CHAPTER I.

NARRATIVE OF CIVIL AND MILITARY TRANSACTIONS.

PART II.

GEORGE III. (CONTINUED.)—1792.

A. D. 1792.—THE British Parliament did not assemble until the 31st of January. The speech from the throne conveyed none of the anxieties and alarms which agitated the breasts of the king, of the minister, and of all thinking Englishmen. Both George III. and Pitt loved to follow the rule of saying least in these addresses to parliament when there was most to say. The first topic mentioned was the marriage of his majesty's second son, the Duke of York, with the eldest daughter of his good brother and ally the king of Prussia. The next thing mentioned was that, since the last session of parliament, a definitive treaty had been concluded, under the mediation of his majesty and that of his allies the king of Prussia and the States-General of the United Provinces, between the emperor and the Ottoman Porte, upon principles which appeared calculated to prevent future disputes between those powers. His majesty's intervention had also been employed to promote a pacification between the empress of Russia and the Porte; conditions had been agreed upon between England and Russia which his majesty undertook to recommend to the Porte, as the re-establishment of peace, on such terms, appeared, under existing circumstances, a desirable event for the several interests of Europe; and he was in expectation of speedily receiving the account of the conclusion of definitive treaties, preliminaries having been for some time since agreed upon between the empress and the sultan. His majesty regretted that he was not yet enabled to inform parliament of the termination of the war in India with Tippoo Sultaun; but the success which had already attended the distinguished bravery and exertions of the officers and troops, under the able conduct of Lord Cornwallis, afforded reasonable ground to hope that the war would be speedily concluded. The speech not merely mentioned in the routine manner the friendly assurances received from foreign powers, but affirmed, with a strange insincerity, that the general state of affairs in Europe appeared to promise to Great Britain the continuance of her present tranquillity. "Under these circumstances," said his majesty, "I am induced to think that some immediate reduction may safely be made in our naval and military establishments; and my regard for the interests of my subjects renders me at all times desirous of availing myself of every favourable opportunity to diminish the public expenses." He recommended to the House of Commons to consider of such measures as the flourishing state of the funds and of public credit might render practicable and expedient for a reduction in the rate of interest of such of the annuities as were now redeemable; and he told them he entertained the pleasing hope of their being enabled to enter upon a gradual reduction of taxation, giving at the same time additional efficacy to the plan for the reduction of the national debt, on the success of which our future ease and security must essentially depend. Again France was not so much as mentioned; but the speech concluded with another recommendation of a steady and zealous, a confirmed and increased attachment to the British constitution, which had been found, by long experience, to unite the inestimable blessings of liberty and of order, and to which, under the favour of Providence, all our other advantages were principally to be ascribed.

The address proposed by ministers gave rise to a long and most animated debate, the attack upon it being led by Mr. Grey, who severely blamed the government for its interference in the war between Russia and Turkey, though that interference had rescued the Turkish empire in Europe from immediate destruction. Mr. Grey also censured ministers for holding out the hope of a speedy termination to the war in India, blaming everything that had been done there, and asserting that we were as far from victory or an honourable peace as we were at the end of the preceding campaign. He concluded by moving the omission of the passage in the address relating to the success which had attended the military operations in India, and the substitution of other words expressive of regret that the war in that part of the world had not yet been brought to a conclusion. Dundas, the real India minister, replied smartly to Grey touching Indian affairs, and adduced good sound facts to prove that ministers were justified in predicting a speedy and glorious termination to the struggle with Tippoo. When Fox rose to speak, every one was sure that he would bring forward France and her revolution and constitution. He began, however, with Russia and Turkey; for he and his party had conceived almost as strong an attachment for that very amiable woman and gentle sovereign the Czarina Catherine as they entertained for the French revolution; and the Czarina, fully aware of this somewhat contradictory prepossession, had, as we shall soon see, taken certain flattering steps to increase the vivacity of Fox's feeling in her favour. On this day Fox expressed his strongest disapprobation of the interference of ministers in support of Turkey, saying that it was very unnecessary and very dangerous to excite the resentment of a court like that of St. Petersburg. After dwelling for some time upon this subject, he suddenly turned to France. He said that the frequent eulogiums on the constitution of Great Britain which had of late been introduced into parliament had been introduced in order to reproach him and his friends for their admiration of what had been done in France, and to suggest the suspicion that he and his friends were not so much attached to our own constitution as they ought to be. He thought that those who had overturned a constitution so radically bad as that of France had done what was perfectly right, and had properly run all hazards to do it; but the constitution of Great Britain was fundamentally good, and merited the efforts of all honest subjects to preserve it, although it was not absolutely free from defects and imperfections. It was therefore most unjust to insinuate that those who approved of the destruction of despotism in France would rejoice in the downfall of the British constitution. Fox then came nearer home, and took up the Birmingham riots and the sufferings of Dr. Priestley. He bitterly complained that, through the laxity or tacit approbation of the magistrates, those violent outrages had been committed upon property and person. The mob, he said, had been basely connived at: a gentleman of the greatest celebrity for science and character, the famous Dr. Priestley, had been reduced to absolute ruin, and had hardly been able to escape with his life. With a too sweeping generalization he declared that all the dissenters were as much attached to the established constitution, and as averse to revolution at home, as the followers of the established church. "It would have been well," he said, "if his majesty, in his speech, had spoken of those riots at Birmingham in the terms they merited. They were not riots for bread; they were not riots in the cause of liberty, which, however highly to be reprobated, had yet some excuse in their principle; they were riots of men neither aggrieved nor complaining—of men who had set on foot an indiscriminate persecution of an entire description of their fellow-citizens, including persons as eminent for their ability, as blameless in their conduct, and as faithful in their allegiance, as this or any country could boast." Pitt, as usual, replied to Fox. He lamented the disorders at Birmingham; but thought these were matters which discretion ought to consign to oblivion, particularly as enough had been done for their atonement. And he told Fox, very plainly, that he was seeking to revive the subject for party purposes. He warmly defended the conduct of his cabinet and his diplomatists abroad in the interference for the pacification of Russia and Turkey; and he told Fox that, but for him and his party, and their clamours in Parliament, the British government could have succeeded much sooner in procuring that desired end. [But Fox, not satisfied with a legal opposition to ministers in the House of Commons, sent, as we shall soon have occasion to notice more particularly, a representative, a sort of minister of his own, with his cypher, to St. Petersburg, to thwart the treaty in progress and frustrate the king's minister—a measure which, as Burke afterwards remarked, though not absolutely high treason, as we were not actually at war with Russia, was in law not very remote from that offence, and undoubtedly a most unconstitutional act and treasonable midemeanour.] Pitt added, that his object was to prevent the ruin of the Turkish empire, and to maintain that balance of power in Europe which was important to this country, and the maintenance of which Fox himself had so often and so eloquently recommended. But, soon quitting these topics, he launched into the pleasanter subject of financial improvement, laying before the House a circumstantial statement, by which it appeared that the last year's revenue had amounted to 16,790,000*l.*, which, after all the expenditure and the annual million devoted to the reduction of the national debt, left a surplus of 900,000*l.* He intimated that, encouraged by this prosperous condition of the finances, he contemplated taking off some of those taxes which pressed most heavily upon the poorer classes. His speech ended the debate, and, the question being called for, the amendment was negatived by a majority of 209 to 85, after which the original address was agreed to.

The opposition, in their plan of campaign, had determined to make a great fight on the subject of the Indian war, and Mr. Philip Francis, the antagonist of Hastings and Impey, had been busily engaged in preparing the means of attack. Their chief objects were to prove that the war with Tippoo had been unjustly and unnecessarily provoked, and that it had been conducted by Lord Cornwallis without spirit or ability. As we have seen, they began their attack on the first day of the session: they renewed it with more formality on the 9th of February by a call for papers, which, they said, were necessary to throw light upon the subject. Major Maitland, who made the motion, accompanied the demand with a retrospective view of India affairs, not very favourable to the present administration. The major contended that the old policy was to remain at peace with the natives, and that this system was more safe and advantageous than the present system of war and conquest. Although Tippoo's insults, enormities, and direct attacks were known to all the world, the Major maintained that he had given no provocation, and that the present war, which must involve us in all manner of difficulties, was uncalled for and aggressive on our part, and a breach of the treaties we had concluded with Tippoo. Maitland was supported by Francis, who expressed his astonishment and indignation at the denial of papers necessary for the examination of transactions not in progress, but already past and completed; and who said, ministers, by refusing these papers, acknowledged that their conduct would not bear investigation. Dundas replied, and consented to produce all the papers which were called for, except copies of any proposals of peace which had been made by Tippoo Sultan; and, with that exception, Maitland's motion was agreed to. On the 15th of March Maitland moved various resolutions on the Indian war, tending to reprobate it as unjustifiable, and as the result of a design planned, long before any declaration of hostilities, for the destruction of Tippoo. This design the Major thought as impolitic as it was unjust, for, were Tippoo to be destroyed, no native power would remain strong enough to balance the formidable power of the Mahrattas, who would become extremely dangerous from their restlessness and rapacity. Maitland was supported by several good speakers of his party, but his resolutions were all negatived. Nevertheless, on the 28th of March, the Major resumed the subject, declaring that, from the most attentive perusal of the papers which had been produced by ministers, he was confirmed in the correctness of his opinions. These papers, he said, clearly proved that a plan of conquest had been formed, and that we had sought the war. In reply, ministers and their friends enlarged upon the personal character and conduct of Tippoo, and his immense hostile preparations, and the known moderation and justice, and perfect sense of honour of Lord Cornwallis, who had, they said, lamented the necessity of taking up arms against the Mysorean. In conformity with these views a resolution was moved, declaring that the conduct of Lord Cornwallis on this occasion accorded with the true spirit and intent of the rules of government established by the British Parliament for the affairs of India; and, after a long and animated debate, in which Pitt took part, this resolution was carried.

The papers relating to the apprehended rupture between Great Britain and Russia, on account of Turkey, had been laid before the House on the 6th of February. On the 13th of that month Mr. Grey complained that large sums had been unnecessarily spent in fitting out an armament, and that the papers produced were incomplete, and did not sufficiently enable the House to examine particulars. He complained that ministers had not produced the preliminaries said to have been adjusted between the Russian and Turkish negotiators, without which no opinion could be formed of the benefits arising from the interference of the British court, supported as it had been by an extensive armament and the apparent determination of employing force. These things, he said, had nearly involved Great Britain in a dangerous and unnecessary war with Russia. Ministers ought also to have given papers to explain the vacillating conduct of the court of Berlin; and, above all, they ought to have presented the account of the expenses attending our formidable armament. Pitt replied, that every paper had been produced that could with propriety be made public; and that the account of the expenses of the late armament was in preparation, and would be laid before the House with all possible dispatch. As for the preliminaries between the two belligerent powers, they had not been officially communicated to our government; but he hoped soon to present to the House a more satisfactory document—the definitive treaty of peace between Russia and the Ottoman Porte. A week later Mr. Grey moved for a more ample production of papers regarding various portions of the recent diplomacy of ministers. He said that, even from the papers they had so stingily laid before the House, there appeared just cause for censuring them for having, without any warrantable motive, engaged in the business, and then relinquished it in a base and pusillanimous manner. Administration had acknowledged that they had not been able to preserve to the Porte the possession of Oczakoff, and yet this had been the great avowed object of our armament. He had been told by ministers that Great Britain stood on such intimate terms with Prussia, that the interests of Turkey, Prussia's ally, could not be relinquished: but our alliance with Prussia was but defensive; and if we were by any secret articles bound to enter more deeply into the views of Prussia, the House ought to know it, in order to guard against mere projects of ambition, which must be inimical to the interests of Great Britain, and tend only to aggrandize other countries at her cost. He called upon ministers to produce the requisitions of the Turks for our assistance and mediation; to produce the entire correspondence between the British and Russian ministers, if they wished to justify the various steps they had taken. In replying to Grey, Pitt said that, though candour and openness between ministry and parliament were commendable and requisite, there were cases which prevented their exercise; that, where other powers were implicated, secrecy became an absolute duty, for otherwise no negotiations could proceed; that he thought, in the present case, the ministry had disclosed enough to make the House master of all the essential parts of the business; and that confidence was due to administration until their capacity or their integrity was impeached. Fox reprobated in severe terms the expectation or demand from parliament of confidence in ministers. He thought that the minister had already exacted a great deal too much confidence, and given too little; that ever since the formation of the present administration, in 1784, there had been a fixed and regular design to tell parliament as little as possible. "Parliament had been made to vote money on confidence, and to pay for extensive armaments without inquiring into the necessity of them: this was assuredly an attack on the fundamental principles of the constitution, on the most important functions of the representatives of the people, whose peculiar duty it was to watch over the money of their constituents. The king, it might be said, had the right of declaring war; but the Commons had the right, as full and as undoubted, of granting or withholding the means of carrying it on." After condemning the uses that had been made of our alliance with Prussia, Fox very daringly declared that the Porte—the poor sultan, who seemed within an inch of ruin—so far from courting, had felt an objection to our interference. He said that he doubted whether there had ever been any necessity for that interference; but that, if such a necessity really existed, it ought to have been explained fully to the House before any expenses were incurred or any steps taken that might have involved us in a war with the empress. The call for fresh papers was negated by a majority of 235 against 120. Lord North (the son of the ex-minister, now Earl of Guildford) not only divided with the minority, but also spoke at considerable length. Mr. Grey, in the course of his speech, made allusion to the constant ministerial plaudits bestowed by ministers and their friends on the British constitution, hoping that they would prove true to that which they praised, and quoted Cowper's celebrated lines—

"We, too, are friends to loyalty. We love
The king who loves the law," &c.

On the same day the same question was agitated with equal vivacity in the House of Lords. The attack was led by Lord Fitzwilliam, who affirmed that the Empress of Russia had been unjustly attacked and forced into this war by the Turks; that, as far back as May, 1790, she had intimated to our government the moderate terms on which she would make peace; that she had been moderate and magnanimous throughout, and that, even after concluding a separate peace with Sweden, which left her free to act with all her force against the Turks, she had adhered faithfully to her first moderate proposals; that, after we had equipped our formidable armament, a negotiation had been set on foot by the British minister at Petersburg in order to secure to Turkey the restoration of Oc-zakoff and a well-fortified frontier on the side of Russia; and that this negotiation had ended by our accepting the very terms which the empress had offered in May, 1790, and in our further agreeing that, if these terms were not accepted by the sultan within four months, the two belligerent powers should be left to terminate their quarrel without any further interference on our part. Thus, urged Lord Fitzwilliam, many months of negotiation and the great sum of money expended on the armament had been thrown away, and during all that time the trade of Great Britain had been exposed to continual hazard; and, what was still worse, the honour and dignity of the nation had suffered a material injury in the eyes of Europe. On the other side it was argued that ministers had managed the difficult business in the very best manner, and had committed no sort of error in interfering to rescue Turkey from the grasp of Russia. It was represented as being manifestly the interest of Great Britain to oppose the aggrandizement of the Russian empire—an empire already too extensive and powerful for the tranquillity and safety of its neighbours. The measures which ministers had pursued, and the armament they had fitted out were also rendered necessary by other and truly critical circumstances: it was highly necessary that we should exert ourselves in order to prevent, in time, the predominance of that naval power which was forming by a potentate who had, in the American war, acted an unfriendly part towards us, and was now again preparing to oppose us, with all her might, upon our own element. Nor was the formidable fleet we had equipped to be considered as a useless parade of our maritime strength. It had carried terror to the heart of Catherine, and imposed upon her some degree of moderation in dealing with the Turks; whereas, if that fleet had not been equipped, she would assuredly have risen in her demands. Lord Fitzwilliam was outvoted by a large majority, 82 to 19. A few days later, on the 27th of February, there was another debate in the Lords on the same subject, which was rendered remarkable and amusing by a speech from Earl Stanhope, who had carried over the congratulations of the Revolution Society to Paris, and who was passionately enamoured of all parts of the French revolution. This eccentric nobleman recommended, as the very best means of maintaining the balance of power in Europe, and preventing the overgrowth of any ambitious state, a close alliance with France, which had, in forming its present system, solemnly forsworn all projects of aggrandizement, and resolved to draw the sword only in a defensive war. These glorious principles, together with all the measures which had been adopted in France since the happy revolution, pointed out that country as the only natural ally of this. Stanhope, who was an experimentalist in natural as well as political philosophy, must have made use of some strange new spectacles or lenses while travelling in France or residing in Paris, for he declared that the French had very zealously copied the British constitution, and that the old antipathy and animosity to the English had entirely disappeared, to give place to the most loving brotherly feeling. On this occasion the opposition only mustered 19 votes against 98. Two days after, on the 29th, the subject was revived in the House of Commons by Mr. Whitbread, who was becoming a considerable man on the Whig side of the House, and who moved the following resolutions:—1. "That no arrangement respecting Oc-zakoff and its district appears to have been capable of affecting the political or commercial interests of this country, so as to justify any hostile interference on the part of Great Britain between Russia and the Porte. 2. That the interference, for the purpose of preventing the cession of the said fortress and its district to the Empress of Russia, has been wholly unsuccessful. 3. That his majesty's ministers, in endeavouring, by means of an armed force, to compel the Empress of Russia to abandon her claim to Oczakoff, and in continuing an armament after the object for which it was proposed had been relinquished, have been guilty of gross misconduct, tending to incur unnecessary expenses, and to diminish the influence of the British nation in Europe." Whitbread exclaimed loudly against the temerity of ministers in lavishing the money of the people in unnecessary and unjustifiable armaments. He condemned what had been said by ministers to exasperate this country against Russia, and declared it to be a well-known fact, that in the armed neutrality set up to injure us during the American war, Russia had been only one among many; that the late King of Prussia, the celebrated Frederick, was the original contriver of that measure, so injurious to England, although the enmity of Prussia seemed now to be utterly forgotten. But Whitbread forgot that Frederick the Great, who had no fleet, could have done nothing in this armed neutrality without the Empress Catherine; and then, again, Frederick the Great was sleeping quietly in the marble vault at Potsdam, and Prussia, under his nephew and successor, was following a policy altogether different from his; while Catherine was still living, reigning, and domineering. He re-asserted that the Turks had rushed into the war to recover possession of the Crimea, which the Russians had fairly conquered in previous campaigns, and which the sultan had ceded to them by a regular treaty. He praised the moderation of the empress, and undervalued the importance of Oczakoff, which had cost so much blood and occasioned so much diplomatic bustle and delay. Because England exported nothing to Oczakoff, and imported nothing from it, he concluded that Oczakoff was not worth any contention, and that ministers must have had another and a hidden motive. After all their bluster, ministers had agreed that Russia should keep Oczakoff. But this concession had been granted because our ally, Prussia, was coveting possession of Danzig and Thorn, which were to be torn lastingly from Poland and given to his Prussian majesty for his consenting to the Russian possession of Oczakoff. Whitbread was seconded by Colonel Macleod, and supported by Grey, Windham, Sheridan, Fox, Francis, and others of the Whig phalanx. The first that rose to oppose his motion was Mr. Jenkinson (afterwards Lord Hawkesbury and Earl of Liverpool), who, on this occasion, delivered his maiden speech in the House, with great applause and effect. He, too, declared that Russia was becoming dangerous to the balance of power and the tranquillity of Europe; and that her plans of conquest on the Turks were notorious. The Turks were accused of having begun the present contest; but were they not justified by the manner in which the Crimea was obtained by Russia, by the revolt promoted in Egypt by the shameful intrigues of Russia, by the haughty and unjust claims set forth by Russia to some of the fairest provinces of the Turkish empire? The power whose position best enabled it to stem this torrent was Prussia; and the British government, by a seasonable alliance, had enabled it to undertake the task of counteracting the schemes of Russia. Britain had already mediated successfully for the Turks in detaching the Emperor of Germany from his Russian alliance and the war against them; and the interposition of Britain between the Turks and Russians, however artfully misrepresented, had obviated the extravagant claims which the empress would indubitably have enforced after the many successes which had attended her arms. He thought, however, the present æra was not calculated for invasions and conquests: a spirit had arisen in Europe decidedly adverse to ambitious views; Great Britain was constitutionally their foe; a stable, unshaken peace was equally her interest and inclination. Dundas made a sharp, telling speech on the same side; and, after several other members had spoken, at a late hour of the night the debate closed by an adjournment of the question till the following day. On the first of March the debate was re-commenced by Mr. Martin, who observed, that wherever much secrecy prevailed, either in public or private transactions, much fraud and deceit might be expected. He was followed by Francis, who said that England was merely serving the interests of Prussia; that all German alliances were particularly to be dreaded, as being always attended with endless and unprofitable expense; that the English character was now to throw aside all steadiness in politics and national pursuits, and adhere only to pecuniary speculations; that the balance of power in Europe was not so much our affair as it was that of the continental powers; that we had lost a great deal of money by our quarrel with Russia, as thereby had arisen a delay of several commercial advantages which might have been obtained from that power, &c. Then Fox rose and delivered one of his longest and most eloquent speeches. He accused Pitt of being guilty of the meanest craft and duplicity, and of having acted in all his foreign negotiations against the honour and the real interests of his country. After taking a review of our foreign policy, from the time of our joining Prussia, in order to prevent Holland becoming the prey of France—a great object, which he applauded at the time, and which he could not censure now—he said that we were standing forward the principals of every quarrel, the Quixotes of every enterprise, the agitators in all the plots, intrigues, and disturbances that were every day arising in Europe. He hurled Oczakoff at the head of the minister with terrible effect. If Oczakoff was an unimportant place, they ought to be censured for having armed and protracted the war on this account; and if Oczakoff was an important place, the key to Constantinople, then they ought to be censured for disarming without having obtained re-possession of it for the Turks. But the reproach came with a bad air from Fox and his party, for their opposition to the armament, and the strong feeling they excited in the country against any war with Russia, had forced ministers to disarm sooner than they wished. Fox drew a flattering picture of the greatness and the steadiness of purpose of the Empress of Russia; and declared that she would have granted better terms to the Turks if we had never armed or interfered at all. Nothing, he said, could be more rash than the minister's foreign policy, or more unconstitutional than his reserve and secrecy with parliament. "This," added he, "is what puts our constitution in danger. That the pride, the folly, the presumption of a single person shall be able to involve a whole people in disgrace is more than philosophy can teach mortal patience to endure. Here are the true weapons of the enemies of our constitution! Here may we search for the source of the present outpouring of seditious writings, meant either to weaken our attachment to the constitution, by depreciating its value, or that loudly tell us we have no constitution at all. We may blame, we may reprobate such doctrines; but, while we furnish those who circulate them with arguments such as these, while the example of this day shows us to what degree the fact is true, we must not wonder if the purposes the seditious writings are meant to answer be but too successful. They argue that a constitution cannot be right where such things are possible; much less so when they are practised without punishment. Against the vain theories of men who project fundamental alterations upon grounds of mere speculative objection I can easily defend the constitution; but when they recur to these facts, and show me how we may be doomed to all the horrors of war by the caprice of an individual, who will not even condescend to explain his reasons, I can only fly to this House, and exhort you to rouse from your lethargy of confidence into the active mistrust and vigilant control which your duty and your office point out to you." Pitt defended himself with as much spirit as Fox had employed in the attack. He again told his great adversary that it was chiefly through him that what had been done well had not been done still better. He asked whether any man conversant in politics could admit that the Turkish empire, if unable by its own intrinsic strength to resist the attacks of its two potent neighbours, Russia and Austria, should be abandoned by the other European powers, every one of which was so visibly interested in the preservation of its independence? But if other powers were indolent and apathetic, or hindered by untoward circumstances, could Great Britain remain inactive and leave Turkey to its fate? Could a British ministry look on with indifference or tranquillity, while her commerce in the Levant was so manifestly threatened, and the maritime power of England, not only in the Mediterranean and Archipelago, but in every other sea, must receive a fatal blow from the immense increase of shipping that would accrue to Russia and Austria, were they to become masters of European Turkey? Russia especially, already formidable at sea, must through the possession of the Black Sea and the Archipelago, and the Straits of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles, which unite those seas, derive such an accession, as might in a short time render her the first maritime power in Europe.* These were considerations which authorised a British minister to act with uncommon energy; for we must not lose the sovereignty of the sea, without which the immediate safety of Great Britain must necessarily become precarious. If the Turks had been the ostensible aggressors in the present war, they had received beforehand provocations from Russia which no people with any remnant of spirit could bear; their subjects had been excited to rebellion by the secret agents of the empress; and the Turks knew—and all the world knew—the ambitious plans, the regular system, which the empress had concerted against the Turkish empire. Nothing, he said, was more obvious than the certainty that, if Great Britain had not assumed that hostile posture of which opposition so unjustly complained, the original demands of the court of Petersburg would have been insisted on to the last, and Turkey would have been forced to submit to a dismemberment. These demands had been made previously to a victorious campaign; and could it be believed that so rapacious a power as Russia would have relinquished such extensive and important provinces as Bessarabia, Moldavia, and Wallachia, after conquering them, unless it had dreaded a contest with the first naval power in the world, which would probably have ended in the annihilation of the Russian navy? Pitt paid back the personalities of Fox, and not without interest, although he made no use at this time of the unjustifiable conduct of the leader of the opposition, in sending an agent of his own to Petersburg to counteract what the king's minister was doing. He said that the party divisions in this country encouraged the temper of resistance to Russia; that unfortunately the enemy had been encouraged by an opposition, who now took merit to themselves for having rendered that useless, which, but for their efforts, would have been attended with full success. But he did not envy them their triumph. There was not a triumph over the enemies of their country, but over the council of their king. And now, as he was on the subject of triumph and popularity, he must observe, that if he and his right honourable friend (Dundas) were to go to the capital of that empire, which opposition had thus served, certain he was that they should not be found in any place of glory between two orators of antiquity! The cut was sharp, and the allusion which gave it its edge was known to all the world, for the Whig newspapers had blazoned the following facts as honourable and glorious both to the English orator and the Russian autocratess. In the summer of 1791, shortly after the strenuous opposition of the Whig party to the Russian armament, Catherine had written with her own hand to her ambassador at London, to request Mr. Fox to sit to Nollekens for a bust in white marble, which she said she meant to place between the statues of Demosthenes and Cicero! Pitt's reference to this bust brought red blood to the swart countenance of Charles Fox, who rose as soon as the minister sat down, and told him that he had said nothing to make him retract the censure which he thought his conduct had deserved. "With regard," said he, "to what the right honourable gentleman has chosen to introduce into his speech, respecting compliments and honours conferred on me by the Empress of Russia, I am ready now and at all times to declare, that if any foreign sovereign, in friendship with this country, shall pay me the compliment to think well of me, and testify it by those marks of distinction to which the right honourable gentleman has alluded, I shall feel myself highly gratified by such distinction." But this plaster could not cover the gash which Fox had received: the great termagant of the North, the Messalina-Semiramis of modern Europe, had never been distinguished by friendly feelings towards this country; she had attempted to inflict a mortal wound upon us during the American war, she had behaved uniformly with an arrogance and an insolence hurtful to our national spirit, and at the moment she chose to pay these well-calculated compliments and honours to the leader of the opposition in the British House of Commons, so far from being in friendship with this country, she and we were in a state of open enmity, and our narrow seas were covered with an armament which a little more obstinacy and a little more insolence on her part would have called to Cronstadt and Petersburg. Nor can we possibly conceive how, under any circumstances, an English statesman could be justified in accepting such honours, even from the most friendly of foreign powers, for his speeches and conduct in the British parliament, upon questions like the present; and still less can we imagine how any friendly sovereign could decently offer these honours to the leader of a party opposed to the government of the day, which alone is recognisable by foreign powers. Assuredly, there was scarcely more indecency in Catherine's sending money and bribes to the poor and factious nobles of Switten, in order to promote their opposition to their sovereign in their diets; or in her caressing and flattering the madly factious nobles of Poland, to keep up anarchy and her own influence in that wretched country: Fox might have made these reflections before sitting to old Nollekens for a bad bust; but he and his party, though professing such an extravagant love for democracy, and such a sympathy for French principles, had long since fallen into a state of admiration for the greatest despot in Europe which is best expressed by the French word engouement; and, forgetting the moral of the old Scotch song, that it is well to be off with an old love before we take on with a new, these men persevered in their passion for the czarina even after they had taken to their hearts that new Dablah, the French revolution. But this bigamous and anomalous connection is not a single isolated instance in liberal politics; for the same party and their successors, though enthusiastic for extreme liberty, fell prostrate before the star and the prestige of Napoleon Bonaparte, the greatest of liberticides. In both cases, no doubt, the prostration was made to successful energy and grandeur of design; and Catherine and Napoleon were also reformers in their way; and the autocratess had cultivated an intercourse with the philosophes and liberals of France, had adopted some of their theories and systems of law and government, though only to let them remain in their chrysalis or theoretic state; and her correspondence with Voltaire and Diderot had gained her wonderful esteem; for what could seem so marvellous and so beautiful as a despotic sovereign courting the correspondence of men of letters, and assuming the language of liberalism and philosophy? The deeds which accompanied and followed, this imperial coquetry, this philanthropy in words and ink, were kept out of sight and out of mind by these infatuated adorers, who continued to applaud Catherine's high wisdom in granting full religious toleration to every sect and community in every part of her immense empire, even after she had wielded the sword of persecution with as remorseless a hand as Simon de Montfort in his crusade against the Albigenses; and who extolled her for abolishing, in her code, capital punishments, though in practice she knouted people to death, and continued for political offenders the unspeakable hardships of Siberian exile. Continuing his answer to Pitt, Fox proclaimed his strong predilection for a close Russian alliance; and declared that he had been steady and consistent in this opinion. "With regard to Russia," said he, "it has ever been my opinion that she was the power in Europe (I will scarcely except even Holland) with which the cultivation of reciprocal ties of friendship, both commercial and political, was most natural, and of the greatest consequence to this country. For the uniformity of this opinion, I appeal to my whole conduct, whether in office or out of it. At the close of the American war, I thought Russia the power whose naval force, joined with ours, might effectually counterbalance the united navies of the house of Bourbon. The gentlemen on the other side have opportunities of knowing to what degree I endeavoured to give effect to this opinion. When I was again in office, I refused to concur in remonstrances to the court of Petersburg against the seizure of the Crimea. These have ever been my sentiments; and I see nothing in what has recently happened to make me change them." The question being then put on Whitbread's first resolution, it was negatived without a division; on his second resolution the previous question was moved and carried; and the third was negatived by 244 against 116.

* In the Greeks, Russia would have obtained the best sailors in the Mediterranean, and subjects most enterprising in commerce, and intelligent and quick in all matters. The community of religious faith between the Greeks and Russians, the harsh and most unwise treatment which the Turks still gave the Greeks, an inveterate hatred of the latter for their Mussulman masters, and their natural proneness to change and political intrigue, made the people of the Morea, the isles, and other parts of Greece, forget the shameful way in which they had been abandoned by Catherine during the preceding insurrection and war, and they were as eager as ever to co-operate with the Russians. In the month of April, 1790, a memorial had been presented to the empress at Petersburg by deputies from the Greek islands, who, in the name of their countrymen, offered the imperial Grecian throne to her second grandson, Constantine. This memorial was strongly marked with the character of the modern Greek people. The deputies began by vituperating a certain cavalier Psaro, the leader of another party of Greeks, who had been for some time in Russia, where he had extracted large sums of money from the empress. "This Psaro," said they, "who now erects himself into a chief and conductor of our people, is a man abhorred by our nation, out of the dregs of which he sprung, and where he would have remained, if he had not with an unheard-of audaciousness deceived your imperial majesty's ministers, and assumed a reputation by attributing to himself exploits he never performed. . . . We assure your imperial majesty that neither he nor any of your officers you sent to us ever paid us a single rouble. The flotilla and the other armaments of Lambro were equipped at our own sole expense. . . . We never asked for your treasures; we do not ask for them now: we only ask for powder and ball, which we cannot purchase, and to be led to battle. We are come to offer our lives and fortunes, not to ask for your treasures. Deign then, O great empress! glory of the Greek faith! deign to read our memorial. Heaven has reserved our deliverance for the glorious reign of your imperial majesty. It is under your auspices that we hope to deliver, from the hands of barbarous Mahomedans, our empire, which they have usurped, and our patriarchate and our holy religion, which they have insulted; to free the descendants of Athens and Lacedæmon from the tyrannic yoke of ignorant savages, under which groans a nation whose genius is not extinguished; a nation which glows with the love of liberty; which the iron yoke of barbarism has not degraded; which has constantly before its eyes the images of its ancient heroes, whose example animates its warriors even to this day. Our superb ruins speak to our eyes, and tell us of our ancient grandeur; our innumerable ports, our beautiful country, the heavens which smile on us all the year, the ardour of our youth, and even of our decrepit elders, tell us that nature is not less propitious to us than it was to our forefathers. Give us then for a sovereign your grandson Constantine; it is the wish of our nation (the family of our ancient emperors is extinct); and we shall become what our ancestors were." And it had been the wish of Catherine from the birth of her second grandson, and from the day on which she named him, as if prophetically, Constantine, that he should sit on the throne of Constantinople.

On the 7th of March the Commons resolved themselves into a Committee of the whole House, to consider of so much of his majesty's speech as related to making a suitable provision for the establishment of their royal highnesses the Duke and Duchess of York. In announcing the marriage of his son the Duke of York, the king had intimated the necessity of increasing that prince's allowance. Parliament voted, in addition to 12,000*l.* a-year already enjoyed by the duke, the further sum of 25,000*l.* a-year. Some murmurs had been raised out of doors at the parsimony of the king of Prussia, who had only given the bride a portion of about 22,000*l.* English, and had stipulated that this money was to be returned to him in case the princess should die before the Duke of York. Some slight opposition was even made in doors to the amount of the annual sum demanded, as the duke, besides his 12,000*l.* a-year, already enjoyed a considerable revenue from the bishopric of Osnaburg, in Hanover, which had been given to him, though a layman and a soldier, as an appanage. But Pitt said that parliament ought not to discuss this matter; and Fox observed, that in a monarchical government such as England, founded on the preference given to it by the people over all other forms of government, the splendour with which they loved to see it attended required that every branch of the royal family should be maintained with suitable magnificence. It was also agreed, without any difficulty, that the Duchess of York should have a "private revenue" of 4000*l.* a-year, and that a sum of 8000*l.* per annum should be settled on her royal highness in case she should survive the duke. In the course of the debate several allusions were made to the Prince of Wales, who was again seriously embarrassed with debt. Fox said that as the prince's name had been mentioned, he would just say a few words respecting his income, which he contended was proportionably much less than that of any of the younger branches of the family, much less than that of former Princes of Wales, and perfectly inadequate to the expenses of his establishment. He said that George, Prince of Wales, afterwards George II., had 100,000*l.* per annum; and Frederick, Prince of Wales, father of George III., had likewise for some part of his life 100,000*l.*, and that he had not always so large a sum was a circumstance of regret, and occasioned consequences that would reflect honour on no part of the country or government. [Among other things, Fox meant that Frederick, Prince of Wales, had died in debt, and that his debts had never been paid.] He was sure that the present Prince of Wales was the only part of the family that had received no increase to his income; although, in the meantime, the privy purse had been increased from 6000*l.* to 60,000*l.*, and the civil list from 600,000*l.* to 900,000*l.* He never had been one who wished to take from the splendour of monarchy. With regard to the principle of the present vote, he wished it might be a principle to provide as liberally for the other branches of the royal family, when in similar situations with the Duke of York. To those who thought otherwise, he would ask, whether they were sorry for the flourishing increase of his majesty's family and the Brunswick line? Certainly, if this was the case, they acted most hypocritically, for scarce a year had passed that they had not carried up the most fervent congratulatory addresses to the throne upon the birth of another prince or princess!

This matrimonial alliance tended to strengthen that political alliance with Prussia which George III. had so much at heart. As the Prince of Wales continued his connection with Mrs. Fitzherbert, as perhaps there were still some doubts in the mind of the king as to the nature of that connection, George III. appears to have been the more eager to get his second son married. The union proved an unproductive one; but in other respects it was not much unhappier than the general run of royal marriages.

When the House went into committee to consider the state of the finances of the country, on the 17th of February, Pitt made another most hopeful speech, representing the country as being in the most flourishing condition. The increase of the revenue would, he said, enable government to take off taxes, bearing chiefly upon the poorer classes, to the amount of 200,000*l.*, and to apply 200,000*l.* more to increase the sinking fund for paying off the national debt. But, eminent as was the degree of prosperity and happiness to which this country had attained, it had not yet reached that summit of grandeur and felicity which lay within the reach of its industry, energy, and manifold advantages. But to reach this summit we must have tranquillity and order at home, and peace abroad; and he was happy to be able to confirm the language of the king's speech, and to assert that unquestionably there never was a time when a durable peace might more reasonably be expected than at the present moment. At the conclusion of the debate the House resolved, without a division, that, from the 5th day of April,—1. The additional duty on malt should be taken off. 2. The new duties on male and female servants should cease and determine. 3. The duties upon waggons, wains, carts, and other such carriages, should be taken off. 4. The taxes now payable on inhabited houses, containing less than seven windows or lights, should cease. 5. A halfpenny in the pound of the duty upon all candles (except wax and spermaceti) should be taken off. And in the committee of supply on the same day the House resolved to grant to his majesty the sum of 400,000*l.*, to be issued and paid to the governor and company of the Bank of England, to be by them placed to the account of the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt. As reductions in taxation, or as instalments for the great debt, these things were sufficiently trifling; but they afforded a prospect of greater things; and a good part of the nation had never been more sanguine in their hopes than at this moment, when we were on the very verge of the most costly of all wars, which increased the national debt by processes far surer and infinitely more rapid than the action of Pitt's or Price's compound interest system, which was to have extinguished the debt altogether. And it was no light conviction which rendered popular a war that was to destroy all these bright financial hopes and shut out the prospect of that Land of Promise, a country without a creditor, with a people flourishing under a minimum taxation.

During the session Wilberforce again brought the subject of negro slavery before the House. He had devoted his life to it, and during the recess he and his friends had made unwearying exertions, wherein at times zeal perhaps had been allowed to outrun political discretion. Some of the abolitionists had determined to use no sugar except such as came from the East Indies, where African slavery was not; some of them left off sugar entirely and completely; and some began to form regular associations to stop the consumption of all West India produce. This would have interfered very materially with the revenue and with his friend Pitt's statements and hopes; and when Wilberforce was applied to—the abolitionists seem to have consulted him on all points connected with this great business, and to have adhered to his opinion as decisive and imperative—he, though at first disposed to recommend the association, decided, upon maturer consideration, that it would be better to suspend the measure until, if necessary, it might be adopted with effect by general concurrence. The dreadful news of massacres and burnings in the French part of the island of St. Domingo, the use the negro slaves were making there of their new-found liberty, the dread that these troubles and enormities might spread to Jamaica and our other West India islands, the knowledge that Brissot and the other French friends of the blacks were amongst the fiercest of the revolutionists of Paris—were men inimical to all thrones and all altars—threw a damp on the new philanthropy, and indisposed both the king and his minister to Wilberforce's extensive innovations. Pitt “threw out” against his making any motion this year, on account of what had happened in St. Domingo; and no doubt the chancellor of the exchequer was ruffled by the threatened associations against the use of produce which afforded so much revenue. Matters were made worse by not a few of the abolitionists professing an admiration for the French revolution and its principles. These were mostly men of religious lives, and even of an exalted devotion, but they dissented, for the most part, from the church of England; and, as the French Jacobins professed to be most friendly to the abolition, to be as enthusiastic as themselves, they seemed to forget their blunders and their madness, their vices, and even their loud-toned irreligion; and, agreeing in one great point, they were too ready with their expressions of sympathy as to others. All this Wilberforce saw operated to the injury of the cause. Of his most active co-operator, Clarkson, he was terribly afraid. He implored Lord Muncaster, another active friend of the blacks, to caution Clarkson against talking so much about the French revolution, saying that that would ruin their cause. Dr. Milner, another champion, after an interview with Clarkson, wished him “better health and better notions in politics;”—“for,” added the doctor, “no government can stand on such principles as he appeals to and maintains. I am very sorry for it, because I see plainly advantages taken of such cases as his, in order to represent the friends of abolition as levellers.” Clarkson, it appears, was in the habit of attending popular meetings at taverns and public places; and he had been present, the preceding summer, at the great dinner at the Crown and Anchor tavern to celebrate the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille. Dundas said to Wilberforce, in his bluff manner, “What business had your friend Clarkson to attend the Crown and Anchor last Thursday? He could not have done a more mischievous thing to the cause which you have taken in hand.” The name of Thomas Paine, as an abolitionist, gave an increase of discredit to the cause, and deprived Wilberforce of not a few votes. Nevertheless, the House having resolved itself into a committee on the African slave-trade, Wilberforce, on the 2nd of April, moved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the trade carried on by British subjects, for the purpose of procuring slaves from Africa, ought to be entirely abolished." In a speech, which was exceedingly admired, he declared that he would never abandon this business until he had obtained his object; he intimated that, if he carried his present motion, he would immediately follow it up by another, "That the chairman be directed to move the House for leave to bring in a bill for the abolition of the slave-trade." He was strenuously opposed by Jenkinson, Colonel Tarleton, and others, who defended the traffic, and declared that our West India islands would be useless without the slave-trade. These gentlemen also treated with great contempt the petitions against the traffic with which Wilberforce and his friends had loaded the table, saying that many of the signatures were those of raw youths, ignorant and inexperienced persons, or needy individuals who wrote their names for money. The motion was supported by Henry Thornton, Montague, Whitbread, and by the two illustrious rivals, Pitt and Fox, who, according to Wilberforce, "displayed more energy and ability than were almost ever exerted in the House of Commons."* Even in the imperfect manner in which they are reported, the two orations read admirably. Pitt's fast friend and brother-minister Dundas, who had recently become secretary of state by the resignation of the Duke of Leeds, opposed immediate abolition as dangerous and impracticable, and recommended a middle course, which he thought might reconcile the interests of the West India islands with the eventual abolition of the trade; and he moved that the word "gradual" should be inserted before the word "abolition." And the committee adopted this amendment by a majority of 68, the numbers being 193 against 125. Wilberforce felt hurt and humiliated. "We must now," said he, "endeavour to force, on these gradual abolitionists in their bill, for I will never myself bring forward a parliamentary licence to rob and murder." Some of his adherents exclaimed, without any moderation, against Dundas. A dignity of the church assured him that nobody thought well of Dundas—that duplicity and artifice were esteemed parts of Dundas's character, &c. On the 4th of April, Wilberforce, upon being asked whether he meant to bring in a gradual abolition bill, declared that he neither would nor could do anything of the sort; that he could not sanction for a time that which it was his deep and firm conviction ought not to endure one moment longer; that it was for his right honourable friend (Dundas), or for some of those who had supported him in his gradual abolition opinions, to follow up a measure which he disclaimed, and bring in a bill. Dundas replied, that the abolition of the slave-trade was Wilberforce's own object; that he had no bill to bring forward, nor could have any, as much the greater part of the plan which he thought best must be carried into effect by the internal legislatures of the different West India islands. Fox here fell upon Dundas with his usual warmth, telling him that the House had expected a regular bill from him before this; that having defeated Mr. Wilberforce's motion for immediate abolition, he was bound to bring in his plan of gradual abolition; and that the House would be insulted, and Dundas himself, and those who had voted with him, disgraced, if they did not bring in a bill forthwith. Dundas retorted that Fox was rude; that it was his opinion that the House and the Colonial Assemblies ought to act together in the business of abolition; that he was confident the slave-trade could not be got rid of until we had the concurrence of the Colonial Assemblies; that he was not prepared to bring in any bill; and that he thought it was unreasonable to expect him, within twenty-four hours after the discussion of the question had been closed, to bring forward any digested system. He added, however, that it was his intention to bring forward certain resolutions for the gradual abolition of the trade. But, as he fixed no day, Fox taxed him with a design of losing the present session, and moved that on the 18th of April the House would resolve itself into a committee to consider of measures to be taken for the abolition of the trade. This motion was seconded by Wilberforce himself, and was agreed to. The committee was, however, postponed till the 23rd, when Dundas produced twelve resolutions, to the effect that all that branch of the trade which was not applicable to the direct supply of the British West India islands should cease instantly; that, in order to prevent the importation of aged negroes into the colonies, no males past the age of twenty-five, nor females exceeding twenty, should henceforward be exported from Africa in British bottoms; that the whole tonnage employed in the slave-trade should be limited and strictly ascertained; that the duty on negroes imported into the colonies should be increased; that laws should be enacted for punishing the white people who maltreated the blacks, &c.; that the colonial legislatures should be invited to concur in these humane measures; and that the period of abolition should be fixed for the year 1800. These resolutions were warmly opposed by Wilberforce, and also by Pitt and Fox. An amendment was moved substituting the 1st of January, 1793, for the 1st of January, 1800; but this was rejected by 161 against 121. The abolitionists, however, carried the 1st of January, 1796, by a majority of nineteen, the numbers being 151 against 132. These debates ran through several days. On the 1st of May, when the question came again before the House, Dundas declared that he could not propose the adoption of his resolutions by the House as they had been amended by the committee. They were, therefore, moved by Pitt, and, being passed, they were sent up on the following day to the Lords. Here the friends of immediate abolition were few, and the number of those opposed to any abolition very considerable. One of the king's sons, Prince William, Duke of Clarence, who in the course of his naval training had visited the West India islands, who had lived among the planters and their slaves, and who conceived that that state of society did not justify the dreadful pictures which had been drawn of it by Clarkson and Wilberforce and the rest of the abolitionists, spoke against their projects with that facility of elocution which appears to have been inherent in all the sons of George III. Some men, who were critics in parliamentary oratory, thought that this young and royal sailor only required a little study to become an excellent speaker. His highness of Clarence was joined by Lord Chancellor Thurlow, Lords Stormont and Hawkesbury, and the Bishop of St. David's, the learned Dr. Horsley. As a sure means of delaying the business, they proposed a committee for the hearing of evidence at the bar of the House. This was vigorously opposed by Lords Grenville, Porchester, Stanhope, and Rawdon, and by the Bishop of London, Dr. Beilby Porteus, who called for an upstairs committee, knowing it would answer their purpose much better than the examination of witnesses at the bar. The resolution of the anti-abolitionists was carried, and was in itself equivalent to a direct vote, which followed on the 5th of June, when the business was formally postponed till the next session. Wilberforce always complained that it was to Dundas's fatal appeal to the principle of gradual abolition that he chiefly owed the defeat of his first assault, and the twenty years' continuance of the murderous traffic; but men less enthusiastic in the cause will confess that immediate abolition, if not an impossibility, was a measure which would have been attended with great difficulties and probably with convulsions. His disappointment seemed almost to affect his loyalty, for he further complained of St. James's and the "Guelph family" being against him.*

* Wilberforce added—"Windham, who has no love for Pitt, tells me that Fox and Grey, with whom he walked home after the debate, agreed with him in thinking Pitt's speech one of the most extraordinary displays of eloquence they had ever heard. For the last twenty minutes he really seemed to be inspired. He was dilating upon the future prospects of civilizing Africa, a topic which I had suggested to him in the morning."—Letter to Mr. Hey, in Life, by his Sons.

The disgraceful state of the police of the metropolis, and especially of the largest portion of it not included in the verge and jurisdiction of the City of London, had long been a subject of complaint; and all men felt that the old unpaid (or unsalaried), for they got money and drove a trade in fees) justices of the peace were altogether inadequate to the discharge of the immense and almost daily increasing duties imposed upon them by a most rapidly increasing population. During the present session, at the beginning of March, a bill proposing to remedy the evil was introduced into the House of Commons with the countenance and approbation of government. The plan of the bill was to open five different police-offices in the metropolis, for the prompt administration of those parts of justice within the cognizance of justices of the peace. Three justices were to sit in each of these new offices, with a salary of 300*l.* a year to each of them. These justices were to be prohibited from the taking of fees individually; and the fee-money paid into all the offices was to be put into a common stock, and to be applied to the payment of their salaries and official expenses. A new power was also to be vested in constables and magistrates; for the first were to be enabled to apprehend people who did not give a satisfactory account of themselves, and the justices were empowered to commit them as vagabonds. Although every one (the rogues and vagabonds excepted) felt that some change was necessary, strong objections were taken to this bill: it was urged that the vesting the appointment of these new magistrates in the crown would give an unconstitutional increase of strength to government, and that the summary arrest and commitment of any individual was an infringement on personal liberty, and contrary to the spirit of the constitution. Fox, Windham, and Sheridan spoke loudly against it; and Dundas, Wilberforce, and some others as loudly in its favour. The advocates of the bill represented that it was meant as an experiment, as was proved by the limited time proposed for its duration; that if it was found to work well it might remain, but that in the contrary case parliament might either amend it or annul it. Being carried through the Commons, it was opposed in the Lords by Loughborough and Rawdon; but it was supported by the Chancellor and by Lords Grenville, Kenyon, and Sydney, and was passed by the usual strong ministerial majority.

A bill brought in for enclosing several parts of the New Forest in Hampshire gave rise to a hot debate and not a few personal attacks. The preamble of the bill stated, correctly enough, that the commissioners of the crown lands had recommended serious attention to the necessity of promoting the growth of proper timber for the British navy; but, as Pitt's adherent and man of all work, Mr. George Rose, the son of a poor Scotch clergyman, who had attained to the profitable post of secretary to the Treasury, was supposed to have had a hand in the bill, and was known to have a house and a small estate in the neighbourhood of the New Forest, the opposition chose to consider the bill as being made solely with a view to his private benefit: they harangued against the many sinecures he had already obtained from his bounteous friend the minister; they spoke of his wealth as being already immense, and they stigmatised the whole thing as a barefaced, infamous job. As the newspapers, pamphleteers, and satirists or squib-writers took up the subject, as Mr. Rose was very unpopular (he was one of the objects of Peter Pindar's constant attacks), a terrible outry was raised and kept up out of doors ; and it was thought expedient to withdraw the bill. The national utility of its principle was, however, admitted, and it was allowed that the personal character of the motives at present attributed to the measure ought not to prevent the future attention of parliament to the important subject. Not satisfied with this blow, the opposition pickled a fresh rod for the servant and friend of the minister, whose services in the House of Commons as an acute and ready debater were of no small value to Pitt. During the preceding summer Mr. Rose had been pursued in a court of law by a publican in Westminster named Smith,* for a debt said to have been contracted at the last Westminster election. Mr. Thompson rose in the House of Commons on the 13th of March to state that from the evidence produced on that trial it appeared that Mr. Rose had unduly interfered in the late election of a member for Westminster, and had first bought over Mr. Smith the publican, who had some time before been fined fifty pounds for an offence against the excise laws, by using his influence and causing that fine to be remitted. Thompson observed, that the jury had given a verdict for Smith ; and he declaimed against the heinousness of such conduct in a secretary of the treasury, who, not satisfied with using his influence and spending his own money, could spend the money of the public in purchasing votes for the iniquitous purpose of packing a parliament. He moved, in consequence, that the House should resolve itself into a committee to inquire into the abuses of which persons in office had been guilty in the Westminster election, &c. The motion was seconded by Mr. Lambton, who stated another dark electioneering transaction. One Hoskins, he said, being in prison for infringing the lottery act, informed the solicitor for that department that he would procure fifty or sixty votes for Lord Hood, the ministerial candidate for Westminster, whom Mr. Rose had worked for, if they would only get him out of prison upon bail. The man's request was granted, but he produced such tattered demeritons for his bail, that, notwithstanding the recommendation of the solicitor, they were rejected. Subsequently, however, means were found to get this ill-conditioned bail accepted ; Hoskins got his liberty and sixty votes for Lord Hood—"and from that time until this season," nothing more had been heard either of Hoskins or of his bail. If, said Lambton, such proceedings are connived at, if the laws can be thus eluded or suspended at pleasure by individuals, there can be no use in enacting laws. The secretary of the treasury, who was present to speak in his own defence, and who lacked not the ability of doing it with effect, explained that Smith the publican had been fined for brewing small beer for the use of his own family ; that the vestry of his parish had consented to remit their share of the penalty ; but that the board of excise, to which he (Rose) had referred his petition for a like indulgence, had refused it—a sufficient proof, he thought, of the little efficacy of his interposition. Mr. Rose acknowledged that during the last general election he had indeed had some dealings with Smith the publican ; but the object of them was not to get votes for Lord Hood, but to get at the knowledge of the bad votes that were given to his lordship's opponents. He said that Smith had proposed to open his house, and had informed him that he could discover a great number of illegal votes given to Lord Townshend, one of the opposition candidates ; that on his (Rose's) assent, Smith had detected a good many illegal voters ; that Smith had applied to him for a reward, and that he had referred him to Lord Hood's committee ; and that, this not satisfying Smith, he had sued him in a court of law, and had won his cause. But did any man in his senses suppose that if he had felt the least consciousness of being really indebted to Smith, he would have suffered the cause to have gone into a court of justice ? Most certainly he would not. He referred to the common and notorious practice of all parties keeping open public-houses during elections, and drew a distinction between feasting and filling men with drink in order to find out what was illegal, and filling them with drink and feasting them in order to procure their votes. His assailants produced a letter which he had written to Smith, inviting him to his own private house to meet Mr. Vivian, the solicitor to the excise, on the business of the fifty pound fine, and they insisted that this letter was proof enough of his having improperly interested himself in the matter. But Thompson's motion for a committee of the whole House was negatived on a division by a majority of 221 against 84. Everywhere bribery and corruption from all parties, and undue influences on the part of government, were manifest ; but it was in Scotland, the country of Rose and of the greater Dundas, that these latter influences were most openly practised. The occasion was very favourable : the people were much excited against George Rose, and it seemed but a continuation of the same exciting story to take up the case of the monstrously corrupt boroughs of Rose's native country. The initiative was intrusted to the ready-tongued Sheridan, who, on the 18th of April, moved for an inquiry into the grievances complained of and petitioned against by the royal burghs in Scotland. The number of these burghs was sixty-six, and the popular party in fifty of them had petitioned parliament for redress. They complained of infringements both on their rights and on their property, through the unlawful authority of their municipalities or corporations, who were self-elected, and against whose usurped power and corruption no formal law had provided a remedy. The main grievance was considered to lie in the self-election of the magistrates in these burghs, and Sheridan required that this practice should be abolished. He said, it had been objected to that abuses of a like kind existed in England; but he could not consider that this was an argument to justify abuses in either country. He had also been told that the courts of law in Scotland might be resorted to for a remedy; but, on consulting those who knew the country and the subject, he had been assured that those courts could afford no remedy whatever. Knowing that at this moment there was a dread of every change or innovation, however innocent in its tendency, Sheridan tried to disarm this principle; but he spoke in a manner to exasperate rather than allay the general fear. He well knew, he said, that numbers were deterred by what had happened in France from countenancing changes in government; but the French revolution, considered in itself, and abstracted from the disturbances which its enemies had occasioned, was an event which must prove beneficial both to France and England: the French were delivered from despotism, and the English were freed from the fatal effects of the ambitious government of that kingdom while under an absolute monarchy. We were, moreover, through this revolution and the promise and assurance of peace it held forth, left at leisure to take in hand the reform of the many abuses which through apathy and negligence had been allowed to creep into our own constitution. And, according to Sheridan, instead of being a bad time, this was the very best season that could possibly be chosen for changes and improvements. The lord-advocate for Scotland* defended the corporations and the magistrates of the royal burghs from the charges brought against them; but he admitted in part one of Sheridan's complaints, acknowledging that there was no court in Scotland which could compel the magistrates of burghs to produce their accounts; and he said that, if a specific proposition were brought forward to remedy this defect, he would most willingly support it, provided it did not interfere with the general constitution of the burghs as established by long usage and practice. As to the power of self-election, as it was termed, the lord-advocate protested he would never countenance its abolition, nor any change in it, as it had worked well and was sufficiently restrained by public opinion. He entirely disbelieved the irregularities and dilapidations imputed to the magistrates; but, if such things were really committed by them, the case might be brought before the court of session, where redress would be afforded. Fox gave the lord-advocate a terrible mauling for resisting the inquiry, and for meeting the assertions contained in forty-six petitions then actually before the House by nothing but contradiction and counter-assertions. If things were as right as the lord-advocate affirmed, why should he resist an inquiry which would only prove and satisfactorily establish the fact? He (Fox) had a high respect for the inhabitants of North Britain on account of their integrity and abilities; but he would not pay them such a compliment as to suppose that there were no abuses in any of their burghs, while he knew there were so very many in England; he could not believe that in a country where, he was told, there existed no check, matters could be better conducted than where there were many checks. The petitioners, a numerous body of persons, complained that money was taken out of their pockets which ought not to be taken, that from the way in which the magistrates were elected there was no possibility of examining into their conduct, &c.; and he was most decidedly of opinion that there was ground for inquiry. If there was to be no inquiry, what character for freedom could the inhabitants of North Britain have? If the abuses did not really exist, still the House ought to peruse the papers which so much pains had been taken to collect; and let them afterwards declare and proclaim the enormous falsehoods they contained, if such should be the result of the inquiry. If the House refused to go into this inquiry, they would break their promise with the public, for they stood pledged by a resolution of last year to enter upon the subject. He hoped the inhabitants of North Britain loved the substance of liberty too well to permit the abuses they complained of to continue for any considerable length of time. He knew very well that every reform was now called a subversion by the enemies of reform, but this ought not to deter other men from entering into inquiry. If the present outcry were to have this effect, no evils would be prevented, no grievance redressed, and matters might come to a pitch when there really would be subversion instead of reform. When it was said that there was no peculiar hardship to the people of North Britain, inasmuch as many boroughs in England were in no better condition than the royal burghs in Scotland, it called to his mind the pleasing recollection of what had once been said by a friend of his (Burke), a person whom he had once the pleasure of calling his friend, who of late had absented himself much from that House, but who had often adorned it with his eloquence and informed it by his wisdom, although he now was pleased to retire from its debates. His right honourable friend (personally he must still call him so) had made a most excellent observation on a point somewhat similar to this during the debates upon the American taxation, which led to the American war; when some persons had maintained that it was no peculiar hardship on the Americans that the British House of Commons should vote taxes upon them without allowing them the right of representation in parliament, as the case was precisely the same with Birmingham and Manchester and other great towns at home, his right honourable friend had exclaimed—"Why do you deal with these people thus? Why do you deal out our own defect for their imitation?" But still the general dread prevailed. One member declared very solemnly, that, if they began changing, there was no knowing where they might stop, and that he had made up his mind always to oppose every motion for a reform, of whatever nature it might be. Retiring before the storm, Sheridan withdrew his first motion, and then merely moved, "That the several petitions and other accounts and papers presented to this House in the last parliament, relative to the internal government of the royal burghs in Scotland, be referred to the consideration of a committee;" which was negatived by 69 against 27.

"For the work and labour, care, diligence, and attendance of the plaintiff during the late contested election for Westminster." Erskine, now in the House of Commons and a distinguished member of the Whig party, was counsel for the plaintiff, and did not miss so favourable an opportunity for bespattering the public functionary. It appeared clearly on the trial that Smith had been employed to detect bad votes, and that he had detected above six hundred. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff to the whole amount of his demand.—Trial of George Rose, Esq., in the year 1791, &c.

Twelve days after this assault on the royal burghs of Scotland an attack was made on the rotten boroughs of England, and the standard of an extensive parliamentary reform was hoisted. A loud stir had been made out of doors by the various and increasing political societies, who made up for the comparative smallness of the number of their converts by their enthusiasm and activity. In addition to the Revolution and Constitution Societies, who continued to talk in a very high strain, and to commend the French revolution at least as much as they had done in 1790, two other societies now took the field—one, the Corresponding Society, which entered into a most friendly intercourse with the French Girondists and Ultra-Jacobins, and which professed to pursue nothing less than annual parliaments and universal suffrage—the other, the Friends of the People (an unhappily chosen name), which simply proposed, in general terms, the reform of the representation. This latter association counted among its members many opulent merchants, many literary men, and from thirty to forty noblemen and members of the House of Commons.* Grey, Sheridan, and Lord Lauderdale, who have been considered as the founders of this association, gave in their names at the first starting of the society, and frequently attended its meetings, and spoke at them in a very popular and very exciting style—at times in a style which might have been dangerous, if Englishmen had only been as readily ignited by oratory as Frenchmen were. It was precisely because more men of character and eminence belonged to this society of the Friends of the People than to any of the others that it was most dreaded by that formidable majority of the nation opposed to change, whose fanaticism in loyalty or toryism kept pace at least with the fanaticism of the other party, and who, being far too hot and zealous and angry to draw nice distinctions, confounded together the views and objects of all these political societies. These men set up the king against the people; the relative constitutional position of the two was entirely lost sight of by both parties, and it was everywhere King versus People and People versus King. The Society of the Friends of the People, with parliamentary reform for their motto and their theme, met rather frequently, and published their sentiments, and the resolutions they came to at their meetings, with great spirit and freedom, and to the manifest discomfort of the king and his loyal subjects, who could see in these demonstrations nothing less than a palpable imitation of the Jacobin Club in Paris. This was enough to call up a tremendous array in parliament against the question of parliamentary reform, which the society resolved to bring forward in the course of the present session, though, from the spirit prevailing in the majority, there was scarcely the hope of their being able to reform so much as a corrupt vestry or a parish poor-house, and although any demand from a society and party in such bad odour was sure to strengthen the cause it opposed. Conformably to the plan of the Society, Mr. Grey rose, on the 30th of April, to make a stirring speech on the subject; and to give notice that he intended, in the following session, to move regularly for a parliamentary reform. He founded the propriety of some such measure on the opinion of the two leading men in that House. Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt had both declared themselves unequivocally to be parliamentary reformers, and he was quite certain that the majority of the nation were of the same opinion. The critical state of the times, instead of shelving such questions, called imperatively for their discussion and settlement. If a general discontent was to be avoided, they must put an end to the incessant complaints of the people, at being misrepresented in parliament, and made the instruments of ministerial projects in which their interests were sacrificed to the ambitious views of their superiors. This called up Pitt, who inveighed with uncommon heat against the designs of the Friends of the People, and against the designs of the other clubs and societies, whom he taxed with aiming at a revolution. This, he said, was no time for moving questions that involved the peace and safety, and endangered the constitution of the kingdom. He was no enemy to a reform obtained peaceably and by a general concurrence; but he thought the present time highly improper, and the national sentiment decidedly inimical to any such attempt. It was true, he had, at the conclusion of the American war, thought a parliamentary reform immediately necessary to quiet the clamour and confusion which had arisen from the dread of an approaching bankruptcy, and to unite both parliament and people in cordial endeavours to prevent so dreadful an evil. But, however much he might, in earlier life, have been inclined to promote schemes of reform, experience had taught him the danger of altering the established form of government. He reprobated the whole class of revolutionary writers that had recently sprung up in England, and that were labouring might and main to recommend and bring about an imitation of that revolution in a neighbouring country which certainly did not seem to promise good government, peace, and happiness. Fox, whose own real notions of parliamentary reform were of a most limited kind—Fox, who, in his quieter hours, shuddered at the idea of depriving the great whig aristocracy of their property in boroughs, &c.—rose to reply to Pitt, whose speech had been very enthusiastically applauded. He said, he knew that, within the walls of that House, the words “Parliamentary reform” were very unpopular, but he believed the public regarded them very differently. He begged it to be remembered that he had never professed to be so sanguine upon this subject as the right honourable gentleman who had just spoken; but, although less sanguine, he was a little more consistent; for he had, early in public life, formed an opinion of the necessity of some parliamentary reform, and he remained to this hour fully convinced of that necessity. The danger which then existed to the liberty of the people existed still. The chancellor of the exchequer had, year after year, made speeches in favour of parliamentary reform. He had followed it up to the year 1785, when all his ardour forsook him. The cause, the necessity for this reform, so far from diminishing, had been progressively increasing, and had increased more than ever in the last session of parliament. The proceedings of that House were too often at variance with the opinion of the public. There had been the Russian armament carried by a ministerial majority against the will of the people. The people of England were at this moment paying the expenses of an armament for which they never gave their consent, and, as far as that went, they paid their money for not being represented in parliament. He knew it was not agreeable to the House to hear it, but he would repeat it—unless something was soon done to quiet the minds of the people, there would soon be some difficulty in preserving the internal tranquillity of this kingdom! If among the allies of his honourable friend (Grey) there were infuriated republicans, among the allies of the minister there were slaves of despotism! As to the books lately published upon principles of government, he could only say that he had not read many of them. There were, indeed, two well-known pamphlets, written by a gentleman, who had distinguished himself as an author during the American war, a native of that country, of the name of Thomas Paine.* One of these pamphlets he certainly had read; and he must say, that, whatever merit might be met with in that publication, he could not suppose we were so far reduced as to be in any great danger from the abuse of a foreigner; nor because, perhaps (he did not remember seeing it, by the bye), the word “reform” was to be seen in the “Rights of Man,” that therefore all those who thought a reform necessary agreed with the general tendency of that book. The truth was, the book called the “Rights of Man” was a performance totally different from all ideas of reform in our government. It went the length of changing the form of it. Why, then, should those who profess reverence for the constitution of this country be charged with having taken up the sentiments contained in a book that was a libel on it? [Because, we would say, these political societies were constantly applauding the author, and recommending and circulating the book.] As to innovation, the greatest innovation that could be introduced in the constitution of England would be to come to a vote that there should be no innovation in it. The greatest beauty of the constitution was, that in its very principle it admitted of perpetual change and improvement, which time and circumstances render necessary. It was a constitution, the chief excellence of which consisted in admitting a perpetual reform. Much had been obliquely insinuated as to the supposed terrific situation of France; but he would observe that the whole government of that country was so detestable, that the most moderate man he ever heard in his life had agreed, that, if it could be proved that vast improvements could not be introduced into it, the whole of it ought to be overthrown at once. The French revolution was therefore justified, and therefore there did not appear to him so much danger from the supposed contagion of French example. To dread similar danger we should be in similar circumstances, which was nothing like the case. Why, then, shut the door against reform on account of this imaginary danger? He taxed all the accounts received of the calamities of the French, and of the defectiveness of their present form of government, with malicious exaggeration. Pitt, he said, had, in his warmth, outrun himself, when he held forth Great Britain as the only country exempted from despotism and anarchy, and in possession of undisturbed liberty. Surely France had entirely changed a detestable government; and Poland was no longer under a despotism; and America was in the full enjoyment of liberty—a liberty which had produced justice, commerce, wealth, and prosperity. He believed the world to be rapidly improving in science, in knowledge, and in virtue; and, as philosophy was spreading her light around every part of the globe, he hoped England alone would not remain without improvement, and enveloped in the darkness of bigotry. If his honourable friend (Grey) had consulted him, he should have hesitated before he recommended him to take the part he had taken at this moment ; but, having taken it, he could not see why the present period was improper for the discussion. Burke, who was this night present in the House, rose under great excitement to reply to Fox, and to stigmatize the society of the Friends of the People, and the other political societies of this class. He allowed that the object at which some of them aimed might not be altogether bad, and that the motives of individuals, in many instances, were doubtless innocent ; but he told them that the way they went to work was decidedly wrong, that the sense of the people had not been taken or declared on the subject, that no specific grievance had been pointed out, no specific remedy assigned ; and that, without these things being explicitly set forth, there might be innovation attempted, but it would not be reform. He asked whether any member of these societies, who gave himself the trouble to think at all, could imagine that, if a design of this nature was partially begun, it would stop there, or that it would be possible to control its progress ? Our House of Commons was not perfect, was not wholly pure ; but he believed it to be in the main as good as human nature would permit it to be. "At any rate, while he could raise a voice or an arm to prevent it, it should never assimilate to the National Assembly. In that body there were 700 members, 400 of whom were lawyers, 300 of no description that he could name ; and, out of the whole, he believed there were not a dozen who possessed, in any one way, a hundred pounds per annum. Such might be the perfection of representation in the eyes of some, nay, he understood it to be the opinion of many of the new sect in politics ; but he trusted to the good sense of the people of England never to permit such a mob, nor anything resembling it, to usurp the sacred office of their legislature." At present, he said, England abounded in factious men, who, deluded by visionary speculations, were longing to realize them at any cost, and would readily plunge the country into blood and confusion, for the sake of establishing the fanciful systems of government they were enamoured of. The disseverance in the Whig party now began to show itself strongly : Windham, one of the most eloquent and accomplished men of that party, and one whose high character for independence and perfect disinterestedness gave a triple weight to his eloquence and classic wit, warmly seconded Burke. Fox corrected Burke, who had spoken of him as having termed Paine's 'Rights of Man' an infamous and seditious libel. He had not, he said, applied those epithets to it, although he had called it a libel against the constitution. He had read, he added, but one of Mr. Paine's pamphlets, and did not approve of it, and, from what he had heard of the other, he was inclined to think that he should not approve of that either ; but he was not certain whether the pamphlets had not done good, by leading men to consider of the constitution. In like manner the book of his right honourable friend (Burke), which he disliked as much as either of them, had, he believed, done some good ; because, in his opinion, whatever led to the discussion of the subject must be of service. This parallel of the 'Rights of Man' and the 'Reflections' was irritating and in the worst taste possible ; and the great care taken to avoid the appearance of any severity of criticism upon Thomas Paine and his doings did not escape notice.

* The number of members of the House of Commons that signed the first declaration and address of the Society, on the 28th of April, 1792, was twenty-eight. The most distinguished names among these signatures, which in all amounted to one hundred, were—Charles Grey, John Tweddell, Earl of Lauderdale, James Mackintosh (the late Sir James), Malcolm Laing (the Scotch historian), Lord Kincaid, Philip Francis, W. H. Lambton, George Tierney, Samuel Whitbread, Dudley North, Michael Angelo Taylor, Hon. Thomas Erskine, Lord John Russell, Samuel Rogers (the poet), R. B. Sheridan, Colonel Fallarton, Alderman Sawbridge (brother to Mrs. Catherine Macaulay), George Byng, Lord Duer (the young Scotch nobleman whom we have seen travelling from Paris to London with Thomas Paine and Dumont), Lord Edward Fitzgerald (whom we shall soon find playing the highest stakes of treason in Ireland), Richard Sharp (known afterwards as one of the very best conversationalists in English society, and known more generally since his death by an exquisite little volume of Essays and Thoughts), and Doctor Joseph Towers and Doctor Kippis (both Unitarian preachers, and classed in politics with Priestley).

By this time government had made up their minds to adopt a much more rigid style of criticism towards the 'Rights of Man' and publications of a similar tendency, and to resort to the very questionable measure of putting down, or attempting to put down, seditious writings, by proclamations royal and restrictions on the liberty of printing. On the 21st of May appeared his majesty's proclamation for preventing seditious meetings and writings. The societies and associations were handled not less severely than the books and pamphlets. The proclamation asserted that there was reason to believe that correspondences had been entered into with sundry persons in foreign parts, with a view to forward criminal and wicked purposes, &c. It solemnly warned all loving subjects, as they tendered their own happiness and that of their posterity, to guard against all such attempts which aimed at the subversion of all regular government ; and it strictly charged and commanded all magistrates to make diligent inquiry, in order to discover the authors and printers of such wicked and seditious writings, &c. It could not venture to prohibit clubs or meetings ; but it charged all sheriffs, justices of the peace, magistrates of cities, boroughs, and corporations, and all other magistrates, to take the most immediate and effectual care to suppress and prevent all riots, tumults, and other disorders, which might be attempted to be raised or made, &c. This proclamation was disapproved of by many, who were of opinion that government ought to have contented itself with prosecuting the authors of such publications as were evidently seditious, and with opposing by pen and speech and sound arguments those publications that were so worded as to obviate prosecution. They said, and truly, that public opinion was not to be directed by royal proclamation ; and that metaphysical and political speculations were not to be refuted by a call upon sheriffs and magistrates ; that the appearance of prohibition would only cause the books that were known to be more read ; and that persecution would only call into the field fresh authors, and increase the vehemence and importance of the old ones. But still more men were of opinion that the proclamation was all that it ought to be—was a timely exertion of authority in a turbulent season—was a measure indispensably requisite to restrain within limits that effervescing spirit which was daily increasing, and which threatened to subvert the established government. The proclamation having been laid before the House, the Master of the Rolls (Mr. Richard Pepper Arden) moved an address of approbation and support to his majesty. This address was opposed, and the proclamation itself condemned in severe terms by Mr. Grey, who said that the "aligent inquiry" enjoined by the proclamation after the authors and distributors of seditious writings could only tend to establish an odious and arbitrary system of espionage. This was the system which had made the old government of France so much the object of general detestation; and it was a system unworthy of the sovereign of a free people to recommend. He believed that the real object of the proclamation was chiefly to discredit the late association of the Friends of the People, and to separate those political friends who had been so long united. It seemed to him a measure concerted by one whose greatest delight was to see discord supersede harmony among those who seemed indisposed to support his measures. Never, said Grey, was there a man in that House who delighted more in these sinister practices than the right honourable the chancellor of the exchequer. He whose whole political life had been a tissue of inconsistency, of assertion and retraction; he who never proposed a measure without intending to delude his hearers; who promised everything, and performed nothing; who studied all the arts of obtaining popularity, without ever intending to deserve it; who was a complete apostate from the first step of his political career, down to the present moment; and whose political malignity was now to be crowned by an endeavour to separate the dearest friends! After an eulogium upon Fox, and a profession of his entire faith in that great man's principles, Mr. Grey moved a counter address, which declared that his majesty's government was already vested with sufficient power to punish any open violation of the laws; that, if seditious writings had for any length of time been published and circulated, ministers had been guilty of criminal neglect in not sooner instituting prosecutions; that the proclamation was unnecessary, and might produce the effect of exciting groundless alarms and suspicions; that the House of Commons were ever ready to concur with his majesty for the suppression of all riots, tumults, or other disorders, on whatever pretexts they might be founded, and that they must express to his majesty the deep regret they felt at the tumults and disorders which took place at Birmingham in the course of the last summer, to the disgrace of all good government, the utter subversion of law, and the destruction of the security and property of his majesty's most faithful subjects; and that the surest means of averting the like calamities would be to proceed with all the severity of the law against such persons as might have been instrumental in aiding and abetting the Birmingham riots, and particularly to prosecute and punish such magistrates as appeared to have been guilty of gross and criminal neglect in the discharge of their duty. The long debate had many branches; but Birmingham and Priestley formed a principal one. It was maintained that the magistrates of that town had connived at the barbarities which had been committed, and had even instigated the populace to the perpetration of them; that persons of all descriptions were implicated in these scandalous transactions; and that not only the ignorant among the laity, but also individuals of consideration among the clergy, had raised the storm against the unoffending victims. Whitbread produced no fewer than thirty-six affidavits to corroborate the charges against the Birmingham magistrates. Fox, in supporting Grey and his counter-address, said that the proclamation was insidious and ambiguous, because it evidently had other purposes than those which it professed, and because it had all the features of that craft which belonged to the quarter from whence it came. He would ask, was the proclamation directed against Mr. Paine's book, the author and publisher of which were known? If so, why desire to discover the authors and publishers? It was because it was the insidious intention of government to create unnecessary alarm, and scatter about vague aspersions! It might be asked, why had some of his own particular friends (he meant Windham and others) supported ministers in this measure? He would explicitly answer that question:—these friends were, very unhappily for the country, made the dupes of the deep and artful design which ministers had in view! He described the original association formed long ago for procuring parliamentary reform, and said he found himself in a very strange predicament, between friends on the one hand and friends on the other, who had all got into strange company. He himself had not signed the declaration upon which the Friends of the People had associated, and he could not subscribe to the principles upon which others of his friends supported this royal proclamation. On both sides there was a meeting of disjointed associations. In the year 1782 he remembered there was a meeting at the Thatched House tavern, when Mr. Pitt, the Duke of Richmond, Major Cartwright, and Mr. Horne Tooke, all agreed together to certain resolutions of reform. Now, by a strange association, one set of his friends had got into company with the two first of these four reformers, and another set with the two last. The Friends of the People had disclaimed the imputations cast upon them of being connected with Mr. Cartwright's and Mr. Tooke's doctrines; but there was no disclaimer from the others. The right honourable gentleman (Pitt) and the Duke of Richmond had thought proper to change their opinions on the subject of reform; and not merely to change their opinions, but the right honourable gentleman had brought forth a proclamation, and the noble duke was to head a camp, against it. He did not mean to say it was singular that the right honourable gentleman should change his sentiments upon any subject; he was so much in the habit of doing it upon all subjects, that one would think he had a patent for retraction, and a monopoly for change. Fox declared, as Grey had done, that the plain intention of this proclamation was to strive to make a division in that great body of united patriots known by the name of the Whig interest; a party whose firm union he considered as of the utmost consequence, as indeed essential, to the maintenance of the constitution. He knew of no plan so good, no object so desirable, as the firm union of the Whigs; and he was proud to say that to divide them was impossible. [They were divided already by a breach that no oratory could either patch up or conceal.] They might think differently on some particular subjects; but, united on principles salutary for the nation, no arts, however insidious, could prevail in dividing them. The proclamation was assuredly intended to effect this division, and not to put down the pamphlets and writings and popular meetings of which it spoke. The Rights of Man and those other publications had long been before the public, some of the political associations had long been in existence, and, if any alarm had been entertained of them, the proclamation ought to have been issued long ago. As for riots, all the riots that had happened had been from the other side—had had Church and King for their cry. It was not a republican spirit that we had to dread in this country—there was no tincture of republicanism in the country—but it was the high church spirit, and an indisposition to all reform, which marked, more than anything else, the temper of the times. Fox concluded with a feeling allusion to the friends of his political life, from whose side, he said, he would never separate, to whose opinions he had often yielded fair objects of personal ambition, but whose union he considered so essential to the public good, that, though, in the prosecution of their system, they were without hope of favour from the crown, and without thanks from the people, he knew and felt that they would have the reward of their own consciences and hearts. Windham said the pain of differing from his old friends was alleviated by the consideration that their difference was but on a single point, of means, not ends, of speculation rather than of practice; and he hoped that when these debates were over they might again act as cordially together as if no such difference had ever existed. Pitt charged Fox with being the only person who saw no danger in the writings and doctrines which had recently gained ground in this country. He could not, he said, reconcile such conduct with any spark of patriotism. Fox indignantly rejoined: he avowed that he saw no danger in these writings and doctrines, because he knew that the good sense and constitutional spirit of the people of this country were a sure protection against them. This, too, had been uniformly the opinion of the chancellor of the exchequer himself, until he saw, or thought he saw, the means of stirring up division among the friends of freedom. Lord North, Dundas, Poyys, Thomas Grenville, and others spoke strongly in favour of the original address; and Francis, Lord John Russell, Whitbread, Lambton, and others spoke as vehemently in favour of Grey's amendment or counter-address. The House sat till four o'clock in the morning, when the original address was agreed to without a division. It was then communicated to the House of Lords, and their lordships' concurrence requested, in order that it might be presented to the king as the joint address of the two Houses. As soon as a motion for this purpose was made and seconded, the Prince of Wales rose for the first time to deliver his sentiments in the House of Lords. His rising excited great interest; for, as he seemed as closely connected as ever with Fox and Sheridan, it was doubted whether he might not share their opinions about that great political touchstone the French revolution. The prince said he should be deficient in his duty as a member of their lordships' House, unmindful of the respect he owed to the constitution, and inattentive to the peace and welfare of the country, if he did not state to the world what was his opinion upon a subject of such magnitude as that on which their lordships were then deliberating. He declared he was educated in principles which taught him to revere the established constitution; and to these principles he was determined, as far as he could have any weight, to give his firm and constant support. He thought the matter now at issue really was whether the constitution was or was not to be maintained; whether the wild ideas of untried theory were to conquer the wholesome maxims of established practice; and whether those laws under which we had flourished for a long series of years were to be subverted by a pretended reform, unsanctioned by the people. As a person nearly and dearly interested in the welfare, the happiness, and comfort of the people, it would be treason to the principles of his mind if he did not come forward and declare his disapprobation of those seditious publications which had occasioned the motion now before the House. His interest was connected with the interest of the people; they were indeed inseparable. On this great, on this solid basis, he grounded the vote which he meant to give; and that vote should unequivocally be for a concurrence with the Commons in their wise and salutary address. Lord Grenville said that these were words that must warm the breast of every Englishman who heard them, and convey the strongest satisfaction to the people at large. The motion was of course carried. A long protest was entered; but it bore the solitary signature of the Earl of Lauderdale. These debates and proceedings, the frequent mention of the author and the book, the information, filed by the attorney-general against the publication of the Rights of Man, and the exertions of the political societies, all served as so many advertisements for Paine's production, the sale of which became more extensive and rapid than ever.

A motion made by Fox, on the 11th of May, for leave to bring in a bill to repeal certain old laws affecting dissenters from the established church, which will fall to be noticed again in the next chapter, occasioned a remarkable debate, much of which bore rather upon the political than the religious disputes of the day. Fox had grounded his motion principally on a strong petition from the Unitarians, which he had presented a few days before; and in his speech he went at great length into the subject of the late Birmingham riots, and the cruel persecution to which he asserted Dr. Priestley had been subjected, not so much on account of his political as of his religious opinions. Burke replied at great length, in a speech of which some notes were found among his papers after his death. The Unitarian petitioners he treated, without ceremony or circumlocution, as merely a body of republicans banded for the destruction of the existing institutions of the state, civil as well as religious. He said he could only look to the petition of the Unitarians which had given rise to this proceeding, and which in his opinion had little or no relation to the other sects, such as Catholics, Presbyterians, Anabaptists, Independents, and Quakers. He insisted that no one universal rule had ever been adopted, and that parliament had examined the grievances of those complaining of the penal laws, and had legislated thereon, according to times and circumstances; and, for himself, he preferred this practical method to general theories. "My mind," said he, "marches the same road; my school is the practice and usage of parliament. . . . Old religious factions are volcanos burnt out; on the lava and ashes and squalid scoræ of old eruptions grow the peaceful olive, the cheering vine, and the sustaining corn. Such was the first, such the second condition of Vesuvius. But when a new fire bursts out, a face of desolation comes on, not to be rectified in ages. Therefore when men come before us, and rise up like an exhalation from the ground, they come in a questionable shape, and we must exorcise them, and try whether their intents be wicked or charitable; whether they bring airs from heaven or blasts from hell. This is the first time that our records of parliament have heard, or our experience or history given us an account, of any religious congregation or association known by the name which these petitioners have assumed. We are now to see by what people, of what character, and under what temporary circumstances, this business is brought before you. We are to see whether there be any, and what, mixture of political dogmas and political practices with their religious tenets, of what nature they are, and how far they are at present separable from them. This faction—the authors of this petition—are not confined to a theological sect, but are also a political faction." Even as theologians he contended that they did not aim at the quiet enjoyment of their own liberty, but were associated for the express purpose of proselytism; and in proof of this opinion he referred to the words of their own act of primary association. Secondly, he maintained that their purpose of proselytism was to collect a multitude sufficient by force and violence to overturn the church; in proof of which proposition he read the Letter of Priestley to Pitt, and extracts from his other works.

Thirdly, he insisted that their designs against the church were concurrent with a design to subvert the state; in proof of which he read the advertisement of the Unitarian Society for celebrating the 14th of July. Fourthly, he argued that the model on which they intended to build was that of the new French constitution, as fully appeared by the correspondence of the Revolution Society with the clubs of France. This led him finally to examine what the French system was with regard to religious toleration, and also with regard to religion, to civil happiness, to virtue, order, and real liberty, to commercial opulence, and to national defence; and in illustration of these topics he read the late representation of the French minister of the home department, and the report of the committee upon it. He said that there was no possibility of knowing what opinions would prevail if the Unitarians should become masters; that they would not tell us their present opinions, one principle of modern dissent being not to discover them; and that, as their religion was in a continual fluctuation, both by principle and in practice, there was no knowing what it would be. If religion only related to the individual, and was simply a question between God and the conscience, it would neither be wise nor equitable for human authority to step in. But when religion is embodied into faction, and factions have objects to pursue, it will and must become a question of power between them. If the Unitarians limited their principles to their own congregations, and satisfied themselves with abstaining from what they thought unlawful, it would be cruel to molest them in their tenets or practices. "But we know that they not only entertain these opinions, but entertain them with a zeal for propagating them by force, and employing the power of law and place to destroy establishments, if ever they should come to power sufficient to effect their purpose; that is, in other words, they declare they would persecute the heads of our church; and the question is, whether you should keep them within the bounds of toleration, or subject yourself to their persecution. . . . But let us pass by our opinions concerning the danger of the church. What do these gentlemen themselves declare to be their own designs? . . . Their designs they declare to be to destroy the established church, and not set up a new one of their own." [Here he referred to Priestley.] "But if they should find the state stick to the church, the question is, whether they love the constitution in state so well, as that they would not destroy the constitution of the state in order to destroy that of the church. Most certainly they do not! . . . Does a design against the constitution of this country exist? If it does, and if it is carried on with increasing vigour and activity by a restless faction, and if it receives countenance by the most ardent and enthusiastic applauses of its object in the great council of this kingdom, by men of the first parts which this kingdom produces, perhaps by the first it has ever produced, can I think that there is no danger? If there be danger, must

there be no precaution at all against it? If you ask whether I think the danger urgent and immediate, I answer, Thank God, I do not. The body of the people is yet sound—the constitution is in their hearts; while wicked men are endeavouring to put another into their heads. But, if I see the very same beginnings which have commonly ended in great calamities, I ought to act as if they might produce the very same effects. Early and provident fear is the mother of safety.” He then alluded to the storm which had so suddenly burst on the head of the unfeeling, unsuspecting king of France; and the reflection sharpened his invective against Unitarians and political societies. “Let not the king,” he exclaimed, “let not the Prince of Wales, be surprised like the deposed Louis XVI.! Let not both houses of parliament be led in triumph along with the king, and have law dictated to them by the Constitutional, the Revolution, and the Unitarian Societies. These insect reptiles, whilst they go on only caballing and toasting, only fill us with disgust; if they get above their natural size, and increase the quantity, whilst they keep the quality, of their venom, they become objects of the greatest terror. A spider in his natural size is only a spider, ugly and loathsome; and his flimsy net is only fit for catching flies. But, good God! suppose a spider as large as an ox, and that he spreads cables about us, all the wilds of Africa would not produce anything so dreadful—

Quale portentum neque militaris

Nec Juba tellus generat leonem Arida nutrix.

Think of them who dare menace in the way they do in their present state, and of what they would do if they had but power commensurate to their malice. God forbid I ever should have a despotic master—but, if I must, my choice is made. I will have Louis XVI. rather than Monsieur Bailly, or Brissot, or Chabot; rather George III. or George IV. than Doctor Priestley or Doctor Kippis: for these kings would not load a tyrannous power by the poisoned taunts of a vulgar, low-bred insolence!” He asked whether those who had the sway in France confined themselves to the regulation of their own internal affairs, or whether, upon system, they nourished cabals in all other countries, to extend their power by producing revolutions similar to their own? and whether we had not cabals formed or forming within these kingdoms to co-operate with them for the destruction of our constitution? He drew a powerful and startling distinction between men of tender consciences and men who made sedition, conspiracy, and confusion a part of their conscience. “The principle of your petitioners,” said he, “is no passive conscientious dissent on account of an over-scrupulous habit of mind; the dissent on their part is fundamental, goes to the very root; and it is at issue, not upon this rite or that ceremony, on this or that school opinion, but upon this one question of an establishment, as unchristian, unlawful, contrary to the gospel and to natural right, popish and idolatrous. These are their principles, violently and fanatically held and pursued—taught to their children, who are sworn at the altar like Hannibal. The war is with the establishment itself—no quarter, no compromise. As a party they are infinitely mischievous; see the declarations of Priestley and Price—declarations, you will say, of hot men. Likely enough: but who are the cool men who have disclaimed them? Not one—no, not one. Which of them has ever told you that they do not mean to destroy the church, if ever it should be in their power? Which of them has told you that this would not be the first and favourite use of any power they should get? Not one—no, not one. Declarations of hot men! The danger is thence, that they are under the conduct of hot men; falsos in amore odia non fingere.”

Pitt assured the House that, if there existed any laws against general toleration, he should be ready to vote for their repeal, provided it could take place consistently with the safety of the constitution; but he desired it to be understood that his system of toleration also would always be regulated by existing circumstances, and by the character of the times to which it was applied. No practical evil could happen from the statutes in question; but, now, danger might arise from their repeal. He could see no propriety in the House giving encouragement to a society professing principles subversive not only of every established religion, but also of every established government. At this moment, too, the repeal of these statutes might be considered by the public as the first step towards a gradual removal of all those barriers which our ancestors had erected for the safety of our civil and ecclesiastical constitution, and as indicating a disposition in the House to favour that prevalent spirit of innovation which had so justly excited serious alarm.

Fox rose to reply. He said he had indeed heard before he came down to the House that his motion was likely to be opposed, but what the grounds of opposition were to be he had not the least idea of. Now, however, all was out; for the right honourable gentleman on the bench with him (Burke) had circuitously, and the right honourable gentleman opposite directly, opposed every principle and system of toleration. It was not his intention to follow the first right honourable gentleman through all the extraneous matter he had introduced; for certainly his motion had nothing to do with France, which it was the fashion with some gentlemen to cram into every debate. He repeated that his opinions of the French revolution were the same now that they ever had been; that he considered that event as highly advantageous to this country, and to the world in general; and that it was not to be supposed that any temporary or accidental defeat the French might suffer in their struggle for liberty could stagger his mind with regard to their success in the result. He mentioned again the happy capture of the Bastille, and said a description of that fortress came to his mind, as given by "one of the first of our modern poets, the amiable Cowper," and he quoted from the 'Task' the beautiful lines beginning, "Ye horrid towers, the abode of broken hearts." He spoke again of the Rights of Man, and of the Reflections on the French Revolution, saying that Paine's book was a libel, though not an infamous one, on the constitution of Great Britain, and that Burke's book was a libel on every free constitution in the world. He said he knew not why Dr. Priestley, because he approved of the French revolution, should be liable to punishment from the circumstance of his being a Unitarian, and that he (Fox) should be exempted from punishment, who was of the same opinion, but a Trinitarian. In the end the motion, which Fox could never have had the slightest idea of carrying, was negatived by 142 against 63.

In the course of the session Fox reproduced his libel bill, for declaring the power of juries to decide upon the law as well as the fact. It was again carried through the Commons. When carried up to the Lords, some points in it were referred to the Judges, who did not give in their opinions without considerable delay, and when they gave them in they were not thought very perspicuous or decisive. There was then considerable opposition to the bill; but Lord Camden and Lord Lansdowne eloquently defended its principle and provisions; and at last it was carried through the Upper House, and became the law of the land. A short but strong protest was entered against the bill, and signed by Chancellor Thurlow, Lords Kenyon, Walsingham, Bathurst, and Abingdon, and the Bishop of Bangor (Dr. Warren). Lord Rawdon once more attempted to procure a revision of the laws relating to debtor and creditor, in order to abridge the imprisonment and sufferings of unfortunate debtors; but the season was too far advanced to allow of any progress being made; and at the instance of the law-lords the motion was withdrawn for the present. Dundas introduced and carried some excellent regulations for securing to the seamen and marines of the royal navy, and their respective heirs or families, the wages due to them, and of which, through their own ignorance and the state of the law, they had been but too often defrauded. In presenting his annual statement of the income and expenditure of British India, Dundas drew a very flattering picture of happiness and prosperity, which had increased and was increasing in spite of Tippoo and his war. Francis contradicted nearly everything he said, making Dundas's bright picture all one black. He denied that there was either happiness or prosperity in Bengal, or in any other part of our possessions; and said that one-third of the company's territory was inhabited only by wild beasts. He reminded the House that the war with Tippoo was not yet finished [it was finished, and very honourably, although the news had not reached

England], and he prognosticated nothing but disgrace, defeat, and ruin.

On the 15th of June the king prorogued parliament in person, with a speech in which he announced the commencement of hostilities in different parts of Europe, but in which he also once more expressed the pleasing hope of preserving to his own people the uninterrupted blessings of peace. He applauded the measures which had been adopted for the diminution of taxation; and the additional provision made for the reduction of the existing national debt, and "for preventing the dangerous accumulation of debt in future." Striking words, when we reflect on what happened within a very few months after.

In spite of the proclamation the press continued to spawn Paine's Rights of Man and revolutionary pamphlets, some of home production and some translated from the French; and the political clubs and societies persevered in meeting, debating, and passing resolutions, and some of them at least in corresponding with the French revolutionists, not merely as individuals, but as a body politic, as a national convention, with which every correspondence must, if strictly considered, be illegal. The French system of affiliation was adopted, and branch clubs and societies were established in Manchester, Sheffield, and other large towns. These clubs and societies corresponded with their respective mother-societies in the capital, and employed themselves in making converts in their neighbouring towns in the country. As was the case in France, several of these provincial clubs grew hotter and fiercer than the metropolitan ones. The cotton-spinning patriots blazed up like cotton flue on fire; and those of Sheffield seemed waxing as hard and sharp as their own razors. As early as the month of May of the present year (1792) the committee of the Society for Constitutional Information at Sheffield announced to "the committee of the honourable society entitled The Friends of the People in London," that their numbers already amounted to about 2400, and that there was every prospect of a rapid increase. "As our members increase," said the Sheffield patriots, "the number of meeting-places are increased in proportion, so as not to exceed at most thirty members at one place. All the circular meetings are held once a fortnight on the same evening. Our general meeting is held once a month at three different houses, on the same day, generally very crowded; yet good order and regularity are strictly attended to." The main object of this epistle was to obtain from the society of the Friends of the People advice and instructions; but the Sheffield men gave advice as well as asked it; and their advice simply was, that before the next session of parliament there should be established a Convention in London by deputies from each county or district of the kingdom. The reply of the Friends of the People, which was signed by Mr. Grey as their chairman, assured the society of Sheffield that they had received sincere pleasure, not only from the firm and virtuous tone in which they had spoken their principles, but from the wise and temperate manner in which they had limited the application of them to practice; that a conduct in the great body of the people corresponding to such sentiments would alike defeat the hopes of those who would dupe the people into tumult, and silence the slanders of those advocates of corruption who had laboured to render the cause of liberty odious and terrible to all good citizens by confounding it with principles of anarchy; that the cause of liberty could never be endangered by the assault of its enemies, but might sometimes be exposed by the indiscretion of its friends, so that it was necessary for them to defend themselves by the wariness of their language and conduct; that they ought to make the preservation of the constitution on its true principles the foundation and end of all their proceedings, which would convince the friends of order that they had nothing to fear, &c. The letter further stated that it was only with societies who expressed the same moderation of principles and adopted the same wariness of language that the Friends of the People could entertain any correspondence, or promise any co-operation: that they had been compelled to decline all intercourse with the Society for Constitutional Information in London; for, though they neither wished to attack, nor pretended to dictate, they were certainly entitled to decline all intercourse with men whose views and principles appeared irreconcilable with their own. As to the bold proposition for the assembling of a convention in London, the Friends of the People, or their chairman, Mr. Grey, said at the end of the letter—"On the particular measure which you suggest for collecting the opinion of the people on the subject of reform, we do not feel ourselves yet prepared to decide. In a more advanced stage of the business it may become very fit matter for deliberation." About a fortnight before this time, or on the 5th of May, the Friends of the People, at a great meeting held at the Freemasons' Tavern (William Baker, Esq., M.P., being in the chair, and Lord John Russell, M.P., being deputy-chairman), broadly proclaimed that their sole object was a parliamentary reform, to be effected and brought about by none but strictly legal and constitutional means; that, whenever this desirable object should be obtained, their association would be at an end. "We go no farther," said they in one of a series of resolutions published to the world. When the Jacobin Club began, they, too, had laid down a no farther; but the founders of that association had been soon made to feel that their resolution was as useless as the words which Canute spoke to the rising tide of ocean. We cannot for a moment believe that any body of Englishmen could have acted altogether like French Jacobins, or French politicians of any cast or colour (great misfortunes were occasioned by the belief in one part of the nation that they could so have acted); but still we can conceive that this society of the Friends of the People might very soon have been inclined to go to far greater lengths than Mr. Gey and gentlemen of his condition and principles could possibly desire. Differences presently broke out among the Friends of the People; and as early as the 9th of June Lord John Russell, Mr. Baker, Dudley North, Mr. Courtenay, and Mr. Curwen withdrew from the association, publicly stating as their reason for so doing that the society was already going too far in continuing its connection with societies and individuals whose conduct was becoming dangerous and illegal.* Some confusion of ideas arose out of the fact that several conspicuous men were members, at one and the same time, of several of the societies, although their avowed objects differed very essentially. It thus of necessity happened that people could not distinguish very clearly between these associations, but applied to them all an identity of conduct and purpose. The Corresponding Society, which became the most famed of them all, contained many avowed republicans, who made no secret of their earnest wish to revolutionise the country in order to establish the doctrines of the Rights of Man, liberty and equality, and a Gallican commonwealth; and these said incurables worshipped the French goddess of liberty when she was covered from head to foot with blood and filth. As a body, however, this Corresponding Society did not profess any higher aspirations than to annual parliaments and universal suffrage. It continued to increase the number of its members and of its affiliations; but from first to last there never appears to have been any great consistency or bond of union among them, any uniformity of opinion and feeling like that which reigned among the Jacobins in France, among the vast masses of the French nation, and which gave to them their enormous force. Many men that entered the association never went near its meetings; others withdrew when they thought the society was going too far, and others kept aloof from the dread of the law and the two acts that were afterwards passed. Three years later than this, in 1795, the Corresponding Society boasted that they were 400,000 strong; but a petition they presented then, and which had evidently been hawked all over England, had not 14,000 signatures; and even a good many of these signatures were suspected of being spurious, or the idle scrawling of boys and vagabonds. At the end of September of the present year (1792), that is to say, after all the unspeakable horrors of the Septembrizers had been committed in Paris, and had been fully reported in England, the Mother or London Corresponding Society, backed by four other societies—the Man-

* These five seceders said that, although the society had refused to admit as a member Mr. Cooper, because that gentleman had been appointed by another society to correspond with the Jacobins at Paris, they had not excluded Major Cartwright, who was carrying on a similar correspondence under his own hand and signature.—Letter to the Chairman of the Society, signed by Lord John Russell and the four other seceders, in Ann. chester Constitutional Society, the Manchester Reformation Society, the Norwich Revolution Society, and the London Constitutional Whigs—joined in an address to the National Convention. In this address they told all Frenchmen that, by an oppressive system of control and by gradual encroachments, this nation had been deprived of nearly all its boasted liberty, and the English people brought almost to that abject state of slavery from which the French had so gloriously emerged; that a few thousands of British citizens were now indignantly and manfully stepping forward to rescue their country from oppression and opprobrium; and that they conceived it to be the duty of Britons to countenance and assist to the utmost of their power the champions of human happiness, and to swear an inviolable friendship to the magnanimous French nation. The address contained sundry passages which showed how attentively the writers of it had studied Jacobin orations and manifestos. It said, “Sacred from this day be that inviolable friendship between us! And may vengeance to the uttermost overtake the man who shall hereafter attempt to cause a rupture between us! Though we appear comparatively so few, be assured, Frenchmen, that our number increases daily. It is true that the stern uplifted arm of authority at present keeps back the timid, that busily circulated impostures hourly mislead the credulous, and that court intimacy with avowed French traitors has some effect on the unwary and on the ambitious; but with certainty we can inform you, friends and freemen, that information makes a rapid progress among us; curiosity has taken possession of the public mind, and the conjoint reign of ignorance and despotism passes away. Men now ask each other, what is freedom? What are our rights?—Frenchmen, you are already free, and Britons are preparing to become so!” After swearing that they would never again fight the French, or let their own throats be cut at the command of ambitious kings and corrupt ministers, these five English societies said in their joint address—“Seeking our real enemies, we find them in our bosom; we feel ourselves inwardly torn by, and ever the victims of, a restless, all-consuming aristocracy, hitherto the bane of every nation under the sun: wisely have you acted in expelling it from France!” After some very significant threats as to what the King of England might expect if he dared to go to war with the French republicans, the address said—“The triple alliance, not of crowns, but of the people of America, France, and Britain, will give freedom to Europe, and peace to the world! Dear friends, you combat for the advantage of the whole human race! How well purchased will be, though at the expense of much blood, the glorious, the unprecedented privilege of saying, ‘Mankind is free! Tyrants and tyranny are no more! Peace reigns on the earth! and this is the work of Frenchmen!’” That there might be no mistake as to date, they particularly begged Frenchmen to remark that this address was written on the 27th day of September. These precious societies presently received a flattering answer from the Convention, under the hand of the president, who called them brothers and fellow-citizens of the world, told them that the time was not far distant when they might join the hands of fraternity, &c. The Society for Constitutional Information in London, which Grey had disclaimed, not only sent an address to France, but a good many pairs of shoes besides. This London association had enrolled among its members and taken to its heart of hearts a good many American citizens, who, for commercial or political traffic, or for both, were sometimes residing in England and sometimes in France. Among these Transatlantic republicans was Joel Barlow, the laureat of the United States, the author of that not-to-be-forgotten epic wherein George Washington is typified by Joshua, and the free citizens of America, and their expulsion of the English, by the Jews and their conquest of the Holy Land. This American infusion certainly gave some new twang or flavour to the London Society for Constitutional Information. Indeed, we suspect that their present address to the French republicans must have been written and composed by the great Joel himself. Is not that laureat’s patriotism and style recognisable in this passage?—“The sparks of liberty, preserved in England for ages, like the coruscations of the northern Aurora, served but to show the darkness visible in the rest of Europe. The new lustre of the American republic, like an effulgent morning, arose with increasing vigour, but still too distant to enlighten our hemisphere, till the splendour of the French revolution burst forth upon the nations in the full fervour of a meridian sun, and displayed the practical result of principles which philosophy had sought in the shade of speculation, and which experience must everywhere confirm!” The address promised the French something more than sympathy. “From bosoms burning in your cause,” said this Society for Constitutional Information, “we tender you our warmest wishes for the full extent of its progress and success. It is indeed a sacred cause; we cherish it as the pledge of your happiness, our natural and nearest friends; and we rely upon it as the bond of fraternal union to the human race, in which union our own nation will surely be one of the first to concur. Our government has still the power, and perhaps the inclination, to employ hirelings to contradict us; but it is our real opinion that we now speak the sentiments of a great majority of the English nation. The people here are wearied with imposture, and worn out with war. They have learned to reflect that both the one and the other are the offspring of unnatural combinations in society, as relative to systems of government, not the result of the natural temper of nations, as relative to each other’s

* The massacres of the Septembrizers continued from Sunday evening, the 3rd of September, till the evening of Wednesday the 6th. They spread horror not only throughout England, but through every part of the civilized world. It was impossible for these corresponding maniacs to be ignorant on the 27th of September of what had happened.

happiness. Go on, legislators, in the work of human happiness. The benefits will in part be ours, but the glory shall be all your own: it is the reward of your heroic perseverance; it is the prize of virtue. Your revolution dispels the clouds of prejudice from all people, reveals the secrets of all despotisms, and creates a new character in man. In this career of improvement your example will be soon followed; for nations, rising from their lethargy, will reclaim the Rights of Man, with a voice which man cannot resist." The paper was signed in London, by order of the society, Sempil, chairman; D. Adams, secretary. But there was a postscript written in Paris, to tell the Convention about the shoes; and this was signed Joel Barlow, John Frost.* The Convention never failed in returning prompt and flattering answers to these addresses, which really made them believe that England too was getting ripe for revolution and liberty and equality. In the present case the president called the Society for Constitutional Information in London "Brave children of a nation which has given lustre to the two worlds, and great examples to the universe;" and told them that the defenders of French liberty would one day be the supporters of English liberty; that the sons of liberty throughout the world would never forget their obligations to the English patriots; that the shades of Pym, of Hampden, and of Algernon Sydney were hovering over their heads; and that the moment could not be distant when the people of France would offer their congratulations to a National Convention established in England! Whatever the Society for Constitutional Information in London might call themselves, the president of the French Convention called them "generous republicans." Nearly at the same time—in the month of November—the Revolution Society in London sent over their congratulatory address to the Convention. They said, "At the suggestion of one of our members, the late Dr. Price, whose loss we regret, we have already congratulated you on your first successes in the common cause of liberty; and we cannot be silent at a period so fruitful in events." They rejoiced that the Prussian army had been foiled; they rejoiced that the tyrants who had threatened the French had retired with disgrace; but, above all, they rejoiced in the late revolution of the 10th of August, so necessary to secure the advantages which the former revolution had taught them to expect.† They libelled the English commonwealth-

* The postscript was a bit of bathos:—"We are also commissioned to inform the Convention that the society which we represent has sent to the soldiers of liberty a patriotic donation of a thousand pair of shoes, which are by this time arrived at Calais; and the society will continue sending one thousand pairs a-week for at least six weeks to come. We only wish to know to whose care they ought to be addressed."

† The French patriots in the field against the invading Prussian army were very badly off for shoes and clothes, which was in a good measure owing to the dishonesty of the patriots staying at home, and to the rapacity and remorselessness of their commissariats.

‡ This revolution of the 10th of August, so dear to the disciples of Dr. Price, consisted of the attack on the Tuileries, the massacre of the Swiss guards, and the flight of the king and royal family to the hall of the National Convention, whence they were soon transferred as close prisoners to the Temple, &c.

men and opponents of Charles I. by comparing them with these French republicans; and they emphatically applauded the sacred right of insurrection, in the evident hope that that right would be soon used at home. "This right," said they, "acknowledged in theory by all the defenders of liberty, formed the groundwork of the revolution which we celebrate (that of 1688); and we feel a tender joy in beholding this right of insurrection successfully exercised in so large a country as that of the French republic." They concluded their address with hoping that the Rights of Man would soon be established over the whole earth, and the characters and distinctions of tyrant and slave be known only in history. These things were not done in a corner; these lights were not hidden under bushels; they were paraded in the most public manner and in the most public places; they were blazed forth to the world in daily and weekly newspapers, in books, tracts, handbills, placards; for every one of these societies held their own doctrines as gospel truths, and every one of them was burning with the fierce zeal of proselytism, and ready to denounce every man that differed from them for a scoundrel or a fool. This particular society, of which Price, the friend of Priestley, had been high priest and patriarch, this Revolution Society in London, had published some time before this, with high exultation at having been the first to avow their admiration of the French revolution, a big book, containing a collection of their proceedings and correspondence, both at home and abroad, from the close of the year 1789, when Price had preached his sermon in the Old Jewry Chapel, and when Earl Stanhope had undertaken to carry the congratulations to Paris, down to the month of March, 1792. A dread of that power which "keeps the wretch in order," and a calculation that it would not answer their purpose to startle Englishmen's minds by producing at once all their boldest theories or aspirations, induced these Priceites to suppress some of their opinions and many of the papers they had written into foreign parts; but quite enough remained in the portions they had the courage to print to damn them in public opinion, and their book too. It appeared from the volume that in 1790 it was reported and boasted at the anniversary meeting that this society had lately received "the warmest marks of approbation and respect" from the Jacobin clubs established in more than twenty of the principal cities and towns in France, together with copies, for their own instruction, of numerous Jacobin resolutions and publications; and that in England they had been very successful in forming branch societies in different parts of the kingdom: that at the anniversary of 1791 there was read a long list of societies in France and England with which the committee of this Revolution Society in London had corresponded in the course of the preceding year; and that letters from the French Jacobin clubs, hailing the members of the Revolution Society as friends and brothers and fellow-combatants for the sovereignty of the people, &c., were read at the said anniversary: that these Pricites had declared over and over again, in words spoken and in words written, that they aimed at nothing less than a sweeping revolution, like the "late glorious and splendid one in France," as England was a prey to an arbitrary king, a servile peerage, a corrupt House of Commons, and a rapacious and intolerant clergy.

The established clergy of England were among the first to take serious alarm at these political societies and publications, and to express either their thankfulness for the royal proclamation which was intended to check them, or their devotion to the established form of government. First of all, the bishop, dean and chapter, archdeacon and clergy of the church and diocese of Worcester sent up an address to his majesty, to return their warmest thanks for his late wise and provident proclamation. The bishop and clergy of the diocese of Llandaff followed the example, and other clerical bodies followed them. The Llandaff address, which was drawn up by Dr. Watson, bishop of that diocese, and one who professed extremely liberal opinions in politics, did not mention the proclamation, but expressed the utmost abhorrence of every attempt to subvert the constitution in church and state; and declared that the improvements which the constitution had received, in the judges being rendered more independent, in the mode of determining contested elections, in the repeal of certain penal statutes respecting Protestant and Catholic dissenters, in the laws ascertaining the rights of juries, and in other ways, had been more numerous and important during his majesty's reign than during the reigns of all his predecessors since the revolution of 1688. Towards the close of the year clubs and associations began to be formed, with the avowed object of counteracting the Revolution Society, the Corresponding Society, &c. One of these new societies—"The Association for preserving Liberty and Property against Republicans and Levellers"—held their first great meeting at the Crown and Anchor Tavern on the 20th of November, and agreed to meet at that place, or elsewhere, every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. They also came to certain resolutions and declarations, which they caused to be published in the newspapers, and to be otherwise circulated very extensively. "Considering," said they, "the danger to which public peace and order are exposed by the circulating of mischievous opinions, founded upon plausible but false reasoning; and that this circulation is principally carried on by the industry of clubs and societies of various denominations in many parts of the kingdom, it appears to us that it is now become the duty of all persons who wish well to their native country to endeavour, in their several neighbourhoods, to prevent the sad effects of such mischievous industry; and that it would greatly tend to promote these good endeavours, if societies were formed in different parts of the kingdom, whose object should be to support the laws, to suppress seditious publications, and to defend our persons and property against the innovations and deprivations that seem to be threatened by those who maintain the mischievous opinions before alluded to. These opinions are conveyed in the terms of The Rights of Man—Liberty and Equality—No King—No Parliament—and others of the like import; all of them, in the sense imposed on them, expressing sentiments in direct opposition to the laws of this land, and some of them such as are inconsistent with the well-being of society under any laws or government whatsoever. It appears to us, the tendency of these opinions is, that we are voluntarily to surrender everything we now possess—our religion and our laws, our civil government and civil society; and that we are to trust to the formation of something new, upon the principles of equality, and under the auspices of speculative men, who have conceived ideas of perfection that never yet were known in the world: and it appears that the missionaries of this sect are aiming at effecting the overthrow of the present system of government and society, by infusing into the minds of ignorant men causes of discontent adapted to their various stations; some of which causes are wholly imaginary, and the rest are such as inseparably belong to civil life; have existed, and ever will exist, under all forms of government; cannot be removed by any change, and will be aggravated and multiplied a hundred-fold by the change proposed." They exposed the fallacy that all men are born equal and must remain so; and they called attention to the facts, that the road to wealth and promotion and honours of all kinds, in the state, the church, the law, the army, and the navy, was, and had been for many generations, open, in England, to all men, without distinction as to birth and family.* They demonstrated that, if a perfect equality could be established to-morrow, there would be inequality the day after; that the French people, after all their murders and assassinations, "deliberately planned and justified by some of their pretended philosophers, as the

* "It appears," said they, "from history and from observation, that the inequality of rank and fortune, in this happy country, is more the result of every man's own exertions than of any controlling institution of the state. Men become great who have greatly distinguished themselves by the application of talents, natural or acquired; and men have become rich who have persevered with industry in the application to trade and commerce, to manufactures, and other useful employments. How many persons are now of great rank and fortune who were born without either! How many are rich merchants and traders who began their career in the lowest employments of the shop and counting-house! In the progress to this advancement they have all, in their stations, contributed their share toward the show of opulence, both public and private, which is now seen in every part of this island. It is by the effects of this industry that the gentleman is enabled to support his rank and station, and the merchant and tradesman to employ his clerks, journeymen, and apprentices. Hence comes the price of the farmer's corn, and the wages of servants of every description. By this happy inequality and dependence of one man upon another, employment is found for all in the several vocations to which they have been called by design or accident. This inequality and dependence is so infinitely diversified in this country, that there is no place upon earth where there are so many ways in which a man, by his talent and industry, may raise himself above his equals. This has hitherto been thought a pre-eminent happiness that was peculiar to ourselves, and ought to be cherished: it has been ascribed to the protecting influence which property has always enjoyed under equal laws; and it has increased of late years in a wonderful degree by the prosperity which was caused, and can only be continued, by the same influence."

means to attain their ends of reform"—after all their sufferings and atrocious crimes, "which it could not enter into the gentle heart of a Briton to conceive"—after all their pretences and boasts, had, in reality, only changed their masters to groan under new tyrannies, to be subject to the lash and knife of one desperate leader after the other: They said with perfect truth, and with facts (at the end of 1792, open to the whole world) to prove all they said, "The excesses of these ruffian demagogues have no bounds; they have already surpassed the wildest frenzies of fanaticism, superstition, and enthusiasm; plundering and murdering at home, and propagating their opinions by the sword in foreign countries; imposture, fallacy, falsehood, and bloodshed! their philosophy is the idle talk of school-boys, and their actions are the savage ferociousness of wild beasts. Such are the new lights and the false philosophy of our pretended reformers, and such the effects they have produced where alone they have unfortunately been tried." After recapitulating the real rights of man as they understood them, and as they had enjoyed them, they concluded with these words:—"We do, as private men, unconnected with any party or description of persons at home, taking no concern in the struggle at this moment making abroad, but most seriously anxious to preserve the true liberty and unexampled prosperity we happily enjoy in this kingdom, think it expedient and necessary to form ourselves into an association for the purpose of discouraging, in every way that lies in our power, the progress of such nefarious designs as are meditated by the wicked and senseless reformers of the present time. And we recommend to all those who are friends to the established law and constitution to form themselves, in their different neighbourhoods, into similar societies for promoting the same laudable purposes." This recommendation was not given in vain: associations against the inroads of republicans and levellers were formed in most parts of the kingdom, and they included individuals of all ranks and conditions—men of rank and fortune, and men that had neither—of various shades of politics, and of almost every religious community except the Unitarians and one or two other tiny sects, whose numbers would scarcely have been discernible in a census of the population. It would be unfair to deny, or even to pass over in silence, the fact that these counter-revolution societies became in many places over suspicious and over zealous, intolerant, and persecuting.

If England was crowded with emigrant French priests before that event, it was doubly crowded after the massacres of the clergy in the Abbaye, in the month of September. Most of them without money, food, or raiment, the priests fled to our shores, and threw themselves for present subsistence on our charity. The late Sir Samuel Romilly, who by this time had completely recovered from his admiration of the revolution, writing to Dumont on the 15th of September, from London, says—

"It is impossible to walk a hundred yards in any public street here, in the middle of the day, without meeting two or three French priests. Who would have conceived that, at the close of the eighteenth century, we should see, in the most civilized country in Europe, all the horrors of political proscription and religious persecution united?"* A vast number of these refugees found support in private hospitality and sympathy, and never knew a want; others became teachers of their language, and gained an easy and respectable livelihood; but others remained for some time in a deplorable condition. Towards the close of the year a great meeting was held at the London Tavern, where their case was taken into consideration, and extensive subscriptions set on foot for their relief.

We must briefly notice a change of some importance which took place in our cabinet. Ever since the king's malady and the chancellor's double-dealing in the regency business, there had been no good understanding between Thurlow and Pitt. On some occasions, where his assistance in the House of Lords was considered necessary by the premier, the chancellor had sat silent, and in other cases he had even openly opposed measures to which Pitt attached the greatest importance. Nor did Thurlow in private society restrain his irritable temper and rough tongue in speaking of the chancellor of the exchequer: he spoke of him often in a tone of contempt which must have been exceedingly irritating to one who was probably about the proudest man in England. The Marquess of Stafford, himself a member of the cabinet, who had been intimately acquainted as well as politically connected with the lord chancellor for many years, repeatedly remonstrated with him, and laboured to bring about a reconciliation, which seemed so necessary to the existence of the present administration; but Thurlow was proud and obstinate, and all these exertions of the marquess were thrown away. Thurlow's imposing manner and solemn and wise looks (which made Fox tax his countenance with imposture, and say it proved him dishonest, since no man could be so wise as he looked), † his indisputable abilities in many parts of business, and the force of habit, which was always a potent force with George III., long made him cling to his heavy-browed, ill-humoured chancellor, and apparently balance at times whether he should keep him by throwing out Pitt, or keep Pitt by throwing out Thurlow. The chancellor of the exchequer at last determined to leave the king no other alternative. Early in the session Thurlow had poured out in the Lords a torrent of spleen and censure on the minister's bill for liquidating future loans. On the very next morning Pitt submitted to the king the impossibility of his remaining in office with the lord chancellor, and the consequent necessity of his majesty's making his choice between them; writing at the same time to Thurlow, to tell him the step he had taken, and his conviction that his majesty's service could not be carried on to advantage while they both remained in their present situations. When thus pressed, George III. presently made his choice, and acquainted Thurlow that he must resign. But as a change was not desirable during the session, and as it was wished he should terminate some chancery business, it was agreed that he should keep the seals until the prorogation of Parliament. Embittered and spiteful at the triumph "of the boy," Thurlow set his tusks into the New Forest Inclosure Bill, which Pitt was accused of promoting for the benefit of his friend George Rose, and gored it most unmercifully. On the very day of the prorogation Thurlow gave up the seals, which were then placed in the hands of three commissioners, Lord Chief Baron Eyre, Mr. Justice Ashurst, and Mr. Justice Wilson.* The Titanic form of Thurlow was not seen again near the helm of the state: he subsequently joined the Whigs, only to serve them badly, or betray them. He cheered the long interval between his dismissal and death, as best he could, with abusing Pitt, and criticising the chancery decisions of Lord Loughborough (the Wedderburne of former times), who became his successor, and with other amusements of the kind suited to his nature, among which was included a most superabundant quantity of swearing and blasphemy. His was indeed of that class of minds to whom quiet is a hell.† On the 5th of August the wardenship of the Cinque Ports, worth about 3000*l.* a-year, fell vacant by the death of the Earl of Guildford, formerly Lord North and prime minister, who had only succeeded to his father's peerage in 1790. The king immediately offered the sinecure to Pitt in a most gracious and pressing letter; and, as Pitt was then at Burton Pynsent, his majesty sent the letter to Dundas, telling him that he must forward it, with a few lines of his own, to state that he (the king) would not admit of this favour being declined. As the chancellor of the exchequer had not improved in the art of managing his domestic finances, as his salary as chancellor of the exchequer had not prevented his getting and continuing in debt, and as a fall from office (which might happen through the king's death or through other accidents) would leave him poor and even miserably embarrassed; and, as the royal letter was imperative, Pitt took the place and salary (which are always for life) without hesitation, and hoped his conscientious friend Wilberforce would think he was right in so doing.

As more immediately connected with our own affairs and interests, we shall now rapidly sketch the history of the war in India which began in 1790. Tippoo Saib, whom our opposition in parliament had taken to honour and applaud, was the cruel, faithless, ambitious prince that we have described him. Hyder Aly, though a barbarian, had several of the qualities of a great prince; but there appears to have been nothing great about Tippoo except the power and resources which his father had left him. After the peace of Mangalore, in 1784, the dominions of Mysore, of which Tippoo remained in possession, extended over a tract of country some 500 miles in length by 350 in breadth: it was nearly all an elevated table-land, intersected everywhere with rivers, and cooling, fertilizing streams; the climate is, for India, very temperate, and the soil as fertile as almost any part of the great peninsula. It swarmed with population, the Mohammedans being almost as numerous as the Hindus; the more ancient occupants of the soil. Several of the towns, besides Seringapatam, the capital, were strongly fortified; and the region abounds in places of great natural strength, affording admirable advantages for a defensive war. Anticipating and providing for a grand struggle, Tippoo, assisted by European engineers, chiefly French and Italians, had erected many new fortresses. His annual revenue was estimated at about five millions sterling, and his father had left him a well-filled treasury. Besides European engineers and artillery officers, he had a considerable number of Europeans to train and discipline his native troops: but these fellows were chiefly common soldiers that had deserted from the Company's service to escape punishment for crimes committed; and, as Tippoo was a bigoted Mussulman, and fond of religious conversion, forced or spontaneous, they had all become renegadoes. He had clothed part of his regulars in uniform resembling that of the sepoy in the English service, and had armed them with French muskets. Their discipline, however, was very far from perfect, and their whole number inconsiderable, not exceeding three or four thousand. The rest of his infantry was a mere rabble, armed with old muskets, matchlocks, pikes, and scymetars. But his principal force was his cavalry—that Mysorean cavalry which had repeatedly rushed through the Ghauts like mountain-torrents, and swept the whole of the low country of the Carnatic. Yet the élite of this force, the Circar, or stable-horse, who were uniformly clothed and equipped, did not exceed 6000; all the rest being irregulars, who found their own horses and arms, and who did no military duty, except when called into the field on some emergency, or to make some plundering incursion into the territories of their neighbours. These fellows, however, were bold and clever riders; and the rapidity of their movements often made up for their deficiency in other points. His artillery was more than respectable, the French having furnished him with guns of all calibres, many of which, being larger and longer than any of the guns of Lord Cornwallis, gave him a considerable advantage over the English in this war. He boasted that, in artillery practice, he had left his masters, the Nazarenes, far behind † Thurlow had a valet, a poor foreigner, upon whom he more especially vented his humour. One day, after sundry other oaths, the ex-keeper of the king's conscience roared, "D—n you, you rascal; I wish you were in h—ll!" "I wish I was!" said the poor fellow, as he stole out of the room and shut the door on his tyrant.

him; "although, like the salamander, they passed their lives in fire." His heavier pieces were all drawn by elephants; and, besides four hundred trained elephants, the best that could be procured in India, he had an immense train of the finest bullocks. According to a British officer engaged, a hundred pieces of ordnance were frequently moved, during these campaigns, with a rapidity not easily to be conceived, and far superior to the best speed the English artillery could make; and the velocity with which his large bodies of cavalry changed their situations, and the general rapidity with which his whole movements were executed, gave him another great advantage. When the war was carried into his own dominions, his irregulars, who had been accustomed to rely only upon plunder for their support and reward, were engaged by what Tippoo called regular pay: but he only engaged them by the month or moon; and Tippoo lengthened months or moons beyond their natural duration to save his pocket. "Thirty, forty, and even fifty days," says Major Taylor, "constitute their duration; and the state of his treasury, or his own whim, regulates the calendar." But in matters where the advantage is less evident Tippoo indulged his whims to excess. He was a reformer or innovator of the most persevering kind, changing all old things, and liking nothing but what was new and of his own creation. It seemed as if the soul of a French democrat had been transfused into this Indian despot. He changed the dates of the ancient Mohammedan festivals; he changed the name of everything in government, law, and military tactics; he gave new names to the days and months, to weights, measures, coins, forts, towns, offices civil and military; in short, to all things and persons, exhibiting "a singular coincidence at nearly one and the same time, and in distant and unconnected quarters of the globe, between the extremes of unbridled democracy and uncontrolled despotism."* He created a fleet, which never existed except upon paper, and made admirals, who had never seen the sea. He drew up a commercial code, and considered himself the chief and best merchant in his dominions. He drew up a civil and criminal code, which is said to have been the maddest and the worst ever devised by man. In the criminal part, "he combined the terrors of death with cold-blooded irony, filthy ridicule with obscene mutilation, the pranks of a monkey with the abominations of a monster."† And whatever the Tiger once did, he would never allow to be altered. Abbé Sièyes himself was not a greater formalist, or more given to rule and line work. Tippoo had a rigid method in all his madness, and he made laws and regulations for almost everything, however trifling. Besides keeping in pay a corps of authors to record his wonderful exploits, he was an author himself, and so busy a one that the pen was for ever in his hand. His capricious but fierce persecutions of the Hindus, and his forcible conversions of some of them to Mohammedanism, made him odious to all that people; and his changes and innovations almost alienated his Mohammedan subjects, who loved change as little as the Hindus. It certainly could not have been from the people of Mysore or the Malabar coast that Francis and other opposition members drew the materials for the favourable character they made up for this Indian Sultan.

By the end of 1790, or early in 1791, the Rajah of Travancore, the close ally of the Company, was re-established in his dominions, and Tippoo was dispossessed of nearly all the dominion he had acquired on the Malabar coast. In the month of February, Lord Cornwallis, the Governor-General, who had taken the command of the army upon himself, laid siege to Bangalore, and took that important place by storm. His lordship then resolved to penetrate into the heart of Mysore, and to dictate his own terms of peace at the capital. He began his march in the first days of May. The native troops, as well as the British troops with him, burned with impatience to take their revenge for the atrocious and brutal degradation Tippoo had put upon their brothers in arms during the last war, and even after the conclusion of it. The news of the fall of Bangalore and of the rapid advance of Cornwallis filled the mind of the tyrant with alarm, and induced him to make arrangements for removing from his capital his women and treasure. To gratify his taste and his vanity, the walls of the houses in the principal streets of Seringapatam had been ornamented with rude paintings caricaturing the English. In one place there was a tiger seizing a trembling Englishman; in another there was a Mysorean horseman rivalling the feats of Antar, and cutting off two or three English heads at a blow; and in other places there were Englishmen put into positions and subjected to treatment which will not bear description. "The anticipation," says Colonel Wilks, "must have been acute which suggested the obliteration of all these favoured triumphs, and a positive order for carefully whitewashing the whole of the walls. The removal of these foolish indications of hostility and contempt was a conclusive testimony of his considering the capture of the place highly probable; but conscience suggested more serious terrors in the mass of living evidence, at Seringapatam and elsewhere, of his detention of prisoners in direct violation of the treaty of 1784. Of the English boys educated as singers and dancers* twenty still remained; a secret order was dispatched for the murder of these unhappy youths as the first victims, and then the other prisoners of the preceding war were gradually and secretly put to death. It was difficult to obtain precise information regarding details in which no individual would acknowledge instrumentality, or even ascribe it to another: the bodies were carried out at the first opening of the gates, by the common scavengers, to places of distant sepulture, and the assassinations were supposed to have been perpetrated by Abyssinian slaves, by the well-understood practice of a sudden and violent twist to dislocate the vertebrae of the neck. The orders to the outposts were executed according to local circumstances, and the English army had afterwards direct evidence, even to exhumation, of murders so committed. . . . The horrible butcheries of this period exemplified the natural connexion between cruelty and fear." Tippoo, however, took up a strong position on the main road, some miles in advance of his capital, behind the deep river Cavery, and seemed resolved to await there the attack of the English. The march of Cornwallis, and of General Abercrombie, who moved in a different line, was excessively laborious. They had to make the roads by which they were to advance; and for fifty miles and more Abercrombie's route was across steep mountains, where the battering trains, provisions, and stores were moved with the greatest difficulty—"every separate gun being hoisted over a succession of ascents by ropes and tackle." They also suffered severely through a want of forage, Tippoo having carefully destroyed all he could; and, in the latter part of their march, the periodic rains, and bad food, and long fatigue brought on sickness and disease. To complete their wretchedness the small-pox broke out among the troops. Our Mahratta allies, who had solemnly engaged to co-operate with a great army of horse, came not at the time of their appointment, and most men doubted whether they would come at all, or, if they came, whether they were not as likely to join the Mysoreans as the English. Lord Cornwallis, however, arrived at Arikera, on the Cavery, and about nine miles from Seringapatam, on the 13th of May; and, crossing the river with difficulty, for it was swollen by the rains, he attacked Tippoo, who had steadily waited his coming in a very advantageous position, on the 15th, before General Abercrombie could join him or get near enough to co-operate with efficacy. The Mysoreans plied their artillery with great spirit, and preserved a very imposing countenance until the British bayonets were near their breasts, when they broke and fled. They were driven from rock to rock, and from mountain to mountain, and were at last obliged to seek shelter under the guns of their capital. The setting sun displayed a glorious view to the victors as they halted on a ridge of the hills. Right before them rose Seringapatam, the proud capital of Mysore, in all the grandeur of Eastern magnificence, adorned with mosques, minarets, pagodas, and other buildings, defended by immense fortifications, and skirted by superb gardens; the rapid Cavery winding round its walls, which seemed everywhere lined with forts, and filled with crowds of the routed army. The road was open, the prize seemed within their reach; but in the very hour of victory the English found it necessary to retreat. The force actually with Cornwallis, though strong enough to beat Tippoo's army in the field, was not strong enough to invest a place like Seringapatam;

and they had with them neither provisions nor stores enough for a long siege. Moreover the camp was half filled with sick, and the pitiless rains continued to fall in torrents. Cornwallis sent orders to Abercrombie, who had reached Periapatam, about three marches from Seringapatam, to retire towards the coast; and, after remaining some days on the Cavery, near the scene of his victory, to cover Abercrombie's retreat, Cornwallis burst the greater part of his battering guns, and began his mortifying retreat also on the 26th of May. Towards the end of his first day's march Cornwallis was startled by the sudden appearance of a body of horse that rode right in on his baggage flank; but, instead of being enemies, they proved to be the advance of the long-expected Mahratta army; and they gave intelligence that the main body of that army, counted at more than 20,000 horse, under the command of Purseram Bhow, a celebrated Mahratta warrior, and Hurry Punt, a brahmin of the highest rank, who was also charged to act as minister plenipotentiary to the whole Mahratta league, was not far distant. Cornwallis halted for a day or two, and was joined by the two great chiefs; but the swelling of the rivers, the sickly state of his own men, and now the want of his battering train, forbade all thoughts of besieging Tippoo in his capital that year; and he continued his retreat to Bangalore, there to prepare better means for another campaign. Tippoo now boasted that he had obtained the greatest of victories; nevertheless he immediately renewed some overtures for peace; but Lord Cornwallis demanded the same ample reparation to the Company and their allies which he had demanded at the beginning, and the negotiation fell to the ground. During the following autumn immense preparations were made for renewing the war in the centre of Mysore. A fresh battering train, one hundred elephants from Bengal, an immense number of bullocks, stores, and abundant provisions of every kind were collected on the Malabar coast. The Company had sent out 500,000*l.* in specie; and the English government had sent out reinforcements to the king's regiments in India, together with some fresh detachments of the royal artillery. The Mahrattas were steady and active in their co-operation, and rendered important services with their light, rapid cavalry. The passes which lead from Mysore into the Carnatic, through which Tippoo and his father had been accustomed to descend, and through which Cornwallis was to receive supplies and reinforcements, were now cleared, and several strong forts which Tippoo had erected in them were taken by storm. Oosoor, though a very strong place, was carried with little difficulty; nor was there much fighting or delay at Rajahcotta, although it consisted of two forts, the one at the bottom, the other at the top, of a high and rugged rock. The rest of the forts which defended this pass—the Policade pass—surrendered upon summons; and this direct road from Madras was opened to an immense convoy which presently came through it, headed by elephants loaded with treasure, marching two abreast, with the British standard displayed. Some hill forts, which interrupted Cornwallis's communication with the army of his other ally, the Nizam of the Deccan, were also reduced, none of them making a manful resistance except Nundydroog, which was built on the top of a mountain 1700 feet high, and apparently inaccessible to artillery. Here General Medows greatly distinguished himself. Guns were drawn up the steep, breaches were made in the walls of the fort, and orders were given to storm. Some one cried out, in the hearing of the troops, that there was a mine near the breach. "If there is a mine," said Medows, "it is a mine of gold." The troops, headed by the flank companies of the 36th and 71st regiments, rushed to the assault, entered the breach, and made the place their own. In another direction, in the mountainous, wooded country that lies between Bangalore and Seringapatam, Savendroog, a place of extraordinary strength, was captured in the same manner, the bands playing "Britons, strike home," as the storming parties advanced to the breach. Ootradroog, another fortress of the same kind and in the same district, was also carried by storm; and before the end of December all the lines of communication for Cornwallis's ultimate operations were opened and rendered perfectly secure. Tippoo had sent a considerable army to keep open his communications with the rich provinces of Bednore and Mangalore, the only part of his dominions which had escaped the ravages of war; but his Mysoreans retreated on the approach of a division of the Mahratta army, and threw themselves into a thick forest, where, besides other natural defences, they were protected by the river Toom and some deep ravines. They were soon, however, attacked, defeated, and driven out of the forest, by Captain Little, with 750 men and two guns. General Abercrombie, who, since the retreat from the upper country, had occupied cantonments at and round about Tellicherry, began to move again towards Seringapatam early in December, but he was obliged to halt at the top of the Ghauts, as the Mahrattas, who were busily engaged in plundering, could not be got together to accompany him. Early in January (1792) Lord Cornwallis united his main army under Ootradroog, where he was kept waiting more than a fortnight by the tardy Nizam, who was to join him with his army from Hyderabad. At last the Indian potentate arrived; and at the end of January the combined forces pressed forward for Seringapatam, while Abercromby was advancing to the same point by a different route. On the 5th of February Cornwallis once more got sight of Tippoo's capital, and saw that the Mysorean army was encamped under its walls. He encamped himself at about the distance of six miles from Seringapatam. That capital is situated on an island formed by two branches of the Cavery; the island being from three to four miles in length, and the fortress standing on the western angle of it. The eastern part of the island was fortified by redoubts and batteries connected by strong intrenchments with a deep ditch. On the bank of the river, where Tippoo lay encamped, there was another line of works, and no fewer than six large redoubts. This first line was defended by 100 pieces of artillery, while the second line, or the island, its fortress, &c., was defended by 300 pieces of artillery. Tippoo's army, at the lowest estimate, amounted to 5000 horse and 40,000 foot. The sultan's hope was that he should be able to protract the siege till the want of provisions and the return of the season of rains should force his enemies to retreat. But the British did not come to loiter. In the night of the 6th of February Cornwallis led them in three columns right into Tippoo's camp; and they took several of his redoubts on the river bank before the Mysoreans well knew that they were coming. Colonel Knox, with one party, even penetrated to the island, and drove the Mysoreans out of some of their works there at the point of the bayonet. When morning dawned, Tippoo, assisted by some Frenchmen who advised some skilful manœuvres, endeavoured to envelope and bear down by weight of artillery and force of numbers one of the three columns of the British; but he failed in the attempt; and detachment after detachment rushed across the Cavery, and got footing on the island. Tippoo fled across the river, and threw himself into the great fortress: many of his men immediately deserted; and 10,000 men, whom he had forcibly dragged from Coorg, the country his father had conquered, ran away in a body towards their native woods. The Mysoreans, who remained within the first line on the river bank, attempted to recover the redoubts which the British had taken; but they were repulsed with terrible loss. One of these redoubts, called the sultan's redoubt, was held by only 100 Europeans and 50 sepoy, who repulsed thousands after thousands. When the fighting on the river bank was over, and when Tippoo's people were all retiring to the island or to the bank of the river beyond it, 50 of the brave defenders of the sultan's redoubt were either killed or wounded, and the rest were so exhausted by fatigue, hunger, and thirst, having no provisions with them, nor so much as a drop of water, that they could scarcely stand or hold their muskets. The loss of the English during the whole of this day's hard fighting amounted to 535 in killed, wounded, and missing; the loss of Tippoo in slain alone was estimated at 4000. By the morning of the 8th Abercrombie had completely established his army on the island, and Tippoo had shut up his within the works of the fortress, except the cavalry and the baggage, which he had sent across the other branch of the Cavery. Cornwallis made immediate preparations for the siege; and three European regiments, seven battalions of sepoy, and some artillery at once girded the place, preventing ingress or egress. On the evening of that day Tippoo sent for two English officers, whom he had kept as prisoners in spite of a capitulation, and gave them presents and letters to Lord Cornwallis, assuring them that he had always been anxious to live at peace with the English. At day-break on the 10th a desperate attempt was made by some of the Mysorean cavalry, who had crossed the river in the dark, to cut off Lord Cornwallis in his camp; but the only effect really produced was an increase of zeal and animosity on the part of the British soldiers and sepoy, who were all greatly attached to their truly noble commander. On the 16th General Abercrombie, who had crossed the Cavery at Eratore, joined Cornwallis before Seringapatam with about 2000 Europeans and 4000 sepoy. As the Mahrattas had after all lagged behind, Abercrombie had been exposed on his march to several sharp attacks from the Mysorean cavalry. By the 21st the close investment of the fortress was well advanced; the first parallel, with a large redoubt in the rear, was finished, and the line was marked out for the second parallel. On the 22nd there was some smart fighting before the English could gain possession of a grove within reach of the guns of the fortress; but by the 23rd the second parallel was finished, and breaching batteries were begun and furnaces prepared for heating shot. In a few days more the walls must have been breached by the fire of fifty heavy guns, and the place must have been made untenable by the red-hot shot which would have set in flames the wooden edifices with which the interior of the fort was crowded. General Medows had undertaken to head the storming party, and the men were eager for that close conflict. But, although he had not suspended operations for a minute, Cornwallis had listened to the overtures sent to him by the two released officers, and had admitted some of Tippoo's people to close conference. These conferences, held in the English camp, were prolonged from the 15th till the 21st, and ended then without any agreement, for, though reduced to despair, the Mysorean sultan could not reconcile himself to the hard conditions proposed. But on the 24th he yielded to his fate, and Cornwallis ordered his troops in the trenches to cease working and to desist from hostilities. So inflamed were the soldiery against the sultan, and so high their hopes about prize-money if the place should be taken by storm, that it was found difficult to restrain them from continuing their works. In general orders issued to them, their general said that he thought it almost unnecessary to remind them that moderation in success was no less expected from brave men than gallantry in action; and that he trusted they would not only be incapable of committing violence in any intercourse that might take place between them and Tippoo's troops, but that they would even abstain from making use of any kind of insulting expression towards an enemy now subdued and humbled. The troops, though fired upon by the Mysoreans both by musketry and artillery after they had suspended their works and their own fire, were dutiful to the injunctions of Lord Cornwallis; but, if Tippoo had not whitewashed his walls, it is probable that their admirable discipline and their devotedness to their general would not have prevented some acts of violence. The treaty which Tippoo was thus forced to accept contained the following articles:—1. That he should cede one-half of his territories to the allies; 2. That he should pay three crores and thirty lacs of rupees; 3. That he should unequivocally restore all the prisoners who had been taken by the Mysoreans from the time of Hyder; 4. That he should deliver up as hostages for the due performance of the treaty two of his three eldest sons. In conformity with these terms Tippoo began to send the treasure out of the fort to the camp of the besiegers; and on the 26th the young princes, one of whom was about ten and the other eight years old, were conducted to the camp with great pomp and ceremony. They were each mounted on an elephant richly caparisoned, and seated in a silver houdah. They were dressed in long white muslin gowns and red turbans; they wore several rows of large pearls round their necks, from which was suspended an ornament consisting of a ruby and an emerald of considerable size, surrounded with large brilliants, and in their turbans each had a sprig of rich pearls. They were attended by their father's vakeels, mounted also on elephants. The procession was opened by hircarras, or messengers riding on camels, and seven standard-bearers carrying small green flags; and it was closed by 100 spearmen, whose spears were all inlaid with silver. Some of Tippoo's sepoy and a party of horse followed at a short distance. Lord Cornwallis, attended by his staff and the principal officers of his army, received the princes as they dismounted from their elephants, at the door of his great tent; embraced them; led them in, one in each hand, and treated them, as it was his nature to do all men, with great politeness, attention, and tenderness. He seated them, one on each side of himself; and then the sultan's head vakeel said—"These children were this morning the sons of the sultan, my master; they must now look up to your lordship as a father!"

SURRENDER OF THE CHILDREN OF TIPPOO SAIB TO LORD CORNWALLIS. From a Painting by Stothard.

Cornwallis assured the vakeels and the princes themselves that they should not feel the loss of a father's care. He gave each of the boys a gold watch, with which they were greatly delighted. The next day his lordship paid them a visit at the splendid tents which had been set apart for them. They came out to meet him with smiling faces; and his lordship again embraced them, and led them by the hand into the tent. There each of the princes presented him with a fine Persian sword, and he gave them in return some beautiful English fire-arms. On the morning of the 28th Tippoo fired a royal salute from the fort to announce his satisfaction at the kind and honourable reception given to his sons. Sir John Kennaway, who was appointed to conclude the definitive treaty, encountered much slowness and many difficulties on the part of Tippoo's vakeels. The sultan particularly objected to restoring to the Rajah of Coorg his dominions, and expressed astonishment and indignation at the imperative demand. But as the rajah had risen in arms, and had very materially assisted the English and their allies, Lord Cornwallis was determined not to abandon him. There had been but too much of this work at the peace of Mangalore. Tippoo instructed his vakeels to tell the English negotiator that he had refused to see them or to deliberate on that point. At the same time it was discovered that he was diligently repairing the damages which the fortress had sustained, and strengthening its works. Cornwallis then issued orders—orders most welcome to the troops—for recommencing the siege, informing the young princes that he must send them to Madras, while he disarmed their guard, and treated them as prisoners of war. The next morning the princes were actually made to begin their march to Bangalore. This brought Tippoo to his senses; his vakeels assured Sir John Kennaway that he would agree to all that had been demanded from him. Cornwallis agreed to suspend operations for one day, and recalled Tippoo's sons, who on the 19th of March presented the definitive treaty, signed by their father, to Lord Cornwallis. By this treaty the English obtained all the dominions of Tippoo on the coast of Malabar, a district surrounding Dindegul, and some territory on the western frontier of the Carnatic, including the Baramahl and the lower Ghauts; the Mahrattas (for all the three allies shared, and about equally, in the dismemberment of the sultan's dominions) recovered possession of the country as far as the river Toombuddra, which had once been their frontier line; and the Nizam got all the country from the river Kistna to the Pennar, including the forts of Gunjecottah and Cudapa. The territory thus acquired by the English did not yield much more than half a million sterling of annual revenue; but it was highly valuable as strengthening the Carnatic against invasion, as affording excellent land communications, and as containing ports on the Malabar coast highly favourable to commerce and to the extension of that influence which we aimed at. The Nairs and the other Hindu people that occupied the coast of Malabar were made happy by the change of masters, and by the full freedom now allowed them in the exercise of their religion and in the enjoyment of their old customs.* In his letter to the court of directors, which accompanied the definitive treaty, Lord Cornwallis described Tippoo as "a faithless and violent character, upon whom no dependence could be placed." His lordship knew very well his connection with the French, and the efforts he had made, and continued to make, to bring that powerful nation (once more into the Indian wars; and it is urged by one intimately acquainted with the whole subject, that he must have considered Tippoo, even in his reduced state, as much more likely to disturb the Company's possessions than either the Nizam or the Mahrattas; and that it was from far different considerations than any dread of increasing the dominions of the Mahrattas and his other ally (the motive generally ascribed to him for concluding the present peace) that he did not prosecute the war to the total destruction of the Mysorean power. The finances of the Indian government were in a very embarrassed state; the general sentiment in England seemed opposed to any war whatever in India; the court of directors had in several of their dispatches, and particularly in one which reached his lordship just before the conclusion of the definitive treaty, earnestly called his attention to the conclusion of an early peace, declaring their readiness to sacrifice some portion of the advantages which they might justly expect from the success of the war. To these strong causes remain to be added the jealousy which subsisted between the Nizam and the Mahrattas, and the serious and reasonable apprehensions Cornwallis entertained of the latter.*

To soothe the troops for the disappointment of their expectations of booty in the storming of Seringapatam, and to reward them for their excellent conduct and rare exertions during the whole of the war, the commander-in-chief, upon his own responsibility, made them a gift, equal to six months' batta, out of the money paid by Tippoo; and both he himself and General Meadows, his second in command, resigned their large shares, that the soldiers might have the more. The army returned to the Company's territories, good care being taken to place respectable garrisons in districts ceded, and particularly in the towns on the Malabar coast, where hitherto we had scarcely had a footing. The conduct of Lord Cornwallis to Tippoo after this peace was honourable and generous; but the sultan, whose pride had been so humiliated, and whose power had been so greatly reduced, seemed to receive every act of kindness rather as an insult than as a proof of friendship; and nothing in his conduct gave ground to hope that the peace would be permanent. Moreover, some of the Mahrattas took mortal offence at the refusal of Cornwallis to permit them to subsidise a British detachment.

While Lord Cornwallis was engaged with Tippoo, Lord Macartney, formerly governor of Madras, proceeded on his famous embassy to China, in the hope of opening that closed and jealously guarded country to English trade and enterprise. But the result really obtained was little more than a good book about the country and the people from Mr. (now Sir John) Barrow, his lordship's secretary. Our gradual conquests had brought our Indian frontier almost close upon the frontiers of the Celestial Empire; and the Chinese, who at least knew something of the history of our aggrandisement in Hindustan, were alarmed at our near neighbourhood, and thus more than ever disposed to persevere in their ancient excluding laws.

The affairs of Poland now demand our attention. In the month of October, 1788, the Polish diet, consisting of the magnates and the clergy, had assembled with the intention of improving and remodelling the whole system of government in that part of the country which yet remained to them unpartitioned. Soon, encouraged by the spirit that was showing itself in France, the members of the diet resolved to continue their sittings until their work of reform should be completed; and, in order to strengthen themselves by the addition of a Tiers Etat, about which so much noise was making elsewhere, but which hitherto had had no political existence in Poland, they determined to admit the inferior orders into a participation in their deliberations and powers. Several years before this, the chancellor, Andrew Zamoyski, who had both patriotism and ability, had prepared a new code, which removed many ancient abuses, and partly emancipated the peasants, who in Poland remained at the end of the eighteenth century in the same condition of serfs or slaves as the peasantry of all Europe had been in at the end of the fourteenth century. The diet which had been assembled in 1780 had rejected these vast improvements, and this code altogether, the majority of them calling Zamoyski, who had set the example by emancipating his own serfs, a plunderer and a traitor to his country.* Nor could the diet now assembled venture to propose the emancipation of the serfs, nor was it in the end proposed until it was too late. The diet, in fact, did little or nothing but occupy itself about an alliance with Prussia, until September, 1789, when they named a committee to propose reforms in different branches of the administration, and to present the basis of an entirely new constitution. "If," says a Polish noble, a magnate of the kingdom, and one, as we believe, honestly attached to his country, "if the diet had proceeded with more dispatch, and proclaimed the new constitution eighteen months earlier than they did, Poland would have been saved. She would have had the time necessary to consolidate her government, and to gain strength, from 1789 to 1792; she would not have lost all the advantages of an alliance very sincerely offered at that period by the King of Prussia; she would not have left Russia the time to make peace with the Turks and the Swedes; and she would have prevented that friendly understanding between Russia and Prussia which arose out of the events and troubles in France in 1792. It was this understanding and these events which entirely changed the intentions of Frederic William with respect to Poland; which altered his character and manner of thinking; and which raised and armed nearly all Europe against France, without producing any other effect than increasing the revolutionary fanaticism, exasperating men's minds, and leaving France exposed for a time to all the horrors of anarchy." † The Polish constitution-makers did not perform their work quite so rapidly as the French, although, unfortunately for themselves, they imitated those vivacious legislators in too many particulars. A deputy, or oruncio, from Lithuania, thought that, before they made a constitution at all, they had better provide the means of defending their country, and repeatedly exclaimed in the diet, "Money and an army! These are the two sole objects which ought at present to engage our attention!" He was in the right, but he was not listened to. At the close of the year 1789 his Prussian majesty, Frederic William, who was already putting himself forward with England as the opponent of the Empress Catherine in her designs upon Turkey, assured the diet that it was his earnest wish to see Poland happy and powerful, with such an improvement in her institutions as would enable her to maintain her own independence; and he added that this was equally the wish of his close allies England and Holland, who, like himself, were anxious to form with the Poles friendly connections not liable to be disturbed by cabals and intrigues. At the request of the diet, the king, Stanislaus Augustus, sent ambassadors to Berlin, London, the Hague, Constantinople, and other courts; and the former lover and creature of Catherine appears to have done all that in him lay to procure alliances with her enemies, and with those who were jealous of her power. After appointing the constitution committee, the diet doubted whether they had or had not the right of making any elementary changes in their old constitution, without being more formally authorised by the nation, or by the nobility and clergy, who then alone constituted the nation. This question, however, being settled in the affirmative, the committee at last produced their project of reform, in eight articles, entitled, "Principles for the improvement of the constitution." These articles laid down several good regulations; but they spoke of the crown as being still elective (that great curse of the country, and the cause of most of its miseries); and they spoke neither of the enfranchisement of the peasantry nor of the rights of the burghers and non-nobles to a share in the legislature. Stanislaus Augustus, having no son likely to succeed him, and believing that if they made the throne hereditary they would not give it to any member of his family, appeared to be passive and indifferent to the discussions which took place on this point; but when his opinion was asked, and he was consulted by members of the diet as to the choice of a prince proper to be named his successor, he made no secret of his intimate conviction that the best thing they could do would be to make the throne hereditary in the family of some prince or other; telling them that the elective nature of the crown, and the intrigues and troubles it had led to at the death of every king, had been the real cause of the decline and weakness of Poland. The burghers had demanded and were demanding to be admitted to the rank of citizens, to be represented in the national diet, and to have their share in the legislature, and their chance of promotion in the executive government, in the law, and in the army, where all places except the lowest were monopolised by the nobles. The diet, which was prorogued on the 30th of December, 1789, to the 3rd of February, 1790, came to no conclusion on either of these vital points; but, unlike the French nobility before the revolution, who paid nothing and would not agree to pay anything towards the expenses of the state, these Polish magnates voluntarily taxed themselves to the amount of a tenth part of their yearly revenues, and decided that the burghers and country-people should pay no more than they had been accustomed to pay in quieter times. During the recess of the diet, Luchesini, Frederic William's ambassador, informed the court of Warsaw that the Empress of Russia had declared that she would be no obstacle to an alliance between Prussia and Poland; that the King of Prussia highly approved of the projected reforms, and was ready to offer Stanislaus Augustus a defensive alliance, and conclude with him a commercial treaty, upon terms liberal and beneficial to both countries. But at the same time Luchesini did not conceal the eager desire of Frederic William to possess Thorn and Dantzic, which would throw open to him the navigation of the Vistula to the Baltic; intimating, however, that Prussia would give an equivalent by ceding other territories to Poland. It is said that the English minister resident at Warsaw backed Luchesini in asking for Thorn and Dantzic; and that some time after this Pitt himself strongly recommended the cession to the Polish ambassador at London, telling him that the Poles derived no advantage from those two outlets for their produce in the state of weakness in which they were groaning under the protection of the court of Petersburg; that the King of Prussia, in offering his friendship and a treaty of alliance, was presenting them with the means of escaping from their abject state; and that this alone would be worth more than Thorn and Dantzic.* But the Poles were averse to yield the commerce of the Vistula, and the command of its embouchure, to a state which had already been a partaker in the dismemberment of their territory; and the diet afterwards decreed that no portion of the states should ever be alienated! The diet continued to discuss the great question of the new constitution; and another committee was appointed to work out the principles which had been admitted. Still the work proceeded very slowly; and, as the term was approaching when the diet, by the old laws, must dissolve itself, the nuncios resolved to make a new law for the occasion, in order to justify the prolongation of their sittings.† The king professed to be perfectly satisfied, saying that the present diet, which had been charged with the reconstruction of the constitution, was a convention, a constituent body, which ought not to separate until it had executed its mission. There was, however, a minority in the diet that hotly opposed this novel resolution, and taxed it with illegality when it was adopted in spite of their efforts. Many essential changes in the form of government were agreed to; but when Krasinski, bishop of Kamieniec, boldly introduced the project for making the throne hereditary, like the thrones of all the countries of Europe, he was furiously assailed by a minority, but still a considerable part of the magnates, who declared that hereditary monarchy would overthrow all liberty and subject Poland to a despotism—as if there were any liberty left to overthrow in the unhappy country. Having determined that the throne should be made hereditary, the majority of the diet recommended the Elector of Saxony as a proper successor to the reigning king. The minority quoted the old law of 1768, which had been dictated and guaranteed by Russia, and which expressly declared that no change could be made in the fundamental laws of the kingdom, except by the unanimous assent of the diet. The majority hereupon voted the abrogation of the law of 1768; and at the same time they decreed that the new constitution should not be discussed article by article, but approved en masse, after which the constitution committee might make any alterations of detail which might be voted by the diet. The Polish reformers increased their speed at the very moment when the French revolutionists were alarming or startling all the established governments of Europe. If they had determined that their crown should be hereditary, they seemed equally resolved that its power, though increased from what it had been hitherto, should be very limited: they kept to themselves the right of declaring war and making peace, and entering into and concluding treaties of alliance; only enacting that in these cases there must be a majority of three-fourths of the diet. The demand of the burghers for a share in the representation was submitted to a committee, who in their report recommended the measure. The minority of the diet, who called themselves anti-revolutionists, and who thought it monstrous that plain citizens should be anything in the state, opposed the measure with the greatest fury; but after some amendments the measure was agreed to. On the very same day Prince Adam Czartoryski, Count Potocki, grand-marshal of Lithuania, and Malachowski, marshal of the diet, took up their freedom as citizens of Warsaw; and their example was followed by many other noblemen. This seemed one great step gained; but unfortunately neither the citizens of Warsaw nor those of any other town in Poland had any great weight or influence in the country, or any familiarity with free municipal institutions, or any of those habits of self-government which are only to be acquired by time. The majority now proceeded with a constantly increasing speed; and being impatient of the opposition of the minority, and apprehending some hostile interference on the part of Russia if the business were not finished

† The better to legitimate their departure from the old law on the duration of sessions, and all such new laws and changes in the constitution as they might make, they called upon the electoral bodies (the noblesse and clergy) to elect and send to the Diet a number of new members, equal to their own number:—and this was done.

immediately, they resolved that the articles of the constitution should be adopted en masse and sanctioned by the king all in one day, and that the minority should be taken by surprise. The articles of this new constitution were privately submitted to the king, who, against his better judgment, agreed to play his part in the coup d'état, or trick, and accept the whole constitution without further examination or debate. But it was difficult to keep secret what was known to so many individuals; and some of the opposition or minority learned the whole of the plan. The majority then anticipated, and by changing their great day, which had been fixed for the 5th of May (1791), to the 3rd of May, they hoped to prevent any mischief to their grand project. It appears they apprehended some scene of violence like those which had so often happened in Polish diets. In the night between the 2nd and 3rd of May they met in a private house and read the constitutional act, precautions being adopted to exclude every one that thought or voted with the minority, or, as they were called, the Russian faction; and, after the constitution had been read with acclamation and unanimous approbation, they set their signatures to it. On the 3rd the king, as had been agreed, entered the hall in the royal palace where the diet held their session; and, the constitution being read and voted by the nuncios, Stanislaus Augustus took the oath to it, and called upon all those who loved their country to follow him to the church to take the same oath with more solemnity. And forthwith all the nuncios except twelve followed the king through the halls and corridors which lead from the palace to the cathedral church; and before the high altar they solemnly swore to maintain this constitution. A Te Deum was then chanted, and the nuncios separated till the 5th of May. This new constitution determined that the Catholic religion was to remain the dominant religion of the state; that other Christian sects should be tolerated, but that the king must always be a Catholic:—that the hereditary principle was adopted, and the succession to the throne vested in the Elector of Saxony and his descendants:—that there should be two Houses, or a senate and a lower chamber:—that the king should have a deliberating voice in the senate, and a casting vote:—that the diet should assemble every two years, but that its convocation would be necessary at any time the country was threatened with a foreign war, a civil war or revolution, a general dearth, or a minority by the death or mental alienation of the sovereign:—that the king should have a suspensive veto, or the right of suspending from one diet to another the execution of any decree to which he had not given his assent:—that the king should have the right of naming to all places of trust and honour:—that the executive power belonged to the king and his council, composed of six ministers of state; but that these ministers should be responsible to the Diet, and that whenever the diet should by a majority declare that they had no confidence in a minister, his majesty should be bound to dismiss him and

name another:—that the army should be entirely at the disposition of the executive power:—that in the interval of the diets the king and his council should provisorily have the power of making treaties and regulations:—that, the nobility should be confirmed in their ancient rights and privileges, but that the burghers of the free towns should send deputies to the diet, and that these burgher deputies should at the end of three years have the right of being ennobled if they chose:—that every man that reached the rank of captain in the army should be ennobled; and that in every successive diet thirty burgher proprietors might be ennobled at the demand of their towns:—that, in addition to the territorial courts of the noblesse and proprietors, there should be courts of justice for such of the country people as were free:—that the executive power should be entrusted with the management of national education, police, war, and the treasury:—that the liberum veto, the cause of so much mischief, and confederations and associations, should be abolished for ever:—that every twenty-five years the constitution should be revised and amended in an extraordinary diet convoked for that purpose. The abolition of the slavery of the cultivators of the soil was no clause in this charter, and was not even mentioned in it; but measures had been taken by the leaders of the reforming party to prepare for and gradually bring about that change without occasioning any violent shock, or infringing the rights and property of the noble holders of lands and serfs; and the Poles insist that there can be no doubt whatever that if this reforming diet had not been forcibly interrupted, and then dissolved for ever, the slavery of the peasants would gradually have disappeared.*

None of the Poles, except the enthusiasts of the nation, could fancy for one moment that they, in the impoverished and already dismembered state of the country, could make head against the formidable power of the Russians, or oppose the Czarina in a single campaign when she should have finished her war with the Turks, unless they were backed and supported by some other power or powers. The ally pointed out by the circumstances of the times and the disposition of the reigning king was certainly Prussia. In the month of March, or some six weeks before the constitution was sworn to and promulgated, the ministers of Frederic William had concluded the commercial treaty with the Polish government; but, as the Poles would not yield to him Thorn and Dantzic, no progress was made in the defensive alliance; and the decree of the Polish diet prohibiting for ever the alienation of any portion of the remaining territory stopped all further negotiation on that subject. This decree was passed some time before the 3rd of May, and there can be little doubt that it gave offence to Frederic William, and destroyed all hope of Prussian assistance, although he allowed his ministers to conclude the commercial treaty after the decree was passed, and wrote an approving

and an applauding letter to Stanislaus Augustus after he had sworn to the new constitution. And the Prussian minister at Warsaw had on the 16th of May (thirteen days after the promulgation of the constitution) a long conference with a committee the diet had appointed for managing foreign affairs, and assured them, in the name of the king his master, that his majesty highly approved of the happy and bloodless revolution which had given to Poland a wise and well-organised constitution. The Prussian minister further assured the diet that his master was more than satisfied with the choice they had made of the house of Saxony to be their hereditary sovereigns; and that he was of opinion that this firm and decisive step would give a solid basis to the government of Poland and to the national prosperity and happiness. He also told the diet that his Prussian majesty had expressed the same sentiments to the Elector of Saxony on the subject of this wise constitution. All that was said at this conference was taken down in writing, signed by all present, and then deposited in the archives of the foreign office. Other strong proofs existed of Frederic William's keeping up the same tone for weeks and months after the passing of that constitution which he subsequently pretended he had all along disapproved. Felicitations poured in to Warsaw from other quarters; but the Elector of Saxony, whose family had already suffered so much by aspiring to wear the worse than iron crown of Poland, who knew the political state of Europe, and felt assured that Russia would never permit him or any of his family to reign in peace as hereditary kings of Poland, hesitated and held back, and only returned evasive answers to the diet, who thought he ought to have been in transports of joy at the offer they made him. The Count of Malachowski was sent to Dresden as envoy-extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to discuss the whole matter with the elector; and, as he made no progress in removing that cautious prince's doubts and misgivings, the Prince of Czartoryski was sent to join and co-operate with Malachowski. This was in the month of October, 1791; and it was not until the month of April, 1792, only one month before the empress Catherine issued her manifesto, and marched her armies into Poland to destroy not merely the revolution and the new constitution, but the very existence of the nation, that the Elector informed the diet that he would accept the crown upon certain conditions, of which some were inexecutable and some such as the Poles would never have consented to execute. His electoral highness put among his conditions that the Poles should obtain the consent of all the neighbouring nations to the new scheme of government they had adopted, and that he should have the certainty of those neighbouring powers not opposing the hereditary monarchy in him and his family. Yet the Elector knew that Russia had determined to oppose everything. Another of his conditions was that the constitution of the 3rd of May should be

remodelled so as to give more power to the sovereign, and determine and limit the powers of the diet. He also demanded the exclusive right of war and peace, and a more direct authority over the army than was given by the constitution. Several things in his ultimatum seemed written to conciliate the empress, and condemn sundry proceedings and regulations in France which the Poles had imitated in their constitution, rather than for any other use or purpose: thus the Elector exposed the form of oath to be taken by the Polish troops to the nation, which he called a vague word signifying whatever a dominant faction chose to make it signify; and, in claiming for himself the entire management of the education of his son and heir, he seemed to glance at the conduct of the National Assembly in usurping the paternal power over the young Dauphin. In far too many particulars the Poles had displayed a fondness for French forms, ceremonies, and phraseologies; and, however different its character, their revolution unquestionably received most of its impulses from Paris, where there were constantly many Poles residing. And ever since the troubles and the first partition in the year 1772, there had been many French propagandists and intriguers residing in Poland, where they disseminated, by spoken words and by printed books and pamphlets, sentiments subversive of all social order. All this was, perhaps, less dangerous in Poland than in other countries; for, except the upper classes, who could never altogether wish that the doctrines of the Rights of Man and of the levelling Jacobin clubs should be put in actual practice, few or none could read, or understand any language except their own difficult Slavonian dialect—a dialect far too difficult for any flighty, impatient Frenchman to learn, even though he remained years in the country. There was no medium by which to communicate the principles of Jacobinism, and liberty and equality, and all the rest of the new philosophy; and the dull, degraded Polish serf was as little given to ambition, or to speculation of any mental kind, as the bullock he drove or the horse he rode. Whatever might be the mistakes in political principles or the errors committed by the Polish nobles and clergy, who were in fact the only makers of this revolution, the only builders of this new constitution, there was therefore but little danger that the scenes passing on the Seine, the Loire, and the Rhone should be repeated on the Vistula, the Bug, and the Niemen: there was in Poland no mighty mass of material to constitute a domineering, remorseless, and all-destroying democracy. Still, however, in those moments of universal doubt and dread, when every sovereign knew that he was threatened from France with insurrection and revolution, it is not unreasonable to believe that the King of Prussia, the Emperor of Austria, and even the Czarina of Russia may have felt some alarm at the partial imitation of the French revolution in a country seated in the midst of their territories, and portions of which they had so unjustly appropriated to themselves. The Empress Catherine, who felt, and like a woman, that it was to her, and her alone, that Poniatowski (Stanislaus Augustus) owed his Polish throne, and that his present conduct, so contrary to her wishes, and his negotiating with Prussia, and through Prussia with England, to enter into that hostile league which threatened her (and which, but for the strenuous opposition of the English Whigs, would, in all probability, have been formed against her on account of Turkey), was most un-dutiful and ungrateful, was eager for revenge, by force of arms or by policy, and no doubt calculated from the beginning on nothing less than the total destruction of the Polish kingdom, or republic, or nondescript. Any home-fears about the French revolution or its principles must have been far less strong and vehement in her bosom than her thirst for revenge and her avidity for more territory. In the King of Prussia, although from the character of his country and some of his subjects he had considerably more to apprehend than Catherine with her Muscovites, doubtless the dread and detestation of French principles were much sharpened by the refusal of the Poles to give up Thorn and Dantzic, and by the prospect soon opened to him by Catherine—opened as soon as, or perhaps rather sooner than, the time when the Czarina so reluctantly concluded her war against the Turks, to prevent the progress of which his Prussian majesty was bound by his English alliance—of obtaining not merely Thorn and Dantzic, with the free navigation of the Vistula, but whole Polish provinces, another great slice wherewith to round and to give shape to that shapeless thing the Prussian monarchy, which had been made up, and in quite recent times, by additions and fragments—a bit here and a bit there—acquired by treaty or by war. Up to a certain point, or so long as the integrity, or at least the independence, of the Turkish empire was the uppermost consideration, Pitt and his government unquestionably encouraged the King of Prussia in demanding Thorn and Dantzic as the price for which he would conclude a defensive alliance, and assist the Poles in maintaining their new constitution and guarding all of their kingdom that was left to them by the last partition against the arms of Russia, and against the arms of Austria, if the emperor should be induced to make common cause with the Czarina. Pitt's words to Count Oginski, and Lord Grenville's dispatches to the British minister at Warsaw, were sufficiently explicit on this head; and a pamphlet, printed, published, and widely circulated in the Polish capital, to recommend the cession in question and to prove that the indispensable sacrifice would not really cost the Poles much, was universally attributed to the English resident minister, Mr. Hailes, who, on the 28th of January, 1791, or three months and a few days before the promulgation of the new constitution, had delivered a note to the diet, expressing the most friendly sentiments on the part of the British government, and the earnest desire entertained by the king, his master, to contract a commercial and defensive alliance with Poland, and to see his ally, the King of Prussia, essentially included in that alliance. But when the Czarina had concluded peace with the Turks, and had begun to put herself forward as the antagonist of French revolutionary principles, pretending to seek the friendship of Prussia chiefly if not entirely on account of the one great object and common cause of sovereigns and established governments, Pitt and his cabinet became suddenly cool and indifferent as to the fate of Poland, adopted a tone of the greatest caution in their diplomatic correspondence, and hinted very plainly that they must and would remain neutral in that quarrel. Fox and other members of the opposition, though they expressed an enthusiastic admiration of the new Polish constitution, and complimented Oginski on the energy, good conduct, and moderation of his countrymen in their late revolution, certainly did nothing, in time, to serve their cause or obviate the doom which awaited them. Indeed, Fox may be ranked among the enemies of Poland; for it was he, and his party, that had prevented the extension of our Prussian alliance, and those energetic measures which would have checked in more than one direction the aggrandisement of Catherine, and have left her little time and no means to devote to the destruction of Poland. Fox told Oginski to beware of the King of Prussia, whose alliance, he said, was not to be trusted; but he continued to eulogise in the British parliament the moderation and the magnanimity of the czarina; to declare that Russia was a power we ought to conciliate instead of alienating,—that Russia was a natural ally of England; and it was at the very time when Catherine was preparing to invade Poland, when her troops were almost on the frontiers, that Fox sent his own minister, Adair, to St. Peterburg to congratulate and encourage the empress! The blame may be divided among them all, but neither Fox and his party, nor any other party or set of men that we can discover in England, can justly pretend to throw the whole of the “deep damnation” of the “taking off” of Poland upon Pitt and his cabinet.

