek and Latin learning, contain a good deal of curious disquisition and anecdote. Most of the literary and political notorieties, great and small, of that day, are noticed by the author—himself not excepted;* and it is interesting and amusing to look back from this distance, and to remark how time has dealt with the several names introduced, and what final judgments she has passed on his likings and dislikings.

This may be said to have been especially the age of literary and political satire in England. Most of it, however, was in a lighter style than the 'Pursuits of Literature' or the 'Baviad and Mæviad.' These poems were the energetic invectives of Juvenal and Persius after the more airy ridicule of Horace. Perhaps the liveliest and happiest of all the quick succession of similar jeux d'esprit that appeared from the first unsettlement of the power and supremacy of Lord North to the termination of the war of parties by the firm establishment of the premiership of Pitt, was Richard Tickell's 'Anticipation,' published a few days before the meeting of parliament in November, 1778. It was an anticipation of the king's speech and the coming debates on it in the two Houses; and so much to the life was each noble lord and honourable member hit off, that, it is said, they one after another, to the infinite amusement of their hearers, fell in their actual orations into the forms of expression and modes of argument and illustration that had been assigned to them, only drifting the faster and the farther in that direction the more they strove to take another course. Poor Tickell, the grandson of Addison's friend, Thomas Tickell, after making the town merry by other sportive effusions both in prose and verse, put an end to his own life by throwing himself from his bedroom-window at Hampton Court Palace in November, 1793. The 'Heroic Epistle to Sir William Chambers,' with its 'Heroic Postscript,' and the 'Odes' to Dr. Shebbeare, to Sir Fletcher Norton, &c., which appeared in 1782 under the name of Malcolm MacGregor, of Knightsbridge, Esq., and are now known to have been the productions of the poet Mason, have been noticed in the preceding Book. A fortunate subject did as much perhaps for the first and most famous of these pieces as any remarkable merit there was in its execution; indeed, the verses would have needed to be golden indeed to give any extraordinary value to so short a performance. The 'Heroic Epistle' is only an affair of 146 lines, with a few slight prose notes. But, although Sir William's oriental principles of gardening afforded matter for solemn ridicule which it was impossible for him to fail in turning to some account, Mason had more spite than wit, and his wordy, laboured verse is for the most part rather insolent than caustic. The next political satire that made much noise at the time, and is still remembered, was the famous 'Rolliad,' which appeared in a series of papers in the latter part of 1784 and beginning of 1785, immediately after the great struggle between Pitt and the Coalition. The 'Rolliad'—so named after the late Lord Rolle, then Colonel John Rolle, one of the members for Devonshire, and a staunch adherent to the party of Pitt and the court—was a volley of prose and verse from the side of the defeated Coalition. One of the persons principally concerned in it is understood to have been the eminent civilian, Dr. French Laurence, Burke's friend; another is believed to have been the late George Ellis, the author of the Specimens of the Early English Poets, &c. Its tone and manner are jocular; but it is easy to see that the writers were at heart not a little angry, and that they were bent on doing mischief. The satire is daringly personal and not unfrequently coarse, going to a much greater length in both ways than our present manners would allow. The vindictive spirit out of which it comes, too, is shown both by the pertinacity with which the more eminent victims are again and again attacked, and by the eagerness with which the smaller game also are hunted down and torn to pieces. Nobody escapes, from the new premier down to the most nameless among his retainers. Yet all this is done, as we have said, with much gaiety and laughter; and the epigrams are often as brilliant as they are stinging and exasperating. The 'Rolliad' was followed, after a few months, by the 'Probationary Odes for the Laureateship,' published after the election of Thomas Warton to that office on the vacancy occasioned by the death of William Whitehead. The Odes, which are supposed to be recited by their respective authors before the Lord Chamberlain, assisted by his friend Mr. Delpini, of the Haymarket Theatre, whom his lordship had sent for to serve as a guide to his inexperience in such matters, are assigned to Sir Cecil Wray, a not very literary M.P., the established butt of the Whig wits of those days—"the words by Sir Cecil Wray, Bart., the spelling by Mr. Grojan, attorney-at-law," is the title); to Lord Mulgrave, a member of the new administration, and the author of a 'Voyage to the North Pole,' as well as of various fugitive pieces in not the soberest verse; to Sir Joseph Mawbey, another ministerial M.P., who appears to have dealt, not in poetry, but in pigs; to Sir Richard Hill, the methodistical baronet, brother of Rowland, the well-known preacher, and said to be given to the same kind of pious jocularity in his speeches with which Rowland used to enliven his sermons; to James Macpherson, the translator or author of Ossian, who was also at this time a member of the House of Commons (sitting as one of the representatives of the Nabob of Arcot); to Sir Nathaniel Wraxall, already famous for having run over all the countries of the world and learned nothing but their names; to Sir Gregory Page Turner, another loyal baronet and M.P.; to Harry Dundas (in Scotch); to Viscount Mountnorris (in Hibernian English); to the Lord Chancellor Thurlow; and to the Rev. Dr. Prettyman (Pitt's tutor, afterwards Bishop of Winchester), the prose notes to whose irregular strains, "except those wherein Latin is concerned," are stated to be by

John Robinson, Esq.—the notorious "Jack Robinson," in popular repute the well-rewarded and unscrupulous doer of all work for all administrations. The 'Probationary Odes' no doubt proceeded from the same manufactory as the 'Rolliad,' and they are at least equally spirited and successful. Indeed, the humour, we should say, is richer as well as brighter and freer in its flow, an effect owing partly perhaps to the form of the composition, which is not so solemn and rigid, but somewhat also, probably, to the writers being in a kindlier mood, and less disposed to give pain to the objects of their satire. The muse of the 'Rolliad' and the 'Probationary Odes' was, as far as is known, heard no more; but another mocking spirit, not to be so soon silenced, was already in the air, and beginning to "syllable men's names" in a very peculiar accent, at once singularly comic and biting. Dr. John Wolcot, formerly a preacher to a congregation of negroes in Jamaica, now settled in London as a physician, made his first appearance as Peter Pindar in his 'Lyric Odes (fifteen in number) to the Royal Academicians for 1782.' The original style and manner of these compositions, coarse and careless enough, but full of drollery and pungency, seems to have taken the public fancy at once. Some attention also their author would have had a right to, had it been merely for the soundness of some of his remarks, and his evident knowledge of his subject; for Wolcot, who when practising medicine at Truro had discovered and encouraged the genius of John Opie, then a working carpenter in that neighbourhood, had a true as well as cultivated feeling for art. But, although the truth or good sense of his criticism may have done something at first to bring him into notice, it was to attractions of another sort that he owed his popularity. He confined himself to his friends the Academicians, to whom he addressed another set of odes in 1783, and a third set in 1785, till the latter year, when he came out with the first canto of his 'Lousiad,' the earliest of his lampoons expressly or entirely dedicated to the higher game which henceforward engaged his chief attention. The king, naturally falling in his way as the founder and patron of the Academy, had from the first come in for a side-blow now and then; but from this date their majesties became the main butts of his ridicule, and it was only when no fresh scandal or lie suited for his purpose was afloat about the doings at St. James's or Kew that he wasted his time on anything else. Such a thorn in the side of the royal family did he make himself, that a negotiation, it is said, was at one time entered into to purchase his silence. There can be no doubt, indeed, that his daring and incessant derision proved materially injurious to the popularity of the king and queen. Their unscrupulous assailant took all sorts of advantages, fair and unfair, and his ludicrous declinations are certainly no materials for history; but as a caricaturist in rhyme he must be placed very high. His manner, as we have observed, is quite original and his own, however much it may have been imitated since by others. His mere wit is not very pointed; but nobody tells a story better, or brings out the farce of a scene with more breadth and effect. Much of what he has left is hastily executed and worth very little; some of his attempts were not suited to the nature of his powers; much of what made people laugh heartily in his own day has lost its interest with the topics to which it relates; but it may safely be predicted that some of his comic tales, and other things which he has done best, and which have least of a mere temporary reference, will live in the language and retain their popularity. Wolcot lived till 1819; but, although he continued to write and publish till within a few years of his death (producing, among other things, a tragedy, the Fall of Portugal, which appeared without his name in 1808), all his most memorable effusions belong to the first eighteen or twenty years of his authorship. His proper successor, who may be regarded in the main as his imitator or disciple, was the late George Colman the Younger (as he persisted in calling himself so long as he lived); but it has not been generally noticed that from Wolcot Byron also has evidently caught part of the inspiration of his Don Juan—not of its golden poetry, of course, but of the fluent drollery and quaintness of its less elevated passages. Even there it is Wolcot refined and heightened; but still the spirit and manner are essentially the same. Compare, for instance, the harangue of Julia to her husband and his intruding myrmidons, in the first canto of Don Juan, with the Petition of the Cooks in the second canto of the Louisiad.

Of a number of other poetical writers, or verse-makers of the present period, very little need be said. The celebrated Sir William Jones—the Admireable Crichton of his day—published the first of his poems, consisting mostly of translations from the Asiatic languages, in 1772, in his twenty-sixth year; and he afterwards produced, from time to time, other similar translations, and also some original compositions in verse. He died, in the midst of a career of intellectual conquest which promised to embrace the whole compass of human learning, in 1794. The poetry of Sir William Jones is very sonorous and imposing; and in his happiest efforts there is not wanting nobleness of thought, or glow of passion, as well as pomp of words. He cannot, however, be called a poet of an original genius; any peculiarity of inspiration that may seem to distinguish some of his compositions is for the most part only the orientalism of the subject, and of the figures and images. He is a brilliant translator and imitator rather than a poet in any higher sense. We cannot say even so much for some other verse-writers of this age, once of great note. Henry James Pye, who died Poet-Laureate and a police magistrate in 1813 (having succeeded to the former office in 1790 on the death of Thomas Warton), had in his time discharged upon the unresisting public torrents of

'Progress of Refinement,' 'Shooting, a Poem,' 'Amusement, a Poetical Essay,' 'Alfred,' 'Faringdom Hill,' 'The Aristocrat,' 'The Democrat,' and other ditch-water of the sort, which the thirsty earth has long since drunk up. Not less unweariedly productive was Hayley, the friend and biographer of Cowper, with his 'Triumphs of Temper,' 'Triumphs of Music,' poetical epistles, elegies, odes, rhyming essays, plays, &c., which had accumulated to a mass of six octavo volumes so early as 1785, and to which much more forgotten verse was afterwards added—besides his Lives of Cowper and Milton, a prose three volume 'Essay on Old Maids,' a novel of similar extent, &c. &c. William Hayley lived till 1820. With his prose poetry may be classed the several wooden didactic and other poems of the late, learned Richard Payne Knight—'The Landscape,' published in 1794; 'The Progress of Civil Society,' in 1796; 'The Romance of Alfred,' many years after. Mr. Knight died in 1824. Here may be also properly enumerated Cumberland's worthless epics of 'Calvary,' 'Richard the First,' 'The Exodiad' (the two latter written in conjunction with Sir James Bland Burges, and the last not published till some years after the close of the present period). Cumberland's comedies have been noticed in the last Book. Another popular poet, and voluminous writer both in verse and prose, of this age was Samuel Jackson Pratt—originally a strolling player, next an itinerant lecturer, finally a Bath bookseller—who, after beginning his literary career as a writer of novels under the designation of Courtney Melmoth, Esq., perpetrated certain long poems, in a style of singularly mawkish sentimentality and empty affectation—'Sympathy,' 'Humanity,' and sundry others, with which humanity has long ceased to sympathize. Pratt, however, was quite the rage for a time—though his existence had been generally forgotten for a good many years before its earthly close in 1814. Here, too, may be mentioned the Rev. Percival Stockdale, whose first poetical effusion, 'Churchill Defended,' dates so far back as 1765, and who continued scribbling and publishing down nearly to his death, in 1811, but all whose literary labours have passed into utter oblivion, except only his Memoirs of his own Life, published in two octavo volumes in 1809, which is a work that the world will not willingly let die, and to have written which is, of itself, not to have lived in vain. Poor Stockdale's pleasant delusion was merely, that, being one of the smallest men of his time, or of any time, he imagined himself to be one of the greatest—and his auto-biography is his exposition and defence of this faith, written with an intense serenity of conviction which the most confirmed believers in any thing else whatever might envy.

Mrs. Charlotte Smith, better known as a novelist, made her first appearance as an author, at the age of twenty-five, by the publication, at Chichester, in 1784, of a series of 'Elegiac Sonnets,' in which there was at least considerable poetic promise.

Miss Brooke, daughter of Henry Brooke, the author of 'The Fool of Quality,' published in 1790 her 'Reliques of Irish Poetry translated into English Verse,' which is chiefly deserving of notice as having called some attention to a neglected and interesting department of ancient national literature. Hannah More had produced her two ballads, or 'Poetical Tales,' as she called them, of 'Sir Eldred of the Bower,' and the 'Bleeding Rock,' and several more poems, as well as sundry tragedies and other dramatic pieces, before the commencement of the present period; and she maintained her reputation as a correct, sensible, and highly moral writer of verse by her 'Florio' and 'The Bas Bleu,' published in 1786; and her poem entitled 'Slavery,' which appeared, in a quarto volume, two years later. Joanna Baillie, still preserved to us, assumed at once her much more eminent place as a poetess, by the first volume of her Plays illustrative of the Passions, which was given to the world in 1798. The late William Sotheby, besides a volume of poems published in 1794, added to our literature in 1798 his elegant version of 'Wieland's Oberon,' the work by which his name is perhaps most likely to be preserved, although he continued to write verse down almost to his death in 1833. But perhaps the two most important poetical publications which have not been noticed, at least in their effects, if not in themselves, were the 'Fourteen Sonnets' by the Rev. Lisle Bowles, who also still lives, printed at Bath in 1789; and the 'Tales of Wonder,' by Matthew Gregory Lewis (already of literary notoriety as the author of the novel of 'The Monk,' published in 1795), which came out, in two volumes, in 1801. Mr. Bowles, whose later works have amply sustained his reputation as a true poet, has the glory of having by his first verses given an impulse and an inspiration to the genius of Coleridge, who in his Biographia Literaria has related how the spirit of poetry that was in him was awakened into activity by these sonnets. Lewis, again, and his Tales of Wonder, gave in like manner example and excitement to Scott, who had indeed already published his first rhymes, partly translated, partly original, in 1796, and also his prose version of Goethe's Goetz of Berlichingen in 1799, but had not yet given any promise of what he was destined to become. Coleridge published his forgotten drama of The Fall of Robespierre, in 1794, and a volume of Poems in 1796; Wordsworth, his Epistle in verse entitled, 'An Evening Walk,' and also his 'Descriptive Sketches during a Tour in the Alps,' in 1793, and the first edition of his 'Lyrical Ballads,' in 1798; Southey, his Joan of Arc, in 1796, and a volume of Poems in 1797; but these writers all nevertheless belong properly to our next period, in which their principal works were produced, as well as Scott and Crabbe, and Thomas Moore, whose first publication, his Odes of Anacreon, appeared in 1800; Thomas Campbell, whose Pleasures of Hope first appeared in 1799; Walter Savage Landor, whose first published poetry dates so far back as 1795; and Samuel Rogers, whose first poetry came out in 1786, and his Pleasures of Memory, in 1792.

In October or November of the same year 1786, in which Rogers, still among us, first made his name known to English readers by 'An Ode to Superstition, with other Poems,' printed at London, in the fashionable quarto size of the day, the press of the obscure country town of Kilmarnock, in Scotland, gave to the world, in an octavo volume, the first edition of the 'Poems, chiefly in the Scottish Dialect' of Robert Burns. A second edition was printed at Edinburgh early in the following year. Burns, born on the 25th of January, 1759, had composed most of the pieces contained in this publication in the two years preceding its appearance: his life—an April day of sunshine and storm—closed on the 21st of July, 1796; and in his last nine or ten years he may have about doubled the original quantity of his printed poetry. He was not quite thirty-seven and a half years old when he died—about a year and three months older than Byron. Burns is the greatest peasant poet that has ever appeared; but his poetry is so remarkable in itself that the circumstances in which it was produced hardly add any thing to our admiration. It is a poetry of very limited compass—not ascending towards any "highest heaven of invention," nor even having much variety of modulation, but yet in its few notes as true and melodious a voice of passion as was ever heard. It is all light and fire. Considering how little the dialect in which he wrote had been trained to the purposes of literature, what Burns has done with it is miraculous. Nothing in Horace, in the way of curious felicity of phrase, excels what we find in the compositions of this Ayrshire ploughman. The words are almost always so apt and full of life, at once so natural and expressive, and so graceful and musical in their animated simplicity, that, were the matter ever so trivial, they would of themselves turn it into poetry. And the same native artistic feeling manifests itself in every thing else. One characteristic that belongs to whatever Burns has written is that, of its kind or in its own way, it is a perfect production. It is perfect in the same sense in which every production of nature is perfect, the humblest weed as well as the proudest flower; and in which, indeed, every true thing whatever is perfect, viewed in reference to its species and purpose. His poetry is, throughout, real emotion melodiously uttered. As such, it is as genuine poetry as was ever written or sung. Not, however, although its chief and best inspiration is passion rather than imagination, that any poetry ever was farther from being a mere Æolian warble addressing itself principally to the nerves. Burns's head was as strong as his heart; his natural sagacity, logical faculty, and judgment were of the first order; no man, of poetical or prosaic temperament, ever had a more substantial intellectual character. And the character of his poetry is like that of the mind and the nature out of which it sprung—instinct with passion, but not less so with power of thought—full of light, as we have said, as well as of fire. More of matter and meaning, in short, in any sense in which the terms may be understood, is in no verses than there is in his. Hence the popularity of the poetry of Burns with all classes of his countrymen—a popularity more universal, probably, than any other writer ever gained, at least so immediately; for his name, we apprehend, had become a household word among all classes in every part of Scotland, even in his own lifetime. Certainly at the present day, unless we are possibly to except some of the more secluded and half-savage dribblets of the population, recent reports of whose moral and intellectual condition have made it doubtful if they always know their own names, that would be a curious Lowland Scotchman, or Scotchwoman either, who should be found never to have heard of the name and fame of Robert Burns, or even to be altogether ignorant of his works. It has happened, however, from this cause that he is not, perhaps, in general estimated by the best of his productions. Nobody, of course, capable of appreciating any of the characteristic qualities of Burns's poetry will ever think of quoting even the best of the few verses he has written in English, as evidence of his poetic genius. In these he is Sampson shorn of his hair and become as any other man. But even such poems as his 'Cotter's Saturday Night,' and his tale of 'Tam o' Shanter,' convey no adequate conception of what is brightest and highest in his poetry. The former is a true and touching description in a quiet and subdued manner, suitable to the subject, but not adapted to bring out much of his illuminating fancy and fusing power of passion: the other is a rapid, animated, and most effective piece of narrative, with some vigorous comedy, and also some scene-painting in a broad, dashing style, but exhibiting hardly more of the peculiar humour of Burns than of his pathos. His Lines to a Mountain Daisy, his Lines to a Mouse, his Address to the Deil, his Death and Dr. Hornbook, his Holy Fair, and many of his more irreverent effusions, are of a far rarer merit—much richer in true poetic sunshine and beauty, as well as of a much more distinctive and original inspiration. His Songs, to be sure, have taken all hearts—and they are the very flame-breath of his own. No truer poetry is any where to be found than these songs of Burns's. Yet they do not resemble the exquisite lyrical snatches with which Shakspeare, and also Beaumont and Fletcher, have sprinkled some of their dramas—enlivening the busy scene and progress of the action as the progress of the wayfarer is enlivened by the voices of birds and the sight and scent of wild flowers that have sprung up by the way-side. The songs of Burns belong rather to the same class with the lyrics of Sappho, and the more impassioned among those of Horace, which are equally utterances of real emotion, expressions of some feeling or aspiration of the poet himself which thus sought and found vent. They are rivulets of melodious fancy poured from the fount of his own heart—his actual mood of mind at the time, whether of sorrow or joy, made vocal and musical. And indeed in all that he has written best, Burns may be said to have given us himself,—the passion or sentiment which swayed or possessed him at the moment,—almost as much as in his songs. In him the poet was the same as the man. He could describe with admirable fidelity and force incidents, scenes, manners, characters, or whatever else, which had fallen within his experience or observation; but he had little proper dramatic imagination, or power of going out of himself into other natures, and, as it were, losing his personality in the creations of his fancy. His blood was too hot, his pulse beat too tumultuously, for that; at least he was during his short life too much the sport both of his own passions and of many other stormy influences to acquire such power of intellectual self-command and self-suppression. What he might have attained to if a longer earthly existence had been granted to him—or a less tempestuous one—who shall say? Both when his genius first blazed out upon the world, and when its light was quenched by death, it seemed as if he had been born or designed to do much more than he had done. Having written what he wrote before his twenty-seventh year, he had doubtless much more additional poetry in him than he gave forth between that date and his death at the age of thirty-seven—poetry which might now have been the world's for ever if that age had been worthy of such a gift of heaven as its glorious poet—if it had not treated him rather like an untamable howling hyæna, that required to be caged and chained, if not absolutely suffocated at once, than as a spirit of divinest song. Never surely did men so put a bushel upon the light, first to hide and at last to extinguish it. As it is, however, the influence of the poetry of Burns upon the popular mind of Scotland must have been immense. And we believe it has been all for good—enlarging, elevating, and refining the national heart, as well as awakening it. The tendency of some things, both in the character of the people and in their peculiar institutions, required such a check or counteraction as was supplied by this frank, generous, reckless poetry, springing so singularly out of the iron-bound Calvinistic Presbyterianism of the country, like the flowing water from the rock in Horeb. What would not such a poet as Burns be worth to the people of the United States of America, if he were to arise among them at this moment? It would be as good as another Declaration of Independence. Nay, what would not such a popular poetry as his be worth in any country, to any people? There is no people whom it would not help to sustain in whatever nobleness of character belonged to them, if it did not more ennoble them. For, whatever there may be to be disapproved of in the licence or indecorum of some things that Burns has written, there is at least nothing mean-souled in his poetry, any more than there was in the man. It is never for a moment even vulgar or low in expression or manner: it is wonderful how a native delicacy of taste and elevation of spirit in the poet have sustained him here, with a dialect so soiled by illiterate lips, and often the most perilous subject. Burns, the peasant, is perhaps the only modern writer of Scotch (not excepting even Sir Walter Scott) who has written it uniformly like a gentleman. Not that his language is not sometimes strong or bold enough, and even, on two or three occasions, coarse; but these momentary outbreaks of a wild levity have never anything in them that can be called base or creeping. On the other hand, some of the most tremulously passionate of his pieces are models of refinement of style. And such as is the poetry of Burns was his life. Even his faults of character and errors of conduct were those of a high nature; and on the whole were more really estimable, as well as more loveable, than the virtues of most other people. Mised he often was, as he has himself said—

By passion driven:
But yet the light that led astray
Was light from heaven.’

This was an age of popular song in England as well as in Scotland: while Burns was in the last years of his life enriching Thomson’s ‘Collection of Original Scottish Airs’ and Johnson’s ‘Musical Museum’ with words for the old airs of his country that have become a part of the being of every Scotsman, Charles Dibdin, like another Tyrtæus, was putting new patriotism into every English heart by his inspiring strains—some of the best of which Tyrtæus never matched; but he will fall more properly to be noticed when we come to speak of what was done in Music during the present period.

In prose literature, although there was book-making enough, not much that has proved enduring was done in England during the last decade and a half of the eighteenth century, at least if we except a few works produced by one or two of the great writers of the preceding period who have been already noticed—such, for instance, as the three last volumes of Gibbon’s History, published in 1788, and Burke’s Reflections and other writings, chiefly on the subject of the French Revolution, which appeared between 1790 and his death in 1797. We may also mention here the publication in 1798, in five volumes 4to., of the first collected edition of the Works of Horace Walpole, comprising, along with other novelties, a volume of his always lively and entertaining and often brilliant Letters, the portion of his writings upon which his fame is probably destined chiefly to rest. His Memoires of the Last Ten Years of the Reign of George II., in two quarto volumes, were not given to the world till 1822.

In the Drama, with activity enough among a crowd of writers, very little was produced in this period that retains its place in our literature. Mrs. Inchbald, Thomas Holcroft, Thomas Morton, John O’Keefe, Charles Dibdin and George Colman the Younger (already mentioned), Francis Reynolds, and Joseph George Holman were the principal writers who supplied the theatres with new pieces; and Holcroft’s Road to Ruin (1792), Morton’s Speed the Plough (1798), Mrs. Inchbald’s Wives as they Were and Maids as they Are (1797), and Colman’s Sylvester Daggerwood, originally entitled New Hay at the Old Market (1795), are all of more or less merit, and retain some popularity. No great comedy however belongs to this time. The tragedies produced were such as Madame D’Arbly’s Edwy and Elgiva, brought out at Drury Lane in 1795, but never printed; Arthur Murphy’s Arminius (1798); Godwin’s Antonio (1801), &c.

In the department of fictitious narrative there was more to boast of. William Godwin, already distinguished by his Enquiry concerning Political Justice, made a great sensation in 1794 by his novel of ‘Things as the Are, or the Adventures of Caleb William,’ a performance still standing almost alone in our literature of that description for earnest, impassioned verisimilitude; and in 1799 the same writer achieved perhaps a still greater triumph by a different application of the same kind of power, in his St. Leon, in which even the supernatural and impossible is invested with the strongest likeness to truth and reality. The Evelina of Miss Frances Burney (afterwards Madame D’Arbly) appeared in 1777; her Cecilia in 1782; her Camilla in 1796. Mrs. Radcliffe (originally Miss Ann Ward) produced within this period her Romance of the Forest and her Mysteries of Udolpho; Mrs. Charlotte Smith (originally Miss Turner) her Romance of Real Life, and several other novels, all of superior merit; Dr. John Moore his Zeluco, his Edward, and his Mordaunt; Mrs. Inchbald, her Simple Story (in 1791). Mrs. Opie (originally Miss Alderson), still living, had also published her first work, her deeply pathetic tale of The Father and Daughter, in 1801; and Miss Edgworth had commenced her brilliant career of fiction by her Belinda in 1801, and her Castle Rackrent in 1802.

In History, if we except the conclusion of Gibbon's Decline and Fall, no work that has any pretensions to be accounted classical appeared during this short period. The first edition of Mitford's History of Greece was published in 1784; another 'History of Ancient Greece,' in two volumes quarto, by Dr. John Gillies, who afterwards succeeded Dr. Robertson as Royal Historiographer for Scotland, appeared in 1786; John Pinkerton published his Dissertation on the Scythians or Goths in 1787, his Inquiry into the History of Scotland preceding the Reign of Malcolm III. (forming an introduction to Lord Hailes's Annals) in 1789, and his History of Scotland from the Accession of the House of Stuart to that of Mary (filling up the interval between Hailes and Robertson) in 1797; all works of research and ingenuity, but of no merit as pieces of composition. The Rev. John Whitaker, who had previously made himself known by his 'History of Manchester,' and his 'Genuine History of the Britons Asserted,' published his 'Mary Queen of Scots Vindicated' in 1787; and many minutiae of the national antiquities were illustrated, in the Archæologia or in separate publications, by Gough, the editor of Camden's Britannia, Dr. Samuel Pegge, and other patient and laborious inquirers. In Biography, historical and literary, besides Boswell's great work, 'The Life of Samuel Johnson,' which first appeared, in two quarto volumes, in 1790, there was Mr. Roscoe's elegant 'Life of Lorenzo de' Medici,' published in 1795. The same writer's 'Life and Pontificate of Leo X.' did not appear till 1805.

Of Criticism and Commentatorship of all kinds there was abundance. At least a brilliant beginning was made in the study of the literature of India and other Eastern countries by a few adventurous inquirers, led by Sir William Jones, whose French version of the Life of Nadir Shah from the Persian appeared in 1770; his Persian Grammar in 1771; his Six Books of Commentaries, in Latin, on the Persian Poetry, in 1774; his translation of the Moallakat from the Arabic in 1783; his translation of the Sanscrit drama of Sacotala in 1790; his translation of the Ordinances of Menu in 1794; and his various disquisitions on the languages, learning, and history of the Oriental nations, printed in the Asiatic Researches, in the early volumes of that publication, begun in 1788. Jones also, besides his poetry already mentioned, and his Essay on the Law of Bailments and one or two other professional tracts, had in 1779 published a translation of the Speeches of Isæus, from the Greek. Other translations from the ancient languages published during this period were that of Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry, by Pye (afterwards poet laureate) in 1788, that of the same work by the Rev. Thomas Twining in 1789, that of Aristotle's Ethics and Politics by Dr. Gillies in 1797, and that of the works of Tacitus by Arthur Murphy in 1793. The immediately preceding period had been illustrated by the learned and ingenious philological speculations of Harris and Monboddo: it was not, indeed, till the year 1792 that the sixth and last volume of Monboddo's 'Origin and Progress of Language' saw the light; meanwhile, the first part of what has proved a much more influential work, Horne Tooke's celebrated 'Diversions of Purley,' appeared in 1786 in an octavo volume, afterwards expanded into a quarto, to which a second was added in 1805. The germ of his system, however, had been stated by Tooke in his Letter to Mr. Dunning, published in 1778. In Latin scholarship, the most remarkable production of this period was perhaps the edition of the work of the Scottish writer William Bellenden, or Bellendenus, entitled De Statu, which appeared anonymously in 1787, with a long and eloquent Latin Preface, loud in its advocacy of the Whig politics and laudation of the Whig leaders of the day, now known to be the composition of the Rev. Dr. Samuel Parr, who had already some years before announced himself in a sermon published under the name of Phileleutherus Norfolciensis, and was for nearly forty years after this date to continue to make considerable noise in the literary world as theologian, critic, Philopatris Varvicensis, &c. Parr was assisted in the preparation of his edition of Bellendenus by his friend Henry Homer, who published some good editions of Horace, Cæsar, and other Latin authors, but died at an early age in 1791. Another reverend politician and classical scholar of this day was Gilbert Wakefield, who, being a dissenter, carried his liberalism both in politics and in divinity considerably farther than Dr. Parr, and was, from his twentieth year till his death in 1801, at the age of forty-five, one of the most restless of writers upon all sorts of subjects. Wakefield published an edition of Virgil's Georgics in 1788; his Silva Critica (a miscellany of Latin notes upon the Sacred Scriptures and other ancient writings) in 1789; and a complete translation of the New Testament in 1792; but his reputation as a scholar, whatever it may be, rests principally upon his work of greatest pretension, his collated and annotated edition of Lucretius, published in 1796 and 1797. He also gave to the world editions of several Greek tragedies, of Bion and Moschus, of Horace, and of Virgil; and among his numerous original works are an unfinished Inquiry into the Opinions of the Fathers concerning the Person of Christ, an Answer to Paine's Age of Reason, a Reply to (Watson) the Bishop of Llandaff's Address to the People of Great Britain (for the publication of which, in 1798, he was brought to trial by the government, and, being convicted of a seditious libel, was imprisoned for two years in Dorchester gaol), and his Memoirs of his Own Life, published in 1795. His Correspondence with Charles Fox was printed after his death. The excellent edition of Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry, which had been prepared by Thomas Tyrwhitt, the admirable editor of Chaucer, before his death in 1786, was brought out at Oxford, from the

Clarendon press, in 1794. In 1795 his edition of the Hecuba of Euripides, which was followed by the Orestes, Phœnissæ, and Medea, crowned the reputation of Richard Porson, who had already given proof of his unrivalled acuteness in his Letters to Archdeacon Travis on the subject of the controverted passage about the three witnesses in the First Epistle of John, published in 1790, and who, in the union of extensive and exact knowledge of the Greek language, probably never had a superior among modern scholars. Porson, upon whom the mantle of the great Bentley seemed to have descended, and who might perhaps have left a name as illustrious as his if unfortunate habits of life had not wasted as well as probably shortened his days, died at the age of forty-nine in 1808. Other active labourers during this period in the department of classical scholarship were Dr. Thomas Randolph, who died Bishop of London in 1813; Dr. Thomas Burgess, the late Bishop of Salisbury; and the late Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Herbert Marsh, whose varied acquirements and literary performances embraced politics, theology, and German and Oriental learning, as well as Greek and Latin. This with the preceding period formed moreover the great age of commentatorship upon Shakspeare, and also upon some other portions of our old poetry. Dr. Johnson's first edition of Shakspeare, in eight volumes, appeared in 1765; George Steevens's edition of the Twenty Old Quartos, in four volumes, in 1766; Edward Capell's edition of all the Plays, in ten volumes, in 1768, but his Notes, in three volumes quarto, not till 1783, two years after the author's death; Sir Thomas Hanmer's in six quartos, in 1771; that by Johnson and Steevens, in ten octavos, in 1773; their second edition in 1778; the Supplement to that edition by Edmund Malone, in two volumes, in 1780; Isaac Reed's first edition (sometimes called the third edition of Johnson and Steevens) in 1786; Malone's first edition, in ten volumes, in 1790; Isaac Reed's second edition, in twenty-one volumes, in 1803; Malone's second, in sixteen volumes, in 1816. We have already mentioned the two volumes on Ireland's forgeries (to the second of which, it may be here stated, an 'Appendix' was added in 1800), published by George Chalmers, the laborious author of many other works, generally written in the most fantastic style, on finance, economical science, and the politics of the day, as well as of various historical and antiquarian compilations, the most important of which, his Life of Mary Queen of Scots, and his Caledonia (unfinished), were published in the next period, as well as the editor of Allan Ramsay, Sir David Lyndsay, and others of our old poets. Following, also, in the path struck out by Warton and Percy, John Pinkerton, Joseph Ritson, David Macpherson, George Ellis, and others investigated, with more or less learning and acuteness, the history of our early poetry, or edited different portions of it.

In Moral Speculation—political, philosophical, and theological, among the principal names belonging to this period of our literature are, besides Burke (our remarks upon whom have been made in the preceding Book), Paine, Godwin, Mary Wolstonecraft, Paley, Bishops Watson, Horsely, and Porteus, Priestley, Price, Dr. Geddes, Dr. Campbell of Aberdeen, Dr. MacKnight of Edinburgh, Dr. Blair, &c. Thomas Paine's three dexterous and smartly-written works, his 'Common Sense,' published in 1776, his 'Rights of Man,' in 1791-2, and his 'Age of Reason,' in 1794-5, have been already animadverted upon in our First Chapter. Mary Wolstonecraft's more declamatory 'Vindication of the Rights of Women' came forth immediately after the First Part of Paine's Rights of Man—not unlike the hollow but imposing thunder of the artillery following the flash. Godwin's more systematic exposition of the new philosophy (not destined ever to grow old), his 'Enquiry concerning Political Justice, and its Influence on general Virtue and Happiness,' appeared in 1793. Bishop Watson, who, besides five volumes of 'Chemical Essays' and a variety of charges, sermons, addresses, and other occasional publications, had defended the cause of religion against the subtle learning of Gibbon in his 'Apology for Christianity' in 1776, twenty years later wrote his 'Apology for the Bible' in answer to the bold ignorance of Paine. All these performances, however, attacks and defences alike, having served each its temporary purpose, are already passed or fast passing away into forgetfulness. Not so with Archdeacon Paley's works: his 'Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy,' published in 1785; his 'Horæ Paulinæ,' in 1790; his 'View of the Evidence of Christianity,' in 1794; and his 'Natural Theology,' in 1802—all of which are characterised by a matureness in the conception, and a care and sterling ability in the execution, that will make it long before they are superseded. Finally, we ought not to omit to notice that the first edition of Mr. Malthus's celebrated 'Essay on the Principle of Population' was published in 1798 in an octavo pamphlet, although it differed hardly more in size than it did in substance from the next edition, expanded into a quarto volume, which appeared in 1803.

In resuming the History of the Fine Arts during the last forty years of the eighteenth century, it is necessary to take up the subject of Architecture from the beginning of that space of time.

The paramount influence exercised by the accomplished Earl of Burlington, during the reign of George II.,* over the professors as well as the patrons of architecture, would scarcely have been conceded to his eminence as an architect, had it not been supported by rank and wealth, and the open and generous spirit with which he encouraged the art he so highly esteemed and so assiduously studied. Lord Burlington, however, took a narrow view of architecture, and in directing his energies against the corruptions which had accumulated upon the classical styles, and of which the works of the contemporary of his earlier years, Vanbrugh, afforded but too many examples for animadversion, he forgot that he was dealing with an art which, uniting usefulness with beauty, and addressing itself to the wants as well as to the tastes of mankind, is essentially influenced by the moral and physical habits of society, and the varied modes of existence which attend the progress of the human race. Whenever a people have shown themselves capable of an original mode of thinking, they have in nothing exerted it more powerfully than in adapting their buildings to their climate, their customs, their religion, and the spirit of their public institutions. Under various combinations of such influences, a perpetual state of transition has ever been an essential condition of the existence of architecture as an art, and at successive periods, both in ancient and modern times, and in different localities, architecture has diverged from a common point of departure into the most distant extremes, and even into the most opposite principles, of taste; and yet each modification may command unqualified applause when judged with reference to the circumstances under which it was produced. This view of the subject was overlooked by Lord Burlington when he transplanted the Villa Capra to the banks of the Thames, and reduced the study of architecture to imitation—a principle which his followers confined within its narrowest limits.†

During the seven centuries which had elapsed from the establishment of the Norman dynasty to the period now under consideration, England had maintained an eminent place among the people of modern Europe in the cultivation of a characteristic national architecture. Throughout the transitions of the middle ages we thought for ourselves, and thought well. The later Gothic architecture of England is national and peculiar, and shows in unrivalled purity and beauty by the side of the depraved contemporary styles of the Continent. We have modes of composition peculiar to ourselves, in the transition which universally accompanied the revival of classical architecture, and the name of Inigo Jones, by whom the change was finally accomplished in England, stands in the first rank of those whose genius has rendered them illustrious in art. The inventive talents of Wren and Vanbrugh, working upon the style which had long proved its fitness, in the hands of original thinkers, to meet every exigency of society, and to assume every characteristic of design, from the sublime to the graceful and gay, maintained to the eighteenth century the claims of England to an independent school of architecture.*

The merits of Vanbrugh were such as neither Burlington, nor the polished literati who supported him in his war against the architect of Blenheim and Castle Howard, were able to appreciate. It has been well observed, that “in the arts there is always to be found room for a man upon whom nature has bestowed the faculty of seeing, feeling, and thinking for himself.” Burlington was not that man—far less so were any of those who adopted his tastes and opinions at secondhand. The English school, as it was constituted at the accession of George III., could devise no correction of the errors of their predecessors but by resorting to crude imitations of Palladio—a recurrence to forms and combinations established under modes of existence totally differing from their own, at another period, and in another climate. Neither their discriminating taste in the selection of the beautiful, nor their profound knowledge of the practice of the Italian schools, can redeem the want of fitness which characterizes their productions, their disregard to the exigencies of our climate, and their inattention to our domestic habits; for in many cases their plans, as well as their elevations, are borrowed from the Italian. The consequences were fatal. They had rooted up a vigorous plant, for an exotic which they wanted skill to naturalize; it perished, therefore, leaving nothing in its place, and another half-century found architecture in England reduced to a condition unprecedented since its first development as an art, devoid of unity, character, and principles.

The description of the far-famed villa at Chiswick, by one of the greatest admirers of the master, will bear a general application to the works of the disciples. “It is a model of taste,” says Walpole, “though not without faults, some of which are occasioned by too strict an adherence to rules and symmetry. Such are too many correspondent doors in spaces too contracted—chimneys between windows, and, what is worse, windows between chimneys—and vestibules, however beautiful, but too little secured from the damps of the climate. The ground apartment is rather a diminutive catacomb than a library in a northern latitude.” The whole school seem, by some strange fatality, to have adopted a mode of the Italian practice the least suited for adaptation to our climate and habits. A large collection of the mansions of the last and present reign, down to the year 1771, may be referred to in the continuation of the 'Vitruvius Britannicus,'* bearing the names of Kent, Leoni,† Paine, Carr, Vardy, Morris, Hiorne, Wright, Ware, Wood, Donowell, Pickford, Leadbetter, Smith, Sanderson, Adam, and Chambers—names now mostly obscure. Out of about forty mansions of the same class represented in this work, the principal floors of three-fourths of the number are raised on basements from two-fifths to one-third of the superstructure in height, the entrance being approached by flights of steps, seldom less than twenty in number, open to all the vicissitudes of the weather; in deference to which there is generally the alternative of creeping into "the diminutive catacomb" below by a door under the steps. The effect of such an arrangement may be observed at the Mansion House in London, which is never appropriated to the especial purpose for which it was built without the erection of a sloping canvas passage to the portico. Sometimes there are the steps without the basement door, and sometimes there is the door without the steps. Inigo Jones has been charged as an authority for these solecisms; but they occur in few of his works. His basements are for the most part of a proportion to form a complete ground-floor, and, if the principal apartment is on a higher level, it is at least approached under cover, and by a staircase, the dignity of which may be a sufficient apology for the trouble of ascending it.

With the exception of the two last, who will claim some more lengthened observations, the most eminent architects in the foregoing list now to be noticed, as belonging to the reign of George III., are James Paine, and John Carr of York. The former seems to have imitated the peculiarities in the style of Kent, and sometimes to have mixed with them the flimsy decoration which was coming into fashion before he quitted the stage; but his most important works do great honour to his abilities. Worksop Manor, in Nottinghamshire, and Keddlestone, in Derbyshire, are in a style of much grandeur. The former was never completed, and the latter is usually assigned to Robert Adam, who carried on the works at a later period; but Paine is entitled to the credit of the magnificent hall of entrance and the principal front. It is impossible not to distinguish his sound Roman style from the gingerbread of his successor. The works of John Carr are extremely numerous. Harewood House is one of his most important productions, and also one of his best. The general characteristic of his style is a certain thinness produced by an effort to be light. Heavy was the grand reproach levelled at Vanbrugh by the Burlington faction, and the pupils were beginning to better the instruction. John Wood, of Bath, was the son of the eminent architect of Prior Park and the Exchange at Bristol, who died in 1754. To the father and son we are in one sense indebted for the modern city of Bath, which is said to have been enlarged to three times its original size from their designs. They built the Crescent, Queen Square, the Parades, &c., in no mean style of street architecture, much favoured by the materials at their command. Hiorne was an artist of great promise, but died young. He built the Sessions House at Warwick. Isaac Ware built Mr. Byng's house near Mims, and Chesterfield House in London. He is better known by the publication of a treatise on architecture, embodying some unpublished works of Inigo Jones.

Conspicuous among his contemporaries for a pure taste and an original mode of treating the Italian style of architecture, appears Sir Robert Taylor.

THE CRESCENT, BATH.

This artist was born in 1714, and began life as a sculptor, but the accession of George III. found him in extensive practice as an architect. About 1785 he completed the most important of his public works, the extension of the Bank of England, which consisted previously of no more than the present centre buildings, erected in 1732 by George Sampson, of whose work the hall is the only part now remaining unaltered; and, with the exceptions of the court-room and the west quadrangle, the additions of his successor are equally to be numbered with the things that have been. The Rotunda, which Taylor first erected, has not been restored for the better, and his plan of the Reduced Annuity Office became the general model in the reconstruction of the building by Sir John Soane, as uniting, in an eminent degree, convenient arrangement, ample light, and good architectural effect. In the Transfer Offices he committed the error by which Gibbs has deformed the interior of St. Martin's Church, profiling the entablatures over single columns supporting arches; and he has generally been considered unhappy in imitating the inclosure of the Belvedere Garden in the Vatican for his exterior. In villa architecture, a style which may be considered to have taken its rise at this period—a circumstance strongly illustrative of the dependence of architecture on the wants of society—Taylor was eminently successful. Previously to this time, country-houses ranking in the class below mansions were something in the style of what Voltaire calls “un château ayant une porte et des fenêtres.” To apply the exterior graces of the Italian casino to moderate dwellings meant for convenience, and not for show, was a novelty. The villa built for Sir Charles Asgill, at Richmond, and Danson, in Kent, for Sir John Boyd, are excellent specimens of the talents of the architect, though the latter has the fault of an inconvenient flight of steps; and in some of his designs of less pretension in the same class he has accomplished the difficult task of uniting a sound architectural character with great simplicity, and of consulting economy without producing the effect of meanness. Of his skill in street architecture, Ely House, in Dover Street, is an example. Sir Robert Taylor died in 1788.