As soon as Catherine had concluded, for the present, her war with the Turks, by the treaty of Jassy, which was signed in August, 1791, she directed the whole of her attention to Poland, preparing to employ against it those armies which had been in the field against the sultan, and diplomatizing with the courts of Stockholm, Berlin, and Vienna with consummate art. As for the King of Sweden, the knight-errant of Marie Antoinette, he was completely absorbed by his wild schemes for conducting armies of half the nations of Europe against the French republicans; he was adroitly flattered with the prospect of being the generalissimo of kings and emperors—a dream from which he never awoke until he fell under the hand of an assassin; and as for the Poles, he hated them for their imitations of the French revolutionists. The King of

Prussia, in the humour he was in, was but too glad to forget his recent negotiations with the Poles, and to grasp at some new compact with Russia, which would give him far more than the Poles had refused him, or than he had ever asked, and this, too, without the expenses and risks of a war with a first-rate power, in which he might have found himself involved, if he had abided by his original scheme of supporting Poland against Russia. With respect to the court of Vienna, whose concurrence or neutrality was a sine quâ non, the character of the Emperor Leopold, and his high reputation for justice and moderation, seemed to offer a serious obstacle to the nefarious scheme on foot; but Leopold died on the 1st of March, 1792, and his successor, Francis, was soon found to be possessed of a more elastic conscience, and of an infinitely more lively dread of French principles—a dread daily increased by the audacity of the French republicans, and very soon by their unexpected victories over their Prussian invaders, and over the emperor's veteran troops in Luxembourg and the Netherlands. To the narrow mind of Francis the revolution in Poland and the constitution of May, 1791, never appeared in any other light than as a branch of the great French revolution; and it seemed to him not merely natural and justifiable, but absolutely necessary, that the spirit of innovation should be put down in their rear, before Prussia and Austria attacked it in their front in France, and that all the princes engaging in the crusade against jacobinism should take their reward out of a country tainted with jacobinism like Poland. The idea never struck him, or the czarina, or the King of Prussia, that, at a great crisis in Europe, at a moment when they were taking up the sword for principles, and against violence and injustice, every part of their own conduct ought to be pure in principle, and free from the vices and excesses against which they were arming. The Poles, who had made the revolution and new constitution, certainly took no care to deprive their enemies of the handle at which they grasped. Several of the laws they made and the decrees they passed were little more than transcripts of things passed in the French Assembly; they got up themselves, or allowed, political clubs, which rather too nearly resembled that of the Jacobins; and a deputation of Poles then in Paris presented themselves at the bar of the Convention, where they glorified themselves in making a profession of ultra-Jacobin principles, and in assuring the French that the whole Polish nation, or at least all the patriots in it, cherished the same principles. There were Englishmen who had done as much as this, or even more: this Polish deputation might be self-elected; and, at all events, their boast of a reigning jacobinism in Poland was absolute nonsense; but the kingly critics of their conduct set down all their madness to the account of their country. At Warsaw they kept the 3rd of May, 1792, as a great holiday and anniversary of their revolution; and, in so doing, the Poles drank toasts and made use of words and sentences which had become the alarm-bells, not only of every king and government, but of every people in Europe that wished to remain quiet. The municipality gave a grand dinner to five hundred persons, and invited the king to be present at it. Stanislaus Augustus not only went to the dinner, but also partook, or pretended to partake, in the double intoxication of wine and politics. When his health was drunk, he responded by drinking to the nation and the municipality (which latter had become, as in Paris, a strong governing power), and he made a speech in which he told the burghers that the period was arrived in which all artificial distinctions were to cease, except so far as they were conferred by the sovereign people: And the enthusiastic and intoxicated guests, whose ears were to tingle in a very few weeks with the roar and crash of Russian artillery, shook the municipal hall with shouts of "Long live liberty!" "Long live the nation!" "Long live our citizen king, the friend of the Rights of Man!" In the meantime other Poles, who were of the Russian party, a party which never ceased to exist, or who became linked with the czarina through their dislike of the new constitution, and their rage at what they termed the irregular and treacherous manner in which that constitution had been carried, had united themselves at Jassy, and had sent their agents and their memorials to St. Petersburg, calling upon Catherine, as the party who had guaranteed the old constitution and form of government, to interfere and overthrow the new one. Russia never made an attack upon the liberty and independence of this unhappy country, without having a Polish party to invite and assist her; it was so in the first partition, and it was equally so in the last. The number of the present party is differently represented, the patriots wishing it to appear small, and the Russians as large as possible. It appears, however, that it was smaller than on any previous occasion, and that only Felix Potocki, Branicki, Rzewinski, and eleven other magnates, signed the act of confederacy at Targowica, on the 14th of May. Four days after the signing of this act the Russian minister at Warsaw, Bulgakoff, presented a protest against all the recent innovations and every part of them. This protest was handed not to Stanislaus Augustus, whom Catherine had ceased to consider or treat as a king from the time he had ceased to be obedient to her will, but to the diet. It commenced with well sounding and memorable words. In the name of his mistress Bulgakoff said—"The liberty and independence of the illustrious republic of Poland have at all times attracted the attention and concern of all her neighbours. Her majesty the Empress of all the Russias, who, together with this claim, also unites the right of her formal and positive engagements with the republic, has endeavoured in a more peculiar manner to watch over the inviolable preservation of these two precious attributes of its political existence. These continual and generous endeavours of her majesty, being the effects of her love for justice and order, as well as her affection and good wishes towards a nation whom the identity of origin, language, and so many other natural relations with the nation she reigns over, render dear to her, did doubtless repress the ambition and avidity of those rulers who, not satisfied with the share of authority assigned to them by the laws of the state, aspired at a greater extent of power at the expense of these very laws." The empress, or her minister for her, told the makers of the new constitution that they had acted most factiously and ungratefully; that they had neglected nothing to tire her patience and weary out her active vigilance over the integrity of the possessions, rights, and prerogatives of the illustrious Polish nation; that they had even dared to defame the purity and munificence of her intentions; that they had with perfidious dexterity caused her protection, and the guarantee she had given to their old legitimate constitution, to be considered a humiliating yoke; and that they had long been proposing all sorts of perverse and erroneous notions, which would be fatal to their own country and perilous to its neighbours. She accused them of hurrying on these designs when Russia had a double war upon her hands, with Sweden and the Porte; of having violated all the ancient laws of the republic, sitting as a Diet beyond the period fixed by the constitution, usurping, mingling, and concentrating in themselves all branches of power, and finally crowning all their ruinous enterprises by totally subverting, on the 3rd of May, 1791, "the edifice of government under which the republic had been happy for so many years." "On this day," continued the protest and declaration of this delicate friend of the rights of nations and of liberty, "the ancient edifice vanished, and on its ruins arose a monarchy, which, in the new laws, by which it was thought to limit it, offers nothing but contradictions, incoherency with the old laws, an entire insufficiency in every respect, which leaves not even to the Poles the shadow of that liberty and of those prerogatives of which they were always so jealous. The elective throne is rendered an hereditary one; and that law which was dictated by the wisdom of their ancestors, and which forbids to meddle during the lifetime of the king with the election of his successor, has been rashly transgressed, together with every other law that guaranteed the perpetual consistency of the Polish republic." Exaggerating some circumstances which indubitably happened, and perhaps purely inventing one or two others, Catherine proceeded to tell the Diet that the means made use of for executing their designs had been characterised by the same violence and injustice as the designs themselves; that on the day of the revolution—that fatal 3rd of May—the palace and the Diet Hall were crowded with the Warsaw mob; that armed men were introduced; that cannons were brought from the arsenal in order to fire on such as might endeavour to prevent the success of the plot; that the regiment of artillery and the Lithuanian guards were assembled for supporting the mob, their fury being previously excited against those men whose resistance to the revolution was dreaded; that several members of the Diet who persevered in their patriotic sentiments were threatened with death; and that when one of these gentlemen humbly approached the throne to remind the king of his solemn oath to the Pacta Conventa, that sacred and indissoluble charter which connected the sovereign with the nation, he was trodden under foot in an unmerciful manner in spite of his inviolable character as a representative of the nation, and to the shame and disgrace of every Pole who had not lost all sense of honour and liberty. "And this is the revolution," said the autocratess, "which is represented by its promoters to have been the free wish of the nation!" Taking good care not to mention the King of Prussia, with whom her good understanding was now complete, or England, of whom she still stood in awe—an awe imposed by the tone which Pitt had frequently used towards her, and from which the bland tongue of Mr. Adair could not disenchant her—she taxed the Poles who had made the revolution with base endeavours to raise up enemies against her, and drive their country into a war with Russia when that power had enemies enough in active hostility. She taxed them with old offences of intolerance against the Greek religion, which was the religion of some of the Poles and of all the Russians; with having imprisoned a bishop of the Greek church, who was in reality her own subject; and with having torn from the altar, in a chapel at Warsaw, protected by her imperial coat of arms, a Greek priest, &c. Some of the orators in the diet had not been silent on the private life and morals of the Messalina-Semiramis of the north; and Catherine, who bitterly resented all such criticisms, accused them of having failed in the respect due to her exalted rank, saying, that this unpardonable rudeness, instead of being reprimanded as it deserved, had been encouraged and applauded by the chiefs of the party who had subverted the laws and constitution. "The least of these grievances," said the she-wolf to those who were destined to undergo the fate of the lamb in this quarrel, "without mentioning those which are voluntarily suppressed for the sake of brevity, would already justify, in the face of God and men, the resolution of her majesty to take signal vengeance. Yet it is not with this view that her majesty publishes the present declaration. Her innate justice does not suffer her to confound all the Polish nation with one of the parties in it which has betrayed her majesty's confidence. The empress, on the contrary, is fully convinced that the greatest number had no share in any of the things attempted against herself and the republic. For this very reason she is willing to sacrifice her just resentment to a hope more compatible with her generous and pacific sentiments, of seeing all these grievances remedied by means of a new Diet, which shall more strictly adhere to the orders of their superiors, and the immutable laws of the state, than the present existing Diet, which has trespassed upon them all in the most manifest manner, and marked all their transactions with the stamp of their own illegality. But, should her majesty refuse to listen to the voice of her own resentment, she cannot be deaf to the voice of claims made to her by a great number of Poles, among whom are several who are as illustrious by birth and rank in the republic as they are distinguished by patriotic virtues and their ability to serve the state. Animated by a pure and praiseworthy zeal for the welfare of their country and the recovery of its former liberty and independence, these noble Poles have united themselves (at Targowica) for the purpose of forming a lawful confederation, as the only effectual remedy for the misfortunes which the unlawful confederation and usurpation at Warsaw has caused to the nation. With these sentiments they have claimed the support and assistance of the empress, who has not hesitated to assure them of both, being guided on her part by her friendly dispositions in favour of the republic, and her desire of strictly fulfilling the obligations of her treaties. In order to fulfil her promise, the empress has ordered part of her troops to enter the territory of the republic. Her troops are to show themselves there as friends, and are to co-operate in the re-establishment of the rights, liberties, and prerogatives of the republic." She promised a perfect oblivion of what was past to such as should receive her troops as friends, with every security for person and property; but she told all those that should offer any resistance, or "persevere in a perverse way of thinking, and oppose the benevolent intentions of the empress and the patriotic wishes of their fellow-citizens," that they would have to thank themselves if they met with the treatment they deserved. Nothing, according to Catherine, was so easy as to get rid of the oaths they had taken to the new constitution on the 3rd of May, by error, by force, or by seduction; they had only to take again the oath to the old constitution, the only true and sacred oath, by which, long before the 3rd of May, they had engaged to maintain and defend the free government under which they were born; and the renewal of this old oath was the only means of repairing the perjury of which they had been guilty in taking the new oath.

On the 18th of May, the very day on which this declaration was presented at Warsaw, a Russian army, consisting of 80,000 regular troops, and 20,000 Cossacks and other irregulars, entered Poland, along with some of the confederates of Targowica and other Poles. The Diet at Warsaw returned an answer which was both spirited and moderate. They claimed for themselves that liberty and independence which the empress seemed to acknowledge as their right; and they defended the revolution they had made as being conformable to the interests of the nation and the wishes of the best of the people. They said that their Diet, before proceeding to pass the constitution, had doubled their numbers by a second set of representatives freely and lawfully chosen; that the spirit of the new was soon seen to assimilate with that of the old representatives; and that a union of will and of sentiment necessarily reinforced the system of patriotic reform, and hastened the completion of the work. They declared that in making their crown hereditary they had been actuated by the recollection of the long and unfortunate troubles inseparable from the vacancies of elective monarchy, and that in so doing they had even served the interests of the neighbouring powers, by the suppression of abuses and intrigues, which were a constantly recurring source of cabal and jealousies to other cabinets, exposing them to influences often injurious to their own tranquillity. They read her a complete recantation of their old political prejudices in favour of the liberum veto, and the excessive power of the oligarchy over the sovereign and every other part of the state; and they declared that the most passionate lovers of Polish liberty must prefer the new constitution, by which the powers of the sovereign were increased, and his ministers rendered responsible for the abuse of them. They denied that one power, by guaranteeing the constitution of another, had the right to prevent improvement and change in that constitution—the right of giving an eternal fixity to laws and forms of government, which ought to vary according to times and circumstances; and they exposed the monstrous absurdity of pretending that one power was to invade another at the mere cry and reclamation of a few discontented individuals. They denied that they had acted ungenerously towards Russia, in seeking to ally themselves with her enemies at a time when her hands were full: and they said that the common object of the ambassadors they sent to different courts was to make known to all those courts the spirit and the pacific objects of the Diet, which tended solely to the improvement of their own internal government. They allowed that during the war they had sent an ambassador to Constantinople, and that the Ottoman Porte, pressed by the arms of Russia, would have been glad to find a useful diversion in an alliance with Poland, and had made advances to that end, accompanied with the most seductive offers; but they protested that they had merely sought to secure the interests of Poland, without committing those of Russia, and had thus given her majesty the empress proofs of their regard, rather than given her any just causes of complaint. As to the persecuting of Poles belonging to the Greek church, they said that the whole Greek communion had been incited to sedition, insurrection, and revolt by the fanaticism of some Greek monks, seconded by the suttlers of the empress's army, and by other Russian subjects: that, in order to stop the conspiracy at its source, endeavours were made to discover the chief authors; and that then, upon good proof, they had arrested a

Greek bishop and a monk. They assured her majesty that the subaltern officer and some soldiers, who had inadvertently arrested the monk in a chapel covered by the empress's coat of arms, had been rigorously punished, and reparation made to her majesty's representatives. The Diet concluded in a tone so very mild, that it sounds almost like a confession of their weakness and the hopelessness of their cause:—"If, contrary to all expectation, our intentions, directed by the love of peace and justice, having no object but the safety and internal peace of Poland, should be still misunderstood—if the reclamations of some individuals, dissatisfied with order, should prevail in the mind of her majesty the empress over the wish of our nation, and if the republic should find herself in the melancholy situation of seeing her sovereignty or legal authority disputed, the Polish people, jealous of the esteem of Europe, jealous of the esteem of a sovereign who knows well what noble sentiments are, will not hesitate in their choice between a degrading surrender and the honourable perils of a necessary defence." Stanislaus Augustus issued an address to the Polish army, telling them that the army of a free nation, with a good cause on their side, could not fail to find their support in the powerful arm of the Omnipotent; and he and the Diet joined in a circular letter addressed to the whole nation, in which the Poles were reminded of the dear rate at which Russian protection had been purchased, and of the curses which had attended Russian interference and domination. Senators, ministers, and representatives of the country, violently carried off from their residences or from the palace of the king and the very hall of the Diet; the contemptuous treatment of the nobility, the oppression and spoliation of the burghers, the seizure and forcible transportation of peasants and their families to stock new Russian colonies or to serve in the armies of the empress; and, finally, the dismembering of the country,—these were some of the effects of Russian interference and Russian guarantees. If the Poles did not now unite as one man, worse would follow—the yoke would be made the heavier for their having dared to become free and independent; and lastly would come the entire partition of the country, and the total extinction of the Polish name! This joint address of the king and Diet ended with a prayer to the God of armies, the God of their forefathers, who saw the innocence and the justice of their cause, who knew the purity of their intentions, and that their object was not to shed blood for the sake of ambition, spoil, and dominion over others, but solely to defend their country, and their national laws and liberty. Stanislaus Augustus, on the 31st of May, applied for aid to the King of Prussia; and many of the Poles were credulous enough to think either that this aid would be given, or that Frederic William would play the part of a generous mediator. Although, through the motives and circumstances we have described, Frederic William had hung back from the defensive alliance, Prussia, as a guarantee at the time of the last partition of the integrity and independence of all that Russia, Austria, and itself had left to the Polish kingdom or republic, seemed bound to interpose on the present occasion. "It is apparent," said Stanislaus Augustus in his letter, "that the territory of the republic, guaranteed by your majesty, is violated; that its independence is invaded and attacked in a manner so general and extensive, that, descending even into the most subtle interpretations, it is impossible to ascribe it merely to the articles of the new constitution. . . . In the midst of my inquietudes and fatigues, that which consoles me is, that never was there a better cause than ours, or a cause which had for its support an ally more respectable and faithful than your majesty." To this call for help Frederic William replied on the 8th of June in a cold and insulting letter, which left no doubt as to his perfect understanding with Catherine. "I see with regret," said he, "the embarrassments in which Poland finds herself involved. But I will acknowledge, with equal frankness, that, after all that has passed for the last twelve months, these embarrassments were to be foreseen. Your majesty will recollect that, on more than one occasion, the Marquis of Lucchesini was charged to manifest not only to you, but also to the preponderating members of the government, my just apprehensions on this subject. From the moment that the general re-establishment of tranquillity in Europe permitted me to explain myself, and the empress of Russia had shown a decided opposition to the order of things established on the 3rd of May, 1791, my way of thinking and the language of my ambassadors and ministers have never varied; and in observing with a tranquil eye the new constitution which the republic has given to itself, without my privity or concurrence, I have never had the idea either of supporting or protecting it." [Yet Frederic William had warmly congratulated Stanislaus Augustus on the passing of this constitution of the 3rd of May, and had assured him of his eagerness to make his sentiments known on this subject, "or to convince him and the whole Polish nation of the lively interest, he took in it." But this was at the time when Pitt was threatening Catherine with his great armament, when Frederic William was contemplating a war with Russia on the score of Turkey, and when the co-operation of Poland was properly placed at a high value.*] "I have predicted, on the contrary, that the threatening measures and the warlike preparations which the Diet incessantly deliberated upon would infallibly provoke the resentment of the Empress of Russia, and draw upon Poland the evils which they were meant to avoid. The event has justified these appearances; and it cannot be dissembled in the present moment, that without the new form of government, and without the efforts which the Poles have announced for supporting it, the court of Russia would not have determined on the vigorous proceedings it has now embraced. Whatever be the friendship that I have sworn to your majesty, and the interest that I take in everything that concerns you, you will yourself believe that, the state of things being entirely changed since the treaty I entered into with the republic, and the present conjuncture, brought on by the constitution of the 3rd of May, 1791, posterior to my treaty, not being applicable to the engagements therein stipulated; it does not belong to me to resist the attack made on your majesty, if the intentions of the patriotic party are still the same, and if they persist in the desire of maintaining their own work; but, if, retracing their steps, they shall consider the difficulties that are rising upon all sides, I shall be ready to concert measures with her majesty the Empress of Russia, and enter into explanations at the same time with the court of Vienna, to strive to reconcile the different interests, and to agree on measures capable of restoring to Poland her tranquillity."

* Frederic William's note was dated the 23rd of May, 1791. Nearly a month later, or on the 21st of June, his ambassador Lucchesini repeated the same assurances to the Diet who had made the constitution of the 3rd of May. No doubt he changed his way of thinking afterwards.

Appeals to other countries, if not met with so much insolence, were at least equally unavailing. Poland, as will be the fate of every country that falls by long misrule into her decrepit condition, and that is unable to help itself, found no help nor hope of help anywhere—

"Found not a generous friend, a pitying foe, Strength in her arm, nor mercy in her woe."

England, though fain to encourage her when it was thought she might be wanted in the projected league against Russia, appears to have had at least the address to avoid committing herself, or encouraging any high hopes of English subsidies or other assistance. Pitt's cousin Grenville, as secretary for foreign affairs, proceeded with the utmost caution and circumspection in all his dealings with the Poles, most evidently apprehending all along the turn affairs might take; and this caution of course increased after the Whig opposition and the strongly pronounced sense of the people had convinced Pitt that he could not safely go into a war with Russia for the sake of Turkey. And after Catherine had concluded the treaty of Jassy, and granted moderate terms to the sultan, Pitt, who was by no means a thorough war-minister like his father, rejoiced that the necessity of English interference was over. Besides, our close ally, Prussia, was not to be thwarted in her desires and schemes. In 1791, after the passing of the constitution of May, Lord Grenville instructed Hailes, our minister at Warsaw, "to express himself most cautiously on the subject of the Polish revolution, and to confine himself to such assurances only of his Britannic majesty's good wishes as could be given without committing his majesty to any particular line of conduct respecting any troubles that might arise on the subject." In the present year, when the storm was thickening and bursting, when the Russian columns were traversing the country without any prospect of a valid resistance,

Grenville repeated and improved upon these injunctions in his instructions to Colonel Gardiner, who was sent out to Warsaw to succeed Mr. Hailes and watch events. In a note dated Whitehall, August the 4th, Grenville said, "The present critical state of affairs in Poland will require from you the utmost prudence and reserve with respect to your language and conduct." He referred Colonel Gardiner to his dispatch to Hailes, which we have just quoted, and added with true diplomatic coolness, "The event has, unhappily, but too well justified this reserve, and the present situation of Poland is such as to leave little hopes that the tranquillity of that unfortunate country can be restored, without its falling again into the most entire dependence on the power of Russia, even if no further dismemberment of territory should take place. The conduct observed on this occasion by the court of Berlin appears to have been dictated by a persuasion of the dangers which would arise to the Prussian interests from the establishment of an efficient and permanent form of government in Poland. There is perhaps too much reason to fear, that the alternative which has been preferred will be productive of more real inconvenience to the King of Prussia than that which has been rejected. But it is sufficiently evident that, while the opinion I have mentioned is acted upon at Berlin, no intervention of the maritime powers could be serviceable to Poland, at least not without a much greater exertion and expense than the importance of the object to their separate interests could possibly justify. All, therefore, that is to be done by you in the present moment is, to hold a language of friendship on his majesty's part towards the king of Poland and the Polish nation. But you are to be very careful (supposing the event still undecided on your arrival at Warsaw) not to do anything which could hold out ill-grounded expectations of support from this country." Grenville concluded his letter by desiring the Colonel to give his utmost attention to all parts of "this interesting business," and to keep his government constantly informed of the different events which might arise, as well as of all that he should be able to discover "of the views and intentions of the three surrounding courts, on whom the fate of Poland seems now entirely to depend."* The Poles, who, in the month of June or July, sent Count Bukaty on an imploring mission to London, had fondly flattered themselves that Pitt, who had so often and so publicly expressed his feeling of the expediency of curbing the ambition of Russia, and who had been so recently on the very brink of a war for that purpose, would be disposed to interfere in their favour; and that the country which most cherished and had longest enjoyed constitutional liberty would be enthusiastically in favour of a people who were attempting to secure the same blessings and to rescue their country from a foreign yoke, who had made a revolution without bloodshed, and who were actually reinforcing the kingly dignity and royal prerogative, instead of utterly destroying both as the French were doing. But Pitt, who was about the last of statesmen to be moved by any romantic impulses, could only look at the Polish question in connection with many others; the Tory majority of the nation had a panic dread and horror of all revolutions and political changes whatsoever; and the attention and sympathies of the Whig party, which had lost half its strength, seemed absorbed by the French revolution and the exciting war of the French republicans. The Whigs, when it was too late, made a loud oratorical noise—forgetting to what an extent their great leader had indirectly contributed to the resistless power of Catherine; but for the present they did nothing beyond holding a meeting at the Mansion House to get up a subscription for the suffering Poles. Although parliament was not prorogued until the 15th of June, which was nearly a month after the marching of the Russian army of 100,000 men, and although the great preparations for that army and Catherine's threats and intentions had been well known in England in the month of January, before parliament met, not a motion was proposed on either side of the House, scarcely a mention was made of Poland and the fate which awaited her. But in the course of this very session Fox had repeatedly extolled the magnanimity of the czarina, exaggerated the value of the English trade with Russia, and recommended a close alliance with that court, as being more suitable to England than any other alliance whatsoever!

Having failed in declaring themselves in 1788 or early in 1789, when the French revolution panic had not begun, the Poles ought assuredly to have waited the recurrence of some other favourable juncture of circumstances, employing themselves in the mean while in the improvement of the financial condition of their country, and (if so much could have been allowed them) in training men for a regular army. They could not possibly have thrown down the gauntlet to Russia at a worse moment. The time chosen was bad in every respect. With a people abundantly brave, and gifted with a character and habits which soon make good soldiers, they had not above 8000, or at most 10,000 disciplined troops to oppose to 80,000 thoroughly trained Russians. The property of the Polish bankers and capitalists was chiefly locked up in the countries with which they provoked a war: a general bankruptcy soon ensued, and this catastrophe accelerated their final ruin. What they could do, the patriots did: they invested the king with very full executive powers, placing the army entirely at his orders, and allowing him to employ foreign officers and engineers; they voted an army of 100,000 men, they authorised the king to call out the Pospolite, and they voted 30,000,000 of crowns. But there was no possibility of procuring the money which it was so easy to vote, and without money the troops could not be united and armed; the arsenals and magazines of Poland being almost empty, and arms and artillery being only to be procured from foreign countries, with which, moreover, all communication was rendered extremely difficult. We have been assured by those who certainly knew the truth, and had no apparent motives for disguising it, more than a quarter of a century after the events, that Stanislaus Augustus never ceased to regret—to complain during the remainder of his life—that he had been forced by the impetuosity of his subjects to grant the new constitution before it was matured, and to provoke the hostility of Russia at a most unfavourable and inauspicious moment. [The revolution was indisputably hurried on by and through the French epidemic; and this was the first of the many good offices that the French did the Poles.] The weight of authority and most reputable proof is entirely on the side of the king's good intentions and sincerity: there seems, indeed, not the slightest reason to doubt that he was most sorely galled by the Russian yoke, and earnest and anxious to see his own native country independent and flourishing, and restored, by a better form of government, to more than her old importance among the states of Europe. But Stanislaus Augustus could never forget that he had once been simply Count Poniatowski, and that he had owed his elevation to the throne to the love and caprice of the czarina; his spirit stood rebuked before that powerful and imperious woman, and the reproach of ingratitude was an incubus which depressed the lively feelings of patriotism. He was not cast by nature in the model of great men; and the course of his life, whether in Russia, as a handsome courtier and paramour of the empress, or in Poland, brow-beaten and maltreated by factious magnates, or dictated to, like a school-boy, by Russian generals and Russian envoys, had not been proper to form greatness or independence of mind. He was not so much as distinguished by personal bravery and daring; and now, at the grand crisis of his life, he was growing old, corpulent, and fond of his ease. All this will sufficiently account for his unheroic conduct in the present war. But, unhappily, the Polish patriots have in all times been prone to suspicion and to splitting into parties and factions, hating one another, counteracting one another, reproaching one another, as heartily as they hated the anti-patriots. Some of them suspected Stanislaus Augustus; and their suspicions too often obstructed the little good he was capable of doing, and thus weakened a cause already deplorably weak. The king, who had formed a camp at Dubno, spoke of taking the command there. Giving up this notion, he formed another camp in front of Warsaw, and only a few miles from that capital. Here everybody expected he would have showed himself, if only to encourage the volunteers who flocked to the camp daily; he had even solemnly promised to repair thither; but he soon began to balance, and to show a pitiful irresolution. We have been assured that he suspected treachery, and dreaded being seized and carried a prisoner to the very presence of Catherine; and that, to those who endeavoured to remove these fears by arguments and representations of the perfect safety he must enjoy in the midst of his patriot subjects, he always recalled the story of former years, when he had been seized in the city of Warsaw itself, and carried off by night to the windmill.* Instead of going to either camp, or taking the field, or visiting any portion of the army, he formed a new council of war, which, as timid as himself, agreed to dispatch orders to his nephew, Prince Joseph Poniatowski, the commander-in-chief, to call in all his advanced posts, and to fall back upon the river Bug, in order to be ready to concentrate all the forces for the defence of Warsaw. And Prince Joseph was obliged to retire with 56,000 men, who had never seen an enemy, and who lost spirit and heart in this retrograde movement. As Kochowski and Kreczetnikoff advanced their Russian columns, skirmishes began to take place, and these generally ended favourably to the Poles, whose light cavalry was particularly alert and excellent. On the 18th of June an affair, important enough to be called a battle, took place at Zielence, where the Poles fought with the most determined bravery, and at least checked and brought to a stand a force far superior to their own, and mainly composed of veteran troops. A few days after, Mokranowski, at the head of the Polish cavalry, gained a brilliant victory at Polonna. But the great affair of this short and desultory campaign, and that which brought into action the best warrior, the greatest name of modern Poland, was on the 17th of July, at Dubienka. Here Kosciuszko kept his ground against a Russian division three times more numerous than his own, beat them in repeated charges, inflicted a terrible loss, and only retreated when his flank was turned by another Russian division, which had been allowed to traverse a part of Galicia and to fall upon him from a quarter where he expected no attack, as Galicia belonged to Austria, and as it was calculated that the Emperor Francis would at least remain neutral in this war—a capital and an unpardonable mistake, which was attended by dreadful consequences. If there had been a gleam of hope before, the conduct of Austria in allowing this passage to Catherine's invading troops utterly destroyed it. But before the battle at Dubienka, and this proof of the complicity of Austria, no inconsiderable number of the Polish patriots had become convinced of the hopelessness of their struggle, and the faint heart of Stanislaus Augustus had died within him. It was not by skirmishes and gallant but desultory fighting that the country was to be saved; in spite of a few temporary checks, the Russian masses kept advancing, both in Lithuania and in Poland Proper: they were abundantly supplied with all the materials of war, while the Poles were wanting in almost every particular. Calculating men, who had more regard for the safety of their own persons and property than for the new constitution and the independence of their country, began secretly to correspond with or openly to join the confederates of Targowica, whom the empress delighted to honour; and it was found that the swarming Jews, who in Poland monopolized all the trade, and nearly all the professions, except that of arms, could find bread and beer, oil, wine, and brandy, clothing and shoes, for the Russians; although, when the patriot Poles applied for those things, they showed nothing but stores as empty as the sacks which Jacob's sons carried into Egypt.

In addition to the confederates of Targowica, another confederation was made in Lithuania for the same objects, for the overthrow of the new constitution, the restoration of the elective character of the royalty, which made every magnate a king-maker, and of the liberum veto, which enabled each of them by his single will and dissidence to paralyse the Diet and government, and make a confusion or an anarchy. These confederates talked quite as loud about liberty as their opponents, pretending that the patriots by their reforms had destroyed the essence of the old Polish liberty; but most of those who joined them were chiefly actuated by the instinct of self-preservation, and the conviction that nothing but ruin could be gained by opposing the will of the empress. The patriot army of Lithuania slowly retired before the Russians conducted by Kreczetnikoff: at first it was commanded by Prince Louis of Wurtemberg, then by Judycki, who, after some reverses, began to retreat towards Grodno, when he received the king's order to deliver up the command to Michel Zabiello. On entering without opposition Wilna, the capital, Kreczetnikoff declared Kossakowski, one of the chiefs of the confederation, grand-general of Lithuania "by the will of the nation." Prince Joseph Poniatowski, who ended his career in the service of Napoleon Bonaparte, dying in a river not much more considerable than a ditch, on the bloody field of Leipsic, was as brave a soldier as ever drew a sword, and not destitute of high military talent; he represented to his timid uncle that the Bug was a bad defensive line, that it was impossible to defend the passage of that river, which was almost everywhere fordable; but Stanislaus Augustus only repeated his absolute orders to continue his retreat to the Bug. When the Russians had overrun two-thirds of the country, and when all the resources of the Poles began to fail, the king commanded his gallant nephew to demand an armistice. The demand was made, and rejected; the Russian generals declaring that their orders were to march right on to Warsaw, and that a truce could only be granted from St. Petersburg. Both the Russian and Prussian ambassadors had been allowed to remain in Warsaw to intrigue with a portion of the inhabitants, and to intimidate and bewilder the king. As early as the 22nd of June, Stanislaus Augustus wrote to the empress, that, if she would only withdraw her troops, he would procure the nomination of her grandson Constantine to be his successor on the throne of Poland; but in her answer, which was dated on the 2nd of July, Catherine did nothing but reproach him for having violated the Pacta Conventa, and urge him to accede instantly to the confederation of Targowica, and restore the constitution and all things else to the state they were in previously to the 3rd of May, 1791. The effect of this imperious mandate was ably promoted by the Prussian ambassador, who well knew the irresolution of Stanislaus Augustus, and the awe in which he stood of the mighty autocratess, and who had resistless arguments furnished him by the state of the Polish army, the wretched, impoverished state of the country, the determination of the neighbouring powers to leave it to its fate, and the want of unanimity even among the patriots themselves. On the 22nd of July the king called a council, at which were present his ministers, the two marshals of the Diet, and his two brothers; and he submitted to their deliberation the vital question, whether, under the circumstances, the best thing to be done was not to submit to the will of the empress—whether this was not the only step that could save Poland from entire destruction. Opinions were divided; but the majority thought with the king, and he on the very next day signed the act of the confederation of Targowica. In this act of shame, in which he unswore his last oath and reswore his first, he said, under Russian dictation—“United in heart and mind with a free and republican nation, which from the rank of citizen has elevated me to the throne; wishing to co-operate in concert with that nation in the salutary work which must lay a new and more durable basis, on which the republic may stand free, independent, and entire, and which tends to organise its political and civil administration with more wisdom—I give way to the impulse of that sentiment by which I am animated. Yes, it is the wish, it is the passion for the public good, which I ought to place before every other interest; it is the desire to secure your happiness, generous and free nation! which dictates the fresh testimonies of paternal love I offer you this day. Sincerely attached to my country, knowing no other pains, no other pleasures than those I partake with you all, my efforts have continually had for their object its safety, honour, and glory. But the private views of my co-assistants, a taste for reform and novelty, have not always permitted me to follow the movements of a heart which was ever yours. Of this the operations of the last Diet are a proof. Seduced by new and bold maxims, which tend only to trouble the tranquillity of nations, our legislators have dared to break the respectable empire of laws which, from the first ages of the republic, have served as its foundation; they have endeavoured to subjugate Poland to the yoke of a government monarchic and democratic at the same time. One Diet alone has seen the birth of so many different laws, that when it became necessary to digest and apply them, the difficulty of the enterprise caused it to be renounced. Besides, the basis which was given to this new constitutional government, too weak to support it, was directly contrary to that legislative system which can alone secure the existence of Poland. But now, when every true Polander acknowledges the errors of those who misled him, after being themselves misled by ambition, I declare, both as a king who ought to be the chief of this generous republic, and as a Polander who cherishes his countrymen, that the republican government, as established by our ancestors, can alone eternise the duration and glory of Poland. In fact, whenever a nation, instead of correcting the defects of its former government, endeavours totally to overthrow it, it draws upon itself those terrible disasters which must end in a sudden and forcible shock of the whole state.” After this forced eulogium upon the worst system of government that existed in Europe, without even excepting that of Constantinople—after this most insincere praise of a ‘crazy oligarchical republic, which had ruined the country, and now left it open to its worst enemies, the miserable man passed sentence of condemnation upon the new constitution, which, with all its faults, was a model of perfection compared with the old one, and heaped upon the Diet, which had made the new constitution in concurrence with himself, the charges of usurpation and illegality in extending their session beyond the terms fixed by the old constitution in order “to form and establish a dangerous and impolitic revolution.” He then said he acceded freely, and joined himself, heart and mind, to the confederation formed at Targowica, “according to the wish of the whole country,”—a confederation “to which that of the grand duchy of Lithuania has united itself by a solemn and public act.” He added, with the most pitiable prostration, “I regard the operations avowed by these confederations as those only which are legal; I promise to conform to all the laws they may proclaim, and swear to second them in all their views which have only the public welfare for their object, in concert with a republican nation which has been free for ages. And I agree the more willingly to this step, as the plan of reform projected by this confederation offers to the impartial eye of good citizens nothing but what is just and salutary, and particularly because the generous and disinterested protection of her majesty the Empress of all the Russias restores tranquillity to the bosom of the republic, promises it new sources of prosperity, and most efficaciously guarantees its rights, and preserves it entire.” After this declaration, which was published throughout Poland in the beginning of August, nearly all those who had considerable properties at stake, or who could not conveniently expatriate themselves, followed the example of the king, and declared for the confederation of Targowica, the members of which, in receiving the law from Petersburg, and in obeying the mandates of Catherine, insensibly flattered themselves that they and their country would be left at least as free as they were antecedently to the revolution of May, 1791, and that the Russians would magnanimously defend them against the Prussians and the Austrians. The patriot officers were all discharged, the army was disbanded or scattered over the country in small defenceless detachments, and the Russian columns came on to Warsaw, and occupied all the important towns and posts between that capital and the Bug. All the decrees of the late Diet, all their laws for raising the condition of the burghers, for gradually preparing the emancipation of the serfs, and for creating a Tiers Etat, were annulled as illegal; and the freedom of the press, which had been granted and enjoyed, gave place to restrictions more severe than those which had previously existed. The estates of such of the magnates as had been most active in forwarding the late revolution, or slowest in giving in their adhesion to the confederation of Targowica, were put under sequestration; and a series of persecutions was commenced against the patriots of all ranks and fortunes. Count Oginski, one of the patriot magnates, found it pleasanter to live in Russia than in Poland, and hastened to St. Petersburg to solicit the restoration of his estates. Catherine and her ministers endeavoured to persuade him that Russia was really the best friend of Poland, and the only power that could prevent its being swallowed up by Prussia and Austria. Prince Zouboff told Oginski that his dread of a farther partition was altogether unfounded; that the empress took a lively and sincere interest in the happiness of the Poles; that she had seen with grief the snares which the King of Prussia had laid for them, and the frightful precipice to which the emissaries of the French revolution were dragging them; that, finding the Poles deaf to her wise remonstrances, she had sent her armies into Poland, but only to save it—only at the request of the best of the Polish nobles themselves. “If,” said Zouboff, “the empress wanted new acquisitions of territory, could she not, if she chose, get possession of Turkey in a single campaign, and place her grandson on the throne of Constantinople? Let your little noblesse of the provinces, who know not what they want, and your sans culottes, who have nothing to lose, cry out as they will; but men who have property ought to be quiet, and Poles who have sense ought to see that the empress will never consent to a new partition of their country.” Branicki, one of the three chiefs of the confederation of Targowica, repaired to the Russian capital, at the head of a numerous deputation of Polish nobles, to thank the empress for all that she had done in their favour, to declare that the Poles would be submissive to her will, and do everything she could require of them, if she would only secure the integrity and the independence of the country; and Branicki finished his discourse by exclaiming “that God and Catherine were the sole hopes of the Polish nation.” The empress gave Branicki and his brother deputies some presents; but her answer, which was delivered to them by her grand chancellor, was so vague and unsatisfactory that some of the confederates became fully sensible of the monstrous error they had committed. Oginski perceived that, notwithstanding court galas and festivals, and an outward show of gaiety and triumph, the minds of Catherine and her ministers were greatly disturbed by the brilliant successes of the French republicans in the field, and their still more daring proceedings in the National Convention and clubs, by the aptitude which the Belgians and other neighbours of the French were showing for the revolutionary state, and by the decree of the Convention granting fraternity and promising aid and assistance to every people that should rise against their established governments and declare themselves republicans. The French republican general, Custine, who by this time had penetrated as far as Mayence, was actually realising the maxim of “War to palaces and peace to cottages;” and, as the people were everywhere promised liberty and equality and an exemption from taxes, it was thought that there must soon be a universal servile insurrection throughout Europe. All these clouds were made blacker at the end of the year; when princes and potentates were startled by the intelligence that the French people intended to try their king and bring him to the scaffold. The passions and the frenzy to which all these things gave rise contributed to a measure of iniquity which they ought rather to have prevented. But the further partition of Poland, which was made an easy work by the operations of Catherine’s army in this one campaign, belongs to another year; and will be best understood in connexion with the other contemporary events that were accumulating and crowding in all parts of Europe.

To paraphrase what Talleyrand said of the Duke of Orleans, the French revolution became the sink into which were thrown all the foul things of the world; or, it came to be considered as a generating pestilence which produced all manner of diseases, the most opposite in their symptoms and character. Even the murder of the enthusiastic, romantic king of Sweden was attributed to the French revolution, although assuredly there were causes sufficient to account for it without referring to that great mother of mischief. The Swedish nobles harboured an implacable resentment against Gustavus Adolphus on account of his political reforms or revolution, which struck their corrupt oligarchy with a death-blow. Other Swedes, not attached to the oligarchical faction, were dismayed at the efforts this king of a poor country was making in order to carry a great army into France; and some of them hurried to the conclusion that he was mad, and that his madness would completely beggar and ruin the nation. In the autumn of the preceding year Gustavus Adolphus had made a journey to Aix-la-Chapelle, and had resided for some time in that antique town, concerting with French emigrants and others the best means of attacking the French republicans, and of getting to Paris in order to release the object of his idolatry, Marie Antoinette, and put down the hydra-headed Jacobinism. After the flight from Varennes of the Marquis de Bouillé, he took that general into his service and discussed with him a variety of plans. His ambition and his hope was that Russia, and perhaps Prussia, would join in the enterprise without further loss of time, and confide to him the command or the chief direction of their armies. He told de Bouillé that he had been encouraged to the steps he had taken by the Empress Catherine, who had represented to him that, as he was acquainted with the nature of revolutions, having so happily finished one in his own kingdom, he might afford the King of France the best of advice as well as assistance; and that, if Louis XVI. could only have got on from Varennes to Montmedy, he would have joined him there. With regard to his present plans, he said that the Empress of Russia promised him troops, and the King of Spain had promised him money; that he thought of landing with an army of Swedes and Russians somewhere on the French coast as near as possible to Paris, expecting that the Kings of Spain and Sardinia would at the same moment invade France by its southern frontiers, and that the French royalists or friends of order would everywhere rise against the Jacobins. After Gustavus had returned into Sweden de Bouillé employed some French naval officers, emigrants or fugitives like himself, to examine the French coast, and to establish a correspondence with some of the royalist inhabitants, who might assist the landing of the Russo-Swedish army, and afterwards co-operate with it. De Bouillé also advised Gustavus to beg the free use of the port of Ostend from the Emperor Leopold, as this would be a near and most convenient rendezvous, where his military stores might be deposited, &c. But Leopold, who clung to the last to the hope that a great continental war might be avoided—that some congress might yet set all things right—hung back from all the royal Swede's wild projects; and it was soon discovered by de Bouillé that, though the King of Prussia was eager for the war, there was anything but friendship and good intelligence between him and Gustavus. Frederic William, in fact, spoke contemptuously of the character and intellect of his Swedish brother, and described his schemes as visionary—which, in truth, they were. De Bouillé, after expressing to Gustavus his perfect conviction that Leopold would not arm at all, and that Frederic William would not co-operate with him, advised him, with the money he should receive from Spain, to buy an army in Germany, which he might incorporate with his own brave army of native Swedes. The French emigrant army, estimated by de Bouillé at from 15,000 to 18,000 men, would move at the same time. Gustavus, still feeling confident of the assistance of Catherine, made great exertions to increase his own army; and, in order to complete his arrangements and get his own country into perfect order, he assembled on the 23rd of January (1792) the Swedish Diet at Geflla, a small secluded town about seventeen miles from Stockholm, which he surrounded with troops. On the 6th of February he wrote to de Bouillé from Geflla—"I am near the close of my Diet, which, to the surprise of all my adversaries, and perhaps of my friends, passes with the most perfect tranquillity. Wishing to assist my friends in the re-establishment of order, I thought I ought to begin at home, and endeavour to compose divisions here. Of three of the orders of the state I was certain; and the nobility, who in 1789 were most violent against me, are now kept in awe by the decided majority I have in the inferior orders, and by the constant attachment they show me. I am endeavouring to make the Swedish nobles comprehend that at the end of the eighteenth century the aristocracy ought to seek to sustain itself by the stability of the throne, and not by contending against it; but they do not yet perfectly understand their real interest. They know, however, that they are the weakest, and begin to have prudence enough not to set themselves in opposition to their king and the three other orders, who, combined, have the power of enacting laws." He had no doubt that all would go on to his entire satisfaction, and that he should be able to take the field in the spring. He boasted of being conversant in the tactics of Diets and representative bodies, and said that, if he were only as well versed in military tactics, he would not fear the Luckners and the Rochambeaus, or any generals of the French Jacobins. "But," said he, with a neat compliment, "I shall have good soldiers, and in you, my marquis, an able assistant, so that I am not apprehensive of failing."* The Swedish nobles, irritated at the loss of their old privileges, of which they had scarcely made a better use than the Polish magnates had done of theirs, and at the armed force which seemed drawn around them to intimidate and coerce them, were in the worst of humours; but, after making some attempts to prevent the voting of subsidies for a war which did not concern them or their country, they apparently acquiesced in all the measures of the Diet; and they united with the three other orders in a very loyal address to the king towards the conclusion of the Diet, which terminated its sitting on the 23rd of February. Gustavus instantly returned to Stockholm, overjoyed at having thus happily brought to a conclusion an assembly in which he well knew there were many desperate malcontents. It is said, too, that he was glad to have finished before the beginning of March, as he had been warned, like Julius Cæsar, to beware of the ides of March. He hoped that he should now be able to devote his whole attention to the war against the French Jacobins; the paucity of his means, the lukewarmness of his confederates, the divergency of their views, and all the difficulties of the case, disappeared to his sanguine imagination, and he saw nothing but victory and glory, crowned and climaxed by the liberation of the new queen of hearts, Marie Antoinette. But in the mean time plots were forming and maturing against his own life. The conspirators were so little cautious, that their intentions became known to many persons in Stockholm; and, if Gustavus had not been rashly brave or over-generously determined not to believe that Sweden harboured assassins, he must have escaped. To those who repeatedly warned him that some of the enraged nobility were plotting his destruction, he declared that he would rather blindly deliver himself up to his destiny than torment himself with suspicions and precautions. He said he could not believe that any Swede could seriously meditate a treacherous assassination; that the Swedes, though brave in war, were timid in political affairs; that they were, like himself, passionately fond of military glory; and that he would make them happy, and increase his own power and popularity, by sending them all the trophies he should take in France. Even while the Diet was sitting at Geflla attempts are said to have been made to take him off. On the night between the 16th and 17th of March he determined, in spite of many and recent warnings, to go to a public masqued ball in the theatre of Stockholm. While supping before the ball with a small number of persons belonging to his household, he received an anonymous note written in French, which cautioned him not to enter the ball-room, as it was intended to assassinate him there. He showed the letter to two or three persons who were at supper with him, passed some jests upon its style and contents, treated it as a contemptible hoax, and, in spite of the representations and entreaties of his attendants, he went to the masqued ball. He entered the ball-room without the least embarrassment, walking arm in arm with his master of the horse; but he had scarcely made two turns when he found himself environed and rudely pressed by a crowd of men in masks; and, as he was moving to get out of this throng, a pistol, loaded with cased shot, was fired close at his left side. The next instant the ball-room seemed to be filled with smoke, and there were loud cries of "Fire! Fire!" The king staggered and fell on a bench; but not one of the balls had gone directly to the heart, and, though he felt them in his reins, he neither fancied that he was mortally wounded, nor lost his presence of mind. He ordered all the doors to be shut, and all persons to be unmasked. A pistol and a long knife were found on the floor; but no person was seized that had any appearance of having been the assassin. Some few of the conspirators quitted the place before the doors could be closed; but many more of them remained, and the individual who fired the pistol, and who is said to have been the very last person that quitted the hall, was among them. Where the crowd had been great, and where nearly all were masked and travestied, there was no possibility of making any discovery. The wounded king was carried to his bed, saying, as he went, he was glad the murderer, whoever he was, had escaped. But on the following morning an armourer of Stockholm identified the pistol and the knife, and named the person to whom he had recently sold them. This person, who was instantly arrested in the town, was Ankarstroem, a Swedish noble, who had formerly been an officer in the royal guard, and who had been dismissed, together with many others, for his mutinous behaviour, or for his opposition to the king's reforms. He was seized in his own house, having taken no kind of precaution for his safety. Without hesitation he acknowledged that the weapons found were his, and that it was he that had fired the pistol at the king. He said he was weary of life, and anxious only for revenge; that the king had subjected him to an unjust sentence, that he had long entertained the project with a view of liberating his country from a monster and a tyrant, and that he had expected to receive honour and reward from the nation. At first he denied having had any accomplices. The anonymous letter in French, which had been delivered to the king at supper, and which seemed rather intended as a bait to his courage than as a warning to keep him away from the ball, was traced to a nobleman named Liljehorn, major of the Blue Guards, who had been brought up, promoted, and loaded with favours by his royal master. He was forthwith apprehended. A few days after his arrest, Liljehorn confessed that he was engaged in the conspiracy. De Bouillé, who took great pains to inform himself of all particulars relating to this assassination of a sovereign who had been his friend in the hour of need and distress, and to whom he appears to have been sincerely attached, says that Liljehorn confessed that he had been seduced by the hope of obtaining, after the revolution, the command of the national guards of Stockholm, with which he had purposed to act in Sweden the part which Lafayette was playing in France; but the marquis was violently inflamed against his cousin the French Scipio Americanus, and too eager to identify all state crimes, and indeed all other crimes, with the French revolutionary spirit; and some doubt may be entertained as to the correctness of these accusations. De Bouillé, moreover, did not collect his information on the spot; for, though he had entered into the service of Gustavus, he had not come into Sweden, but remained in Germany, or in the Low Countries, with the other emigrants, to make arrangements for the campaign against the Jacobins, which his Swedish majesty was to head. After one or two examinations, Ankarstroem became more communicative, and, in consequence of his revelations, and of strong suspicious circumstances, Counts Horn and Ribbing, Barons Pechlin, Ehrensward, Hartsmandorf, Von Engerstrom, and others, were apprehended as accomplices. It appeared, however, from his confession, that he first thought of murdering the king without being connected with any other conspirators; but that,

falling in afterwards with Counts Horn and Ribbing and other disaffected nobles, he imparted his design, and was at least encouraged by them to execute it. He admitted that, besides the attempt at Geffla, several other attempts had been made in other places; and that, at last, it had been resolved to kill him at the masqued ball. According to de Bouillé, he confessed that the project had been formed ever since the month of October, 1791; that it was proposed, after Gustavus should be killed, to dispatch some of his principal ministers and favourites, and the commanders of the different troops composing the garrison of Stockholm; to carry their heads upon pikes through the streets, after the French fashion; and then, with the artillery of the queen's regiment, and the artillery of the Blue Guards, upon which they thought they could depend to keep the people in awe, or gain them over to their party; and further, that they had proposed to deprive the Duke of Sudermania, the king's brave brother, of his liberty, or perhaps of his life; and to make themselves masters of the person of the king's young son, and compel him to sign and proclaim a new constitution, which should restore to the nobles the privileges and powers of which Gustavus had deprived them. As torture appears to have been employed—as indeed there is little doubt that it was employed in the course of these examinations—the confessions of Ankarstroem must ever remain open to query and cavil. His trial, however, was public, and before the ordinary tribunal. There he acknowledged his crime, but denied having any active accomplices, merely confessing that several persons knew of his determination. He was condemned to be publicly whipped on three successive days, then to be exposed to the view of the people, with an iron chain round his neck, upon a scaffold erected in front of the Senate House; to have his right hand cut off, and next his head. All this torture and ignominy he seemed to bear with stoical indifference. On the fourth day his sufferings terminated; and his right hand, his head, and his body were distributed in different quarters of the city. He was in his thirty-third year when he died. Of the other nobles arrested two destroyed themselves in prison, Counts Horn and Ribbing and Major Liljehorn were banished for life, and some others were visited with confiscation of property and deprivation of rank; but Ankarstroem was the only victim brought to the scaffold for this regicide. In the mean time the sufferings of the wounded king had been ended by a slow, lingering death. In the sad twelve days which intervened between his being wounded at the masqued ball and his decease he displayed the high qualities of his character without any of its foibles and half-crazy eccentricities. Amidst his acute sufferings he displayed a courage and resignation rarely equalled; not a groan escaped him, scarcely a murmur, and he never once expressed a wish for vengeance on his assassins. He summoned round his dying bed not only his court, his family, and friends, but also those who had been in the number of his enemies. Of this number was the celebrated Marshal Fersen, who had opposed all his constitutional reforms, and Count Brake, the head of the Swedish nobility and of the opposition party, and he was cordially reconciled to both, saying that he now felt consoled for the misfortune which had befallen him, since it again brought around him the friends of his early life, when no political differences existed. Calm and collected to the last, he added a codicil to his will, relating to the education of his young son. In order that public affairs might not be impeded, and to save himself from the disagreeable inquiries after the assassins, of whom he could not bear to hear speak, he appointed, almost as soon as he received the wound, a council of regency, with his brother, the Duke of Sudermania, at the head of it. He expired on the 29th of March, in the forty-sixth year of his age. Thus fell the champion and knight-errant of Marie Antoinette, and with him every chance of Sweden taking any part in this war against the Jacobins. On opening the body a square piece of lead and two rusty nails were found lodged within it. The reins of government were immediately assumed by the Duke of Sudermania, the crown prince being only in his fourteenth year. The regent was intent on peace, and the Swedish people, who were but little excited by the murder of their king, seemed glad to be free from the expenses of a distant and hopeless war. Their neighbours the Danes agreed with them in their resolution to avoid all participation in the French revolution wars.*

We return to France, and to Paris, the centre around which nearly everything seemed to revolve. We left the revolutionists in a most warlike attitude at the end of the year 1791. In the month of January in the present year they announced that the whole nation was eager to march into Germany and the Low Countries to attack the emigrants at Coblenz and elsewhere, and all the princes, whether an emperor or a little margrave, that harboured and assisted them. As early as the 1st of January the great Girondist orator Gensonné said in the Assembly that there was no use in attempting to disguise the fact that they were ready to attack all the despots in Europe. On the same day, and on the motion of the same orator, the Assembly launched an accusation of conspiracy and treason against the king's two brothers, against the Prince of Condé, against Calonne, and some others who were with the emigrant princes; and ordered a committee to make search for and prepare materials for their trials. On the 6th of January the minister for foreign affairs informed the Assembly that the elector of Treves had engaged to expel from his states within eight days everything that bore the name of a military corps, to punish severely all such as attempted to recruit or enrol troops for a foreign service in his dominions, to prohibit, under severe penalties, the furnishing of munitions of war to the French emigrants, to hinder the transit of horses for mounting the cavalry regiments of the emigrants, to break up the cantonments of the emigrants near Treves within eight days and to prevent any such gatherings for the future, to treat the emigrants as the emperor ordered them to be treated, &c. Brissot declared that all this was a diplomatic farce, and that the war was more than ever necessary. On the 11th of January the war-minister, Narbonne, who had returned from his tour with the de Staël, presented his report on the state of the frontiers, describing the fortresses, the corps d'armées, and all other things as being in a much better condition than had generally been believed, and assuring the Assembly that they had nothing to fear from an immediate war. He undertook to answer for the fidelity of Lafayette, and for his entire devotion to the cause of liberty and equality. The Girondists and the Robespierrists united in declaring that Narbonne had need of some one to answer for his own fidelity; that matters could not go well until the war-minister and the generals were all changed, &c. On the 14th of January Gensonné urged the necessity of preparing for a war with the emperor himself. He spoke furiously of Leopold's plan for calling a congress of all the princes of Europe, to modify the French constitution by surrounding France with a military cordon; he painted Leopold as the worst enemy of the revolution, and declared that it was time for the French nation to take vengeance on him for his astucious proceedings, his intrigues and correspondence in France, and his open acts of hostility and insult. The Assembly agreed to issue a decree declaring infamous and traitorous to their country every one that should attend the emperor's conference, or seek to modify the constitution, or have any connection or correspondence with the emigrants, or seek or agree to the restoration of their ancient feudal rights to the possessed princes (princes possesseurs) whose quarrel the emperor had espoused; and they then called upon the king to hasten the preparations for war, and to demand from the emperor a satisfactory answer before the 11th of February, intimating to him that his silence would be regarded as a declaration of hostilities. A day or two later the Assembly agreed that there was reason to apprehend an immediate attack from the King of Spain, and that the French army at the foot of the Pyrenees ought to be reinforced. New rules were adopted for recruiting the troops of the line with more facility; and, when some economical deputies objected to the great expense which must attend this scheme, Lacombe exclaimed, "Do not be sparing of your money! With money we shall obtain troops and victory and conquests, and victory will bring us back plenty of money!" Thus early did the Jacobins adopt a principle which was destined to carry the French arms so far. Brissot was quite certain that England would remain neutral, or that, if the government attempted to make a war upon liberty, the English Whigs would make a revolution; but Robespierre's party thought that the neutrality of England was a thing not to be counted upon, and that the king of Prussia would join King George and the emperor in a crusade against the French. Poor Louis passively submitted to all that was demanded of him; but reports were raised, and not without some foundation, that he was again attempting preparations for a flight beyond the frontiers. Prudhomme the printer pretended to a minute acquaintance with this plot, and announced in his newspaper that the royalists had collected within Paris sixty pieces of artillery, and intended at a favourable moment to break open the prisons, release all the aristocrats and priests confined within them, and fall upon the faubourgs and the patriot districts. Thus, as early as the month of January, the journalists began to prepare the people for the atrocities committed in the prisons in the month of September. Prudhomme, who never let the subject rest, asserted a few days after that the court, the Monarchic Club, and the Barnaves and Lameths, were certainly going to assassinate all the patriots of the Assembly, and set up an execrable British constitution with two chambers; and he denounced as instigators and leaders in this dreadful plot the queen, her friend the Princess de Lamballe, who had recently ventured to return to Paris, Madame de Staël, and her lover Narbonne. Carra and other journalists repeated these accusations day after day. Fresh émeutes broke out in Paris and the faubourgs on account of the dearness of bread and sugar: for, ever since Brissot and his friends had sent the Rights of Man to the negroes in St. Domingo and the other French West India islands, the planters had been able to send no more sugar to France; and through the same causes coffee and spices began to grow very dear in Paris, and this gave rise to fresh riots. The Faubourg St. Antoine rose and marched to the National Assembly on the evening of the 26th of January, and sent in a numerous deputation and an orator to demand that bread, sugar, coffee, and spices should all be made cheaper, and that the vengeance of the laws should be hurled against all forestallers, monopolisers, and scoundrels who would not sell their goods at the people's price. "The citizens of the Faubourg St. Antoine," said the orator at the bar of the Assembly, "leave it to women and children to cry for sugar. The men of the 14th of July do, not fight for sugar-plums (ne se battent pas pour des bonbons). The wild and savage nature of our canton only loves iron and liberty. But we demand that these conspirators, these forestallers and monopolisers, who are forcing the people into insurrections which bring them under the bayonets of the national guards, be exterminated! These brigands speak of the rights of property; but is not their property a crime of high treason against the nation? Death to them all! Death to all the public functionaries who protect them! Death to all conspirators! Death to all the enemies of our patriotic mayor Pétion! Death to all who would again hoist the red flag, and do over what was done by Bailly and Lafayette in the Champ de Mars! Death, above all, to those bandits in the pay of the aristocrats, who, wearing the honourable livery of the people, insult the laws, in order to bring about massacres and civil war!"*

The Jacobin Club continued its labours. Lafayette on the 2nd of January was formally denounced as a traitor engaged in the most dangerous plots; and it was ordered that all the accusations which Danton had brought against him in the club in the month of June, 1791, should be printed and distributed throughout the kingdom. Robespierre, who was ten times more potent there than he would have been by keeping his seat in the Assembly, and who was now setting up a journal all his own, entitled 'The Defender of the Constitution' (a constitution which he had long since determined to destroy), seized this opportunity of repeating his former opinions about the danger of going to war so long as the executive and the aristocratic generals should have the management of that war. He now attacked face to face Brissot, whom he contemptuously compared to "that effervescent philanthropist Anacharsis Clootz!" He was seconded by Carra and by Danton; and neither Brissot nor any of his friends dared to enter the lists with him. A fortnight later, seeing Brissot in the club, Robespierre accused him of having inserted in his journal a pompous eulogium of Lafayette. Brissot excused himself by saying that the letter about Lafayette had been inserted by his co-editor without his knowledge. He said that Robespierre seemed to accuse him of absenting himself from the club, and of taking no part in its deliberations when he was present; but really he had so much to do elsewhere, in committees, in the Assembly, where yesterday he had delivered a long speech, that it was impossible for him to give a constant attendance; and the people who had heard him might judge whether he was abandoning their cause and the principles of liberty and equality. Faublas Louvet rashly rose to defend Brissot, and to accuse Robespierre of madness or treachery in opposing the immediate commencement of a war of attack upon the German princes. A few days after this, Brissot, who began to feel all that he and his party were losing in their combat with Robespierre, re-appeared in the Jacobin Club, and implored the great man and dictator of it to put an end to a quarrel which could only be advantageous to the enemies of the chose publique. He was backed by Dussault, who, after a very affecting speech, induced Robespierre and Brissot to embrace once more in the presence of all the clubbists, who were sensibly affected at the sight. But Robespierre, a day or two after, informed the public, through a newspaper, that, though he had embraced Brissot, he had not embraced his principles or his notions about the war; that he had satisfied his heart by fulfilling a duty of fraternity; but must continue to combat Brissot, and all those who would hurry the country into a war, in which it was sure to be betrayed. The Club deliberated and passed decrees upon the sugar question. Manuel announced that the Paris section of La Croix Rouge had come to the patriotic determination of doing without sugar. "If," said Manuel, "all other patriot citizens adopt the same noble resolution, the monopolists will be obliged to sell their sugar at a reasonable price." Faublas Louvet rose to second the proposition of Manuel, and lump coffee with sugar. After some sonorous sentences about Spartans and black broth, and the simplicity of living which became the French as a republican people, Louvet said, "I demand that we Jacobins take instantly a solemn engagement to use no more sugar and coffee, and that to-morrow the whole capital be informed of our engagement!" [This afforded an awkward parallel for Wilberforce's friends, the abolitionists, with their proposed associations for putting a stop to the consumption of colonial produce.] Manuel spoke again, to recommend that every Jacobin that did not conform to this self-denying ordinance should be deprived for one month of his carte or ticket, which gave him the right of being present in the club, and of ranking himself among the true patriots of France. Collot d'Herbois, who had been artist, actor, and poet, but who now prided himself most on his authorship, and considered himself one of the greatest men in Europe because he had written the 'Almanac du Père Gerard,' expressed his astonishment that a man of letters, like Louvet, should have been the author of a proposition to deprive littérateurs of their nightly cups of coffee, which lightened the fatigues of the closet and gave them inspiration. "Gentlemen," said he, no doubt with proper emphasis, "I cannot do without my coffee; but henceforward I will take it without any sugar!" Louvet said, complementarily, that M. Collot d'Herbois ought to be allowed to infringe the law, and even to be thanked for so doing, as his nightly cups of coffee might give birth to another Almanac du Père Gerard. The club, however, adopted the motion of Faublas Louvet in all its rigour, and solemnly renounced the use both of coffee and sugar, every mother's son of them standing up on his patriot feet, holding out his patriot right arm, and pronouncing, with his patriot voice, Je le jure.^{*} But we must pass from the monkey parts of the performance to the tiger tricks. A day or two after this scene, Manuel, the father of the sugar-motion, represented to the Jacobins that the king, who was in an understanding with the emigrant priests and nobles, and basely conspiring against the country, ought not to be allowed to reign—ought not to be allowed to live; and he followed up this exposition by writing a letter to the king himself, containing the same arguments and the same mortal conclusion.

In the Assembly, Brissot and the rest of the Girond continued their fierce war upon the king's ministers, who were sadly divided among themselves—some, like Narbonne the war-minister, and Cahier de Gerville the minister of the interior, pulling one way, or insisting that the constitution as established should be preserved and respected, and that the king should act frankly and decidedly according to its spirit and provisions, and in harmony with the côté droit of the Assembly; and others, like Bertrand de Molleville the minister of marine, and Delessart the minister for foreign affairs, pulling another way, or insisting that the king had no hope of salvation except in a gradual counter-revolution, and no party or support except in the aristocracy, the emigrants, and foreign princes, who must in time awake from their long lethargy and take up his cause as their own. These conflicting parties in the cabinet soon came to an open rupture, which ended in the king's dismissing Narbonne and Cahier de Gerville, and in the Girondists breaking up the whole ministry to seat themselves on its ruins. On the 8th of March, by the mouth of Herault de Sechelles, they accused Bertrand de Molleville of various crimes amounting to high treason, and called upon the king to dismiss him and to deliver him up to justice; and two days later, Brissot accused Delessart, minister for foreign affairs, of treason still more damnable. Bertrand de Molleville was fortunate enough to escape any further punishment than what was included in his prompt dismissal from office; but Delessart, whom his pursuer Brissot said he knew to be innocent of the crimes he imputed to him, was ordered by the Girondists and Jacobins of the Assembly to be brought before the high court of Orleans, and was committed in the meanwhile to the prison of Versailles, where he lay till the month of September, when he was massacred by the mob without any trial.

After the breaking up of this ministry the triumphant Girondists entered the cabinet by storm, and inundated all the places of government. The husband of Madame Roland became minister of the interior; and that true chameleon, Dumouriez, minister for foreign affairs; de Grave, who was soon replaced by Servan, got Narbonne's post as minister of war, and Lacoste was appointed minister of marine; the finances were confided to Clavière, a poor republican stockbroker and man of letters from Geneva, who had first signalised himself by attacking his compatriot Necker; and the important department of justice was given to Duranthon, a little lawyer from Bordeaux, after Roland the virtuous had failed in obtaining it for Faublas Louvet. Madame Roland, who had had much to do with the formation of this Girondist ministry, but who had not been able to appoint to all the places, and who had afterwards personal reasons to complain even of some who had obtained their posts with her good wishes and concurrence, speaks very slightly in her memoirs of most of these new statesmen, finding not one of them, save and except her own husband, who was but the double or echo of herself, precisely what he ought to have been. The court called this ministry, which was formed in the month of March, the Sans culotte ministry. Roland, and all the rest of them except Dumouriez, attached the greatest importance to what they thought a republican simplicity of manners, behaviour, and dress. The first time that Roland, who was a rigorist and pedant in these matters, presented himself at the Tuileries, he wore a round hat instead of the courtly chapeau bras, and had ribands to his shoes instead of buckles. These ribands will be remembered when all the rest of the man is forgotten. The master of the ceremonies, who had not yet seen anybody, much less a minister of state, come to court in that guise, made some difficulty about admitting him; but being compelled to let him enter, he pointed at the citizen-minister, and said to Dumouriez, who was going in after him, "Ah, sir! no buckles to his shoes!" "Ah, sir!" responded Dumouriez, DUMOURIEZ.

"all is lost—tout est perdu!" But Roland and the rest of these Girondist, patriot, or sans culotte ministers, had scarcely been three days in office—had scarcely seen the king, twice—before they felt that he was a different man from what they had fancied, and that they could not prevent themselves from entertaining a kind of involuntary respect for him. Madame was positively afraid that they were all going to lose their republicanism and become downright royalists; and she assures us that she had some difficulty in keeping her husband in the right path, by constantly reminding him that Louis was not to be trusted. Dumouriez, who had no political conviction of any sort, who had only made himself a Jacobin and a Girondist in order to obtain employment, better his fortune, and gratify his ambition, who was a man of the world, and not unaccustomed to high society and the habits of courts, blushed at the Tuileries for his rude, unmannered, and awkward colleagues, who were constantly offering some little insult merely to make a parade of their republican independence. He was admitted to the Tuileries much more frequently than any of them; he often saw the queen, and presently agreed with her that his brother ministers not only had not the manners of gentlemen, but had not the talent necessary to manage any part of government. The sans culotte ministry was very soon split by jealousies and dissensions as violent as any that had raged in the cabinet which they had overthrown. Roland and Clavière hated and feared Dumouriez and Duranthon, whom Madame Roland characterises in no very gentle terms, describing Dumouriez as a profligate and swindler, and Duranthon as a mean hypocrite. In one thing they all agreed, and that was in the propriety and expediency of declaring war. Dumouriez, who loved war for its excitement, was scarcely more eager than that tranquil philosopher Roland. This war cry became louder when the young emperor Francis II. succeeded Leopold, and began to show that he was not so entirely wedded to congresses and pacific measures as his predecessor. When Robespierre and his party saw that a declaration of war was inevitable, and that they might risk their popularity by opposing it too long, they originated or promoted measures for arming and strengthening the people; and the Girondists, striving with them for popularity, and shutting their eyes to the inevitable consequences of arming the mob, encouraged the same system, which was gradually to destroy the present ascendancy of the middle classes, and erect on a broad basis the dominion of the multitude—of the most desperate and the neediest, the real sans culottes. Brissot was among the very first to recommend that pikes should be forged in every section of Paris, in every department, in every town of France; and that the hat should be thrown aside as a vile slavish thing introduced by priests and despots, and give place on every true French head to the bonnets rouges, or red night-caps, such as were worn by some of the lowest of the people. Brissot in his journal demonstrated that the bonnet rouge was the real Phrygian cap of antiquity, the proper cap of maintenance for the French people, the real cap of liberty; that such caps had been worn by the Greeks, the Romans, the Gauls, and all the great nations and illustrious men of antiquity; that Rousseau was a great partisan of the red cap as the symbol of liberty, and that Voltaire was equally proud of it, and always wore it.

This essay from the pen of Brissot appeared in February, and within a month the bonnet rouge was in high vogue. Pikes were forged faster than red night-caps were made, patriots and patriotesses subscribing or clubbing together to keep the smiths going; and still Brissot kept saying in his newspaper—"Citizens and patriots, let us forge pikes from one end of the kingdom to the other!" And Gorsas and other newspaper-men kept echoing in their journals, "Pikes! Pikes! Pikes! Nothing but pikes and bonnets rouges and tricolor cockades to put upon them." One of the heroes of the Bastille presented himself with a deputation in the Jacobin Club to make a patriotic donation of tricolor cockades and ribands. "This national cockade," said he, "must make the tour of the globe; it first took root on a worsted night-cap! Pikes, pikes, and bits of tricolor ribands! these are our means, and these will be enough to make traitors bite the dust, and overthrow the thrones of all despots!" A locksmith presented to the club four pikes of a peculiar make, which he had forged himself. This led to a discussion of what form of pike was the best; and the Jacobin Club, about the middle of February, appointed a committee to examine and report on the best way of making pikes. The Feuillants, or Lafayette party, took the alarm, and told the respectabilities of the national guards that these pikes were intended for butchering them all. The mob began to cry out in the streets, with many foul-mouthed oburgations, that if they had only had pikes—sharp, stiff pikes like those now a-making—Lafayette and his blue coats would have rued that black Sunday when they attacked the patriots on the altar of the country. A Feuillant journalist asked who commanded these pike-men, who had distributed the pikes, to what sort of people had they been delivered, and what would be the effect of this new weapon, and this sudden and universal arming of the lowest rabble in France? Brissot answered these queries in tranchant style. "While the enemies of the people," said he, "are preparing to destroy them, the people also are making their preparations; but frankly and openly. Pikes began the revolution, and pikes will finish it. This beautiful movement of a whole people, ready to rise with all their force, to put down the fatal diversion which is to precede or accompany our foreign war—this waking of the lion, no doubt, terrifies those who counted upon its sleeping. They ask whither will these pikes go? They will go wherever they are needed, wherever there are enemies of the people—into the chateau of the Tuileries, if need be! They ask who commands these pikes? Necessity.—Who is to distribute them? Patriotism.—To whom are they delivered? To men of courage.—What will be the effect of this new arming? The annihilation of the enemies of the people!" These were not the words of Robespierre, or Danton, or Marat, or of any one of the ames perdues of the revolution, but of Brissot the Girondist, of one of the leaders of a party who claimed to be considered as averse to blood, and as guiltless of any of the provocations and measures which led to the prolonged butcheries of the Reign of Terror. All the Gironde journals copied Brissot's article, while the ultra-Jacobin journalists, though certainly from no other motive than a desire that the Girondists should not have the merit of this patriotic pike scheme, passed over the article in silence. The king, who could not look out from the Tuileries without seeing a gathering of these pikes, and without hearing from the mob the uses they intended to make of them if they should be provoked, sent for Mayor Pétion at a late hour one evening, remonstrated with that potent magistrate, and demanded or implored of him to put an end to the dangerous practices that were going on. Pétion collected his municipals in the Hôtel de Ville, and issued a decree or proclamation, which, instead of condemning this general pike armament, seemed rather to approve and applaud it, assuming that such things were necessary to defend the country in days of danger. It only invited the patriot citizens, who were not inscribed on the rolls of the national guards, and who had provided themselves with pikes, muskets, or other arms, to make a declaration to the committees of their respective sections of all such arms, &c.; and told them that they must not go armed in the streets and public places, either by day or by night, or wear any other sign or cockade except the national one. The desire was as far from Pétion as was the power to stop this pike fever. In the course of a very few days the Dames de la Halle, or market-women, and other patriotesses, appeared at the bar of the Assembly to demand permission to exercise in the Champ de Mars with their pikes, as they had formed themselves into a very strong Amazonian phalanx; and the faubourg St. Antoine men appeared at the same place "to confound the calumniators who dared speak ill of them and their pikes." "Our civism," said their orator, "is engraved on the ruins of the walls of the Bastille, and on the iron of our pikes. These pikes are only to be feared by brigands and conspirators. The ministers, the civil list, the aristocrats shall perish; but the constitution and liberty shall flourish and triumph with the pikes." At nearly the same time, in the month of March, the merits of another great revolutionary instrument, the GUILLOTINE, were discussed both in the Jacobin Club and in the Assembly. The guillotine was quite a ministerial measure, for the humane and philanthropic Gironde, equally with the gentle Robespierre, had soon awakened from their pleasant vision of the abolition of all capital punishments. The Assembly had come to the conclusion that executions would be very necessary things, and that there ought to be but one process all over the kingdom, and for all sorts of persons. A committee had been appointed, and the Academy of Surgery had been consulted as to the best method. The expert man that took the subject most to heart was Doctor Joseph Ignace Guillotin, a native of Xaintes, and a member of the Assembly. His name will be immortal. A great living English writer, dividing the revolution into three parts, has properly made one part of it consist of the guillotine.* Doctor Joseph Ignace, described as a lively facetious little Frenchman, was uncommonly proud of having hit upon the falling, heavily loaded, sharp axe, and the fixed horizontal position of the patient; and he was accustomed to say to his friends and to the Assembly, "Gentlemen, with my little machine there I can shave off your heads by dozens without any of you feeling a twitch of pain! Gentlemen, this is the prettiest invention of modern times! Mongolfier's balloon and Abbé Chappe's telegraph are nothing to it! Only conceive, gentlemen, the pleasure of dying without pain!" The thing, however, was no new invention at all, but the instrument, or something very like it, could boast of an antiquity as venerable as that of many established forms and customs.† On the 20th of March the committee presented to the Assembly a consultation of the Surgical Academy of Paris, signed by Antoine Louis, perpetual secretary, and a very eminent surgeon and anatomist. The learned faculty said the mode of decollation ought to be "one and uniform" in the whole French empire: "That the body of the criminal ought to be laid down horizontally, with his face towards the earth, between two strong posts connected above by a traverse or beam, from which should descend on his neck, by moving a stop, a broad axe of a convex form; that the back of this axe should be strong enough and heavy enough to act efficaciously, like the rams which serve to sink the piles for bridges, and the force of which augments in proportion to the height from which they fall." Such was the cool, mechanical description of Doctor Guillotin's machine, the universal use of which was voted by the Assembly on this same 20th day of March, 1792. The very next decree they voted was that men of colour, whether mulattoes or negroes, should, if free, enjoy, both in the colonies and in France, the same liberty and equality and civil rights as the

† The instrument called the Maiden, which the regent Morton brought into Scotland from the Continent in 1578, is exactly on the same principle as the guillotine. A similar instrument had been in use, for the punishment of felonies committed within the Forest of Hardwick, as early as the time of our Edward III. But in Germany, in Bohemia, at Naples, and in other parts of Italy, an instrument of the same kind was commonly used. In Germany, Crusius, writing in 1590, describes the instrument as being then ancient, and superseded by the great sword—certainly a much worse implement.—Penny Cyclopædia of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, art. Guillotine. An engraving of the Halifax guillotine may be seen in Gibson's Translation of Camden's Britannia (edit. of 1722), vol. ii., p. 854.

The tradition in Scotland is that the regent Morton was the first man that fell under the embraces of his Maiden; and a pendant has been made to this story by saying that Doctor Guillotin was one of the first victims of his guillotine. But this is not true, for the doctor was alive and merry a good many years after the reign of terror, and did not die till 1814, when he died in his bed, and of old age. He used to say, "No doubt mistakes have been committed in our revolution; but my name will live in history!"

white people, should be admitted to the elective franchise, and be themselves eligible to all posts and places. [This, too, was rather unlucky for the English emancipationists, and gave a truly sharp point to the sally of Windham, who said to Lady Spencer, a warm advocate for emancipation, "Your friend Mr. Wilberforce will be very happy any morning to hand your ladyship to the guillotine."]

Every day brought frightful intelligence of riots and massacres in the south of France; for a large portion of the inhabitants of Avignon neither approved of the new revolutionary government established in their city, nor of its forcible annexation to France; and in Provence and Languedoc all the zealous Catholics continued hostile, not only to the constitutional clergy, but to nearly every part of the revolution; and the sans culottes, inflamed by a zeal fiercer than their own, fell upon them and butchered them wherever they could. The patriots of Marseilles particularly distinguished themselves in this campaign, which, though not expressly ordered by the Assembly, was assuredly encouraged by many of its members, including gentle Girondists, who were themselves natives of the south, and who were convinced that there was nothing very wrong in such massacres so long as they were confined to bigots and enemies of the revolution. It was in the south, in the country of these Girondists, that the republican fever raged the highest and earliest; and it was the Gironde that suggested that the greatest services might be rendered to liberty if some of the enthusiasts of the south would only march to Paris. As soon as the Parisians began to make their new pikes, the Jacobins of Marseilles, who maintained a very regular correspondence with the mother society, sent a deputation to the Rue St. Honoré, to make an offer of their services in the capital. This deputation was headed by Charles Barbaroux, a very young and very handsome man, described as being as beautiful as Antinous by Madame Roland, whose enemies accused her of being more sensible to his charms than she ought to have been. As early as the beginning of March Barbaroux announced in the great Jacobin club that the men of Marseilles were ready to march to Paris. "When," said he, "tyrants are trying to crush the people, the people must rise and crush the tyrants!" He was enthusiastically applauded at this his débüt in the capital; and the patriotesses, scanning him with critical eyes, vowed and declared they had not seen so proper a man for many a day. Another Marseillais, who had come up from the provinces with le beau Barbaroux, after denouncing the executive and the majority of the present Assembly, told the Jacobins that they would always find the people of Marseilles ready to rise en masse, and that they only hoped to find the Parisians of 1792 the same brave people that they were in 1789, when they began the revolution and stormed the Bastille with a few pikes and muskets. The young Duke of Chartres (now Louis Philippe, King of the French, &c.), who had been introduced to the club by his father, continued to visit the Jacobins occasionally, and even to speak in their hall. At this very moment we find him in the tribune, informing the patriot members of the mother society that a lieutenant-colonel had been arrested in the north of France for recruiting or enrolling men for the emigrant army of Coblenz. On the very same evening that the Duke of Chartres made this speech, Mademoiselle Théroigne, that noted fille-de-joie from Luxembourg, made another speech.* Not many nights after this sitting, honoured by the presence of two such different personages, the Jacobins had a stormy discussion in their Hall as to the propriety of admitting the belief of a God, or of throwing off that belief altogether as a part and parcel of the degrading superstitions which the revolution and the lights of the new philosophy had exposed and overthrown. The materialists, who swarmed in the club and in the capital, and who were proselytising and increasing their numbers rapidly in most parts of the kingdom, were moved with an intolerant contempt for all spiritualists or believers, and were moreover intimately convinced that any kind of religious belief, embodying any part of the old national faith, was inimical to the new order of things. Robespierre, who was a deist, brought on the storm by a speech about the war with the emperor, in which he spoke of Almighty God, and of that Providence which watched over the salvation of the free French people. He had scarcely uttered these words when many voices, speaking or roaring all together, called him to order, and accused him of a design to reintroduce the old, exploded superstitions. Robespierre, who was not easily interrupted in that tribune, boldly and indignantly replied, "Am I to be accused of leading citizens into superstition! I, who have combated all sorts of despotism! It is true, superstition is one of the strongest props of tyranny, but to pronounce the name of the Divinity is surely not to wish to make citizens superstitious. I abhor, as much as any man, all those impious sects, which have spread themselves over the universe to favour ambition, fanaticism, and all the evil passions, in covering themselves with the sacred power of the Eternal, who created nature and man; but I am far from confounding them

* This common prostitute, who had acted so considerable a part in the attack on the palace of Versailles, in October, 1789, had fallen into trouble since that time. In 1790 she had enrolled herself among the Jacobin propagandists, and had been sent to Luxembourg and Liege to work with Bonne-Carrere in exciting the people to insurrection against the Austrian government. She was disturbed in these functions, was arrested, and carried prisoner to Vienna, where, it is said, the Emperor Leopold had the curiosity to see her, and spoke with her for a considerable time. Whether this be true or not, it appears that whoever examined her were of opinion that she was crazed, and that no great profit or honour could be derived by keeping a girl of the town as a state prisoner. She was liberated in the month of November, 1791, and told never again to set her foot on Austrian territory. She re-appeared at Paris and in the Jacobin club in the month of February of the present year. The Jacobins received her with acclamations and honours—Lanthenas (Madame Roland's friend), who was presiding that evening for Guadet, calling her "one of the first Amazons of liberty," and "the presidentess of her sex," and demanding that she should have the honours of the séance, and be allowed to sit at his right hand, which was of course granted with lively emotions. Like Othello, the damsel related all the perils she had run, and told that august senate of Jacobins that she was going to publish her memoirs, which would contain terrible things against the emigrants, &c.

with those who believe in a God. I sustain the eternal principles on which the weakness of human nature rests in order to reach the higher virtues. It is no crime or vain language in my mouth, nor was it in men more illustrious and as moral as I, to say that I believe in the existence of a God!" Again many angry voices cried out, "Order! Order!" while others made a wild hullabaloo. But Robespierre shook his head and continued:—"You shall not smother my voice! You have no order of the day that can smother this eternal truth!" He hoped that he, who had defended liberty in the Constituent Assembly, might have liberty of speech in the Jacobin Club, might be allowed to announce his principles to the friends of the constitution. He would never enter upon religious discussions which might bring disagreements and discord among the patriots; but he must repeat, that there was no political crime in naming a God or in invoking the protection of Providence, which visibly influenced the destinies of nations, and which, as he believed, watched with particular care over the French revolution. "This belief in a God," said he, "this sentiment of my heart is necessary to my existence, and is the support which has sustained me in all my labours and struggles for liberty. Alone with my soul, how could I have had strength for struggles which were above human force, if I had not raised my soul to God!" He dwelt for some time on this profession of faith, and then concluded by saying, that it was in order to establish morality and sound policy that he had written the address which he had delivered, and that he hoped the society would adopt his principles and order the discourse to be printed. An indescribable tumult followed his descent from the tribune; and, when the president attempted to put the question to the vote, Santhonax and others cried out, "None of your Capuchin tricks, Mr. President!" Finding the ringing of his hand-bell all in vain, the president put on his hat, the session closed, and the Jacobins quitted the hall cursing and foaming like maniacs that had broken out of a mad-house. Four days after Robespierre made a faint attempt to renew the motion for printing his discourse; but another terrible tumult arose, and, bending before it, he said that he would not be the cause of discord in the club, and that he would withdraw his address, having in his hands other means to produce the good effect he desired upon the public mind.* He meant his newspaper, 'The Defender of the Constitution.' In this war the Gironde Jacobins fought on the side of the materialists; but this no doubt arose not so much from Robespierre's mentioning his faith in a God and a Providence, as from his declaring that he put no faith in the Gironde ministry which had been established. At least the major part of the Girondists, in declaring a determined hostility to all established or revealed religion, pretended a reverence for natural religion, and a philosophical belief in a God. Their triumph over Robespierre was of the shortest duration; but, such as it was, it no doubt tended to prepare many a scourge for their own backs, in after days, when the fanatic deist, and one of the most vindictive of men, had his feet upon their necks. All these things should be remembered. They will diminish our astonishment at seeing Robespierre hurrying these Girondists to the guillotine by scores at a time, although he had once lived with many of them on the most friendly, intimate terms. Within a few weeks, when Robespierre had resigned his office of public accuser, which, though seemingly so suitable to his nature, had not called forth the least activity on his part, Brissot and the Gironde found that he was gaining ground upon them at a tremendous rate, that he and his party in the Jacobin club were blighting the few laurels that remained to the Assembly, and that, unless they could bring about a reconciliation or conquer him in the club, he must conquer and utterly destroy them. They found that, although Robespierre, to captivate public opinion and add to that popularity which was already immense, was constantly talking about the necessity, the sacred duty of concord and unanimity among the friends of the revolution, he would only treat with them on his own terms, and was not to be really reconciled upon any conditions whatever. After sundry sharp conflicts in the newspapers, in the coffee-houses, and in the public places,* Brissot, Guadet, and Condorcet, who were more particularly attacked by Robespierre, resolved to denounce him as an enemy to liberty and the country at the Jacobin tribunal. They set to work some of their Gironde subalterns; but no sooner was Robespierre aware of their project of operation, than he made Collot d'Herbois denounce Rœderer and Condorcet, and then he himself, aided by Tallien, denounced Brissot and Guadet, who at this time considered themselves as the real heads of the Gironde party. Tallien hinted that the Jacobin society wanted a new purgation; that the sooner it got rid of the Girondists, as it had got rid of the Feuillants, the better; and he declared that, having unmasked the Lafayettes, the Barnaves, the Lameths, they ought to tear the mask from the faces of those worse traitors, the Brissots, the Guadets, the Condorcets. Robespierre began characteristically, by saying, "It is time for this society to adopt vigorous measures. I will not now develop what those strong measures ought to be. The moment for unmasking the traitors of this society will arrive. I do not wish that they should be unmasked to-day; at least, as far as I am concerned, I willingly postpone it for some time. Do not let people say that it is we that are sowing divisions among patriots! When the time comes it will be seen that what we, the true friends of liberty, wish for is a true union and agreement: then it will be seen that those were the honest men who undertook to remove a part of the veil which covers the most frightful plots against liberty! I defer to some other day my explanations. The seed scattered to-day must germinate before I proceed farther. When the blow is to be struck it must be decisive. It must then be shown that there are only two parties in France, the party of liberty and the party of rogues. Would that all France could be present on the occasion, for then an end would be put to all plots and intrigues, and to all the enemies of the constitution who make them. Above all things I wish that Lafayette, that guilty leader, could be present, with his whole army. I would say to his soldiers, presenting my breast to them, If you are the soldiers of Lafayette, strike! If you are the soldiers of the country, hear me!—and that moment would be the last of Lafayette's life. For the present I will say no more. Perhaps I have said too much; perhaps I have caused too violent an alarm among good patriots; but I only meant to awaken honest people, to put them on the alert, to convince them that they ought to feel that liberty and the country are exposed to the greatest dangers, and will perish, unless honest citizens are prepared against the faction, against these men of plots and intrigues, who are seeking to raise themselves on the ruins of our liberty!" "Name them!" cried a tremendous voice in the hall; "only name them, and this day week not one of them shall exist!" This loud voice was that of Father Adam, the mad ex-Marquis de St. Huruge, who continued to be stirring and doing, and who had now exchanged his white hat for a red worsted nightcap. Robespierre, continuing his harangue, and throwing out his dark suspicions in all directions, demanded that a list should be published of the names of all the members of the club, with a view to its purification. Chabot, the ex-Capuchin, said he would make some of the scales drop from the eyes of the public; said that Narbonne, the ex-war-minister, was aiming at Cromwellism, being notably assisted by Madame de Staël, and also by Madame Condorcet, whom he had equally seduced; and that Madame de Staël had duped into her views that once energetic patriot Abbé Fauchet, now constitutional bishop of Calvados, and as great a traitor as any in France. On the 25th of April, while the Robespierrists were renewing their denunciations, and adroitly implicating, not merely the Gironde ministry, but the whole of their party, Brissot and Guadet appeared in the club to make a life-and-death struggle. Brissot spoke first, and, after justifying his own conduct and vaunting all that he had done for the revolution, and defending his friend Condorcet, he openly denounced Robespierre. Guadet followed him; but so strongly pronounced was the feeling of the majority, and so loud was the riot, that Guadet could not be heard, until Robespierre, with a show of magnanimity, implored the Jacobins to be silent and hear what he had to say. Being thus allowed to speak, Guadet began with an injudicious acknowledgment of the popular omnipotence which the rival and deadly enemy of him and his party had obtained. He said, "I denounce M. Robespierre! I denounce a man who, for the love of liberty and of his country, ought to exile himself from France, ought to impose upon himself the pain of ostracism, and serve the people by removing himself from their idolatry!" Guadet was an eloquent man, but he appears to have been discouraged by the unsympathising hostile countenance of the club, and to have made but a weak and ineffectual speech. Encouraged by all that discouraged his adversary, Robespierre made a most triumphant reply: he described the Girondists as a set of babblers that were eternally talking about philanthropy and philosophy, and never doing; as a company of empirical orators that were strutting and haranguing upon a mountebank stage, wearing the mask of patriotism only to obtain office; and he told them that ostracism would be better applied to Brissot, who pretended to be so great a man, than it would be to a man like himself, who never pretended to be anything but one of the people. He was applauded most enthusiastically. Seeing how things were turning, feeling convinced that there was not only no chance of victory, but a certainty of a fatal defeat, several of the Gironde Jacobins endeavoured to stop the combat by proposing that a committee should be appointed by each party to examine the grounds of difference between Robespierre and Brissot and Guadet, and to endeavour to effect some reconciliation or compromise; but the conquering party rejected these propositions with disdain, and Robespierre swore he was the eternal enemy of all compromises of principles, and would never cease until he had proved that there were traitors in the Jacobin society who had been labouring to make that society the instrument of their intrigues and ambition, who were labouring conjointly with Lafayette and Narbonne, and the Barnaves and the Lameths, to make a civil war as soon as the country should be plunged into a foreign war. At a late hour Brissot, Guadet, and the rest of the Gironde sneaked out of the Jacobin Club, leaving Robespierre all-glorious and triumphant, in a state little short of apotheosis. Three days after this signal victory the idol of the club and of the people, in complying his denunciation against the Gironde, gave a long laboured history of his own political life and a précis of his views and principles. He accused Brissot and Guadet of having sought this quarrel, and declared that he had had no part in the accusations brought against them by Chabot and others. He said Brissot had endeavoured to take him and the club by surprise, and had come down with a voluminous speech when he expected nothing of that kind. He described at some length the way in which he had managed, at the dawn of the revolution, the electoral assemblies of Artois, by means of which he had secured his election to the States-General; and he related what he had done to amalgamate those States-General of the three orders into one body, and to convert it into the first National Constituent Assembly. "These Girondists," said he, "ask me, with a sneer, what I did in that National Assembly? I will tell them one little thing that I did;—I made these Brissots and Guadets legislators—it was I that gave these men to France! I said one day to that Constituent Assembly, that it ought to set the people a grand example of disinterestedness and magnanimity, by decreeing that none of their members could be re-elected to the second Assembly. This my proposition was received with enthusiasm. Without it, many of these Girondists might long have remained in obscurity, and who shall say that the people of Paris might not have elected me to the seat which is now occupied by Brissot or Condorcet? It is not for M. Brissot to speak slightly of what I did in the first Assembly. This one action of mine ought to procure me some indulgence from my adversaries! M. Brissot, in writing the eulogium of his friend Condorcet, speaks of his glories as an Academician, and reproaches us with temerity in daring to sit in judgment upon men whom he calls our masters in patriotism and in liberty. As for me, I should have thought that in these arts we wanted no masters or teachers but Nature. Our revolution has patched up (rapetisé) many great men of the ancient régime: if the Academicians and geometricians, whom M. Brissot proposes to us as models, combated and ridiculed the priests before the revolution, they did not the less pay court to the aristocracy, and adoration to kings, from whom they got tolerably good profits; and who does not know with what ferocity they persecuted virtue and the true genius of liberty in the person of Jean Jacques Rousseau, whose sacred image I now see in this Hall, in the person of that true philosopher, who alone, in my opinion, of all the celebrated men of that time, merited the public honours which have been prostituted since to political charlatans and despicable heroes. Why are these insulting questions, of what I have done, asked me?—even in this society, whose very existence is a monument of what I have done. I defended it in times of difficulty and danger, when those who now come hither to insult me had abandoned it; and the very tribune from which they attack me is the evidence of my public service." He next complained that, after making it a crime, in him to have deserted his post as public accuser, and, after charging him with doing nothing, they changed their note and accused him of having done too much, of having made himself a perpetual agitator—thus endeavouring to discredit him solely because he was striving to excite public opinion against the intrigue and treachery that stopped the march of the revolution. It was not he, he unctuously and pathetically protested, that had made the present fierce dissension in the Jacobin Hall:—he indulged in no personal malice—he had no personal resentments to gratify—he could embrace Brissot and Guadet and the whole Gironde, but only upon condition that they joined him and the real friends of the revolution, heart and hand, against the common enemy. "Hasten, then," exclaimed he, in his most terrible phraseology, "hasten to make the sword of the laws move horizontally, so as to strike off the heads of all the great conspirators at once! If you require more proofs of their crimes, come more frequently to the club, and I will furnish you with them!"* His speech, frequently interrupted by rounds of applause, was ordered to be printed and distributed all over France. On the next day (the 29th of April), Mayor Pétion appeared in the Jacobin Hall to recommend, with very questionable sincerity, a peace, or at least a truce, between the Robespierrists and the Girondists—a truce which the Girondists pretended to desire with earnestness. But at the very next meeting (on the 30th) Robespierre's friends accused the Gironde of having endeavoured to steal a march upon them; of having falsified, in their ex-parte accounts, a great deal of what had passed in the club; and of continuing, in Brissot's newspaper, to heap fresh calumnies on Robespierre, &c. The combat was therefore renewed with more ferocity than ever; and again victory seated herself on the crest of the little lawyer from Arras, who thus beat the Gironde, with all their ministerial power and influence—beat them when their power was greatest, and when they had, or believed that they had, the mass of the regular army and even the majority of the national guards on their side. The club, on the evening of the 30th, declared that they abided by Robespierre, and held Brissot and Guadet guilty of falsifying their debates—declared that the imputations they had directed against M. Robespierre were proved to be lies by public notoriety and his constant patriotic conduct.† Marat, Camille Desmoulins, Collot d'Herbois, and other journalists and speakers in coffee-houses and public places, continued the strife after it had ceased, for a time, in the Hall in the Rue St. Honoré. The mad Camille almost annihilated the philosophe Brissot in a pamphlet, entitled 'J. P. Brissot Unmasked by Camille Desmoulins.' The Gironde ministry began to discover that they were not sufficiently sans-culottic for the real sans-culottes: the worst motives, the grossest corruption, the vilest treachery, were imputed to all of them, without so much as an exception in favour of the virtuous Roland.

In the meanwhile the European war had been declared by the Assembly. Instead of clearing of troops such of his territories as bordered on France, and prohibiting the gatherings of the emigrants, as his predecessor Leopold had done, the young emperor, Francis II., it was said, collected troops, appointed generals, traced out camps, gave open countenance to the expatriated French princes and noblesse, and declared that the court of Vienna must and would insist on the restoration of the possessioned princes to their rights in Alsace, &c., on the restoration of Avignon to the pope, on the cessation of that French propagandism which was seeking to undermine all the thrones and established governments of Europe, and finally, on the restoration of Louis XVI. to his liberty and royal dignity, or at least on some adequate guarantee that the peace and tranquillity of the neighbouring powers should not be disturbed through the present weakness of the internal government of France. Prince Kaunitz refused to treat any longer directly with French negotiators, or with the government now established in France; and the Baron de Cobenzel informed the ambassador whom Dumouriez and the Gironde had sent to Vienna, that Austria would on no account qualify or recede from this ultimatum. Dumouriez, who had obtained great influence over the mind of the king, who had formed in his own mind a grand plan of campaign, who intended, though now minister for foreign affairs and not war-minister, to direct and manage the whole of the war, was overjoyed at this termination to diplomacy; and he immediately carried poor Louis with him over to the Assembly, to give, in constitutional form, the note of war. It was the 20th of April, when Louis, with the confident and tricky Dumouriez by his side, and all the rest of his ministers at his back, rose to inform the National Assembly that he had come there for one of the most important objects that could possibly occupy the attention of the representatives of the nation; and that his minister for foreign affairs would read them a report which he had made in council on the actual situation of affairs. When this was done or said, Dumouriez, whose schemes of conquest fell but little short of those that were subsequently entertained by Napoleon Bonaparte, commenced reading his report, with a voice and manner full of hope and hilarity. By suppressing every allusion to the revolutionary propagandism, the open war which the Jacobins had long before this declared against thrones, the infectious nature of Rights of Man and Jacobin principles, the indisputable invasion of the rights of the possessioned princes, the barbarous treatment which the revolutionists had bestowed upon the queen, a daughter of Austria, it was not difficult for so brisk and adroit a man as Dumouriez to make out a terribly bad case against Austria, with its conferences at Mantua and Pilnitz, its coalitions, completed or in progress, its open protection of the emigrants who were in arms to invade France, and its haughty, imperious tone towards a country at least as great in the European scale as itself. Dumouriez, as the conclusion of his spirit-stirring report, announced that there must be an immediate declaration of hostilities, and that the king, whose honour and good faith were indisputable—that Louis XVI., the constitutional King of the French, who was the deposi-

tary of the dignity and security of France—was quite ready to make this declaration of war.* When he had finished, the royal automaton stood up once more, and said, with a faltering voice which denied the sentiments it uttered, "You have just heard, gentlemen, from my minister for foreign affairs, the result of my negotiations with the court of Vienna. The conclusions come to in the report have been adopted by the unanimous advice of the members of my council; I have adopted them myself; they are conformable to the wish which the National Assembly has several times manifested, and to the sentiments which have been testified to me by a great number of citizens in divers parts of the kingdom, all agreed in preferring war to seeing any longer the dignity of the French people outraged. It was my duty, in the first place, to exhaust all the means of maintaining peace. To-day I come, according to the conditions of the constitution, to propose to the National Assembly war against the King of Hungary and Bohemia."† There were a few cries of Vive le Roi, but they were faint and faltering, like the poor king's own voice; and the great majority of the Assembly and of the galleries were not only silent, but, apparently, sad. The crisis had arrived for which they had been so long calling, and yet it startled them when it came. The president told Louis that the Assembly would proceed to deliberate on the great proposition which had been made to them, and would let him know by message the result of their deliberation. As soon as the king had withdrawn, the Assembly adjourned till five o'clock in the evening. Then Lasource recommended that the great question should be submitted to the diplomatic committee, who might deliberate calmly during the night, and make their report on the morrow. He was seconded by Daverhoul, who said that in this determination the courage and impetuosity of the national character ought to be allied with the prudence of the legislator; that he thought war ought to be decreed, but only after mature deliberation; that it was important that their decree should be preceded by the thorough conviction of the people that the war was become inevitable. An unnamed deputy rose to sustain the same opinion, observing that Dumouriez had affirmed that Austria had animated against France the successor of the immortal Frederic the Great, but that they knew nothing of the real disposition of the King of Prussia, or of the correspondence which Dumouriez had had with that court, and that this correspondence ought to be laid before a committee previously to any decision. This orator was assailed with loud murmurs and

* Dumouriez tells us that, if he had listened to his Gironde colleagues, this report would have been a very different sort of composition. "They wished him to draw up his report in unison with their sentiments, and were desirous that he should enter into metaphysical discussions entirely foreign to the business in hand. In short, they were anxious that he should produce a rhetorical and logical composition. He however told them, in a decided tone, that this state paper was not intended for the French nation alone, but for all Europe, and that he wished it to be comprehended without the assistance of the new dictionary, which was not yet published. This pleasantry disconcerted them."—Mémoires.

calls to order, and was obliged to descend from the tribune. He was succeeded in the speaking-place by Jean Mailhe, a Girondist, who had been a little lawyer before the revolution, and who now seemed full of military ardour. Mailhe proposed that the declaration of war should be decreed instantly and unanimously—that they should not lose another minute in vain discussions and doubts which might make people think they had not proper confidence in the spirit and courage of French soldiers. The galleries, who, during the adjournment, had been talked into the most martial humour, and who had excited one another so far as to forget the suspicions instilled by Robespierre and his Jacobins, supported Mailhe with all their lungs, shouting “War! war!” Some members observed, that the tumult was so great as to prevent them from taking any part in the deliberation: they hoped that at such a crisis they might be allowed to deliver their opinions. One of them hinted that he did not place implicit confidence in the veracity of Dumouriez’s report; that war was a serious affair; that the people ought to see that their representatives proceeded with caution and prudence; and that it was scarcely decorous to rush to a conclusion, without debate or reflection, merely upon the report of a minister, and in an evening session. This orator was applauded by a small part of the Assembly; but he was hooted by the galleries; and Merlet angrily called him to order, and begged to let him know that the National Assembly was as much a National Assembly at six o’clock in the evening as at ten o’clock in the morning:—which last remark was loudly applauded. The orator he had called to order persisted, however, in adding, that enthusiasm might be a fine thing on the field of battle, but that prudence was a finer thing in council; that it was irregular, indecent, to reason by acclamations, and precipitate such a question as the present; that there had been absolutely no discussion at all, and that the loud tumult had prevented a great many members from taking any part in the deliberation. But the majority resolved that there should be no committee, no delay—that the decree should be issued on Dumouriez’s report that very evening. At this moment Dumouriez and the rest of the Gironde ministers entered the Assembly to hear what was going on, and to encourage by their presence the patriots that were shouting for war. Pastoret said, that the report presented by Dumouriez was a faithful picture of the bad faith of the House of Austria; that Francis II., and even his predecessor Leopold, had shamefully violated ancient treaties with France; that it was time to put an end to uncertainty, and send out the French to fight for the universal cause of the people—of the people of every country. “Yes,” exclaimed he, “liberty must triumph or despotism must destroy us all. Never were the French people called to such high destinies! Victory will be faithful to the standard of liberty!” He concluded by moving that the Assembly should decree that there was ground for declaring war against the King of Bohemia and Hungary, and then order a deputation of twenty-four of their members to carry this decree to the king. This was welcomed with tremendous applauses; and there was a loud call for putting the question to the vote, and closing the debate. Becquey, a moderate man, and one who had obtained a reputation for ability and prudence, rose and said, that, if the Assembly would only hear him, he would demonstrate that the ministerial proposition ought not to be accepted—that war ought not to be declared at this moment. A number of voices cried, “Speak! let him speak!” And, a short silence being obtained, Becquey said that if ever there was a moment when France had need of calm and peace it was now, after the convulsions of a great revolution; that a nation which had just regenerated its institutions ought carefully to avoid war; that the constitution was not yet firmly established, nor was that respect paid to the laws which was necessary; that while the armies were employed abroad, it would be impossible to restrain the factions within; and that the state of the finances had need of a few years of repose and peace. Cambon interrupted him, telling him that he did not know the state of the finances; that France had more money than would be required. Becquey ventured to doubt the fact, and to say that, notwithstanding the prodigies which might be expected from French valour, the condition both of the army and navy was such as to excite some uneasiness, if they were to have a general war. Here he was interrupted, and called to order by the House and the galleries. Dumas hoped that in that land of liberty a member might be allowed to deliver his opinions; and after some bell-ringing, and some admonitions from the president, silence was restored, and Becquey was allowed to continue. He upset Brissot’s theory about the non-intervention of the other European powers, and he even seemed to admit that that intervention would not only be inevitable, but justifiable by the principles of the law of nations, if France proceeded to make war in the manner now proposed. “You talk,” said he, “of invading the Netherlands: if you do so, you provoke a general war! The last dispatches of our ambassadors announce that Prussia is preparing to act in concert with Austria: the greatest part of Germany will immediately espouse the quarrel of these two powers, who are the supreme regulators of the other princes and electors of the German confederacy. But the power which ought principally to fix your attention is ENGLAND; you should not count too much on the assurances of neutrality given at present by her ministers,—above all, if you attack the Netherlands. For a very long time England has regarded that country as a barrier necessary to her own security, and to the prosperity of her commerce: it is a barrier she has bought at the price of her blood! . . . And again, England will fear for Holland, where any invasion or revolution would essentially injure her interests. The party of the Stadtholder, for which she has lavished her money and succours, can scarcely at this moment keep down the democratic party attached to France. Every movement which shall make the balance incline in favour of France will be injurious to England; and she will unite with Prussia in supporting the Stadtholder and his party. You may now receive amicable assurances, for the English love the liberty which you have obtained; but their great commercial interests must be opposed to you in the system you meditate, and you will soon have against you both the English nation and the whole of Europe!" Though interrupted and hooted, Becquey continued his speech. He declared that there was still ground whereon to treat and negotiate without cannons and bayonets; that the court of Vienna, in its very last dispatch, said it wished not for war, but peace; that Francis II. did indeed take a great interest in the reclamation of the possessed princes; but, if France would only give proper indemnities for what they lost in Alsace to those princes who were ready to enter into negotiations, there was no doubt that that affair might be amicably terminated. "The other point in the last dispatch from Vienna," said Becquey,—who, in a very few words, gave a better explanation of the spirit and motives of those who began this war, which was to last for a quarter of a century, than has been given by others in hundreds of pages,— "the next point regards your taking possession of Avignon by force. It appears the pope has claimed the protection of Francis II.; but he has charged that king to propose indemnities; and, therefore, negotiations may easily be opened upon this point also. It is not to be believed that foreign powers will refuse amicable explanations and negotiations with us. Austria, who has the centre of her forces at the distance of two hundred leagues from Paris, cannot make war upon us without ruinous efforts; and do not believe that, instead of fixing her attention on the revolution in Poland, instead of concerting measures with the Empress Catherine and the King of Prussia for that distant object, she will consent to attack you unless you force her. In effect, Austria has hitherto taken none but defensive measures:—three formidable French armies are, and have been for some time, upon her Belgian frontiers, and she has only opposed to them a number of troops very inferior indeed. You know this, and, without doubt, you only wish to attack her at this moment because you are certain that you are better prepared for a war than she is!" Becquey might have added that the Assembly knew equally well that the Belgic revolutionists, who had only been put down in 1790, were very willing to rise again by the spring of 1792; that an incessant correspondence had been carried on between these revolutionists and the French Jacobins; that those who were stronger than diplomatists and ministers, or any established or tottering authority in France, had promised succour and co-operation, fraternity, and a democratic liberty of the widest extent; that other emissaries besides the demoiselle Théroigne and Bonne-Carrère had been sent, during the last two years, and were at this moment constantly going to Luxembourg, to Liege, to Brussels, to Bruges, to every town in Brabant and Flanders, to excite the people to rise and arm against the Austrians; and to Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and the chief towns in Holland and the other United Provinces, to induce the people there to take the same course against the Stadtholder and his party. But the enunciation of truths like these might have conducted Becquey from the tribune to the lanterne. Even as it was, he was assailed by rabid and abusive cries from the galleries and nearly all parts of the House, and was reduced for some time to a state of silence, if not of fear. When allowed to continue, he told them that, no doubt, they might have reason to complain of the concert between Austria and Prussia, of the coalition of kings against the French revolution; that, without doubt, the court of Vienna was not to be allowed to interfere in the internal affairs of France; but that he could not consider a simple suspicion as to what the coalition might do hereafter capable of justifying a present declaration of hostilities. "Could we," said he, "exact or expect that, while all France was in so general and violent a fermentation, when the cry for war against kings was so frequently echoed even within these walls, these foreign kings should repose an entire confidence in our declaration that we had for ever renounced conquests, or should not have taken any defensive measures, at a time, too, when the ardour of our national guards near the frontiers seemed to threaten them with invasion?" He boldly predicted the evil reputation the French would acquire if they went to war thus hastily, and prosecuted the war, in the way proposed, by foreign invasions and conquests, and the propagandism of universal insurrection of peoples against their governments. "If," said he, "we attack Austria in this manner, we shall force all the kings of the earth to enter into a league against us, for they will see that we are shaking all their thrones! Can a free nation have the immorality to bring down all the calamities of war upon a neighbouring nation, merely to take its revenge for insults offered in a ministerial dispatch? Let us renounce these unjustifiable enterprises! Let us content ourselves with preparing resolutely to defend our own country; and then, in all probability, we shall have no war at all. If we begin the attack, we shall make our cause odious in the eyes of our neighbours. We shall obtain the character of aggressors; we shall be represented as a restless, turbulent people, disturbing the repose of Europe, in contempt of old treaties, and of our new laws, which forbid us to aim at conquests. You will have to combat, in the end, not only the kings of Europe, but the peoples of Europe, who will fight you with that natural animosity felt by every man against those who go to disturb the repose and well-being of his country! I conclude that the National Assembly ought to decree that there is no ground for deliberating on the question of war; that the executive power be charged to defend the kingdom against every attack, and that the king be invited to recommence negotiations." As soon as Becquey had descended from the tribune, Lasource said he would follow him through every part of his discourse, if the Assembly thought his sophisms deserving of an answer. Apparently the majority testified that they were not worth refuting, for Lasource said no more. Guadet treated Becquey's opinions with sovereign contempt, and laughed at his financial and other calculations. If the finances of France were not in the best condition, those of Austria and Prussia were in a still worse state; there was no power in Europe that could call into existence by a single word, as regenerated France had done, 200,000 national guards; there was no country in Europe that contained four millions of free citizens armed or ready to arm, except regenerated France; and therefore, according to this gentle, philanthropic Girondist, France ought to go to war at once, without the Assembly saying anything more about it. Guadet concluded his speech by calling for an immediate division. Bazire, who was acting with Robespierre's party, said that he was astonished, that France and the whole universe would be as much astonished as himself, to see so grave a question discussed with so much haste and frivolity. "You are going," said he, "to make blood flow in torrents, you are going to create enormous expenses, you are going to take a determination which may commit your own liberty and that of all mankind, and yet you will not hear the various opinions of your members, the pour et contre. If we are to undertake a war, let us first be sure that we shall not be betrayed by our own armies or generals. I demand that every member who wishes to speak be heard before you divide upon this grand question: I demand that three days at least be employed in this discussion." Bazire was treated as rudely as Becquey, and the thundering majority decided that there should be no delay—no, not for one day—not for one hour! Brissot, who hitherto had sat silent, who had not even attempted to defend his theory about the political state of Europe when Becquey was knocking it to pieces, now demanded that the war decree should be drawn up before they adjourned. Dumas attempted to speak against this indecent hurry; but a loud voice exclaimed, "President, spare us these miserable debates; put the question to the vote!" Dumas cried out, "President, take the sense of the Assembly whether I am to be heard or not!" The president put this question, which, in a twinkling, was decided in the negative. Then Merlin, another of the friends of Robespierre, mounted to the speaking-place; but his discourse was cut short, not in the middle, but in the beginning, by a chorus of voices that called upon the president to close the discussion. The president then put that question of form, and the Assembly voted that the debate was ended, and that no more could be said. "I only wanted to say," quoth Merlin, as he quitted the tribune, "that we ought to declare war to kings, and peace to their people." The president then put it to the vote, whether the king's proposition for war should be accepted or not. The war party, the overwhelming and intolerant majority, had called for a unanimous vote, the mob in the galleries were ready to set down as traitors to their country all such as opposed the general wish, and in the excited humour of the moment there might have been imminent danger in voting in opposition to the galleries: only Theodore Lameth, Dumas, Becquey, and four other members had the courage to stand up as a minority; all the rest, who disapproved of this precipitating of hostilities, remained seated and silent; and the question was declared to be carried in the affirmative, with a shouting and a noise as loud as could have been made if House and galleries had been in the act of charging the Austrian army. As soon as the "Vive la Guerre!" "Vive la Liberté!" "Mort aux Tyrans!" &c. had somewhat subsided, Condorcet rose to state that it became the National Assembly to publish a declaration of the political principles which had led them to their present resolution, and that he had such a declaration ready written for them. The Assembly agreed that the philosopher and master in politics should be heard; and thereupon Condorcet began to read a long paper, the scope of which was to prove that the French people were forced into this war by the iniquity of despots, and that they had given no provocation whatever. According to Condorcet, nothing was so clear as that the French nation had a right to do whatever they chose with Alsace and Avignon. He was indignant at the thought that any foreign court should pretend that Louis XVI. was in a state of bondage and coercion; for, was not Louis as free as he ought to be? Was he under any subjection except that of the laws which had been made by the sovereign people? There might be contrary opinions emitted even in France, but these were only the voices of factions contemptible in number and undeserving of the smallest attention! The Assembly ordered that this declaration of Condorcet should be printed. Then Vergniaud improvised a Tyrtæan address to excite that warlike ardour which needed no further excitement. In the opinion of this great Girondist, orator, statesman, philosopher, nothing could be more efficacious in securing success to the war they had declared, than the getting up of some more processions and patriotic festivals in the Champ de Mars. "Recall to your minds," exclaimed this fiery man of the south, "that festival of the federation, where all the French devoted their lives to the defence of liberty and of the constitution! Remember your own oaths to bury yourselves under the ruins of this edifice, rather than consent to the least capitulation, rather than suffer the least modification of your constitution! Well then! Give again to France, to Europe, the imposing spectacle of these national fêtes! Reanimate that energy before which the Bastille fell prostrate! Give a new activity to the burning sentiment which attaches the people to liberty and the country. Make every part of this empire re-echo with the sublime words, 'Liberty or Death!' 'The Constitution entire and without any modification, or Death!' Let these cries be heard round the thrones that have coalesced against us! . . . Let us all swear! Let us decree that the national guards and the troops of the line shall all take, on the 10th of next month, the oath which we took on the 14th of January last!" Here some men, who thought there had already been swearing enough, cried out, "No more oaths! No more oaths! The order of the day!"—and that extinguisher was put upon the rest of Vergniaud's fire. Then his friend Gensonné, who had been working with a committee appointed to draw up the decree of war, stepped forward with that decree written and finished; and forthwith the Assembly adopted it unanimously, and appointed a deputation of twenty-four to carry it to the Tuileries for the king's signature and sanction.*

This first of so many declarations of war, which were to proceed from the same quarter, merits a full insertion. It was to this effect:—"The National Assembly, deliberating on the formal proposition of the king, considering that the court of Vienna, in contempt of treaties, has continued to grant an open protection to the French rebels; that it has excited and formed a concert with several powers of Europe against the independence and security of the French nation:—That Francis II., King of Hungary and Bohemia, has, by his notes of the 18th of March and 7th of April last, refused to renounce this concert; that, notwithstanding the proposition made to him by the note of the 11th of March, to reduce on both sides to a peace establishment the troops on the frontiers, he has continued and increased the hostile preparations; that he has formally infringed the sovereignty of the French nation, by declaring that he would support the pretensions of the possessed German princes, to whom the French nation have continued to hold out indemnifications; that he has attempted to divide the French citizens, and to arm them against one another, by holding out support to the malcontents in the concert of the powers; considering, in fine, that the refusal of an answer to the last dispatches of the King of the French leaves no longer any hope to obtain, by the means of amicable negotiation, the redress of those different grievances, and amounts to a declaration of war, decrees that there exists a case of urgency:—The National Assembly declares that the French nation, faithful to the principles consecrated by the constitution not to undertake any war with the view of making conquests, and never to employ its force against the liberty of any people, only take up arms in the defence of their liberty and their independence; that the war into which they are compelled to enter is not a war of nation against nation, but the just defence of a free people against the unjust oppression of a monarch; that the French will never confound their brothers with their enemies; that they will neglect nothing to soften the rigours of war, to preserve their property, and prevent it from sustaining any injury, and to bring down upon the heads of those alone who league themselves against liberty all the evils inseparable from war; that France adopts all those foreigners who, abjuring the cause of its enemies, shall join its standard, and consecrate their efforts to the defence of freedom; that it will even favour, by all the means in its power, their establishment in France. *Deliberating on the formal propositions of the king, and after having decreed the case of urgency, the National Assembly decrees war against the King of Hungary and Bohemia."

When Vergniaud was recommending fresh festivals and celebrations in the Champ de Mars, a grand scene in that place was quite fresh in the Parisian mind. As this business of the Fête of Liberty is connected with other lively and significant demonstrations, a few words must be devoted to the subject. It has been mentioned how the present Assembly liberated the Swiss soldiers of the regiment of Château Vieux, who, under the previous Assembly, had been condemned by their own officers to the galleys for their mutiny at Nancy. Not satisfied with their liberation, which in itself proved that what was vice under the Constituent became virtue under the Legislative Assembly, the friends of the progress of the revolution determined that these Swiss mercenaries should be received in Paris with the highest honours, and should have a fête to their own proper account on Sunday the 15th of April. Mayor Pétion took the lead in this affair, and, backed by his municipality, issued a decree importing that the patriots ought to be allowed to get up this festival; that all friends of liberty ought to be present at it, provided that they did not carry arms; that the national guards and no other armed force ought to interfere with this celebration; and that from ten o'clock in the morning till eight o'clock in the evening no carriages should be allowed to drive in Paris. The directory of the department, the national guards, with the exception of those of the Faubourg St. Antoine and the ultra-revolutionary and sans culottic districts, strongly opposed this decree of the mayor and municipality, and the festival to the liberated mutineers, representing that it would be a bad example, and lead, in all probability, to some immediate excesses. Mayor Pétion replied that the law permitted the citizens to assemble in any numbers, provided they did it peaceably and without arms, and that no authority could hinder them from making use of this right. "I tell you, gentlemen," said he, "that it will be a thousand times more dangerous to attempt to hinder this festival which the patriots are preparing than to let it run its natural course." Rest the municipality should not be strong enough to resist the respectabilities, the Jacobin Club took the festival under its special protection. Tallien announced in the club that he was one of the stewards or regulators of the ceremony, and that the fête was not to be considered so much as a tribute offered to the Swiss, the victims of de Bouillé, as a tribute to Liberty. Collot d'Herbois seized Tallien's word, and said he had a proposition to make which would reconcile all opinions, and convince everybody of the propriety of the grand celebration in the Champ de Mars: it was that the festival should be dedicated to liberty, and be called the Fête of Liberty. The club accepted the proposition with acclamations; and then Robespierre ascended the Jacobin tribune to launch a terrible philippic against all who had attempted to prevent the celebration, and especially against Lafayette, who was at this moment in Paris expecting the declaration of war against Austria, which, he confidently hoped, was to give him the means of eclipsing every military reputation that had hitherto existed in Europe. In his most vehement and most popular style Robespierre accused the hero of two worlds of being the meanest of plotters, of being the real source of all the opposition which had been made to the popular festival by some of the battalions of the national guards, by the departmental authorities, &c. "If that hypocrite," said he, "had never existed, we should have no divisions among us! It is Lafayette that is the most dangerous of all the enemies of liberty, because he still wears a mask of patriotism, sufficient to dupe and to keep under his banners a considerable number of citizens who have more money than wit, and who are miserably shortsighted! It is Lafayette that we have to fight! It is Lafayette who duped the national guards, and made them fight under de Bouillé against the soldiers of Château-Vieux and the patriot regiments at Nancy, &c." He represented that the present festival might be truly useful to liberty, and become the real triumph of the people, who would remember, on this Sunday in the Champ de Mars, what had happened on that Sunday when Lafayette and Bailly had made the national guards fire upon the people! And, in concluding his address, he called for the immediate execution of a previous decree or resolution of the Jacobin Club, that every member should individually send a petition to the municipality, demanding the removal of the busts of Lafayette and Bailly from the Hôtel de Ville. All that he proposed was adopted by the club. The departmental authorities forthwith gave up their opposition to this Fête of Liberty, only taking care to throw all the responsibility of any émeute, commotion, or bloodshed that might happen, upon Mayor Pétion and his municipals. The liberated galériens, who had received their lesson, and who at this stage of the revolution represented what the Gardes Français had been at an earlier stage, requested to be admitted to the Assembly to express their gratitude; and the Girondists joined with the Jacobins in demanding that they should be honourably admitted to the bar of the House. Gouviou, the aide-de-camp of Lafayette, and several others passionately represented that this would be dishonouring the brave men who had marched under the banner of the law against mutiny and insurrection, and many of whom had fallen victims to their duty at Nancy; that this would be passing a censure upon the patriots who had sat in the first Assembly and made the constitution; that this would confound all notions of right and wrong, of military obedience and disobedience, and produce the worst effect upon the army. But their voices were drowned by the galleries and by the majority of the Assembly, who determined not only that the liberated Swiss soldiers should be admitted to the bar, but also that they should have the honours of la séance. There was, however, a narrower division than had been seen for a long time, the numbers being 281 against 265. The galleries shouted, the deputies almost fought—it appears to have been one of the greatest storms that ever raged even in that region of storms and hurricanes. As soon as these votes were passed, the president announced that the national guards, who had escorted the Swiss, demanded permission to defile before the Assembly; and, this being agreed to by the majority, the doors of the Hall were thrown wide open, and Swiss and national guards began to march in. As the forty Swiss of the regiment of Château Vieux had not an orator amongst them, Collot d'Herbois, who had been their most passionate advocate in the debate which had just ended, undertook to deliver an harangue for them. This hissed strolling actor, become, by the grace of the revolution and the Rights of Man, a representative of the sovereign people and a lawgiver, told the Assembly that this was a beau spectacle—that here were forty brave soldiers of Château-Vieux, whose chains they had broken, &c.—that these sons of liberty, who had been so iniquitously condemned, had now put on the uniform of the national guards, and were ready to renew their oaths to be true to the constitution. The Assembly ordered that Collot d'Herbois's speech should be printed. Then the national guards, who had escorted the forty Swiss from Versailles, defiled through the Hall, with drums beating and with shouts of "Vive la Nation!" "Vive la Liberté!" being followed by a numerous procession of citizens and citizenesses, carrying tricolor flags, pikes, "and other emblems of liberty," the march being closed by deputations from various popular clubs, who carried the flags which had been given to the liberated Swiss by the different departments they had traversed on their way from the galleys. As soon as they had all retired over the way to the Jacobin Club, where an ample dinner was provided for the forty Swiss, an orator from the faubourg St. Antoine presented himself at the bar, with the cap of liberty (a red worsted night-cap) fixed on a lance, and had the pleasure to inform the Assembly that the conquerors of the Bastille, the men of the 14th of July, the heroes of the faubourg, were forging 10,000 more pikes for the service of liberty and the destruction of its enemies.

On the appointed Sunday the Feast of Liberty was celebrated, and once more all Paris poured out to the Champ de Mars. The interminable procession set out from the Barrière du Trône, marched through the Faubourg St. Antoine, and made a halt at the spot where the Bastille had stood. The first division consisted of citizens and citizenesses, who marched eight abreast, and carried the Declaration of the Rights of Man, "inscribed upon two tables resembling the tables of the law which are placed before the figure of the legislator Moses." The second group, composed also of citizens and citizenesses, carried the arms and instruments which had been used at the conquest of the Bastille, &c. The third division carried the flags of England, America, and France, united together by tricolor ribands; and they also carried the busts of Algernon Sidney, Dr.

FÊTE OF LIBERTY. From a Print after Duplessis-Bertaux.

Franklin, and Jean Jacques Rousseau, which were surrounded by boys and girls from the boarding-schools and other houses of education. The fourth division consisted of husbands and fathers, wives and mothers, with their offspring; and these carried the book of the constitution, to denote that it was they who had the greatest interest in preserving intact that inestimable treasure. Then followed Pétion and the officers of the municipality, the judges of the new tribunals, the employés of Paris, deputies of the National Assembly, many of whom honoured the fête with their presence, men and women dressed to represent the victims of despotism, who carried the model of a galley, and branches of trees studded with flowers and tricolor cockades, while, close in their rear, young women carried fragments of the galley-chains of the forty Swiss, and a sarcophagus of antique form, on which were inscribed the names of all the soldiers of the Château-Vieux regiment that had been hanged for mutiny, and another sarcophagus, consecrated to the memory of the national guards who had been killed at

Nancy in obeying the orders of de Bouillé, the two sarcophagi being united by a festoon on which was inscribed in large letters, "The tyrants alone were guilty of this blood." After this division marched the bands of the national guards and troops of chorus-singers, who immediately preceded the car of liberty, the grand object and cynosure of the procession. This car had been designed by the classical republican painter David, who, with his sister or cousin, Mademoiselle David, a marchande de mode, and a very enthusiastic republicaness, appears to have been the principal deviser of all this ballet d'action, as of nearly all the processions and celebrations that took place at this time. On the summit of this car was a colossal figure of Liberty, in a sitting posture, holding in one hand a globe, and in the other a mighty club: the figure was eighteen feet high, and was painted and varnished to imitate bronze; it was so tall that it reached the second-floor of the houses, and could not pass through the streets until the patriots had removed their street lamps, which it was the fashion to suspend by strong ropes over the middle of the streets. At the foot of this colossal figure of Liberty incense (no longer needed in the churches) was burning in antique vases, such as were used by the Greeks and Romans in their worship of the gods. The sides of the enormous car were covered with paintings in distemper to look like bas-reliefs; and the subjects of these paintings were—Brutus sacrificing his own sons to liberty, William Tell bending the bow which was to kill the tyrant of Switzerland; and allegorical scenes, such as Liberty crushing Despotism, Aristocracy, Feudality, Superstition, and Fanaticism, and Reason and Philosophy triumphing over all things. In the front of the car seats rising one above the other, to the height of the base, on which sat the statue of Liberty, were destined to receive eighty-three children of both sexes allegorically dressed to represent the eighty-three departments; “but this interesting part of the decorations of the car” was missing, for the mothers of the children, fearing accidents, as that they might tumble and be crushed under the wheels, would not let them go.* Around the car, which was drawn by twenty horses, and which ran upon the same wheels as those that had carried Voltaire’s apotheosis machine, marched the forty liberated Swiss of Château-Vieux, and the eighty-three emblematical boys and girls that ought to have ridden on the seats, with some of the ex-Gardes Français, deputies from the town of Brest, and Collot d’Herbœis, who had been the advocate and orator of the forty Swiss. Close in the wake of the car there was a man ridiculously dressed and mounted upon an ass, to represent the ignorance and folly which disgraced former times, but from which liberty and philosophy had now so gloriously freed the French nation. Besides stopping at the site of the Bastille, these Parisians, who really imagined that it was all “classical and Greek,” halted in sundry other places to sing ‘Ça Ira,’ and patriotic hymns and choruses to Liberty which had been composed for the occasion. From the Faubourg St. Antoine they moved slowly, and with all the solemnity they could muster, along the boulevards to the Place Vendôme, to the Place Louis XV., to the Pont Neuf, where more deputies of the Assembly joined them, and where other busy patriots had Jacobinized the old equestrian statue of Henry IV., having clapped a big red nightcap on the head of that bronze king, and converted the sceptre in his hand into a tricolor flag, besides decorating the mane and the tail, the poutrel and the crupper, of his bronze horse with tricolor streamers and cockades.† “But,” says a patriot journalist of the day, “it was when this immense procession reached the Champ de Mars

* Dulaure, who is as minute as an old chronicler in these particulars, says, however, the absence of the interesting children from the seats on the car was attributed by some to a struggle of generosity between the little girls and the soldiers of Château-Vieux:—“The little girls wanted to go on foot, in order that the Swiss soldiers might ride; the Swiss refused, and so the car remained empty.” We suspect the real cause of its being empty was in its being considered unsafe. These machines were made of very fragile materials—of deal boards, scene-cloth, plaster of Paris, &c.

that the festival assumed its sublimest character and made all the children of Liberty experience their most lively and most delicious sensations! The field and the altar of the country were covered with citizens and citizenesses impatiently expecting the arrival of the cortège. Anon shouts of applause announced its arrival, and it advanced majestically towards the august altar, on which was sworn the fraternal pact which unites all Frenchmen. The table of the Declaration of the Rights of Man was deposited on that altar, in the front and on the flanks of which were presently collected all the signs, emblems, flags, and trophies which had embellished the march, and incense was burnt on the altar with patriotic profusion; and then the grand car of Liberty was dragged all round the altar, the air resounding with praises and thanksgivings to Liberty, that only divinity of the French! ”* When they had done singing to that mock bronze statue, their only god, the citizens and citizenesses, old and young, clad in rags or clad in scarlet gowns, set to dancing to the tune of ‘Ça Ira,’ and, with dancing and singing, shouting and promenading, mixed with the ordinary quantum of gallantry, coquetting, love-making, and assignation-making, they passed the sabbath-day very happily until the sun went down, and the darkness and coolness of night warned them to go home-wards. There was no rioting or bloodshedding, because the patriots had it all their own way, none of the blue-coats, of the national guards, or at least none of Lafayette’s respectabilities, daring to show themselves. “Ah!” exclaims a journalist, “there is nothing like these fêtes for uniting, improving, and raising the souls of the French! These popular fêtes form the best political education that can be given to the people! . . . And you, O wise administrators! give these fêtes often to the people: repeat this one every 15th of April, let this first Fête of Liberty be our great spring holiday, and let other civic solemnities signalize the return of the other seasons of the year.”†

As this Fête of Liberty was entirely republican, the Feuillants and Constitutional-monarchy men—as they continued to call themselves—determined to try the effect of a counter-fête or procession, which should be wholly emblematic of constitutional monarchism, and a tribute to one who had not broken the laws like the forty Swiss, but who had died in defending them. The republicans of Marseilles, of Blois, and other places in the south and in the centre of the kingdom, were pillaging and destroying all the châteaux of the gentry, whether they had emigrated or not; and they had for some time come to the conclusion that it was very republican and proper that the sovereign people should fix the price of the bread they consumed. Some of the magistrates in those parts endeavoured to show that when corn was scarce bread must be dear; and that to fix an arbitrary maximum price would only scare away those who had corn to sell, and thus, and by increasing consumption, make bread still scarcer and dearer. Among these spirited magistrates—for it now required spirit, and courage, and fortitude to oppose even the slightest wish of the sans-culottes—was Henri Simonneau, mayor of Etampes, and a tanner by trade. In spite of his remonstrances, the sans-culottes of Etampes, joined by other sans-culottes from the neighbourhood, rushed into the market-place, armed with guns, sabres, pikes, and scythes, put their own price upon the wheat, divided among them according to that fixed price all the wheat that was there, and butchered the poor mayor for attempting to resist them. It was reported that Simonneau had said, when under the pikes and the bayonets of the ruffians who murdered him, that he willingly sacrificed his life to his duty and the laws. The Feuillants, on the 3rd of June, got up a procession in his honour, and in honour of the laws and the constitution as established, showing, by all manner of ingenious devices, allegories, and inscriptions, that the French, having got the best of possible constitutions, ought to be quiet and happy, and never think of changing it. Instead of a colossal figure of Liberty they carried a colossal figure of the Law, made, like the other, of wood, paper, and plaster, and painted and varnished like it into the resemblance of bronze. Lafayette's respectabilities, who had not shown their faces in the Liberty fête, marched in full force in this procession, which, like the other, terminated in the Champ de Mars, at the altar of the country. Instead of burning incense and singing odes to Liberty, these friends of law and order, and of the constitution as it was, burned incense and sang an ode to a bust of the defunct mayor of Etampes—things which seemed eminently ridiculous in the eyes of the sans-culottes, who had found everything proper and sublime in the Liberty affair. The thing was a complete failure, tending only to show how weak and unpopular was the party that got it up.

At the moment when war was declared the vast frontier of the kingdom from Dunkirk to Huningen was divided into three great military commands; and was watched, besides, by numerous corps of national guards, and a whole people more or less armed. On the left of this long line, from Dunkirk to Philippeville, was the army of the North, commanded by old Rochambeau, and consisting of 40,000 men and 8000 horses. Between Philippeville and the lines of Weissenbourg was the army of the Centre, commanded by Lafayette, and counting at least 45,000 men and 7000 horses; and to the right of this Centre, and stretching away from the lines of Weissenbourg as far as Basle, was the army of the Rhine, commanded by Luckner, and consisting of 35,000 men and 8000 horses. The frontier of the Alps and the Pyrenees, where attacks were expected from the King of Sardinia and the King of Spain, was watched by General Montesquiou with another army, which, for the present, had nothing to do, as the Italian and Spanish courts were not yet ready to act in concert with the emperor. Of the three generals on the northern frontier, where the war was to commence, Lafayette was the best stationed; and, as he was also the youngest, it was expected that he would be the most active of the three. He had spoken loudly of the great things he would perform, but he was destined soon to find that he could do little or nothing, that he was suspected by his own troops, and that the widest differences of opinion prevailed between him and Rochambeau and Luckner, and again between all three of them and Dumouriez, who, though minister for foreign affairs, acted as war minister and took upon himself the entire direction of the campaign, the Girondist de Grave, the nominal war minister, being a young man, and equally without experience and ability. Dumouriez insisted from the beginning that they ought to commence operations by making a dash upon Belgium, where the people were ready to rise and join them. "The number of the discontented in that country," says Dumouriez himself, "was so very encouraging! The dismantling of the fortifications, and the rupture of the Barrier treaty, caused by the late Emperor Joseph, had prepared the Belgic provinces to receive the law from France, because there was nothing to protect them from invasion. The people appeared to solicit our assistance. In short, whether friendly or unfriendly, it was wise to select this as the first theatre of the war, in order to anticipate the House of Austria. . . . Besides, but little preparation was needful for the attack. The Austrians had not more than 30,000 men there. The country was rich and fertile and everywhere open, and the people expected us with impatience: as a proof of which, it is to be recollected that they received us with joy six months after, notwithstanding the shameful disasters that accompanied our first ill-managed attempts at invasion."* But Rochambeau, when this plan was opened to him at Paris, had strongly disapproved of it, had recommended remaining on the defensive, had called Dumouriez a fool, and had set out for his head-quarters on the frontiers in a pet. Lafayette, who had been so eager to assist the Belgian revolutionists two years before when the Emperor Leopold was reducing them to order, and when Austria had given no provocation whatever to France, not only approved of the plan of invasion, but endeavoured to appropriate to himself the original conception of it. He not only attempted to deprive Dumouriez of his glory, but, according to that brilliant adventurer, the most trickish and intriguing of men, he tried to trick him and dupe him in other matters, and set forth ambitious claims, which could not have been listened to without disgusting Rochambeau and Luckner, and giving to him (Lafayette) more power than any party was disposed to intrust him with. Dumouriez, who modestly writes his memoirs in the third person, says, "Whether from ambition or dissimulation, Lafayette readily acquiesced in the plan of the campaign chalked out by Dumouriez; they concerted measures together with the utmost cordiality, and agreed on the time and manner of the execution; but he proposed to this minister, as Rochambeau was not only chagrined, but in a bad state of health, that he himself should be intrusted, as commander-in-chief, with the execution of the project; he accordingly demanded 50,000 men, with whom he was to enter the Low Countries by Namur, and descend along the banks of the Meuse as far as Liege, which would render him completely master of the Netherlands! This plan was a good one, and Dumouriez really thought that Lafayette would have succeeded in carrying it into effect; but the conduct pursued by this general since his return to Paris, his unnatural connection with the court after having been so long its scourge, his sudden coalition with the party of the Lameths, which had formerly ruined him in the opinion of the nation, but at that moment looked up to him as its leader,—all this had rendered him equally suspected by the National Assembly and the Jacobins. The latter (the Jacobins) already deemed it improper that he should be intrusted with the command of any body of troops; and, if he had been invested, as he wished to be, with the whole military authority on the frontiers, Dumouriez must have passed for a Feuillant, and the Assembly would have proceeded to extremities against the king, against Lafayette, and against the Gironde ministry, rather than have permitted such a thing. Besides, there were two marshals of France, two officers superior in rank to Lafayette, on the frontiers. If Rochambeau were really too feeble and too sickly to act, there was not the same objection with regard to Luckner. In short, Dumouriez himself had not so great an opinion of the character and talents of Lafayette as to run such desperate risks in his behalf. He had always shown himself indecisive, versatile, and rather cunning than able, when he acted the principal character during the three first years of the revolution. He possessed some talent and instruction, but he was destitute of that genius which hurries mankind along with it; and, whatever might be his ambition, nature had condemned him to mediocrity." In refusing him the chief command, Dumouriez gave Lafayette reasons to hope that he would really have the principal management of the campaign; and he says that Lafayette assumed an air of content, and dissembled his resentment till another opportunity. According to Dumouriez's plan there were to be two real and two false attacks. Lafayette, with a detachment of 10,000 men, which was to be followed by the rest of his army, was to file off by Givet, and take possession of Namur, where at the time the Austrians had only a single battalion of Walloons, more than the half of which had entered into a conspiracy to desert on the first appearance of the French. From Namur Lafayette was to march for Brussels or for Liege, just as he might find best. At the same time Lieutenant-general Biron was to strike off from Valenciennes with another 10,000 men, and march straight upon Mons, where the Austrian general Beaulieu was posted with only 2500 men. Another general officer was to be dispatched on the very same day from Lille with 3600 men, who were to follow the road leading to Tournay, and, in conjunction with the Belgian inhabitants, to surprise that place: but, if the Belgians were not found so friendly or so active as they had promised to be, then this column was to halt on the frontier line, and merely make a false attack. Also, on the very same day, a major-general was to issue from Dunkirk with 1200 men, and march towards Furnes, to feel the pulse of the Flemings. "This general attack," says the planner of it, "was to be followed up and to be made altogether with about 40,000 men, who were certainly sufficient, for war had only been declared ten days, and neither orders nor troops had arrived from Vienna for defending the country, which was so extremely well disposed in our favour. Had the execution been confided to a general of genius, able, active, and willing, the success would have been infallible. This army was to have been quickly reinforced by more than 30,000 infantry, consisting of national battalions raised during the preceding summer in the northern and western departments of France. A second levy was ordered; and in the mean time the central departments of the kingdom had furnished several regiments of cavalry, which were now approaching Flanders. Thus, when the emperor would have assembled an army in June or July for reconquering the Low Countries, he would have found Lafayette at the head of 75,000 Frenchmen, and the whole country completely revolutionised."* As this plan met with the approbation of the Gironde ministry, Rochambeau and Luckner were obliged to give up their objections, and to promise to co-operate to the best of their ability. A part of the invading force, which was all to be concentrated under the command of Lafayette, was drawn from Rochambeau's army of the North, and a part from Luckner's army of the Rhine. By the 1st of May Lafayette got all his heavy artillery as far as Givet; but, instead of pressing forward for Namur, which he might have taken on the 2nd of May, he began making a fixed position of Givet. General Biron, setting out from Valenciennes, crossed the Belgian frontiers on the 29th of April, and on the 30th pressed onward for Mons. But scarcely had his people caught sight of some Austrian light troops which General Beaulieu had sent out of Mons, when they set up a terrible shout that they were betrayed, and this was presently followed by the cry of Sauve qui peut. Two regiments of dragoons, who are said not even to have seen the enemy, galloped back into the ranks of the infantry swearing that they were surrounded and betrayed; and the infantry, thrown into perfect disorder by this unsoldierlike movement, took them at their word, and followed them in their mad flight. In vain Biron, young Rochambeau, and other officers, conjured them to stop: there was no rallying them; and they never stopped till they reached Valenciennes, where they threatened to massacre all their general officers. These 10,000 fuyards were pursued by only 500 or 600 Austrian light horse, who captured Biron's baggage and military chest. On the very same day and hour Major-general Theobald Dillon's division of 3000 men, which had left Lille and advanced as far as Bessieux, manifested the same panic at the apparition of 800 or 900 Austrians who had sallied out of Tournay; and they fled back to Lille without ever looking behind them, abandoning artillery, baggage, and almost everything else. Theobald Dillon, who entered Lille after the fugitives, was massacred by his own men, as well as a lieutenant-colonel of engineers. The bodies of these two victims, together with that of an unsworn priest, were hung up on a gallows; and, the populace joining the soldiery, all kinds of excesses were committed, including the butchery of some Austrian prisoners of war, who had been surprised and taken near the frontier at the first irruption.* No one dared to hint that brave men ought to have stayed to see how they were betrayed before they fled; all joined in crying that their superior officers were all aristocrats and engaged in a plot against liberty. This bad beginning completely disheartened the Belgians, who had promised to join the tricolor banner, and who now displayed their prudence and their fears by remaining perfectly quiet, and by dropping for a time all communication with the French camp. Lafayette would no longer venture to move from the position he had chosen at Givet, and he stayed there, doubting of his troops and complaining of Dumouriez and the rest of the Gironde ministry, till his provisions began to fail him. Although they agreed on no other point, old Rochambeau united with Lafayette in writing letters to the king and to the National Assembly, to throw all the blame of what had happened upon Dumouriez and his plan of campaign, and at last to declare that they could no longer obey the orders of an ignorant Gironde council and a presumptuous minister. The Assembly for a time turned their backs upon Dumouriez, and insisted on his confining himself within his own department of foreign affairs. The defensive system was now resorted to—and out of necessity, for the army of invasion had lost a principal part of their baggage and equipments, and seemed to be thoroughly disorganised and incapable of discipline. Rochambeau resigned his command in disgust and despair; and de Grave, the nominal war minister, who had connected himself with Madame de Staël, whom Dumouriez describes as “the Circe of the Feuillants,” threw up his place in a fright, and was succeeded by Servan, who, though recommended by de Grave to office, blackened the conduct of his predecessor, and set himself in direct opposition to Dumouriez. “This Servan,” says Dumouriez, “had long been very intimate with the celebrated Madame Roland, and was said, whether truly or falsely, to have acted in the capacity of her lover.” From the friends of Madame Dumouriez could have little to hope; for just at this critical juncture he quarrelled outright with the virtuous Roland and his friend Clavières, whom he had always eclipsed in the king's council, and despised in his own heart as a set of formalists and pedants, who knew nothing of business, nothing of war or politics, nothing of human nature.

When the news of the double flight and disgrace was spread in Paris, and the subject was taken up by the Jacobin Club, there was a terrible war of words, but unaccompanied for the moment by the violent and atrocious acts which might have been expected. Everybody seemed to be accusing everybody else of treachery. Old Rochambeau, who now found what it was to serve militarily under the sovereign people, under a democracy broke loose, told the king that he had lost the confidence of the army through an “infernal plot,” and that all the generals were in the same predicament. The patriots of Paris accused Rochambeau and Lafayette who were alive, and Theobald Dillon who had been murdered, and Biron and all the generals, of being in a damnable plot against liberty, for, without treachery and a plot, how could brave Frenchmen ever run away? The Feuillants accused the Girondists of having madly preferred a war of attack to a war of defence—a revolutionary war to a constitutional one (which, like a good deal more of their phraseology, we do not pretend to understand); and in clearer language, and with arguments more intelligible, they accused the Jacobins of having made sure beforehand of the verification of their own dark prophecies as to the result of a war of attack—of having, by their constant preaching of doubt, suspicion, indiscipline, and insubordination, rendered it utterly impossible for the generals and superior officers to do anything with their soldiers, who were predetermined to look upon them all as traitors. The Girondists, with some subdued reflections on the tendency of the Jacobin preaching, the doctrines of which they had themselves aided in promulgating, accused Rochambeau of being the principal cause of the disasters and dishonour; because that old general, who had always opposed the war of attack, who was obstinate and wedded to his own opinions, was no friend to the present Gironde ministry, but attached to the principles of the ministers they had displaced. The hottest of this party—the enfants perdus of Girondism—men like Carra, the journalist, went farther, and openly accused Rochambeau of treachery. The Jacobins, putting aside for a season their accusations of treason against all the commanders, laboured to show that all that had happened might easily be explained by the incompetence, hurry, and frivolity of the Girondists, who, so far from being fit to be ministers of state, were scarcely qualified to fill the most subordinate offices of Government. These men of the Gironde,

* The reader will look in vain for this horrible fact in M. Thiers and the French writers of history. We derive it from a letter addressed by Lafayette to the minister at war, dated Givet, the 2nd of May.

reasoned the Jacobins, who were already aspiring to their places, are only revolutionists in appearance or by halves: they have confided a patriot army to chiefs who are not patriots; they have obstinately persisted in pursuing an object emanating from the sovereignty of the people with generals and lieutenant-generals that are all ex-nobles, all Feuillants, all brought up under the old court, and holding to a counter-revolution by their hatred to the sovereignty of the people, and by the antipathies they have so often manifested to liberty and equality! In the Assembly the Girondists now united for a brief season with the Feuillants, and this union was strong enough to repress there some demonstrations which were made by the Cordelier Club—which club, as we have seen, included in the number of its members all the ultra or excessive Jacobins. These Cordeliers sent a deputation—consisting of Mommoro (a working printer, who had been arrested by Lafayette, in 1791, for going too far), Vincent (the son of a Paris gaoler), and other patriots of the same colour—to the bar of the Assembly, to represent that the army had been betrayed, and the lives of many brave men sacrificed by the generals. In simple truth, there had been no fighting whatever, for, except a few stragglers, none of the French had got within reach even of an Austrian rifle: if they had stopped in their panic flight, and had formed, the Austrians must have run back without fighting, for they were solely light troops, without artillery or anything whatever to support them; but the journalists and popular haranguers had always been talking about Thermopylæ, and the orator of the Cordelier deputation was determined that a Thermopylæ there should be, or should have been, with a perfect parity of numbers to the ancient one. “Three hundred of our brethren,” said they, “have perished! They have had the fate of the Spartans at Thermopylæ! The public voice, always truer than the ministerial voice, makes us believe that they have been the victims of treachery and treason!” Here a hundred Gironde and Feuillant voices exclaimed, “Turn these blackguards out! Drive them out!—Chassez ces coquins, chassez!” These cries were prolonged until Mommoro and Vincent, who will soon re-appear, and in a condition to take a bloody revenge for this insult, retreated from the bar and vanished through the doors of the hall. Through the same temporary union the Girondists and Feuillants felt themselves bold enough and strong enough to attack Marat, who had recently resumed his editorial functions, in order to call down vengeance on the aristocrat officers, and tell the sansculotte soldiers the line of conduct they ought to pursue. In his horse-doctoring days Marat had never drawn up a more simple or concise prescription. “People and soldiers,” said he, in his paper of the 3rd of May, “I told you six months ago that our generals, all varlets of the court, would betray the nation and deliver up our frontiers. My hope now is, that the army will open their eyes, and feel that the first thing they have to do is to massacre all their generals!” Beugnot, who was half Feuillant, half Girondist, denounced Marat the very next day in the Assembly, and followed up his denunciation by another against Carra, who, though a professed Girondist, had given advice in his newspaper not a bit less atrocious than Marat’s prescription. But the Girondists, though ready and willing to bring down the vengeance of the laws upon the ex-horse-leech, were anxious to preserve the ex-secretary of the hospodar of Moldavia, and by their management Carra was passed over. To balance matters, Lasource proposed that the decree of accusation against Marat or L’Ami du Peuple should be accompanied by a similar decree against Royou, the editor of L’Ami du Roi, who had been recommending in his paper that the sansculottes and Jacobins should be treated as they proposed treating the aristocrats and royalists. Guadet, the great Girond orator, supported this double motion, which was carried by a great majority. These little facts seem to prove that, if the Feuillants and Girondists could only have continued to agree and act together, they might yet have kept down the Mountain or ultra-Jacobin party, at least in the Assembly—that they might yet have had a chance against the Robespierres, Dantons, and Marats—a faint chance, indeed, because the Jacobin club continued to be a great deal stronger than the Assembly, and Robespierre and the Mountain, after the defeat of Brissot, were more than ever absolute in the club.

Carra, left to pursue his editorial career, denounced to popular vengeance, which was something more powerful and terrible than any existing law in France, the two ex-ministers, Montmorin and Bertrand de Molleville. These two ex-ministers immediately cited Carra before the juge-de-paix, Larivière. Carra, whose capital accusation was that the two ex-ministers were active members of what was called the Austrian committee, which was said to meet sometimes in the Tuileries, and sometimes in the house of the Princess of Lamballe, to concert with the queen the means of betraying the country to Austria, declared that he had received his information from three members of the Assembly, Merlin, Bazire, and Chabot, who were also members of the Committee of Research or Surveillance, and prepotent both in the Cordelier and Jacobin club. The inviolability of this trio as members of the legislature did not deter the juge-de-paix from proceeding against them, calling witnesses and taking their depositions, and even applying to the Assembly for copies of papers said to have been presented in its Committee of Research. Saladin rose to declare that a juge-de-paix had no right to demand any such papers. Fauchet represented how dangerous it would be to make public private and confidential declarations which had been made to the committee by individuals in the king’s service. Dumolard thought that the best thing the Assembly could do would be to pass to the order of the day, and leave Larivière, the juge-de-paix, to do whatever he might think best. Larivière, with uncommon boldness but with lamentable rashness, issued a warrant to arrest the three deputies, Merlin, Bazire, and Chabot. "Unluckily," says Bertrand de Molleville, "Larivière was carried away by the desire of acting a great part, and of making himself remarkable; and, in defiance of every consideration of prudence, he drew down upon himself the indignation of the Assembly by executing the law in the most disrespectful manner against these popular members, whom he caused to be raised out of their beds and brought before his tribunal at five o'clock in the morning. His pretext for this inconsiderate conduct was, that he wished to avoid interfering with their attendance on the Assembly, and summoned them at that early hour in order that they might be at liberty by the time the Assembly met." Larivière had been selected by the court as the best disposed of all the magistrates; but, unhappily, whenever anything was to be done for the court, zeal and good intention were almost certain to be accompanied by folly and extravagance. The three Jacobin-Cordelier members quoted the constitution, which forbade any such proceedings against men who had seats in the national representation, declared that they would answer none of Larivière's questions, and entered a solemn protest against the whole procedure. The juge-de-paix was obliged to let them go, and, as soon as the Assembly met, they went thither to proclaim how they had been treated, how the dignity of the nation had been insulted and outraged in their persons, how each of them had been torn out of his bed by three rascally gendarmes. Larivière, by letter, requested to be admitted to the bar of the House to give his own account of his motives and proceedings. Some debate followed as to whether he should be admitted or not; but Vergniaud said that they ought to lose no time in hearing what he had to say touching an infraction of the laws and a daring outrage, which in itself was quite enough to prove the existence of that Austrian committee which had for so long a time alarmed the patriots; and upon this great Girondist's recommendation Larivière was admitted to the bar. Larivière justified his proceedings by an appeal to the constitution, which had not established any distinction in the manner of summoning persons in different situations, and therefore he had not presumed to introduce any new form, but had brought the three deputies before him just as he would have done with any other individuals. This seeming tribute to the doctrine of equality conciliated the galleries and a portion of the Assembly; but, when he proceeded to speak contemptuously of the rumours that were raised about this Austrian committee, he excited the galleries and a good portion of the Assembly into exceeding wrath. He stated that he had examined Madame de Lamballe and other persons, and was thoroughly convinced there was not the least proof of the existence of that Austrian committee, or of any of the infernal plots which Carra talked and wrote about. Brissot, who is accused of being the original inventor of this chimera, and Gensonné, who had employed the rumour of the Austrian committee very successfully against the court, could not bear to hear it treated as a ridiculous dream. They asserted that Larivière's pretended examination of the Princess of Lamballe, &c., was a tissue of lies; and they engaged to bring before the Assembly the most convincing proofs of the reality of the Austrian committee, and of the dark plots which were planning in it. It is one of the most favourable points in the character of Louis XVI. that he never abandoned those who attempted to serve him without making some efforts to save them, although all such efforts were full of danger to himself. Affected at the danger which the ill-judged, though well meant, zeal of Larivière had exposed him to, he tried to cover and assist him by all the means in his power: he commissioned the minister of justice, Duranthon, to order the Public Accuser to prosecute the inventors and propagators of the calumny regarding the Austrian committee, and he informed the Assembly by letter of what he had done. In his letter Louis expressed a hope that the papers which were said to exist in the secret committee might be made public. But this generous interference did not prevent the Assembly from passing a decree of accusation against Larivière, who was accordingly sent to the prison at Orleans, to be tried by the High Court of Orleans for having failed in respect to the nation in the person of its representatives. He shared the fate of the rest of those state prisoners, who were all massacred by the mob in September, except a few servants, and an officer of artillery who bore the unlucky name of M. Loyauté, and who was grievously, but not mortally, wounded. On the 23rd of May Gensonné and Brissot fulfilled their engagement, or produced what they held to be convincing proofs. Gensonné dwelt more on generalities; but Brissot, who had got hold of some of the diplomatic correspondence, and who prided himself on his ability and finesse in detecting and exposing diplomatic manoeuvres, descended to particular inculpations, and again invoked the vengeance of the laws against those two ex-ministers, Delessart and Montmorin, taking no heed at first of Bertrand de Molleville, who had been minister of marine, and never minister of foreign affairs, as the two others had been. "I have denounced the existence of the Austrian committee," said Brissot, "and I will prove that it has existed and that it still exists. In the first place, we must fix the character of this Austrian committee. What is understood by the terms? The Austrian committee is a faction of the enemies of liberty, who, at times governing in the name of the king, and at times directing his ministry, have constantly betrayed the people and sacrificed the interests of the nation to the interests of a family. The entire subjection of this committee to the House of Austria is its principal characteristic. . . .

... Would you know the leading principles of this detestable committee? They are these:—1. An absolute devotion to what people call the royal prerogative; 2. An absolute devotion to the interests of the House of Austria; 3. No alliances with Prussia or with England; 4. Indulgence towards the rebel emigrants, without adhering, however, to all their views; 5. Opposition to the war against the House of Austria, after having provoked us to declare it; 6. The old project to establish two chambers, as in England." After reminding the Assembly that it was Montmorin who had given the queen a passport in the name of the Russian baroness at the time of the flight to Varennes, &c., Brissot said that it was after the return of the king from that flight that Montmorin became most active and most successful, having found out the secret of winning over to the court Barnave and other members of the first Assembly, who, down to that moment, had been the most energetic champions of the rights of the people. He quoted part of a letter written by Montmorin in the month of August, 1791, to the French ambassador at Vienna, in which he informed that functionary that the best minds in the National Assembly, and those who had had the greatest influence on public opinion, had united themselves with the true servants of the king, and were concerting with them measures proper to sustain the monarchy, and restore to his majesty the power and authority necessary to govern. Brissot detected a vast deal of iniquity and slavishness in the expression "true servants of the king," and insisted that Montmorin could have meant nothing less than the restoration of the old absolute power of royalty. Selecting detached sentences and even fragments of sentences from two or three of Montmorin's dispatches, he made it appear that this minister for foreign affairs was always talking of the king, and never of the people, except to condemn their impatience and violence. In one dispatch Montmorin said, "The people are subject to fits of fury; this is a state of violence; but with time the king may recover some authority." This Brissot thought was monstrous. In another letter Montmorin said, "The constitution will march; nobody must hope to be able to destroy it." But Brissot thought this passage as monstrous as the preceding one. This vain presumptuous man did the whole of his spiriting so clumsily that any auditory less passionate and less prejudiced would have absolved Montmorin on his own showing. Among other crimes, this journalist by profession, this writer of all manner of libels, this Brissot, who was constantly feeding the Paris press with the most violent and exciting attacks and denunciations, accused Montmorin and the Austrian committee of having been guilty of horrible attempts to captivate public opinion and delude the people by means of placards, newspapers, and libels! Among Montmorin's accomplices, he denounced as being as guilty as himself the examiner Duport, who, he said, had a slavish adoration for the English constitution with its system of two chambers, by means of which the King of England was enabled to dispose arbitrarily and capriciously of the blood and the lives of his people. He then fell upon Bertrand de Molleville, accusing him of having purposely disorganised the French navy, which had been notoriously disorganised by the Jacobin clubs and publications, and by the declaration of the Rights of Man, and of having caused the black insurrection and the massacres in St. Domingo, which, as was equally notorious, had been brought about by the same causes, aided by the direct intermeddling, systematising, and preaching of Brissot himself. He had promised proofs—proofs of the most convincing nature—but he produced absolutely nothing of the kind, and made up for the want of them by loud, vague declamations, such as had already been worn threadbare by being applied to all manner of persons. He concluded by demanding a decree of accusation against Montmorin, Duport, and Bertrand de Molleville; but, before this decree could be drawn up, the attention of the Assembly was called to more lively matters.

The patriot municipality of St. Cloud informed the committee of research and surveillance that there had been strange suspicious doings in their neighbourhood, at Sèvres, where the king had a manufactory of china or porcelain ware, and a good number of workmen, whose civism was thought doubtful. They announced that, early on the morning of the 26th of May, M. Laporte, who had charge of the civil list, repaired to the china manufactory, without its being known by the workmen why he had come; that in the afternoon of the same day two carriages arrived at the same place, loaded with fifty-two bales of paper, square and carefully packed; that on the next day the furnace used for burning the china was lit, but without any china in it; that the fifty-two bales of paper were thrown into the furnace, under the superintendence of M. Regnier, the director of the works, and of an abbé, whose name was unknown, but who looked as if he had not taken the serment civique; that this burning of paper lasted five hours; and that they themselves (the patriot municipals of St. Cloud) had seen a terrible smoke issuing from the chimney of the oven aforesaid. The Assembly was greatly excited at the reading of this letter. Merlin, whose humour had not been improved by the visit of Larivière's gendarmes, said that the Assembly ought to command the minister of justice to examine into this matter, as there was good reason to believe that the papers thus burnt were the archives and correspondence of the Austrian committee. Isnard, the great Girondist, thought that M. Laporte ought instantly to be called to the bar, and strictly examined by the House itself; and that greater Girondist, Guadet, seconded the proposition, which was forthwith adopted. The poor treasurer of the civil list, being brought in, confessed that he had been at Sèvres, and that bales of paper had been carried there to be burned—not fifty-two bales, however, but only thirty. When asked what those papers were, he said they were a new edition of a French work which had lately been printed in London, and which he had withdrawn from the Paris bookseller who held it. “What work was it?” demanded the Assembly. “It was no work that had anything to do with liberty,” said poor Laporte, who well knew the danger of being suspected of having burned patriotic Jacobin books. “It was the mémoires of a woman who has been but too notorious. Every copy was to be signed by her, but she is now dead. That woman was Madame de la Mothe, who wrote about the diamond necklace.* I never saw the book. I only charged two persons to buy up all the copies, and see it burned. The bookseller himself went to the furnace with the bales.” “But who was that abbé that went with you?” demanded the august Assembly. “There was no abbé with me,” said Laporte: “I went alone.” He was told he might withdraw. Merlin then demanded that M. Regnier, the director of the Sèvres works, should be brought up and interrogated instantly, before he could have time or opportunity to advise or speak with any person whatever. In the end it was agreed that the workmen who had burned the bales should be brought to the bar, as well as the director. While the messengers went in search of the director, the journeymen, and the bookseller, the Assembly came to one very important resolution. Bazire, one of the trio who, under Robespierre, had undertaken to be high priests of terror and suspicion, rose and said that to-morrow he would prove the indispensable necessity of dissolving the constitutional guard which had been allowed to the king by the Assembly; that he would prove that in the regiments of that guard there had been admitted unsworn priests, men who had been at Coblenz with the emigrants, servants of the expelled aristocrats, and so great a number of enemies to the revolution that nothing could be expected from them but some sanguinary attempt to make a counter-revolution. He added that he knew for certain there had been a project for carrying off the king on that happy Sunday when the patriots were enjoying themselves in the Champ de Mars at the Fête of Liberty. He promised to be ready with his papers and proofs on the morrow; and in the mean time he thought the Assembly ought to decree that the civic guard of Paris should be doubled from that very night, in order to keep down fermentation in the capital. The Assembly forthwith not only adopted this bright scheme, but also came to the resolution that Mayor Pétion should be ordered to present every morning a report on the state of Paris. Then Carnot the younger, brother of the extraordinary man who was soon to organise the disorderly armies of the republic, rose to demand that the Assembly should not adjourn at all, but declare themselves in permanent session, as they had done in the time of the flight to Varennes. When this proposition had been adopted, almost unanimously, an unnamed deputy recommended that, in imitation of the consuls of ancient Rome, they should issue a proclamation in these terms:—“Citizens, the republic is in danger. Take up your arms, and stand on your guard!” For the present, this proposition was negatived. But all this, which passed on the 28th of May, was an audible prelude to what was to happen at the Tuileries on the 20th of June. In the evening the Paris bookseller, the director of the china manufactory at Sèvres, and three of his workmen, were brought to the bar, and sharply examined touching those suspicious bales. The bookseller declared that they consisted of nothing but impressions of the mémoires of Madame de la Mothe, which he had received from London from Mr. Robinson, with instructions to sell them on commission. When M. Regnier, the director, was asked whether he knew what the bales contained, he said he did not, as he had not permitted himself to look into them. The first workman said that all he knew about it was that the paper pulled out of the bales to be burned was printed on both sides like a book or pamphlet. When asked whether the burning was a long operation, he said it lasted from half-past five till half-past eleven o'clock. When asked whether he had not seen the title of the book, he said that he had not, and that he had not any ambition to see it. When asked whether he had not seen any manuscripts, he declared that he had not. After a few other questions, this witness was told he might retire. The next journeyman could only say that a great deal of paper had been burned. When asked what paper, he said he could not tell, as he did not know how to read. The third workman examined said that he had thrown the paper into the furnace, being told so to do by his chief, but he could not say what paper it was, as he could not read. Like the first workman, he declared that he did not know the gentleman who brought the paper to Sèvres, and attended while it was burning. Nothing more could be made of these witnesses; no more light could be obtained from the great conflagration of printed paper; but it was easy for the trio, Merlin, Chabot, and Bazire, to keep up the suspicion or belief that manuscripts had been burned, besides printed sheets, and that those manuscripts would have afforded ample proofs of all the accusations they had brought against the Austrian committee; and out of doors, in the clubs, coffee-houses, and all public and private places, a great deal was made of that fire and smoke at Sèvres. Bertrand de Molleville says that Brissot joined the whole Jacobin party in maintaining, with as much effrontery as vehemence, that the papers burned so secretly were and could not be anything else than the registers and parts of the correspondence of the Austrian committee. The same minister, who continued to be a confidential servant of the court after he was driven out of the ministry by the Girondists,

* The story of the Diamond Necklace, that remarkable passage in the life of Marie Antoinette, will be afterwards taken up when we come to look back upon the whole history of the unhappy queen from its bloody end.

declares that the papers were nothing but the mémoires and libels of that notorious woman who had long before done such incalculable mischief to the reputation of the queen. He says that M. de Laporte, by the king's orders, had bought up the entire impression (the rogue of a bookseller must have kept some of them back, or Mr. Robinson of London must have sent more copies over, for in a very short time the terrible libel was circulating in Paris), and that de Laporte, instead of destroying the sheets immediately, kept them for a considerable time in his own house; that the alarming and rapid progress of the revolution, the audacity and arrogance of that swarm of ruffians who directed, and in good part composed, the populace of Paris, and the excesses daily committed by them, made the treasurer of the civil list dread that his house might be attacked and broken open; and that then he decided on sending the dangerous sheets to be burnt. Bertrand adds that the secret was betrayed by one Riston, who was employed by one of the employés of de Laporte to see the papers burned, and who was a dangerous intriguer, a man of the very worst character, formerly a lawyer of Nancy, where only one year before he had escaped from the gallows, by favour of the new principles, and the patriotism of the new tribunals, although convicted of enormous forgeries, including a falsification of the great seal of France. Madame Campan says that she was the first in the Tuileries to hear of the terrible storm in the Assembly about the burning of these papers, and that she went immediately to tell her royal mistress of it. "While," she adds, "I was giving this account to the queen, the king blushed and held down his head. The queen said to him, 'Sir, have you any knowledge of this?' The king made no reply. Madame Elizabeth begged him to explain what this meant, but still the same silence on the part of the king. I instantly withdrew. A few minutes after, the queen came to me, and told me that it was the king who, out of fear for her, had caused the entire edition to be bought up, and that M. de Laporte had not found a more secret manner of destroying the impression than getting it burnt at Sévres, in the midst of two hundred workmen, of whom one hundred and eighty must be Jacobins. She told me that she had concealed her grief and mortification from the king, as he was in a consternation at what had happened, and as she could say nothing, seeing it was his tenderness for her that had caused this new misfortune."

On the following morning, the 29th of May, mayor Pétion very briskly made the first of his daily reports on the state of Paris. He declared that the capital was in a dreadful state of fermentation, which he attributed not so much to what had happened on the frontiers as to plots carrying on in its own centre, and efforts made by unpatriotic men to deprave public opinion and corrupt public spirit. "You must," said he, after a great deal of more declamation, "incessantly intimidate your enemies, and keep them bent under the yoke of the law; for, at the least neglect on your part, they will raise their audacious heads, and defy you." The mayor was honoured with long applauses; and the Assembly ordered that his discourse should be printed and distributed. He had scarcely withdrawn when the citizens of one of the lowest sections of Paris entered the Assembly, to swear to sacrifice their lives for its defence. They defiled through the hall, with drums beating and flags flying, and red worsted nightcaps stuck upon pikes: they were fifteen or sixteen hundred strong, and all armed with pikes of the new fabric. After doing their swearing, most of them sat themselves down in the body of the House behind the members. Bazire then rose to fulfil his promise of proving the danger of allowing the king to keep his constitutional guard. He declared that that guard was rotten with aristocracy and anti-revolutionism, and that liberty and equality could not be safe until it was disbanded. Was not the Duke of Brissac, its commander, a determined aristocrat and royalist? Had he not put upon the hilts of the men's swords a cock and a royal crown? Had not anti-revolutionary principles, and heresies against liberty and equality and all the rights of man, been propagated among these guardsmen, and then by these guardsmen among some of the people? Was this to be borne by men who had the power to prevent it?—who could dismiss these guards, and the king along with them, if so they chose! Was it not true that, while ci-devant nobles, and their base valets, were admitted into the guards, patriots, with all the qualifications, and of undisputed civism, had been rejected? Had not men, ci-devant nobles that belonged to that execrable body the gardes du corps, been enrolled in this constitutional guard, wherein there were unsworn priests who had thrown off their cassocks to put on grenadier coats? Were there not some of these anti-revolutionists in this guard who still dared to insult the national equality by making use of their old titles, and speaking contemptuously of the bourgeoisie—of the whole sovereign people? Continuing his discourse, Bazire affirmed that a serjeant of the constitutional guard, who had formerly been of the body-guard, had said aloud to some of his comrades that the three hundred patriots who had perished in the affair of Mons were so many beggarly rascals, and that there were plenty more of them in France to be destroyed; that on another occasion some of these royalist guardsmen had cried out, when on guard at the Tuileries, "The Austrians have taken Valenciennes! In fifteen days they will be in Paris! Bravo! bravo! We will march out twenty leagues to meet them, with the white flag, the king's own colour!" that these guardsmen had taken an oath to accompany Louis XVI. wherever he might choose to go; that M. Sombreuil, one of the sons of the governor of the Hôtel des Invalides, had said among these guardsmen that he had got a good sword, with which he intended to rip up the bellies of the rascally sansculottes, &c. &c. He declared that he had been informed of most of these facts by various patriots, who were serving, or had been serving until they could bear it no longer, in the king's guard. He said that many efforts had been made to induce soldiers to enlist for the emigrant army at Coblenz; and here he named a young soldier—JOACHIM MURAT, the son of a postmaster and innkeeper of La Bastide, near Cahors, but who was destined, by the fate of revolution and wars, to wear a kingly crown before he died—who had recently retired from the king's guard, in which he had been a serjeant or corporal. Bazire said that the lieutenant-colonel of the guard, at the moment when Monsieur Murat gave in his resignation, invited that patriotic citizen to join the emigrants, telling him, in order to tempt him, that he had just sent forty louis-d'ors to the son of the postmaster of Cahors, who had joined the emigrants at Coblenz. Bazire declared that the ancient gardes du corps, whose aristocratic sallies in a moment of drunkenness had forced the people to awake, and provoked the famous day of the 6th of October, 1789, had never abused the patience of good citizens so much as this new guard, and had never been half so dangerous to liberty, because they had never been one-fourth so numerous; and he concluded by moving that the Assembly should take it upon itself to decree that this new guard should be instantly cashiered, and that the king needed no other guard than the patriotic national guards of Paris and a regiment of Swiss. Just at this moment some soldiers from the Invalides came to the bar to acquaint the House with some very suspicious circumstances which had occurred the preceding night, and which made them believe that the king's guards were going to butcher the patriots. [These royal or constitutional guards were under two thousand men, and at least one-third of them were supposed to be patriots; the armed national guards of Paris and the towns in the neighbourhood, without counting the pikemen and the pikewomen for anything, exceeded one hundred thousand, and they were well provided with artillery and all the materials of war; and they had the whole populace of the capital and banlieue—at least half a million of sansculottes—to back them; and yet nothing is more clear than that the frenzy of fear, that real cause of nearly all the monstrous excesses of this revolution, was impelling the people, and the guides and instructors of the people, at this moment.] These invalid soldiers said that on the preceding evening an order was sent to all the commanders of posts round the Hôtel des Invalides to cede their posts to any troops that might present themselves during the night, whether they were national guards or king's guards. "Surprised at this order," said their spokesman, "we consulted the decrees of the Assembly, and there found that the king's guard does not form a part of the forces of the empire, and that in consequence the order was very suspicious. It is for you, O! honourable deputies, to maintain the law and support our patriotism. To our last breath we will repeat, 'Liberty or death!' &c." The Assembly thanked these cautious patriot, and gave them the honours of the sitting (les honneurs de la séance). The Assembly then determined to summon to their bar M. de Sombrevil, the governor of the Hôtel des Invalides, and several of his officers. The interval that elapsed before they came was principally filled up by Cato-Couthon, who was uncommonly anxious for an attack on the royal palace, guards and all. "The moment," exclaimed he, "is come in which the Assembly ought to display a grand character! There exists a great conspiracy, the centre of which, as we all know, is in the château of the Tuileries, that source of all the conspiracies against the people!" At these words not only the people in the galleries, but a considerable portion of the Assembly, applauded and shouted, and made a noise so terrible and so long that it seemed as if it would never end. A côté-droit man begged to observe that he thought the noise in the galleries very indecent; that he thought the solemn deliberations of the Assembly were not to be interrupted either by applauses or by murmurs. The president rang his bell, and reminded the galleries that this was the law, and that they ought to be quiet. As soon as some degree of calm was restored, the Jacobin Cato went on with his speech, but in a manner which soon made a greater storm than before. He could add a few astounding facts to those mentioned by M. Bazire. A young citizen had presented himself for enrolment in the king's guard, with a certificate of civism signed by the department, and the Jacobin Club, to which he belonged; and, instead of being received, he had been told that they had no need of factious men of his kind. Another young man, still serving in that accursed guard, announced that about a week ago a conciliabulum of these guardsmen were discussing the question of the dissolution of the Assembly, when a quartermaster had said, "If they will only leave that matter to me, I will undertake to blow the Salle de Manège into the air within a month from this time." "I demand, therefore," cried Cato-Couthon, "that the Assembly, adopting a measure of general security to purge the capital of this troop of brigands conspiring against liberty, pronounce the dissolution and discharge of the king's guard before we adjourn this day!" Here the applauding and shouting became tremendous, a part of the Assembly again joining the vociferous, hard-fisted galleries. A member of the right side—a side which seemed all struck with paralysis, and to be hardly capable of giving a sign of life at this critical moment—ventured to tell the president that he ought to insist on the rules of the House being respected by the people in the galleries, who, not satisfied with clapping with their hands, were thumping and beating with their feet to make the more noise and dust. [As the most active of these gallery patriots wore sabots or wooden shoes, and as the streets of Paris were many degrees more dirty and dusty than they now are, and as the galleries were chiefly constructed of deal planks, the effect of the latter operation must have been truly tremendous.] The president, thus called upon, did what he could; and in process of time there was silence enough to allow Couthon to be heard once more. "I have proposed," said he, "the discharge of this king's guard as a measure of general police, because such matters belong exclusively to the legislative body, and cannot be stopped or interfered with by the king's veto." Here Dumas called him to order, and reminded him that, by the constitution and their own laws and decrees, the Assembly had nothing whatever to do with the king's guard, and therefore could not discharge it without violating the constitution, and invading the very limited prerogative. "We are here," exclaimed Dumas, "to cause constituted authorities to be respected, and not to obey the will of a factious mob." "I say," resumed Couthon, "that our decree must not be stopped by the fatal veto. I also beg the Assembly to reflect whether, after what has just passed at Neuilly, it would be prudent to allow the king a Swiss regiment, as M. Bazire proposes." "Oh!" quoth Bazire, "I beg to withdraw that part of my proposed decree. Upon reflection, I think that the king ought to have no guard but national guardsmen—no guard but the patriots of Paris!" Mazurier, or Mazuyer (the immortality of many of these men is put in jeopardy by the slovenly way in which their names are written), thought that the king's guardsmen were mere machines in the hands of their chiefs, and that the first thing the Assembly ought to do was to impeach or prosecute Brissac, their commander, with all those who resembled him.

Sombreuil, the governor of the Hôtel des Invalides, and two of his officers, were brought to the bar and sharply interrogated in presence of their patriot men, who had denounced the suspicious order, and who were now seated in the Assembly like honourable members. The officers merely deposed that they had received orders to fall back from their posts and retire into the hôtel in case any armed force, whether national guard or king's guard, should present itself in the night. Sombreuil, a man of rank, a lieutenant-general, one whose person, name, and quality must have been known to all Paris, was examined like a vagabond or a cutpurse at a common police-office. After being asked what was his name, what his employment, where he had been last night, &c., the president of the Assembly, who was the interrogator, demanded to know why he had put guards round the hôtel, and why he had given that strange order for their retiring. Sombreuil's answer to these last questions contained a word or two that say a great deal as to the state of morals and religion to which the revolution and the philosophes before it had brought the people of France. "The night before last," said he, "some people broke into the sacristy of our church (which is detached from the hôtel), stole the sacred vases, and scattered their contents and the host upon the altar. It was my duty to prevent a repetition of such a visit; and, besides, I heard that there were troubles and émeutes in Paris. I thought myself obliged to take extraordinary precautions. I told my officers to place some additional sentries, and to be more than usually vigilant; but I also told them that, if there should be any fighting in the night, they were to retire, and consider our house as an asylum for all, since it was but a military hospital, and in no state to offer resistance to any party whatsoever. In short, I told my officers that every part of the nation ought to be the same in our eyes, and that, whether it were gendarmerie, national guard, or king's guard, we had nothing for it but to leave our posts and our gates open to them, having no means of offering any opposition." Being asked why he had put sentinels round the church without any orders from his superiors, the old soldier replied with some naïveté, "If I had placed them a little sooner, perhaps my sacristy would not have been robbed." Another Jacobin, with an ambiguous name, was exceedingly disgusted at this talk about sacristies and hosts and sacred vases. "Mr. President," said he, "I can bear this no longer! I demand to be heard, if it is permitted to a patriot to defend the dignity of the nation and reclaim its rights. M. Sombreuil has been talking for an hour about My sacristy, my sacred vases; now M. Sombreuil ought to know that the sacristy and the sacred vases of the Invalides belong to the nation, and that, besides, if these vases had been stolen, that gave him no right to admit into the hôtel every sort of armed corps that might present itself." The president chose rather to seem to doubt whether the said vases had been stolen at all. He asked the governor whether the theft had been proved and made public. Sombreuil replied, that not only the juge-de-paix of the section, but also Pétion, mayor of Paris, had been acquainted in form with the robbery; and he assured the president, in addition, that for some time past a great deal of roguery (beaucoup de friponnerie) had been committed in the interior of the hôtel, as discipline could not now be kept up as it formerly was (attendu que la discipline n'a plus le même nerf qu'autrefois). Here he was hastily told that he might withdraw. The House then returned to Bazire's motion for cashiering the unpopular guard. Some of the coté droit had by this time (there had been the usual dinner adjournment, and Feuillants, Girondists, and ultra-Jacobins had all dined) got courage enough to rise and speak against the proposition and the unconstitutional mode recommended by Couthon for carrying it into execution. Ramond made a long and excellent speech to show that the Assembly could not dissolve the guard without invading a part of the constitution; that the constitution recognised different constituted powers, which ought to respect one another; that the king had his powers and the Assembly theirs, and that no invasion could be made by one power upon the other without bringing about a new revolution. If improper persons had been admitted into the guard—if such men were guilty of conspiracy or of any other crime, there were laws to punish them, and there was nothing to do but to bring them to trial. It would surely be infamous to confound the innocent with the guilty, and to proceed to an unconstitutional extremity before the guilt of any part of that guard was proved. Guadet rudely interrupted Ramond, saying that there could be no doubt whatever that the king's guard had been illegally organised. Frondières, one of Ramond's friends, irritated at this rudeness, and dreading a long flowery speech from the Girondist orator, cried out, "Before M. Guadet goes any farther, I beg him to speak as a logician, and not as a declaimer (un declamateur)!" This provoked a tremendous hurricane, in the midst of which Guadet descended from the speaking-place, while his friends vociferated that the member who had interrupted him ought to be sent to the Abbaye prison. Lasource, when the tumult had somewhat subsided, said he hoped M. Guadet would treat the indecent sallies of those gentlemen of the coté-droit with sovereign contempt, and resume his speech. Jean Debry, who was at this time the fiercest of Jacobins and republicans, moved in form that M. Frondières should be committed to the Abbaye for having insulted M. Guadet by name in treating him as a declamateur. This was followed by loud cries of "To the Abbaye! To the Abbaye with him!" but some members demanded that M. Frondières should be heard first; and that gentleman, who appears hitherto to have been a silent member, rushed to the tribune. He had scarcely opened his lips ere he was assailed by fresh cries of "To the Abbaye! To the Abbaye!" "Mr. President," said he, "I beg you to send to the Abbaye all those who interrupt me!" Lacombe-Saint-Michel begged to say that, unless Frondières apologised for what he had said to M. Guadet, he ought to be sent to the Abbaye forthwith. "Gentlemen," said Frondières, "I have had the patience to listen to you for six months; have the patience to listen to me for six minutes!" Ducos thought the Assembly ought to pass to the order of the day; but the majority decided that they would do no such thing. A great many members then insisted that Frondières should be at once condemned to three days' imprisonment in the Abbaye; but the Assembly again dividing, it was voted by the majority that Frondières should be heard. But, as the galleries were with the minority, this was no easy matter. Before he could finish a sentence he was loudly called to order, and again threatened with the Abbaye. "If, in calling me to order," said Frondières, "you could re-establish some order in the eighty-three departments, I would vote with you for my own censure. But what have I done to be called to order? What is the crime imputed to me? I merely begged M. Guadet to speak as a logician and not as a declaimer. And what better advice could I give a member than to tell him not to lose time in declamations, but to present his ideas in a few words. It is a fine talent this oratory—it is a beautiful talent that of

deceiving the people by force of words. (The tumult recommenced.) Gentlemen of the left, it is your duty to hear severe truths, and it is our duty to tell them. I have told M. Guadet; for six months I have heard you and your like declaiming in the tribune, and I have seen the agitators of the people " Here his voice was completely drowned, and nothing more could be heard from him except a few disjointed words. He was obliged to descend from the tribune; and then, with a tumult like that of Pandemonium, he was voted a lodging for three days in the Abbaye. This over, Guadet continued his speech, which made the red coats of the king's guards blacker than Bazire had made them, and which ended in recommending a decree of accusation against M. de Brissac, and a decree abolishing the guard in toto without any care about the king's veto. Daverhoul, an expatriated Dutchman, who had been elected a member of this Assembly because he had been a revolutionist in his own country, though his notions of revolution and democracy really differed from those now in vogue in France, boldly and eloquently opposed both propositions. "As for M. Brissac," said he, "there is nothing against him but simple suspicions. M. Guadet has just said that suspensions are enough to justify a decree of accusation against any citizen; but only conceive whether this monstrous system of tyranny will lead us?" [Within thirteen months Guadet found that it was leading him to proscription and a bloody grave.] Every man that knows the organization and the natural movements of great popular assemblies, and who has reflected on the history of all the peoples that have been governed by public assemblies, knows very well that in all such bodies of men there are formed the things called parties. What will become of the individual liberty of citizens, if the dominant party, upon simple suspicions, shall issue decrees of accusation against all those who oppose or displease them? and if the different parties, overthrowing one another and domineering by turns, shall, by this unlimited right of accusation, lay prostrate all ministers, all public functionaries, and all opposing citizens? You will then see the proscriptions of Marius and of Sylla!" This, in a few words, was the real history of the sequel and end of the revolution, and this system of accusation was the deep fountain from which flowed all the blood that deluged the kingdom. But who introduced this atrocious system? As French histories are written, it was not introduced until the revolution was demoralised, and from a beautiful object made hideous by the baleful ascendancy of the Robespierres and the Marats. But it is time that this flimsy texture of sophisms, equivocations, suppressions, and downright lies should be torn to shreds, and sent to the proper dwelling-place of all falsehoods and monstrous humbugs;—it is time that these philosophic, gentle Girondists should be exhibited to the world in their true colours. It was they that brought the system into full play; and if they did not carry it out in operation to its fullest extent, it was only because they were undermined by their own handywork and swallowed up like blunderers and blockheads in the abyss they had themselves made.* It was Guadet, whom the high-priestess of the Gironde describes as the tender husband, good father, excellent citizen, virtuous man, sincere republican, but only rendered weak by an excess of sensibility, that enunciated the detestable principle in this debate; and it was Vergniaud, that other Divus Apollo of the Girondists, "whose soul was devoured by the love of the public good," that seconded Guadet, and that said nearly everything was justifiable in men who feared a plot against liberty! Danton, Marat, Robespierre, Saint-Just, never used any other argument; and this argument was considered by the French people as justification enough for every murder or wholesale massacre they afterwards committed. As soon as Vergniaud had finished a long argumentative speech, in which he rode his logic and metaphysics to death, the Assembly divided, and decreed by a large majority that the king's guard should be dismissed, and that, until a new guard could be formed more conformable to the laws, the national guard of Paris should do duty at the Tuileries, &c. Merlin then implored the Assembly not to adjourn before launching the decree of accusation against Brissac, the commander of the guard, which had been proposed by Bazire, and afterwards by that man of excessive sensibility, Guadet. Becquey opposed this proposition with all his might. He spoke of the danger of receiving anonymous accusations, and of acting upon them precipitately. He reminded the House that their own Committee of Research had often been deceived, and had at least on one occasion discovered that the signature put to a sweeping denunciation was forged. He mentioned an instance in which Chabot had made use of a document of this kind, which the Assembly subsequently proved to be false. He mentioned another instance in which Bazire had committed the same mistake; and he asked who had examined the accusations brought against Brissac except Bazire? Chabot, the ex-capuchin, replied that these papers had been seen by several of the committees of the Paris sections, by several municipals and police-officers, and by the Committee of Research; and that, if none of the papers had been presented to the five members who had recently been balloted into the committee, it was because none of those five gentlemen inspired confidence in the patriot citizens who made the depositions. Calvet, one of the five new members of the committee, who, unfortunately for himself, had been a garde-du-corps before the revolution, responded in a passion, that he and his friends were very happy not to have the confidence of those blackguards, de cette canaille-là. This sally provoked a universal shouting of "Order! Order! To the Abbaye! To the Abbaye!" "Let me explain," said Calvet: "indignant at the inculpations brought by M. Chabot against some of the members of the committee, I said that none but scoundrels could give in depositions not signed with their names!" An honourable deputy cried out, "Mr. President, he is seeking to sow divisions, and to deprive the nation of the accusations and depositions of good citizens. That is the object of the insults of all those gentlemen on the right." "How!" exclaimed Calvet; "are those not scoundrels who give in anonymous denunciations such as we read of in the Inquisition?" Lacroix, the bosom friend of Danton, insisted that the president ought to call Calvet to order, with a censure proportionate to the gravity of his offence against the sovereign people. "The citizens, whom he has insulted," said Lacroix, "ought to find their avengers in the National Assembly! (Thunders of applause from the galleries.) The object of these insults is to keep away from our committees all good citizens by treating them as canaille, a word that can only come from the mouth of a çi-devant noble. As for me, I know no canaille, for we are all equal. I demand, therefore, that we render for once a proper homage in this Assembly to that doctrine of equality to which some men cannot accustom themselves, by giving some striking satisfaction to the citizens who have been insulted." "I had not the misfortune to be born in the privileged class," said Calvet, "nor do I know what is meant by saying that I have insulted the people. I am one of the people myself; I form an integral part of the people; I know no other distinctions than those which the constitution has established; they were in me before the constitution was made; I have never drawn any distinction except between honest men and rogues. But upon this principle I repeat that I despise and abhor an informer that has not the courage to sign his accusation. An accuser who acts openly may be the most virtuous of men, that sacrifices himself for the good of his country. Thus Cato made three hundred denunciations in the Roman Senate. But the secret informer or spy is a mean villain that uses his dagger without showing himself, and such men were known at Rome in the time of Tiberius and Sejanus, a time, gentlemen—for I must be frank—which your proceedings too often call to my mind!" He could say no more, for the galleries and all the left side were transported into their most vociferous frenzy, and for some minutes no word was heard except the name of the state prison to which they had just committed M. Frondières. When the uproar subsided, the generous and over-sensitive Guadet formally moved that Calvet should be sent for three days to the Abbaye for having dared to say that the representatives of the French people recalled

* A little later—on the 24th of July—Gensonné presented a project of decree authorising the municipalities (which were all thoroughly Jacobinised long before this) to arrest upon suspicion and to interrogate all such citizens as might be accused of plots; and Brissot read a long pedantic discourse in support of the measure, which was soon adopted, and which filled all the prisons of France with victims who were either butchered by the mobs, or sentenced, with scarcely more form of law, by revolutionary tribunals, to the guillotine.

to his mind the times of Tiberius and Sejanus. "Gentlemen," said Calvet, "if you will hear me, perhaps you will change your opinion." Some thousands of rabid voices shrieked or roared "No! No! To the Abbaye! To the Abbaye!" and, the president putting it to the vote whether they would hear him [or send him to the Abbaye at once, the majority determined that he should go to the Abbaye without a hearing. As soon as this was decided, ex-capuchin Chabot complained that Jaucourt, another member of the côté droit and one of the five new members of the Committee of Research, had threatened to cudgel him. One of Chabot's confrères hereupon demanded that Jaucourt should be sent to the Abbaye to join his two colleagues. Jaucourt begged to say that what had passed had been in a private conversation; that he had been whispering in Chabot's ear confidentially, and not addressing him as a representative of the nation; that Chabot, talking in the same private confidential manner, had made use of two or three equivocal expressions, and that thereupon he had replied that he would "Stop," cried deputy Reboul, "I demand that the order of the day put an end to this scandalous scene, which M. Chabot might very well have spared us." "I might, indeed, have spared you this scene," quoth Chabot in his old conventual tone, "but I thought it very cowardly for a colonel of dragoons like Jaucourt to propose cudgelling to a capuchin like me." The august Assembly then passed to the order of the day, and with very little discussion, and without any opposition—which it appeared was only to be made at the risk of being sent to the Abbaye—they launched their decree of accusation against Colonel Brissac, ordering that all his papers should be instantly seized.* Louis XVI. wept like a child when this faithful servant and brave old officer took his leave of him to go to the state prison of Orleans, all the inmates of which were to be massacred by the mob, without even a mob trial, in the bloody month of September. Dragged with the rest from Orleans to Versailles, the old soldier (he was in the sixtieth year of his age, and weakened by imprisonment and mental and bodily sufferings), when assailed by his dastardly assassins, boldly resisted them, and did not fall until they had cut off two of his fingers, split his jaw, and pierced his body with several wounds. Could Guadet forget this death when the Robespierrists, after hunting him like a wild beast, and forcing him to hide in forests and caves, brought him to the scaffold at Bordeaux? Could Vergniaud forget it when he threw away his poison in the Conciergerie, and made up his mind to die with Gensonné and three other friends—Girondists and perfectibilians all—under the guillotine?

At the same time, other persons, struck by decrees of accusation, were hurried off to Orleans; and, as this was attended with a good deal of noise and éclat, and as all informers, whether anonymous or not, had been declared by the Assembly to be the best of patriots, fresh accusations poured in day by day and hour by hour. The Faubourg St. Antoine, and the men of the most patriotic sections, fancying that some opposition might be made to the decree against the king's guard, thought fit to superintend its execution. Armed with muskets or with pikes, they assembled round the Tuileries, shouting and menacing, singing 'Ça Ira,' and dancing 'la Carmagnole.' Mayor Pétion gave them every encouragement, and told the Assembly, in his daily report, that nothing could be more patriotic than their conduct. "The citizens," said he, "made the air re-echo with that famous song which rejoices the hearts of patriots, and makes their enemies tremble. It looked like the picture of the first days of the revolution!" On the evening of the 30th of May, when the king's guard had been dissolved without the least opposition, Faublas Louvet, at the head of an immense deputation from one of the most Jacobinised of the sections, appeared at the bar of the Assembly to congratulate them on what had been done, but also to demand "still stronger measures of surveillance and suppression." "Several of our Catilines," said Louvet, "are departed, or are going to depart, for Orleans, and already their gladiators are dissolved. Nevertheless a great many members of that corrupt body (the king's guard) are scattered through this immense city, where they are uniting with those swarms of conspirators that for some weeks past have been flocking hither from all parts of the kingdom, to await the opportunity of striking some deadly blow." Thus there was no end to these suspicions and fears: the guard was as much an object of dread when cashiered and dispersed, as it was when embodied. The writer of romances fit only for the stews finished his discourse with the threat that the impious race should be swept from the face of the earth—should be exterminated by the sacred sword of liberty. On the 31st of May the Assembly terminated their séance permanente. During its continuance they passed a terrible decree to prevent desertion, treachery, and cowardice in the army; and another decree almost equally terrible against all such persons as should take up their abode in Paris without showing their passports, and declaring, before the sectional committees, their names, conditions, ordinary domiciles, &c. In this last decree every housekeeper and door-porter was bound to declare the name of every stranger that took up his lodging in the house; every housekeeper, innkeeper, letter of lodgings, &c., was forbidden to lodge any person that was not provided with a passport, and that had not conformed with the other regulations.

During all these days, or from the arrival of the news of the disgraceful flight of the troops on the frontier at the beginning of May, down to the dissolution of the king's guard at the end of that month, many significant debates and proceedings had taken place in the great Jacobin Club; and it may be imagined whether the teeming Jacobin press lay unproductive or silent. After Chabot had declared that not only Dillon, who had been massacred, but that all the other generals were rank traitors and conspirators, Robespierre undertook to explain the results which might be expected in future, if the whole army was not put under true sansculotte generals. He also delivered a discourse, and printed it afterwards in his own newspaper, "On the means of making war usefully." In this discourse he said that the idea had often been emphatically announced that the French printing-press would be as terrible an engine as French artillery in prostrating kings and tyrants; yet, under a corrupt administration, no life and activity had been put into this revolutionary press. Why had there not been printed manifestos and short essays to develop the doctrines of the rights of man, and the true principles of democratic liberty? Why had not such papers been translated, under the eye of the French government, into the German language and the Belgic patois? Why had not such translations been distributed, by tens of thousands, among the people and the soldiers of the Austrian army, before the French columns attempted to move into Belgium? This was a monstrous omission. Everybody knew that in Belgium there were three factions: that of the Austrian government; that of the nobility, clergy, and rich bourgeoisie; and that of the common people. The last was the only party which the principles and the interests of the French constitution permitted Frenchmen to protect; and it was certainly the only party from whom they had anything to hope. But what could the sansculottes of Belgium think when they saw the army on the frontiers commanded by the caste of noblesse, the natural enemies of equality, whose chiefs were known to entertain the project of giving the French constitution an aristocratic character, like that of England? What confidence could they have in an army that was subjected to the control of a king and court? They could only believe that the victories of such an army would establish, in their own country, the odious faction of the aristocrats. If the French really wished for victories, and the destruction of kingships and aristocracies, they must thoroughly convert the common people, the popular masses, in the countries which were to be the seat of their wars; they must indoctrinate and revolutionise the standing armies of all the despots; and in working in this sense the French press would be indeed more terrible than French artillery. But before they could carry on the war usefully abroad, there was one general measure that was absolutely indispensable: this was to make war at home upon aristocracy, perfidy, and tyranny! If they struck down the enemies to the people, if they thoroughly worked out the glorious principle of the rights of man within France, they might expect victory and every advantage without, but not otherwise. After warning the people to beware of Lafayette, and of every other commander, Robespierre concluded by saying, "Frenchmen, if you would conquer, be patient, intrepid, cautious, proud, cool, and distrustful!" An unnamed Jacobin announced in the club that Lafayette had effaced some patriotic devices and inscriptions in the barracks of one of his regiments. Ex-capuchin Chabot took up this terrible charge. "This act," said he, "is a national crime; for in our manifesto we declare 'war to tyrants and peace to cottages,' and it is therefore infringing a decree to prevent soldiers from sticking up that device wherever they may go." Camille Desmoulins said that Lafayette had committed so many great crimes, that it would be ridiculous to make an act like this the sole subject of a denunciation. He was interrupted by loud murmurs, for the Jacobins dearly loved denunciations against Lafayette. "Gentlemen," said Camille, with happy promptitude, "permit me to explain my idea. To charge Lafayette with this offence, would be like accusing a parricide of having stolen a penny!" The club determined that the letter denouncing the fact imputed to Lafayette should be submitted to their committee of research and surveillance, and that all the patriot journalists should be invited to print it in their newspapers. Tallien brought a terrible accusation against citizen minister Roland. He told the club that that Girondist in place was sending, under his official covers, the printed discourses of Brissot to the Paris sections and to the departments. This, he said, was contrary to those measures of peace and reconciliation which had been proposed by Pétion; and he demanded that M. Roland should be invited to circulate and enclose in his ministerial packets, Robespierre's answers to Brissot. Robespierre opposed this motion as illusory and useless. The Abbé d'Anjou, who, like many other abbés, was a member of the club, proposed what he called 'an emetic,' which was to be applied in case the king should desert his post, or again attempt to fly: it was to pronounce the extinction of the reigning dynasty, and to call to the throne an English prince, one of the sons of George III. Incredible and insane as a part of this notion may appear, there were certainly men in France mad enough to entertain it for a moment. Robespierre fell upon the poor abbé, calling him a maniac and a Feuillant, and demanding his instant expulsion from the club; but Bazire and Chabot, for some private reasons, defended the abbé, or at least pleaded in mitigation of punishment, and he was let off with a reprimand. Ex-marquis St. Huruge announced that there were no fewer than fifty aristocratic societies in the capital, who had the audacity to affiliate and correspond with one another. "Gentlemen," said he, "you feel how dangerous this is to public tranquillity. I demand, in consequence, permission to go with all the strong market-porters to the places of their meeting, in order to interrupt their discussions with scourges." The president thought this proposition scarcely admissible, and censured St. Huruge for addressing himself to the galleries, rather than to the chair or the society. Robespierre and his friends discovered that, though their power in the mother society was well assured, the Girondists, by means of their ministerial faculty of giving places and dispensing public money, were gaining ground upon them in some of the affiliated clubs in the departments, and even in the corresponding committees in the capital. Robespierre instantly acted with a boldness and decision of which the Girondists were never capable. He rose in the club, exposed the system, and called for a suspension of the affiliation and correspondence with the provincial societies. He told the committee of correspondence that they had sold themselves to Brissot and his party—that nearly every one of their members had received ministerial favours; and, though he told them this and more to their faces, not one of those committee-men durst rise to contradict him. “When,” said he, “I see men adhere to this society, without deriving any other fruit than calumny and persecution, I can conceive that those men only think of the public good; but, when I see members of our committees suddenly obtaining lucrative employments, I can only consider such Jacobins as ambitious men that are betraying liberty and the people. What has happened in our own bosom? Of the members composing our committee of correspondence there are scarcely six but have sought and obtained government places! Paid patriotism is to me always suspect.” The Girondists had mustered in full force, and an obstinate opposition was made to the great Jacobin dictator; but it was all in vain, and his proposition was voted by the immense majority of the club, who had obtained no places or profits, and who very cordially hated those who had. The club took into consideration the readiest and best methods of disposing of the refractory or unsworn priests, bitterly condemning the Assembly for being so dilatory, so treacherous, or so soft-hearted. If the guillotine was not to be set a-going, where was the use of the learned doctor’s invention, and of the Assembly’s decree? Legendre, who had been a sailor, and who was now a butcher, and a maker of émeutes by profession—the sworn friend, and at times the host, of Marat—made use of some of his maritime information to recommend an expeditious method of getting rid of the pestiferous priests. He said there existed at Brest certain broad, flat-bottomed boats, used for cleaning the port, and which, when filled with filth, floated out of themselves to the roadstead, and there discharged their foul cargoes. “Only load these boats with priests,” said he, “altering the machinery so that they may be sunk, not in the roadstead, but far out at sea.” Thus there was little originality in the plan which was shortly afterwards adopted of drowning priests and others in flat-bottomed boats on the Rhône and the Loire. Robespierre concluded his labours for the present month of May by publishing in his paper an essay ‘On the principal Causes of the Misfortunes of our Revolution.’ No longer preserving any measures with the Girondists, he told the French people that that corrupt, vacillating, incompetent party was now the greatest curse of France; and, that there might be no possibility of mistake as to the worst individuals in this execrable party, he named Brissot, Condorcet, Guadet, Vergniaud, Gensonné, and the rest. He traced the history of their public conduct; he examined facts, and he derived from these facts three great conclusions:—1. That, as members of the legislative body, these Girondists had violated the rights of the nation, and powerfully laboured to put liberty in jeopardy; 2. That they had employed pernicious manœuvres to deprave the public mind, and turn it back to principles of despotism and aristocracy; 3. That they had done everything in their power to corrupt the clubs and patriotic societies, in order to turn those excellent channels of public instruction into instruments of intrigue and faction. He declared that the Girondists had done more injury to the revolution, and the real cause of the people, than all the royalists put together,—that Brissot and Condorcet were far worse men than Abbé Maury and Cazalés; and the Girondists were soon to find that the people adopted the same opinion.

On the 4th of June, or only five days after the dissolution of the king’s guard, which, having been done on the sole authority of the Assembly, had brought the prerogative and the veto into complete contempt, Servan, the new war-minister, who acted heart and hand with Roland and the thorough Girondists, presented a plan to the Assembly for forming a camp of 20,000 men under the walls of the capital. These men were to be chosen among the warmest patriots in the departments; and with such a force Servan calculated that the most jealous and apprehensive of the friends of liberty might sleep quietly in their beds. He alluded to the first festival of federation, which had done great things for liberty, when in its infancy; he reminded them that a law had been passed by which the national guards were to assemble on the 14th of July of every year to renew the civic oath. And why should they not recommend every canton in the kingdom to send up to the Champ de Mars, on the 14th of July next, five federates dressed and equipped, to remain at Paris after the fête, and to form a camp a little to the north of the capital? Five federates per canton would give a total of 20,000, or thereabout; and these warm patriots from every part of France would be the very force on which the friends of liberty could rely. While these federates guarded the capital, the national volunteers and the troops of the line might all march to the frontiers. The plan was received with enthusiastic applause: the Jacobins joined the Girondists in recommending its immediate adoption. Merlin demanded that the Assembly should instantly decree this new federation, and submit the details of it to the military committee. On the 6th of June, when the committee presented their report, which adopted in toto Servan’s propositions, several of the côté droit offered a strong opposition. Lemontey said that this federated corps would become infinitely dangerous; that, joining with the Paris mob and the men of the faubourgs, they would oppress all manner of citizens. Calvet said that the real object of this federated camp was to overawe and subjugate all those battalions of the Paris national guards that wished the revolution to go no farther, and that were the only defenders of law and order, and of the constitution as now established. Daverhoul declared that the plan was contrary to every military notion; and Ramond said that, if there was to be such a federation, it ought to assemble, not at Paris, but on the frontier. But Jean Debrie, or Debry, and others of the ultra-Jacobins said that there was more danger in the capital than on the frontiers; that Paris contained 40,000 conspirators, who must be watched and kept down by the true sons of liberty from the departments. The Girondists used similar arguments; and, after some insignificant alterations made by Vergniaud, the decree was passed, and the 20,000 federates were called up from the provinces.

At this critical moment Antoine Français, a member of the Assembly, and a native of Nantes, where, before the revolution, he had exercised the double calling of lawyer and officer of customs, a thrifty, shifty man, who was now a hot republican, but who, like so many others, became an imperialist under Napoleon, and a royalist under the restored Bourbons, announced that the great Dr. Priestley had confided his son William to his care, in order that he might make a good Frenchman, or citizen of the world and republican, of him. Priestley himself, in a farewell address which he, or his friends, took care to print, said to his son, "Go and live among a brave and hospitable people! Go and learn from them to detest tyranny, and to love liberty!" Français of Nantes, after reading a long eulogium on the science and exalted liberalism of the English father, demanded letters of naturalization for the son. Lacépède, the naturalist, who had acquired fame, before the revolution began, by a treatise upon reptiles, seconded the motion; and the letters of naturalization were granted unanimously. This being done, William Priestley presented himself at the bar of the Assembly to express his gratitude for that national adoption which had admitted him into the number of free French citizens, &c.

As soon as the decree calling up the 20,000 federates was passed, some of the most sansculotte sections, including the Faubourg St. Antoine, sent deputations to congratulate the Assembly on that patriotic measure; but other sections, whose politics were of a different colour, petitioned against the decree—some of them going so far as to say that war-minister Servan ought to be impeached for having proposed it. Servan, who had not entered the council to play the part of an automaton, like de Grave, had presented his plan to the Assembly not merely without the king's permission, but even without consulting Dumouriez, who was certainly the only man that had kept this sansculotte ministry together. But, if Servan had kept the whole matter a profound secret from Dumouriez and from Duranthon, it had certainly been no secret to Roland and Clavières, and the other thorough citizen or republican ministers; and the plan appears to have been originally concocted in Roland's dinner-giving house, between Madame, Servan, and le beau Barbaroux, who was eternally talking about the excellent spirit of the departments, and especially of the republican energy of his countrymen of the south. As soon as the secret became known to Dumouriez, and to all the world, by the war-minister's submitting his plan to the Assembly, Dumouriez asked Servan whether he had ever received any orders from the king on this subject—whether he had ever consulted his colleagues in council upon an affair which must be productive of the most serious consequences? Servan acknowledged that he had not; and then endeavoured to show that it was in his quality of a private individual and citizen that he had submitted to the Assembly a plan which he thought was very necessary and might be very useful. Dumouriez asked why, then, he had annexed to his signature his official title of minister of war? Not knowing what to answer, Servan fell into a passion; and the minister at war and the minister for foreign affairs became so furious in the council chamber, that Dumouriez himself says that but for the presence of the king blood would have been spilt between them. Roland and Clavières, who had been for some time striving to drive Dumouriez from his post, seem scarcely to have been sensible of any impropriety in Servan's strange proceeding. Clavières proposed a perfidious accommodation, which was that Servan should withdraw his motion and his plan, which, at the time of this violent scene, was not yet decreed. Dumouriez says he perceived the atrocity of this snare, which would have thrown a fresh odium upon the king, and have rendered the Assembly still more eager to adopt Servan's proposition. As the Assembly had received the plan with transports, and had submitted it to their military committee, it could hardly have been possible for Servan or any one else to withdraw it and undo its effects. Dumouriez strongly advised the king not only not to sanction any attempt to withdraw the project, but also not to think of opposing his veto to it when it was passed by the Assembly. Louis, however, seemed resolved to exercise his veto on this occasion, although, as Dumouriez himself says, he made him perceive that, destitute as he was of any force, exposed to the violent suspicions of the greater part of the nation, to the rage of the Jacobins, and to the deep policy of the republican party, he must be left without any resource or help; and that the republicans, in reality, were only waiting for such a step on his side to declare open war against him. The perplexed Louis kept the decree in his closet after it was sent up to him for his sanction by the Assembly; and four councils were held without its being produced for deliberation. The Assembly, backed by the clamours of the entire Jacobin party, became very urgent for an answer; and at length the king presented the decree to his ministers in council, to take their opinions upon it. Dumouriez, who, as eldest member of the council, spoke first, declared, sans phrases, that those who had proposed this decree were equally the enemies of their country and of their king—that their measure could produce nothing but mischief—that the minister at war was very culpable in having solicited an assemblage of 20,000 men in the immediate neighbourhood of Paris, at a time when the frontiers were not well defended, and when there was not money enough to pay the troops already in arms; that in the present temper of the nation this minister had also been exceedingly imprudent in proposing the reunion of an undisciplined multitude in the immediate neighbourhood of the National Assembly and the king, &c. After mentioning the two parties of Girondists and Feuillants, Dumouriez said there was a third party, which, though at present playing only a subordinate part, would soon annihilate the two others; because the Jacobins were not only the most active and turbulent, but by far the most numerous, because their branches extended throughout the kingdom, and because, in short, out of these 20,000 federates whom Servan would bring to Paris, 19,000, at least, would be Jacobins. “Thus the promoters of this decree will be ruined and destroyed by it,” said Dumouriez, looking at his brother-ministers, Servan, Clavières, and Roland, who, in their eagerness to find a short road to a republic, had found for themselves the shortest road to the guillotine. Dumouriez, however, added that, since the decree had been passed, there was no resisting it by the veto. “It has been provoked,” said he, “by profound malice, it has been debated with great bitterness, it has been carried with enthusiasm, and all France is now blinded and enchanted by it. In spite of your veto, that measure will be carried into effect. Instead of 20,000 men assembled by virtue of a decree, and who may consequently be subjected to some regulations, 40,000 men will arrive from the provinces, and these men may overturn the constitution, the throne, and the Assembly itself.” The three republican ministers, and more especially Servan, were terrified at this prediction, and they communicated their fears to the whole Gironde party, but it was too late to retract: they had run their necks into a noose like fools, and, after some brief vicissitudes of failure and triumph, like fools they must perish. The king, pressed equally by all his ministers to sign the decree, said he would take a few days to consider the matter: and there appears to be no doubt but that he would have signed it if the Assembly had not precipitated upon him another decree, which his religious conscience could not brook. In the course of this very week they presented to him the terrible law they had passed awarding transportation or imprisonment to all priests who had refused to take the serment civique. “This prince,” says Dumouriez, “was not only scrupulous, but courageous, when religion was concerned:” he laid the decree upon the council-table, and declared that nobody should ever prevail upon him to sanction it. Many good arguments were made use of by Dumouriez to convince him that it would be far better for all parties to sign the decree than to put his veto upon it; and Dumouriez told him that, far from saving the priests by his veto, he would expose them to the danger of being massacred, and the French people to the guilt and disgrace of being their murderers. Dumouriez knew the character and the temper of his own countrymen, and nothing could be clearer than his prediction of the atrocities of September. Still Louis said he could not authorise a decree which would send conscientious men and ministers of his religion to perish in the pestilential regions of French Guiana. Dumouriez, who had had frequent opportunities to marvel at his patience, placidity, and seeming impassiveness, says that this was the only day on which he ever saw the temper of “this pure and mild monarch” a little soured. To complete the king’s chagrin, Roland obstinately persisted in reading a long letter at the council table which he had addressed some two or three days before to his majesty. This precious piece of political pedantry and republican insolence was written, not by citizen Roland, but by the citizeness his wife, who was in the habit of drawing up nearly all his plans and writing nearly all his papers, and who magnanimously declares in her Memoirs that for her husband she could even have condescended to write homilies and sermons! Madame Roland not only wrote the letter, but forced her husband to present it in his own name, after Servan and Clavières had refused to have anything to do with it, and after Duranthon had told her that the tone of her letter would provoke the king to upset the Gironde ministry. This Girondist lecture to royalty, like nearly all the productions of that school, is long and tediously verbose: it has been printed in many places, and may be found entire in the book of M. Thiers, who calls it “that famous letter;” but the substance of it was that, through various iniquitous means, the constitution had got lamed, and could not march; that the king had been guilty of perjury, &c.; and that nothing could make the constitution go except the rigorous execution of the new decree against the priests, and the immediate assembling of the patriotic camp of 20,000 men. After telling the king that it was vain for him to think of drawing back or of temporizing, this amiable republicaness, who soon saw blood enough, and whose own veins soon went to swell the red torrent, said in this letter which her husband read to the king’s face:—“The revolution is in the minds of the people; it must be purchased at the price of blood, and be cemented by blood, if wisdom does not prevent it by adopting measures which are still possible!” “Monsieur Roland,” said Louis, “it is now three days since you transmitted a copy of this letter to me: it was, therefore, useless to read it to me before my council, and, besides, you told me it was to remain an eternal secret between you and me." The king then withdrew. On the next morning he summoned Dumouriez to his closet in the Tuileries. The queen was with him, and spoke for him, as she usually did when anything energetic was to be said or done. "Do you think," said she, "that the king ought any longer to endure the insolence and threats of Roland, and the impostures of Servan and Clavières?" Dumouriez, who as eagerly wished to be rid of them as they wished to be quit of him, said that their insolence filled him with indignation, and was not to be borne; that the king had better change the whole administration at once. "No," said Louis, "I wish that you, Lacoste, and Duranthon should remain; but ease me of those other three factious and insolent men, for my patience is completely exhausted!" Dumouriez said that, though the thing was dangerous, he would attempt it upon certain conditions, the chief of which was that the king should instantly sanction the two decrees. It appears that the king thought most about the priests, and the queen most about the federated camp. "Think, Sir," said she, "how hard it is for the king to sanction a decree which will bring 20,000 rogues to Paris, perhaps to massacre him!" Dumouriez, who was about equally quick and dexterous with sword, pen, or tongue, reasoned so well that the queen's doubts were almost removed, and the king all but determined to sanction this decree upon the understanding and condition that Dumouriez would take the war-office into his own hands, and appoint proper generals to take the command of the 20,000 federates. But when they came to discuss the priests' decree, though the queen seconded him, Dumouriez found he could make no impression on the king. "Sire," said he, "if you do not sanction this decree, you will put the knife to the throat of these unhappy priests!" The queen said that Dumouriez was right. Louis was dreadfully agitated; and, assailed and pressed both by his wife and his minister, he seemed for a moment to waver. Another council was held that very night, at which Roland, Servan, and Clavières were more insolent than ever: they roughly pressed the king either to give or to refuse his sanction, threatening, in the latter case, to resign instantly. Louis very soon dissolved this council, but he did it with temper and dignity. In the course of the same night he wrote a note to Dumouriez, intreating him to propose three new ministers. This adventurous man, whose real eagerness to retain power oftentimes made him overleap himself, hurried the next morning to the palace, and proposed that Roland should be replaced as minister of the home department by Morgues, a protestant of Montpellier; that Maulde, who belonged to no party, should be made minister for foreign affairs; and that the finance department should be intrusted to Vergennes, nephew to the former minister of that name. Though not very partial to protestants, who for the most part had been very enthusiastic revolutionists, Louis agreed to accept Morgues; but for the office of foreign affairs, he preferred Naillac to Maulde. Dumouriez himself doubted whether Vergennes would encounter the perils of office; and, when the king sent for that gentleman, he with tears in his eyes begged to be excused. Several other moderate and considerate men, who well knew that the dangers were greater, and the risks more terrible, than those of shipwreck, war, or pestilence, declined in the same manner, with protestations of the greatest respect and attachment to Louis. As a finance minister could not be found, it was at length agreed that Morgues, the minister of the home department, should, pro tempore, take charge of the finances. It is quite certain that the Girondists were not taken by surprise: nothing could be kept secret in the palace; and, within six hours after Roland had read his wife's letter to the king, it was whispered all over Paris that Dumouriez had changed sides, and that more than twenty Feuillants had waited at his door to solicit office under him. On the morning of the 13th of June, Roland, Clavières, and Servan received their official dismissal, and with a bitterness and violence of feeling which little became philosophers of such high pretension. Madame was of opinion that that "rogue and hypocrite" Duranthon had co-operated with Dumouriez in betraying her husband. It was by her advice that her good man, who never did anything without her, wrote a letter to the Assembly, and basely enclosed in it the letter to the king which he had solemnly declared should never be known except to Louis and himself. In his own letter Roland made a pompous display about the pure patriotism which alone could have induced him ever to accept office in such stormy times; he declared that his hope of success had been founded on the belief that there was a conformity of principles in all the members of the cabinet; that he had done everything it was possible to do, and yet had been dismissed; that he retired with an approving conscience, and tranquilly leaning upon it for support, &c. This was nothing: it was the letter which his wife had written for him to the king, which the Assembly heard read with enthusiastic applause, and which they forthwith ordered to be printed and sent to the eighty-three departments, that contained the poison and the dagger. The menaces and sinister prophecies it contained insured in a manner their own fulfilment; and his telling the king all that he had to fear from the people was, indeed, suggesting to the people all that they had to do against the king.* Servan and Clavières informed the Assembly, at the same time as Roland, that they had been abruptly dismissed only on account of their patriotism. The Assembly decreed that they all three carried with them the regrets of the nation. While this was doing, Dumouriez, as the war-minister, entered the House, and, as soon as he was able, he boldly presented himself at the bar amidst the murmurs and hootings of the Girondists and Jacobins. He read a dispatch from Lafayette, dated from his intrenched camp at Maubeuge, and giving an account of some skirmishes of the pettiest description, in which he claimed the advantage. After reading this despatch, Dumouriez read a long memorial, which he had hastily drawn up, on the state of the war department, and on the best mode of conducting hostilities. In this paper he spared neither the ex-war-minister Servan nor the Assembly itself; and he resolutely set himself against any sudden arming of the popular masses, which he thought might bring anarchy upon France, without securing her victory on the frontiers. He told them that the levies of troops which had already been ordered were enormous in number, and that no sufficient care had been taken to provide them with proper arms and equipments and a sure and regular pay. He reproached the Assembly for having, in the course of a single fortnight, voted the levy of 240,000 men, but in such a manner that it was found impossible to execute their decree. He terminated his memorial, as he had begun it, with sharp strictures on the prevailing factions, which made it almost impossible for any ministry to act with effect and consistency; and bold and bitter were the remarks he made upon the spirit of insubordination and mutiny which existed not merely in the army, but everywhere else, and which was not so much the fault of the soldiers as of their superiors, and of the Assembly itself. We need not say that he was frequently interrupted—the marvel is how he should ever have been able to read all that long lecture to such impatient, peppery men, who had the gods and the thunders of the galleries on their side. At one point orator Guadet cried out, “Only hear him! he is giving us lessons!” “And why not?” said Dumouriez, with perfect coolness. As soon as he had finished reading it, he folded up his paper as if to be gone. “He is running away with it,” cried several voices. “No, he is not,” said the cool little man, laying the paper upon the table, and putting his signature to it in perfect composure. He then made his bow, and traversed the Hall with the same calm air with which he would have performed any manœuvre in the field. A number of deputies cried out to him, “You will be sent to Orleans.” “So much the better,” responded Dumouriez, who was as witty as he was brave; “I shall take the mineral baths there, and the milk diet, of which I stand in need, and I shall rest myself!” Any trepidation or hesitation, almost any other line of conduct than that which he followed, and the adroit, spirited little man must assuredly have been sent to that terrible state prison, to which commitments were quite as arbitrary as ever commitments to the Bastille had been. In the course of the preceding evening the Girondists and Jacobins had repeatedly menaced him in the Assembly with that High National Court, whose business was all to be done beforehand by the sanguinary Septembrizers. It is impossible to convey in a few words and extracts an adequate notion of the fury and spite of the gentle, philosophical, perfectibilian Gironde. On first accepting office Dumouriez had insisted that a sum of money, which sounds very large in French—six millions of livres—should be placed at his disposal for secret services, and for other things for which no provision had been made. He asserts that this affair had been regularly and minutely debated in presence of all the Girondists, who concurred in it—only attempting to play him a trick which might have left him at their mercy, if he had not discovered it in time; and Madame Roland herself admits that the Gironde ministers had agreed that the money should be placed at Dumouriez’s disposal. Dumouriez adds that he had offended the Girondists by depositing the six millions in the hands of M. Amelot, the keeper of the national treasury, instead of placing it in the bank of Bidermann, as Pétion and Clavières warmly recommended him to do. Bidermann, he says, was a zealous revolutionist, and actually in partnership with his compatriot finance minister Clavières. They now accused him of lavishing this money on his creatures, his mistress, and his personal extravagancies. Dumouriez smartly replied that the far greater part of the money was still untouched; and that what had been spent had been chiefly paid to the virtuous Roland, who published, or caused to be written in his own house, several republican newspapers, whose main drift had all along been to cry down the king, Dumouriez himself, Lacoste, and Duranthon. Brissot, who was even more considerable as a journalist than as a deputy of the Assembly, and who fancied he could journalize Dumouriez to death, or to the prison of Orleans, which signified the same thing, kept up the attack in his ‘Patriote Français,’ and, not satisfied with exposing the personal immorality of Dumouriez, who, like so many other married men, lived with another man’s wife, he brought forward his mistress, Madame Beauvert, who was sister to the ex-count Rivarol, a man of letters, who, at the beginning of the revolution, had associated himself with Peltier, the noted royalist journalist, and who, like all that class of writers, was supposed to be in the pay of the court. “This Madame Beauvert,” says the Roland, “sister of Rivarol, who enjoyed so bad a reputation, was constantly surrounded by the creatures of the aristocracy.” Rivarol, who was a man of wit, and who must have known how Brissot and other journalists had been paid in the happy days of the Gironde ministry, made no secret of his connexion with the aristocracy, though afterwards he was accustomed to change the point of a fine phrase of Mirabeau, and to say that, though he had sold himself to the court, he had never been paid.* As for the reputation of his sister, Rivarol was not that rare Frenchman who would have felt any concern about it. Dumouriez, however, was sensibly piqued; and when Brissot proceeded to declare in print that Madame de Beauvert had had a large part of the secret-service money, Dumouriez placarded the streets of Paris with a printed affiche, in which he clearly gave the people to understand that Brissot and his friends were only complaining because they had not been able to devour the whole of that secret fund; and in which, moreover, he intimated that in a very short time he would publish a list of the dividends, with the proper names of those who had received the money. Brissot, who could scarcely have been so absurd as to take any of this secret-service money in his own name, defied Dumouriez to produce any proof against him. There the matter remained. "It is quite clear," said an ultra-Jacobin journalist, "that each party dreads the disclosures that might be made by the other."* The members

* The day after Dumouriez's visit to the Assembly there was a terrific fracas there. Jounneau, a member of the côté droit and an ex-lieutenant of gendarmerie, had repeatedly quarrelled in the Assembly and in committees with Grangeneuve, a Girondist member, and lately a lawyer in Bordeaux. The French were the most duet-fighting people in Europe; but since the revolution the practice seemed almost to have gone out, in part, probably, because on one occasion, when a royalist deputy went out with a revolutionary one and wounded his man, the Paris mob broke open his house, and destroyed everything in it, and would have destroyed him if they had been able to catch him at the moment. The coarse, hard words which the deputies gave one another, and the imputations of liar and scoundrel which so many of them bore day after day without any appeal to arms, must excite some surprise. Jounneau, who had been battered by Grangeneuve, invited him to a meeting in the Bois de Boulogne, and, that the arms might be more equal, he proposed to the lawyer that they should fight with pistols, weapons rarely used at this time in France. Grangeneuve said he would rather meet him in the Assembly, which was the proper place for orators to fight in. Jounneau called him a coward, upon which Grangeneuve called him a coarser name. The ex-officer of gendarmerie thereupon gave the ex-advocate a slap on the face in the French manner. Grangeneuve (the scene of this conflict was on the terrace of the Feuillants outside the Tuileries) picked up a big stone, threw it at the head of Jounneau, but missed him. Jounneau then fell upon him with his cane, and was eaning him and kicking him soundly, when a crowd of patriots, headed by ex-marquis St. Huruge and le beau Barbaroux, fell upon him, and were almost killing him when Calvet, the constitutionalist, and some of the respectabilities of the national guard, rushed to his rescue. This decent scene, enacted almost at the door of the Assembly, took place in the dusk of the evening, so that some slight contradictions were to be expected in the reports of the eye-witnesses. But the spirit of party made a greater darkness and confusion than could have proceeded merely from the uncertain twilight. Orator Gaudet, on the morning of the 15th of June, informed the Assembly that Jounneau had attempted to assassinate Grangeneuve. Jacobins and Girondists uniting, the Assembly appointed a deputation to wait upon Grangeneuve, and take his deposition at his own bedside. Grangeneuve made out a good case for himself, and named, as honourable witnesses that could verify his deposition, St. Huruge, Barbaroux, two other hot Jacobins, and a Madame Daigremont, wife of the upholsterer to the Assembly. The deputies immediately called in these witnesses. St. Huruge, who had the voice of a bull and almost the strength of that quadruped, said he was sitting quietly in a coffee-house hard by, "with several good patriots like himself," when he heard some one crying out murder; that thereupon he flew to the spot, and found that it was M. Grangeneuve, to whom M. Jounneau had just been giving a hundred kicks and a hundred blows with a cane; and that Jounneau had, in his presence, given a hundred more blows with his cane to M. Grangeneuve. Barbaroux, the upholsterer's wife, and the two other witnesses, deposed that they had seen Jounneau cruelly beat Grangeneuve, &c.; and that they had carried Grangeneuve in their arms to his lodging, where he lay senseless for three-quarters of an hour. But Jounneau's friends of the côté droit insisted that witnesses ought also to be heard on his side; and these witnesses, consisting entirely of members of the Assembly, deposed that Grangeneuve had repeatedly used most gross and provoking language in the committee; that they had heard him call Jounneau a j. . . f. . . , and seen him provoke that honourable member by menacing attitudes and gestures. As for the actual fight on the terrace, M. Fressel declared that he had seen M. Jounneau knocked down against a railing, and Messrs. Barbaroux and St. Huruge with their fists on his face maltreating him cruelly. M. Sage said that he had seen St. Huruge seizing Jounneau by behind, par derrière, while M. Grangeneuve held him by one of his legs. Calvet said that he had released Jounneau from the grip of St. Huruge, who had his hand at his throat, and who loaded him (Calvet) with terrible abuse, because he would not allow him to strangle Jounneau. M. Cazès deponed that, seeing St. Huruge fighting or struggling with M. Calvet, who was striving to separate Grangeneuve and Jounneau, he said to

of the military committee accused Dumouriez of publishing a severe satire on his predecessor Servan and themselves, because he had denounced in his memorial various abuses and malpractices, and had exposed the deplorable state of the French fortresses, which they had always described to the Assembly as being in admirable condition; and they, also accused him of culpable imprudence, and almost of treason, for discovering the weakness of the armies and garrisons at a time when invasion was daily expected. He excused himself by stating that the greatest danger lay in lulling the nation into a false security; that the enemies of France were already as well acquainted with their weakness as they could be themselves, and that the proof they were not in a condition to profit by it was the fact itself that they had not yet done so—that they had not yet touched the frontier, though invited thither by the shameful and cowardly manner in which the disorganised French troops had begun the war. He said that there was yet time to repair the evil by a wise and methodical application of the resources of France; and it can hardly be denied by his worst enemies that, during the three or four days he managed the war department, he adopted several admirable measures for making the most of the time which the ill-organised, wavering coalition of kings allowed the revolutionists. In the course of these three or four days he wrote, dictated, or signed upwards of fifteen hundred official papers; he laid down good rules for reviving discipline; he marched all regiments in the neighbourhood of Paris to the frontiers; and he exhorted Luckner, who had joined Rochambeau's command to his own, to prepare for the invasion of all Belgium with the utmost vigour. And all this time Dumouriez was in the greatest state of uneasiness and uncertainty. When he returned triumphantly from the Assembly to the Tuileries, the king applauded his boldness, and told him that it had completely disconcerted the Gironde faction; but when he asked the king to sanction the two sus-

him that this was a combat which did not concern him, a dispute between two members of the Assembly, which one of their colleagues was endeavouring to terminate; and that St. Huruge, instead of heeding him, excited the people to an insurrection by shouting out that they were beginning to murder the patriot deputies. The Girondists, however, being backed by the Jacobins, declared that the testimony of mad St. Huruge, beau Barbaroux, and the upholsterer's wife was entitled to more credit than that of the côté droit deputies; and Gaudet, thundering from the tribune, called for signal vengeance on Jounneau, who meant nothing less than to murder the patriot Grangeneuve. The Gironde demanded nothing less than a decree of accusation for a capital crime. The côté droit and other members, not quite so eager for blood, said that at most Jounneau had been guilty of an assault, which might very well be punished by the correctional police. A tremendous uproar ensued, the galleries shouting with the humane Girondists that Jounneau had intended to murder Grangeneuve, and ought to be capitally accused, and tried by the Assembly as guilty of a national crime. The president rang his hand-bell, requested the galleries to be silent, and put on his hat twice. At last, however, it was voted that Jounneau should be committed to the Abbaye for three days, without prejudice to any action at law which Grangeneuve might choose to bring against him before the ordinary tribunals.—Hist. Parlement.

Grangeneuve, who apparently was not so much hurt in the scuffle as Jounneau, was exceedingly anxious to throw upon his political opponents the horrible odium of an assassination. If we are to believe Madame Roland—which we confess we do not, either in this or in several other particulars—Grangeneuve bravely sought death, and afterwards arranged to get himself assassinated in downright earnest, in order to throw the blame on the court, and so hasten the republican Avatar. We shall have to return to this strange story.

pended decrees about the federate camp and the priests, Louis declared, that, though ready to agree to the camp, he was now fully determined to put his veto upon the other decree. Dumouriez said that this would ruin the king and everything, and that in agreeing to take office he had understood the king would sanction both decrees. Louis was immovable: he even said that Dumouriez, or one of his colleagues in the new ministry, must countersign a letter to the president, in which he announced his resolution, and that they must go to the Assembly in a body. "Never," says Dumouriez, "did Louis speak in so imperative a tone before." On the next morning all the new ministers sent in a request to be permitted to resign. In the mean time the Jacobins and the Girondists, and mayor Pétion, were agitating the people of the Faubourg St. Antoine—the mayor and the Girondists, at least, expecting that a well-timed émeute would force the king to recall the virtuous Roland and his colleagues. Dumouriez announced this coming storm to Louis, who seems to have been induced to suspect that the reports about the dreadful faubourg were not quite correct, and that it was Dumouriez who wished to terrify him for his own ends and purposes. He declares that he no longer recognised a single trace of the mild and confiding character of Louis XVI., who said to him, "Do not think, sir, that I am to be terrified by menaces: my resolution is fixed." On the 17th of June the king accepted the resignations of Dumouriez and the friends he had brought into the cabinet, retaining by force of entreaties, or by their desperate love of place, Duranthon and Lacoste. To fill up the vacated posts, Louis had once more recourse to the Feuillants; and he chose from among that party Lagard, Chambonas, and Terrier de Mont-Ciel—men who had scarcely any other recommendation except that of being personal friends of Lafayette and partakers of his views in politics. Dumouriez insinuates that the intrigues of Lafayette and his party had not been idle during these rapid ministerial changes; and there seems abundant proof to show that there was a perfect understanding and active correspondence between the general in his fortified camp at Maubeuge and his party in Paris; and, as for proofs of Lafayette's hatred and jealousy of Dumouriez, they meet us in all directions. On the 18th of June, the very next day after the formation of the new Feuillant ministry, who came into office just in time to witness the horrible insults offered to the king in his own apartments, a letter was presented and read in the Assembly from Lafayette, who, from his fortified camp, threatened the Jacobins and all other factions; and called upon the Assembly, in his own name, and in that of his army, and of all the true friends of liberty, to respect the constitution and the written law. He told them that there was no possibility of bearing any longer the tyranny of clubs and mobs, that had scarcely left the shadow of liberty at Paris or in any other part of France—an indisputable fact, and the inevitable result of the monstrous follies and imbecilities of Lafayette himself, and of those who had begun revolution-making with him. Terrible was the tempest which this letter excited. The writer of it was called a Cromwell, and Dr. Guillotin's invention was invoked for his behoof. Vergniaud mounted the tribune to demonstrate, logically and rhetorically, that no general in the command of an army could possibly be permitted to address the legislative body in such a style; that counsel and advice from such a quarter must be regarded as dictation and menace. Guadet, that other great Girondist (for the Gironde was quite as furious as the ultra-Jacobin section), declared that the letter could hardly have been written by Lafayette, as it spoke of the dismissal of Dumouriez, which could not have been known on the frontiers at the time the letter was dated; that it must be supposed that Lafayette had left his signature in Paris on a blank sheet, and that the paper must have been filled up and presented by a faction; that, when Cromwell had dared to hold such language in England . . . He was interrupted by several voices crying out, "Sir, this is abominable." From the other side of the House he was applauded; and another scene of riot took place. The president, after some vain efforts to be heard, said, "I call the National Assembly to order." Le Josne called the president to order for daring to call the Assembly to order, and was backed by all the Jacobin deputies and the entire forces of the galleries. The president threatened to leave the chair and the hall. He was pacified by the order of the day being carried against a regular motion for calling him to order, and then the tumult subsided. A Jacobin begged Guadet to get on with his discourse, reminding him that he had stopped short at Cromwell. "I was going to say," resumed the Girondist orator, "that, when Cromwell held language like this letter, liberty was lost in England; and I cannot persuade myself that the emulator of Washington is wishing to imitate the conduct of this protector! [Loud applause.] If such be the power of the party that aim at killing liberty in France, that Lafayette might believe himself empowered to write this letter, which I am far from thinking he has done, then I say the Assembly ought to bestow the most solemn consideration on this step. I demand, therefore, that the letter be submitted to our new committee of twelve, in order that the Assembly may avenge M. Lafayette on the coward that has covered himself with his name; and in order that the Assembly may prove to the French people, by a novel and terrible example, that they have not taken a vain oath in swearing to maintain the constitution. . . . For we have no longer a constitution, if a general at the head of an army can dictate laws to us!" Daverhault begged to say that the letter did not speak of the actual dismissal of Dumouriez, but only mentioned it as something that must happen. Dumas attested that the signature at the foot of the letter was certainly Lafayette's. The House decided unanimously that the letter should be sent to the committee of twelve. Even the Feuillants were now convinced that a capital mistake had been committed in sending such a letter to the Assembly at such a time. It hastened on those terrible explosions which had been for some time preparing. Robespierre was in ecstasies at Lafayette's faux pas; and, instantly taking up the pen, he addressed a terrible letter to the general, and published it in his own journal. He called Lafayette traitor, tyrant, and dictator; telling him that he had been more successful in making war upon the liberties of his country, and upon a plain honest citizen like Robespierre, than in fighting the enemies of the French. He accused him of all manner of mean and dastardly intrigues; and, after relating his whole public history in his own way, which was the way best suited to exasperate the people, he concluded his very long epistle by declaring that the Assembly must either destroy Lafayette or be destroyed by him. Brissot, in his journal, preached very nearly to the same text; and Condorcet excused Lafayette of treachery and of enmity to liberty by accusing him of imbecility and a passive submission to the intriguers and traitors into whose hands he had thrown himself. But, if Lafayette's blunder hurried on what was coming, it is quite certain that it would have come a little sooner or later if his letter had never been written. The publication of Roland's letter to the king, which, as Dumouriez says, actually pointed daggers at the breast of that unhappy prince, would have produced some terrible émeute without any other agency, public or secret. But there were secret and most powerful agencies that had been most actively employed ever since the moment that Louis turned out the Girondist ministers; and nothing was more true than the intelligence Dumouriez gave the king, that the Girondists, united with the Jacobins, and aided by mayor Pétion and the municipality, were agitating the Faubourg St. Antoine. Pétion—Virtue Pétion, as he was now styled by the sansculottes, who in little more than a year drove him away to perish by famine or by poison, and to be devoured by wolves—had all the necessary knowledge of persons and places. He called upon the brewer Santerre, the butcher Legendre, the ex-capuchin Chabot, the ex-marquis St. Huruge, and other men of that stamp: he held several meetings with them, and urged them to make a demonstration with their Parisian pikes, which by this time were counted at some thirty or forty thousand.* Pétion even made up matters for the nonce with Robespierre, whose esteem he had lost by identifying himself with the Gironde party; and the immense popular influence of the Incorruptible was added to that of the mayor of Paris. On the 16th of June, two days before Lafayette's letter reached the Assembly, the citizens of the Faubourgs St. Antoine and St. Marcel made a formal demand to the council-general of the commune for permission to meet in arms on the 20th, to draw up and present a petition to the Assembly, and a petition to the king, to plant a Mai, or May-pole, or Tree of Liberty, on the terrace of the Feuillants, and otherwise celebrate the anniversary of the Jeu de Paume. The commune communicated this demand not to the Assembly, but to the mayor; and the mayor did not communicate it to anybody till the 18th. It was then made known to the departmental directory, who took it upon themselves to prohibit any such armed meeting, and to enjoin the commandant of the national guards and mayor Pétion to do all in their power to prevent it. On the 19th the decisions of the departmental directory were reported to the Assembly, where many men not in the secret heard, for the first time, of the storm that had been fully prepared ever since the 16th. But it was not only in the faubourgs and in the sections of Paris that Pétion and the Girondists had been busy: they had concerted measures with Barbaroux, who had repeatedly promised the Jacobin Club to bring up patriots and true republicans from Marseilles and all the south; and, before the report of the department was presented, a numerous deputation of Marseilles citizens, with beau Barbaroux at their head, were admitted to the bar of the Assembly. Barbaroux, who did nothing without consulting Madame Roland, was of course the orator of the deputation; and terrible and sanguinary was the speech he delivered. "French liberty," said he, "is in danger! The free men of the south are ready to march for its defence. The day of the wrath of the people is at length arrived. This people, whom the traitors have always tried to slaughter or enchain, is tired of parrying blows: it will now give blows of its own, and annihilate the conspirators! Legislators! the popular force constitutes your strength. Employ it then, and give no quarter to your enemies, as you have none to expect from them! The French people demand from you a decree authorising them to march with all their imposing forces. Only give the order, and they will march to the capital and to the frontiers. The people are absolutely determined to finish this revolution!" Long and loud were the applauses which hailed Barbaroux. A great many voices demanded in a breath that his discourse should be printed, and sent to the eighty-three departments; and, after a fruitless struggle on the part of those who were terrified at the certain effect of this resolution, it was agreed to by the Assembly. A deputation from the Jacobin Club of Aix presented some patriotic gifts; and then, late in the evening of the 19th, the letter of the departmental directory was presented. The leading Girondists joined the Jacobins in insisting that this letter ought not to be read, and in calling for the order of the day. Becquey, who understood what this meant, said that to-morrow was going to be a stormy day, and that surely the Assembly ought to read the letter, and take measures of precaution. Vergniaud, beginning with a lie, said he did not know that there was to be a storm to-morrow; and that it would be very unconstitutional for the Assembly to occupy itself about mere measures of police. In order, however, to stop a discussion which might possibly have led to the disclosure of startling facts, the Girondists and Jacobins withdrew their opposition, and the letter was read; but then, instead of deliberating upon it, or of taking any measures to avert the tempest which was to burst within a very few hours, the Assembly passed to the order of the day. Surely this conduct justified Chabot in saying to the mobs of the faubourgs, "The National Assembly expects you to-morrow morning, and with open arms." That night a grand conciliabulum was held in the Faubourg St. Antoine, at brewer Santerre's. It began about midnight; and Pétion, Robespierre, Manuel, Alexandre, commandant of one of the Parisian battalions, and Sillery, the husband of the Genlis, and the creature of Orleans, were present at it. The meeting was also attended by a number of desperate Jacobins, whom Santerre had called in from the neighbouring towns and villages. Some of the pikemen were uneasy at the orders issued by the departmental directory, and thought it would be better to meet in the morning without arms, as the national guards of the more opulent sections of Paris might possibly fire upon them, and make a worse slaughter than that of the black Sunday in the Champ de Mars; but Santerre assured them that the national guards could not fire without an order from the municipality, that no such order would be given, and that mayor Pétion would be there to see that all went well for the patriots. In the course of the night Pétion sent a letter to the departmental directory, proposing what he called "a means at once simple, legal, and analogous to circumstances," which was, that the directory should order the national guards to receive the pike-armed citizens of the faubourgs into their ranks on the morrow, and authorise all such as chose to march to do so. The departmental authorities rejected this strange, bold proposition as dangerous, and as contrary to the official oath they had taken to preserve tranquillity and execute the laws; and for this answer Pétion afterwards threw all the blame upon them.* He pretends that he doubled the guards at the Tuileries; but, if he adopted any such measure, he must have taken good care that the national guardsmen sent thither would be thoroughly sansculottic, and such as should offer no opposition to the sovereign mob he had set in motion. As soon as day dawned this mob began to assemble in the Faubourgs St. Antoine and St. Marcel to beat of drum. About eight o'clock they began to form themselves into marching columns; but it was not until nearly eleven o'clock that brewer Santerre, at the head of a strong detachment of invalids and other old soldiers, joined them, that they began their march towards the

Tuileries. Nothing could be more terribly clear than their emblems and devices. Their standard, par excellence, was a pair of old black silk breeches extended on a tall cross-staff, with these words underneath:—"Tremble, tyrants! the sansculottes are coming!" On another tall staff they carried a bullock's heart, pierced through with the steel head of a pike, and having inscribed beneath—"Aristocrat's heart." Women and children marched in column with the men; and all were armed with pikes and iron-shod clubs. From the pike-heads streamed tricolor ribands; and banners were distributed along the line of march, with inscriptions like these:—"Without breeches, but free;" "Down with the veto;" "Long live liberty;" "Death to all tyrants;" "Advice to Louis XVI.;" "When the country is in danger, all sansculottes rise;" "The people are tired of suffering, and will have an entire liberty or death;" "We only want union, liberty, and equality;" &c. Santerre, who directed all the movements, who was the real general of this sansculotte army, had taken care to flank the Mai, or tree of liberty, with two or three loaded cannon, which were dragged along by nervous arms. Before they reached the Assembly, which they were to visit before visiting the palace, Rœderer, the procureur syndic of the department, announced to that august body that an extraordinary number of armed citizens, contrary to law, and in spite of divers injunctions, were coming to present petitions, and to make an émeute, under the pretence of celebrating the anniversary of the Jeu de Paume. He implored the deputies not to admit them; but to execute the law, which prohibited a greater number than twenty citizens from presenting petitions, &c. "It is true," said he, "that these armed citizens come hither to-day for a civic object; but to-morrow other men may come for a different object, and then what will you have to say to them?" All the côté droit who had courage enough to express their opinion declared that the Assembly ought not to admit this armed multitude; but the Jacobins and the Girondists, with louder and bolder voices, declared that the citizens, who only wanted to present a petition, ought to be received by the representatives of the people with civility, respect, and a welcome. Vergniaud, "the most eloquent orator of the Assembly, whose soul was devoured with the love of the public good," mounted to the speaking-place, and told the Assembly that these were not times to be too particular; that they had already received petitioners, and in great numbers; and that they must receive them again, or worse would follow. Dumolard said that everybody knew that that shameful abuse had been established, but that it was now time to put an end to it, if they did not wish the Assembly and the king to appear equally, in the eyes of all Europe, the merest slaves of an insolent mob. But, while he was speaking, the lumbering of cannon, the roll of drums, and the shouts and shrieks, and shrill cries of men, women, and children, announced that the faubourg columns had arrived in the square outside the Salle de Manège, and a letter was handed in from Santerre to the president. This letter, which was read with that promptness which was demanded by any missive from such a quarter, stated briefly that the patriots of the faubourgs merely wanted to be admitted to the bar, in order to confound their calumniators, and prove themselves still the men of the 14th of July, 1789. Vergniaud said that any opposition would only renew the bloody scenes of the Champ de Mars. "And surely," added he, "there is nothing reprehensible in the sentiments of these petitioners. They are very properly uneasy about the future; and they only want to prove to us that, notwithstanding all the intrigues against liberty, they are ever ready to defend it!" Somebody else said that the petitioners were only eight thousand in number. "But," said Calvet, "we are only seven hundred and forty-five! Let us retire!" Calvet was rudely called to order, as if such a word could be pronounced on such an occasion; and several members accused him of insulting the people, who meant no harm to the Assembly, and who would assuredly never touch a hair of their heads. Ramond attempted to speak, but he was told that eight thousand citizens were kept waiting. In the midst of this idle debate—most idle and absurd in every respect, for, if they had wished it, the Assembly could not have kept out the pikes and the clubs, the bullock's heart and the black breeches—the impatient mob rushed into the hall, and filled it almost to suffocation. Then Guadet made a speech, not merely to excuse, but to justify their coming, and to propose that they should be permitted to defile, with their arms and banners, before the Assembly. Crowding into some order, the head of the columns came up to the bar; and then Santerre, with a naked sword in his hand, being flanked by St. Huruge, who held another drawn sabre, delivered an oration in his loudest voice. "Legislators!" said the sonorous and triumphant brewer, reading from a written paper in his hand, "the French people come to acquaint you with their fears and inquietudes. It is in your bosom that they deposit their alarms, and hope at length to find a remedy for their evils. This day recalls the memorable epoch of the 20th of June, and the Tennis Court at Versailles, where the representatives of the people met, and swore never to abandon our cause—to die in its defence. Remember, gentlemen, that solemn vow; and permit an afflicted people to ask now whether you will abandon us? In the name of the nation, that has its eyes fixed on this city, we come to assure you that the people are up, that they are quite equal to the circumstances of the times, and quite ready to employ great means in order to avenge the outraged majesty of the people. These rigorous means are justified by the second article of the Declaration of the Rights of Man—resistance to oppression! It is indeed a misfortune for free men, who have transmitted their powers to you, to see themselves reduced to the cruel necessity of bathing their hands in the blood of conspirators; but the time for dissimulation is past, the plot is discovered, the hour of vengeance is come, and blood shall flow, or the tree of liberty which we are going to plant shall flourish in peace!" Continuing his harangue, with some menace of death and blood in every sentence, the brewer said that, if there were conspirators in the Assembly itself, the patriot members had nothing to do but to name them to the people, the true sovereign, that was there to judge and execute judgment on them. He talked widely and vaguely about conspirators, but he never named Lafayette, or alluded to his letter to the Assembly; but in a few words he explained the true object of this insurrection. "The executive power," said he, "is not in accord with you. We require no other proof of this than the late dismissal of the patriot ministers [Roland, Servan, and Clavières.] And is it then thus that the happiness of a free people is to depend on the caprice of a king? But is this king to exercise any other will than that of the law? The people will it so, and their head is well worth that of crowned despots. Their head is the genealogic tree of the nation; and before this robust oak, the feeble reed must bend! We complain, gentlemen, of the inaction of our armies. We demand that you discover the cause of it. If it be derived from the executive power, let that power be annihilated! The blood of patriots ought not to flow to gratify the pride and ambition of the perfidious château of the Tuileries. Who can stop us in our march? Are we to see our armies on the frontiers perish piecemeal? Ours is a common cause, O legislators! and our action ought to be common too. If the first champions of liberty had temporised, would you be sitting to-day in this august Areopagus?" He next complained of the shameful inactivity of the guillotine, and of the high national court appointed to try political crimes; and he asked the Assembly "whether the people would be obliged to take the sword of the law into their own hands, and exterminate, by one terrible blow, not only all the state prisoners, but all those that would not execute the laws upon them?" The reading of this so called petition was frequently interrupted by tremendous applauses, which proceeded not only from the galleries, but also from a large portion of the House. When it was finished, the president (M. Français of Nantes, the same who had made Dr. Priestley's son a French citizen) replied, with what some French writers call "remarkable dignity." He told Santerre and the pike-armed rabble that they were all fellow-citizens, and that the people and the Assembly were but one; that the Assembly, as the representatives of twenty-four millions of men, announced to them through his organ that they would disconcert all the plots of the conspirators; that they would deliver over all the conspirators to the sword of the law, as the law alone ought to avenge the people, &c. By this time there were at the least thirty thousand men, women, and children in the Place de Carrousel, and they all intended to defile through the Hall with their pikes and their bludgeons, their swords and guns. One formalist of a deputy wished to know whether the citizens of the faubourgs St. Antoine and St. Marcel were to be permitted to traverse the Hall thus armed; but the Assembly, to save their dignity, called him to order, and, without mentioning arms, decreed that the citizens should traverse the Salle. While this idle talk was going on among the legislators, the sovereign mob formed, and began to march through the Hall, coming in at one door and going out at the other, and shouting "Down with the Veto! Long live liberty and equality! Long live the patriots without breeches!" and dancing the Carmagnole, which was their war or liberty dance, and singing, in deafening chorus, the Ça Ira, or "It will go" song. A very long time was necessarily consumed in these performances; and it appears to have been about four o'clock in the afternoon before the patriot citizens got clear of the Hall, and consolidated their columns for an assault on the Tuileries. They had scarcely cleared out when another formidable deputation, though not quite so numerous, marched up to the bar of the House, as if to give an additional, but scarcely necessary, proof of how much the Girondists had had to do with this insurrection. The deputation consisted of armed men from the first and second battalion of the department of the Gironde, who were going, they said, to the frontiers, and who could not, in passing through Paris, neglect to pay the homage of their respect and fidelity to the Assembly. As soon as their orator had read his oration, and the complacent president had replied to it, the House adjourned till the evening, and the deputies went to their dinners.* In the meantime the patriot columns, with the transfixed heart at their head, moved along the strong iron railing which encloses the garden of the Tuileries, looking for some open gate by which to enter in order to plant their tree of liberty. But as all the gates were closed, and as troops—horse and foot and artillery—were very distinctly seen within the railing, the patriots hesitated and hung back, and not a few of them went off at score, swearing that this was going to be a blacker day than the black Sunday. Those who did not bolt turned aside to the garden of the Capuchins, and erected their tall poplar-tree there with Carmagnole and Ça Ira. Bully Santerre, who now came to the spot from the Assembly, where he had stayed gossiping with republican deputies till the adjournment, was wroth that they had not planted the tree on the Feuillant terrace, as they had agreed to do; but the unbreeched told him that there was a snare laid for them there, and that they were not such fools as to rush into it. Even at this moment of extreme exaltation a few whiffs of grape-shot would have sent these sansculottes flying through every street and dark alley of Paris; but there was positively no one to administer that purgation, and Santerre, St. Hürge, and others of those men who had attended the nocturnal meetings in the faubourgs, soon convinced the mob, and ocularly demonstrated to them, that the national guards inside the Tuileries railings were as good patriots as themselves. When Santerre had carried this pleasant conviction to their bosoms, he harangued them, and told them that they must go not merely into the gardens of the Tuileries, but into the palace itself, in order to present their petition to the king in person. "We have cannon," said he, "and, if they will not open a gate to us, we will knock it to pieces with our bullets." The mob, waxing uncommonly bold from the moment they knew there would be no resistance, sang Ça Ira; a loaded cannon was dragged to their front, and on they all went to a side-gate that opened on the Place de Carrousel. In the morning, before the mob reached the Assembly, a number of noblemen and gentlemen, but not exceeding altogether one hundred and fifty, had hastened to the palace with a vain offer of their services and their lives. Their arrival did a great deal more harm than good; for even such of the national guards as were not disposed to join the insurgents were exceedingly disgusted at the presence of men who wore buckles to their shoes, powder in their hair, and black silk breeches, and who were all known to entertain opinions very adverse to the constitution at present established. The king, fearing a repetition of the humiliating scenes of the Day of Poignards, begged these noblemen and gentlemen to retire, and, except a few that remained behind in the apartment of Louis's premier valet, they had all withdrawn. Some faint hope was then entertained that the gens d'armes and the national guardsmen would stand by the king; but the gens d'armes refused to load their muskets, and the national guards surrounded the artillery, swearing that they would not permit them to fire upon the people. If the king's guard, so recently and so opportunely disbanded, had been there, matters might have taken a different turn; but, with such precious defenders as Louis had, he could do nothing but submit. The national guards threw open the gate, and the living torrent rushed into the garden, with Santerre and a cannon at their head. Near the door of the palace a number of respectable citizens surrounded the brewer, and endeavoured, by persuasion or by terror, to prevent his entrance. They told him that he would be responsible for whatever might happen, that he was the sole chief of that most unconstitutional movement, that he had basely deceived the people, and would soon be regarded by all as a scoundrel. Santerre turned pale; but butcher Legendre gave him an encouraging wink, and then the brewer cried out, "Gentlemen, I take you all to witness that I refuse to march at your head into the king's apartments!" and then the gentlemen who carried pikes and the bullock's heart, perfectly understanding what was meant, closed their ranks, pressed forward, and swept on before them Santerre and those who were remonstrating with him. They found the strong oak-door of the outward apartment closed upon them; but they dragged their cannon up the broad staircase, and pointed it against the door, which presently flew open. At the same moment other divisions of the patriots broke open other doors and windows with sledge-hammers and axes, and entered different parts of the palace at once. Nothing remained between the king and the mob, save one inner door, which presently shook and cracked under the blows of the sansculottes. Louis ordered it to be opened, and even advanced to meet the mob, expecting instant death, but being prepared to die unflinchingly like a martyr—which was precisely the only great thing he was ever capable of doing. "What is it you want?" said he. The foremost patriots recoiled awe-stricken; but anon the masses in the rear, who could neither hear his words nor see his calm, unmoved countenance, drove them forward, and in they rushed by hundreds. Some of the grenadiers of the national guards who belonged to the more respectable classes had got into the room by a private staircase. M. de Bougainville, fearing that, if they did not murder the king with their pikes and axes, the in-rushing multitude would throw him down and smother him, cried out to these grenadiers to carry his majesty into the embrasure of one of the windows, and place benches and tables before him to keep off the crowd. This was promptly done, and the few grenadiers placed themselves immediately in front of the benches between the king and the rabble. "Sire, fear nothing," said one of the grenadiers. Louis took the man's hand, and, placing it over his heart, said, "Feel whether I fear!" This passive part of courage, which no man possessed in greater perfection, was not what the French people most admired or best understood, their own courage being of the active kind, and requiring constant action and display to keep it up; nevertheless, the whole bearing and manner of the king, so different from what they had been taught to expect in him, struck them with awe and an involuntary respect, and to this, we believe, was owing the present preservation of his life. Twice, it is said, a pike was thrust at his body, but parried by one of the national grenadiers. But there was another member of that doomed race who could meet martyrdom with a heart as unpalpitating as Louis, and who had active courage as well as fortitude and the power of enduring. At the deadliest part of the hurly-burly and fury Madame Elizabeth attempted to run to her brother. The irresistible mob were uttering frightful imprecations against the queen, that "Other b . . .," and calling for her head.* "Ah!" said Elizabeth, "let them believe that I am the queen, so that she may have time to escape!" The noble-minded woman could not reach the king, nor could the queen and her children escape out of the palace, which was invaded on every side, and completely surrounded without. They, too, were prudently carried into the embrasure of a window in the council-chamber, which was within the apartment where Louis was standing; and there they stood, behind chairs and tables—the queen, her little boy and girl, Madame Elizabeth, the faithful Princess of Lamballe, the Princess of Tarente, and three other ladies. A national grenadier had the forethought to hand the queen an enormous tricolor cockade, and this she stuck in her cap. Many of the sansculottes had got drunk on bad wine, which had been copiously distributed to them by Santerre and others. One of them in this condition presented the king, at the end of a pike, a cap of liberty or bonnet rouge, or one of those red worsted night-caps which Brissot had learnedly recommended as the proper head-gear for republicans: Louis calmly took it, and placed it on his head, and, further to pacify the madmen, he joined in the cry of "Long live liberty! Long live the nation!" By this time the heat was suffocating, and the smell such as may be fancied to proceed from so many thousands of frowsy unwashed patriots, who had been marching and sweating that livelong day under a hot summer sun, and that were jammed together in the royal apartment. The king complained of thirst; a black bottle was handed to him from the mob, and he drank out of it—to the health of the nation. The grenadiers had placed him on a table, as near as possible to the open window, and there he stood for full four hours with the red cap on his head. A tall young man mounted another table in front of him, and kept repeating for a long time, "I demand, in the name of the hundred thousand souls who surround me, the recall of the patriot ministers! I demand the sanction of the decree against the priests, the sanction of the decree for the camp of twenty thousand men! I demand the immediate execution of both decrees, or you shall perish!" The only answers that these and other terrible and indecent threats could extort from the king were that this was not the form or the manner in which to demand his assent—that he would never depart from the strict line of the law and the constitution. Butcher Legendre told the king to his face that he must listen to his people—that he was made to listen and obey—that he was a perfidious scoundrel, and that the people were tired of being his dupes. It was butcher Legendre, or, according to others (in such a scene of utter confusion it may be imagined what a variety and contradiction there is in the details), it was Huguenin, that read the petition to the king, which simply told him that his conduct was not to be borne; that his enemies were not the people of Paris, but the emigrants at Coblenz; that the French would still love him, if he would only do what they wished him; that the people were all ripe for the revolution, and insisted that, in order to make the constitution march, he should sanction the decrees of the Assembly, and recall the ministers, who enjoyed the confidence of the nation. "Yes," said the petition in conclusion, "we will maintain the constitution we have got, but it must march: we will perish, if need be, in its defence, but then you must perish with us." Still Louis replied that this was not the form or the manner. When the deputies of the Assembly adjourned, and went to their dinners, there was not a man among them but knew that Santerre and his armed multitude were going to the Tuileries. A few of the Feuillant members ran to the palace as soon as the mob had taken possession of it, to harangue and implore the people to respect the laws and the lives of the royal family; but the rest waited events and the effect of this formidable intimidation; and the House did not meet again until past six o'clock. Then, to preserve some appearances, they sent a deputation to the palace to request the mob to withdraw, and to tell the king how sorry they were for all that had happened. About the same time Mayor Pétion found his way to the Tuileries to allay the storm, to conjure the foul fiend which he, more than any other man, had raised. Bescarfed and bedecked with all his civic emblems, Pétion was lifted to the shoulders of two grenadiers, and he made a speech which seemed rather to say "Go on" than "Stop." "Without doubt," said he to the feculent patriots, "your example will be followed by the eighty-three departments, and the king will not be able to avoid acquiescing in the manifest will of the people." Approaching the king, he said, with one of the most barefaced lies that ever came from the lips of Jacobin or Girondist, "Sire, I have only this instant learned the situation in which you are placed." Louis calmly replied, "That is very astonishing, for I have been in this situation these two hours!" And there, in spite of the coming of Pétion and the deputation from the Assembly, he was destined to remain nearly two more mortal hours, half-stifled by the heat and stench, half-deafened by harangues here and harangues there (there were fifty orators speaking at once in different parts of those state-rooms), and by shouts and clamours inside and outside, that never ceased for a single second. One of Pétion's municipal officers invited him to quit that recess: but Louis, having no confidence in such a guide, declined the invitation; and nowhere else could he have been so safe. The Assembly now sent a second deputation, which was headed by Vergniaud, who made a talk and a bustle, and did nothing. At last a number of voices called upon Pétion to do his duty, and order the people to retire in the name of the law. As Pétion replied not, and continued perfectly inactive, he was told to take care of himself, as his conduct would be judged by the event. Then the mayor began to tell the citizens that they ought to go home, unless they wished to commit their faithful magistrates, and provoke unjust accusations against them. "If you remain any longer," said he, "you will give occasion to your enemies and the enemies of the public weal to misrepresent your respectable intentions. You know you only came here to petition." But the patriots showed no disposition to be gone; and the voice of the virtuous mayor was smothered in the crowd and crush. That he might be better heard, he mounted upon a table; a justice of peace got up beside him—a worthy and calculating justice of the peace, for he had been over to the Assembly, and had borrowed the president's hand-bell, which he rang with all his might—and, when some degree of quiet was obtained, Pétion assured the citizens that the king allowed them to defile through the palace as they had defiled through the Assembly. "People," said he, "you have done what you ought to do. You have acted with the pride and dignity of free men. But this is enough! Let every man retire." The rabble then got into such order as they could, and marched slowly through all those state-rooms, going out by a door and staircase at the opposite end of the palace. As they passed the window in the council-chamber, one of them clapped a bonnet-rouge upon the head of the little Dauphin, and others assailed the ears of the queen with language which cannot be translated, not merely because of its grossness, but, happily, because our language offers no equivalents. And yet, even in this moment of fury and frenzy, the fair and graceful and sweet-voiced Marie Antoinette could draw some tears from the vilest of that rabble. She asked a miserable Jacobiness, who was vomiting abuse and imprecation, whether she had ever seen her before—whether she had ever done any harm to her or hers? The woman answered, no, but that she was the curse of the nation and the cause of all its troubles. "You have been told so," said the queen, "but you have been deceived. Wife to the king of France, mother of the Dauphin, I am a Frenchwoman—never shall I see my own country again—never can I be happy or unhappy but in France—I was happy when you all loved me!" The fury was touched to the heart, and she went away weeping, and saying that she saw the queen must be very good. Between eight and nine in the evening Santerre, "the king of the faubourgs," got all his patriots out of the Tuileries; and then the king, after so long and so terrible a separation from them, joined his wife, his children, and his sister in the council-chamber. Too many serious matters had been working in his brain to allow him to think of the unseemly red night-cap on his head: it was still there when he joined the queen, nor was he sensible of it until he was told. Vergniaud and the republican deputies, who had come over from the Assembly in deputation, could scarcely have desired to see royalty in a more degraded state, or a palace more perfectly sansculotized. The queen, pointing to the dirt the sovereign people had left behind them, and to the broken doors, windows, and furniture, asked these honourable deputies what they thought of such outrages, committed under the very eyes of the Assembly? The sadness of the scene, and perhaps still more the tone of the queen's voice, and the expression of her countenance, drew tears even from the eyes of that lost Jacobin, Merlin, who was one of the deputies whom the Assembly had so opportunely and appropriately sent to the king. Marie Antoinette perceived his emotion, and said to him, "You weep, M. Merlin, at seeing the king and his family treated thus cruelly by a people whom he has always wished to make happy." "It is true, Madame," replied Merlin, "I weep for the misfortunes of a woman, handsome, endued with sensibility, and the mother of a family; but, do not mistake me, there is not one of my tears shed for the king or for the queen: I hate kings and queens—this is the only feeling they inspire in me—this is my religion." Thus ended that doomsday of monarchy, the 20th of June, in the Tuileries, for no pen has attempted to put upon record the scenes which passed in that palace when rabble and legislators were all withdrawn, and the royal family were left to themselves.*

On the following day people thought they perceived a very general disgust at the plots of the Jacobins and Girondists, and the indecencies and the excesses of the mob, and a strong reaction in favour of royalty in some classes which had hitherto been inclined to republicanism. We believe that the political passions of men remained much as they were before the insurrection; and that the sympathy for the court was still confined to the old unvarying royalists, who became for a moment a little bolder by an understanding with the Feuillant or Lafayette party, who certainly seemed determined to attempt one desperate struggle with the Girondists and Jacobins ere they resigned themselves to destruction. It is said, however, that even at this crisis the royalists and Feuillants had no fixed plan of co-operation; and that when the salvation of both was at stake, and could only be secured by a perfect agreement, if by that, they disagreed on nearly every measure or proposition, and even counteracted one another; and this we can readily credit, as it was in the national character, and the essential spirit of parties in France. The Jacobins and Girondists had only made a temporary and a very partial truce; but the Jacobins, who had already won the hearts or imaginations of the mass of the people, were getting quite strong enough to do without the Gironde. A few votes carried against them in the Assembly could not check their progress. On the motion of a Feuillant member it was voted by a majority that, in time to come, bodies of armed citizens were not to present themselves at the bar or at the palace. But, if thirty thousand ruffians were again to come to the door of the Assembly, what was there to prevent their entering? In the course of the day (the 21st) Rœderer, the procureur syndic, and most active officer of the directory of the department, announced to the Assembly that fresh riots were breaking out, and that another mob was collecting round the Tuileries; and a Feuillant member, after mentioning that he had seen the troops on guard there making preparations for defence, proposed that, in order to prevent the disgraceful scenes of the preceding day, or a more frightful scene of blood, the Assembly should go over in a body to the palace. The Jacobins and Girondists said that there was no danger of any popular movement; that the royalists and Feuillants were trying to lay a snare for them; that it was not from Rœderer, or from the department, or from any of the king's ministers, that the House ought to receive reports as to the state of Paris, but from mayor Pétion alone; that, if the king was attacked in his domicile, he ought to come over to the Assembly, and take refuge in the sanctuary of the law; that the popular movements only existed in the minds of those who wished to excite troubles for the most unpatriotic purposes, &c. The grenadiers of the section Filles St. Thomas, which was chiefly inhabited by people of superior condition, were mounting guard in front of the palace; and, as Pétion went by with a rabble at his heels, these hot grenadiers gave him some sharp words, and, rattling their muskets, told him that to-day they were well prepared to receive him. It was even reported that they had audaciously pulled the nose and tripped up the heels of one of Pétion's municipals. Forthwith a numerous deputation from a more patriotic battalion of the national guards came to the bar of the Assembly to denounce these impious grenadiers of the section Filles St. Thomas, and to affirm that a part of the national guards were in a state of revolt, and aiming at nothing less than a universal civil war. The fellows composing this deputation, who for the most part had belonged, in former times, to the Gardes Françaises, were admitted to the honours of the séance. Then Pétion presented himself in the House, and declared that order reigned everywhere; and that the magistrates, who would some day receive the honours that were their due, had taken all the precautions that were necessary, doing their duty nobly, as they had ever done. A Jacobin member then accused Rœderer of lying and malice. Guadet said that he was convinced that the enemies of the people had been attempting to renew to-day the slaughters of the Champ de Mars; that preparations had been made for slaughtering the people in heaps, &c.; and he added that the people had been excited, and tempted to rise and march, by a report industriously circulated that their virtuous and beloved mayor had been put under arrest. It appears, however, that Rœderer had said nothing but the truth. A great body of people had collected, and had begun their march in the direction of the Tuileries; but they had halted at some distance from that abode of woe, and after a time had dispersed, probably from intimation given to them that there were men there to-day who intended to fight. In the evening, mayor Pétion waited upon the king. Rœderer was present at this irritating interview, and has left an account of the words that passed—an account which differs but slightly from one given by Pétion himself in the 'Moniteur.' Both accounts make out the mayor's conduct and conversation to have been of the most insolent kind. Pétion said that there was no ground for the alarm of the morning, as the citizens had not been armed, and had only meant to plant a tree of liberty; that he knew that the conduct of the municipality had been calumniated, but that its conduct would soon be known. "It ought to be known to all France," replied the king: "I accuse nobody in particular. Yesterday I saw everything myself." Pétion said that but for the prudent measures taken by the municipality, sad events might have happened. The king attempted to speak again, but Pétion, instead of listening, continued his discourse; and for some minutes both spoke together, so that Rœderer could not distinctly hear what either of them said. It should seem that the king asked the mayor whether he had to fear the attack of the people or the Assembly, for when he was silent, and Pétion was heard speaking alone, Rœderer distinguished these words: "Not for your person, as you ought to know that that will always be respected." Here Louis lost patience, and for once spoke in a sharp, bold tone: for, raising his voice to its highest pitch, he bade the mayor hold his tongue; and, after a moment's silence, he said sternly, "Was it respecting my person, to force my guard, to enter my house in arms, to break open my doors? What passed yesterday will be a scandal to all the world!" "Sire," rejoined Pétion, "I know the extent of my duty and of my responsibility." "Then do your duty," said the king, very imperiously: "you will have to answer for the tranquillity of Paris. Adieu!" And so saying he turned his back on Pétion, and retired. When Pétion, somewhat abashed, left the room, the queen said to Rœderer, "Do you not think that the king has been very sharp? Do you believe that this will not injure him?" "Madame," replied Rœderer, "I believe that nobody can doubt that the king may permit himself to say, 'Hold your tongue,' to a man that speaks and that will not listen to him."* Several respectable citizens now went and deposed before the departmental directory that force had been employed by the mob to make men and women march with them to the Tuileries, and that no effort was made by the municipality or their police to check this shameful violence. On the following day, the 22nd, the king issued a proclamation, briefly stating to the whole nation the insults he had received, and calling upon all constituted authorities to watch over the public tranquillity. The departmental directory, assuming a power which did not properly belong to it, pronounced sentence upon Pétion, and declared that he was provisionally suspended from his functions as mayor. The king, committing another mistake, confirmed the decree of the departmental directory; but the Assembly, after hearing Pétion at their bar, soon reinstated him in his office. At this time the mayor was the idol of the faubourgs, and of the rabble of Paris, whose cri-de-guerre was "Pétion or death!" To meet the king's proclamation, Pétion issued a proclamation of his own, in which he told the people to be calm and dignified, and to take heed of the snares that were laid for them. He assured them that efforts were making to sow divisions between the national guards and the unarmed citizens; and that the most innocent meetings might be misrepresented and misdirected by men of evil intentions. In short, he seemed to tell them that all that they had done had been well done, but that the moment was not propitious for their doing more.

Eight thousand Parisians, not of the sansculottic order, had signed a petition against the federate camp, and twenty thousand of the same class of citizens now signed an address to the king. Some other addresses came up from Rouen, Havre, and several large towns. All the respectabilities of the national guards vowed that they would now stand by the king, and resist the pikemen, who threatened the most complete and most sanguinary anarchy. The Duke de la Rochefoucauld-Liancourt, who held the military command at Rouen, and whose army was said to be devoted to him, proposed that the king should fly, and take refuge in that city; but this was but a desperate enterprise, the failure of which was an inevitable and a total destruction. Lafayette proposed conducting the king to Compiègne, and there placing him at the head of the army he commanded; but this enterprise was as difficult as the former, and the king and queen doubted both the good intention and the ability of Lafayette. They are reproached with an obstinate aversion to Lafayette and the whole Feuillant or constitutional party; and they are said to have refused this last offer because they knew that Lafayette would make terms with them, and never permit the re-establishment of the old despotic form of government, and because they preferred trusting to the arms of the coalition of absolute kings; but if they had accepted Lafayette's offer, and if they had been enabled to effect their escape from Paris, was Lafayette at any one moment strong enough to save them, or even himself, from destruction? Would not their flight from the capital have hastened, by some months, Lafayette's own flight across the frontiers? Would even the lives of the royal family have been safer in the midst of Jacobinised armies than they were in Paris? Without any encouragement from the court, without even intimating his intention to them, or his own friends in the capital, Lafayette, who was in very truth, "by dint of experience, improving in blunders," quitted his army, and suddenly appeared in Paris on the 28th of June, at an early hour of the morning. Old Luckner had told him that the sansculottes would surely cut off his head; and several persons on his road had entreated him to give up his desperate project. His arrival, the news of which was heard with astonishment, was soon known throughout Paris. As soon as the Assembly met, he repaired to their bar, and told them, with great spirit, the reasons of his coming. In the first place, he assured them that he had concerted measures with Luckner, and had left his army in such a state that it could not suffer by his absence. He then added, "It has been said that my letter of the 16th to the Assembly was not written by me. I have been reproached with having written it in the midst of a camp. To acknowledge it, it was necessary perhaps that I should present myself alone, and come from behind that honourable rampart which the affection of the troops formed around me; but a still more powerful reason, gentlemen, has induced me to come to you. The acts of violence committed on the 20th at the Tuileries have excited the alarm and indignation of all good citizens, and especially of the army!" After a few more words touching the respect due to the laws, to the constitution, and to the king, who was a part of it, he entreated the Assembly to order the trial and punishment of the instigators and chiefs of the recent insurrection, who had been guilty of high treason against the nation, and to destroy the Cordelier and Jacobin Clubs—"to destroy a sect which constantly invades the rights of the national sovereignty, tyrannizes over the citizens, and whose public debates leave no doubt of the atrocity of those who direct it." The president replied, that the National Assembly had sworn to maintain the constitution as it was; that, faithful to their oaths, they well knew how to protect that constitution from every outrage; and that they granted to General Lafayette the honour of a seat among them. But, when the president had finished this bit of commonplace, Girondist Guadet begged to know whether Lafayette had received a leave of absence from the minister of war? Whether he had beaten the Austrians, that he was so soon back at Paris? Whether a general had any right to dictate to the legislative body, or to talk to them of the wishes of his army? Gensonné followed in the same style; and sundry ultra-Jacobin orators agreed that the step Lafayette had taken was most suspicious, dangerous, and unjustifiable. After another fearful fracas, in which honourable members called one another rogues and scoundrels, it was decided, by a considerable majority, that the whole business should be submitted to the select committee of twelve. From the Assembly Lafayette proceeded to the Tuileries, and conferred for some time with the king and queen, and Madame Elizabeth. He says himself that both Louis and Marie Antoinette repeated that they were convinced there was no safety for them except in the constitution; that Louis never appeared to express himself with more thorough conviction and sincerity than when he said he should consider it most fortunate if the Austrians were speedily defeated. From the palace he retired to his own house, where he found a strong detachment of the respectabilities of the national guard, who received him with acclamations, and mounted guard before his door. He acknowledges that but for this protection he might have been destroyed during the night by the clubbists he had come to destroy. To do him the more honour, some of the respectabilities brought a tree of liberty, and planted it in front of his house. All the chiefs of the Feuillant party that had courage enough to discuss an enterprise which they all felt to be dangerous, if not desperate, met at his house in the course of the evening and night, but apparently only to show that there was a great difference of opinion among them as to the best way of proceeding against the Jacobins, who at the same time were meeting in great force in their hall, and sending their emissaries through the faubourgs and the sections to keep the sans-culottes awake. Lally Tollendal, who had returned from his exile in England, proposed that they should fall upon the great club at once, and scatter its members with such cannons and bayonets as were at their disposal; but the majority, including Lafayette himself, thought that this would be too bold, and wear an appearance of illegality. On the following day the king was to pass in review the first division of the national guards, who were commanded by Acloque, a brave man who was devoted to the court, or who was at least one of the most decided enemies of the Jacobins and anarchists. Lafayette asked permission to accompany the king at this review, apprising his majesty of his intention of haranguing these troops, and of doing with them whatever he might deem best for the good of the constitution and public order; but mayor Pétion got scent of this project, countermanded the review before daybreak, and none took place. It is said that the queen warned Pétion of the project, declaring to those about her that it was better to perish than trust a man who had done them so much harm as Lafayette; but it is indubitable that Lafayette must have defeated his own project by disclosing it beforehand to Louis, who was sure to shrink from every act of violence, who could only suffer like a martyr, but who could never act like a hero. With Pétion's espionage, and countless sources of information, there was no need of any secret revelation from the queen, or any one at court, as to the intended review; but we can believe a better witness than Lafayette, who says that, when some of the officers of the national guards asked the king whether he wished them to enter into the views of Lafayette, and join him in such operations as he might undertake during his stay in Paris, the king answered with a decided "No."* Neither Lafayette nor any other party attempts to show how a few hundred Swiss and four or five thousand national guards—for the respectabilities did not exceed that number—were to be sure of a victory against thirty or forty thousand pikes, and twenty or thirty thousand national guards of the Jacobinised sections, who had artillery and munitions of war; and, besides this revolutionary force, there were volunteer regiments in the neighbourhood, all fanatic Jacobins, and thorough sans-culottes, who were marching for the frontiers, but who would assuredly have stopped to take part in this contest. Heroism, or a desperate daring, may do wonders, but there was likely to be more of this on the other side. As the review failed him, Lafayette proposed a meeting, on the evening of the 29th, in the Champs Elysées. A great number of the respectabilities promised to attend; and it is said that he engaged, if only three hundred of them would keep their appointment, to march upon the Jacobin Club in the Rue St. Honoré. But lo! when the evening and the appointed hour came, instead of three hundred, only thirty of these civic heroes met. The Feuillantine valour had evaporated; and, to avoid being taken prisoner or assassinated by the Jacobins, Lafayette got into his travelling carriage, and fled with all possible speed to his army.* The Jacobin leaders had passed many anxious hours during his stay in Paris. Some of them had hid themselves, and some of them had ferreted out Dumouriez, who was still in Paris, and had proposed that he should put himself at the head of the sans-culottes, and march against Lafayette. In the course of the night of the 28th they had told Dumouriez, that if he would only repair to the club he should certainly be revenged; that they were all ready to march; that the dictator had only a guard of a hundred men round his house; and that, as the people would be sure to join the clubbists, Lafayette must certainly perish. Dumouriez had declined going, and had, with his usual address, reconciled the fiercest of the Jacobins to his decision. But if Lafayette was not cut off, his party was annihilated by these imprudent proceedings: the mortal blow was struck at that remnant of influence which remained to him. From this moment the sans-culottes had the field entirely to themselves; and, as they could not credit the fact that the court had refused to be assisted by the general, they held it accountable for all that he had done or attempted to do; and hence rushed a fresh consuming fire of hate and revenge. Lafayette had not got many miles on his road ere the tree of liberty in front of his house was struck down, and he was burnt in effigy by the people, with horrible imprecations; and at the same time Jacobin emissaries, travelling nearly as fast as

* Morris says, under date of the 29th:—"I go to court. . . . Lafayette speaks to me at court in the tone of ancient familiarity. I tell him that I shall be glad to see him for a few minutes. He says that he is going out of town this evening, but gives me rendezvous at M. de Montmorin's. I observe to him that he must soon return to his army, or go to Orleans; and that he must determine to fight for a good constitution, or for that wretched piece of paper which bears the name; that in six weeks it will be too late. He asks what I mean by a good constitution—whether it is an aristocratic one. I tell him yes; and that, I presume, he has lived long enough in the present style to see that a popular government is good for nothing in France. He says that he wishes for the American constitution, but a hereditary executive, I reply that, in such case, the monarch will be too strong, and must be checked by a hereditary senate. He says it goes hard with him to give up that point. Here ends our colloquy."—Diary.

himself, were wending to the army to preach mutiny and murder to the common soldiers. The flying hero of two worlds had left behind him a terrible letter to the Assembly, which was produced and read on the morning of the 30th. It was heard with execrations; and Isnard expressed his astonishment that the Assembly had not seized that factious soldier when he was at their bar, and sent him to join the other state prisoners at Orleans—an energetic measure which would certainly have been attempted by the Girondists and Jacobins, if Lafayette had not been escorted by a strong body of his respectabilities, and had not taken the Assembly by surprise. In the course of the same day Jean Debrie brought up a report from the select committee of twelve, recommending an immediate declaration that the country was in danger. According to Debrie a proclamation of this kind would be attended with the most salutary effects, as it would keep the people suspicious and on the alert. The majority, taking the same view, agreed in the form of the decree, but postponed the proclamation for a few days. On the following day, after some energetic discussions in the Jacobin Club, whither Brissot had once more gone to join Robespierre in denouncing Lafayette and the whole of the Feuillant and royalist parties, several deputations from the sans-culotte sections (the sections of the pikemen) presented themselves at the bar of the Assembly, to demand that Lafayette should forthwith be seized in his army, and punished as a traitor; that the staff of the national guard, composed by him of Feuillants and aristocrats, should be dismissed; that a new staff should be chosen; and that the patriots with pikes should be incorporated in the battalions. That nothing might be wanting to keep up the ferment, mayor Pétion placarded the streets of Paris with an alarming proclamation, commencing, "Citizens, the storm is preparing!" As it was a Sabbath-day, when all the world was idle and abroad, this placard was seen by everybody. It led to a deal of scuffling and fighting with sticks in the streets and public places; and several individuals who belonged, or were supposed to belong, to Lafayette's party, were wounded, and all but killed, in the Palais-Royal.

Even some time before the dangers and humiliations of the 20th of June, the king had fallen into a state of despair or inertia: he rarely opened his lips, and had passed ten successive days without speaking even to his wife and children. At last the queen had roused him from that horrible apathy by falling at his feet and imploring him to make some exertion, were it only for the sake of her and his offspring. The high-spirited daughter of Maria Theresa, who ought to have been king instead of him, said, if they must perish, it was better to perish with honour, and with a bold struggle for it, than to sit there helpless and inactive until the Jacobins came to murder them under their own roof-tree one after the other.* But when he stirred himself to be doing, he saw nothing that he could do, except to send some secret envoy to the Emperor of Austria and the allied princes, to implore them to hasten to his rescue. The person he selected for this delicate mission was Mallet-du-Pan, a native of Geneva, a protégé of Voltaire, but of late years a royalist journalist in Paris. Mallet-du-Pan had left Paris for Germany, at the end of May, with instructions in Louis's own handwriting. Confiding in the belief that there was still a considerable part of the nation attached to royalty, and that it would rise and declare itself on the approach of foreign armies, the king implored the foreign powers, the princes his brothers, and the rest of the French emigrants, not to give the invasion the character or appearance of a hostile attack on the French nation, or of a war of power against power; telling them that an opposite line of conduct to what he advised would only produce a civil war in the interior, and endanger the lives of the royal family, overthrow the throne, provoke the massacre of the royalists, rally round the Jacobins all the parties that were now seeking to separate themselves from them, and excite a universal enthusiasm and the most obstinate resistance. He represented to the court of Vienna and to the court of Berlin, which by this time had engaged to join in the invasion of France, that their armies ought to advance quickly, but with extreme caution, treating the people of the French provinces they might traverse with gentleness; and that the march of their armies ought to be preceded by a manifesto declaratory of their pacific and conciliatory intentions, and of their determination not to attempt to impose any particular constitution or form of government upon the French nation. To the form of this manifesto—so different in nearly every particular from that which the commander of the Prussian army afterwards issued—Louis attached the utmost importance, as if any such proclamation could reconcile a proud and martial people to the invasion of their country, or as if the promises and assurances of arbitrary princes, who had not been remarkable for keeping their word with other parties, who were in the act of breaking their faith and their treaties with Poland, could possibly obtain any credit from so incredulous a people as the French! He recommended that a clear distinction should be made between the Jacobins and the rest of the nation; that the manifesto should contain the fundamental truth that this was a war not against the French nation, but against an anti-social faction, and a furious anarchy destructive of liberty and peace; that it should remove every fear of dismemberment or of an arbitrary interference with the laws of the country; but that it should, at the same time, declare energetically to the Assembly, to the municipality, to all administrative bodies, and to the ministers of the day, whoever they might be, that the allies would neither treat with them nor with any one of them, but only with the king restored to a state of liberty; and that they would hold the Assembly, the municipality, &c. personally and individually answerable in body and in goods for the safety of the king, the queen, the royal family, and of the persons and the properties of all citizens whatsoever. He preached moderation to the emigrants, who, as he well knew, were likely to be more violent, when once on the soil of France, than Prussian grenadiers or Austrian hulans; and he concluded by advising that the coalition should promise in their manifesto the immediate assembling of a congress, where the emigrants might plead their losses and their wrongs, and where the interests of all parties might be pacifically discussed and arranged.*

Louis had not dispatched Mallet-du-Pan until, as he thought, every other resource had failed him. Barnave, who had so confidently undertaken to save the monarchy and the monarch—for it had been a question of life and death with Louis for many months—had completely failed him long before this; and after expressing his vain regrets, and gallantly kissing the fair hand of the queen, he had gone off to Grenoble, his native place, to become mayor, and to marry a rich heiress. Mallet-du-Pan found that the Austrian and Prussian preparations were going on but slowly (both powers were thinking as much about Poland as about France); and that the emigrant noblesse were in a frantic state of mind, which precluded all hope of the moderation the king had recommended. At length, however, in the early days of July, it was known at the Tuileries that the Austrians in the Netherlands had been greatly reinforced, and that the Prussian army, under the command of the Duke of Brunswick, was approaching the Rhine—encouraging intelligence, if there had only been a possibility of keeping it from the knowledge of the Assembly and people. The Assembly, though it had no note of warning from the ministry, though not so much as a hint had ever been given officially of the King of Prussia's intentions, were fully informed of everything by the 2nd of July; and on the 3rd Vergniaud rose to represent the imminence of the danger. He described the army of the North, which had crossed the Belgian frontiers, as retreating before the Austrians, and the Prussian army as on the very point of bursting into France with fire and fury. He reminded the house that these foreign despots, and the emigrants worse than they, and all the enemies of the French people, continued to make use of the name of Louis XVI., and to assert that they were only in arms for his cause; and he then stated a series of hypotheses which would justify the nation in dethroning the king at once. The majority, already immensely increased by the tidings which had been received of the Prussian interference, ordered the exciting discourse to be printed and sent to all the departments. A day or two after Condorcet read a long discourse on the general measures proper to save the country and liberty and equality; and he recommended, as the best of these general measures, the calling up of the confederates to the capital, the impeachment of all the ministers, the suspension of the civil list and of the king's veto, and union and fraternity between Girondists and Jacobins. This last notion was taken up on the following day by Lamourette, the constitutional bishop of Lyons, who thought it ridiculous to believe in the existence of a God. "If," said this new Gallican prelate, "we can only agree among ourselves, there is nothing to alarm us, nothing that can resist us. There have been and there still will be proposed extraordinary state measures to put an end to the divisions which rend France, and which induce foreign powers to believe that we have fallen to the lowest point of weakness. But not one of the objects hitherto proposed can attain the desired end, because there is not one of them that is central, or that ascends to the true source of our evils. That source, which must be stopped, is the division that reigns in the National Assembly itself. The legislative body is the real thermometer of the nation: it is here that rests the lever which moves the great machine of the state, and which, when ill directed, produces the complication of movement that destroys the state. And can it be! You have in your own hands the key of the public salvation, and are seeking painfully for that salvation in uncertain laws, and are refusing to adopt the means of re-establishing peace and union in your own bosom!" He shuddered to think that a reconciliation of political antagonists and a union of parties should be considered impracticable. Honest men, though they might employ different means, could only aim at one end, and must always meet on the road of probity and honour. Surely, then, nothing could be so easy as to bring about a most beautiful and solemn moment, and to offer to France and to Europe a spectacle so redoubtable to the enemies of liberty, so sweet and heart-moving to all the friends of liberty! How simple was the difference! One part of the Assembly attributed to the other the seditious design of destroying monarchy; the other party attributed to their colleagues the design of destroying constitutional equality, and introducing the aristocratic form of government known under the name of two chambers. "Well, then," exclaimed Lamourette, raising his voice to the enthusiasm key, "let us fulminate, gentlemen, by a common execration and an irrevocable oath, let us fulminate both the republic and the system of two chambers!" The great hall of the Riding-School re-echoed with the unanimous and enthusiastic applauses of the members and the gallery mobs, and many times the cry was repeated, "Yes, yes, we will only have the constitution as it is!" "Then," added the constitutional bishop, "let us swear to have but one mind and one sentiment, to unite and confound ourselves in the one sole and same mass of free men, equally averse and redoubtable to the spirit of anarchy, and to the spirit of aristocracy; and the moment that foreigners see that we only wish for one fixed thing, and that we all wish it, will be the moment in which liberty shall triumph and France be saved." The same applauses recommenced, and continued for some time. "And therefore, M. le President," said Lamourette, in conclusion, "I demand that you put to the house this simple proposition: 'Let all those who equally abjure and execrate the republic and the government with two chambers rise!'" Never was coup de baguette, never was harlequin's wand more promptly followed by a universal movement and change of position. All the members rose simultaneously, and putting themselves in the attitude of swearing, dans l'attitude du serment, they all swore never to suffer, either by the introduction of the republican system or by the establishment of two chambers, any alteration whatever in the constitution. The galleries, all electrified, shouted and applauded, and swore like the deputies. Then rose the cry of "Union, re-union, a brotherly union!" and the members of the côté gauche, as if by a spontaneous movement, ran over to the côté droit, and lovingly embraced and sat down among those old adversaries; and the members of the côté droit ran over to the côté gauche and did the like. All the parties were intermixed: Jaucourt was seen fraternising with Merlin, Dumas with Bazire, Genoué with Calvet; and for some time there was nothing but hugging and cheek-kissing, and mutual protestations of eternal friendship. Empty protestations, Judas kisses!—and yet not all so, for it is in the nature of Frenchmen to be carried away by momentary impulses, to rush into everything that makes a dramatic scene; and, doubtless, their feeling of the present danger might, for the moment, make them very much alive to the necessity of some agreement among themselves. When "the sweet sensations" had had their course, a Feuillant member proposed that a report of what had passed should be sent to the king by a deputation of twenty-four members, as when the Assembly was re-united the legislative power ought to be re-united also. Then Brissot, who had prepared a long-winded oration to prove that nothing could save France but the king's déchéance or dethronement, begged to say that, after so touching a spectacle as that which had just been witnessed, he could not find it in his heart to pronounce a discourse which might re-awaken discord and bad feeling; and that he must put off the reading till to-morrow. The Assembly decreed that all the administrative bodies of Paris and all the judicial bodies should be summoned to the bar to learn the perfect reconciliation which had taken place, and to transmit the report of it to their fellow-citizens. "This," said Bazire, "will restore tranquillity to all Paris." Carnot thought it would give joy and peace to all France, and prove to the nation that the constitution as at present established would never be changed. The return of the deputation sent to the Tuileries was almost immediately followed by the arrival of the king, attended by all his ministers. Once more, and for the last time in that place, the cry of "Vive le Roi" was coupled with that of "Vive la nation." With the holloest faith of all—for Louis had not been carried away by any momentary enthusiasm, and was physically and morally incapable of such transports—for Louis well knew that the reconciliation would be as suddenly destroyed as it had been made—for Louis never believed that the constitution as it was could be other than a curse to him and to his country, and the ruin of the church and religion he most devoutly revered—for Louis felt to-day as he had felt yesterday, that nothing but an armed interference could save him and his family from destruction, and France from anarchy and atheism—he stood at the president's right hand and said—"Gentlemen, the most touching spectacle to my heart is that of the reunion of all parties and wills for the good of the country. I have for a long time desired this salutary moment; my prayer is now fulfilled. The nation and their king are but one. Both have the same end in view. Their reunion will save France. The constitution as it is ought to be the rallying-point of all Frenchmen. We ought all of us to defend it; the king will ever set you the example." The applauses and the cries of "Vive la nation! Vive le roi!" were renewed. Then the president made an answer conformable, telling the king that from this happy union would proceed the force necessary to vanquish the tyrants that had coalesced against the French and liberty and equality; and then the king appeared to be much moved. After a dead silence, which was the rarest thing in that Assembly, and which must have been very short, Louis said that he had impatiently expected the arrival of the deputation to be enabled to run to the Assembly, to express his great happiness; and then he bowed and retired in the midst of faces radiant with joy, and of tremendous shouts of applause. But this very evening the smooth stream was ruffled and driven into fresh eddies and whirlpools by Pétion's business, which was not yet settled, and by the king's confirming the temporary suspension pronounced against the mayor by the directory of the department; and, when the deputies re-assembled after dinner, the mob outside the House and the mob within cried furiously to them, "Give us back Pétion! Give us back our virtuous mayor! Down with the directory of the department! Send their president la Rochefoucauld to Orleans!" The following day was a Sunday; the Assembly did not meet; the patriots and patriotesses grew hotter and hotter about the affair of Pétion; the touching reconciliation of the preceding day was forgotten, or only mentioned to be called "the kiss of Lamourette," or "the kiss of Judas," or "the Norman reconciliation"—which last was proverbially the commencement of a fresh and a more furious quarrel. And, if the Assembly did not meet, the Jacobin Club met this Sunday evening, and in great force, to make havoc with the priest and his project. Billaud-Vareanes, one of the many mouth-pieces of Robespierre, bade all true Jacobins beware of the deep treachery that lay hid under this plan of reconciliation. "Although," said he, "there have been transports of joy in the National Assembly, I can bring nothing to this tribune but sinister and mournful presentiments. A re-union of all the parties has been effected in the bosom of the legislative body. But the first objection which this strange kissing and embracing gives rise to, is to know whether it is or whether it can be sincere. . . . I speak as I think: to see such a deputy of the Assembly throwing himself into the arms of such another, is like seeing Nero embrace Britannicus, is like seeing Charles IX. giving his hand to Coligny, whom he caused to be assassinated! The eve of all the great conspiracies against our liberty has been celebrated by perjured reconciliations and reunions. The massacre on the altar of the country in the Champ de Mars was introduced by a reconciliation of the sort. These Judases never give kisses but to deliver their victims, the people, to destruction! When I see the Assembly inviting the king, who is inviting foreign armies to Paris, to witness and be a party to this Lamourette reconciliation, what can I think of it? And how can this sudden reconciliation agree with the spirit of the republican federates who are coming to Paris to make a new federation feast? How can we believe that this new nonsensical oath can put the country out of danger? Will this theatrical scene stop the marching of the Austrians and Prussians? They may swear eternal friendship and concord as they like, but will this make Lafayette less a traitor and scoundrel than he is? . . . The honest men in the Assembly have been duped, and the patriots will be laid under the sharp knife of the guillotine by this reconciliation; for now, to dwell upon the treasons of the court, to unveil its manœuvres, to give warning of its plots, will be to pass for an anti-royalist and republican, as an execrated and an execrable citizen. I say that, from the very beginning of our revolution down to this day, there has never been a more cunning plot than this! . . . And yet not one patriot member of the Assembly could perceive the snare! Even if they had had all the money of the civil list spread under their eyes, the most corrupt and greedy members ought at least to have reflected that men cannot walk blindfold on the brink of a precipice without imminent danger to themselves. . . . The people must not be deceived for a moment by this reconciliation! If the country is to be saved, it is only the people that can save it. Let them meet and act, and exterminate our enemies! Against crowned brigands and devourers of men, Hercules and his club are needed!" The club ordered that this speech from Billaud-Vareanes should be immediately printed and sent to all the affiliated societies.

In the course of the same Sunday, Brissot, in his newspaper, spoke suspiciously of the reconciliation; and almost as soon as the Assembly met on Monday morning (July 9th), he began to read his promised discourse, which contained the most dreadful denunciations against the court, and a frank recommendation of the salutary measure of déchéance or dethronement, to which Vergniaud and Condorcet had precluded on the 3rd and 6th. After drawing a most alarming picture of the horrors of invasion, Brissot, who had been sighing and dying for a republic ever since the revolution commenced, exclaimed, "The country is in danger, not because it wants troops, not because its troops are not courageous, its frontiers badly fortified, its resources inconsiderable. . . . No! It is in danger because its forces have been paralysed. And who has paralysed them? One sole man; that man whom the constitution has taken for its chief, but whom perfidious counsellors have made our enemy! You are told to fear the Kings of Hungary and Prussia; but I tell you that the principal force of those kings is in our own court, and that it is at the Tuileries that we must first beat them. You are told to strike down the refractory priests all over the kingdom. . . . But I tell you that to strike at the court of the Tuileries is to strike all the priests with one blow. You are told you ought to pursue all the men of intrigue, all the factious, all the conspirators. . . . And I tell you that all these will disappear, if you only strike the cabinet of the Tuileries: for that cabinet is the point where the threads of all intrigues end, is the place where all plots and conspiracies are hatched, and from which every evil impulse is given! The nation has been too long the sport of this cabinet. This is the secret of our position, this is the source of all our woe: it is here that we must apply our remedies." These remedies, according to his prescription, were to include a searching inquiry into the conduct of the king and his ministers, the severe and immediate punishment of Lafayette for his late escapade to Paris and his conduct while there, and the instant proclamation of "The country in danger." He exalted the usefulness and the past services of the popular societies or political clubs, forgetting that he and his party had lost all influence in the Jacobins, and that a deadly hatred like Robespierre's was not to be moderated by Lamourette kisses, or by extorted compliments, or any other means that he or his Girondists could command. Brissot did not yet venture to pronounce the direct proposition of déchéance; but everybody understood his meaning. He had scarcely finished his harangue when the terrified ministers, who had been summoned to give an account of the state of the kingdom, appeared at the bar to be bullied and baited, and then hooted out. They were asked whether they believed that the country was not in danger; and, as their answers were not satisfactory, they were interrupted, insulted, and told to return on the morrow at twelve o'clock, with full and proper reports as to the means of defending the kingdom against invasion. And on the morrow, the 10th of July, the ministers, in evident dread of their lives, which had been threatened by the galleries and by the mob outside, re-appeared in the House to state the actual strength of the army and navy, and to announce that they had all of them that morning given in their resignations to the king, seeing that, "in such an order of things, or rather, in such an overthrow of all order, it was impossible for them to do any good, or to defend the kingdom against that anarchy which threatened to swallow up everything." And, having said these dangerous words, they rushed out of that terrible Riding-School, like men who had set fire to a train of gunpowder. The Girondists and Jacobins were thrown into transports of joy, for the resignation and the confession of ministers would justify in the eyes of the people the decree that the country was in danger, and the issuing of that decree could hardly fail to hurry on the glorious crisis. On the morning of the 11th, after a report read from the select committee of twelve by Herault-de-Sechelles, the tremendous decree was voted and issued in these terms:—

"Numerous troops are advancing towards our frontiers. All those who hold liberty in horror are arming against our constitution.

"CITIZENS! THE COUNTRY IS IN DANGER.

"Let those who shall obtain the honour of marching first to defend all that they have most dear, ever remember that they are Frenchmen and free; let their fellow-citizens maintain at their homes the security of person and property; let the magistrates of the people watch attentively; let all classes, in a calm courage, the attribute of true strength, wait, before they act, the signal of the law, and the country will be saved."—This was followed by an address of the Assembly to the army, and by another address to the French people in general, who were told to arm and make haste to save liberty and their country, and to keep their oath to live free or die. This last address, in fact, repeated to the people, with a slight difference in the wording, the axioms which Billaud-Varennès had delivered in the Jacobin Club on the evening of the 8th:* it called upon the masses to take the business into their own hands, and it assured them that for four years they had been struggling against despotism, &c., and that liberty could only be saved by their own majestic force and sublime character. At the same time the Assembly declared themselves in permanent session, with the usual declarations and oaths that they would never adjourn until the country was got into a safer condition. Moreover, all the municipalities and civil authorities of the kingdom were ordered to put themselves in permanent surveillance; and every citizen who was in a condition to carry arms, and who had already served in the national guards, was called out. Subsequently the staff of the Paris national guard was entirely re-modelled, the respectability battalions were intermixed with pikemen, and a fresh and extensive manufacture of pikes was ordered all over the kingdom, to make up for the deficiency in muskets and bayonets. On the night of the 11th Bazire and other Jacobins told the Assembly that they must discharge all the juges-de-paix of Paris, who were nothing but aristocrats and royalists in disguise; and Chabot announced that it would be very proper and expedient to send the late minister of justice to Orleans. The late ministry had prohibited the federates from marching to Paris, and had even commanded the civil and military authorities to stop them on their march, and send them back to their homes by force; but the federates, only pressed the more urgently by Girondists and Jacobins to come, and to come in sufficient numbers to form the patriot camp of 20,000 men, now began to arrive from various quarters. On this very evening a party of federates from Rochefort were admitted to the bar to present their homages to the Assembly, and to demand the instant impeachment of Lafayette. Other parties presented themselves on the morrow; and thus they continued to arrive day after day, though, for some time, not in such numbers as the patriots expected and earnestly desired. On the 12th, while the Assembly was regulating the forms and ceremonies to be observed at the approaching fête in the Champ de Mars, three or four deputations of federates harangued in the House in the most republican style; and an address was read from the council-general of the commune of Marseilles, calling upon the Assembly to pronounce not merely sentence of déchéance against Louis XVI., but a sentence of death upon all monarchy and sovereignty except that of the people. This hot paper, which, if not written, had been dictated or suggested by Barbaroux and the other Marseilles republicans that were in such close league and amity with the republicaness Madame Roland and her husband, did not in the slightest degree mince matters. It said that eternal reason shows that the laws relating to royalty, imposed by the Constituent on the Legislative Assembly, were in contradiction to the rights of man; and that it was time the nation should govern itself. It quoted the Rights of Man—the natural and imprescriptible rights, as liberty, property, security, and resistance to oppression. All citizens being born equal, and remaining equal in rights, how could the Constituents, their predecessors, lay it down that royalty should be delegated hereditarily to the reigning race by order of primogeniture? What had this reigning race done to be preferred to every other race of men? What was its moral character in the midst of a regenerated people? Why had the Constituent made a law for declaring the person of one man inviolable? Could this inviolability guarantee him from the knife of an assassin? Was not this inviolability a principle subversive of equality and of every principle of the Rights of Man? Where was the sage, where the member of the Constituent Assembly, that could say that the son of the best of kings might not be the greatest of scoundrels? And what were the obligations the French people had to this privileged reigning race? What were its services to the country? It had kept the people for ages under the yoke, and had ruled with a rod of iron. It could only count a succession of men loaded with vice and crime. Would the people any longer rely on a man who had the incurable habit of tyranny, and who would soon join his brothers beyond the frontiers to wage the fiercest of wars against liberty and the people? How, while the nation was suppressing, upsetting, destroying all the monuments of tyranny and servitude, could it bend the knee before a perjured family!" In concluding, it mentioned the monstrosity of the civil list, of the suspensive veto, &c., and said, "Legislators, avow that your predecessors the Constituents have constituted nothing; and if you would be anything, if you would respond to the wishes of the nation, abrogate at once a law which reduces you to nothing and the people to nothing; which you can destroy by and with the people, and which the duty of self-preservation will no longer permit the people to suffer. Let the executive power be chosen and dismissed by the people, like the other functionaries, and let no more credit be given to those culpable maxims which tend to make it be believed that an hereditary king can represent the nation!" The galleries applauded and shouted; but none shouted so loudly as the federates that had come up from the departments. A great number of members, however, rose all together, and with signs of great indignation, to reprobate this republican manifesto, and call down vengeance on the heads of its authors. One of them reminded the Assembly how very often they had sworn to maintain the constitution as it was, and how recently, at the Lamourette reconciliation, they had, by a solemn declaration, devoted to execration every project for altering the constitution: he thought the offence, in the present case, the more serious and unpardonable, as it proceeded from a constituted authority, the council of a commune who had all signed their names to the paper; and he concluded by moving that these individuals should be all brought to the bar to answer for their audacious libel. But the galleries expressed their strong disapprobation, and several Girondist and Jacobin members cried down the motion, and proposed a variety of new ones. One of them said that the Marseilles address ought to be set aside for the present, or referred to the next Legislative Assembly; another thought that it ought to be submitted immediately to the extraordinary committee of twelve; and several of them joined in recommending the order of the day. Lacroix quoted a rule, which the Assembly had lately laid down, that every address or petition of this kind should be referred to the committee of twelve, insisting vehemently that they were bound to adhere to, this rule in the present case. He was cheered by the galleries, and especially by the federates there stationed, and who, at every move, took a direct part in the debate. Several members of the côté droit, exceedingly provoked at these provincial patriots, demanded furiously that they should be called to order, and reprimanded for their unconstitutional insolence. "It is very astonishing," said Lacroix, "that members of this Assembly should thus brave the federates!" "It is very astonishing," replied Girardin, "that the federates should brave the Assembly, and that the soldiers of the law and liberty should show no respect to the deliberations of their legislators!" The president, who also got into a passion, said, "I announce to the federated citizens, that the Assembly, by a decree, forbids all citizens in the galleries to express either approbation or disapprobation; and I remind the members of the Assembly, who ought to set the example of decency and calmness, that it is the president alone who has the right of calling the galleries to order." At an earlier stage of the debate the president had ordered the commander of the national guards on duty at the Hall to place four sentinels in each division of the galleries; but this order had produced no visible effect. After a terrible hurricane, it was decided that the Marseilles address should be forthwith referred to the committee of twelve. Other addresses were presented from the commune of Lille, from the department of the Lower Rhine, from the commune of Metz, &c., representing the imminent danger to which the country was exposed, and the imperative necessity of adopting the most vigorous methods for satisfying and uniting the people, who continued impressed with the belief that the king and the commanders of the French armies were betraying them. To keep up the ferment, to madden brains that were mad enough without, the Jacobins had a grand meeting on the 13th, when Camille Desmoulins commenced operations by announcing that a bloody plot was on the point of breaking out; that Luckner had been seen in Paris, and that Lafayette had secretly returned there that very morning. To-morrow, the anniversary of the taking of the Bastille, was to be consecrated to the fête of the new federation. Was Lafayette come to make another and a more fearful massacre in the Champ de Mars? Or were he and Luckner only come to steal away the king, and carry him to the Austrian camp? He (Camille) thought that this last measure, which must lead to many massacres, was the motive of their coming; and he read several letters, and among them what he called an intercepted letter of the queen, to support his opinion, and to convince the Jacobins how necessary it was to watch the Tuileries. Merlin and Chabot followed Camille, the ex-capuchin vowing that he had seen a letter from Lafayette to the queen, in which that traitor announced that he would be in Paris on the 13th, when all would go well if the court would only be bpld. Chabot also settled where the provincial federates should meet on the morrow morning before marching to the Champ de Mars. "These true patriots," said he, "can only meet in the Faubourg St. Antoine, and form into line with the conquerors of the Bastille; for they did not come to Paris to federate with the court and the gentlefolks of Lafayette. No! They came to federate with the sans-culottes, to fraternise with the people of Paris, and assist them with their vigorous arms in extirpating despotism and annihilating tyrants!" Robespierre, whose eloquence was never so effective as when instilling suspicion and dread, followed the ex-capuchin. He hoped that the federates, the Jacobin Society, and all patriots were convinced that there was some frightful plot, and were prepared to be on the alert. He knew for a certainty that the ex-war-minister Narbonne had been for some days in the capital, and that an aide-de-camp of Lafayette's and other suspicious persons had been seen prowling about the court and city. He could not possibly believe that it was for nothing these known conspirators came into the heart of the capital at the critical moment of this federation. He would not take it upon himself to say how these conspirators meant to begin their infernal work. All that he was certain of was that Lafayette was meditating a grand state crime, which he would endeavour to throw upon the Jacobins. Everybody knew how cunning Lafayette was in inventing prettexts for employing muskets and bayonets against the people. Could the federates, who had come up to Paris with such pure principles, with such severe principles, do anything better than unmask the false patriots that were sitting in the Assembly, and find instantly the means of punishing a traitor like Lafayette, whose existence was incompatible with the existence of liberty and tranquillity in France? He hoped the federates would not disappoint the high hopes which had been founded upon them and their arrival. He had drawn up an address to the federates, telling them that the country was in danger, only because the country was betrayed; that they were the last great hope of the country; that they had not come merely to get up a spectacle; that their mission was to save the state and reform the constitution; that they ought only to swear fidelity to the nation and to themselves, omitting those parts of the old ridiculous oath which included bad laws and the name of a king, &c. Danton boldly announced that the federates were not to separate after the fête, but to invite others to join them, so as to form a formidable camp somewhere near Paris. He also recommended a supplementary oath to be taken by the federates—an oath never to separate until all the wishes of the people were accomplished, &c. As for the king's veto upon the camp, Danton thought it was only worthy of attention as a proof of the royal intention to betray the country, and leave the capital open to the Austrians and Prussians.