The mention of villas suggests the name of Lancelot Brown, who ruled during this period over landscape gardening, as despotically as Kent in the preceding generation. The park at Blenheim is a lasting monument of Brown's talents in the construction of artificial scenery; but, like most persons who have founded a system, he was apt to mistake its application, and the “belts” and “clumps” with which he and his followers replaced the stately avenues of former days have become a by-word for their monotonous irregularity. His plan in domains of smaller extent—of bringing the pleasure-ground, displaying art without its formality, and nature without its asperities, into immediate connexion with the house—had a reciprocal influence upon the style of that class of mansions to which it was peculiarly adapted. The close approach of the plantation to the building in irregular masses facilitated the arrangement of uniting the principal rooms into a compact corps de logis, and extending the offices in a wing on one side, to be concealed by the trees. This plan, recommended by the advantage of leaving three sides of the house clear of all obstruction, and of not hampering the arrangement or extent of the offices or subordinate apartments by any considerations of symmetry, or by the necessity of condensing them into a basement, soon became general, and was abused in its application through the influence of an increasing taste for economy, where its only effect was to reduce to apparent insignificance mansions important in their real extent. The continuation of the ‘Vitruvius Britannicus’ by Richardson, in which the series of English houses is brought down to 1802, contains many plans thus arranged. A reference to this work, commencing with the original volumes by Campbell, will not only exhibit to the reader the progressive changes in our architecture of this class throughout the whole of the eighteenth century, but the objects selected for illustration will also indicate the prevailing fashion at the date of each successive publication.

Sir William Chambers, who professed the science of planting, attacked Browne, who took upon himself to dabble in architecture, in the preface to his ‘Dissertation on Oriental Gardening,’ published in 1772. The result was, Mason’s ‘Heroic Epistle,’* famous in the literature of art, in which the wild vagaries which the knight propounds as the theory and practice of the Chinese, are cleverly ridiculed, by supposing them Anglicised and carried into execution in the royal gardens at Kew, laid out by Chambers a few years before. As an architect, the name of Sir William Chambers, one of the original founders of the Royal Academy, stands in the first rank. This distinguished artist, on his return from his professional studies in Italy, was introduced on the recommendation of Carr of York as a tutor in architecture to the Prince, afterwards George III. His first considerable work was Lord Besborough’s villa at Roehampton, a building of fine proportions and great purity of detail, though not, like the great majority of his later works, exemplifying strictly his own precept—“that, in providing the elegant and the durable, the comfortable and commodious may be secured.” This golden rule occurs in his ‘Treatise on the Decorative Part of Civil Architecture,’ the most valuable elementary work on the art, so far as it professes to treat upon it, in the English or any other language, in which the author’s intimate knowledge of the productions of the Italian and French schools is wrought into a digest of the practice of the great masters in attaining that harmony and good keeping which essentially characterise their works, and, it may be added, his own. Being promoted to the office of surveyor-general, he commenced in 1776 his great work, Somerset House, “in which,” to borrow the words of Gwilt, “though there be many faults, yet so well did he understand his art, that it is a matter of no small difficulty, and indeed requires hypercriticism, to find anything offensive to good taste in the detail.” The character of the street front is truly palatial; the vestibule of entrance in the highest degree scenic and picturesque, and the proportions and distribution of the quadrangle leave nothing wanting to satisfy both the eye and the judgment. The river front is more liable to exception. The disproportionate height of the terrace is injudiciously aggravated by the introduction of columns, which unduly diminish the order of the superstructure, and the façade of six hundred feet extends in unbroken monotony, while the grove of chimneys is suffered to deform the roof, instead of being called into play to vary the outline. A multiplicity of parts is the chief blame which has fallen on this, as on Chambers's works in general; but, with all its imperfections on its head, Somerset House holds a high place among the public buildings of Europe. Chambers died in 1796. His most distinguished pupil was James Gandon (before named as the editor of the 'Vitruvius Britannicus'), architect of the Parliament House (now the Bank of Ireland), the Four Courts, and other buildings, at Dublin.

We may conclude our account of what may be called the old school of architecture in England with Robert Mylne, the architect of the most beautiful of modern bridges, Blackfriars, commenced in 1760, and completed in eight years—a work unsurpassed by the skill with which the graceful, the classical, and the picturesque are combined in a species of structure to which a knowledge of architecture in its most fundamental and important sense, the union of beauty with utility, has seldom been applied.*

"L'ennui du beau," says the French proverb, "mène au singulier," and the aphorism is no inapt exponent of the new school of architecture which was destined to prevail against the example and precepts of Taylor and Chambers. It might be thought that the various publications which made their appearance soon after the middle of the eighteenth century, revealing to architects treasures of antiquity hitherto unknown, or known but imperfectly, would tend to enlarge the sphere of thought, and stimulate the powers of invention. Wood and Dawkins had surveyed and published the Remains of Palmyra in 1753, and of Baalbec in 1757. In 1762 appeared the first volume of James Stuart's 'Antiquities of Athens,' a work upon which terms of praise might be exhausted, without surpassing the just appreciation of its merits. The 'Ruins of Spalatro' appeared in 1764, from the pencil of Robert Adam, an architect of whom there will be more to say; and a second visit to Greece by Nicolas Revett, the coadjutor of Athenian Stuart, at the cost of the Ionian Antiquities Society; produced the 'Ionian Antiquities' in 1769. Here was a fund of materials which might at once have varied, enriched, and purified our style: but the good seed fell on an ungrateful soil. Wearied by the insipidity of the imitations of the imitators of Palladio, the public taste was by this time bent upon novelty at any price, and Robert Adam, who with the depraved architecture of the dregs of the Roman empire appeared first in the field, was the successful candidate for its applause, which he maintained triumphantly to the end of his career. Robert Adam (his brother, James Adam, is associated with him in his works) had, nevertheless, some of the qualities requisite to form an architect, and his rapid and extensive popularity, which dates from the beginning of the reign of George III., was not destitute of a solid foundation. In the distribution of his plans for convenience and comfort he is unrivalled.

From the fully developed mansion, with its centre and wings, to the London house, where he has to contend with a site four times as deep as the street frontage, his dispositions are masterly; but in the general composition of his elevations we shall seek in vain for anything striking or original, and in their treatment decoratively, including in the application of those terms the orders of architecture, he falls into proportions and profiles which set at defiance the immutable principles of adjustment which have been proved to govern the practice of the ancients, and from which no striking departure has ever been effected with success. An extravagant affectation of lightness has resulted in a meagreness and poverty unexampled in any style pretending to be regular architecture. "Spindle columns, bald capitals, wide intercolumniations and scanty entablatures," says Mr. Payne Knight, alluding to the works of Adam, "form a sort of frippery trimming, fit only to adorn a brick clamp, which is indeed the usual application of them." In his decorations, Adam is lavish of ornament, but so thin and wiry in character, and so ill distributed, that it never produces the effect of richness. His interiors are more to be commended than his elevations. Some of his halls and saloons are well composed for picturesque architectural effect, when they are not marred by the paltry character of the decoration. In the introduction of colour in his ceilings he was especially unhappy.

Adam published his works. The first part appeared in 1768, and in the prefaces to that and the succeeding portions he dwells with much complacency on the influences of his performances on the taste of the day—a claim unfortunately but too well founded. His style had become the fashion, and set the mode not only for houses, but for carriages, plate, picture-frames, and furniture of every description, and all in the same manner of overloaded flimsy ornament. One assumption for which he takes credit to himself may be allowed to him—that he has not "trod in the paths of others, nor derived aid from their labours." "He who resolves never to ransack any mind but his own," says Sir Joshua Reynolds,* "will soon be reduced from mere barrenness to the poorest of all imitations—he will be obliged to imitate himself, and to repeat what he has before repeated." Adam's buildings are in fact as tiresome from their sameness as they are displeasing from the frivolity of their style.

The works of Adam are extremely numerous, not only in England, but in Scotland, his native country. Gosford House, in East Lothian, is an example of his skill in plans;† and the Register Office, in Edinburgh, is in every respect one of his best works. Caen Wood, at Hampstead, contributed much to his reputation, although (perhaps because) it displays as much of his defects as of his merits. The alterations at Sion House‡ are admirably conceived, but no caricature of all his habitual sins against good taste, collected into one focus, could surpass the entrance-gate to the park. In London he effected, on his own speculation, the important improvement of the terrace and buildings of the Adelphi. Portland-place is also from his designs, where he has endeavoured, by excess of width, to produce the grandeur of effect which our habits of building seem to preclude in our streetarchitecture. In the screen at the Admiralty he has surpassed himself. It is a work of great beauty, independently of being remarkable as the only instance in which Adam has adopted a recognised style in the detail, an aberration for which he thinks it necessary to apologize in his book. Let it however be observed, that this work stands an example of the futility of beauty in architecture irrespective of fitness, since the want of convenient access to the court led to its mutilation some years ago. Robert Adam died in 1792.

Another of the family, William Adam, was extensively employed in Scotland. His works may be seen in the 'Vitruvius Scoticus.' They have no trace of the peculiarities of his brothers, nor are they of the Palladian school; but rather in the old French style.

The next influential name in the history of the art in England is that of James Wyatt, who, about the year 1766, entered upon a long and successful career of forty-eight years. His first important work was the Pantheon ball and concert room, in Oxford-street, where he displayed a knowledge of the antique, and an original taste and tact in its adaptation, which at once placed him high in his profession. Never, perhaps, was so great a reputation earned by a first work. The principal room was a noble conception: it has long since perished by fire. The two fronts, that toward Oxford-street much altered, are all that remain of this celebrated building. The works of James Wyatt in general exhibit a lively imagination and a classical feeling; yet his taste was by no means uninfluenced by the passing fashion, which is evidenced* by a certain fanciful treatment of the orders, and a too frequent intrusion of tablets and medallions into his decorations. It is not therefore surprising that his reputation has waned a little. In the dispositions of his plans he was consummately skilful. But James Wyatt's chief claim to a prominent station in the history of art is due to the part he took in the revival of the Gothic style of architecture, which began, before the close of the eighteenth century, to dispute for ascendancy, in the conflict of styles, over the fallen Palladian. The only artist who had hitherto succeeded in understanding even the details of the Gothic style was James Essex, who restored the lantern at Ely cathedral and made considerable repairs at Lincoln. He was also much employed at Cambridge, where his stall-work in King's College Chapel betrays itself; but for the most part his restorations escape notice, which is no small merit. Essex died in 1784. Wyatt took up the Gothic style with a view to reproduce it. He speedily mastered its expression and details, and showed that they were to be acquired, like those of any other style, by the study and measurement of original examples, and by no other means. Of his proficiency thus far the extensive repairs and alterations which he executed in some of the principal colleges at Oxford, before the end of the eighteenth century, afford convincing proofs; but it may be doubted whether he ever understood the broad principles of the Gothic style in its various modifications, as applied to civil, military, and ecclesiastical purposes, however well he may have been acquainted with its individual features. In 1789 he was employed to restore Salisbury cathedral, upon which he proceeded according to his own notions of architectural effect, and of the innate beauty of unity, by reducing the whole edifice, as far as possible, to an empty room, thereby stultifying the architects of the middle ages, who showed their skill in nothing more strikingly than in the gradual and distinct development of the numerous members which constitute the complicated pile of a Gothic cathedral. Remonstrances poured in upon the rash architect and his employers—too late to save the eleven chapels, the two porches, the bell-tower, and the illuminations on the roof and walls, which then and there perished, but happily in time to prevent, it is to be hoped for ever, similar devastation elsewhere. At Fonthill, which he began in 1795, he committed the error of representing an abbey, not as a habitable building combined with a church, but as a house in the shape of a church, and of endeavouring by colossal dimensions alone to produce effects which are unattainable, especially in the Gothic style, without the accompaniment of a fit modification of the proportions and details.

As we must return to the works of James Wyatt in the next Book, it is necessary only to add, in this place, that he was appointed Surveyor-General on the death of Sir William Chambers; and, in the year 1800, made the first step towards restoring Windsor Castle to its original character, which had been nearly obliterated by the alterations of Sir Christopher Wren. The vestibule and staircase to the state apartments, the greater part of which has yielded in its turn to later innovators, were characterized, like his Gothic works in general, by correctness of form and detail, but partook too much of the ecclesiastical style.

In the present day, with the experience of another half-century passed in the study of Gothic (if of nothing else), it is easy for architectural criticism to expatiate on the faults of James Wyatt; but his acquirements will be estimated at their proper value when we recollect how the front of the Guildhall, in London, was Gothicised as late as 1789 by George Dance, who held the office of Surveyor to the City. Dance, however, occupies an honourable place among the architects of the period. Newgate and St. Luke's Hospital will not easily be surpassed in the essential quality of character. He also built the Giltspur-street Compter, and in a more decorative style has left us the Shakspeare, (now the British) Gallery in Pall Mall. Dance was willing, like his contemporaries, to do something new, and devised the expedient of varying his outline by Greek sepulchral ornaments; but he seems to have wanted the imagination necessary to take advantage of his own idea, which was afterwards appropriated with great success by his pupil John Soane. Dance would also appear, from his designs, to have the honour of the invention, once popular, of pilasters without capitals or bases, panelled or fluted like joiner's-work. He has used them in the front of the theatre at Bath.

Although Sir John Soane published a collection of his works as early as 1788, and was appointed Architect to the Bank of England in the same year, yet, as he long stood confessedly at the head of his profession, and exercised a very powerful influence over the arts, in the nineteenth century, the consideration of his public works more properly belongs to the next Book. The publication referred to consists entirely of private dwellings, mostly of the villa class, meagre in style, according to the fashion of the day, and without the slightest trace of that peculiar character by which the architect so remarkably distinguished himself at a later period. The plans, for the most part, exhibit a defect which has since, from notions of economy, become too common—the substitution of a wretched lobby for that characteristic feature of a country-house, the hall: in other respects they are well distributed.

Our review of the history of this branch of the fine arts may be concluded with a notice of some other artists, to whom it will not be necessary to recur.

Of these, Henry Holland was distinguished by the patronage of George Prince of Wales, who prefigured the sort of encouragement the future monarch was likely to bestow upon the arts, by employing him upon that extensive structure of lath and tiles, the Pavilion at Brighton. In 1784 he altered Carlton House, and to him was due the façade, pleasing and harmonious in all its proportions and details, with its beautiful portico, turned to a legitimate purpose by affording shelter for carriages. Holland built Drury-lane Theatre, destroyed by fire in 1809; and the façade and hall of Melbourne House at Whitehall, which remains a memorial of his refined taste. He was likewise the author of the India House, usually attributed to Jupp, who was surveyor to the Company at the time it was built. It is a commonplace design, and the portico ill assorted to the wings; but porticoes were now coming into a vogue which made the propriety or impropriety of their association a matter of no importance. Honourable mention must be made of Freemasons' Hall, erected by Thomas Sandby, Professor of Architecture at the Royal Academy, 1775; and the Italian Opera-House, celebrated among the great theatres of Europe for its elegant form and its acoustic qualities, by Novosielsky, in 1789. To these may be added the Sessions-House at Clerkenwell, by Thomas Rogers, in 1779; and the Trinity-House, by Samuel Wyatt, the brother of James Wyatt, and a close follower of his style, in 1797,—and we shall have noticed most of the public buildings worthy of remark at the close of the present period. As for Church Architecture, it lay in a catalepsy, to wake in an atrophy in the nineteenth century.

We must now look back to the beginning of the reign of George III., to recall the memory of an architect, who, if he executed few plans, left many to be executed, and to make a reputation for others. John Gwynn, who built the Magdalen Bridge at Oxford, published, in 1766, his 'London and Westminster Improved;' in which he has so well considered the topographical defects of the metropolis, and the means of applying remedies to them, that there is scarcely an improvement in our public ways, either effected or proposed during the present century, of which he is not really the author and originator. The opening from the Mansion-House to London Bridge (King William-street) is perhaps the only one not directly suggested by his maps, four of which accompany his book. Passing over his observations on street architecture in general, his proposals for regulating the new quarters then springing up to the north of Oxford-street, and his alarm at the unrestrained increase of the metropolis, it may interest the general reader to compare a few leading points in his plans with what has actually been done or is now in contemplation. The bridge at the Savoy (Waterloo Bridge), with its approaches from the north and south—the removal of Fleet Market, and continuation of the line from Blackfriars Bridge to the North road—the general clearing and widening of the Strand, and the isolation of St. Clement's church—Moorgate-street, the widening of Lothbury, and the formation of squares in Moorfields—the disincumbrance of Westminster Abbey and the erection of a Sessions-House in the open space,—all these are on the plans of John Gwynn. In Regent-street has been carried into effect one of several suggestions, or rather a combination of two of them, for opening communications through the metropolis from north and south; and the collateral improvements in the same quarter, the continuation of Marlborough-street, Jermyn-street, and Charles-street, widening the east-end of Pall Mall, opening St. Martin's Church, and making a square on the site of the King's Mews, are all, with some variations, his designs. So is the continuation of Coventry-street through Leicester-square, the contemplated improvement in the neighbourhood of Bloomsbury, and the clearance about to be made between the Bank and Cornhill to throw open the Exchange. He stigmatizes, with becoming indignation, the disgraceful motives which still perpetuate the nuisance of Smithfield Market, and blames severely the attempts to improve the old London Bridge instead of building a new one; and it does great honour to his sagacity and judgment, that he argues against the apprehensions which then and long after existed, even in the minds of eminent engineers, as to the ill effects which the removal of the dam formed by the old bridge might produce upon the navigation of the river, and which experience has now proved to be unfounded. Gwynn's book has been, and will be for generations to come, a valuable legacy to posterity.

The spirit of nations may be traced in their works of art in all its branches. From the sublime of the Italians to the homely matter-of-fact of the Dutch, the characteristics of the European schools of painting have been impressed upon each by influences as far beyond human control as those which have dictated the progress of the moral and political institutions of the people; and art, whether ancient or modern, has reached its most exalted condition only when it has grown with the growth, and strengthened with the strength, of the state in which it has flourished. It is only in the nineteenth century that the British school of painting has been established on the solid basis of national habits and modes of thinking; but these influences (independently of which no genuine art ever has existed, or ever can exist) have finally triumphed, and, though they have failed in our own case to place art on its loftiest pinnacle, we may be justly proud both of the number and of the excellence of the artists by whom our poetry and history have been illustrated, the changeful effects of our atmosphere and the picturesque antiquities which characterise our landscapes fixed and perpetuated, the incidents of our moral and domestic life brought home to our sympathies, the results of foreign travel and enterprise displayed, and the living forms of the great, the learned, the noble, and the beautiful transmitted to posterity. If the British school of the present day be reproached with following art in its inferior paths only, let it be remembered that its general diffusion, aided by the use of water-colours and the unrivalled school of engravers who have rendered pictorial representation of every class familiar to all ranks, cannot but be calculated to prepare the public mind, for the encouragement of higher efforts, whenever circumstances may be more favourable to their development. That the commercial spirit of the British character enters largely into our actual state of art is not to be denied; and it might perhaps be argued, from past experience of the controlling influences over national styles, that an indigenous school could hardly flourish in Great Britain on any other terms. Whatever theories may be formed on this subject, the fact is certain, that the grand style of art, which neither the precepts of Reynolds, the example of West, nor the enthusiasm of Barry could sustain, repulsed by the Church and hopeless of any other asylum, was enabled, during the last fifteen years of the eighteenth century, to make a final struggle for pre-eminence through the aid of a mercantile speculation; and, although the enterprise failed in the proposed result of establishing that class of painting on a national basis, yet it had the effect of confirming the intimate alliance of Art with Commerce, by which, whether finally for good or evil (and the question has been fiercely debated), it has since been so materially influenced. The foundation of "the Shakspeare Gallery" is an important event in the history of British art.

BOYDELL.

John Boydell, citizen and alderman of London, was bred an engraver, and published his first works about 1746. Although he never attained any eminence in his pursuit, he soon enabled himself, by his industry, to become a publisher of the engravings of others; and he secured in his employment the best artists, whose talents he was well able to appreciate and well inclined to remunerate liberally. The Niobe and Phaëton by Woollet after Wilson, the Liber Veritatis by Earlom, the drawings of Guercino in the Royal Collection by Bartolozzi, and the Houghton Gallery by the same and other eminent engravers, may be mentioned among the important works which were thus brought before the world. It is but justice to the well-known character of this distinguished citizen to believe that he was influenced no less by an enthusiastic desire to fix the national taste on the highest department of painting than by the spirit of trade, when, in 1787, he entered into the plan for an edition of Shakspeare which should carry to perfection the arts of typography and engraving, and display in its illustrations whatever the talents of the historical painters of the English school could produce, under the inspiration of the works of the immortal bard. Sir Joshua Reynolds might be inclined to consider such patronage unsuited to the dignity of high art, and he received the first proposition coldly; but his scruples were overcome, and the list of the painters engaged on the work includes, without exception, every one of whom either the Royal Academy or the nation at large could conceive they had any reason to boast. Never were the talents of artists more fairly put to the test. The subjects to be treated were assuredly worthy to call forth the most strenuous efforts of the mind. The artists were encouraged to paint on any scale which they believed best suited to the development of their powers. The Shakspeare Gallery in Pall Mall was built for the purpose of receiving their works, and exhibiting them to the public; and, in addition to prospects of fame and the consideration which accompanies it, the more solid incentive to exertion was unsparingly administered. The results can hardly be deemed worthy of the occasion and of the preparation; and it is to be observed that, among the new candidates for the honours of the historical and poetical pencil, above a score in number, there are but few who can justly claim any rank in that style of art. The nature of the work, however, admitted of some variety, and we shall have occasion to notice one or two artists of merit, who acquitted themselves honourably in other departments.

To the Shakspeare Gallery Reynolds contributed three pictures—Puck, Macbeth at the Cauldron, and the Death of Cardinal Beaufort. The Puck is the very incarnation of the mischievous spirit, but in the other two subjects it must be admitted there is a want of dignity which it requires all the magic of the artist's colour and execution to redeem. They must both, however, rank as great works. Barry contributed but one—Lear with the dead body of Cordelia. From the pencil of Opie there were five, all strongly marked with the just and forcible expression which he so faithfully transcribed from nature. The Incantation Scene in the Second Part of Henry VI. is the most striking: it is even grand. The bold vigour of Romney was displayed with pre-eminent success in two allegories—Shakspeare nursed by Tragedy and Comedy, and attended by Nature and the Passions; and in the fine figure of Cassandra raving;—the latter inspired, like many others of his pictures of the same class, by the charms of the celebrated Lady

Hamilton, Angelica Kauffman and Wright of Derby contributed each two pictures; the former in her usual tame manner, and the latter in a style remarkable for nothing but the bad taste of the costume. West's Lear in the Storm is a picture well worthy of his reputation: his Ophelia is less satisfactory. Of these artists it is unnecessary to say more; but, in enumerating those who have not come under our observation in a former Book, such particulars will be noticed as may be requisite to convey to the reader some general estimate of their merits or pretensions.

The name of Henry Fuseli undoubtedly claims the first place among those of the historical painters who had risen up in England since the formation of the Royal Academy, and who now put forth their exertions in the Shakspeare Gallery. This extraordinary man was a native of Zurich, and came to England in pursuit of literary distinction in 1763; but he soon felt another vocation, and, after a residence of eight years in Rome, as a votary of the arts, settled himself in London in 1779. An enthusiastic admirer of Michael Angelo, Fuseli possessed powers of imagination, and a feeling for the sublime, which justified his ambition to figure in the highest walks of painting; and it is no profanation of the name of the mighty Florentine to admit that of Fuseli among his followers—a distinction to which no other modern painter can advance a pretension of a claim. His compositions occupy an eminent place in the class to which he aspired. No artist has approached him in the success with which he has embodied the spirit as well as the forms suggested by the pages of Shakspeare and Milton, but as a painter he was too impatient and impetuous to do full justice to his own conceptions. His execution is careless, and he treats colour as if he despised it, although his cold, cadaverous tones are well calculated for the effect of the subjects in which he delighted. His strength lay in those supernatural and shadowy delineations which fixed upon him the soubriquet of "Painter in ordinary to the Devil." The appearance of the Ghost in the first act of Hamlet is one of the sublimest productions of the art: it is, in truth, the "majesty of buried Denmark" which "stalks away." The Witches in Macbeth are fearful; and two scenes from the Midsummer Night's Dream display, beyond all comparison with his fellows, the fertility of his imagination and the vigour of his drawing. In dealing with mere mortal subjects he runs into exaggerated action, his women are apt to be strange specimens of the sex, and he has sometimes scarcely avoided the bounds which separate the sublime from the ridiculous. The "Milton Gallery," which he painted singly in rivalry with the Shakspeare, occupied him from 1791 to 1800. It consisted of forty-seven pictures, and although in some of the subjects the grave majestic solemnity of the poet has been too much for the painter, the series comprehends several of his finest works. The Lazar-House is a high effort of genius; and Satan starting up at the Touch of Ithuriel's Spear, one of the most remarkable of the set; not more for the magnificent characterization of the arch-fiend, than for the grace and beauty which he has unexpectedly thrown over the repose of our first parents. Another of his works which deserves peculiar notice is the Infernal Knight, from Boccaccio's Theodore and Honoria. It has been well said, "that, if ever a spirit visited the earth, it must have appeared to Fuseli." This admirable painter and accomplished scholar died in 1825, Keeper of the Royal Academy and Professor of Painting. His lectures do great honour to his literary abilities.

James Northcote was a pupil of Sir Joshua Reynolds, but devoted himself to the highest style of painting, and produced many meritorious and well-known illustrations of English history. He contributed largely to the Shakspeare Gallery. The scenes of Hubert and Prince Arthur, and the Death of the Princes in Richard III., are works deservedly popular. Northcote's paintings hold a respectable place in their class. It is true that his composition is artificial, his drawing defective, and his colouring opaque, but he has the merit of telling his story well, and has succeeded in the difficult task of uniting in his heads much dignity with strong individuality. Northcote was a member of the Academy, and died at an advanced age in 1831.

William Hamilton and Francis Wheatley were both members of the Royal Academy, but their employment upon the Shakspeare Gallery seems to indicate a dearth of better talent. The latter was a painter of rural and domestic scenes, and in great request as a designer for book-plates, but shows to little advantage in Shakspeare, although the subjects allotted to him are such as are best fitted to the style he professed. Hamilton's compositions are to be noticed only for their uniform insipidity. The Rev. Wm. Peters feebly supported the honours of the Academy and the Shakspeare Gallery, though there is some character in his scenes from the Merry Wives of Windsor. The comic illustrations, however, fell principally to the share of an artist who has done them greater justice, and the humour of Dogberry, Slender, Christopher Sly, and even Falstaff himself, derives a new zest from the visible forms in which these personages have been clothed by Robert Smirke. The Arabian Nights were illustrated by this artist with equal success. Henry Tresham contributed one picture only to this collection. He was esteemed an accomplished artist by his contemporaries, but has left little likely to attract the notice of posterity. Two subjects, in which the landscape is made the principal feature, served to exercise the talent of William Hodges, a pupil of Wilson, whose landscapes will always be distinguished in the English school. Although defective in his forms, and inaccurate in his general design, his execution is masterly and his colouring rich and harmonious. Hodges was appointed draughtsman to the expedition in Cook's second voyage of discovery, and afterwards visited the West Indies, the scenery of which forms the subject of some of his best works.

It would be but an unprofitable task to pursue further the catalogue of the artists engaged in the Shakspeare Gallery, since not even the title of R. A., appertaining to some who remain behind, has served to rescue their names from obscurity even at this short distance of time. Two only must be excepted as having contributed in an eminent degree to the illustration of English literature. The romantic and poetical compositions of Richard Westall and Thomas Stothard have ever been among the most popular of their class for their gracefulness and elegance, though exhibiting very dissimilar modifications of those qualities, and very unequal degrees of merit. The grace of Westall is that of the ballet-master. On the figures of Stothard it sits unaffected and unfelt, the gift of heaven. Westall's skill in grouping and management of light and shade impart a highly agreeable character to his compositions, but his mannerism is wearisome, and nothing can relieve the monotonous repetition of the family likeness which pervades his heads. Even in his illustrations of Milton the same conventional forms appear on the scene, whatever be its character. The compositions of Stothard are not free from the charge of mannerism, but they teem with fancy, variety, taste, and feeling, and truth and nature are the distinguishing marks of his character and expression. He has embellished the pages of literature in every class, feeling the influence of poetry with a congenial mind. His works are innumerable, and confer the highest honour on the British school of design. He has embodied to perfection the exquisite groups of the Decamerone, and the Canterbury Pilgrimage alone might support his claims to a distinguished place in art. His works are mostly small, and those in oil are handled with a simplicity unfitted for expansion. Hence he has added little to his reputation by his large paintings on the staircase at Burleigh. Stothard died in 1834.

It was the intention of Alderman Boydell to have presented the Shakspeare paintings to the public, as a monument of the arts of the eighteenth century and the nucleus of a national gallery. But the French revolutionary war, by cutting off the resources of foreign commerce, injured the fortunes of the munificent citizen to a degree which finally compelled the sale of the pictures. Their dispersion in 1805 may be considered as the final blow to all hopes of establishing a native school of historical art on the grand scale, and the prices which they then commanded, whether the fault lay in the demerits of the artists or the apathy of the public, show how little had been achieved by the efforts of nearly half a century.*

* Reynolds's pictures fetched the largest prices, as might be expected, but the Macbeth, for which Boydell had paid the painter 1000 guineas, produced only 378*l.* Its size was embarrassing. Wes's Lear brought 200 guineas, and all his pictures sold comparatively well. Some of Smirke's brought large prices,—his Seven Ages, 32*l.* After these Northcote and Hodges make the best figure. Tresham's Antony and Cleopatra brought 100*l.* 16*s.* Hamilton's

In the mean time painting flourished in other branches, and artists were rising who were destined to sustain the reputation of the British school, and to open new paths to its progress. The star of Lawrence already shone brightly at the death of Sir Joshua Reynolds, in 1792. But this distinguished painter will be more conveniently noticed in the next Book, and we must turn to those of older reputation, who more properly belong to the present period. Of these, John Hoppner is pre-eminent in portrait, and had secured a considerable share of royal and noble patronage even during the lifetime of Reynolds. His colouring is natural, fresh, and harmonious, his effects of light and shade forcible, and, as he excelled also in landscape, his backgrounds are remarkable for their beauty and taste. In his best works, as in the Sleeping Nymph, formerly in the collection of Lord de-Tabley, he is scarcely surpassed by any master in the delicacy and truth of the flesh-tints. Hoppner contributed a picture to the Shakspeare Gallery. A few of the portraits of William Owen rank high for their vigorous style of colouring, but he is extremely unequal, and always drew feebly. He was, most successful in female heads. Sir William Beechey cannot be classed very high as a painter, but he was fortunate enough to obtain a large share of royal patronage, and the subjects of some of his works, as the equestrian group of George III. and his elder sons, now at Hampton Court, secured their popularity through the medium of the graver. The list of portrait-painters may be concluded with the names of Richard Cosway and Ozias Humphry, who carried the art of miniature to great perfection, and infused into that style much of the higher qualities of art. They were both accomplished draughtsmen and fine colourists.

George Morland is one of those sons of genius who vindicate the claims of his country to indigenous talent in the arts. Engaged in the practice of painting from early youth, Morland had neither opportunity nor inclination for academical study; but he knew the extent of his own powers, and confined himself to the representation of objects demanding little skill in drawing and little combination of effect. As a painter of domestic animals and the humble scenes of rustic life he has seldom been excelled. Pigs, sheep, asses, shaggy ponies—the common incidents of English scenery—the barn-door, the pond, the hedge, the clay bank—in these and similar subjects the works of Morland may claim companionship with those of any artist of any school, for their perfect truth to nature, and their original and appropriate mode of treatment. Morland unhappily closed a dissolute life at the age of forty, in 1804.

The name of James Philip de Louthembourg, a native of Strasbourg, who settled in England at this period, and became a member of the Academy, must not be omitted. He was a painter of battles sea-pieces, and landscapes with figures and cattle. He possessed a great talent for composition and superior facility of pencil, but his colouring is sometimes meretricious, and want of breadth is his prevailing fault. The works of Louthembourg tell best in the engravings. Those of Lord Howe's Victory and the Siege of Valenciennes are well known. He died in 1812.

The present notice may be concluded with the mention of two Scottish painters of talent—David Allan and Sir Henry Raeburn, who may be considered the founders of a resident school of art in their own country. The former established himself at Edinburgh in 1780, and took the direction of the Academy in that metropolis. He died in 1796. The latter was an eminent portrait-painter, who returned from Italy in 1787, and lived to receive the honour of knighthood on the visit of his majesty George IV. to Scotland. He was also a member of the Royal Academy.

In the art of sculpture the reputation of the British school was raised to an eminent pitch during the latter part of the eighteenth-century, by Banks, Nollekens, Bacon, and Flaxman.

BANKS.

Upon few mortals has the gift of genius been more unequivocally bestowed than upon Thomas Banks. Born in 1735, he was pursuing his studies at a period when the art throughout Europe was still under the influence of the school of Bernini, and when there was not in existence a sculptor from whom he could have derived the pure taste which characterizes even the earliest of his works.* At the opening of the Royal Academy his models attracted immediate notice, and Sir Joshua Reynolds pronounced him the first English sculptor who had produced works of classic grace. It was not until 1772 that he visited Italy at the expense of the Academy. On his return to England he found himself anticipated by Bacon and Nollekens in the favour of the public, and in the tardy patronage which the government was at last inclined to bestow on the arts, in the shape of commissions for public cenotaphs; and, with a talent which threw all rivalry into the shade until the appearance of Flaxman, he took refuge among the Russians from the indifference of his contemporaries. He soon, however, discovered the base metal in the composition of those lacquered barbarians, and was content to devote the remainder of his life to his own country. The first work he produced on his return to England was the noble statue of Achilles now in the hall of the British Gallery.

* According to Allan Cunningham, he studied under Kent; but Kent died in 1748, when Banks was but thirteen years of age. He is believed to have been a carver in wood, and certainly excelled in handling that material, though of course he seldom practised upon it.

With an original mind for beauty and expression in sculpture worthy an ancient Greek, it is unfortunate that Banks lacked invention to carry him with success through his laudable endeavours to introduce a more poetic feeling into our monumental sculpture. In seeking an adaptation of Greek form and sentiment to the purpose of commemorating the valour and genius of our own days, he has only accompanied his contemporaries into the dreary mazes of allegory. To the use of personification in art, if judiciously regulated, there can be no objection: it has been employed, sometimes in better taste, sometimes in worse, throughout the whole range of modern sculpture; but never has the resource been so abused as in the ambitious groups of the English school. "These medley works," says Allan Cunningham, speaking of our public cenotaphs, "like mixed metaphors, are manufactured on every public occasion; and, when the commissioners of national monuments demand designs, fifteen out of twenty of the rival sketches are sure to be of this nature. It is no uncommon thing to see a man standing on a monument in regimentals; his Genius, as large as himself, on one side; his Wisdom comforting him, in the shape of Minerva, on the other; and his Valour busy in the battle-field with his sword and buckler." The application of this picture is but too universal, and the works of Banks are no exception to its truth. The monuments of Sir Eyre Coote in Westminster Abbey, and of Captains Westcott and Burgess in St. Paul's, have each its full-grown Victory, raising a trophy, bestowing a crown, and presenting a sword. In the latter the artist has avoided the reproach of the costume by representing the English naval commander in a state of nudity.

With all allowance for this prevailing fault, the merits of Banks as an artist are of the highest class. The Achilles already referred to is perhaps, without exception, the finest heroic statue in the whole range of modern art. The Falling Giant in the Royal Academy condenses into a small compass the grandeur of the antique, and the Indian on the monument of Sir Eyre Coote has ever been the admiration of all competent judges of art, for its fine proportion and expression, and its perfect anatomy. The relief of Thetis and her Nymphs rising from the Sea is well known through the medium of plaster casts, and is a model of grace both in composition and form; and the monument to the daughter of Sir Brooke Boothby, a sleeping child, is perfect in nature and pathos. Banks also executed the relief of Shakspeare supported by Painting and Poetry on the front of the British Gallery.

The estimation in which Banks was held in his lifetime, as compared with artists in every way inferior to him in power, is a reflection upon the taste of his country, and even down to the present day the reproach is by no means wiped off. His merits were such as his rivals could not approach; his faults he had with them in common, and they have had their influence in reducing them and him to the same level. The fault may not, however, be entirely on one side. The observation in a former Book, on the neglect of the spirit of his age and nation which characterized Barry, is not without its application to Banks. "I wish," says Cunningham, "that Banks had turned from the poetry of Greece to that of England, and found subjects in the works of Spenser, Shakspeare, or Milton. He might not even then have become, in the usual sense of the word, popular, but he would have attained a wider approbation, and left works behind him sure of forming the delight of some tasteful generation yet unborn." Banks died in 1805, and this brief notice may be summed up with the words of his monumental inscription in Westminster Abbey:—

"In memory of Thomas Banks, Esq., R.A., sculptor, whose superior abilities in his profession added a lustre to the arts of his country, and whose character as a man reflected honour on human nature."

Next in seniority to Banks comes Joseph Nollekens, who, with scarcely the rudiments of general education, attained eminence in the art by dint of a close study of nature, corrected by an innate feeling for the beauty of the antique. In early youth Nollekens studied under Scheemakers. In 1759 and 1760 he gained three premiums at the Society of Arts, and in the latter year proceeded to Rome, where Garrick sat to him for his first bust. In the eternal city he was encouraged by the liberal patronage of his countrymen to remain for ten years. On his return to England his marble portraiture maintained a long rivalry with the canvases of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and it is upon his busts that his fame will rest. In that department of the art none of his contemporaries contested his pre-eminence. The treatment of his heads is peculiarly his own, and yet entirely free from the vice of mannerism. "They are unaffected and elegant. There is no attempt to raise ordinary heads into the regions of the heroic, nor to give even eminent mortals the looks of gods. The best are simple without weakness, and serene without austerity. In woman he took beauty as he found it, and of man he gave the mind, and no more, which was spread visibly before him. There is little dignity, but much truth—sometimes mechanic vigour—never exaggeration."*

* Allan Cunningham, Life of Nollekens.

His monuments and poetical statues are also numerous. Destitute of imagination and sentiment, it cannot be supposed that the former contribute much to his reputation. His cenotaph to the three commanders who fell in Rodney's action is composed on the received principle. "His heathen progeny," says Cunningham, "differs in nothing from the accredited forms." In monuments of a more domestic character he has sometimes been more successful. That to Mrs. Howard of Corby Castle may be considered one of the best works of its class. His poetic sculptures, among which are to be reckoned several varieties of the nymph and Venus tribe, are everything that careful study and mechanical skill can effect; but to pass these boundaries, destitute of a poetical mind and ignorant of the classics, Nollekens was incapable. He became a royal academician in 1772, and died in 1823, at the age of eighty-six.

BACON.

John Bacon, far less gifted than his contemporary Banks, was, like him, indebted to himself for his education as a sculptor. His début in the arts was as a maker of the shepherdesses in long stays and high-heeled shoes, and other figures of the like class, which it was then the fashion to execute in coloured porcelain; but, at the age of nineteen, inspired, as it is said, by the works of the artists who sent their clay models to the manufactory to be baked, he had qualified himself to obtain a premium from the Society of Arts. He afterwards became the principal modeller for Coade's artificial stone, and contributed greatly by his talents to the reputation of that manufacture. In 1766 he gained the first gold medal awarded for sculpture by the Royal Academy. His statue of Mars, in the possession of the Society of Arts, although its rank is but that of a clever academical model, obtained for him not merely the gold medal of that institution, but also the patronage of the Archbishop of York, Dr. Markham, through whose influence he was employed to execute a marble bust of the king; and his success in this undertaking opened to him a road to fame and fortune, of which he was not slow to take advantage. He was shortly afterwards intrusted with the monument of Chatham, in Guildhall, and in 1780, "but a few years removed from the time when he was an obscure labourer in the manufactory of Coade, his reputation had spread through the land, his works had found their way into cathedrals, collections, and galleries, and he had become a member of the Royal Academy and the companion of princes and peers."^{*}

Worldly wisdom and the art of rising formed a considerable ingredient in the talent of Bacon. He never risked a check to his full tide of success by quitting his native land in search of improvement, nor interrupted the gainful pursuit of chiselling monuments for the barren reputation to be won by that of the heroic and poetical. In his great monuments, of which he obtained his full share in competition with his fellow-artists, he affected a style which dispensed with the severe study necessary for the attainment of the high class of sculpture, and was calculated to lead by the shortest path to immediate popularity and profit; he sought the picturesque—a style which cannot be considered legitimate in sculpture. To this end he heaped up allegorical figures, possessing, indeed, the merit of telling their own meaning, but confused with redundant action and superfluous draperies. The monument to Chatham, before mentioned, is one of the most striking examples of his peculiar style of composition. His full-length portraits are of a much higher order of merit, and he may be suspected of sinning against conviction in his other works, when we find that it was upon them he rested his hopes of future fame. The characteristics of Bacon as a sculptor cannot be better summed up than in the words of Allan Cunningham:—"Bacon felt where his strength lay, when he said his statues were his best works. He infused more good English sense into his sculptures than any preceding artist. Having little imagination, he willingly welcomed those figures which Spenser calls 'dark conceits,' because they came without study or meditation. His style of sculpture was, with the exception of his single statues, decidedly of that kind called the picturesque. The result of the whole is sometimes magnificent. The figures are well placed and commanding; the auxiliary symbols are scattered with profuse liberality; and the workmanship is ever neat, skilful, and elaborate. But a man can only infuse genius into his works in proportion as he possesses it himself, and the genius of Bacon is not of a high order. There is much external grace and lavish prettiness; but we have few of those bright shapes and vivid sentiments which denote the hand of the inspired master. The manufacturer of images in a pottery is visible in many of his works; a good shape and interesting posture alone are aimed at. His natural strength exerted itself and shook off the fetters imposed by this sort of education, whenever he was commissioned to make a statue of one whom he had familiarly known. He placed, as it were, the images, mental and bodily, of Johnson and Howard before him, and thought of them alone till he had finished his work; this is sufficiently visible in those fine statues:—there, all is original and unborrowed."

Besides the monuments already incidentally noticed, Bacon executed those to Lord Halifax, in Chatham, and to the Captains who fell in the victory of the 1st of June, in Westminster Abbey, and the statue of Sir William Jones, in St. Paul's; the monument to Mrs. Draper, in Bristol Cathedral, is also his work, and added much to his reputation. Among his other works are the bronze group in the court of Somerset House, and the stone figures on the front; the statues of the founder of Guy's Hospital, of Judge Blackstone for All Souls College, Oxford, and Henry VI. for Eton. In the works of Bacon a progression may be distinctly traced in compliance with the changing taste of the period. He had none of the intuitive feeling of Banks for the pure and severe, and his early monumental works are tinged strongly with the fashion of the old school. Bacon died in 1799.

FLAXMAN.