On the morning of the 14th the federates, who did not exceed four or five thousand men (but more were on the road, who cared not for the festival, but were determined to strike a blow as soon as they came), assembled in the faubourg St. Antoine with the most desperate of the sans-culottes; the pike-men and pike-women were admitted into the ranks of the national guards, whose commanders had been all changed; the gendarmierie on foot and horseback, and all the troops of the line then in Paris, drew up on the boulevards; and from the square of the Bastille to Port St. Martin nothing was seen but troops and an armed multitude, the rough pikes being rather more numerous than the bayonets. Some of Lafayette's respectability battalions were observed to be sadly thinned; the bankers, the stock-brokers, the merchants, the lawyers, the men of property or gentlemanly habits, had refused to serve under the sans-culotte commandants that had been appointed. About the hour of noon a deputation of the National Assembly, headed by the president, went in procession to the site of the Bastille, and there, in the midst of warlike music and shouts that were heard leagues off, they laid the foundation-stone of a column dedicated to liberty, which was to be very majestic and very classical, but which, like so many other works projected in the enthusiasm of the moment, was never finished. When the stone was laid, a faubourg orator delivered an harangue upon this text—"All the kings of the earth are conspiring against us; therefore let us swear the ruin of all kings." After this gratifying ceremony the troops and the federates, and the municipal officers, and all manner of constituted bodies fell into order, according to the programme which the Assembly had voted, and began to march slowly towards the Champ de Mars, with the tables of the Rights of Man, with statues of liberty, and incense burning before them, with caps of liberty on pikes and tremendous long poles, with a murderous-looking broad-sword, called the sword of the law, on a table covered with crape, and carried by men dressed all in black, and wearing cypress wreaths on their heads. Nearly every man wore on his hat the words "Long live Pétion!" or "Pétion or Death!" The virtuous mayor, who had only been reinstated in his mayoralty by decree of the Assembly the night before, was the real hero or idol of this feast, as Lafayette had been of the federation of 1790; but, although the blinking eyes of Pétion could not see it, his glory had reached the culminating point. The wretched king, who had not been able to prevent this new federation, made up his wavering mind to be present at it, with some most faint hope that, by showing himself in the midst of the people and these much-dreaded federates from the provinces, and by protesting and taking fresh oaths, he might turn the ceremony to his own advantage, disarm the popular animosity, and still that terrible cry for déchéance, which could only be a synonyme for death. The queen, who showed on every occasion a determination to share in the dangers of her husband, insisted upon accompanying him. They both expected that attempts would be made upon their lives by some fanatic assassins. Since the irruption into the Tuileries on the 20th of June, Louis had worn under his waistcoat a plastron, or quilted breast-piece, which had been provided by Madame Campan. It had been proved by daggers and pistol-bullets. They wished the queen to wear a similar defence, but she refused, replying to the tears and entreaties of Madame Campan that the blow of an assassin would be happiness for her, as it would deliver her from a most miserable existence. They took the little Dauphin with them to the Champ de Mars, where they arrived long before the procession, and where they were kept waiting, without receiving one sign of respect or good-will, except from a few timid hirelings whom Bertrand de Molleville had paid to cry "Vive la Reine" when the queen should hold up the Dauphin in her arms to show him to the people. The Champ de Mars was surrounded with eighty or more pieces of artillery; and every inscription, emblem, or device looked like a threat and a malediction to royalty. The wooden altar of the country, which had been done up anew by the scene-painters and upholsterers of the theatres, was decorated with red caps of liberty: opposite to it was a lugubrious pyramid covered with cypress and yew, and bearing the inscription, "To the Citizens who have died for their country on the frontiers. Tremble, tyrants, we are rising to avenge them!" and in another direction, in the midst of the Champ de Mars, there was a tall Mai, or tree of liberty, hung all round with scutcheons, cordons of the suppressed orders of knighthood, helmets and emblazonries, intertwined with chains and fetters; and at the foot of this tall liberty-tree were heaped, as materials for a great bonfire, kingly crowns and coronets of all kinds, genealogy books, parchment titles of nobility, doctors' bonnets, judges' ermines, and lawyers' bags stuffed full of paper—all to be consumed, with all the abominations that hung upon the pole, as a type and assurance of the completion of the revolution now at hand. Besides this loaded liberty-tree, there were eighty-three other trees, one for each department, surmounted by red caps and tricolor streamers, and inscriptions appropriate to the occasion. At last—at about five o'clock in the evening—the multitudinous procession, loosely estimated at from 400,000 to 500,000 men, women, and children, began to arrive, deafening the royal ear with shouting "Long life to Pétion! Pétion or Death!" and revolting the strong religious feelings of the king by filling the air with church incense, burnt before the only god of the French, the plaster-of-Paris image of Liberty. When the federates and the pikemen, the national guards and the troops of the line, had volleyed their oaths, as if they had been firing shot at the enemy, the king proceeded on foot, from a tent which had been pitched for him and his family, to the deal altar of the country to swear again to that constitution which was falling all to pieces, and which was so soon to bury him and his under its ruins. Necker's daughter saw him quit the tent and his wife and child, and did not expect to see him return alive, for the mob pressed round him, and seemed rushing to annihilate him from every quarter. But Louis walked firm and erect, uninjured except by words, and he ascended the mock altar, as the noblest of martyrs may have mounted the scaffold or embraced the stake. These were the moments of his greatness—but then followed the littleness and moral bathos of the oath, which a martyr of old would scarcely have sworn. The president of the Assembly and a host of other functionaries committed, knowingly and wilfully, the same act of perjury, in the midst of cannonading, shouting, and Ça Ira singing. Louis then descended, and traversed again the confused mass of the people, which rolled and roared like the Bay of Biscay in a storm. These people never saw him again until they saw him, firm and composed even as he now was, upon the guillotine scaffold in the Place Louis XV., renamed "Place de la Revolution." "Never," says Madame de Staël, "will the expression of the queen's countenance be effaced from my memory! Her eyes were filled with tears; the splendour of her dress and the dignity of her carriage contrasted in the most striking manner with all the people and things that surrounded her. Nothing but some national guards separated her from the populace; the armed men, collected in the Champ de Mars, looked as if they had met not for a fête, but for an insurrection." No order was preserved; the unarmed mob was mixed with the armed mob and the troops; pikes, bayonets, clubs, all were huddled together; and all the countenances that did not express hatred and fury, and a fanaticism excited to the utmost, bore the expression of doubt, suspicion, terror. The slightest accident, any one of those occurrences which so commonly attend such immense assemblages of people, would, from the state men's minds were in, have led to a scene of havoc and slaughter—would have left that Champ de Mars and the quays on the

Seine littered with wounded and dead. As soon as the swearing was over, a large portion of those who had only come out to see a sight went homeward, giving vent to their disappointment and their criticisms on such a triste spectacle. Those who remained behind set to dancing the Carmagnole: the great bonfire, that was to be, was quite forgotten, and the liberty-tree, with all its scutcheons and emblems of royalty and feu-dality, left standing. At last somebody thought of this great political lesson; and some patriot deputies of the Assembly, Girondists and Jacobins mixed, with the great Gensonné and the as great Jean Debrie at the head of them, took torches in their hands, and set fire to the heap.* The king returned to the Tuileries in the midst of a crowd, where no one cried God bless him, but where every one was straining his throat for Pétion. The mayor's creatures, Manuel, Couthon, and some other patriots of that deep Jacobin hue, were also applauded. All the spectators, not even excepting the few who took an interest in the king's fate, regarded this triumph of Pétion as the forerunner of the ruin of Louis, or rather of his final destruction, for he and his cause had been ruined long before this gloomy feast of pikes. The queen saw and said that all was lost.† If the federates had been in greater numbers, the great blow would have been struck on this very day; and Louis, in all probability, would not have returned alive to the Tuileries. But five hundred Swiss guards, who were not like the Swiss of the Château-Vieux regiment, three hundred gens d'armes, and some three thousand national guards, who were fancied to be devoted to the king, and ready to die for him, imposed some respect. If a royalist writer is to be believed, these brave friends offered to form a moving rampart round Louis and his family, and to carry them out of Paris, and for some distance along the road to the northern frontiers: they conjured the king not to neglect this the last chance of escape, and were grieved when they saw him reject their bold plan (far too bold for poor Louis) and return quietly to his palace, which had been for so long a time his prison.‡

After the feast of the federation or of pikes, the federates began to flock into Paris in greater numbers. The cause of their delay had been their want of money: cash was now sent from the capital, patriotic subscriptions were opened in all the Jacobin clubs of the kingdom, and anon the Assembly voted them thirty sous a-day per man. These federates were, for the most part, as desperate as poverty and Jacobin fanaticism could make them. They had all been indoctrinated in the provincial clubs, and were quite ready to do whatever the clubs might recommend. We have already caught some glimpses of them in the galleries of the Assembly; but in course of time, as they became more numerous, they took, with the consent or approval of the Girondists and the Jacobins of the Assembly, entire possession of those galleries, to the exclusion of all other citizens and citizenesses. From this moment the legislature was under the absolute control of the pikes. Taking, in many guises, the supplementary oath recommended by Danton, the federates swore they would not march to the frontiers until they had destroyed the enemies of liberty in the interior. At the same time the Assembly, not professing any longer an unmeaning respect for the executive, or for a constitution laid prostrate in the dirt, re-organised all the regiments of the line that were in or near to Paris, formed the soldiers of the terrible ex-Gardes Françaises into a corps of gendarmerie, gave their orders directly to the regiments, and even ordered the Swiss guard, whose fidelity to the king was unquestionable, to march to the frontiers. The new cabinet, which Louis had formed with extreme difficulty, and without any hope of their being able to act ministerially, or to do him any service, had scarcely had courage enough to represent that the constitution left the command of the public forces to the sovereign, or to offer any remonstrance; but M. d'Affry, the commander of the Swiss, quoted the capitulations under which he and his countrymen served in France, proving that they were not bound to march to the frontiers, and positively refusing to quit Paris, or their service near the person of the king, for which alone they had been engaged. While the Assembly thus managed the war department, the Jacobins dictated how it ought to be managed, and made their preparations for changing all things in France, through the agency of terror and the guillotine. The federates formed themselves into a central committee in one of the apartments of the Jacobins in the Rue St. Honoré. The avowed object of this central committee, which soon took the name of Comité Insurrectionnel, was to bring about a popular insurrection in every corner of France. At first, in order that its resolutions and measures might be kept secret, its number was limited to five:—Vaugeois, an apostate priest; Debessé de la Drôme; Gillaume, a professor from Caen; Simon, a newspaper editor from Strasburg; and Galissot de Langres. But, as this number was found insufficient for the immensity of business on hand, fourteen other members were added to this insurrectional committee. Among the chosen fourteen were Carra; Westermann; Santerre, now commandant of all the Faubourg St. Antoine; Alexandre, commandant of the Faubourg St. Marceau, or St. Marcel; Manuel; Camille Desmoulins; and the redoubtable Danton. This precious committee entered into a perfect understanding with mayor Pétion, and also with beau Barbaroux, who was now daily expecting the arrival of his Marseilles band—"six hundred Marseillaise, who knew how to die." Their coup d'état was to burst into the Tuileries, and depose, if not murder, the king; but they wanted some strong stimulus to excite the people—some excessive provocation, which should make the mob alike insensible of fear and of mercy. And how was this to be brought about? What means were there of casting some horrible imputation on the court at this juncture? Chabot pondered, and they all pondered; but the imagination of the ex-capuchin hit upon an admirable expedient. He said that it was much to be wished that the court would attempt to assassinate some patriotic deputy of the National Assembly; but that, as the court was not likely to do any such thing, it would be highly patriotic if some deputy would consent to get himself assassinated, in order that it might be said the court had done it. Little Grangeneuve, the same who had had some foretaste of martyrdom in the beating he got on the Feuillant terrace from Jouneau, took Chabot aside, and said to him, "Your plan is most admirable, and I will be the victim!" Chabot, "with an inspired air," exclaimed, "Ah! my friend, you shall not be alone! I will share that glory with you!" "Well," replied Grangeneuve, "be it as you will: one is enough, but two dead patriots would do still better. Let us settle the means of execution." The ex-capuchin said that he charged himself with the execution; and would find some sure men that would lie in wait by night, between the Jacobin Club and the Tuileries. A day or two after he assured Grangeneuve that he had got everything ready. "Well then," said Grangeneuve, "let the thing be done to-morrow night, between the hours of ten and twelve, as we shall be returning from the committee; but your men must take care to kill us outright, and not merely maim us." The little Girondist lawyer went home, made his last will and testament, &c., and on the following night, at the proper hour, went to the appointed place to get assassinated; but the ex-capuchin had not kept his appointment, nor could Grangeneuve find any man or men posted to murder him; and so was obliged "to return home safe and sound—de rentrer chez lui sain et sauf."* Such is the account given by the high priestess of the Gironde republicans, who holds that the plan was in itself an admirable one, and that Grangeneuve—"the best of men, who had but an ordinary head, but a truly great soul"—acted as a virtuous patriot ought to have acted; but who says that Chabot's conduct was such as might have been expected "from the cowardice of a priest and the hypocrisy of a capuchin." Yet, on the other side, the Jacobin republicans say that it was not their dear brother Chabot, but the poltroonery of Grangeneuve, the Girondist, that spoiled this beautiful project; that the ex-monk kept his appointment like another Brutus, and that the little Bordeaux lawyer skulked home to his bed by a different street.

As the monk or the lawyer broke down in their patriotic design, as one or the other, or, which is far more probable, as both repented at their leisure of the notion which had presented itself in a moment of enthusiasm, of getting themselves assassinated in order to furnish materials for a frightful calumny, it was necessary to think of other means of exciting the people. The federates thought that those public men who were so eager for a republic, and who had already reduced monarchy to its last gasp, ought specifically to point out to them, and the leaders of the sans-culottes, how the last blow was to be struck; but these public men—Girondist and Jacobin members of the Assembly, mayor Pétion, &c.—were anxious that the federates and the sans-culottes should take all the guilt or the risk upon themselves, and proceed as if by their own spontaneous movement. Marat, who was still lying in hiding in the miserable lodging of a poor Parisian attorney, was disgusted and incensed at all this indecision and procrastination. He sent for the Marseillaise Barbaroux, whom he had known in former days, when that French Antinous was studying or dabbling in the physical sciences. He told Barbaroux that the French, after all, were mere children in revolution-making. "Give me," said the hideous, diseased, decrepit wretch, whom one blow from a manly arm would have annihilated, "only give me two hundred Neapolitan bravos, with daggers in one hand, and muffs over the other for shields, and with them I will traverse all France, and make the revolution!" The Assembly, he said, ought to order every aristocrat to wear a white riband on his arm, so that the people might know them all. "But," added he, "the people, without any such mark, can hardly go wrong, if they fall upon all such as have horses and carriages, valets, and sumptuous dresses, and all such as frequent the theatres; for surely these are all aristocrats!" Beau Barbaroux went away horrified: not that he, and the party with whom he was acting, would have objected to a copious blood-letting, but that Marat, in his impetuosity, let out the secret that he considered the Girondists as no better democrats than the noblesse, the court, the Feuillants, and all the other classes not rabble and sans-culottes; and that he was foredooming them all alike to the guillotine and the pikes. Finding that Barbaroux was not his man, Marat sought out Robespierre; but the impression left by his conferences with that great Jacobin was, that he had not courage sufficient to put himself at the head of the people, and work out the grand system by massacres and executions. He then saw Danton, and thought better of his spirit; but Danton was at this moment in the pay of the court, who continued this hopeless means of self-defence, though no one of the numerous men they had bribed or paid had ever done them the least good. He could not wish that the source which supplied him abundantly with the means of revelry and debauchery (in all respects Danton was a coarse resemblance of Mirabeau) should be stopped and dried for ever: his enthusiasm for a republic was of a less impatient kind than the enthusiasm of his friends; and, after all, Danton's personal courage was rather problematical. Marat now saw, like the rest of them, that they must wait events and accidents. Upon certain conditions, the Girondists would yet have negotiated with the king, and would have duped that helpless, wretched sovereign into the belief that they were yet strong enough to save him. They knew that the present cabinet, which was never completed, could not stand many weeks.

* Madame Roland, Mémoires.

They dreaded the Jacobins, and hated them as much as ever. If Louis would reinstate the Gironde ministry, and submit entirely to the will of that party—if he would only stop the marching of the Prussians and Austrians, dismiss Lafayette, &c.—they would yet support the throne, keep off in the Assembly the discussion of the question of déchéance, and join the court, the Feuillants, and the moderate party called the centre, in curbing and chastising the insolence of the Jacobins. A secret negotiation to this end was actually carried on by Brissot, Guadet, Gensonné, and Vergniaud, through the intermedium of one Boze, portrait-painter to Louis XVI., and Thierry, a valet-de-chambre at the Tuileries; and it was not suspended, but apparently in full progress, when the federates from Marseilles, and sundry other agencies, interrupted it, and buried it, with a hundred other schemes and intrigues, in a chaos of confusion and blood. When Danton saw that the court must be destroyed, he resolved to have part in its destruction.

Though not disposed to join in the march against the Tuileries with the federates and sans-culottes, Robespierre certainly laboured more than any man to hasten that great event. On the 17th of July, when the Assembly, on the report and recommendation of Carnot, had just decreed that the army should be increased to half a million of men, some of the federates appeared at the bar to deliver a tremendous discourse which had been written for them by Robespierre, and which demanded the instant suspension of the executive power and the condign punishment of Lafayette. He continued these attacks in the clubs and in his newspaper, endeavouring to show that the real friends of liberty ought to begin with the punishment of the arch-traitor who had so recently insulted them within the very walls of Paris. After long deliberations, the legislative committee of the Assembly pronounced, on Saturday the 21st of July, that they had not yet found sufficient grounds of accusation against Lafayette; and thereupon the Assembly agreed to adjourn that great question. Robespierre had foreseen what would happen, and had taught the people what they ought to do in such a case. The tocsin was sounded in the suburbs; the Assembly was surrounded by an immense multitude, threatening vengeance to all that dared interpose between their wrath and the objects of it; the scenes of the 20th of June were on the point of being renewed, when mayor Pétion arrived in a hackney-coach, and told the people that it was not yet time—that they ought not to waste their strength in partial movements; and thereupon the patriots and patriotesses suspended their march to the Tuileries. But on the morrow, which was a Sunday, when all the working-people would be idle and abroad, a grand spectacle was got up, which seemed well calculated to convert these partial movements into a universal and irresistible insurrection. The proclamation of “The country in danger” had been printed and distributed all over

France, but now it was to be proclaimed by heralds and by minute-guns, and with every circumstance and appliance that could make it more impressive and more terrible. Mayor Pétion and his municipals—preceded and surrounded by troops, artillery, trumpets, and deadened drums—went processionally all through Paris, carrying an enormous black banner, inscribed, “Citizens! the country is in danger!” and stopping in all the principal squares or places, while the heralds told the citizens by word of mouth, and with dolorous wailings of trumpets, that the country was in danger—the alarm-cannons firing all the while from Pont Neuf and the arsenal. When the procession was over, one great flag, with the inscription, “Citizens! the country is in danger!” was planted in front of the Hôtel de Ville, and another black flag on the Pont Neuf, there to remain until the legislature should declare the danger to be over. Numerous booths and tents, with smaller flags bearing the same device, “Citizens! the country is in danger!” with red liberty caps on pike-heads, with crowns of laurel and oak leaves, and other emblems and devices, were thrown open in various parts of the city and faubourgs; and in every one of them there was a long table balanced upon drum-heads, and ink, paper, and pens, and three municipal officers to take down the names of all such patriots as would voluntarily enlist and engage to march for the defence of the country. In a very few days ten thousand and more signatures were obtained in these bureaux. But the enlisting patriots were not to march to the frontiers, or to go to meet either Prussians or Austrians: they were to remain in Paris, or at Soissons, or at some other place in the neighbourhood, to join the provincial federates, and form with them that true camp of liberty which had been so long annointed.

Everything seemed now to denote that some terrible dénouement was at hand; and that the people themselves would act for and by themselves. On the morning of the 23rd more federates appeared at the bar of the Assembly to demand the suspension of the king and his immediate trial, and to recommend the immediate assembling of a National CONVENTION, which might pronounce judgment upon “certain pretended articles of the constitution.” Manuel proposed that the people themselves should assemble in the Champ de Mars and make a constitution according to their own interests and notions. An address came up from the town of Angers demanding the déchéance, and a multiplicity of addresses poured in from many parts of the kingdom to intimate that the revolution must go onward, or France and liberty would be lost. On or about the 27th of July the Duke of Brunswick’s manifesto was received, and it was known in Paris that he had commenced his march from Coblenz with the Prussian army, having in his van all the armed emigrants, who were promising themselves a certain victory and a terrible revenge. Contrary to the interest and the wishes of Louis XVI., and the instructions he had given to Mallet-du-Pan, Brunswick's manifesto was of the most fulminatory kind. In its composition the Prussian ministers and Brunswick had listened not to Louis, but to the emigrants, who were altogether incapable of their king's moderation and gentleness, and whose lives, unlike his own, were not at the mercy of the sanguinary Jacobins. The paper began with an exposition of the grievances the allies had suffered, and this is scarcely to be taxed with untruth or exaggeration:—"Their majesties the Emperor and the King of Prussia," said the duke, "having intrusted me with the command of the combined armies assembled on the frontiers of France, I think it my duty to inform the inhabitants of that kingdom of the motives which have influenced the conduct of the two sovereigns, and the principles by which they are guided. After arbitrarily suppressing the rights and invading the possessions of the German princes in Alsace and Lorraine; after having disturbed and overthrown in the interior part of the kingdom all order and lawful government; after having been guilty of the most daring attacks, and having had recourse to the most violent measures, which are still daily renewed against the sacred person of the king and against his august family,—those who have seized on the reins of government have at length filled the measure of their guilt by declaring an unjust war against his majesty the emperor, and by invading his provinces of the Low Countries. Some of the possessions belonging to the German empire have been equally exposed to the same oppression; and many others have only avoided the danger by yielding to the imperious threats of the domineering party and their emissaries. His majesty the King of Prussia, united with his imperial majesty in the bonds of the strictest defensive alliance, and as a preponderant member himself of the Germanic body, could not refuse marching to the assistance of his ally and of his co-estates. It is under this double relation that he undertakes the defence of that monarch and of Germany. To these high interests is added another important object, and which both the sovereigns have cordially in view, which is, to put an end to that anarchy which prevails in the interior parts of France, to put a stop to the attacks made on the throne and the altar, to restore the king to his legitimate power, to liberty and to safety, of which he is now deprived, and to place him in such a situation that he may exercise that legitimate authority to which he is entitled. Convinced that the sober part of the nation detest the excesses of a faction which has enslaved them, and that the majority of the inhabitants wait with impatience the moment when succours shall arrive, to declare themselves openly against the odious enterprises of their oppressors,—his majesty the emperor, and his majesty the King of Prussia, earnestly invite them to return without delay into the paths of reason and of justice, of order and peace." After affirming that the two allied courts, drawn into the present war by irresistible circumstances, had no other object in view than the welfare of France, and had no intention of making conquests, (the language of diplomacy had not been very different when these powers were proceeding to the first and second partition of Poland,) the manifesto went on to declare, 2. "That they (the allies) do not mean to meddle with the internal government of France, but that they simply intend to deliver the king, the queen, and the royal family from their captivity, and to ensure to his most Christian majesty that safety which is necessary for his making, without danger and without obstacles, such convocations as he shall judge proper, and for endeavouring to ensure the welfare of his subjects, according to his promises and to the utmost of his power. 3. That the combined armies shall protect the towns, bourgs, and villages, as well as the persons and property of all those who shall submit to the king; and that they will concur in the immediate restoration of order and police throughout all France. 4. That the national guards are called upon to preserve, provisionally, tranquillity in towns and in the country, to provide for the personal safety and property of all Frenchmen, until the arrival of the troops belonging to their imperial and royal majesties, or until orders be given to the contrary, on pain of being personally responsible: that, on the contrary, such national guards as shall fight against the troops of the two allied courts, and who shall be taken with arms in their hands, shall be treated as enemies, and punished as rebels to their king, and as disturbers of the public peace. 5. That the general officers, the subalterns, and soldiers of the French regular troops are equally called upon to return to their former allegiance, and to submit immediately to the king, their legitimate sovereign. 6. That the members of departments, districts, and municipalities shall be equally responsible, on pain of losing their heads and their estates, for all the crimes, all the conflagrations, all the murders and the pillage which they shall suffer to take place, and which they shall not have, in a public manner, attempted to prevent within their respective territories; that they shall also be obliged to continue their functions until his most Christian majesty, when set at full liberty, shall make further arrangements, or till further orders be given in his name. 7. That the inhabitants of towns, bourgs, and villages who shall dare to defend themselves against the troops of their imperial and royal majesties, and to fire upon them, either in open country, or through half-open doors or windows of their houses, shall be punished instantly, according to the rigorous rules of war, or their houses shall be demolished or burned: on the contrary, all the inhabitants of the said towns, bourgs, and villages who shall readily submit to their king, by opening their gates to the troops belonging to their majesties, shall be immediately taken under their safeguard and protection; their estates, their pro-

erty, and their persons shall be secured by the laws, and each and all of them shall be in full safety. 8. The city of Paris, and all its inhabitants, without distinction, shall be called upon to submit instantly and without delay to the king, to set that prince at full liberty, and to ensure to his, and to all the royal persons, that inviolability and respect which are due by the laws of nature and of nations to sovereigns; their imperial and royal majesties making personally responsible for all events, on pain of losing their heads, pursuant to military trials, without hopes of pardon, all the members of the National Assembly, of the department, of the district, of the municipality, and of the national guards of Paris, justices of peace, and others whom it may concern: and their imperial and royal majesties further declare, on their faith and word of emperor and king, that, if the palace of the Tuileries be forced or insulted, if the least violence be offered, the least outrage done to their majesties, the king, the queen, and the royal family, if they be not immediately placed in safety and set at liberty, they will inflict on those who shall deserve it the most exemplary and ever memorable avenging punishments, by giving up the city of Paris to military execution, and exposing it to total destruction; and the rebels who shall be guilty of illegal resistance shall suffer the punishments which they shall have deserved. Their imperial and royal majesties promise, on the contrary, to all the inhabitants of the city of Paris to employ their good offices with his most Christian majesty to procure for them a pardon for their insults and errors, and to adopt the most vigorous measures for the security of their persons and property, provided they speedily and strictly conform to the above injunctions. Finally, their majesties, not being at liberty to acknowledge any other laws in France except those which shall be derived from the king when at full liberty, protest beforehand against the authenticity of all kinds of declarations which may be issued in the name of the king, so long as his sacred person, and that of the queen, and the princes of the whole royal family, shall not be in full safety; and with this view their imperial and royal majesties invite and entreat his majesty to name a town in his kingdom nearest to the frontiers, to which he would wish to remove, together with the queen and royal family, under a strong and safe escort, which shall be sent for that purpose; so that his most Christian majesty may in perfect safety send for such ministers and counsellors as he may be pleased to name, order such convocations as he shall think proper, and provide for the restoration of order and the regular administration of his kingdom." "In fine," concluded the commander-in-chief of the allied army, "I declare and promise in my own individual name, and in my above quality, to cause to be truly observed everywhere, by the troops under my command, good and strict discipline, promising to treat with mildness and moderation those well-disposed subjects who shall submit peaceably and quietly, and to employ force against those only who shall be guilty of resistance or of manifest evil intentions. I, therefore, call upon and expect all the inhabitants of the kingdom, in the most earnest and forcible manner, not to make any opposition to the troops under my command, but rather to suffer them everywhere to enter the kingdom freely, and to afford them all the assistance and show them all the benevolence which circumstances may require." This manifesto, dated Coblenz, the 25th of July, was followed by an "Additional Declaration," dated Coblenz, July the 27th. The main or sole purport of this latter paper was to seek an additional security for the lives of the royal captives in menaces and terror. "I declare besides," said the Duke of Brunswick, "that if, contrary to all expectation, by the perfidy or baseness of some inhabitants of Paris, the king, the queen, or any other person of the royal family should be carried off from that city, all the places and towns whatsoever which shall not have opposed their passage, and shall not have stopped their proceeding, shall incur the same punishments as those inflicted on the inhabitants of Paris; and the route which shall be taken by those who carry off the king and royal family shall be marked with a series of exemplary punishments, justly due to the authors and abettors of crimes for which there is no remission. All the inhabitants of France in general are to take warning of the dangers with which they are threatened, and which it will be impossible for them to avoid, unless they, with all their might and by every means in their power, oppose the passage of the king and royal family, to whatever place the factions may attempt to carry them. Their imperial and royal majesties will not allow any place of retreat to be the free choice of his most Christian majesty (in case he should comply with the invitation which has been made him), unless that retreat be effected under the escort which has been offered."

These papers, which were issued in the full confidence of an easy victory, and which were intended to terrify the Jacobins, produced an effect directly the contrary—not but that there were fears and panics, and plenty of them;—they filled the French people with fury, and they united them in one will and one determination—to resist the enemies coming from abroad, and to destroy in the interior the alleged cause of their coming. Ferocious before, the Parisians now became mad for blood. Other addresses poured in to the Assembly, with the word "Death" written after déchéance; a strong body of republican federates arrived from Brest; nothing was wanted but the Marseillaise band, that knew still better how to make die than to die themselves. At last, on the 30th of July, these southern heroes arrived, being 516 men well armed and appointed, and having with them three pieces of artillery, and a patriotic song or hymn, the famed and truly spirit-stirring "March of the Marseillaise," which was to produce more effect than all the bad poetry and uncountable speeches that had been written or were to be written here afterwards; which was to cheer the hearts of the French in hundreds of battlefields, and to be continued to be sung by them when its burthen and its sentiments were no longer applicable to their situation, except as a reproach.* They were met at some distance from Paris by beau Barbaroux, brewer commandant Santerre, deputy Merlin, and an infinity of other patriots and republicans, who hugged and kissed them, and conducted them through the Faubourg St. Antoine, and the midst of a cheering, overjoyed multitude to the Hôtel-de-Ville, where they were hugged and kissed anew by Mayor Pétion and his municipals. From the Hôtel-de-Ville they were led to the comfortable barracks of Nouvelle France close by, where they put down their muskets, washed their hands and faces, and brushed the road-dust off their clothes; and then from these barracks they were conducted by deputy Merlin to the Champs Elysées, where a patriotic banquet had been prepared for them.

On their way thither the Marseillaise sang their "Allons, enfans de la patrie," stopped all such citizens as were not wearing the true tricolor cockade—made of worsted, and not of silk, for silk had become a damnable sign of aristocracy—and administered not a few twitches of the nose and kicks behind, the Faubourg St. Antoine following and applauding, or co-operating. Now it happened, by chance or design, that some of the grenadiers of the national guards of the sections Filles St. Thomas and Petits-Pères, or the respectabilities par excellence, were dining this very day at a tavern or restaurateur's hard by in the Champs Elysées. What could happen from this contiguity of fiery particles but a combustion and explosion? And what could be expected but that each party should lay the original provocation to the charge of the other? The grenadiers, who were dining sumptuously like gentlemen, accused the Marseillaise, who were dining like common soldiers, and the faubourg patriots, who were not dining at all, of beginning the scuffle, and said that it was not likely they should have begun the quarrel, as they were only 40 against 516, without counting the rabble who were sure to join the Marseillaise. On the other side—and this was the account

* "Allons, enfans de la patrie, Le jour de gloire est arrivé," &c.

This famed song, which has been heard in every part of the world, and the music of which is still more inspiring than the words, was written, both words and music, by Rouget de Lille, at this time captain of artillery and man of letters. If we except the sea-songs of our Dibdin, perhaps no man ever did so much, in modern times, by song. Rouget's excessive patriotism and republicanism, and the remembrance of the important services he had rendered by his one happy inspiration, could not, however, save him from suspicion and danger in the time of the Reign of Terror. He was thrown into prison by Robespierre, and, like so many others, would have lost his head if that sanguinary dictator had been allowed to live a day or two longer. He was afterwards wounded in the battle with the emigrants at Quiberon, and maltreated by the journalists under the directory, as having been a Jacobin. And under Buonaparte, who would have destroyed all remembrance of his words and of his music if he had been able, he never attained any eminence or consideration, but was left to languish in some garret of Paris, in obscurity, poverty, and idleness. He was alive in 1836; but we believe he is since dead.

adopted by Mayor Pétion, and presented by him to the Assembly—the respectable grenadiers offered an insupportable provocation by drinking such toasts as "Vive le Roi!" "Vive la Reine!" and by singing unpatriotic songs; the citizens, inflamed at this insolence, pelted the grenadiers with mud and stones; the grenadiers called them hard names, and threatened them; and thereupon the citizens and citizenesses cried out, "A nous les Marseillais!" or "Help us, men of Marseilles!" the hot men of the south then rushed out by doors and by windows, leaping over fences and ditches "with an inconceivable agility which astounded and intimidated the grenadiers;" they were presently upon the aristocrats, swords were drawn, several of the grenadiers were wounded, and the rest took to flight—flying where their hearts were, or to the accursed Tuileries.* The wounds and the flight of the respectabilities are indisputable, as is also the fact that one of the fugitives, Duhamel, a sub-lieutenant in his grenadier company, and a stock-broker and money-changer by trade, was wounded in his retreat, and then butchered in a coffee-house to which he fled for refuge. But the federates and their friends say that he provoked and merited his fate, as he carried pocket-pistols, and fired two of them at his pursuers, the brave Marseillaise. They acknowledge, indeed, that poor Duhamel did not hit any one. As the grenadiers approached the Tuileries, the national guards within, who chanced to be of their own respectable battalions, lowered the drawbridge to let them enter, and then raised it quickly to keep out their pursuers. In their haste, however, some of the grenadiers tumbled into the ditch, and there lay in sad plight, for there was more mud than water, and such water as was there was neither so clear nor so sweet as the stream of the Seine. Nearly the whole battalion of the Filles St. Thomas flew to arms to avenge the insult; it is even said that they hauled out some cannon; but this fact rests upon ex-parte evidence, and is, at the best, doubtful. In the evening several of these grenadiers, whose feast had been so disturbed, went in deputation to the Assembly to lodge their complaints and to invoke the vengeance of the laws. They would have done much better to have stayed at home, for the Marseillaise, united with the men of Brest and the other federates that had arrived, crammed the galleries and gave the law; and what could the House do against the galleries, even if the majority in it had not been, as they were, of opinion that the Feuillant banqueters had only got what they deserved. "We were tranquilly dining," said the orator of the grenadiers, "when we were assaulted by a mob. We are men devoted to the constitution and to liberty; we were offering no insult to the constitution, which we cherish; and yet we were assailed by showers of stones! Six hundred madmen—[Here the orator was hooted not only by the galleries, but also by a part of the House]—six hundred Marseillaise next fell upon us with sabres and with pistols! They have assassinated one of our comrades. [So much the better' cried a voice in the galleries.] Others of our brothers were badly wounded. We demand justice: the blood of our brothers cries for vengeance! [Here the orator was called a liar and a rogue, and was hissed and hooted by the galleries.] Legislators, the national guards of Paris have defended you well! You will not, with cold blood, see such assassinations committed under your eyes!" The hissing and the hooting became so terrible that the orator could say no more. The president told him that the Assembly would deliberate; and that in the meantime he and his companions were admitted to the honours of the séance. As they traversed the Hall to take their seats, they were pitilessly hooted by the galleries. The next minute other national guards, who had also been on duty at the Tuileries, but who did not belong to the battalion of Filles St. Thomas, or to the respectability sections, appeared at the bar to depose that the grenadiers had acted both insolently and with cowardice; that the court had certainly set them on, and that the king and queen and the ladies of honour had expressed the most unpatriotic sympathy for the fugitives, who had entered the palace all covered with mud. One of these sans-culotte national guardsmen then narrated how one of the grenadiers had called the Marseillaise a set of brigands, and how he had told him that he must not speak in this manner of patriots who were going to march to the frontier—how, hereupon, the grenadier had sworn that if he was not on duty he would put his sabre into his bowels; and how he, the sans-culotte, had drawn his own sabre upon the grenadier, wishing to kill him; how all that he had been able to do to the said grenadier was to give him a good kick in the belly, and how a crowd of officers interfered, and prevented him and his comrades from putting the said grenadier to death. Here two Jacobin members, Brival and Montaut, cried out in a breath that the grenadiers were indisputably Chevaliers of the Poignard! One of the sans-culotte national guardsmen, proceeding on this hint, next declared that six or seven hundred gentlemen, all dressed in black, had run into the Tuileries, and were still there, in the apartment of the queen. "I warn you," said he, "that they are going to send a dead body to your bar. These are the men that would commence a counter-revolution!" The president told this orator and his companions that the Assembly would examine the facts that they had averred, and that they, too, were admitted to the honour of seats. Far different from that of the grenadiers was their greeting as they went to their seats; the galleries and a great portion of the Assembly shouted bravos and vivats without number. As soon as these enthusiastic applauses subsided, Grangeneuve, who thought that as much might be made of these matters as could have been made of his and Chabot's assassination, required that "these gentlemen"—the sans-culotte national guardsmen—should be invited to attend the Committee of Research and Surveillance, there to give in their very important depositions. Gaston, one of the most republican members of the Assembly, then rose to say that he had been an eye-witness of the scuffling and fighting in the Champs Elysées; that this business was not to be considered as an ordinary event, but as the beginning of some frightful plot against liberty; that the forty grenadiers had certainly been sent on purpose to provoke the patriots, and spoil the "frugal repast" of the Marseillaise. Gaston waxed quite eloquent in describing the agility and valour of the Marseilles men (five hundred and sixteen against forty!). "All of a sudden," said he, "I saw them leaping the ditches like lions, every one of them with his drawn sabre in his hand. Gentlemen, it was an imposing spectacle!" The galleries and a part of the Assembly loudly applauded this orator. After allowing everything to be said that might exasperate the people against the poor grenadiers and the court, the Assembly agreed to leave the affair to the ordinary courts of justice, and then passed to the order of the day. Grangeneuve, however, was not yet satisfied; and he informed the House that a patriotic sentinel had informed him that he had heard an aristocratic officer of the national guards swear that, if the Assembly did not give the grenadiers satisfaction by punishing the Marseillaise, the grenadiers and the best part of the national guards would take the matter into their own hands, and obtain satisfaction before three o'clock the next morning. It was now midnight; but the Assembly, taking into consideration "the known civism of the Parisian national guards, and their respect for the laws," adjourned without further debate. On the following day, the 31st of July, the Assembly was occupied from morning till night with the same business. A deputation of Marseillaise and sans-culotte national guardsmen mixed declared anew at the bar that there was some horrible plot; that the grenadiers had begun the quarrel in order to lead to a scene of carnage; and they demanded, as essential to liberty and to the personal security of all patriots, that the grenadiers should be brought to judgment, and every aristocratic corps of the national guards cashiered at once. On the other side a numerous deputation appeared for the grenadiers and the respectabilities in general, to attest and solemnly swear that no provocation had been given to the Marseillaise, who had been wilfully deceived and set on by the revolutionary movers in Paris. These facts, they said, could be clearly proved if the Assembly would only allow a fair trial, and if the courts were not terrified out of their duty by the clubs, the mob, and the Marseillaise. "Legislators," said their orator, "these Marseillaise are still in arms, and in a menacing attitude. Are we to wait until our property and our lives are in danger? And under the reign of liberty are we patiently to expect a civil war in the streets of the capital? Or, true to our oaths to live free or die, ought we not rather to remind this Assembly that its predecessor, the Constituent, confided to our courage the sacred duty of defending the constitution? [Here the galleries burst into shouts of laughter.] Legislators, the heroism of the patience and fraternity, which we, the national guards of Paris, have never from the commencement of the revolution ceased to give proofs of, is entitled to some respect. We come to demand of you to send away these Marseillaise, whose arrival within our walls has already cost the lives of some excellent defenders of liberty. We come to demand vengeance from you; and our coming is a proof of our respect for you and the laws." The orator could say no more, for the Marseillaise and the other federates in the galleries, joining curses and menaces to the peals of laughter, drowned his voice, and drove him and his companions out of the Hall.*

On the 1st and 2nd of August more federates arrived, as fierce and as impatient as the Marseillaise; and then bureaux, or offices, of insurrection, were opened in several inns and wine-shops in the faubourgs, the Jacobins having declared in their club that no more time was to be lost,—that the plot of the royalists and Feuillants must be anticipated, or all would be ruined. On the evening of the 2nd—just after Guadet had carried a decree granting or promising to every Prussian or Austrian soldier that would desert a pension of one hundred livres per annum, the rights of French citizenship, and the free option of serving in the French army or not—the Marseillaise again appeared at the bar of the Assembly to demand the immediate dethronement of Louis XVI., who had been again attempting to butcher the people, and who had never for one moment ceased betraying them. The majority—and the minority had not courage enough to open their lips—voted that this excellent discourse of the patriot soldiers of Marseilles should be printed, and sent to all the departments. Girardin now hazarded a few words on the fate of Duhamel, who had been butchered by the Marseillaise in the coffee-house, and who had left a wife enceinte, and two poor children; but the galleries hooted him, and the Assembly passed to the order of the day. It was now eleven o'clock at night: the debates were concluded, the president had retired, and most of the members were retiring, when a demoniac cry was heard at the door, and in the next instant the hall was inundated by men, women, and children, all shouting, "Vengeance! vengeance!—They are poisoning our brothers: they are poisoning the patriots!" One of the Jacobin deputies said that, as M. Vergniaud, the president, was gone, the oldest member remaining ought to take the chair; and thereupon Lasource, a member of the insurrection committee of the faubourgs, took the president's place, begged the citizens and citizenesses to be calm, and then told them that every deputy there present partook in their just indignation, and would join them in demanding

vengeance on those who had been guilty of the horrible crime of poisoning their brethren who were hurrying to Paris and the frontiers for the defence of their country. It should appear that this nocturnal irruption had been preconcerted, and that all the Jacobin members had remained behind in the House, in order to have first speech with the infuriated mob; but president Vergniaud, that great Gironde chief, presently ran back to the hall, turned Lasource out of his chair, and himself addressed the people, telling them that he was ready to hear their petition. The mob orator said that they had not come to present a petition, but to denounce, with bleeding hearts, the most atrocious of crimes: to inform the Assembly that the enemies of the people were poisoning the federates by mixing glass with their bread; that one hundred and sixty of these brave men were already dead, and eight hundred of them dying in the hospitals! "If," said the spokesman, "these brave men had perished in the field like Spartans, there would have been nothing to say about it; but to be poisoned like dogs, and by Frenchmen—this is too horrible!" Vergniaud assured him that the Assembly would send a committee, composed of none but known patriots, to examine the bread and the hospitals; and then the mob withdrew with the same shouts of "Vengeance! vengeance!—They are poisoning our brothers!" Three commissioners were dispatched to Soissons, the alleged scene of the grand poisoning, where some of the federates were forming the camp. On the following day a letter from them was read in the Assembly. They declared that, after most careful search, they had discovered that there had been no poisoning or premeditated mischief whatever; that the bread for the federates had been made in the church of St. Jean, the walls and windows of which were in a sad state [before turning the church into a bakehouse, the sans-culottes no doubt had smashed the windows, and committed other abominations about the edifice—at least this was the treatment churches had been subjected to, in nearly all the towns of France, for many months]; that some bits of the broken panes had been shaken down, and carelessly mixed with the bread; and that this was all. Possibly the federates, who had been to Paris for the first time in their lives, had felt some of that sharp antipathy which exists between Seine water and the bowels of strangers; besides, they had been feasted and regaled by Santerre and the sans-culottes of the faubourgs and popular sections, and had been marching and counter-marching in the dog-days, and were not yet inured to a military life. No doubt some of them were ailing; and, in their suspicious humour, the detection of some ground glass in the bread they were eating would infallibly suggest the notion of their being poisoned. Their cry for vengeance, being communicated to Paris, was as likely as anything to set all the tocsins ringing, and precipitate the people upon the Tuileries. This was precisely what both Girondists and Jacobins wanted; but, as the people had dispersed

the preceding night without doing anything, and as the pleasant fiction at Soissons could not bear daylight, they now accused the court, the Feuillants, the aristocrats, and the priests of having spread the alarming reports about the poisoning with the intention of making an anarchy and overthrowing the Assembly. The letter from the commission sent to Soissons had scarcely been read, when a deputation of federates came to demand vengeance for the grand crime which had been committed under the walls of Soissons. "So many of our brethren," said their orator, "have perished there, and by poison, that" President Vergniaud, begging his pardon, interrupted him, said that really there had been no poisoning at all, and then ordered the letter from Soissons to be read to them. "Well, then," continued the federate orator, "if there is no poisoning at Soissons, there are here in Paris crimes still more atrocious, since they intend to assassinate the entire people. We denounce to you the executive power; we denounce the court and the ministers, who are wearing a mask of patriotism to deceive the people. We demand from you a categorical answer :—Can you save us? Say yes or no! The people are up: the people wish to save the public interest [la chose publique], and you with it!" President Vergniaud assured the orator, and the federates with him, that the Assembly would save everything, and find the means of this salvation in the constitution as it was and in the laws. The federates were of course admitted to the honour of seats. They had scarcely got seated when some of the ministers (we scarcely know their names, and as for functions or authority they had none) came into the House with a message from the king, who was no more a king than they were ministers. In this message, which was written, and signed and countersigned, Louis denied any foreknowledge of the Duke of Brunswick's terrible manifesto, which, as we have shown, was indeed very different from what he had himself advised. The rest of the message is only to be taken as the pleading and varnishing of a man struggling for life, and for what was far dearer than life—struggling for the lives of wife and children, for the preservation of an ancient dynasty, for religion, which was under the armed heel of atheism, and for a country which was becoming like a hell. In this sense alone can the message be excused; but, before zealots cry out against mental reservation, duplicity, and lying, it would become them to reflect what they might have done themselves, if placed in a situation like that of Louis, who was expecting every moment to see his palace converted into a shambles, and who had and could have no hope except in gaining time, in pacifying, by protestations, the fury of the people, and awaiting the arrival of the Prussians. And yet this very message contained more than one unassailable truth. "I brought with me to the throne," said this already discredited king, "pacific sentiments. . . I intend to maintain the national independence with my last breath: personal dangers are nothing in comparison with public dangers.

Ah! what are personal dangers to a king from whom it is attempted to alienate the love of the people! There lies the real wound of my heart. The people, perhaps, will one day know how dear to me is their happiness: how much it has always been my sole interest—my first wish. How many griefs might yet be effaced by the slightest marks of its return!" Several deputies of the côté droit, vainly hoping that some impression had been made by it in the House, demanded that the message should be printed, and sent to the departments. Lacroix called for the previous question, saying that no doubt the message had been already printed in the royal printing-office, that it was useless to make two editions, and very proper to be careful not to spend the public money except for good purposes. Ducos, the Girondist, said it was not to save the paltry expense of printing that he should vote for the previous question, but because the message expressed sentiments which the king did not feel. "If we trust him now," said he, "we shall repent of it when the Prussians are in Paris! It is not by messages and letters, but by actions, that the king ought to convince us of his sincerity, and of his desire to oppose enemies, who are making war upon us only for him, and in his name!" Isnard, that greater Girondist, said that the king's language had always been very constitutional; but what had been his conduct? What had he really done to stop that plan of counter-revolution which covered all France, and had its ramifications in foreign courts? He would answer this question himself: the king had done nothing, and he would prove it. Here some loud murmurs from the Feuillants interrupted him. "Gentlemen," he continued, "I know not what loadstone it is that incessantly attracts you to the court!" "And you, gentlemen," retorted Champion, who merely repeated an absurdity in which many of his party believed, "you are all sold to the English!" Isnard, the most peppery of all the deputies that had been sent up from the hot south, raged like a demoniac at these words, calling Champion an execrable scoundrel, &c., and denouncing him to the vengeance of the Assembly—to the vengeance of all France! When his rage was over, he logically exposed the many grounds and motives there were for distrusting the king, and everything that came from him; and, after applauding his speech, the majority resolved not only that the king's message should not be printed, but that there was nothing in it deserving the attention of the Assembly.

The very next minute mayor Pétion strutted into the hall with a smiling face, and at the head of a deputation from the commune of Paris. In the name of that commune, which had so long been a power by itself, he demanded the déchéance as the only measure that could save the country. "It is with grief," said he, "that the commune and the people of this immense city denounce, by my lips, the chief of the executive power. The people, without doubt, have the right to be indignant against him; but the language of wrath does not become free men. Constrained by Louis XVI. to accuse him before you, and before all France, we will accuse him without bitterness as without pusillanimous reserves. It is no longer time to listen to that long indulgence which sits so well upon a generous people, but which only encourages kings in their perjuries!" Not satisfied with dwelling on the recent conduct of Louis, who had only become a traitor or deceiver because the revolution had threatened his existence, and the existence of all persons and things that were dearest and most sacred to him, mayor Pétion referred to his early history, and represented one of the mildest and best-intentioned of princes as a bloody tyrant, seeking the destruction of his people, and, above all, the massacre of the noble and enlightened citizens of Paris. He accused him of a monstrous predilection for nobles and priests, and of an aversion to all who were not priests or nobles (which was so remote from the truth, that, long before the revolution began, many of Louis's chosen companions were men of the Tiers Etat); and he taxed him with the most monstrous ingratitude to the people, who had been so generous, so kind and considerate to him, even in the moments of excitement and triumph, when they secured their own sovereignty, and when so many reasons would have justified them in dethroning him. "By some remains of indulgence," said he, "we might have wished to be able to desire from you only the suspension of Louis XVI. till the present dangers of the country are over, but the constitution is opposed to a mere suspension. Louis XVI. is incessantly invoking the constitution: we invoke it in our turn, and by it demand his forfeiture and dethronement!" According to the gospel of Pétion, this grand measure would not only clear the country of its foreign invaders, but of all native rogues and aristocrats whatsoever—bringing about, in double-quick time, a state of freedom and virtue, peace and happiness, such as the world had never witnessed, and such as was only faintly symbolised by the fabulous age of gold. There would only be a little fighting first; but how little would that cost, and how soon would it be all over! "What can these slaves do," exclaimed Pétion, who was nothing of a fighting man himself, "against ten millions of free Frenchmen, equally prepared for death or for victory, fighting for equality, for their hearths, for their wives and children! Let every man among us be a soldier in his turn; and, if we must have the honour of dying for the country, let each of us, before rendering his last sigh, illustrate his memory by the death of a slave, or by killing a tyrant!" By the time Pétion had done speaking or reading it was four o'clock, the usual dinner-hour, and the Assembly adjourned to dine. As it always happened, they were bolder after dinner. Many of the Girondists and Jacobins demanded that the déchéance question should be settled that very night; but it was at length agreed to postpone the discussion for six days, or until the 9th of August. In the mean time the petition of the mayor and commune of Paris was submitted to the select committee of twelve, and hints were given that other petitions of the same tenour would be most acceptable to the legislature; that bodies corporate and individual citizens would do well to express their sentiments as to royalty before the question should be again taken up. This very night the Marseillaise were removed from the quarters they had till now occupied (the barracks of Nouvelle France) to Danton's section of the Cordeliers, and were lodged in the Cordelier Monastery (now Club), being at once considered as the braves and as the body-guard of the republican movers; and, to keep up their spirits and their patriotism, they were regaled with a supper which was much more generous and abundant than the dinner in the Champs Elysées. In the course of the same night the Jacobin Club had many deep deliberations. The Assembly were accused of timidity and want of energy in not ordering Pétion's petition and discourse to be printed and sent to the departments. Thuriot, a member of the House, said that the king's cajoling message had been sent only because Louis knew that the commune of Paris were going to demand his forfeiture. "It had been a race," he said, "between the king's ministers and the mayor and the commune; but ministers had run fastest, and had got in with their message before the others could arrive with their petition." Billaud Varennes represented that the best security for the patriots in the capital would be the instantaneous formation of a camp in the Champs Elysées, and on the edge of the Tuileries gardens. Antoine appealed to the generosity of the club for means of providing shoes, clothing, and food for the five hundred and sixteen Marseillaise. The Jacobins put their hands into their pockets, and at once produced, among them all, a sum not far short of 30*l.* English; and a committee was appointed to manage a general subscription. Several members of the club announced that they had seen, from certain signs and movements in the Tuileries, that the king was preparing to fly. The president of the club said all such information should be conveyed to mayor Pétion; and he earnestly recommended vigilance round the Tuileries—an incessant patriotic watch by night and by day.*

And in effect, for about the hundredth time, Louis seemed to have come to the resolution of attempting another flight. Regularly informed by Bertrand de Molleville and other friends of all the nocturnal meetings in the faubourgs and of all the efforts made and making for a general émeute, Louis doubted whether he and all his family would not be murdered in the palace before the Duke of Brunswick could get near to Paris. The queen had been for a long time more hopeful: she had an itinerary of the march of the Prussians, and had been wont to calculate that by such a day they would be at Verdun, by such a day at Lille, and so on, till they reached the capital; but armies could not, or at least they did not, march half so rapidly as the queen expected; and she, too, fell into despair, which was made the sadder by the contrariety of opinion and advice given by her friends, and by the king's lamentable want of energy and activity. She said to Madame Campan, "The king is no coward; he has great courage, but it is all of the passive kind, and he is crushed by bashfulness and self-misgiving, which proceeds as much from his education as from his natural character. He fears to take upon himself any command, and most of all he fears addressing a popular body or any number of men collected together. He was made to live like a child, and always under the eyes of Louis XV. until he was twenty-one years old; and this constraint has been the cause of his timidity and bashfulness. Situated as we are, some well-articulated words addressed to the Parisians and to such of the national guards as are devoted to him, would centuple the strength and spirit of our party; but he cannot speak them! As for me, I could speak and act, and even get on horseback if necessary. But if I were to act it would make bad worse, it would aggravate the cries against the Austrian, against the domination of a woman; and besides, by putting myself forward, I should throw into shade the king and make him appear as nothing. A queen who is not a regent must in these circumstances remain inactive, and only prepare to die!" She was suffering in these days and nights things worse than death, apprehending almost every moment that the mob would burst into the palace to murder her husband and her children, and all the few friends that remained about them, as well as herself. One attempt was made at the dead of night to surprise and assassinate her in her bed. She abandoned her apartment on the ground-floor, to sleep in a gloomy inconvenient room between the king's apartment and that of the dauphin. But go where she would in that abode of woe and degradation, she could not escape the cries and shouts and filthy obscenities of the mob, who crowded the gardens of the Tuileries to insult and threaten everybody and everything which seemed to belong to the court. They hawked under the very windows of her apartment a most atrocious libel entitled 'The Life and Adventures of Marie Antoinette,' which was illustrated with the most obscene of engravings, done by the best artists of Paris, and which contained adventures that might have figured in the 'Faublas' of Girondist Louvet, who very probably had written them. The queen and her children could no longer take the air out of doors. At last the king had ordered that the gates of the garden should be closed against the people. But the Assembly had instantly decreed that one-half of the garden belonged to them—that the whole length of the Feuillant terrace must be open to the deputies and people in general; and to fix the limits between what were called "terre nationale" and "terre de Coblenz" a cordon was made of tricolor ribands, and placards were stuck up to intimate that every citizen that dared to pass that line should be lanterned like Foulon and Berthier. But, as furious voices could pass that line of demarcation, though bodies did not, the queen, after making two attempts to walk in the garden with her children, was obliged to confine herself entirely to the interior of the palace, the language addressed to her by the patriots and patriotesses on the other side of the tricolor ribands being too horrible and obscene to be borne. By this time the court, which had lavished money in all directions to buy partizans that did nothing, or to purchase services which only did mischief, was reduced almost to its last louis-d'or. Several gentlemen, well knowing that the king must escape from Paris or perish, now came forward with offers of large sums; but Louis, in despair of the result, generously sent back most of this money, saying that it might be necessary to the friends who had sent it, and who might also have to fly for their lives. Clermont-Tonnerre, Montmorin, Malouet, and Bertrand de Molleville, all agreed that if Louis and his family could only escape into Normandy, they would yet have a chance for life and safety, and more. A considerable part of the population were as yet decided royalists; and there, at the distance of only twenty leagues from Paris, was the strong and spacious castle of Gaillon, with roads open to the sea-side, to Honfleur, to Fécamp, to Hâvre de Grace; and M. Mistral, commissary of the marine at Hâvre, and a man zealously devoted to the king, had engaged to keep a vessel constantly ready, in case the royal family might find it necessary to sail over to England. As for getting out of the Tuileries, Bertrand de Molleville, who drew up the whole plan in writing, thought that that would be no such very difficult matter. Laporte, the intendant of the civil list, was in the constant habit of having a supper party in his hôtel, which communicated with the palace by the great gallery of the Louvre, from which it was separated by an old wooden partition, guarded at night-time only by a single sentinel, who might easily be set asleep by wine or by opium. On the given night M. Laporte would have no guests except Clermont-Tonnerre and Montmorin, who would come in plain coaches drawn each by two horses; and, as two coaches went every night to Laporte's door to wait for the company that supped with him, these two vehicles could not possibly attract attention. At the hour of midnight the king, the queen, the Princess Elizabeth, and the children would steal through the great gallery of the Louvre, pass through the wooden partition and by the drunk or drugged sentinel, then through Laporte's house to the two plain carriages in waiting, when Clermont-Tonnerre would get up behind the one, dressed in a grey coat, an officer of the disbanded guards in the same menial dress would get up behind the other, and away they would all go along the Boulevards, and—fortune only propitious, or God willing—out of Paris by the gate called the White

Barrier, always supposed to be less carefully guarded than the other issues. Some of the Swiss guards were already at Courbevoie, and at other places on the Normandy road; and these by rapid movements might render the most important services. The king had approved of this plan: one Lefort, a grandson to Lefort, the Genevese, who had been the friend and instructor of Peter the Great of Russia, had been sent into Normandy to examine the castle of Gaillon and the country, and to make preparations; the Dukes of Rochefoucauld, Liancourt, and Châtelet had forced money upon the king, and everything had been done except stringing up the heart of Louis to resolution and a bold daring; but this last was not work to be done except by other than mortal agency, and the age of miracles had gone, long before the age of chivalry. On Sunday, the 5th of August, as the royal family traversed the gallery to hear a grand mass with music in the chapel, some of the national guardsmen on duty cried out to them "Vive le Roi;" but a much greater number roared "Vive la Nation!" "No king!" "Down with the veto!" "Down with the king!" The servants of royalty, the men entertained to give grace and splendour to it, had nearly all been Jacobinised into the most savage assailants of the king and queen; and the musicians of the royal chapel took this opportunity of insulting them to their faces, and that too in the solemn service they were singing. At vespers, when they sang the 'Magnificat,' and came to these words, "Deposuit potentes de sede," they all raised their voices in a fearful manner, as if they had been commissioned to announce the sentence of dethronement which the Assembly were to discuss on the Thursday following. On this same Sunday the royalists all flocked to the levee. "Never," says Bertrand de Molleville, "was the court more brilliant, or rather, never was it more crowded. The uneasiness and alarm inspired by the king and queen's sad situation, and the grief felt at the thought that this might be the last time they should ever see their sovereign, were strongly expressed in the countenances of most that were present. I could not long support the affecting scene. I left the palace with tears gushing from my eyes; yet I was far from imagining at that moment that I had indeed seen the royal family for the last time!" Early on the following morning—Monday, the 6th of August—Lefort returned from castle Gaillon with the most comforting assurances that everything would go well if the royal family could only get safely out of Paris on the night of the 7th or 8th. From seven in the morning till six in the evening Bertrand de Molleville expected a letter or a message from the king to tell him to complete the preparations he was making for the flight. At one o'clock Louis had said he would give his final answer at five, and at five he still wanted time to consider or to doubt; for with him consideration always ended in doubting and nothing-doing. At last Bertrand got his answer. It was an order to suspend all preparations till further notice, as it was his majesty's intention to reserve this desperate step for the last extremity. The poor ex-minister, who could scarcely conceive a worse extremity, fell into a fit of spleen and despair. He says, however, that Montmorin positively assured him that this time the queen was more to blame than the king, as she distrusted the loyalty of the Duke de Liancourt, a political and personal friend of Lafayette, and said, "M. Bertrand does not consider that in sending us into Normandy he is throwing us into the hands of the Feuillants!" Seeing no other hope, Bertrand de Molleville wrote a note to the king on the morning of the 7th, entreating his majesty to consider that this plan might yet succeed, but that to-morrow it might be too late to do or attempt anything. Again he got no answer until the evening. Then Louis said, "I am assured from good authority that the insurrection is not so near as you imagine. Besides, there are still means of preventing it, or at least of retarding it; and I am adopting measures for that purpose. It is only necessary to gain time. I have reason to believe that there is less danger in remaining than in flight." In truth, the dangers and risks were now about equally balanced. It is scarcely to be believed that, any time between the night of the 3rd and the morning of the 10th, the royal family could have escaped out of the capital; but if they had only made the attempt, they would have died doing and striving; they might have been cruelly massacred by the mob, but better this than the long months of captivity and mental torture which, after all, with one single, unhappy exception, were to end in death.* Nor are we quite sure that those who recommended this flight, and who were either to go with or to follow the king, were either sanguine as to the final result, or confident and courageous as to the immediate execution of the measure. We can hardly expect from any Frenchman writing his own history a confession of any lack of courage or adventurous daring. Bertrand speaks highly of his own resolution and hopefulness; but he tells us that Montmorin, his fellow-labourer in all this project, was despondent, and almost in despair for himself, for the king, and for all of them, even before Louis had declined the plan, and, in fact, even when they believed him to be fully determined to act upon it, and risk everything only to get out of Paris. When Bertrand advised him to get a false passport for the interior of France, Montmorin replied, with a tone and look which made him shudder, that the passport he stood in need of was one for the other world. He repeated over and over again that he was convinced all precautions were useless; that he for one should never escape those who were determined to have his life; that he had long since had the presage that he would be murdered in some prison, &c. Montmorin, who was massacred in a prison within a month of this time, has left us no memoirs or history of any kind. Probably, if he had, we should have been told that Bertrand de Molleville was not without his presentiments and dreads, or free from that discouragement and misgiving which are fatal to hazardous and decisive enterprises. After Louis had refused to go, Montmorin said to Bertrand, "My friend, the king is ruined, and so are we all. You laughed at me, six months ago, when I told you that it would come to a republic; you now find that I was not deceived!" The necessity of the departure of the royal family from Paris, and the conviction that some horrible scene would take place in a day or two if they remained, were now so generally felt that various plans of escape were sent to Louis, or to some of his ex-ministers or friends. Madame de Staël, who was only a revolutionist up or down to the Feuillant point, had conceived a strong disgust at everything that had been done since her cher ami Narbonne had been turned out of the war department, and the Feuillant party had been trodden under foot by the temporary union of the ultra-Jacobins and the Girondists. The daughter of the phlegmatic Necker was, moreover, a woman of a warm and a generous nature, quite capable of feeling for the deplorable condition of the royal family, and of making exertions and self-sacrifices for any object that deeply interested her. The Duke of Orleans, who had long been in the greatest straits, was advertising for sale one of his numerous estates that was situated on the coast of Normandy. There was nothing strange in a person of Madame de Staël's fortune offering to become the purchaser of this estate, or in travelling more than once to see and examine it. She undertook to do all this, and to make repeated journeys, always in the same carriage, and always with the same company or attendants, namely, her man of business, who was stout, like the king, and of about the same stature, a waiting-woman of about the size and figure of the queen, who should always have her face partly concealed under a large bonnet and a black gauze veil, a child of about the age and figure of the little dauphin, and a valet or groom mounted on horseback. As soon as these repeated journeys should have accustomed the postmasters and the postillions on the road to the passing and re-passing of Madame de Staël and this retinue, then, according to the plan which she submitted to Montmorin in a letter, the king was to put on a grey coat and a round perriwig, and pass for the man of business; the queen, with a big bonnet and a black veil, was to be the waiting-woman, with the Dauphin on her knee; and the valet or groom was to be the gallant and witty Narbonne! A fishing-vessel was to be kept on the coast in constant readiness to carry the royal fugitives wherever they might think best to go. The court, she said, would have no difficult preparation to make—nothing to do, in short, except to procure the round periwig and the big bonnet; but she made it an essential article that Narbonne should be included in the enterprise, as she considered his zeal and intelligence necessary to secure its success. No provision was made for the safety of the little princess-royal or of Madame Elizabeth; but the smaller the travelling party the better, and Madame de Staël could hardly conceive that those two princesses could possibly be exposed to any personal danger by remaining behind in Paris. We confess that this plan, from a head that was afterwards fertile in making plans, incidents, and plots for novels and romances, seems to have been as good as any that was offered; but unfortunately there was no time for these frequent goings and comings which were to accustom postmasters and postillions to Madame de Staël's style of travelling and her very remarkable countenance. Montmorin, however, considered the whole plan as romantic, hazardous, and inconsistent with propriety; and therefore he never mentioned it to the king, in the fear, as he says—or, as Bertrand de Molleville says for him—that his majesty, who regarded Madame de Staël as an extremely romantic and extravagant person, would be disposed to reject every future plan of escape as flighty and extravagant, merely because a measure of this kind had been proposed by Madame.* In the course of not many days, when the royal family were close prisoners, Madame de Staël found that she could not quit Paris even alone, and that, but for the venality of Manuel and the caprice of Santerre, she must have been massacred in her carriage as she attempted it. Bertrand says that the king certainly entertained another project, which was to attempt to escape to the forest of Ardennes, whence he might get to Brussels. But there is good evidence to show that not one, but several, projects of escape or manœuvre were entertained in the Tuileries down to the moment that the irresistible insurrection burst out. Even Gouverneur Morris, now ambassador or minister of the United States, was very deeply engaged in some plan to rescue the royal family. We cannot ascertain from Morris's brief memoranda precisely what this plan was; but we perceive that a large sum of money was lodged in his hands for the king's service; that Monciel, one of the last dismissed batch of ministers, was at the head of it; and that down to the very last moment they were all certain or most sanguine as to the entire success of this particular scheme. On the 8th of August Monciel calls upon Morris to say that "things are going on well; and the king seems to hold the proper opinions also, which is a desirable thing." He calls again on the 9th, and brings Morris more money. Nay, Monciel calls even on the morning of the fatal 10th of August to give a tranquillising report; "but," adds the American, "shortly after he leaves me, the cannon begin firing, and musketry mingled with them announce a warm day."† Others, and men not altogether unfriendly to the king or to royalty, thought that the escape of Louis must have led to the re-establishment, or at least to a determined and desperate attempt to effect the re-establishment of the old despotic system; but this was certainly not the opinion of Gouverneur Morris, who believed, on the contrary, that Louis honestly desired a constitutional form of government, and that he would have used all the exertions of which he was capable to establish a free and rational constitution, and to moderate alike the fury of the emigrants and the fury of the Jacobins. We speak merely of intention: as to execution, or the faculty of executing, we cannot believe for a moment that it lay in Louis; we cannot believe that the thing could have been done, even if Louis had been in the qualities of energy and action all that he was not—even though he had been the boldest and greatest of princes.

In the meanwhile the Paris sections, well agitated by Mayor Pétion, and for some time past in permanent session, discussed the question of forfeiture or déchéance. Of forty-eight sections, only one, that of Filles St. Thomas, had refused to accede to the extreme proposition. The section Mauconseil, or Bad Counsel, had even declared that the forfeiture had taken place, and that since the last day of July they had ceased all allegiance to Louis. In the Cordelier section, Danton, the president, had invited all passive citizens, or sans-culottes who had not the necessary qualifications, to join the active or qualified citizens in all section business; and, setting an example, which was soon followed by the other sections, the Cordeliers adopted not merely a universal suffrage, but a universal mob legislature. On Saturday, the 4th, Brissot had required the Assembly to resume and finish Lafayette's business in two days; and the Assembly had decreed that it should be determined on Monday, the 6th. On Sunday (the times were too critical to allow the Assembly to make holiday) Guadet presented sundry addresses from Alençon and Briançon, and other places in various departments, all calling for the déchéance; and other addresses of the same tenor were sent in by the Paris sections. Even the respectability section of Filles St. Thomas now sent in a déchéance address or petition, for the Jacobins of the section had united and had assumed to be in themselves the whole section, inasmuch as it was impossible to consider aristocrats that had money and slaves that wanted a king as a component part of any incorporate body of free, French citizens. Brissot, who himself inhabited the said section of Filles St. Thomas, adopted this same liberal view in the tribune, informing the Assembly that the section contained two parties, one composed of true patriots, "of the men designated by the name of sans-culottes;" and the other, "the gangrened part of the section," being composed of "nothing but a set of bankers, financiers, stockbrokers, and stockjobbers, who had all along done the greatest mischief to liberty and the revolution." If the Assembly wished to know the real sentiments of the section, and how heartily all the patriot party joined in the general wish for forfeiture, they had only to hear two illustrious citizens who had been deputed by them. And, introduced in this manner by Brissot, Collot d'Herbois, and André Chenier, one of the poet-laureates of the revolution, appeared at the bar of the House, to harangue, and declare that, as the sans-culottes of the section were incomparably more numerous than the bankers, financiers, &c., it was but natural that their voice should be taken as the expression and will of the section. Collot d'Herbois said that, since the will of the sovereign people was so plainly declared, it really seemed strange to him that the Assembly should not pronounce déchéance at once—a sentence which all prayed for except the traitors whose voice was not to be listened to for a moment. That Sunday night the Jacobin club was busier and more thronged than ever was the old nut-tree by Benevento on a Sabbath of witches. Beau Barbaroux communicated to the Mother Society an address to the citizens of Paris from the municipality of Marseilles, and a petition from the merchants and traders collected at the great fair of Beaucaire, who demanded Déchéance! Déchéance! And the Mother Society not only decreed that this excellent petition from the fair should be printed and sent to the departments, but also that it should be placarded in the streets of Paris. Robespierre called out for more caution and vigilance—for more and still more vigilance and suspicion:—he was quite certain that the king was still trying to escape, and that the most terrible of all conspiracies and plots was about to burst. "It is the duty," said he, "of every good citizen, of every true patriot, of all constituted authorities, to watch and spy round the Tuileries, to be vigilant at the barriers, to examine every carriage that quits or comes into the capital." An inferior Jacobin (Beaumier) communicated the following resolution of the municipality, hoping that all the sections would adopt it:—"The Commune of Paris, considering that the manifesto of the Duke of Brunswick contains disastrous menaces against the city of Paris, &c., resolve—1. That a petition shall be sent to the legislative body, to demand of the Assembly to decree, as a measure of precaution and general security, that Louis XVI. and his family shall be kept as hostages. 2. That, seeing the urgency of the danger, the Commune of Paris will employ, provisionally and without delay, all the means in its power to prevent the evasion of the king and his family." Antoine instantly rose and said that every good Jacobin ought to go to his section, in order to advise and act. A great many members quitted the club and ran to their sections. Merlin thought that, though good service might be done in the sections, the club ought not to be left empty or remain idle. Another Jacobin said that the club would find its defenders in the best of patriot. The next minute the Marseillaise federates, united with a troop of Santerre's Paris cannoners, defiled through the hall singing "Aux enfans de la patrie." Then an unnamed Jacobin began to explain one part of the horrible plot that was brewing against the patriots. A certain deputy of the Assembly, who had lived more luxuriously than patriot ought, had just sent off his servants and horses, and had packed up his portmanteau to be gone himself. Hence, and from other indications of the same kind, the shortsighted patriot might discover that most of the deputies of the Assembly intended running away. "In short," said he, "this part of their project is to manage matters so that on next Thursday, the 9th, the day fixed for the discussion of the question of forfeiture, there shall not be members enough left to make a House, or enough to vote competently on that great question." Duhem, a physician from Lille, and as great a blood-letter as any of the Jacobins, said that for a long time the National Assembly had been informed that some of their deputies were going to run away. "But," added he, "what does that signify? Let us wish them a good journey. There will always remain good patriot deputies enough to save the country." Bourdon de la Croisnière, lately a teacher of mathematics, stated that the section to which he belonged had appointed a good patrol to watch every night round the Tuileries; and he proposed that all the other sections should follow this excellent example: if they did, the Tuileries would be surrounded by a true sans-culotte army of 4800 men, a force not likely to let Louis escape. The proposition was received with acclamations. Then some citizens presented and read a petition which had been drawn up on the altar of the country, and which was intended for the National Assembly if the club approved of it. This brought to the tribune ex-capuchin Chabot, who exclaimed, "For a long time the French people have been making war against despotism with arms that despotism despises. They are still making war with petitions, when real blows are wanted. There is one great secret that I must tell you. You are all demanding forfeiture. Well, then! forfeiture is not in the constitution. The constitution says that in certain circumstances the king is to be considered as having abdicated. But, upon this point, it is not for the National Assembly alone, but for all the people, to judge. Believe me, that, whatever form the Assembly may employ, they will always give you a king or a regent, or something just as bad. Therefore, no more petitions! Only let the Parisians send their own address to all the communes, to all the Jacobin clubs and popular societies of France; let that address return covered with signatures, and in less than a month you will see the accomplishment of the unanimous wish of Frenchmen. Then you will say to those who want a king, 'Get ye gone to Coblenz!'" "Yes," rejoined his confrère Merlin, "no more petitions, no more words! The French people must decide this déchéance with muskets, pikes, and cannon." On Monday morning a committee which had been sent to Soissons reported to the Assembly that there were already nearly ten thousand federates collected in that camp, without counting the brave Marseillaise, who remained in Paris, and other bands that were approaching from other parts of the kingdom. Some of these federates presented, not a petition, but a demand or command, which they had drawn up in the Champ de Mars. Their will, as briefly expressed, was, that for the present the Declaration of the Rights of Man should be put into mourning by having a black crape drawn over it; that the king should be censé to have abdicated; that the primary assemblies should be convoked; that every Frenchman paying any contribution to the state should have the right of voting upon monarchy and a new constitution; that the patriot ministers—Roland and the rest of the Gironde—should be re-instated and invested with the entire executive power per interim; that Lafayette should be sent to the High Court at Orleans; that all the ambassadors residing at foreign courts should be recalled, and all the political or diplomatic relations with foreign countries be broken off; and, finally, that the staffs of the army should be entirely remodelled, that every man of noble birth should be declared incapable of commanding in this war for liberty and equality, and that all the commanders of fortresses or frontier towns should be dismissed. Boulanger and a few other members ventured to remonstrate, and to say that these petitioners were guilty of high treason against the nation and the constitution; but the majority applauded the harangue of the federates, and granted them the honours of the séance. Then national guardsmen from nearly all the sections of Paris came to offer their right arms and swords for the defence of the country, to exclaim against the wickedness and the absurdity of kingly government, and to call for the suppression of the grenadiers of Filles St. Thomas and all other corps of national guards that were not sans-culottic like themselves. Brissot made no progress this day in the impeachment of Lafayette; but in the evening the Jacobins proceeded with that business, and Real, one of the most terrible of those sectaries, delivered a very long harangue, which had the double object of showing that Lafayette was the greatest of traitors, and that Brissot, though pretending to accuse him, was not much better. Real, indeed, not only attacked Brissot, but also fell upon Vergniaud, Gensonné, and all the Girondists, declaring that they were playing a double game, that boded nothing less than treachery to the people, and escape and impunity to Lafayette. On Wednesday, the 8th, the Assembly and Brissot quickened their paces. Witnesses were examined, and their evidence failed to prove what was, however, an indisputable fact, that Lafayette, in his late visit to Paris, had intended to have recourse to arms, &c. Brissot and his party certainly showed no want of zeal and activity:

they endeavoured to prove that Lafayette had been guilty of treason, and had merited death by the single fact of his having come to Paris in the manner he had done. Brissot's speech was very long and very furious, speaking daggers or guillotine in nearly every sentence. He confessed that he had once been closely connected with Lafayette, but that was when he believed that the disciple of Washington was one of the most ardent friends of liberty. Since that time Lafayette had been torn from his principles and from his glory by an infernal coalition, and he was now nothing to him. He thought that if even they could not prove treachery and a concert with the Emperor of Austria, Lafayette's incapacity in the field would justify a severe sentence; for had not the English condemned Admiral Byng to death only because he had failed to conquer? He maintained, too, that this aristocratic general had spoken contemptuously of the National Assembly itself, and most calumniously of some of the best patriots in it (the Gironde); that he had committed the greatest of crimes in calumniating the people and the clubs of Paris, and thereby provoking a civil war. Dumolard and Vaublanc defended Lafayette with equal warmth, although they declared they knew they did it at the hazard of their lives, inasmuch as the clubs and the sections, the federates and the mob, had set their hearts upon his condemnation. Vaublanc was uncommonly bold; he affirmed that there was no exaggeration in the picture Lafayette had drawn of the domineering, insolent spirit of the clubs; that General Montesquiou, who was commanding on the side of the Pyrenees, had spoken out as clearly as Lafayette, having said in a public letter, "The legislative body itself is not free in the exercise of its functions; the galleries and the Jacobins of Paris actually make the greater part of its decrees." "And," added Vaublanc, "if it is criminal to think and to say these things, you had better impeach at once one-half of France!" When the president was called upon to put the question to the vote, whether there was or was not ground of accusation against General Lafayette, those who were for the negative rose in such evident superiority of numbers, that he declared at once that there was no ground of accusation. The galleries preserved a sad silence, more alarming than their usual vociferations. A portion of the minority protested against the way in which the president had collected the sense of the House, and demanded that every member should vote separately and by name. They could have no doubt as to the majority; but what they desired was, to expose these deputies to the fury of the people. Perhaps, too, they thought that many timid men would rather sneak out of the House, or even change sides, than thus stand up and vote the acquittal. The president rose as if to adjourn the House; but the call for the "appel nominal" became louder, the galleries began to give tongue, and the president sat down again. At last the appel nominal took place. Four hundred and six members had the courage to stand up and vote openly against two hundred and twenty-four. The president repeated that there was no ground of accusation against General Lafayette, and the House rose in order that the hungry members, who had sat two hours longer than usual, might go to their dinners. A terrible commotion took place; the federates who had been swarming in the galleries, and the mob that had been swarming outside the House, in expectation of a very different vote, gathered around the doorway, and insulted, spit upon, kicked, and beat Vaublanc, Dumolard, Calvet, and many others of the deputies who had spoken or voted in favour of the acquittal of Lafayette. The Assembly apparently did not meet after dinner—many of the honourable deputies had been left by the mob in no state for dining, or for returning to the tribune—but the Jacobin Club met to declare that the National Assembly, which could absolve so foul a traitor, could never save France; and that the only hope of patriots must rest on a general insurrection. Goupilleau, who led off in this chorus, said, "Since lists of proscription are circulating in the Tuileries, in Lafayette's camp, and among the armies of Austria and Prussia, ought not the people to make their own lists of proscription, and set down the names of all their enemies? But the people ought to be careful not to confound the different kinds and classes of their enemies; they ought to visit every man according to his deserts. I therefore demand, in order to settle public opinion as to the merits of individuals, that we print the list of all the deputies of the Assembly who have voted for or against this Lafayette." The club agreed to this proposition, and appointed a committee of six to draw up the list, which was meant to act as a proscription of the majority of the legislature. An un-named Jacobin, who had just arrived from the Palais Royal, begged to acquaint the club that the patriots had well nigh killed Vaublanc, and that there would have been a downright battle between different divisions of the national guards if he, the informant, had not contrived to let six deputies, held in durance by the populace, escape out of a window. Merlin then rose to predict what would be the consequence of the warrantable castigation the people had bestowed on the deputies who had voted the acquittal. "Gentlemen," said he, "you have just heard that the people have not respected the noses and backs of M. Vaublanc and some other deputies of the côté droit. Well! to-morrow these gentlemen, as it has been already arranged, will present themselves in the Assembly to complain of the horrible treatment they have received, to protest that it is not possible to enjoy freedom of opinion and debate in Paris, and then to propose the immediate removal of the Assembly to Rouen! But, in my way of thinking, there is not much to fear from this manœuvre. The good patriot deputies who have this day voted against Lafayette may make very good laws without the rest; and I count sufficiently on their patriotism to believe that they will see those who have voted for him quit Paris without any alarm, and remain quietly in their own seats. Then we shall see whether the majority of the people are patriots or not. I, therefore, beg these Feuillants of the Assembly to take their departure as soon as may be; and I invite my colleagues in patriotism to permit that horde of villains to depart, and so give the people the opportunity of choosing better representatives!" Merlin was followed by the ex-capuchin. "There is no use in any more talking," said Chabot: "the National Assembly have declared the country to be in danger, and they have proposed no measures proper to save it. But it has been decreed that all the people should take up arms. Then let the people fly to arms! This is all we can wish or ask for. As for the majority of the Assembly, let them, if they will, vote the removal of the legislature into a town gangrened with aristocracy. We may well hope that of the minority, of the two hundred and twenty-four members who have voted against the conspirator-general, not one will quit his post. I cannot, however, say with M. Merlin that this event will be indifferent or even advantageous to liberty; for, although assuredly the vast majority of France is patriotic, and would abide by the minority, some timorous patriots might be shaken and alarmed if the majority of the Assembly got to Rouen. But I have said the word. The people must save themselves, and Paris must set the example, and make a beginning. I repeat it, and I sound the tocsin from this very moment! If the majority in the Assembly decree the removal to Rouen, the people, with bayonets and pikes in their hands, must stop every deputy that attempts to go thither." The mob in the galleries shouted out, "To the gates, and to the barriers! Let us go to the barriers at once and stop the traitors." An unnamed Jacobin thought that the galleries were quite right; that no proposition would be made in the Assembly, but that all the deputies who had voted for Lafayette would steal away that very night, and that, as soon as they were all united at Rouen, they would, as the majority, declare themselves to be the Assembly. Robespierre, who very well knew that there was no such bold design on foot, that the majority which had voted in the Lafayette affair were not bound together by any general principle or feeling, but were divided and subdivided, undertook to demonstrate that this supposition of the translation or removal to Rouen was little better than an absurdity. He thought it much more probable that, if Vaublanc and the other deputies who had been beaten by the people should complain to-morrow of the treatment they had received, it would only be in the view of turning the attention of the Assembly from the grand question of Louis's forfeiture of the throne, which was fixed for that day. He implored the patriot members not to be the dupes of this manoeuvre, but to stop all discussion on the complaints of ill-treatment, &c., and boldly take up and conclude the déchéance. Robespierre's words carried their usual weight; but, when the Jacobins separated at midnight, not a few went to the barriers.

On the morning of Thursday, the 9th, as soon as the Assembly met, a patriot from Strasburg presented two intercepted letters written by a noble emigrant to a French gentleman in the department of the Lower Rhine. According to these epistles the emigrant army, commanded by the Prince of Condé and counting 6000 born gentlemen, was in the Prussian van, and was advancing so rapidly that it had performed nine leagues in one day, and thus must soon be on French territory, when victory and vengeance would follow as things of course. The writer signed himself as one "Armed for God, for his king, and for his lady." Nothing is more probable than that these letters were forgeries; yet nothing is more true than that such was the vaunting, vapouring, silly tone commonly in use among the emigrants even at this awful crisis. Deputations from several of the sections came to disavow the petition for déchéance which had been presented by Mayor Pétion in the name of all Paris, and to protest that what they and their friends wanted was to preserve the constitution they had all sworn to, and to remain true to nation, law, and king; but they were hissed and hooted by the galleries, and all the Jacobin and Girondist members united in crying that these petitions ought not to be read. By division or by acclamation the petitions were all tossed over to the special committee, who were to take them into consideration on the 12th. Then Lamarque, who was Girondist, Robespierriest, Bonapartist, and everything by turns and nothing long, but who was at this moment a perfectibilian republican in the manner of the Gironde, rose to recommend that the Assembly should declare itself in permanent session until the question of forfeiture was settled once and for ever. He said that no man in his senses could doubt that the king was a traitor, that would ruin the Assembly and all France if the Assembly did not first pull him down from his throne and throw him into a safe state prison. Lamarque also recommended as precautionary measures that the Assembly should at once decree, 1. That all strangers now in Paris, the federates only excepted, should be expelled the city, unless they could produce certificates of civism, &c. 2. That the municipality should be authorised to prohibit and put down all such newspapers as preached aristocracy and incivism. 3. That commissaries should be sent from the Assembly to the several armies in the field to watch the generals, &c. There was some little murmuring, some whispering or saying that there was to be no personal liberty except for the federates and those the federates served—that there was to be no liberty of the press, except for one faction—that Lamarque ought to have included such newspapers as preached insurrection and anarchy; but these timid voices could produce no effect upon sworn insurrectionists and anarchists. Lamarque's propositions were all submitted to the special committee of Twelve to be embodied in a project of law. When this was settled the president pointed to a heap of letters lying on the table which had been sent in by the members whom the people had beaten yesterday, and informed the House that the secretaries were going to read them. Many of the members and the mob in the galleries, who knew what the letters were all about, wore of opinion that precious time ought not to be lost in hearing them read; but after some outcry one of the secretaries began to read them. Never surely had such epistles been addressed to an august legislature by men that were members of it. One honourable deputy said that yesterday evening, on going out of the hall, he had been pursued as far as Dauphin Street by a fierce woman with a big knife, who wanted to cut his throat; that he had been fortunate enough to knock her down with a stick; but that then a man in the uniform of the national guards had seized him by the collar, and had wrestled and fought with him for a long time. "Mr. President," added this honourable deputy, "I am a representative of the French people: I have never given offence; I have had over many of my colleagues the great advantage of knowing how to be silent; I am and will ever be a man of the people. But I demand security for the inviolability of my character and the liberty of my opinions." Another honourable deputy stated that on quitting the Assembly he had been surrounded by a crowd of men wearing national guard coats and red worsted night-caps, who deliberately consulted about hanging him over a lamp-iron; that he had claimed his inviolability as a member of the legislature, and had shown them his cordon to prove that he was a deputy;* that thereupon they had said that it was because he was a deputy that they were going to hang him; that a man without a coat had caught hold of him by his hinder parts, par derrière, and was in the act of hoisting him up when some grenadiers of the national guard rushed to his rescue sword in hand, and so saved him from the lanterne. In concluding, this deputy said he would go no more to the Assembly. Another deputy related how he had left the Assembly with M. Dumolard, who had spoken in favour of Lafayette; how they had been pelted all through the streets with mud and other filth; how the people had threatened to lanterne them; how they had taken refuge in a guard-house by the Palais Royal; and how a federate who had followed them there had struck his hand upon a table and sworn that if M. Dumolard ever put his foot in the Assembly again he would cut off his head with his sabre. Here the gallery mobs, who had been laughing at all these misadventures, shouted and applauded, and swore that the federate was quite right. But this interior noise was presently awed into silence by a tenfold louder roar from the outside of the hall. Some honourable deputies cried "What is that?" some ran to the door, and some out of it; some rushed to the middle of the hall, and standing on the floor demanded that the Assembly should resolve itself into a committee of the whole House. "I am assured," said the president, "that our hall is surrounded by citizens in arms, and that our guard is not sufficient to restrain them." The uproar was now louder than before; but four of Pétion's municipal officers came to the bar to assure the august assembly that, though the patriots out of doors were exercising their lungs, they had brought no arms to make use of. Upon this intimation a Jacobin member demanded the punishment of the person who had spread the calumnious report, and called upon the president to name him. The president said that he had received his information from two deputies present. One of these two gentlemen rose and said that he had certainly seen men armed with sabres in the lobby. Several members cried out that he ought to be sent to the Abbaye for having attempted to alarm the Assembly. Merlin said that the greatest culprit in this matter was the president, who had dared to say that the patriot guard of the Assembly could not protect it; and he demanded in form that the president should be committed to the Abbaye. The president—we believe it was still Guadet, the Girondist, whom Merlin and his Cordelier Jacobin trio hated most heartily—excused himself as best he could; he had really heard from several persons that the Assembly was not free, that the hall was surrounded by an armed multitude; he had really thought it his duty to mention this to the House; and now he could not but think it very dolorous for a president to be threatened with the Abbaye for having discharged his duty. Merlin's motion was got rid of by the order of the day, and the Assembly then continued reading the letter, which added that seven or eight members of the Assembly could attest the facts, as they had run for refuge into the same guard-house as M. Dumolard; that the deputies were all waiting there for the arrival of a force sufficient to protect their retreat, when the mob began to break into the guard-house, which reduced them to the humiliating necessity of jumping out of a back window. "Without doubt," said the writer of this letter, "we are all bound to die at our posts; but it would be as useless as contrary to our duty to let ourselves be butchered at the very door of the Assembly by the emissaries of a faction whose plots we sometimes disconcert. . . . The city of Paris is actually threatened with the same horrible massacres that have taken place at Avignon, if a mayor and a municipality are determined to do nothing but legalise seditious meetings." Another deputy, one of the seven or eight that had leaped out at the back window with Dumolard, confirmed the preceding account, complaining it regard to himself that he had been pelted with mud and beaten with fists, and declaring that he would go no more to that House unless they could assure him of protection. The next letter read by the secretary was from Calvet, who merely said that he had been grossly insulted and threatened, but that he would continue to attend and vote according to his conscience, although he should fall a victim to his attachment to the constitution. After reading a short note from Quatremère-de-Quincy, the well-known writer on the fine arts and antiquity, who merely denounced in a general way the outrages committed on many deputies his colleagues, and the popular violence to which he himself had long been exposed, the secretary took up a letter from Chapron, another of those who had leaped out of the back window of the guard-house with Dumolard. "Yes," wrote poor Chapron, "we all leaped out of a window! It is horrible that deputies of the Assembly should have had no other resource than that—no other means of saving the inhabitants of Paris from the shame of a bloody crime! I was elected by my constituents to speak without fear and to emit my opinions freely. I have now the honour to acquaint the Assembly that until it takes the necessary measures to restrain the furious galleries and clear the lobbies, until it enjoins the mayor and the municipality to disperse the mobs which collect daily round the hall, I must absent myself from its debates." The next letter read was from the minister of justice, who said, "The evil is at its height. I have had the honour of writing eight letters to the Assembly to beg it to take proper measures for checking those who excite the multitude to violence and crime; but the Assembly has done nothing, and every day fresh calamities happen." After dwelling upon the attack on the members, and stating that a commandant of the national guards had been sabred by the mob, the minister of justice said, "Yet all these crimes are to remain unpunished. I have, however, denounced them to the criminal tribunal by the express order of the king. [Angry murmurs from all the galleries.] But the laws are powerless! In these circumstances, honour, probity, duty oblige me to declare to you that, without the prompt succour of the legislative body, the government can no longer incur responsibility." When the galleries had done hooting at this letter, a bold and powerful declaration, sent in by Jolivet, deputy for the department of Seine-et-Marne, was read by the secretary. Jolivet stated that in spite of his repugnance for all clubs, he had ventured the preceding evening into the Jacobin Club, in order to hear in what light the excesses of the mob were considered there; that in the lobby he had heard men devoting to execration and vengeance the majority of the Assembly for having voted for Lafayette; that, on reaching one of the galleries, he found the society occupied with the question about publishing a list of the names of all the deputies who had acquitted the general; that he had seen M. Montaut, a member of the National Assembly, acting as president, putting this question to the vote, &c.; that he had heard members of the club boasting of their activity and zeal in insulting the deputies of the Assembly, and in tearing down all the king's proclamations, &c.; and he intimated that the publication of the list of the members could only be meant to provoke a massacre. Not only the galleries, but all the extreme part of the côté gauche, where sat Montaut, and other chiefs or orators of the Jacobins, hissed and hooted at this declaration. Then Kersaint, who had been a captain in the royal navy when the revolution began, but who had become an author, a perfectibilian, and a Girondist of the hottest kind, rose to cry shame on this delay and all this jabber. "At a time," said he, "when the question of the king's forfeiture fixes upon you the attention of all France—on this day, when you ought to be opening the solemn discussion, what must Frenchmen think at seeing you wasting your time about miserable delations like these?" Some of the members said it was no such trifling matter to be pelted, beaten, and threatened with the lanterne; that, if the Assembly wished to appear solemn and grand, it must maintain the respect due to all its members. "Far be it from me," continued Kersaint, "to wish to applaud, to wish to excuse, the excited citizens, who have forgotten what they owe to themselves in the person of their representatives; but let the Assembly constantly occupy itself upon great questions and the real interests of the people, and then the people will never fail in paying the respect that is due to its members. [The federates, and the other mob in the galleries, applauded enthusiastically.] I therefore demand that these letters and denunciations be all turned over to the committee of legislation, which may draw up a project of law against those men who disturb the freedom of our debates, who excite confusion and riot in the galleries—in short, against those despicable means that are employed by the enemies of the people to discredit this Assembly and ruin la chose publique." M. Girardin, who boasted of being the boy-friend and pupil of Rousseau, but who was a gentleman, and who had found, for some time past, that Jean Jacques's political theories were not the best fitted for practice, rose in his place to declare that yesterday, within the very walls of the Assembly, he had been struck" A brutal voice from the extreme côté gauche asked in what part of the body he had been struck. "Behind," cried Girardin, indignantly: "assassins never strike a man in front! And but for the quick intervention of one of my colleagues, I should have been murdered in this hall. I say, then, that this House cannot enter upon so important a question as that which M. Kersaint has mentioned, unless every member is free to deliberate and vote according to his conscience. Yesterday I was all but assassinated for voting according to my conscience. At this moment the House is surrounded, and we are under the dominion of a fierce faction. I declare then to the nation, from whom I have my powers as a legislator, that I cannot vote under these circumstances!" Nearly every member of the côté droit rose at these words; and they all cried that they could not and would not deliberate on the question of forfeiture, unless they were previously rendered safe and free. The secretary then continued to read other letters from other unfortunate deputies who had been pelted and beaten by the mob; and one of whom had moreover been robbed of his snuff-box, pocket-book, and walking-stick. The galleries continued their hooting, and the roar of thousands of savage voices was heard outside. A member of the côté droit exclaimed, "Mr. President, I demand that we adjourn, and that we quit these walls, wherein we are not free!" "No," subjoined Vaublanc, "it is no longer possible to make France believe that there is a National Assembly, or that this Assembly is free! We cannot conceal from ourselves the fact that we are under the domination of furious factions! . . . I too was threatened yesterday, and might have been murdered but for the timely warning of a friend, which prevented my going home. My house was surrounded by an armed mob, who were dressed as national guardsmen, and who cried aloud that eighty citizens were to perish by their hand, and I the first of the number! . . . Twelve men broke into my house, ransacked every part of it, and insulted and terrified everybody they found in it. Last night I could not go home to my bed, lest I should be massacred! I cannot believe that there are many members of this Assembly who can think with M. Kersaint that these are matters too trifling to engage our attention." The galleries, and a part of the Assembly, murmured and hissed; but, nothing daunted, Vaublanc, who had worn a sword before the revolution, and who knew how to use it, continued, "Without doubt, insults, menaces, personal assaults, are excellent means to prepare this discussion of the déchéance: but these means shall not make us guilty of perjury; and surely this Assembly will not dare to go beyond the limits which have been laid down by the constitution. . . . I demand, for the present, that the procureur-general syndic of the department be called to the bar, and that he be ordered to take the strongest measures to secure the tranquillity of Paris, and so enable members to vote without fear of being torn to pieces by the mob. I beg you to observe that it is impossible for any man to vote here or debate any longer—unless, indeed, he be ready to do violence to the constitution and to his own conscience. . . ." Here his voice was drowned by furious cries. He begged the president to silence those galleries. The president rang his hand-bell, and shouted like one possessed. Vaublanc resumed, "I am incessantly hearing men invoke the authority of the Assembly against the galleries, but this authority has no longer any force. Is it not ridiculous to hear the president twenty times calling these galleries to order, and to hear the galleries twenty times drown his voice with their hooting. It is better to say at once that we will all quit this place!" Here all the members of the côté droit rose again, and cried out, "Yes, let us go! We can no longer stay here!" A côté gauche man asked them where they would go to—where the Assembly could be so safe as in Paris, in the midst of a brave and a generous people, devoted to liberty and equality, and all the principles of the revolution? Another deputy on the same side said that it would be the height of cowardice to abandon the capital, merely because a few deputies had been kicked. Vaublanc begged to remind them that he had said nothing about quitting Paris; that the motion he had made was that the procureur-general syndic should be called to the bar, and proper means adopted to put an end to the atrocities of the mob and the insolence of the galleries. "In addition," said he, "I now demand that these federates be all ordered to quit Paris, and march to the camp at Soissons. We had troubles and émeutes enough before; but since the arrival of these Marseillaise there has been nothing but violence, intimidation, and anarchy!" The côté droit cheered and applauded this proposition. Kersaint, who, like the rest of the Girondists, regarded the presence of these federates as indispensable to the establishment of the republic, rose to turn attention from that ticklish point by haranguing about calumnies and inventions, and then by seconding Vaublanc's first motion for calling the procureur-general syndic to the bar, &c., in order that the sacred character and inviolability of the representatives of the people might be respected. A member of the côté droit said that there was a greater power, a more influential personage, than the procureur-general—that this was Mayor Pétion, and that Pétion, who had under his orders the whole public force of the capital, ought to be called to the bar, and asked whether he would or would not answer for the personal security of the representatives of the people. As Pétion was hesitating and shrinking already, his party, the Girondists, endeavoured to save him from this awkward pass. Grange-neuve, the unassassinated Girondist, thought it shameful to think of increasing the responsibility of the virtuous mayor at such a crisis. Isnard delivered a long oration, in which he said that all patriots must know how active Pétion had been in putting down émeutes, and in which, as a sure means of distracting attention, he thundered at Lafayette, at the departmental directory, and at the court—the wretched, helpless court, upon which, he said, the first vengeance of the people ought to fall. Guadet said that the security of the whole was a more interesting matter than the security of a part; that, since the Assembly were going to call upon Mayor Pétion to know whether he would answer for the tranquillity of the capital, they ought also to call upon King Louis to know whether he would answer for the security of the empire. Choudieu, the most rabid of Jacobins, and to the very last moment the sworn friend of Robespierre, supported the proposition of the amiable Girondist, adding another of his own, which was, that the Assembly should declare whether it could or could not find means sufficient to save the country. And in this speech Choudieu broadly hinted that the best means of salvation would be found in the forcible expulsion of the majority by the minority. "For my part," he exclaimed, "I see the danger of the country in nothing but our weakness—a weakness of which we yesterday gave such a deplorable proof in acquitting Lafayette. I say that those men who have not courage enough to look that factious soldier in the face are not fit to sit here, or debate upon those grand measures that are requisite to the salvation of the state. I say that those who dread the power of one man because he is at the head of an army." Here the speech was cut short by a terrible tumult, the côté droit calling out that he ought to be sent to the Abbaye, and the côté gauche and the galleries applauding him to the skies, and hooting and cursing the côté droit. In this hurly-burly the federates were forgotten; but it was determined by the august Areopagus that Pétion should be summoned to the bar as well as Rœderer, the procureur-general syndic of the department. Rœderer frankly deposed that the whole capital was in a most alarming state; that the mayor and the municipality had shown a disinclination to the taking of any energetic steps to prevent riot and insurrection; and that one of the sections—the section of Quinze-Vingts—had come to the resolution of sounding the tocsin, and marching to the Assembly that very night, if the king's forfeiture were not voted. Rœderer added that this resolution of Quinze-Vingts had been sent to the forty-seven other sections of Paris, with an invitation to each of them to sound the tocsin and join the march; and that, as far as he knew, only one of the sections had refused. He represented that he and the body to which he belonged—the directory of the department—could do little or nothing without encroaching on the powers of Mayor Pétion and the municipality, who had the national guards at their command, and who entirely monopolised the management of the police of the capital. As for Mayor Pétion, he protested that he had no rest by night or by day; that for more than a week he and his municipals had been incessantly labouring to preserve order and tranquillity, &c. "But, gentlemen," said he, "you are not ignorant of all the alarming rumours that have been spread, such as that the enemies of the people are going to carry off the king. The municipality have recognised the necessity of letting all the sections, and all classes of citizens, unite in mounting guard at the Tuileries; and the municipality have arranged that that guard shall be composed, every day, of citizens taken from the battalions of all the sections indiscriminately, so that every section, by having a share in the guard and surveillance of the king, may dissipate its suspicions and alarms." This was Pétion's masterpiece: he had mixed the sans-culottes with the respectabilities, in the proportion of at least ten to one; and therefore there could not be the least danger of any resistance at the Tuileries on the part of the national guards. Condorcet, in evident ecstasy, then produced "A project of instruction to the people as to the best way of exercising their sovereignty;" and, at the early hour of seven in the evening, the Assembly rose. They had adjourned the great question of déchéance till the morrow, when, as nearly every man among them must have known, sentence would be pronounced by the people themselves. Pétion went straight to the committee of research, and surveillance of the Jacobin Club, where the trio—Merlin, Chabot, and Bazire—were the most active spirits. This trio received their impulse from Robespierre; but the Incorruptible, as usual with him in these moments of crisis and peril, kept himself out of sight, sending forth his oracles from behind the shrine. Notwithstanding the sneers of Madame Roland, the ex-capuchin was not deficient in courage: at least Chabot appears to have been the boldest and most resolute of the trio. Pétion now wanted the thing to be done without his taking any active or open part in the doing of it—wanted the insurrection to appear like the spontaneous movement of the people, in which neither he nor his party had any direct share. The Girondists had begun the business with treachery and cowardice, and with cowardice and cunning they now finished it. The worshipful mayor pretended to desire that the Jacobin committee should suspend the insurrection, and leave the fate of the monarchy to the Assembly, who would, he said, within a day or two, pronounce sentence of déchéance. He protested that the Girondists had made up their minds to act in perfect concert with the Jacobins, to carry the question of forfeiture in the teeth of all opposition, and then to dissolve the Assembly, and instantly convoke a National Convention, to which none but determined republicans would be elected. This course, he said, would look more legal in itself, and would be safer in execution; for, in the insurrection, blood, after all his precautions, might be spilt. Chabot replied, that to suspend the insurrection would be to disappoint and discourage the people, who not only expected it, but had prepared for it; that the Girondists and Jacobins, however closely united, might still find themselves in a minority on the grand question; that it was quite evident the côté droit intended to make a life and death struggle, as they had been so much bolder to-day than they had been for a long time past; and, in fine, that nothing was to be hoped from an Assembly that had just absolved that villain Lafayette. Speaking as if Pétion had really deceived him, the ex-capuchin added that he (Pétion) had allowed himself to be deceived by his friends; but that, for the rest, the people had resolved to save themselves, and to ring out the tocsin that night; and the tocsin would be rung at midnight. "Will you then always be so rash?—Vous aurez donc toujours mauvaise tête”—subjoined Pétion. “It will go ill with us if the people rise! I know your influence, but I also know my own, and must employ it against you.” “Ah! but, friend Pétion,” replied the ex-capuchin, “we will put you under arrest in the Hôtel de Ville, and then, you know, you cannot act.” This was precisely what Pétion wanted; and at the proper time he went to the Hôtel de Ville to be put under arrest, and thence to be able to urge a “Thou canst not say I did it—I; a prisoner, helpless in the hands of the people.” As the sun went down in the west the mob got up in the east, in the swarming faubourgs of St. Antoine and St. Marcel; and in brief time the drums beat to arms in every quarter of Paris. The halls of the several sections were taken possession of by the most sans-culottic and ardent of the inhabitants, who scared away or forcibly expelled the more respectable citizens; and each of these sectional assemblies communicated and concerted measures with all the rest. There was, moreover, a grand committee of insurrection, which had been arranged and constituted several days before, and which sat at three several points. Santerre, and Westermann, a fierce Alsatian, who had been a non-commissioned officer before the revolution, and who was now rising to the grade of general, and to the scaffold of the guillotine, presided in the Faubourg St. Antoine. Fournier, styled the American, a mulatto from St. Domingo, who had been released by the revolution from a gaol, to which his crimes had consigned him, presided in the Faubourg St. Marcel, or St. Marceau. Danton, the chief supreme of that club and district, presided at the Cordeliers, being assisted by Camille Desmoulins the madman, and Carra the newspaper-man, and being backed by the five hundred and sixteen Marseillaise federates, whom he had so opportunely lodged in the monastery club-house. Beau Barbaroux, who had provided himself with a strong dose of poison, to be taken in case the plot should be shaken, or miscarry, stationed videttes to watch the Tuileries and the Salle de Manège, and put several couriers in a state of readiness to gallop off towards the south and the ultra-republican city of Marseilles; and, having done this work, he joined Danton and the federates at the Cordeliers. Marat, whose cowardice was ever equal to his cruelty—Marat, who had been preaching and writing for this bloody insurrection ever since the summer of 1789, was scared out of his senses now that it had come. He had asked Barbaroux to smuggle him off to Marseilles disguised as a groom, but the French Antinous had refused him this favour, and now Danton hid the hideous little monster and his fears in a cellar in the Cordelier section. As for Robespierre, he was still an invisible voice—a mystery and an awe felt everywhere, but seen nowhere by mortal man. Danton was the great visible actor and orator; yet, when the time came for fighting, even Danton hid himself, and did not re-appear until victory had declared for the mob. In his present harangues, he made use of the old logic of fear.

He told the sans-culottes and the federates that that very night the satellites of the tyrant concealed in the Tuileries were to make a sortie en masse, and butcher the people before quitting Paris to join the army of Coblenz; that the only hope of self-preservation lay in anticipating this murderous movement; that the people must strike, or be stricken. “To arms, then!” cried he, with his loud trumpet voice. “To arms, to arms, and save yourselves!” At this moment a musket was fired in a square or open court close by. The cry, “To arms!” was spread in all directions; and about half-past eleven o’clock the insurrection was proclaimed. Leaving his Marseillaise federates drawn up in arms, and with several pieces of artillery at the gate of the Cordeliers Club, Barbaroux, with Camille Desmoulins and others, ran to different churches to set the tocsin ringing. They found several of the sections vacillating, or hanging back, as if alarmed about the result, or anxious that others should begin first; but the oratory of Camille Desmoulins put the sans-culottes into better heart, and by degrees all the sections agreed to sound the tocsin, and then march.

In the Tuileries there was nothing but doubt, dissension, and alarm. Everybody knew what was coming, but few were agreed as to how it ought to be met. Among the national guards, who had been so nicely shuffled and mixed by mayor Pétion, there was the widest difference of opinion. Some (who, unfortunately for the court, were the minority) thought that the palace ought to be defended against the mob; but others thought that no resistance ought to be offered to the sovereign people. The king was at supper, and was giving various orders to Madame Campan, when a noise and a scuffle were heard at the door of the apartment. Madame Campan going out to see what it was, saw the two sentinels (national guardsmen both) quarrelling and fighting. One of them said that the king was acting according to the constitution, and that he, for one, would defend him at the risk of his own life; the other said that the king hindered the only constitution that could suit a free people; and upon this difference they were well nigh murdering one another. Louis, who had heard the scuffle, would know what it meant, and what the men were saying, and Madame Campan was obliged to tell him. The queen said that she was not at all surprised; that she well knew that more than half of those that were mounting guard were of the Jacobin party. Mandat, the commandant of that guard, a captain of the ex-gardes Françaises, was, however, devoted heart and soul to the king and queen, and determined, if only half of his men would stand by him, to repel force by force. He had demanded, and even obtained, an order to this effect from the municipality; for Pétion, the virtuous mayor, when publicly asked for such an order, would not venture to refuse it, and thereby make himself responsible for consequences. About ten o’clock, Mandat, who had before written to the mayor in his own name, to beg him to come to the palace, sent a message in the king's name to enjoin him to go thither, and see to the proper discharge of his duty, which was to preserve order and tranquillity. Pétion was sitting quietly in the Hôtel de Ville, waiting the accomplishment of Chabot's threat or acceptable promise; and there he would fain have remained, as a visit to the palace might possibly be attended with some personal danger to his precious self; but, at the same time that Mandat's last message was delivered, a multitude of citizens of the respectable class rang in his ears that the sans-culottes were going to ring the tocsin—that the federates and the mob were all in arms—and that he, as mayor, was bound to go to the Tuileries, which was the point threatened with attack. Moreover, several members of the municipal council, who were not in the secret, cried out, "We must go to the Tuileries! You must put yourself at our head! Allons, Monsieur le Maire!" Thus urged, Pétion went with several of his colleagues to the palace. We have no doubt whatever as to the reality of his fear, but we know that he monstrously exaggerated the scene which met his eyes (though he insinuates that it did not make him quake) in the interior of the royal dwelling. He said that he found there assembled the mass of the Swiss guards, with their bayonets fixed to their muskets; a great many officers belonging to the national guard staffs which Lafayette had formed; and a multitudinous array of courtiers and gentlemen in black, with swords at their sides which seemed leaping out of their scabbards; and that it was impossible to describe how savagely they all looked upon him, the man of the people, and mayor of Paris. Their looks seemed to say, "Pétion, you shall pay to-night for all the mischief you have done us!"—or so says Pétion, who goes on to inform us that he proceeded unmoved to the council-chamber, where the king was with his wife and children and sister, his ministers, and a pretty good number of women (un assez grand nombre de femmes). The king, he says, was in great wrath, and deigned to say nothing to him, the mayor, except, "Sir, it appears that there is a great disturbance in Paris." To which he says he replied, "Yes: the fermentation is great." He adds that commandant Mandat, who was standing by the side of the king, here put in his word, and said, "Never mind! I answer for everything: I have taken proper measures." Procureur-general syndic Rœderer, who was present, and who was writing at the council-table another letter to the mayor to bid him come to the Tuileries when Pétion entered, gives a very different account of the behaviour of poor Mandat, who was not destined to live to give his own. Rœderer says that he and his friends had discovered that, in the course of the day, Pétion's administrators of police, by virtue of an order dated five days before, had distributed five thousand ball cartridges to the Marseillaise, and had refused to deliver any gunpowder or ball to commandant Mandat; that Mandat now complained of this conduct to Pétion, who told him that he had not demanded the ammunition in proper official form; that there was then an angry discussion on this point; that then the mayor asked the commandant whether he had not any powder left from the last distribution; and that Mandat replied he had only some three cartridges per man (which must have been another consolatory piece of information to the virtuous mayor); that Pétion then said it was stifling hot up there, and descended forthwith to the garden. After waiting a short time for a letter from the council of the departmental authorities, which letter, when it came, brought no clear information as to the movements of the insurgents, Rœderer followed Pétion down to the garden, and there found the virtuous mayor surrounded by some municipal officers and members of the commune, and by many young men of the national guards, who were without their arms, and singing and frolicking round the magistrates and the mayor (qui chantaient et folâtraient autour des magistrats et du maire). Rœderer took a turn or two in the garden with Pétion, who appeared tranquil, and who said, "I hope nothing will happen. My commissaries are gone to the sections. Thomas has told me that there is no harm doing there. Thomas ought to know the true state of affairs." But who this knowing Thomas was, Rœderer never knew. Friends and foes alike insisted that the mayor ought to remain where he was, and the sentinels prevented any one quitting the palace-garden. But not only was Pétion obliged to stop—he was also obliged to put in writing the order he had given commandant Mandat to repel force by force. About half-an-hour after he had done talking about his knowing Thomas, the loud clock of the Tuileries struck the midnight hour; and then, from the Hôtel de Ville, from the church of St. Roch, from the tower of St. Jacques de la Boucherie, and from every church tower and belfry in Paris, there rose the louder and still louder sounds of the tocsin. Some time after the first peal of these dreadful bells, a message was delivered in the palace that the National Assembly had met, and demanded the presence of mayor Pétion at their bar, in order that he might give them an account of the state of the capital. [Several deputations from the Hotel de Ville had represented to the Assembly that the virtuous mayor had been missing for two hours, that it was believed he had gone to the Tuileries, and that his precious life must be in danger there.] Many of the king's friends, thinking that Pétion might be of some value to the court, and some check to his idolaters, the mob, if kept in the Tuileries as a hostage, advised Louis to bid defiance to the summons of the Assembly, and keep the mayor where he was; but the poor victim of every kind of irregularity and violence thought that this step would be irregular, and far too violent; and he ordered that Pétion should be allowed to take his departure. The virtuous mayor only appeared at the bar of the Assembly to be demanded back to the Hôtel de Ville by another deputation, who represented how extremely necessary his presence was in a moment of such universal combustion. Pétion stepped into his gilded coach, rolled back to the Hôtel de Ville, and was there put under arrest by the active men of the sections and faubourgs, who had already upset or suspended, pro tempore, the old municipality, placing all the members present in arrest, and setting up an insurrectional municipality of their own.

At the first sound of the tocsin all the friends of the royal family that were in the palace or in the gardens rushed to the royal apartment; and other friends came flocking in from different parts of the city to protest that they would die for and with their sovereign. Men of rank and ancient lineage, who had been for some time past in hiding, came from their places of concealment, with swords and with pistols—all the arms that they could bring—and with advice and suggestions, which were things already too numerous, contrary, and conflicting in that woful Babel. Besides these royalists of the old stamp, there ran to the Tuileries, with offers of swords and service, many of the Feuillants, who called themselves constitutional royalists, as Lally Tollendal, Narbonne, Latourdu-Pin, Gouvernet, Castellane, and Montmorency; but these betwixt-and-between gentlemen, who were now repudiated by both parties, were refused admittance by the court, and were left to wander round about the walls of the palace, at the imminent risk of being butchered by the sans-culottes. A number of old valets and serving-men of the court appeared in the midst of the noblemen and gentlemen in black, and the Swiss and staff-officers in their brilliant uniforms; some of these poor fellows had clumsy, old-fashioned sabres or rapiers tied to their middle by pocket-handkerchiefs; some had queer-looking pistols stuck in the same kind of girdle; and some, being able to lay their hands on no better weapons, armed themselves with spits and pokers, shovels and tongs—and, terrible as the moment was, Frenchmen could not but titter and laugh, and make bons-mots at these old serving-men and their unwarlike and uncourtly accoutrements. It had been fully expected that the sounding of the tocsin would be instantly followed by the march of the insurgents; but a quarter of an hour, half an hour, a whole hour passed away in this painful expectation, and the sans-culottes came not; and, instead of them, there came another letter from the departmental directory—a comfortable and comforting letter, as it intimated that, to the best of the knowledge of that council, the people were perplexed and undecided, and the insurrection paralysed. This impression was confirmed by “a tall man in a grey coat,” who made a verbal report to the king; and then the pleasant bon-mot ran through the council-chamber, le tocsin ne vend pas, or the tocsin gives no milk, or the tocsin is a dry milch-cow. But the tocsin was soon to give blood.

Mandat had said he had taken proper measures; and, indeed, the plan for defending the palace and the royal family, which had been adopted before the panic and confusion of counsels began, was exceedingly well arranged and proper for its purpose. The forces disposable by the court were inconsiderable in number; but it might be hoped that their discipline and military experience would give them the superiority over the countless rabble and town-militia that were expected to be their assailants. The far greater part of the Swiss guards were unfortunately at Courbevoie, where they would have been of the greatest service if the king had got out of Paris to fly into Normandy, but where, at present, they were of no use whatever. The Swiss that remained certainly did not exceed eight hundred men, and probably were not more than between six and seven hundred; and by the contrivances of the republicans—so ardent and so cautious all the while, so eager for the onslaught, and yet so cautious that it should only be made with the least possible risk and danger to themselves—this brave and faithful battalion had been deprived of its artillery. The rest of the forces consisted of the gendarmerie, which was principally composed of men who had belonged to the old gardes Françaises, and from whom little was to be expected; of the Parisian artillery attached to the national guards, and which consisted entirely of mechanics, the smiths, locksmiths, iron-founders, &c. of the capital, who were all furious liberty-and-equality men; and of the national guards themselves, who were so thoroughly imbued with the revolutionary spirit that nothing could be expected but that they would all join the people, except the battalion of Filles St. Thomas, which Pétion had not been able to mix and democratise, and about one-fourth of the battalion of Petits-Pères. This civic army had, however, promised to do their duty, to defend the constitution as it was, &c.; and, as there was no other army, as the Assembly by a series of decrees had sent to a distance every regiment of the line suspected of the least affection for the king or for the monarchy, Louis was compelled to hope in these promises, or to give himself up to absolute despair. Mandat had placed a squadron of gendarmerie with cannon on the Pont-Neuf, to keep in check the Marseillaise, and the men of the Faubourg St. Marceau, men who had to cross the Seine before they could form a junction with the men of the Faubourg St. Antoine; he had placed another squadron with some guns near the Hôtel-de-Ville to drive back the Faubourg St. Antoine men; he had placed other squadrons and detachments in the Place Vendôme, and on other important points commanding the approaches to the palace; and he had stationed the mass of the cannoneers in the avenues of the Tuileries, and the Swiss and the best of the national guards partly in the courts of the Tuileries, and partly in the interior of that palace. But about half-past two in the morning Pétion's right-hand man, Manuel, procureur of the commune, who had not been provisionally suspended, ordered the squadron and the cannoneers stationed at the Pont-Neuf to quit that post, “as the cannons interrupted the free communications of citizens;" and the squadron and the cannoneers promptly obeyed this order, and thus left the road open for the Cordeliers and the Faubourg St. Marceau to join the Faubourg St. Antoine and the western sections. Upon this being reported at the Tuileries, the king's ministers deliberated and debated whether they might not take it upon themselves to set Manuel's order at defiance, and re-establish the artillery on the Pont-Neuf. We are not told what was the conclusion they came to; but we need no information to conclude that, if such a counter-order had been given, it would not have been obeyed. Another hour or two rolled on, and still the insurgents came not. The day was beginning to break. Madame Elizabeth, who had been reposing with the queen on a sofa, rose and went to a window, looked out at the sky, which was very red, and said to the queen, "Sister, come and see the sun rise." Marie Antoinette went to the window. "It was the last time," says Rœderer, who seems scarcely aware that he is telling a most pathetic story, "it was the last time she ever saw the sun." About the same moment the king, who had retired an hour or two before to his bed-chamber, re-appeared in his cabinet. "He had probably been lying down, for the powder had fallen out of his hair, and the curls on one side were all flattened, which made a singular contrast with the powder and the curls on the other side of the head."* A summons from the Hôtel-de-Ville had already been delivered to Mandat; and now there came a second and a more urgent call from the same quarter, where, it was said, Mayor Pétion wished to consult with him as to the best means of employing the public force. The poor commandant was very averse to going; but one of the king's ministers thought that his going would be useful to the court, and Rœderer thought that he ought to go to show his respect to the laws and to the constitution, which put the national guards under the direction of the mayor of Paris. Mandat, therefore, took his departure, being, like those who advised his going, quite ignorant of the coup d'état which had been struck in the Hôtel-de-Ville. It was about five o'clock of this fatal morning of the 10th of August when poor Mandat entered the civic hall, and found the new insurrectional municipality installed in it, and issuing their orders in all directions. They questioned him and cross-questioned him, demanded back Mayor Pétion's written order for repelling force by force; taxed him with high treason against the nation, with a monstrous design to shed the blood of the patriots, and then committed him to the Abbaye prison, there to abide trial. It is probable that these insurrectional municipals had no intention that he should travel so far or wait so long; but whether they had so arranged it or not, the hapless commandant had scarcely crossed the threshold of the Hôtel-de-Ville ere he was seized, knocked down with clubs and pikes, and then barbarously butchered by a mob. He died on the very steps of the Hôtel-de-Ville. His son, who had accompanied or followed him to that pandemonium, begged to be permitted to remove the dead body,—entreated with tears and the most touching prayers,—but the ruffians carried away the body, and hurled it into the Seine. It was a miracle that they did not butcher the son; and probably it was to make up for this omission that the revolutionary tribunal afterwards guillotined Mandat's daughter, a young and interesting woman. Shortly after the departure of Mandat from the Tuileries, and apparently before his fate was known there, the queen took Rœderer aside, and asked him what was to be done under present circumstances? Rœderer, who well knew that circumstances were far worse than the queen believed, who saw that the cannoneers near the palace were no more to be depended upon than those who had been stationed at the Pont-Neuf, that the majority of the national guards were, at the very least, resolved not to fire upon the people, and that even the battalion Filles St. Thomas were offended, and murmuring at the presence in the royal apartments of so many nobles and ultra-royalists, replied that he saw nothing that the king and his family could do but go over to the National Assembly, and take refuge there. The Vicomte Dubouchage said, "Sir, you are proposing to carry the king into the midst of his enemies!" Rœderer said that the members of the Assembly were not all enemies, that a great majority had recently voted against the republicans, and that he only proposed this measure as the least of many dangers. The queen then said to him in a most decided tone, "Sir, we have troops here! It is at length time to know who shall have the upper hand, the king and the constitution, or the lawless faction!" "In that case, madame," said Rœderer, "let us see what dispositions have been made for a resistance." And he called up M. Lachesnaye, to whom the chief command had fallen through the absence of Mandat—a bad change for the court, for Lachesnaye had a rabid hatred of old nobles and aristocrats in general. When asked by Rœderer whether the national guards were steady, and whether he had adopted measures for stopping the march of the mob upon the palace, Lachesnaye replied in the affirmative; but then turning to the queen, he said in a rude and angry tone, "Madame, the apartments are full of all kinds of people, who embarrass the service and prevent us from getting near to the king, and these are things that give great disgust to the national guards." "This is untimely and unreasonable," said Marie Antoinette, who was speaking and acting instead of her inert husband; "I will answer to you for all the gentlemen that are here. They will march before, behind, in your ranks, just as you will; they are ready to do anything and everything that is necessary; they are men to be depended upon—ce sont des hommes sûrs." By the advice of Rœderer two of the king's ministers were sent over to the Assembly to acquaint them with the state of affairs, and request them to send a deputation to the palace. But nothing more was said about the king's removing to the Salle-de-Manège; and, as the insurgents did not even yet appear, as all Paris seemed to have fallen into a lull, many in the Tuileries hoped more than ever that the tocsin had remained unproductive. The truth, however, was that the court was left without information—that insurrection was now armed cap-à-pié, and on the very point of striking with all its strength. The blood of Mandat had quickened the appetite of the mob for more blood; and the foremost pack allured and brought into speed and action the countless packs behind. The Demoiselle Theroigne, the prostitute from Luxembourg, the Aspasia, Minerva, Bellona of the Parisians, had gone forth in a short-tailed riding-habit, with a grenadier's cap on her head, a sabre in her hand, and pistols in her girdle; and she had long been marching and counter-marching, haranguing and reprobating the indecision and slowness of the patriots. She was the she-champion of the Gironde, and, with the exception of beau Barbaroux, the only one of that party that showed courage and daring on this critical night, which was to produce that glorious republican to-morrow for which the whole of the Gironde had been so long sighing. A patrol or advanced guard of the patriots seized in the Champs Elysées seventeen individuals who were dressed like gentlemen, who had rapiers by their sides, and who were therefore supposed to be going with some desperate intent against the people. They carried them off and lodged them in the nearest guard-house; but eleven of the seventeen escaped by back windows or passages. Demoiselle Theroigne presently appeared in front of the guard-house to prevent the evasion of the remaining six by executing prompt mob-justice upon them. Her strong troop—a very strong one, for the Paris patriots loved to follow such a leader—dragged out the victims: two of them, by bribery or by miraculous agility, contrived even now to escape, but the other four were massacred in the Place Vendôme under the eyes of the “Amazon of Liberty.” One of these victims was Sulleau, the editor of a royalist journal, who had been a companion and class-mate of Robespierre in the college of Louis-Quinze; the second was an abbé, and the two others were gardes-du-corps. Their bleeding heads stuck upon pikes had a wonderful effect in quickening the people, who were now concentrating from all quarters without the slightest opposition, as the gendarmes and gunners stationed near the Hôtel-de-Ville had, like their brethren on the Pont-Neuf, obeyed the orders, not of commandant Mandat, who was dead, but of Manuel, who was living and stirring, and likely to rise to a proud pre-eminence. The march and the concentration would have been quicker if brewer Santerre had been braver. When the Faubourg St. Antoine was all armed—excepting only some prudent patriots who had sneaked home to their beds—the burly brewer took it into his head that the Faubourg St. Marceau and the Marseillaise would not march or venture to cross the Pont-Neuf, and, stumbling at sundry other doubts and difficulties, he proposed that the business should be put off for a day or two. But Westermann, the Alsatian, caught the brewer by the throat, while his bright sabre glittering before his eyes told the brewer that he must march or die. “Allons, Santerre!—Allons, brothers of Faubourg St. Antoine and Bastille heroes!”—and at last, between five and six in the morning, away they all went from their distant suburb to the heart of Paris, and thence slowly onward for the Tuileries. Apparently the court knew by the beat of drums and the occasional firing of cannon that their merciless foe was coming, when, at about six o'clock, or a little earlier, animated by his wife, who said to him, “Sire, this is the time to show yourself, or never,” Louis put on his hat and descended to the gardens with old Marshal Maille to pass the troops in review. If the heavy man could have leaped on horseback, if he could have caracoled and galloped along the ranks, if he could only have made a loud, commonplace harangue, his presence might possibly have done some little good; but poor Louis was utterly incapable of these things, and his tardy attempt at doing something appears to have done harm rather than good. Some of the grenadiers of Filles St. Thomas put their caps on their bayonets and cried for the last time “Vive le Roi!” But the rest looked with mixed anger and contempt at the unwieldy figure of the king, and, irritated at the cry of the grenadiers, and encouraged by the arrival of some of the cannoneers, who came to point their guns, not against the people, but against the palace, they shouted “Vive la Nation!” “Vive la Liberté!” “À bas le Veto!” “À bas le Traître!” “Vive Pétion!” and presently mingled with such cries hooting and cursing. These ominous sounds were heard by those who had remained in the palace. “Great God,” exclaimed Vicomte Dubouchage, “it is the king they are hooting! What the devil is he going to do there? Quick! Let us go and bring him back.” And instantly the Vicomte and another nobleman descended to the garden. The queen now wept without saying a word; she tried many times to dry her tears, and, finding she could not, she rushed into another room to hide them. Anon Louis reappeared between the two gentlemen who had gone out to seek him: he was heated and out of breath, from the extraordinary exertion he had made; but his countenance was as calm and impassive as ever. “The king,” says Rœderer, “appeared but little troubled at what had happened downstairs.” But Madame Campan, who says that she saw from a window of the palace everything that had taken place in the garden—who says that she saw cannoneers quit their posts and hold their fists in the king's face, loading him at the same time with the grossest abuse—

states that Louis became as pale as death, pâle comme s'il avait cessé d'exister. She adds, "The queen now said to me that all was lost; that the king had shown no energy, and that that sort of review had done more harm than good." To complete this despair a messenger now got into the palace with the certain intelligence that all Paris was up in arms, that the faubourgs were in full march with artillery and an abundance of ball and ammunition, and that the Marseillaise and the Cordeliers battalion had crossed the Seine and were close at hand. Rœderer again proposed that the royal family should seek refuge in the Assembly. The Vicomte Dubouchage, who had seen how the king had been treated in the garden, said passionately, "No, he must not go to the Assembly! There is no going there with safety: he must remain here." Rœderer and some of the members of the Council of the departmental directory who had joined him then offered to go over to the Salle-de-Manège to acquaint the deputies with the intelligence which they had just received, and "submit the affair to their wisdom." On their way they met the two ministers who had been sent to, and who were now returning from the Assembly. "Gentlemen," said the two ministers, "where are you going?" Rœderer replied, "To the Assembly." "And to do what?" asked the ministers. "To demand their assistance—a deputation—or to beg them to invite the king and his family to their hall," responded Rœderer. "Eh! gentlemen," said the ministers, "we have been making the same demand, and without any effect! The Assembly would scarcely listen to us. There were not members enough present to form a House or vote a decree; there are not more than sixty or eighty of them at most." Rœderer and his party faced about and went with the two ministers back to the palace; and, no doubt, they went at speed, for crowds of people were now seen rushing along the Feuillant terrace. As they entered the garden they were stopped by some of the cannoneers who had not yet turned their guns towards the king's dwelling, and who said in a dolorous tone, "Gentlemen, are we to be obliged to fire upon our brothers?" Rœderer said that they were only there to defend the gates of the palace and hinder the people from entering; that they were not expected to fire unless they were first fired upon, and that those who could fire upon them were not to be considered as brothers. He was told that he ought to give these assurances to the rest of the cannoneers and to the national guards, who were all very uneasy at the thought that they were to be called upon to slaughter their brethren. Rœderer went to the great court-yard and to all the posts, haranguing and declaring that they were only to act according to the constitution, that they were only to stand upon the defensive. "No attack," shouted he, "no provocation on your side, but a bold countenance and a steady defence!" But at the word defence the cannoneers took the charges from their guns, threw the powder and ball upon the ground, and dashed out a match which was already lighted as if for action. This was decisive in itself; and the next minute the terrible Marseillaise and Cordeliers battalion marched into the square of the Carrousel, and took post close under the palace. They sent a man forward to the iron railing to speak with the Swiss guards, and invite them to join and fraternise; but these Swiss were very different men from the Château-Vieux regiment, and were not to be moved from their strict sense of military duty, however desperate might be the circumstances under which that duty was to be performed. Another messenger came forth from the ranks of the insurgents—"a young man, short, thin, and pale, and an officer of cannoneers"—and he told Rœderer that the insurgents only wanted to go the Assembly and remain there till the king's forfeiture should be pronounced; that they had twelve pieces of artillery in the Place du Carrousel, and were not to be resisted. Rœderer replied that the road to the Assembly did not lie through the palace; that it was illegal to go to the Assembly in force and in arms; that the constitution and laws must be respected, &c. While Rœderer was speaking with this thin, pale patriot, a number of people rushed to one of the gates of the palace and held conversation with several persons within, who seemed well-disposed to open the gate to them without giving them any trouble. He rushed into the palace by another door to tell the king that if he did not fly he would be murdered. An officer of the municipality, old or new, was telling the same sad story to the king. "But what do the people demand?" said the keeper of the seals. "The déchéance," replied the municipal. "Well, then, let the Assembly pronounce it," said the minister. "But, after this déchéance, what will happen?" was the terrible and inevitable question then put by the queen. The municipal bent or turned away his head, and said nothing. "Sire," cried Rœderer, "your majesty has not five minutes to lose! There is no safety for you except in the Assembly. You have not a sufficient number of men to defend the palace, and those you have are little to be depended upon. The cannoneers, at the mere mention of standing on the defensive, have unloaded their guns." "But," said the king, "I have not seen a great many people in the Place du Carrousel." "Sire," replied Rœderer, "there are twelve pieces of cannon there, and immense multitudes of men are arriving from the faubourgs." One Gerdret, a member of the departmental directory, a zealous patriot, and lace-merchant to the queen, ventured to offer a few words in support of what the procureur-general had said. "Silence, M. Gerdret," cried the queen; "it is not for you to raise your voice in this place! Hold your tongue, sir. . . . Let the procureur-general speak." And then turning to Rœderer she said, "But, sir, we have troops yet" "Madame," replied Rœderer, interrupting her, "all Paris is marching!—tout Paris marche."

And then, addressing the king with greater earnestness than before, the procureur-general added, "Sire, time presses; it is no longer a prayer that we make to you, it is no longer an advice that we take the liberty to give you; we have but one thing to do in this moment, and that is, to demand permission to drag you to the Assembly!" At these words poor Louis, who had been seated near a table with his hands on his knees and his eyes fixed on the ground, raised his head, looked fixedly at Rœderer for some seconds, then turning towards the queen he said, "Marchons—let us march," and then rose. His affectionate sister said to the procureur-general, "Monsieur Rœderer, you answer for the life of the king!" "Yes, Madame, with my own life," replied Rœderer, who then opened the death-march. As he walked before the king, who, he says, gave him a look of confidence, he begged that his majesty would not think of conducting with him any of his court, but would rely entirely on the departmental directory and on the national guards, who would form a double hedge to keep off the insurgents. "Well," said the king, "you have only to say it." The keeper of the seals exclaimed, "But, Monsieur Rœderer, the ministers will follow." As soon as Rœderer had assented, the queen said eagerly, "And Madame de Tourzel, the governess of my son!" Rœderer said she might go too. By this time they had reached an outer apartment which was crowded by national guardsmen and by gentlemen of the court, who seemed more than half inclined to prevent the king's going. Rœderer called out in a loud voice, "The king and his family are going to the Assembly alone, without any cortège except the department and the ministers and a guard. Please to open a passage." He then ordered the officer in command of the guard to advance his men to march in double rows with the king. The only words Louis was heard to address to his afflicted courtiers were, "Gentlemen, I am only going to the Assembly." The national guards were soon ready. As the king traversed the last apartment of the palace, he took the hat of a national guardsman who was marching at his right hand, and put on the man's head his own hat, which had a white feather. The guardsman was taken by surprise; but he presently took the king's hat from his head and put it under his left arm. At the foot of the great staircase Louis halted, and said to Rœderer, "But what is to become of all those persons left upstairs?" meaning the members of his diminished court, his faithful servants, and the devoted men who had run to the palace in the course of the preceding night to share in his danger.* It was never in the heart of Louis to be indifferent—as monarchs so often are—to the fate of his friends and servants; nor could any extremity of danger or distress drive them from his mind. Rœderer replied, that, as all the gentlemen appeared to be in plain clothes, they had nothing to do but to leave their swords and come out—that harm could scarcely happen to them. As he went out into the portico which commanded a view of a part of the Place du Carrousel, the king hesitated and halted again. "But still there are not so many people here in the Place," said he to Rœderer. "But, Sire," responded the procureur-general, "all the faubourgs are on the point of arriving, all the sections are armed, they have been united at the municipality; and then you have not men enough to resist even the insurgents already collected on the Place du Carrousel: there are twelve pieces of cannon there." The king continued his march. As they passed along the terraces of the Tuileries gardens they had to walk over leaves which had fallen abundantly from the trees in the course of the night, although it was only the 10th of August. "Here is a great fall of leaves," said Louis; "they fall early this year!" Some days before this Manuel had written in a newspaper that the king would only last till the fall of the leaves. The little Dauphin playfully kicked the leaves about, all ignorant of the prophecy and its actual fulfilment. The president of the department ran beforehand to the Assembly to announce that the king was coming. Rœderer, recollecting in time that the Assembly had drawn a line of demarcation, and claimed all the terrace of the Feuillant beyond a certain point as their own or as national territory, and that it would be considered very unlawful for the armed guard escorting the king to pass that delicate line, halted the head of the column on the court side, or, as it was called, the Coblenz side, of it. A deputation came forth from the Assembly to meet the king. "Sire," said the president, "the Assembly, eager to concur in securing your safety, offer you and your family an asylum in its own bosom." The royal family quitted the double row of national guards to traverse the rest of the terrace in the midst of the furious insurgents, who were not so entirely absorbed by the now decided theory of a republic but that some of the patriots found time to rob the queen of her watch and purse. Another of the republicans, a man of the tallest stature and most ferocious countenance, with a uniform on his back and officer's epaulettes on his shoulders, brandished a naked sword before the king's eyes, and by words as well as gestures intimated that Louis and all with him ought to be massacred. The general fury seemed, as usual, to be more directed against the queen than against the king, and the armed mob kept roaring, "No women! no women!" seasoning the exclamation with blasphemy and beastly obscenity. Rœderer harangued and the deputation from the august Arcopagus harangued till the ruffian put down his sword and took up the little dauphin in his arms. The royal mother gave a cry of dread and horror, and for the first time was near fainting. But Rocher—the ruffian's name is preserved in memoirs and histories—said to her "Madame, do not fear, I will not do him the least injury," and he hoisted the dauphin to his epauletted shoulder and carried him the remainder of the way. But there were other alarms and other obstacles. A fellow with a pole or pike nine or ten feet long made a frightful outcry, and had by his side a citizen still more transported with rage: they cried out with all their force, "They shall not go into the National Assembly! They are the cause of all our miseries! This must have an end! Down with them! Down with them!" Rœderer again harangued, telling them that they must respect the laws which the friends of the people had made; that the king had a right to enter the Assembly whenever he thought proper; and that, although the constitution gave no such right to the queen and the rest of the royal family, the Assembly, by a special decree just voted, allowed them to repair thither with the king. One of the deputation from the House attested that all this was truth and the law. The general opposition then seemed to yield, but the fierce loud man with the long pole or pike kept brandishing it in the air, and shouting "Down with them! down with them all!" until Rœderer snatched the pike from his hand, when he turned and fled, and disappeared in the crowd. At the door of the Assembly, which was guarded as usual by national guardsmen, one of the men said to the king, "Sire, do not fear; we are good people, only we will be betrayed no longer. Be a good citizen, Sire, and do not forget to drive all your black-silk-breeches men out of the palace!" Louis said a few words to the man, mildly and without any ill-humour. He was the first that entered the Assembly. He was closely followed by Rœderer; but a crowd and a rush in the lobbies stopped the queen, who would not separate from her son. Rœderer, going up to the bar, entreated the Assembly to send away the mob, and permit some of the grenadiers of the battalion Filles St. Thomas, who had escorted the royal family, to mount guard at the door. The ultra-Jacobin party, and apparently some of the Gironde, expressed great anger at the latter proposition; and there rose a cry that there was a conspiracy against the Assembly, and that it was for some sinister and fatal design Rœderer had proposed introducing into the Assembly an armed force. Thuriot and Cambon were particularly furious, and really spoke as if they were in an agony of alarm. They threatened Rœderer with impeachment, and told him that his head should answer for it if any attack were made or attempted upon the House. Instead of answering, Rœderer called in a few grenadiers without their arms; and these men presently opened a passage for the queen. One of the grenadiers took the Dauphin in his arms, traversed the hall, and set the child down on the table, which excited some applause. The queen followed with the rest of the royal family, and then sat down with the king upon the seats usually reserved for ministers. When Louis spoke, he calmly said, "I am come hither to avoid a great crime, and I think that I can nowhere be so safe as in the midst of you, gentlemen." To this the republican Girondist, Vergniaud, who was president, responded, "Sire, you may count upon the firmness of the National Assembly: its members have sworn to die in maintaining the rights of the people and the constituted authorities." Louis then seated himself close by the side of the president; but ex-capuchin Chabot, of the mauvaise tête, reminded the Assembly that they could not deliberate in presence of the king; and thereupon Louis and his family and ministers were conducted to a box called la loge du logographe, which was reserved for the short-hand writers or reporters, and which was placed immediately behind the president's chair. In that place, where they could see without being much seen, and where Louis could hear every word of the debate upon his own déchéance or forfeiture, we must leave them for the present, in order to return to the Tuileries.*

* Madame de Tourzel, that she might not be separated from her charge the Dauphin, had been obliged to leave her daughter, then seventeen years of age, in the Tuileries in the midst of the soldiers.

With the departure of the king all motive for resistance seemed to cease at the palace, where the means of defence were diminished by the departure of the grenadiers and others who had helped to escort the king. The gens-d'armes, who had so implicitly obeyed procureur Manuel, quitted all their posts, and joined the people with cries of "Vive la Nation!" the national guards that remained in the great court-yard and in the gardens of the Tuileries were now all of one mind, for those who were well disposed to the king saw now no chance of saving their lives except by declaring for the insurgents; but the brave Swiss—five or six hundred men, for some of this corps, too, had gone to give escort to the royal family—remained at their posts within the palace, nothing daunted by the tens of thousands that were gathering around them; and there they determined to remain until their orders to that effect should be revoked by those who had given them. On the other side, the Marseillaise and the Breton federates, who had come to fight, and who could not brook the idea of being disappointed of the pleasure of storming the château, were resolutely bent upon entering the palace; and the party, or rather the parties, whose impulses they obeyed, wished for some grand scene there that might terrify all non-republican members, and drive the Assembly to a rapid solution of the déchéance problem. To scare the Swiss, who, with their muskets on their shoulders, were looking out at the windows and doors of the palace, the mob paraded along the Feuillant terrace with four bleeding heads stuck upon pikes—the heads of Sulleau and the other three who had been put to death in the Place Vendôme under the eyes of the demoiselle Theroigne. Finding that this had no effect, some of the insurgents parleyed with the Swiss, who, in sign of peace and friendship, threw cartridges out of the windows, but intimated at the same time that they must do their duty. Westermann, who had removed the indecision of brewer Santerre in so energetic a manner, could, as a native of Alsace (which was still more than half German, and which never ought to have been allowed to be French, or become a part of France), speak a bad German dialect with facility; and, as he fancied the Swiss might not well have understood those who had parleyed with them in French, he spoke to them in his Alsatian German. Still the brave, stern men, from the mighty Alps and the high Swiss valleys, remained firm as their native rocks, the only men or things that were firm on that day, or that had been firm for many a long day in France. Not only was the Place du Carrousel now crowded, but the quays on the other side of the Tuileries, and every spot of ground near the palace, were covered with armed multitudes, who, for the most part, were kept in ignorance of the fact that the king and his family were no longer there, and who consequently urged on the attack with a blind fury. Some voices nearer at hand roared out, "Only give up the château to us, and we are friends!" But the Swiss made no answer. The next message or summons on the part of the patriots was spoken by three loud cannons that fired over or into the roof of the Tuileries. Such of the nobles and gentlemen in black, and such of the servants of the royal household as had not escaped before, now fled from the doomed place in the best manner they could. Cléry, one of the king's valets-de-chambre, who will long be remembered for his faithful attendance on his kind master, and for his touching narrative of the captivity and sufferings of the royal family, found every passage out of the palace blocked up, saw certain death staring him in the face, ran desperately from apartment to apartment, and at last leaped from one of the windows of the queen's room down upon the terrace. Before he made his escape the walls of the palace were pierced with balls and bullets, and several of the apartments were already strewn with dead bodies; for the Swiss returned the fire of the three great guns, and the insurgents then plied all their cannon and all the musketry they could, firing on the palace from different sides and angles, and aiming chiefly at the doorways and windows. But presently the Swiss made a bold sortie from the palace, drove the insurgents back from a barricade which they had almost mastered, and out of the great court-yard, seized one of the pieces of artillery which had been placed there, turned it against the retreating Marseillaise, gave many of them a lasting quietus, and in brief space of time entirely cleared the Place du Carrousel. Many of the flying rabble never stopped until they reached the Faubourg St. Antoine, and never re-appeared on the scene of action until the only work to be done was to butcher helpless prisoners. Beau Barbaroux, who had not exposed his own handsome person, endeavoured to rally the Marseillaise when they were under cover, or when tall stone houses or whole streets intervened between them and the Swiss. Westermann, who had risked life and limb like a soldier, rallied the Breton federates, and the demoiselle Theroigne, in her amazonne, or short-skirted riding-habit, ran from rank to rank, crying "Vengeance! Vengeance! Victory or Death!" Even some of the pike-men rallied; and some of the national guardsmen who had remained within the iron-railing of the Tuileries, infuriated at seeing Frenchmen fly before the Swiss, and the blood of their countrymen shed by foreigners, fired upon the Swiss on flank and rear. The very battalions of Filles St. Thomas and Petits-Pères joined in this fusilade. The mass of the artillery of the besiegers was gradually collected on one good point; more guns, seized by the mob at the arsenal and in other places, were dragged forward; some barricades were raised, and a close concentrated fire was opened upon the Swiss and the château. But still the Swiss kept up their fire by volley and platoon, and, by dint of musketry and their single cannon, they captured three other pieces of artillery—but unfortunately without their linestocks. At this moment many lookers-on were very doubtful whether a complete victory would not remain to the Swiss. Napoleon Bonaparte, then a very young and a very poor officer of artillery, who was among the spectators, and who afterwards pretended that he was indifferent or merely led to the spot by curiosity, although, in fact, he was then professedly an out-and-out Jacobin of the school of Robespierre, thought that the Swiss must beat if they had only a skilful commander. But the Swiss, unable to use the three guns they had just captured, and assailed by the national guards as well as by the enemy in front, were soon compelled to fall back upon the palace. They had left, however, on the Place du Carrousel from a thousand to twelve hundred Frenchmen killed and wounded—so dreadful had been their fire, and so close and thick the masses against which it had been directed—and their case was by no means desperate, when M. d'Hervilly arrived from the Assembly with the king's order to them to cease firing. Before the brave men could be made to understand this order, they repulsed a body of insurgents who had ventured to come to close quarters. The Swiss, relieved from that duty for which alone they had been hazarding their lives against such fearful odds, would gladly have piled their arms; but the insurgents, who obeyed no orders, or at least none that came from the king or from any other constituted authority, kept firing on, more vigorously than ever. Some few of the Swiss did, however, quit their posts to follow M. d'Hervilly to the Assembly, where he promised them life and security; but the rest remained in the palace—and many of them, it is said, never knew, or had an opportunity of knowing, anything about the king's order. Cannon-balls and bullets were flying about too thickly to allow d'Hervilly to make any long stay. He was scarcely gone ere Westermann led the Marseillaise and Bretons to another assault in front of the palace, while another body of insurgents attacked it with artillery on the side of the Louvre. Long and bloody was the contest, and many a Marseillaise and Breton fell dead on the terrace and on the marble steps before Westermann forced an entrance by the great door; and then the Swiss obstinately defended every step of the broad staircase. But, as soon as the Marseillaise and Bretons got footing in the interior of the palace, they were followed by thousands of national guardsmen of the sans-culottic districts, and by thousands of pike-men from the faubourgs—by a living mass which might have seemed sufficient to make the old oak beams and rafters of the Tuileries crack and break, and so bury together in one hideous ruin Swiss and French, the assailants and the assailed. The republicans even dragged up heavy guns to burst open the inner doors with grape-shot. At last the Swiss, who were for the most part wounded and covered with blood, threw down their arms and cried for mercy. Never was such a cry more vainly raised; the French fell upon them, and commenced one of the most atrocious of massacres—a butchery in which mere children and women, armed with pikes and knives, took part. One division of the victims, from two to three hundred strong, formed into a column, rushed out of the palace, and endeavoured to cut their way to the Champs Elysées, and thence on to Courbevoie, where were hundreds of their brave countrymen and brothers in arms, in barracks and doing nothing, but who, had they been kept in Paris, might have given a very different turn to the fortune of the day. They kept together, and in perfect order for some time, defending themselves with their bayonets, for they had consumed all their cartridges before they quitted the palace; but attacked from every side, fired upon by artillery and musketry, and seeing every avenue blocked up, they hesitated, halted, consulted, and then broke and fled in small parties, and in every direction, crying, "Quarter! quarter! mercy!" Nearly every man of them was massacred by the ferocious mob, who mutilated their bodies, and stuck their heads upon pikes. Another party fled from the Tuileries by the Rue de l'Echelle, and were butchered to a man. A third party rushed across the garden and the Feuillant terrace to the Assembly; and of these the greater part were brought down by a keen fusilade, and the rest found refuge in the back benches of the house. Cléry, who had leaped out at the queen's window, and who had not known whither to go, was accosted by some Marseillaise, who had just butchered several of the Swiss, and were stripping them of their clothes. One of them went up to him with a bloody sword in his hand, saying, "How, citizen! without arms! Take this sword and help us to kill."—"I was," says the faithful valet-de-chambre, "without arms, and most fortunately in a plain frock coat;" for if anything had betrayed that I belonged to the palace, I should not have escaped." He then ran and concealed himself in a stable, where some of the Swiss took refuge also; but they were watched and soon cut to pieces close to him. Attracted by the cries of these wretched victims, the master of the house ran down to the stable; he was too late to be of any service to the Swiss, but he conducted Cléry into his house, and kept him there till the massacre was over. Cléry had barely time to throw away some papers which might have disclosed the nature of his employment at court, ere a body of armed men broke into the house to see if any Swiss were concealed in it. After a keen search these ruffians, with their hands wet with blood, entered into conversation, and coolly related how many men they had massacred. "I remained at this asylum," adds Cléry, "from ten o'clock in the morning till four in the afternoon, having constantly before my eyes a view of the horrors that were committed in the Place de Louis Quinze. Of the men, some were continuing the slaughter, and others cutting off the heads of those who were already slain; while the women, lost to all sense of shame, were committing the most indecent mutilations on the dead bodies, from which they tore pieces of flesh and carried them in triumph." For the horrors that were perpetrated within the Tuileries we have the authority of another eye-witness. Madame Campan, who was in the number of those who could not leap out of windows or escape in any other way—a very considerable number, and consisting for the most part of women and aged or feeble men—says that several noblemen, in attempting to fly by the long gallery that leads from the Tuileries to the Louvre, were poniarded or shot, and their dead bodies thrown out of the windows; that two ushers of the king's chamber were killed in defending with their swords the door of the council-room, and that another usher was slain at the door of the queen's bedchamber, all three protesting that it was their duty to die there. Madame Campan, the Princess de Tarente, and a good many more ladies, were in the queen's drawing-room, expecting death every instant, when a man with a long beard entered, crying out, in the name of Pétion, "Mercy for the women! Do not dishonour the nation!" Missing her sister, Madame Campan ran to an upper apartment, where she found two femmes-de-chambre and a tall Hungarian, one of the queen's chasseurs, who was sitting on the side of a bed pale as death, and utterly helpless through fright. She cried out to him to fly for his life. "I cannot," said the man; "I am dead with fear!" As he said the words a savage troop rushed up the stairs and into the room, and massacred him. They were falling upon Madame Campan and the two femmes-de-chambre, when a voice at the bottom of the stairs called out, "What are you doing up there? The women are not to be killed;" and thereupon a horrible Marseillaise said to Madame Campan, who was on her knees before him praying for mercy, "Get up, she-rogue, the nation pardons you! Lève-toi, coquine, la nation te fait grâce."

Five or six men then carried her and the two waiting-women to one of the large windows of the palace, set them upon a table, and bade them cry "Vive la nation." After this they were allowed to quit the palace, which was re-echoing with the blows of men and women who were breaking the furniture and everything to pieces. "I was obliged to walk over several dead bodies," says the estimable woman, who has rendered even better service to the memory of Marie Antoinette than Cléry has done to that of Louis XVI., "and I recognised among them the body of the old Vicomte de Broves, to whom the queen had sent me at the beginning of the terrible night to beg him and another aged gentleman in her name to quit the palace and get to their homes. But the two old men had begged me to tell her majesty, that they had too often obeyed the king's orders in circumstances when it was their duty to have risked their lives for his defence; and that this time they were determined to be disobedient, and would only remember the kindness of the queen." As Madame Campan was quitting the Tuileries garden by one of the iron gates, the men who were conducting her asked whither she would go? She asked them whether they were at liberty to conduct her wherever she desired to go? Upon this one of them, a Marseillaise, pushed her with the butt-end of his musket, saying, "How! do you still doubt the power of the people!" Madame replied, "Certainly not." They told her that she might go wherever she liked. As she traversed the Place du Carrousel, in the midst of balls and bullets, she witnessed the massacre of several of the Swiss, and saw her own house in a blaze; for, partly through accidents likely to arise in such an incessant firing of cannons and muskets, and partly by design, fire was set to many of the buildings near the Tuileries, and even to a part of that palace itself. The skirts of her white dress had been stained with blood in sweeping over the floors of the palace. The poissardes, or fish-wives, who, like all the market-women of Paris, had long been such decided patriotesses, followed her and her companions, hooting and hissing, and crying out that they belonged to the Austrian woman, and ought to be killed. The armed men that were conducting her led her and the two waiting-women under a doorway that they might take off their white gowns; but this seemed to make matters worse, for their under dresses, being too short, gave them the appearance of persons in disguise, and another troop of poissardes cried out that they were young Swiss dressed as women, and as such ought to be massacred. When this alarm was over, Madame Campan saw advancing along the street a group of she-cannibals carrying the head of poor commandant Mandat. Her escort made her and her companions hastily enter an obscure wine-shop, where they called for wine and bade the ladies drink with them, assuring the landlord that they were their sisters and good patriotesses. By this time all the Marseillaise who had followed her from the palace had quitted her. One of the men that remained told her in an under tone of voice that he had been forced to join the insurgents; that he disapproved of all their atrocities; that he had killed nobody, and saved her. "You have run," said he, "a great risk in meeting those furies that were carrying the head of Mandat. Yesterday, at midnight, in the Place de la Bastille, those horrible women took an oath to kill with their own hands the queen and all the females attached to her service. It is only the difficulty and danger of the deed that has saved you all." At last Madame Campan reached the house of her sister, where all the members of her family were assembled, and where every one believed that she had been murdered in the palace. But she could not long rest there, for the house was known, and it was presently surrounded by a furious mob, shouting that the confidante of Marie Antoinette was there, and that they would have her head. The numbers were never correctly ascertained, but it appears that five or six gentlemen of rank, twenty or thirty of the national guards, who either sided with the Swiss, or met death because they were known to have been friends of the court, and to have fought with the Marseillaise at the ill-omened dinner in the Champs Elysées, and about one hundred domestics of the royal family, were butchered in the Tuileries. As for the Swiss, out of seven or eight hundred men that had mustered in the palace on the preceding night, not more than one hundred and fifty, or at most one hundred and eighty, outlived this bloody day; and many of these poor fellows afterwards died of their wounds or of grief. So madly savage were the Parisian mobs, or patriots and patriotesses, that they murdered all the door-porters they could reach, as some of those men were Swiss, and as they were all called Swiss—the word Suisse having become, in Parisian French at least, a synonyme for "door-porter." As a large party of them—fifty, or, according to other accounts, eighty—were on their way to the Hôtel de Ville, under escort of a detachment of national guards to whom they had surrendered—a ferocious multitude in the Place de Grève burst through the ranks of the national guards, and murdered the helpless prisoners in cold blood to the last man, the guardsmen looking on, and, it is said, making not the slightest effort to save men whose lives ought to have been sacred in their eyes. But still there were some Frenchmen who were horror-stricken at these atrocities, and who risked their lives in endeavours to stop them—only, unfortunately for the national character, these noble efforts were spoiled in some cases by strut and theatrical display. One Clement, a wine-dealer, rushed to the bar of the Assembly, leading a rescued Swiss by the hand, set forth, in an artificial speech, the dangers he had undergone in the rescue, declared that he was childless himself and would adopt the Swiss he had saved, and then fell upon the poor soldier's neck and fainted away; at which that august Areopagus clapped and applauded, as if it had been Talma enacting. Gorsas, the journalist, stood fast at the door of a guard-room, within which were some Swiss prisoners, haranguing the mob, and doing all he could to save the prisoners—an action which would have been the more commendable if Gorsas had not himself been labouring for months in his newspaper to excite the people into insurrection and their present madness, or if either his efforts had been attended with success or he had ended his foul life by the door of that guard-house in pleading the cause of mercy. Some few other citizens generously exposed their lives in concealing Swiss or other fugitives in their houses.

The massacres were not all over till late in the evening; but as early as eleven o'clock in the morning the triumphant shouts of the people informed the republican deputies sitting in the Assembly, Jacobins and Girondists, who had set them to this work, that they had conquered and that the Tuileries was in their possession. Until the moment when this certain intelligence was received, these reformers and reconstructors of nations, though they had the king and his family in their hands, were quivering with agitation and alarm. The cannon which was fired close by—for their hall was not many hundred yards from the palace—shook the walls of their Areopagus, and their windows were nearly all broken by the concussion of the atmosphere and by random musket-shots. Some of the illustrious deputies rose and went to the door; but to go out where balls were flying like hail was more dangerous than to remain in; and so they returned to their seats or vaulted into the speaking-place to talk about the glory of dying for the country, and the imperative duty of all representatives of the people to remain at their posts in the hour of danger. As the guns boomed and the House shook, they talked the louder to keep up what heart was left in them. A portion of the armed mob rushed in at the door of the hall; but it was not the mob that these orators feared, and so they greeted the in-comers with shouts of "Vive la Nation!" The next thing they did was to decree an address calling upon the people to respect, not the palace they were attacking, but "the Rights of Man, Liberty, and Equality," and to order that this brief address should instantly be printed and placarded. As soon as this was decreed they had recourse to some more swearing, which they always employed like a dram: they all rose on their feet, stretched out their right hands, and, to the loud accompaniment of the galleries, they swore that they would perish, if necessary, for the defence of liberty and equality. Then a deputation from one of the sections, composed of daring men who had ventured to come to the House through the terrible storm that was raging, appeared at the bar to say that their section fully concurred in the petition for déchéance which Mayor Pétion had presented, to declare that they too had sworn to die for liberty and equality, that they were all tired of the crimes of the court, and wanted to get rid of kings for ever. "O, legislators," said their orator, in winding up his harangue, "only dare to swear that you will save the empire, and the empire is safe!" What! more swearing?—Yes! more and still more; for all the deputies rose simultaneously, and, again raising their right hands towards heaven, they shouted, almost loud enough to drown the roar of big guns and the crack and crash of small ones, "Nous le jurons! We swear it." The president—it was the Girondist Guadet, as the Girondist Vergniaud had been worn out by sitting all night—entreated this deputation to take charge of the address to the people which had just been voted, and cause the same to be placarded. Apparently the servants of the Assembly would not expose themselves to be shot by carrying out the paper. Next came a deputation from the insurrectional municipality, who had established themselves in the Hôtel de Ville. This deputation, consisting of six known men of the people, demanded that the Assembly should pronounce sentence of déchéance instanter, and that they should be permitted on the morrow to present to the Assembly a detailed account of all the occurrences "of this for ever memorable day," in order that it might be sent to all the forty-four thousand municipalities of France. And they also announced that, notwithstanding the suspension and changes which they had found themselves under the necessity of making in the Hôtel de Ville, Pétion, Manuel, and Danton were "still their colleagues," and that Santerre was put at the head of the national guards and all the armed force of Paris. Guadet, who was acting as president, and who was one of Pétion's closest friends, said to this deputation, "Gentlemen, you have spoken of Monsieur Pétion, but Pétion you know is detained a prisoner. He cannot speak to the people, and you may judge how much he wishes to do it. We invite you, therefore, to take off the order which prevents him from showing himself to his fellow-citizens." This was a conclusion to the farce of the virtuous mayor's duress and restraint. Montaut Maribon, a decided Robespierriest, who had been more than once president of the Jacobin Club, who was president there at the beginning of the present month of August, and who, in that capacity and otherwise, had materially aided and assisted in bringing about the insurrection, moved that the Assembly should be called over by muster-roll, and that every member should ascend the tribune as his name was called, and there separately and individually swear in the name of the nation to maintain liberty and equality, or die at his post. This motion was carried upon the ground that, when men swore in masses, their oaths were not so good or clear as when each man swore separately. This fresh swearing—the calling over the list of the members—the ascending and descending the steps of the tribune—must have occupied a considerable time; but we know not whether the proceeding was over or only in progress when the Assembly was informed that the insurgents had triumphed, and that a deputation of patriots were coming to the bar to present several boxes full of papers which they had found in the Tuileries. Upon the motion of Lacroix, who said that the Assembly had no place set apart for the preservation of such documents, these papers were sent to the Hôtel de Ville. Then Lamarque acquainted the House that the extraordinary committee of twelve had thought fit to prevent the departure of any carriages or couriers from the capital, "in order that lying letters might not carry alarm into the departments;" and he advised the Assembly to draw up immediately an address to the French people, to assure them that their representatives, true to their oaths, would neglect nothing to save the country, and to let all the inhabitants of the rural districts know that the insurrection of to-day was only the effect of the weariness of the people, &c. The Assembly not only adopted the proposition, but intrusted the drawing up of this address to Lamarque himself. After this, a number of citizens and citizenesses, who had been attacking the palace, came to depose that all the bloodshed had been owing to the court and to the abominable Swiss, who had betrayed good patriots by their signs of amity, and had fired upon them when they confidently and peaceably approached the palace. According to their spokesman, the people had all been as innocent and as quiet as lambs, and it was the king, and not they, who had set the tocsins ringing. "For a long time," said he, "the people have been calling for déchéance, and you, legislators, have not yet so much as pronounced sentence of suspension. Learn, then, that we have set fire to the Tuileries, and that we will not extinguish it until the vengeance of the people is satisfied. I am charged to demand from you once more in the people's name the dethronement of the king." Guadet assured them that the Assembly was watching over the safety of the empire (the word kingdom was pronounced no more), and that they might assure the people that it was going instantly to adopt grand measures. Guadet then ceded the presidential chair to Gensonné, and assisted Vergniaud in bringing up a project of decree in the name of the extraordinary committee of twelve. Vergniaud, with the ordinary Gironde cant, spoke of his own tender feelings, and of the great grief the Assembly must necessarily feel in being obliged to have recourse to rigorous measures; but he ended with saying that these measures must be adopted instantly, or farewell liberty! farewell equality! farewell the existence of France as an independent nation! His propositions were simply these:—1. That the French people were invited to form a National Convention, to take place of the existing Assembly. 2. The king was provisionally suspended from his functions, until the National Convention should pronounce upon the measures proper to secure the sovereignty of the people and the tranquil reign of liberty and equality. 3. The extraordinary committee would present, within the day, the best method of organising a new mi-ministry according to the wishes of the people. 4. The ministers actually in office were to continue their functions until the new cabinet should be formed. 5. The extraordinary committee would also prepare in the course of the day a project of decree touching the governor and the education of the prince royal. 6. The payment of the civil list was suspended until the National Convention should decide on that head; but the extraordinary committee would present, within four-and-twenty hours, a project of decree touching some allowance to be granted to the king during his suspension. 7. The National Assembly took charge of the money, books, &c., in the hands of the intendent of the civil list. 8. The king and his family were to remain within the walls of the Assembly until tranquillity should be re-established in Paris. The department was to give orders for preparing the palace of the Luxembourg for the future residence of the king and his family, who would be placed under the guard of citizens and the law. 10. Every public functionary, every soldier, non-commissioned officer, officer, or general that abandoned his post in these days of alarm was declared infamous and a traitor to his country. 11. The department and the municipality of Paris would instantly and solemnly proclaim the present decree. 12. And it would be sent by extraordinary couriers to the eighty-three departments, who would be bound to send it to all the municipalities, &c.