John Flaxman was born in 1755, twenty years after Banks, and came before the public as an artist at a period when he could add to an intuitive perception of the great and graceful, at least equal to that of his senior, the advantages arising from the general appreciation of the forms of Greek art, and the inquiries into its principles and practice, which had followed the publication of Stuart's Athens. There are few biographies in art more interesting than that of this distinguished Englishman. His father was a modeller, and dealer in plaster figures, in humble circumstances. Condemned by physical infirmities to bodily inactivity during the first years of his life, John Flaxman was, from his infancy, thrown for occupation and amusement upon the resources of a mind in the highest degree studious, contemplative, and pious, and his pursuits were determined so early by the influence of the objects in the midst of which he passed his days, and an intense love of reading, that even in his childhood he had felt the inspiration of the Greek poets, and made his first attempts to embody their characters and descriptions. At the age of fifteen, when he became a student of the Royal Academy, he had already secured patrons by the merit of his juvenile sketches. He had no opportunity of visiting Italy until 1787, having then earned a high distinction through several of those private monuments which rank not only among the most successful of his own works, but also among the finest productions of modern sculpture. It was a principle with Flaxman, "that the Christian religion presents personages and subjects no less favourable to painting and sculpture than the ancient classics;" and well has he supported his dictum by the works in which the Christian virtues of the dead are commemorated by sculptured illustrations of the poetical and divine sentiments of the Old and New Testaments, conceived and executed not merely with the pure outlines of the Greek form, but with the deep intellectual power of the Greek mind. Flaxman would willingly have dedicated his talents to works of morality and devotion; and, although it was not possible for him to accomplish this purpose to its full extent, he yet did much, and it is in this class of art especially that his works are beyond all praise.

During his sojourn in Rome, Flaxman produced those compositions which have conferred upon him the widest reputation ever achieved by a British sculptor. The dissemination of the engravings after his illustrations of Homer, Æschylus, Dante, and Hesiod is coextensive with the knowledge of the fine arts. "He has penetrated into the Iliad and Odyssey," says an able critic, in reference to these works, "with a far deeper sense of the majesty of Homer than his great contemporary Canova, who dedicated his whole life to the renovation of the antique; but, indeed, he never failed to catch the peculiar inspiration of whatever poet his fancy selected for illustration. We own the groupes at once as the offspring of Homer, Æschylus, or Dante."* One of the compositions from Hesiod, the groupe of Mercury conveying Pandora from Heaven to Earth, with which he was himself so well satisfied that he modelled it in relieve, has elicited even from English apathy a tribute to its surpassing beauty. It is sometimes seen as a decoration upon the walls of our dwelling-houses.

The reputation with which Flaxman returned to his own country secured to him the execution of several public monuments; but in this class of art his success, with one splendid exception, has been by no means equal to that which attended his religious and poetical compositions, to which he has never failed to impart a purity and simplicity, united with a vigour of sentiment, unrivalled in modern sculpture. In commemorating our naval and military heroes he has been driven to allegory, which has nothing to distinguish it from the allegory of inferior artists. Victory, History, and Britannia mingle in familiar juxtaposition with the personages they are assembled to celebrate, and, as it is admitted that the sculptor was deficient in the mechanical processes necessary for handling large statues in marble, these works have in general added but little to his renown. In one work of this class he has, however, distanced all competition—the monument to Lord Mansfield in Westminster Abbey—for which he received the commission while yet in Italy, and which was the first work he executed on his return. The judge is seated in a curule chair, raised on a pedestal supported by the figures of Wisdom and Justice; behind is a Genius, emblematical of Death. The general composition of this design, calculated to be viewed on all sides, may challenge criticism; the individual statues are of the highest class, and the judicial costume of the principal figure furnishes a proof of the power of genius to defy the most formidable extrinsic difficulties. The treatment of the allegorical figures is unexceptionable. They occupy their proper subordinate station, and can never be mistaken for the wife and children of the person commemorated.* When Banks saw this monument he said, "This little man cuts us all out."

In his early days Flaxman contributed much to the diffusion of a classical taste by the assistance he lent to Wedgwood, who rendered common in our households the purest forms and ornaments of Greek pottery. The rotation of the wheel of fashion has condemned Wedgwood's ware to oblivion, and the exquisite reliefs of Flaxman, which once circulated unheeded among the million, are now objects of research.

ciated, there is a commensurate appreciation of the genius of Flaxman. Rome itself is proud to adopt him, and in the modern additions to the museum of the Vatican a composition of Flaxman's occupies a conspicuous place in the sculptural decoration. The application of this test to his native country will argue little feeling even for the honour of having produced him. We talk much of art and of the means of raising its character. "Appreciate high art, and it will be produced," is the argument on one side.—"Produce high art, and it will be appreciated," is the proposition sustained in answer. Let not the fact be overlooked, that the compositions by which Flaxman has illustrated the Lord's Prayer have been placed in vain within the reach of the multitude, who have flocked to admire the stone images of Tam o'Shanter and Souter Johnny, and to gaze with enthusiasm on their worsted stockings.

Flaxman became a member of the Royal Academy in 1797. In 1810 he was appointed professor of sculpture. His lectures, which are published, are a valuable addition to the literature of art. The greater part of Flaxman's public works belong to the nineteenth century. His Shield of Achilles, modelled for Messrs. Rundell and Bridge, and executed both in gold and silver, was produced in 1818. He died in 1826.

From the latter years of the eighteenth century may be dated that revolution in the condition of Engraving which is one of the most remarkable effects of the establishment of an English school of art. During the whole of its previous history, the higher kind of engraving had been considered as the handmaid of painting, and as the means of multiplying such productions of the pencil as might be worthy of that distinction, either from their excellence as works of art, or from their popular qualities, as in the case of portraits and contemporary history. Hence the best works of the most eminent engravers consisted, for the most part, of single plates, which were esteemed not merely for the mechanical skill they might exhibit, but were also valued in proportion to the fidelity with which they transmitted the mind and spirit of the original masters. Occasionally a series of illustrations might be produced with all the luxury of art, but in providing works of the graver for general circulation there was seldom found a medium between those of the highest class and the wretched book-plates to which reference has been made in a former Book. In the present day, the demand of the public taste for illustrated works has raised the supply both in quantity and quality (the phrases of trade are strictly appropriate) to a pitch hitherto unprecedented. The invention of steel plates has left no temptation to practise in any style inferior to line engraving. The quality of effect, at once the beauty and the vice of the modern English school, is not difficult of transference. The use of mechanical processes insures clearness and precision; and the joint labours of the draughtsman, the engraver, and the bookseller manufacture and circulate throughout the country, by tens of thousands, engravings superior to any which existed previously to the last twenty years of the eighteenth century, except in the portfolios of the few and fastidious. It is not to be doubted that the speculations of Alderman Boydell contributed greatly to this general diffusion of works of engraving; but he was preceded by another, publisher, Harrison, whose voluminous editions of the British classics and novels, with the names of Stothard for the designs and James Heath and Angus for the engraving, among those who contributed to the illustrations, took the lead, with Bell's British Poets, in providing a superior class of book-plates for general circulation. Boydell's Shakspeare and Milton followed, rivalled by Macklin's Bible, and accompanied by a host of publications less ambitious in their pretensions, and therefore more perfect in their degree. As a specimen of the English school of engraving, the Boydell Shakspeare must be pronounced a failure. It is principally executed in the inferior and now exploded style of dot engraving, which had been introduced from France by William Ryland, and unfortunately adopted and brought into fashion by Bartolozzi, under the temptation of its greater facility and rapidity of execution, qualities not to be overlooked in a publishing speculation so extensive as the Shakspeare. Much as this style was then in vogue, it has conferred little reputation on any of those by whom it was practised. Peter Simon, one of the numerous French artists entertained by Boydell, Caroline Watson, Antony Cardon, B. Smith, Ryder, Scriven, and Holl, may be particularized. The last mentioned is remarkable for his skill in the then fashionable style of imitating chalk drawings. Caroline Watson also excelled in mezzotint.

In the superior department of line-engraving, the English school may assert, during this period, an indisputable superiority over all others. The works of William Sharpe rank among the finest which ever proceeded from the graver. His style is distinguished for its beautiful tooling, both of the flesh and the drapery. The Doctors of the Church after Guido, and the portrait of John Hunter after Reynolds, have never been surpassed. John Sherwin was a pupil of Bartolozzi, and has the credit of engraving the Clytie, one of the finest works bearing the name of the master. His Death of Lord Robert Manners, and some of the plates in the large illustrations to Cook's Voyages, especially the portrait of the Sandwich Island Girl, may also be cited as specimens of the highest ability. James Fittler is remarkable for the neatness of his execution, without losing in finish any of the higher qualities of art. He engraved much after Louthembourg, and many of the plates in Macklin's Bible are from his hand. James Heath engraved innumerable book-plates in a very superior style, and likewise produced large engravings of the highest merit. Among these are the Death of Major Pierson, the Drowned Fisherman, the Dead Soldier, and the Riots of London after Wheatley. Heath is greatly esteemed among artists for his technical skill in handling white drapery. Anker Smith was also an excellent artist, and, in conjunction with J. Neagle, engraved many plates after Fuseli. Wilson Lowry excelled in architecture and machinery. He invented an instrument by which he carried the engraving of geometrical subjects of this description, plans, maps, &c., to a degree of precision never before attained. His engravings for scientific works are well known. Lowry's instrument was improved at a later period by his pupil Turrell, and in the present day its use has crept into picturesque engraving, doubtless to the advantage of a clear and minute style, but to the total destruction of all the feeling and freedom essential to the constitution of a real work of art. John Scott excelled in animals. He executed a work on sporting-dogs, another on horses, and several large plates after Snyders with great success. Louis Schiavonetti, a native of Bassano, who studied in England under Bartolozzi, may be named in this place, although his best works were executed subsequently. He engraved the Cartoon of Pisa after Michael Angelo, and the plates to Blair's Grave after the designs of Blake. His last work was the etching of Stothard's Canterbury Pilgrimage. The names of Parker, Collyer, Legat, and Stow may be added as artists of great merit.

The landscape line-engravers of this period are also numerous and excellent. At the head of this class stands Samuel Middiman, and the landscape with the Wounded Stag (in As You Like It), in the Boydell Shakspeare, is a fine example of his talents. He executed a set of sixty-nine views of picturesque English scenery, to meet the growing popular demand for engravings of a superior class. James Watts and William Angus are each the author of a series of views of noblemen's and gentlemen's seats in the same style. The former executed the architecture with peculiar neatness. Thomas Milton engraved a set of views in Ireland: he was also an excellent engraver of natural history, and did the plates for Cotton's edition of Buffon, and at a later period many in the same class in Rees's Encyclopedia. Pouncey is distinguished for the superior handling of his trees, Peake by the brightness and clearness of his effects, and Taylor for his skill in etching. To the list of the popular works of the period may be added an extensive series of landscape engravings from the drawings of Paul Sandby, on which the best artists were employed.

In mezzotint engravings the credit of the English school was ably supported by Earlom, B. Smith, Faber, Ryder, Peltro, Say, Turner, and Reynolds. Richard Earlom confessedly stands at the head of this branch of the art. His two flower-pieces after Van Huysum are beyond all rivalry. He also engraved the Liber Veritatis with a profound feeling of the original. Samuel Reynolds is the father of the present school of mezzotint engraving both in England and France. He introduced the practice of varying the surface and texture of mezzotint by a mixture of etching, which has latterly been carried to such great perfection in the hands of Cousins and Lucas. William Westall, Sutherland, Medland, Stadler, and William and Thomas Daniell, practised at this time in aquatint (a style in which there is no medium between the very good and the very bad) with a success which ranks them high among engravers. William Daniell was in fact an eminent landscape painter and Member of the Royal Academy, but he is best known by the aquatint engravings from his own Views in India, and the Oriental Field-sports, in which he applied the art to printing in colours, and has produced the most satisfactory imitations of water-colour drawings in the style then practised. Sutherland and Westall also excelled in the difficult mechanical process of adapting the grain of aquatint to the various distances and surfaces of the picture.

The name of William Blake has been reserved to the last place, as that of an artist forming a class by himself. He should perhaps be rated among painters, as he engraved exclusively from his own designs, which exhibit a power of imagination scarcely surpassed by that of Fuseli. But it is not denied that this vigorous mind was diseased, and, as he was either deficient in the technical skill necessary to make his engravings acceptable to the public, or indulged his own speculations in the style he adopted, his works will for ever remain "caviare to the multitude," who look at their surface only. To those who penetrate more deeply, they possess, especially his illustrations of the Book of Job, the elements of the sublime.

It would be easy to extend to a greater length the list of the English engravers of this period; but such is the general proficiency which appears throughout their productions, that, with much to commend in each, they would be as difficult to discriminate as the strong Gyas from the strong Cloanthus. Attention to middle-tint and variety of surface, powerful indication of colour, and freedom from that metallic glare in the lights which disfigures the best modern French engravings, are the high qualities of the English school, and the characteristics which distinguish it from all its contemporaries.

The coinage of the reign of George III., down to the end of the nineteenth century, is, with reference to art, one of the most disgraceful productions of any mint in modern times. The decline of the Roman empire can exhibit little worse than the silver coinages of 1778 and 1787. It was not until 1797 that the copper pence struck for the government by Messrs. Boulton and Watt at Soho exhibited a better feeling for art.

The history of Wood-Engraving in this country, down to the present period, has been traced in the preceding Book,* where the commencement of its revival under Thomas Bewick is recorded. Probably no single work effected so much in rendering the long-neglected art popular, and in restoring it to a suitable place among those denominated the fine arts, as the celebrated volume on the Natural History of Quadrupeds, published by Bewick, in connexion with his partner and former master, Mr. Beilby, in 1790. Even the literary merits of this work, the simple and agreeable style of which also made the science of zoology more popular than it had been before, are sufficient to entitle it to respect; but its great charm consisted in the spirited and generally accurate cuts of the animals described, and in the amusing vignettes freely interspersed as tail-pieces, the designs or conceptions of which display as much the quaint humour of Bewick, who, to adopt the language of one of his admirers, gave "a moral in every tail-piece—a sermon in every vignette," as their execution does credit to his artistic skill. Mr. Beilby's assistance was rendered chiefly in collecting and arranging materials for the literary portion of the work, but even in this department Bewick himself took part. So popular did the work immediately become, that second and third editions were called for in 1791 and 1792; and its sterling value occasioned a continued demand, notwithstanding a great increase of price; the demy octavo copies of the first edition, 1500 in number, having been sold at 8s., while those of the eighth edition, published in 1825, were charged a guinea. The tail-pieces, which lend such a peculiar charm to the work, were much more sparingly introduced in the first than in the subsequent editions. The great success of this work induced Bewick, in 1791, to commence a similar one on British Birds, of which the first volume, embracing the land birds, appeared in 1797; the descriptions in this, as in the 'Quadrupeds,' being chiefly written by Mr. Beilby, whose partnership with Bewick was shortly afterwards dissolved. The second volume, containing the water-birds, was therefore written, as well as illustrated, by Bewick. Its publication, which took place in 1804, "formed," observes Mr. Chatto,† "the keystone of Bewick's fame as a designer and engraver on wood; for, though the cuts are not superior to those of the first, they are not excelled, or indeed equalled, by any that he afterwards executed."

† Treatise on Wood Engraving, with Illustrations by John Jackson, p. 581. To this valuable and beautiful work we are indebted for most of the facts in the above notice of the art on which it treats.

John Bewick, the younger brother and pupil of Thomas, left Newcastle-upon-Tyne and settled in London about the year 1790, where he executed woodcuts to illustrate several works, the best being those published in a thin quarto volume of 'Poems by Goldsmith and Parnell,' issued by Bulmer from the Shakespeare Press, in 1795; a work which, according to the advertisement prefixed, was "meant to combine the various beauties of printing, type-founding, engraving, and paper-making; as well with a view to ascertain the near approach to perfection which those arts have attained in this country, as to invite a fair competition with the best typographical productions of other nations." This volume, which contains only the 'Traveller' and the 'Deserted Village,' by Goldsmith, and the 'Hermit' of Parnell, excited the interest of George III. so strongly, that he desired to inspect the blocks from which the illustrations were printed, which were accordingly laid before him by Mr. George Nicol. While, however, their beauty is said to have excited the incredulity of his majesty, until he was convinced that they were really printed from wood, by the actual inspection of the blocks, these illustrations, which are in a free and effective style, are only remarkable as specimens of wood-engraving at a time when it had fallen into a very low state. Both of the Bewicks, Robert Johnson, an artist who drew, but did not himself engrave, on wood, and Charlton Nesbit, an engraver who long held an elevated position among the professors of this art, were engaged upon the above work, which was followed, in the succeeding year, by a similar edition of Somerville's 'Chase,' with illustrations designed by John Bewick, who died December 5, 1795, and engraved principally by his brother.

Two wood-engravings of this period claim special notice as indications of a desire to apply the revived art to the production of prints of a more ambitious character than those used as illustrations to books. The first of these is an engraving executed by Thomas Bewick about the year 1789, of one of the wild oxen kept in Chillingham Park, of the then unusual size of nearly eight inches by five inches and a half, independent of an ornamental border by which it was surrounded. Owing to the carelessness of the printers, the block split after a few impressions were taken (one of which is preserved in the collection of George III., now in the British Museum), but some years afterwards it was repaired. Though this engraving has been called Bewick's masterpiece, it is by no means equal in execution to some of the small cuts in the 'British Birds.' The other engraving referred to is a view of the church of St. Nicholas, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, about fifteen inches long and twelve inches high, drawn by Robert Johnson, and engraved by Charlton Nesbit, an impression of which may also be seen in the British Museum. This large engraving was executed upon twelve pieces of box-wood, cramped together, and mounted on a plate of cast iron; and it was published in 1799. For this engraving Mr. Nesbit received a silver palette from the Society of Arts in 1798; and in 1802 he was again rewarded by the Society for engravings on wood.*

The Commemoration of Handel in 1784 completely revived in England that taste for Music which had been almost extinguished nearly a century and a half before, during the age of Puritanism, and was but very slowly returning when it received this fresh and powerful stimulus, the immediate effect of which may in some degree be estimated by the comparative results of the triennial musical festivals at Birmingham in 1781 and 1784. The profits of the former year amounted to only 140*l.*, of the latter to upwards of 700*l.* In 1802 they had by a gradual increase reached the sum of 2380*l.*† The performances in Westminster Abbey were annually repeated till 1789, the band being enlarged every year till it reached the prodigious number of 1000. They were then suspended on account of the king's illness, but resumed in 1790, and were given one more season, when they were finally discontinued, the French revolution and the agitated state of the country indisposing the public mind for such tranquil enjoyments on so large a scale.

The Ancient Concerts, however, were carried on with great spirit, and not only kept alive but more widely diffused that taste for the grand and sublime in music to which the performances in the Abbey may be said to have given a second birth. The royal family never ceased to attend these concerts regularly, till the state of the king's health rendered his seclusion necessary; and the royal patronage brought with it, as a sure consequence, that of many families of the highest rank in the kingdom. But the bulk of the fashionable world are doomed to suffer a continual thirst for novelty: hence other concerts, in which new compositions were the chief attraction, and formed the principal feature, were established, and all met with support while they were fresh, and able to furnish a supply of that aliment which a morbid appetite demanded. Among these were the 'Pantheon Concerts' and the 'Professional Concerts;' the former held in a beautiful building which was afterwards destroyed by fire in 1792, the latter in the Hanover-square Rooms. These, offering scarcely any but ephemeral productions, had their short-lived day, and left only the bare record of their existence.

The year 1791 makes another era in the musical history of this country. Salomon, a very distinguished violinist, then instituted those concerts, known by his name, for which the twelve grand symphonies of Haydn were composed. No new orchestral music of a high order had been produced here since the time of Handel, except some few of Haydn's earlier works, all of which, however, departed widely from the old style, and many of which were as remarkable for effect as for originality. But his last twelve symphonies as far excel all his other works of the same class, as his earlier ones surpassed those of all preceding composers. That they might be heard for the first time under every advantage, the composer himself came to London in the above-named year, and also in 1794, to superintend their performance in person. Indeed some of them were composed in the British metropolis, and all were completed here; we may therefore at least claim the merit of having caused the production of works which have exalted the art, are listened to with admiration in every part of the civilized world, and will last while music has power to charm. In 1792 Harrison, the celebrated tenor, and the elder Knyvett,* commenced the 'Vocal Concerts,' consisting of glees, songs, &c., with a bare piano-forte accompaniment. Bartleman, the eminent base, and Greatorex,† joined afterwards in the management of these performances, for which several of our best glees were composed. They became the resort of the fashionable world, and during many years were very successful. Some very good and well-attended subscription concerts were also given in the great room of the King's Theatre during the seasons of 1795 and three following years.

The King's Theatre, or Italian Opera, continued to be well supported by the upper classes. Sometimes well and sometimes ill conducted, it proved either the source of considerable profit or loss to the managers. But during the present period many excellent operas and some of the greatest singers that Europe ever produced were heard on this stage. Among the former were Paisiello's Molinara, Barbiere, Elfrida, and Nina; Gluck's Ifigenia in Tauride, Orfeo, and Alceste; Sacchini's Evelina; Gretry's Zemira ed Azor; Sarti's Giulio Sabino; and Martini's Cosa Rara. Of the latter were Mesdames Mara, Banti, Billington, and Signora Storce; Signors Pacchierotti, Tenucci, Rubinelli, and Marchesi (sopranos); Viganoni, Rovedino, and Morelli, and Mr. Braham. The theatre was destroyed by fire in 1789, and rebuilt the following year, but not opened for operas till 1792, in consequence of a dispute between the Lord Chamberlain and the proprietors. In the interim, the Pantheon, fitted up for the purpose, was converted into an opposition opera-house; and this was, in 1792, burnt to the ground.

The increasing love of music was nowhere more discernible than in our national theatres. Opera, which, during the early portion of the present reign, was treated as a mere accessory, and only admitted for the sake of variety, now began to assume a much more important character, and to divide, with tragedy and comedy, the favour of the town. The composers for the English stage who most distinguished themselves were Arnold,‡

Shield,* and Storce. For beautiful melody, and for judgment in setting poetry to music, the two first will always be admired. The Castle of Andalusia, Incle and Yarico, The Surrender of Calais, and The Mountaineers of Arnold, and the Rosina, The Poor Soldier, The Woodman, and The Farmer, of Shield, are composed of materials of so durable a nature that they never can be worn out, though capricious fashion may for a while lay them aside. Stephen Storce combined the foreign with the English schools, and made invaluable additions to our stock of dramatic music. His Haunted Tower, No Song No Supper, Pirates, Iron Chest, Mahmoud, together with a portion of The Siege of Belgrade and Lodoiska, will secure to him a lasting place in musical history; and, had he not died at so early an age, when his genius was just beginning to display its full power, it is probable that he would have stood foremost among the greatest musicians of any time or country.† As connected with the stage, Charles Dibdin belongs to a former period; but as a true representative of the bards of old—as poet, composer, and singer—this is the place in which he claims to be noticed. Of ancient bards, our only knowledge is derived from vague tradition; but of Dibdin we do know, and may assert, without fear of contradiction, that no poet of modern times ever operated more powerfully upon a whole people than he did; that no musician ever excelled him in sweetness of melody, and just adaptation of sound to sense; and that no singer ever rivalled him in the effect he gave to his own patriotic and spirit-stirring productions.‡

That social and delightful species of music which may be said to be indigenous to the British isles, the Glee, had many able cultivators in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Two already mentioned, Webbe and Danby,§ still continued to labour in the same field, and were joined by younger candidates for fame, among whom the names of Callcott,|| Stevens,¶ and Spofforth stand conspicuous; and a large proportion of their numerous compositions maintain their high ground in the public estimation, without incurring the slightest risk of ever losing it. Callcott gained many prize-medals from the Catch-Club, and the two others whom we have named with him received more than once the same acknowledgment of their talents. That club continued to flourish, though, from the enormous † Storce was born in London in 1763, and died in 1795. His father was a Neapolitan, long engaged as a performer in our theatres. His mother was an Englishwoman: so we may justly claim this highly endowed composer as a Briton.

‡ This distinguished poet-musician was born at Southampton in 1745, and died in 1814. It is with pain we add, that he, to whom even the glory of our navy may be in some degree ascribed, was allowed to breathe his last amidst all the inconveniences of poverty!—See Harmonicon, vol. ii. p. 65.

In 1787 the GLEE-CLUB was established on the plan of the Catch-Club, inasmuch as it consisted of subscribing and professional, or honorary, members, who met at dinner periodically, and passed the evening in the enjoyment of that vocal harmony from which the society derived its name. But the meetings, instead of taking place weekly, were limited to twelve in the season, and no prizes were offered; consequently the expense incurred was far less than in the elder club, and the members, though of high respectability, were not necessarily chosen from the most wealthy classes.*

Of the sacred music to which the present period gave birth, The Shunamite Woman, an oratorio by Dr. Arnold, was repeatedly performed and universally approved; though, not being printed, we can only speak of its merits on the authority of contemporary hearers and writers. Dr. John Clark (who afterwards took the name of Whitfield) † published two volumes of Services and Anthems, which prove him to have been an excellent musician of the most orthodox school. The official composers of the Chapel Royal ‡ continued to perform the duties of their office with ability and zeal, as the choir-books will testify: but for want of that encouragement which was once given by deans and chapters, when they were comparatively poor, to composers for the church, but withheld when those reverend bodies became rich, this most important branch of the art stood still during the general advance; and much that was written remained in manuscript from the fear, not unreasonably entertained by the authors, of the risk incurred by publishing. But a well-digested book of psalmody, by Dr. Miller, of Doncaster, appeared, and was immediately adopted by nearly every parochial congregation in the kingdom. The claim of this work to notice is founded on its having directed public attention to the subject, and thus proving the source of that improvement in the service which has ever since been gradually advancing.

The far-famed musical celebrations in Westminster Abbey, to which we have repeatedly adverted, drew the attention of foreign artists to this country, and a number of performers of the first rank sought our shores. Those of the vocal kind have already been mentioned. Of instrumentalists, Dussek and Steibelt who long reside in London, contributed much to the improvement of all performers on the piano-forte. † But in this branch we owe still more to Muzio Clementi and John Cramer, both of whom were denizens, and may morally be considered as natives, of Great Britain; for the one came to us when only ten years of age, and passed a long life in our island, and the other arrived in his infancy, and has made this his country by adoption. These names lead us to speak of the instrument which called forth their best powers—an instrument now to be found in the house of nearly every one who is not destined to live by bodily labour—the Piano-Forte.

About the time when the present portion of our history commences, the harpsichord was in general use, but the instrument destined to supersede and finally annihilate it was, though in an infant state, making some progress. The great superiority of the piano-forte, even in its early stage, became so undeniable, that the older professors were obliged either to confess its advantages or tacitly submit to its introduction. Shudi, a German, settled in London, was one of the most famous harpsichord-makers of the day. His daughter married John Broadwood, a native of Scotland, who at first joined his father-in-law in business; but his acute mind soon enabled him to perceive that the old instrument was rapidly approaching deposition, and that the reign of the new one was on the eve of commencing. Enterprising and active, he speedily resolved to employ all his ability, which was of a high order, in the manufacture of piano-fortes; and, aided by unwearied industry and undeviating perseverance—sustained, too, by a character for the strictest probity, which he maintained unsullied during a long life—he brought to perfection an instrument, in the able construction of which he had no rival, by which he honourably amassed a noble fortune, and left a name to his successors that is every where known and respected, and a business which enables the firm of ‘Broadwood and Sons’ to rank with the first commercial houses in the world.

Oratorios continued to be given at Drury Lane Theatre, under the management of Mr. Linley and Dr. Arnold; and Covent Garden Theatre soon entered into competition with a concern which originated with Handel himself, and had been regularly transmitted to the above proprietors. A few of the least known of the great master’s oratorios were, during two or three seasons, given by the directors of the Ancient Concerts, at the Tottenham Street Rooms, which were regularly attended by the royal family. All these contributed their share towards the propagation of the art, the advance of which was evident in all parts of the two kingdoms.

* Among the original subscribing members of this club were, Dr. Arnold (President); Dr. Bever, the civilian; the Rev. James Hinckes; T. S. Dupuis, Esq. (afterwards Mus. Doc.); Charles Wright, Esq., Secretary of the Admiralty; Dr. Ayrton; James Heselstine, Esq., of Doctors’ Commons; Thomas Linley (sen.), Esq.; Theodore Aylward, Esq.; Luffman Atterbury, Esq.; Giffin Wilson, Esq.; Matthew Raine, D. D.; E. G. Boldero, Esq., &c.

Among the honorary members were Messrs. Samuel Webbe, J. W. Callcott (afterwards Mus. Doc.), James Bartleman, Samuel Harrison, and S. Webbe, jun. The club met at first at the houses of the members, and this ‘wandering’ state is alluded to in the glee, ‘Glorious Apollo,’ written and composed for the club by Mr. Webbe, after it had chosen a fixed place of meeting.

† Professor of Music to the University of Cambridge. He was author also of much popular vocal music. He died in 1836.

CHAPTER VI.

THE HISTORY OF MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

THE time which elapsed between the recognition of American independence and the peace of Amiens was too brief to admit of any of those glaring changes in national customs and manners which catch the eyes of the most unobservant; but, to those who observe more minutely, this period is interesting on account of the great alteration which was silently being brought about, amid the tempestuous political discussions which diverted attention from it.

The court continued domestic in its habits, homely almost in its tastes. The Diary of Madame D'Arblay, who at the commencement of this period was a personal attendant of the queen, has thrown considerable light upon the pursuits and etiquette of the circle immediately surrounding royalty. The king was illiterate; he relished neither poetry nor science. His patronage of the arts of design was little more than an exercise of his strong self-will. For music alone of all the fine arts can he be said to have had a taste, and it was with him a passion. He was a keen sportsman, an enthusiastic farmer, a great gossip. His narrow-minded but sincere piety kept him strictly decorous in regard to social morals; and his strong sense of kingly dignity prevented his gossiping habits from being carried to an extent that would, as in the case of James I., have rendered the wearer of the crown ridiculous. The queen's character has scarcely had justice done to it. Her letter to the King of Prussia when quite a girl, indicates a vein of romance in her character. She had a taste for literature and science, and indulged in it. Bryant was a favourite; De Luc was her constant attendant—"the queen's philosopher," as the Duke of Clarence called him: she chose the author of Evelina for her bedchamber-woman; and, when that lady retired on account of ill health, her successor was a niece of the celebrated Jacobi. The queen was fond of being read to, and of reading aloud herself; and De Luc's 'Lettres Physiques et Morales,' which were addressed to her, convey a favourable idea of her tastes and intelligence. But her education as daughter of the poor prince of an inconsiderable territory had impressed her with views of economy which, however praiseworthy they might have been in a private individual, were a vice in a queen; and through force of habit they grew stronger as she advanced in years. She considered it her duty as a wife and a subject to acquiesce implicitly in the tastes and opinions of her husband, and she exerted a will as powerful and pertinacious as his own to render this obedience perfect. The entire union of two such strong-willed, decorous, and narrow-minded characters gave the tone at court. Save for particular favourites and immediate attendants of royalty it was not easily accessible. The king and queen were frequent in their attendance at church, the theatres, and other public places; levees and drawing-rooms were duly held, and on these occasions of exhibition all the formality and state of the preceding reigns were kept up. But the royal pair had a different character when they laid aside their robes of state; when the crowd was shut out they were plain, even parsimonious, in their domestic economy. Their household differed only from that of any wealthy nobleman in the almost Spanish stiffness with which the characters of king and queen were never for a moment laid aside.

Perhaps no line of conduct could have done more to secure the throne at that epoch. The domestic and unostentatious habits of the king and queen flattered the middle class; their exclusiveness kept their homely court as much an object of distant awe as a more gorgeous one could have been; and their severe decorum contrasted favourably with the licentiousness of foreign courts, and the equal licentiousness of the democratic leaders of France, in the eyes of the British people, in whom the rival efforts of the dissenters and Wesleyans had kept alive or rather re-created a strong admixture of puritanism. The deportment of the king and queen was something so new in crowned heads, that at the commencement of the reign it rather occasioned coldness and dislike on the part of the people. But as it became an old familiar thing men were at last reconciled to it. The convulsions of France induced the timid and the quiet to cling more closely to the throne. And, lastly, the awful visitation of mental obscurity with which the king was visited, blending compassion with other feelings, rendered the royal pair eminently popular. Two of the many instances of this popularity recorded by Madame d'Arblay will serve to indicate the fervent loyalty of the people (from which the influence of the court over the imitative propensities of men may be inferred), and also the taste and intelligence of the masses at that time.

In July, 1789, Madame d'Arblay, then in attendance on the queen, followed the court to Weymouth:—"His majesty is in delightful health. The loyalty of all this place is excessive: they have dressed out every street with labels of 'God save the king;' all the shops have it over their doors; all the children wear it in their caps; all the labourers in their hats; and all the sailors in their voices, for they never approach the house without shouting it aloud, nor see the king or his shadow without beginning to huzza, and going on into three cheers. The bathing-machines make it their motto over all the windows; and those bathers who belong to the royal dippers wear it in bandeaus on their bonnets to go into the sea, and have it again in large letters round their waists to encounter the waves. Flannel dresses tucked up, and no shoes or stockings, with bandeaus and girdles, have a most singular appearance; and when first I surprised these loyal nymphs it was with some difficulty I kept my features in order. Nor is this all. Think but of the surprise of his majesty, when, the first time of bathing, he had no sooner popped his royal head under water than a band of music, concealed in a neighbouring machine, struck up 'God save great George our king.'" In August, 1791, the same lady, after resigning her appointment about the queen's person, visited Sidmouth, and there gleaned from the life of the poorer classes their feelings and conduct in 1789. "A poor woman said 'she had holiday enough upon the king's recovery, for there was such a holiday then, as the like was not in all England. A baker-woman baked 110 penny-loaves for the poor; the gentry roasted a bullock whole; we had a sermon made us all cry.' They had 'the king drawn and dressed up all in gold and laurels, and put him in a coach and eight horses, and carried him about; and all the grand gentlemen in the town came in their own carriages to join.' And they had the finest band of music in all England, singing 'God save the king;' and every soul joined in the chorus, and all 'not so much because he was a king, but because they said he was such a worthy gentleman, and the like of him was never known in this realm before; so we all subscribed for the illuminations for that reason—some one shilling, some one guinea, and some a penny—for no one begrudged it as a was such a worthy person.'"

The higher aristocracy began about this time to withdraw themselves more and more from the public eye. The old houses kept aloof from the numerous new creations, and nourished, in the quiet way which becomes a country with a tolerably strong police, their old family feuds. Mixing less frankly than formerly with the public, they did not associate with each other, but every family groupe maintained a kind of isolated state. The external badges of rank were in a great measure laid aside as inconsistent with the prevailing tone of society. The great wealth of the nobility, their influence as legislators, and occupants of administrative posts in the provinces, rendered them still powerful; and this withdrawing in a manner from public observation when democratic views were rife rendered them less obnoxious. The domesticity of the nobles, like that of the king, preserved their influence at that crisis. It at the same time served to strengthen an unostentatious citizenlike deportment, and citizen standard of morality among all the easy classes, which, from various causes, was rapidly spreading through society.

The representatives of the gay and courtly circles of former days still occupied a large space in the public eye, but, being now something apart from the court and the old nobility, they were more objects of wonder than of imitation. A few members of the great families—some so long accustomed to dissipation that they could not accommodate themselves to the tone of the new world, some young and light-hearted and carried away by their volatile spirits—were to be found among them. But the mass of this circle was composed of the wearers of new titles, the rich parvenus, the busy political intriguers, and such other notoriety. A good deal of the coarseness and licentiousness which had characterised the fashionables of the preceding generation still clung to this class, though even in them it was held in check by the growing decorum of general society, and the increased daring of the personalities of the press and print-shop. The alien temper of the court had the effect of making opposition politics to a great extent fashionable with this gay class. The appetite for pleasure, and aversion to control, natural to youth, rendered this kind of society attractive to the young princes. The injudicious severity of their parents for a time converted this difference of tastes into an overt rebellion. The fashionable world rejoiced to increase its influence by enlisting into its ranks the heir of the throne and his brothers. The political roués played a double game; they identified themselves with fashionable follies at once as a matter of taste and in the hope that it would ingratiate them with the future monarch.

Among those who lent a charm to this circle by their wit and talents the most prominent perhaps at this time were Fox and Sheridan. Burke and Windham seceded on account of their political differences during the period now under review. But the most dazzling figure of the group was the accomplished, high-spirited, beautiful, and daring Duchess of Devonshire.* Madame D'Arblay, by no means partial to any thing or person not in fa-

your at court, describes the impression made upon her by this lady at two visits—one in the month of August, 1791: "I did not find so much beauty in her as I expected, notwithstanding the variation of account; but I found far more of manner, politeness, and gentle quiet. She seems by nature to possess the highest animal spirits, but she appeared to me not happy. I thought she looked oppressed within, though there is a native cheerfulness about her which I fancy scarce ever deserts her. There is in her face, especially when she speaks, a sweetness of goodhumour and obligingness that seem to be the natural and instinctive qualities of her disposition; joined to an openness of countenance that announces her endowed by nature with a character intended wholly for honesty, fairness, and good purposes." In the September immediately following, "I now saw the duchess far more easy and lively in her spirits, and consequently far more lovely in her person. Vivacity is so much her characteristic that her style of beauty requires it indispensable; the beauty, indeed, dies away without it. I now saw how her fame for personal charms had been obtained; the expression of her smiles is so very sweet, and has an ingenuousness and openness so singular that, taken in these moments, not the most rigid critic could deny the justice of her personal celebrity. She was quite gay, easy, and charming; indeed the last epithet might have been coined for her." A strange groupe clustered around this being, meant by nature for something better than a mere queen of fashion. On a footing of equality were such characters as the masculine-minded scheming Duchess of Gordon, and the Countess of Buckinghamshire divided between private theatricals and faro. The present is the latest period at which habitual high play notoriously retained a footing in the private houses of the nobility. The caricatures of Gilray record its latest devotees among the females of fashion. But the more prosaic annals of the police-office also tell their tale:—"11th March, 1797. At the police-office in Marlborough-street, Lady Buckinghamshire, Lady E. Luttrell, and Mrs. Sturt, were convicted before N. Conant and T. Robinson, Esqs., in the penalty of 50*l.* each for playing at the game of faro; and Henry Martindale was convicted in the sum of 200*l.* for keeping the faro-table in Lady Buckinghamshire's house. The witnesses were two ci-devant servants of Lady Buckinghamshire. There were informations against Mr. Carcannon and O'Byrne for similar offences. Both the defendants paid the penalty."* Some remarks made by Lord Kenyon in summing up a case in 1796 have been quoted as a proof that gaming among the upper classes was on the increase at this time. The words were, "Gaming is prevalent among the highest ranks of society, who have set the example to their inferiors, and who, it seems, are too great for the law;" and "If any prosecutions are fairly brought before me and the parties are convicted, whatever may be their rank or station in the country, be they the highest ladies in the land, they shall certainly exhibit themselves in the pillory." There was quite as much of the courtier as the austere judge in these remarks, for not only was the vice denounced discountenanced at court, but the circle to which it was confined—small in proportion to that of gamblers in any previous age—were personally distasteful to the king and queen, and on the other hand unpopular with the general public. The speech was merely one among many proofs that society had grown ashamed of the vice, that its hold on men was weakened. At comparatively humble distance, and in character still more remote from the better natures, like the Duchess of Devonshire, who lent a grace to this gay circle, were the last examples of a class who, under the last of the Stuarts and even the first Georges, had brazened it at court. A ludicrous example of their tastes and pursuits occurs in a newspaper paragraph of 1802, connected with a name which, however unworthily, will live as long as that of one of Britain's most cherished heroes. "8th March, 1802. The epicures are probably to be gratified by Lady Hamilton as much as antiquarians have been by Sir William's researches in Italy, by her reviving an ancient dainty. In the manifest of the 'Shelburne,' Captain Happs, from Sicily and Mahon, entered at the custom-house, there appears a case of sow's udders, a present for Lady Hamilton." Lady Hamilton's first appearance before the British public was about the year 1783, when in the employment of Graham, the famous quack, she, as "Hebe Vestina, delivered a lecture from the electrical throne of health in London."

The motley classes composing the gay world had their influence on the tone of society weakened by their being out of favour at court. On the other hand, it was undermined by the operation of two widely different principles, which conspired to spread the pursuits and standard of morals, hitherto deemed characteristic of citizens, upwards into the ranks of aristocracy. The devotional character of Methodism had become much sobered among its wealthier professors, and had assumed a more practical turn. Mrs. Hannah More's writings and Mrs. Trimmer's Sunday-schools were a consequence of this change. These ladies were countenanced by the court originally from pure sympathy with their views and feelings. In 1790 Mrs. Trimmer was honoured by the queen with an interview at Windsor. Congenial tastes and the approbation of royalty confirmed the loyal sentiments of this portion of the religious public, and at the same time rendered them fashionable. The political influence of Wilberforce and others of their leaders made them powerful. Their example, their conversation and writings, raised the standard of public decorum, and spread the taste for domestic pursuits, or affectation of it, recommended by the example of this court. This fashion was not, however, confined to the court party;

one of the most amiable examples of this class was the mother of the dashing Duchess of Devonshire, a lady whose pursuits and whose character, both in its strength and weakness, have been truly and pleasingly drawn by Madame D'Arblay. "Lady Spencer"—the date is 1791—"named with much regard Miss Trimmer, eldest daughter of the exceedingly worthy Mrs. Trimmer, with a regard that seemed quite affectionate. She told me that this young lady had the care of the young Lady Cavendishes, but was in every respect treated as one of themselves. The name of Mrs. Trimmer led us to the Sunday-schools and schools of industry. They are both in a very flourishing state at Bath, and Lady Spencer has taken one school under her own immediate patronage. On Sunday she sent me a message upstairs to say she would take me to the Sunday-school if I felt well enough to desire it. . . . It was a most interesting sight, such a number of poor innocent children all put in a way of right, most taken immediately from every way of wrong, lifting up their little hands to heaven, and joining in those prayers for mercy and grace, which, even if they understood not, must at least impress them with a general idea of religion, a dread of evil and a love of good. . . . Lady Spencer is a sensible and sagacious character, intelligent, polite, and agreeable; and she spends her life in such exercises of active charity and zeal, that she would be one of the most exemplary women of rank of the age had she less of show in her exertions and more of forbearance in publishing them. My dear oracle [Mrs. Delany], however, once said, vain-glory must not be despised or discouraged when it operated but as a human engine for great or good ends."

The other principle alluded to as actively contributing to diffuse the homely citizen tone through society, was the universally prevalent taste for mechanical inquiries and pursuits. That portion of the Memoirs of Richard Lovell Edgeworth which was written by himself contains the most graphic picture of its influence. Common intellectual tastes formed a bond of union between the gentry who, like Edgeworth, were passionately fond of mechanics, or, like Sir John Sinclair, of agriculture, and the wealthier plodding manufacturers and agriculturists. Day, Darwin, Priestley, and others, who combined speculative views in morals with a taste for mechanical science, struck out a moral and political creed which became common both to the aristocratical and democratical sections of this class, and promoted their fusion. Under such influence were moulded the opinions, tastes, and habits of a third section of society, equally distinct from the decorous loyalists who took their tone from the court, and the roués and demireps of the liberal aristocratical school, the last representatives of the courtiers of the reigns of Charles and Anne. The old puritan party was the nucleus of this section, and its leanings were more or less decidedly republican: it affected the views and manners of the French Girondists. In politics the allies of the gay party opposed to the court, in morals sympathising with the court party, they could blend with neither.

The progress of events in France contributed by external pressure to combine these heterogeneous elements into one general conventional system of exclusively English manners. The staid citizens were startled by the fierce revolutionary energies of France, and sought refuge from them by clinging to the throne. The more timid of the opposition party of the aristocracy followed a similar course. A strongly pronounced sentiment of nationality was found to be the most conducive to harmony among the new allies. The emigrants who flocked from France were received coldly in the domestic circles of England. The gay libertinism of the old courtiers was repulsive to the prudery of the English court. The most moderate of the liberal nobility were shunned because they were looked upon as having helped to bring about the revolution. The emigrants who, like Talleyrand and Madame de Genlis, were identified with its excesses, were publicly insulted. French royalists, constitutionalists, and Jacobins found themselves alike under the ban of English society. With the exception of a few political leaders and the mass of the suffering and discontented, the insular exclusiveness of John Bull was exaggerated to a pitch it had never previously attained.