The uncrowned king, panting in the close hot box of the short-hand writers, had scarcely heard the Assembly vote this decree ere Guadet presented the plan for constructing a new popular ministry—a plain and simple rule, for the members of the Assembly were themselves to elect all the ministers for the present. And as soon as this was agreed to Guadet said that the same rule would do very well for choosing a governor for the king's son. Two things appear pretty certain; the Girondists must have had these decrees and projects of decrees and orations ready written in their pockets, and the côté droit, who had shown so much energy and boldness during the two or three preceding days, must either have kept away from the Assembly for fear of being massacred, or they must all have lifted hands and taken oaths with the republicans in dread of the armed patriots, who crowded both the galleries and the body of the House. Hitherto there had been no division, everything being carried by acclamation, nor can we find that, in the course of the whole day, or in the course of several following days, there was a single deputy that ventured to offer one word of opposition or remonstrance or protest. Brissot, who fondly fancied that they were now going to have the best of possible republics, and that he and his party would be, and would long remain, at the head of it as ministers or dictators, supported Guadet's propositions, but said he thought that the Assembly could not proceed to elect new ministers until they had decreed that the present cabinet had lost the confidence of the nation—until they had been formally deprived of their functions, and until all their papers had been seized and sealed up by order of the Assembly. These propositions were adopted and decreed instantly and unanimously. A member then announced that a part of the Tuileries was still in a blaze, that the people were interrupting the firemen, and that the whole palace would be burnt to the ground unless the Assembly sent a deputation to restore order. But the Assembly decreed that this business did not concern them, and ought to be left to the care of the municipality. Jean Debrie then proposed, in the name of the extraordinary committee, that it should be declared—1. That every decree the Assembly had passed should have the force of law without the royal sanction: 2. That the new minister of justice should use the great seal without any sanction or consent of the king; 3. And that the new ministers should sign together and issue all addresses, proclamations, and other acts of that kind. All this was decreed in an instant. Duhem then said that he had been out of doors, and that the most excited and furious of the people were already rendered quiet as lambs by the decrees which the Assembly had passed, and were now doing nothing but swearing fidelity, tranquillity, and submission. Nevertheless, another body of patriots in a very excited state appeared at the bar to give vent to their indignation against the chief of the executive power, and to demand incontinently a decree of déchéance. Vergniaud, after declaring that he could not doubt the purity of their sentiments or their respect for the laws, told them that they must have a little patience; that the present representatives of the people had done all that their powers had permitted them to do in voting that a convention should be called to pronounce on the great question of déchéance. "And in the mean while," said he, "the Assembly has pronounced sentence of suspension, and this measure ought to be sufficient to remove from the people all further fear as to the treacheries and plots of the executive power. It is now a truth that the king can do no wrong; and we are here to die for the people and for liberty." But the Jacobins, who were determined not to leave all the honours of the day to the Girondists, now proceeded rapidly to propose and carry decrees which could not be otherwise than fatal to the Gironde, who had little or no hold on the popular masses. Jean Debrie proposed that the Assembly, having just sworn so solemnly to maintain and carry out the principles of liberty and equality, ought forthwith to admit the natural right of universal suffrage, and ought to decree that for the approaching convention every citizen of the age of twenty-five, and living by the produce of his labour, should have a vote; and this too was adopted unanimously. Choudieu demanded, as measures very essential to the general safety, that a camp should be formed under the walls of Paris, to be composed of the people of Paris and of all other patriots that chose to repair to it; that the

Parisian cannoneers, who had been so active this day, should be allowed to place their artillery in battery on the heights of Montmartre, which commanded the capital; and that from this moment the Assembly should remain in permanent session. As soon as all this had been decreed unanimously, Lacroix, another most thoroughpaced Jacobin, demanded that the Assembly should instantly appoint a committee, or commissaries, to go to the army on the frontiers to announce the changes which had taken place, and to keep the soldiers in the right path. And forthwith the Assembly named thirteen deputies of the deepest Jacobin hue, who set out for the army this very evening, being invested, on the motion of Gensonné, with powers to dismiss generals and all functionaries, civil or military, and to put them under arrest if they should think proper. Some citizens then came in to implore the Assembly to do something to stop the fire that was spreading in the buildings near the Tuileries; and the Assembly deputed Palyo, one of its members, who was considered a skilful man in such matters (there were hundreds there that were skilful enough in lighting fires), to go and put out the conflagration. When this was done Isnard called the attention of the House to the new cabinet that it was to form. "And," said this Girondist, "since the Assembly declared that Roland, Clavières, and Servan carried with them the regret of the nation, we owe it to public opinion to reinstate those three virtuous ministers immediately by a unanimous vote!" The House voted as he proposed, and thus, through the bloody paths of insurrection and anarchy, the husband of Madame Roland found his way back to the cabinet. Next a deputation of the cannoneers of Paris came in to declare that this was the most beautiful day of their lives, since they had saved the cause of liberty; that the Swiss had been the aggressors, having fired upon them out of the same windows from which Charles IX. had fired upon his subjects at the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, &c. Deputy Montaut said that the attestation of these excellent citizens clearly proved that the Swiss guards had provoked the vengeance of the people by treacherously assassinating the citizens. "As it is good," said he, "that it should be known that the citizens of Paris have only repelled force by force, I demand that the Assembly order this address of the cannoneers to be printed and sent to the departments." This being agreed to, the Assembly proceeded to elect the three other ministers by simple vote. Danton, who had gone into the Tuileries when all the fighting was over with a drawn sword in his hand, was appointed minister of justice by an overwhelming majority; Monge, the mathematician, was named minister of marine, and Lebrun minister for foreign affairs. At half-past three in the morning the Assembly suspended their labours for a few hours. The king and his family were conducted to four small rooms on the upper floor which had been destined to the use of Camus the archivist. They had no change of clothes, they had been able to bring nothing with them from the palace but the clothes on their backs; but the Countess of Sutherland, the wife of the British ambassador, hastened to send some things for their present use; and their gaolers, it appears, permitted these things to be delivered to them. On the following morning the queen sent for Madame Campan, who borrowed some more clothes, and went instantly to the narrow prison in which all the royalty in France was confined. In the outer room she found five or six gentlemen who had followed the court; in the second room she found the king, who was having his hair dressed, and who said not a word; and in the third room she found the queen stretched on a rude bed and in a state of grief passing description. Nobody was with the queen except a big woman, une grosse femme, who had been appointed her gaoler, but who yet looked a kind and good person. As soon as Marie Antoinette saw her faithful servant, she opened her arms to embrace her; but loud bursts of despair followed this first affectionate movement. She exclaimed, "We are all lost—all! This is where they have been leading us for these three years. We shall fall in this horrible revolution—many others will perish after us! All parties have contributed to our ruin; the innovators like madman, others out of ambition, for the most frantic of the Jacobins only wanted gold and place, and the mob are now looking for pillage. There is not a true patriot in all that infamous horde! And the emigrants, they have their intrigues and improper projects; and foreign nations are only wishing to profit by the dissensions of France: all, all have contributed to our calamities!" Here the little dauphin and Madame de Tourzel entered from the fourth room, and the sight of her poor child forced fresh exclamations of woe, woe and despair, from the fallen daughter of Maria Theresa. As soon as these natural emotions were over she spoke feelingly of the serious loss Madame must sustain by the burning of her house, inquired after the Princess de Tarrente and her other friends whom she had left in the Tuileries, and hoped that they were safe. She complained, but in the gentlest terms, of the uneasiness the king's undignified and very unromantic behaviour occasioned her. She said that his habit of never checking himself in those things, and his strong appetite, had made him eat as heartily as he could have done in his own palace; that those who did not know the king as she did could not conceive what piety and real greatness there was in his resignation, and were unfavourably impressed with this behaviour; that several deputies, sincerely devoted to him, had warned her before now of these disadvantageous impressions, but that there was no doing anything with the king's appetite!

When the Assembly resumed its labours the king and his family were again conducted to the close, hot box, scarcely ten feet square—scarcely larger than a funeral vault—behind the president's chair, to hear obloquy heaped upon his name and his race, to see the last remnants of monarchy entombed. In the destruction which had taken place at the time of the flight to Varennes, the people had respected the equestrian statue of Henry IV. on the Pont-Neuf, and a grand statue of Louis XIV. which stood on the Place Vendôme; but now they resolved that these, too, must come down, and that the last traces of royalty must be obliterated. A Jacobin deputy acquainted the House that the people were already engaged in these operations, and that, as serious accidents might happen from their inexperience, he would request that some engineers or architects should be sent to superintend the demolitions. An unnamed deputy ventured to say that the Assembly could not properly authorise the destruction of these monuments, and to call for the order of the day. Fauchet opposed this call, saying that the Assembly ought to regulate the movements of the people. Thuriot thought that, as it was impossible to prevent the people from doing what they wished, some confidential men ought to be appointed to preside over their labours, in order that accidents might be prevented. "Some of these monuments," said he, "may be useful to the arts, and some may be cast into cannon or coined into money. The Assembly must in these circumstances display a greatness of character, and not fear to order the suppression of all the monuments raised to pride and despotism." Albitte, another furious Jacobin, exclaimed, "We must at length tear up by the roots all royal prejudices. I demand, as a proof that we are friends of liberty, that we order the statues of kings to be overthrown everywhere, and statues of Liberty to be placed on their pedestals." The Assembly voted a decree in conformity, and also instructed the several sections to send engineers to superintend the work of destruction. The new municipality or commune gave in their procès-verbal of all the great things that had been done yesterday; and Mayor Pétion, free as a bird in the air, and as merry too, came to the bar in the midst of a deputation of the new municipals, who said, in presenting him, "Legislators! the friends of the people come to deliver to the friends of the people the friend of the people!" When this conceit had been duly applauded, Pétion spoke for himself. He said that he could not express the satisfaction he had just experienced in traversing the tranquillised and happy capital. "Everywhere, O legislators," exclaimed the re-made mayor, "you are blessed by the people! Everywhere your last decrees are blessed! It is in the name of the Assembly that we have established peace and order. There will be no more slaughter! The citizens now feel the necessity of reposing on the laws, and expecting from them their just vengeance." The virtuous mayor's virtuous friends, Roland, Clavières, and Monge, and also Danton, who was not his friend, presented themselves to take the oath of office, and to swear once more to defend liberty and equality, or die at their posts. Danton, who said that he had been led to the ministry "through the breach made by the cannon of patriots," delivered a short but sonorous harangue; and Roland solicited and obtained a decree authorising each of the new ministers to make whatever changes and new appointments in his department he might think proper. Arena, a deputy from the island of Corsica, called the attention of the Assembly to some of the poor Swiss prisoners who had escaped massacre, but who had not had a morsel of bread to eat for thirty hours. The gendarmes, who had done such good service, denounced the greater part of their officers as men gangrened with aristocracy: the Assembly allowed them to choose officers of their own; and this convenient rule was gradually extended to the whole army, until officers and men were alike sans-culottic. Guadet, working hard at what must inevitably ruin him and his party, brought up a decree regulating the elections for the National Convention, and the time when that new legislature was to assemble. According to his project, which was adopted and voted unanimously, the members of the Convention were to repair to Paris by the 20th of September, on which day, if only two hundred of them should have assembled, the present legislature would dissolve itself. At night the royal family were conveyed back to their four narrow rooms or cells, to be re-conducted on the morrow morning to the loge du logographe; and this was repeated on Sunday, the 12th, when Anarcharsis Cléotz, the Orator of Mankind, was introduced at the bar of the House to make one of his harangues upon the blessed rights of man and the execrable vices of all kings. He was surrounded by a group of madmen and vagabonds, whom he represented as brave and enlightened Germans, who were disgusted with the injustice and tyranny of the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia, and only anxious to fight in the French ranks for liberty and equality. He declared that Prince Henry of Prussia, the king's brother, that the Prussian generals Mollendorff, Kalkreuth, and Slieffen, were all ardent admirers of the French revolution; that the philosophy of Voltaire and Rousseau had taken deep root in all parts of Germany, not excepting the dominions of the Duke of Brunswick, so that in a very short time all those well-peopled regions might be expected to be up in arms "for the eternal principle of the indivisible sovereignty of mankind, and for the rights of man." A committee appointed to examine the state of the Luxembourg reported that there were many cellars and subterranean passages under that palace, so that it would be extremely difficult to guard it. And hereupon the Assembly agreed that the dirty, dingy tower of the Temple would be a much safer place for the present residence of the royal family. They further determined that the guard should be placed under the orders and surveillance of Mayor Pétion and Santerre, now commandant-general of all the national guards; and that no one should be allowed access to the king without a pass signed by the mayor or by the municipality. They liberally voted 500,000 livres to defray the king's expenses until the time of the meeting of the Convention—but they never paid, or caused to be paid, a single sous of this money. Citizens and citizenesses were admitted to heap horrible abuse upon the king and queen, who, penned up in the loge du logographe, could not avoid hearing all that was said. Some of these impatient patriots said it was not suspension, but déchéance, that they wanted—instant déchéance, and the trial of the king after it. Federates appeared to demand the immediate formation of a court-martial to avenge the blood of their brothers, who had perished by hundreds round the den of the tyrant; and addresses were presented from nearly all the sections congratulating the Assembly on all that it had done, and urging it to go on in the same glorious course. At a late hour the royal family were conveyed to their four cells, to be brought back again on Monday morning to the loge du logographe, where slow torture, more exquisite than any that could have been administered with fire and stake, had been inflicted on the king and queen. In the course of this Monday morning Robespierre, who had thrown off his coat of darkness as soon as the triumph of the insurgents was secure, and who had appeared at the club on the night of the 10th to point out to the Jacobins the best uses that might be made of the events of that day, presented himself at the bar of the Assembly at the head of a deputation from one of the sections. He was welcomed with tremendous applause. He hoped the Assembly would make haste to honour the patriots who had fallen on the 10th, and whose heroism was equal to anything that Greece or Rome could show. These martyrs of liberty ought to be immortalized: it was not mere honours, but an apotheosis, that the nation owed them. "O people," said he, "now that tyranny is laid low in the dust, take care not to give her time to get up again! Vigilance and rigour! We propose that you should decree that in the Place Vendôme, where stood the statue of Louis XIV., there shall be erected a pyramid to the honour of those who died fighting for liberty on the 10th. The Assembly referred this demand to the committee of public instruction or education; and the House and the galleries again applauded Robespierre, who, with his companions, took his seat on the benches, being allowed, as a matter of course, the honours of the séance. The rest of the day was chiefly spent in reading scraps of letters and papers which had been found in the Tuileries, and in hearing fresh denunciations of royalty, and fresh calls for its perpetual suppression.* In the afternoon the royal family were removed from the Assembly to be conveyed to the dismal tower of the Temple, a place surrounded on every side by strong lofty walls, and situated in the filthiest part of all Paris, which was then a very filthy city: they were put into an open carriage, in order that their degradation and wretchedness might be seen by all patriots. Virtue-Pétion rode in the same carriage with them, pretending that his presence was necessary to prevent their being torn to pieces. The national guards were drawn up in line all the way from the door of the Salle de Manège to the gate of the Temple; the carriage was preceded by a horde of ferocious-looking pikemen, who styled themselves the men of the 10th of August, or the conquerors of the Tuileries; and behind the carriage rolled several heavy cannon charged almost to the lips with grape-shot. With a refinement of cruelty, they made the carriage halt for some time in the Place Vendôme, in order that Louis might contemplate the prostrate and broken statue of his ancestor. A few devoted friends, who would have approached the carriage if only to weep for the king, were brutally repulsed and ill treated. At last the iron-bound doors of the

Temple closed upon the royal captives and hid them from the insulting gaze of the populace. "And thus," says Dulaure, who is verily an historian worthy of his subject, "disappeared the throne; thus the antique monarchy of the Franks, the dynasty of the Capets, established by force in barbarous times, were annihilated by force in civilized times!"

The Temple—the building had belonged to the Knights Templars, and from its gates the last of those knights in France had gone forth to be tortured and burned five centuries before, when the national cruelty was as hideous as now—had several towers or donjons. That to which the royal family were consigned was a small tower that stood with its back against the great tower, and it was flanked by two turrets. The body of this building was four stories high, but the rooms on each floor were small, filthy, and inconvenient. The king's sister and daughter had no other bedroom than a small, dark ante-chamber, and this ante-chamber was the only way to one of the turrets, where servants, municipals, and common soldiers cooked their dinners and did other offices. The queen and the dauphin had rather a better room; but behind the king's sleeping-room there was another kitchen. In one of the turrets there was a library containing from twelve to fifteen hundred volumes; and these books became a wonderful source of enjoyment to poor Louis, who had ever been a great reader. He had not been many days in this hard captivity when Cléry, who had implored and obtained permission to wait upon him and to be confined with him, found him amusing his children by making them guess riddles in a collection of the 'Mercurus de France' which he had found in that turret library. The Princess de Lamballe, who had so generously returned to France to share in the dangers of the queen, obtained permission to shut herself up in the Temple with her; but after five or six days the new commune, which usurped even more power and authority than the old one, tore her from her friend and committed her to the prison of La Force, where she was confined with felons and criminals of the worst description. Madame Campan supplicated Pétion for permission to wait upon her royal mistress; but the virtuous mayor not only refused, but threatened to send her to the prison of La Force; and, crueller still, in the kind of consolation he offered to her disappointment, he told her that none of the persons who had accompanied Louis XVI. or his family into the Temple would be allowed to remain there very long. And, in effect, a few days after Madame de Tourzel, her daughter, a woman that waited on the dauphin, and every one else was turned out of that prison, except only Cléry, who waited upon the king, the queen, the dauphin, the princess royal, and Madame Elizabeth, as best he could. But these discomforts were trifles compared to the vexations, alarms, and mental tortures that were constantly inflicted on the captives by the infernal malice of their gaolers, and by the mob out of doors, that found delight in gathering under the grated windows of the tower, and there uttering ribald jests, blasphemy, obscenity, and sanguinary threats, even as they had done under the windows of the Tuileries. This, of course, became worse and worse as the Prussian army advanced into France. At one time the commune decreed that a deep ditch should be dug all round the Temple to keep the poor prisoners in surer custody; but on account of the labour and expense this excavation was never begun.

On the 14th of August, the day after the removal of the royal family to the Temple, Robespierre appeared again at the bar of the Assembly to petition for or demand the prompt punishment of all the enemies of the people, a punishment that should allow of no distinctions; and his friend Duquesnoy, an unfrocked monk, and now a member of the Assembly, proposed the instant arrest of all individuals known to be enemies to the revolution. For the present the Assembly got rid of Duquesnoy's arbitrary and horrible proposition by passing to the order of the day. But, upon the motion of Chabot, that other unfrocked monk, they decreed that there should be immediately erected a "popular court" to try the enemies of the people. Merlin announced that the Prussians and Austrians were advancing, that probably before this time they had opened trenches before Thionville; and he moved, in consequence, that Louis XVI. and his family, and the wives and children of all the emigrants, should be held as hostages; and this proposition was unanimously adopted, and a decree was instantly issued. On the 16th they voted that the camp already organising under the walls of Paris should consist of 40,000 men at the least. On the following day the impatient commune sent a deputation to announce to the august Areopagus that, if the new revolutionary tribunal were not put in activity at once, the tocsin would sound again at midnight, and the people, whose patience was worn out, would take the trial and execution of their enemies into their own hands. "I demand," said the municipal who was the orator of the party, "that you instantly decree that one patriot citizen be named from every section to form this new revolutionary tribunal. I demand that this tribunal be established in the palace of the Tuileries. I demand that Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, who are so greedy for the blood of the people, have their appetites glutted with the blood of their infamous satellites!" Even some of the most violent Jacobins were revolted at these atrocities, and angrily expostulated with this new municipal; but anon another deputation appeared at the bar to urge the same demands in language equally atrocious. The orator of this party said, "Legislators, we are come to enlighten you, for you are quite in the dark as to all that is passing in Paris. If within two or three hours the trials of the traitors are not begun, grand calamities will promenade through this capital. We invite you not to go loitering in the traces of the old jurisprudence, for a revolution requires a jurisprudence of its own. Your reserves and delays have put the people under the necessity of rising; and you know, legislators, that it is only the energy of the people that has saved them. Rise up, representatives, and be great and bold like the people, in order to merit their confidence." Thus goaded on, threatened and terrified, the Assembly organised the tribunal, which was generally called "The Tribunal of the 17th of August," and which was the precursor of the still more terrible "Tribunal Révolutionnaire." The appointment of both judges and juries was left to the commune and the sections, and there was to be no appeal whatever against the decisions and sentences of the court. The judges, the public accusers, and the directors of juries were all to swear before the commune to maintain liberty and equality, or die. The court was to be divided into two sections, so that between the two it might be in constant activity. By the next day, the 18th of August, this very popular tribunal was completed, and Robespierre was appointed to be president of it; but, although the Incorruptible had recommended the institution of the court, he refused the supreme post in it that was offered to him. He was looking forward to a seat in the National Convention; but he had probably other reasons for declining the present appointment: he must have wished certain dangers and obstructions to be removed before he completely committed himself, and he was averse to committing himself at all in company with or under the Girondists.* He preferred spending the short interval between the revolution of the 10th of August and the meeting of the Convention in establishing an ascendancy over the Parisian electors, in acting as orator to the impatient deputations that besieged and bewildered the Assembly, and in contributing with Danton to make the commune of Paris the real governing power of France. The Girondists had scarcely seen the king thrown at their feet ere they were scared by this rising Colossus, by this re-modelled and reinvigorated municipality, which took to itself whatsoever attributes and functions it chose. As the commune retained the absolute command and control of the national guards, it had always an armed force ready to execute its will. At the end of a short debate in the Assembly upon the great question of divorce—a debate which ended in passing a resolution that the marriage contract was and ought to be dissoluble upon the easiest terms—Gensonné expressed his dissatisfaction at the manifest usurpations and daring abuses of power of the new commune. He complained more particularly of the commune having surrounded the war-office with an armed force, which completely blockaded the building, permitting no one to come out from it; and all this because the printer of the 'Patriote Français,' Brissot's own newspaper, was said to be in the house. Gensonné was followed by Grangeneuve and Guadet. Grangeneuve said, "Circumstances occasioned the establishment in Paris of this provisory municipality, but these circumstances are now changed. Perhaps we owe them a debt of gratitude for having brought about this new order of things, but now these municipals ought to withdraw from the scene; and I demand that the Assembly decree that the old municipality be reinstated in all its functions." A decree was carried to this effect; and it was further decreed that the national guards and the whole public force of Paris should be, as before, under the sole control of Mayor Pétion. But these votes signified next to nothing; the commune remained much as it was, and Pétion, by attempting to re-possess himself of his former power, speedily lost all his popularity. Within a week or a fortnight the virtuous mayor, the idol of the mob, was held up or set down as one of the greatest rogues in France. It was under the guidance of this new commune that an armed mob broke open the Garde-Meuble, and carried off all the rich furniture and other valuable property, consisting of the objects of taste and curiosity therein deposited. Several of the leading members of the commune and chiefs of the Jacobin Club shared largely in this plunder. Danton is said to have gotten some hundred thousand livres; but no one has hinted that Robespierre ever took so much as a sous. It was Robespierre who demanded that the departmental directory should have no control whatever over the police of the capital, and that the new commune should correspond directly with the legislative body, by which it was understood that the commune was to dictate to the Assembly. And never did one body dictate and domineer more arbitrarily over another—never did inferior so insult superior. From the Hôtel-de-Ville there issued, as from a huge thunder-cloud, forked lightning that struck in all directions; statues, gates, triumphal arches, and even edifices, were destroyed with a rapidity which seemed to threaten the ruin of everything that was beautiful or ornamental in Paris. From the same black centre proceeded personal proscriptions and arrests. Accompanied by locksmiths skilled in the art of opening locks with false keys, and by blacksmiths and carpenters who beat down or cut away doors that could not be opened by picklocks, the new municipals made domiciliary visits to get at the papers and other

* Robespierre sent the following letter to the 'Mouiteur' of the 28th of August:—"Certain persons having endeavoured to throw suspicions on my refusal of the place of president of the tribunal appointed to try the conspirators, I owe to the public an account of my motives. I have combated, since the beginning of the revolution, the greater part of these criminals guilty of high treason against the nation. I have myself denounced the greatest number of them. I predicted all their attempts and crimes when other people believed in their civism. I could not be the judge of those of whom I had been the adversary; and I have been obliged to remember that, if they were the enemies of the country, they were also my personal and declared enemies. This maxim, good in all circumstances, is particularly applicable to the present case. The justice of the people ought to bear a character worthy of them: it ought to be as imposing as it is prompt and terrible. Besides, the exercise of these new functions was incompatible with my functions as a member of the commune to which I have been elected. I was obliged to choose between the two: I have remained at the post where I was, convinced that, for the present, it was there that I could best serve my country."

effects of such as they suspected, hated, or feared. An order of arrest was launched against Girey-Dupré, the printer and co-laborateur of Brissot's journal, which had accused the new commune of making anarchy and terror the order of the day. The Girondists, who were now completely terrified at the devil they had helped to raise, brought this matter before the Assembly, and Vergniaud harangued upon the deep iniquity of permitting such horrible attempts against personal liberty at the very beginning of the reign of universal liberty, concluding with a motion that the Assembly should declare the order to arrest Girey-Dupré a vile attempt against individual liberty and the liberty of the press, and that as such it was null and void; and that the Assembly should enjoin the municipality to confine itself for the future within its proper functions and limits. Reboul, in supporting Vergniaud, said he was astonished to hear some members of the Assembly defending the conduct of the municipality in issuing an order to arrest Girey-Dupré for a few harmless reflections, when all Paris was placarded with printed papers which called down fire and sword upon the National Assembly itself, and which were signed Marat. The Girondists were strong enough in the House to carry Vergniaud's resolutions; but Larivière now mournfully confessed in the Assembly that its resolutions were a waste of words and of paper—that the Assembly had not the power to carry its decrees into execution. "I ask," said he, "of the deputies of the eighty-three departments, whether they can still consider themselves as the representatives of the empire? whether they will have energy enough to demand from the people of Paris respect, obedience, submission to the laws? I ask those who flatter themselves that they have thrown down all tyrannies, whether they will suffer a new despotism to arise among us? whether they will be so pusillanimous as to permit some citizen or citizens to set the law and the general will at defiance? We have called to the bar the president of this new commune, that he might explain the motives of his conduct; but this citizen has not deigned to appear—he even refuses to obey the law! I demand, therefore, for our honour, for the honour of the empire, and even for the justification of the citizens of Paris, that this president of the commune, who has only been called to the bar, be forcibly brought to the bar before we adjourn." This motion was carried. Then Pétion, sadly embarrassed, came into the Assembly to say that the council-general of the commune had sent a deputation to explain the motives of its conduct. This deputation was forthwith admitted, and Tallien, who had become secretary-general to the new commune, and who was spokesman for the deputation, delivered a long harangue, which rather taunted and accused the Assembly than excused the municipality. In other words, Tallien told that august Areopagus that its reign was over—a simple fact which ought to have required no repetition or comment after the insurrection of the

its power; and that it could acknowledge no authority whatever save that of the people. "Called upon by the people," said he, "on the night of the 9th to save the country, we have done what we ought to do. The people never limited our powers—they only said, 'Go and act in our name, and we will approve whatever you may do.' But what signify these present complaints of the Assembly? We ask you, gentlemen, whether the legislative body has not always been surrounded by the respect of the citizens of Paris? This Hall has never been contaminated except by the presence of the worthy descendant of Louis XI. and of the woman that rivals in crime Catherine de' Medici. If these tyrants still live, is it not to the respect of the people for this Assembly that they owe their lives? But, gentlemen, you yourselves have applauded whatever we did on the 10th of August! [And Tallien might have added, you yourselves knew beforehand all that we were going to do—you Girondists, who now complain of our speed, because you fancy you are not to win by the race, helped to set us going.] You were the first to wish to overthrow the authorities of the department, and to communicate with us directly. You approved of whatever we did, and the people have sanctioned whatever we may have done since. We were charged to save the country, and we swore to save it: we have dismissed unworthy justices of the peace; we have broken up a Feuillant municipality. We have issued no orders against the liberty of good citizens, but we glory in having sequestered the property of emigrants, and in having arrested conspirators against liberty! We have driven out monks and nuns in order to sell the houses they occupied. We have put down incendiary journals which corrupted public opinion (meaning all newspapers that were not thoroughly republican and sans-culottic). We have made domiciliary visits; but who first ordered them? You. The arms seized in the houses of the suspect (chez les gens suspects), we have put into the hands of the defenders of the country.

We have arrested the turbulent priests; they are all locked up in a certain house, and within a very few days the soil of liberty will be purged of their presence. We have been accused of disorganising the civic administration, and of neglecting the important article of provisions for the capital; but whose fault is that? Not ours. The administrators appointed by the late municipality vanished on the day of danger, and have not re-appeared since in the Hôtel-de-Ville. But the people do not complain of us:—only yesterday, in the galleries of our own house, they solemnly swore that they would continue to repose confidence in us. If you strike us, strike also the people who made the revolution of the 14th of July, 1789, who have consolidated it by the 10th of August, and who will maintain it with the sword. The people are now engaged in the elections for the Convention; the people are now exercising their sovereignty; only consult them, and let them decide whether our conduct deserves blame or praise. You have heard us, and we are here to hear you. As men of the 10th of August, we only wish to have justice, and to obey the will of the people!” Then Manuel, procureur of the commune, begged to observe that the National Assembly had issued two contradictory decrees, one dissolving the new commune, and the other declaring that it had merited well of the country. The president of the Assembly begged to say that different constituted authorities, though all derived from the same source, or from the sovereign people, had different duties, functions, and limits; that the formation of the provisory commune was certainly contrary to existing laws; that it was the effect of an extraordinary and necessary crisis; but that as soon as these perilous circumstances should cease, the provisory authority ought to cease with them. The president also said he hoped that the city of Paris would not dishonour la belle révolution by setting an example of scandal and of rebellion to the law. “But, no,” exclaimed he, “Paris will not set this evil example! We have issued our decree. The National Assembly has done its duty, and you, gentlemen of the commune, will do yours. The Assembly invites you to the honours of the séance.” Three citizens were next admitted to the bar: they came to speak more unceremoniously than Tallien and Manuel, and to tell the House that the galleries were the better part of it—a thing well known before, but never so plainly expressed in words. “People of the galleries, National Assembly, and you, Mr. President,” said the plain-speaking orator of this trio, “we come in the name of the people who are waiting outside the door to demand to defile in the Hall, in order to see the representatives of the commune who are here. We will die, if need be, with them!” Several members, feeling their own danger, cried out in a breath that really the gentlemen of the commune were in no danger; and the president, after some commonplace gabble about the dignity of the Assembly and the importance of the business it had on hand, requested the trio to go back and tell their fellow-citizens that the Assembly would equally maintain the liberty of the people and the respect due to the constituted authorities. Lacroix added that the Assembly was on the point of occupying itself with decrees for the sale of all the property of the emigrants; that, if the multitude at the door defiled, a precious space of time would be lost, and that, therefore, he should propose that those citizens should select twenty of their number, who should have the honours of the séance. The spokesman of the trio grumbled, and said that the people were free, but that the Assembly was trying to deprive them of their liberty. Lacroix asked whether the Assembly itself was free? At a late hour of the evening the president of the commune, a sans-culotte of the most vulgar kind, condescended to appear at the bar, but only to insult the august Areopagus, and to tell it that the Hôtel-de-Ville was stronger than the Salle-de-Manège.

The activity of the new commune went on increasing, and there was an energy and a decision in all it did—an energy which was not ill adapted to the circumstances of the case and to the proper way of meeting the dangers of invasion—an energy which would have been admirable but for the ferocity which accompanied it. Under the mighty wing of the commune the new tribunal began to try and condemn with a rapidity which would be astonishing but for the still more astounding rapidity of the Tribunal Révolutionnaire which so soon followed. This commune and the Jacobin Club, which were but as one, regulated the elections for the Convention, the club tracing out the plan in the first instance. Robespierre, who had been the first to propose the Convention, recommended that the commune should send commissaries into all the departments, to prevent the possibility of the people being duped and misled by unpatriotic, unrepublican men; and the commune, acting on this suggestion, sent forth its agents and its committees, who exercised in all parts of France a most despotic power. He also recommended that in future all popular petitions should be addressed, not to the expiring and incompetent National Assembly, but to the new-born and vigorous commune of Paris; and this advice was taken immediately. The club named a committee of forty-eight to examine the conduct and character of its members, in order that it might be further purified by the expulsion of all such as were not honest republicans. It laid down as a plain and simple rule that no man was to be elected to the Convention that had ever belonged to anti-revolutionary clubs, or that had ever been suspected either of absolute or constitutional royalism, or that had ever signed any petition in favour of the king or of any of the royal party. A member of the club proposed that every member elected to the Convention should be a mere delegate, that he should have his instructions given to him in writing by his constituents, that it should be unlawful for him to depart in any degree from these instructions ; and that the principle should be adopted that no laws or decrees of the future Convention should have any force unless they were sanctioned and confirmed by the majority of the people in their primary assemblies. The club printed this discourse, and furthermore drew up an address to all the affiliated societies on the subject of the elections. Instead of a patron saint the club chose a patron patriot. Le Nain, a sculptor of the day (we have noted the excessive republicanism of the French artists), sent in a bust of the elder Brutus, which was received with universal applause. Manuel, the orator of the inauguration, said, " It was in this club that the ruin of kings, the fall of Louis the Last, was prepared. Here ought to repose the image of him who first undertook to purge the earth of kings. Gentlemen, here is Brutus, who will every instant remind you that, in order to be a good citizen, one must be always ready to sacrifice everything, and even one's own children, for the good of the country. Let us, above all things, remember, at a moment when we are engaged in the elections, that, if in the National Convention there shall be found a single head like his, France will be saved, because France will have no more kings. We ought all to swear—and I myself take the oath the first—that all our efforts shall be directed to the destruction of royalty!" All the Jacobins raised their right hands and swore. An un-named member of the club then said that all the affiliated societies ought to be written to, and invited to place in their halls a bust of Brutus. It appears that Le Nain, with all his republicanism and patriotism, had an eye to business; for this orator added that the artist had a subscription for making Brutus busts at a very moderate price; and he (the orator) demanded that the club should recommend this subscription to all the affiliated clubs, &c. Manuel said that the best way of recommending the subscription would be to write at the bottom of the artist's prospectus, "The Mother Society has taken Brutus for its patron." Manuel's proposition was adopted, and, in order that honour might walk hand-in-hand with profit, Le Nain, the sculptor, was elected a member of the club by acclamation. The bust of Brutus made the club very impatient for the blood of a king. Terrasson exclaimed, "We must now unite in demanding justice on the traitor! We must now join all our efforts to obtain the judgment of Louis the Last!" Voices from the galleries roared "Cry 'Yes!' Let every man present say 'Yes!' He who says not 'Yes' is no patriot!" And then a thousand voices shouted, "Yes! yes! yes!" The federates who had remained in Paris came to the club to swear that they would not march to the frontiers to meet the Prussians and Austrians until the king and queen were brought to judgment, and a terrible vengeance executed upon all the enemies of liberty in the capital. Everything announced that some frightful massacre was at hand, and there is nothing whatever to show that the Girondists or any section of them, or of the Jacobin party, made the slightest effort to prevent the atrocities which it was utterly impossible for any of them not to foresee. Indeed, several of the Girondists contributed to these atrocities by adding to the panic terrors and the suspicions which were, as we believe, the principal cause of the massacres of September. Thus the immaculate Roland, as minister of the interior, reported to the Assembly on the very eve of those massacres that a terrible conspiracy against liberty had been discovered in the provinces—a conspiracy which probably only existed in his imagination or in the imagination of the provincial Jacobins, who had written to him or to his wife, or to some of the flaming republicans by whom his wife was constantly surrounded.

The commune, almost immediately after the attack on the Tuileries of the 10th of August, closed all the gates and barriers of the capital, in order to prevent deputies of the Assembly and others from flying to some provincial town where they might make a new legislature, or at least form a party. The guards were vigilant; but the barriers were still more thoroughly closed sixteen or seventeen days after, when the massacres were determined upon. In ordering and managing the levies of troops the commune issued a decree or decrees importing that all the copper and bronze belonging to the churches, all the bronze statues of saints, and even all the crucifixes that were made of metal, should be seized, melted down, and converted into cannon; that all the iron railings of churches and palaces should be converted into pikes; that all the silver chalices and vessels, and silver candlesticks and church bells, should be seized, and melted and coined into money, with the exception only of two church bells for every parish. Even in the capital there was some opposition made to these decrees, but Manuel put forth a proclamation explanatory of "the social necessity" of the measures, and a strong armed force constantly attended those who were charged with the execution of the decrees. In the ancient metropolitan church of Notre Dame there was, however, a battle before the commissaries of the municipality could despoil the altars and pull down the bells. The commune assembled and deliberated as a legislative body, having its galleries open to the people like those of the National Assembly. The president of the commune frequently referred questions to the decision of the mob in these galleries. Marat, who has been called "the mind and conscience of the majority of this assembly," had a private gallery or lodge reserved for his own use, and he was charged with the important duty of reporting in a journal all that passed and all that was spoken in the Hôtel de Ville. But the genius of the friend of the people could not descend to such dry mechanical work: he never reported a line, but suggested most of the things that were done, and paved his way to a supreme authority in that place. As soon as the massacres were begun he was elected a member of the commune's committee of surveillance. As early as the 18th of August the commune ordered that all the women and children of emigrants should be shut up in prisons or in strong houses as hostages, and the principle was established that the lives of these captives should be answerable for the lives of the patriots in the field against the coalition of kings. They decided that all public acts from this time should be dated the first year of Equality, &c.; that all officers, including commanders-in-chief of armies, should wear worsted epaulettes like the common men; that in all diplomatic or ministerial correspondence the word monsieur should give place to the more correct and more honourable epithet of citizen; that in trials before the Extraordinary Criminal Tribunal no advocate should be allowed to plead for prisoners accused of high treason against the nation, unless he produced a certificate of his own patriotism and civism signed by his section; and that all conferences or consultations between such prisoners and their counsel should be public, or take place before the officers of the municipality. The elections of all the Paris members for the Convention were indisputably settled in the Hôtel de Ville and in the great club-hall in the Rue St. Honoré. That silly herd the Gironde fancied that they could carry these elections in their own way, although they knew that they had no influence in either of these places, while Robespierre and Danton, Marat and Manuel were omnipotent both in the Jacobin club and in the commune. Madame Roland, who at one time had written flattering letters to Robespierre, who had expressed the greatest sympathy for him, and who condemned him only when she saw that he was aiming at the destruction of her party, talks vaguely of plots and manœuvres to seduce the good people of Paris into voting for the Terrorists; but neither manœuvres nor plots were necessary; the election of the Terrorists, the choice of men who would go all lengths, being secured, first, by the ascendancy the clubs had been allowed to acquire, and next, by the sanguinary revolution of the 10th of August, which the Girondists themselves had indisputably promoted.

It has been conjectured that the September massacres—"the most atrocious crime that stains the annals of mankind"—were perpetrated for the chief, if not for the sole, purpose of securing the elections of Robespierre and his partisans for the city of Paris, even as, at the beginning of the revolution, the Revillon émeute was got up to secure the election of the friends of the Duke of Orleans to the States-General.* This may indeed have been one of the causes of the massacres, but we think it was far from being the only cause, or even the chief cause, as the elections of the Terrorists were quite sure without these wholesale murders. The commune, and the Assembly too, had completely done away with the elective qualification of property; every man that lived by his labour now had a vote in the sections and in the primary assemblies, so that the sans-culottes must inevitably be an immense majority in Paris as everywhere else, and sans-culottes could only be expected to vote for sans-culottes—for Robespierre, who had so long been their idol, and for the friends he recommended, and who recommended themselves by their ultra-democratic and levelling principles, and by their incessant flattery of the vices and passions of the sovereign mob. Some memoirs and papers of the time affirm that the commune resolved to proceed to the bloodiest extremities to preserve that power a part of the Assembly were now attacking; but the chief cause of the September massacres we take to be that madness of fear which had already given rise to so many atrocities; and it was because they felt a panic terror themselves, and confessed in their own bosoms to the mighty agency of fear, that Danton and the rest recommended terror as the best means of acting upon others. Nor was there any want of things and circumstances proper to alarm and exasperate so excitable a people. Lafayette had essentially contributed to get up this madness of suspicion and fear. When the three commissaries sent by the National Assembly to call him to account, or to seduce his army from their obedience to him, reached his head-quarters at Sedan, he caused them to be arrested and thrown into the tower of that town, alleging that the National Assembly had been violated and reduced to less than a third of its members; that the members who had come to him on such a mission could only be the chiefs or the instruments of the faction who had equally usurped the authority of the Assembly and that of the King; that the commune freely elected by the people had been violently replaced by the commune of the 10th of August; and, finally, that there was nothing in Paris but anarchy and lawless violence. The mayor of Sedan concurred with Lafayette, who flattered himself that he might be sure of his troops and of some of the neighbouring towns in the Ardennes, and with them might set "the example of a holy resistance to oppression." He wrote to old Luckner to invite him to join with his army in this generous effort for securing the constitution they were all sworn to defend; but Luckner, knowing better what was in the minds of his men, hesitated, half promised, and retracted, muddled his head with wine, lost his wits altogether, called the revolution of the 10th of August "a very great accident that had happened in Paris," laughed at it one minute, wept at it the next, and did nothing but harangue the soldiers in very German French. At the same time General Arthur Dillon, who had been left with a small force on the other side of the Flanders frontier, showed no alacrity in concerting measures with Lafayette. This, Lafayette says, was owing to Dillon's too great royalism; but it might proceed from Dillon's doubt as to the wisdom of Lafayette's plan and of the means of carrying it into execution with troops that had made their camps almost counterparts of the mother society in the Rue St. Honoré; and Dillon had had a brother massacred by his own soldiers. Dumouriez, who had contrived since the breaking up of his ministry to get appointed to the command of a part of the army of the North, had established himself with 20,000 good troops in a fortified camp at Maulde, fully determined to have nothing to do either with Lafayette or with Luckner, although he had been placed under the orders of the old marshal, but to wait events and act by and for himself, with a very confident hope that this course would soon lead him to the entire command of the army, upon which, sooner or later, the entire subjection of France with all its factions must depend. Dumouriez, however, was too stirring and active a man to remain in camp doing nothing like Lafayette: he took up and fortified with great skill various posts, which enabled him to make incursions into the enemy's territories, and which could not but seriously interfere with the enemy's advance; he multiplied his incursions, to make the Austrians believe he was in great force, to raise the spirits of his own men by good forage and plunder, and to injure them to the habits of active warfare. He boasts that the soldiers stationed in the camp of Maulde acquired a degree of hardihood and discipline, which distinguished them during the whole of the campaign; and that everywhere else, along the French lines and in the very front of the main army, the emperor's light cavalry laid waste the plains of France, while the troops trifled away their time in shameful inactivity. Well aware of the effect to be produced on French soldiers by such dramatic means, he encouraged two young women, the daughters of an ex-quartermaster of hussars, to gird on the sword, and accompany the detachments in their incursions; and he published very poetical accounts of the exploits and bravery of these modern Joans of Arc. When Lafayette ordered or requested Dumouriez to administer to his troops the old oath to be true to the nation, the law, and the king, the shifty man refused to do anything of the kind; and, in consequence of this refusal and of other parts of his artfully studied conduct, Dumouriez soon received a letter from the National Assembly, engaging him to march with his army against the rebellious Lafayette, who was obliged to run before Dumouriez could move. The municipality of Sedan very speedily repented of the part they had taken in arresting the three deputies of the Assembly; three more commissaries arrived from Paris to harangue and threaten; the soldiers declared that they were all sans-culottes; the captives in the tower of Sedan were liberated, only four or five days after their arrest; and the hero of two worlds, as early as the 19th of August, found himself under the humiliating necessity of flying from the fury of his own army into the territories of the emperor of Austria. His wish was to go through Belgium into Holland, where he hoped for the countenance of the democratic party: he would have claimed the protection of the American minister at the Hague, and from that place he would have gone to Rotterdam to his friend Peter Paulus, one of the leaders of the Dutch patriots. He tells us that he would have been exceedingly happy to make a new insurrection in Holland, and a diversion in favour of France by leading an army of Dutchmen on the rear of the enemies that were invading her; but he adds that the Orange influence and the aristocratic party were too powerful to permit the realization of this brilliant scheme, and that therefore he determined to go to England, and there "wait until some auspicious opportunity presented itself of connecting himself in France with new efforts in the cause of liberty." He says he knew that England was the only country in which he could be safe from arrest and captivity, and that he was fully convinced he would be lost if he fell into the hands of the Austrians or Prussians, or of any of the despotic sovereigns of the Continent. With an attendance as thin as that which had fled with his cousin de Bouillé he crossed the frontiers. Perhaps it would not have been easy for the most ingenious of men to traverse the Low Countries at such a moment; but Lafayette chose his course so badly that he went but a very few miles ere he fell into the hands of an Austrian detachment, and was taken prisoner, together with all the companions of his flight. They were conveyed in the first instance to Namur, whence they were soon removed to Nivelles, where they were closely guarded and treated rather as felons than as prisoners of war. Lafayette represented that it was contrary to the law of nations to hold him in captivity, and he and his twenty-two companions signed a letter or declaration, stating that they were French citizens, "deprived, by an irresistible concurrence of extraordinary events, of the happiness of serving their country and liberty;" that, "unable any longer to resist the violation of a constitution, the offspring of the nation's choice," they had withdrawn from France; that they could not be considered as enemies in arms, "inasmuch as they had abandoned their respective posts in the French army;" that still less could they be confounded "with that portion of their countrymen whose interests, feelings, and opinions, diametrically opposed to theirs, had leagued them with powers at war with France;" and that, in fine, they ought to be regarded merely as foreigners claiming a free passage in order to reach with all dispatch some neutral territory. But the allied sovereigns were not in a humour to take this reading of the law of nations. The fugitives were divided into three parties: such as had not served in the national guard, or rather, such as had not distinguished themselves at all in the revolution, were released, with orders to quit the country as speedily as might be; others were sent to be confined for a time in the citadel of Antwerp; and Lafayette, with three others, who had been members of the States General and the Constituent Assembly, were conveyed as close prisoners to Luxembourg, where they were reproached, taunted, and insulted by many of their countrymen of the emigrant party, and where the Baron de Breteuil, who was figuring as ambassador from Louis XVI., is reported to have said that Lafayette's existence was incompatible with the safety of the governments of Europe. From Luxembourg Lafayette was soon transferred to the Prussian fortress of Magdeburg, where he suffered close confinement for about a year. He was then carried to the Prussian fortress of Neisse, where he lay till the month of May, 1794, when the King of Prussia found it expedient to hand him over to the Emperor of Austria, who caused him to be removed to the dreary fortress and state prison of Olmutz, and who would never consent to release him until the victories of Napoleon Bonaparte enabled him to dictate whatever terms he chose at the peace of Campo Formio in 1797. His flight from Sedan justified in the popular mind every accusation that had ever been brought against him by Robespierre and Marat, and increased immensely the universal proneness to suspicion and alarm. The Assembly issued sentence of outlawry against him and against those who had fled with him; the commune ordered the die of the medal which had been voted to him by the municipality at the beginning of the revolution to be destroyed by the hand of the common hangman; and the Parisians, whose ingenuity in such matters was great, exhausted their invention in heaping abuse and contempt upon his name and his exploits. Dumouriez, who did not foresee how soon he would be obliged to fly himself from his army and from the all-devouring Jacobinism, chuckled over Lafayette's flight, and afterwards, when he was himself a fugitive, he reflected upon the prisoner of Olmutz in a style of contempt and sarcasm, in which, however, some truths are recognisable. "Perhaps," says he, "some respect ought to have been shown to him on account of the effort he had made to save Louis XVI. If he had not been considered in the smallest degree serviceable, or likely to be of any use as a friend, it would have been but just to have allowed him to pass through Holland, and get back to America, where he might have wept over the evils he had brought upon his country by an ill-directed revolutionary zeal, and by a bad imitation of his model, Washington. But the unreflecting rage of the emigrants misled the justice of the Prussian monarch, who became the instrument of their vengeance."

At the baths of St. Amand, near the entrenched camp of Maulde, there had been domiciliated for some time a close friend of Robespierre, a member of the extreme gauche of the Assembly and a dominant debater in the Jacobins. This was no less a personage than Couthon, who had lost the use of both his legs, and who had come to seek some cure or relief to the diseases that were consuming him. According to Dumouriez, who was little disposed to look too closely into the character of a political chief who might forward his own promotion and aggrandizement, he had a very mild appearance, and enjoyed the reputation of being a good friend, a good husband, and a good father. He admits that he had several conferences with him, and that they became very intimate, but he does not add that it was Couthon who won for him the suffrages of the Jacobin leaders, and mainly contributed to his being appointed commander-in-chief as soon as Lafayette had absconded. The Girondists, Roland, Servan, and Clavières, who had been turned out of office in the month of June by Dumouriez, and who had regained office by the revolution of the 10th of August, would assuredly have opposed this appointment if they had been able; but, lacking that ability, they wrote complimentary letters to the new commander-in-chief. Lafayette, in quitting France, had boasted that he had put his lines in excellent order for repelling the foreign invaders. Dumouriez says that he found all the dispositions Lafayette had made as bad as they could well be: the army was divided into two bodies; the advanced guard, consisting only of 6000 men, occupied an extensive camp on the right banks of the Meuse, which it would have required 40,000 men to defend; the main body, consisting of 17,000 men, was posted three leagues in the rear, in a bad camp on the heights that overlook Sedan. He says that the consternation was general; that the soldiers considered all their officers as traitors; that no one took upon him to issue orders, and that, assuredly, if the Duke of Brunswick, any time between the 22nd and 28th of August, had but pushed forward 10,000 men towards Sedan, Lafayette's army would either have dispersed itself among the fortified places, or have fled as far as Paris. But the Duke of Brunswick was moving in a different direction, and by marches that were not forced marches. Slow, however, as was their progress, the Prussians sat down before Longwi on the 23rd of August. This town, on the Moselle and the north-eastern frontier of France, was small and poor, but it had a fortress on a rock, which had been constructed by the great Vauban. After summoning the place the Prussians commenced bombarding it. The garrison was in terrible state of disorder and indiscipline, their commandant had no control over them, and the inhabitants, although they had all sworn to die for the country, had not fixed the when or the where, and were anxious not to die just yet. In a very few hours the place was surrendered to the Duke of Brunswick, who allowed the garrison and the commandant to retire to other fortresses more in the interior of France. The Prussians then blockaded Thionville, and advanced upon Verdun. On the 26th the news of the surrender of Longwi was known all over Paris. It produced the greatest alarm and rage: the people, who attributed the surrender to treachery, believed that they and their cause would be betrayed everywhere, and that the Duke of Brunswick would be allowed to reach the capital and execute his tremendous threats without any valid opposition. Some of the soldiers and non-commissioned officers, who very possibly had been the cause of the surrender, sent a letter to the National Assembly to throw all the blame on Lavergne, their commandant, and to ask what they could have done in the midst of deception and treachery? Many of the deputies responded, like the Roman father in Corneille's tragedy, that they ought to have died! When the intelligence first reached the House many of the members were absent attending a grand funeral service and procession which had been voted in honour of the 1200 French patriots who had fallen on the 10th of August under the Swiss fire: ushers were sent to call them to their seats, and then a tremendous storm roared in the Salle de Manège, where every man agreed that nothing but treachery could account for what had taken place at Longwi. Cambon said it was time to call upon the citizens to perform the promises and abide by the solemn oaths they had so often taken at that bar to die for their country. He could not doubt but that the patriotism of the citizens of Paris would be equal to the emergency; he could not doubt but that the federates would now eagerly rush towards the frontiers; and he demanded that the Assembly should instantly decree a levy of 30,000 men in the department of Paris and the departments nearest to the capital. The proposition was voted by acclamation. It was then hinted that though men might be ready enough to march, they could not well march without muskets; and this led to the passing of resolutions, that all those citizens who were not going to march to the frontiers should deliver up their guns to those who were; that domiciliary visits should be made, and that muskets and all other arms should be seized wherever they could be found. "It is time," exclaimed Cambon, "that men of property should go themselves and fight for what they possess; but, if they will remain inactive, we must take from them their uniforms and their muskets, and dress and arm with them the sans-culottes, who have no property at all, but who are willing enough to march and fight. We must also take all the horses of the idle and luxurious men in Paris, and give them to the citizens who have already served in the cavalry." Other decrees were voted for stripping towns and fortresses, which lay out of the line of attack of their artillery, and bringing it all up to Paris. The cannoncers of the capital came to the bar to offer twenty-four pieces of artillery and their own services with them on the frontiers; but Cambon suggested that these heroes had better remain to form part of the levy of 30,000 men which had just been voted. Vergniaud, in the name of the Extraordinary Committee, presented a project of decree declaring that every citizen who in a besieged town should talk of surrendering should be punished with death; and this too was voted by acclamation.

But it was in the commune that the greatest fervour and energy were displayed. Danton, who attended there much more constantly than in the council of ministers, recommended the measures of vigour and rigour that ought to be adopted at the present crisis. It was he that suggested the taking into pay and arming all the indigent men in and about Paris; and nearly every revolutionary measure that was adopted either originated with him or was recommended and enforced by his bold oratory. It was Danton's plan that the barriers should be strictly guarded and closed for forty-eight hours, counting from the 29th in the evening, and that the domiciliary visits should not be made merely in search of arms, but also for the arrest of all aristocrats, of all unsworn priests, of all who had put their names to anti-revolutionary petitions, of all, in short, who were in any way suspect. In order that all these victims might be seized within Paris, the strictest and most terrible orders were given to let no living being pass the barriers; and the pikemen and the sans-culotte national guardsmen, who watched those barriers and every issue from the capital, wanted neither threatening nor prompting to make them keen in their duty. Boats and barges were moored across the Seine to prevent any escape up or down that river; and all the communes of the neighbouring towns were instructed to arrest every soul they found either on the high roads or in the fields and bye paths. The Paris sections, who had been for some time in permanent session, were to close their meetings in order to attend to the proper execution of these decrees, and even the Extraordinary Tribunal, which had begun to give active employment to the guillotine, was to suspend proceedings for these two days. From ten o'clock of the evening of the 29th all carriages were to cease circulating in Paris, and every house was to put forth a light or lights and keep them burning all through the night. Visits to all manner of houses were to be made by commissioners of the commune assisted by the armed force. At the beat of drum every citizen was to go to his own house or lodging, under pain of being treated as suspect. On the morning of the terrible 29th news was received that the Austrians, under Saxe-Teschen were advancing rapidly in the north, and that nearly the whole of La Vendee was up in arms. The panic and the fury were trebled. The Girondist ministers lost what little heart had been left in them, and proposed abandoning the capital and retiring to Saumur. But here Danton raised his sonorous voice and said—"You cannot be ignorant of the fact that all France is in Paris! If you abandon the capital you are lost for ever, and you deliver up all France to the enemy. You must maintain yourselves in Paris, cost what efforts it may. It is also impossible to think of fighting under the walls of the capital: the 10th of August has divided France into two parts, one attached to royalty, and the other wishing for a republic. The republicans, whose extreme minority in the state you cannot conceal from yourselves, are the only men upon whom you can rely—are the only men that will fight. The rest will refuse to march; they will agitate Paris in favour of the emigrants and foreigners, while your republican defenders, placed between two fires, will get themselves killed in endeavouring to repel the invasion. If they fail—as it seems to me they must do—the ruin of France and your own ruin are certain: if, contrary to every expectation, they should return as conquerors of the coalition, still this very victory will be a defeat for you; for it will have cost you the lives of thousands of brave republicans, while the royalists, even now more numerous than you, will have lost none of their force or influence. My opinion, therefore, is, that, to disconcert their measures and stop the foreign enemy on his march, we must strike terror into the hearts of the royalists!" The Girondist ministers understood the sense of these terrible words: it is said they shuddered at them and remained speechless. "I tell you," rejoined Danton, "that there is nothing for us but terror! We must terrify the royalists and all our enemies here at Paris! (Il faut faire peur!)" Gentle Roland, honest Clavières, amiable Servan, mathematical Monge, are said to have continued to sit silent and horror-stricken, staring with eyes of wonder at Danton and one another; but, whatever was their wonder, whatever their horror, it is not shown or even said by any one that they made the slightest effort to stop the realization of the scheme of terror and slaughter proposed by this truly revolutionary minister of justice. We know their utter powerlessness, we know that no efforts that they could have made would have prevented the massacres which had already been determined upon; but just and brave men, enthusiasts in all the higher virtues—as the Girondists pretended to be—would have made the attempt, and would have been massacred themselves rather than have lived to witness such infernal cruelties, such an eternal disgrace on the character of their country. But these men were hollow pretenders: they only felt for their own personal danger, which is said to have been great, inasmuch as some of the directors of the massacre wished to include them in it; and when their own danger was over they would have shaken hands with the blood-stained ruffians who had relieved them from all future dread of royalty and aristocracy. From the council Danton strode to the Hôtel de Ville, to give the last directions as to the proper means of beginning the Reign of Terror. The chief men who acted under him or with him were Marat, Tallien, Billaud-Varennes, Collot d'Herbois, Panis, (a little lawyer, and brother-in-law to brewer Santerre), Sergent (an engraver and Cordelier), Duplain, Lefort, and Jourdeuil; but the active agents in the arrests, which were preparatory to the massacre, included nearly every member of the commune, whose total number was at this moment from five to six hundred. All kinds of subterfuges and suppressions are employed by French writers to diminish the numbers of the butchers of the revolution, and to make the world believe that all the worst crimes were not only conceived, but were absolutely perpetrated by a few individuals; but their ingenuity can deceive no one that will look into the facts. Before these hundreds of municipals began the domiciliary visits they knew as well as Danton himself the meaning and the object of them.

At the appointed hour the drums beat to arms, the tocsin was sounded, alarm-guns were fired, and the visitations were begun. Many hundreds of victims of both sexes and of all ages were torn from their homes or from their hiding-places, and crowded in upon the many thousands that already occupied the prisons. Nobles, officers, men of letters and journalists that had taken the wrong side, or that had not gone far enough or fast enough with the revolution,—ladies who had belonged to the old court, and ladies who had never belonged to any court, but who had emigrants or some other aristocrats for their husbands or lovers,—priests who had not taken the civic oath, and priests who had taken it and repented of it afterwards,—men, and women too, who had never taken any part in political matters, but who had been denounced as suspect, by personal enemies or by busy-bodies, to the committees of research and surveillance, were all clutched by the municipals and their armed force, and put into prison like sheep into pens to be ready for slaughter. These operations were continued during the following day and night. On Saturday, the 1st of September, they ceased, and the barriers were once more opened for a few hours. But in the course of the day it was reported (prematurely) that Verdun had fallen—and fallen, like Longwi, through treachery. Hence fresh panic, and fury, and madness, and hence a cry for blood from every faubourg and section, from every street, lane, place, and corner of that vast madhouse—a cry which encouraged Danton, and gave him the assurance that all Paris, or the sans-culotte part of it to a man, would either co-operate in his great work of terror or look on complacently. The burly minister of justice or blood went again to the Hôtel de Ville, and helped the commune to decree that on the morrow the tocsin should be sounded, the guns of alarm should be fired, and the citizens should all meet in arms, with their muskets or with their pikes, in the Champ de Mars. The decree added, for form sake, that these armed citizens were to march off on Monday morning towards Verdun; but no one was deceived by this pretence, and those who had relations or friends in the prisons, and who had courage enough to show their interest in them, well knowing that the prisons were to be forced and that all in them were to be murdered, hastened to supplicate and implore Manuel, the procureur of the commune, to liberate the objects of their affection. Manuel, it is said, enlarged two or three persons of distinction, and two or three more appear to have been liberated at the instance of Danton. To a lady who offered to share the captivity of her uncle, an old abbé, Sergeant said, "Madame, you are very imprudent; the prisons are not safe!" On this day Virtue Pétion presided for the first time over the new council of the commune formed on the 10th of August; and yet Thiers and others have endeavoured to make the world believe that he knew nothing of the extermination that was preparing in the commune. Others have conjectured that Pétion might have presided only in order to prevent the execution of the infernal project; but no one has adduced any proof of his having attempted anything of the sort. If he had made an effort, some evidence of it must have been left. There is a great deal more evidence to show that he tacitly approved everything that was done in the Hôtel de Ville. On the same day Robespierre appeared in the council of the commune, as a member of it, and in a discourse, described as eloquent, he developed all the manœuvres which had been employed to make that council lose the public confidence, and all the good deeds by which the council had proved themselves worthy of that confidence. This seems to prove that one of the avowed objects of the arrests and massacres was to save the commune from the decrees and interference of the Assembly.

The morrow, the 2nd of September, was a Sunday; it had been chosen because most of the people would be idle, and so have time to spare for the bloody work. Most of the grand crimes of the revolution were, for the same reason, committed on Sabbath days. The commune issued a proclamation to tell the people that the country was in far greater danger than ever, that the enemy was almost at the gates of Paris, that there was nothing but Verdun between them and the capital. A report was also circulated that the aristocrats in the prisons had formed a horrible plot with the aristocrats in the town and without, and that they were going to break out of prison that very night in order to put Paris to fire and sword. The National Assembly met in the morning, and, while the sans-culottes were assembling in the streets or marching to the Champ de Mars, the honourable deputies, who must have known what was coming, spent their time in speech-making and in spinning rhetorical figures. That there might be no mistake, two members of the commune came to the bar to announce that the tocsin was going to sound, and that all the patriot citizens of Paris were assembling in the Champ de Mars in order to march against the enemy. The Assembly thanked these municipals in the name of all France for their beautiful patriotism, and invited them to the honours of the séance. Orator Vergniaud poured out a long rhapsody. "It is to-day," said this great Girondist, "that Paris will really show herself in all her grandeur! I recognise her high courage in the step she has just taken, and now we may say that the country is saved. From this day forward we have nothing to fear!" After talking about the corrupting gold which the enemies of liberty were distributing, and after making use of other arguments and figures which, however he might mean it, certainly tended to keep up the popular fury and thirst for blood, Vergniaud proposed that the Assembly should every day send twelve of its members to work with the people in digging trenches on Montmartre. At this proposition all the House rose and shouted, and all the galleries did the same; the decree was passed in a whirlwind of enthusiasm. Soon after this scene the tocsin was heard ringing from the Hotel-de-Ville and all the church towers, and the Salle de Manège was shaken by tremendous discharges of artillery, and Danton came to the bar with a radiant countenance. "Gentlemen," said this minister of justice, "it is very satisfactory to the ministers of a free people to have to announce that the country is going to be saved. Everything is moving, everything is shaking itself, every man is burning with anxiety to fight. You now know that Verdun is not taken, but only invested. You know that the garrison have sworn to immolate the first man that proposes a surrender. One portion of the people of Paris are going to march to the frontiers, another portion are going to work at the entrenchments, and a third will defend the interior of the city with their pikes! The tocsin that you hear is not the signal of alarm; it is only sounding the charge on the enemies of the country! To conquer them, to annihilate them, what is wanting? Audacity, audacity, and still audacity! —toujours de l'audace, et la France est sauvée." The Assembly applauded, the Assembly approved all that he and the commune had done, saying nothing, hinting nothing about the first and immediate consequences of this universal insurrection and meeting in the Champ de Mars. The honourable members went quietly to their dinners at four o'clock, and returned to the House at six, with a fuller knowledge than ever of what was to be done; but still no generous effort was made, no voice was raised to plead the sacred cause of humanity. They knew that the barriers were again closed, that the prisoners in all the prisons and strong houses in Paris, that the royal family in the Temple were in agonies of alarm and expecting instant death; yet they passed their time in listening to deputations who came to make vapid speeches, and to offer for the service of the country a new musket, an assignat of fifty livres (not then worth five pence), a pair of hackney-coach horses, a uniform coat, &c., &c. A deputation of citizenesses came into the Hall to make the significant demand that all such as were detained in prison merely for debt should be instantly liberated in order that they might not be confounded and punished with the traitors. Yet still the Assembly did nothing, said nothing, to avert the horrible doom that was hanging over many thousands of their countrymen and countrywomen; nay, at this very moment they agreed to a demand that the state prisoners at Orleans should be brought nearer to Paris, or nearer to torture and death. Some mad Englishman had just offered a musket for the defence of liberty, when news was brought that the prisons were forced, and that the massacres were beginning; and a minute or two after Fauchet announced that two hundred priests had been already butchered in the church of the Carmelites, which, like other churches, had been converted into a prison. Then the Assembly, without any evident or extraordinary emotion, appointed a deputation to go forth and tranquillise the people; and for this object they selected only five of their members, and those five were men more likely to encourage the people than to check their savage rage: they were the ultra-Cordelier-Jacobin Bazire, the Jacobins François de Neufchâteau, Dussaulx, and Lequinio, and the Girondist Isnard, who is generally reputed the most enthusiastic or maddest of his faction. As soon as these members had quitted the Hall, other deputations arrived to make more speeches about dying for one's country; and there sat the Assembly listening to these orations, while young and old, the innocent and the helpless, were dying in heaps all round them. Minister Servan came to the bar to ask for four millions of livres for the volunteers that were marching towards the frontiers; and this question was debated, and put to the vote with all the usual formality. When this important matter had been settled, the House returned to its vagaries and nonsense, and were thus engaged when the deputation of five members returned. One of them reported that all was quiet within the Temple and round about it. Another (Dussaulx) said that they had with great difficulty penetrated as far as the Abbaye, in front of which the people were killing priests and others; that they had endeavoured to harangue the people; that one of them had even got upon a chair, but that he had scarcely pronounced a word ere his voice was drowned by tumultuous cries; that another orator, M. Bazire, had endeavoured to get a hearing by making an ingenious beginning to his speech, but that, as soon as the people heard he was not really speaking according to their notions, they had forced him to hold his tongue. "Each of us," said he, "spoke to the people that were near him, right and left; but the pacific intentions of those who heard us could not be communicated to a crowd of many thousands. We, therefore, retired, and the darkness of night prevented our seeing what was passing." The darkness of night—and the nights at the beginning of September are not usually very dark—was lighted up by lamps and candles in the windows, and by lanterns and torches which the murderers carried about with them. Dussaulx and his companions must have seen very well what was passing; and, even if the night and the city had been as dark as Tophet, the cries and shrieks of the victims, and the shouts, oaths, and exclamations of the murderers must have told them what was passing. A man who could speak as Dussaulx did of such horrors was assuredly not the man to make any efforts or run any risk to prevent them. After the Assembly had heard his report, they proceeded to debate about arms and uniforms for the patriots who were going to march to the frontiers, taking no further notice of the massacres. At eleven o'clock at night they suspended their debates, but most of the members—that is to say, most of the Girondists and Jacobins, for the rest had absented themselves from the House ever since the 10th—remained in the hall, as the House had been declared in permanent session. At one o'clock in the morning it was reported in the hall "that the disorder continued, and that the people were still killing the prisoners." Then, for the first time—when the massacres had been going on for nine hours—the Assembly made an application to the omnipotent commune. And what was the nature of this application? Was it an earnest entreaty, a solemn injunction, a passionate appeal to the commune to put forth its whole strength, and stop these murders en masse? No! it was nothing of the sort: it was merely to request the commune to give the Assembly "precise information" as to what was passing. At half-past two in the morning three commissaries of the commune, Tallien, Truchot, and Giraud, presented themselves in the hall, in order to give this "precise information." Truchot, who spoke first, said with a coolness that could only have proceeded from his approbation of all that had been done, "Gentlemen, most of the prisons are now empty; about four hundred prisoners have perished. At the prison of La Force, to which I repaired, I thought it my duty to get out all the persons detained there only for debt. I did the same at the prison of Sainte-Pélagie. Having returned to the commune, I be thought myself that I had forgotten at the prison of La Force the ward where the women were confined. I went and got out twenty-four women. We principally took under our protection Mademoiselle de Tourzel and Madame Sainte-Brice. I observe that the latter lady is with child. For our own safety we retired, for they threatened us also. We conducted these two ladies to the section of the Rights of Man, in order that they may be detained for trial." Tallien, who spoke next, was equally cold-blooded. "The people," said he, "went first to the Abbaye. They demanded from the governor of the prison his register and list of prisoners. All the prisoners detained for the affair of the 10th of August, or for forging assignats, perished at once. Only eleven of them have been saved. The council of the commune sent a deputation to oppose this disorder [the villains would not even call it a massacre]; the procureur of the commune employed all the means suggested by his zeal and humanity. He could do nothing, and saw several victims perish at his feet. He himself ran great risks, and his friends were obliged to carry him off lest he should fall a victim to his zeal. From the Abbaye the people went to the Châtelet, where all the prisoners have also been immolated. About midnight the prison of La Force was attacked. Our commissaries went there too, but could do nothing. Several deputations were sent afterwards. An order has been given to the commandant-general (Santerre) to move some detachments; but the service at the barriers requires so great a number of men, that there do not remain enough to restore order. Our commissaries did what they could to prevent the hôtel of La Force from being pillaged; but they could not in any way stop the just vengeance of the people; for we ought to mention that their blows have fallen upon forgers of assignats, who had been confined there a very long time. What excited their vengeance was that there were none there except well-known rascals!" Giraud, the third commissary, said, "They went likewise to Bicêtre prison with seven pieces of cannon. The people, in exercising their vengeance, showed their justice: at the Châtelet several prisoners were enlarged in the midst of cries of 'Vive la Nation!' and the rattling of arms. The prisons of the Palais-de-Justice are absolutely empty, and very few of the prisoners have escaped death." Tallien then begged to notice an important fact, a fact very honourable to the people: a man had just brought to the commune five golden louis and eighty-three livres in silver; and a dépôt had been established in the

Hôtel-de-Ville for the money and effects found upon the dead prisoners. Giraud, continuing his panegyric, said that the people on the Pont Neuf searched the dead bodies, and deposited the money and pocket-books they found upon them. "They have just killed a man," said he, "for stealing a pocket-handkerchief." When the Assembly had done marvelling at this sublime honesty, Giraud continued, "But I had forgotten a fact very important for the honour of the people. The people organised in the prisons a tribunal composed of twelve persons. After the mittimus had been read, and after divers questions had been put to the prisoner, the judges placed their hands upon his head, and said, 'Do you believe that in our consciences we can turn this gentleman out of the prison?' The answer to this was the sentence of the court. When they said Yes, the accused was let go, and he rushed out upon the pikes outside the prison, and so was dispatched. If they said No, the cries of 'Vive la Nation' were heard, and the prisoner was saved." By the time these precious orators of the commune had done speaking it was broad day-light. What the Assembly did for some hours after we know not; we only know that the massacres continued, and that no effort was made by them or by any of the Girondist ministers to stop them. This duty more especially concerned the virtuous Roland, as minister for the home department; and Roland did nothing until the evening of the 3rd, when he complained to the Assembly—or rather until the 4th, when he wrote a pressing letter to Santerre for a military force, which Santerre never sent. Such was the conduct of the "courageous Girondists," such the conduct of the "afflicted Assembly," at this bloody crisis; yet Thiers, who excuses and even approves of everything they did or left undone, says that the Assembly issued decree upon decree to demand from the commune an account of the state of Paris, and that the commune replied that it was making every effort to re-establish order and law. We have shown from the most authentic of all records of the night's proceedings* that the Assembly never sent to the commune at all until one o'clock in the morning—that it never sent again—and that, when the commissaries of the commune appeared in the hall at half-past two in the morning, it was rather to praise the people for what they had done, than to talk about order and law. They said, indeed, that they had made efforts, which was not true; and they intimated that the massacres were over, because the prisons were emptied, which was another falsehood. "However," says Thiers, in his tortuous way, "the Assembly certainly had not the idea of transporting itself as a whole, tout entière, into the prisons, and of placing itself between the murderers and the victims. If this generous idea did not present itself to the members to drag them from their benches and carry them to the theatre of carnage, it must be attributed to surprise, to the consciousness of their own powerlessness, perhaps also to the insufficient devotedness inspired by the danger of an enemy—in fine, to that *disastrous opinion, in which some of the deputies participated, that the victims were so many conspirators from whom one would have received death if one had not given death to them. Madame Roland speaks somewhat more openly, and gets a little nearer to the truth in admitting that the Assembly was struck with stupor and terror, that the members who disapproved of the massacres were completely unmanned by their own personal fears.

We cannot enter upon anything like a complete account of the orgies of human blood which lasted all through the following day and night, and which did not entirely cease until the 6th. Such an account, compiled from the innumerable narratives left by eye-witnesses, would fill a larger volume than ever has been written upon the Sicilian Vespers or the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, and would contain details infinitely more atrocious than any connected with those two celebrated butcheries of human beings. We can only select some of the most striking incidents. The first victims were twenty-four priests, who had been arrested and carried to the Hôtel de Ville, charged with having refused the serment civique; and it appears that their massacre began as early as three or four o'clock in the afternoon, or about the time that the members of the Assembly were adjourning to eat their dinners. At a moment when the Place de Grève was crowded by men and women of the people driven to frenzy by the tocsin and the alarm-guns that were ringing in their ears, at a moment when there was one continuous mob from the Champ de Mars to the heart of the city (for all the sans-culottes of the towns and villages for leagues round had come into Paris), the council of the commune chose to send forth the priests to be conducted to the Abbaye prison. The captives were placed in six hackney-coaches, and escorted by federates, Marseillaise and Bretons, who marched very slowly, and who, as they marched, loaded the helpless priests with abuse and execration. "Here are the conspirators," said they, "who were to cut the throats of our wives and children while we were marching to the frontiers!" The mob crowded round the hackney-coaches, spitting at the priests and striking at them. The priests endeavoured to close the coach-doors, which were left open, but they were not allowed to do it. They were men, and Frenchmen; and it is said that one of them, of a quicker temper than the rest, struck a ruffian with his cane, first over the hand and then over the head, and several times. The people, who had sworn before that they would have the life-blood of every one of them, now fell upon this carriage, which, together with the other five, had arrived close in front of the Abbaye. Vain were cries for mercy, vain the appeal to their grey hairs and their calling; the four priests were butchered, and then the four in the next carriage, and then those in the next, until not one was left alive except the Abbé Sicard, the celebrated teacher of the deaf and dumb, who was recognised by a watchmaker named Monnot, who bravely and miraculously rescued him, throwing himself before him, opening his bosom, and saying to the people, "You shall pierce this heart before you reach that of the good Abbé Sicard!" At this moment Billaud-Varennes, a member of the council of the commune, arrived on the spot with his municipal scarf and insignia of office about him, and, stepping among the hacked and blood-covered corpses of the twenty-three priests, he told the slaughterers that they had made a good beginning. "People," cried he, "you are immolating your enemies; you are doing your duty!" Then Maillard, who had led the she-devils to Versailles, proposed that some of the mob should go with him to the church of the Carmelites, where there were many more conspiring priests to be disposed of; and at his terrible Allons aux Carmes! a multitude began to march with him in that direction. Two hundred priests lay under lock and key in the church of the Carmelites—according to some accounts the number was much larger—expecting death, which they presently found. Some were slaughtered on their knees and in the act of prayer; some were thrust through the heart with pikes as they endeavoured to fly, or had their skulls cleft with sabres as they grasped the pikes in their hands, and struggled with the pikemen with the superhuman strength of despair; others were driven into corners, and dispatched, more easily and expeditiously, with fire of musketry; and others were shot in the garden of the monastery, and in trees there, to which they had climbed, as also on the garden walls, not without much laughter and many jests on the part of their murderers. Not one found mercy, not one escaped: archbishop and bishops, men high in the church and poor parish priests, were all murdered; and, that there might be no chance of recovery from gun-shot wounds, the pikemen examined those who had only been shot, and thrust their bloody blades through their hearts. When this double hecatomb of human bodies had been heaped up there, Maillard and his merry men, all covered with blood and sweat, went away to the hall or assembling room of the nearest section to demand wine—"Wine for the brave workmen who are delivering France from its enemies!" And the committee of the section gave them twenty-four quarts to drink. The monsters carried out the wine and drank it in the midst of the dead bodies. As soon as they had thus refreshed themselves, Maillard cried out, "And now to the Abbaye!" In that old prison there were confined from two to three hundred persons for political offences, including Swiss, gentlemen who had belonged to the gardes-du-corps or to the king's constitutional guard, deputies of the first Assembly, priests, ladies, and others, who must all have been warned by the tocsin and the artillery, and the massacre of the twenty-four ecclesiastics in front of the Abbaye, of the fate that awaited them. "Towards seven o'clock on this Sunday night," says one of the few captives who escaped by miracle, "we saw two men enter our apartment, their hands bloody, and armed with sabres; a turnkey with a torch lighted them; he pointed to the bed of an unfortunate Swiss, Reding. Reding (who had been wounded on the 10th of August) spoke with a dying voice. One of the men paused; but the other cried Allons donc! lifted the unfortunate man, and carried him out on his back to the street, where he was massacred. We all looked at one another in silence; we clasped each other's hands. Motionless, with fixed eyes, we gazed on the floor of our prison, on which lay the moonlight, chequered with the triple stanchions of our windows." * While the mob were beginning to massacre indiscriminately, some one observed that there were others beside aristocrats and conspirators in the prison, and that it would not be fair to sacrifice the innocent with the guilty; and Maillard demanded the keys of the different wards, and the écroux, or registers on which were written the names of all the prisoners and the offences for which they were committed. The gaolers delivered up the keys and the papers. It was then agreed that there should be a court and a president to read these registers and pronounce judgment with all possible speed. "Let Maillard be president!" cried the mob. And Maillard, sitting down to a table and opening the prison books, entered upon his functions. He chose some ten or twenty men that were near him to assist him in his summary trials; he sent others into the interior of the Abbaye to bring down the prisoners in small parties at a time; and he left the mass of the bloodthirsty mob outside the gates, to execute, with their pikes, and their sabres, bludgeons, and knives, the sentences that might be pronounced. It was also agreed among these hell-hounds that the sentence should be expressed in these short and indirect words, "Sir, to la Force, — Monsieur, à la Force;" and that as soon as these words were said the victim should be thrust out through a wicket of the gate. The improvised tribunal began with the Swiss; and in their case it was not deemed necessary to read names. "It was you," cried Maillard, "that murdered the people on the 10th of August!" "We were attacked," said the poor Swiss, "and we obeyed our chiefs." "As for that matter," said Maillard, "we have only to send you to la Force;"—speaking coolly, and laying his emphasis on the two death-words. The Swiss, who could see the pikes and swords glittering beyond the open wicket, and who could hear the people crying for their blood, knew very well that there was no intention to convey them merely from one prison to another: they fell back, rushed towards the interior of the prison, and cried piteously for mercy, mercy! But the stone walls of the prison were not deaf to that cry than Maillard and his mob; they were dragged forward, goaded on towards the fatal wicket by pike and sword. Suddenly one of the Swiss, a man who seemed about thirty, whose stature was above the common, and whose look was noble and martial, stepped forward and said, "I go first, since it must be so: farewell!" Then, dashing his hat behind him, he cried to the butchers, "Show me the way." They opened the wicket: he plunged forward among the pikes, and died of a thousand wounds. Some of his comrades rushed after him, others were dragged to the wicket and thrust out by main force: they all perished—their total number was thirty-eight. When the Swiss were dispatched to a man, Maillard and his tribunal pronounced the words à la Force upon a few men who had been accused of falsifying the paper-money. Some of these individuals had possibly been guilty of forgery, which had never been in France a crime punishable with death; others are asserted to have been entirely innocent: but the united numbers of the two classes were so very small as to make horribly ridiculous the discourse of Tallien about the just vengeance of the people. As soon as these cases had been disposed of, they brought to Maillard's bar the Marquis de Montmorin—elder brother of the unfortunate minister of that name—who had been tried a few days before, and even acquitted, by the new special tribunal, but who had nevertheless been carried back to prison by the people. In reply to some questions put to him, the old nobleman said that he submitted to a regular tribunal, but could not recognise or plead before any other. "Be it so," replied Maillard; "you shall go then to await another trial at la Force." Deceived by these words, the marquis asked for a coach to carry him. He was told, with the usual Parisian smartness, that he would find a coach at the door. He stepped through the wicket, and found death—happy at least in this, that he did not live to see his eldest son and his wife conducted on one day to the guillotine by sentence of the Tribunal Révolutionnaire. The next victim was Thierry, valet-de-chambre of Louis XVI. "Like master like man; à la Force!" said President Maillard; and Thierry was cast out to the butchers. Shortly after this, Montmorin, the minister, who had concealed himself in the house of a washerwoman in the Faubourg St. Antoine, but who had been discovered or betrayed in the nocturnal domiciliary visits, was dragged to the table and the wicket to meet the doom which he had foreseen for months.

But by this time the same murderous work with the same extemporised tribunal was begun at the other prisons. At La Force the shibboleth of sentence was "To the Abbaye," and there, and at the

This terrible narrative, which was printed on the 20th of September, 1792, and which went through an amazing number of editions (the author says that two hundred and eighty thousand copies of it had been sold before the month of May, 1793), is reprinted in Histoire Parlementaire de la Révolution.

Châtelet, at Bicêtre, at the Conciergerie, the victims were thrust out through gate or wicket to be massacred in the streets. Detachments of national guards mounted guard by day and by night at each of the prisons; but they joined in the slaughter, instead of endeavouring to prevent it; and before the murders began they had received orders from the commune or from Santerre, or from others whose orders they deemed worthy of attention, to permit who would to enter, but to allow none to come out. And, while Tallien and that trio were appearing publicly and officially in the scene of carnage as if to recommend mercy and peace and a cessation of the massacres, other members of the commune—colleagues and brothers of their own—went from place to place to encourage the murderers, to ask whether they were making clean work of it as at the Carmelites, to tell them that they should have aid from the commune if requisite. At each prison a certain number of women burst in with the men; and women took an active part in the massacres outside the gates. In the front of every prison, and there were five or six besides those we have named, there was, before morning, a heap, a mound of dead bodies, and as the sun rose nearly every stone thereabout was seen wetted with blood. The butchers, when tired at that work, passed within the wickets and became judges, and the judges passing outwards became butchers. There was an abundance of wine distributed to keep up their spirits, and when they had drunk they put down on the table their glasses stained with blood, which also stained the judgment-seat. Blood was the one predominant idea. In the Abbaye, Sombreuil, the venerable governor of the Invalides, was brought up to the table, and Maillard had pronounced the words “à la Force,” when the governor’s daughter, likewise a prisoner, rushed through pikes and sabres, clasped her old father in her arms so tightly that none could separate her from him, and made such piteous cries and prayers that some were touched. She vowed that her father was no aristocrat, that she herself hated aristocrats. But to put her to a further proof, or to indulge their bestial caprices, the ruffians presented to her a cup full of blood and said, “Drink, drink of the blood of the aristocrats, and your father shall be saved!” The lady took the horrible cup and drank, and the monsters kept their promise. Nay, they carried the old man and his daughter in their bloody arms safe to their own home, shedding tears, shouting “Vive la Nation,” and refusing money which the Sombreuils offered them. In the same prison the Marquis de Cazotte owed his life to his young daughter, who clung to him when under the pikes, and who poured forth such passionate filial eloquence that the hands raised to kill refused their office, and both were let go without any blood-drinking. Yet in ten days the grand tribunal, more merciless than the mob, or not acted upon by a touching scene, condemned the old marquis to die, and he perished on the scaffold, bequeathing to his daughter—all he could bequeath—a lock of his grey hair. Two or three other prisoners were allowed to escape death at the Abbaye. A section, or a committee of a section, interfered in behalf of a young man, with solemn attestations that he was pure from aristocracy: he was acquitted with cries of “Vive la Nation,” and conducted to his home in triumph. The agonies of the prisoners, who passed long hours expecting death every moment were worse than the pangs of death itself. Jourgniac de Saint Méard, who was among those in the Abbaye, has recorded some of these sufferings. “It is utterly impossible,” says he, “to express the horror of the profound and sombre silence which reigned during these executions: it was only interrupted by the cries of those that were being murdered and by the strokes of their assassins. As soon as one man was dispatched there rose a cry for another, and shouts of ‘Vive la Nation’ a thousand times more terrible than the horrors of the preceding silence. In the interval between one massacre and another we heard the people saying under our windows, ‘We must not let one of them escape; we must kill them all, all! and, above all, those that are in the chapel, for they are all conspirators!’ It was of us they were speaking. There was silence in the streets, but a noise in the interior of the prison, where they were selecting fresh victims.’ But presently fresh screams and cries were heard outside; and we trembled again, and recalled to our minds the last words of M. Chantereine, who, plunging a knife into his heart, had said, ‘We are all destined to be massacred!’ At midnight ten men, sword in hand, and preceded by two turnkeys who carried torches, entered into our prison, the chapel, and ordered each of us to place himself at the foot of his bed. After they had counted us, they told us that we should answer for one another, and they swore that if one of us tried to escape we should all be massacred without being heard by Monsieur le President. These last words, however, gave us a glimmering of hope, for we did not know until then that we should be heard before being killed. At two o’clock in the morning we heard a terrible beating on one of the inner doors of the prison. We thought it was the door that gave access to the passage which led to the chapel, and that they were coming to butcher us there; but we were somewhat re-assured and comforted when we heard that it was the door of a dungeon which some prisoners within had barricaded. Soon after we learned that the door had been forced open, and that the people had butchered every man they found in the dungeon. At ten o’clock on Monday morning [his agony had already lasted twenty hours] the Abbé Lenfant, confessor to the king, and the Abbé Chapt de Rastignac appeared in the pulpit of the chapel which served as our prison, and which they had entered by a back door. They told us that our last hour was at hand; that we must compose our minds, and receive their benediction. An electrical movement, not to be defined, threw us all on our knees, and, with our hands joined, we received the blessing. This moment, although consolatory, was one of the most awful that we experienced. On the eve of appearing before the Supreme Being, kneeling before two of his ministers, we presented a spectacle which is not to be described. The venerable age of those two priests, their position above us, death hovering over our heads and environing us on every side—everything made the ceremony of that benediction sublime and awful. It drew us near to the Divinity; it restored us our courage; all reasoning was suspended; and the coldest and most incredulous amongst us was as deeply impressed by the scene as the most ardent and the most devout. Half an hour after these two priests were dragged out and massacred, and we heard their cries! . . . Is there a man whose hair does not stand on end with horror? Our principal occupation now was to endeavour to learn how to be massacred with the least suffering. From time to time we sent some of our comrades to look out at the window of the chapel tower in order to instruct us. . . . They reported that the victims who held up their hands suffered most, because the blows of the sabres were deadened before they reached the head; that some of them had their hands and arms chopped off before they fell, and that those who placed their hands behind their backs and presented their heads and breasts to the pikes and sabres seemed to suffer the least. . . . We advised one another to be firm, and to assume this attitude when our turns should come. Towards the hour of noon, worn out by my long agony, I threw myself on a bed and fell into a profound sleep. Everything makes me believe that I owe my life to that moment of sleep. I dreamed that I was appearing before the terrible tribunal which was to judge me; that I was heard with attention in spite of the dreadful tocsin and the horrible cries of the people; that I finished my pleading, and was acquitted. I woke with the happy presentiment that this dream would be realised. I related it to my companions in misfortune, who were astonished at my confidence—a confidence which I preserved until I appeared before my terrible judges. . . . But the torments of the most devouring thirst were added to our other anguishes. At last our turnkey, Bertrand, came alone into the chapel, and we induced him to bring us a jug of water. We drank it with desperate avidity, for during twenty-six hours we had not been able to obtain one drop of water. We spoke of this cruel negligence to a federate, who came with some other persons to visit our prison: he was so enraged that he asked the name of the turnkey who had refused us water, assuring us that he would go and put him to death; and he would have done it if we had not hindered him. Shortly after we were disturbed by a sad moaning overhead. We discovered that the sounds proceeded from the pulpit, and we begged those we heard passing and re-passing on the staircase behind to open the door and see what it was. At last some of them entered the pulpit, and told us that it was a young officer who had given himself several wounds, but without killing himself, as his knife had bent at the point, and would not penetrate. The young man was dragged out and dispatched. . . . Several other prisoners killed themselves in their chambers in different parts of the Abbaye: among others there was one who beat out his brains against the lock of his cell." By this time it was late in the afternoon of Monday the 3rd.

Maton de la Varenne, who was a prisoner in La Force, tells us what was doing there, while these things were doing at the Abbaye. "About two o'clock on the afternoon of Sunday the 2nd," says Maton, "I saw a tall, ill-dressed man come in and whisper to our gaoler, who presently said aloud, 'Let them come if they will, and massacre them; by my faith I am not going to be such a fool as to get myself killed for the prisoners.' . . . About three o'clock a gendarme came in and told us that the people had massacred seven persons on the Pont Neuf; and that on the preceding evening women in a state of intoxication had been heard saying on the Feuillant terrace, 'It is to-morrow that souls will be driven out of bodies in the prisons!' Towards seven o'clock prisoners were called frequently, and they did not reappear. Each of us reasoned in his own way on this singularity; but our ideas became calm, as we persuaded ourselves that a memorial I had drawn up and got sent to the National Assembly was producing good effect. This was particularly the opinion of my unfortunate companions de Rulhière and de la Chenaye, with whom I was conversing when, at about eight o'clock, our turnkeys separated us and shut us all up in our several cells or wards."* [It should appear that the narrator and many others of the captives were confined in parts of the prison where the noise of the massacres, loud and frightful as it was, could not reach them; for during several hours they had no notion of the bloody work that was doing in front of the gates of La Force.] "I was trying to sleep," continues Maton, "when the door of our chamber was burst open with a terrible noise, and one Delange was dragged out. An instant after he was followed by Berger, an old man of seventy-three. The doors of the other cells along our corridor were opened successively. There were still five of us in my cell, and all except myself were giving themselves up to the consoling hope of being liberated before day, when the people came to seek Durand. Durand was lying on his bed ready dressed, in order not to keep them waiting. He squeezed my hand, promised to send me his news, and went out. At the same moment we distinguished the voice of Delange, who, after having obtained his liberty, insisted absolutely upon returning to his room to take his effects away with him, and above all a little white poodle dog, which had been his only amusement during his captivity. His solicitations were unsuccessful, because they wished the prisoners above to remain ignorant of the horrible scenes that were passing. About midnight a man named Barat, who, from the situation of his cell, could better hear what was going on, called my comrade Gérard towards him and said, 'My friend, we are all dead men! They are assassinating the prisoners as fast as they go out at the gate—I hear their cries!' Gérard came back to us with this fatal news, and exclaimed, 'Our last hour is come! There is no help for us.' I replied to him—and I tried to force myself to believe it—that the tremendous noise came only from the Faubourg St. Antoine men who were to march for Verdun, and who, no doubt, were going first to the Hôtel-de-Ville. At one o'clock in the morning the wicket gate which led to our quarter opened anew. Four men in uniform, each with a naked sword and a blazing torch, came up to our corridor, preceded by a turnkey, and entered a chamber adjoining ours to break open and examine a box. This done, they stopped in the gallery and questioned a man named Cuissa to know where was Lamotte (the widower of the notorious woman of the diamond necklace, &c.). This Lamotte, they said, had some months ago, under pretext of a hidden treasure he knew of, swindled one of them out of 300 livres, inviting him expressly to dine with him. The wretched Cuissa, who was in their grip, and who, in fact, lost his life this night, answered trembling, that he remembered the circumstance well, but could not tell what had become of Lamotte.* Determined to find Lamotte and confront him with Cuissa, they dragged the latter along with them, and made a fresh search in several other apartments, but apparently without success, for we heard them say to one another, 'Let us go and search among the dead bodies; for, nom de Dieu! we must know what has become of him.' At this same time I heard them call for the Abbé Bardy, who was dragged out and directly massacred, as I learned afterwards. He had been accused of having, in concert with his concubine, murdered and cut into pieces, five or six years before, his own brother, an auditor of the Chambre des Comptes of Montpellier; but had by his subtlety, address, and eloquence outwitted his judges and hitherto escaped. One may fancy what terror I had been thrown into by the words, 'Let us go and search among the dead bodies.' I saw nothing to do but resign myself to death. I wrote my last will, terminating it with the request that whoever found it in my pocket when dead would carry it to its address. Scarcely had I quitted the pen when there came into the corridor two other men in uniform; one of them, whose arm and coat-sleeve up to the very shoulder, as well as his sabre, were covered with blood, said, 'For these two hours I have been dispatching members right and left! I am more tired than a mason's labourer that has been beating plaster for two days!' I afterwards heard them talking about Rulhière. They promised themselves the pleasure of prolonging his torture, to make him pass slowly through all degrees of the cruelest sufferings; and they swore with frightful oaths that they would cut off the head of any man that thrust at him with the point of his sword, or that attempted to give him a coup de grace. The unhappy officer being delivered to them, they dragged him along crying 'Force à la loi!' then they stripped him almost naked, and began to beat him to death with the flats of their swords." We cannot translate what follows. It was half an hour before death relieved poor Rulhière from these fiends of hell.

* La Rulhière, who was presently massacred, was younger brother to Rulhière the historian, author of 'L'Anarchie de la Pologne' and other well-known works. He was a military man, and had commanded a part of the gendarmerie on the 10th of August. The immediate cause of his captivity was his conduct on that fatal day. He had endeavoured to make his men oppose the march of the mob on the Tuilleries, and, not succeeding in that, he had quitted his post, and his command. Chenaye, we believe, was a man of letters.

Maton de la Varenne continues: "It was three-quarters of an hour after this, that is to say, about four in the morning, when they came to seek Rulhière's comrade, la Chenaye. As his room was immediately under mine, and as the window was open, I heard the turnkey say to him as he was asking for his hat, 'Leave it where it is; you have no more need of it.' He walked out of his room—he underwent a sort of interrogatory—they pronounced the words à l'Abbaye, which meant massacre him; he passed out by the fatal wicket, and was massacred. He gave one cry of terror at sight of the heap of corpses, covered his eyes and face with his hands, and then fell dead upon the heap. Sixty years of virtues, which had ever been hereditary in his family, seemed to promise him a better end. After his death his murderers confessed that they had committed a mistake, having discovered that he was not guilty of any plot against liberty or the people. . . . An infinity of prisoners, such as René-François Gentilhomme, Staudé, called the German, André Roussey, the Abbé de la Gardette, Simonot, de Louze de la Neuville, Etienne Deroncières, were dragged one by one from my part of the prison to meet the same fate as La Chenaye. At every opening of the grate I expected to hear them call my name. I flung off my robe-de-chambre and my nightcap; I put on a coarse and very dirty shirt, an old frock-coat, without a waistcoat, and an old round hat: these things I had procured a day or two before, in the apprehension of what was going to happen. I imagined that, thus dressed, I should not be suspected of being one of those that were to be murdered. The disguise was not useless to me. About five o'clock in the morning they came to drag down the Abbés de Blinières and Bertrand. I know not the fate of the first of these ecclesiastics; but the second escaped, for I saw him more than a year after. At about half-past six they came back to the room where the two abbés had been lodged, to seize M. Guillaume, a notary-public, who, instead of opening the door at their summons, barred and barricaded it within. Then the men beat at the door, blasphemed horribly, called him a villain and an enemy to the nation, and went to seek a reinforcement. . . . At length he was obliged to open the door. He was seized. I was uncertain as to his fate for fifteen days; but then I learned that he had been saved. . . . By this time all the chambers on our corridor had been emptied except our own. We were four together, and seemed to have been forgotten: we addressed our prayers in common to the Eternal to deliver us from this peril. While we were in this situation, a thousand times more horrible than death, our turnkey (Baptiste) came to visit us by himself. I took him by the hands; I conjured him to save us, promising him a hundred golden louis if he would conduct me home or to the house of one of my relations. A noise proceeding from the grate made him withdraw precipitately. We heard the noise; we also saw from our windows, near to which we were lying flat on our bellies to escape being seen, twelve or fifteen men armed to the teeth and covered with blood, who were holding council in the garden below, and saying to one another, 'Let us go again up-stairs there—into all the chambers:—let not one remain—no' pity!' I took out my pen-knife; I considered where I should strike myself—but then I reflected that the blade was too short; and religion came to my aid. I encouraged my companions, and above all Gérard, to renounce the thought of suicide and rely upon Providence. Between seven and eight o'clock four men armed with bludgeons and sabres came to our room and told us that we must follow them. Gérard whispered earnestly, apart, with one of them, whose uniform appeared to be that of a gendarme. They both spoke very low, and made use of gestures, which made me suspect that Gérard was trying to save himself by sacrificing us. The conversation finished with these words, which Gérard pronounced aloud—'As you see, comrade, I was arrested only for having given a beating to an aristocrat.' The gendarme took Gérard under his protection. During their colloquy I searched everywhere for a pair of old shoes, that I might get rid of the advocate slippers (pantoufles de palais) I had on. But, forced to give up my search, I descended the stairs with my three companions. Constant, called le Sauvage, Gérard, and the third, whose name escapes my memory, were let off at once, without appearing at the dreadful bar. But four sabres were crossed over my breast, and I was led to the table before a person wearing a municipal scarf, who was sitting there as judge. He was a lame man, tall, and very thin. As I crossed the court to get at him, I saw it crowded with the égorgeurs (slaughterers or cut-throats), who were being harangued by Manuel, then procureur of the commune, afterwards deputy of the Convention, and last of all food for the guillotine, to which he was justly condemned on the 14th of November, 1794. Arrived at the bar, I was thus interrogated: 'What is your name? What is your quality? How long have you been here?' My answers were simple; 'My name is Pierre Anne Louis Maton de la Varenne; I am an old advocate; I have been detained here these eight days, without knowing why or wherefore; I hoped to have been liberated last Saturday; but public affairs have retarded it.' A fellow behind me said, 'Va! Mr. Fineskin, I am going to treat myself with a cup of your blood!' The soi-disant judge of the people gave over questioning me, in order to save time. He looked into the prison register, and then said, 'I can absolutely see nothing against him.' Then their faces brightened up, and there rose the cry of 'Vive la nation!' which was the signal of my deliverance."*

The National Assembly opened their debates at the usual hour this morning (the morning of Monday, the 3rd of September), and apparently without feeling any interest in the massacres that were going on. Roland, as minister of the interior, transmitted a letter he had received from Mayor Pétion, who coldly and lyingly affirmed that he knew nothing of the events of the night, until it was too late to apply any remedy! Brissot announced that Verdun was still holding out, and that the enemy had met with a repulse at Montmedy; and was honoured with loud applauses. A milliner came to present some trinkets for the service of the country, and to offer to mount guard in Paris as a soldier: her patriotic daughter, who came with her, presented a silver thimble and fifteen sous. The students of surgery came to offer their services either as soldiers or as surgeons, and to deposit on the altar of the country two or three thousand tenpenny pieces. A long letter was read from the Jacobinized commune of Troyes, in Champagne, reporting that everybody was armed or arming. A decree was issued for seizing and bringing instantly to Paris all the gold and silver and rich ornaments that might be found in the ci-devant royal palaces and in the houses of the emigrants. Letters were read from different commissaries who had been sent by the Assembly or by the commune to look after the recruiting and the levies in the departments. Not a word was said about the butcheries which were going on more actively than ever at some of the prisons, and no further allusion was made to them until Deputy Jouneau, who had been lying in the Abbaye for the beating he had given Grangeneuve, appeared at the bar, accompanied by ten or a dozen of the people who were serving as his escort. Jouneau was applauded, and invited to ascend the tribune. His escape from a horrible death was too recent, and the ground which he still stood upon too volcanic, to allow his language to be other than complimentary. Besides, the Assembly in the course of the preceding night had issued a decree to guarantee his life. "With your decree upon my breast," said Jouneau, "I have just come out of my prison in the midst of the acclamations of the people. These brave citizens here have accompanied me with the greatest good-will. Their zeal attests the respect which your decrees meet with everywhere." [If this was really the case, why did not the Assembly issue thousands of such life-saving decrees?] He was going to take his usual seat as a member of the House, when Montaut cried out that it was against the ordinary rules to permit a member against whom there was a decree of accusation to sit in the House; and that he ought to be "left under the sword of the law." Lacroix said, with more liberality and mercy, that M. Jouneau was not under a decree of accusation; that he had been under arrest only on account of a private quarrel and fight with one of his colleagues; and that this was so true, that, if M. Grangeneuve would give up his prosecution, M. Jouneau would be free to take his seat. "I demand, therefore," said he, "that the Assembly, considering that M. Jouneau could not, without risking his life, remain in the prison to which he was committed, do allow him to remain on parole in one of the committee-rooms of the Assembly." This delicate resolution was adopted. Then a letter was read from the council of the commune. It briefly said:—"The asylum of Louis XVI. is threatened. Resistance would be impolitic, dangerous, perhaps unjust. The harmony of the representatives of the people with the commissaries of the commune might guarantee the Temple. We demand that you please to name six of your members to act conjointly with us in calming the effervescence." [The most atrocious, the most immense and astounding of crimes was, in the language of Pétion's colleagues, only disorder or effervescence.] The Assembly instantly did as they were ordered, and named six deputies to act with the commune—Bazire, Chabot, Choudieu, Thuriot, Dussaulx, and Lacroix. Four of these six were disciples or admirers of Marat—were Jacobins of the very worst kind; and the remaining two, to say the least of them, were men impatient for a republic, and who were sure not to expose themselves to danger by counteracting their blood-thirsty colleagues, or by opposing the will and energy of the sovereign people. The individuals selected by the council-general of the commune to act with them in calming the effervescence were Robespierre, Manuel, and Deltroy.* Busi-

* We learn from Cléry what was passing in the Temple. "On the 2nd of September there were great tumults about the Temple. The king and the family having come down as usual to walk in the garden, a municipal officer that followed the king said to one of his associates, 'We were wrong in allowing them to walk this afternoon.' I had taken notice in the morning that the commissioners from the municipality were uneasy. They made the royal family return in a violent hurry, but they were scarcely assembled in the queen's chamber when two of the officers, who were not on duty at the tower, came in, one of whom, whose name was Mathieu, formerly a Capuchin, thus addressed the king:—'You are unacquainted, Sir, with what is passing. The country is in the greatest danger; the enemy have entered Champagne, and the King of Prussia is marching to Chalons. You will have to answer for all the mischief that may follow. We know that we, our wives, and children must perish, but the people shall be avenged. You shall be the first to ness was then suspended in order that the deputies might have time to dine;—for men dined in the midst of all these atrocities, sipped their coffee and their chasse-café while the streets of Paris were running with blood; and the graceful and gracious Madame Roland was giving her dinner-parties and displaying such wit as she had, and turning fine phrases in her hôtel du ministère all the while—at least she gave her usual five o'clock dinner to her husband's colleagues in office and the select members of the Gironde on this very day, the 3rd of September, entertaining, as we have seen, the madman Anacharsis Clootz, who then and there undertook to prove that the massacres in progress were indispensable and salutary. Yet this woman, who tells us these facts about the dinner, tells us also that the massacres were continuing; that they lasted at the Abbaye from Sunday afternoon till Tuesday morning; at la Force still longer; at Bicêtre four days, &c.

When the honourable deputies returned to their hall after their dinner, they talked about Verdun, and the beauty of dying for one's country, as the commandant and garrison of that place were said to have sworn to do rather than surrender; they die; however, there is yet time, and you may'—Here the king replied, that he had done everything for the people, and had nothing to reproach himself with. On which the same fellow, turning to M. Hué, said,—'The council of the commune have charged me to take you into custody.' 'Whom?' cried the king. 'Your valet de chambre,' was the reply. The king desired to know of what crime he was accused, but, not being able to obtain information, because the more uneasy for his fate, and recommended him, with great concern, to the two officers. Seals were put, in the presence of M. Hué, on the small room occupied by him, and he was taken away at six in the evening, after having been twenty days in the Temple. Mathieu, as he was going out, told me to take care how I conducted myself; 'For,' said he, 'it may be your turn next.' The king then called me to him, and gave me some papers, which he had received from M. Hué, containing accounts of expenses. The disturbed basis of the municipal officers, and the clamours of the populace in the neighbourhood of the tower, affected him exceedingly. After the king went to bed he desired me to sleep near him, and I placed my bed near his majesty's. On the 3rd of September his majesty, when I was dressing him, asked me if I had heard any news of M. Hué, and if I knew anything of the commotions in Paris. I told him that in the course of the night I had heard an officer say the people were going to the prisons; but I would try if I could learn anything more. 'Take care,' said his majesty, 'not to expose yourself, for we should then be left alone; and, indeed, I fear it is their intention to get strangers about us.' At eleven in the forenoon, the king having joined the family in the queen's chamber, a municipal officer desired me to go up to the king's, where I found Manuel and some members of the commune. Manuel asked me what the king had said of M. Hué's being taken away. I answered, that it had made his majesty very uneasy. 'He will come to no harm,' said he, 'but I am commanded to inform the king that he is not to return, but that the council will put a person in his place. You may go and break this to him.' I begged to be excused, adding, that the king desired to see him respecting several things of which the royal family stood in great need. Manuel could scarcely prevail upon himself to go down to the chamber where his majesty was. He communicated the order of the council of the commune, concerning M. Hué, and informed him that another person was to be sent. 'By no means,' replied the king, 'I will make use of my son's valet de chambre, and if the council object to that I will wait upon myself; I am resolved.' His majesty then mentioned that the family were in want of linen and other clothing. Manuel said he would go and make it known to the council, and retired. I asked him, as I conducted him out, if the tumults continued, and his answers excited my apprehensions that the populace might visit the Temple. 'You have undertaken a perilous service,' added he, 'and I advise you to prepare all your courage.'—Journal of Occurrences at the Temple during the Confinement of Louis XVI.

We believe honest Cléry to have been in every part of his narrative minutely and most scrupulously correct. In looking into the reports of the proceedings of the commune, this morning, we find this passage:—"The commissaries of the council on service at the Temple transmit a note of different articles which Monsieur Capet demands. Adjourned till to-morrow." They had begun to call Louis XVI. by no other name than Monsieur Capet, taking that for his family name, which it was not, any more than Plantagenet, or Tudor, or Stuart is the name of our Queen Victoria.

received deputations of actors and actresses, school-boys and dames de la Halle, who came to offer livres and assignats, and other patriotic gifts of infinitesimal value, and to make interminable speeches, all tuned to the same key. At a late hour in the evening ministers Servan and Roland came to the bar of the House. It was the painful duty of Servan, as minister of war, to announce that, in spite of all the swearing, Verdun had surrendered to the Prussians. He also begged to submit to the consideration of the Assembly a few observations on the state of France and of Paris. Yet, true to the connivance or to the dastardly character of his party, Servan expressed no indignation at the horrors which had been committed, or the horrors which were still in progress. "The enemies of France," said he, "have never counted on their armies for subjugating a great people, but on the internal disorders of this empire. Shall their hopes be realised? It is said that private animosities are kindling—that the men who signed certain petitions are proscribed: the most alarming and most contradictory ideas are circulating. It is said in the departments near the frontiers that one would give France a king in the person of the Duke of York, and that it is the people of Paris who entertain this project. In Paris, it is insinuated that the National Assembly wishes to re-establish Louis XVI. on the throne." All the propositions he had to offer were, that the Assembly should make an address to the people to disabuse them; that the House should sit complete (the majority of the House had been scared away) all through the night; that it should demand an account of the situation of Paris, and put the national guards under arms. These propositions were referred to the extraordinary committee; and after a time Gensonné, in the name of the committee, presented a project of decree in eight articles. In a very wordy considerando, Gensonné or the committee spoke somewhat more clearly as to the effect of the fury of proscription and the resistance to the laws and the Assembly; but still there was no indignant burst against the cruelty of the sovereign people. The execration of all France and all posterity was held up to the people, not on account of their butcheries, but only hypothetically, in case they should continue to resist the authority of the Assembly, which "had always merited an entire confidence"—"which was the only authority that free men could possibly recognise." Any one coming upon this legislative act by itself, and not looking at the date, would never suspect that anything very extraordinary was doing in Paris—could never fancy that it had reference to anything more serious than some popular excitement produced by a few malicious men. As for the eight articles of the decree, they were worth next to nothing: they charged the municipality, the general council of the commune, and the commandant Santerre, who among them had organised the massacres, to give the necessary orders for causing the persons and properties of citizens to be respected; they called upon Mayor Pétion to give a daily account of the state of Paris; they recommended more oath-taking; they called upon the municipality, the council-general of the commune, the presidents of the sections, the commandant of the national guards, &c., to come to the bar, and swear individually to maintain liberty and equality, security of persons and property, and to die, if necessary, for the execution of the law; they ordered the president of each section to administer the same oath to all the citizens of his section; they called upon all the constituted authorities in France to take the same oath, and to administer it to the people; they ordered that the present decree should be solemnly proclaimed in every one of the forty-eight sections of Paris by forty-eight members of their own House—and this was all. They, however, afterwards agreed on a proclamation to the people, which was to be read to sound of trumpet, &c.; and in this paper they conjured the citizens, "in the name of the country, of humanity, of liberty, to dread the men that were inviting discord and provoking them to excess." But it was late in the evening of the 3rd before this proclamation was drawn up, although, from morning till noon, from noon till night, the égorgeurs, with short intervals for rest, continued their work. Roland, who had accompanied Servan to the bar, did not speak, but he handed in a long-winded, pragmatical, pedantic letter, full of generalities, commonplace axioms, and self-laudation. Madame, his wife, applauds his wondrous courage in being the first to raise his voice against the massacres. Yet how did virtuous Roland speak of these multitudinous and gigantic abominations? Why, he mingled praise with his blame, and, in most gently condemning what had happened, half hinted at the usefulness of the popular fury; and he openly and directly eulogised the 10th of August, which threw both the throne and the Assembly under the feet of a rabid democracy, and which led directly to these very massacres. "The wrath of the people," said this self-sufficient, cold-blooded formalist, in this letter to the Assembly, "the wrath of the people and the movement of the insurrection are to be compared to the action of a torrent which sweeps away obstacles which no other power could remove, but the over-flooding and rush of which spreads ravage and devastation, unless it return very soon into its bed. Without the day of the 10th of August [a day rendered, by the massacre of the Swiss, as atrocious as any single day of blood that followed it], it is quite evident that we were all lost; the court, fully prepared long before, was only waiting the moment to fill up its treasons, to spread over Paris the flag of death, and to reign by terror! The feeling of the people, always just and prompt when their opinions are not corrupted, anticipated the moment marked for their ruin, and rendered it fatal to the conspirators! It is in the nature of things, and in the nature of the human heart, that victory should bring with it some excesses: the sea, agitated by a violent storm, continues to roll and roar for a long time after the tempest is over; but all things have their limits." Could Danton, could Robespierre at any time, could Marat himself have spoken of blood and horror with more coolness than this? In another part of his letter, virtuous Roland said, "Yesterday was a day on the events of which we ought perhaps to throw a veil. I know that the people, terrible in their vengeance, yet observe a sort of justice: they do not take for their victim every man that is presented to their fury; they direct their fury against those whom they believe to have been too long spared by the sword of the law, and whom the perilous circumstances of the times persuade them to immolate without delay. But I know that it is easy for scoundrels, for some traitors, to bring about an abuse of this effervescence, and I, therefore, know that it ought to be stopped. I know that we owe to all France the solemn declaration, that the executive power has been able neither to foresee nor to prevent these excesses; I know that it is the duty of the constituted authorities to put an end to them, or consider themselves annihilated. I also know that this declaration exposes me to the rage of some agitators: well, then, let them take my life; I only wish to preserve it for liberty and equality, &c." He eulogised the gentleness and docility of the French people, and said he was quite sure that if they were only properly informed, and placed "on a level with the circumstances of the times," all would go well until the meeting of the Convention, which was close at hand, and which could not fail of securing tranquillity and happiness under the best of institutions. His letter, the reading of which was several times interrupted by applause, was ordered to be printed, placarded in the streets of Paris, and sent to the departments.* Shortly after this a deputation from the commune assured the House that Paris was perfectly tranquil, parfaitement tranquille. And at eleven o'clock at night, when massacres were going on at the Abbaye, at La Force, at Bicêtre, and at other public prisons and private houses, this assembly of villains and cowards suspended business. The council-general of the commune passed the whole day in issuing decrees, which had far more weight and force than those of the Assembly, but not one

* Hist. Parlement.—This is the letter of which Madame Roland, who probably wrote the whole or the greater part of it herself, speaks, in a rhapsody, as a paper replete with justice, wisdom, and the most heroic courage!

"We agreed," says she, "that there was nothing for a minister, who was an honest man, to do, but to denounce these abominable crimes with the greatest force, to interest the Assembly to stop them, to raise against them the indignation of all virtuous men, to wash his own hands of the foul dishonour, to expose himself, if needful, to the daggers of the assassins, to escape the guilt and the shame of being in any manner an accomplice. It is quite certain, said I to my husband, that resolutions of courage are as suitable to self-preservation as to justice; audacity is only put down by firmness; if the denunciation of these excesses were not a duty, it would be an act of prudence: the people who are committing these crimes must hate you, for you have made efforts to hinder them—[At this time this was false; Roland had made no efforts whatever]—there is nothing for you to do but to make them fear you, and to impose upon them by their fears—il ne vous reste qu'à vous faire craindre et à leur en imposer. Roland, therefore, sent to the Assembly this letter of the 3rd of September, which became as famous as the letter which he had addressed to the king."—Mémoires.

of which had really for its object the putting an end to the carnage. They committed several new victims to the Abbaye, where a horrible death was inevitable. Among these unfortunate men was Duplain, a printer and journalist, who was accused of having written some anti-civic articles. They listened complacently to a deputation from one of the sections, who proposed that all the aristocrats should be put to death before any of the patriots should march against the Prussians. They issued a series of decrees which had been arranged with Mayor Pétion on the preceding day, ordering, among other things, that the leaden coffins of the dead should be taken up and cast into ball; that the churches should be turned into workshops for making tents, &c. Late in the night, "sensibly alarmed and touched by the rigorous measures the people are employing against the prisoners," the council-general named another deputation or committee of six (six of the worst cut-throats that appertained to the commune) to calm the effervescence; and they providently agreed that these six should be accompanied by two gendarmes on horseback, and that they might call out the armed force if they thought it needful.

It was on the morning of this day, the 3rd of September, and while the Assembly and the council of the commune were both sitting, that one of the most damnable of all the murders—that of the Princess de Lamballe—was committed. This lady, a foreigner of royal blood, descended from the ancient house of Savoy, had come into France at an early age to be married to the Prince de Lamballe, a branch of the House of Bourbon-Penthievre. Marie Antoinette had become greatly attached to her, and had lived with her for many years as an equal and a sister. Hence, when that torrent of obscene slander and libel began, which preceded the revolution, the name of the princess was always coupled with that of the queen, and she was charged with nearly every vice and turpitude that is to be found in Juvenal's sixth satire. At the time when the reign of liberty began, the princess was a widow, and superintendent of the queen's household. She was and ever had been gentle in her manners, generous in her actions, graceful and kind-hearted to all people, and, though in her fortieth year, her face and form were eminently beautiful. She had never interfered in any business in court or cabinet, except to procure pardons for offences, or promotions and favours for others; but all these things weighed lighter than a feather in the balance against the foul imputations which had been cast upon her for years, and the fact of her being the friend and confidante of the defamed queen, next to whom she was the most hated woman in all France. Her life had been repeatedly threatened—had at one time, when the court was brought from Versailles to be imprisoned in the Tuileries, been threatened daily—and the poissardes, the dames de la Halle, and the other furies who had been wont to sit "knitting i' the sun" under the walls of the palace and in the Tuileries gardens, had often sung in her hearing songs which expressed the happiness they should feel in carrying her bowels on their pike-heads, along with those of the Austrian woman. At the time of the flight to Varennes, the princess got safely out of this Pandemonium; she was living in security and honour in England when the king accepted the constitution, and when her generous affection and devotion to the queen induced her to return to Paris. We have seen how she followed her royal mistress to the dungeons of the Temple, and how barbarously she was torn from her at the end of a few days, to be sent alone to the prison of la Force. She was there when the massacres began on Sunday afternoon; she was there when Maton de la Varenne obtained his release, and thought the massacres were over on this Monday morning; and, about an hour after Maton had obtained his deliverance, her chamber door was burst open, and she was told that she must go to the Abbaye. She said she did not wish to be removed; that she was as well at la Force as she could be at the Abbaye, or in any other better prison. A national guardsman approached her bedside—for she was lying on her bed, though not to sleep—and told her that she must go; that her life depended on her obedience. Having with difficulty obtained permission to be left alone for a minute, she rose from the bed and arranged her dress. When the ruffians went in with their infernal “Allons, marchons,” and when she saw the blood upon their faces and their hands, she almost sank to the earth or into it; but two men supported her, and leaning upon them she walked or was dragged down to the terrible table. There more blood and clearer evidences of the executions of the night met her eye, and she could hear the exclamations and cries of the slaughterers outside the gates. She swooned away. When she recovered her senses the lame thin monster that had examined Maton, or some other monster that had succeeded him as chief of the popular tribunal—for these presidents, it appears, were frequently changed—put the usual questions to her, beginning with, “Who are you?” “Maria Louisa, Princess of Savoy-Carignan,” replied the royal lady. “What is your employment?” “Superintendent of the queen’s house.” “Have you knowledge of the plots of the court on the 10th of August?” “I know not whether there were any plots on the 10th of August; but I know that I have not the slightest knowledge of any.” “Swear to love liberty and equality, and to hate the king, the queen, and all royalty!” “I will readily take the first oath, but I cannot take the last; it is not in my heart.” Here a man, standing near, whispered, “Take it, take it! If you do not swear, you are dead!” The high-minded woman replied not, and made one step towards the death-wicket. The president pronounced the words, “Let Madame go out!”* Then two men took her by the arms, and the wicket was thrown open. Some who are anxious to reduce the amount of atrocity, and to make it be believed—what is altogether incredible—that there was really an intention on the part of many present to save her life—say that she was advised to cry out, “Vive la nation!” and that it was the men who led her out that gave her this advice; and they add that instead of pronouncing these words she cried, “Pi, l’horreur!” or “Je suis perdue!” (I am lost). The most natural supposition is, that at sight of the mound of corpses she shrieked and fainted. All agree in relating that she had scarcely crossed the threshold of the prison ere she received a blow on the head from a sabre which made her blood spout; that the blow was presently repeated; that she fell dead among the heaps of dead, and that then the people (horrible to be told!) women mixed with men, stripped her beautiful body stark naked, cut off her head, and committed other mutilations and acts which none but a French pen would dare describe—which cause the pen to drop from one’s hand in thinking of them. They stuck her head, her heart, her limbs, and other parts of her body upon pikes, and singing and dancing they promenaded them through Paris. When they had done their worst there was a worse behind—when all that they could do to the remains of a beautiful, noble-hearted woman could only damn them to eternal fame without hurting her, an accursed villain cried out, “We must carry her to the foot of the throne; Allons, au Temple!” and to the Temple they ran with their horrible shrieks and hell songs, rounded off from time to time with the “Ça ira,” “Vive la nation,” “Vive la liberté,” and the Marseillaise hymn, the only hymn now sung in revolutionised France. Cléry shall inform the reader of what took place at the Temple—we cannot trust our own feelings:—

“It was one o’clock. The king and his family had expressed a desire to walk in the garden, but had been refused. While they were dining, drums were heard, and, soon after, the cries of the populace. The royal family rose from table with great uneasiness and assembled in the queen’s chamber. I went down to dine with Tison and his wife, who were employed for the service of the Tower. We were scarcely seated when a head, on the point of a pike, was held up to our window. Tison’s wife gave a violent scream, which the murderers supposed to have proceeded from the queen, and we heard the savages laughing immoderately at it. Imagining that her majesty was there at dinner, they placed their victim in such a manner that they thought it could not have escaped her sight. The head was the head of the Princess de Lamballe, which, though bleeding, was not disfigured; and her fine light hair, still curling, waved round the pike. I ran instantly to the king. My countenance was so altered by terror that it was remarked by the queen, from whom it was ne-that this examination was collected by the family of the princess from the mouth of an ear-witness.

* Peltier, Histoire de la Révolution du 10 Août.—Peltier declares cessary to hide the cause. I wished to speak to the king only, or to Madame Elizabeth, but two commissioners of the municipality were present. 'Why do you not go and dine?' said the queen. I replied that I was not well. At that moment another municipal officer, entering the tower, came and spoke to his associates with an air of mystery. On the king's asking whether his family were in safety, one of the municipals answered—'It has been reported that you and your family are gone from the Temple, and the people are calling for you to appear at the window; but we shall not suffer it, for they ought to show more confidence in their magistrates.' In the mean time the clamour without increased, and horrible insults, addressed to the queen, were distinctly heard; when another municipal officer came in, followed by four men, deputed by the populace to ascertain whether the royal family were or were not in the tower. One of them, dressed in the uniform of the national guards, with two epaulettes, and a huge sabre in his hand, insisted that the prisoners should show themselves at the windows, but the municipal officers would not allow it; upon which the fellow said to the queen, 'They want to keep you from seeing Lamballe's head, which has been brought you, that you may know how the people avenge themselves upon their tyrants! I advise you to show yourself at the window, if you would not have them come up here.' At these words the queen fainted away. I flew to support her, and Madame Elizabeth assisted me in placing her upon a chair, while her two children, melting into tears, endeavoured by their caresses to bring her to herself. The wretch kept looking on. The king with a firm voice said to him, 'Sir, we are prepared for everything; but you might have dispensed with relating this horrible event to the queen.' Their purpose being accomplished, the monster went away with his companions. The queen, coming to herself, mingled her tears with the tears of her children; and all the family removed to Madame Elizabeth's chamber, where the noises of the mob were less heard. I remained a short time in the queen's room, and on looking out at the window, through the blinds, I again saw the Princess de Lamballe's head. The man that carried it was mounted upon the ruins of some houses which had been ordered to be pulled down for the purpose of insulating the Temple: another person stood behind him holding the heart of the princess on the point of a sabre. The crowd, being still inclined to force the gates, were harangued by a municipal officer, named Daujon; and I very distinctly heard him say—'The head of Antoinette does not belong to you; the departments have their respective rights to it. France has confided these great culprits to the care of the city of Paris; and it is your part to assist in securing them, until the national justice shall take vengeance for the people.' He was more than an hour debating with them before he could get them away. In the evening one of the municipal officers told me that the mob had attempted to rush in with their four deputies, and to carry into the tower the body of the princess, naked and bloody as it had been dragged from the prison of la Force to the Temple: that some municipals, after struggling with them, had hung a tri-colored riband across the principal gate as a bar against them; that the commune of Paris, General Santerre, and the National Assembly, had all been called upon in vain for assistance to put a stop to designs which no pains had been taken to conceal; and that, for six hours, it had really been very doubtful whether the royal family would be massacred or not. In truth, it appears that the faction was not yet sufficiently powerful: the chiefs, although they were unanimous as to the regicide, were not so as to the means of perpetrating it; and the Assembly were perhaps willing that any other hands but theirs should be the instruments of the conspirators. It struck me as a remarkable circumstance, that the municipal officer, after giving me this account, made me pay him five-and-forty sous, as the price of the tri-colored riband which they had hung before the gate. At eight in the evening all was calm in the neighbourhood of the Temple; but the same tranquillity was far from reigning throughout Paris, where the massacres were continued."

In the course of this day Tallien and another member of the commune are reported to have said that, including the departments, these massacres must last thirty days! It was on the evening of this day, and also while the Assembly and the commune were sitting, that the most frightful carnage took place at the Bicêtre. That building, which served the double purpose of a prison and a madhouse, a Newgate and a Bedlam, was crammed full to choking with maniacs and insane persons, with political prisoners, and with all manner of prisoners: it was the receptacle of innocence and crime, of madness in all its gradations, of disease, misery, and woe. Even as Giraud, the commissary of the commune, had reported to the Assembly on the Sunday night, the mob attacked this place with artillery. The keeper, who appears to have been the only one of his class that attempted any resistance, not only refused to open his gates, but pointed two pieces of cannon against the multitude. He had the match in his hand, but before he could fire he fell mortally wounded. The assailants then burst open the gates and forced an entrance with cannon-ball; and then occurred a scene which we believe to be unequalled in the annals of the world. The lunatics rushed from their cells, the doors of which were thrown open by the keepers, with horrible shrieks; some fell upon the égorgeurs and fought them with the links of their chains and fetters; some tore down parts of the building to furnish themselves with stones and clubs and iron bars. In many cases it is said the maniacs recovered a momentary possession of their reason, were fully sensible of the nature of the attack, and adopted the very best means of defence that were possible: others grew madder than ever, and laughed and grinned horribly, yelled and shrieked, rushing on the pikes and sabres, clutching their assailants by the throat, biting them with their teeth, and not all dying without dealing death or terrible wounds on their assailants. Others again, in the idiotic state, sat down moping in corners, or gazed on the bloody affray with wide, vacant, unmeaning eyes—incapable of being roused even by the roar of cannon and the immediate presence of death. So great were the numbers confined in Bicêtre, and so fierce and terrible were a part of the inmates, that the égorgeurs sustained some considerable loss, and would have been repulsed and defeated altogether if it had not been for their artillery, which they loaded with grape-shot. While the unprecedented combat was lasting, a member of the council of the commune demanded in form an armed force from the Hôtel de Ville to reduce the prisoners, who, he said, were daringly resisting the justice of the people. The massacre, which began here on Sunday night, did not end until Wednesday morning, when an immense number of victims had perished, and when there remained no more to be slain. Lunatics, idiots, felons, persons confined for misdemeanours, political prisoners, were all butchered together. “The thirst for blood,” says Thiers, for once speaking truth and speaking out, “animated the multitude; the fury of fighting and massacring had succeeded to their political fanaticism, and they were now killing for the sake of killing.” At the Grand-Châtelet, where there were no political prisoners at all, every man, every woman, that was found was murdered in cold blood; the total number amounted to some hundreds. At the Châtelet, where there were some priests and aristocrats, a few were saved, but about two hundred perished. At the Salpêtrière, a prison reserved for women of bad life, every one was murdered with circumstances of beastliness and atrocity. The number of women in the place was forty-five. At the Conciergerie there were, among other prisoners, all the Swiss officers (with two or three exceptions) who had escaped the massacre of the 10th of August, and who had been promised the protection of the Assembly: they were all butchered except Count d’Affry, their colonel, who was let off, on account of his great age say some, but rather, as we presume, on account of the not very honourable part he had played at the time of the flight to Varennes, when he was among the first, or the very first, to swear that he would serve the National Assembly against the king.* Altogether the Conciergerie was nearly as much crowded as Bicêtre when the massacres began. All the hellish ingenuity of the mob in tormenting and in degrading the human species was exhausted upon a woman confined here—a seller of bouquets in the Palais-Royal, who in a fit of jealousy had mutilated her lover, a grenadier of the ex-Gardes-Françaises, and as such a patriot of the first order. In the cloisters of the Bernardins there were some sixty or seventy criminals who had been condemned to the galleys: they were all butchered. In the ancient college of Bons Enfants there were a great many ecclesiastics who had chiefly been swept in during the last domiciliary visits, and who were now all swept out and butchered to a man. In other places of confinement scarcely one in twenty escaped. After the first fury the égorgeurs proceeded with their bloody work in a cool methodical manner. Their wives and women were seen carrying them their dinners to the Abbaye while they were engaged in hacking and stabbing. “Où allez vous? where are you going?” “To our men who are working at the Abbaye,” said these Parisiennes. Others were heard crying “Wine! wine! du vin pour nos braves égorgeurs—wine for our brave slaughterers, who are finishing the enemies of the people!”

It was in the course of this dismal Monday—the 3rd of September—that one of the committees of the commune, which had now assumed the name of Comité de Salut Public (of Public Health or Salvation), publicly issued, and sent to the municipalities in the provinces, the most horrible of letters, in which they not only justified all that had been done or was doing in Paris, but also invited the people in the departments to follow the good example which had been set them. This letter was regularly and officially signed—“Pierre Duplain, Paris, Sergent, Lenfant, Jourdeuil, Marat (the friend of the people), Deforgues, Leclerc, Dufort, Cally, constituted by the commune, and sitting in the mayor’s house.” The letter began:—“Friends and brothers, a frightful plot woven by the court to massacre (égorger) all the patriots of the French empire—a plot in which a great number of the members of the National Assembly are found to be implicated—having reduced, on the 9th of last month, the commune of Paris to the cruel necessity of seizing the power of the people to save the nation, it neglected nothing to merit well of the country; witness the honourable testimony which the National Assembly itself has given of its conduct. Could any one have thought it! From that moment new plots, not less atrocious, were laid in silence and secrecy; they broke out at the very moment when the National Assembly, forgetting it had just declared that the commune of Paris had saved the country, was hastening to dissolve it, as the reward of its burning civism. At this news, public clamours were raised on every side, and these cries made the National Assembly feel the urgent necessity of uniting with the people, and of restoring to the commune all the powers with which it had been invested.” After describing the pride the commune felt in enjoying this plenitude of power and confidence, &c., the circular continued:—“Sincerely professing the principles of the most perfect equality, being ambitious of no other privilege than that of being the first to mount the breach, the commune of Paris will hurry to put itself upon a level with the smallest commune in the state, the very instant that the country has nothing more to fear from the clouds of ferocious satellites that are now advancing upon the capital. The commune of Paris hastens to inform its friends and brothers in all the departments, that a part of the ferocious conspirators detained in the prisons have been put to death by the people; acts of justice which have appeared indispensable, in order to restrain by terror (pour retenir par la terreur) those legions of traitors concealed within their walls, at a moment when they were going to march to meet the enemy; and, without doubt, the whole nation, after the long series of treasons and treacheries which have conducted it to the brink of ruin, will make haste to adopt this so necessary means of public salvation, and all the French will cry, like the Parisians, 'We are going to march against the enemy; but we will not leave behind us brigands to massacre our children and our women!'" It was added in a postscript: "N.B. Our brothers are invited to print this letter, and to transmit it to all the municipalities of their arrondissemens." We cannot discover that the National Assembly took any notice of this monstrous address, which must have been perfectly well known to them, and which proposed nothing less than a universal massacre—a butchery in every town, city, and hamlet in France. No doubt such of the deputies as did not approve of it as salutary advice, were too much scared and terrified for their own worthless lives to think of entering into any contest with the omnipotent commune.

In the course of the same busy day—the 3rd—some commissaries of the commune proceeded to the house or lodgings of Brissot, and seized and examined all his papers. The said commissaries, however, reported that, after making a most careful search, and after examining him, they had found "absolutely nothing that seemed contrary to the interest of the public good;" and that therefore they had left the said sieur Brissot all his papers, &c. A report was spread that eight orders of arrest had at first (on the evening of the 2nd) been issued against the Girondists by the committee of research and surveillance of the commune, and that these were afterwards converted into mere orders to search their houses and examine their papers: but it appears there is no proof of this beyond the visit paid by the municipals to Brissot, the personal enemy of Robespierre, the hated of all the ultra-Jacobins. "However this may be," say the editors of the 'Histoire Parlementaire,' who tell us they have carefully examined all manner of documents, "this bold attempt against Brissot awoke the Girondist ministers; and on the next day, the 4th, Roland wrote a very sharp letter to Santerre." We can very easily credit that more than one of the dastardly and imbecile Girondists were really in danger during the massacres, from the scorn and hatred with which the people regarded them, and from the effect of Marat's long-continued predications against them; we can believe still more easily that not only eight of them, but that all of them may have trembled for their lives, and fancied that their names were down in the lists of proscription; but what we cannot so easily credit is, that there was really any fixed determination on the part of the commune which directed the massacres to cut them off or to get them cut off. It was not a moment when such designs were let sleep. If there was such a design, what was there to prevent its execution? Madame Roland tells a not very clear story about a visit paid to her house on the Sunday afternoon at five o'clock, (just as the mob were beginning to invest the prisons,) by some two hundred men, who demanded arms, who wanted to see her husband, and who called him and all the ministers a set of infamous traitors; and she insinuates that, if Roland had not fortunately been absent at the time at the hôtel of the minister of marine, he must have been murdered; but, if the virtuous citizen and minister of the interior was absent from his home that time, he was not absent on the morrow, when he gave a dinner party and dispensed his hospitality to Anacharsis Clootz, and when the égorgeurs were continuing their devourings, with appetite increased by the blood it fed on. There could then have been no difficulty in finding Roland; and in the course of the day two or three of the Girondist ministers were at the bar of the House, while Gensonné and others of their orators were sitting in their seats, and went to and came from the Assembly. Roland did indeed try to conceal his whereabouts, quitting his stately official residence every night to hide himself in friends' houses, and never sleeping two nights in the same house; but this was a good many weeks later, when his party had thrown down the gauntlet to the ultra-Jacobins in the Convention, when all the Girondists, by attempting to bring Robespierre to the guillotine, had left that abler and scarcely worse man no alternative but to cut them off or be cut off by them. On the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th of September, a hint from Robespierre or Marat, a word from the commune, would assuredly have sent these Gironde chiefs to a certain death—would have sent their mutilated bodies to be piled with the corpses of those whom, first by their republican zeal, folly, short-sightedness, and madness, and then by their cowardice and selfishness, they had helped to consign to bloody graves. And, as has been properly observed, by an English writer who feels these things as Englishmen ought to feel them:—"Happier would it have been for them, both in their persons and reputation, if they had then died, instead of basely living, as they did, to palliate and excuse these atrocities, and to fall within a few months, by a variety of lingering deaths, the dishonoured victims of the same assassins whom they had at first flattered and screened."* On the next day—the 4th—Brissot complained in his newspaper, 'Le Patriote Français,' of the treatment he had received; but complained gently, as a man does that fears and trembles; and as a safeguard he inserted the procès verbal of the lawless committee of the commune, which declared that nothing was found in his papers against him. Brissot also said in this article, that he, together with a part of the deputies of the Gironde, and with other men as virtuous as they, had been denounced to the commune—had been accused of plotting to deliver up France to the Duke of Brunswick, of having received millions of livres, and of having taken measures for escaping into England. He thundered out protestations of republicanism, called himself the eternal enemy of all kings, complained of the cruelty of his enemies in denouncing him at a moment when the people were greatly excited, and were killing in the prisons; but neither now nor later did Brissot venture to give any details of the massacres, or to express any indignation at them. The other journalists were at the least as cautious as he. The royalist papers, the constitutional-monarchy papers, had all been prohibited and suppressed, as things incompatible with liberty—the first exercise of French liberty ever being to persecute and annihilate all opinions but its own, and to allow no voice, to allow not even the melancholy privilege of complaint, to the minority or defeated party. The Girondist newspapers, such as Gorsas's 'Courrier des Départemens,' the 'Annales Patriotiques,' &c., the official or ministerial paper, the 'Moniteur,' never spoke of the massacres until they were over, and during the four days that they lasted these journals seemed wholly absorbed by what was passing on the frontiers, and altogether indifferent to what was doing in the capital. Afterwards they promised from day to day to give details, which were never given; but when all was over Gorsas coolly said that it was quite clear that there was no other alternative than that the traitors should perish by the hands of the people, or the people perish by the hands of the traitors! (that is to say, by the hands of helpless men cooped up in prisons). He called the events that had passed nothing but the exercise of the terrible but necessary justice of the people! As for the ultra-Jacobin journalists, like Prudhomme, they harked on the égorgeurs while they were at their work, and they applauded them when they had done it. Prudhomme the socialist, Prudhomme the perfectibilian and disciple of Fauchet, who had undertaken to establish truth and universal love and peace upon earth, rapturously applauded everything, justified everything, even to the massacre of the Princess de Lamballe, and "the indignities committed on her dead body."*

* "Yes," wrote the printer, "the people had but too many reasons for giving themselves up to that fury against Madame Lamballe! The 'Bulletin de Guerre' (another lying newspaper) has informed the people that the Austrians and Prussians cut off the ears of every French municipal officer they can catch and nail his ears pitilessly on the top of his head. . . . The people know very well that in several great houses in Paris there are aristocrats that kill their time with little guillotines made of mahogany; these guillotines are put upon the table with the dessert: they make pass successively under them many puppets whose heads, made in the resemblance of our best magistrates and representatives, in falling, let flow from the bodies (which are bottles) a liquor red like blood. All those present, the women above all, hasten to dip their handkerchiefs in this blood, which is found to be a scented water very agreeable to the nose. . . .

He praised the justice and severity of the people, and the expeditious processes of the sans-culotte tribunals established at each of the prisons. "The people," exclaimed he, "are humane, but the people are incapable of weakness! Everywhere where they smell crime they throw themselves upon it without regard for the age, the sex, or condition of the criminal. . . . Oh, judges! all the blood shed on the 2nd and 3rd of September must fall upon your heads. It was your criminal delays that carried the people to extremities, for which you alone ought to be answerable. The people, because their patience was worn out, snatched the sword of justice from your hands and executed your function! Oh, judges! be admonished! Seek henceforward to do what is right, and no longer despise the people!" He extolled to the skies the clemency of the Parisians in not exterminating some Swiss who had thrown down their arms or deserted from the Tuileries on the 10th of August, and who had been lodged under the safeguard of the nation in the Palais-Bourbon. He said that some people of the neighbourhood, anxious to take part in the great act of justice performing in Paris, went straight to the Palais-Bourbon, seized those Swiss, carried them under a good escort to the Abbaye; that the people of Paris, although the view of those Swiss recalled the memory of the horrible massacres which they had committed at the Tuileries on the 10th of August, remembered also that those same Swiss had not fired upon the people, and nobly conducted them to the Hôtel de Ville, where the said Swiss took the oaths, enrolled themselves, and were incorporated in different regiments about to march for the frontiers. He called the horrors committed at Bicêtre a purification, and praised the order observed in the massacres. He denied—though the fact must have been known to all Paris—that the égorgeurs had massacred the lunatics, the sick, and the poor debtors confined there. "Many citizens," said he, "whose misery condemned them to that place of captivity, ran no danger whatever; but all the rest fell under the sabres, pikes, and clubs of the Hercules-people (peuple-Hercule), who were only cleansing the Augæan stable of the king. There were a great many killed there." Next to the Jacobin clubs and their affiliations, these revolutionary journalists (who were, however, all leading members of the clubs or in the affiliated societies, and therefore entitled to a share of that pre-eminence in guilt) contributed most directly and most largely to this carnival of blood. The tales they told, and had so long been telling, the logic they used to keep up the popular fury, were loose, vague, ridiculous, more incredible than ogre-tales made use of to terrify naughty children, more visionary than any fairy or nursery tales: they were things that, even under the same circumstances in which the French were placed, would have excited the laughter or the contempt of any other people in Europe—would have failed to dupe for a moment the most ignorant, credulous, and superstitious of people; but the French had made an anomalous mixture of the two extremes of incredulity and credulity: they could not and would not believe in gospels, or prophets, or traditions—they could not believe in any revealed or natural religion—they could not believe in a God—they could not believe in anything less demonstrable to the senses than the truths that blood is red and iron heavy and hard; but they could believe in whatever a sans-culottized newsmonger would tell them in print—they could swallow the most monstrous lies, if invented by a printer's devil or a devil of a printer; and in this most miserable, most false, and contradictory state of mind, there was nothing too horrible to be credited by them, and nothing too monstrous to be expected from them. Such were these modern Athenians; and, as their fears are removed by their victories and the miscalculations and blunders of their adversaries, as atheism becomes legalized and codified, we shall find their credulity taking the boldest flights in other directions, and rivalling the faith of the alchymist and the hunters after the philosopher's stone.

. . . . The people have promenade the head of Lamballe round the Temple; and, perhaps, but for a barrier of tri-color riband, placed there by Pétion and Manuel, the people would have carried that head into the dining-room of the Ogre and his family. Nothing can be more natural and more reasonable than all this. The salutary warning may perhaps produce some good effects."—Révolutions de Paris.

At an early hour on the morning of the 4th, Journiac de St. Méard, after what he properly calls an agony of thirty-eight hours, escaped out of the jaws of death, chiefly, it should seem, through his interesting one of the federates, a man from his native province of Provence, by speaking with him in the now, degraded tongue of the Troubadours. But Journiac spoke also boldly before the blood-stained table and the tribunal at the Abbaye, and this, too, may have done him good service. "By the glare of two torches," says he, "I descried the terrible tribunal which was going to give me life or death. The president, in grey coat, with a sabre at his side, stood leaning against a table, on which were papers, an inkstand, tobacco-pipes, and bottles.* The table was surrounded by ten men, seated or standing. Two of them wore jackets and aprons. Some other men were sleeping, stretched upon benches. Two men, in bloody shirts and with swords in their hands, guarded the fatal wicket; and an old turnkey had his hand on the lock, ready to draw the bolt as notice should be given. In front of the president three men held a prisoner, who seemed to be above sixty years old, but whose face was unknown to me. They placed me in a corner, and my guards crossed their sabres on my breast, warning me that if I made any resistance, or attempted to escape, they would stab me. I was looking for my Provençal federate, when I saw two national guards present to the president an appeal from the section of Croix-Rouge in favour of the old prisoner, who was standing opposite to him. The president said, 'These appeals are useless for traitors.' Then the prisoner exclaimed, 'This is horrible! Your sentence is a murder.' The president merely replied, 'I wash my hands of it. Lead out M. Maille.' It was the brave old marshal, who had stood by the king to the last—who had descended to the gardens with Louis on the morning of the fatal

10th to pass the troops in review. He had been wounded that day at the Tuileries, had managed to escape and conceal himself; but a surgeon, who had long been employed by him, and in whom he placed an entire confidence, had denounced him to the commune, and he had been seized in his hiding-place, and on his sick bed, and carried to the Abbaye. The president had scarcely pronounced the words 'Lead him out!' ere they thrust him into the street, and through the open wicket I saw the veteran massacred. The two national guards who presented the appeal or petition did not behave as they ought: one of them was drunk. I thought I perceived that the president pronounced this one sentence with regret; but a great many of the killers (tueurs) had come in, and were making a terrible disturbance. . . . The president sat down to write, registering, I suppose, the name of the victim last dispatched; and then I heard him say, 'Another.' Instantly I was dragged before this swift and bloody judgment-seat, where the best protection was to have no protection, and where all resources of ingenuity were null. Two of my guards held me each by a hand, the third by the collar of my coat. 'Your name?' 'Your profession?' said the president. 'The least lie, and you are lost,' said one of the judges. 'I am named Journiac Saint-Méard; I have served as an officer twenty years; and I appear at your tribunal with the assurance of an innocent man, who therefore will not lie.' 'We shall see that,' said the president. 'Do you know why you are arrested?' 'Yes, Monsieur le President, and I can believe, from the falsity of the denunciations made against me, that the committee of the commune would not have thrown me into prison but for the precautions which the salvation of the people commands them to take. I am accused of being editor of the anti-Feuillant newspaper entitled 'Journal de la Cour et de la Ville;' but the truth is, that is not the case. The editor of that paper is a man named Gautier, who bears no resemblance to me; and, if I could only put my hand into my pocket. . . . One of the judges, perceiving that I wanted to get my pocket-book, said to the men who held me, 'Leave his hands free.' Then I laid upon the table a variety of papers, which proved that Gautier, and not I, was the editor of that royalist journal—that Gautier was editor and sole proprietor of it. 'But,' said one of the judges, 'there is no smoke without some fire; you must tell us why you were accused about this paper.' I confessed that, though I had never edited this paper, or written for it, I had sometimes given Gautier some pleasant ideas and bons-mots. 'Here, gentlemen,' said I, 'is the groundwork of this great denunciation, which is as absurd as what I am now going to speak about is monstrous. I am even accused of having been to the frontiers, and of having recruited for the emigrants!' At these words there arose a general murmur, which, however, did not disconcert me, and I exclaimed, raising my voice, 'Eh! gentlemen, gentlemen, it is my turn to speak; I beg Monsieur le President to have the kindness to let me be heard; I never needed it more!' 'That is true enough,' said nearly all the judges, laughing. 'Silence!' [Journiac pleaded away as best he could. He begged them to examine his testimonials; and a national guardsman attested that he knew the signature to one of his certificates to be that of a good patriot of his section.] While they were examining the testimonials, another prisoner was brought in and placed before the president. The men who held him said it was one priest more that they had ferreted out in the chapel. After a very short interrogatory, the president said, 'A la Force!' He flung his breviary upon the table, was hurled through the gate, and massacred. I re-appeared before the tribunal. . . . I harangued at some length; I abused the nobles of the Constituent Assembly; I criticised with severity the Feuillants; I showed how the constitution which had been made could not suit or last; I was going to give a résumé of the thousand reasons which made me prefer a republic to that constitution, when the keeper of the prison entered all in a fright, to give notice that a prisoner was escaping up one of the chimneys. The president told him to make people fire pistols up the chimney after him, and that if he escaped he should answer for it with his head. It was the unhappy Maussabré, aide-de-camp to the Duke de Brissac, who had fought bravely at the Tuileries on the 10th. They went and fired several muskets up the chimney, and the keeper of the prison, seeing that this did not bring him down, set fire to a quantity of damp straw. The smoke made him fall, half-smothered: he was finished outside the wicket. . . . At length one of the judges cried out to me impatiently, 'You tell us always that you are not this, that you are not that: what are you then?' 'I was an open royalist!' There arose a general murmur, which was miraculously appeased by one of my judges, who had seemed to take an interest in me. 'We are not here to judge opinions,' said he, 'but to judge the results of them.' [Journiac was a disciple of the new school, and, as we take it, rather a contemptible fellow besides. He exclaims in a foot-note, "Could the united genius of Rousseau and Voltaire, if they had been pleading my cause, have said anything better than this!"] 'Yes, gentlemen,' cried I, 'I was an open royalist always till the 10th of August; but I was never paid for being one. I was a royalist because I believed the monarchic form of government suited my country. . . . I have been a kind master and landlord. The peasants on my estate planted a Mai before my house, while the châteaux of all my neighbours were burning around.'" After more of this, and a great many more protestations, Journiac had the satisfaction of hearing the president say, "I see nothing to suspect in this man; I am for granting him his liberty. Is this your opinion?" All the judges and killers standing by cried, "Yes! yes! it is just!" and there rose merry vivats inside the

Abbaye and outside the wicket, and Journiac was hugged and kissed by the égorgeurs, and escorted to his home, his escort vowing that they would massacre the man that dared touch a hair of his head.* We trust we have said enough to convey a clear idea of these long-continued massacres—of these revolutionary horrors, which some writers, even in our own language, have affected to consider as pardonable trifles—the thoroughly authenticated accounts of which some have attempted to treat as mere bugbears to frighten children.†

In the letter which Roland wrote on the 4th, and not before, this minister of the interior enjoined commandant-general Santerre, in the name of the nation, and by order of the National Assembly and of the executive power, to employ all his forces in defence of the persons and properties of the citizens of Paris; declaring that he would be held answerable for any further crimes that might be committed. The brewer replied that his heart had bled every moment during these violations of the laws; that he had given orders to his commandants and battalions to protect the Temple, &c.; that he was now going to redouble his efforts, and that his body should serve as breast-plate and buckler to the first citizen attacked. The reader may be reminded that Santerre was brother-in-law to Panis, who was one of the committee of the commune which had organised the massacres, and signed the address to the other municipalities of the kingdom. In the course of the 4th the commune issued the following order:— “IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE. Comrades, you are enjoined to carry off the dead bodies, to clean and wash out all the marks of blood, particularly in the courts, chambers, and staircases of the Abbaye. To this end you are authorised to impress scavengers, carters, and workmen.—At the Hôtel-de-Ville, this 4th of September. (Signed) Panis, Sergeant, administrators; Méhée, secretary.” The National Assembly met in the morning as usual. Not a word was said about the massacres, which, though finished at the Abbaye because there no longer remained any to kill, were certainly not over in other parts of Paris until the afternoon or evening of the 5th. Ex-capuchin Chabot explained the great danger arising to the Assembly out of reports that they had suspended Louis XVI. only in order to place upon the throne the Duke of Brunswick or the Duke of York. “For my part,” said he, “I know all this is false! I can read in your hearts that you equally abhor all kings whatsoever! But if you would deprive your enemies of this dangerous weapon of attack, let every one of you declare individually that he is convinced by a sad experience of the incurable vices of kings and of royalty, and that he will detest them unto death.” The Assembly rose to a man, and shouted, “Yes! We swear it! No more kings!” Another Jacobin of the same party said that they swore by the most sacred oath that no king, foreigner or French, should ever be allowed to contaminate with his presence that land of liberty; and he demanded that Chabot should be intrusted with the drawing up of a regular form of oath to be taken individually by all the deputies that remained. Here the Girondists struck in, in evident fear that the ultra-Jacobins were going to lay claim to all the honour of the day, to all the glory and popularity resulting from the republican vow or vows. “Gentlemen,” said Guadet, “you have been anticipated; our extraordinary committee last night agreed in a project of address which contains the oath you have just taken. We are anxious to manifest our sentiments aloud. I will read our project of address.” Guadet read his paper. Thuriot, one of the fiercest of the Jacobins, then said that the address and Guadet’s form of oath might do very well, but that he feared the Assembly was proceeding without sufficient precaution—was going to anticipate the Convention, and to decide upon matters which they had agreed to leave to the free decision of the Convention and of the people. Vergniaud rose to declare that the address presented by Guadet was essential to the security of himself and friends and party, whose views had been cruelly misrepresented. He said that they had been attacked by the calumnies of able men; that absurd reports had been circulated to ruin them; that they had been completely misrepresented in divers sections of the capital, and even in the bosom of the commune; that prudence, that self-preservation made them urge the passing of this decree. But Vergniaud’s eloquence produced no effect; the House, without dividing, passed to the order of the day.

On the 5th, when the massacres were over, the council-general of the commune, with Mayor Pétion at their head, repaired to the prison of La Force; and in the course of the same day the commune ordered that the barriers, which had been shut ever since Sunday, should be thrown open. On the 6th Pétion presented himself at the bar of the Assembly to promise the speedy return of order and tranquillity. Little now remained to be done but to get the bodies of the victims out of sight, and pay some of those who had worked in the massacres. The bodies were collected and thrown upon carts; all the cemeteries of Paris and the environs, as at Clamart, Montrouge, Vaugirard, Tombe-Isoire, and Montsouris, were opened to receive them; they were cast pêle-mêle into enormous graves, and quicklime was thrown over them to hasten their decomposition. Billaud-Varennes, as substitute to Manuel, procureur of the commune, and other individuals, had scattered a good deal of money among the égorgeurs while they were actively employed; and on the 6th the council-general of the commune came to the following ingenious and periphrastic resolution:—“The council-general decrees that there shall be delivered an order upon the treasurer of the city for the sum of 1463 livres, as salary due to the persons who worked at the peril of their lives in order to preserve the salubrity of the air on the days of the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th of September last, as well as to those who presided over operations as important for society as dangerous to themselves.* Louvet, in one of his printed attacks on Robespierre † (which were not written or published until months after), says that Roland, or some of his clerks, saw an order of the commune upon the treasurer of the city, M. Valet-de-Villeneuve, for forty-eight livres, to be paid to four men “for expediting the priests in the cloisters of Saint-Firmin;” and in another work, more worthy of credit than Louvet’s paper, an extract is given from the city-treasurer’s books, in which there is the entry of forty-eight livres, paid to Gil. . . Pet. . . and three of his comrades “for the time they had employed in expediting the priests at Saint-Firmin on two different days, according to the requisition made by the section of sans-culottes, who had set them to that work.” ‡

These things did not pass as trifles, “as bugbears dressed to frighten children,” at the time they happened, at least they did not so pass with the generality of enlightened and thinking Englishmen; but, as we shall have occasion to show, there were un-English Englishmen among us who grasped the bloody hands of the makers of the French republic after all these deeds; and it was after the massacres of September that Doctor Priestley became a French citizen, and was elected a deputy of that Convention which, from the first, showed its determination of pursuing the same monstrous career of cruelty and murder. “Oh!” exclaimed Romilly, “how could we ever be so deceived in the character of the French nation as to think them capable of liberty! Wretches, who, after all their professions and boasts about liberty, and patriotism, and courage, and dying, and after taking oath after oath, at the very moment when their country is invaded and the enemy is marching through it unresisted, employ whole days in murdering women, and priests, and prisoners! Others who can deliberately load whole waggons full of victims, and bring them, like beasts, to be butchered in the metropolis; and then (who are worse even than these) the cold instigators of these murders, who, while blood is streaming round them on every side, permit this carnage to go on, and reason about it, and talk about the example they are setting to all nations! One might as well think of establishing a republic of tigers in some forest of Africa, as of maintaining a free government among such monsters!” From the same correspondence we derive one of the most characteristic and horrible traits of these wholesale butcheries. Romilly had the account from M. Guyot, a Swiss gentleman, who fled from Paris to London. “He left Paris immediately after the massacres of September; and, although he was a foreigner, it was with great difficulty that he obtained a passport. Finding all other resources fail him, he resolved to try what influence he might have on Manuel, with whom he had once been intimate. . . . Accordingly he went to the Hôtel de Ville, and was there conducted into a room where a number of persons were assembled, and all waiting to have an audience with Manuel. A profound silence prevailed among them, and the deepest melancholy and dejection was painted on every countenance. Guyot could not conjecture who they were; but he soon found that they were the relations and friends of persons who had been confined in different prisons, come to inquire what had been their fate. The mode adopted to answer their inquiries, and to remove their anxious uncertainty, was this: they were taken one by one into a room, where were strewed about a number of fragments of clothes, torn, stained with dirt, or soaked in blood; and if, upon minutely examining these vestiges of massacre, they could discover nothing which they recollected, there was some faint hope that the son or the husband they were trembling for had escaped.”*

We have mentioned how and when the Assembly itself passed a decree for removing the state prisoners from Orleans. While the massacres were raging in the capital, and when the circular of the commune was sent everywhere to recommend the salutary example, these unhappy captives, fifty-three in number, including ex-ministers, general officers, and other persons of high rank, were dragged from their prison, thrown into carts and tumbrils, and carried towards Versailles by a frantic mob, and under a strong escort of national guardsmen, federates, and volunteers, who marched with artillery, and with ammunition and baggage-waggons. The escort, by order of the commune, was commanded by Fournier, surnamed the American, one of the greatest monsters of the revolution. On the 8th of September Roland, as minister of the interior, wrote to the municipality of Versailles to request that they would provide safe lodging and food both for the prisoners and for their escort, and adopt precautions for protecting the lives of men, who, “though under the sword of the law, merited the attentions of humanity.” Attempts have been made to shift all blame from the Versailles municipals: it is said that they felt it was dangerous to bring the prisoners into their town; that, in consequence, they prepared lodgings for them in the building called the Menagerie, which appertained to the palace, and which was situated outside; that they had agreed that the escort should not march through the town, but that the artillery and heavy baggage obliged them so to do; but we believe that that commune was just as atrocious as the great Paris commune, of which it was but an offshoot, and even if they had been ever so well disposed they could not have been able to prevent what happened, and what evidently had been determined upon. At two o'clock in the afternoon of the 9th the prisoners arrived, and were made to go right through the town. As soon as they were in the heart of Versailles hundreds of égorgeurs fell upon them, and by half-past two the massacre was completed. Of the whole fifty-three, only four, or, at most, five, escaped with life: all the rest were murdered, tortured, hacked to pieces, in the most frightful manner. "Never," says the register of the general council of the commune of Versailles, "did man witness so much fury and cruelty! All the prisoners were struck nearly at the same instant: some succeeded in escaping through the crowd; the rest were cut to pieces there." As soon as they were all finished, the égorgeurs went to the town-prison, and there treated twenty-three individuals in the same manner. The mayor went to the prison, but the crowd prevented his entering it; he saw naked swords flashing about, and learned that all the prisoners had been killed already. Some of the mob followed him to his house, shouting "Vive la nation! Vive le maire de Versailles!" To his remonstrances they replied, "This is only what has been done at Paris! This is nothing but justice! We must purge the interior before we think of the frontiers!" In the evening the murderers, or a part of them, returned to Paris, and passed in front of the house of the minister of justice in the Place Vendôme; and Danton, from a balcony of that house, thanked them for the good services they had rendered to liberty.

In various towns and municipalities the people rose with the avowed intention of murdering all political prisoners, all priests, all aristocrats—all men whatsoever who outraged the principle of equality by possessing property and elegant houses or dresses; but in many instances the communes would not consent to take their lesson from Paris, and the national guards, not yet sufficiently sans-culottized, courageously opposed the égorgeurs. At Meaux fourteen individuals were butchered in the prison of the fort, and a day or two later a good many priests of the town and neighbourhood were put to death by the mob, who carried their heads upon pikes through the streets. At Caen, at Rouen, other horrors were committed; at Roanne seventeen heads of priests and officers were promened on pikes; at Gisors the Duke de la Rochefoucauld, ex-president of the directory of the department of Paris, was cut to pieces under the eyes of his mother and his wife,* at Rheims eight priests and laymen were put to death. In the south there were many massacres; at Lyons nearly every prisoner in the château Pierre-Encise was dispatched; and Avignon, where fighting and massacring had never ceased since the expulsion of the papal authorities and its annexation to France, became one slaughterhouse. At Bordeaux, the headquarters of Girondism, attempts were made to clear the prisons; but the mayor and the municipality made head against the insurrection, and it appears that not many were murdered.

* According to Maton de la Varenne, this nobleman, the best of his class, and a high-minded excellent man, was arrested by order of the commune, on the demand of Santerre, and at the recommendation of Comdoret.

Dumont, who was now in England enjoying the hospitality of Lord Lansdown at Bowood, was much affected by this murder of a man whom he highly prized, and whom he had known very intimately. In a letter to Romilly he says:—"We tried to persuade ourselves that it was the cardinal, and not the duke; for, although these wild beasts had no more right to kill the one than the other, yet the virtues, the services, the patriotism of the latter, would add much to the horror of this butchery."