Some idea of the extent to which the isolation of the exceptional parties was carried may be formed from the close of a letter from Dr. Burney to his daughter, written in the end of January, 1793, a few days after the arrival of the news of the execution of Louis XVI.:—"At the club (the Literary Club), on Tuesday, the fullest I ever knew, consisting of fifteen members, fourteen seemed all or one mind, and full of reflections on the late transactions in France; but, when about half the company were assembled, who should come in but Charles Fox! There were already three or four bishops arrived, hardly one of whom, I believe, could look at him without horror. After the first bow and cold salutation, the conversation stood still for several minutes. During dinner Mr. Windham and Burke, jun. came in, who were obliged to sit at a side-table. All were boutonnés, and not a word of the martyred king, or politics of any kind was mentioned; and, though the company was chiefly composed of the most eloquent and loquacious men in the kingdom, the conversation was the dullest and most uninteresting I ever remember, at this or any such large meeting. Mr. Windham and Fox, civil—young Burke and he never spoke; the Bishop of Peterborough as sulky as the devil; the Bishop of Salisbury, more a man of the world, very cheerful; the Bishop of Dromore frightened as much as a barn-door fowl at the sight of a fox; Bishop Marlow preserved his usual pleasant countenance. Stevens in the chair; the Duke of Leeds on his right, and Fox on his left, said not a word. Lords Ossory and

It became the fashion to look down upon every other land as worthless; the conventional domestic morals and manners of Britain were esteemed perfect and alone in the world. Apprehensions of invasion, which brought the whole of the upper and middle classes under arms, lent strength and energy to this feeling. The awkward citizen soldiers were then and still are laughed at. The ignorant contempt entertained for other nations has justly drawn upon the English nationality of that day many a piercing arrow of sarcasm. The prevailing tone of morality was eminently sectarian, narrow, and unelevated. But there was an energy in the people which has rendered it respected; and in its higher and more widely-spread tone of domestic purity, in its humane regard for the poor, the ignorant, and even the criminal, and in its chivalrous martial spirit there was much that entitled it to respect. In this new tone of national manners the most discordant ingredients were fused into a harmonious whole—the affected homeliness of the modern republican, the quietism of the Moravian, and the martial loyalty of the cavalier.

The public amusements of the period were scarcely changed in name or form, but greatly modified in spirit. The theatre had become more chaste and decorous. Among places of public resort, Ranelagh was closed before the termination of the century; the Pantheon became a mere concert room; and Vauxhall was abandoned to the citizens. The increased domesticity of men's habits, and the abandonment of external distinctions of rank, created a distaste for miscellaneous assemblies and generated what has been called the “exclusive” spirit. Routes and assemblies were externally much the same as formerly, except in regard to dress: in which the more convenient habiliments of daily use which came gradually to differ widely from those worn on state occasions more frequently elbowed them in the meetings of the gay and fashionable. The “court dress,” as it is called, came to be reserved not merely for the court, but for public levees and drawing-rooms. The change by which the modern dress superseded the ancient, at balls and parties, was slow, and a motley appearance was occasioned by the lingering process of transition. The innovations in the forms and arrangements of social intercourse were trivial, as will appear from the following examples.

Madame D'Arblay's Diary contains an account of a “very fine public breakfast, given by Mrs. Montague,” in May, 1792, which was then a novelty. The company first entered “the Feather room,” which Cowper's verse has immortalized; and “then made for the dining-room, which was filled for a breakfast upon this occasion, and very splendidly; though to me, who have been long familiar to sights and decorations, no show of this sort is new or striking. The table was not a matter of indifference to the guests at large; and it was so completely occupied by company seated round it, that it was long before one vacant chair could be seized, and this fell to the lot of Miss Ord. The crowd of company was such that we could only slowly make way in any part. There could not be fewer than four or five hundred people. It was like a full Ranelagh by daylight. . . . We went round the rooms, which were well worth examination and admiration, and we met friends and acquaintances every other step. . . . Dr. Russell was in high spirits, and laughed heartily at seeing the prodigious meal most of the company made of cold chicken, ham, fish, &c., and said he should like to see Mrs. Montague make the experiment of inviting all the same party to dinner, at three o'clock. ‘Oh!’ they would cry, ‘three o'clock! What does she mean? who can dine at three o'clock?—one has no appetite—one can't swallow a morsel—it's altogether impossible!’ Yet, let her invite the same people, and give them a dinner, while she calls it a breakfast, and see but how prettily they can find appetites.”

The newspapers of March, 1802, record another innovation:—“This season has been marked by a new species of entertainment common to the fashionable world, called a Pic-nic supper. Of the derivation of the word or who was the inventor, we profess ourselves ignorant; but the nature of it we can inform our readers, is as follows:—A Pic-nic supper consists of a variety of dishes. The subscribers to the entertainment have a bill of fare presented to them, with a number against each dish. The number of the lot which each draws obliges him to provide the dish named against it, and this he takes with him in his carriage or sends by a servant. The proper variety is insured by the talents of the maître d'hôtel, who draws up the bill of fare.”

The increased spirit of gentleness and decorum which characterized the easier classes had extended itself much further. The gladiatorial displays of prize-swordsmen had ceased. Bull-baiting and pugilistic exhibitions survived, and the waywardness of patrician youth resuscitated the latter and carried it perhaps, for a time, to a greater excess than it had ever before attained; but on the whole, the taste for these rude amusements had become so weak, even with the rabble, as to admit of their being in a great measure suppressed. The special pleading of Windham in the House of Commons, that they ought to be encouraged, was in itself a proof that their day had gone past. It was the language of a theorist who had had few or no opportunities of witnessing their practical effects, and therefore an indirect proof that they had become of comparatively rare occurrence. Windham admired bull-baiting as Sir Walter Scott admired Jacobitism, because he saw it from a distance with its harsh features rendered indistinct.

During the whole of this period the assimilation of the manners and customs of Scotland with those of England had been advancing at a rapid rate.

* On the subject of the general horror excited in London by the execution of Louis, see ante, page 256.

The youth of Sir Walter Scott witnessed the last strongly distinctive marks, and much even of what he has preserved he received from the traditions of the preceding generation. Two circumstances promoted this change: the progress of trade and manufactures, and the revolutionary war. The pastoral countries of the south of Scotland and the Highlands supplied more than their fair average of soldiers, and the commissariat department, both of the army and navy, was particularly attractive to the sons of the burghesses in the smaller royal burghs of Scotland. This class had from the beginning cherished more inclination for connecting itself by tradionary pedigrees with the land-owning class than was the case in England, and since the Revolution a new class of landowners had sprung into existence and importance, most of whom were sprung from burghesses. The difference of caste between the "laird" and the thriving "burghess" was less than existed between the "squire" and the manufacturer. The quicker conveyance of female gauds and fashions from the metropolis to the country towns and rural parishes of Scotland, through the instrumentality of the half-warlike, half-trading class alluded to, was peculiarly instrumental in smoothing down external differences. At the same time, however, that the Scotch were becoming more English, circumstances conspired to keep them English of an earlier date. On the one hand the moral influence of the court was less felt in the remoter districts of the kingdom: on the other the secession of the severer Calvinists from the Kirk had left a more accommodating clergy. The young blood of Scotland, at least among the gentry, was at this period subjected to less restraint than it had ever formerly been. The consequence was that, as the aristocracy of England grew more moral, the aristocracy of Scotland grew less so. The country began to sow its wild oats at too advanced an age. The incidental pictures of excess scattered through the biographies and writings of Burns are not exaggerated.

In Ireland, which still retained a legislature as well as a vice-regal government of its own, there remained a more marked character of distinctive nationality. The manners and customs of Ireland during the period now under review were in little if in anything altered from those of the preceding. They may therefore be passed over without description. Faithful pictures of them will be found in the writings of Miss Edgeworth, and clever caricatures in those of most Irish novelists who have succeeded her.

Although the period comprised in this portion of our work extends only over sixteen years, an almost entire change took place in costume during the course of it. The French Revolution, which broke out in 1789, affected the fashionable as much as the political world, and introduced the modern muslin cravat, in which the chin was sometimes buried, the stand-up collar, pantaloons and Hessian boots, which we find caricatured in 1799, and round hats, which had been occasionally worn in morning dress as early as the year 1780. Scarlet coats were much in vogue about 1784-5. An anecdote in the 'Life of Sir Astley Cooper,' lately published by his nephew, represents the former as returning from a dancing academy dressed in a scarlet coat, a three-cocked hat, a black glazed stock, nankeen knee-breeches, and silk stockings. Wigs had begun to go out of fashion as early as 1763, in which year the wig-makers petitioned the king to support the trade by his example. "The hair was a long time," says Malcolm, "dressed or frizzed high on the head like a negro's wool, and perfectly whitened with powder, and alternately plaited and turned up or queued behind. The powder-tax occurred, and thousands of heads became in an instant black and brown; and, as the revolution in France deserved imitation, the fierce republican head of Brutus stared us full in the front."*

In 1785 the ladies wore gowns very nearly of the same fashion as those of the present day, the tight sleeve to the wrist, the waist rather long, and the bell or pocket hoop giving scarcely more amplitude to the skirts than is now imparted by the crinolins and corded petticoats. The hair, intensely powdered, was dressed, however, in 1785-6 in a most singular manner, presenting a perfectly square appearance, whilst from behind a quantity of ringlets fell as out of a frame upon the shoulders. The hats became exceedingly broad in the brims, and were profusely ornamented with ribbons and sometimes with feathers. Very broad sashes were worn round the waist, tied in large bows behind, especially by young girls and children. The years 1787 and 1788 present us with heads dressed more in the cauliflower style, whilst in some instances ringlets appear in front, and an enormously long queue hangs down behind. About this period, however, an improvement becomes visible, which has been attributed to the taste of Sir Joshua Reynolds, Angelica Kauffman, Hoppner, and other portrait-painters of that day—the hair being worn full and flowing in natural curls, but still powdered. In 1789 we see the bouffante or neckerchief so arranged as to give all the ladies the appearance of pouter pigeons. In the example we give, the lady's hair is confined by a ribbon inscribed "Long live the king;" his majesty George III. having in that year, on the 23rd of April, gone in public procession to St. Paul's to return thanks for his restoration to health. A hat with a most absurd chimney-pot crown is visible in the fashions of the same year. In 1790 we begin to perceive the influence of the French Revolution. Two of the caps of that date, of which we give engravings, are exactly similar to those still worn by the French peasantry. In 1793 hair-powder was discarded by Queen Charlotte and the Princesses. In 1795 and 1796, perhaps out of compliment to the Prince of Wales, who was married in the former year, we perceive the triple plume of ostrich feathers in the hats of the ladies, and in their turbans, another introduction of this period when in court or ball costume. Some were content with a single upright feather. The spencer appears about this time as a riding-habit, and modern bonnets begin to supersede the hats. They are exceedingly small, and some very ugly, like jockey-caps, are seen in the fashions for 1799 and 1800. After 1796 the waist began to get much shorter. Hoops were entirely discontinued except at court. "Silks became unfashionable, and printed calicoes and the finest white muslins were substituted." And, instead of the stiff corsages of their mothers and grandmothers, the ladies rushed almost into the opposite extreme, and wore scarcely any stays at all. At the close of the eighteenth century, indeed, England entered what may be called a transition state of costume, which lasted during the first twenty years of the present century, our remarks upon which we of course reserve for our next Chapter on this subject.

With respect to the army, trifling changes were continually taking place in the uniforms of the different regiments; but the general appearance of the infantry towards the end of this century is given in our engraving at page 472. The cocked hat was exchanged for a cap with a shade and a brass plate in 1800. Some of the dragoon guards wore short-skirted coatees in 1799.

So little alteration took place in the style of English furniture till after the breaking out of the French Revolution, that we shall reserve our remarks for our next and concluding notice of the subject.

CHAPTER VII.

HISTORY OF THE CONDITION OF THE PEOPLE.

F the circumstances or causes that ordinarily most affect the economical condition of the great body of the population, the first and greatest is the produce of the harvest. At least with a law prohibiting or restraining the importation of corn from abroad, it may be safely affirmed that the quantity of the grain raised at home in any year is singly more influential upon the whole social system of the community than all other ordinary causes taken together. No diminution of the profits of our foreign trade in any one year has probably ever equalled the amount of loss that has been often sustained through a deficient harvest. And, even if the pecuniary amount in the former case were as great as in the latter, the loss would not come home to the mass of the population so immediately and directly. It would fall in the first instance upon capital, and its force would be broken before it reached the producing classes. An adverse foreign trade may tend to create a scarcity of employment, but that usually comes on gradually, and, if the loss be only upon a single year, although the effect must always, of course, be suffered in some way or other, it may be diffused over so considerable a space of time as hardly to be felt. A scanty harvest is instantly, to the masses, a deprivation of bread. Nothing can prevent it from having this effect. It falls upon them at once with its full weight in that conclusive shape: there is no intermediate barrier to slacken its descent; no accumulated power anywhere to sustain its first rude shock, and ward it off from them at least till it has lost its impetus and subsided into a mere pressure. It strikes sharp and hard at the health and strength, in other words, at the very life of the people, reducing them infallibly to a subsistence either insufficient in quantity or inferior in quality.

The succession of good and bad seasons in England from 1785 to 1801 inclusive, appears to have been as follows:—After an uninterrupted course of deficient harvests from 1765 to 1774,

and a mixture of good and bad years from 1775 to 1784, ending, however, with three of the latter description, the crops for 1785, 1786, 1787, and 1788 were all at least of average amount. That of 1789, again, was deficient, and that of 1790 still more so. The season of 1791 was one of great abundance, that of 1792 of considerable deficiency; in 1793 the crop was only a moderate one; in 1794 it was not even that; and in 1795, although it was got in in good order, it was still more deficient in quantity. The harvest of 1796, however, was abundant. That of 1797 was rather deficient; that of 1798 moderately good. Finally came the two miserably bad harvests of 1799 and 1800, followed by the tolerably good one of 1801. Thus, in the seventeen years, there were only two abundant crops (those of 1791 and 1796); seven were of average character (those of 1785, 1786, 1787, 1788, 1793, 1798, and 1801); four were rather deficient (those of 1789, 1792, 1794, and 1797); and four were decidedly bad (those of 1790, 1795, 1799, and 1800.)*

The way in which the harvest affects the condition of the great body of the people is, of course, by influencing the price of food. The mean price for the whole year, of the quarter of wheat (Winchester measure) varied throughout the present period as follows, according to the register kept in the Audit Books of Eton College:—in 1785, 48s.; in 1786, 42s. 2½d.; in 1787, 45s. 9¼d.; in 1788, 49s. 4d.; in 1789, 56s. 1¾d.; in 1790, 56s. 2½d.; in 1791, 49s. 4d.; in 1792, 47s. 1½d.; in 1793, 49s. 6¾d.; in 1794, 54s.; in 1795, 81s. 6d.; in 1796, 80s. 3d.; in 1797, 62s.; in 1798, 54s.; in 1799, 75s. 8d.; in 1800, 127s.; in 1801, 128s. 6d. These mean prices for the whole year are what

* We have deduced this brief enumeration, as well as we could, from the detailed statements collected by Mr. Tooke, in his History of Prices, vol. i. pp. 62-86, 179-188, and 213-225. At the same time it is proper to observe that the epithets we have used are in some cases only the general terms which appeared to us best to express the amount or result of Mr. Tooke's details. It is also to be remembered that in matters of this kind the facts are always to a certain extent inferential, and therefore matter of controversy. It may seem strange that there should be any difficulty in ascertaining whether, in a particular year half a century ago, the harvest was good or bad; but the fact belongs to a class of which no authentic register has ever been made or attempted in this country; and, besides, it is one scarcely admitting of perfect registration. The quantity of each of the different kinds of grain yearly produced in the country might, perhaps, be collected and recorded (although even this has never yet been done); but the quality of the grain, which is also so important an element in the character of the crop, could not be subjected to precise admeasurement.

best indicate the pressure upon subsistence; but it is to be recollected, in comparing the series of figures with the preceding account of the succession of good and bad seasons, that the mean price for the year will often differ widely from the actual price at any particular time of the year. Prices, too, are always influenced by the prospect of the coming harvest, as well as by the quantity and quality of the crop after it has been gathered in.

As the effect of a bad harvest is more immediately felt by the people than that of any of the other ordinary influences of an unfavourable kind acting upon their economical condition, so a good harvest also brings them whatever measure of relief it is fraught with at once. The measure may be great or small; the bounty of heaven may be in part counteracted by the legislation of man; but still it is impossible for any social arrangements altogether to intercept this blessing, or to prevent it from being immediately, if not fully, enjoyed by the mass of the population. Nor will it be found, we apprehend, that there is anything else which operates so surely and instantaneously in putting a spirit of life even into commercial and manufacturing enterprise as an abundant harvest.

It appears, then, that down to the year 1795, or for the first ten years of the present period, the price of wheat kept within what may be called a moderate range, nearly the same range, in fact, which it had taken ever since 1765, or from about the time when the country had ceased to produce more corn than sufficed for its own consumption. From 1795 to 1801 inclusive, however, prices took another and much higher range; having in only one of these seven years, 1798, declined so low as the highest point they had reached in the preceding ten, or indeed ever since the year 1710. The average mean price for the year of the Winchester quarter of wheat was about 49s. 9d. from 1785 to 1794, and about 87s. from 1795 to 1801.

To this account we may add another, of the contract prices of various articles of provision, &c., as supplied to Greenwich Hospital at various dates. Butchers' meat, which in 1770 was purchased for 108s. 6d. per cwt., and in 1775 for 113s. 5d., cost 117s. 6½d. in 1785, 202s. 10d. in 1795, and 304s. 4d. in 1800; butter, which had been 5½d. per pound in 1765, was 6¾d. in 1785, 8¼d. in 1795, and 11¼d. in 1800; cheese was 3¾d. per pound in 1785, and 6¼d. in 1800; peas were 3s. 6d. per bushel in 1765, 7s. 6d. in 1775, the same in 1790, 9s. 6d. in 1795, 13s. 5d. in 1800; beer was 5s. 10d. per barrel in 1770, 7s. 3½d. in 1780, 8s. 7d. in 1790, 10s. 4½d. in 1795, and 20s. 4¼d. in 1800; candles were 6s. 6d. per dozen pounds in 1785, 7s. 9d. in 1790, 9s. 2d. in 1795, 10s. 4d. in 1800; coals were 34s. 2½d. per chaldron in 1785, 39s. 9d. in 1795, 51s. 7d. in 1800; shoes were 4s. in 1770, 3s. 6d. in 1785, 4s. in 1795, 5s. 8d. in 1800.* Other articles of clothing, however, do not appear to have generally increased in nominal price or money value from the middle of the century; in fact, the great improvements that had been made in the cotton and other manufactures had materially diminished the real cost of most articles of that description, and if money had retained the same value in relation to commodities, their nominal prices would have also been considerably reduced.

With the single exception of articles of clothing, then, it appears that the prices of all necessaries continued to rise in this country from the commencement to the close of the present period—more slowly in the first nine or ten years, by a more rapid movement in the last seven or eight. With regard to foreign and colonial produce the case was nearly the same, although the fluctuation of prices followed a somewhat different course. First, according to Mr. Tooke, there was a general fall of prices in 1793 and the greater part of 1794, the two first years of the war: it is sufficient for our present purpose to note the fact, without inquiring into its cause or causes; but they may be found explained in the authority to which we have just referred.* “In 1795,” continues Mr. Tooke, “several circumstances combined to occasion a range of high prices, besides those of provisions. Two successive bad seasons on the continent of Europe, as well as in this country, had rendered all European agricultural produce scarce and dear, such as linseed and rapeseed, olive-oil, and tallow. Silk in Italy, and the vintages in France, had suffered from the inclemency of the season. There was an extraordinary competition between our government and that of France in the purchase of naval stores in the north of Europe, thus greatly raising the prices of hemp, flax, iron, and timber. The prospect of a war with Spain, which broke out in the year following, affected several descriptions of Spanish produce. Colonial produce, of which a scarcity consequent on the failure of the supplies from St. Domingo was now generally felt throughout Europe, experienced a fresh rise. All these classes of commodities continued to rise through 1795 and part of 1796. Those which were affected by the seasons in Europe fell in the latter part of 1796 and in 1797, although, from the increased cost of production, and in the case of naval and military stores from the increasing demand, not to their former level.”† “But,” he adds, “a very important class of articles, viz., coffee, sugar, indigo, pepper, cotton, cochineal, and other articles of colonial produce, which had begun to rise in 1795, continued to advance till the close of 1798, insomuch that at the end of the latter year (and in the first two or three months of 1799) they attained a greater height than at any subsequent period between that and 1814. It is further to be observed, that this large class of articles was rising while corn was falling; and that they attained at the close of 1798 some a little less and some a great deal more than 100 per cent. above their previous rate, while corn had fallen 50 per cent. below the rate which it had attained in 1795-6."* Mr. Tooke afterwards shows that, although in a few instances the rise which had thus been going on since 1796 was continued through the first three months of 1799, yet generally from the close of 1798 the prices of colonial produce began to fall, and underwent a great depression between the spring of 1799 and the spring of 1801, being the very time during which an unprecedented rise was taking place in the price of corn.† We believe, as we have stated in a former chapter, that the fall in the one description of prices was in great part the effect of the rise in the other—that the dearth of the first necessary of life withdrew the means of purchasing colonial luxuries, or only half necessaries, and so brought down their price by diminishing the demand for them. The high price of bread, in fact, appears to have brought down other prices as well as those of colonial produce. Mr. Tooke further states that "the prices of most of our manufactured articles likewise experienced a considerable fall in the interval from 1799 to 1801."‡ The people, unable to procure a sufficiency of bread, had no money to throw away upon Coventry ribands, and even much less than they had been wont to have wherewith to purchase the woollens of Yorkshire. But on the other hand, between the close of 1798 and the spring of 1801, not only did there take place the enormous rise in the prices of provisions to which we have already adverted, "but," says Mr. Tooke, "many other articles of European raw produce had experienced a simultaneous advance, partly as the consequence of the same inclemency of the seasons which had prevailed in this country, and partly from the extraordinary obstructions to importation from political causes. Thus wool and tallow rose from the twofold cause of the seasons in diminishing both the home and foreign produce, and flax, hemp, timber, foreign iron, linseed, in short all articles for our supply of which we are dependent, wholly or in part, on importation from the Baltic, experienced a very considerable rise, not only in consequence of the embargo in Russia in the autumn of 1800, but also in consequence of the threatened hostility of Denmark, which was likely to close against us the passage of the Sound. In addition to this extensive dearth of raw produce was the dearness of many articles of general consumption, occasioned by the progress of taxation, such as the heavy duties of excise on salt, soap, candles, and leather, which may be considered as necessaries, and on malt and beer, sugar, tea, and tobacco and spirits, which are secondary necessaries, or perhaps, more correctly speaking, necessaries to all the classes above the very poor. Fuel of every description had risen considerably from the same general causes."§

Here, then, we have a general rise in the money prices of all the ordinary articles of consumption. The price of bread, as we have seen, the first necessary of life, had nearly doubled in the course of the seventeen years which make up the present period; all other kinds of provision had also become greatly enhanced in price; only the materials of clothing and some other manufactured articles had not become dearer. On the whole, the increase in the expense of subsistence and housekeeping to the poor man cannot well be estimated to have been less than fifty per cent.; or, in other words, his three shillings at the close of this period would not go farther than his two shillings would have done at its commencement.