No two accounts agree as to the total amount of these wide-spread massacres. Nothing like an exact account was attainable at the time, and now no such thing is to be expected. The 'Histoire de l'Espion,' a work of some authority, states broadly that the number of all who were massacred in the course of the month of September, at Paris and in all parts of France, was 15,000. Barrière and Berville, who published their Mémoires in 1823, make the numbers of those who were égorgeés in the prisons of Paris alone, amount to 12,800. In this calculation there is evidently some great exaggeration. Peltier, the royalist writer, calculates the number killed in the prisons at 1005; but he omits several of the prisons in his account, and among them that of Bicêtre, where, according to every relation, the murders were the most numerous, and attended with the most horrible circumstances.* Maton de la Varenne, speaking only of the prisons, and not of all of them, sets down the number of the killed at 1049, of whom 202 were priests; but he relied upon prison registers, which were very imperfectly kept, and took no account of the murders that were committed in the streets and in private houses, or of the massacres perpetrated in Paris after the 5th. There was only a lull then; and, though the prisons were emptied by the butcheries of the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th, the work of killing was loosely renewed on the 6th and 7th, and was not entirely over on the 9th, while the massacres were well nigh recommencing with as much fury as ever on the 16th and 17th. On the 7th, Gouverneur Morris, writing to the Duchess of Orleans, says distinctly that the horrors had not reached their limit; and as late as the evening of the 17th we find the captives of Saint-Pelagie, which was then, as now, a prison merely for debt, imploring the Assembly to send them some protection, as they were expecting every moment to be butchered. The editors of the 'Histoire Parlementaire,' in the very act of seeking to diminish the amount of the atrocities, add fresh circumstances of horror to them by showing the perfect sang froid with which they were perpetrated. They inform us that they have handled and carefully examined the écrous or registers of the prisons of La Force, the Châtelet, and the Abbaye, which are all that remain in existence. In the écrou of the Abbaye, which they coolly call "this original and unpublished piece," they find a column containing the names of the thirty-eight Swiss in confinement there on the 2nd of September, and in the margin of the page the single word "MORTS"—(Dead); whence they conclude that all the thirty-eight "were killed en masse, and probably without judgment." In the same register they find the names of twenty-six of the ex-guards of the king, and in the margin the words "MORTS, HORS UN SAUVÉ"—(Dead, all but one saved). Opposite other names they find written, "CONDEMNED TO DEATH BY JUDGMENT OF THE PEOPLE, AND EXECUTED ON THE SPOT." They make the total number of those executed at the Abbaye 122, and the total number of those set at liberty and acquitted 45; but they seem to admit that this document, as well as the other two, may be very defective; and it is not very probable that any very exact list was taken at any of the prisons of the immense numbers that were sent into confinement by Danton's domiciliary visits just before the massacres began. In the écrou of the Châtelet they find the words in the margin, "PUT TO DEATH BY THE PEOPLE," or "SET AT LIBERTY BY THE PEOPLE;" and they infer that not above 189 were actually killed there. As to the écrou of La Force, they state plainly that it was not kept in any order, so that no facts are to be derived from it. As there was no possibility of escape; as the barriers were strictly guarded all the time the massacres lasted; as the people had lists of the names of many thousands of obnoxious individuals; as the butchery indisputably lasted four days and nights, in full activity, and as assassinations were performed from time to time during a whole fortnight, we believe it may safely be assumed that from 4000 to 5000 victims perished in Paris alone, and that in all France there fell in the course of this dismal month, by murder alone, some 7000 souls, or near upon half the number stated by the author of 'L'Histoire de l'Espion.'

On the 7th of September Talleyrand told Morris that he was really persuaded that those who now ruled meant to quit Paris, to take off the king, and utterly to destroy the city before they left it. There was no travelling in any part of the kingdom without passports signed and countersigned by the commune of Paris and their affiliated municipalities. "I know this," says Dumont, "that the National Assembly is atrociously guilty of all the murders which may yet be committed, in not having immediately repealed the decree on passports. To shut the gates of a kingdom, in which a frantic people butcher on bare suspicion all those who do not think as they do, is to be responsible for all the murders that are perpetrated." The Assembly was guilty enough; but the closing of the barriers, the passports, and all the rest, were matters of business above their power. If they had been men, however, they would have revoked their decree; and we perceive that afterwards, when it was too late to be anything but a reproach to them, they made some alteration in their accursed passport law. Some few persons got passports by paying enormous sums to the commune of Paris for them. Manuel is said to have obtained for one pass a sum equal to 5000*l.* of our money. The massacres, on the whole, fell far heavier upon the Feuillants, or the party of Lafayette, than upon the decided and ultra royalists: these unwise friends of liberty and of the people, who had favoured all the first stages of the revolution, and unwittingly prepared, as much as lay in them, all its later stages; these patriots of 1789 and 1790, whose estates would all have been confiscated if the Duke of Brunswick and the coalition had triumphed, were slaughtered without mercy as guilty of conspiracy and a correspondence or understanding with the Prussian. But this, as the Girondists ought to have perceived, was but the natural course of such a revolution—this, they ought to have felt, was but the forerunner of their own inevitable doom. If one could place faith in pretension, profession, and fine phrases, one might have expected that the virtuous Roland and his colleagues would instantly resign, or refuse to act any longer in a cabinet which included Danton, a minister of justice who had been at the very head of the massacres. But they all remained in office: not one of them resigned until he was kicked out by the Jacobins, or terrified out by their power and their menaces. The world will judge what merit is to be attributed to the harangues they then made, and the writings they published, against the Jacobins and their égorgeurs. Madame Roland continued to receive the visits of Danton; and it appears to have been actually at this moment that she requested him to make her acquainted with Marat. Roland himself expressed no indignation either against Danton or against the people of Paris. On the 14th, while representing, by letter to the Assembly, that there were fresh excesses in the capital, that nearly everybody that walked abroad with watches, or gold chains or ear-rings, was robbed of them, the wretched man exclaimed: "But these scenes cannot be the work of the people! The people, in all circumstances, have proved themselves to be good and honest!" And on the next day, when persons of all sorts were plundering the Garde-Meuble, and carrying off diamonds and other property worth many millions of livres—when officers of the commune, with their scarfs on, were joining in this plunder—he durst not speak out, he would not "dispute the rights of the commune of Paris," and he talked as if these municipals were not true municipals, but only professed thieves disguised as such. A member of the House who had somewhat more courage declared that, if this plunder and destruction was not stopped, the city of Paris would be reduced to a wilder state than the forest of Ardennes; and he recommended the instant employment of the guillotine as the best means of stopping the ravages. On the following day Roland presented himself at the bar to state that fresh arrests had been begun, and that from four to five hundred persons had already been thrown into the empty prisons by order of the commune, or the sections, or the people, or individuals. These arrests seemed preparatory to another massacre. He said that the commitments were arbitrary and informal; but he suggested no measures for preventing them in future, or for releasing the unhappy persons already in confinement, leaving these things to the Assembly, "which, no doubt, would issue such orders as it thought suitable." A member said that the people had been excited by all kinds of alarming reports, by false intelligence that Dumouriez had been defeated and taken prisoner, while the truth was that Dumouriez had gained several advantages, and had raised his army by the successive junctions of several generals of division to 80,000 men, a force far more considerable than any the Duke of Brunswick could bring against him; and that this was not all, as national guards were joining him from all parts of France, and eight battalions of the line were expected every moment from the south. There was, therefore, not merely the probability, but the certainty, that the cause of liberty would triumph. Madame Roland, for some reason or other, accuses Vergniaud of indolence and procrastination, of a want of ardour and passion for the public good, of a philosophical egotism, yet Vergniaud was the first of his party to speak in anything like a manly tone against these proscriptions and murders. In the course of the present debate—somewhat of the latest indeed, as it was on the 16th of September, and after so many thousands had perished—he asked whence proceeded that kind of torpor in which nearly all the citizens of Paris now seemed buried? "Let us no longer dissemble," said he; "it is time to tell the truth! The past proscriptions and the reports of future ones have spread consternation and terror. Good men hide themselves when things have reached that point at which crime may be committed with impunity. There are, on the contrary, bad men who never show themselves except in time of public calamity, as there are noxious insects which the earth only produces in storms and tempests. These men are incessantly instilling suspicion, jealousy, hatred, vengeance; they are ever thirsting for blood! In their seditious harangues, they aristocratize virtue, to acquire the right of trampling it under foot; and they democratize crime, in order to satiate themselves with it, without having to fear the sword of justice. Oh, people of Paris! will you never unmask these perverse men, who, at a time when the enemy are marching against you, only invite you to slaughter, in cold blood, women and disarmed men, countrymen and fellow-citizens?" As Vergniaud was listened to by the Assembly, and not torn to pieces by the galleries, he renewed the subject on the morrow: yet he could not renew it without flattering the people, the butchers, of Paris, and repeating the absurd accusation that the égorgeurs were set to work by the emigrants and the coalition. "If," said he, "there was nothing to fear but from the people, there would be everything to hope, for the people are just, and they abhor crime. But there are satellites of Coblenz among us, monsters salaried to sow discord, and make a new anarchy and massacre! These wretches keep repeating—'They want to stop the proscriptions and tear our victims from us. Well, then, let us have recourse to fresh orders of arrest! Let us denounce, seize, heap in the dungeons, all those we would sacrifice. Afterwards we will agitate the people, we will let loose our assassins, and establish in the prisons a butchery of human flesh!'—And do you know how these orders of arrest are issued? The commune of Paris leaves this business to its committee of surveillance. The committee of surveillance confers on certain individuals the terrible right of arresting all those they may think suspect. These individuals again subdelegate their powers to certain confidential friends, whose personal animosities and vengeance they must second, in order to be seconded by them. This is the strange concatenation on which depend the liberty and the life of citizens! These are the hands that take charge of public security!" Pétion, who was at the bar, said that there could be no doubt all the crimes were committed by the paid agents of the enemies of liberty; that the commune knew nothing about the orders of arrest which were again filling the prisons. Roland was charged with the important duty of preparing a part of the palace of the Tuileries for the reception of the members of the Convention, and he soon reported that all would be ready by the 21st of September, the day for which the Convention stood convoked.

It is a relief to escape from these civil proceedings, even to the horrors of war, for the worst of them are less revolting than these things. It is admitted by a French military man, writing shortly after the crisis, that, notwithstanding the discordant views of the allied powers, there was a moment when everything was possible; but they suffered that moment to be lost.* The French people had been expecting invasion, and preparing to meet it for many months—for more than a year France had been one great drill-ground. There was a time when a large part of the population, not yet indoctrinated by the clubs, or emboldened by success, or committed by daring and extreme acts, were wavering and uncertain; but the allies waited to make their attack till the moment when the unity of feeling and the popular enthusiasm were at their highest pitch; and even then, instead of beginning the campaign early, so as to have all the summer before them, they did not enter France until the month of August. Before Verdun surrendered to the Prussians, Dumouriez adopted a bold resolution. He called a council of war at Sedan, composed of Lieutenant-General Dillon, four major-generals, Petit (his principal commissary), and his own staff, which consisted only of three experienced officers. He opened the map of Champagne, into which the Prussians were penetrating; and he showed that, Longwi being taken and Verdun invested, while another body of the enemy had advanced beyond Thionville and were threatening Metz, there were no means left either to form a junction with Marshal Luckner, or to receive succours from any other quarter in time to deliver Verdun; and that accordingly there was nothing to be depended upon but the little army which he had with him. He allowed that this army was far inferior in number to that of the Duke of Brunswick; but then the cavalry of it was composed of the best regiments of France, and was upwards of 5000 strong; more than one-half of his infantry (exceeding in all 18,000 men) was formed of regiments of the line; the rest consisted of national guards, being well disciplined, rendered warlike by a year's encampment, and by continual marches and skirmishes with the Austrians; the artillery, too, being excellent, counting a park of 60 pieces, besides the battalion-guns. With such means there was no reason to despair: he thought that this army might secure the salvation of France. It had the inestimable advantage of acting in its own country, where everything was to be expected from the enthusiasm of the people. On the other hand the Prussians would be retarded by the sieges, by the difficulty of finding provisions, by the delays incident to their own convoys, and by the terrible quantity of their heavy artillery. The equipages of so many princes, the numbers of draught-horses necessary to drag their cannon, stores, and baggage over rough roads, must make their march exceedingly slow. On the contrary, his own army, which could not possibly remain where it was, might move with great rapidity. But in what direction should it move? Dillon was of opinion that it ought to retreat behind the river Marne, and endeavour to reach Châlons before the Prussians; observing that, if the Duke of Brunswick should get first to Châlons, he would then be between Dumouriez and the capital, and arguing that the safety of the capital was of more importance than the preservation of a country which it was impossible to defend. Dillon concluded by proposing that a few battalions should be left in the entrenched camp before Sedan, that Dumouriez should make a rapid march with the rest, behind the forest of Argonne, by way of Ste. Menéould, in order to reach Châlons (or even Rheims if Châlons should be previously occupied); that he should then post himself behind the Marne, defend the passage of that river, and wait for reinforcements. This opinion was adopted by the whole council: but Dumouriez only said he would consider of it; and, as soon as the council broke up, he concerted a bolder and a better plan with Thouvenot, a young officer of great science, who knew the country well. Dumouriez said he could not approve of retiring to Châlons, as this would be abandoning Lorraine, the Bishoprics and the Ardennes, and would be the sure means of inducing the Prussians to advance with more rapidity in order to pursue them; that such a retreat might soon degenerate into an absolute flight; that if they retired behind the Marne it would become absolutely necessary to burn Châlons, nay to sacrifice the great city of Rheims itself, both places being incapable of a defence; that all communication with the army of the North on the one side, and with the troops of Luckner on the other, would then be interrupted; that if the Prussians could once traverse Champagne-pouilleuse, the poorest of countries, they would find abundance of provision and forage in the countries round Rheims and Epernay; that the Prussians might then march to Paris by Rheims and Epernay, or by Vitry and Troyes, unless they rather chose to employ the two remaining months of the campaign in conquering Lorraine and the Ardennes; that the passage of the Marne was incapable of being defended, as it might be passed with ease at several points; that there was not one single good position between Châlons and Paris; and that if the army took that route, and should be followed by the Duke of Brunswick, it would be cut to pieces by the Prussian cavalry before it could reach the capital. Then pointing to the forest of Argonne upon the map, Dumouriez exclaimed, "Behold the Thermopylæ of France! If I can but arrive there before the Prussians, all will be saved!"* The forest of Argonne is a belt of wood, running on elevated rocky ground, nearly all the way from Sedan to Passavant, a league beyond Ste. Menéould, the entire length being about fifteen French leagues, its breadth very unequal, varying from four leagues to half a league. It separates the Bishoprics (Les Trois Evêchés), a rich and fertile country, from Champagne the Hungry, or the Lousy (as pouilleuse properly signifies), a district cursed by nature, in which was neither water nor wood, forage nor pasturage, but one cold bed of clay, without towns or bourgs, with no habitations but a few wretched villages scattered here and there and far apart. The forest was intersected with rocks, watercourses, bogs, and marshes, which rendered it impenetrable to the march of an army except by five openings or passes. The first of these, Le Chêne-populeux, was easy and open, and led by a tolerable road to Sedan; the second, La Croix-aux-bois, about two leagues to the westward, offered a rough waggon-road; the third, Grandpré, a league and a half from Croix-aux-bois, gave access to the great road leading to Rheims; the fourth, La Chalade, two leagues and a half from Grandpré, was the regular road which led from Varennes to Ste. Menéould; the fifth, Les Islettes, about a league still farther to the west, was the hollow through which ran the great road from Verdun to Paris. As there were no other means of advancing on the French capital, where the Duke of Brunswick had promised to dine by a certain day, it is astonishing that he should not have secured one or two of the best of these passes ; but he had done nothing of the kind, wasting several days in the sieges of Longwi and Verdun, places which he might have left in his rear without any danger. But if he could now discover Dumouriez's intentions, he could hardly fail of remedying his blunder ; and, as he was considerably nearer to the best of the passes, or those which led most directly to the capital, the French general must move with the greatest rapidity, or see his plan frustrated. But Dumouriez not only moved with admirable rapidity, but also marched in such a way as to conceal his intention, until it was too late for the Duke of Brunswick to attempt anticipating him. He moved his army in several separate columns ; and by the 4th of September all the five passes of the forest of Argonne were occupied by different divisions of his army, which was every day reinforced by the arrival of national guards and volunteers. He had also transmitted orders to Beurnonville to quit the fortified camp of Maulde and march straight to Argonne with his 10,000 men, a considerable portion of whom consisted of Belgians who had revolted against the emperor and joined the French ; and Beurnonville was expected to arrive in a very few days. Other troops—another army, in fact—were collecting in his rear at Rheims under General d'Harville ; and even before the Prussians moved towards the passes there seems to have been numerically a greater force on the Paris side of the forest than on the hungry Champagne side. Dumouriez took post at Grandpré with 13,000 men (according to his own enumeration), in a camp strongly fortified by nature, situated on elevated ground between two streams, being flanked by the village and castle of Grandpré on the left, and on the right by the village of Marque. Dillon, with 7000 or 8000 men, took post at Les Islettes in another strong camp ; General Dubouquet was at Le Chêne-populeux with 6000 men ; another force was at Grandpré ; and a detachment under a colonel watched the less important pass of La Croix-aux-bois between Le Chêne-populeux and Grandpré. Trees were felled to block up the roads, trenches were dug, and abattis made round the several positions, which all communicated with one another, and with the populous towns in their rear beyond the Marne. When all these dispositions were made, Dumouriez wrote exultingly to Servan, the minister of war : "Verdun is taken ; I expect the Prussians. The camps of Grandpré and Les Islettes have become our Thermopylæ ; but I shall be more lucky than Leonidas." This was written merely for effect ; but in another epistle he besought the war-minister to detach from the army of the Rhine a body of 5000 or 6000 men to reinforce the army at Metz, and to order Luckner to put his troops in motion, so as to take the Prussians in flank and rear. Servan dispatched the necessary orders ; and moreover, day after day, from 1500 to 2000 volunteers, partly furnished by the departments, and partly by the capital itself, where many men of better condition than the common had become convinced that the safest place for them would be in the camp, and in the midst of the army, shouldered their muskets and marched away from Paris for the Argonne. The mean-spirited Gironde ministry continued, however, to doubt and hesitate ; and if it had depended upon them, Dumouriez would even now have been compelled to retreat behind the Marne. Even after the fall of Verdun, and the certain knowledge of all that Dumouriez was doing to block up the passes, the Duke of Brunswick lost several precious days, which allowed Beurnonville and Kellermann to get near to the scene of action. The duke's head-quarters were constantly distracted by a variety of conflicting opinions, and disturbed by the petulance and evils counsels of the emigrants, who pretended that, as Frenchmen, they must best know how to manage a war in France, and who evidently misled him from the beginning of the campaign to the end of it. At last, on the 8th of September, the duke lengthened the front of his army, and, traversing an extensive plain, he approached the forest. On the 9th the Prussians presented themselves in the passes, and skirmished along the whole front of Dumouriez's outposts, in order to reconnoitre his positions, and discover which pass would be easiest. On the 10th General Miranda, a Peruvian whom Pétion had introduced into the French service, and who had only arrived on the preceding evening, had to withstand a very brisk attack ; and General Stengel, who had thrown himself into a village in the forest, had some difficulty in maintaining himself. But Dumouriez had the satisfaction to see that the apprehension was wearing out which had at first been spread by the high reputation of the Prussian troops, commanded by a general who had been trained under the great Frederick—to see that his old troops were steady and full of heart, and he fondly hoped that the new levies were rapidly becoming excellent soldiers. From his central position at Grandpré he threw reinforcements to whatever point was attacked or threatened with attack. But there was one thing which Dumouriez had omitted to do ; and with a little more rapidity on the part of the Duke of Brunswick, this omission must have proved fatal at least to his army. He had not examined with his own eyes the passage of La Croix-aux-bois ; he had relied on the report of the colonel placed there, and had fancied the pass so difficult, and so completely blocked up, that the Prussians would never venture into it. The Prussians did not ; but a division of the Austrian army which was serving with them under General Clairfait, and a body of emigrants commanded by the son of the brave and witty Prince de Ligne, dashed into this gorge on the morning of the 13th, cleared the abattis, drove the colonel's weak detachment before them, and presently made themselves complete masters of the pass. By this operation Dumouriez's positions were turned, and he was cut off from General Dubouquet's division of 6000 men, which was guarding Le Chêne-populeux, the pass to the east, and nearest to Sedan. As soon as he learned the alarming news, he sent General Chasot, with two entire brigades, six squadrons of horse, and four field-pieces, to recover the pass, and drive out the Austrians and the émigrants before they should have time to entrench. Chasot, who could not get to the attack before the 15th, recovered the post after some hard fighting, in which de Ligne was killed, but could not keep it; for, being attacked again within two hours, he was driven out of the pass and cut off from Dumouriez and the troops at Grandpré. He retreated towards Châlons by the only road that was open to him. Thus separated both from Chasot and Dubouquet, with the enemy debouching rapidly by the pass they had gained and threatening to envelope him, Dumouriez could do nothing but abandon his fortified camp and the pass of Grandpré, and by a lateral movement unite with Dillon, who kept his ground at Les Islettes; and this movement he executed with his usual celerity, marching all the night by rough and wretched roads, and having to cross on his way the river Aisne. Once beyond this stream he considered himself safe; but while he was employed in tracing a camp a number of fugitives arrived, who cried out that all was lost,—that the army was in confusion, and the enemy in full pursuit. He galloped to the rear, and there found Miranda and old General Duval stopping a host of fugitives who had been thrown into a panic by a few Prussian hussars, and who were making a terrible outcry that they were betrayed—that their general was delivering them over to be massacred by the enemy. He caracolled, he harangued, he made fine sentences, as every French commander must do, and he flattered himself that he had restored order, when there arose fresh cries of Sauve qui peut. He then had recourse to another French practice—a practice of the old régime which had not yet disappeared, and which in fact never did disappear from the new régime—he beat the noisiest with the flat of his sword. But as the troops were all intermingled, he caused great fires to be lighted up and commanded them to pass the night where they were. He now began to find that new levies are not made veteran soldiers in a breath. He hints, indeed, that the cry was got up “by the arts of evil-disposed persons,” but from the composition of his army, and even from his own account, it is quite evident that it was a mere panic; and he adds, with some naïveté, that, when they once begin, no troops fly either quicker or farther than the French. “More than 2000 men,” he says, “belonging to different corps, bolted with incredible speed to the distance of thirty leagues, through Rheims, Châlons, and Vitry. They published everywhere that the army was betrayed and annihilated, and that Dumouriez and all the generals had gone over to the enemy. The latter, in particular, was the favourite cry of the runaways; they had even told Dumouriez himself that he had deserted, and that, too, at the very moment when he had been belabouring them with plats de sabre. But for the good conduct of Duval, Stengel, and

Miranda, this retreat must have ended in an irremediable flight, and 1500 Prussian hussars would have annihilated the whole of the French army.”* The Prussians and Austrians, who had no notion of such panics, who proceeded according to the old pedantic rules of war, and who were not sure of the country through which they had to pass, did not pursue with any speed or vigour; and thus they lost what was almost their last chance. On the 17th, having with the utmost difficulty restored some order, Dumouriez continued his retreat, and took up a good position at Ste. Menéould, where a fortified camp was already partially prepared. Here he was joined by Dillon, who abandoned the pass of Les Islettes, so that the Thermopylæ of France were open to the enemy. Nothing, however, can be more absurd than the story usually told that the road to Paris was equally open to the Duke of Brunswick. Dillon brought twenty-eight fugitives under arrest to his commander-in-chief; and that ingenious man stripped them of their uniforms, caused their eyebrows and heads to be shaved, and dismissed them as cowards, “which example produced a very good effect.” Brunswick’s advanced guard did not appear in sight until the 18th, when Dumouriez was too well posted to be attacked. Losing none of his confidence, he wrote to the National Assembly that he had been obliged to abandon the passes of the Argonne; that in his retreat 10,000 of his men had fled before 1500 Prussian horse; but that now all was repaired, and he would answer for everything. Beurnonville, who had been allowed time to march from Maulde, joined him on the 19th, and Dubouquet, who had retreated from Chêne-populeux, had got near enough to co-operate, although his detachment was in a very unruly state, and had massacred a colonel of a regiment, and cut off the heads of several other officers. On the same day Kellermann, who had taken the command of old Luckner’s army, arrived within two leagues of his flank with 15,000, or according to other accounts, 20,000 troops of the line, one-third of which consisted of excellent cavalry. Chasot, who had retired or fled from the pass of La Croix-aux-bois towards Châlons, changed the order of his march, and got near enough to co-operate. All these corps formed together a far greater force than any the Duke of Brunswick ever brought through the passes of the Argonne. The French themselves state the total number at 76,000.† On the morning of the 20th the Prussians showed themselves on the heights of La Lune, above Kellermann’s camp and between him and Châlons, their evident intention being to envelope him, and cut off his retreat to the latter

† According to the returns given at the time by the French commanders and commissaries, Dumouriez had 76,000 men, and the Duke of Brunswick less than 70,000. But the duke’s force must have been a very great deal less than this, for, though he had received some reinforcements from beyond the Rhine, he had been obliged to leave strong garrisons in Longwi and Verdun; and 10,000 men were engaged in the absurd siege of Thionville, and Hohenlohe had been left on the other side of the Argonne with a considerable force.

town. Kellermann made some hurried changes of position, and took post on the heights of Valmy, his centre being near a windmill. His outposts were all driven in at an early hour, and then a cannonade was commenced by the Prussians. To this the French replied with the same arm; but the distance was too great to allow the cannonade to be very destructive. But the explosion of an ammunition waggon threw the French into great disorder, and Kellermann's first line began to give ground. The Duke of Brunswick then resolved to charge them with the bayonet; but it was now noonday, and, while the almost idle cannonade had been going on, Dumouriez had sent Chasot, Stengel, and Beurnonville to support Kellermann and protect his flanks.* Besides, the Prussians had the disadvantage of charging up-hill; and in parts the hill of Valmy was rather steep. Kellermann's front, too, was now defended by some entrenchments; and the greater part of his army was composed of old soldiers. The Prussians rushed up the hill with great spirit; but Kellermann's entrenchments and artillery made them pause, and, apparently before they were within reach of musket-shot, the Duke of Brunswick recalled them. At this sight a part of Kellermann's line quitted their entrenchments with shouts of "Vive la nation!" and their brave leader exclaimed, "La victoire est à nous!" The French writers make a great flourish about a crossing of bayonets with the Prussians—a sort of thing which never takes place between any considerable numbers of men, and which certainly did not take place in any way on this occasion. Kellermann was but too happy to see that his men kept their ground, and that the new levies did not fall into some panic and horrible disorder. It was this gave him an assurance of victory; for, if these federates and volunteers and national guardsmen could once acquire self-confidence and a confidence in their generals, every advantage was on the side of the French. The Prussians now cannonaded from La Lune, and the French from Valmy, both burning an enormous quantity of gunpowder, so that, if this famed battle of Valmy was not the bloodiest, it was certainly one of the noisiest of battles. About four in the afternoon Brunswick attempted a new attack at closer quarters, and sent his men again up the hill; but Kellermann's lines were stronger and steadier than before, and, after a mere feint, the Prussians again descended—and again without being followed by the French. There was then some more cannonading, which, with intervals between, lasted till the close of day. The affair has been very properly called the Cannonade of Valmy: each of the two armies fired more than 20,000 cannon-shot, and yet lost no more, in killed and wounded, than three or four hundred men each. It, however, gave great encouragement to the French, by proving to them that their steadiness and their fire could arrest the progress of so formidable an enemy. The young Duke of Chartres (then plain M. Chartres, and now Louis Philippe, King of the French) was in this battle or cannonade, serving as a general officer, and having for his aide-de-camp his younger brother, the Duke of Montpensier, then a youth of seventeen. Kellermann praised the valour and conduct of both princes, and honorable mention was made of them in the bulletins sent to Paris. The Prussians lay all night under arms on the heights of La Lune: Kellermann, without beat of drum, retreated and crossed the small river Aube; but this was only in order to take up a better position nearer to Ste. Menéhould. The Prussians still remained between the French army and the French capital; but there were no longer any advantages to be hoped from such a position. Dumouriez had got the whole of his forces compactly together; he had 12,000 cavalry, and a strong camp defended by a numerous artillery: d'Harville was rapidly assembling troops at Rheims on the Duke of Brunswick's left; General Sparre had collected another army at Châlons on his right, and troops were marching from Paris, from Soissons, from Troyes, from Vitry, and half the great towns of France, to take him in the rear. At the same time that the Prussians found themselves in the centre of all these levies, still entangled in a sterile country, and in want of forage and provisions, a cruel dysentery broke out among them, occasioned by the badness of their food and by the dreching autumnal rains, which now fell incessantly for many days, making the bad roads still worse, swelling all the rivers and streams, and ruining all the baggage.* Even before they got through the passes of the Argonne, the army of the coalition and the emigrants, campaigning in Champagne

* "The duke," says Dumouriez, "very phlegmatically commenced a useless cannonade, and thus lost four inestimable hours, instead of deciding the affair immediately by a sudden attack, the success of which was infallible, and the attempt not dangerous, as his retreat was secure."

* Dumouriez, the Duke of Brunswick, the Jacobin Commissioners, Goëthe, the French newspapers, the English newspapers of the day, all mention these dreadful rains. But a critic in the 'Edinburgh Review,' in commenting on Mr. Carlyle's account of the Campaign of Argonne doubts, or denies that there was any rain at all, and assures us that September is not a rainy month on the Continent! If the critic had been as often drenched with September rains on the Continent as we have been, he would have told a different story.

the Lousy, had suffered terrible privations. In a letter found in the pocket of Prince Charles de Ligne, who was killed in the pass of La Croix-aux-bois, it was stated that Clairfait's troops, now that they had come into France, could procure nothing to eat; that the weather and the roads were dreadfully bad; that the sickness and mortality were great; that all the promises so confidently made by the emigrants had completely failed, and that all this had led to great coolness, and had produced many divisions among the allies. The King of Prussia, who accompanied his army, had been tempted into the country with a force utterly inadequate to the purpose, chiefly by two sanguine assurances of the emigrants: the first was, that the mass of the population, who must by this time be disgusted with the revolution, would rise and join him, and fight under the French princes; the second was, that the revolutionary army, being without experienced officers, and composed in good part of raw levies, with tailors and shoemakers for their leaders, would never be able to stand on a field of battle against the well commanded and highly disciplined veterans of Prussia. At the beginning they had assured him that the campaign would be nothing but a pleasant promenade along the banks of the Marne. But, instead of joining him, or even of remaining neutral, the population of the country seemed armed to a man against him, the peasantry cutting off and butchering all his stragglers, fighting in ambush on almost every road, and not unfrequently intercepting his convoys; and at Valmy he had found that the sans-culottes were commanded by skilful and experienced generals,—that shoemakers and tailors were becoming very good officers, and that the new levies, mixed with old troops, could keep their ground. It was clear that neither he nor the emigrants had sufficiently reflected on the aptitude of the French people for the art and practice of war; or upon the fact that such revolutions must nearly always produce great soldiers. The Prussians were pedants in the art of war, believing that it could only be a successful art when subjected to their own rigid rules; and, as for the emigrants, it was one of the few articles of their limited belief, that roturiers could never make good officers—a conviction which was scarcely removed from their minds until the sans-culotte armies, under sans-culotte officers and generals, had overrun half Europe. From the affair of Valmy, on the 20th, down to the night of the 30th of September, when the Duke of Brunswick struck his camp on the heights of La Lune, the two armies remained near to each other, but without any fighting, with scarcely any skirmishing. The duke has been bitterly reproached for his inactivity. It is said that he ought to have brought Dumouriez to a general action, or have continued his march towards Paris without regarding Dumouriez's army; but, if he had attempted a general action, all the chances, all the advantages of position and number, were against him; he could not even gain much by a victory, for he could not pursue Dumouriez without increasing his own distance from Paris, and he could hardly advance upon Paris with Dumouriez's army, however beaten and diminished, hanging upon his rear: 10,000 of the troops of the coalition were engaged in the siege of Thionville, and must be supported; and we have seen what republican armies were gathered between the heights of La Lune and the heights of Montmartre, between the Marne and Paris. If the duke had been beaten and enveloped, all would have been lost; the King of Prussia, with all his nobles, Prussian, Austrian, Hessian, and French emigrants, must have fallen into the hands of the republicans. On the 24th Dumouriez agreed to a kind of truce and an exchange of prisoners with the Prussians, refusing, however, to give up any of the emigrants who had been taken. After a few compliments had passed between him and some of the Prussian officers, this versatile man opened a political discussion in order to prove that the King of Prussia had been dragged into a war against his own real interests, and in order to forward the ambitious projects of his hereditary enemy, the House of Austria; that the French fought him with much reluctance; and that an alliance between Prussia and France would be mutually advantageous, and not at all difficult to bring about. He assures us (and we can easily credit the fact after what had happened) that the King of Prussia was getting heartily sick of the war. He says that Colonel Manstein assured him that the king did not wish to intermeddle with the French constitution; that his desires were extremely moderate, and might all be limited to six propositions: the first of which was, that Louis XVI. should be liberated from prison, and restored to such authority as he had possessed previously to the 10th of August. Dumouriez says that, by way of answer, he gave the Prussian colonel a copy of the decree which changed the National Assembly into a Convention, and the monarchy into a republic. He adds that Colonel Manstein was grievously afflicted at this intelligence, and that he himself "was extremely sorry that things had been carried to such an extremity, more especially as he did not perceive any remedy." He dispatched a French colonel to the Prussian camp, and drew up a long memorial, in which he threw all the blame of the war on the House of Austria, and laboured to persuade the King of Prussia that it was his interest to detach himself instantly from the emperor and the coalition. He says that the only answer he got to this paper was another memorial from the Duke of Brunswick, which had been drawn up by the emigrants some time before. In the 'Mémoires d'un Homme d'Etat,' attributed to Hardenberg, the Prussian minister, it is said, however, in the plainest terms, that Dumouriez entered into an agreement with the Duke of Brunswick not to molest his retreat, if he would only evacuate the French territory at once; that the executive government, and especially Dan-ton, gladly recognised and agreed to this arrangement; and that the King of Prussia was induced to enter into it from a conviction, artfully instilled by the French, that if he advanced, or fought another battle, or delayed his departure, the lives of Louis XVI. and his family would be sacrificed by the uncontrollable fury of the Parisians, whereas, if the army of the coalition retired quietly out of France, their lives would be in no danger whatever. The same authority also states that the Prussians held private conferences with Kellermann and Dillon; that Major Massenbach, pretending that he merely meant to arrange about the exchange of prisoners, repaired to the head-quarters of Kellermann, whom he found surrounded by the two sons of the Duke of Orleans, General Dillon, Labarolière, and others; that Massenbach dined with them; that the conversation turned upon the affair of Valmy and the political situation of France; that after dinner Massenbach talked a good deal with Dillon, who begged him to tell the King of Prussia and the Duke of Brunswick that, as the republican party were triumphant in Paris, the King of France and the royal family could only be saved by the coalition consenting to recognise the republic and make immediate peace with it; that Dillon added, but in a very low tone of voice, that peace would very soon annihilate the republic, by giving play to factions and parties, some of whom, a little sooner or later, would be sure to re-establish Louis XVI. on his throne; but that if, on the contrary, the coalition persevered in the war, the French monarchy and all the nobility would be lost for ever; that he (Dillon) considered his own death as certain; that it was idle to think of restoring the princes and emigrants, who were despised and detested by the whole nation; that Dillon then drew Massenbach to a window, pretending to show him a pleasant prospect, and cautiously whispered in his ear, "Warn the King of Prussia that they are preparing at Paris a plan for invading Germany, as they know very well there are no German troops on the Rhine, and hope that this movement will hasten your retreat." These were all very proper arguments to prove—what, however, wanted no proof—that the Prussians had better be gone. It is confidently asserted that Louis XVI., from his prison in the Temple, entreated the King of Prussia to withdraw his troops from France, as the only means of saving him and his family from a horrible death. Fantin Desodoards, who was a member of the Convention, and who wrote two histories of the revolution, solemnly affirms that he received this fact from Manuel, who, with Pétion and Kersaint, went to the king in his prison, and induced him to write the letter by assuring him that his life and the lives of his wife and children depended on his compliance. He adds that afterwards, when the Convention condemned him to the guillotine, Louis was heard to say to those near him, "Surely Pétion, Manuel, and Kersaint have not voted for my death!" But Fantin Desodoard's judgment and authority are not entitled to very much respect. Dumouriez says nothing about any such letter, and Hardenberg, or the author of the Memoirs attributed to him, expressly denies that there was ever any letter of the kind from Louis. Servan, the Girondist war-minister, accounts for the report by saying that the King of Prussia eagerly desired a precise account of the actual condition of the royal family; that hereupon Dumouriez wrote to Danton, who employed Manuel to obtain a certificate from the commune, with copies of all the decisions which had been come to on the subject of the treatment of Louis XVI. and his family, in order that they might be sent to the King of Prussia; and that Manuel's going to the Temple with Pétion and Kersaint gave rise to the report about this letter.

While these messages and papers were passing, the French army, completely cut off from Châlons and the rich country, was suffering almost as much as the Prussians; and the politicians at Paris, looking only at the fact that the Duke of Brunswick had got between them and Dumouriez, kept sending their general letters, and imperative orders to abandon his position and retreat behind the Marne. But Dumouriez told his men, when they clamoured for bread, that the Prussians were feeding on their dead horses; that they had got hog's-lard, rice, and flour, and so might make cakes, to which liberty would give a relish; and he set the orders from Paris at defiance. To Servan, who taxed him with a culpable obstinacy in remaining in his camp at Ste. Menéould, and who told him that the Prussian hulans were making incursions to the very gates of Rheims, laying waste all before them, he replied, with proper mettle, "I will not alter my plan on account of a few foragers. There are more than 10,000 men in Rheims; let them come out, pursue, and slay these hulans." He says that at one time Kellermann insisted that the orders of the minister-at-war ought to be obeyed, and that the army ought to get behind the Marne. His troops were several times very mutinous; but the worst danger of all proceeded from the arrival of three Jacobin commissioners from the Convention—Sillery, Carra, and Prieur—who administered the oath to the troops to be true to the republic which had been established by the 10th of August and the subsequent massacres. Sillery, Dumouriez says, was eloquent, subtle, and seductive; Carra, so well known by his newspapers, possessed a rhetoric suited to the populace, and ever since 1789 he had been the disorganiser of the armies, and the protector of all the common soldiers in a state of mutiny and insurrection; while Prieur was a most violent and fierce Jacobin, and, moreover, a native of Champagne, which had furnished many of the soldiers of this army. The three commissioners had been charged to make him leave his camp and cross the Marne; at a word from them the Jacobinised soldiery would have taken off Dumouriez's head, and sent it to the Convention in a sack or on a pike; but he talked them over, won their good will, convinced them that the terrors at Paris were ill-founded, and made them agree to wait six days longer, at the end of which, if the Prussians did not retreat, he would pass the Marne and throw himself between them and the capital.

Various stories were told at the time, and some of them are still repeated, to account for the Duke of Brunswick's retreat; but the simple truth appears to have been, that he went because he could not stay, or because there was not the slightest use or the faintest hope of good in his remaining where he was, isolated, wasted by disease, in want of everything, and with half a million of men gradually gathering around him. If he had tarried but a few days longer, he and the army, the King of Prussia and the emigrant princes, must all have been taken prisoners. On the 30th of September, at the dead of night, he struck his camp, having sent before him his artillery and heavy baggage. He marched about a league; and this beginning of his retreat was executed with perfect order. On the morning of the 1st of October Dumouriez detached General Dampier to occupy the abandoned camp of La Lune, which was found strewed with the carcasses of men and horses, and offering such startling proofs of the epidemic malady or maladies which had been raging there, that Dampier precipitately abandoned the post, lest his men should be infected. Dumouriez has been often accused of taking gold from the Duke of Brunswick or from the King of Prussia, to connive at an easy, unmolested retreat: but, in truth, the retreat was not altogether unmolested; and, though the Prussians could not keep the advance they had gained, they knew how to retire like soldiers, and their compact mass was not to be attacked in open field with impunity. Dumouriez, too, gives a consistent account of the numerous causes which delayed pursuit, and prevented him from giving battle in full force: the generals serving under him disputed his orders; Kellermann, pretending to an equal authority with him, chose a route and a plan of operations of his own; and none showed any alacrity in the pursuit except General Dillon, who hung upon Brunswick's rear and did considerable mischief; but, venturing too far, Dillon and his corps d'armée had a narrow escape from being annihilated by the division of Prince Hohenlohe. The Prussians got safely through the forest of Argonne by the pass of Grandpré; and, once beyond that defile, they were comparatively safe, except from the horrible disease which continued to thin their ranks. They withdrew their garrisons from Verdun and Longwi, abandoned everything they had taken, and thought of nothing but of getting across the Rhine. By the end of October about 50,000 of the 80,000 men who had entered France in the beginning of August, to conquer the Jacobins, and restore Louis XVI. to his throne, arrived at Coblenz, quite as indignant against the emigrants as they were against the unconquered sans-culottes. Not only during the advance, when their hopes were extravagantly sanguine, but also on their retreat, when their hopes were all blighted, and when nothing was before their eyes but a continued exile, and privation and beggary, these French noblesse displayed all their pride, petulance, and want of discretion, quarrelling for precedence, disputing furiously about words, and things more trifling than words, and taking little care to conceal the contempt in which they held their rough German allies. But in other points they were equally true to their old character: they fought gallantly on every occasion that presented itself; and, when their quarrels and altercations were over, they could laugh and sing in the midst of their misfortunes, and make excellent bons-mots about the plight they were in.* Dumouriez, whose vanity was at least equal to his genius, hurried to Paris to show himself at the theatres, to receive compliments and laurel crowns, to solicit for more troops in order that he might conquer Belgium, to see which party was getting strongest in the Convention, and to make friends accordingly. In many respects his reception was as flattering as he could have desired; but some of the Jacobins thought that he had not done all that he might have done, and other Jacobins were mortally offended at his having punished some federates who had brutally massacred four deserters from the emigrants. He says the ministers Roland, Servan, Clavières, Lebrun, Monge, and Danton, "who appeared to be living together in the utmost cordiality," carried him to two public entertainments, where he was greatly applauded; and a celebrated lady of Paris invited him to a "charming festival," at which all the actors of the different theatres of Paris complimented him. Many members of the Convention, and some of the ministers, accompanied him to this last fête; and all was joy and brilliancy, when a deputation of three members from the Jacobin Club, uninvited and unannounced, stalked into the salon, and insisted on speaking with General Dumouriez. The commissioners—all three members of the Convention, as well as of the club—were Marat, Bentabole, and Montaut. Marat, who was spokesman, looked at him with savage eyes, and summoned him, in a brutal manner, to tell him how he could have had the audacity to commit violent and tyrannical acts against good patriots and estimable citizens? Dumouriez, looking scornfully at him, said, "Ah! you are he they call Marat: I have nothing to say to such as you!" and then turned his back upon the blear-eyed monster. He however spoke with the two other Jacobin envoys, Bentabole and Montaut, and flattered himself that he had made them listen to reason. He presented himself once in the Jacobin Club, where, he says, he met with a gracious reception. Minister-of-justice Danton presided on the occasion. The club indulged in some facetiæ.

* The great Goëthe, who accompanied this miserable expedition, and who made experiments, on the height near Ste. Menéould, on what he calls the "cannon fever," has given some striking sketches of the retreat in his 'Hermann and Dorothea,' and 'Campaign in France.'

BOMBARDMENT OF LILLE, Oct. 1792. From "Tableaux Historique de la Revolution Française."

"Collot d'Herbois, formerly a very bad comedian, and since become the exterminating angel of the city of Lyons, made the members laugh by saying to the general, 'You are going to conquer Brussels: you will find my wife there, you must embrace her.'" "Three weeks after," adds Dumouriez, "the general took Brussels, but he did not see Collot d'Herbois's wife, and he easily forgot the commission he had received from that orator." Well had it been for Dumouriez if Marat had forgotten the slight he had received from him!

The Duke of Saxe-Teschen commanded in the Netherlands. When the French found themselves obliged to withdraw the greater part of their army from that frontier, in order to oppose the Duke of Brunswick, Saxe-Teschen, after a succession of feigned attacks along the lines, dashed across the frontier to make a real attack on Lille, one of the strongest fortified towns of France. As a regular siege was impossible with the limited means at his disposal, he began a terrible bombardment. The inhabitants of the town were, however, better patriots and heroes than the people of Longwi and Verdun; and, instead of forcing the garrison to capitulate, they assisted them in defending the place. When the bombardment had lasted six days, and when some two or three hundred houses had been burnt or knocked to pieces, the Austrians were obliged to withdraw by the rapid approach of two corps d'armée, each of which was numerically superior to their own force; and on the 7th or 8th of October, as the Duke of Brunswick was retreating from the passes of the Argonne, Saxe-Teschen crossed his own frontier. He was very soon followed by Dumouriez, who arrived at Valenciennes on the 27th of October, and took the command of the two armies assembled in and under that town.

On the 4th of November the French entered the Austrian Netherlands in nine columns; and on the 5th, being reinforced by another corps d'armée under d'Harville, they came up with the Duke of Saxe-Teschen, who occupied an excellent position on some wooded hills near the village of Jemappe. But, if the Austrian position was good, their disproportion in number was very great, Saxe-Teschen not having more than fifteen or sixteen thousand men to oppose the fifty or sixty thousand French under Dumouriez. On the afternoon of the 5th some skirmishing took place. On the morning of the 6th the French began a general action by cannonading, to which the Austrians replied from some well-placed redoubts. This heavy firing continued without intermission, and without any great effect on either side, till ten o'clock, when the young Duke of Chartres, or, as he was now called, young Egalité, recommended an attack with fixed bayonets.* From eleven o'clock till one in the afternoon several charges were attempted, but every time the French were driven back by cannon ball and grape-shot. At one time their centre, after losing a great number of men, was thrown into complete disorder, and was not rallied by the young Duke of Chartres without extreme difficulty. While the duke returned to the centre to attack the village of Jemappe on Saxe-Teschen's right, Dumouriez, putting himself at the head of two fresh brigades, and singing the Marseillaise hymn, "Allons, enfans de la patrie," moved rapidly to attack some redoubts to wards the enemy's left. He was accompanied by several regiments or strong squadrons of horse, and, not relying solely on the bayonet, he carried some light artillery with him. These redoubts were defended by some Hungarian grenadiers, who fought most desperately; but attacking by the gorge of the redoubts, and bringing their artillery within musket-shot, the French at length carried the works, when a fearful butchery of the Hungarians ensued. Dumouriez, anxious about his centre, put himself at the head of his cavalry, and was proceeding at a smart trot to its succour, when he met the young Duke of Montpensier, who was galloping to tell him that the centre was victorious, and that his brother had gained possession of the village of Jemappe after a bloody engagement. This decided the affair: it was only two o'clock, and the Austrians were in full retreat for Mons. The conquered moved off in admirable order, carrying with them all their artillery except seven or eight pieces; the conquerors had scarcely secured their victory ere they were seized with a terrible panic, and, imagining that the Austrians had undermined the hill and that they would all be blown into the air, five battalions abandoned the heights they had gained, and fled in the utmost disorder to a village at some distance. Dumouriez says that it was in consequence of this panic, and of the cowardice of one of his generals and of the disobedience of others, that he could not molest the Duke of Saxe-Teschen on his retreat. The battle of Jemappe decided the fate of the Netherlands, so miserably weak was the force collected for the defence of that rich country, and so disaffected were the Belgians to the House of Austria. Dumouriez states his own loss in killed and wounded at 2000, and that of the Imperialists at twice that number; but there is reason to doubt whether, from the nature of the combat and of the ground, and from the want of pursuit, the French did not lose as many men as the Austrians. On the 8th Tournay opened its gates to Labourdonnaye, Dumouriez's second in command; Courtrai, Menin, and Bruges, which had been well Jacobinised beforehand, sent deputations to the commander-in-chief and to the Convention; and, as soon as the intelligence of the battle of Jemappe arrived, the French commandant of Dunkirk, with only 1800 foot and 200 horse, marched to Nieuport and Ostend, which received him with joy. Without a single musket having been fired, all

* The Duke of Orleans, on being elected a member of the Convention, had taken the name of Philippe Egalité, or Philippe Egalité. Dodsley's Annual Register and other works of the day speak of General Egalité and of the bravery he displayed at Jemappe, without any notion that he was the Duke of Chartres, the son of the Duke of Orleans.

Flanders was subdued—or rather, the people joined the French and removed every obstacle to their progress. The exultation of the Flemings and Brabanters was in the course of a very few weeks considerably damped by the arrival of Jacobin commissioners from the Assembly, who plundered them most mercilessly, levying contributions, taxing and harrowing them, as if they had really been a conquered people. Even Dumouriez himself gave them a sad proof of what they had to expect: for almost as soon as he had entered Mons, where the inhabitants received him with the utmost joy, he issued an ordinance requiring from the clergy a forced loan of one year of their revenues; and subsequently, in managing contracts for provisions, he forced the Belgian contractors to accept of payment in French paper money, which was every day becoming more discredited and worthless. His excuse is, that the Convention had no money to give him, and that the troops, engaging in a winter campaign, were almost naked. It was the 11th of November before he could move from Mons to look after the Duke of Saxe-Teschen, who had continued to retire with his small force in admirable order. Between Mons and Brussels his van, advancing too rapidly, was attacked and almost beaten by the Austrian rear; but he extricated himself with his usual bravery and address, and the Austrians continued their retreat, as they saw the heads of other French columns approaching. Saxe-Teschén, who was at Brussels, evacuated that indefensible town, and from that moment many of his people began to desert to the French. Old Marshal Bender, who had once so terrified the Belgian patriots by the threat of pulling on his boots, was left in Brussels, not to offer any resistance, which was impracticable, but merely to arrange a capitulation. On the evening of the 13th the marshal was summoned by the Alsatian Westermann, become a colonel in the armies of the French republic by virtue of his exploits in the Tuileries on the 10th of August. Old Bender made the best terms he could, and on the 14th Dumouriez entered Brussels amidst the acclamations of the people and shouts of "Long live the French! Long live liberty and equality!" Almost the first thing he did was to borrow 80,000 florins from the municipal treasury of that capital, and 300,000 livres, without interest, from a banker of the place. But Dumouriez's borrowing was a flea-bite compared with other sharp operations which followed immediately after. We dwell somewhat upon the particulars, because they convey a pretty correct notion of what, from the first, was practised by the French in all the countries into which they carried liberty and equality, and the blessed Rights of Man. The executive at Paris sent into the country a commission which they termed a "committee of purchases." It was composed of the Swiss banker Bidermann, the partner of finance-minister Clavière, a Flemish speculator belonging to Ostend, and three Jews from Strasburg, the sons of a man who had made his name proverbial by the successful rogueries he had practised during the Seven Years' War. "These," says Dumouriez, "were the five worthies to whom were intrusted the fate of Belgium and the interests of France. It was the minister Clavière who had brought this machine into play, with the help of the faction of the Gironde, the greater part of whom now possessed some capital, and became riders to these contractors disguised under the name of administrators. Poor Roland may, perhaps, have been deceived by sophisms, and the ministers Monge and Pache may possibly have been drawn into the scheme by their clerks, who found their account in promoting it." The committee of purchases were to make all the bargains for the army, and to pay the Belgians in assignats, not at the value affixed to them in Paris, where nobody would take them except at a tremendous discount, but at the same rate as coined money; and they were instructed by those enlightened ministers, Roland, Pache, and Monge, to establish in all things a uniformity of price, or a maximum. These regulations brought swarms of stock-jobbers and Bourse speculators of all kinds round the French army; and these speculators bought the specie from the soldiers who were paid in hard cash, and gave them assignats according to their real value at Paris; or they gave the soldier a hundred or a hundred and twenty sous in paper for his fifty sous in silver—and then the soldier who had given his fifty sous for his paper forced the poor Belgian dealer or shopkeeper to take it from him as a hundred or a hundred and twenty sous, or at whatever figure was printed on the note. A republican trooper would buy three sous' worth of tobacco, tender an assignat for fifty sous, and demand the difference in specie: if the poor Belgian remonstrated, he was asked whether he would oppose the will of the republic, which had freed his country from the yoke of Austria, and which was going to give liberty to all the countries of the world? or, if he waxed stubborn in his resistance to this robbery, or lost his temper, he got, in all probability, kicks and plats de sabre. The magistrates entreated the general to direct that the tradesmen should not be obliged to receive assignats at all: but what could Dumouriez do?—He could not fly in the teeth of the Convention and its executive—he durst not depreciate the paper money, for that would be doing a great injury to France! There seemed no reason to fear that they would ever want assignats so long as there were rags in France to convert into paper. Four hundred, five hundred, and at last eight hundred workmen were constantly employed in making this paper money; and a finance minister of the revolution has boasted that assignats to the value of from two to three millions of francs or livres were often printed, numbered, and stamped, all in one day*—and this, too, at a time when they were making assignats of ten and fifteen sous, and when there was no printing-machine and steam-engine to speed their labours. Previously to the battle of Jemappe there were many French emigrants in Brussels and other towns: they were now retreating with Saxe-Teschén, and in their hurry they left effects and property behind them. To all this the republic, not very unreasonably, laid claim; but, when the commissaries and the soldiery once began seizing and confiscating, they knew not where to stop, and soon lost all discrimination between Belgian property and emigrant property. As soon as the Austrian flag was struck, a great Jacobin club was established in Brussels. It was composed partly of the soldiers and officers of Dumouriez's army, and partly of Belgian sans-culottes—democrats and revolutionists by profession, who had finished their education in the Paris clubs or in the French ranks. These men had nearly all some spite to gratify against the better-conditioned inhabitants, some personal enemies to denounce to the club, and their feeling about equality was quite as rabid as that of the Parisian clubbists. In less than a week this club spread terror through Brussels. Having called upon all the towns in Belgium to raise and equip volunteer corps and militia, Dumouriez left Brussels on the 19th of November, when Labourdonnaye was already laying siege to Antwerp, while Valence was blockading Namur. He captured Mechlin, where he found a great quantity of ammunition and arms, and an excellent foundry for casting cannon. This enabled him to improve the equipment of his troops, and to arm crowds of volunteers who had come from France, where they had been starving for want of employment, to take part in this harvest of glory and gain. The situation of France continued for years to furnish the like adventurers in prodigious numbers, for there was starvation at home, and no calling within the reach of the common run of men was half so profitable as that of arms. To these numbers must be added numbers—not inconsiderable—of downright republican enthusiasts; and of men passionately fond of war for the mere sake of war and its glories; and again other numbers who could only be safe from the Jacobins and the guillotine by throwing themselves into the ranks of marching armies. All this enabled the revolutionary generals to be careless whether a given operation cost them some thousands of lives more or less; the immense numbers which fell were replaced by fresh arrivals: the want of regular employment at home, and the system of terror, were by themselves sufficient to recruit their armies. On the 22nd Dumouriez was astonished by finding the Duke of Saxe-Teschén firmly posted at Tirlémont. Another battle took place. The Austrians, though defeated, continued their retreat in admirable order, abandoning the country foot by foot, and fighting again on the 27th in front of Liège. This last engagement continued during the whole day; and, though the Austrians then moved off and left Liège open to the French, they left Dumouriez in no condition to pursue them. At the beginning of this war of the revolution many of the Austrian retreats, if properly examined, will be found to be more extraordinary things than the French victories. Liège, which swarmed with revolutionists and Jacobins, who in various ways had hampered the operations of the emperor's general, welcomed Dumouriez as a deliverer on the 28th. The strong fortress of Antwerp surrendered about the same time to the Peruvian Miranda, whom Dumouriez had sent to supersede Labourdonnaye; Namur surrendered to Valence on the 2nd of December; and thus, exactly one month after opening the campaign, the French found themselves completely masters of all the Austrian Netherlands, excepting the Duchy of Luxembourg.

The sans-culottes of Liège were fiercer than those of Brussels. "The people of Liège," says the hero and planner of the campaign, "adopted with a degree of fury all the excesses of the French revolution. Fabry, the mayor, who had aided the first revolution at Liège, and been the martyr of it, lost all his credit as soon as he spoke in favour of a reasonable constitution. A club was formed in the city; it was exceedingly ardent and unruly: the missionaries, whom the Jacobins sent from Paris, formed another, which blamed all the operations of the former, and accused it of aristocracy: the quarrel between them was carried so far that a civil war was likely to ensue. The French troops took part with one or the other, according to their private inclinations. The general became mediator between the two parties, without being able to make them agree. Those who inhabited the faubourgs beyond the Meuse were, according to the French expression, perfectly at the height of the revolution, for they would not listen to anything else than absolute equality and pillage. Those who inhabited the town, on the other hand, wished for a constitution; but, in consequence of metaphysical subtleties, they did not well know what they wished for. An attempt was made to prevail upon them to form a national Convention. The country was divided into districts with a considerable degree of ingenuity. Commissioners selected from the two clubs were sent into all these districts. Fabry, the mayor, and the provincial administration, were in the mean time continued, and at the end of a month no progress whatever had been made, and men's minds were deranged anew by the Jacobins and the commissioners of the French Convention. The secret intention at Paris was not that the people of Liège, and still less those of Belgium, should unite as a national body, to give themselves a constitution and laws: they were afraid lest, when once assembled, these two countries should know their own strength and found an independent republic. This, however, would have been consonant with the real interest of France, which, by means of a sage conduct, would have procured a good ally, and would not have acquired the odious character of a conqueror and a spoiler. But the desire of getting possession of the gold of Belgium, and laying hands on the property of a rich clergy, presented another political system to the managers of the Convention. They wished, by overwhelming that unhappy country with tumult and disorder, to force it either to throw itself into the arms of France, or to commit some excesses which would afford a pretext for treating the inhabitants as enemies. The country of Liège was poor and ruined: the people are proud, hasty, warlike, impatient of subjection, and very ready to run into excesses. It was the policy of the Jacobins of Paris to excite this nation to anarchy, in order to press Belgium between the two chaps of a vice, and force it to follow the same course with France. The people of Liège, divided among themselves, supposed they should agree together in consequence of a union with France: they have, however, only completed the measure of their former evils, and deprived themselves of the means of defending their liberty. What determined the most moderate to join the sans-culottes of the other side of the Meuse, in favour of this union, was the consideration of their being too small a country to form an independent state: they also distrusted the Belgians, who would not sacrifice their religion and their clergy; and, considering themselves in an advanced position, destitute of fortified places, and their territory easily invaded, they imagined that, on their becoming French, the republic would defend their liberty." * Danton and Lacroix were the two commissioners that were sent by the Convention to Liege, as to other parts of the country. They plundered remorselessly: Lacroix, when he returned to Paris, carrying with him waggon-loads of furniture, pictures, carvings, plate, and other commodities—a spoliation worthy of the worst of the proconsuls of ancient Rome. It appears that he and Danton repeated their visit twice after this, plundering the churches and the municipalities—nay, the very army of the republic itself. But this was not all the work they did. At their first visit they pushed on the inhabitants of the other side of the Meuse—the part of the city inhabited by the poorer classes—to every species of revolutionary excess, observing that their revolution had been a great deal too mild, that democratic revolutions could be cemented only by the blood of aristocrats, and reproaching them for not having cut off heads. Many acts of violence were committed, the vengeance of individuals were satiated, and some hasty assassinations were perpetrated, but the Liegeois were not found sufficiently “at the height of the revolution” to imitate the Parisians in their vast massacres and their coolness and regularity in taking off heads.

Dumouriez, having sent Miranda forward to Ruremonde, wished to continue his winter campaign by capturing Maestricht, by calling up the Dutch democrats, and by revolutionizing Holland and all those Seven United Provinces. It was true the Dutch government had not declared war or entered into the coalition against France, but its predilection for the Austrians, Prussians, and emigrants, and its aversion to the French revolution, were not disguised;—and then, without Maestricht no one could be master of the Meuse—and without Holland Belgium might prove but an uneasy possession—the Dutch garrison of Maestricht was so temptingly weak—the provinces altogether were so little prepared for any attack. “The Dutch had not made any preparations for war. Their government being taken by surprise, and distrusting the patriotic party, would have endeavoured to gain time; on the other hand, the Dutch democrats, emboldened by the capture of Maestricht, would have resumed courage; a coalition would naturally have been formed between the Dutch, the Liegeois, and the Belgian patriots, and France would have been girded on that side by a wall of revolted nations. It was impossible to exaggerate the advantages resulting from such an aggression at this epoch. The general’s motives were very legitimate, for, indeed, it was only by occupying Maestricht and Venlo that the preservation of Belgium could be insured.” † But, greatly to Dumouriez’s mortification, the Convention and the executive would not send him the order to attack the Dutch; thinking it better, for the present, to “maintain a neutrality with the stadtholder, until the Dutch democrats were better prepared for insurrection. Thus circumstanced, he resolved to capture Aix-la-Chapelle. But he was sadly impeded by a pestilent Jacobin poet, Ronsin, who had been sent by the Convention to superintend the civil concerns of his army; his soldiers, still badly clad, were falling sick (whole regiments of them were infected with the itch); his military chest was again empty, and no movement could be undertaken without money. He, however, borrowed 114,000 livres from the seven collegiate churches of Liege, and got his army in motion. On the 7th of December the Austrians fought another battle; but they were far too weak to secure or cover Aix-la-Chapelle, and on the 8th Dumouriez entered the ancient city of Charlemagne as a conqueror. On the 12th, when little more than ten leagues from the Rhine, he put his army into winter-quarters.

But it was not alone in the Netherlands that the French, from being invaded, became invaders. Dillon’s whispers into Major Massenbach’s ears were no fable; the energetic men of Paris had really resolved that Germany should be invaded. General Custine, who had been attached to the French army on the Upper Rhine, commanded by Biron, made, with 18,000 or 20,000 men, a dash into the little circles of the empire, where there were no troops in the field, and none but weak garrisons in the fortresses. These silly German electors had all been indulging in the pleasant dream that the Duke of Brunswick would get to Paris, and therefore they had not thought it necessary to make any extra exertions. Spires and Worms capitulated to Custine on the 30th of September and 5th of October, and on the 21st of October Mayence (Mentz) threw open its gates, all the garrison laying down their arms, except some eight hundred Austrians who marched out and joined the grand army of the Coalition. All these successes could have been obtained only through the disaffection of these Germans to their rulers, and the dissemination among them of French principles. Custine had no artillery or material for conducting any siege, and the least resistance must have preserved Mayence: but the town and university were full of democrats and believers in the new exposition of the Rights of Man; and these men had secret intelligence with Custine before he approached the place, and as soon as he had summoned it they urged the necessity of an immediate capitulation. In all directions the first progress of the republican armies was favoured by the people of the countries they invaded, so that the French press and their political propagandists were indeed of more service than French artillery. Custine soon gave the speculative Germans some cause for regretting the welcome they had given him. Quitting the banks of the Rhine, he rushed to Frankfort on the Maine. This free commercial town had remained neutral in all the wars, and her neutrality had been respected by the armies of kings and emperors; but these republicans were not so scrupulous, and they resolved to plunder it, notwithstanding the fact that the people were disposed in their favour, and were wishing them every success. They entered the open undefended place on the 27th of October, and levied contributions in the most rapacious manner. In this marauding expedition Custine exposed his force to be cut off by the Prussians, who were at Coblenz, or by the Elector Palatine, who had an army at Manheim; but the Prussians who attempted it were, as usual, too slow, and the Palatine adhered to a treaty of neutrality, though the French had broken it.

Ever since the time of Louis XIV. the French had pretended that the natural frontiers of their country were the river Rhine and the high chain of the Alps; and that Belgium, Savoy, and Nice, which lay within these limits, belonged to France by the assignment of nature. Dumouriez, when minister, had recommended, as a beginning, the conquest and permanent occupation of these countries. We have seen how easily he overran one of them. General Montesquiou, beginning earlier in the season, found Savoy quite as easy a conquest; and General Anselme, who was detached by Montesquiou, and reinforced by six thousand Marseillaise, moved under the maritime Alps to make a prey of Nice. In both these possessions of the King of Sardinia, the propagandists had long been at work, and their labours had been attended with very great success. "The words of innovators," says the historian of the Italian part of this mighty revolution, "made more impression on the minds of the people than the arguments of their adversaries: the people are always greedy of novelty, and those who cover themselves with the veil of the public good, and promise advantages, must have more force than those who defend established order and privileges."* There were too, in all the dominions of Vittorio Amedeo, abuses and absurdities of government, and many of the worst symptoms of an absolute monarchy in decrepitude: so that some of the best citizens, though averse to a sanguinary or violent revolution, felt the indispensable necessity of some great reforms. Notwithstanding the demonstrations of the court of Turin, and the asylum it had given to the French princes and others at the beginning of the emigration,—notwithstanding the dread and horror Vittorio Amedeo was known to entertain of the revolution, and indeed of all political changes,—the revolutionary statesmen had not been altogether without hope of gaining his Sardinian majesty for an ally. At least they had repeatedly sent agents, both public and secret, to Turin (as also to other Italian states), to represent how great and glorious a thing it would be to drive the Austrians out of Lombardy, and so leave the whole of Italy in Italian hands; and to intimate that, if the French were only allowed a free passage across the Alps, and through Piemonte and the territories of the republic of Genoa, they would soon be at Milan, and overthrow for ever the odious dominion of the Germans. As for any apprehensions that this would be merely a change of masters, and that the French might not be satisfied with that part or portion of Italy which had contented Austria, how could they be entertained against a free and just people who had solemnly renounced conquest? If these reasonings had no effect, or an effect directly opposite to that proposed, upon the minds of Vittorio Amedeo and his ministers, they yet made some impression among certain classes of the Piemontese—a quick, excitable people, fond of war and adventure, and by no means averse to political craft and intrigue. These ardent spirits were flattered with the prospect of extending their own frontier far into Italy—of occupying all that the Austrians now held. A prudent silence was probably observed as to the natural frontiers of France; but they were not likely to care very much about the small district of Nice, or the poor and hungry country of Savoy, which lay beyond the Alps, and the people of which had a different language, different interests, and different prejudices from their own. Semonville, who had been sent by Lafayette into Belgium at the time of the first insurrection in that country, was sent into Piemonte to preach disaffection to the people, and to make fresh and more tempting offers to the king. He was instructed to tell Vittorio Amedeo, that, if he would unite with France and grant a passage to her troops, the French would guarantee all his dominions, cede to him Lombardy and all that they might conquer from the emperor, and, furthermore, *put down the turbulent spirits who were aiming at revolution, both in Piemonte and in Savoy. His Sardinian majesty, who had already promised at least free passage to the Austrians, now descending through the Tyrol into Italy, and advancing towards Piemonte, sent orders to stop Semonville, who was coming to Turin from Genoa, at the fortified town of Alesandria, through which his route lay. Semonville was stopped accordingly, and politely informed that the sooner he quitted the territories of his majesty the better. The French agent returned to Genoa, and at Paris those who had sent him raised a terrible outcry in the National Assembly, which ended in a declaration of war against Vittorio Amedeo. But several days before this declaration of hostilities, the Girondist executive had given peremptory orders to General Montesquiou to attack Savoy, and drive all the troops of the king of Sardinia across the Alps, as these troops had been collected for no other purpose than to invade France, and to co-operate with the coalition. Before any blow was struck, the French had made pretty sure of the Savoyards, who hated the Piemontese; and, by a variety of ingenious devices, they had gained all the information they wanted. A republican general, who thought it no shame to play the part of a spy, took the dress and the name of an Irish priest; and imposed sadly on the credulity of Colegno, the commandant of Chambery, the little capital of Savoy, and also upon the too easy faith of Count Perrone, the governor-general of the duchy. Other emissaries went among the citizens and the people, explaining the stupendous benefits they must derive from the French system, the promulgation of the Rights of Man, the overthrow of the aristocracy, and a fresh division of property. Montesquiou knew that the Savoyards would everywhere join him; and that the troops of the king of Sardinia, about which so much talk had been made, did not really exceed ten thousand men, and these, too, scattered over the country, through the false security or the treachery of those who had the command over them. On the night of the 21st of September, in the midst of a hurricane and torrents of rain, the republicans dashed across the frontier of Savoy, and took by surprise the important fortress of Sanparellian, which was garrisoned only by a handful of Piemontese. With fifteen thousand men, and twenty pieces of artillery, Montesquiou threw himself between the two chief divisions of the king's small army, which were never able to reunite on this side of the Alps. The detachments which had been thrown here and there in the most absurd manner, and the insignificant garrisons which had been left in a few fortresses without provisions, and almost without ammunition, abandoned their posts, and fled in a panic. Without losing a man, almost without firing a gun, the French reached Chambery, and were there received with transports of joy by the Savoyard patriots. After making a triumphal entrance, and installing a provisory council of government, composed of ardent democrats, who were invited to consider the expediency of an immediate union and incorporation with the French republic, Montesquiou advanced a few miles on the road that led to the pass of Mont-Cenis, and took the formidable fortress of Montmelian, which had been abandoned by its garrison, although well furnished with powder, ball, and provisions. The soldiers who behaved in this unsoldierlike manner were, for the most part, Piemontese—were men not wanting in courage or in loyalty, but they saw treachery at work all round them, and they thought that they had as much to fear from the Savoyards as from the French. The season was too far advanced, the snows were gathering too thickly on the Alps, to allow Montesquiou to penetrate into the long defile of St. Jean de Maurienne, or into any of the upper parts of Savoy; besides, this advance was unnecessary, unless he intended to descend on the other side of the Alps to the plains of Piemonte, for the docile Savoyards, who were too poor to be plundered, were sure to submit to the French republicans, or to whatever council of government they might choose to set up at Chambery. On the side of Nice there was the same mixture of imbecility and treachery in those who commanded for the King of Sardinia, and the same sympathy among the people for the French and their enticing principles. Anselme crossed the river Var, which there forms the frontier, on the night of the 23rd of September. An inconsiderable corps d'armée, composed of Piemontese and Sardinians, retreated in the greatest confusion, and, without firing a shot, left the city of Nice open to the invaders. Two hundred grenadiers, who threw themselves into Villa-Franca with some disorderly militia, surrendered at discretion, giving up to the French one hundred pieces of artillery, magazines full of ammunition and materials of war, a frigate, and a corvette. Without the least exertion, except that of marching to their prey, the republicans got possession of all that sea-board, of all the lower part of the country of Nice lying between the maritime Alps and the Mediterranean, save and except only the citadel of Mont-Albano that stands on a high and pointed rock overhanging the town of Nice. To co-operate in this war of coasts the Girondist executive had dispatched from the near port of Toulon Admiral Truguet with eleven ships of the line, some frigates, and other vessels, having on board 2000 land troops. This fleet now came to anchor, and assisted in the siege of Mont-Albano, which very soon capitulated. Before the siege Truguet had been cruising up and down the coast, and the constant sight of his formidable force, and the uncertainty as to the point where he might land the troops, had bewildered and disheartened the Piemontese and Sardinians. After the surrender of Mont-Albano, the French advanced as far as Saorgio, a strong fortress, which commands the entrance of the pass of Col-di-Tenda. A part of the Piemontese army, who had been joined by some of the newly-arrived Austrian troops, here met them manfully, and drove them back with some loss. Anselme renewed the combat a day or two after with his entire force; he gained possession of the post; but here he was obliged to halt, and he could never get beyond Saorgio. In proportion as he increased his distance from the populous city of Nice, he found the inhabitants of the country indifferent to or ignorant of the Rights of Man and all that new philosophy, attached to their church and their priests, devoted to their king, and furious against the invaders of his dominions. These feelings and passions were made the stronger by a horrible slaughter that was perpetrated by Truguet and his fleet at Oneglia, a small but thriving town on the coast, the birth-place of the great Andrea Doria. Truguet sent an officer and boat's crew to summon this place to surrender. In the rage of the moment, or—which is at least as probable—through the ignorance of those rough people as to the intention of the French, and as to the respect due to such heralds, some musket shots were fired at the boat, the officer was wounded, and one or two of his men were killed. Truguet forthwith drew up close to the town, and began a tremendous bombardment, throwing shot and shell for hours, as if the safety of his republic depended upon the destruction of that picturesque little place. When the churches and houses seemed half-battered to pieces, he disembarked his land troops, and these, in conjunction with the sailors, put everything to sack, fire, and sword. Some of the inhabitants got out at the back of the town and escaped to the mountains; the rest were butchered; and Oneglia was left a heap of smoking ruins. Half a century has passed since these horrors were committed, but the memory of them has been transmitted from father to son in eloquent and exciting tradition, and there is not at this day on all that coast a mariner or peasant but will recount with flashing eyes the horrible particulars of the destruction of Oneglia. It was pure vengeance, though perhaps not unaccompanied by some intention of working out Danton's problem, faire peur. Oneglia, a detached possession of the king of Sardinia, was surrounded on all sides by the territories of the republic of Genoa, which was at peace with France; the possession of it could have been of little or no use to the French. After this exploit Truguet showed his flag for a time in the port of Genoa, and then returned to Toulon, not without some apprehension of being intercepted by an English fleet, for the British ambassador had withdrawn from Paris in consequence of the dethronement of Louis XVI. and of all that had been done on the 10th of August.

We return to Paris. On the appointed day, the 21st of September, the members elected to the Convention met in the Tuileries, the greater part of which was riddled by the cannon-balls of the 10th of August. The elections for the city of Paris may enable the reader to judge of the spirit and influence under which they had been made, and will convey a tolerably correct notion of the character of the deputies returned by most of the departments. The Parisian deputies were—Robespierre, Danton, Camille Desmoulins, David, Fabre d'Eglantine, Legendre, Panis, Sergent, Billaud Varennes, Augustin Robespierre, Collot d'Herbois, Dussaulx, Freron, MARAT, Philippe Egalité, Thomas, Manuel, Boucher, Beauvais, Raffron, Robert, Lavicomterie, Osselin, and Laignelot. They included in their number all the members of the notorious committee of surveillance of the commune who had directed the égorgeurs or Septembrizers. Among them were three newspaper editors, a butcher, a painter, an actor, an engraver, a prince of the blood royal, two street orators and authors, and one advocate—"which," says Thiers, "represented the confusion and the variety of existences which then agitated the capital of France." The first two returned by the Paris electors were Robespierre and Danton. Their success, about which there never could have been a moment's doubt, was hailed with enthusiastic joy by the Jacobin club and by the commune, who, in fact, had secured their return. Marat had the same all-efficient support, and was passionately recommended to the Parisian electors by Chabot, who treated with contempt the remonstrances of such as represented that the Friend of the People was rather too fond of blood, and was already lying under two criminal accusations. Brissot, who was Marat's rival candidate, had no chance against him, and was obliged to get returned by one of the departments. These elections proved that he and his party could do nothing with Paris, and without

Paris there was no hope of victory to them in the mortal combat they were entering upon with the ultra-Jacobins. After the failure of Brissot, some of the Girondists set up Doctor Priestley against Marat; but the doctor was beaten by the horse-doctor. Some have thought that the losing the honour of representing the city of Paris in the Convention, and his mortification at being beaten by a man like Marat, may have contributed to keep Priestley away from France. Thomas Paine, who had gained additional consideration by publishing the second part of the 'Rights of Man,' was elected by the department of the Pas de Calais. Priestley was elected by the department of L'Orme, but never took his seat in the Convention; "because," as his friends said in the House, "he could not speak our language." Abbé Sieyès, who had not very patiently endured Robespierre's self-denying ordinance, was returned by the department of La Sarthe; and various other members of the first or Constituent Assembly, who had scarcely been heard of since the dissolution of that body, found their way into the Convention. The departments of the south remained tolerably constant to their representatives in the Legislative Assembly, and there was not one Girondist of any note but found a place in the Convention. These Girondists, who had sat on the left before, now took their places on the right, the Jacobins taking the left, and Robespierre with the deputation of Paris and all the most excessive Jacobins seating themselves at the summit of the left (sur la crête de la gauche), from which position they obtained the name—the memorable name—of la Montagne, or the Mountain. What had been called the "Centre" was now called the "Plain;" and, at the beginning, it was occupied by a very considerable portion of the House, some being moderates, some cowards, and a great many mere trimmers, ready to go with the Jacobins or with the Girondists, according to circumstances. The first president appointed was Mayor Pétion. On the first day only 371 members presented themselves; but these were more than enough, and after their elections had been verified they passed from the Tuileries and took possession of the Salle de Manège. The first oration was delivered by Manuel, procureur of the commune, and a man of letters besides. "Representatives of the sovereign people," said he, "the mission with which you are charged would require the power and wisdom of the immortal gods! When Cinesas entered the senate of Rome, he thought he saw an assemblage of kings. A similar comparison would be an insult to you, for here one must see an assemblage of philosophers met to prepare the happiness of the world! I therefore demand that the president of the Convention and of France shall be lodged in the national palace (the Tuileries), that the attributes of the law and the public force be ever at his side, and that every time he comes down to the House all the citizens present receive him standing. The homage thus rendered to the sovereignty of the people will incessantly recall to our minds our rights and our duties!" Manuel was a Girondist, or acting this time under the impulse of that party, and Pétion, another Girondist, would have been the first—as first president of the Convention—to receive these royal honours. The proposition was the first monstrous mistake committed by the Gironde in their new capacity as conventionalists: it provoked the Jacobins and furnished them with excellent materials for popular harangues and newspaper articles, in which the chiefs of the Gironde were held up to execration as men incapable of the true principles of equality, as fools eager for pomp and parade, or as scoundrels that were attempting to get a more than kingly state and power into their own hands. Even in the present debate the Jacobin members raised a storm which ought to have warned them to take in sail. Mathieu ingeniously or ingeniously remarked that he did not think the Convention, which was, indeed, met to prepare the happiness of mankind, ought to begin their labours with such discussions; that the first Assembly had lost a great deal of time in regulating the colour, form, and dimensions of the ci-devant king's stool. "I believe," said he, "that the National Convention, at whose aspect all powers and dignities are annihilated, ought to mark the first moments of its existence by declaring that all powers and functions whatsoever are vacant, and to be filled up by the Convention itself." Ex-Capuchin Chabot was astonished, confounded at citizen Manuel's scheme. "The French nation," said he, "in sending to the Convention two hundred citizens who were members of the last Assembly, and who in it took individually the solemn oath to combat kings and royalty, has surely sufficiently explained that its will is to establish a popular government. The nation wishes to abolish not only the name of king, but everything that smells of pre-eminence and dignity. So none of your presidents—there can be no president of France! The only dignity that we can aspire to is to mix ourselves with the sans-culottes, who compose the great majority of the nation. It is only in assimilating ourselves to the sans-culottes that we can acquire the dignity that is necessary to make our decrees respected! . . . I think, too, it is very necessary that this Convention declare that it will appeal directly to the people for their concurrence and approval in whatever decrees we may pass." Manuel attempted to explain away what he had said: he was too good a patriot to wish that the president should be environed by the luxury of kings; he only wished to give him an attitude "proud and simple like Virtue and Genius;" he only wished that every president of the Assembly in his turn should be lodged in the Tuileries, where the citizens might know where to find him, and have easy access to him. But this only afforded more cutting arguments to the Jacobins of the Mountain. Tallien said—"Once out of this hall, our president is nothing more than a simple citizen. If people want to speak with him, they will go and seek him at his third floor, or up in his garret—for virtue and patriotism dwell in garrets. Citizen Manuel's proposition is unworthy of a representative of the people; it ought to be rejected, and never reproduced." It was rejected without a division. Then Tallien proposed that the Convention should take a solemn oath never to separate until they had given to the French people a stable government, founded on the true principles of liberty and equality. Couthon, that miserable cripple, who was always allowed to speak sitting, because his diseases would not allow him to stand or ascend the tribune, thought rather that they ought to swear in the first place to the sovereignty—the sole and undivided sovereignty—of the people. Bazire begged to observe that so many oaths had been broken during the last four years, that they no longer carried any weight with the people. "I demand, therefore," said he, "that, instead of oaths, we pass a law making every man guilty of death that shall make any attempt whatever against the liberty and sovereignty of the people." It was here that Danton rose, for the first time, to speak as a member. He began by observing that he had resigned his office as minister of justice. "Let me be permitted," said he, "to resign to the Convention the high functions I received from the Legislative Assembly; I received them at the sound of the cannon which the citizens of the capital were thundering against despotism. But now I will be nothing more than a representative of the people. It is in this quality that I now speak to you. It has been proposed to take more oaths; but I say, let us issue a solemn declaration to the people to acquaint them with the sentiments and principles which will direct all our labours in the vast career we are entering upon; let us declare that there can be no constitution but such as may be accepted and approved by the majority of the people. If you make this declaration there will be an end to certain phantoms, to certain extravagant ideas about dictators and triumvirates; all these absurdities, invented to frighten the people, will disappear when we have told them that nothing can be constitutional except what they themselves have accepted. After having made this declaration, we may make another to restore public tranquillity. Up to this point we have agitated the people, because it was necessary to keep them on the alert against tyrants; but that necessity is over. Some men have seemed to think, some excellent citizens have presumed that the ardent friends of liberty may injure social order by exaggerating their republican principles. Well, then, let us abjure all such exaggeration; let us declare that men shall keep what they have got, that all landed and personal property shall be eternally respected." The Convention presently decreed—1. That there could be no constitution until it was accepted by the people; 2. That the security of person and property is under the safeguard of the nation; 3. That for the present the nation must pay taxes, as before. Then Collot d'Herbois rose to say that the members of the Convention could not, without being false to the nation, defer for a single instant the formal decree of the abolition of royalty. He was seconded by Abbé Gregoire, Constitutional Bishop of Blois, by a constitution which no longer existed. "Assuredly," said this tricolor prelate, "no man can think of keeping in France this fatal race of kings: we all know too well that kingly dynasties have never been anything but races of cannibals living on human flesh. But still we must make the friends of liberty sure of our intentions. We must break a talisman which yet has magic power enough to stupify a good many men. We must declare by a solemn law that royalty is abolished for ever in France." Côté Droit, Côté Gauche, Montagne, all rose to a man, shouting and applauding; and the solemn law or decree was passed in a minute in these concise terms—"The National Convention decrees that royalty is abolished in France." This was a forenoon's work. The Girondists did not wish to go so fast; but they had not courage enough to speak up for any delay; at four o'clock they all went to their dinners. In the evening session they elected Condorcet to be vice-president, and received a number of deputations from patriotic bodies. At night there were wonderful rejoicings. "Who would have thought a year ago," said Brissot's newspaper, "when a corrupt faction held the people in chains, that France would so soon become a republic! By what fatality was it that only a year ago the most noble idea, the government best suited to the dignity of man, and the most proper to excite beautiful sentiments and glorious actions, excited nothing but murmurs, terrors, and an almost general anathema? Was it ignorance, hypocrisy, interest? It was all these together. Who is there but must remember with grief that the word republic was then almost proscribed in the Jacobin Club itself; that it was necessary to make use of oratorical figures of speech in justifying one's republicanism; that a man whose whole art consists in crying down the talents of other men, his superiors (Robespierre), avowed in the National Assembly that he did not know what people meant by a republic?"

No time was lost in making the business of the morning known to the prisoners in the Temple. Cléry, who remained there, not without constant danger to his own life, says, "On the 21st of September, at four o'clock in the afternoon, one Lubin, a municipal officer, attended by horsemen and a great mob, came before the tower to make a proclamation. Trumpets were sounded, and a dead silence ensued. Lubin's voice was of the Stentorian kind. The royal family could distinctly hear the proclamation of the abolition of royalty, and of the establishment of a republic. Hébert, so well known by the name of Père du Chesne, and Destournelles, since made minister of public contributions, were then on guard over the family; they were sitting at the time near the door, and stared the king in the face with a malicious grin. The monarch perceived it, but, having a book in his hand, continued to read, without suffering the smallest alteration to appear upon his countenance. The queen displayed equal resolution; not a word, not a gesture escaped either of them to increase the malignant enjoyment of those men. At the end of the proclamation the trumpets sounded again, and I went to one of the windows: the eyes of the populace were immediately turned upon me; I was taken for my royal master, and overwhelmed with abuse. The horsemen made menacing signs with their sabres, and I was obliged to withdraw to put an end to the tumult."

The next mistake committed by the Girondists was to demand a guard for the Convention, which was always to be kept in Paris or round the legislature, as the guards of the king were formerly kept near the person of the king, and which was to be formed out of good citizens taken from all the eighty-three departments. Buzot and others of his party represented that without some such guard there would be no liberty of debate or of action in the Assembly, and no security for life and property in the capital; that, the republic being once established, it was necessary the laws should have the ordinary course, so that an immense number of citizens should no longer live in constant dread. This demand, which incensed the Parisians beyond measure, was violently opposed by the men of the Mountain, who accused the Girondists of insulting the patriots of the capital, of listening to the complaints of aristocrats and traitors, of aiming at arbitrary power by the establishment of a corps of Janissaries, who would be blindly devoted to their own party. The Girondists replied by accusing the ultra-Jacobins of cruelty and ferocity, of all the guilt of the crimes committed in September, and by taxing them with a fixed design of prolonging anarchy and murder for their own advantage. The Girondists, however, were strong enough to carry the vote that a committee should be appointed to settle the organisation of a departmental guard, and prepare laws to punish all such men as should excite the people to acts of violence and blood. On the next day, when a Girondist demanded that the report of the committee should be presented to the House, so that no time might be lost, the contention between the two parties and the accusations they heaped upon each other became still more terrible. The Mountain declared that they knew that their adversaries were entertaining projects fatal to liberty and equality; and now the Girondists declared they knew that the Mountain were aiming at a dictatorship or at a triumvirate, and that all the massacres of September had been committed in order to promote their detestable project. Merlin, the friend of Robespierre, dared them to the proof. Lasource, speaking for the Gironde, repeated the charges, but without offering any proof whatever, without naming any one.

Osselin, one of the Paris deputies, rushed to the tribune and exclaimed, that it was he, and his friends who had been elected with him by the capital that Lasource meant to indicate; that there were no better patriots than they; that they abhorred the notion of a dictator or a triumvirate; that all they wished was to render the republic as democratic as possible; and that no man in the Convention durst name one of them. The great orators of the Gironde sat silent, but Rebecqui, a new and second-rate man of the party, rose and said, "Well, then, I will tell you that there is a party—there is a man in this Assembly named ROBESPIERRE—and that is the man I denounce!" All eyes were turned upon the Incorruptible. He betrayed no emotion; he did not rise or speak, but Danton rose and spoke forcibly, well knowing that under the triumvirate he himself was joined with Robespierre and Marat. Danton observed that it was a bad beginning to the republic to indulge in violent and unfounded accusations against one another. "People," said he, "talk about dictators and triumvirs; but this is all vague. If any citizen has grounds for an accusation, let him come forward and make a deposition, and sign it with his name." Rebecqui cried out that he would sign it. "Be it so," rejoined Danton; "and if you can prove that there are among us men guilty of such crimes, let them die—let them perish, even though my best friend should be among them." He described his own public career, boasting that for three years he had done everything he had thought it his duty to do for liberty; that during the time he was minister of justice he had exerted all the vigour of his character, and had carried into the council all the activity and zeal of a patriot inflamed by the love of his country. He said not a word for or about Robespierre, thinking, no doubt, that Robespierre, at his own good time, could speak for himself; but he took up the defence of Marat, against whom the opinion of the House was running much more strongly. "It is true," said Danton, "that there exists among us deputies of Paris a man whose opinions are perhaps as extreme in republicanism as those of the Abbé Royou were in aristocracy—I mean Marat. I have been too long accused of being the author of his writings. I call upon the virtuous citizen in the chair (Pétion) to testify that he has seen a threatening letter addressed to me by that citizen; that he witnessed a violent quarrel between Marat and me at the Mairie. But I attribute that citizen's violence to the vexations and persecutions he has undergone in advocating the cause of liberty. I believe that the cellars and subterranean places in which he was long compelled to conceal himself have ulcerated his soul. . . . It is but too true that excellent citizens may hitherto have been republicans in excess; we must all agree in this; but do not accuse, on account of some one extravagant individual, the whole deputation of Paris. As for myself, I do not belong to Paris; I was born in a department towards which I always turn my eyes with a feeling of tender pleasure. But not one of us ought to belong to such or such a department, but to France!" From the defensive he then turned to the offensive, and hit the Gironde with an accusation as vague as that which they had brought against Robespierre and his friends. "It is suspected," said he, "that there are federalists in this House, that there are men among us who think of splitting France into separate republics. Let us dissipate these absurd ideas by pronouncing the pain of death upon the authors of them. France must be one and indivisible; there must be a unity of representation; the citizens of Marseilles in the south must be the same as the citizens of Dunkirk in the north. I therefore demand the penalty of death against every man that would destroy this unity; and I propose to decree that the National Convention lays down, as the basis of the government it is going to establish, unity of representation, unity of the executive. The Austrians will tremble with fear and rage at learning this holy harmony; and then, I swear, all our enemies will be dead!" Buzot said that there was nobody in the House that could think of dividing France into a number of federal states; that it was not because his friend Barbaroux had spoken of troops from Marseilles that there was any plan for making the south predominant; that the departmental guard which he had proposed was in reality intended to preserve the unity and indivisibility of France, and to check the too visible tendency of some parts of the country to federation and division. When this Girondist had spoken at some length, Robespierre mounted the tribune. "In replying," said he, "to the accusation brought against me by citizen Rebecqui, it is not my own cause, but the cause of the people, that I shall defend. When you have heard me, you will believe that I do not think about myself, but about my country. Citizen, who have had the courage to accuse me in the face of the representatives of the people, in a place where I have so often defended the people's rights, I thank you! I recognise in the act the civism of the celebrated city (Marseilles) which has deputed you to the Convention. I thank you, for we shall all gain something by this accusation. Citizens, it is no doubt difficult to reply to an accusation which has no precision—to reply to the most vague, the most chimerical of imputations; yet I will reply. There are men who would sink under the weight of such a charge, but I am a stranger to such weakness; thanks to my enemies, thanks to my recollections of all that I have done for liberty! It was I that, in the Constituent Assembly, fought all the factions for three long years; it was I that combated the court, rejected its presents, scorned the caresses of the most seductive party which, under the mask of patriotism, rose at that time to oppress liberty!" Many voices cried out, "This is not the question: to the question, Robespierre!" "Representatives," said his friend Tallien, who had been elected to the Convention by the department of Seine-et-Oise, "a member who is inculpated has the right of replying. Silence!" Robespierre then continued his political history, boasting of all that he had done for liberty and equality, boasting of his disinterestedness and constant sacrifice of self, of his poverty, of the persecutions he had undergone, of the terrible threats with which he had been menaced, of the self-denying ordinance by which, at the close of the first Assembly, he had shut himself out from the road of honour and political power. An impatient member cried out, "When will Robespierre finish this tedious story? Let him come to the point!" Another member exclaimed, still more rudely, "Robespierre, leave off talking about what you did in the Constituent Assembly, and tell us simply whether you have aspired to be dictator or one of a triumvirate." Both these members were loudly applauded by the majority of the House; but the Incorruptible, apparently nothing abashed, continued his long narrative, insisting on the sacred right which every member must enjoy, of delivering his own opinions in his own manner. Wearied out with his constant repetitions of "I did this," and "I did that," many of the members murmured, and made a loud noise; but this old method, which had been successful in so many cases, could not silence or confound Robespierre. "I feel," said he, "that it is extremely disagreeable to be continually interrupted in this manner, but . . ." "Be shorter, then: abridge your tedious discourse," cried the Girondists. "I will not abridge," cried he; "I will force you to hear me!" And he continued his narration, hinting that he might find it very necessary to invoke the justice of the Convention against certain members who were his personal enemies. "For the love of heaven, president, make Robespierre finish!" cried a Girondist. "It is of infinite importance," cried Jacobin Ducos, "that Robespierre should be perfectly free in choosing his own method for justifying himself. I demand, for his interest, and for the interest of all of us, that he be heard without interruption." The Mountain applauded, and Robespierre went on with his oration, which was little more than a general eulogium of his political life and actions. He, however, told the Girondists, that, whatever they might do at Marseilles, or in the departments of the south, they could not shake his popularity in Paris, or deceive the patriots of the capital as to his worth; and he concluded with renewing the charge of federalism—the charge that the Girondists, not feeling themselves strong enough to domineer over the whole of France, were aiming at dividing it, in order to work out their theories and their own greatness in a part of it. He said he had confined himself to generalities, as Rebecqui's charge against him was general and vague in the extreme, being unsupported by a single fact or allegation. Barbaroux ascended the tribune, and said he would sign the denunciation which Rebecqui had made, he would speak to particular facts, which would prove the libercide projects of Robespierre. "We Marseillaise," exclaimed Barbaroux, "came to Paris in the month of July. You all know the patriotic conspiracy (conspiration patriotique) that was then entered into for upsetting the throne of Louis XVI. the tyrant. The Marseillaise having made that revolution on the 10th of August, it is not astonishing that they should have been sought after and courted by the different parties which unhappily divide France. We were conducted to Robespierre's house. There we were told that it was necessary to rally round citizens who had acquired popularity, and citizen Panis mentioned Robespierre by name as the virtuous man who ought to be the dictator of France. But we answered that the men of Marseilles would never bow the head either to king or dictator." This was the only allegation of any particular fact that Barbaroux could make, and, though it might inculpate Panis, it could not very seriously affect Robespierre. Those who had expected the revelation of many secret facts were disappointed and disconcerted by this solemn disclosure of a nothing. The Antinous of the revolution then continued still more vaguely, declaring that all the usurpations and proceedings of the commune proved the existence of a plot to establish a dictatorship. "It is for this," said he, "that some members of the Convention are so set against the departmental guard proposed for this Assembly by citizen Buzot. The commune who control the national guards of Paris are afraid that this force from the departments will make the Convention strong enough to defy the commune and put a stop to its usurpations. But this opposition will be all in vain; the patriots will come from the departments and make us a rampart with their bodies. Eight hundred men of Marseilles are already on their march for the capital to protect and defend us. Marseilles, which has constantly anticipated the best decrees of the National Assembly—Marseilles, which four months ago abolished royalty, and set us the first example of that saving measure—Marseilles has chosen these eight hundred men from among its most patriotic citizens, from among its most independent and respectable inhabitants. The fathers of these brave young men have given to each of them a pair of pistols, a sabre, a musket, and an assignat of five hundred livres. They are accompanied by two hundred horsemen, armed and equipped at their own expense. They will soon arrive, and, never doubt it, the Parisians will receive them as friends and brothers, notwithstanding all this opposition to their coming." After recommending unanimity in the Convention, energy in prosecuting the war, and the prompt trial of the ci-devant Louis XVI., Barbaroux said, "As for Robespierre, whom I have been obliged to accuse, I declare that I have done so with great regret, for I loved him, I esteemed him, we all loved and esteemed him formerly—yes, we all loved him! And even now, let him acknowledge his faults and renounce his schemes, and we will give up our accusations and be friends again."

Tallien, who had the sense to know that the commune was and must remain stronger than the Convention, and that the Girondists had committed an enormous blunder in making so plain a declaration of war against it before they had any force wherewith to open the campaign, taxed Barbaroux with calumny and falsehood, and asked him where the revolution would have been but for the commune of Paris. Several members gave the lie back to Tallien, saying (though these very men were rejoicing in the great result, the republic, now attained) that nothing was so evident as that the commune had exceeded its powers, had committed great crimes, had endeavoured to make a federation with all the municipalities of the empire. After these members had spoken Panis ascended the tribune to reply to the inculpation of citizen Barbaroux, and to deny that he had ever named Robespierre as a proper man to be dictator. He declared that his only object in seeking the Marseillaise before (and not after) the 10th of August was to induce them to change barracks and take up their quarters in the Cordeliers, where Danton presided, and where "a certain number of good citizens were patriotically plotting the siege of the Tuileries." He swore that this was the only time he had ever conferred with Barbaroux, and that this conference related entirely and solely to the removal of the Marseillaise to the Cordelier monastery, the head-quarters of liberty, not a word having been said by him or by any of his friends about a dictator or about a dictatorship. He called upon the chiefs of the Marseillaise themselves, who were present at the conference, to confirm what he said. He was proceeding to defend the conduct and operations of the commune's terrible committee of surveillance, when Brissot started up and asked why that committee had delivered an order to arrest him, a deputy of the Assembly. "Was it not in order that I might be massacred with the rest of the prisoners in the Abbaye?" said Brissot. Panis coolly told him that he did not pay sufficient attention to the terrible circumstances in which the committee and the commune found themselves. He denied that there had been an order of arrest against Brissot, and in this at least it seems pretty certain that he spoke the perfect truth. "We have saved you," said Panis, "we have saved you all, and made the revolution you wanted, and now you heap calumnies upon us. This, then, is to be the fate of those who sacrifice themselves for the triumph of liberty! Our political and personal character, warm, firm, energetic, has made us a great many enemies. But only figure to yourselves our situation on the 2nd and 3rd of September! We were surrounded by citizens maddened by the treasons of the court. We were told that there was an aristocrat here, a conspirator there, that must be punished, or we must pass for traitors. With the knife at our throats we were forced to sign many orders, and to do many things which we would not otherwise have done. For example, a great many good citizens came to tell us that you, Brissot, were setting out for London, with a great deal of money, and with written proofs about you of guilty machinations. Undoubtedly I did not believe in this charge, but I could not answer personally, and on my own head, that it was not true. I had to moderate the effervescence of the best citizens, recognised as such by you yourself; and so I thought I could not do better than send some commissaries of the commune to demand fraternally a sight of your papers, which might dissipate the dangerous suspicions." The Girondists, even now, said as little as possible about the massacres which were past; but they dwelt upon the writings and placards of Marat, which they said were traducing the Convention and inviting the people to commit fresh murders. The Friend of the People had heard himself many times named without making any effort to justify himself; but at last his wretched figure and hideous face were seen in the tribune. The apparition seemed to excite a general feeling of horror, disgust, and loathing; and his first attempt to speak in that House was interrupted by tremendous cries of "Down! Down! à bas de la tribune!" Lacroix, the close friend of Danton, hoped the Convention would not condemn a member without hearing him, and formally moved that Marat should be heard. Then, snuffing and grinning, the Friend of the People said: "I perceive that I have a great many personal enemies here." Nearly every member of the House started to his feet and shouted, "All! All! we are all your enemies!" Nothing discomposed by their shouts and the hissing and hooting that followed, the cynical little monster snuffled on: "Yes, I perceive I have a good many enemies here; but shame on them, they ought not so to treat, and hoot, and threaten a man who has devoted his life to his country and to their own salvation! Let them listen for one moment in silence. I will not tire their patience! I am no speech-maker. I render thanks to the hidden hand which has thrown this vain phantom among us to intimidate weak minds, to sow dissensions among good citizens, and to cast discredit on the Parisian members. They talk of triumvirates and dictatorships, and attribute these designs to our metropolitan members. Well then! I owe it to justice to declare that my colleagues, and especially Danton and Robespierre, have always condemned every idea of establishing a tribune of the people, a triumvirate, or a dictator—have always opposed the opinions which I entertain, and which I have avowed on this point. I, first and alone, have thought of a dictatorship as the only means of crushing the anti-revolutionary traitors. If this be punishable, punish me, and me alone—but first hear me!" The House, now silent enough, stared and listened, while Marat expounded what sort of dictator it was he meant, and why it was he had so long recommended proscription and murder. "You see," said he, "that, if you accuse me of crime, the sovereign people will give you the lie; for, obedient to my voice, and convinced that the means I proposed were the only 'ones that could save liberty, they themselves assumed the dictatorship, and have freed themselves of the traitors that were swarming in Paris. I have myself shuddered at seeing the impetuous movements of the people continue for too long a time, and I wanted a good citizen, wise, just, firm, known for his ardent love of liberty, to direct these irregular movements of the people, and make them all serve to the public salvation. If I had been listened to on the day when the Bastille was conquered, the heads of five hundred conspirators would have flown from their shoulders: this would have terrified traitors, and to-day we should all be quiet and happy, with law, and justice, and liberty established within our walls. It was for this purpose I often proposed an instantaneous authority to be lodged in some wise and strong man, who might be called Tribune of the People, or Dictator, or what you will, for the name is nothing. But a proof that I did not want to enchain my country is, that I always required that this tribune or dictator should have chains and a cannon-ball fastened to his feet, and that he should have no authority except for striking off guilty heads. Such has been my notion. I have not propagated it in private societies; I have printed it in my paper; and I do not blush at it yet. If you cannot understand me, so much the worse for you, for our revolution is not finished! Let those who accuse me of ambitious views look at my poverty and present state, and judge for themselves. If I had chosen to put a price upon my silence, if I had sought after money or place, the favour of the court would not have been denied to me. But I threw myself into dungeons, I condemned myself to misery and want, and every kind of danger. The swords of twenty thousand assassins were suspended over me; I preached truth with my head on the block!" Such was the tone of Marat's first oration in the National Convention; and, whatever might be the feeling of the majority of the House (of the Girondists, who in their turn were trying to prop themselves up by and with the respectabilities, who were ten times weaker now than when Lafayette and the Feuillants had tried the same experiment), it secured the assent and enthusiastic applauses of the real sans-culottes in the galleries, who were so entirely of his way of thinking, that they interrupted Vergniaud, the great Girondist orator, who was going to reply to him. When Vergniaud could be heard he said that, if there could be a disgrace for a representative of the people, it was, to his mind, that of succeeding in the tribune to a man, who had been the object of repeated criminal charges, from which he had never cleared himself. "I glory in them," exclaimed Marat. "Is it the decrees of the unpatriotic and iniquitous Châtelet court that Vergniaud would speak of?" asked Chabot. "Does he allude to the decrees of accusation with which citizen Marat was honoured for having struck to the earth the traitor Lafayette?" asked Tallien. "I say," exclaimed Vergniaud, "that it is a disgrace to have to speak after a foul man that sweats blood and gall." He was interrupted again by angry murmurs. As soon as he was allowed to continue, Vergniaud begged it to be understood that he and his friends had no intention of inculpating all the deputies of Paris, since Dussaulx, David (as sanguinary a fanatic at this time as any in the number), and others, who would, no doubt, merit well of the country, were among them. Next, he read the circular letter of the 3rd of September which the committee of surveillance had sent to the departments, and which bore the signatures of Duplain, Panis, Sergent, and Marat. Without dwelling upon the infernal atrocity of that circular in recommending the provinces to imitate the massacres of the capital, Vergniaud said it contained a calumny against the National Assembly, and provoked the people to murder many of its members as being accomplices of the court, or, as he expressed it, "of the excesses of the court." "Only remark the chronological coincidence," said he; "this letter is dated on the 3rd of September, and it is in the night between the 2nd and the 3rd that a man whom I had never mentioned but with respect and esteem—that Robespierre told the people that there was a great plot which he alone could defeat—that there was a plot for delivering up France to the Duke of Brunswick, and that Vergniaud, Brissot, Guadet, Condorcet, Lacombe, and others of the Gironde were at the head of it." Sergent gave him the lie direct, exclaiming "Vergniaud, all that is false!" And that it was false was best proved by the fact that Vergniaud was alive to tell the story, and his party alive to hear him. Lowering sail, Vergniaud responded that he was happy to learn that Robespierre too had been calumniated. He then spoke of the massacres and of the formal invitation to murder and assassination which had been given to the people, but still cautiously, still measuredly, like one who yet trembled under the knife of the sovereign people, or like one who had determined to shut his eyes to the fact that no invitation or provocation could have led any people but the French to commit such atrocities—that nothing but a universal bloodthirstiness mixed with an apathy scarcely less detestable could account for the prolongation, in a populous and crowded capital, of such enormities. He said, "That the people, with a patience worn out by a long series of treasons, should have risen at last and have taken signal vengeance on their enemies is not so extraordinary—is nothing but a resistance to oppression. And, even if they have committed some excesses which go beyond the limits of a just vengeance, I can only see in that the crime of those who provoked them by their long treachery and treason. The good citizen will throw a veil on these partial disorders (désordres partiels), and will only speak of the courage of the people, of the ardour of the citizens, of the glory which ought to attend a people who know how to break their chains." The gist of this part of Vergniaud's speech seems to be nothing more nor less than this, that the massacres were all very well until they threatened the Girondists. Boileau, another Girondist, who followed Vergniaud, said, that Marat was calling for a fresh insurrection; and he read a passage from Marat's newspaper of the very day. The passage he quoted was rather a proof of Marat's sagacity and foresight than of the allegation of the Girondist. It was to this effect—"Seeing the temper of the majority of this Convention, I own that I despair of the public safety. If in the first eight sittings the Convention shall not be able to lay the foundation of our constitution, there is nothing to be hoped from it. Fifty years of anarchy await France, and you will emerge from it only by the power of some dictator who shall be a true patriot and statesman. Oh! prating people, if you did but know how to act!" There was nothing so atrocious in this passage from Marat's newspaper as in the circular of the committee of surveillance; but it excited infinitely more indignation or noise. Amidst loud cries of "Send him to the Abbaye," Marat rose with great sang-froid, and demanded to be heard. Boileau exclaimed that such a monster ought to be expelled. Another Girondist demanded that Marat should be heard only at the bar. "Oh!" quoth Marat, "I entreat the Assembly not to get into a great passion against me!" Another Girondist said that he ought to answer whether he avowed or disavowed the atrocious extract which had been read. "Oh!" responded Marat, "there is no need to make this call upon me. Some men have dared to throw in my teeth the proscriptions and decrees and accusations of the Constituent and Legislative Assemblies. But do you not see that the people themselves have upset all those decrees by electing me one of their representatives, and by calling upon me to take my seat among you? The people judge correctly of my intentions—the sans-culottes know that their cause is my cause. The accusations, the offences which some men in this Convention have reproached me with form and constitute my glory! The decrees they speak of were launched against me only for my having unmasked traitors and detected conspirators. For eighteen months have I lived under the sword of Lafayette! If that traitor could have got possession of my person, he would have annihilated me, and the most zealous defender of the people would no longer exist. As for the passage cited from my writings, I confess it, I avow it, for never has a lie escaped my lips, and dissimulation was ever a stranger to my heart:—but I beg to observe that that passage was written ten days ago, when the Convention had not met, and when the elections were going on. Then, indignant at seeing the election to the Convention of some men whom I had long ago denounced as enemies to the people—at witnessing the triumph of this faction of the Gironde who are now persecuting me, I wrote what is written, and stuck it up in the streets of Paris. It is only through a little roguery of my printer that the passage has appeared in small type in my paper of to-day. But I have an incontestable proof that I wish to march with you, at least with all friends of the country; and here is my proof—it is the first number of a new journal which I am going to publish under the name of 'The Republican.' Gentlemen, you will permit me to read a few passages? You will see in them the homage I render to the Convention, and then you will be better able to judge the man who is now accused before you." The Assembly ordered one of their secretaries to read this new sheet, which appears to have contained nothing but a rhapsody of words, unsusceptible of any definite meaning. It, however, had a very favourable effect on an Assembly which was eternally taking rhodomontade for eloquence. "I hope," said Marat, "I flatter myself that, after hearing these passages from my 'Republican,' you will no longer entertain the slightest doubt as to the purity of my intentions. I can answer for the purity of my soul; but I cannot change my opinions, which are suggested by the nature of things. But permit me to remind you, that, if my justification had not appeared in my new journal, 'The Republican,' you would have condemned me to die by the sword of tyrants! This fury is unworthy of free men; but I fear nothing under the sun." Here he drew a pistol from his pocket, and putting it to his forehead, he continued: "If you had launched a decree of accusation against me, I would have blown out my brains at the foot of this tribune. This, then, is the fruit of my nightly wakings, of my labours, of my misery, of my sufferings, of my three years of subterranean dungeons, all braved and borne for the good of my country!" The Girondists cried out that he was mad—that he ought to be driven out of the speaking-place; the Mountain and the galleries applauded; and Tallien moved the order of the day, to get rid of ridiculous accusations which had led to such a scandalous and riotous discussion. The Gironde was fluttered, awed, intimidated, and, though in a decided majority, it allowed the order of the day to be carried—which was equivalent to a decisive victory on the part of Marat, Robespierre, and the whole Mountain. Not satisfied with this triumph, the Mountain drove for the passing of the declaration, "The French republic is one and indivisible." And this was carried as a thing of course, the blind Girondists having no notion that this formula would be the death sentence upon their party, as soon as another turn or two of the wheel should throw them at the feet of the Mountain. The morning sitting was terminated by the reading of a letter from war-minister Servan, who sent in his resignation under pretext of bad health, and with assurances that the crisis of alarm ought now to be over, as Dumouriez had united the French armies at Ste. Menchould. A deputy moved that it should be declared that this retiring Girondist had merited well of the country; but the Convention would not come to any vote. In the evening sitting a deputation from the Paris municipality presented itself to demonstrate that the commune cared no more for the Convention than it had cared for the last Assembly; and that it was not disposed to sit down quietly under the accusations which the Girondists had brought against it that morning. The orator of the deputation declared that all the commune had ever wished to do was to crush traitors, and make the enemies of the country tremble. The Convention basely ordered that his discourse should be printed. These somewhat minute details of what passed at Marat's first appearance in the tribune, and at the first open attack of the Girondists upon the ultra-Jacobins, will prepare the reader for all that soon followed—for the humiliation, flight, proscription, and bloody death of a conceited, contemptible, babbling faction. Yet the Girondists themselves seem to have been unconscious that they had made a miserable exhibition of weakness. They might have been quiet, and Danton was not indisposed to reconciliation and renewal of friendship; but they kept the hostile attitude they had assumed, and, putting themselves again on the offensive, attacked the Jacobins with a fierceness which hardly leaves a doubt that they would have been as cruel after victory as we know the Mountain to have been. Brissot, like Marat, waged war in the double capacity of journalist and member of the Convention. Prudhomme, the printer, and all that class of journalists whose essays were most to the taste of the people, continued to support the Mountain, and to lash the Gironde as a troop of Syllas and Catilines and Julius Cæsars. Tales were invented by both contending parties to blacken and damn one another in public opinion:—on both sides the malignity was about equal.

The Convention agreed to demand from Roland, as minister of the interior, an exact and faithful account of the state of Paris; and there was now a great deal of talk on the part of the Girondists about the duty of stopping future massacres. Roland had been elected to the Convention, but, being a minister, he could not take his seat, as the first Assembly, in their wisdom, had decreed that the functions of a representative of the people and the functions of a minister were incompatible with each other, and that there would be an end to liberty and good government if any minister were allowed to debate in the House. Roland, or his wife, says that he would infinitely have preferred the honour of representing the people to the honours and emoluments of office, and that it was only at the earnest prayer of his party that he consented to remain in the ministry. The Girondists made a faint attempt to erase the decree of the first Assembly; but the majority of the Convention cried out as against a grand political heresy, and Jacobin logicians demonstrated that no man could possibly be a part of the representative and a part of the executive at the same time. It was then assumed that those who were ministers and had been elected members might make their own free choice between the two stations; but the Jacobins urged that there could be no such choice, and that Roland, having been elected by the people, was bound to resign office and take his seat in the Convention, as Danton had done. Failing in this, some of them suggested that their own party ought to be represented in the executive; that Danton, "that revolutionary minister, who at the head of the interesting department of justice had served the cause of liberty with that vigour of character and that energy of talent which were peculiar to him," should quit his seat in the Convention and take again his seat at the council-board. But Danton would not consent to so dangerous an arrangement: he would not return to the cabinet, and he very ingeniously demonstrated that Roland and the rest ought to resign and leave the Convention to choose an entirely new executive. This, he said, was the course that Roland himself was disposed to take; and surely it would be unworthy of the dignity of the Convention and the young republic to supplicate and intreat Roland, or any other man, to remain in office. The Girondists, after describing Roland as the most perfect of men and ministers, as a statesman whose like was not to be found in France or in the world, insisted that he ought to be invited to remain in the executive. "But," said Danton, "if you send an invitation of the sort to citizen Roland, you must send another to Madame his wife, for all the world knows that Roland has never been alone in his department. I was alone in mine." The Girondists murmured as if Danton had spoken treason against the nation. This provoked him, and he went on to tax Roland with incompetence and cowardice. "Not long ago," said he,—alluding to the time when the Duke of Brunswick was advancing,—"all the ministers were in despair, and Roland himself thought of quitting Paris." "Yes," subjoined Duhem, one of the most terrible men of the Mountain, "that is quite true. I myself was a witness of the fact." Here Faublas Louvet, who continued steady to his party and his devotion to Roland (who had promised at one time to make him minister of justice), said that Danton referred to a moment when the streets of Paris were placarded with the most frightful calumnies against ministers and their friends. Several Girondists cried out, "Yes! yes!—the placards of Marat!" "Alarmed at the state of the public mind," resumed Louvet, "alarmed for the safety of Roland, who was incessantly threatened in these atrocious placards, I waited upon him, I showed him that his danger was great, and becoming every hour greater. And what did the virtuous Roland say? He said, 'If I am to be killed, I must wait for death; and this will be the last crime of the faction, be it what it may.' Roland, therefore, may have lost a part of his confidence; but these words prove that he had lost none of his courage." The Girondists applauded; but the Mountain continued their sneer at a minister of the interior who was governed by his wife, and who could do nothing without her. The majority of the Assembly; however, agreed that Roland should be invited to remain in office; and he presently said, in a letter to the president, that he acceded to the wishes of the House. "I remain," said he, "since calumny attacks me, since danger awaits me, since the Convention seems to desire that I should remain. It is but too glorious for me that men can reproach me for nothing but my union with courage and virtue." His creature Pache, who began to betray him, and to intrigue with the Jacobins as soon as he obtained office, or as soon as he saw that the Mountain must triumph over the Girondé, was made war-minister, in lieu of Servan, who had resigned. Garat, a man of letters from Bordeaux, and the editor of a Paris newspaper, succeeded Danton as minister of justice. In his letter to the Convention (it was dated the 30th of September), Roland rendered thanks to heaven that the liberty of his country was now secured; and to the late National Assembly for having recalled him to the ministry on the 10th of August—a nomination which would be the honour of his whole life. He declared as a minister that he knew there had been projects to establish a dictatorship or a triumvirate, and that it was in furtherance of these iniquitous projects that the worst atrocities of September had been committed. He denied that he had ever shown any want of courage, or that he had ever advised the council of government to flee from Paris; and he asked who had the more courage, a minister like him, who in the doleful days which followed the 2nd of September had denounced the assassinations; or the men like Danton who had flattered and protected the assassins? He did not attempt to explain how it was that his denunciations were made so very tardily, how it was that he allowed two days and nights of massacre to elapse before he wrote his energetic letter to Santerre. He boasted that he had done his duty honestly, promptly, heroically, whereas in fact he had done absolutely nothing from Sunday afternoon till Tuesday evening. We know his weakness, we more than suspect his fear: we repeat he could have done little or nothing—but these after-boastings of his having done so very much fill the mind with inexpressible disgust. He resumed the subject of that departmental guard for the Convention the proposal of which the Mountain and all Paris had received with such wrath and suspicion. "Without doubt," said he, "Paris has rendered the most important services to liberty; but the people of Paris must not exercise any absolute control over the Convention. The patriots of the capital would never think of exercising this ascendancy were it not for evil counsellors. The best laws can only result from a wise and mature deliberation; and there can be no such deliberation unless the legislature is left to enjoy the most perfect independence and freedom of speech and opinion. It is for this that the Convention requires an armed force that belongs neither to Paris nor to any other particular town, but to the entire republic—a force composed of men taken from all parts of France." All this was perfectly true and in itself just; but there was no convincing the omnipotent Parisians that they ought not to retain the ascendancy they had acquired. Barbaroux in the beginning had committed a monstrous mistake in speaking of the respectabilities of the South, the countrymen or the fellow-townsmen of the Girondists, thus giving the Parisians the opportunity of saying that these Girondists were choosing their own devoted bands to give the law to the capital, to destroy the Mountain, the only sans-culottic portion of the Convention, to shut up the Jacobin Club, and commit other horrors against liberty and equality. And after all this loud talk, after securing to themselves all the odium of the intention, the Girondists threw up the project of the departmental guard altogether, and nothing was ever seen of Barbaroux's eight hundred respectabilities, or their braces of pistols, or their muskets, or their assignats. In the same way, after threatening the new commune with destruction, after passing a number of decrees for the appointment of a more legal or more moderate municipality, they left that body much as they found it, the only significant change being that Pétion resigned the mayoralty on becoming a member of the Convention, and was succeeded at the Hôtel-de-Ville by a Dr. Chambon, a weak silly man, but entirely devoted to the men of the Mountain. At one time the Girondists thought of threatening the Jacobin Club with the vengeance of the law, at another time they thought of attempting to recover their influence in the club by means of their oratory and eloquence; but they neither did the one nor the other, but on this, as on all other vital points, kept talking and vacillating, discovering their weakness even where they might have concealed it, and showing no courage and energy except by fits and starts. Whenever they were ebullient they were rash and fierce. On Monday the 29th of October, Roland presented a long report to the Convention on the actual state of Paris, or rather, on the crimes and plans of the agitators. "If my lungs were as strong as my courage," said the minister of the interior, "I would read the paper myself." The Convention ordered one of the secretaries to read it for him. The report stated that the administrative bodies were without power, that the commune of Paris had become a terrible despotism; that the people of Paris were good, but deceived; that the weakness of the two preceding Assemblies had been the cause of a vast deal of mischief; that unless the Convention acted promptly there would be no remedy to the evil, and that no doubt could be entertained that the agitators, "partisans of the ancient regime, or false friends of the people," had conceived the plan of a universal anarchy, which should enable them to revel in blood and plunder. Added to the report was the attestation of the vice-president of one of the sections of the criminal tribunal, who said that a member of the Cordeliers' Club (meaning Marat or Danton, but not naming anybody) had told him that the revolution was not yet completed; that the massacres of September had left a good deal to do yet; that a new blood-letting was indispensable, and might take place within a fortnight; that Roland, Brissot, Barbaroux, Buzot, Vergniaud, Gaudet, and Lasource were marked out; and that the only man that could save the country was Robespierre. On hearing his name pronounced, the Incorruptible begged to be heard in his own defence against this vague accusation, which was indeed more unmeaning than that which had been produced by Beau Barbaroux. The Girondists made a hooting and shouting, and demanded that Roland's paper should be printed and sent to the eighty-three departments. "President," roared Danton, "stop this shameful noise! Let Robespierre be heard: I will speak after him." The president, who happened to be Guadet, told Robespierre that he could only speak to the question, or whether Roland's report was to be printed or not. The Incorruptible replied disdainfully to the president, that he had no need of his officious instructions as to the rules of the house. "I invoke," said he, "the justice of this Assembly. A representative of the people has as much right to be heard as a minister! Am I to be calumniated and condemned without being allowed to reply?" President Guadet savagely called him to the question. "This is oppression!" exclaimed Robespierre; "this is tyranny! I am defending my honour, and perhaps my life, and the president would restrict me to a miserable question about printing a ministerial report!" "Robespierre," cried Guadet, "if you do not speak to the question, I will put it to the vote." "Hear me first," cried the Incorruptible; "hear what I have to say!" Some of the Girondists cried out that they would not hear him, and others hooted and shouted. Robespierre was losing heart or voice, when Danton said to him, "Speak, man; there are good citizens who will hear you!" and Robespierre then continued, crying shame at these indecent interruptions, and exposing with considerable force the horrors that must ensue if representatives were to be treated in this manner, if tried patriots were to be condemned without being heard, and without a particle of evidence against them. He concluded with saying, "Who is there that will enter into a calm discussion? Who dares accuse me to my face?" Here Faublas-Louvet,—who had once ventured to attack him in the Jacobins,—rose and exclaimed, "I do—I accuse you, Robespierre!" This looked like an impromptu, and it produced a wondrous sensation; but it had all been arranged beforehand between the novelist and the Rolands; and Louvet had his harangue ready written in his pocket, and he now proceeded to read it. "I accuse you, Robespierre, of having long calumniated the purest of our patriots, and particularly in the days of September, when calumnies were proscriptions. I accuse you of having set yourself up as an object of public idolatry, and of having caused it to be said that you are the only man capable of saving the country. I accuse you of having degraded, insulted, and persecuted the national representation, of having tyrannized by intrigue and fear over the electoral assembly and the elections of Paris, and of having aimed at supreme power by calumny, violence, and terror. I accuse you of having evidently marched towards supreme power, as is demonstrated by the facts I have enumerated, and by the whole tenor of your conduct; and I demand that a committee be appointed to examine that conduct." But facts there were none. There was a vast deal of declamation, but no statement of a fact, nothing like a good presumptive proof (that is, against Robespierre) from the beginning to the end of this long oration; which had been cogitated by all the talent and genius of the Gironde. There were indeed several things that bore closely and heavily upon Marat, Panis, and Sergent; but, the present business was to attack Robespierre, who had not been a member of the commune's committee of surveillance, who had not in any way made himself or his agency apparent during the September slaughters, who was not at the time a public functionary, who did not belong to any of the councils or committees either of the commune or of the Assembly. No paper was ever found signed by him as a mere member of the municipality. We believe that Robespierre may have been deeply implicated; but it was the business of his accusers to bring forward convincing proofs, and this they failed to do—failed miserably, and so awkwardly, that they put him in the enviable position of an injured and calumniated man. Louvet's oration, moreover, contained several palpable falsehoods, as that Pétion knew nothing of the preparations for the massacres, that the massacres were all committed by two hundred persons, or fewer, and against the intention and to the horror of all the rest of the Paris population! The oration too which Louvet read bestowed such extravagant praise upon the virtuous minister of the interior, that the Jacobins cried out that the real intention of it was to propose Roland for a dictator. Another instance of unfair play was that Danton, who had had more to do with the massacres than any man, was touched most delicately, as if those who were accusing Robespierre would enter into a pact and alliance with the terrible ex-minister of justice, if he would only break with Robespierre. Popular idolatry, and an influence exercised over the Paris elections, were the very bathos of accusation after all the loud denunciations and preambles of the Girondists. If even, as Louvet said, it was through the influence of Robespierre that Marat was elected, this was but a poor and inconclusive ground for impeachment, particularly after the Convention had recognised Marat's return, and had allowed him to sit among them for five or six weeks. At this moment, though the spirit of the man might be suspected, there were no overt acts wherewith to charge Robespierre; he had run the race for a republic with the rest, and, bad and mad as were his orations in the Jacobin Club, they were scarcely worse than the declamations and writings of the leaders of the Gironde. Barbaroux had loved him; they had all loved him for these orations, and for his conduct in the first Assembly. Vergniaud had just said that he had never mentioned Robespierre but with respect and esteem down to the night between the 2nd and 3rd of September, when he (Robespierre) was reported to have talked about cutting off the Girondists, a report which neither Vergniaud nor any of his party sustained by the shadow of a proof. There has been a great deal of dramatic narrative written and printed, to the effect that Robespierre turned deadly pale, and faltered, and shrunk almost into the earth before the thunders of Louvet (who, heaven knows, was no thunderer, but as far removed as possible from all that is sublime and terrible); but there is nothing in the reports of the debate to justify these descriptions or paintings. It appears, on the contrary, that, save for a minute when the Girondists were drowning his not very strong voice by superior strength of lungs and riotous hootings, he was perfectly self-possessed, and that, backed by Danton, his brother Augustin, Couthon, and others, he laughed at the vague accusations, and had not the slightest difficulty in inducing the Convention to put off the consideration of them, and grant him till that day week to prepare his answer. In the interval the Girondists committed fresh mistakes. On the very next day Barbaroux, in the Convention, while endeavouring to dissipate the suspicions of the Parisians on the subject of the departmental guard, gave them growth and increase, and made use of several most awkward arguments to put down the cry of federalism and southern preponderance. But the real field on which the battle must be decided was the Jacobin Club; and there Robespierre and his friends were armed at all points. On the very night after the debate in the Convention, the members of the club went down in shoals to denounce the horrible conduct of Louvet, and to call for his immediate expulsion from the society. The violence and folly of the Girondists furnished them with excellent arguments; and it was not for them to prove that their own conduct had been, or would continue to be, more generous or more considerate. Fabre d'Eglantine said it was impossible to describe the scandalous scenes that passed in the Convention, where patriots were not allowed to speak against their accusers, where there was nothing, in the body of the house, but insolence and despotism, while the galleries were getting crowded with nobody but women. Robespierre himself called upon the club to arm itself with courage to resist the atrocious calumnies that were propagated; and he read a long discourse justifying the whole of his own conduct, and accusing the Girondists of state crimes far worse than any that had ever been committed or imagined by the old despotism or even by Lafayette and the Feuillants. In the same discourse the incorruptible administered enormous doses of flattery to the Paris population, not neglecting to ask them what they could expect if this faction of men from the south were to invade and crowd the capital with provincials of their own choosing—with Marseillaise, not sans-culottic like those which Barbaroux had first brought to drive the king out of the Tuileries, but respectabilities like those whom Lafayette had employed to massacre the people in the Champ de Mars? The Jacobin Club unanimously resolved and decreed that this address should be printed and sent to all the affiliated societies. It had ten thousand times more chance of making an impression on the public mind than the loose accusation read by Louvet in the Convention; and, to judge impartially between the two productions, it really displayed a great deal more ability and an immense deal more tact. Butcher Legendre called attention to the fact that Louvet had been carrying his speech in his pocket for many days, and that it was a noticeable coincidence that Roland's report, Louvet's speech, and a terrible pamphlet by Brissot against the Jacobins had all appeared in the course of one morning. Merlin said that Louvet, Rebecqui, and Barbaroux were ever ready to swear what the virtuous Roland bade them—ever ready to insult, in the Convention, those who were accused, and to impose silence on them when they rose to defend themselves; that Louvet, the editor of the 'Sentinelle' newspaper, was paid and salaried by Roland (which was perfectly true); that Louvet's moral character was none of the best (which was just as true), and that he was "a champion of intrigue." Fabre d'Églantine said that there was a man who had seen, near at hand, all that had passed between the 10th of August and the 6th of September; that he could be a proper arbiter between Robespierre and Louvet; that this man was Pétion; that, whatever might be Pétion's connexions with the Gironde, he hoped he would speak the truth, particularly as he had seen him that morning on the very point of mounting the tribune to give the lie to Louvet's accusations. But Merlin condemned the notion of any such arbiter, first damning Pétion with the faintest praise, and then asking whether the ex-mayor was not the close friend of Brissot, of Roland, of Vergniaud, of Barbaroux? Augustin Robespierre, the younger brother of the Incorruptible, delivered a discourse which carried conviction to the mind of the Club, and made his fame great. He begged them to observe what moment it was the Girondists were choosing to crush his innocent brother. "It is a moment," said he, "when they hold in their hands both the executive power and the legislative power; when they dispose of all the forces of the state. And it is a moment when all the people of France are not for us, when we can only count with certainty on the people of Paris. Citizens, I was alarmed this morning at their fury in the Convention. I thought that assassins were going to poniard my dear brother! I heard some men say that he should perish at their hands! The Convention has been dishonoured by a tissue of lies—by a romance made by a romance-maker: they heard him in silence, even to the last word—nay, they even applauded him! The Convention has dishonoured itself! Who knows but forged papers may be brought in on Monday next to inculpate my brother? But let the innocent perish: liberty will not perish with him, for she does not depend on the life of one man. . . . I cannot quit this tribune without making an observation about Marat. Marat cannot be very culpable, since he is persecuted by the same men of intrigue that are persecuting Robespierre! There is another fact that I must communicate. This morning I was at the Convention, sitting near Anacharsis Clootz; and I heard Clootz say to Pétion and others, that he had been obliged to dispute warmly, at the table of the minister of the interior, for the unity of the republic! You must see clearly that these intriguers aim at federalism. A member of the Mountain, who endeavoured to restore order and calm in the House, was cruelly insulted by Rebecqui, who said that there was no listening to such men as Robespierre—that the only argument was the sabre." Deschamps rose to give a counterpart to the accusation contained in the letter of the president of the criminal court, which Roland had presented to the Convention. He said that a citizen, a member of the society, had been heard to declare at a public table, only yesterday, that Robespierre and Marat ought to be assassinated; that it was as necessary to get rid of them as it was to get rid of the ci-devant king; and that Robespierre would have been taken off long ago, if he were not constantly surrounded by a body-guard of bravoos. But the most remarkable speech of the night was that of ex-Capuchin Chabot, who knew as much about the massacres of September as any man. "Louvet," said he, "has declared this morning that it was not the men of the 10th of August that made the days of September; and I, who was an eye-witness, will tell you that they were precisely the same men! Louvet has said that in the September affairs there were not above two hundred persons in activity, and I will tell you that I saw and passed under ten thousand swords! For the truth of this I appeal to Bazire, Calon, and other deputies of the Assembly who were with me. For a long way before we reached the prison of the Abbaye we had the greatest difficulty in forcing our way through the dense crowd. I alone recognised one hundred and fifty of the federates who were brought to Paris by Barbaroux. It is possible that Louvet and his adherents may not have been present at those popular executions; but, when a man can speak of them with so much sang-froid, surely he cannot have much humanity. I know that, since his discourse in the Convention, I would not sleep in the same room with Louvet for fear of being assassinated. I call upon Pétion, who knows something, to declare whether it is true that there were no more than two hundred persons employed in those long executions. Could a small number of men have done what was done if the armed citizens of Paris had not been with them—if the prisons had not been invaded by the same men who stormed the Tuileries? France has yet something to learn about these matters; and the men of intrigue fancy that they can take advantage of its ignorance. They want to destroy us in detail: they are going to impeach Robespierre, Marat, Danton, Santerre; and very soon they will lay hold of Bazire, Merlin, Chabot, Montaut, and others. But let them look well to their own heads: their strength is a mere weakness. The Convention itself, by their own vote, can exercise no judicial power without the sanction of the people!" A federate presented himself to assure the club that he and several of his comrades had been actively employed in the days of September; that the prisoners they had massacred were nearly all forgers of assignats or conspirators; that he was going to quit Paris to-morrow, and that he regretted to leave it at a moment when great divisions and dissensions were going to break out.*

Marat, in his 'Republican,' kept up the war. He repeated the accusation of federalism—a word which soon became as terrible and odious to the Parisians as the terms veto, or aristocrat, or roi; and he made use of very ingenious arguments and inductions, from facts or appearances, to fix the charge on the Gironde. He described that party as a clique, the soul of which was "the pedant Buzot, the formalist Lasource, the irascible Guadet, the perfidious Brissot, the double Gensonné, and tartuffe Rabaut-Pommier." "May God have pity on their souls in the next world!" said Marat, "and I will pardon them in this, provided only they take no more false steps." He again and again bade the commune and the people of Paris reflect on the consequences of bringing an army devoted to this faction into the capital—on the consequences of any removal of the legislature from Paris to the provinces—on the consequences of a splitting up of the empire into a number of federal republics, in each of which the Gironde would establish an aristocracy on the ruins of royalty, would seize and hold all the first places, depriving Paris of all her honour, weight, and profit. The commune, who had lost none of their revolutionary energy, persevered in their system, intermeddling with everything, usurping nearly all that was left of the executive power, and getting possession of all the national or forfeited property they could lay their hands on. Septeuil, the treasurer of the civil list, had a sum of money in his chest, said to exceed ten millions of livres; but, whatever was the amount, the commune got it all. With an abundant deposit of hard cash, they had wherewith to pay all the poorer and more desperate part of the sans-culottes; and with such a body-guard they had little to fear from the Girondists of the Convention. They even procured from the forty-eight Paris sections a declaration of confidence, approbation, and friendship. On the other hand, Roland, as minister of the interior, demanded accounts, taxed the committees of the commune with dilapidation, waste, and corrupt use of the public money, and sent secret orders to the departments to arrest some of the commissaries employed by the commune, as robbers and assassins. A number of federates were employed to call out for the heads of Marat, Danton, and Robespierre; and great efforts were made to win over the respectability sections, which had professed so much devotion to Lafayette and the Feuillants, and which had done so little for them at the moment of crisis—so little for themselves; for the triumph of the sans-culottes must be their destruction. Barbaroux, as a proper reply to an address which the commune had sent to all parts of France to justify their own conduct and suspicions, and to denounce the members of the south as convicted federalists, proposed four formidable decrees against the commune; but his party had not the courage to try their strength upon them; the said decrees were given up; and again, without doing anything, they acquired the odium of the most fierce and sanguinary intention.* More through this miserable weakness and indecision of his enemies than from the exertions of his friends and party, Robespierre, when he presented himself on Monday the 5th of November to reply to Louvet's vague charges, looked rather like one who came to make accusations than one that came to answer them. The galleries and all parts of the House were crowded; and when he mounted the tribune he was cheered by the people. His discourse was very long, and very carefully prepared, showing infinitely more ability than the flimsy paper which the author of 'Faublas' had read. "Of what am I accused?" said he: "of having conspired to bring about a dictatorship or a triumvirate, or to make myself a tribune of the people. The opinion of my adversaries does not seem to be fixed. Let us translate these inconsistent Roman ideas by the words supreme power. Now you must agree that, if such a project was criminal, it was still more insane. To execute it, it was necessary not only to upset the throne, but to destroy the legislature, and prevent the Assembly being succeeded by a National Convention. But how happened it, then, that I was the first, in my public discourses and in my writings, to call for a Convention, as the only remedy for the ills of my country? It is true that that proposition was denounced as turbulent and dangerous by the Girondists; but presently the revolution of the 10th of August more than legitimated it—realised it. Need I say that, to arrive at a dictatorship, it would not be enough to be master of Paris? All the eighty-three departments must be won over or subdued. Now, where were

* Barbaroux's proposed decrees were—1. That the legislature should quit Paris unless it were protected from insults and violence; 2. That the federates and the national gendarmes, conjointly with the national guards of the Paris section, should mount guard at the National Convention; 3. That the Convention should convert itself into a high court of justice to try all conspirators; 4. That the Convention should break up the Paris municipality.

my treasures? Where my armies? Where my fortresses? All the power was actually in the hands of my adversaries. In order that the accusation presented by Louvet acquire any character of verisimilitude, it must first be demonstrated that I was completely mad. Nor can I see that my adversaries can gain much by such a demonstration; for, if I was mad, why have they given themselves the trouble of composing so many fine discourses, of sticking up so many placards, of making such efforts to represent me to the Convention and all France as the most dangerous and redoubtable of conspirators?" He repudiated all political connexion with Marat. He said he had never seen Marat in private but once, and that was in the month of January of the present year; and that before then he had never had any kind of connexion or correspondence with him, direct or indirect; that their notions were not the same; that he took occasion to remonstrate with Marat on the extravagance and violence of some of his writings, which were as offensive to the friends of liberty as to the aristocrats; that Marat defended his opinions, and he his; and that from that time he had never seen Marat until he found him sitting in the electoral assemblies as candidate to be one of the deputies of Paris. "There also," continued he, "I found M. Louvet, who accuses me of having abused Doctor Priestley, also a candidate for Paris, and of having secured Marat's election by means of intrigue and terror. I will answer these absurd accusations with a few plain facts. Those elections were controlled by the entire body of the people of Paris. The electoral assembly had unanimously agreed that the returns should all be rectified by the people in their primary assemblies, and that the votes should be given openly and aloud, after a public discussion of the merits of the respective candidates. Everybody made a free use of his vote or of his right of proposing candidates. But I would not propose Marat; I proposed no one. Only, following the example of some who are now members of this Convention, I offered a few general remarks upon the rules which ought to guide the electors in making a proper choice of representatives. I spoke no ill of Doctor Priestley: I could not so speak of a man who was only known to me by his reputation as a savant, and by the misfortunes he had suffered in England, which ought to render him interesting in the eyes of the friends of the French revolution. I only designated Marat, without naming him, as one of those courageous writers who had fought and suffered for the cause of the revolution. But would you know the true cause of Marat's election? In that moment of crisis, when the heat of patriotism was at its height, when Paris was threatened by the advancing armies of the Coalition, people were less struck with certain exaggerated or extravagant ideas emitted by him, than with the crimes of all the perfidious enemies he had denounced, and the actual presence of the evils which he had so long predicted. Nobody then thought that in a short time the name of Marat alone would be made a pretext to calumniate all the Paris deputies, the electoral assembly, and the primary assemblies of the people. For me, I leave to those who know me to judge of this fine project, formed by certain people, to identify me with a man with whom I have nothing in common. Had not my combat for liberty created me enemies enough, without their letting loose upon me the enemies Marat has made by his extravagant opinions!" He treated with contemptuous ridicule the charges of making himself an object of public idolatry and of tyrannising over the Jacobin Club. "In that club," said he, "there are fifteen hundred ardent citizens, and the only influence I have over them is from their sentiments being mine, and my sentiments theirs! My adversaries were all Jacobins, all eloquent men, but they were weak there, because they did not feel like the people. Experience has proved that the opinion of the Jacobins and the popular societies is the opinion of the French people: no citizen has created that opinion, or domineered over it; and I only shared it with others." He challenged his accusers to prove that he, either as a member of the municipality, or in any other quality, had taken any part in the popular executions of September. It was not his line to denounce the Septembrizers, for they were the commune and the sans-culottes, his friends and his party; but he boldly undertook to prove that the prison massacres were the direct consequence of the storming of the Tuileries; that the 10th of August and the 2nd of September were inseparably linked together; and that the Girondists, who profited by the first, could not with conscience or decency condemn the second. As for the talk about illegality, it was nonsense; or with equal reason the Girondists might make the same reproach to the 10th of August, to the whole revolution, for even the taking of the Bastille, which began it, was contrary to law, and surely it was very illegal to overthrow and imprison the monarch! He would ask, could the Girondists expect to have a revolution and a republic without revolutionary excitement? Robespierre concluded with some Roman flourishes, which were very ridiculous in themselves, but entirely adapted to the taste of his auditors, who hailed him once more as the best friend of the people and of liberty.* He descended from the tribune in the midst of these applauses, which were mingled with a call for the order of the day. Louvet rushed towards the tribune; but before he could reach it the Convention, without dividing, dismissed his ill-composed charges by passing to the order of the day. The Girondists feared that the men of the centre, or, as it was now called, the "Plain," would entirely desert them on this question, as the accusations were so very vague, and as the most that could possibly be made out against Robespierre at that moment was, that his popularity was immense, and that it might be suspected he would at some future time attempt to employ it for his own aggrandisement. The cowards, too, stood in awe of the shouting, roaring galleries; and they were shackled and chained by their inward convictions that the 10th of August and the days of September were indeed inseparable, and that hitherto Robespierre was, at the least, as clear from blood as they themselves. Pétion, who was sitting with them, who was both pillar and buttress to the Gironde, had, moreover, an evident interest in stopping discussions which might have revealed perilous secrets.* The Mountain demanded that Robespierre's discourse should be printed; and this was agreed to almost unanimously. And then Merlin said that, as the minister of the interior had printed 15,000 copies of Louvet's accusation, there ought to be 15,000 copies of the justification. Louvet and Barbaroux both demanded permission to bring forward a fresh accusation or denunciation; but they were put down by cries of "Order! Order!" "But," piped Louvet with his thin, shrill voice, "I must be allowed to answer Robespierre." "Oh!" cried many voices, "you can answer him in your newspaper." The author of 'Faublas' then begged to be permitted to speak against the president. The House decided by a great majority that he should not have this permission. Then beau Barbaroux rushed, not to the tribune or speaking-place of members, but to the bar of the House, and demanded permission to speak as a simple citizen. The escapade provoked peals of laughter—the august Areopagus laughed for some time. At length some members demanded that Barbaroux should be censured by the House for degrading the character and dignity of a representative of the people; and Barrère, a true middleman, who was making himself a party in the Centre, or Plain, with the full determination of making good terms with the Gironde if it should come out victorious from the mortal strife with the Jacobins, or with the Mountain if it should crush the Gironde, vaulted into the tribune, and began a smooth, pacific discourse. "I entreat," said he, "in the name of the public good, that an end be put to these personal piques and passions, and that, setting aside these idle quarrels, we occupy ourselves solely about great questions. What ought to signify in the eyes of an enlightened legislator all these vague accusations about a dictatorship or ridiculous projects for a triumvirate? Citizens, if there existed in the republic a man born with the genius of Cæsar or the audacity of Cromwell—a man who, with the talent of Sylla, possessed the immense means of that dictator—I would myself boldly accuse him, for such a man might be dangerous to liberty. But men of a day, little managers of riots, politicians who will find no place in the domain of history, ought not to occupy the precious time which you owe to the grand labours wherewith the people have charged you. . . . I propose that we get rid of these accusations altogether, by resolving that 'The National Convention, considering that it ought only to occupy itself about the interests of the republic, passes to the order of the day.' " Robespierre, whose pride was hurt by the slighting, contemptuous expressions of Barrère, exclaimed, "I will have none of your order of the day, if you qualify it in this manner!" The Mountain called for the order of the day, in its usual and simple form, without any preamble; and this, being put to the vote, was carried by an immense majority. The triumph of the Incorruptible was thus complete. Rebecqui endeavoured to defend the extravagance of his friend and townsman Barbaroux; and, when the president told him that the debate was closed, he exclaimed that the discussion, properly speaking, had never been opened—that the accusation of Robespierre was a still-born child! But one capital cause which may have produced an immense effect on the cowardly minds of the Girondists, and on the votes and divisions of the House, remains to be mentioned:—The Feuillant terrace, and all the open spaces between the Tuileries and the Salle de Manège, were crowded with national guards and pikemen from the faubourgs and the sections. "It is strange," said Brissot, in his newspaper, "that General Santerre should have found so many patrols to protect Robespierre, whom nobody menaced, and not have found a single patrol on the 2nd of September and the following days." But in truth this was not strange at all; and, as for the safety of Robespierre not being menaced, the Girondists would have sent him to the guillotine if they had prevailed over him this day; they would have shown him, and his party, no more mercy than he showed them. But it was in the evening, when the Incorruptible entered the Jacobin hall, that he enjoyed the full sweets of his triumph. He was almost deafened with applause, almost suffocated with embraces: they called him an eagle, an Aristides, the best and greatest man in the republic; and they easily induced Barrère, who was soon to be his satellite, to explain away the offensive words he had used in the Convention, or to declare that he meant them to apply not to Robespierre or Marat, but to the Girondists. Not satisfied with the vote passed in the Convention for the printing of Robespierre's discourse, Merlin rose to accuse "the virtuous, eternally virtuous Roland," of forgetting his principles, and of making use of the post to circulate in the departments the diatribes of Brissot, the harangues of Buzot, and the denunciations of Louvet. "I demand," said he, "that the Club print and send to all the affiliated societies the great discourse of Robespierre; and that we join to it a vote of thanks, in which we shall declare all the good we know of Robespierre. The departments will rather believe us than the virtuous Roland!" The proposition was adopted instantly. The Incorruptible, moreover, inserted the whole of his defence in a printed letter to his constituents; so that, in one way or other, it must have been widely disseminated.* In the Hall he seemed to blush under his blushing honours; and, whenever it suited him, this strange being could play the part of a modest and silent man in perfect style. He was the only man of the revolution, perhaps the only man of his country, that knew when to be silent, or that could persevere in silence. Merlin invited him to mount the Jacobin tribune and give the Club his own account of his struggle and victory. "Ah, no!" said one of his worshippers; "I know the modesty of Robespierre; I know he will be silent." And silent he was the whole night, leaving others to sound his praises and repeat some of the arguments he had used. "His virtues, his eloquence—his incorruptible virtue and his masculine eloquence," exclaimed Garnier, "have crushed all his enemies! Barbaroux, in despair, quitted his seat as a legislator, and ran down to the bar: he could not look the man he had accused in the face; and, in effect, how should a vile reptile bear the glance of the eagle! This has been the most beautiful day of our revolution!" Manuel delivered a still more extravagant panegyric; but Manuel, who was a sort of Barrère, without Barrère's dexterity, tried to couple Pétion with his old friend Robespierre, forgetting, what every old woman might have reminded him of, that no foes are so bitter and irreconcilable as those who have been once close friends; and shutting his eyes to the fact that Pétion had now entirely committed himself with the Gironde, between whom and the Mountain there could be no peace or truce but in death. "Robespierre," said he, "has always shown the greatest austerity in his principles; he has ever wished to be nothing, while so many men were eager to be something. Robespierre might say, as the ancient Roman said to the senate, 'People attack my words, so innocent am I in my actions.' Look at his conduct in the first Assembly! where there was so much corruption. He always sat side by side with Pétion—Pétion and he were the twin-brothers of liberty!" Collot d'Herbois instantly called the orator to account for these grave errors, telling him that Pétion was no more like Robespierre than winter was like summer.

* Pétion spoke against the order of the day, and for the prolongation of the debate, but this does not alter our opinion that he was glad to get the debate ended.

Between this triumph of Robespierre over the Gironde, and the mock trial of Louis XVI., there is nothing to detain us long. There were committees of the Convention labouring in many vocations, and a grand committee busy at the old work of constitution-making, as the constitution of 1791, to which more oaths had been taken than had ever been sworn to all the constitutions in the world, was now to be set aside as a dirty sheet of paper, as an opprobrium; and as all things were to be remodelled and cut into republican shape. This Constitution Committee was composed of nine members, of whom seven, or at least six, were decided Girondists. They were Pétion, Condorcet, Brissot, Vergniaud, Gensonné, Thomas Paine, Sieyes, Barrère, and Danton. Barrère, as we have mentioned, sat in the Plain, and was waiting upon providence or events. Sieyes, properly speaking, was never of any party but of the party of Sieyes, being a party in himself, and to himself, and by himself. Thomas Paine, who had obtained his letters of naturalization through Guadet, was decidedly a Girondist. Danton was the only Montagnard. In the affected language of that great moral philosopher Thiers, "Philosophy had its representatives in the person of Sieyes, Condorcet, and the American Thomas Paine; the Gironde was particularly represented by Gensonné, Vergniaud, Pétion, and Brissot; the Centre by Barrère; and the Mountain by Danton." But, by giving philosophy three representatives, Thiers takes at least two from the force of the Gironde. He adds, "It is no doubt surprising to see Danton, that tribune of the people, so very turbulent, but so little speculative, placed in the midst of a committee entirely philosophic (tout philosophique), and it seems that the character, if not the talents, of Robespierre ought to have obtained him that post. It is certain that Robespierre was most ambitious of that distinction, and that he was deeply wounded at not obtaining it. They gave the preference to Danton because his natural disposition rendered him fit for everything, and because no deep resentment as yet separated him from his colleagues." The first of these two propositions is, to our understanding, a phrase without a meaning; but the second must comprehend in it the confession that the Girondists entertained no resentment against Danton, whose immense share in the guilt of the massacres of September was as clear as the sun at noonday, while they pretended so much resentment on that account against Robespierre, whose participation in the crime was as obscure and uncertain as it could well be—whose agency must have been remote and indirect. The Girondists commanded a great majority when the committee was appointed; and certainly they could have substituted Robespierre for Danton, or they could have excluded Danton as well as Robespierre. But they wanted to secure to themselves the services of the greatest or loudest bully in France; they knew that Danton was open to the influences of flattery, money, and other kinds of corruption, and that Robespierre was utterly inaccessible to such influences; proud and confident in their own eloquence and logic, they cared not for a cool and a pertinacious reasoner; they thought Danton's lungs worth ten times Robespierre's logic, and they therefore took the ex-minister of justice to their bosoms, and affected a virtuous indignation against the Incorruptible. Composed as the committee was, the Girondists soon found that, in spite of their majority, they could not make it march quietly towards their ends. Fierce dissensions upon first principles broke out, retarding the constitution-making, and depo-pularising the Girondists, who had promised that France should have the best of republican charters in the shortest period of time. Counting solely on the middle classes, who had been already borne down and crushed by the armed masses, and who had already given up the struggle in a spiritless manner, their wish and plan was only slightly to democratize the constitution of 1791, and to establish the régime of the bourgeoisie, or respectabilities. But what Danton demanded, and what the march of the revolution demanded and made inevitable, was the extension of the democratic principle to its utmost limits, the régime of the sans-culottes, the supremacy of the lowest and poorest. Barrère soon trimmed his sails so as to catch the same wind as Danton; and Thomas Paine's passion for an absolute democracy, and his eagerness to work out the axioms laid down in his essay on the Rights of Man, made him rather unsteady, and at times untrue to his friends and patrons, the Girondists. And, besides these causes of hindrance and difference, there was that incarnation of all that was pragmatism and dogmatism, Sieyès, who was as confident as ever that to him alone was reserved the task of making a model constitution, who could never accept the shadow of an opinion from any man, and who could never conceive how any man could honestly refuse an opinion of his.

There was another committee that marched with much more speed than the constitutional. This was "The Extraordinary Committee of Twenty-four" appointed to inquire into "the crimes of Louis Capet, formerly king." In this committee, too, the Girondists were in the majority. On the 6th of November, the very day after Robespierre's great triumph, Valazé, a Girondist, and a sworn friend of Vergniaud, presented to the Convention the report of this committee, he and his party being evidently in a hurry to recover popularity by some strong revolutionary demonstration. This report ran to a great length. It stated that the committee, after a careful examination of documents and letters found in various places, had come to the conclusion that Louis Capet had been guilty of numerous acts of high treason against the nation, and had thereby merited some further punishment than the forfeiture of the throne, which had been already pronounced. The Girondists afterwards pretended that they had ever been averse to the death of Louis, and that all they wanted was to bring him in guilty, and to prove to a young republican people the monstrous vices of kings. Their pretence has imposed upon many: they have gained credit for a gentleness and mercy that was never in them. The tale is, however, equally bad either way, for, if they believed Louis ought not to suffer death, they should never have agreed to find him guilty, or they should never have hinted at a punishment beyond the severe penalty he had already undergone. In concluding the report Valazé proclaimed in the clearest manner that there ought to be another punishment besides the forfeiture (une peine autre que la déchéance), and, although he did not actually define what that punishment ought to be, he said that Louis ought to be treated as a common citizen, and the punishment for common citizens, in cases of treason against the nation, was DEATH. He acknowledged, indeed, that, according to the constitution of 1791, the only compact between the ci-devant king and the nation, the only punishment pronounced for bad kings was déchéance, or dethronement. "But," said this nice logician, "Louis Capet has been guilty of a great many more crimes than are mentioned in that constitution—of many more crimes than liberal-minded legislators could possibly suspect or foresee—and therefore his punishment ought to be so much the greater. Otherwise there would be a contradiction between the law and universal reason; and it would be your duty to set aside and destroy so monstrous a contradiction." If all this does not signify—"You must send Louis to the guillotine," it signifies nothing. And what was the conduct of the Girondists in the House when the report was read? Barbaroux, the preux-chevalier of the party, the echo of the sentiments of Madame Roland and her husband, declared that the charges ought to be made heavier still, said that the committee of surveillance of the commune, and the committee of general security of the Convention, the extraordinary criminal tribunal of the 17th of August, and the high national court, possessed a great number of documents touching the multiplied treasons of the ci-devant king; and he demanded that all those papers should be collected, made public, and used as evidence. Pétion said that the Committee of Twenty-four had only made use of the documents which had been laid before them; that there were many papers much more important; that the king was committed in several letters written by Choiseul-Gouffier, and that his treasons were clearly proved by the trial of one Dangremont, "that man who had been chosen by Louis to raise a body of assassins." Was it by heaping accusation upon accusation, by exasperating the public mind, that these Girondists proposed saving Louis from the scaffold? They were sure of a sentence of guilty, which they afterwards pleaded was all they wished, without any processes of this kind. As a matter of course the ultra-Jacobins went farther and faster, for fear of being left behind by the Girondists; but the Mountain never pretended that they meant to terminate the tragedy or the bloody farce otherwise than by the guillotine; and, when the deed was done, they gloried in it. On the following day, November the 7th, Mailhe, another Girondist, presented the report of the committee of legislation upon the mode in which Louis XVI. was to be tried. After reciting a series of questions on that subject, which he said the committee had long and profoundly agitated, he in a long and hot harangue aggravated all the offences of Louis, keeping out of sight all the provocations, and persecution, and terror which had driven the despairing king to invoke the aid of foreign arms and of arbitrary sovereigns. He treated with contempt the constitutional inviolability of the sovereign, and the idea that any king could be put above the law and the will of the people. Not satisfied with taxing Louis with the blood spilt and the devastations committed by the Austrians and Prussians at Longwi, Verdun, and Lille, this Girondist accused him of all the blood that had been shed on the 10th of August, although it had been so recently boasted that the attack on the Tuileries was the result of "a patriotic conspiracy"—although all the world knew the miserable, defenceless state of the court, and that Louis had been obliged to flee to the National Assembly before a match was lighted or a trigger drawn. "Have you not still before your eyes," exclaimed Mailhe, "the marks of the parricide bullets, which on the 10th of August threatened the nation even in this sanctuary of the laws? Do you not still hear re-echoing in the bottom of your hearts the dying voices of the citizens who perished in front of the Tuileries, and the appeals of so many other patriots, new Decii, who, in sacrificing themselves to their country, carried into the tomb the hope of being avenged? Do you not hear the whole republic reminding you that this vengeance is one of the first objects of your mission? Do you not see all the nations of the universe, all generations present and future, crowding around you and waiting with a silent impatience your decision, whether he who was charged with the execution of the laws can render himself independent of those who made the laws; whether this royal inviolability has the right to butcher with impunity citizens and societies; whether a king is a god who is to be blessed for the blows he deals, or a man who is to be punished for the crimes he commits!" The applauses were tremendous: the galleries could not do otherwise than applaud sentiments which had so long been taught them by the Jacobin clubs and journals. The orator referred to the trial and execution of our Charles I., which long before this time the revolutionists had selected as a model, although they understood properly no single part of the story, except its termination on the scaffold. He declared that Charles Stuart merited death; that the House of Commons had an indisputable right to set aside the House of Peers, who wanted to preserve the king and the royal despotism; that if the Commons had only been sitting as a National Convention everything would have been perfectly right, and that there would have been a Convention but for the ambition of Cromwell, who was aiming at the protectorate. Was it by falling in with the Jacobin credo—was it by dwelling upon the block and the axe, that these humane Girondists proposed driving the thoughts of blood out of the heads of the people? Was their applauding the beheading of Charles I. the best mode to prevent the guillotining of Louis XVI.? But the head of the queen had long been in greater danger than the head of the king. The nimbler cowards of the party, who kept their own necks from the guillotine and survived the Reign of Terror, boasted that the Gironde, if they had been able to keep their places in the Convention, would never have permitted the queen's execution. Yet how did their confrère Mailhe, who was not adroit enough to escape the block, speak at this moment of the hapless, helpless wife of Louis? "Hitherto," said he, "I have said nothing about Marie Antoinette. She is not mentioned in the decree which commanded the report I am now making to you in the name of the committee; nor ought she, nor could she be in it. What right can she have to confound her cause with that of Louis? But have the heads of women who bore the name of queen in France ever been more inviolable or sacred than the heads of other rebels and conspirators? When you take her case under consideration, you will decide whether she is to be tried or not; and it is only before the ordinary tribunals that you can send her for trial." The present conclusions which Mailhe and his committee came to were—1. That Louis might be judged; 2. That he should be judged by the National Convention; 3. That a committee of three should be appointed by the Convention to collect all papers, informations, and proofs relating to the crimes imputed to Louis; 4. That this committee of three should draw up the act of accusation or impeachment; 5. That, if this act was adopted, it should be printed, communicated to Louis and to his counsel, if he should think proper to choose counsel; 6. That the original documents and proofs against him, if Louis desired it, should be carried to the Temple, after authenticated copies had been made to remain in the archives, and the originals brought back to the archives by twelve commissioners of the Assembly, who should never let them get out of their hands or lose sight of them; 7. That the National Convention should fix the day on which Louis was to appear before them; 8. That Louis should, by himself or by his counsel, present his defence, either in writing signed by himself or verbally; 9. That the National Convention would pronounce sentence by every member voting separately and aloud (par appel nominal).

The Girondist reporter descended from the tribune, applauded by côté droit and côté gauche, by Plain and by Mountain, by galleries and by all present. Billaud-Varennes demanded that the report should not only be printed and sent to the armies, but translated into all the languages of Europe, and sent to all the countries of Europe. The Convention presently passed a decree to that effect. Manuel moved that such as might choose to speak in favour of Louis, or be employed as counsel by him, should be taken under the safeguard and protection of the law. The galleries hooted at this proposition; some member or members observed that it would be insulting the French people to entertain a doubt about it, and the house passed to the order of the day. The business was then adjourned to the 13th. In the interval the

Jacobin Club delivered its opinions. In the Convention the great debate was re-opened by Pétion, who expressed his contempt "of the stupid dogma of inviolability," and proposed that the house should decide at once whether the ci-devant king should be tried, as recommended by the committee of legislation, or not. The Convention voted that this should be the course. Morisson rose and courageously declared that Louis could not be tried at all. It was boldly said, although, before venturing to that conclusion, he adopted the prevailing tone, and called the ex-king a traitor, a sanguinary monster, that ought to expiate his crimes in the cruelest torments;—it was honestly and earnestly meant, for Morisson was not a Girondist;—it was ingeniously argued, with more address and more humane cunning than can be found in any other instance throughout these proceedings. He showed that the constitution of 1791 had foreseen not merely secret hostilities (all that could be now proved against him), but an open attack on the part of Louis XVI., a marching at the head of armies against the people, &c.; and that with that foresight it had provided the déchéance and nothing more. He showed that the national faith was pledged, deeply and most solemnly pledged, to adhere to all that was laid down on its part in that constitution. He showed that the National Convention had been intrusted with powers to change the form of government, but not to try or condemn the king. He reminded them, as a military people, that even the usages of war did not permit them to sacrifice an enemy who had fallen prostrate before them in the hour of victory; and he insisted that nothing could be gained by his trial and condemnation, and that the best measure to be adopted under present circumstances was to keep Louis a state prisoner, or to banish him and his family from France. There was slight chance that such reasonings should be listened to; yet it is curious to observe by what manner of man or boy, and by what sort of reasonings, the Convention was transported into a whirlwind fury against Morisson's propositions. Antoine Louis Léon Saint Just, whose family name must live in history with that of Robespierre, was the son of an old officer, a native of Picardy. The family, if not rich, were noble—a little proof of which is seen in his triple Christian names. He had been well educated, according to the new philosophy, and the notions now entertained in France as to what was a good education. Like Robespierre, he had been taught to rave about Greeks and Romans and republics, and never taught to reflect upon the difference between those times and these, or upon the possible exaggerations of the ancient historians, who, in some cases at least, wrote history as we write poetry, or drama, or historical romance. This kind of education, and the excitement of the nascent revolution (for he was little better than a schoolboy when the phenomenon began), deranged an intellect which appears to have been not well arranged by nature. Saint-Just was a fanatic and a fury for the "one idea" before he was a man; and this very exaltation caused him to be elected to the Convention and received there at an illegal age, or before he was twenty-four years old. He had that worst kind of madness which wears the "reasoning show." It was a madness that left the head cold, and burned in the heart. He had all the honesty of fanaticism; and he was just as fearless as he was pitiless. He was a sort of exaggerated Camille Desmoulins, possessing the same wild eloquence, but having considerably more steadiness of purpose, more method in his madness. Such as he was, with eyes that betrayed his insanity, with the countenance and the gestures of a madman, it was Saint-Just that rose to combat the humane intention of Morisson, and to condemn even the report of the Girondist committee. "Citizens," cried he, "I undertake to prove that Morisson, who would preserve the inviolability, and the committee, who would try Louis like a citizen, are both in the wrong. I tell you that the ex-king ought to be tried or treated as an enemy. I tell you that we have rather to fight him than try him! I tell you that, Louis being for nothing in the contract which unites Frenchmen, the forms of procedure ought not to be according to civil law, but according to the law of the Rights of Man. Here any delay or hesitation, any temporizing with the king, will have the most fatal consequences. Some day, perhaps, when men shall be as far removed from our weak prejudices as we are from the ignorance of the Vandals, they will be astonished at the barbarism of an age which made so solemn a business of judging a tyrant, and in which the people, having a tyrant to judge, raised him to the rank of a citizen before they would examine his crimes. They will be astonished, I say, that in the eighteenth century people were less advanced than in the time of Cæsar. That tyrant was immolated in full senate, without any other formalities than twenty-two dagger-strokes, without any other law than the liberty of Rome. And to-day we respectfully prepare a long trial for a man who is the assassin of a whole people, who has been taken in flagrante delicto with his hands red with blood! Ah, those who attach so much importance to the critically just chastisement of a king will never found a republic. . . . I will never lose sight of this,—the spirit with which you try the king will be the same with which you will establish the republic, and the measure of your philosophy in this trial and sentence will be the measure of your liberty in the new constitution. Oh! make haste to dispatch this king; for there is not a citizen in France but has the same right over him which Brutus had over Cæsar. He must be condemned promptly, for wisdom and sound policy require it! Already efforts are making to work upon our compassion; and very soon tears will be bought, as they were at Roman funerals. Every effort will be made to work upon our feelings, nay, even to corrupt us. People! if ever this king should be allowed to escape death, remember that we your representatives are no longer worthy of your confidence, and accuse us of the blackest perfidy!" Fauchet, who had quarrelled with the Jacobins, and who had been expelled from their club, replied to Saint-Just with a bold and rather ingenious speech. He maintained that Louis ought not to be tried at all, and that to put him to death would not be serving but ruining the republic in its birth. "The revolution," said he, "is now triumphant, Louis is a helpless prisoner, the armies of the coalition are flying before us, we have no longer anything to fear from him or from them. But, if we put him to death, we shall give new hopes and new means of action to the conspirators. The royalist idea will attach itself to his young and innocent son, and that will make proselytes. I cannot agree to a proposition advanced by citizen Mailhe, that public utility may sometimes authorise us to throw a veil over the image of justice. What! are we to look for the happiness and repose of the country in a violation of justice, in a national crime, in a bloody infamy which will fill the whole world with horror!" He could say no more; he was hissed and hooted out of the tribune. Robert, a grocer of Paris, and one of the most ferocious members of the Mountain, followed the discomfited abbé or constitutional bishop, whose bishopric was now worth nothing. "Long enough," said he, "and far too long, have kings been allowed to sit in judgment over the people! It is now time that the people should sit in judgment over kings! Certain men, still astonished at the success of the revolution of the 10th of August, think it a serious matter to bring a king to trial. Their narrow minds cannot conceive, or can scarcely conceive (and that not without grief), the idea that Louis XVI. shall be judged by you—that the descendant of Henri IV. and Louis XIV. shall be brought to your bar, and that the sword of justice shall strike the proud head of a man so long accustomed to command; but these notions of the barbarous twelfth century must be far from the minds of the real representatives of an enlightened nation." He concluded his long harangue by urging that Louis ought to be tried and condemned by the Convention, and handed over to the executioners and the guillotine as quickly as possible, Barrère, who saw which way the torrent was going, moved that Robert's speech, that all the speeches delivered on this grand subject, should be printed and sent to the departments, to enlighten the public mind, and show the people with what solemn deliberation, with what wisdom and justice, their representatives were proceeding; and this was unanimously agreed to.

The discussions were renewed on the 15th of November, when abbé Gregoire, who had been elected to this Convention, and who had taken his seat on the Mountain, made a very long oration, in which he recapitulated all his own services, revolutionary opinions, and prophecies, and all the crimes of the king—including in the list Louis's unfortunate appetite. "The genius of history," said Gregoire, "in recording his crimes, will describe them all in a single incident:—thousands of men were being slaughtered at the Tuileries, the roar of the cannon was shaking these walls and announcing a frightful carnage, yet here, in this very hall, Louis ate." This abbé, who clung to his religion, who boasted that he was the only Catholic and Christian in the Convention, laughed at the idea of the constitutional inviolability, and particularly recommended bringing the king to trial on account of the salutary effect it would produce on other nations, who were all opening their eyes and fixing them on France, who were all getting weary of kings, and anxious to know what was to be done with them. He exclaimed, "The impulse has been given to all Europe; all the nations are rushing towards liberty! The volcano is going to explode, the political resurrection of the globe is going to begin, for, as a philosopher has observed, the fashion of kings is passing away; and, since France sets the fashion to all the world, let us take heed not to check the salutary contagion of our present mode. What will happen if, at the moment when all people are going to break their chains, you should assure to Louis XVI. impunity and inviolability? Why, Europe will think that it is nothing but cowardice on your part, and the despots will derive, from your pusillanimity, an argument to defend their monstrous maxim that there is something godlike about kings." These reasonings sensibly touched the national vanity, and carried great weight with the people, who were, however, fully determined to shed the blood of Louis long before abbé Gregoire had delivered his opinions.

Several days were spent in receiving deputations of Savoyard and Belgian sans-culottes; in settling the proper methods for democratising Savoy, Nice, the provinces on the Rhine, and the other regions which the republican armies had overrun; and in drawing up manifestoes to invite the people in all parts of Europe to take up arms against their governments, and make common cause with the French, who would not fail of securing them all in the peaceable enjoyment of liberty and equality, and all the other rights of man. The printers of Paris had certainly some personal reasons for loving this progressive revolution, for it furnished them with an incalculable quantity of work. These manifestoes alone, translated into English, German, Spanish, Italian, Polish, nay even into Russian, gave for a long time constant employment to many presses. On the 21st of November Thomas Paine, regretting his inability to make a speech in the French language, delivered in his opinion in writing as to the proper course to be pursued against Louis XVI. In the opening of this letter Thomas indulged in some pleasantry upon Louis's "good state of health;" and hoped that the Convention would order his epistle to be read that very morning, he being anxious to send a copy of it over to London in order that it might appear in the English newspapers. The Convention, full of respect for the author of the 'Essay on the Rights of Man,' ordered the letter to be read instantly. It had the double object of keeping up the excitement against Louis and of exciting the French against England, or against the English court, "the most intriguing and iniquitous of Europe." In his short, trenchant style this double renegade demonstrated that Louis ought to be brought to his trial, without further loss of time; and that nothing but her poverty and ruined credit, and the dread of a popular revolution at home, had prevented England from joining openly the enemies of the French republic. He trusted that the trial of the French king would bring to light the detestable conspiracies of other kings, and cast an odium upon royalty that should last for ever. It was as a great lesson for the world that he wanted this trial; and nothing could be so clear as that the interests of the French republic demanded universal insurrections, and the establishment everywhere of democratic republics. "With respect to the inviolability," said he, "I should wish you to pay no attention to it. Seeing nothing in Louis XVI. but a weak silly man, badly brought up, and subject to frequent fits of drunkenness, perhaps the Convention, after trying him, may have some compassion on him; but let not that compassion be the result of the burlesque idea of this pretended inviolability." The Convention applauded, and ordered that Paine's opinions should be printed. From this day down to the 28th these lawgivers occupied themselves in decreeing the union and incorporation of Savoy with France, and in changing the name of Savoyards into the old and classical name of Allobroges. On the 28th Lefort undertook to prove that it would be a capital error to try Louis in any way or at any time; and that it would be a monstrous mistake to put him to death. He reasoned that the execution of Charles I. was the principal cause of the restoration of royalty in England, where people were too enlightened to have much love for kings; that the death of the father pleaded the cause of the son, and brought about the return of the tyrannical race of Stuart. He demanded that the House should either pass to the order of the day on Mailhe's report, or send it to all the primary assemblies of the republic, in order to collect the sense of the entire body of the people; but apparently he could not find a single member to second him. On the 2nd of December a deputation from the commune of Paris, which had lost none of its power, came to the bar to urge the Convention to make more speed, and to reproach them with the time they had already lost in idle discussion and ridiculous refinements. The orator of these impatient municipals told the House that everything was getting paralysed by their indecision, and that the people were beginning to suspect there was still some corruption or a wretched cowardice among them. "Why do you wait?" said he; "why do you give time to the factions to get up again and unite? To keep debating whether the perjured king can be tried or not, and how he is to be tried, is nothing but a political blasphemy. And have you not reflected that death may walk into the Temple, and deprive you of your victim? Then where will be the use of all your protestations and oaths? Ignorance and calumny will injure our honour by spreading the report that the French did not dare to put their king to death in public, but preferred poisoning him, like cowards, in the obscurity of a prison. Oh! citizens, save us from even the possibility of this shame! Take courage, and finish at one blow the history of the most horrible of conspiracies. In the name of the commune, and of all the sections of Paris, we demand of you to lay down the question simply thus—1. Is Louis, ci-devant King of the French, deserving of death? 2. Is it advantageous to the republic to make him die on the scaffold?" The president of the Convention (it was now Barrère, that most expert of all trimmers) assured the deputation of the commune that the Convention was neither in a torpor nor subjected to the least pusillanimity; that the Convention would have courage enough to do its duty, and that promptly; and that, in the mean time, it invited the citizens of the deputation to the honours of the séance. The House decreed that the municipal's speech, with its simple propositions, and the speech of the president in reply to it, should both be printed and sent to the departments. This loud note from the terrible commune, and notes still louder from the Jacobin club and its affiliated societies, helped to accelerate the unsteady march of the Convention; and certain intimations that discoveries had been made in the papers and documents for which they themselves had called, proving that several of the Girondist chiefs had, during the late Assembly, intrigued and corresponded with the court, carried a cold shiver to the hearts of that party. It was not until the 3rd of December that Robespierre delivered his opinion upon the great question in the Convention; but then he spoke frankly and decidedly, and with incomparably more honesty and better logic than the quibbling Girondists were capable of. He declared that it was absurd to talk about forms of trial and respect to the laws; that the death of the king was not a question of law at all, but a question of expediency and state policy. "The Convention," said he, "has lost sight of the true question. There is no trial to make: Louis is not an accused citizen; you are not his judges: you are and can only be statesmen and representatives of the nation. You have no sentence to give for or against this man; you have only to adopt a measure of public security, you have only to exercise an act of national providence. What is the thing wanting to cement our infant republic? It is that we should deeply engrave on the hearts of the people a contempt for royalty, and that we should strike terror into the hearts of all the king's partizans A dethroned king can only serve two purposes, to trouble the tranquillity of the state and to shake liberty by living, or to give strength to both by dying Louis was your king; but you have made a republic. All the question lies in these few words:—Louis has been dethroned for his crimes; Louis accused the French people of rebellion, and called in the arms of his brother tyrants to punish them, but victory and the French people have decided that it was Louis alone that was the rebel. Louis is, therefore, already condemned, or the republic itself is very guilty. If Louis shall be presumed to be innocent, what becomes of the revolution? If Louis is innocent, we are all calumniators, liars, and rebels; all the manifestoes become but lawful reclamations against a dominant faction; even the imprisonment which we have made Louis undergo becomes a crime, and the federates, the people of Paris, all the patriots of the French empire, all, are guilty! When a nation has recourse to the rights of insurrection, it enters into the state of nature with regard to its tyrant, and either the tyrant must perish or the nation. Your tribunals and your judicial proceedings are not made for a case like this. And how can you judge the king by the rules of a constitution which no longer exists, which you yourselves have destroyed by making this republic? Surely the right of dethroning the king (and you have dethroned him) and the right of punishing him are one and the same. If you have not the right in the one case, then you have it not in the other. Prison or exile will not do. Louis must die in order that France may live. I demand that the Convention declare Louis XVI. to have been a traitor to the French and an enemy to humanity, and that as such they instantly condemn him to death in virtue of the rights of insurrection!"* All this is atrocious enough, yet surely it is less disgusting than the cant of the Girondists about laws and a legal trial. Pétion replied to Robespierre's oration, which electrified the galleries, but which was reprobated by the majority of the House. The ex-mayor insisted that the ex-king could be very legally tried by the Convention; that it would be disgracing the young republic to proceed irregularly; and he moved, in conformity with the report of the Girondist committee, that the House should now decree—1. That Louis should be tried. —2. That he should be tried by the Convention. Robespierre rushed again to the tribune; but the Girondists interrupted him, drowned his voice, drove him from the speaking-place, and carried both the motions which Pétion had proposed.

If this was a triumph, the Girondists were not permitted to enjoy it very long. Roland, the "eternally virtuous," himself was accused of suppressing evidence, and stealing away letters and other papers which were said to prove that his party, shortly before the 10th of August, had attempted to make terms with the court. While the search and rummaging after papers, and all manner of evidence, were at the hottest, and when honours

* "As for Louis's wife," said Robespierre, "you may send her before the ordinary tribunals, together with the rest of the conspirators; as for his son, you will keep him well guarded in the Temple until peace and public liberty are secured."

and other more substantial rewards were held out to such patriots as could give any valuable information, one Gamain, a locksmith of Versailles, waited upon Roland and told him of an iron cupboard (armoire de fer) which he and the king, in May last, had inserted behind the wainscot and in the wall of the king's bedchamber at the Tuileries. The man said it was so well concealed that none but himself could find it, as the existence of the armoire was known only to him and the king. In fact they had already hammered and sawed, and torn the royal apartments to pieces, without lighting upon anything of the sort. Roland rushed joyously to the spot with Gamain and one or two municipals or clerks, and without any deputies of the Convention—without letting the Convention know anything of the matter. The smith went straight to a panel in the wainscot, which opened by means of a secret spring, and, having removed some bricks, he disclosed and unclosed the iron door of the armoire. Roland eagerly seized all the papers, wrapped them up in napkins and pocket-handkerchiefs, and hurried away with them to a Girondist committee, who kept them for several days without giving any information of the great discovery to the Convention. As soon as these facts became known the Jacobins asked why Roland had not taken with him some of the chiefs of the municipality or some impartial members of the Convention? Why he had not caused the papers to be all put under cover as found, and to be sealed with the seal of some notary public, or other legal functionary, whose seal and signature might attest that there had been no foul play? As the business had been managed, had not Roland and his friends had ample opportunity not only to take out, but also to put in whatever papers they chose? And had they not, in effect, destroyed documents which committed themselves—which proved their own guilt? The Jacobin club fell into a hurricane; and their newspapers made an immense use of all the suspicious circumstances. Some of the papers which were found in the iron cupboard contained the clearest proofs of Mirabeau's venality and court intrigues. On the 5th of December the Convention solemnly decreed that the bust of Mirabeau should be covered with black crape until the letters found in the iron chest, and other letters found in other places, should be sifted and examined. Camille Desmoulins said that Pétion had told him, as far back as Mirabeau's funeral, that he knew that he was sold to the court; to which Pétion responded that he always knew that Mirabeau was a man of profound immorality—that he believed he had received large sums of money from the court, that it was certain he often went to St. Cloud, but that for the rest he had never had any positive proofs against him. But a veil of black crape would not satisfy the impatient rage of the Société Mère. On the night of the 5th Robespierre rose in the Club, and said:—"It has long been clear to every intelligent patriot that this pretended great man, this Mirabeau, was a mere in-

triguant who wore the mask of patriotism to betray the people. The proofs of his corruption are now complete. I demand, therefore, that the bust of this political charlatan be cast out of this temple of liberty! At the same time it will be well for us to consecrate a grand principle which is too much forgotten. We ought to check in the people their too great tendency to make popular idols; we ought to declare that it is not to great talents, but only to a true and persevering patriotism, that we will grant honours. Of all the busts here I only see two that are worthy of our respect—Brutus and Rousseau. Mirabeau must fall. Helvetius ought also to fall; for what was this Helvetius but a man of money and intrigue, a miserable bel esprit, an immoral man, one of the cruelest persecutors of our good Rousseau. If Helvetius had lived, do not fancy that he would have embraced the cause of liberty; he would only have been one more in the crowd of the intriguans and beaux esprits that are now ruining the country. I demand also that all these civic crowns which you have hung up in honour of living men disappear from our hall. A sad experience teaches us that we ought not to throw away our incense upon living men!" Before his speech was finished, or before any vote was come to, the garlands and civic crowns were all snatched from the walls, torn to bits, trampled upon, and burned as execrable rubbish. Then the Club demanded unanimously that the bust of Mirabeau should instantly be expelled, and the bust of Helvetius along with it; and, while the members of the club and the visitors in the galleries threatened the imperturbable effigies with wrathful eyes and clenched fists, some attendants ran and brought in two ladders. In a trice both busts were brought low, broken, cast under foot, and kicked about, every Jacobin "being ambitious of the honour" of kicking them or trampling upon them. "After this civic ceremony, and after this expeditious trial of Mirabeau and Helvetius, the Club passed to the order of the day."* This order of the day was the heavy charge against the Girondists, who had now not a single defender left in the Club. The iron chest or cupboard was a Pandora's box to this most inexpert faction. It was, at least, as fatal to them as to the court.

It appears that Roland, either through haste or parsimony, neglected to give a proper reward to Gamain, the locksmith, or, if he gave such reward, it did not prevent that scoundrel from re-appearing afterwards to demand a recompense from the Convention. The atrocity of the man is rendered the blacker by several little circumstances. Louis, who had always been exceedingly fond of the mechanical arts, had called in Gamain to teach him or assist him in the not very royal mysteries of turning, lock-making, &c., had treated him with great kindness, and had most liberally recompensed him. In the course of years Gamain had witnessed the remarkable gentleness and humanity of Louis's disposition; yet, besides betraying the secret of the armoire de fer (for which, no doubt, he had been largely paid), the villain, to get more money from those who sent Louis to the guillotine, charged him with a monstrous crime. Fifteen months after the time when he led Roland to the iron cupboard he presented a humble petition to the Convention, and, well knowing that the surest way of obtaining money from it was to defame the dead king, he asserted that, as soon as he and Louis had finished the iron chest and all that concealment, the king gave him a large glass of wine; that, on going home, he felt he was poisoned; that a sickness produced by the poison itself, and then a strong emetic, saved him from death; but that ever since his constitution had been ruined, and he had been unable to work for his family. Revolting, utterly incredible, as was the charge, the Convention put it upon record, made honourable mention of Gamain in their journals, and granted him a pension of twelve hundred livres.

On Monday, the 10th of December, Robert Lindet, an ultra-Jacobin member, presented the report of the committee of Twenty-one upon the crimes of Louis XVI. This paper, which described the history of the revolution in the manner of revolutionists, suppressing all that was irregular, excessive, or brutally violent on their parts, charged the king with every commotion, every misfortune, every drop of blood that had been spilt; but, with rather more dignity than Valazé, who had introduced the most contemptible and ridiculous accusations (such as making Louis the cause of the scarcity of sugar and coffee), Lindet dwelt principally upon the arrangements with the Marquis de Bouillé, the plan of operations which were to follow the flight to Varennes, the correspondence with the emigrants, and the negotiations on the part of Louis at the Congress or Convention of Pilnitz, in order to bring the troops of the coalition upon France. After making some amendments and additions to the charges, the Convention decreed that Louis should be brought to their bar on the morrow.

By means of the faithful Cléry the king was apprised a day or two beforehand of the decisions the Convention had come to, and of their intention to bring him before them. Other intimations had been given from less friendly quarters. As early as the 7th of December, a municipal officer, at the head of a deputation of the commune, went to the Temple, and read a decree ordering that all persons in confinement should be deprived of knives, razors, scissors, and all other sharp instruments, which are usually taken from criminals, and that the strictest search should be made for the same, as well on their persons as in their apartments. Louis calmly put his hands into his pockets and drew out a small clasp-knife, and a morocco pocket-book which contained a penknife and a pair of nail scissors; and, having delivered up knife, penknife, and scissors, he put the pocket-book into his pocket. The municipals then searched every corner of his apartment, and carried off his razors, curling-irons, and other instruments of the toilet, some of which were made of gold and some of silver. They made the same search in Cléry's room, and forced him to empty his pockets before them. They then went upstairs to the queen, read the same decree over to her and her little daughter and the Princess Elizabeth, and deprived them even of the little articles they used in working. Cléry, whose plain homely narrative is more touching than any eloquence could be, says, "The queen and the princesses were the more sensible of the loss of the little articles that were taken from them, as it forced them to give up different kinds of needle-work, which hitherto had been some solace and diversion in their tedious imprisonment. Once, as Madame Elizabeth was mending the king's coat, having no scissors left, she bit off the thread with her teeth. 'How are we fallen!' said the king, looking tenderly at her; 'Sister, you were in want of nothing at your pretty house of Montreuil.' 'Brother,' she said, 'I have no regrets while I share your misfortunes.'" At dinner-time a noisy dispute arose amongst the commissaries of the commune; some were against the royal family using knives and forks; others were for allowing them silver forks, but no knives; at last it was decided that they should be allowed both, but that they should be closely watched, and that care should be taken to remove the knives and forks the instant the meal was over. The king and the queen were now watched each by two municipals, who scarcely lost sight of them by night or by day. But they were allowed to be together in the daytime with their children and the Princess Elizabeth. On the 11th of December, by five in the morning, drums were heard beating to arms throughout Paris, and a squadron of horse, with cannon, were marched into the garden of the Temple. A little later battalions of infantry collected outside the gates, and orderlies and aides-de-camp were seen galloping from post to post. At nine o'clock the king and the dauphin went upstairs to the queen's room to breakfast with her and the princesses. It was the last meal they ever took together, and a sad one it was! They were so closely beset by the municipal officers, that, though they had so much to say to each other, they durst not speak, or they only ventured to say such things as their gaolers might hear. "This constant torment," says Cléry, "which the royal family suffered in not being able to give a loose to any unrestrained expression of their feelings, to any free effusion of their hearts, at a moment when they were agitated with so many fears, was one of the most cruel refinements and dearest delights of their tyrants." After remaining about an hour with his wife, his daughter, and his sister, Louis took leave of them to go down to his own room with the dauphin; and then his looks expressed what he dared not speak. As yet, however, he had no notion that they were going to separate him from his family. All that he knew was, that he was to appear that day before the Convention. When he was in his own apartment, the little dauphin would play a game of draughts. Louis sat down with the poor child and played several games. If he had been going to hold a levee, or to visit friends, he could not have been more cool and collected. When the games were over, the dauphin took his books and read to his father, as he had been accustomed to do every morning in the Temple. At eleven o'clock, while he was still hearing the dauphin read, two municipals (these Paris municipals must have been by many degrees harder of heart than the familiars of the Inquisition) stalked into the room, and told him that they were come to carry the young Louis up to his mother. The king desired to know why they would take his boy away from him. The municipals replied, that such were the orders of the council of the commune. The king tenderly embraced his son, and charged Cléry to conduct him upstairs to his mother. Cléry soon returned, and informed him that he had been allowed to deliver the young prince to his mother, "which," says Cléry, "appeared to relieve his mind." A municipal entered and told the king that Chambon, mayor of Paris, had arrived at the Temple, and was just coming up. "What does he want with me?" said Louis. A municipal answered, that he did not know;—and, being struck with the anguish of the king's countenance, this officer went to the door to avoid the sight of it. The anguish had all been caused by the ordering of his son from him, and by the presentiment that he was now to be separated from his family. Louis walked for some minutes up and down his room in great agitation—an agitation which he had not shown before—and he then sat down in an arm-chair at the head of his bed. The municipal, who had last quitted him, still stood by the door, which he kept ajar; but he respected the anguish of a father—he would not, he could not break in upon it. But, when half an hour had passed in dead silence, he became uneasy at not hearing the king move, and went in softly. He found Louis leaning with his head upon his hand, apparently lost in thought. His approach roused the king, who said, "What do you want with me?"—"I was afraid," said the municipal, "that you were ill." "No, I am obliged to you," said Louis; but he then added, in a tone that told the agony he felt, "But my son! the way they have taken my boy from me cuts me to the soul!" The municipal withdrew again without saying a word. It was one o'clock in the afternoon before Mayor Chambon made his appearance. He was accompanied by Chaumette, the new procureur of the commune (for Manuel had resigned that office on becoming a member of the Convention), by many municipals, and by Santerre, commander-in-chief of the national guards, attended by his aides-de-camp. The mayor told the king that he came to conduct him to the Convention by virtue of a decree which the secretary of the commune would read to him. The secretary read that Louis Capet was to be brought to the bar of the National Convention. "Capet!" said Louis, "that is not my name, though it is the name of one of my ancestors." After a pause, he added, addressing the mayor, "Sir, I could have wished that your commissaries had left my son with me during the two hours I have passed waiting for you. But this treatment is of a piece with the rest I have met with here during these last four months. I am ready to follow you, not in obedience to the Convention, but because my enemies have the power in their hands." Cléry handed the greatcoat and hat, and Louis followed Chambon and Santerre downstairs. At the gate of the Temple he was handed into the mayor's carriage; and, preceded by three pieces of artillery loaded with grape-shot, followed by three other cannons loaded in the like manner, and surrounded by a guard of six hundred picked Jacobins, the carriage was slowly driven towards the Convention, passing through double lines of national guards and pikemen, who had been stationed by order of the commune along the streets, with their battalion guns, and who saluted the king's ears with those strophes of the Marseillaise hymn which doomed tyrants to death.

While the king was approaching, the Convention talked loudly, and heaped decree upon decree, to keep up their hearts to the point of republican elevation; for, in spite of them, misgivings, and trepidations, and shame would now and then come over their minds. The cowards even trembled in the midst of their hundred thousand sans-culottes in arms—as must be evident to every man that will look into the precautions they had taken, and into their debate of this morning. Barbaroux made a fresh recapitulation of the crimes imputed to the king. Rewbell intimated that the House must not forget the Turks—must not overlook the fact that Louis and his insidious agents had endeavoured to arm the Ottoman empire against France. Drouet, the postmaster, who had arrested the king at Varennes, and who was now, by virtue of that deed, a legislator, called the attention of the House to the detestable intentions of that flight. Tallien remarked upon the way in which the king, at the time of that flight to Varennes, had forbidden his ministers to sign any legislative act, &c., and begged that this might be added to the articles of charge. Gorsas begged to add some further proofs of the intelligence between Louis and that arch-traitor Lafayette. Ruhl called attention to the dark treason in which Mirabeau was to have been chief agent. Dubois-Crancé hoped they would not forget to insert in the act of accusation a letter which Louis had written to the Bishop of Clermont, telling him that if ever he should recover his authority he would re-establish the Roman Catholic religion. But here Serre said, "Psha! do not talk about religion, unless you wish to see Louis some day canonized as a saint!" Marat, Billaud-Varennes, Bazire, Sergent, and others suggested fresh charges (as if they had not charged him enough), and out-rhodomontaded one another. Pétion gave a loud and most lying account of the events between the 9th and 10th of August, representing Louis in the Tuileries (his last night there) as a bloody tyrant anxiously expecting and confidently counting upon the massacre of his innocent subjects. "And I," said the ex-mayor, "saw him there, and heard him speak, not without danger to mine own life. Other men may make mistakes; but I was there, in the midst of Swiss and bayonets, and those people that we formerly christened knights of the dagger, chevaliers du poignard." Valazé, that other humane Girondist, threw in some more accusations, some more questions to be put to the king when he should appear. Butcher Legendre, who had been a slaughterer of men, as well as of sheep and oxen, demanded that no member of the House should make any motion, and that no person in the galleries should make any noise during all the time that Louis should be at the bar; "for," said he, "the silence of the grave must terrify that guilty man." Shortly after this, Barrère, who was acting as president, and who, with about equal indifference, would have sent Louis or the Convention and the whole revolution to the block, just as best suited his interest, put on a solemn face, and informed the House that Louis Capet was now close at hand on the Feuillant terrace. "Representatives of the people," said Barrère, who knew his trade, and understood to a nicety the people he was addressing, "representatives, you are going to exercise the rights of national justice! You will have to answer to all the citizens of the republic for your conduct on this grand occasion. All Europe is observing you. The genius of history is collecting your actions, your thoughts. Incorruptible posterity will judge you with inflexible severity! Let your attitude be conformable to the new functions you are going to fulfil. Impassibility and silence the most profound become such judges. The dignity of your countenance ought to respond to the majesty of the French people, who are about to deliver by your organ a great lesson to kings, and an example very useful to the enfranchisement of nations. Citizens in the galleries, you are associated in the glory and liberty of the nation of which you form a part. You know that justice presides only over tranquil deliberations. The National Convention reposes confidence in your entire devotion to the country, and in your respect for the representatives of the people. The citizens of Paris will not lose this new opportunity of showing the patriotism and public spirit with which they are animated. They have only to recollect the terrible silence which attended Louis when he was brought back from Varennes, a silence the forerunner of the judgment of kings by the nations." As soon as Barrère had finished this presidential magniloquence, commandant-general Santerre entered, and said he had the honour to acquaint the House that Louis Capet was waiting their orders. "Let him be brought in," said the president, trembling and turning pale, as some accounts say. Louis entered between the mayor and a municipal officer. As he approached the bar Santerre took hold of him by the arm, and General Wittengoff, a Courlander in the service of France, who had obtained promotion since the revolution, placed himself on the other side of the royal prisoner. There was a dead silence. The Girondists were in an evident quake; even the Mountain seemed moved. At length the silence was broken by president Barrère, who said, "Louis, the French nation accuses you. The National Convention has decreed, on the 3rd of December, that you shall be tried by it; and on the 6th of December it has decreed that you shall be brought to its bar. The act containing the crimes imputed to you is about to be read. Louis, you may be seated!" (Louis, vous pouvez vous asseoir.) Apparently unmoved at this vulgar insolence, which had been carefully studied and pre-arranged, the king sat down in front of the bar, and looked calmly around him—the calmest man in all that crowded assemblage. Girondist Mailhe read the charges, which had been considerably swelled since his first report, and which had been increased even this morning while Louis was coming from his prison to the House. When this reading was over, president Barrère began repeating the charges one by one. "Louis," said he, "the French people accuse you of having committed a multitude of crimes to establish your tyranny by destroying their liberty. On the 20th of June, 1789, you assaulted the sovereignty of the people by suspending the meeting of their representatives, and by driving them out by violence from the place of their sitting. Proof of this exists in the procès-verbal drawn up in the Tennis Court at Versailles by the members of the Constituent Assembly. On the 23rd of June of the same year you attempted to dictate laws to the nation, you surrounded their representatives with troops, you presented them two royal declarations subversive of all liberty, and you ordered the representatives to separate. Your own two declarations and the journals of the Constituent Assembly prove these crimes. Louis, what have you to reply?" Although the king had been diligently studying during his captivity the trial of Charles I. as related by Hume, he did not, like that prince, deny the authority of the court before which he was brought, or refuse to answer. He urged that in June, 1789, there was no constitution, or no existing laws which hindered his doing what he had done. The president then charged him with having surrounded Paris with troops in the month of July, 1789, and of having caused blood to be shed. Louis replied, that at the time he had the right of commanding the troops, protesting that he had never had any intention of shedding the blood of any of his subjects. In this manner they went through the articles of charge, fifty-seven in number; Louis either answered by a simple negative, or insisted that what he had done had been done before the constitution, or was justified by the laws as they then existed, or had been done since the constitution, which threw all the responsibility upon his ministers. In reply to the charge about the journey to Varennes, he said that he must refer to what had passed in the Constituent Assembly at the time, which Assembly had set aside the charge for ever by restoring him to the throne, and by swearing with him to the monarchic constitution. He scarcely showed any warmth or vehemence, except when the president charged him with having caused all the bloodshed on the 10th of August, 1792, when he cried out with a loud voice, "No, Sir! No! that was not I! The Tuileries was threatened, in a way which all constituted authorities witnessed. The mayor and the municipality saw it; and, as I was a constituted authority, I had a right to defend myself; but I did not do even that—I sent for a deputation of the National Assembly, and I came and took refuge here with my family."

When Barrère had finished putting his fifty-seven questions, Valazé began to interrogate Louis touching the documents which had been found in the Tuileries on the 10th of August, and the papers and other letters which Roland produced as having been found in the iron chest on the 20th of November. Louis denied all knowledge of the papers, one and all, except some notes written by Lafayette, which, he said, merely related to a revision of the constitution before it was finished and sworn to. He even denied any knowledge of the mysterious iron chest or of its contents—whereat the Convention was very wroth. The president then said, "Louis, the National Convention invites you to withdraw." "I demand the assistance of counsel," said Louis, retiring with the same calmness with which he had entered. Accompanied by Chambon, Chaumette, Santerre, and sundry municipals, he entered the mayor's coach. The porters of the Halle, the charcoal-men of Paris, and other citizens and patriots of the most sans-culottic order, were drawn up, under arms, on the Feuillant terrace, and saluted his ears with the Marseillaise hymn, straining their throats most at that part of it which calls for the blood of tyrants to irrigate the land. As the carriage passed through the streets, the people shouted Vive la Republique! Not a man among them had heart or courage enough to show any sympathy with the unhappy prisoner. They noted that he was much thinner, that his beard was rough and unshaven, that his whole exterior was neglected; but the sad change only furnished them with some merry jests. It was half-past six in the evening before he reached the Temple. The first thing he asked was permission to see his family. The municipals in attendance told him that this could not be, as they had orders from the commune to the contrary. He then requested that they would at least tell his family that he was come back safe; and with this the municipals complied. He then took up a book and read for two hours, being all the while surrounded by four municipal officers. At half-past eight supper was served. He asked the municipals whether his family were not to come down as usual to sup with him. They made him no answer. "But my son," said the bereaved father, "at least my son is to sleep in my room, as his bed and things are here!" The municipals were as silent as before. He sat down to his solitary meal. After supper he renewed his entreaties to be allowed to see his family; but he was told that he must wait the determination of the Convention. He had then the anguish of seeing his little boy's bed removed from his own bedside, and carried with the rest of his things upstairs. Nevertheless he lay quietly down to rest, merely saying to Cléry that he could never have conceived all the questions which the Convention had put to him. The first thing he did the next morning was to ask the first municipal he saw whether he might not see his family. He was again told that they waited for orders. He begged the municipal to go up and inquire after his wife, children, and sister, and tell them that he was well. The municipal complied, and brought back word that they too were well. Cléry expressed a hope that the Convention would revoke the order for this cruel separation. Louis replied, "I expect no consideration, no justice, no mercy: but let us wait!"

The members of the Convention were strangers to this patience and this tranquillity: they, in the meanwhile, had been in convulsions of rage and impatience. As soon as he withdrew, this rage commenced, with a demand made by Treilhard (rather a Jacobin than a Girondist) that he should be allowed counsel. After loud murmurs from a part of the House, Albitte, a member of the Mountain, proposed that the proposition should either be rejected at once or its consideration adjourned. Billaud-Varennes, Tallien, Robespierre the younger, Marat, and several other members of the Mountain, rose all at once, and furiously supported the motion for adjournment. Ducos, though also a member of the Mountain, supported Treilhard. Being put to the vote, the adjournment was rejected by a great majority. Uproar and riot followed: the president rang his bell, but there was longue et vive agitation. Garat, when he could make himself heard, reminded the house that by the jury laws, which had been passed since the revolution, every person accused had the indisputable right of choosing one or two friends, or counsel, to assist him in his defence. Marat exclaimed, "But we are not engaged upon an ordinary trial! . . . We must have none of your lawyer chicanery here!" Chabot, Merlin, Montaut, and other Jacobins roared and raved at Garat. They thought that few would have courage to commit themselves openly on such a question; and therefore Duhem demanded that not only upon this question, but on all questions that might arise during the king's trial, the members should be bound to vote by appel nominal, or by muster-roll. The tumult and agitation increased; and, tired of ringing the bell, the president put on his hat. This last solemn and decisive act (for, if the president kept his hat on, the house must separate or suspend business) restored order; and then, after a speech from Pétion, the vote was carried that Louis should be allowed counsel. On the morning of the 12th the session was still more stormy. Thuriot demanded that no time should be lost—that Louis should be tried and condemned on the 15th, or, at latest, on the 16th. "I trust," said he, "that in allowing him counsel you do not mean to allow of any delay. Foreign nations, eager to recover their own liberty, are calling out for this great example; and the tyrant must carry his head to the scaffold!" Some members, ridiculously enough, begged Thuriot to remember that he was one of Louis's judges, and that therefore he ought not to prejudge him, or talk of the scaffold before he was condemned. "I mean to say," resumed Thuriot, "that there are men among us who are seeking to delay the trial; that there are men who would prevent the execution of justice, while the true friends of liberty only wish the law to strike at once! Your duty is to act according to the wish of the people: now their wish is that Louis should be promptly judged; and I declare every man that opposes this wish to be unworthy of the confidence of the people!" These sentiments were enthusiastically applauded by the people in the galleries. There then followed a furious debate upon the questions whether the originals or only the copies of the papers found in the iron chest, &c. should be submitted to the examination of Louis and his counsel, and whether he should or should not be allowed more than three days to prepare his defence. The Mountain again insisted that the house should vote by appel nominal, so that the vote of every member should be clearly known to the people, who might thereby draw a proper distinction between such as defended the cause of the people and such as defended the tyrant. On the motion of Cambacérés, a young lawyer from Montpellier, and at that time a decided Girondist, it was agreed that the house should send a committee of four to the Temple to ask Louis whom he would choose for his counsel. This committee, composed of Thuriot, Dubois-Crancé, Dupont de Bigorre, and Cambacérés himself, soon reported that they had been at the Temple, and that Louis had chosen MM. Target and Tronchet, and had demanded the use of pens, paper, and ink, of which he had been deprived. The Convention magnanimously resolved that the king should have what he asked for, and be allowed to communicate freely with the counsel he had chosen. But on the next morning (the 13th) a letter was presented to the Convention, signed "The Republican Target," importing that the said republican refused to act as counsel for the king, inasmuch as he was an old man, and was not in good health. It appears, however, that he was well enough to keep the place and do the duties of judge, and that he was hale enough and strong enough to perform all such functions as gave pleasure or profit without any danger. Upon the reading of this letter, Cambacérés proposed that the Convention should appoint counsel for the ex-king. But, at this juncture, two letters from eminent lawyers were presented. The first of these was Malesherbes, who was really as old and infirm as Target pretended to be. This ex-minister of Louis, whose note was dated on the 11th, told the citizen president that he was as yet uninformed whether the Convention would allow counsel or not; but that if it allowed counsel, and allowed the choice of it to Louis XVI., he requested that Louis might know that he was ready to devote himself to the duty. "I do not ask you," added Malesherbes, who had passed his threescore years and ten, "to make my offer known to the Convention, for I am far from thinking myself of sufficient importance to engage their attention: but I was twice called to the council of him who was my master, at a time when that office excited the ambition of everybody; and I feel it to be my duty to offer myself as his counsel, now that that duty is thought dangerous by many. If I knew any possible mode of making my intention known to him, I should not take the liberty of applying to you." The other note, dated the 12th, was from Sourdat, a lawyer of Troyes, who had held several offices under the king, and who now offered to plead for him, although he knew the danger attending the simple offer. Tallien hoped that all this talk about counsel might not delay the king's trial; and he demanded that the day should be fixed. Thuriot said that, since Louis had denied his own notes, and his own signature attached to the papers found in the iron chest, the Convention should appoint some two or three men expert in judging of handwriting to decide those points. An unnamed member moved an adjournment to this proposition. "Oh!" cried Thuriot, "with these adjournments you want to prolong the affair for a month." "Kings," said butcher Legendre, "never adjourn their vengeance upon the people, and would you adjourn the justice of a people upon a king!" "Helas!" said Billaud-Varennes, "we must break the bust of Brutus to bits; for he never hesitated as we do in taking vengeance on a tyrant!" Another unnamed member (lucky in that he was not named) cried out that all this fury, that these propositions were nothing but proofs of a continual conspiracy against liberty—that it was impossible to expect justice from such passionate judges. Another terrible tempest was going to break out, when some adroit men reminded the House that it was absolutely necessary to appoint instantly certain commissioners to go and look after the armies. This business occupied them till dinner-time; and in the evening their attention was absorbed by the election of another president to succeed Barrère. When this business was finished, a letter was read from Tronchet, who accepted the dangerous office which Louis had proposed. In all this business the commune pretended to a division of power with the Convention. One of their deputations now came to the bar to inform the House that they had ordered that, before the counsel of Louis XVI. should be admitted to the Temple, they should be searched jusque dans les endroits les plus secrets. As the municipals announced this frowsty decision of the commune, about a hundred members testified that there was still some sense of decency left in France; a hundred voices or more demanded the suppression of the vile proposal. Bazire exclaimed that it looked as if the commune wanted to force people to pity the fate of Louis Capet. But Robespierre, who knew how essential it was to keep well with the commune, attempted to defend its order. The sense of the majority, however, was against it; and it was agreed that the House should abide by its previous decision, which granted the counsel free access to the prisoner. The commune was far too powerful and independent to give implicit obedience to this decision of the Convention. On the 14th Tronchet had a conference with the king. On the same day Malesherbes was introduced into the Temple. Louis ran to meet the venerable man, and pressed him to his bosom:—the old statesman melted into tears. Cléry, understanding that the king had permission to consult with his counsel in private, shut the room-door in order that he might speak the more freely with Malesherbes. For this Cléry was reprimanded by one of the municipals, who ordered him to open the door, and forbade him to shut it in future. Cléry opened the door; but Louis and Malesherbes had withdrawn to the turret closet. The municipals entered the room, and, as the king spoke rather loud, they could hear every word that was said in the closet. When Malesherbes was gone, Cléry informed his master how he had been reprimanded, and how the municipals had been eaves-dropping and catching every word of the conference: he also begged the king to shut the door of his chamber himself when his counsel should be with him, and this in future Louis did. The greatest anguish of Louis—the only thing that unmanned him—was his continued separation from his family. On the 15th he received an answer from the Convention upon this tenderest point. This answer, in substance, was that the queen and Madame Elizabeth should have no communication with him during the trial, but that his children might be with him, if he desired it, on condition that they were not allowed to see their mother or their aunt, till his examination was over. "You see," said the bereaved father to Cléry, "you see the cruel dilemma in which they place me. In this way I cannot think of having my children with me: as for my daughter, she is out of the question, and I know what pain the queen would suffer in giving up my son: I must make the sacrifice." It is not in the book of M. Thiers that the domestic part of this tragedy—the most agonising part of all—will be found correctly represented. True to his one unvarying system, Thiers at once diminishes the sufferings of royalty and the atrocities of the Convention and people. He says that the Convention decided instantly (sur-le-champ) that Louis might see his family (qu'il pourrait voir sa famille). And from the context, and the absence of any date, and from the expression sur-le-champ, the reader is left to believe that this humane decision was adopted as soon as Louis made the request, or on the night of the 11th or morning of the 12th; whereas, in fact, the Convention took no notice of Louis's appeal until the 15th. M. Thiers entertains no doubt as to the scrupulous exactness of Cléry, which has been acknowledged by all, and which is demonstrated and proved by an abundance of existing documentary evidence: he uses Cléry's little book for many of his facts; and we presume he has looked into the 'Moniteur' and other newspapers of the day, which not only show that the resolution was adopted on the 15th, and not before, but also show what the barbarous resolution really was; giving, besides, the motives and reasonings of one party, and the dastardly fears of the other (the Gironde), which led to it. On the 15th, Lecointre of Versailles (the linen-draper, and first commandant of the national guards of that town), feeling some touches of compunction, rose in the Convention and said, "It is very astonishing that Louis Capet should be deprived of the right of seeing his wife and children. I demand that he be permitted to see his family." At the first moment the humane proposition was received with applause; and, the president putting it to the vote during the emotion, it was carried, apparently by acclamation, or at least without a division. But presently a number of members, sitting at the extremities of the hall, raised angry voices against the haste with which it had been put to the vote and carried; they said that there had been no deliberation, that the motion had been made in a hurry and tumult, and that the question must be debated. Tallien then rose to give his opinion upon the hasty resolution, or rather to tell the House that the permission to the king to see his family did not depend upon them or their vote, but upon the commune of Paris. "In vain," cried Tallien, "in vain will the Convention order it; if the municipal body do not wish it, this decree will never be executed!" Irritated, exasperated by this plain and concise enunciation of the indisputable fact that the commune was stronger than the Convention, and could defy its decrees and authority, many members thundered at Tallien and drowned his voice, and Pétion, who had made such uses of the commune prerogative when he was mayor, rushed to the tribune in a state of great excitement. "Every day," cried he, "endeavours are made in this place to degrade the Convention." "That is but too true!" said many voices. "But," resumed Pétion, "in degrading the Convention, they ruin the public cause! They have just insulted the Convention in the grossest manner! We have been told that our decree shall not be executed unless the municipality chooses. Those who speak thus commit outrages upon liberty, and violate the laws in their very sanctuary.

This is not liberty! This is licence! I demand that the member who has been guilty of this outrage be censured by the House." The Girondists applauded; but Marat, standing at the foot of the tribune, apostrophised Pétion, and threatened him with gestures, until Pétion retired from the speaking-place. Tallien then spoke again. "I wished to observe," said he, "that it is not to the Convention, but to the commune, that the custody of the ci-devant king and his family has been confided. It is inconsequent to permit Louis Capet to communicate with his accomplices,—I mean with his wife and sister, for they would concert together their projects and their answers. Assuredly, if the municipal body should think that your decree is contrary to the national interest, that it might commit the public tranquillity, the municipality would do well to refuse....." His voice was drowned by murmurs and shouts; some even shouted, "Send him to the Abbaye!" But Tallien well knew they dared not do it—well knew that it was he and his commune, and not the Convention, that kept the keys of the prison;—and Robespierre's brother rose and perplexed the House, by referring to some preceding decrees which seemed to allow the commune to dispose of the persons of the royal family as it might think proper. The Girondists were, however, strong enough to carry the vote of censure proposed by Pétion; but such a censure carried no popular discredit with it—it only incensed the men of the Mountain, without humbling them or doing them any injury. And scarcely was this vote of censure passed, ere the Convention revoked the humane resolution which had been the cause of Tallien's offence. Postmaster Drouet, whose opinions in all matters concerning the custody of the king met with great respect, as there was no denying that he was the man that caught the king at Varennes, demanded that the report of the decree should be suspended, and that Lecointre's proposition should be submitted to a considerate debate. He was seconded by Leonard Bourdon, who had been a commissioner or commissary of the commune before he became a member of the Convention, and who, in the former of these capacities, had gone to Orleans, his native town, to see that the state prisoners there were all delivered up to Fournier, the American, who conducted them to be massacred at Versailles. This Bourdon, who had remarked, at an earlier part of the debate, that the Convention had properly nothing to do with the custody of the royal family, which solely belonged to the commune, now said that many members of that House had wished to deliver their opinions on the very important question, and had been prevented by the tumult which was got up, and by the hurry with which the president had put it to the vote. Some other members demanded that the decree should be so modified as to permit the king to see his children, without seeing his wife and sister. The Girondists called for the order of the day, and even carried it. "If this is to be your method," cried Tallien, "I demand that you decree the principle that all criminal accomplices may concert their defences together!" "Yes! yes!" shouted the Mountain and the galleries. A terrific storm ensued, in which some cried out for the amendment, some for the entire revocation of Lecointre's decree, and some for the vote by appel nominal, or muster-roll—which last was a proposition never heard by the Gironde without terror. Amidst that roar of voices the loud organ of Drouet made itself distinctly heard. And what followed?—Why, Linendraper Lecointre took the alarm, and begged that his own decree might be amended. "When I first made my motion," said he, "I did not know that the wife and sister of the ci-devant king were inculpated. Without doubt, if they are inculpated, they ought not to be allowed to communicate with him until his trial is over. But I do not believe that we can refuse him the permission to communicate with his children." Rewbell could not conceive how Lecointre could be ignorant of the fact that Louis Capet's wife and sister were implicated; and he told the draper that none but fools could say that the family of the ex-king were not co-accused with him! Lecointre shrunk into his corner, resolving never again to get into danger by pleading the cause of humanity. Dubois-Crancé said that, as he had been one of the committee sent by the Convention to the Temple on the 12th, he might speak to this point, and inform the House that Louis knew very well that his wife and sister were accused. "Besides," added Dubois-Crancé, "the municipal officers that are watching him told us that, if he were allowed to see his children, he would know, through them, all that his wife and sister wished him to know; for the children, in these things, are inconceivably cunning." Some of the Girondists proposed voting simply that Louis might see his children; but they were again scared by the cry of "Appel nominal! No voting but by muster-roll!" and they allowed Lecointre's decree to be amended and altered in this manner:—"Louis shall be allowed to communicate only with his children, who shall not be permitted to see their mother or their aunt until after his trial."*

On the 16th the Girondists made sundry efforts in the Convention to recover the popularity they had lost, and place themselves again in the front of the movement. Buzot exclaimed, "A great act of national vengeance is going to be accomplished. Justice is at length going to fall upon the head of kings, and to consecrate her sword to the defence of equality. The throne is laid low, and in a short time the tyrant will be no more! But, be upon the alert! despotism still lives, and our republican constitution is not made!" After this exciting exordium, Buzot demanded that the Duke of Orleans and his sons should be instantly banished from France as a branch of the royal race. The Girondist chief pretended that this banishment was necessary, as it was vain to expect that the Orleans branch could ever be good republicans, and as their name might serve as a rallying-point to the royalists after the death of the king; but his real object was to depopularize the Jacobins by connecting them with Philippe Egalité, and to ruin Robespierre by accusing him of a very anti-republican connexion with that most wretched prince. The blow was well meant, for Philippe had taken his post at the very top of the Mountain, and had in a manner identified himself with that furious party. If Robespierre and his friends should venture to plead in favour of their colleague, Buzot fancied he would have them on the hip. He was seconded by Faublas-Louvet, who opened his discourse in a still more startling manner by saying that the House ought to consider that it was not he (Louvet), but Brutus that was addressing them—Brutus, the immortal founder of a famous republic, and the father of Roman liberty. As there was something exceedingly un-Roman and un-Brutus-like in the face and figure and spectacled nose of the little novelist, the House rejected the impersonation, and laughed uproariously. But Louvet would not be disconcerted: he repeated that he ought to be considered as Brutus, and that the Convention ought to give ear unto him while he delivered the speech which Brutus had delivered on the expulsion of the Tarquins. "Frenchmen," exclaimed the little man, "I swear it is Brutus that addresses you; I am only the faithful interpreter of his words. Listen attentively to Brutus! " Legendre, the butcher, who possibly had not had the advantage of a classical education, interrupted him, and seemed to implore him to have done with his Brutus and his Romans; and Duhem cried mercy, imploring the little man not to crush them "with the despotism of his talent." But it was all in vain! Louvet was not to be stopped, and on he went with Brutus's speech and half of a book of his French 'Livy.' In concluding his mercilessly long harangue and oration, Louvet said that it was quite clear Philippe Egalité ought to act as Collatinus had done at the expulsion of the Tarquins. "That virtuous Roman," said he, "was nephew to the tyrant Tarquin. Philippe Egalité, thou art a relation to the tyrant Louis! Collatinus had powerfully contributed to drive out Tarquin; and some men say that thou, Philippe, hast done something to bring about the fall of Capet, the traitor. Nay, some have thought that they might elect thee to be a representative of the people; but, remember, Collatinus, by the free choice—I say by the indisputably free choice—of the Roman citizens, occupied a post not less respectable than thine, being Consul. At the head of the Roman youth, he had partaken with Brutus the honour of putting the despot to flight; thy sons, O Philippe, are leading the conquering children of France against the barbarians. But Collatinus saw that his presence, as a relation of the tyrant, was giving occasion to suspicions and troubles, and thereupon he left Rome, and retired to Alba. Philippe, I declare to thee that thou throwest among us doubts and uneasiness, the seed of all discords. Collatinus had the good sense not to wait for the decree of the Roman people: Philippe, thou wilt not wait for ours if thou art the true friend of liberty, but thou wilt get thee gone out of France with thy wife and thy sons, and with all that belong to thee!" And then, quitting his Romanisms and his parallels, Faublas-Louvet moved, parliamentarily, that the National Convention should order every individual of the family of the Bourbons, except such as were in the Temple, to quit for ever the territory of the French republic. He was seconded by that other capital Girondist, Lanjuinais, who soon blew into a mad flame the fire which Louvet had kindled in the galleries by only hinting that some of the citizens of Paris had behaved unpatriotically in the late elections. Lanjuinais, going much farther, spoke loudly about the massacres of September, and declared that those slaughters were committed solely by a detestable faction, and for the sole purpose of influencing the elections. "How," said he, "were those popular elections managed which gave us Philippe Egalité for one of the Paris members? The elections were managed under the axe of the people, and by the orders of those men that were to partake in the protectorate with Philippe! It was not without a design that they brought this new Collatinus among us; it was not without a design that they united themselves with a man who may pretend some hereditary right to rule over us. When you reflect on that circular of the commune, and on the commissaries they sent into the departments to terrify the republic with executions not less bloody than those of Paris, everything proves that these men want a new royalty, because they have a real interest in procuring one, because they have so placed themselves as to make sure of the favours of the civil list, because they are all connected with this Philippe Egalité and his sons. Only look at the men who are distinguishing themselves at the head of our armies! Are they not all friends of this Orleans family? If you allow yourselves to proceed on this great question according to the vices of form (vices de forme), I must despair; I must, in spite of myself, entertain dark suspicions. For these three years have I been turning in my mind the propriety and expediency of the measure which Buzot now proposes to you." Lanjuinais, in the course of his harangue, was called to order by Drouet for treating the people of Paris as tyrants and assassins; and he was repeatedly hooted by the indignant galleries. If the Gironde had had but common prudence, they would have abstained from these attacks upon the sovereign people until they had gotten more strength, and they would have for the present continued to keep down the veil which they had so repeatedly declared proper to be drawn over the events of September. Chabot rose to reply to Lanjuinais, and, as he ascended the steps of the tribune, the ex-capuchin was applauded and cheered by the galleries. He was far too adroit a man to commit himself or his party by openly defending the ci-devant Duke of Orleans. He denied that Robespierre had taken any part in the election of Philippe Egalité. Nay, he declared that the election of Egalité had been opposed by none so warmly as by Robespierre and those who were styled his partizans. He begged Buzot and Louvet, and the rest of the Girondists who were so eager to banish the Orleans branch, to remember that the exiling proposition of Brutus had not been made until after judgment had been passed upon Tarquin. "If," said he, "you banish Egalité and his family before you try Louis Capet, you will begin at the wrong end, and give an irregular character to your proceedings. For my part, I wish that the whole Bourbon race should be condemned on the same day; but I cannot wish you to begin with this Philippe and his sons, who, you say, have served the cause of liberty. Besides, the sovereign people have elected Philippe Egalité to be their representative, and to sit among you; and so it seems to me that, before talking about banishment, you must discuss the question whether you can reject from your body a representative of the people invested with precisely the same rights and having precisely the same character as you yourselves. Let us adjourn this business until the day when we shall pass judgment on the head of the Bourbon race, and then it is not I that will oppose the perpetual banishment of every member of that family." A Girondist followed Chabot, speaking strongly against the adjournment, and calling for an immediate decree of banishment. St. Just, though sitting on the Mountain, agreed for once with the Gironde. This fanatic exclaimed, "I demand the eternal exile of all the Bourbons, and death to any one of them that dares put his foot again in France. But this will not be enough. Brutus drove out the Tarquins to make sure of liberty in Rome; but here, I do not know whether we are not expelling the Bourbons to make room for other Tarquins. Rome had laws, Rome had Brutus; but here, I see neither laws nor a Brutus. When we shall have expelled our Tarquins, I expect to see Catiline with his army. I abhor the Bourbons. I demand that every one of them be driven away except the king, who must remain, and you know for what (vous savez pour quoi!)" [This allusion to the guillotine was much applauded.] "Some men would connect this Orleans with the king and his trial, no doubt, in order to diminish the king's punishment, and to get from us a sentence of banishment, instead of a sentence of death. I say, let us pronounce judgment on the king to-day, and let the family of Orleans quit France to-morrow!" Other members of the Mountain, taking up St. Just's hint that there were in the Convention and in the executive government as bad enemies to liberty as any of the Bourbons, and that there was a faction quite ready to play the part of Catiline, began to denounce the chiefs of the Gironde, so that the first fruits of their project to ostracise the Duke of Orleans and his sons, were fresh accusations against themselves. "The principal cause of all our troubles and divisions," said Duhem, "is Roland. I demand that he be made to quit the ministry this instant!" The Mountain and the galleries clapped hands and shouted; the côté droit murmured. "I know," added Duhem, "that in attacking this Roland I attack the idol of the Gironde!" The Mountain and the galleries applauded him again. The Girondists, who by this time had made the important discovery that Pache, the new war-minister, had turned against Roland, his old patron, and had joined the Jacobins, cried out that it would be much more proper to get rid of the war-minister. "If you do," said Camille Desmoulins, "France is lost!" "I speak of Roland," said Duhem, "as the head of the party; and we will have no heads of parties in France!" Barrère thought that the best thing the Convention could do was to dismiss both Pache and Roland, form an entire new ministry, and exile the family of Orleans at once. Camille Desmoulins said that, if the Convention would banish Philippe Egalité, they ought first to secure to him an asylum somewhere, as all the governments of Europe were inflamed against him for the part he had taken in the revolution. Cambon, who was at this time a Girondist, thought that the family of Orleans and all known enemies of liberty might very well be banished, but that care and delicacy ought to be used in regard to Roland and the Gironde ministry. "The republican principles which guide us," said he, "must prove to the whole universe that France was ripe for liberty. But let us take care not to run into extremes, or establish too much ostracism." Kersaint, one of the most decided of Girondists, thought that at least the question about changing the ministry might be adjourned. "Yes, until after the death of Louis XVI.!" cried Tallien, who was much applauded by the galleries and by some members of the House. But the Girondists seemed determined not to adjourn the question of the banishment of Philippe Egalité; and this made Jacobin Rewbell cry shame upon them. "You have not examined any one," said he; "you have no proofs that Philippe is other than what he declares himself to be, a patriot citizen, a champion of equality. I confess that all that I have heard upon the question is a scrap of Roman history. Are we servilely to imitate the Romans? Are we to establish ostracism in a representative republic? Have we the right to expel and banish a representative of the people? In my way of thinking, all these questions merit at least the serious attention of a committee of the House." All the members of the gauche joined in calling out loudly for the adjournment: the Girondists responded, with shouts, that they ought to deliberate and decide then and there; and, being joined by some of the wavering

Plain, the Girondists had an evident majority. They seemed determined to make full use of this advantage, without paying the least regard to justice or to decency: they seemed, in short, determined to use the horrible process of ostracism, just as Robespierre and his party used it against them not six months after this date. But, as usual, their hearts failed them: they trembled before the fury of the galleries, who all declared for the Mountain; and they could never daringly execute what they had daringly conceived. The House became a Bedlam. The Jacobins cried out that this was horrible despotism; that such decrees would never be obeyed by true patriots or by the people. The Girondists moved that the first member who interrupted the discussion should be sent to the Abbaye; and they even carried a vote to this effect. But the men of the Mountain rose to a man, crying, "Send us all! all! to the Abbaye!" and so the vote remained a nullity, and the cries of the Jacobins continued as loud as before. Vergniaud exclaimed, in a rage, that it was impossible that the majority of the Convention should thus submit to the tyranny of a seditious minority; that it was time to display a grand energy; that the majority must deliver themselves from this tyranny! "Try," cried Calon; "the minority are ready to die here in their places!" The galleries applauded Calon, and the tempest grew louder and louder. The president put on his hat, took it off, put it on again, proposed reading over the procès-verbal of the debate. The galleries and the Mountain shouted that the majority were going to invade the sovereignty of the people. "I say," exclaimed Vergniaud, "it is you that are committing the sovereignty of the people; it is you that are constantly violating it." "I say," retorted Duhem, "that Egalité is a member of this house—that you have no right to expel a representative of the people." Another Jacobin demanded to be heard. The president told him he should be heard in his turn. "Yes," cried Duhem, "when you have ostracised us all, when you have driven out of the House all the members who sit on this side of it! I denounce all that side of it." The galleries again applauded. Barrère made an equivocating speech, which gave the Girondists to understand that they must not count too much on the Centre, or Plain; and then the Girondists consented to listen to a long harangue from Choudieu, whom shortly before they had hooted from the tribune. Choudieu, encouraged by all that discouraged his opponents, urged on by his party and by the galleries, attacked the Girondists with great fury, and yet with some address. He complained of the shameless manner in which they had attempted to stop free discussion, and he accused them of proceeding according to a preconcerted plan. "Yes," said he, "all this manœuvre was prepared. They wanted to represent us as attached to the party of Orleans. It was very necessary that we should destroy that dangerous fallacy. Moreover I maintain that this Assembly has not the right of expelling a member invested with a portion of the national sovereignty. And, even if this principle were subject to exceptions, it would be very dangerous, very indecent to decide such a question in such a hurry. This is the reason why we, the minority, have struggled with the majority, and have said that it should not be! We want security for all the representatives of the people; and, if you had once driven out one member, where would have been our security that you would not very soon have driven out others? This is what we would have said before, if, instead of calling us rogues and villains, you had consented to hear us. You ought to remember that it was the minority of the last Assembly that brought you into this, and that without that minority you would have been nothing. In this present debate you have been tyrannical and out of all order; while we, the minority, have been constantly in order, and on the side of moderation and justice. We meant to ask that the question of Philippe Egalité's banishment should be adjourned for two days; and, now that you hear me, I demand that adjournment." Choudieu descended from the speaking-place covered with applause, and in the next minute the Girondists withdrew their opposition, gave up their advantage as a majority, and allowed the adjournment to be carried without a division. The Convention then agreed that the question about dismissing Roland, and changing the whole ministry, should be adjourned sine die. Their case was hopeless enough before, but the conduct of the Girondists on this day alone would have been sufficient to discredit and ruin almost any party. They had put themselves clearly in the wrong; they had allowed their enemies to prove this wrong against them, and, after a brazen attempt, they had been foiled and completely beaten. One very noticeable effect of their conduct was, that it made sure, at the least, of one vote more against the life of Louis XVI., which they pretended to wish to save. They made the Duke of Orleans feel what mercy he might expect from them; they sharpened that fear which (as with the rest of them) was the chief guide and dictator of his conduct, and therefore it was that he determined to go onward with the Jacobins, to go any lengths with them, and to give them a pledge of his perfect sincerity by joining his vote to theirs in sending his kinsman to the block. This is the true key to Philippe Egalité's conduct at the awful crisis. Whatever may have been his plans or his hopes when the revolution began, he had certainly no plan, no hope now, beyond that of saving his own life and the lives of his children, with some portion of his immense landed property. It was not ambition, or the lofty hope of stepping into a vacant throne, but it was the fear of banishment and beggary, or the dread of the guillotine, that impelled Philippe to give his vote for the death of Louis. He was already a far more wretched man than the dethroned prisoner in the Temple. Even outwardly he was so worn and wasted, that men passed him in the streets without knowing him.

That night the Jacobin Club passed in review the conduct of the Girondists in the Convention. "Never," said Camille Desmoulins, "never since the beginning of the revolution has there been such a storm! The perfidy of the Barnaves and the Duports was nothing compared with the tactics of these Girondists, these Brissotins. Buzot moved that, in order to secure the public tranquillity, we should send into perpetual exile every member of the family of Bourbon. This, as you see, was demanding the banishment of Egalité, who has contributed so much to the revolution: and to demand the banishment of that sincere friend of liberty is to demand that he should be assassinated at Coblenz. The Brissotins said among themselves, the Jacobins will not abandon Egalité, and thus we will get the Mountain to be looked upon as a royalist faction. Brethren, we were seriously embarrassed! It was the perfection of craft to make us pass for royalists in forcing us to defend Egalité. Their object was to force us into the sad alternative of being unjust or of passing for royalists!" Robespierre, who had not been present at the debate in the Convention, and who, no doubt, had kept away from it designedly, followed Camille Desmoulins in the club, speaking with rare cunning or caution, for he well knew that he, above all Jacobins, had been accused of complicity with the Duke of Orleans. "Camille Desmoulins," said he, "has given you an account of this atrocious plot of the enemies of liberty; but I fear that Camille has not got to the bottom of it. If I had been in the House I would have voted for Louvet's motion! It is conformable to principles, and the conduct of Brutus is applicable to our present position. I acknowledge that the House of Orleans has shown a great deal of patriotism. I do not deny the debt of gratitude we owe to that family; but, whatever may be some of the members of the ci-devant royal family, they ought all to be immolated to true republican principles. I am far from accusing those particular members of the family who seem to have been accused this morning by the aristocratic party; I believe them to belong to no faction whatever, but we must stick to principles. Now, such are the clouds and mysteries spread over the characters of men, that we cannot for a certainty know the real object of the House of Orleans. The patriots this morning seemed to defend the citizen Egalité, because they believed the cause of our principles was attached to the cause of Egalité. But one thing is very certain, and it is, that the patriots have never had any connexion with the House of Orleans, while those who proposed the decree of banishment have had the closest connexions with that House." He affirmed, as things of notoriety, that Pétion was the friend of Philippe Egalité; that Sillery, the confidential man of Philippe, was constantly in the society of Pétion and Brissot; that Philippe's election had been managed and secured by those who were connected with Brissot, and that he (Robespierre) had actually voted against Philippe, as was perfectly well known to Louvet, who was spreading the libel that he now wanted to give the crown to Philippe. The conclusions he drew from all these circumstances were, that the Girondists had been acting a comedy, had been spreading a snare for the Jacobins; that their object was to give themselves a republican air, and to throw upon their adversaries the imputation of the very projects which they were themselves meditating—to alarm credulous minds by vague charges, and words that could be easily repeated. “They have,” said he, “already tried what they could make of accusing me of aiming at the dictatorship; they have seen that that calumny would not take, and therefore they are now calling us an Orleanist faction. This observation may throw a little light on their manoeuvres. Now I will tell them that I have myself long been thinking of demanding the banishment of Philippe Egalité and all his family—the banishment of every member of the House of Bourbon. Nor is this demand so inhuman as some good friends of liberty have thought it, for they may go and take refuge in London, and the French nation may provide in an honourable manner for the subsistence of the exiled family. They have not injured or offended their country; their exile is not a punishment, but a measure of security; and, if the members of the Orleans family are attached not to the Brissotins, but to the true principles, they will feel their exile to be an honour, for it is always honourable to serve the cause of liberty; their exile will only last as long as the present dangers of the country, and they will be recalled as soon as liberty shall be firmly established. But observe the actual dangers of Louvet’s motion. The object of that motion is to drive all our friends, all the best patriots, out of the Convention; for, after driving out Egalité, they will drive out other representatives; and as soon as they have poisoned public opinion, it will be easy for them to expel all the true friends of the people, and so remain masters of the field of battle. Already have they laid down the principle that, as soon as the name of a man becomes formidable to them, they may drive him out of the Convention and out of France by means of their ostracism. They have announced this principle before to-day in their party newspapers; and Louvet has developed and explained it in his printed libels against me. Nevertheless I declare that all this ought not to prevent us from voting with Buzot. I declare that, if the consequences of Buzot’s principle might some day be applied to the friends of liberty, to myself, I would submit with joy; I would consent to undergo banishment for the good of my country—I would live happy in that honourable exile, provided only I could find some obscure asylum against the persecutions of these Girondists!” He was applauded to the third heaven, and tears were shed at the thought of the exile of so good a man and so pure a patriot. He had at once evaded the dangerous implications of Louvet, and rendered it impossible for the timid Gironde to think any more of their ostracism. Such coups d’état must be struck at once or never. Perhaps it was from seeing the effect produced by Robespierre’s speech that Marat, Réal, and others now boldly and openly took up the defence of the Duke of Orleans. Marat even censured Robespierre for saying that Egalité might go, ought to go. “No!” cried he, “Philippe Egalité must remain, for he is a representative of the people. The same criminal faction that attack the rights of the people in Egalité would immediately exile all the friends of the people, and you, Robespierre, at the head of them. Therefore let Egalité remain among us, unless we wish to abandon the field of battle to the enemy. If we abandon Egalité, liberty is lost for ever!” Réal observed, that there was no comparison between the nephew of Tarquin, whom Brutus exiled, and citizen Egalité, whom the Gironde would exile: Collatinus had great credit in Rome, immense riches, and numerous partisans; but Philippe Egalité had no such great credit in France, his money was all spent, his estates were charged with debt, and he had no party. An unnamed orator, said to have been a lieutenant-colonel in the army, declared that the revolution had not produced a better patriot than Egalité—that Egalité was, in fact, the first hero of the revolution—that Egalité was a man of the loftiest virtue, who, forgetting his birth and position, had from the first made common cause with the people. “And if we allow him to be ostracised,” said this orator, “where shall that ardent defender of liberty find a refuge? Held in horror by all kings, he will be proscribed by them; they will all refuse him an asylum. We have been told that he has no party; but I say that he has a party, that he has friends who will rally round him to defend him from such injustice. I tell you that such a party exists, and that it will not abandon Egalité.” The men of the Mountain thought this was going too far, and, though the galleries applauded the orator, particularly in the passages where he spoke of Orleans’s civism and sans-culotism, Thuriot rose to stop him with a call to order. “Some men,” said he, “talk as if Philippe was really going to be placed on the throne of the tyrant; but he shall never mount a throne, for I am ready to blow out his brains first!” This turned the tide in a moment, and the club and its galleries shouted “Bravo! bravo!” “I demand,” continued Thuriot, “that until the death of the tyrant we occupy ourselves continually about the proper mode of putting him to death.” He was again loudly applauded, and the society adopted his proposition. After a few words from Saint-André, who said that the plot against Egalité had been laid at Roland’s house, that Roland ought to exile himself, and that the plot would prove fatal to the Gironde, the club broke up, fully convinced that the Girondists must be beaten on the adjourned question. The sans-culottes of Paris angrily complained of foul play, and Orleans and his friends worked upon their feelings by numerous appeals and addresses. Many pamphlets in his favour were cried through the streets, and distributed at the doors of the Convention. The ex-marquis Villette, the husband of Voltaire's Belle et Bonne, and now a member of the Convention, printed a letter to his colleagues, which made a considerable impression. This "épître" asked where Orleans could lay his head if he was banished from France? It invoked the humanity of the Convention, declaring that the proposed decree of banishment would be equivalent to a sentence of death. And Egalité himself put forth a short address to his fellow-citizens in his own name, and with his own signature, denying all ambitious projects or notions contrary to liberty and equality, and quoting the profession of political faith which he had made in 1791, when he had formally renounced the rights of a member of the reigning dynasty, in order to cling to the rights of a plain French citizen. "My sentiments," said he, "are the same now as then, and my sons are ready to attest with their blood that their sentiments are the same as mine." Philippe had also secured an able advocate, in the House, in Fayau, who had made such ardent professions of republicanism, and who stood so well with the sansculottes and the popular societies, that he had little to fear from suspicion or from charges of being sold to Orleans. On the 19th of December Buzot returned to the question, saying that he cared little how it was settled, provided that, after the judgment of Louis XVI., he did not see another man advancing from behind the curtains to succeed him. Fayau, after going over all the arguments drawn from Philippe's character as a representative of the people, and the necessity of keeping the rights of representatives intact and sacred, dwelt upon the enormous sacrifices which Philippe had made since the beginning of liberty in France—a liberty which had no better defender than he. "Some men had pretended that these sacrifices had been made to pave the way to the throne; but where were the proofs of any such intention? Some thought that his birth was crime enough; but would they make crime hereditary, after declaring that virtue was not? Was it possible to think for one moment that the liberty of France depended upon the exile of an individual? In Rome, if a man had but gold and credit, and money enough to gain over thirty thousand individuals, liberty was in danger; but in France nothing could be done without seducing thirteen millions of men, who were and ever would be republicans, who had all sworn to maintain their own sovereignty, and to die rather than be slaves to any king." He called attention to Philippe's numerous acts of patriotism. "In 1789," said he, "when our revolution was rather in an uncertain condition, when we did not know whether it would produce the happy results which you are now enjoying, Philippe Egalité was a revolutionist. Recently, when all the princes and aristocracy of France were ranged with your foreign foes in order of battle upon our frontiers, and were threatening our infant liberty, Philippe Egalité was here among us, and his sons were defending the rights of the people with muskets on their shoulders." Fayau was loudly applauded, and other portions of his speech excited still more enthusiasm, the men in the galleries being all ready to declare and swear that Philippe Egalité was in very deed the best patriot and republican in all France. At this moment a letter was handed in from Doctor Chambon, mayor of Paris, informing the Convention that he and commissaries from the forty-eight sections of Paris wished to present a petition against the banishment of the ci-devant Duke of Orleans. The Mountain sat silent until the Girondists had expressed their high indignation at this interference; but then Bazire rose and declared that the Girondists themselves had cunningly got up the petition in order to have a pretext for complaining that the sections were domineering over the Convention. "Being at the Hôtel-de-Ville," said Bazire, "as a member of the committee of general security, I perceived a great many citizens collecting there. I went to them—asked them what they were about—and they told me they were about this petition. I told them that they were very wrong to think of such a thing—that the National Convention, which admitted of no ascendancy but that of reason, was going to decide the question, and ought to be left to decide it without any popular dictation. 'You are quite right,' said they, 'and this false step has been suggested by men who are suspected by us: Mayor Chambon has been the busiest in this matter, and you know the party with which Chambon is connected.'" The first blow being thus given by Bazire, Robespierre rose to give the second. He declared in the most solemn manner that there was a plot on foot against public tranquillity, that this petition from the sections had no other object than that of making the world believe that the deliberations of the legislature were not free, that Paris was unworthy of being the seat of the legislature, and that the Convention ought of necessity to be removed to some other town of France. "At the first," said he, "this motion for banishment or ostracism was only introduced to bring about an event. It never was meant to be a question of principles. The principles were clear enough, the persons menaced were indifferent to us, the discussion delicate and dangerous. It never would have been brought on but for the private passions of men whose motives are well known. We had carried our fear of kings so far as to oppose the election of that representative of the people whom our principles now force us to defend. It has been foreseen that a debate which touched several officers of the army, which touched the national representation itself, would occasion great troubles and commotions, and therefore it has been provoked. And who are those who have been making the motion to revise all the elections? Who are those who have said that Paris is the centre of troubles, that the Convention is not safe here, that the constitution cannot be made here? Who are those who have spread such calumnies against different members of this Assembly? Why, the very men who have brought on the dangerous deliberations in which we are now engaged! On the other side, who are those that are interested in preserving the reign of tranquillity? Why, the same men who now wish to repel calumny, and to keep the Convention where it is, in the centre of the greatest enlightenment—the men who would be obliged to stab themselves with their own hands if any movement should take place to make it be believed that they are the authors of the evils of their country. It is certain that a movement seems to threaten Paris, and yet we have never ceased to preach tranquillity! [The côté gauche murmured, and the Mountain and the galleries applauded.] Calumny and suspicion are hovering over this Assembly; and at the very moment that I am making the truth heard” Here the murmurs of the Girondists became so loud, that they interrupted him; but they in their turn were soon silenced by the shouts of the Mountain and the galleries, and he continued: “Well, then! I declare to you that the persons who have thrown this unhappy motion into the Convention are the very same persons who are provoking troubles and insurrections around us!” Here Louvet rose and exclaimed, “It was exactly in this manner that Robespierre spoke to the council general of the commune on the 1st of September, just before the massacres began.” “Listen to me,” cried Robespierre, “listen to me, or butcher me where I stand!” And, after the Girondists had done murmuring at this passionate sally, he coolly and measuredly repeated that it was they and their friends who had got up the petition of the sections. Billaud-Varennes and Tallien added their positive assertions to his. Tallien said that he had implored the mayor of Paris to have nothing to do with it, and that the only answer he got from the mayor was that he would present it. Tureau demanded that Mayor Chambon should be called to the bar. Robespierre then resumed: “I call my country to witness,” said he, “that I have been telling a truth very useful to the public safety. I make the heart of all good men the depositary of the secrets of my heart. I wish that a man known by his personal hatred against me would” Mazuyer, a Girondist, and a warm friend of Pétion, interrupted him by saying, “I beg to observe to Robespierre, that where the public interest is concerned we have nothing to do with him or his personal enemies. I demand my turn to speak, and it will be to denounce Robespierre with proofs in my hand!” “I call my country to witness,” resumed Robespierre, “that I have exposed the real plot that is now weaving against public security. I demand a truce to these angry passions, in order that we may calmly examine this question. Citizens, you see how I am persecuted, how impossible it is for me to defend myself against the darts that are perpetually thrown at me.” He bowed meekly to the citizens in the galleries, and descended from the tribune like a much injured and calumniated man. Mazuyer said not a word more about his denunciation of his proofs; but Pétion rose to lament that it was indeed but too true that the House was distracted by suspicions, and jealousies; and deadly personal animosities; that it was but too true that no member could mount the tribune without being environed by suspicions; that it was but too true that the Convention was losing all its dignity, and setting an evil example of suspicion, calumny, rage, to all France. He intimated that he and his friends were ready to give up the motion touching the banishment of Philippe Egalité; and he even agreed with the Jacobins that the mayor should be called to the bar. As soon as Pétion had done speaking, the Girondist executive stepped in very opportunely to make a diversion in favour of their brethren in the legislative body. The minister for foreign affairs, although he had nothing to announce but a London newspaper article, came to state the possibility of friendly relations being interrupted with England. When he had occupied the House for some time, the minister of the marine and the minister of justice came in to make some unimportant reports. Jacobin Thuriot at last stopped this ministerial bavardage, and called the House back to the consideration of the banishment decree, which he said would be a sentence of death not only against Philippe Egalité, but against all his family. A Girondist who replied to him, and who declared that the exile of Orleans would be a good state measure, was hooted and threatened by the galleries; and he finished his speech by exclaiming that the House was deliberating under the auspices of axes and daggers. Rewbell then proposed, as the only means of restoring tranquillity, that the question concerning Philippe Egalité should be adjourned until after the trial and judgment of Louis XVI. Some of the Gironde attempted to speak against this proposition; and, upon being again hooted and menaced, one of them imprudently exclaimed that they would quit Paris if they were not left free. Though merely a passionate exclamation, these words were noted by the Jacobins and the Parisian citizens in the galleries, who took them as another proof of some fixed design on the part of the Girondists to deprive the capital of its privileges and pre-eminence. Lanjuinais, who appears to have been a very bold and ready debater, succeeded in obtaining a hearing; but he too was hooted whenever he spoke of the banishment of Orleans as a necessary and justifiable state act; and, when he had finished, he was sorely pestered by Robespierre's adherents. Then Pétion recommended the proposition of Rewbell, and, after some vain attempts made by Buzot to prevent the adjournment, the Girondists, stunned and terrified by the noise in the House, and bewildered by the accusations of Robespierre, gave up the point. The adjournment until after the judgment of the king was therefore voted almost unanimously. After this vote had passed, Mayor Chambon came to the bar to declare that he had had nothing whatever to do with the petition of the sections; that he had only been the bearer and passive organ of the petition; and that, as far as he knew, no improper influences had been employed to excite the citizens of the sections against the Convention. This second debate about banishing the Duke of Orleans did the Girondists still more mischief than the first. But the Jacobins, as soon as they had secured the victory, took especial care to show that it was not for any love or respect they bore to Philippe Egalité that they had fought the battle so earnestly. They filled their journals with satires upon his vices, his debaucheries, his manners and personal appearance, treating the foremost friend of their revolution with a contempt difficult to be borne. Marat said, that in his quality of a representative of the people Orleans had been entitled to the support he had met from the people and the patriotic part of the Convention; but that Orleans, as an individual, and as a member of the fallen dynasty, was entitled to no support, and certainly to no respect. "I must speak plain upon this subject," said Marat in his 'Republican,' "since the creatures of Roland report in all the departments that the party of Marat and Robespierre—a party which never existed—only seek the death of the dethroned despot in order to put the crown upon the head of this Orleans. I declare, therefore, that I have always regarded Orleans as an unworthy favourite of fortune, as a man without virtue, without soul, without bowels, having no merit except a popular jargon. I also declare that I have never believed in his civism, but that I have believed that the proofs he pretended to give of it proceeded from ambitious projects, which he had neither wit nor courage to achieve, notwithstanding the numerous partisans he had at one time obtained by his birth, fortune, and immense prodigalities. I further declare that I consider him as an intrigant, cajoling the patriots among whom he has crept, and secretly united with the Roland faction, who are scheming and plotting for him at the very moment they are making a show of persecuting and banishing him." Printer Prudhomme was scarcely less bitter, making the duke's visits to England, his intimacy with the Prince of Wales, and his known Anglomania, so many capital charges against him. The unhappy man, who, with all his vices, had strong paternal affections, had been seen to shed tears of joy at the recital of the gallant bearing of his two sons at Valmy and Jemappe. The printer cried "Fudge!" His present cue being to prove that such a contemptible, discredited personage could not be dangerous to the republic by staying in it, Prudhomme wrote—"Who is there that does not know the scandalous details of his private life? Look at his carbuncled face! He carries his morals written on his countenance. How could Frenchmen ever love a man who seems never to have loved any but English, who finds more pleasure among them than among us, who has never been surrounded by any but by English? How could a party ever rally round a man that is blasé, and that has neither talents nor character? He has served the revolution, we confess it. But was it for love of liberty? Was it not rather to take vengeance on a court which despised him as much as it hated him? Was it not even a cunning and selfish speculation? Yes! he speculated on the revolution, as he speculated on his English jockies and race-horses. He saw that if he opposed the torrent he would meet the same fate as his emigrant relations, that his property would be confiscated like theirs, and therefore he chose the wiser side, that is to say, the side which best suited his interests." [And here we confess that it seems to us Prudhomme has described both correctly and concisely some of the principal motives of Philippe Egalité's conduct between the years 1785 and 1793, his impulses after that period being simply those of terror and the instinct of self-preservation.] "No, Orleans is not dangerous, and ought not to be considered so. It is true, indeed, that his sons may unite great talents with high moral qualities, and that his elder son already promises to be both a man of ability and a moral man; but, as he has a brother and a sister, M. Chartres will not be so rich as his father. But, if every man that has some virtue and some talent is to be considered as dangerous, we must expel from our republic all talents and all virtues, and then what will become of our liberty? Wee unto us if we cannot believe ourselves strong enough to resist the ascendancy even of virtue! In vain shall we drive out the Bourbons, for in the poorest and most obscure family we may find individuals to dread. No! Frenchmen are not so vile, and if the present generation sometimes stumble, it will not be so with our children. Less corrupt than we, they will make the ex-Duke of Chartres fulfil all the duties attached to his new name, Egalité, or they will make his head fall at their feet!" The present position of the ex-Duke of Chartres, as Louis-Philippe, King of the French, is a strange commentary on the text of Prudhomme. Before quitting the Duke of Orleans we must briefly mention one other blunder which the Girondists committed in his business. While the decree of banishment was under deliberation, Louvet, acting as one of the secretaries of the House, sent it to the executive as a decree that had regularly passed, and the executive placarded it in the streets of Paris and sent it to the departments. The Jacobins called them to a severe account, and Louvet, in pleading in defence, lost his temper, and committed some more imprudence. In this angry war of words the Girondists called the Jacobins assassins, and the Jacobins accused Brissot of having been guilty of assassination and forgery in 1791, as an accomplice of Lafayette and Bailly, in slaughtering the people in the Champ de Mars. The great efforts made to prop up the reputation of Roland induced Thuriot to say sarcastically that they ought to decree that the minister of the interior was infallible. On the next day the Girondists assumed the offensive, by calling again for the impeachment of Marat, not for his preaching massacres, but for his having said in his newspaper, the 'Republican,' that the misery of the people and the frightful anarchy that was reigning must inevitably lead to the establishment of a dictatorship or protectorate, or to the temporary rule of one single authority—"would force the people to renounce their democracy in order to give themselves a chief." They inferred from these words that Marat proposed setting up Philippe Egalité. Marat defended himself with rare audacity, repeating all that he had said against the life, conduct, and character of the unhappy duke, and retorting with fresh accusations against the Gironde. He was indignant, he said, at the shameful disorder and the scandalous scenes which reigned in the Convention, and which left no honest man any hope that such an assembly would ever establish a good government. "I declare," said he, "that the anarchy in which France is plunged must drive the people on to fresh revolts by starving them. I declare that I am disgusted at seeing the favour and protection accorded to certain battalions of the army, retained in the capital by clandestine orders which have originated in this House. I declare that I have been still more disgusted at seeing these soldiers going through the streets of Paris and calling for the heads of Marat, Robespierre, Danton, and other enlightened patriots!" In reply to some who rudely interrupted him, Marat exclaimed, "You call yourselves the protectors of liberty of opinion, and you are nothing but cowardly tyrants. You would put a knife to my throat, beautiful legislators that you are!" And, speaking to the galleries, he said, "Only look at your beautiful legislators!" And the galleries applauded him and hooted the Gironde. "I now believe that they will not be so mad as to decree accusation against me!"—and with these words, and an admonition to the House not to lose its precious time in such scandalous discussions, Marat descended from the tribune. His friends, and many who were not his friends, called loudly for the order of the day; but the Girondists, though sensible of their own miserable weakness, would not let the matter drop, but kept calling for a decree of accusation against Marat. He demanded to be heard again. They interrupted him with shouting Order! Order! To the Abbaye! "You shall not assassinate me thus!" cried he, rushing to the tribune, and keeping his ground there in spite of every effort made to drive him from it. After a most scandalous scene it was put to the vote whether he should be heard or not, and, this being carried in the affirmative, he delivered another long speech, which turned upon various subjects, but which dwelt principally upon the use Roland was making of the public money in retaining unpatriotic journalists. A member said, rather archly, that the Convention had better decree that the minister of the interior should give Marat the 15,000 livres which he had refused some time ago when Marat had asked him for that sum. Nothing disconcerted, Marat responded, "I will no longer take the money: I despise Roland too much for that!" The House laughed and the galleries laughed; and then this terrible Girondist attack died away in the order of the day. The monstrous cynic, well knowing that their weakness and their fears dictated their moderation, devoted all their heads to destruction; and the leading Jacobins now began to feel that, as their adversaries persisted in linking them with Marat, and in holding them responsible for all the principles and opinions put forth in his journal, they must, in spite of themselves, make common cause with Marat. Two days before this last debate, or on the 23rd of December, the Jacobin club, after repudiating the attempt made by the Girondists to identify Robespierre with Marat, came to a formal resolution, which was printed, and sent to all the affiliated societies. In this manifesto they warned all true patriots not to confound the two names of Robespierre and Marat, and not to believe that there was any party union between them. They acknowledged that Marat, in his own peculiar line, had rendered essential services to liberty; but they held up Robespierre as the more prudent patriot of the two, and as the most eminent statesman among all the patriots. Even in the debate in the Convention on the 25th several members of the Mountain joined the Girondists in denouncing the unrepugnant paragraph in Marat's paper, and in calling down punishment upon him; but, in consequence of the wretched tactics of the Girondists, the Mountain and Marat soon became really identified.*

In the course of this same day—the now utterly despised Christmas-day—a letter was read from commandant-general Santerre. "Citizen representatives," said the brewer, "to-morrow is the day you have fixed for hearing Louis Capet. Conformably with orders given by the executive power, all measures of security have been taken to bring him before you without commotion or inconvenience. It is only this night that can do any harm. Please to let me have to-day a decree settling my duties and the hour at which the Convention wishes to have Louis Capet at the bar." The Convention decreed that he should be brought to the bar at nine o'clock precisely on the morning of the 26th.

In the mean time the king had been preparing his defence—a useless labour, except for the occupation it gave him. On the afternoon of the 16th four of the committee of Twenty-one—Valazé, Cochon, Grandpré, and Duprat—carried him a copy of his impeachment, and papers relating to the proceedings against him, the greater part of which were the papers which Roland had presented as having been found in the iron chest. The reading of these papers lasted from four o'clock in the afternoon till midnight. After the reading of each piece Valazé asked Louis if he had any knowledge of it, and Louis simply replied yes or no. Another of the deputies gave him the papers and copies to sign. Louis calmly interrupted proceedings by asking the fatigued deputies if they would not sup. The deputies consented, and Cléry served a cold fowl and some fruit in the adjoining room. The generous Tronchet remained alone with the king. That day and night a municipal officer, lately a president of the commune of Paris, though a chairman at Versailles before the revolution, happened to be on guard at the Temple for the first time. He had now taken up the trade of a mason or a stone-cutter, and he wore his working-clothes, which were in rags, a greasy old hat, a leather apron, and his tri-coloured scarf. This dirty republican stretched himself out before the king in an arm-chair, while the king was sitting in a common chair; he kept his hat on his head as if it had been nailed to it, and thee'd and thou'd everybody with all the familiarity of equality. One of the four deputies of the Convention expressed his astonishment and disgust at this behaviour; but he had not the courage to attempt to check the fellow's insolence, being even afraid that he should have been overheard in expressing his opinion about it. Some of the papers examined contained plans for a monarchic constitution, with marginal notes written in the king's own hand. They had been composed by different Feuillant notables at a time when all the world was busied in constitution-making. Louis was also shown some registers of the police, in which were informations against him written and signed by his own servants. His equanimity was not equal to this exhibition of ingratitude; he seemed much affected by it. These informers related, or pretended to relate, conversations and occurrences which had passed in the king's or queen's apartments in the Tuileries. At midnight, when the four deputies withdrew, Louis went to bed without uttering any complaint. A day or two after more papers were brought and read to him as evidence of his guilt. M. Desèze, an eminent advocate, was invited to join Malesherbes and Tronchet as counsel for the king, and he accepted the dangerous office. From the 14th to the 25th Louis saw his counsel every evening. Malesherbes brought in the newspapers which gave reports of the debates going on in the Convention, from which, if other evidence had been wanting, Louis must clearly have foreseen that they were fully resolved to have his head. But still he continued calm and firm, or only lost his composure when he thought of his family and his cruel separation from them. Ever since that separation he had refused to go down to walk in the garden. "I cannot think of going by myself," said he, "I cannot enjoy the walk without my family." On the 19th he said to Cléry, before three or four municipals, "This day fourteen years you were up earlier than you were this morning—my daughter was born that day." He then exclaimed, "And am I not to see her on her birthday!" Some tears trickled down his cheeks, and for a moment those obdurate municipals preserved a respectful silence. But, though deprived of the objects nearest his heart, and certain of the fate that awaited him, he suffered not a complaint, not a murmur to escape his lips. He had already forgiven his enemies. Every day he read for several hours, and his reading gave aliment to his natural fortitude. He had not been shaved since his razors had been taken away. His beard became very troublesome to him, and he was obliged to bathe his face in cold water many times a day. He desired Cléry to endeavour to procure for himself a pair of scissors or a razor; for he would not speak about it to the municipals. Cléry suggested that, if he would appear as he was at the bar of the Convention, the people would at least see with what barbarity the council-general of the commune had treated him. "No," said Louis, "it does not become me to endeavour to excite commiseration." Cléry therefore applied to the municipals, and next day the commune resolved that the king's razors should be returned, but that he should not have the liberty of using them except in the presence of two of the municipals. The scoundrels, who nearly all proved themselves ready to cut their own impious throats when the last throw of the dice went against them, affected to believe that the religious and truly Christian king might commit suicide in order to escape from their infernal malice. On Christmas-day, while they were wrangling in the Convention, Louis, in a holy calm, sat down and wrote his will—a lasting monument of his piety, purity of heart, and unvarying goodness of intention. The longest clauses in it were those in which, before his God, he forgave with all his heart all those who had in any way injured him.*

On the morning of the 26th the beating of drums and the rattling of arms were heard again all round the Temple. At about ten o'clock Mayor Chambon and Commandant Santerre conducted Louis to the carriage at the gate; and he was then carried away to the Convention with the same precautions and the same mighty parade of arms which had been adopted on the previous occasion. Again was the king the calmest man in all that countless multitude. He conversed with Chambon about Seneca and Livy, and about the state of the public hospitals: he even indulged in a goodnatured bon-mot at the expense of one of the municipals, who insisted on riding in the carriage with him with his hat on his head. He appeared at the bar attended by Malesherbes, Tronchet, and Desèze. Desèze, who had been working day and night, had drawn up the defence, which he now proceeded to read, after remarking upon the very short time which had been allowed for the difficult task. It ought to be mentioned as a proof of the king's taste and judgment, that he had previously gone over the paper, and drawn his pen across all the merely oratorical passages. The defence, as read, was a plain, able, and manly paper. It dwelt upon the inviolability accorded to the person of the king by the constitution, to which all France had so frequently sworn; it insisted that, as accusers, the Convention ought not to be judges; it exposed the difficulties in which the king had been constantly placed, and urged the unvarying goodness of his intentions. But it would be a mere loss of time to analyse what had not, and what could not have, the slightest influence on the king's fate, which had been determined long before this by the hot passions of some men, the cold systems of other men, and the dastardly fears of others. When Desèze had finished reading the paper, Louis said a few words himself. "You have heard," said he, "my means of defence: I shall not dwell upon them. In speaking to you, perhaps for the last time, I declare that my conscience reproaches me with nothing, and that my counsel have told you nothing but the truth. I never feared a public examination of my conduct; but my heart is torn at the imputation that I wanted to shed the blood of the people, and above all, that the calamities of the 10th of August are attributable to me! I confess that it seems to me that the multiplied proofs I had given, in all times, of my love for the people, ought to clear me for ever from such imputations." The president (Defermont) asked him if he would recognise some keys which had been found in the Tuileries, in the apartment of Thierry, one of his valets, and one of which was said to open the iron chest. Louis said he could not recognise them. "Have you anything else to say in your defence?"

said the president. "No." "You may retire." When Louis had withdrawn into the hall of conferences with his counsel, he fell upon the neck of Desèze, who appeared to be exhausted with his long exertion, and afflicted by its want of success; and, with the tears streaming from his eyes, he said, "My poor Desèze!" He foresaw nothing but destruction to the three generous lawyers who had ventured to stand by him in his extremity. Manuel moved that the king's defence should be printed, together with all the charges against him; that copies should be distributed to the members of the Convention in four-and-twenty hours; and that the affair should be adjourned until three days after that distribution. A part of the Assembly applauded, but the galleries were furious at the thought of any adjournment, and expressed the feeling in their ordinary manner. Under cover of this fire, the men of the Mountain called for an immediate sentence. "What more do you want?" cried Duhem; "all formalities have been observed. Louis has had counsel, and he has told you himself that he has nothing to add in his defence. To the vote, then, by appel nominal! We have nothing to do but to pronounce upon this question:—Shall Louis Capet suffer the pain of death or not?" "I demand," cried Bazire, "that we give our answer before we rise this morning!" And Bazire and Duhem were both cheered by the bloodthirsty galleries. The Girondists sat silent, listening to the cries of the mob and to their own fears. At last, however, Lanjuinais, who scarcely belonged to their party, rushed to the tribune, and boldly raised his voice—his single, unsupported voice—against this bloody haste, and against the whole trial. He now declared, as Morisson had done before, that the Convention could not in any way try the king; that Louis could not be judged by the conspirators who had loudly proclaimed in the House that they themselves were the authors of the “illustrious day” of the 10th of August. This excited a universal tumult, in which many members rose and shouted, “To the Abbaye! to the Abbaye!” Butcher Legendre called him a conspirator; and Thuriot said he was too openly showing himself the partisan of the tyrant. “I say,” resumed Lanjuinais, “that you are the conspirators of the 10th of August; that you are, all at once, accusers, jury, and judges” He was interrupted by another universal uproar, and by fresh threats of the Abbaye. Legendre, Billaud-Varennes, and others, cried out all in a voice, “It is a royalist. . . . He is impeaching the glorious 10th of August.” Mazuyer, the Girondist and friend of Pétion, declared that he himself was a conspirator of the 10th of August, and gloried in it. Lanjuinais retracted his censure, called the 10th of August an illustrious day, and said that, in calling it a conspiracy, he had only repeated the words of Barbaroux. After this sacrifice to the dominant opinion, Lanjuinais was allowed to continue, and even to propose that the Convention should revoke the decree in which they had decided that they were competent to try the king; but no one seconded him—the Girondists, one and all, being as silent as the grave. When some time had been spent, not in discussion, but in absolute raving, all the House seemed to be of opinion that the business could not be finished that day, and at about four o’clock they agreed that Louis should be reconducted to the Temple; but the tumult and the fury did not end there. The Jacobin members succeeded each other rapidly in the tribune, calling for an immediate decision, and invoking the guillotine—the men of the south, the real Girondists, sitting as silent as before. But at last Hardy of Rouen, who, if not attached to the Gironde party, was a decided enemy to the Mountain, ventured to support Manuel’s proposition of adjournment, and to say that all great publicists, and especially Jean Jacques Rousseau, had laid down the principle that the people committed an act of tyranny in passing judgment on any man,—that justice required impartiality and something like a balance of power between the accuser and the accused,—that seven hundred and fifty members of the Convention, all set against one man, the king, was not fair play. Hardy was hooted out of the tribune. Duhem exclaimed, “None of your adjournments! When the tyrant was butchering the patriots, he did not adjourn. When the Austrians were bombarding Lille in his name, they admitted of no delay. Let judgment and sentence be pronounced before we rise.” Kersaint mustered heart enough to demand a truce to these violent declamations, and to say that the Convention ought to act like judges, and not like executioners; but still none of his party threw themselves like men into the arena. At last the president put the question of adjournment to the vote. The majority of the House rose in the affirmative. But there instantly succeeded a terrible cry that the votes should be taken by muster-roll or appel nominal, in order that the people might know who were the traitors that wanted to screen the tyrant; and from sixty to eighty members of the Mountain, cheered by the gallery mobs, rushed down to the floor of the House, and then advanced with menacing gestures to the table. Duhem, Thuriot, Billaud-Varennes, Camille Desmoulins, and Julien were at the head of the gang. Duhem put his feet on the president’s chair or stool, reproached him for having brought on the division prematurely, and threatened him with clenched fists. They cried—both Mountain and galleries cried as though they had been possessed by ten thousand devils. “The majority are seduced; but we will have no votes or divisions except by appel nominal! The sixty or eighty who had run to the table wrote and signed the demand for the vote by muster-roll. The cowardly majority sat mute and motionless. When the Mountain men had signed the paper, Julien mounted the tribune and begged permission to accuse the president. The president hoped the Assembly would hear him first. A good many voices cried “Yes! yes!” But Robespierre, Marat, Billaud-Varennes, and others, said that the president ought not to be heard before his accuser. Julien then declared that there was an odious plot on foot to dissolve the republic, and that the president (Defermont) was at the head of it, having had several interviews with Malesherbes, the officious defender of Louis the Last. “This president,” said Julien, “has shown in this too stormy and too scandalous sitting that he is not worthy of our confidence. And, since he has shown such a revolting partiality for the tyrant, I demand that his hand-bell be torn from him, and that he be sent to hide himself in the darkest corner of our hall while we choose a better man to preside over us. The unlucky president, as soon as the roaring galleries would permit him, justified himself as best he could. The Girondists called for the adjournment; but they had not heart enough to claim and act upon the right which their majority gave them—a right by which the adjournment was already a settled question. Instead of raising their unanimous voice, or (which would have been better) instead of quitting the House, they sat there and heard the Jacobin minority claim and exercise all the rights of a majority, and throw out arguments and hints which transported the mob with fresh fury. Bazire said that they were only seeking for delay in order to give time to certain men, who were to bring trouble and confusion with them, to arrive at Paris. Philippeaux said that the last news from England was that they were proposing in the British Parliament to send a solemn embassy to beg the life of Louis. Ducos replied that the debates of the British parliament ought to have no influence on the deliberations of the National Convention; that the ministerial insults of a Windham or a Sheffield ought to be as insignificant in the eyes of a true Frenchman as the bloody manifestos of the Duke of Brunswick; and that reason, justice, and the salvation of the people ought to be the sole guides of the judges of Louis. Rather than risk that terrible ordeal the appel nominal, the majority consented to the resolution that the discussion or trial of the king should go on to the exclusion of all other business until sentence was pronounced. After this motion had been carried, Salles and Pétion made some weak efforts to modify it. Hooted, menaced, interrupted, Salles exclaimed that his conscience was put to the torture, that he was speaking under the knife, that there was no liberty left for any man: and, so saying, this Girondist quitted the tribune. Nor did Pétion obtain a much better hearing: his popularity, his influence, were gone entirely, and he was now condemned to taste the bitter draughts he had helped to brew for others; he was no longer Virtue-Pétion, but King-Pétion. Billaud-Varennes called upon the president to send an usher to pull him out of the tribune; and Marat rushed towards that speaking-place sputtering and gesticulating. The president said he would put it to the vote whether Pétion should be heard or not. "I tell you," cried Marat, "that the discussion is closed." And then, turning to the Mountain and the galleries, Marat added, "Do you not see that that president there is the very personification of partiality. He has played us fifty mountebank tricks this very day." The president, however, consulted the House, and a great majority decided that Pétion should be heard—a decision which could not signify much, unless the galleries and the Mountain should choose to ratify it. Pétion had scarcely said three words when he was interrupted by murmurs and hootings. He tried again and again; he was interrupted by a tremendous hubbub, in the midst of which one shrill voice was heard to cry, "Only hear King Pétion!" That ex-mayor of Paris then implored the president to restore order. The poor president, who had been so lately hooted himself, replied, "How would you have me make myself heard in the midst of this tumult?" "I tell you what," cried Duhem, "we want no opinions à la Pétion." "We have no need of his lessons," added Legendre, the butcher. Still struggling to be heard, Pétion said, "I know not why, in so serious a question as this, which . . ." He was stopped again by hundreds of voices crying, "Ah! Ah! King Jerome Pétion!" The Girondists, who had so tamely submitted to worse things, now seemed determined to assert a little spirit, because the brutality affected a leading member of their own party. One of them rose and exclaimed, threatening the Mountain and the galleries the while, "Gentlemen, this is too much, we are losing our patience!" "Yes," added a number of voices from the same side, "it is high time that this should finish!" And then Barbaroux, Rebecqui, Serres, and a hundred other Girondists rushed down to the floor of the house, and advanced towards the men of the Mountain, threatening them by gestures and by words, and swearing that they were going to write to their departments that they were about to secede from the Convention. The president put on his hat. This solemn movement sent the Girondists back to their seats, and by degrees something like tranquillity was established. All the house, all France, had been diligently studying the trial of our Charles I., a translation of which had been printed with copious notes; yet this was the way in which the French were imitating that irregular, iniquitous, yet still imposing process. The president said it was a very cruel moment for la chose publique to see such a disorder; that the majority had decided that Pétion should be heard, and that Pétion therefore ought to be heard. "We tell you again," cried several voices, "that we want none of his lessons!" Pétion, however, was enabled to make a short speech, which signified little or nothing at all, as he was forced by his fears to pay homage to the ascendancy of the Mountain, and to approve of a proposition which had been made by Couthon. The rest of his speech contained nothing but some weak complaints, and some loud-sounding protestations of republicanism and hatred of all kings. He said that the Convention had very properly made themselves the judges of Louis Capet, because the crimes of that tyrant were not to be judged by positive laws, but by the interests of the republic. He said it was cruel that patriots and true republicans like himself should be insulted with nick-names, and designated as royalists, because, on some slight matter, they might chance to differ with the gentlemen opposite. "We have all," said he, "solemnly sworn to have nothing more to do with kings. Who is there that would break that oath? Who is there that would have a king in France? No, we will have no more kings!" Every member in the house rose, and they all shouted together, "Never, never!" It was observed that Philippe Egalité waved his hat the highest, and shouted the loudest of them all. The miserable man already felt that he was struggling for his life.

On the morrow the discussion was renewed by a terrible speech from Saint Just, who declared that it would be the extremity of folly to permit any tender emotions to plead in favour of the crafty tyrant, and who indignantly exposed a project which the shuffling Girondists entertained, of voting an appeal to the people, in order that the nation at large might decide on the fate of the dethroned king. "Citizens," cried this fanatic, "if the king is innocent, the people are guilty; if Louis escape punishment, we shall all be punished. If the tyrant be allowed to appeal to the people who accuse him, he will do what Charles I. did. It is not you who accuse; it is not you who judge Louis; it is the people who accuse him, and who judge him."

through and by you. You have proclaimed martial-law against all the kings and tyrants of the earth, and would you spare your own? The revolution will only begin when our tyrant is ended. I demand that every member of the house mount the tribune, and deliver his opinion whether Louis shall be convicted or not." Saint Just was cheered by the Mountain and by the galleries. The Girondists, whose humanity and generosity amounted simply to this, that, if Louis's life was to be saved, it should be saved by the people without danger or risk to them, and that, if Louis's life was to be sacrificed, the guilt should not rest upon them, but upon the mass of the nation, now began to introduce their project of appel au peuple; and in so doing they proved that even upon this point their selfish imbecile faction had no unity or steadiness of purpose. The heads of the party kept in the background. Rouzet, who was the first to stand forward, was but a third-rate Girondist. He thought that Louis ought to be treated as a prisoner of war, but that nothing ought to be decided without consulting the nation at large, la nation tout entière. Salles proposed that the Convention should merely pronounce on the guilt of Louis, and leave it to the people to decide whether he should be put to death or only exiled till a general peace. Serres, saying nothing about the appeal to the people, recommended that Louis should be kept in a state prison so long as the war lasted, and that at the return of peace he should be sent into perpetual exile. Barbaroux, who must still be considered as acting under the impulse of Roland and his wife, made a long speech to prove that Louis was guilty, and was not inviolable; but he neither spoke of death nor of imprisonment, of banishment, or any other secondary punishment; and he never mentioned the appeal to the people at all, as if fully aware of the danger of committing himself in any manner. Lequinio mounted the tribune after Barbaroux, to tell the house and the galleries what the Mountain thought of the proposed appeal to the people. He was, of course, careful not to call in question the sovereignty of the people, or their right to decide the fate of the king; but he urged that twenty-five millions of souls could not deliberate and sit in judgment together; that the Convention, as representing the people, ought to decide for them; and that to convoke the people in their primary assemblies [for such an object would be to provoke a civil war, and plunge a great part of France in blood; and it appears that many members of the house, who belonged neither to the Mountain nor to the Gironde, were deeply impressed with this last conviction, and were determined thereby to resist at all hazards the appeal to the people. But not satisfied with predicting the inevitable civil war, Lequinio accused the Girondists of having proposed the appeal expressly and solely to bring about that worst of calamities as a means of destroying the Mountain, of making a Jacquerie against the Jacobins, and of reigning alone over France. The Parisian mob in the galleries, naturally averse to any appeal that would include all the departments and give as much value to the vote of a Vendéan as to the vote of a Parisian, applauded Lequinio most tumultuously. The president called them to order. The Mountain, who generally acted as fagmen to the galleries, clapped hands and shouted, and then the galleries made a louder noise than ever. The president rang his bell with all his might, but this only provoked a louder and still louder roar. Barbaroux, with Faublas-Louvet, and about a hundred other Girondists, again rushed across the House and threatened the Mountain with clenched fists. The rest of the day was spent in much the same rage and rabid disorder, without a single word more being said either about the king or about the appeal to the people.

On the 28th of December Lebrun, the Girondist minister for foreign affairs, submitted to the Convention a note which he had just received from the court of Madrid. In this note, which was dated on the 17th, the Spanish minister declared that his country would remain strictly neutral in the present war. Not a word was said about Louis XVI. and his trial; but Lebrun took occasion to signify that the King of Spain promised this neutrality only in order to save the life of his cousin the ex-king of France. The Girondists remained silent while the Mountain denounced this detestable interference, and told the people that they had not only nothing to fear from so crippled a power as Spain, but nothing to fear from England and all the powers of Europe united. "Our republican principles," cried Thuriot, "are not to be influenced by any impulse from without, nor by any considerations for crowned despots. Our principles rest solely upon the eternal basis of reason. If we do not decree that this Louis, who has committed all manner of crimes, shall perish on the scaffold, we shall betray the people. Never suffer the ministers of foreign courts to form a congress here in Paris to intimate to us the will and declarations of the crowned brigands of Europe. Let us decree that no letters from abroad, no memorials that may be addressed to us about the king's trial, shall be read until we have passed sentence upon him." Chales was astonished that the House should have condescended to listen to the note from Madrid. "I demand," said he, "that for the future none of our ambassadors or diplomatic agents shall be allowed to treat with any of these crowned heads until they have solemnly recognised our republic. We ought no longer to treat with kings, but with their people." The House agreed that the Spanish note should be turned over to the diplomatic committee; and that the French minister at Madrid should be recalled, unless that court acknowledged forthwith the French republic.

They then took up the business of the trial or sentence, Lequinio proposing that the House should vote by appel-nominal on the two following questions:— 1. Is Louis convicted of crimes against the national sovereignty? 2. If he is convicted, what punishment does he deserve? Buzot; one of the great Girondists, now took the field—and surely in the meanest and vilest manner. He devoted the greater part of his harangue to the offences and crimes of the king, declaring over and over again that the punishment he merited was death. Going wide away from the original proposition of appeal, he moved that the Convention should pass sentence of death, and that the people in their primary assemblies should only be appealed to to ratify and sanction that sentence. Blundering and still blundering, like every man of his party, Buzot exasperated the jealousy which the capital felt for the provinces, and made use of language that at the very least intimated that the splitting of France into a parcel of federating republics was a possible event. He finished with these words: “It is as a measure of general safety and security to us all that I demand this appeal to the nation after we have passed judgment. The appeal to the people will prevent all imaginable inconveniences; it will be the sovereign people that will sanction our decision, and the general will, legally expressed, must necessarily be just. Who will dare to say that the people are not the proper judges of the king? Insensate declaimers! you speak of civil war because we appeal to the national sovereignty, and because we will not admit that that sovereignty resides exclusively in a portion of the people here in Paris. Cease your calumnies, give over agitating the republic, and remember that it was upon the blood-smoking ruins of the throne of Charles I. that Cromwell established his tyranny, and that afterwards the same people who had demanded with loud cries the death of Charles pitied his fate, and demanded the execution of his judges! Louis, I condemn thee; I condemn thee to death, for my constituents have imposed that duty upon me. But, in condemning thee, justice does not regard thee, but merely sacrifices thee to the nation. Let then the nation pronounce thy sentence after me!” Robespierre, the real chief of the Mountain, followed this contemptible Girondist, whose principal and avowed object in recommending an appeal, was to identify the people with the Convention in this bloody act, so as to prevent subsequent crimination from the people—a design at least as absurd and puerile as it was cowardly and criminal. Robespierre’s speech was very long, but its reasoning was close and terrible, without any equivocating or shirking;—at least he had the merit of going straight to his object without caring to prop himself up with other men’s opinions, or to shift the responsibility from his own head. He powerfully exposed the vacillating, cowardly system or no-system of the Gironde, and called their pretended appeal to the people a paltry stratagem. He held up to derision the idea of forty-four thousand separate tribunals—for such was the total number of the primary assemblies—sitting in judgment on the king; and he repeated that nothing could come of such a mad attempt except a horrible civil war. He accused the Girondists of all manner of imbecilities, state crimes, and plots, and hinted that they would be glad to patch up monarchy again if they could only humble the free people of Paris, and exterminate him and all the patriots, his friends. He concluded with moving that the Convention should pass sentence immediately, and send Louis to the scaffold without any appeal to the people. The House rose without coming to any conclusion. The 29th was spent in the same manner. But on the 30th of December deputations began to present themselves at the bar to tell the honourable deputies that the citizens of Paris were wearied out by their long delays. Eighteen of the Paris sections sent petitions and committees; and the men who had been wounded on the 10th of August, and the widows and orphans of the patriots who had perished on that day, came in one grand dramatic group to the Convention to demand vengeance and blood for blood. Some of the wounded dragged themselves slowly along upon crutches, and one of them was carried in a litter. Their orator delivered a terrible speech to “the fathers of the country, the legislators of all mankind,” telling them that Louis must perish on the scaffold forthwith, that there would be no humanity upon earth until all kings were destroyed, and that there would be no virtue until all priests were destroyed also. The president made them a very complimentary speech in return, and invited them all to the honours of the sitting. The greater part of them went and sat on the benches with the members of the House. This quickener had scarcely been applied ere another was administered in the shape of an alarming rumour that the barriers were to be closed again that night in order to facilitate another wholesale massacre. On the next day—the 31st of December—this terrific report was renewed, and a deputation of respectable citizens complained at the bar of the Convention that papers were distributed in the streets and placarded on the walls, threatening proscription and extermination. Marat declared that all the trouble and alarm was created by the Girondists, that Roland and his faction were holding secret councils, and were inviting Dumouriez to come to Paris to use his sword in their favour. After Marat had spoken, the greatest of the Girondist orators, Vergniaud, rose for the first time to deliver his opinion as to the proper course to be pursued with the king. He complained bitterly of the calumnies and threats which had been employed against his party, and of the insolent, overbearing spirit of the minority, who, backed by the galleries, bade defiance to the majority. At the same time he applauded the 10th of August, and described Louis as one of the most treacherous and bloody of tyrants, treating his constitutional inviolability as an absurd dogma. “Nevertheless,” said he, “though Louis cannot avail himself of the inviolability promised him against the people he has betrayed, it is not less certain that the people, and the people alone, can punish Louis without regard to the inviolability with which they themselves invested him. Let me explain: it was not only the assembly of the representatives of the people who promised Louis this inviolability, it was the people themselves who gave the promise, it was the citizens who gave it individually in the several and separate oaths they took to maintain the constitution. Now, indeed, you may declare, as a principle of eternal truth, that the promise of inviolability given by the people was not obligatory or binding on the people; but still it is for the people alone to declare that they will not keep their promise. You may declare, as a principle of eternal truth, that the people can never validly renounce the right of punishing an oppressor; but it is for the people alone to declare that they will make use of a terrible right which they have renounced." Such is a part—a very small and not the worst part—of the miserable galimatias which Thiers and other writers of that school still hold up to the admiration of the world as the very perfection of logic and reason and enlightened humanity! Vergniaud said he thought it not difficult, but easy, not inconsistent, but very consistent, for the people to meet in their forty thousand and odd primary assemblies, and for the ploughman to leave his plough, the weaver his loom, the smith his anvil, the carpenter his bench, to sit in judgment upon the king, as a court of appeal. Nearly all the rest of his long speech was a furious attack on the Mountain, who were charged with aiming at the civil war which they spoke of. Thiers says that Vergniaud's splendid improvisation produced on all sides of the House a profound impression and a general admiration. We can discover no evidence to this effect in the accounts which remain of the debate; but what we clearly see is, that the Jacobins scattered his flimsy argument at once, while not a man of his own party ventured to rise and support him. Jean Moreau represented that, if the people in their primary assemblies were to be appealed to in one case, they must be appealed to in all serious cases—that, if the Convention once allowed that it was incompetent to decide, the people would ever afterwards question its competence. "If," said he, "you only once admit that the people are personally to decide upon measures of general security, you will no longer have the right of adopting any measure without their direct consent. In this way the invasion of Savoy, the invasion of Belgium, the law about emigrants, nay, even the change of a minister may become so many crimes against the national sovereignty, as the people have not pronounced their opinion on those matters in their primary assemblies. Reflect upon the certain consequences of this proposed appeal to the people, and upon what an apple of discord you would throw among them. If here, in the National Convention, seven hundred educated men cannot agree on this subject, but are thrown into a tempest of rage and confusion, what will be the nature of the discussion in the primary assemblies and among millions of men?" Dubois-Crancé, who followed Moreau, announced one plain truth, and that was, that the Girondists were afraid of taking upon themselves the entire responsibility of the king's execution. He said that the appeal to the people was so absurd, that Louis Capet himself had positively refused it, citing this maxim of Rousseau: "The general will cannot pronounce as a general will, either upon a fact or upon an individual." "Let us," cried this frank assassin, "let us take vengeance on the tyrant, and then say to the people, 'Make our heads fly off on the scaffold, if you will! We will render thanks to the gods, for we have saved our country!'" The House again adjourned without coming to any decision.

A. D. 1793.—When they met again (on the 1st of January), several addresses were presented from the departments demanding the immediate execution of the king; petitions were read which represented that bread was very dear and the people starving; and Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs, announced that the English government was assuming a very hostile attitude, and that the English parliament had shamelessly passed an alien bill which would greatly interfere with the liberty of Frenchmen residing or trading in England, and which was a manifest infraction of the last treaty of peace with France. Lebrun also complained of "indecent diatribes uttered in both houses of parliament against the French people and their present government." He said that a vote had been carried for arming thirteen ships of the line at Portsmouth, but that if the French used proper expedition they might get their fleet to sea before the English. Billaud-Varennes was astonished that the French government had not sent over an address to the English people which had been prepared some time ago. "Everybody," said he, "knows the situation of the English people, and that they are our friends. There cannot be a wiser or better measure than an address to them. This is what I call a proper appeal to the people! The oppressed English desire nothing better than to fraternise with us." The Convention turned over the report of the minister for foreign affairs to the committees of marine and diplomacy, and did nothing more that day. People were now crying through the streets of Paris, "Give us bread or kill us!" "There has not been blood enough!" "Let the scythe of equality strike off more heads!" "Give us bread and equality!" "Put the traitor to death, and then we shall have both equality and bread!" "The cause of all our woe is in the Temple and in a part of the Convention!" &c. Roland, as minister of the interior, declared that there was plenty of grain, but that traitors and plotters were preventing its arriving at Paris, in order to provoke the people to insurrection and other excesses. This business occupied the Convention during two or three days. On the 2nd or 3rd of January Gensonné made a prodigiously long speech to recommend, not the appeal to the people beforehand, but the appeal to the people after judgment, in order to obtain their solemn sanction to the king's execution. He affected to treat Robespierre and his opinions with extreme contempt, and he told him that such an appeal could not be attended with danger to any party or to any person, as the people would tranquilly adopt and ratify the sentence of their representatives. He even ventured upon a prophecy, saying, with a sneer, "Tranquillize yourself, O Robespierre! you will not be murdered, and I do not believe that you will ever be able to murder anybody!" [Within ten months Robespierre sent this Gensonné and twenty of his Gironde friends to the guillotine on one day!] In this same speech Gensonné said, "While the ordinary tribunals are every day condemning to death some of the accomplices of Louis, how can he, the chief of the conspiracy, escape the same punishment? I vote for the affirmative of both these propositions—Louis is guilty—Louis has merited death. But the execution of Louis must not pass in the eyes of Europe and in the eyes of posterity as the work of a faction in this Assembly. The national will must put an end to these scandalous debates. Hasten, then, to consecrate for the people the enjoyment of the plenitude of their rights. This appeal to the people, instead of lowering the republican spirit, will make it mount higher than ever, and give the people a new energy. If you fear that there is still some lingering superstition for royalty, and that many citizens still regard kings as superior to other men, the best means of elevating their souls, and forming their minds for republican virtues, is to prove to them by the fact that they are more than kings, inasmuch as they are individually the king's judges." Such was the manner in which these Girondists pleaded the cause of mercy! From the beginning to the end of this sham trial their conduct was only calculated to send all the royal family to the block, and to screen themselves by making millions of people share in their guilt. So thoroughly had France now been Jacobinized, and into such madness had it been driven by the proceedings and harangues of the Convention (by their own harangues as much as by that of the Mountain), that, if the appeal had been allowed, the vast majority of the French people would have voted sentence of death or would have confirmed it; the minority of the people, always so cowardly, would have acquiesced, or would have been cut to pieces in their unconcerted and useless opposition; or, if that opposition could have proved at all formidable in some of the provinces, the commune, who kept the keys of the Temple, would have thrown the doors open to the Parisian égorgeurs, and the king, the queen, the dauphin, the princess royal, and the princess Elizabeth would have been septembrized. On the next day the Girondists were thrown into consternation by Gasparin, a member of the Mountain, who accused Gensonné, Vergniaud, Guadet, and Brissot, of intriguing with the Tuileries by means of Boze, the painter, and Thierry, the king's valet. He informed the House that at the time he was lodging with Boze, who had shown him a long letter signed by the four Girondists, whose principal condition was, that the king should recall Roland's ministry; that Boze had delivered this letter to Thierry, who had carried it to the king; that he had been much surprised that this letter had not been found among the papers presented by Roland as the contents of the iron chest, but that he (Gasparin) had taken some notes while the letter was fresh in his memory, and that he had shown his notes at the time to Carnot and another patriot. Upon this motion the House decreed that Boze should be brought to the bar, and that his papers should be seized and sealed. Robespierre's brother said that there were many interesting papers in Thierry's country-house, and that Roland had been attempting to carry them off clandestinely. After a terrible tumult, in the course of which Boyer-Fonfrède exclaimed, "Send these four Girondists to the Abbaye, and let them have Septembrizers for their judges," the House agreed that Roland also should be called to the bar. This Girondist minister of the interior came almost immediately. He declared that he knew nothing about the letter or about the papers in Thierry's country-house: but, as it is not often that a minister of state has treated of such matters and in such a manner, we must let the eternally virtuous Roland speak a little for himself. "With respect to the seals," said he, "which have been put upon Thierry's country-house, I have prevented their being removed until the pretended death of Thierry or the fact of his emigration be authentically verified. I have opposed the delivery of his effects to the citizeness Thierry, because I suspect that Thierry is not dead, but has emigrated, in which case all his property becomes confiscated to the nation. I have procured from the gaoler of the Conciergerie a list of the persons massacred there on the 2nd of September; that list contains one hundred and thirty persons, and Thierry is not among them.* I have been told since that he fled over to England. Thus, as for my breaking of seals and trying to carry off papers, I consider the charges as gratuitous and wicked calumnies." Robespierre the younger responded, denying that he was a calumniator, and accusing Roland of having spent money, given to him to promote the instruction of the people, upon Brissot and his writings. Painter Boze was then brought to the bar in the custody of the secretary of the commune's committee of general security. He made an ingenious defence, vowed that he had ever been a good patriot, and produced a letter written by Thierry, which seemed to exculpate both himself and the four Girondists, but which really and in a moral sense justified the king more than anybody else. Kersaint, Barbaroux, Vergniaud, and Guadet harangued each at great length, to show that the

correspondence with the court by means of Boze and Thierry had only been entered upon with the most patriotic views: but they could not conceal the fact avowed by Boze, that one of their objects was to regain possession of office; and this enabled the Mountain to cry out that they were a horde of intriguers,—that their system had always been to make themselves ministers and monopolise all the powers of the state, and that they had no system or design but that. Although the Girondists with their numerical majority could carry the order of the day, they were seriously wounded and lamed by this attack at this critical nick of time; and, if they had no courage before—no heart to commit themselves in the cause of mercy—they were not likely to be bolder now. In fact, on the next day, January the 4th, Barbaroux demanded that the discussion should be closed, and that sentence should be passed within four-and-twenty hours. He was followed by that chief of the Plain, Barrère, who had long since made up his own mind to the sentence of death, and who now, in a long and laboured speech, urged all the arguments he could command to prove the expediency of that sentence and of its immediate execution. The predominant argument was one drawn from the old logic of fear:—it was, that, if the ex-king were not put to death, there could be no safety for the republic or the founders of it. He condemned and again exposed the danger of any appeal to the people either for sentence or for a confirmation of sentence; and as he proceeded, like a true middle-man, he eulogized and flattered both sides of the House, the Girondists for their humanity and superhuman eloquence, and the men of the Mountain for their energy and republican directness. He carried along with him all the hesitating and timid, who had determined not to risk in any way their own heads to save the head of Louis, and who merely wanted some plausible argument wherewith to deaden their own consciences. At the same time more addresses came in from the departments crying for execution, and predicting or threatening the most terrible consequences if it were delayed many days longer. There was, too, another cause, which was not without its effect, even in this solemn matter, with that volatile and impatient people; they were weary with the length of the discussion, and could no longer listen with any patience to the repetition day after day of nearly the same arguments. On Sunday the 6th there was a furious debate, which turned chiefly upon the Paris municipality and upon Roland as minister of the interior. Marat apostrophised those who attacked the commune with the grossest and foulest language; and Robespierre, though frequently interrupted by cries of “The Abbaye! the Abbaye!” denounced, in a terrible style, the Girondist ministry and the Girondist majority in the House, declaring that the aid and assistance of the commune was essentially necessary to preserve the patriotic minority from their savage tyranny. Roland, who was present, having been called to the bar to give an account of the state of the interior, protested, shrugged his shoulders, cried out calumny and abomination; but this did not prevent a prodigious effect being produced by Robespierre’s speech. On the 7th the House unanimously decreed that the discussion of the trial was closed, and that nothing remained to do but to fix the definitive sentence. The Mountain proposed that this should be fixed at once; but the Gironde moved an adjournment till the 14th, and this was carried after another tumultuous debate. In the interval the Jacobin newspapers employed themselves very busily in settling the how, the when, the where the king should be executed. Camille Desmoulins recommended that the place should be the Carrousel, right in front of the Tuileries; that he should have a placard on his breast with the words “PERJURED AND TRAITOR TO THE NATION,” and another placard behind him, with the simple word “KING.” Camille further recommended that the Convention should decree that the tombs of the kings of France in the Abbey of St. Denis should henceforward be set apart as the burying-places of thieves, robbers, assassins, and traitors. In the same interval the Convention, on the motion of Kersaint, who had been a naval officer before the revolution, decreed that thirty ships of the line and twenty frigates should be equipped and manned in order to anticipate the hostile movement of England.

On the morning of the 14th the Convention was completely surrounded by immense multitudes of armed citizens, who kept shouting, “Death to the tyrant!” “Death to him or to us!” and as soon as the House opened the galleries were crammed to suffocation. In order that the crowd might be the greater, the commune had taken upon itself to order that all theatres and other places of amusement should be closed that day; and, as the people were thus shut out from all other pastimes, nearly the whole Paris population gathered round that one spot. Buzot, who was the first that ascended the tribune on this tragical day, complained of this stopping of the theatres and spectacles, and proposed that the Convention, in order to lessen the crowd and the tumult, should order those places of amusement to be all opened as usual. The Jacobins opposed and ridiculed the proposition. Gensonné, after a fierce attack on the commune, which he accused of organizing trouble and sedition, and perhaps massacre, demanded that the Convention should decree that the police of Paris belonged to the House, and not to the municipality. This raised another tempest. One Jacobin cried out that it was Gensonné and his party who were conspiring; another said indignantly that the deputies of the Convention were not elected to act as a police; butcher Legendre demanded that Gensonné should be censured; and linen-draper Lecointre exclaimed majestically, that they were met there to pass judgment on the king, and not to talk about theatres and police. The Gi-rondists were again compelled to give way; the theatres were left closed and the people where they were; and under this intimidation the Convention proceeded to decide the king's fate. Danton, who had taken no part whatever in the trial, having been absent on his money-making mission in Belgium, now presented three several series of questions; but after a long debate Danton's three schemes were rejected, and the House adopted the following scheme, or series, proposed by Boyer-Fonfrède, a Girondist:—

"1. Is Louis Capet guilty of conspiring against liberty, and of crimes against the general safety of the state?"

"2. Shall our sentence, whatever it may be, be submitted to the people for their ratification and sanction?"

"3. What punishment shall be inflicted on Louis?"

Danton, it appears, took his departure again that night, for on the following day he was not present to vote, and his name was set down with the names of nineteen other deputies as being "absent on commissions appointed by the Convention." In spite of all their efforts to defeat the vote by muster-roll or appel nominal, the resolution to adopt that mode of proceeding had been carried against the Girondists; and it was further resolved that every member should speak from the tribune, and deliver his opinion and motive also in writing, and signed with his name. Moreover, on the morning of the 15th, on the motions of Rouyer and Jean-Bon-Saint-André, it was ordered that all such members as were absent without cause should be censured, and that a list of their names and the censures pronounced upon them should be printed and sent to the departments. Buzot, however, succeeded in carrying a motion favourable to laggards and cowards: it was, that such as were absent might have leave to vote after the appel nominal.

When this muster-roll began, there was for once a solemn silence in all parts of the House. The president read the first question, Is Louis Capet guilty, &c.? The House was composed in all of 749 members: the muster-roll showed that 8 were absent on account of sickness, that 20 were absent on commission, and that 721 were present and answered to their names. Of all these 721 there was not one that would venture to say simply not guilty, and only 37 who declared that they were incompetent to pronounce judgment on the king, or recommended some punishment short of death. All the rest of the deputies, being 684, replied with a simple affirmative Yes, without offering any explanation or modification; and in this list we find, together with Robespierre and Marat, and all the Mountain, Condorcet, Kersaint, Thomas Paine, Isnard, Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, Brissot, and all the great Girondists. The president (Vergniaud) proclaimed in a sonorous voice, and in the name of the French people, that the National Convention declared Louis Capet guilty. They then without loss of time proceeded to the second question—whether there should be an appeal to the people to sanction the sentence. At this appel nominal 5 members refused to vote at all; 11 would only vote upon certain conditions; 280 (so potently had their fears worked upon the late majority) voted for the appeal to the people; and 425 voted against it. With the exception, however, of Condorcet and Thomas Paine, all the Girondist chiefs voted for the appeal. Philippe Egalité voted on both these questions with the majority, saying, as he gave his vote on the appeal, "I only think of my duty as a citizen; I say, No!" President Vergniaud then announced with the same solemnity, that the National Convention decreed in the name of the French people that there should be no appeal to the people for their ratification. By this time the night was advanced: the third question was reserved for the morrow, the 16th of January, with the understanding that the House would not rise until they had pronounced sentence.

On the morning of the 16th the debate was opened, not about the sentence, but about the theatres, and about a new drama entitled L'Ami des Loix (The Friend of the Laws), a miserable piece, but which had given mortal offence to the Jacobins, as it seemed intended to favour the king, and to hold up to the detestation of the world Robespierre, Marat, and one or two other leaders of the Mountain. There had been terrible scuffles and fights at the representation; and the ultra-Jacobin commune, out of pure regard to order and tranquillity, had prohibited the repetition of the drama. The executive council, on the other hand, had revoked the order of the commune, as contrary to the liberty of the press, in which was included the liberty of the theatre. Pétion condemned the conduct of the commune, justified that of the executive, and said some fine things about the uncontrolled liberty of opinion which became their perfect republic; as if he had not learned from the entire course of the revolution, and from his own personal experience in it, that no liberty was to be allowed except to one party. Robespierre a little later said, with great naïveté, "Without doubt the liberty of the press ought to be entire; but it must not be employed against liberty." And, as liberty was what the majority chose to make it, no man who differed from them could be permitted to express his dissent from them in any way. With respect to the offensive drama, L'Ami des Loix, Dubois-Crancé and other Jacobins said it was written with a perfidious object; that the acting of it served as a rallying-point to the enemies of la chose publique, to the ex-privileged orders and their miserable lacqueys; that it was a notorious fact that swarms of aristocrats were returning to Paris, and that the emigrants were deserting the army of Condé in order to excite troubles in the capital that might prevent the execution of Louis Capet; and from all these circumstances they concluded that the commune had only done its duty in prohibiting the play. Danton, whose last commission must have been a very short one, as he was now in the House, exclaimed, "Citizens, I confess I thought that we were to be occupied upon a subject very different from a comedy!" Some voices said, "But liberty is concerned!" "True," rejoined Danton, "liberty is concerned. But we are to think about the tragedy that we are to present to nations: we are to occupy our minds as to how we are to let the axe of the law fall on the head of a tyrant, and not about miserable comedies!" Pétion expressed his astonishment at hearing such language from a man who had been a magistrat and a minister of justice, talked some more commonplace about the liberty of the press, and made a motion only to be outvoted. At this moment a letter from Roland was presented and read—a letter which announced that many persons, terror-stricken, were flying from Paris; that the closing of the barriers was again threatened; that nothing was talked of but fresh proscriptions; that the fermentation was universal; that everywhere one heard "projects of massacre and preaching to excite murder;" that the incendiary resolutions of many sections, the sanguinary doctrines promulgated in the clubs, and, finally, the arrival of many pieces of artillery which had been parked at St. Denis, and which in the course of yesterday had been brought into Paris and distributed among the sections, could leave no doubt on the mind of any man as to what was intended. "I know," added the minister of the interior, "that the commune and Santerre assure you that Paris is tranquil; I know that they gave you the same assurance on the 2nd of September; I know that I then made fruitless applications; and I also know that I am as powerless to-day as I was then. The same faction exists, the same horrors now threaten us!" The Girondists trembled; the Mountain laughed to scorn the notion that Paris was otherwise than tranquil. A member of the droit got up and said that Charles Villette had just been told at the very door of the Convention, that if he did not vote for the death of Louis he would be massacred. The Mountain hissed and murmured; and butcher Legendre exclaimed, "These fantastic terrors are only a part of your tactics to delay the sentence of the king. If you had to condemn the people, instead of the king, you would not be so slow! It is only old slaves like you, that still bear the marks of their fetters on their wrists, that can talk of dangers and daggers that do not exist!" Marat trusted that the House would not be the dupe of a farce which the Girondists had been playing for three days. "These men," said he, "who now pretend to be in an agony of terror, are the very men who a few days ago boasted of their majority and of their power to carry votes and decrees—they are the very men who are constantly surrounded with bayonets, and who have been dining every day in the barracks of the federates! But their present despair proceeds from their having discovered that the brave federates reject the criminal principles they proposed to them, and refuse to do their work." Another member of the côté droit declared that some members of the Mountain had been heard to say that the cannons had been brought in from St. Denis to make a revolution like that of the 10th of August; and another affirmed that he had just heard news-venders and hawkers crying through the streets, "Here is the true list of the royalists and aristocrats who voted yesterday for the appeal to the people." The Mountain roared, and Danton told the House that they were losing time in idle gossip. Gensonné called all France to witness that the faction of the Mountain was exercising a perfect tyranny. The galleries, which were still more crammed than on the preceding day, expressed in various ways how impatient they were for the third appel nominal. The Convention, however, passed several more hours in hearing the reports of the minister of justice and the mayor of Paris on the actual state of the capital; and in voting and decreeing that the barriers should not be closed, and that the federates actually in Paris should mount guard and do duty with the national guards. The Girondists attempted to carry a vote to bring in a strong regiment of mounted gendarmes then quartered at Versailles; but the Jacobins, who were not quite sure of this regiment, opposed the project, and it ended in exciting one outcry more against the falling party.

As the day was now far advanced it was agreed, on the motion of Danton, that the House would not rise or take up any other business until the third appel nominal was finished. Here there arose the question whether a simple majority should suffice for carrying the sentence, or whether, in such a case, a majority of two thirds should not be required. Lanjuinais demanded that there should be a majority of two-thirds to give any sentence the force of a judgment. The Jacobins cried out against this proposition; and Garan-Coulon said that it was impossible the Convention should follow any other rule than the ordinary one, which gave a majority all its weight and effect whether it was a majority of one or a majority of hundreds. Lehardy demanded that the question should be put thus—Transportation or Death; and that the majority should be at least a majority of two thirds of the whole House. Duquesnoy, a Jacobin of the deepest dye, and afterwards a colleague of Carnot, exclaimed, "Citizens, I am too well convinced of the enlightenment of this Assembly to believe that there can be any serious difference of opinion upon this matter. All the world have declared that Louis is guilty of treason against the people. Well, then! we have nothing to do but to open the penal code, and apply the law to him. I read in that code that the law is equal for all citizens." Danton, knowing that this would not do, simply called for the order of the day, and, this being carried, it remained as a matter of course that a simple majority should decide the fate of Louis. Lanjuinais declared that all forms of justice and all feelings of humanity were outraged, and that the Convention was deliberating under the daggers and cannons of a faction; but these self-evident truths made no impression either upon the mobs in the galleries or upon the men of the Mountain, who had the cannons and the daggers under their control. A secretary now began to call over the muster-roll. It was eight o'clock at night, and the hall was only imperfectly lighted up with lamps and candles. All faces were either pale or flushed—the heads and shoulders projecting from the galleries seemed about to fall upon the members sitting in their seats. By a drawing of lots, or by some operation styled a roulement, the deputies of the Garonne, Gers, and the Gironde, who nearly all belonged to the party named Girondists, were the first called upon for their votes. The first of all who voted was Mailhe, and his vote was LA MORT (Death)—but he demanded that the Convention should afterwards discuss the point whether execution should follow immediately, or whether sentence should be suspended for a time, taking care, however, to add that his vote of death was independent of this proposition. The next two members that voted were Delmas and Projéan, who both said LA MORT, and nothing more. As the business went on, the galleries applauded all who voted simply for death, and hooted and threatened all such as attempted to qualify the sentence, or to commute it into imprisonment or banishment. Early in the roll, Verguinaud, who was acting as president, was called upon; and pale and trembling, and cowering before the popular fury, he pronounced the monosyllable DEATH, although he had previously declared that his heart and conscience would never permit him to give such a vote against the unfortunate king. Guadet, who voted next, said DEATH, but recommended the suspension of execution (le sursis), which had been first suggested by Mailhe. Next came Gensonné, who followed up the concise vote LA MORT, by demanding that the Convention, in order to prove to Europe that the condemnation of Louis was not the work of a faction, should deliberate immediately after judgment on the measures of security proper to be taken in favour of the children of the condemned, and against his family; and that, in order to prove that no distinction was made between villains (scélérats), the Convention should enjoin the minister of justice to pursue before the tribunals the assassins and brigands of the 2nd and 3rd of September! In some few instances courage and humanity were found where their existence could never have been expected. Thus Grangeneuve boldly voted “IMPRISONMENT (la Détention);” and Manuel, with equal boldness, said “BANISHMENT,” and soon afterwards rushed out of the House for ever—but not before he had been hustled, kicked, and beaten, beaten on the very floor of the House, and then in the lobby. As the voting continued, one opinion, delivered by Servière, to keep the king in prison, and only execute him in case of the coalition again invading France, seemed to make some little impression; but it was only for a moment, as the conviction was by this time universal that republican France, instead of suffering invasion, might now invade all Europe, and, in alliance with the people, bring down every throne to the dust. Lepelletier Saint-Fargeau, a man of noble birth and large fortune, who had figured in the Constituent or first Assembly, and who had harangued and written largely for the abolition of all capital punishment, now, to save his own life, said, DEATH. Condorcet said, “THE GREATEST PUNISHMENT SHORT OF DEATH.” Thomas Paine, who had previously urged his opinions with more courage than any of them, both in conversation and in writing, voted for IMPRISONMENT TILL THE PEACE, AND THEN BANISHMENT. Several members of the Mountain voted, like the majority of the Girondists, for DEATH, WITH THE SURSIS. As every member had to answer to his name, to ascend the tribune, to deliver his sentence vivâ voce, and then to write it and sign it in a procès verbal, the dismal business proceeded very slowly. Some of the deputies fell asleep in their places, and had to be roused by the ushers when their names were called. Others, choosing their time, ran out of the House to get dinner or other refreshments. The people in the galleries brought their refreshments with them, and were seen drinking wine and brandy as in a common tavern. One particular gallery set aside for distinguished visitors was occupied by Philippe Egalité's mistresses, and by other rouged and splendidly dressed dames, some of whom, with cards and pins, pricked down the eyes and noses as if they had been at the roulette-table or playing at rouge-et-noir. Deputies of the Convention carried ices, and bon-bons and other condiments, to these proper priestesses of that temple of liberty; and love-making of the French fashion, and gallantry, and assignation, went on even as if the harlots and the scoundrels had been at a merry play. From time to time some fellows went over to the neighbouring coffee-houses, where other cold-blooded scoundrels were betting upon the results of the appel nominal. Marat voted, DEATH WITHIN TWENTY-FOUR HOURS; Danton, simply, DEATH; but Robespierre accompanied his vote of DEATH by a long comment, in which he said that the very reasons which had formerly induced him to call for the abolition of capital punishment now made him demand the death of the tyrant, and in him the death of all royalty. When the turn of Sièyes came, that ex-abbé said, shrilly and briefly, LA MORT SANS PHRASES (Death without phrases). But the vote which made the most sensation was that delivered by the ex-Duke of Orleans, who mounted the tribune between night and morning, and with a hollow, shaking voice said, “Solely occupied by my duty, convinced that all those who have made attempts, or shall hereafter make attempts against the sovereignty of the people, merit death, I vote for DEATH.” There was a universal murmur, a sort of subdued groan; but this was all, and, with the vast majority there collected, the feeling of horror was transitory. All through the next day, the 17th of January, this voting continued. At eight o'clock at night, when Chazal the younger gave the last vote of all, the president announced that he had received two letters, one from Louis's counsel, the other from Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs, who enclosed a note about the king from the Spanish ambassador. Garan-Coulon, and a great many more deputies, Girondists as well as Jacobins, shouted that the letter from the Spanish minister was an insult, and that it ought not to be read. Danton exclaimed, "I am astonished at the audacity of any power pretending to exercise an influence over our deliberations. If everybody was of my opinion, we would this instant declare war against Spain, were it only for this letter." Gensonné said he thought like Danton, and he moved the order of the day, which was carried unanimously. The note of the Spanish ambassador, who offered, in the name of his sovereign, not only the neutrality of Spain, but her friendly mediation with the other powers, if they would only spare the life of Louis XVI., was thrown over the table and sent back unread to the foreign office; and, if all the courts of Europe had sent similar notes, they would all have been treated in the same manner. They then read the note from Louis's counsel, who begged to be heard once more at the bar. Robespierre insisted that the counsel could not be heard until the appel nominal had been scrutinised, and the result of it made known; and, after some debate or clamour, the House agreed with him. At this moment Duchâtel, a farmer from the neighbourhood of Thouars in Poitou, who had been returned to the Convention by the department of Deux-Sèvres, and who had generously exerted himself in favour of the king, was carried into the hall in blankets and with his head wrapped up. He had been lying on a sick bed, but had risen from it in the belief that one humane vote more would turn the balance. Draper Lecointre, Duhem, and some other Jacobins, contended that he could not vote, as the appel nominal was over, and the result of it known; but Valazé, who was acting as one of the secretaries, said that the scrutiny was not over, and the majority decided that the House could not refuse to any member his right of voting. Duchâtel crawled up the steps of the tribune, and gave his vote for BANISHMENT. Charlier, a member of the Mountain and a close adherent of Marat, demanded that the president should interrogate the sick member in order to make him confess who had sent to bring him there in that state; but this proposition was rejected with murmurs. The secretaries then presented the lists to the president (Vergniaud), who, putting on a solemn countenance, said, "Citizens, I am going to proclaim the result of the scrutiny. You are going to perform a grand act of justice. I hope that humanity will induce you to maintain the most profound silence: when justice has spoken, humanity ought to have its turn." After this preamble he read the result of the third appel nominal.—The number of members absent on commission was 15, 8 were absent through real or feigned sickness, and 5 had refused to vote. Of the 721 that remained, 2 had voted for the galleys; 286 for imprisonment and banishment at the peace, or for immediate banishment, or for an imprisonment which was to end in death if France should be again invaded; 46 had voted for death with the sursis either after the expulsion of the Bourbons, or at the peace, or at the ratification of the constitution; 26 had voted for death, but had subjoined the recommendation of Mailhe; and 361 had voted for death without any condition, restriction, or recommendation. Taking the 26 shuffling Girondists (Mailhe and those who had voted with him) as being on the side of mercy, the majority for Death was only a majority of One; but throwing Mailhe and his crew on the other side, as they must be thrown, the blood majority will stand at 53, or 387 against 334. When he had gone through these enumerations Vergniaud said, in a sorrowful tone of voice, "Citizens, I declare, in the name of the National Convention, that the punishment it pronounces on Louis Capet is DEATH."

The very next instant the king's counsel came to the bar. Desèze read a protest signed by Louis, who, besides protesting, claimed to be permitted to appeal to the people. Desèze pleaded eloquently for the helpless sovereign, dwelling upon the smallness of the majority and the anxiety which the large majority of the Convention had so lately shown for the ratification by the people. Tronchet spoke with equal eloquence; and the tears and sobs of the white-headed Malesherbes, which scarcely allowed him to speak one uninterrupted sentence, were more eloquent than any rhetoric or any pleading. Many members seemed overcome by the old man's tenderness; but Robespierre rose and delivered one of his freezing speeches. Guadet demonstrated that it was impossible to allow of the king's appeal to the people, and the House forthwith determined that there should be no such appeal, but that the sursis, or suspension of execution, should be debated on the morrow. They then adjourned amidst hootings and hissings, for, though it was near midnight of the 17th, and they had been sitting ever since nine o'clock of the morning of the 16th, the galleries were furious at their adjourning without settling the sursis question like all the rest, and leaving the king for immediate execution.

On the morrow, the 18th, two or three efforts were made to lengthen the delay by men who thought that delay might yet give Louis a feeble chance for life. Some charitable doubts were suggested that the enumeration of the votes of yesterday might not be quite correct, and some hours were passed in going over and scrutinising again that appel nominal. No error was detected. One member, a Jacobin of the Mountain, proposed that a procès verbal of all the late proceedings should be printed and sent to the departments, with an address to the people, in which the Convention should clearly state the motives under which it had acted. Thuriot, Choudieu, Charlier, Tallien, Duquesnoy, Duhem, Julien, Robespierre, and others, vehemently opposed the proposition, saying that it was only meant to gain time, and that it was utterly useless, as the people had given their representatives the incontestable right of trying the tyrant and sending him to the scaffold. Several of the Girondists, who had not the courage to emit that opinion from the tribune, and whose own conduct had been in direct opposition to the principle, cried out in the crowd that this was not true—that the people had given the Convention no such right or powers! This cowardly inconsistency greatly incensed Choudieu, who roared, “President, call that côté droit to order! They are indirectly protesting against the vote and will of the majority!” Tallien, who had no more bowels than a rock, rose at the very top of the Mountain to recommend despatch on account of humanity. “Louis,” said he, “knows that he has been condemned, and that a suspension of punishment has been demanded for him. Now is it not barbarous to leave him any longer in uncertainty as to his fate? I demand that we decide this question before we rise, in order not to prolong the agonies of the condemned prisoner.” Lareveillère-Lepeaux, now a member of the Plain, expressed some disgust at Tallien’s sortie. “I have,” said he, “voted against the appeal to the people; I have voted for the death of Louis; but it is not without horror that I hear humanity invoked with cries of blood! My advice is, not to admit any long delay to our final determination; but it is almost incredible that any one can wish this important question to be decreed in one sitting by an assembly worn out with the fatigue and extraordinary length of our last sitting.” Lareveillère-Lepeaux concluded with demanding that the House should rise at its usual hour, and that the discussion should not be closed until every member in it should have been fully informed. Couthon demanded that Tallien’s motion should have the priority, and that the House should decide both upon it and upon Mailhe’s proposition or query whether a reprieve or suspension of punishment should be allowed before it adjourned. A voice cried out, “And let us vote upon this point too by appel nominal!”—to which there seemed to be a universal response, “Agreed, agreed.” Dounau of Boulogne, and a representative from the department Pas-du-Calais, which had returned Thomas Paine among its members, spoke against Tallien’s mock humanity, and the indecent precipitation that was recommended. Dounau had voted for banishment at the last appel nominal, and he now wished to read a paper against the punishment of death, which had been drawn up by that brother member, who could not make speeches in French. “One of your members,” said he, “Thomas Paine, has an important opinion to communicate. Perhaps it will be of some use to learn from him how in England —” He was interrupted by indignant murmurs, and called a traitor to the people. Before descending from the tribune Dounau exclaimed that those were the enemies of the people who were flattering their evil passions, their atrocious curiosity to see how a king could die; that the true friends of the people were those who would stop bloodshed and dry up tears, and struggle to bring back the people to feelings of mercy, to principles of morality, justice, and reason! He was answered by Robespierre, who said it would greatly grieve him if one part of the Assembly should be obliged to do violence on the other, but that he hoped that no honest patriot would permit himself to be shamefully dragged in the train of a majority, instead of concurring with his free vote to eternize the glory of the French name. Sentences surely were not passed in order not to be executed; tyrants were not condemned for the sake of a barren formula; it was very absurd to attempt to interpose a space between condemnation and execution; it was very dangerous, by delay, or pity, or pusillanimity, to re-awaken the guilty hopes of the royalists. The longer the execution was delayed, the greater would be the risk of intrigues, plots, troubles, and civil war. The penal code demanded that every criminal sentence should be executed within four-and-twenty hours. If the House thought they might in the present instance depart from the written law, they ought at least to set aside all incidental propositions, and adjourn till to-morrow the actual question. A great many voices on his own side of the House cried No! No! “Citizens,” rejoined Robespierre, “you know this adjournment is not my proposition. I have urged that humanity and the letter of the law command the execution within four-and-twenty hours. I demand, then, if this assembly—which I cannot believe—shall refuse to pronounce definitively before it rise, that it shall decree that to-morrow, at four o’clock, the appel nominal shall be commenced on the question of sursis, so that the execution may follow without loss of time.” Many Jacobins shouted that the question ought to be settled to-day or to-night, or before the House rose; and a fresh tumult ensued. When it had lasted for some time the president put on his hat, and the majority of the members quitted the House. About three hundred remained, collected in groups in the centre of the hall, and many voices among them cried out that the House had not been prorogued—that the debates ought to go on—that the president had acted irregularly and illegally, and ought to be called to the bar. Several members who had formerly been presidents of the House were consulted as to the rules; and at last Lacroix, the friend of Danton, took possession of the president’s fauteuil. Some of the Mountain, who fancied that Lacroix was going to preside, and that the minority that remained would deliberate and vote against the majority that had taken their departure, exclaimed that this was a superb moment—that this was an excellent opportunity for annihilating the royalists and the Brissotins. But a good many members refused to take their seats, or to deliberate, and Lacroix thought himself obliged to confess that he could not properly preside, that the members present did not make a Convention, and that the majority had certainly pronounced the adjournment. Some of the Mountain cried out, "But now we are the majority!" "I know no majority when an adjournment has been legally pronounced," responded Lacroix: "you may name a president if you will, but I declare that I will not preside." And so saying he quitted the chair in the midst of murmurs. Some said that they would appoint a president, some that they would remain all night in the House, though no business were done, in order to show the people who were the true patriots, and who the traitors that abandoned their posts. Couthon said it would be better to avoid any irregular act by going quietly home, engaging, every man on his honour, to be at his post to-morrow morning at nine o'clock. Robespierre rose and said, "I am now speaking only to friends and brothers, for all who are now here are good citizens and of one mind. Our only motive for demanding the immediate execution of the condemned tyrant is the fear that he may be rescued, or that troubles may arise. The only object, then, of all good citizens, at this moment, ought to be to prevent this danger. Let, therefore, every one of us go and exert himself according to his ability. Let us give good warning to the commandant-general, to the municipality, to the sections, to the clubs, to the federates, and to this end let us now calmly retire from this House. To-morrow we will return and resume our glorious labours for terrifying kings and firmly establishing liberty!" While he was speaking Santerre stalked into the House, followed by some of his aides-de-camp, and spoke apart with Marat and other chiefs of the Mountain; and as soon as the Incorruptible had finished his speech, Santerre, though not a member of the House, mounted the tribune to deliver a very significant discourse. "I speak to you," said the brewer, "as a citizen. All Paris is perfectly tranquil. The judgment of the ci-devant king will be executed with great safety and ceremony. I have a reserve of five thousand men ready to march in; there are cannons everywhere, but we shall not want them; tranquillity cannot be interrupted. . . . Then be tranquil yourselves, for the people will never suffer the head of Louis to fall otherwise than as the laws direct." Having thus said, he descended from the tribune in the midst of tremendous applauses, and quitted the House. The members and the mobs in the galleries soon followed Santerre, saying, "Citizens, to-morrow at nine in the morning!" It was now almost midnight.

At the appointed hour on the 19th they met again. A letter was presented from Manuel, declaring that he could no longer consider himself as a member, that he would never again deliberate or attend the House, that it was impossible for the Convention, composed as it was, to save France, and that the virtuous man had now nothing to do but to envelope himself in his mantle and die. The House took no notice of the letter. An order of the general council of the commune was next read. This order imported that, now that the trial of Louis was finished, he should not be allowed to see his counsel or any one else, and that the commissaries of the municipality should make a strict search in his apartments. Choudieu moved that there should be no debate about this order, and that the Convention should now decree that it would not rise until the question of sursis or reprieve was finally settled; and this was agreed to without a division. The debate which followed was as tumultuous and as indecent as the preceding ones, and the conduct of the humane Girondists just as equivocating and cowardly, as ill combined and inconsistent as ever. Vergniaud, Gensonné, Boyer-Fonfrède, Ducos, Barbaroux, Rebecqui, and many more of them, voted against the sursis, which had been recommended by their own friend Mailhe; Guadet voted for it, as did Buzot, Brissot, and Pétion; while Grangeneuve and the great Condorcet declined voting at all. Buzot said, in a fury, that the Mountain only wanted to put Louis to death in order to place Philippe Egalité on the throne. Condorcet, though he would not commit himself by a vote, delivered a long, pedantic, perfectibilian harangue, beginning and ending in rigmarole. He was in doubt whether Louis ought to be executed within four-and-twenty hours or not; he was a merciful man, but he loved strict justice; he was anxious that the matter should be settled, but still he was alarmed at the evil consequences and unfavourable impressions that might be produced by sending Louis to the guillotine. By means of calumny and misrepresentation the sovereigns of Europe might induce their subjects to believe that the tyrant had been unjustly dealt with; and thus not merely the kings, but the peoples of Europe—the masses, from whom co-operation and fraternization might otherwise be expected—would be set against the French republicans. The despots might say to their subjects that the Convention beheaded Louis in sheer vengeance; might represent the friends of liberty as men greedy for blood; might describe the revolution as a thing that led to anarchy and disorder; and this was the only means by which the good and great cause could be injured. "When," continued this equivocator, "I saw my colleagues mount the tribune to pronounce their vote, I remarked that many of the firmest of our patriots did not pronounce the word 'Death' without shuddering. Well, then! let us abolish the punishment of death for all private crimes, reserving for another time the examination of the question whether we shall preserve that punishment for crimes against the state, for here the considerations are very different! The prompt execution of sentence upon a convict is certainly a duty of humanity, and we ought to fulfil it. In Paris people complain that the prisons are full; and terrible reports are spread as to the fate these prisoners may meet with at this season of excitement and movement. But what is the cause of this? It is that there is only one tribunal in Paris. Let us increase the number of criminal tribunals in the capital, and then these prisoners may be tried expeditiously. You have hitherto testified an active solicitude for liberty. Some have accused you of carrying your zeal too far. I do not, nor do I wish to diminish it; but I demand from you some measures of philanthropy and beneficence. Hasten to decree laws of adoption! Hasten to secure the fortune of children born out of marriage; act and decree in such a manner that the terms foundling and bastard be expunged for ever from the French language. The necessities of the state oblige us to impose taxes; but there are means proper to prevent those taxes from pressing heavily on the poor. Legislators, make haste to consult as to these means!" Such was the speech which the humane philosopher Condorcet delivered on the question of survival. When he had done, Thomas Paine, who had still some remains of the English nature in him, ascended the tribune to read, or rather cause to be read, the written discourse to which his colleague, Dounau of Boulogne, had alluded the day before. Marat, who knew that Paine's opinion was strongly pronounced against the execution of the king, and who possibly did not know that deism and quakerism were two very different creeds, cried out that Thomas Paine, the high-priest of modern deism, could not be allowed to vote on this question, as he was a Quaker, and as the religious principles of the Quakers were opposed to the punishment of death. The majority, however, decided that Paine's written discourse should be heard, and (in order that the effect might not be injured by mispronunciation) that one of the secretaries of the House should read it for him. In this discourse Thomas boasted that he had had some experience in revolutions, having twenty years ago contributed to the revolution of the United States of America; that his language had ever been the language of liberty and humanity, and that he knew by experience that nothing so exalted the soul of a nation as the union of these two principles in all circumstances. He announced, in a manner much more direct and manly than that of Condorcet, that, considering the furious passions which raged in France, and particularly in Paris, the execution of the king would be looked upon by the world as nothing but an act of vengeance. "My anxiety for the cause of France," said he, "is now limited to an anxiety for the honour of the French people. If it is reserved to me, after my return to America, to write the history of the French revolution, I would rather have to record a thousand errors dictated by humanity, than one mistake proceeding from a too severe justice." He said that the most humane and fittest punishment would be imprisonment till the peace, and then banishment. He reminded them that the present Convention had only been elected to make a republican constitution, which must be submitted to the acceptation of the people; that, as soon as the people in their primary assemblies accepted the constitution, there must be a general election, and that the actual Convention could not exist more than five or six months. The new choice of representatives would enable the entire body of the people to express their opinion, and he therefore proposed that the decision of the king's fate should be left to the next legislature. He represented briefly and energetically that the death of Louis would greatly increase the number of the enemies of the French republic, and decrease the number of its friends. "France," said he, "has now only one ally, the American republic, and that ally is the sole nation that can furnish her with naval stores; for the kingdoms of the north of Europe, from which she has been accustomed to procure these provisions, are or soon will be at war with her. Now it unfortunately happens that the person who is the object of the present discussion (Louis) is regarded by the people of the United States as their best friend, as he who procured them their liberty. I can assure you that his execution will spread a universal affliction through the United States, and it is yet in your power to spare your best friends that affliction. If I could speak your language like a Frenchman, I would descend, a suppliant, to your bar, and in the name of all my brothers in America present to you a petition and prayer to suspend the execution of Louis!" The galleries and the Mountain roared furiously. Thuriot exclaimed, "That is not the true language of Thomas Paine!" Marat ran up to the tribune, spoke with Paine, then ran down again and shrieked in his screech-owl voice, "I denounce the translator of the discourse! These are not the opinions of Thomas Paine! It is a wicked and unfaithful translation!" Garan-Coulon solemnly affirmed that he had seen the original in Paine's own hands, and that the translation was strictly exact. The secretary was then allowed to continue the reading of Paine's discourse, which concluded with these words: "Your executive council have just appointed an ambassador to the United States, who will set sail in a few days. Nothing can be more agreeable to your allies than if your ambassador on his arrival shall be able to tell them that, in consideration of the part which Louis Capet took in the American revolution, and in consideration of the affliction which the Americans might have felt at his execution, you have suspended the penalty of death. Ah! citizens, do not give the despot of England the pleasure of seeing sent to the scaffold the man who helped my beloved brethren of America to free themselves from his chains!" [King George of England wept for the fate of the hapless Bourbon; but too many of Thomas Paine's beloved brethren of America—as we may show hereafter—hailed the execution of their benefactor as a grand republican triumph, and celebrated the death of Louis with feasts and songs.] As for Thomas Paine, whose discourse produced no salutary effect, he incurred from this moment the deadly hatred of the Mountain and Robespierre, who, in the month of June following, drove him out of the Convention as a base foreigner and no republican.