The question, therefore, of whether the condition of the great body of the people was better or worse in the latter than it was in the early part of the period will be answered if we can ascertain whether every man really had three shillings to spend in 1800 for every two which he had in 1785—that is to say, whether wages had risen fifty per cent., or thereabout, between those two years as well as prices. Or, as prices were nearly stationary down to 1795, we may take that year, instead of 1785, as our starting-point. "Such and so great," observes Mr. Tooke, "being the rise of prices of provisions and of nearly all consumable commodities, it was quite impossible that the lowest of the working classes could, upon their wages at the rate of what they were before 1795, obtain a subsistence for themselves and their families, on the lowest scale requisite to sustain human existence; and the classes above the lowest, including some portion of skilled labourers, could do little, if at all, more than provide themselves with food, clothing, and shelter, without any of the indulgences which habit had rendered necessaries. If, under these circumstances, there had been no rise of wages, no contributions by parishes and by individuals in aid of wages, great numbers of the people must have actually perished, and the classes immediately above the lowest would with difficulty have preserved themselves from the same fate. In such case, the suffering from dearth would have been correctly designated as a famine—a term which has been somewhat loosely applied to the period under consideration. For, severe and intense as were the sufferings and privations of the people of this country in the dearths of 1795 and 1796, and of 1800 and 1801, there were few recorded instances of death from actual destitution. A rise of wages was imperatively called for by the urgency of the case, and was complied with, to some extent, in most of the branches of industry, the claims for increase being aided by the resource which workmen and labourers had of enlisting in the army and navy."*

the table begins) till 1795; but in 1800 (the next year given in the abstract) they are stated at 2s. 10d. Those of joiners were 2s. 8d. in 1735, and were no higher in 1785; but in 1790 they were 2s. 10d., and in 1800 they were 3s. 2d. By 1805, however, the wages of both joiners and carpenters had advanced to 4s. 6d. per day. Those of bricklayers, which were 2s. 6d. in 1760, are stated at only 2s. 4d. in 1780, and at only 2s. in 1785; but in 1790 they had again risen to 2s. 4d., and they were 3s. in 1795, and the same in 1800. In 1805 they were 4s. 10d., or more than twice what they had been only fifteen years before. Those of masons, which in 1735 were 2s. 6d., and which stood at 2s. 8d. from 1740 to 1770, had reached 2s. 10d. by 1775, but remained at the same amount in 1800; by 1805, however, they were 5s. Those of plumbers, which had been 3s. from 1730 to 1740, were only 2s. 6d. from 1745 to 1760; but were again 3s. from 1765 to 1780; and were 3s. 3d. from 1785 to 1800. By 1805 they had risen to 4s. 6d. The most considerable advance, therefore, in all these cases, appears to have taken place after 1800: how much of the difference between the wages of 1800 and those of 1805 may have been an addition made immediately after the former of these years, the abstract of the Greenwich accounts does not indicate.

There was, however, some advance of wages in 1800 and 1801, as well as in 1795 and 1796; but there appears to be no doubt that both these advances together were far from being sufficient to compensate for the advance which had in the mean time taken place in the prices of all the principal necessaries of life. Mr. Tooke quotes a statement of Arthur Young's, from the 'Annals of Agriculture' for 1801, in which that writer affirms that a labourer was then living in the vicinity of Bury, in Suffolk, who, when his week's wages were only 5s., could purchase with that sum a bushel of wheat, a bushel of malt, 1 lb. of butter, 1 lb. of cheese, and a pennyworth of tobacco; whereas in 1801 the same purchases would have cost him not less than 26s. 5d., while his week's wages had only risen to 9s. If we were to judge by this instance, then, it would appear that, in the course of perhaps fifty or sixty years, the condition of the working man had been depressed, in so far as it was to be measured by his rate of wages, to a point in the scale of comfort, or of command over the good things of life, only about one-third as high as that at which it originally stood. His wages in 1801 could purchase scarcely more than a third-part of the quantity of provisions which they could formerly purchase. Here, however, it is probable, we have a very cheap year placed against a very dear year, which is not a fair way of representing the difference between the two eras. Still there is abundance of other evidence to show that the wages received by all classes of labourers at the close of the present period were far from sufficient to purchase the same quantity of necessaries at the lower wages which they had received at its commencement. Thus, the wages of journeymen tailors had from 1777 to 1795 been 21s. 9d. per week, which would then purchase thirty-six quarter loaves; they had been advanced in 1795 to 25s., and in 1801 to 27s. per week, but the latter sum would only purchase eighteen loaves and a half in that year of scarcity. So also with the wages of printers and compositors, which had been advanced from 24s. to 27s. in 1795, and to 30s. in 1801: the advance was to the extent of 25 per cent. in all, but the advance in the price of bread had been above 140 per cent.

It is true, indeed, that this very high price of bread was only temporary, and that the rise of wages not only maintained itself after bread fell in price, but even went on and increased. If it had not done so, if so much of buoyant energy had not manifested itself in the social system, it might have been apprehended that the principle of general decay was already at work, and that, whatever show there might be of health and growth, the real strength of the system and its spirit of life were on the decline. Where there is no tendency to advance evinced by the body of the people, it seems impossible that any other advance can be permanent, or can operate otherwise than to break up society by separating it into two alienated and repugnant portions. The continuance of the rise of wages, or of their tendency to rise, after the extreme prices of 1801 had somewhat given way, was a natural consequence of the generally advancing state of the nation; and, besides, the same principle which had originally impressed this upward direction upon wages was still at work, and urging on their movement so long as the old relation between their amount and the price of provisions remained unrecovered. Prices commonly both rise and fall much more suddenly or rapidly than wages; the nature of wages is rather to follow the movement of prices at some distance than to run by their side. In the present case, even if it should be contended that wages, by continuing to rise after 1801, did at last nearly recover their former relation to the price of food, still it is not to be questioned that for the seven years preceding that date any rise that they experienced was far from adequate to sustain the labouring population in the position which they had held before 1795.

The great rise in the price of corn, as we have seen, began in that year. The price of the Winchester quarter of wheat, according to the Eton College accounts, was 45s. 0½d. at Michaelmas 1793, 52s. at Lady-day 1794, 56s. at Michaelmas 1794, 71s. at Lady-day 1795, 92s. at Michaelmas 1795, 96s. at Lady-day 1796; having thus, by an uninterrupted ascent, more than doubled its height in the course of two years, while it still continued to mount up. Its progress, however, had been comparatively gradual at first: the transition from the old range of prices to quite a new range may be said to have taken place in the twelve months between Michaelmas 1794 and Michaelmas 1795, during which the quarter of wheat rose very nearly 70 per cent., and at the end of the term still retained its tendency to go on in the same direction. By the time that parliament met, in the end of October, the general distress had reached such a point that it formed the subject of a prominent paragraph in the king's speech; and on the 3rd of November the House of Commons, on the motion of Mr. Pitt, resolved itself into a committee to take into consideration the high price of corn. On this occasion Mr. Lechmere, member for the city of Worcester, endeavoured to show that the scarcity had arisen from other causes than the deficiency of the late harvest, which he described to have been as plentiful a one as the great Author of all blessings had ever given us—a mistake, as very soon became apparent enough. "The poor man, nevertheless," added the honourable member, "who ploughed the earth which produced that plenty was starving, or driven to very great distress indeed, and entirely unable to support his family." Lechmere thought that the system of great farms—what he called "the monopoly of farms"—ought to be put down, or at least prevented from extending itself. "It was notorious," he said, "that there were now farms occupied by one man which formerly supported twelve or fourteen families." The jobbers in corn and horned cattle, he also thought, were instruments of great oppression to the people. Fox also doubted if the scarcity had really been occasioned by the defective produce of the two last harvests. Meat, he observed, and the produce of dairy-farms, had advanced in price to the same extent as bread; "but what affords," he went on, "the most striking proof that the high price does not arise merely from the deficiency of the harvest, is, that with respect to barley, the produce of which is admitted this season to have been plentiful beyond example, a similar advance of price has taken place." We are not here concerned with these reasonings as to the causes of the dearth; we bring them forward only as involving evidence of its character and extent: but surely there was nothing to occasion surprise in the circumstance that the scarcity of wheat should have raised the price of barley—that in their inability to purchase the dearer grain, upon which they had been wont to subsist, the people, or a portion of them, should resort to the cheaper, and so its price be raised by the increase of the customary demand. In fact, it will be found that, under the operation of this principle, whenever the price of any chief article of subsistence rises, the prices of all other kinds of provision that can be in any measure employed as its substitutes will rise along with it. Fox was inclined to attribute the scarcity partly, but not solely, to the war. "I admit, even," he added, "that part of the causes to which it may be traced may be connected with a certain state of prosperity of the country. The war certainly has had a most decided effect, so far as it has tended to increase the consumption, to diminish the production, and to preclude the possibility of obtaining supplies, which might have been drawn from other quarters. But, if there are other circumstances which have operated along with those arising from the war—if the evil has proceeded from many and complicated causes—nothing can be more mischievous than to ascribe it solely to one cause, and to proceed as if that were the fact." The state of wages had already, it appears from Mr. Fox's speech, begun to attract attention. "There are some," he said, "who think that the price of labour has not kept pace with the increased price of provisions. I am afraid that this disproportion too much takes place in almost all the counties of England, and that, while provisions have been rapidly rising to an unexampled height, labour has been by no means advanced in proportion. It is indeed a melancholy and alarming fact, that the great majority of the people of England—an enormous and dreadful majority—are no longer in a situation in which they can boast that they live by the produce of their labour; and that it does regularly happen, during the pressure of every inclement season, that the industrious poor are obliged to depend for subsistence on the supplies afforded by the charity of the rich." On the 9th of December following, Mr. Whitbread brought in a bill to accomplish the extraordinary purpose of fixing a rate below which wages should not be suffered to be paid. On the 12th of February, 1796, on the order of the day being read for the second reading of this bill, Whitbread entered into some details on the subject of the existing distresses. "In most parts of the country," he said, "the labourer had long been struggling with increasing misery, till the pressure had become almost too grievous to be endured, while the patience of the sufferers under their accumulated distresses had been conspicuous and exemplary. . . . Were it necessary to refer to any authority, he could quote the writings of Dr. Price, in which he showed that in the course of two centuries the price of labour had not increased more than three or at most four fold; whereas the price of meat had increased in the proportion of six or seven, and that of clothing no less than fourteen or fifteen fold, in the same period." Dr. Price's calculations upon this as well as upon other subjects may be regarded as more curious than conclusive; but the honourable member went on to observe:—"The poor-rates, too, had increased since the beginning of this century from 600,000*l.*, at which they were then estimated, to upwards of 3,000,000*l.* Nor was this prodigious increase in the poor-rates to be ascribed to the advance of population; for it was doubtful whether any such increase had taken place. At the present period the contrary seemed to be the case. By the pressure of the times marriage was discouraged; and among the laborious classes of the community the birth of a child, instead of being hailed as a blessing, was considered as a curse." The motion for the second reading of the bill was lost; and at the present day it is scarcely necessary to remark that Whitbread's idea, if it had been attempted to be carried into execution, would only have aggravated the evil it was designed to cure or diminish. The establishment of a minimum of wages would have been a condemnation to starvation of all who could not find employment at the rate fixed, although they might have found it at a lower rate. Mr. Whitbread, however, again brought forward his plan in the next parliament, on the 11th of February, 1800, when he observed that what first put it into his head was the situation to which the poor were reduced in 1795, when their distresses were nearly the same as they still continued. The bill, as before, was thrown out on the second reading.

A few days after this, on the 18th of February, Lord Hawkesbury, in moving for leave to bring in a bill to regulate the assize of bread, stated to the House some interesting facts relating to the habits of the people and the economical condition of the country. "The number of consumers of wheaten bread," he observed, "depended much upon the abundance of the crop, and the consequent price of wheaten bread. On an average, one-third of the people did not consume wheaten bread. A great majority of the people in Scotland, Westmoreland, Cumberland, the North Riding of Yorkshire, part of Lancashire, of Wales, Cornwall, and the northern parts of Devonshire, consumed bread made of oats, barley, and other grain. Now, as to the quantity of wheat consumed, a quarter of wheat in the year for each man was the general calculation. This allowance would require between eight and nine millions of quarters to supply the country for a year. The produce of the country varied in different years; but the average . . . did not feed the country; for the average importation for several years back might be estimated at one-twentieth of the whole consumption."² The deficiency of the late crop Lord Hawkesbury estimated at one-third of an average crop; so that the quantity of wheat necessary to be imported would be this third added to the usual importation of one-twentieth of the consumption; deducting only the stock on hand. All things considered, he calculated that the probable amount of the importation necessary for the present season would be above 600,000 quarters; whereas in 1796 the quantity imported was more than 800,000. The quantity of wheat and flour actually brought from abroad, however, in this year was above 1,200,000 Winchester quarters.

In the state to which the people were thus reduced, the pressure upon the poor-rates necessarily became greatly augmented.

The history of the legislation on the subject of the poor-laws has been brought down in the last Book to the passing of Mr. Gilbert's Act for the erection of union workhouses, in 1782.* By an Act passed in 1790, justices of peace were empowered to visit the workhouses within their jurisdiction, and, having examined the state of the houses, of the paupers therein, and of their food, clothing, and bedding, to report the result of their inquiries to the next quarter-sessions; and also to summon the masters of workhouses to appear at the sessions to answer complaints made against them. And justices at the quarter-sessions were authorised to make the necessary orders and regulations for the removing of any cause of complaint. The visiting justices were also empowered, if they found the poor in any workhouses affected with any contagious or infectious disease, to order that medical or other assistance should be immediately procured, or proper food provided for them, or that the sick should be separated and removed, until further order could be taken at the next quarter-sessions. But the most important of the Acts relating to the poor, passed within the present period, was that passed in 1795 (the 35 Geo. III. c. 101), which repealed so much of the Act of the 13 and 14 Char. II. c. 12, as authorised justices to order the removal of persons likely to become chargeable to parishes, and provided that no poor persons should be removed from any parish in which they might be resident, until they should have become actually chargeable. Thus was at length removed from the statute-book, and the constitution of the country, after it had been in force for more than a hundred and thirty years, a most tyrannical power by which the labouring classes were, in point of fact, reduced to the condition of adscripti glebæ, with this difference only, that they were confined each to a particular parish, instead of to a particular estate.²

The law regulating the management of pauperism was therefore considerably improved during the present period; but, on the other hand, very serious abuses in practice were introduced. Under the first pressure of the high prices of 1795, the magistrates of Berkshire and some other southern counties published tables of the rates of wages which in their opinion labourers ought to receive, according to the price of bread and the numbers of their families, and directed that the parish officers should in all cases make up the wages of the labourer to the allowance so set down for him. This example was followed in other parts of the kingdom; and, an act having been passed the following year (the 36 Geo. III. c. 35), permitting relief to be given to the poor, under certain circumstances, and in certain cases, at their own houses, various expedients were adopted by parishes for carrying the new principle into effect. The most common mode was by what was called the roundsman (or otherwise the house row, billet, ticket, or stem) system, which consisted, as defined in the Report made by the Poor Law Commission in 1834, in "the parish paying the occupiers of property to employ the applicants for relief at a rate of wages fixed by the parish, and depending, not on the services, but on the wants of the applicants, the employer being repaid out of the poor-rate all that he advances in wages beyond a certain sum." The roundsman system, however, had been known in various parts of the country before this date. Sir Frederick Eden speaks of it as having been general in Buckinghamshire and many of the midland counties before the publication of Sir William Young's proposal for the amendment of the poor-laws in 1788.* In his Report on the parish of Winslow, in Bucks, dated September, 1795, he says, "There seems to be here a great want of employment: most labourers are (as it is termed) on the rounds; that is, they go to work from one house to another round the parish. In winter sometimes forty persons are on the rounds. They are wholly paid by the parish, unless the householders choose to employ them; and, from these circumstances, labourers often become very lazy and impetuous."† And again, in the report on the parish of Kibworth-Beauchamp in Leicestershire, dated August, 1795:—"In the winter, and at other times, when a man is out of work, he applies to the overseer, who sends him from house to house to get employ: the housekeeper who employs him is obliged to give him victuals and 6*d.* a day, and the parish adds 4*d.* (total 10*d.* a day), for the support of his family: persons working in this manner are called roundsmen, from their going round the village or township for employ."‡ The Report of the Commission on the Poor Law states that the general practice, where the roundsman system was adopted, had come to be, for the parish to make an agreement with a farmer to sell to him the labour of one or more paupers, at a certain price, and to pay to the pauper out of the rates the difference between such wages and his proper allowance according to the Table. "It has received the name of the billet or ticket system," continues the Report, "from the ticket signed by the overseer, which the pauper in general carries to the farmer as a warrant for his being employed, and takes back to the overseer, signed by the farmer, as a proof that he has fulfilled the conditions of relief. In other cases the parish contracts with some individual to have some work performed for him by the paupers at a given price, the parish paying the paupers." It is added, that in many places the roundsman system was effected by means of an auction. In Sulgrave, Northamptonshire, the old and infirm were then (in 1834) sold once a month to the best bidder, at prices varying, according to the time of the year, from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 3*s.* a week. At Yardley, Hastings, all the unemployed men were put up to sale weekly; and the clergyman of the parish told the commissioner that he had seen ten men, the week before, knocked down to one of the farmers for 5*s.*, and that, out of 170 male paupers belonging to the parish, there were then about 70 let out in this manner.§

One effect of the roundsman system, therefore, was to throw an unfair share of the burthen of supporting the poor upon such rate-payers as did not employ labourers in proportion to their rates. The farmer got back his assessment, or part of it, in the form of cheap labour: the labour he required was in part paid for him by those of the inhabitants who employed less labour in proportion to their rates than himself. It is evident that this plan could operate no diminution of the entire burthen of the rates; and that it had as little tendency to lessen the amount or check the spread of pauperism. On the contrary, by increasing the allowance to the pauper in proportion to the price of bread and the number of his children, it tended to destroy all habits of providence and economy, to counteract those arrangements of nature by which in years of scarcity the smaller quantity of food that there is to be divided is made to go farther than it would have done or have needed to do in a time of greater plenty, and to encourage by a premium the propagation of poverty and destitution.

The total amount raised under the name of parochial and county rates in England and Wales in the year 1785 was, as we have seen in the last Book, 2,184,904*l.* The average expenditure upon the poor for the three years 1783-4-5 was 2,004,239*l.* The next year for which we have any account is 1801, in which the sum expended for the relief of the poor was 4,017,871*l.*, or more than double what it had been seventeen or eighteen years before. The average of the total sum levied for poor-rates and county-rates in the three years 1801-2-3 was 53,48,205*l.*, or nearly two and a half times as much as had been so levied in 1783-4-5.

The population of England and Wales was probably about 8,000,000 in 1785, and about 9,000,000 in 1801. The census taken in the latter year made it 8,872,980. The increase of the poor-rates, therefore, in the course of the present period would appear to have been nearly ten times as great as the increase of the population. A portion of the additional amount of money expended on the poor is, no doubt, to be assigned to the augmented price of provisions; but certainly not more than one-half of the increase in the rates can be so accounted for. At least 50 per cent. of the increase, which was 100 per cent. in all, must be set down, it is to be apprehended, to the increase of pauperism; in other words, while the general population had been augmented by an eighth, the pauper population had been augmented by a half, or by four times as great a proportional accession. And the probability is, that this latter augmentation had taken place in less than half the time that the other had been going on—that it was chiefly the growth of the seven years from 1794, or, at most, of the nine from 1792, to 1801.

During the earlier part of the present period, indeed, the condition of the labouring classes, as well as of the rest of the community, was probably one of decided and even rapid advancement. "There can be little doubt," as Sir Frederick Eden has observed, writing in 1797, "that the ten years ending in January, 1793, exhibit the most flattering appearances, in every circumstance that has been considered by political economists as demonstrative of national prosperity.* Sir Frederick is even disposed to hesitate before admitting that the great augmentation of the poor-rate was an unequivocal proof of the inability of labourers, at the time when he wrote, to maintain themselves on the ordinary wages of labour. "Before this can be admitted," he argues, "it should be proved that more persons are maintained by the present poor-rate, which probably exceeds three millions sterling, than were by half that sum twenty years ago." And he goes on: "Even allowing this to be the fact, it by no means proves that the able-bodied labourer, whom it has been the fashion of late years, upon benevolent though mistaken principles of policy, to quarter on the parish, would, if unassisted by the overseer, have been unable to benefit himself, whilst his employer was getting riches by his labour." "The fact," he concludes, "seems to have been, that, instead of an advance in wages proportioned to the increased demand for labour, the labourer has received a considerable part of that portion of his employer's capital which was destined for his maintenance in the form of poor-rate (the very worst that it could assume), instead of being paid it as the fair, well-earned recompense of equivalent labour." "This," Sir Frederick well says, "is a deplorable evil, which has fallen heavier on the poor than on the rich."*