BRISSET.

Brissot, in his speech, told the Convention that if they cut off Louis's head one day, they must declare, on the next, war against England, Holland, Spain, and all the tyrants of Europe, on whose part a war was inevitable; but their recent victories over the Prussians, Austrians, and Sardinians, and their cherished belief that they could revolutionize and Jacobinize the popular masses in all countries, made the French confident of a perpetuity of triumph, and the vast majority of the Convention were quite ready to declare war against all Europe. At a late hour the appel nominal commenced, each member voting simply "Yes" or "No." Seventeen members were absent on commission—the number of those who pleaded sickness as the cause of their absence was now swollen to 21—8 were reported absent without known cause, and 12 refused to vote. Philippe Egalité and 379 more said "No!" to the sursis, and 310 said "Yes!" It was, therefore, carried by a majority, an unqualified majority of SEVENTY, that there should be no delay, and that Louis should suffer death within four-and-twenty hours. Santerre's carnal-speech and other demonstrations had operated; the present majority was greater by 17 than the majority which had pronounced sentence of death; 21 were sick now, instead of 8; an additional number were absent without saying why; and, instead of 5, 12 refused to vote. It was three o'clock on the morning of the 20th when the House adjourned, and then the members went to their houses or obscure lodgings followed by an applauding mob.

On the morning of the 18th Malesherbes had gone to the Temple to announce the result of the third appel nominal. Cléry ran to meet him. "All is lost," said the old man; "the king is condemned." Louis, who saw him coming, rose to receive him. Malesherbes threw himself at his feet; his voice was stifled with sobs, and for some minutes he could not utter a word. The king raised him and pressed him to his bosom; and then Malesherbes told the terrible sentence. Louis betrayed no surprise, no agitation; he seemed only affected at the grief of that venerable old man, and he endeavoured to console him. They retired together into the inner closet, and there remained about an hour. When Malesherbes took his departure, Louis conducted him to the outer door, begging that he would return early in the evening and not forsake him in his last moments. When the old minister had withdrawn, the king shaved and dressed himself, and said to Cléry, who was standing by his side pale and trembling, and almost fainting, "Come, more courage!" If his own active courage had been but a tithe of his passive courage or fortitude, matters could never have come to this sad pass, and possibly, notwithstanding all the talk about mighty and irresistible agencies, the revolution would have been put down by this time. He then took up his book and passed the time in reading. In the evening he said to Cléry, "You have heard the sentence they have pronounced against me." The affectionate attendant said he hoped that it would be superseded. "I seek no hope," replied the king; "but it grieves me exceedingly to think that Monsieur d'Orleans, my near relation, should have voted for my death: read that list." Hoping against hope, or striving to give a feeling to his master to which he himself was a stranger, Cléry said that part of the public were murmuring greatly at the proceedings of the Convention; that General Dumouriez, who had come from Liege to Paris, was said to entertain favourable intentions, and to have brought with him the sentiments of his army; that the people generally were shocked at the conduct of Orleans; that it was reported that all the foreign ambassadors who remained in Paris would meet and go to the Convention in a body; and, finally, that the members of the Convention were in evident fear of some popular insurrection in the king's favour. Louis replied, "I should grieve to see an insurrection take place on my account, for it will only lead to fresh massacres, and there have been victims enough." But then, thinking of his wife, his sister, and innocent helpless children, he added, "Cléry, I do not fear death, but I cannot contemplate without shuddering the cruel lot I leave behind me to my family, to the queen, to our unfortunate children! . . . and to those faithful servants who never forsook me, and to those old men whose subsistence depended upon the little pensions I allowed them! . . . I see the people delivered over a prey to anarchy—the victims of every faction—crimes succeed crimes—long dissensions tear France in pieces!" After pausing for a moment, and seeming to reflect upon the eagerness with which he had entered into all the first schemes for political reform and for bettering the condition of the people, he exclaimed, "Oh, my God! and is this the reward for all my sacrifices? Have I not tried everything to insure the happiness of the French people?" He expected to see Malesherbes, but in vain. At night he asked Cléry if he had not been at the Temple. Cléry put the same question to the municipals on guard, who all answered No, without mentioning that the Convention and the commune had forbidden further access. On the following day Louis was exceedingly uneasy at hearing no news of Malesherbes. He took up an old number of the 'Mercure de France,' and asked Cléry if he could guess a riddle or anagram that was in it. Cléry could not. "And yet," said the king, "it is something very applicable to my present case: Sacrifice is the word." He then ordered Cléry to bring him the volume of Hume's history which contained the death of Charles I., and this he read again. Cléry found that the king had perused since his coming to the Temple two hundred and fifty volumes. At night he observed that his majesty could not be deprived of the attendance of his counsel without a decree of the Convention, and advised that a demand should be made for their admission. Louis merely said, "Let us wait till to-morrow." On the following morning a municipal officer came in, holding a paper in his hands; he was accompanied by the warden of the Temple, one Mathey, who carried pens and an inkstand. The municipal told the king that he had orders to take an inventory of the furniture and other effects; and forthwith he began a very minute search, to be certain, as he said, that no arms or sharp instruments had been secreted in the rooms. There was a small desk containing some papers; the king was compelled to open it and every drawer in it, and to remove and show all the papers one after the other. At the bottom of one of the drawers there were three rouleaus. "That," said Louis, "is money which does not belong to me, but to M. de Malesherbes. I have put it up for the purpose of giving it to him when he comes." The three rouleaus contained 3000 livres in gold, and on each of them was written in the king's hand For M. de Malesherbes. The officer left the money in the desk. While the search was making in the inner room the king wanted to warm himself, the weather being very cold. Mathey, the warden, was standing before the fire, with his back to it, and his coat-flaps tucked up under his arms. As he scarcely left room on either side for the king to approach, and as he continued insolently standing in the same place, Louis, with some quickness, told him to leave a little more room; and upon this the brute withdrew altogether, sneaking out of the room, and being followed by the municipal officer. Whenever he displayed any sharpness or boldness, these wretches were cowed; but it was very rarely that he could assume that tone, and to pity or commiseration, or respect for fallen greatness, or sympathy for the man, the father, the husband, and the brother, or to any tender emotion, their hearts were inaccessible. It would be impossible to find an instance where so many individuals, in close contact with the sufferer, displayed anything like such a consistent and unvarying barbarity. The commissaries that were sent, from time to time, by the commune were numerous, the municipals that kept guard within the Temple were changed every day, as were also the detachments of national guards, and in the rotation, in the course of more than six months, a vast number of individuals of various ages, characters, professions, and callings, did duty in the prison, and witnessed the sufferings of the royal family, and the meek spirit with which they were borne; yet of all these numbers, of all these hundreds of witnesses of a long protracted martyrdom, there were only four that ever showed any symptom of feeling, and only two that ever rendered a trifling assistance or comfort. It seemed to be the study of all the rest to add insult to harshness, and to make refinements, in barbarity. Some of the municipals never named any individual of the royal family without making use of some gross epithet. One of them said, in the hearing of Cléry, "If no executioner can be found to guillotine this family, I will guillotine them myself." Simon, the shoemaker, into whose keeping the little dauphin fell, after the execution of the king and queen, distinguished himself by a systematic cruelty. He was a municipal officer, and the only one that was on permanent duty, and that never quitted the prison. He never appeared in the presence of the royal family without treating them with the vilest insolence. Before the trial was commenced, one of the soldiers wrote on the door of the king's chamber, "THE GUILLOTINE IS PERMANENT AND READY FOR THE TYRANT LOUIS XVI." The king read the words and prevented Cléry from rubbing them out. At that time, when the family were as yet together, and allowed at stated times to walk in the garden of the Temple surrounded by national-guardsmen, Rocher, one of the door-keepers—a man of a horrid figure, with a black hairy cap on his head and a huge sabre by his side—never let the royal captives go through the door that opened into the garden without puffing the fumes of his tobacco-pipe at each of them, and most at the queen and the princesses; and the national guardsmen used to be amused with these indignities, and to burst into fits of laughter at every puff of smoke. At times these civic patriot soldiers would run and bring chairs from their guard-room to sit and enjoy the sight at their ease. They would also assemble in the garden, while the family were walking, and dance the Carmagnole (these Frenchmen committed scarcely any atrocity without a dance and a song), and sing the Ça Ira, the Marseillaise, and things of that sort, their songs being always revolutionary and often obscene—and he who is not aware of the depth of French obscenity is happily exempted from the knowledge of one of the great proofs and ingredients of human depravity. The same indignities were repeated when the royal family returned from the garden into the prison. The walls were frequently covered with the most indecent scrawls, in large letters, that they might not escape notice. Among others were—"MADAME VETO SHALL SWING"—"WE SHALL FIND A WAY OF BRINGING DOWN THE GREAT HOG'S FAT"—"THE LITTLE WOLVES MUST BE STRANGLERD." Under a gallows, with a figure hanging to it, was written—"LOUIS TAKING AN AIR-BATH." And under a guillotine and a figure laid prostrate, with the head over the sack which received the heads when struck off by the machine, were the words, "LOUIS SPITTING IN THE SACK." We repeat it: there is not upon record anything like an instance where the same number of individuals, for the same length of time, committed such atrocities, and were so totally insensible to human suffering—where so much cruelty was accompanied with so much ribaldry and obscenity—where such savage deeds were done with gaieté de cœur. Or, if a companion-piece is to be found for the infernal picture, we must look for it in earlier French history, and in French history alone.

On the evening of the 19th Louis, still separated from his family, and still grieving at being debarred the society of the good Malesherbes, requested the municipals to inquire of the commune upon what grounds they objected to his counsel coming to him, requesting to be allowed at least a short conversation with M. de Malesherbes. The municipals said they would mention it; but one of them now confessed that they had been forbidden to lay any application from Louis XVI. before the council of the commune unless it was written and signed by himself. "Why," said the king, "have I been left two whole days ignorant of this alteration?" He then calmly wrote a note to the council-general of the commune desiring to have a free communication with his counsel, and complaining of the barbarous order for keeping him in sight both by night and by day. "It must be supposed," wrote he, "that, in the situation I am now in, it is painful not to have it in my power to be alone, and not to be allowed the tranquillity necessary to collect my thoughts." He gave the note to the municipals, but they did not choose to present it till the next morning. On Sunday, January 20th, as soon as Louis awoke, he inquired about the note; and a little later he said to Cléry, "I see that M. de Malesherbes is not coming." Cléry then informed him that he had just learned that the good old man had been several times at the Temple, but had always been refused admission. Louis spent the rest of the morning in walking up and down his gloomy cell, and in reading and writing. Just as the clock struck two the door was suddenly thrown open, and from a dozen to fifteen individuals walked, or rather rushed, into the room. Two of them were ministers of state, who owed their appointments to the virtuous Roland and the Gironde—namely, Garat, the minister of justice, and Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs: among the others were Grouvelle, heretofore a man of letters, a comic poet, an amanuensis to the atheistical academician Champfort, and collaborateur with Cerutti in his infamous journal, and now secretary of the council of government, Santerre, the commandant-general, the president and attorney-general of the department, the mayor and solicitor to the commune, and the president and public accuser of the criminal tribunal. The brawny Santerre, stepping before the others, bade Cléry announce to his master the executive council. Louis advanced some steps to meet them, and then stopped in a firm and noble attitude. Garat, the minister of justice, who had pretended to be much affected on being ordered by the Convention to announce the death sentence to Louis, and who had muttered repeatedly, "What a frightful commission!"*—Garat, the ingenious author, ideologist, reformer, philanthropist, and perfectibilian, who had won golden opinions not merely from reformers at home, but also from reformers and friends of humanity abroad—Garat, who, after a few more turns of the wheel, licked the dust and spittle at the feet of Napoleon Bonaparte, and became the panegyrist of absolutism and despotism, now, without a blush or a tear, or any apparent emotion, played off the starch republican, and, with his hat upon his head, addressed the king thus:—"Louis, the National Convention has charged the Provisionary Executive Council to make known to you its decrees of the 15th, 16th, 17th, 19th, and 20th of January. The secretary of the council will read them to you." Grouvelle, the secretary, then unrolled a paper he held in his hand, and read it with a weak and tremulous voice. The substance of the paper was that Louis was to die to-morrow morning. While it was reading no alteration took place in the king's countenance, except at the word conspiracy, when a smile of contempt played upon his lips; but at the words shall suffer the punishment of death the serene expression of his countenance told them that death had no terrors for him. He stepped forward, and took the decree from the hands of the secretary, folded it up, and put it into his pocket, from which he took out another paper, and presented it to the minister Garat, desiring he would deliver it immediately to the Convention. As Garat seemed to hesitate, Louis added, "I will read it to you first:" and he then read with perfect composure the letter, which demanded a respite of three days in order that he might prepare himself to appear before his God—which demanded that he might freely see a confessor, and that that person should be ensured from all fear and uneasiness on account of the act of charity he would bestow upon him—that he might be freed from the incessant presence of the municipals, and be at liberty to see his family without witnesses. The earnest, but hopeless, entreaty was added that the Convention would now allow his family to quit France, or go wherever they might think proper. We have mentioned, as one of the best traits in the character of this weak but good and kind-hearted man, that he never in any extremity forgot his servants and friends. This paper—apparently the last he wrote—ended with the following words, which would in themselves be his best funeral panegyric or epitaph:—"I recommend to the bounty of the nation at large those persons who were dependent on me: there are very many of them who have sunk their whole fortune in their places, from the loss of which they must now be in great want, and others who never had anything to live upon but their appointments; among the pensioners, there are many old men, women, and children, who have also no other support." After he had heard it read, Garat took the letter, and said he would present it immediately to the Convention. As he was leaving the room with foreign minister Lebrun and the other functionaries, the king gave him another slip of paper, on which was written the name and address of the priest he desired to have for his last confessor. When they were all gone, Cléry stood by the door in silent, motionless despair; but Louis, after taking two or three turns, roused him by bidding him order dinner. On entering the eating room he saw a tray with the queen's dinner upon it, and asked why his family had been kept waiting an hour beyond their usual time, saying that the delay must have alarmed them. He then sat down to table, and said, "I have no knife." One of the municipals hereupon told him that the commune had passed a resolution that he should be allowed neither knife nor fork at his meals, but that his valet might be trusted with a knife to cut his bread and meat in the presence of two municipal officers. "Do they think me such a coward," said Louis, "as to make an attempt on my own life? I am innocent, and shall die in their way without fear. Would to God my death could avert the miseries I foresee." A profound silence ensued. He ate a little, helping himself to some stewed beef with a spoon, and breaking his bread with his fingers. About six in the evening, minister of justice Garat returned with his train, and informed Louis that the Convention had decreed that he should have a confessor, and see his family freely and without witnesses—"that the nation, ever great and ever just," would take into consideration the state of his family—that proper indemnities should be granted to the creditors of his household—and that with respect to the delay of three days the Convention had passed to the order of the day. Louis made no observation, but returned to the inner chamber. The commissaries of the commune then took the minister of justice aside, and asked him how the king was to see his family. Garat replied, "Strictly in private; it is so intended by the Convention." To which the commissaries responded, "But we are enjoined never to lose sight of the king by night or by day; it is so ordered by the commune." The minister of justice was too wise in his generation to think of disputing the omnipotence of the municipality, or of setting against it the inferior power of the Convention, and he readily agreed to a compromise: the king was to receive his family in the outer room so as to be seen through the glazed part of the door, but the door was to be shut, so that they should not be heard. When this discussion was over, Louis called the minister of justice back to ask whether he had sent for the confessor. Garat answered that he had brought the priest with him in his carriage, that he was below stairs with the council, and would soon come up. Louis then gave the 3000 livres in gold to a municipal officer, begging him to deliver the money to M. de Malesherbes. The municipal promised he would do so, but he immediately carried it to the council of the commune: it is scarcely necessary to add that Malesherbes never saw the money. The confessor whom Louis had chosen was M. Edgeworth de Firmont, the descendant of an Irish family settled in France, and a man revered for the piety and purity of his life. This priest now made his appearance, and the king instantly retired with him into the inner room. About eight o'clock Louis came out of the closet with a serene countenance, and desired the municipals to conduct him to his family. Those officers replied that this could not be, but that his family should be brought down to him if he desired it. "Be it so," said the king, "but I may at least see them alone in my bed-room?" "No," replied one of them, "we have settled with the minister of justice that it shall be in the outer room." "You have heard," said Louis, still calm as a martyr with his foot on heaven's threshold, "you have heard that the decree of the Convention permits me to see them without witnesses." "True," said the municipals, "you will be in private; the door shall be shut, but we shall have our eyes upon you through the glass." "Let my family come," said Louis. The municipals disappeared, and Cléry set chairs, and arranged the narrow miserable apartment as best he could. Louis desired that some water and a glass might be ready. There was a decanter of iced water standing on a table, so Cléry merely brought a glass; but the king told him to bring some water that was not iced, for if the queen drank that it might make her ill. Afterwards he bade Cléry go and tell the confessor not to leave the closet, lest his family should be suddenly shocked. The municipals were more than a quarter of an hour before they returned: during the time, the king went into the closet to the good priest, but from time to time came out to the door in extreme agitation. At last, at about half-past eight in the evening, the outer door was thrown open, and his family entered unannounced. The queen came first, leading her son by the hand; Madame Elizabeth followed, with the princess-royal. They all threw themselves into the arms of the king. A sad silence, only broken by sighs and sobs, prevailed for some minutes. The queen turned towards the closet. "No," said Louis, "let us go into this room: I can see you only there." They went in, and Cléry shut the glass door, remaining himself outside with the brutal men of the commune, who watched all that passed.

* The fact is kept carefully out of sight, but we believe that Garat, like so many other men of letters, enjoyed a pension from Louis XVI. when the revolution began.

The king sat down: the queen was on his left hand, his sister on his right, his daughter stood nearly opposite, and the little dauphin stood between his knees—many were the fond embraces and the silent tears. "This scene of sorrow," adds Cléry, "lasted an hour and three-quarters, during which it was impossible to hear anything from outside the glass door. It could, however, be seen that, after every low sentence uttered by the king, the agitation of the queen and princesses increased; that this lasted some minutes; and that then the king began to speak again in the same gentle low voice. It was quite plain, from their gestures, that they received from his own lips the first intelligence of his condemnation." At a quarter past ten the king rose, and moved towards the door, his family following him. Cléry threw open the glass door. The queen then clung to her husband's right arm, and his sister and his children hung round him; and as he advanced some steps towards the outer door, which was so soon to be closed between him and them for ever, their irrepressible anguish burst forth in agonizing lamentations. The king tried to comfort them. "I assure you," said he, "that I will see you again to-morrow morning, at eight o'clock. 'You promise!'" said they, speaking all together: "you promise!"—"Yes, I promise."—"Why not at seven o'clock?" said the queen.—"Well! yes, at seven," replied Louis; "and now farewell! farewell!"—At this sad word their sobs and lamentations were renewed, and the princess-royal fainted at the feet of the king, round whom she had been clinging. Cléry lifted her up, and assisted Madame Elizabeth to support her and bring her round. Eager to put an end to the heart-rending scene, Louis once more embraced them all most tenderly, then resolutely tore himself from their arms, said, for the last time, "Farewell! farewell!" and shut himself up in the closet with his confessor. Cléry attempted to continue supporting the almost lifeless princess-royal up the stairs; but the municipal officers stopped him before he had gone up two steps, and compelled him to go in. Although both the doors were now shut, the screams of the queen and princesses were heard for some time on the stairs. It is said that the queen, in passing through the ante-room, looked with flashing eyes on the municipals, and exclaimed, "You are all villains!—all! all!" But Cléry does not mention the fact; and it should appear that the imperial Marie Antoinette was now too broken-hearted and crushed in spirit to be capable of any such indignation. In half an hour the king came out of his closet, and sat down to his supper, eating little, but heartily. He then returned to his closet; and in a few minutes the confessor came forth to request the municipals that he might be furnished with the vestments and what else was necessary for celebrating mass. With extreme difficulty, M. Edgeworth induced those unbelieving, unfeeling men, to procure the things he required: they were brought in from the church of the Capuchins of the Marais. He then returned to the closet, and remained in conversation and prayer with the king till half an hour after midnight. Cléry then helped the king to undress, and was going to roll his hair as usual; but here Louis said, "It does not signify now." As the weeping attendant was drawing his bed-curtains he said, "Cléry, you will call me at five o'clock." He was scarcely in bed before he fell into a deep sleep, which was calm and uninterrupted, like the blessed sleep of innocence and infancy. The confessor threw himself upon Cléry's bed, and Cléry passed the night on a chair by the king's bedside. On hearing five o'clock strike Cléry began to light the fire, and the noise he made awoke Louis, who asked whether it had struck five. "I have slept soundly," said he, "and I stood in need of it: yesterday was a fatiguing day to me—a dreadful day." He expressed his concern at the uncomfortable way in which Cléry had passed the night on the hard chair, and tenderly pressed that good man's hand. He then dressed himself, and emptied his pockets of his snuff-box and the very few articles the commune had left in his possession. He took from his watch-chain a little seal, and from his ring-finger a gold ring: he looked at the ring again and again, placed it again on his finger, took it off, and put it, with the seal, into his waistcoat pocket—it was his wedding-ring, which he was now about to return to the queen as his last and mute farewell. As soon as he was dressed he sent Cléry to advise the confessor, and to assist him in preparing for the celebration of mass. They placed a chest of drawers in the middle of the inner room to serve as an altar, and an arm-chair in front of it, with a large cushion on the ground for the king to kneel upon: the priest put on his stole, and in a few minutes all was ready. The municipals, who had been prying about, quitted the room, leaving one fold of the door open. When the king came in he desired Cléry to take away the large cushion he had laid on the ground, and he went himself to his closet and brought a smaller cushion made of horse-hair, which he commonly used at his prayers. His last mass began at six o'clock. There was a profound silence during the awful celebration, and the king was on his knees all the time, with a countenance full of devotion and heavenly hope. When the mass was over he took the sacrament, and then the priest, retiring to unrobe, left him for a few minutes alone with Cléry, his sole attendant and companion for many a sad day. He took both the poor man's hands into his own, and in a tone of holy tenderness thanked him for all his services. Cléry, whose head was bewildered, threw himself at his feet, and bade him still hope. "Hope, Sir," said he, "hope yet! They will not dare to strike the blow!" Louis, who better knew their daring, and who had never allowed hope to delude him for one moment, said that death did not alarm him, that he was quite prepared for it, but that Cléry must take heed not to expose himself to danger by giving vent to his feelings: and after this he spoke about his son, his only son, who was to be left in this horrid abode, saying he meant to request them to allow Cléry to remain with the dauphin, and enjoining him to take every care of him if the request should be granted. The faithful attendant could say little more than, "Oh, my master! oh, my king! Give me your blessing. . . . Bless the last Frenchman remaining with you!" Louis raised him from the ground, blessed him, and pressed him to his bosom, saying, "Give my blessing to all who were in my service—and now leave me, to avoid suspicions that may be dangerous to you." Cléry was withdrawing, but the king called him back to give him a letter which he had received from Pétion on his first coming to the Temple, and which he thought might be of some use to him. Cléry once more kissed his hand, and then retired, the king saying to him as he went, "Farewell! again farewell!" M. Edgeworth now rejoined the king, and they remained together in the closet. At seven o'clock Louis came out, called for Cléry, and, taking him into the recess of the window, he gave him the little seal for the dauphin and the ring for the queen. "This little packet," said he, "contains some of the hair of all my family; you will give her this too. . . . And and tell the queen, tell my dear children and my sister, that, although I promised to see them this morning, I have resolved to spare them that pang. . . . Yet tell them how much it costs me to go hence without receiving their embraces once more." He wiped away some tears; then added in the most mournful and solemn accent, "I charge you to bear them my last farewell." He returned to M. Edgeworth. The municipals, who had been prying and spying, came up to Cléry and commanded him to resign to them the articles which the king had given him; but after some altercation it was agreed that Cléry should keep the things till the council of the commune should decide what was to be done with them. This council was now sitting below stairs in the Temple. In about a quarter of an hour the king again came out and desired Cléry to ask whether he could have a pair of scissors. The commissaries pretended to be much excited by this request. (We say pretended, because it was not possible for them to suspect that the religious and resigned king entertained the idea of suicide, and because it is perfectly evident that all their study was how to heap violence and degradation upon him—how to crowd his last few moments with torture, and how to make more and more a scene of his execution.) "Do you know what he wants to do with the scissors?" said they. "I know nothing about it," replied Cléry. "But we must know," said they, advancing towards the door of the closet. Cléry tapped at the door and the king came out. "You want a pair of scissors," said one of the municipals; "but before we make the request known to the council we must know what you want to do with them." Louis said, "I only wanted Cléry to cut my hair off." One of the municipals went down to the council, and they, after half an hour's deliberation, refused the scissors, intending that his long back hair, if cut at all, should be cut by hangman's hands. The obdurate villain, leaving his brother scoundrels below, came up and acquainted the king with the decision. "I did not mean to touch the scissors," said Louis; "Cléry might cut off my hair before you all. . . . Sir, try once more. . . . Sir, I beg you to repeat this request." The fellow went, and presently returned to say it could not be. At this moment Cléry was told that he was to accompany the king in order to undress him on the scaffold. The poor man shuddered and trembled all over at this intelligence; but he collected all his strength, and was getting himself ready to discharge this last duty to his royal master, when another municipal officer came and told him that he was not to go, adding, "The common executioner is good enough for him!"

All the troops in Paris had been under arms since five o'clock. The beat of drums, the clash of arms, the trampling of horses, the rumbling of cannon, which were incessantly carried from one place to another, the cries of the populace—all resounded through the stone tower of the Temple, and were heard by the family above, as by the king below. At about half-past eight o'clock the noise waxed louder, the gates of the prison were thrown open with a terrible clatter, the footsteps of many men were heard on the stone staircase, and presently Santerre entered the king's apartment, followed by seven or eight municipals, and by ten soldiers, who drew up in two lines. On the instant Louis came out of his closet, and said to Santerre, "You are come for me, sir?"—The brewer responded with a loud "Yes!"—"One moment," said the king; and going into the closet he forthwith returned, followed by his confessor. He had his will in his hand, and, addressing one of the municipals, he said, "I beg you to give this paper to the queen—to my wife, I mean" (remembering that queen was now a prohibited word). Jacques Roux, the man he addressed, was a renegade priest, who now styled himself the preacher of the sans-culottes: "It is no business of mine," replied he; "I am come here only to conduct you to the guillotine."—The king then turned to another municipal named Gobeau, and said, "I entreat you to give this paper to my wife—you may read it—there are particulars in it that I wish to be made known to the commune." This fellow took the will. Cléry offered the king his great coat. "I do not want it," said Louis; "give me only my hat." Cléry presented a hat, when the king once more, and for the last time, pressed his hand. Louis then requested that Cléry might be allowed to remain to wait upon the dauphin—and then, looking at Santerre, he said, "Partons!" (let us go.)—"These," says Cléry, "were the last words he spoke in his apartment." On the top of the stairs he met Mathey, the warden of the prison, to whom he said, 'I spoke with some little quickness to you the day before yesterday; do not take it ill.' Mathey made no answer, and even affected to turn his back on the king while his majesty was speaking."

As Louis issued from the gates of the Temple to get into the vehicle that was to convey him to the scaffold, some faint, timid cries were heard of "Grace! Grace!" (Pardon! Pardon!)—and this, with the distribution of some printed papers which had been cautiously made by night, was almost the only attempt made to save Louis from his doom. Dumouriez was indeed in Paris, but he could do nothing, being, in spite of his far superior address, adroitness, and ability, more helpless than Lafayette had been when he came to rescue the king in the month of June. One royalist, in his despair and madness, had done something more, but the deed only increased the popular ferocity, which was eternally accompanied or caused by dastardly terror. On the preceding evening—a Sabbath evening—Michel Lepelletier St. Fargeau, who had voted for the king's death, went over from the Convention to the Palais-Royal to take a hasty dinner at a restaurateur's. He had dined, and was paying his bill, when a thick-set man, wrapped in a loose cloak, stepped up to him with "Are you Michel Lepelletier?"—"The same."—"You voted on the king's trial?"—"Yes, I voted death."—"Villain, there is death for you!"—and in the next instant Lepelletier was mortally wounded in the side by a sabre, and the thick-set man had taken flight; Fevrier, the keeper of the house, in vain attempted to arrest him. The fugitive was, however, recognised as one Paris, who had formerly belonged to the king's guard. The description of his person was presently spread all over France, but he was not discovered until several weeks after, when he was found in a stable, where he had committed suicide by shooting himself. As soon as the assassination was known in Paris, the absurd report was circulated on all hands that there was a royalist plot on foot for assassinating, that night, every member of the Convention who had voted for the king's death, and for preventing his execution by a general massacre of the patriots of the capital. Robespierre and others declared that Count d'Artois, the king's brother, was concealed somewhere in Paris for the purpose of heading all the fanatic royalists and bands of hired bravos, chiefly foreigners; Goupilleau announced that he had had a narrow escape from being murdered in a coffee-house; and other members of the Convention, or leaders in the Jacobin Club, remembered or invented many suspicious circumstances which seemed to indicate some horrible plot. As we have said, nothing was too horrible or incredible to obtain belief among these excited, suspicious mortals. The people believed all that it was wished they should believe, and Lepelletier's fate and their own panic fears gave a fresh edge to their cruelty, making them anxious, restless, rabidly impatient, until they should see the head of Louis in the sack. The Jacobin Club declared themselves in permanent session, and sent their commissioner to every section, street, alley, and court of Paris, to call upon every patriot man, woman, boy, or girl to be wide awake and under harness—with pikes, clubs, and knives, where they had no better weapons—all that Sunday night and all the next morning.

On quitting the Temple the king was conducted to the Place Louis XV., now called Place de la Révolution, in the midst of which, between the garden and palace of the Tuileries and the Champs Elysées, and close by the base of the overthrown equestrian statue of his grandfather, they had erected the scaffold and the guillotine, the latter being so placed that the face of the dying man, when under the axe, must be turned towards the palace. The square bristled with artillery, and every street and avenue leading to it was crowded with troops and armed multitudes, who had cannon with them charged with grape-shot. The carriage was surrounded by picked men, who are said to have had orders to dispatch the king with their carbines in case of any rescue being attempted. During the long, slow drive the king read the prayers for the dead with his confessor; two gendarmes, who rode in the coach with him, and who were more especially charged with the duty of dispatching him if any movement should take place, are said to have been deeply affected by his piety and resignation. At about half-past ten o'clock, or an hour after quitting the Temple, Louis arrived at the scaffold, which was guarded and surrounded by federates of the most determined kind, behind whom were ranged the men of the faubourg St. Antoine, and all the worst portions of the sanguinary Parisian mob. These federates, or the mob, or both together, raised a shout of savage joy as the coach stopped at the foot of the scaffold. The king descended from the carriage, and M. Edgeworth followed him. Three executioners approached to undress him, but he put them back, and threw off his coat and undid his stock himself. He was then told that his hands must be tied behind him. He made some resistance, and kept off the executioners; but after a few words from his confessor, he quietly placed his hands as they wished, and the executioners tied them together by the wrists. He requested to be permitted to cut off his own hair, but it appears that that work was done, even as the commune wished it should be, by the hangmen's hands. He ascended the stairs that led to the platform with a firm step, being still followed by M. Edgeworth. He made a sudden movement towards the edge of the scaffold, and exclaimed with a loud and firm voice, "Frenchmen, I die innocent; it is from the scaffold, and when about to appear before my God, that I tell you so. I pardon my enemies; I pray that France" Here Santerre, on horseback, raised his right hand, and cried, "Tambours! Executioners, do your duty!" and the drummers beat their drums, and drowned the king's voice, and six executioners dragged him from the edge of the scaffold to the guillotine. He said again, "I die innocent; I ever desired the good of the people;" but his voice could be heard only by the executioners and the priest. He then knelt down in order to place his head in the appointed place; the confessor, bending over him, said, "Son of Saint-Louis, ascend to heaven!" The spring of the machine was touched, the heavy axe descended in its grooves, and, quicker than the eye could follow, the king's neck was severed. It was nicely calculated that the whole execution did not last eight seconds. Samson, the chief executioner, took up the bleeding head by the hair and walked three times round the scaffold, holding it up at arm's-length to show it to all the people. The people and the troops shouted "Vive la République!" put their hats and caps upon their bayonets and their pikes, and waved them in the air, with prolonged and re-echoing cries of "Vive la République!" "Vive la Nation!" "Vive la Liberté!" It was twenty-four minutes past ten o'clock of Monday morning, the 21st of January, 1793. Louis was only in the thirty-ninth year of his age; he had reigned nineteen years all but four months and a few days.*

The patriots standing near the scaffold dipped the heads of their pikes in the king's blood, and others pressed forward to dip their handkerchiefs, but not, as we are assured, "out of any royalist superstition." It was said, however, that Samson afterwards made a deal of money by selling to the royalists locks of the king's hair and fragments of his coat; but, as this was a very dangerous imputation, he denied the facts in a letter, which was printed in the 'Republican' newspaper. The roar of cannon announced to the captives in the Temple that the king—the husband, brother, father—was no more; and a little later in the day the mob paraded with their bloody pikes before the windows of the queen's prison, and sang, and shouted, and danced their infernal Carmagnole. The body of Louis was put into a large wicker basket, placed in the coach which had brought him to the scaffold, and carried to the cemetery of La Madeleine, the destined burying-place of all the victims of the guillotine. It was apprehended or expected that the people would seize the headless body to drag it through the streets of Paris, and to treat it as they had treated the bodies of Foulon, the Princess de Lamballe, and so many other persons; and they were applauded by the journalists because they offered no insult to the royal corpse, but magnanimously permitted it to be thrown, without coffin or shroud or any grave-clothes, into a deep grave, which was partly filled up with quick-lime. One poor man, who afterwards suffered a long imprisonment, and narrowly escaped the guillotine for this conduct, made a generous effort to obtain a more fitting burying-place for the hapless descendant of so many kings. This was Benoit Leduc, a tailor of Paris, who at one time had been tailor to Louis. As soon as the Convention met on this Monday morning he presented a petition, praying to be allowed, at his own expense, to bury

* In the different accounts of the execution of Louis there is considerable variety and contradiction as to some of the minor details, but they all agree in the capital fact that Louis displayed the greatest fortitude during his last awful moments. Samson, the headsman—or, as he styled himself, "the executor of criminal judgments"—had the best opportunity of all for judging of the king's behaviour on the scaffold, and Samson says:—"To render homage to truth, he certainly bore it all with a sing'froid and a firmness that astonished every one of us. I remain perfectly convinced that he derived this firmness from the principles of religion, with which no man could be more thoroughly imbued than he was."—See Esquisses Historiques, by Dulaure, who tells us that he had Samson's original letter in his possession. the body of the king by the side of his father, the dauphin, and under the monument which had been raised to that prince by the city of Sens; but the Convention rejected his petition, and ordered the executive council to see that Louis was buried like other criminals.

In the evening the republicans rejoiced, shook hands or embraced in the streets, and in all coffee-houses and places of entertainment, congratulating one another that, now the deed was done, their political millennium must begin; and on the following morning their newspapers sang pœans for the death of the tyrant. One of these pestilent journalists exclaimed, "What a glorious day for France! What a lesson for the universe! Louis Capet is no more. We have proved to the world that a king is but a mortal man. People of Europe, nations of the earth, look at your thrones, and see that they are but dust! Look at us Frenchmen, and imitate us! Oh, celebrated day! Oh, day for ever memorable!" Another exclaimed, "This was an example we owed to the world! We were bound to give this lesson in the person of the sixty-sixth of our kings, and the greatest villain of them all. The blood of Louis, shed by the sword of the law, will wipe out the disgrace of thirteen hundred years of slavery. It is only from the 21st of January that we are really republicans, and that we have the right to set ourselves forward as models to the neighbouring nations!" Marat in his journal said, "The same blow that cut off the head of the tyrant has upset for ever the foundations of monarchy. At last I begin to believe in the republic. How happy! During the execution there was not a single voice raised in favour of the man who, not long ago, ruled the destinies of France! The rest of the day was perfectly calm; the people seemed animated with a serene joy; one would have thought that they had been attending some religious fête. Delivered from the weight of oppression and penetrated with sentiments of fraternity, all men gave themselves up to the bright hopes of a happy future. The execution of Louis will have a prodigious effect on the fate of the crowned despots of Europe, and on the fortunes of the nations that have not yet risen to break their chains!" Robespierre, in his 'Letters to his Constituents,' which he printed in the shape of a newspaper from time to time, said, "This grand act of justice has thrown aristocracy into consternation, has annihilated the royalist superstition, and has created the republic. We may now defy Pitt and the arms and guineas of England, and the wrath of all the tyrants of Europe!" The Girondist journalists were not quite so jubilant, for they already dreaded the evil consequences that might follow to themselves personally. Brissot's journal, after giving a cold, formal, and most brief account of the execution, without venturing to express the slightest sympathy for the victim, or for his unhappy family, said, in a style truly characteristic of the cowardly, sneaking party, "Louis spoke of the calamities which would ensue after his death. Oh, fellow-citizens! Let your conduct prove that there is no more truth in that fatal prediction than there was in his protestations that he was innocent. Let us all be united together to save the republic. The representatives of the people sent Louis to the scaffold; let their decision be respected; share with them, oh! fellow-citizens, in the responsibility which they have taken entirely upon themselves! You who foresaw that the greatest danger must follow the execution of the tyrant, and you who thought there was no danger whatever in putting him to death, join your exertions, and act together to prevent the possibility of the calamities which you have foreseen, or which you have not expected." On the 23rd of January the Convention issued an address to the French people, glorying in the deed which had been done, and defying the hostilities with which they said they were threatened by England and by Spain. This address was written by Barrère, but it was signed by Vergniaud, who happened to be president, and by five other Girondists, who happened to be secretaries of the House. It contained the ordinary quantity of allusions to Roman history, and of outrage and insult to all established governments whatsoever.

The day that the death of Louis XVI. was made known in London, that immense city looked as if a great national calamity had happened. The news carried grief and consternation to other populous capitals, in many of which reigned the blood relations or the close connexions of the unfortunate monarch, who might command the outward signs of mourning, grand masses for the dead, and pompous funereal services; but in none of those cities was the sadness so universal and spontaneous, so much the uncontrolled and undisguised feeling of the mass of the people, of all classes and conditions of men, as in London. The general conviction had been that the Convention would stop short of death; and at first the report of the execution was scarcely credited; but a moment's incredulity, or stupor and bewilderment, gave way to indignation and horror; and, except in the case of some incurable political fanatics, the French people and their present rulers were execrated for the deed by every man, woman, and child in the three kingdoms. So vehement was this feeling that there rose a cry of War from every part of the island. Parliament had met on the preceding 13th of December, several weeks earlier than had been intended, the government having by royal proclamation called out the militia on the 1st of December. The speech from the throne was much longer than usual, and full of alarm—alarm at the spread of French principles, not only on the Continent, but at home. It attributed the calling out the militia to seditious practices which had already been discovered, and to a spirit of insubordination, tumult, and disorder which had manifested itself in various places. It declared that there was some fixed design against the constitution, and that this design was evidently pursued in connection and concert with persons residing in foreign countries. It declared that his majesty had observed the strictest neutrality in the present war on the Continent, and had uniformly abstained from any interference in the internal affairs of France; but that it was impossible for him to see without serious uneasiness the increasing indications which appeared there of an intention to excite insurrection in other countries, to disregard the rights of neutral nations, and to pursue schemes of conquest and aggrandisement. It mentioned the fate with which Holland was threatened by the French armies which had overrun the Netherlands; and it said that under all these circumstances his majesty had thought it right to adopt precautionary measures, and to make some augmentation of his naval and military force. Sir James Saunderson, lord-mayor of London, who moved the address in the Commons, affirmed that seditious practices were very prevalent, that there had been established within the city of London itself various political societies, corresponding and confederating with other societies in different parts of the united kingdoms; that these societies, who aimed at nothing less than subverting the constitution and destroying monarchy, were circulating with great activity, and free of all cost to the receivers, a vast number of pernicious pamphlets and publications, accommodated to the perusal of the meanest capacity. He referred to the situation of our ancient ally the States-General of the United Provinces as something that would justify and call for our armed interference in the affairs of the Continent, even if France ceased to agitate England by her secret agents and by the correspondence of her Jacobin clubs. The address was seconded by Mr. Wallace, who deplored the ill success of the Duke of Brunswick and the army of the Coalition. Lord Fielding not only approved of all that the government had done, in calling out the militia, in quartering troops round London, in doubling the guards at the Bank, &c., but also declared that, if ministers required any extraordinary powers at this alarming and critical period, he would gladly vote them. Fox, who was not yet disenchanted of his dream and idolatry of French liberty, and who perhaps had some reason to say that ministers were exaggerating the dangers to be apprehended from popular disaffection at home, made a brilliant speech, condemning every part of the address, and every sentiment that had been uttered in support of it. He declared it to be his firm opinion and belief that every fact asserted in the king's speech was false, that all its insinuations were unfounded, that no improper spirit existed, and that the alarm had only been raised by the artful designs and practices of ministers. He rejoiced in the triumph of men fighting for liberty over the invading armies of despots, and said that when there had been a probability of the triumph of the armies of Austria and Prussia over the liberties of France his spirits had drooped, and his heart desponded. He bitterly condemned the calling out of the militia; he taunted government for daring to assume a power or control over the minds and speculative opinions of men; and he said, not without some foundation, that the ultra-loyal and Tory clubs and societies had been going to as great extremes in one direction as the reforming societies could have gone in the other. He did not think that England was in a state to go to war—he did not think that anything which had occurred in France, or in Belgium, or in Savoy, or anywhere else, would justify us in going to war with the French republicans. He condemned ministers for not sending a new ambassador to treat with the present executive government of France. He praised the dissenters, who were said to be republicans and levellers; he praised the English constitution as being “the best adapted to England, because the people of England thought it best;” and in conclusion he moved an amendment to the address, the purport of which was that the House should enter into an immediate examination of the facts stated in the speech from the throne. Pitt was not there to answer him, for he had just accepted the profitable sinecure of Warden of the Cinque Ports, and was thus obliged to wait for the form of a re-election to the Commons. But the reply came with more force from the lips of Windham, who had figured for so many years as one of the leaders and most eloquent chiefs of the Whig opposition, and who had been linked in such close friendship and fellowship with Fox. This eloquent and elegant man had been scared by the horrors perpetrated in France, and had followed Burke, whose political pupil and friend he had ever considered himself. He declared—and this was at the least as true as Fox's asseveration that the danger was exaggerated—that, whatever might be the amount of real danger, the real alarm was exceedingly great, was felt in every town, village, and hamlet in the kingdom, was agitating every man who had a veneration for the institutions of the country, or had property to lose, or had a proper English aversion to anarchy and bloodshed. For himself he believed that the alarm was not greater than the real danger. He knew of his own knowledge, and all men must know, that there had been and still was a constant communication between persons in Paris and persons in London, the object of which was the destruction of our present form of government. The effect was already felt in an alarming degree; for in every town and village, and almost in every house, these worthy gentlemen had their agents, who regularly disseminated their pamphlets. These agents delivered these pamphlets gratis; a proof that there must be somewhere a society that defrayed the expense, for the agents themselves were poor men. The greatest pains had been taken with the poorer part of the community, to wean their affections from government, to make them dissatisfied with their lot, and eager to pull down and plunder all who were above them in fortune and station. It might not succeed here in the end, but this was the system which had made France a country of anarchists. Speculative opinions in politics and in religion had long been allowed in this country; and they might have continued to be freely published, but both the matter and the manner of publishing were entirely new. They were putting their seditious pamphlets into the hands of the labourer as books of instruction; they were giving innocent names to things that were intended to reverse suddenly and violently the order of society. Windham believed that the motives of the combined armies that had attempted to march to Paris and liberate Louis XVI. were good. The maxim that no country ought to intermeddle with the internal affairs of another might be true in a limited sense, but he could not admit it as an unvarying rule, as some countries might choose to set up principles that were subversive of the government and tranquillity of all their neighbours; and, even without stirring beyond their own frontiers, or openly intermeddling in the affairs of their neighbours, they might commit incalculable mischief, which would call for repression and suppression. But, he would ask, how had France observed the rule that no country ought to interfere with another? How had she abided by her decree that she abandoned for ever all ideas of foreign conquest? What had she done with Savoy? She had converted it into a department. She was now treating the little republic of Geneva still worse. Her decree that she would give liberty to all mankind was no better than an avowal of a design to disturb every power of Europe. They talked, indeed, of giving to the people of every country where their arms were victorious a free choice of the form of government; but did they ever wait to take the sense of the majority? Not they. When two or three Jacobins and republicans were gathered together, that was enough for them. The correspondence of the Jacobin Club of Manchester and the Jacobin Club of Paris might throw some light on their intentions towards this country. Windham concluded by repeating that the alarm was not fictitious, but real; and that ministers had acted right in calling out the militia and increasing the army and navy. No one doubted the perfect sincerity of Windham's conviction; and, as very few men in the country had so high a reputation as he, his speech made a deep and lasting impression upon some minds that were as yet wavering as to the expediency of preparing for an immediate war with France. Mr. Grey, who remained an unchanged Foxite, replied to Windham, and Dundas to him. Dundas declared that the utmost arts and industry had been used to circulate Paine's 'Rights of Man,' and other works of the same tendency, among the poorest and most ignorant of the people; and that the people had been told, over and over again, that it was time for them to assert their own rights, to confound all distinctions, to seize and divide property, and, in short, to follow the example which the French had set them. He said it was absurd to charge ministers with having excited an unnecessary alarm. That feeling was spontaneous; and the fact was that a universal and most serious alarm pervaded the country gentlemen, farmers, and others. This had rendered some active measures absolutely necessary on the part of government, in order to restore confidence. The National Convention had been eager to countenance every complaint of grievance from the factious and discontented in this country; and, in proof of this fact, Dundas read addresses which the Convention had received, with great applause, from several political societies in England. Was not this, on the part of the French, an unjustifiable interference in the internal affairs of another country? And had not leading members of the Convention repeatedly declared that they would look not to the sovereign, but to the people of Great Britain—that they would appeal from the government to the republicans of England? Some might pretend to shut their eyes to the truth, but he would never believe that the passion of the French for conquest and aggrandisement had been changed by the change of their government from a monarchy to a democracy, or that the slightest trust was to be put in their decrees, manifestos, and proclamations, to which they had already given the lie by their conduct in Belgium, in Savoy, and at Geneva. He referred to the treaties which bound us to assist Holland, intimating that these alone imposed the necessity of our arming and preparing for the worst. The French, since their conquests in the Low Countries and the capture of Antwerp, had declared that they would open the navigation of the Scheldt. This must be ruinous to the commerce of the United Provinces, and England was a guarantee that this should never be allowed. In conclusion, Dundas said that, under all the circumstances, government were fully justified in all they had done; and would have merited impeachment if they had remained inactive and passive at so critical a juncture. Sheridan, who remained with the Foxite Whigs, said, in his fluent, confident manner, that the alarm was ridiculous, and had been created by ministers themselves for the most selfish and wicked purposes; that the formidable band of republicans said to exist in England were men of buckram; and that certainly every hand and heart in the country would be united to resist any French army that might attempt to invade England with the idea of effecting any change in our government. On the other hand, he said he would vote for the impeachment of that English minister who should enter into a war with France for the purpose of re-establishing the old despotism of the Bourbons. He did not consider the language held by the French republicans towards Holland, or the opening of the Scheldt, as sufficient ground for a war; nor would he believe that the Dutch would apply to us for an armed interference, unless they were previously prompted to do it by our own ministers. Burke, who had seen many of his predictions already verified, and whose horror of the Gallic revolution was unbounded—

Burke, who believed that, if Fox had been suffered to succeed in his project for the amendment to the address, he would for ever have ruined this nation, along with the rest of Europe, rose and spoke with extraordinary warmth. Considerations of party, he said, and all minor considerations, must now give way: he came forward not as the defender of opposition or of ministry, but of the country. He believed the country to be in great danger; he knew that there was a faction in England who wished to submit to France, in order that our government might be reformed upon the French system; and he knew that the French corresponded with and encouraged this faction, and were preparing to aid them. The cabals and conspiracies, the practices and correspondences, of this French faction in England, were of public notoriety. Mr. Cooper and Mr. Watt had been deputed from Manchester to the Jacobins: these ambassadors had been received at Paris as British representatives. Other deputations of English had been received at the bar of the National Assembly: they had gone the length of giving supplies to the Jacobin armies, expecting in return military assistance in England. A regular correspondence for fraternising the two nations had been carried on by societies in London with the Jacobin societies in various parts of France. To prove the truth of these assertions, he read the addresses of the Englishmen and Irishmen resident at Paris; and of Joel Barlow and John Frost, deputies from the Constitutional Society of London to the National Convention. He declared that the question was not whether they should make an address to the throne, but whether they should have a throne at all. There would soon be no thrones or settled governments in Europe, if French arms and French principles were allowed to take their own course; and he recommended and prayed for unanimity and determination in England as the best means of stopping the progress of French arms. Mr. Erskine, who continued to be connected with Fox and to be a member of the Society for Parliamentary Reform, justified that society and himself, and blamed ministers for delaying to prosecute Thomas Paine, the author of 'The Rights of Man,' till a year and a half after the publication of the book. He then charged Burke with inconsistency, and concluded with recommending the House, instead of loading the English people with abuse and calumny, to meet their complaints, redress their grievances, and remove the grounds of their dissatisfaction by reforming parliament and granting them a fair representation. The attorney-general, Sir John Scott, the solicitor-general, Sir John Mitford, Mr. Anstruther, and others supported the address in all its parts, the attorney-general dwelling more particularly upon the different modes which had been adopted to work upon the minds of the poorer classes of society. The division, which did not take place till three hours after midnight, exhibited the numerical weakness of the Foxites: 290 members voted for the address and only 50 against it. The great majority of the Whigs, vexed at his imprudent conduct and alarmed at the tone held by men and societies which Fox frequented, had parted company with him for ever, and had followed the Duke of Portland and Burke. He, however, now gave notice that to-morrow he would move an amendment upon the report. And accordingly on the 14th of December, when the lord mayor brought up the report of the address, he proposed the addition of a clause requesting that the king would enter into negotiations with the present Jacobin government of France, or "that his majesty would employ every means of negotiation consistent with the honour and safety of this country to avert the calamities of war." In his speech Fox threw the whole blame of the horrid scenes which had occurred in France upon the Coalition, and eulogised the spirit and valour of the French republicans, who had taught the proudest men in this world that there was an energy in the cause of justice and freedom which nothing could defeat. "Thank God," said he, "Nature has been true to herself! Tyranny has been defeated, and those who fought for freedom are triumphant." He said that all the inhabitants of Europe sympathised with the French and wished them success, regarding them as men struggling with tyrants and despots. He could see no force in the objection raised by some men that France had actually no government to treat with. Surely that was a government which the people considered as such. Great Britain ought immediately to acknowledge that government and negotiate with it. He proceeded to contend that we could not go to war without the greatest hazard; that Ireland was disaffected, so that no man in his senses could expect any hearty support from that kingdom; that we could obtain no new allies on the Continent, and that our ally the King of Prussia could not be depended upon; and that no reliance whatever was to be placed on the emperor. Even the invasion of Holland by the French would give us but doubtful allies, inasmuch as the democrats there would be sure to join the French republicans, and the democratic party there was already nearly as strong as the party of the Stadtholder. In spite of the aristocracy and the clergy the people of Flanders and Brabant had received the French with open arms. It would be the same with their neighbours the Dutch, and it might be the same with the peoples of other countries. He represented the people of Scotland as being almost as disaffected as the Irish, and the truth, he said, was, that the people of Scotland had been treated with shameful indignity by that House, which had scandalously refused to hear their petitions for reform. Those acquainted with Scotland had affirmed that Mr. Paine's works had far greater influence there than in the southern parts of the island; that they were read by all descriptions of people, but particularly by the lower class. He paid high compliments to

Windham, "who to the soundest heart joined the clearest head;" but he complained that Burke, in the preceding debate, had scarcely treated him with civility. He said that Burke, who had accused him of using more invective than argument, had himself been obliged to descend to hell for similes and figures of speech with which to stigmatise the present rulers of the French nation. Among some exceptional characters he (Burke) had classed and reprobated M. Roland, a man eminent for many virtues! [The cant about this "eternally virtuous" individual had reached England, and Fox probably did not yet know to what a condition of discredit and insignificance Roland had by this time fallen in France, any more than he knew that these Girondist rulers with whom he would have negotiated were to be swept away in the course of a very few months by the "exceptionable characters" to whom he alluded as being the only bad men in this new republic.] He said that such invectives did not tend to conciliate France; that such gross insults and injuries could not be forgotten or forgiven by a spirited people like the French. He said that sooner or later we must acknowledge this French republic. Was not the republic of this country readily acknowledged at the time of Cromwell? Did not courts vie in their civilities to our commonwealth after the execution of Charles I.? Whatever difference of opinion might be entertained about it, that execution was certainly less unjust than that which he feared was about to be inflicted on the late unhappy monarch of France, but still he would hope a deed so foul would not be committed. His right honourable friend (Burke) had said yesterday that we could not receive an ambassador reeking with the blood of innocent men, and, perhaps, even of the king of France; but, if the French should even proceed to extremities against that unfortunate monarch, he (Fox) would consider it as an act that would be an eternal disgrace to the nation, but still he could not think that we were, therefore, never to have any connection with France. If ministers' objection to receive an ambassador at present was that they did not know how to introduce a French republican minister into the king's drawing-room, he wished they would fairly confess it, to the end that the English people might see that their blood and treasure were to be sacrificed for a mere punctilio! [Many persons were hurt at this sarcasm, and none more than George III., who is said to have treasured it in his memory, and to have frequently repeated afterwards that Mr. Fox would have presented to him Marat or Robespierre, or Samson the headsman.] He bestowed some pathos upon the unhappy prisoners of the Temple; but he soon passed from their sufferings to dwell more tenderly upon those of that "brave but unfortunate gentleman" Lafayette, whom the despots had locked up like a felon because he had always been a friend to liberty. Sheridan seconded the amendment, as being calculated to rescue the country from a war with France. Burke again rose to declare that he saw a spirit at work that would leave England no option between war and peace. Considering it as admitted that France must not be permitted to open the navigation of the Scheldt, and that she must be induced by negotiation or compelled by arms to restore the conquests she had made, he thought it a very extraordinary way of effecting either purpose to represent our internal situation as rotten, and all our allies as powers not to be depended upon. He would not believe that our internal condition was so bad, although our constitution was certainly assailed by men who might do much mischief if not stopped in time. If the fidelity of our allies was not to be relied on now, what could we expect from them if we acknowledged and entered into negotiations with the new republic of France, the fiercest enemies of those allies and of all crowned heads? Would Mr. Fox make a choice of friendships and enmities, and renounce all former alliances with established governments to contract a close alliance with a country that had no government at all—with an anarchy? And were we sure that the French republicans, even if courted, would come to any reasonable terms with us? Yet this was the contingency for which we were to renounce our present allies, the ancient and established governments of Europe. The French republic had not yet been recognised by any power whatever. And what was the peculiar time when England was to be the first to recognise it, and to send over an ambassador to Paris? Why, it was the very moment, perhaps, when the merciless savages had their hands red with the blood of a murdered sovereign! To follow the course proposed would look like giving a sanction to a bloody act, like giving currency to regicide, and affording a preliminary to the murder of our own sovereign. He shattered at a blow the argument that Fox had drawn from the conduct of Europe towards Cromwell and the English commonwealth. The French republic, he said, was sui generis, and bore no analogy to any other republic or system of government that had ever existed in the known world. The English commonwealth did not attempt to turn all the states of Christendom into republics: it did not wage war with kings merely because they were not democrats; it professed no principles of proselytism. The same might be said of the republic of the United States of America. But France wanted to make all the world proselytes to her opinions and dogmas—France was for turning every government in the world into a democratic republic. If every government was against her, it was because she had declared herself hostile to every government. This strange republic might be compared to the system of Mahomet, who, with a Koran in one hand and a sword in the other, compelled men to adopt his creed. The Koran which France held out was the Declaration of the Rights of Man and universal fraternity, and with the sword she was determined to propagate her doctrine, and conquer those whom she could not convince. He did not wish to hurry the nation into a war; he wished only to make the people of England see that France had really declared war against them, and that the two countries might be considered as actually engaged in hostilities. The French Assembly and Convention had passed a variety of decrees, every one of which might fairly be considered as a declaration of war against every government in Europe. France had resolved to wage an eternal war against kings and all kinds of kingly government. She had received at the bar of the Convention Englishmen, whom, in contempt of the king and parliament, she professed to consider as the representatives of the people of England. Between the two nations there was at this moment a moral war, which must soon become an actual war. Mr. Yorke spoke of Fox and his opposition in terms of severe invective: he allowed them eloquence and talent, but denied that they possessed patriotism, moderation, or candour. Dundas repeated that there was every reason to apprehend that the French army, under Dumouriez, meditated an attack on Holland. England must, therefore, either abide by her treaties or abandon them. If she abandoned them, she would lose at once the respect hitherto paid to her high character, and be no longer considered by any other nation as worthy of confidence. Other men might rejoice in representing the state of their country to be degraded, weak, and helpless; but he could find more pleasure in believing that England was still high in spirit, and great and powerful, abounding in resources which, if she should be forced into a war, would enable her to bring it to an honourable termination. Mr. Powys, an hereditary Whig, and one who had long and steadily voted on the same side as Fox, now declared that gentleman's political intentions to be peculiarly baneful to his country, and his present amendment only proper to alienate the people of England from their government. Negotiation appeared to him to be impracticable. He asked to whom could we send an ambassador? Who could be sure that the men who had proscribed our king and invited his people to take up arms against him, would receive an ambassador sent by him? The faith of treaties and the duty of securing our internal peace justified the address and the whole conduct of ministers. If he could have his wish, he would draw a cordon round France to prevent the spreading of her infection. Wilberforce, though deprecating war—if war could possibly be avoided consistently with justice—concurred with the speech from the throne and the proposed address; and Fox's amendment was rejected without a division.

On the very next day—December the 15th, which was a Saturday, a day when Parliament did not usually sit—Fox came forward with a third proposition, moving, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, that his majesty will be graciously pleased to give direction that a minister may be sent to Paris to treat with those persons who exercise provisionally the functions of executive government in France, touching such points as may be in discussion between his majesty and his allies and the French nation." He said he knew how little anything he could say on this subject would be attended to by the House. He was, besides, indisposed, and so hoarse that it was physically impossible for him to speak above a few minutes. "By his motion he did not mean to imply any approbation of the conduct of the existing French government, or of the proceedings that had led to the present state of things in France. His object was simply to declare and record his opinion, that it was the true policy of every nation to treat with the existing government of every other nation with which it had relative interests, without inquiring or regarding how that government was constituted, or by what means those who exercised it came into power. This was not only the policy, but frequently the practice. If we objected to the existing form of government in France, we had as strong objections to the form of government at Algiers; yet at Algiers we had a consul. If we abhorred the crimes committed in France, we equally abhorred the crimes committed in Morocco; yet to the court of Morocco we had sent a consul almost immediately after the commission of crimes at which humanity shuddered. By these acts we were neither supposed to approve of the form of government at Algiers, nor of the crimes committed in Morocco. From his motion, therefore, no opinion was to be implied, but the opinion he had stated. It would have been better if what he proposed had been done sooner, and there were circumstances that made it less proper now than at an earlier period. But this was not imputable to him. The earliest period was now the best; and this was the earliest opportunity that the meeting of parliament afforded him. It would have been still better if our minister had not been recalled from Paris, but had continued there, as the ministers of some other courts had done." Mr. Grey seconded the motion, declaring that an immediate embassy to Paris was the only means of averting the greatest of calamities, the most dangerous war that England had ever undertaken. Lord Sheffield, the friend of Gibbon the historian, reprobated the object of the motion, and declared he was almost ashamed of his former enthusiasm for Fox. He thought that the surest way of avoiding war would be by making vigorous preparations for it; and he affirmed that the disturbers of the world, when they had overrun other nations, would not fail to fall upon us with double force. Some gentlemen expressed a hope that Fox might be prevailed upon to withdraw his motion; some said that that motion was a palpable encroachment on the royal prerogative; and some bitterly censured him for his conduct during the last three days. Fox, however, pursued his object with so much heat and perseverance as to cause the House to sit into Sunday morning; a thing not known in parliament for many years.* Mr.

Jenkinson (afterwards Earl of Liverpool) was of opinion that the motion did encroach on the prerogative, and was otherwise improper and dangerous. He believed that there were disaffected persons in the country whose activity made them dangerous; but he thought that war, instead of increasing their power of mischief, would greatly lessen it. The French knew that we were engaged by every tie of national faith to protect Holland, and their insolent threats to that state must be considered as an intentional insult to England, which could not be overlooked without incurring the imputation of a cowardly and base submission. The king of Sardinia had endeavoured to negotiate and conciliate the French, and what had he gained by it? Ministers were blamed for not having taken the same course—for not having some months ago treated with the French; but for many months there had been nothing in France with which they could treat. And now, when persons and things were every day changing, when all rule belonged to a mob of robbers and assassins, where could we apply? What government could we acknowledge where there was actually no government? How could England recognise a constitution which the French themselves were every day violating? How could we negotiate with men who had declared a universal war to all governments? “On this very day,” he exclaimed, “while we are here debating about sending an ambassador to the French republic; on this very day is the king to receive sentence, and, in all probability, it is the day of his murder! What is it, then, that gentlemen would propose to their sovereign? To bow his neck to a band of sanguinary ruffians, and address an ambassador to a set of murderous regicides, whose hands are still reeking with the blood of a slaughtered monarch? No, Sir, the British character is too noble to run a race for infamy; nor shall we be the first to compliment a set of monsters, who, while we are agitating the subject, are probably bearing through the streets of Paris—horrid spectacle!—the bloody victim of their fury.” The Master of the Rolls thought that Fox himself ought to be sent on this embassy. Perhaps he might be as well received as Frost and Joel Barlow; perhaps not. The French rulers might say to him, “Do you come from the king of Great Britain? If you do, you can have no business here, as we have sworn eternal enmity to all kings; you had, therefore, better be gone!” Mr. Windham contended that not only experience, but higher principles and the dictates of humanity forbade any present recognition of the French republic. If Great Britain gave that recognition, which had been given by no other power, what would be the consequences? Some of those consequences would be the alienation of all those powers with whom she was at present allied, and a universal discouragement on the Continent; for, by giving the whole weight of her character to France, she would place all the rest of Europe in a situation truly deplorable,—she would arm every subject of every kingdom against the powers that governed that kingdom,—she would recommend and facilitate the imitation of what had been done, or was still doing, by the sans-culottes of Paris; and all this could not be otherwise than fatal to the future interests of the world. Mr. Grant, who had studied the law of nations, and who was well read in what the French now styled “the worm-eaten writings of Grotius, Puffendorf, and Vattel,”* replied to some gentlemen who chose to think that the forcible opening of the navigation of the Scheldt was not of sufficient importance to justify any loud complaint on the part of the Dutch. Not only the trade, but also the internal security and independence of Holland depended upon that river. All the celebrated writers on the law of nations had laid it down as a clear and indubitable principle that rivers belonged to those who inhabited their banks, just as far and no farther than those banks extended. If the banks belonged to different peoples or nations, then the dominion over the river was divided, each people possessing the part of the river that was contiguous to their domain; and such was the policy of this distribution, that, if it had not been laid down by the law of nature, it would have been a positive stipulation under the law of nations, for without it no state traversed by rivers could be secure. If, as the French were now contending, the course of rivers was as open and common to all mankind as the sea itself, a fleet of French or Spaniards might sail up the Thames, and we should have no right to molest them until they actually began hostilities. The mouth of the Scheldt being between the banks of Holland, gave the Dutch, under the law of nature and nations, an incontrovertible right to the possession of that river as far as their banks extended; and this right, moreover, had been repeatedly acknowledged and ratified by express treaty. The emperor Joseph, although he had attempted to open the navigation of the Scheldt for the benefit of his subjects in the Netherlands, who possessed the upper banks of the river, had been obliged to forego his purpose. France had no direct interest in the question—at least, the French pretended, in their own declaration, that they had not conquered the Netherlands, but had only restored the sovereignty of that country to the inhabitants of it. The Belgians might want^o to have the free navigation of the river from their own country, through Holland, to its mouth; but what had the French to do with this question? Were we to permit them to arrogate to themselves the empirage of all the disputes in Europe? The restless, meddling disposition of that country, which an honourable gentleman had declared was so long the scourge of mankind under the old despotism of its kings, seemed now no less disposed to pursue the same course under the still more wild and unlimited despotism of the people. The French had already seized some territory belonging to Holland, or had threatened to seize it instantly; and yet some gentlemen could suggest that the Dutch government, instead of preparing to fight, ought to have sent an ambassador to Paris. If France, by force or surprise, had seized on Portsmouth, or any other of our harbours, or had declared its intention of doing so, would Englishmen condescend to send an ambassador to negotiate? They had declared publicly their intention of invading the rights of our allies; and those rights, so long as faith and honour remained in England, were the rights of Englishmen. The French had admitted the subsisting treaties, but denied their force upon grounds on which all treaties and compacts must fall. If Holland or England were to attempt to treat, they should send to them not a statesman, but a professor of casuistry; for nothing remained for inquiry but an abstract and metaphysical question on the moral competence of contracts. But was it to be allowed that the first principle of morals should be controverted, and the community of nations turned into a school of metaphysical sceptics? If we settled the dispute with the present executive government of France, their successors, armed with their natural imprescriptible Rights of Man, would, by the very same reasons, deny their right to settle it. There was nothing that could be obtained, short of a total abandonment of their project, but what the metaphysical wand of those logicians would destroy as by magic. They would tell you that it was impossible to bind by treaty the Rights of Man; that right is paramount to treaty; that the executive with whom you negotiated had exceeded their power, had betrayed their constituents, and that therefore the contract and treaty with you must be void. Sir William Young said that, if we wanted to facilitate the importation of plots and treasons, we would do well to open and prolong a negotiation with the present French executive; and he declared (what was perfectly certain) that, if we proposed preliminaries, we should be looked upon as trembling cowards, we should earn contempt and infamy, and be attacked all the same. Burke, who this evening for the first time took his seat on the Treasury bench, again spoke with the most impassioned eloquence. Kings, said he, are anointed with oil—the new sovereignty of the people, with blood! The massacres of September, at which all Europe revolted, heightened this striking likeness; and none but the murderers themselves could help deploring those horrible barbarities, which exceeded all ancient and modern crime. He declared his solemn conviction that a war with France was rendered necessary for the security of the liberties of England, the interests of Europe, and the happiness of mankind. He drew a ludicrous picture of the figure an ambassador from the king of Great Britain would make at the bar of the National Convention. His credentials would state that he was commissioned by “George III., by the grace of God,” &c. At the reading of these words, how would that pious assembly be convulsed with laughter! The president, Robespierre or Marat, or some other sworn enemy to kings, would surely not be able to keep his indignation within bounds. On the one side, citizen Frost would inflame the resentment of the House; and on the other citizen Paine would proceed to denounce us! Dundas gave a good answer to those who urged that the English ambassador ought not to have been recalled from Paris, as he had been, after the 10th of August. As for the motion now before the House, he was willing to put it upon this issue:—“If, under the former government of France, while we had an ambassador in France, and France an ambassador here, the French government had received persons from this country complaining of the constitution, and proposing an alliance to subvert it, and given a favourable answer to such persons, what would have been the duty of his Majesty’s ministers? Would it not have been to recall our ambassador, and order the French ambassador to quit this country? How could we now send an ambassador to France, when the present French government had openly and vauntingly pursued the same conduct?” Fox said a few words in reply to Dundas, or rather to Burke. He said he had done his duty in submitting his ideas to the House; and in doing this, he could not possibly have had any other motive than that of public duty. He was not courting the favour of ministers, or of those by whom ministers were supposed to be favoured; he was not gratifying his friends, as the debates in the House had shown; he was not courting popularity, for now popularity was to be gained only by the very opposite course; but the misled people might even treat his house as they had done that of Dr. Priestley. All that he wanted was that they might know the real cause of the war into which they were likely to be plunged; that they might know it depended on a matter of mere form and ceremony. Fox was supported by Mr. Grey, Francis, Erskine, Whitbread, Sheridan, and two or three others; but, after a long debate, his motion was negatived without a division. Burke, writing upon the subject a few months after, thanks heaven for this rejection of a measure which he believed to be full of peril. If it had succeeded, he says—“At home, all the Jacobin societies, formed for the utter destruction of our constitution, would have lifted up their heads, which had been beaten down by the two proclamations. Those societies would have been infinitely strengthened and multiplied in every quarter; their dangerous foreign communications would have been left broad and open; the crown would not have been authorised to take any measure whatever for our immediate defence, by sea or land. The closest, the most natural, the nearest, and, at the same time, from many internal as well as external circumstances, the weakest of our allies, Holland, would have been given up, bound hand and foot, to France, just on the point of invading that republic. A general consternation would have seized upon all Europe; and all alliance with every other power, except France, would have been for ever rendered impracticable to us. I think it is impossible for any man, who regards the dignity and safety of his country, or indeed the common safety of mankind, ever to forget Mr. Fox's proceedings in that tremendous crisis of all human affairs."* On this very same day, on which Fox made his motion for sending an ambassador to France, the National Convention had published a decree in which they declared that the French people would treat as enemies all other peoples or nations who, refusing or renouncing liberty and equality, should be desirous of preserving their king or prince, and their privileged castes, or of entering into an accommodation with them; that the French promised and engaged not to lay down their arms until the liberty and the sovereignty of the people, on whose territories the French armies had entered, or might hereafter enter, should be established; and that they would never consent to any treaty or arrangement with king, princes, aristocracies, or privileged classes of any kind.

On the following Monday, the 17th of December, Fox pursued the same line of conduct. Mr. Grey complained that the loyalists and high churchmen had been committing riots in various towns, and particularly in Manchester, where the house of a Mr. Walker, a most respectable manufacturer and merchant, had been attacked. This Manchester riot, he said, had risen out of a loyal meeting held in the town. An honourable gentleman, Mr. Peel (the father of the present Sir Robert), whom he saw in his place, was reported to have been present at that meeting, and to have said in his address to it, that it was time for the people to rouse from their lethargy, as there were incendiaries in the country. If Mr. Peel had really used those words, he called upon him to name the incendiaries. Mr. Grey next called the attention of the House to a paper issued by the Association against republicans and levellers, established at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in London. This paper was entitled, 'One Pennyworth of Truth from Thomas Bull to his Brother John,' and contained, Mr. Grey said, some most unfounded and libellous invectives against the dissenters, whom it charged with having been the authors of the American war. [The simple truth was, that this loyal association, and others of the same kind, were weary and impatient of seeing the popular press in a great measure monopolised by the revolutionary or reforming party, and were now retaliating with the same sort of fury and exaggeration as had animated their adversaries.] Mr. Grey stated that Mr. Paine's 'Rights of Man' had not produced a single riot; but that this 'Pennyworth of Truth,' by exciting the people against the dissenters, seemed calculated to produce effects the most alarming. His motion was, that the said libellous paper should be delivered in at the table and read. Mr. Peel begged to observe that there was no truth in any part of the newspaper

paragraph to which Mr. Grey had alluded, except that part of it which stated that 'God save the King' had been sung at the Manchester meeting. He read the resolutions of the committee of that Manchester society against republicans and levellers, and showed that they were calculated to dissuade the populace from insurrection. The motion was strongly opposed by Dundas, Windham, the Master of the Rolls, and others. Mr. Gregor said that Fox himself had promulgated dangerous opinions, and that, if he chose, he would point them out. Fox said that he was quite ready to meet this discussion if the House chose to appoint a time for examining his opinions. There were, he said, certain forms and phrases which every gentleman who now rose to speak was required to repeat; all these, whether "Church and State," or "God save the King," or anything else, he begged to be understood as having said or sung. There were other forms and phrases not so acceptable. But, as those who had read Italian operas might recollect to have seen prefixed an advertisement by the author, that when he introduced the names of the heathen gods and goddesses he meant nothing against the holy Catholic religion, so he must advertise the House, that, when he made use of the words "liberty," "equality," he used them only in the true sense of the British constitution, and not as understood, or supposed to be understood, in any other country whatever. He implored the House to be equal and impartial; for it was not for the dignity of the House or of the government to prosecute seditious publications on one side and pass by those on the other. He had always advised never to connect riots and insurrections with seditious writings, but to repress and punish the criminal acts. He maintained that libels against the constitution, like Paine's 'Rights of Man,' had not led to rioting, whereas the libels against the dissenters had provoked great riotings in several places, and this rioting had not been punished. He severely criticised the loyal associations and subscriptions which were in progress to aid in the prosecution of disaffected persons. These associations, he said, were made an instrument of tyranny over men's minds, almost as bad as the clubs in France, that went about, as often as they thought fit, requiring men to renew their civic oath on pain of proscription for incivism. Papers were handed about in London and the country for signatures, and the names of those who signed and of those who did not were taken down, with the mark of incivism fixed on the latter. He treated the associations for prosecuting libels against the constitution, or order, morals, and religion, as tending to hinder the improvement of the human mind, and as a mobbish tyranny. He compared them with Lord George Gordon's mob, declaring that he had advised his friends in Westminster to sign the said associations whether they agreed with them or not, in order that they might avoid destruction to their persons or their houses, or a desertion of their shops. "This insidious advice," says Burke, "tended to confound those who wished well to the object of the association with the seditious, against whom the association was directed. By this stratagem the confederacy intended for preserving the British constitution and the public peace would be wholly defeated. The magistrates, utterly incapable of distinguishing the friends from the enemies of order, would in vain look for support when they stood in the greatest need of it."* Dundas took the same view of Fox's advice, and told him that men who signed papers of which they disapproved might soon learn to swear what they did not believe, and the signatures of traitors might thus appear among those of good citizens. Fox said he kept no such company as the right honourable secretary talked of; he conversed with no men who would refuse to aid the civil magistrate; and he had no advice to give to traitors except to become good subjects. He complained of inflammatory handbills circulated to call meetings of the friends of the constitution, and mentioned one which concluded with the words, "Destruction to Fox and all his Jacobin crew." This might be intended to cause his house to be treated like Mr. Walker's or Dr. Priestley's. He was, however, not much afraid, for, although he had been often made unpopular where he was not personally known, he had the good fortune never to have been unpopular in his own neighbourhood. Mr. Grey's motion was negatived without a division. The very morning after these declamations in the House of Commons against the loyal associations, Fox went down to a meeting of St. George's parish, and there signed an association of the nature and tendency of those he had the night before so vehemently condemned; and several of his most intimate friends attended the meeting and signed along with him. Immediately after this extraordinary step a society was formed under Fox's auspices, called "The Friends of the Liberty of the Press." This society, according to Burke, was only a modification of the society calling itself "The Friends of the People;" being composed of many, if not most, of the members of that club, with the addition of a great many other individuals, such as Mr. Horne Tooke, "of the worst and most seditious dispositions that could be found in the whole kingdom." "In the first meeting of this club," continues Burke, "Mr. Erskine took the lead, and directly (without any disavowal ever since on Mr. Fox's part) made use of his name and authority in favour of its formation and purposes. In the same meeting Mr. Erskine had thanks for his defence of Paine, which amounted to a complete avowal of that Jacobin incendiary, else it is impossible to know how Mr. Erskine should have derived such marked applauses for acting merely as a lawyer for his fee, in the ordinary course of his profession."†

cial towns were swarming with Frenchmen. Many of these were priests or noblemen who had fled for their lives; the vast majority of them were decided royalists, without a hope on earth save that of overthrowing the Jacobin system; but mixed among them were individuals who wore the garb of loyalty in order to serve the republicans, who were nothing else than spies and secret agents; while others there were who made an open profession of atheism and sans-culottism in all its branches, and who, protected by the large liberality of the English law, were using all their efforts to seduce the people. The success of these men was not likely to be very great, but they excited a panic and an outcry, and it was assuredly the duty of government to adopt some measures calculated to clear the country of the nuisance. Our laws were not made for foreigners, and least of all for foreigners that were trying to subvert them. On the 19th of December Lord Grenville brought forward a bill in the House of Lords for subjecting aliens to certain regulations. The bill proposed in the first instance to make all foreigners arriving in the kingdom give an account of themselves, and surrender such arms as they might have in their possession—to oblige them in their several removals through the country to use passports, by which their actual residence or occasional movements might be known—to distribute those emigrants who received allowances from the British government, and who had no other means of subsistence, into certain districts where they could be more under the cognizance of the civil power—and to pay particular attention to such foreigners as had come within the present year, or as might afterwards arrive without obvious reasons. As it had always been a part of the royal prerogative to send foreigners out of the kingdom, this alien bill merely re-affirmed that right. Although opposed by the Duke of Norfolk, the Marquess of Lansdowne, Lord Guildford, and Lord Lauderdale, the bill was carried through the three readings in the House of Lords without a division. On the order of the day for the second reading, the Marquess of Lansdowne moved that government should enter into an immediate negotiation with France, for two important objects: 1. To propose to the ruling powers in that country either to receive back that vast number of people they had driven into banishment, or to contribute to their means of support; 2. To save the unfortunate Louis XVI. from the horrible fate which appeared to menace him. The Lords negatived both propositions as hopeless and useless; and the Commons pursued the same course with respect to some suggestions of the same sort which were offered by Sheridan and Fox, who both expressed their detestation of French cruelty. Pitt said that a vote passed on the subject of the unfortunate King of France, and framed in those indignant terms which became the House, might, in the present furious temper of the French people, only serve to disguise the atrocity of their conduct, and hurry them on to the commission of that very crime which the House so warmly desired to prevent. We may add, that, in whatever terms the vote and overture had been made, they would have hastened both the execution of Louis and the declaration of war against England. When the Alien bill was brought down to the Commons, Fox and his diminished party opposed it with all their might, describing it as a measure contrary to the existing treaties between Great Britain and France; as a violation of the law of nations; and as an outrage on Magna Charta itself. On the second reading of the bill there was a memorable debate. Dundas observed that so very great and extraordinary an influx of foreigners into this country must at any time have called for the attention of government; but that at a time and under circumstances like the present, such an immigration from a country which had been the scene of the most convulsive proceedings and the most dreadful enormities made the necessity of adopting some particular measure still more imperative and urgent. In these transactions a vast number of the French people had taken a direct and an active part. The principles which guided the French revolution were not confined to France; they were spread, or attempts were making to spread them, over the whole of Europe: there were Jacobin emissaries in Italy, in Spain, in Holland, in Germany—there was a systematized proselytism at work. The matter became the more serious as there had been found even in England men so infatuated as to adopt these principles, and to send over addresses to the executive government and the clubs of France. Everybody, he said, knew that among the hapless emigrants who had come hither for refuge there were many who had been engaged in deeds of outrage and cruelty at Paris—in some of the worst deeds of the revolution. Burke, who says in his letter to the Duke of Portland that this Alien bill was “feeble and lax, and far short of the vigour required by the conjuncture,” supported ministers even more strenuously than Fox opposed them. It was in his speech on this occasion that he had recourse to that stroke of oratorical acting which has been so often commented upon. In alluding to the fact that three thousand daggers had been ordered and manufactured at Birmingham, he drew a concealed dagger from his bosom and threw it down upon the floor of the House, exclaiming, “This is what you are to gain by an alliance with the French! Wherever their principles are introduced, their practice must follow. You must equally proscribe their tenets and their persons! You must keep their principles from our minds, and their daggers from our hearts!” On the motion for the third reading, Fox undertook to prove that the anxiety about a few French republicans in England was as ridiculous as all the rest of the alarm; that no Alien-act could guard against the introduction of opinions; and that if dangerous principles were propagated in the country they must be propagated by English agents, who would remain if every foreigner was sent out of the kingdom. He wished that all the Frenchmen who had been concerned in the detestable massacres of September should be expelled; but he thought that the horrors of those days ought not to be mentioned as the act either of the French government or the French people, for both disclaimed it. To disclaim, indeed, was not enough. That the crime was not prevented or followed up by punishment would be an indelible disgrace to Paris and to France. But were we to go to war on account of these inhuman murders? No war could be rational that had not some object which, being obtained, made way for peace. He believed that the prerogative of the crown to send foreigners out of the kingdom did not exist, and, if it did, that it was too dangerous to be allowed to remain. Fox was answered at great length by Pitt; and after a warm debate the bill was read a third time and passed. Another bill to prevent the circulation in England of French assignats, bonds, promissory notes, &c., was carried through both Houses with scarcely any opposition; as was also another bill to enable his majesty to restrain the exportation of naval stores, saltpetre, arms, and ammunition.

On the 30th of January, 1793, Dundas presented to the House of Commons a royal message alluding to the execution of Louis XVI., and stating that orders had been given to lay before the House copies of several papers which had been received from M. Chauvelin, late minister plenipotentiary from the most Christian king, and of the answers which had been returned thereto; as likewise a copy of an order to quit the kingdom made by his majesty in council, and transmitted to the said M. Chauvelin, in consequence of the accounts received of the atrocious act recently perpetrated at Paris. The message, moreover, stated that his majesty thought it indispensably necessary to make a further augmentation of his forces by sea and land. The House took this message into consideration on the 2nd of February, when Pitt recited all the aggravations which England, in common with her allies, had received from France, and maintained that, however anxious we might be for peace, the French would not allow us to enjoy that blessing. He dwelt with great eloquence upon the murder of the French king, a crime which had excited but one general sentiment of indignation and abhorrence. He stated that the British government, having adopted from the beginning a system of neutrality, had religiously adhered to that system; that they had declined taking any part in the internal affairs of France, and had made a positive declaration to that effect. In return for this declaration the French had entered into a positive contract to abstain from any of those acts by which they had since provoked the indignation of this country. In a paper which was now on the table they disclaimed all views of conquest and aggrandisement; they had given assurances of friendship to all neutral nations; they had protested that they entertained no idea of interfering with the government of other countries, or making any attempts to excite insurrection, as they held any such interference and any such attempts to be a violation of the law of nations. During the whole preceding summer, when France had been engaged in the war with Austria and Prussia, the King of Great Britain had in no shape departed from the neutrality which he had engaged to observe. But what had been the conduct of the French? The first instance of their success in Savoy had been quite sufficient to unfold the plan of their ambition. They had immediately annexed Savoy to their own dominions; and had displayed a resolution to do the same wherever they could carry their arms. They had rendered the Netherlands a province, in substance as well as name, entirely dependent on France. Their system, aided by the Jacobin societies and their correspondence in foreign countries, had given a more fatal blow to the independence of nations than any which had ever been inflicted by the most ambitious king. On the 27th of December their ambassador here had complained of the injurious construction which we had put upon the decree of the 19th of November, wherein they promised fraternity and assistance to all nations that would revolt against their governments. Yet on the 31st of December their minister of the marine had addressed a letter to all the friends of liberty in the seaports of France, in which was the following passage:—"The king and his parliament mean to make war against us. Will the English republicans suffer it? Already these free men show their discontent, and the repugnance they have to bear arms against their brothers the French. Well! we will fly to their succour—we will make a descent on the island—we will lodge there fifty thousand caps of liberty—we will plant there the sacred tree—we will stretch out our arms to our republican brethren, and the tyranny of their government shall soon be destroyed." Pitt declared his conviction that war was preferable to a peace which could be consistent neither with the internal tranquillity nor external safety of England; and he moved an address to his majesty to that effect. Lord Beauchamp seconded the motion. Windham in a long and earnest speech contended that we must go to war for the security of this country; that never had a war been undertaken with a more specific or more important object; that in his opinion this war was inevitable; that the French were actuated by as great a spirit of conquest as they had ever shown; that their success would be destructive of all order, morality, and religion; that this indeed would be a war pro aris et focis. Fox and a few of his friends spoke on the other side, still insisting that war was not necessary and might be avoided; but Pitt's motion was carried without a division. An address to the same effect was voted by the Lords, where the ministerial party had been strengthened by the accession of Lord Loughborough, who on the 26th of January obtained the great seal, which he had so often endeavoured to snatch from Thurlow.

On the 11th of February Dundas presented a royal message acquainting the House that the National Convention had declared war against the King of Great Britain and the Stadtholder of Holland on the 1st of February. This message was taken into consideration on the next day, when Pitt entered into a detailed statement of our dealings with France, and of our endeavours to remain neutral so long as neutrality seemed honourable and possible. His motion for the address in answer to his majesty's message was seconded by Mr. Powys, who spoke the opinion of the vast majority of parliament and people when he said that, under present circumstances, war with France was far preferable to peace with her. If it were asked, he said, what we should get by going to war, he would answer, we should get just what we should lose by not going to war. There might be men who asserted that the constitution of this country had not been in danger; but it was his honest opinion that it had recently been in great danger; and, for his part, he less feared the arrows that fly by day than the pestilence that walketh by night. Fox said that, if there was any necessity of going to war with France, that necessity must have been made by the unwise, arrogant, and provoking conduct of our ministers; and he concluded a long speech by moving an amendment, promising an effectual support to his majesty in repelling every hostile attempt upon this country, and in such other exertions as might be necessary to induce France to consent to such terms of pacification as should be consistent with the honour of his majesty's crown, the security of his allies, and the interests of his people. Dundas ably defended the conduct of ministers, and threw some more light on the spirit of France, on her sans-culottic anarchy, and her ravenous ambition, which equally contributed to render a peace with her impracticable. He did not deny that this, to a great extent, was to be a war of principles; for he said that Great Britain entered into the war to secure her best interests, by opposing a system of principles which, if not checked, must end in the destruction of this and of every other country. Burke, in a vehement speech, taxed Fox with using in the English House of Commons language exceedingly like to that used in the National Convention by M. Brissot. Fox had said, or had seemed to say, that it was only against absolute monarchies that the French had declared eternal war; but Burke showed—what scarcely required any showing—that they were as furious against the free constitutional monarchy of England as against absolutism. This new-created empire of theirs was intended to shake all surrounding governments. Their minister, Cambon, had declared that the limits of their empire should be those that nature had set to them—the sea on one side, and the Alps and the Rhine on the other, together with a large cut of the Apennines—and all this was said to be for the benefit of mankind and of liberty and equality, as the subjects of other governments situated within those wide limits were to be duped and flattered into insurrection. They had directed their invectives and reproaches at England more than at any other country. They had executed their unhappy, innocent monarch, not as an example to France, not to extinguish the royal race there, but, as they themselves alleged, as a warning to all other kings and an example to all other nations. Only a few hours after the execution of Louis, their minister of justice, Garat, had said to the Convention, "We have now thrown the gauntlet to tyrants, which gauntlet is the head of a tyrant." They intended the murder of their king only as a step to the murders of the other kings of Europe, for they had declared that no monarchical country could have alliance with them; and this too at the very moment when they were pretending to conciliate England and to explain away the decree of the 19th of November. Neither the sovereign nor the people of any other country had any doubt as to their intentions, or as to the meaning of their public decrees and their secret machinations. But if Burke held the war with France to be inevitable, and on our part a sacred duty, he did not disguise the dangers and difficulties of the struggle: instead of believing, with the unreflecting or over sanguine majority of the nation, that the odds would be on the side of England and her allies, he showed that the odds would be on the side of France; and, if his warning voice had been attended to, the war would have been conducted in a very different manner from that in which it was unfortunately carried on. The French, he said, having abandoned arts, industry, religion, law, order, everything but the sword, having armed the entire population, must prove most formidable and dreadful to all nations composed of quiet citizens who only used a given number of soldiers as a defence. All France had, in fact, become one vast camp, from which armies might be poured in every direction; and, as they had already adopted the principle that the countries overrun by them were to support their armies and furnish money to the head-quarters at Paris, they would have no need of commissariats or supplies from home, which cost so much and caused such delays in the movements of armies. There would only be some primary expenses, and these were so easily met! Their minister had stated that France had been purged of 70,000 men of property, all of whose effects were to be confiscated, to the amount of 200,000,000*l.* sterling. Thus, like a band of robbers in a cave, they were reckoning the strength of their plunders. They had two terms for raising supplies—Confiscation and Loan. The common people were at present relieved in their taxation by the confiscation of the property of the rich; and they reckoned on the confiscation of property in every country they entered as a sufficient supply for their exigences in that country, and as their resource for carrying the war further. Thus they were making war supply them with plunder, and plunder with the means of war. Men who could find no work at home would readily turn soldiers, even in countries where the passion for war was not so predominant as in France, and where there was no new fanaticism to impel them. In the manufacturing city of Lyons alone there were 30,000 artisans destitute of employment; and these men would seek for a remedy for starvation in the ranks of the army. In a crisis like the present he thought that gentlemen should examine, as if in the divine presence, whether they had any sinister motive, and act upon the pure result of that examination. For himself he had no hesitation to pronounce, as if before the divine presence, that ministers had not precipitated the nation into this war, but were brought to it by over-ruling necessity. Fox's amendment was negatived, and the address, as moved by Pitt, was carried without a division. In the Lords, on the same day, an address to the same effect was moved by Lord Grenville and seconded by the Duke of Portland, the head of the old Whig party. Earl Stanhope, who had not recovered from any of his delusions, and whose genius was too irregular and flighty to submit to party rules, moved an amendment much more extreme than that of Fox, with whom he had engaged to act, for it accused ministers of producing the rupture with France, and demanded specific information as to the objects which his majesty proposed to obtain by carrying on this war. Lord Lauderdale moved another amendment, which was the counterpart of that proposed by Fox. Both amendments were negatived, and the motion for the address was carried without a division. In all these proceedings the parliamentary majority was backed by the feeling of the people. There had not been anything like so near an approach to unanimity for many years. Yet, on the 18th of February, Fox moved a string of resolutions, the effect of which was that the two Houses were to load themselves with every kind of reproach for having voted the address which they had just carried up to the throne. They were to begin by declaring that England was not to intermeddle in the interior concerns of France, a thing unexampled in the history of the world when one nation has been actually at war with another, and a doctrine contrary to the uniform practice of France, who, whether in peace or in war, was making it her great aim not only to change the interior government, but to effect an entire revolution in the whole of the social order, of every other country. They were next to declare that the particular complaints which had been stated against the conduct of the French government were not of a nature to justify war; and that ministers had not taken such measures in their negotiations with the French government as were likely to procure redress, without a rupture, for the grievances of which they complained. The next resolution came with a singularly bad grace from the eulogist of the Empress Catherine, and the statesman who had invariably opposed whatever tended to check the ambition and insolence of that imperial termagant. It imported that it did not appear that the security of Europe and the rights of independent nations, now stated among the grounds of war against France, had been attended to by his majesty's ministers in the case of Poland, in the invasion of which unhappy country the most open contempt of the law of nations and the most unjustifiable spirit of aggrandisement had been manifested, without having produced, as far as appeared to the House, any remonstrance from his majesty's ministers. Burke, who had always felt most warmly for the fate of Poland, and who ever deplored the iniquity of the partition committed at a moment when, were it only for their own sakes, the sovereigns of Europe ought to have been setting examples of justice, forbearance, and generosity, says: "Mr. Fox's intention, in the choice of this extraordinary topic, was evident enough. He well knew two things; first, that no wise or honest man can approve of that partition, or think of it without prognosticating great mischiefs from it to all countries at some future time. Secondly, he knew quite as well that, let our opinions on that partition be what they will, England, by itself, is not in a situation to afford to Poland any assistance whatsoever. The purpose of the introduction of Polish politics into this discussion was not for the sake of Poland; it was to throw an odium upon those who are obliged to decline the cause of justice from their impossibility of supporting a cause which they approve, as if we, who think more strongly on this subject than he does, were of a party against Poland, because we are obliged to act with some of the authors of that injustice against our common enemy France. But the great and leading purpose of this introduction of Poland into the debates on the French war was to divert the public attention from what was in our power, that is, from a steady co-operation against France, to a quarrel with the allies for the sake of a Polish war, which, for any useful purpose to Poland, he knew it was out of our power to make. If England can touch Poland ever so remotely, it must be through the medium of alliances. But, by attacking all the combined powers together for their supposed unjust aggression upon France, he bound them, by a new common interest, not separately to join England for the rescue of Poland. The proposition could only mean to do what all the writers of his party in the Morning Chronicle have aimed at persuading the public to, through the whole of the last autumn and winter, and to this hour; that is, to an alliance with the Jacobins of France for the pretended purpose of succouring Poland. This curious project would leave to Great Britain no other ally in all Europe except its old enemy France."* The last of Fox's string of resolutions was, that it was the duty of ministers to advise his majesty against entering into any engagements with his allies which might prevent Great Britain from making a separate peace, or which might countenance an opinion in Europe that his majesty was acting in concert with other powers, for the unjustifiable purpose of compelling the people of France to submit to a form of government not approved by that nation. Hitherto he had rather avoided dividing the House, but he pressed these resolutions to a division. They were rejected by a majority of two hundred and twenty-six, the numbers voting being 270 against 44.

Notwithstanding the decided victory of ministers, Fox, a few days after (on the 21st of February), encouraged and supported Mr. Grey in producing the very same string of resolutions in a new form, and in moving, under the guise of an address of the House to the crown, another censure on all its own proceedings in this session. The charge about Poland was dwelt upon at much greater length, and the French republicans were likened to the unfortunate Poles, the attack upon France by the allies being represented in the same light as the invasion and dismemberment of Poland. Fresh palliatives were offered for the conduct of the French executive, and it was again affirmed that we were going to war without any sufficient ground. The motion, however, was negatived without a division.

Instead of entering upon the long and complicated debates (which did not end with the present session) upon the justice and propriety of England's engaging in this war, we will endeavour to detail briefly some of the facts and reasons which seem to justify the belief that the choice of war or peace no longer rested with the British government; that the direct provocations to hostilities did not originate with us; and that, whatever complaints may justly lie against the manner in which the war was for a long time conducted, the government of the day must be wholly freed from the charge of heedlessly and wantonly running into hostilities.* In the conferences at Pilnitz, where, in the month of August, 1791, the emperor and the king of Prussia signed a declaration that they would take certain measures to rescue the king of France, provided other powers would support them, England took no part whatever; and when the conferences were over, and the emperor had returned to Vienna, she declared that she was resolved to preserve the strictest neutrality. Besides the letter of the emperor, whom the British government could have no interest in deceiving, there are various other proofs that Great Britain, at that period, took no part in a coalition against France. It was an afterthought of the French republicans to charge Great Britain with being a party to that coalition: they did not mention the charge in their present long declaration of war; and before issuing that declaration, they had repeatedly declared, in the Convention and elsewhere, that Great Britain had nothing to do with the conferences at Pilnitz. Brissot, a bitter enemy to England, said she acted the part of a mediator on that occasion, and laboured to calm the effervescence of the German princes. When the late king of Sweden was discussing his generous but romantic projects with the Marquis de Bouillé, he said, in all the confidence of friendship and private correspondence, that it would be a grand point gained if England would only remain neutral, by which his majesty even seemed to doubt whether she might not at that time have thought of assisting the French. When, towards the close of the summer of 1791, the negroes of St. Domingo asserted the rights of man, and reduced the French inhabitants of the island to a state of despair—when the French capital of that island was surrounded by the black insurgents, and the inhabitants had neither arms nor ammunition—the English governor of Jamaica, at the request and prayer of the French governor, sent them arms, ammunition, and provisions, with all possible expedition, and, for that time, saved many thousands of Frenchmen from destruction. This was in the days of the Legislative Assembly, when the Jacobins were a minority; yet how did that legislature respond to the humane act? The person who spoke first when the facts were laid before the Assembly, proposed neither a vote of thanks to the British government nor to Lord Effingham, the governor of Jamaica, but directed his whole attention to the state of the French colony, till M. Dubayet reminded him of the obligations which they owed to the generous English governor. An obscure member of the Assembly then proposed a vote of thanks to the British government, but the motion was seconded by no one. On the contrary, when Goujon moved that the thanks of the Assembly should be voted neither to the British government nor to the governor of Jamaica, but to the British nation, there were found plenty to second and support the motion, which was carried only with the amendment that Monsieur Effingham, as a member of the British nation, should be named in particular. The insult was the more gross as it was Lord Gower, the English ambassador, who had notified what had happened at St. Domingo, and who had informed them that his sovereign had highly approved of Lord Effingham's conduct. But it was something more than an insult—something more than an exhibition of republican conceit and impertinence: it was a public intimation—the most public that could be made—of the design already formed to draw a distinction between the English people and their government, and to flatter the nation (if it could swallow so vile a compliment) at the expense of the king, and of those who held their commissions under him. A proud government, eager for war, might have proceeded to hostilities on no greater provocation; and between the months of November, 1791, and February, 1793, the French had offered many other provocations and insults greater than this.

* In this detail we have availed ourselves of a very clear recital of the course of events, supported by documentary proofs, given in the 'History of the Politics of Great Britain and France, from the time of the Conference at Pilnitz,' by Herbert Marsh (the late Bishop of Peterborough), 2 vols. 8vo. This able work, in which no fact is stated without full and convincing evidence (taken chiefly from French decrees, manifestos, declarations, and other state-papers, and memoirs) was originally written in the German language—a language which a long residence at the University of Leipsic had rendered as familiar to the author as his own—and was first published at Leipsic, in February, 1799. He translated it himself into English in the course of the same year; and it was published in London in 1800.

When Louis XVI. sent his circular letters to foreign courts, announcing that he had accepted the constitution of 1791—that model and perfect constitution which all Frenchmen swore to, and which was never to be altered—the court of Great Britain was one of the first which sent a respectful and friendly answer; whereas several of the European courts answered much later, some of them did not answer at all—the king of Spain giving for his answer that he could not consider that Louis XVI. had the use of his free-will when he accepted the said constitution, and the king of Sweden refusing to open the circular letter, which was delivered to him by the French minister at Stockholm. It was never pretended that the British government approved of that absurd constitution, the makers of which prepared the way for the anarchy and blood that followed, or that they believed, any more than the king of Spain, that Louis had been in the enjoyment of liberty and free-will when he accepted it; but they abstained from all remark, not considering themselves justified in offering any, and returned a civil note of form to a circular which was in itself nothing more. Nearly at the same moment that the National Assembly made such a return for the generosity exercised by the English at St. Domingo, a French frigate, streaming all over with tricolor flags, and bidding defiance to treaties, fired upon an English man-of-war on the coast of Malabar. By an article in the treaty of commerce of 1786—that treaty in which Pitt had taken so much pride—it was stipulated between France and England, that, if either of the two contracting powers should be engaged in a war with a third power, all vessels belonging to subjects of the other contracting power should be provided with sea-letters and certificates, that the masters of them, in case they should be suspected of carrying ammunition, or any warlike stores to the enemy of the former power (a thing strictly prohibited by another article of the same treaty), might be able to clear themselves; and, as a necessary consequence, it was further stipulated, that, if a ship of war belonging to the former power met a merchant-ship belonging to the latter, the captain of the ship of war should be at liberty to send an officer on board the merchantman, to examine the said sea-letter and certificate. Sir Richard Strachan, in the 'Phoenix,' met, on the Indian coast, several French merchantmen that were under convoy of a French frigate. As the war with Tippoo Sultaun was then at its height, as Tippoo and his father Hyder had always been the allies of the French, as the embassy which Tippoo had sent to Paris was no secret to the English officer, as it was very unusual for vessels which had nothing contraband on board to be convoyed by a man-of-war in time of peace, the suspicion unavoidably arose that these vessels must be carrying ammunition and warlike stores to Tippoo. Sir Richard Strachan sent off an officer in a boat to the captain of the French frigate, to request him to make a signal to the merchantmen to lay to, in order that their certificates might be inspected. But, instead of doing this, the captain of the frigate made a signal to the merchantmen to crowd all sail and get off; and, to prevent Sir Richard Strachan from following them, he attacked the 'Phoenix,' beginning to fire upon her even before the English lieutenant in the open boat had time to return on board to make his report to Sir Richard. As soon as the officer and men got on board, Sir Richard Strachan replied in the proper manner to this unexpected attack, and after a short engagement, in which the French captain fell mortally wounded, the frigate struck her flag—the first of many hundred tricolor flags that struck to the flag of England in the revolutionary war. Commodore Cornwallis, who commanded the English fleet which was lying at Tellicherry, gave immediate orders for the release of the frigate; and afterwards, when Lord Gower complained to the court of France of this violation of the treaty of commerce and this act of open hostility, his complaint was delivered in most moderate terms, being coupled with the hope that the French government would give orders to prevent similar accidents in future, which might disturb the peace which his Britannic majesty so earnestly wished to maintain. Yet, when this note of our ambassador was read in the National Assembly, they would not condescend to make an apology or to give any promise for the future; and, after insolently attempting to justify the conduct of the captain of their frigate, they referred the matter to a committee, who let it sleep. If our government had been desirous of a war, this alone would have justified the declaration of it; and if the thing had occurred when Pitt's father was minister, and at the height of his warlike ardour, it may be doubted whether hostilities would not have been proclaimed immediately. To a succession of such acts no nation can submit without losing spirit, character, and moral force—without bringing upon itself, with the most unfavourable and discouraging circumstances, the war it would fain have avoided. The insults heaped personally upon Lord Gower were numerous and excessive. They so openly accused him of facilitating the correspondence of the aristocrats in Paris with the emigrant princes, that he came forward with a public denial and a solemn protestation that he observed in all things the neutrality between parties which his government had imposed upon him. But for great temper on his part he would have withdrawn from Paris long before the 10th of August, and but for the real anxiety of his government to avoid a war, he must have been recalled. For many months he could not take up a newspaper without reading the most ferocious attacks on his king and government; and the writers of these things were not merely journalists and newsmongers, but known to be members of the national legislature, leading men of foreign committees (as Brissot), or ministers of state. At the beginning of the year 1792 the British government reduced the number of sailors and marines to 16,000 men, made a reduction in its very inconsiderable army, and gave up, or rather did not renew, the treaty of subsidy with Hesse-Cassel; Pitt, in his confidence of peace, abolishing taxes to the annual amount of 200,000*l.* At the same time the French not only augmented prodigiously their land forces, but also increased their navy, declaring that they would have 80,000 sailors and marines, and that the thunder of their ships was ready to roar in all seas. They must have contemplated a war with England, for Prussia and Austria had no fleets whatever. When those two powers moved their armies towards the French frontier, the great naval preparations were of necessity suspended; but, as soon as those armies were in retreat, the preparations were resumed; and three months before they declared war they had 21 ships of the line, 30 frigates, 18 sloops, 24 cutters, and 10 sloops armed en flûte, not only in commission, but actually at sea. The brutal bombardment of Oneglia, and the impunity with which they had been allowed to scour a part of the Mediterranean and to insult the helpless Italian states, had wonderfully elated their sailors. Upon war being declared by the Convention against Austria (in April, 1792), Chauvelin notified the event to the English court, and received another positive assurance that England would persevere in her neutrality. Chauvelin, an observing and an acute man, expressed his conviction that there was every reason for relying on these assurances of the English government; stating that Pitt was solely occupied with his schemes of finance and home improvements; that he had formally assured a deputation of merchants that England would not meddle in the affairs of France; that the nation had no taste for war; that no preparations were making either in the ports or in the arsenals. A few days after Chauvelin delivered a note to Lord Grenville, the secretary for foreign affairs, requesting that all British subjects should be forbidden to serve under any foreign power at war with France; and with this request the court of Great Britain promptly complied, issuing a proclamation on the 25th of May, forbidding all British subjects "to receive any commission for arming and acting at sea as privateers, or letters of reprisals from any enemy of the most Christian king; or, by virtue or under colour of such commissions or reprisals, to disturb, infest, or in any way damage his subjects; or to arm ships as privateers, or to go out to sea therewith, under the severest punishments that can be inflicted on the transgressors, besides being liable to make full restitution and satisfaction to those to whom they have done damage." Chauvelin was instructed by his government (we use the term for the sake of brevity, but government there was none in France) to thank his Britannic majesty for his friendly dispositions, and for the sentiments of humanity, justice, and peace which he had manifested. Nearly at the same time that this proclamation was issued at Chauvelin's request, the proclamation was issued against seditious writings; but this was a mere act of national police, which had no relation to the government of France, and which no more concerned that government than the measures taken in France relative to the emigrants concerned the English government. There was not a sentence, a word in the proclamation against the government of France: alarmed at the proceedings of the corresponding societies and clubs, who had not merely addressed letters and sent delegates to the National Assembly, but had also sent delegates to the Société Mère, which was not then the French government nor the friend of that government, but its vilifier and oppressor, the English proclamation merely said that "dangerous correspondences had been entered into with sundry persons in foreign parts." If, instead of these very general expressions, the terms "sundry Frenchmen" had been used, still no objection could reasonably have been taken, as individuals are not a government or a nation. Chauvelin never pretended that any injury or insult was intended against his government or country in this proclamation. Immediately after its appearance he sent a note to Lord Grenville declaring that, "if certain individuals of this country have established a correspondence abroad, tending to excite troubles here, and if, as the proclamation seems to insinuate, certain Frenchmen have come into their views, this is a proceeding wholly foreign to the French nation, to the legislative body, to the king, and his ministers; it is a proceeding of which they are entirely ignorant, which militates against every principle of justice, and which, whenever it becomes known, will be universally condemned in France." In his eagerness to rescue his government from all suspicion, and in his ignorance of the forms of the English constitution, Chauvelin even requested that his note might be laid before the two Houses of Parliament. On the 18th of June, 1792, nearly a month after the proclamation against seditious writings, Chauvelin, in the name of his government, thanked his Britannic majesty for his pacific intentions; and a month after that, or on the 17th of July, Chauvelin acquainted his own government that the British court remained steady to their friendly disposition. In the interval, on the 18th of June, he had even communicated a note to Lord Grenville, in which the mediation of the British cabinet was requested between France and the allied powers of Austria and Prussia. Although the note was printed at the time in the 'Moniteur,' nearly every French historian has passed over the fact in perfect silence. On the 8th of July, after mature deliberation, the English government answered, that the intervention of his majesty's councils could not be of use, unless they should be desired by all the parties interested. No answer could be more reasonable, for, unless the contending parties invite and agree to the mediation of a third party, there can be no mediation at all on a friendly footing. But it was not mediation or friendly negotiation that the French wanted; and Chauvelin gave Lord Grenville clearly to understand that what they required was an English armament and an effectual and decisive co-operation on our part with France against our ancient friend and ally the House of Austria, and against our present closest ally the King of Prussia! Mr. Fox and his opposition, who had made so terrible an outcry against our Russian armament, and who had defeated the object of it, could hardly have expected the government to comply with this strange request. Moreover, a naval armament against two powers who had neither ships nor ports would have been of no more use than an armament against the moon: to adopt effectual and decisive measures, England must have sent a land army to the continent to co-operate and fraternize with the thoroughly Jacobinized and sans-culottized armies of the French republic. But the whole proposition is too gross and monstrous to deserve a thought or a word, were it not that the Foxite opposition pretended that the French had never made any very unreasonable demands, and that by continuing our friendly negotiations with them we might very well have kept out of the continental war. If that had been possible which was utterly impossible, if England had been able to bring about a general peace in June or July, 1792, the National Assembly would have declared war a second time, for peace would have left a king on the throne, and they wanted a republic; and Brissot and other leading men had declared in the government journals and in the Assembly, over and over again, that France did not require peace, but war; that the condition of the country and the circumstances of the times were all favourable to the most extensive military operations; that the resolution was formed "to break with all the courts," "to set all Europe at defiance," "to set fire to the four corners of Europe, for therein lay the salvation of France." Even the eternally virtuous Roland said to the friend of an English gentleman who was eager for peace, and who undertook to show that France might obtain peace with Prussia and Austria if so inclined—"Peace is out of the question: we have 300,000 men in arms; we must make them march as far as their legs will carry them, or they will return and cut our throats!"* Here again was that logic of fear which was the motive of so many deeds and the groundwork of so much of the revolutionary fabric. And this dread of an armed multitude must have existed and have led to the same decision, of making them march as far as their legs would carry them, if Prussia and Austria had never given refuge to the emigrants, or remonstrated against the acts of violence and encroachment that were committed,—if they had reduced their armies to the peace establishment, and quietly assented to all that France was doing at home and abroad; for the popular masses were armed long before there was any talk of foreign invasion; they were armed, not to contend with Prussia and Austria, but to put down, destroy, or drive out the aristocrats, by which term was understood every Frenchman that differed in opinion with the majority, and had property and a name. Before the conference at Pölnitz the principle had been adopted of arming the sans-culottes, as the class that was the most interested in the progress of the revolution, and best prepared for the privations and risks of war. Before there was any intimation of foreign interference France was converted into a great drill-ground, and the shock and convulsion which had taken place, the flight of the opulent and luxurious classes, had created a dearth of employment which drove men to the army as their only resource. These legions, after doing the work of their rulers and legislators at home, would have demanded a proportionate reward, and their rulers would have sent them to glean it in the neighbouring countries, in the circles on the Rhine, in the rich fields of Belgium and Piedmont and Lombardy. This they would have equally done to save their own throats. Such an army could neither have been reduced nor maintained by any government in France; but, in the national passion for war and conquest, these troops would have been ready at any signal to throw themselves upon their neighbours to obtain not only free quarters, but excitement, fame, and the chances of high promotion, the highest ranks in the army being now not merely open to, but almost exclusively reserved for, men of the lowest conditions. Thus, whatever course the European sovereigns and governments had pursued, there would still have been a European war.

On the 17th of August, 1792, after Louis XVI. had been dethroned and his Swiss Guards butchered, the British government recalled their ambassador; but, in his letter of recall, Lord Gower was instructed to take especial care not to neglect any opportunity of declaring that his majesty meant to observe the principles of neutrality in everything which regarded the arrangement of the internal government of France. Lord Gower communicated this letter to Lebrun, and that French minister returned an answer to it in the name of the new republican government of France, expressing, indeed, some regret at his recall, but at the same time their great joy at the continuance of the friendly assurances of Great Britain. They did not affect to consider the recall as a violation of neutrality; they left that gloss to be put upon the affair by Mr. Fox and his friends. In ordinary circumstances the recall of an ambassador precedes a declaration of hostilities, but ambassadors had often been recalled without that step being followed by any war, and, in itself, it never amounts to a declaration of hostilities. When hostilities are intended the ambassador takes no leave; but Lord Gower had taken leave in a friendly note. In the present case a recognised government had been overthrown, and no regular government had been substituted for it. No one yet knew what manner of government might be set up by the plotting Jacobins and Girondists who had made the revolution of the 10th of August, but who had scarcely begun to make the constitution which was to take the place of the one they had all sworn to—no one yet knew whether there might not be a fresh popular insurrection and a new revolution within a month, a week, a day. Lord Gower had been accredited to Louis XVI. as to the person invested by the constitution with the executive power of France, but Louis was now a prisoner in the Temple, and his authority was transferred to a provisional executive council. His lordship's letters of credence were, therefore, no longer valid. For him to remain at Paris it would have been necessary to have sent him new credentials. But to whom could he be accredited?—Not to the executive council, for that was only provisional and temporary, and liable to be changed every hour—not to the National Assembly, for it had pronounced its own dissolution, it had ordered the election of a Convention, and it had decreed not that the king was actually dethroned, but that he was only provisionally suspended from his functions until the Convention should meet and decide what was to be done with him. As all authorities, or semblances of authorities (for there was no real one except that of the armed and bloody mob), were at that time merely transitory; as there was nothing that a regular government could recognise, the most prudent and the most moderate step which England could take was to withdraw its ambassador, and wait at least till the new constitution should be determined by the Convention. There was, indeed, an incessant haranguing and writing about the nation, which was said to be distinguishable and recognisable apart from any government it had adopted or might hereafter choose to adopt. But governments can only treat with governments; Lord Gower could not take the sense of the French people by appel nominal. In the Assembly he saw one party succeeding another, and each pretending that it represented the whole nation. If he had asked the Girondists, they would have told him that they were the nation, and their adversaries a mere faction: if he had put the same question to the ultra-Jacobins, he would have been told that they were the nation, and the Girondists a faction. Every man in France foresaw that very soon these parties would make a relentless war upon one another, but as yet few persons could be certain which of the two would remain masters of the field. It was even more necessary to be neutral between these two parties than it was to be neutral between France and the Coalition. If the British government had treated with the party now in power, they would have been accused by the succeeding ruling party of having treated with a faction—of having intermeddled unwarrantably in the internal affairs of France. The recall of our ambassador was positively the best and the only means of preserving both neutralities. As Pitt said, in his speech of the 12th of February, the propriety of Lord Gower's recall appeared still more evident when it was considered that the men who had seized upon the government had been obliged, in the course of a month, to yield to the interests and the views of a different party:—adding, that when any government was overturned, it became a fair question to know how long an interval should intervene till the new powers should be acknowledged; but that, if that change of government was accompanied with the utmost tumult and distraction, with a bloody anarchy, it would be very hard that war should be declared against a nation for not acknowledging the change the very moment the change took place. Before the Convention determined what the new constitution or form of government was to be, they declared war against Great Britain. No complaint was raised by the executive council upon the recall of Lord Gower, or upon any other English topic, until after the Duke of Brunswick had been defeated, and the French troops had commenced their career of conquest. Then murmurs were heard, then decrees intended to produce social insurrection and social war throughout the civilized world were promulgated one after the other, and then, too, more open and flattering countenance was given to those deputations of scoundrels, fools, or madmen that carried over to the foot of the National Convention the congratulations of the English societies and clubs—and then, too, fresh thousands of secret agents and propagandists received their missions to penetrate into every quarter, and to preach the rights of man, and blood, plunder, and anarchy to the poorest classes of society. Gregoire, the priest, called these agents “missionaries,” Camille Jordan called them “apostles of rebellion,” and Chaussard, who declares that London abounded with them at the end of November and beginning of December, 1792, called them “revolution professors.” They were furnished with money for the purpose of bribing and seducing the needy, and paying interpreters and other assistants. According to Brissot himself, the executive council was authorised to take, under the head of army extraordinaries, unlimited sums for these secret operations. He also intimates that a great deal of this money was sent over to London, although the greater part of it was embezzled and appropriated by the patriotic executive.* We have seen at the very beginning of the revolution, before either Girondists or Jacobins were heard of, and before any party or any man in France pretended any offence at the hands of the British government, that Lafayette cherished a plan for revolutionizing Ireland. This plan was now taken up with vigour; and, a month or six weeks before the Convention declared war against England, Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs, most confidently asserted that the French were sure of Ireland, and that a revolution must take place in England. This conviction was so strong and so universal, that no line of conduct which the British government could have adopted would have prevented their declaration of hostilities. In vain did Mr. Miles, as a private friend of Lebrun, assure him that the English people were enthusiastically loyal and attached to their constitution; and that a few political clubs, which were thought so much of in France, were altogether contemptible in England. Certainly there were other subjects of the King of Great Britain and Ireland who laboured with all their might to confirm Lebrun and his colleagues in their mistake. On the 18th of November, the very day before the Convention issued its formal decree that France was ready to assist every nation which was ready to rebel against its own government (a decree which was translated into all the languages and sent to all the countries of Europe), a grand dinner or fête civique was celebrated at White's Hotel in Paris. The company was composed of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Frenchmen, with some few republicans from other countries. Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and other men of some name and consequence in the world, sat down to table, and fraternised with Santerre, Thomas Paine, and other characters of the same notoriety. Among the toasts that were drunk were, “The National Convention of France,” “The Patriotic Societies of Great Britain and Ireland, with those men who have contributed to inform and enlighten the people, Priestley, Fox, Sheridan, Barlow, &c.”—“The approaching National Convention of Great Britain and Ireland”—“May Revolutions never be made by halves.” Eight or nine days after the publication of the decree for universal insurrection, deputies from certain British societies appeared at the bar of the National Convention, and signified their intention of adopting the republican form of government now so happily established in France. “We hope,” said the orator of the first of these deputations, “that the troops of liberty will never lay down their arms so long as tyrants and slaves shall continue to exist. Our wishes, citizen legislators, render us impatient to see the moment of this grand change. Nor are we alone animated by these sentiments; we doubt not that they would be equally conspicuous in the great majority of our fellow-countrymen if the public opinion were consulted there, as it ought to be, in a NATIONAL CONVENTION.” In replying to this address, the president of the Convention said, “Citizens of the world, royalty in Europe is either destroyed, or on the point of perishing on the ruins of feudalism; and the Declaration of the Rights of Man, placed by the side of thrones, is a devouring fire which will consume them all. Worthy republicans, congratulate yourselves on thinking that the festival, which you have celebrated in honour of the French revolution, is the prelude to the festival of nations.” The orator of the second of these deputations (it came from the Society for Constitutional Information) used language still more expressive, saying, that, after the example which France had given, revolutions would be rendered easy; and that it would not be extraordinary to see in a short space of time a National Convention in England. Nearly at the same time deputations or addresses from six or seven other English or Irish societies were presented, and to each of them the French Convention paid the same compliments, and gave the same flattering assurances. It is scarcely surprising that men, so ignorant of all that concerned England, should have been deluded into the belief that these blatant peripatetics spoke the sense, if not of the majority, of a very large portion of the English people.

A moderate member of the Convention moved, on the 24th of December, that the insurrection decreed of the 19th of November, which had excited reasonable uneasiness in the British government, should be restricted to those countries with which France was actually at war; but the House rejected the proposal without a debate. Before the end of the year 1792 the executive resolved to send M. Genet as ambassador to the United States of America, in order to engage them to join France in a war against England. His instructions were signed on the 3rd of January, 1793. Nearly at the same moment the garrison of Brest made an attempt to sink a British sloop which was cruising outside the outward harbour. First of all they fired a loaded gun. The sloop hoisted English colours. The batteries hoisted the tricolor flag, and the red flag over it, as a signal of war; and forthwith they opened a cross-fire from several points upon the sloop, which must have been riddled if a fresh breeze had not sprung up. The whole proceeding showed that these republicans, who had changed everything, were determined to pay no respect to the established rules of war. Neither the executive council nor the Convention attempted to offer any excuse or explanation to the British government. They had known all along that they could not possibly attack Holland without provoking the hostility of England; yet as early as the month of November, when Dumouriez was driving the Austrians out of Belgium, he was instructed to follow them into Holland if they attempted to take refuge there. The Austrians did not enter Holland; but the French were determined to enter it all the same. They collected 10,000 Dutch patriots or democrats, men who had either been expelled by the Prussians and the party of the Stadtholder, or who voluntarily stole out of their country to join the French in the hope of being enabled to take their revenge on their own countrymen, and establish a true sans-culottic republic. The French allowed them pay and provisions, and gave them the name of the Batavian Legion. These precious Dutchmen established a revolutionary committee, which corresponded with their friends of the French or democratic party in the interior of Holland, in order to promote insurrection and facilitate the entrance of the French army. A French agent resided with this Batavian legion, or with its revolutionary committee, and communicated directly with the minister for foreign affairs at Paris. The Belgian patriots had been converted to the same uses; this was a capital part of the new republican theory of war. After all these preparatory steps had been taken, the executive council, on the 10th of January, sent an order to General Miranda to invade Dutch Flanders and the province of Zealand within twelve days. This secret order was not preceded by any declaration of war, or even by any complaint that the government of the Stadtholder had broken the neutrality which, in common with England, they had engaged to observe. Holland was to be attacked because it was unprepared and almost defenceless—because her sans-culottes were ready to give every facility to the enterprise—because the republicans, who had renounced conquest, hungered and thirsted for it beyond all the people of the earth, and because Holland was rich. By their operations on the Scheldt they had, indeed, sufficiently discovered their intentions; but the Stadtholder could do nothing by himself, and the British government seemed as yet undetermined as to the course to be pursued. France had guaranteed the treaty which gave the Dutch the sovereignty over the Scheldt, but these modern Frenchmen had declared all old treaties to be waste paper. In declaring, as they did as early as the 16th of November, that the navigation of the Scheldt should be free to all ships of whatsoever size, and whether armed or not, the National Convention had two objects in view, one immediate and the other distant. The immediate object was to send French ships of war up the river to bombard the emperor's citadel of Antwerp; the distant but main object was to convert the mouth of the Scheldt into a station for French ships of war, in order to acquire the naval superiority in the North Sea, which the French flag had never possessed. In fact, all along their north-west coast the French had no harbour in which ships of the line could enter; but, if they could obtain this most advantageous post, they could overawe the eastern coast of England, and interrupt a very material part of British commerce. Thus the opening of the Scheldt, instead of being an insufficient cause of war, was cause enough, even if Great Britain had had no other; and there never had been a statesman in this country but would have hazarded a long war rather than submit to see the French hugging our own coasts by the possession not merely of Belgium, but of Holland added to it. As to their more immediate object of sending ships of war to bombard Antwerp, they attained it as early as the 1st of December, when a French frigate, a brig, two gun-boats, and three other armed vessels from Dunkirk entered the Scheldt in defiance of the solemn protest of the States-General and Stadtholder. This was an act of open war; this was not only a declaration, but a commencement of hostilities, which not merely justified, but called for a declaration of war on the part of Great Britain as early as December, 1792.

The diplomatic legation which France sent to London shortly after declaring war against Prussia and Austria, but a considerable time before the revolution of the 10th of August, was composed of Chauvelin, Talleyrand, Duroverai (the Genevese who had made so many of Mirabeau's discourses), Garat, Gallois (another man of letters), Reinhard (originally a Protestant preacher in Würtemberg, then teacher and man of letters at Paris), and an ex-priest of the Catholic church, who had been grand vicar to Talleyrand, when Talleyrand was bishop of Autun. Chauvelin was the nominal chief, the letters of credence being made out in his name; but the real chief, for some months, was the high-born, knowing, and witty Talleyrand, who appears to have indulged very frequently in sarcasms and bons-mots against some of his companions.* It was supposed not to have been without design that the revolutionary government had sent over such a literary, writing, printing embassy. It was observed that, as soon as they arrived, they eagerly sought the acquaintance of literary men and opposition journalists. The English public therefore took them for revolution professors or apostles, who came to propagate their system, and make proselytes and disciples. This view of their real functions is borne out by the instructions they received from their government:—1. "To embrace every opportunity of assuring the English nation that, notwithstanding the ill humour of its government, the French desired nothing more ardently than to merit the esteem of the English people. 2. To threaten the British government with an appeal to the people." Their reception at court was of course not very cordial. They soon seemed to shun all intercourse with ministers and the friends of ministers, and to seek exclusively the society of Fox, Sheridan, and men of that party. Nothing could well be more indecent, or contrary to the rules which regulate diplomatic intercourse, than this conduct on the part of the Frenchmen. The conduct of the English opposition would merit still harsher language; and, taken in connexion with Fox's behaviour towards the empress of Russia, it looks almost like the adoption of a settled system that the party, besides opposing ministers by national and legal means, should resist and thwart them by foreign means, and by connexions and correspondences with governments that were on the very brink of war with us. Chauvelin, before negotiations really commenced, communicated his secret instructions to an intimate friend of Mr. Fox. On one occasion he wrote to his government, "that, though he was not well with the English minister, yet he was perfectly so with Mr. Fox, and some other members of opposition; and that it would not be prudent in France to lose the fruit of his labours with these gentlemen, and their subsequent services, for any vague form of diplomatic etiquette." Garat flourished his pen with his usual facility, writing an answer to a manifesto of the government of the Netherlands, in which he justified the French revolution, and set down all the atrocities with which it had been accompanied as nothing but so many unlucky accidents. This view of the case was incessantly presented to Fox and his friends. The public feeling, which would have driven England into a war in spite of any ministry, showed itself in a marked manner, even before the horrors of the 10th of August and the massacres of September. One evening all the members of the embassy, with Dumont, went to Ranelagh, which was then frequented by the most respectable classes of English society. As they entered, there was a murmur of voices, "There is the French embassy!" All eyes were fixed upon them, with a curiosity not mixed with any expression of good-will; and presently the crowd fell back on both sides, as if the Frenchmen had the plague upon them, and left them all the promenade to themselves. Soon after, they saw a solitary man traversing that void space: it was the Duke of Orleans, who was shunned by every one with particular care. Dumont separated from the group, and mixed in the crowd; and, as he understood English, he had the opportunity of hearing some not very flattering descriptions of the characters and adventures of his companions. They all of them soon quitted the place—Chauvelin appearing greatly disconcerted, and Talleyrand not seeming affected at all.

* Garat, one of the vainest and most pragmatistical of French litterateurs, projected writing the history of the revolution; and seemed to think that it had happened only to give him the opportunity of making a great and wonderful book. When the bloody affair took place which overthrew the throne, Talleyrand said to Dumont, "What do you think Garat sees in the revolution of the 10th of August?—Nothing but a fine page for his history."

When the revolution of the 10th of August happened, Chauvelin's mission was properly at an end, for he had been accredited by Louis XVI., and had been received as the representative of a government which now no longer existed. He was, however, allowed to remain in England in a private capacity. Garat, who had been a conspicuous member of the legation, went back to France to be made minister of justice, and to have the task of announcing sentence of death to the king.* While Chauvelin's powers were thus suspended, both Pitt and Lord Grenville intimated that outward forms should be no hindrance to negotiation, if the French government would only give satisfactory explanations; that it was our desire to avoid a war if possible; and that they, as ministers, would be glad to receive some proof of the same sentiments from the French ministry. These facts were admitted at the time by Brissot himself, who was at the head of the diplomatic committee—the committee which managed all negotiations. At the

* Talleyrand had gone over to Paris a short time before the 10th of August, and was in that capital on that dreadful day. "It required all his dexterity and abundant means to obtain a passport from Danton, and return to London, immediately after the 10th of August. If he had remained in Paris only a few days longer, he would have been enveloped in the destruction of the constitutionalists."—Dumont.

Among the papers produced by Roland, as found in the iron chest, were some that were deemed sufficient proof of Talleyrand's having been in correspondence with the unhappy king: so that, if he had escaped death as a constitutionalist in the September massacres, he would have been sent to the guillotine as a traitor, by the Extraordinary Tribunal, in November or December. Not being able to behold the shifty man, the Convention proscribed him, and confiscated his property. He sold his library, which he had brought with him to England, and lived very philosophically upon the proceeds. For some time, his residence was a small house on the top of Highgate Hill.

beginning of the month of December, a French agent waited in London upon Mr. Miles, who had formed a friendship with Lebrun, and who hoped to turn it to good account in preventing a war between the two countries. This very secret agent assured Mr. Miles that he was empowered to demand an audience of Mr. Pitt, but that his name must not be mentioned till he had positive assurance that the English minister would receive him. Mr. Miles waited upon Pitt, who consented to give an audience to the mysterious stranger; but when the meeting took place he found that he had no authority whatsoever to treat—that he had not even any explanations to offer from the provisory government of France as to the subsisting differences. The secret agent, however, presented another person as having authority to treat; and this other person was the well-known Maret, who held some employment about the foreign office at Paris, but who pretended to have come over to England merely on some private business of the Duke of Orleans. Pitt consented to give an audience to Maret; but, to his astonishment, Maret told him that he had no more power to treat, or no more explanations to give, than the gentleman he had just seen. The English prime minister was a proud man, little accustomed to tolerate such insulting mockery, yet, according to Mr. Miles, and even Maret himself, he kept his temper, and told the Frenchman that, in case he could obtain instructions from Paris, “it would give him great pleasure to treat with him as a confidential person from the French executive council.” Flattered by this reception, Maret immediately dispatched a courier to Paris, in the hope of obtaining instructions to treat with the British government; but the French executive not only refused to send the required instructions, but also ordered Maret to abstain from all further conversation with Mr. Pitt, and return immediately to Paris. Maret was at the house of Mr. Miles when this dispatch arrived, and he showed it to him. “I read it,” says Miles, “with the more surprise and indignation on finding that Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs, had reported to the Convention that Mr. Pitt, alarmed (at the prospect of a war with France), had solicited an interview with the secret agents of the executive council, but that he (Lebrun) had expressly forbidden them to have any communication with the English minister.” This was too much for the patience of the too sanguine peace-maker, Mr. Miles; and he wrote indignantly to Lebrun:—“His (Pitt’s) condescension has been attributed, not to frankness, not to the interest which he is believed to feel in the prosperity of his country, not to a principle of sound policy based upon probity and humanity, but to weakness and fear, and a motive still less honourable, which could never have been attributed to him except by men without virtue, who, being destitute of every sentiment of honour, do not believe that those sentiments can exist in others. According to them, it was to cowardice or to perfidy that M. Maret owed his interview with Mr. Pitt. Great God! what fear could Mr. Pitt feel? One sole fear perhaps—that of being assassinated! And what had he to gain by perfidy?”* Mr. Miles, however, would not yet give up all hope; and he proposed to Lebrun that M. Noel, who was then in London, and who was thought to be inclined to pacific measures, should be authorised to confer with the English minister; but Lebrun and his executive again refused. As for Chauvelin, Mr. Miles, who knew him well, asserts that he was altogether hostilely inclined; that he had made no scruple to declare that, if he was not received again at St. James’s, the height of his ambition would be to leave this country with a declaration of war; that, if a pretext for a quarrel between the two countries had been purposely sought, France could not have selected a better man for the purpose than Chauvelin. If we had sent over a minister to Paris, either now or at any other moment between the retreat of the Duke of Brunswick and the declaration of war against us, the measure would have been attributed solely to our weakness and our fear; and nothing could have come of it except some new complication of insolence and intrigue.

On the 27th of December, when the storm was thickening on every side, and when the British parliament had been assembled a fortnight, Chauvelin sent a note to Lord Grenville, still styling himself minister plenipotentiary of France. The sole intention of this note was to declare, in diplomatic form, the solemn lie, or congeries of lies, that France had ever been, and still was, anxious to remain at peace with England; that the French republic and people scorned the idea of exciting disturbances or promoting insurrections in any neutral or friendly country; that France had no intention of attacking Holland, so long as that power remained neutral; and that the question of the opening of the Scheldt—“a question irrevocably decided by reason and by justice, and of small importance in itself”—could only be a pretext, and not a real cause, for going to war. Chauvelin demanded an immediate answer in writing, and terminated his own note by telling Lord Grenville that the generous and free people of England could not long consent to betray their own interests by serving as an auxiliary and a reinforcement to a tyrannical coalition. Lord Grenville, on the 31st of December, replied, that M. Chauvelin could not be ignorant that, since the unhappy events of the 10th of August, the king had thought proper to suspend all official communication with France; that he had been no otherwise accredited than in the name of his most Christian majesty; that the proposition of receiving a minister accredited by any other authority in France would be a new question, which, whenever it should occur, the king would have a right to decide according to the interests of his subjects, his own dignity, and the regard which he owed to his allies and to the general system of Europe; that he must therefore inform him, in express terms, that he acknowledged him in no other public character than that of minister from his most Christian majesty, and that consequently he could not be admitted to treat with the king's ministers in the quality and under the form he had assumed in his note. All this was perfectly regular, and was justified and rendered necessary by precisely the same reasons which necessitated the recall of Lord Gower from Paris. If England had adopted any other course, she would have thrown herself into the wild vortex of revolutionism. To have acknowledged the French republic at this moment, when it had done what it had done, and when it had fully determined to declare war against Great Britain, would have been an act of insanity. But the British Government did not refuse that recognition: it left the question open. Lord Grenville, moreover, though treating Chauvelin only as a private or unaccredited individual, went into a calm discussion of the explanations he had pretended to offer, showing that it was not without reason that the French Convention and people were suspected of promoting insurrection in other countries; that the language used about not attacking Holland was the same which Chauvelin had used in the month of June last, since which time France had openly violated both the territory and the neutrality of the Dutch republic in sending ships of war up the Scheldt, &c.; and that, at the very moment when, under the name of an amicable explanation, Chauvelin was renewing his correspondence, he announced that France fully intended to maintain these open and injurious aggressions. With respect to the opening of the Scheldt, his lordship said, "If it were true that this question is in itself of little importance, this would only serve to prove more clearly that it was brought forward only for the purpose of insulting the allies of England by the infraction of their neutrality, and by the violation of their rights, which the faith of treaties obliges us to maintain. But you cannot be ignorant that here the utmost importance is attached to those principles which France wishes to establish by this proceeding, and to those consequences which would naturally result from them; and that not only those principles and those consequences will never be admitted by England, but that she is, and ever will be, ready to oppose them with all her force. France can have no right to annul the stipulations relative to the Scheldt, unless she have also the right to set aside equally all the other treaties between all the powers of Europe, and all the other rights of England or of her allies. She can even have no pretence to interfere in the question of opening the Scheldt, unless she were the sovereign of the Low Countries, or had the right to dictate the law to all Europe. England will never consent that France shall arrogate the power of annulling at her pleasure, and under the pretence of a pretended natural right, of which she makes herself the only judge, the political system of Europe, established by solemn treaties and guaranteed by the consent of all the powers. This government, adhering to the maxims which it has followed for more than a century, will also never see with indifference that France shall make herself, either directly or indirectly, sovereign of the Low Countries, or general arbitress of the rights and liberties of Europe. If France is really desirous of maintaining friendship and peace with England, she must show herself disposed to renounce her views of aggression and aggrandisement, and to confine herself within her own territory, without insulting other governments, without disturbing their tranquillity, without violating their rights." His lordship called all Europe to witness the justice and moderation which the British government had observed. With regard to the insolent threat with which Chauvelin had concluded his last note, his lordship said he had no answer to give. Chauvelin transmitted the letter to Paris. On the 7th of January the "Provisory Executive Council of the French Republic" sent over their answer to it to be presented by Chauvelin, although they had furnished him with no letters of credence, but continued, in defiance of all diplomatic rule or law, to maintain that his former credentials were not invalidated. This executive council of shuffling Girondists denied a great deal, but ceded nothing: they would not give up the navigation of the Scheldt, saying that it was extremely important to the Belgians, of trivial import to Holland, and indifferent to England; that the treaty which closed the Scheldt was concluded without the participation of the Belgians; that France was authorised to break those stipulations; that the Jus Publicum could be nothing but the application of the principles of the general rights of nations to the particular circumstances in which nations are placed with regard to each other, inasmuch that every particular treaty which offended such principles could only be regarded as the work of violence, &c. They gave no pledge or promise that they would not attack Holland; and by the time their letter reached London they had penned their order to General Miranda to invade Dutch Flanders and Zealand within twelve days. They impudently denied that France was aiming at conquest, or at arming the subjects of states against their governments; and at that moment they had in the slips the Batavian legion of 10,000 rebellious Dutchmen, and they had annexed Savoy, gained possession of Nice, of all the Netherlands, &c. This note, which was in fact their ultimatum, declared that though they were unwilling to engage in a war with England, they knew that such a war would suit their interests better than peace; and that, if the British government did not deem these explanations sufficient, they would prepare for war. Before their letter came to hand Chauvelin, still styling himself minister plenipotentiary, wrote to Lord Grenville to complain of the Alien bill, then under discussion in parliament, as a shameful infringement of the treaty of navigation and commerce concluded in 1786 between France and England. He cited the fourth article of that treaty, wherein it was agreed that it should be allowable for subjects and inhabitants of the respective states to come and go freely without any permission or passport, general or special, either by land or sea, and to sojourn or move from place to place in either country without hindrance, but with a reciprocity of all sorts of kindness, &c. If it had suited Lord Grenville, he might have told Chauvelin that the French themselves had never observed this part of the treaty, and that for two years and more no Englishman had been free to travel in France without passport, or to reside there without being subjected to continual annoyance by the municipal police, unless, indeed, he came from some corresponding society and enjoyed the protection of the Jacobins. But his lordship contented himself with sending back Chauvelin's letter and telling him that it was totally inadmissible, as he assumed in it a character which did not belong to him. These notes passed on the 7th of January. To the ultimatum of his government, which Chauvelin presented on the 13th, he received an extra-official answer from Lord Grenville on the 18th. His lordship said that under the form of extra-official communication he thought he might yet be permitted to tell him, "not in a tone of haughtiness, but of firmness," that the explanations were not considered as sufficient—that, as France had made such extensive preparations, England must continue her preparations in order to protect "the safety, tranquillity, and rights of this country, as well as to guarantee those of our allies, and to set up a barrier to those views of ambition and aggrandisement, dangerous at all times to the rest of Europe, but which become still more so, being supported by the propagation of principles destructive of all social order."* It was not until this moment that the British cabinet was desired to accept of letters of credence for M. Chauvelin in the name of the Provisory Executive Council—that is to say, Chauvelin did not ask to be admitted to a condition in which he could treat, until all chance of treaty was over, and then his request was entirely inadmissible, as a compliance with it would have included a recognition of the French republic—a republic which had declared, five weeks before, that it acknowledged no kingly government—a republic which had proclaimed its fixed design of expelling all kings whatever—a wild democracy which had already drawn all the sword out of the scabbard except the point of it, which was to be directed against the vitals of England. In a note to Lord Grenville he now desired a personal interview, and affected to speak as if he himself might be affected by the Alien bill and thrown into a prison. He said he had received fresh orders to insist upon a speedy and definitive answer; but he offered no concession, no explanation; and, for the rest, the definitive answer of the British government was contained in Lord Grenville's extra-official communication of the 18th. His lordship, on the 20th, informed him that his majesty did not think proper, under present circumstances, to receive his letters of credence; that an interview could not be granted; and that he must consider himself not as a public minister properly acknowledged, but as a private individual amongst the general mass of foreigners resident in England. And four days after, on the 24th of January—the news of the execution of Louis XVI. having arrived in the interval—Chauvelin received a passport for himself and his suite, with an order to quit this kingdom within the term of eight days. This intelligence was announced to the Convention on the 30th of January with expressions of joy and exultation, and certainly without any surprise; for every man there was eager for a declaration of hostilities, and, on the 23rd of January, the day before Lord Grenville gave his notice and passport, the executive council had actually recalled Chauvelin.* On the 31st letters were presented from the Jacobins of Liege, demanding that their country might be permanently incorporated with France; similar letters were presented from the Jacobins of Nice (it was easy for the French commissaries to obtain such letters from some portion of the population of every country into which their armies penetrated); and forthwith the civdevant county of Nice was formally decreed to be a part of the republic, a department of France, never to be alienated therefrom, as the republic was indivisible. Even in this way did the French corroborate the bold assertions of Fox and his friends, that they were not aiming at conquests or permanent occupations, but were merely keeping the countries they overran as security for indemnities at the time of peace. On the same day (the 31st) Danton demanded that, in compliance with the unanimous wish of the sovereign people of that country, the whole of Belgium should be decreed to be an integral part of the French republic. On the same day, also, letters of marque were granted to privateers to cruise against the English.

Under the influence of Dumouriez it had, however, been secretly determined before this to amuse England a little longer with some feigned attempts at negotiation; and on the 26th of January M. Maret had been again sent across the Channel to ask Mr. Pitt if he would treat with General Dumouriez. On the road between Dover and London, Maret, who evidently was not admitted into the whole secret, met Chauvelin returning to Paris,

* At the same time Mr. Miles, who was in communication with Pitt and other members of the government, wrote to Maret, who was now become chief of the department for foreign affairs, that it was impossible for the British government to remain tranquil, unless the executive council would consent to comply with the conditions respecting the Scheldt, the neutrality of Holland, the appropriation of Savoy, &c.; but that, if the executive council would only comply with these, and cease their endeavours to promote insurrection, there would certainly be no war on the part of Great Britain.

and, fancying he himself might yet be the means of preventing the war, he wrote to his employers in very pressing terms for fresh instructions, intimating that he would not request an interview with the English minister until he had received some fresh instructions. Maret remained eight days in London, but no instructions came for him. At the end of that time, or on the 4th of February, the declaration of war, which had been made by the Convention on the 1st, was known in London, leaving nothing for Maret to do but to get back to France as quickly as possible. So much truth is there in the harangues of the parliamentary opposition and in the narratives of party writers, who asserted at the time, and continued to assert long after, that Maret had come with full powers to treat and to offer extensive concessions and securities; and so perfectly true was the declaration of Pitt in the House of Commons that M. Maret, during his whole stay in London, had proposed to his majesty's ministers no question of state whatever. The real motive of Dumouriez in sending Maret (and if the executive council had been less proud and confident of success, they would have worked out his scheme, and have endeavoured to enable Maret to engage the English government in some long-winded discussion) arose out of that general's discovery that the conquest of Holland presented more difficulties than he had contemplated; and that Miranda, whom he had ordered to begin the attack before the 22nd of January, was not in a condition to move so soon. Therefore, on the same day that Maret was dispatched for London, de Mauld, who had been French ambassador at the Hague, whence he had only lately returned, was hurried off to the Hague again with a letter from Dumouriez to Lord Auckland, the British ambassador, intimating that he (Dumouriez) would be very happy if an opportunity presented itself of conferring with his lordship on the frontiers of Holland, "because such conference might be beneficial to mankind in general, and to France and England in particular." De Mauld arrived at the Hague without any interruption from the Dutch authorities, as he pretended to have come merely to settle some private affairs. Lord Auckland consulted the Grand Pensionary, Van Spiegel, and, after some deliberation, both these ministers consented to confer with Dumouriez. To make sure of his dispatches being received, Lord Auckland sent off three successive packet-boats to England, and seemed to cling to the hope that hostilities might yet be obviated. Dumouriez, quitting Paris in the last days of January, before the Convention issued the declaration of war, and not being informed by the Girondist ministers, who all feared and suspected him, of their fixed determination to issue that declaration on the 1st of February, went down to Dunkirk, and thence proceeded to Antwerp, examining the country and the French army on his way, and finding everything in confusion, everything in a condition that boded ill for the success of his next campaign, unless he could gain time to remedy the disorder. It was the 2nd of February when he arrived at Antwerp. It was agreed that, as soon as Lord Auckland could receive his instructions from his court, conferences should be opened at Moerdyk on board a yacht belonging to the Prince of Orange, which was ordered to be fitted up for Dumouriez's reception. Though they could scarcely have been blind to the real motives of Dumouriez, the British government, to avoid the reproach which would have resulted from a refusal, immediately consented to the hollow negotiation, and authorised Lord Auckland to treat with the French general. On the other side, it was on the very day that the overture was made to Lord Auckland at the Hague by de Mauld that the French executive issued the order to lay an embargo on all British vessels in the French ports. On the receipt of his instructions from London, Lord Auckland dispatched a courier to Dumouriez, who was still at Antwerp, and proposed the 10th of February for the day of holding the first conference. But now Dumouriez knew that the Convention had declared war on the 1st; and this rendered further thoughts of negotiation impracticable. Two capital and evident consequences attended this manœuvre of the French Proteus and its failure: the one was, that it showed a willingness on the part of the English government to negotiate even down to the last moment; the other, which followed on the failure of the scheme for delay, was a series of failures and defeats on the side of Dumouriez, who, instead of taking Holland in the ensuing campaign, lost nearly the whole of Belgium, and saw the war carried once more to the frontiers of France.

The declaration of war was the unanimous vote of the National Convention. Although the decree was drawn up by the hated Girondists, and presented by Brissot, the personal and deadly enemy of Robespierre and Danton, both those Jacobin chiefs and all the Mountain enthusiastically concurred in it; Ducos seconded it, not a man of any party opposed it, not a single man in the House offered a remonstrance or amendment, or so much as a remark on the decree—all cried impatiently, "Vote! Vote!" and it was put to the vote and carried instantly, with a unanimity which had hardly ever been seen before on any subject, and which was never seen again in that Assembly. When it was carried, they voted an address or appeal to the people of Great Britain, and the creation of assignats for 800,000,000 of livres. Several days before they had ordered a levy of 300,000 men, and had boasted (and with no vain or lying boast) that in a few weeks half a million of men would be ready to march.

Such is the brief sketch of the diplomacy which preceded the breaking out of this most memorable of wars; and the reader may judge from it whether it was possible for England to have kept out of the contest, or to have treated with a set of anarchists who were determined upon the war from the beginning. But, without any reference to these negotiations, which on the side of the French were never for one moment honest and earnest, the whole history of the revolution, from the meeting of the States-General in 1789 till the massacres in September, 1792, and the execution of Louis XVI. in 1793, is nothing but one continuous proof that there could be no friendship, no peace with such a country—that there was less to lose by the worst of wars than by an intercourse with them—that the virulent nature of their moral disease required a quarantine, not of forty days, but of forty years.

The remaining business of the session in the British parliament was not very interesting, and the attention of the people seemed absorbed by the war, which at the commencement was excessively popular. Mr. R. Smith chose this inauspicious moment for presenting a petition from the town of Nottingham praying for parliamentary reform. The House refused to receive it by a majority of nearly five to one. Towards the close of the session a number of petitions, having the same object, were presented from various parts of the country, but, for the most part, bearing few signatures; and Mr. Grey moved that they should all be referred to a committee. This motion was rejected by 282 against 41, many members who had formerly been warm parliamentary reformers now voting on the side of ministers, and declaring their dread of any innovation, and their detestation of the language in which some of the petitions were drawn up. Michael Angelo Taylor made a ridiculous motion about the unconstitutional tendency of military barracks, and the great danger to liberty in having a standing army in England at any season or under any circumstances. He proposed a resolution declaring it to be the opinion of the House that the building of barracks was contrary to the true principles of our constitution; and he was supported in his nonsense by Fox, Mr. Courtenay, and others of that party. The motion, however, was negatived by the order of the day being carried without a division. On the 25th of February Dundas presented an elaborate and able statement of the situation of affairs in British India, showing a great increase of trade and revenue, notwithstanding the costly war with Tippoo Suldaun. The opposition made but a faint attempt to cloud the brightness of this prospect. A little later in the session (on the 23rd of April), the East India Company having petitioned in the usual form for the renewal of their charter, Dundas gave a spirited sketch of our trade and possessions in the East, and of the system under which they had been governed by the Company, and, of late years, by the Company and the Board of Control. He represented that the administration of Indian affairs, being good and sound, ought to be left as it was, more particularly as the natives of India were by nature averse to any sudden change, and as able men were not at all agreed as to what the change ought to be. Some years ago Mr. Hastings, Mr. Barwell, Sir John Clavering, Mr. Francis,

Colonel Monson, Sir William Chambers, and Sir Elijah Impey were consulted, as able men, well acquainted with the country. "If," said Dundas, "I had found that so many able men had agreed in opinion, it would have been an inducement to build up a new system; but from their differences of opinion I can only draw this conclusion, that it is safer to rest on the present system, which experience has rendered practicable, than to entrust myself to theories, about which ingenious and informed men have not agreed." Francis and Fox opposed the bill; but it was carried, without any division, on the 24th of May, and the Company's charter was consequently renewed. Various motions were made for proceeding in the business of abolishing or further regulating the African Slave Trade; but they were all defeated. On the 4th of March Sheridan moved for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the truth of the reports of sedition in the country, his intention being, of course, to prove that no sedition existed, or had existed, or was to be apprehended. He went off into a florid harangue about parliamentary reform, and declared that government and its agents had propagated a false alarm in order to divert public attention from that important question. He observed, that early in the session the attorney-general had said that he had two hundred sedition cases to bring forward for prosecution; yet very few had been brought forward, and they had consisted simply of the crime of selling Mr. Paine's book. Part of his speech was very querulous: he complained again of the Loyal Association of the Crown and Anchor tavern; he complained of a sermon preached by the Bishop of St. David's before the House of Lords; and he lamented that so many noblemen and gentlemen should recently have withdrawn their names from the Whig club. Windham asserted his belief, from his own knowledge and observation, that there existed alarming discontents among some portions of the community, and that these discontents were actively propagated by seditious publications. The debate was continued with great heat by Fox and Burke; but the motion was negatived without a division, as every division now exhibited the excessive weakness of the Foxites.

On the 6th of March some lamentable evidence was given of the weak and ineffectual manner in which ministers intended to begin the great struggle on the Continent. Pitt acquainted the House, in the form of a royal message, that his majesty had engaged a body of his Hanoverian troops to assist his allies the States-General; and on the 11th, the House being formed into a committee of supply, the minister made a statement of ways and means, making it appear that a loan of four millions and a half, and an issue of four millions of exchequer bills, would, in addition to the ordinary revenue, carry him through the year. Resolutions were passed for the loan and for the exchequer bills. On the 15th of March the attorney-general introduced a bill for preventing all traitorous correspondence with the king's enemies during the war. Its provisions went to prohibit, under the penalty of high treason, all persons from supplying the French government or armies with arms, military stores, provisions, bullion, or woollen cloths; also, under minor penalties, from purchasing lands in France, or property in the funds of that country; from going from this country to France without a licence under the great seal, and from insuring vessels either proceeding from or going to France. While the bill was before the House, an amendment was moved and carried by the solicitor-general to confine its operation to persons actually residing in Great Britain. The clause was also struck out which prevented British subjects from purchasing in the funds of France—a speculation not likely to occur very soon, considering the nature of the revolutionary system of finance. Fox opposed the bill in all its stages, declaring it to be more unjust in its principle, more inadequate in its provisions, and more tyrannical in its effect, than any bill that had ever passed through the House of Commons; that it was such an extension of the terrible laws of treason that honest traders and others might find themselves involved in its penalties without ever having had any treasonable intention. Burke, though he did not approve entirely of the construction of the bill, defended it with passionate warmth.* There must, he said, be a peace police and a war police—the necessities of war calling for an increase of the prerogative of the crown in progressive proportion to the difficulties that occurred in it. The general matter of the bill harmonised with the general principles of the constitution, and was justified by the example of our ancestors. The juridical power of punishing as traitors those who aided and comforted the king's enemies could be traced to Edward III., and even farther. King William III., when engaged in the struggle with Louis XIV., had had recourse to a bill of this kind, and so had Queen Anne. Indeed, the statute of Anne was much more severe: it had an energy and harshness in it far greater than the present, although it was made in the very session that the queen received the news of the victory of Blenheim, and although the Houses of Parliament were then full of Whigs. There were surely occasions on which governments must adopt such precautions, or perish? What was the particular occasion that governed the present case? France was endeavouring, under the specious pretext of an enlarged benevolence, to sow the seeds of enmity among the nations, to destroy all local attachments in the people, to dis sever the people from their rulers. "Let any one," said he, "read the proceedings of that mother of mischief, the Revolution Society, and be convinced!" He conceived it was the duty of the House to concentrate and fortify the country: he conceived that it was their duty to keep their subjects at home, and prevent an adulterous communication with the French. They ought not to enable France to carry on war out of resources drawn from the bowels of Great Britain, or to allow Englishmen to fight against their own country, and make contracts to its ruin. "Let us not," said he, "sacrifice everything—the love of our country, our honour, our virtue, our religion, our security—to mere trade and traffic: let us not estimate these high things by the scale of pecuniary or commercial reckoning. The nation that goes on that calculation destroys itself!" He concluded by declaring that all he desired was that England would be true to itself, and carry on no intercourse with the outcasts of mankind. As the Foxites pressed their resistance to a division on the third reading, the House divided, when the bill was supported by 154 against 53. It was opposed in the Lords by some of Fox's friends, but was carried through that House also, after a few trifling alterations.

* Burke considered Fox's opposition to the bill as unwarrantable and dangerous in the highest degree. Writing some years after the debate, he says, "In the same manner, and with the same heat, he opposed a bill which, though awkward and inartificial in its construction, was wise and right in its principle, and was preceded in the best times, and absolutely necessary at that juncture: I mean the Traitorous Correspondence Bill. By these means the enemy, rendered infinitely dangerous by the links of real faction and pretended commerce, would have been, had Mr. Fox succeeded, enabled to carry on the war against us by our own resources. For this purpose, that enemy would have had its agents and traitors in the midst of us."—Letter to the Duke of Portland, on the Conduct of the Minority.

Towards the end of April, when the French army had been foiled in its attack on Holland, and had been repeatedly defeated, with terrible loss, in Belgium, a curious overture was made by Lebrun for opening negotiations with England. On the 26th of April, one Mr. John Salter, a notary-public of Poplar, delivered to Lord Grenville two notes from the French minister for foreign affairs, bearing the date of the 2nd of April. In the first of these notes, Lebrun merely expressed how desirous the French republic was of terminating all its differences with Great Britain; and requested a passport and safe conduct for a person entrusted with full powers to treat. In the second note, which was only to be shown in case Lord Grenville consented to read the first, Lebrun said that M. Maret was the person that would be sent over. Some time after these notes were presented by the notary-public of Poplar, a declaration was made by a Mr. James Mathews, living at Biggin House, Surrey, that the notes to Lord Grenville were perfectly authentic, and had been signed by M. Lebrun in the presence of him, the said James Mathews; that he had brought them over, had delivered them to the said John Salter, &c. Having been so frequently deceived by Lebrun, who was known to be both rash and faithless, it was not surprising that Lord Grenville should pay no attention to notes which had been sent through such a ridiculous channel. Besides, there was no possibility of doubting that the only object of Lebrun's notes was to gain time, in order that France might repair her recent failures. But there was still other ground for treating with contempt any overture from the French executive at this moment. Lebrun, his colleagues in office, and all the Girondist party, were falling under the attacks of Robespierre and the Mountain, which commenced on the 10th of April, and ended in a complete victory on the 2nd of June. By the 22nd of June, a decree of accusation and arrest was issued against Lebrun himself; and he became a fugitive and an outcast, whose turnings and windings were all to end under the guillotine.

An awkward crisis in the money-market, and great embarrassments in trade, through a deficiency in the circulating medium, and a difficulty in obtaining discounts for commercial bills, had induced the chancellor of the exchequer to move on the 25th of April for a select committee to take the whole matter into consideration. Upon the report of this committee, who represented that serious evils were likely to happen if some extraordinary means were not speedily adopted to restore credit and circulation, Pitt, on the 30th of April, moved that there should be an issue of exchequer bills to the amount of five millions, to be placed in the hands of commissioners, to be by them advanced, under certain regulations, to those who should apply for such assistance, and should give proper security for the repayment at limited dates. This was agreed to after some discussion; and the commissioners were named who were to carry out the whole plan.* Manufactured goods were to be accepted as proper security, and the places where these goods were to be deposited were London, Bristol, Hull, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Leith.

Some violent debates took place in both Houses on a memorial presented to the States-General by the British and Imperial ministers at the Hague on the 5th of April. In this memorial Lord Auckland and Count Stahrenberg called upon their high mightinesses to prevent any of the French regicides from finding an asylum in their states in Europe or in any of their colonies. The language used was perhaps too warm and too much like the habitual language of the French Convention; but otherwise there was nothing very censurable or serious; and, when Earl Stanhope moved, not only that Lord Auckland should be recalled, but that he should be impeached for putting his signature to such a paper, he only confirmed the prevalent opinion about the peculiar state of his intellect. With better effect, Sheridan, who led the attack in the Commons, held up to detestation the conduct of the Empress of Russia and of two of our allies, the Emperor of Germany and the King of Prussia, in the new partition of Poland which they had just completed. He declared that no robbery had been committed by the most desperate of the French, that no crimes had been perpetrated in France that exceeded in infamy the injustice and tyranny of those sovereigns: and Sheridan's opinion was assuredly the opinion of a large part of the world. It struck good men with despair to see a rivalry in guilt between established governments and champions of order, and the mad democrats and anarchists of the day. Sheridan, who was supported by Fox, divided the House, and saw his motion for an address to the throne on Lord Auckland's conduct negatived by 211 against 36. In the Upper House Lord Grenville made a motion for approving the conduct of Lord Auckland, and this was carried without a division. The transient success of the arms of the Coalition in the Netherlands excited and elated the friends of ministers, and drew from them some unwise menaces against all those members of the Convention who had voted the death of Louis XVI.; but no serious effect is to be attributed to these menaces; matters in France would have gone on even as they went if these threats against the regicides had never been used—at most they were but as a flask of oil poured into a raging volcano.

"After it had been generally supposed," says Burke, "that all public business was over for the session, and that Mr. Fox had exhausted all the modes of pressing his French scheme, he thought proper to take a step beyond every expectation, and which demonstrated his wonderful eagerness and perseverance in his cause, as well as the nature and true character of the cause itself. This step was taken by Mr. Fox immediately after his giving his assent to the grant of supply voted to him by Mr. Serjeant Adair and a committee of gentlemen, who assumed to themselves to act in the name of the public. In the instrument of his acceptance of this grant Mr. Fox took occasion to assure them that he would always persevere in the same conduct which had procured to him so honourable a mark of the public approbation. He was as good as his word." An address to the people of Norwich against the war had been drawn up by Mr. Gurney, a banker of that town, and was industriously circulated by him and his friends who put their names to it. In this paper Mr. Fox was applauded for his conduct throughout the present session, and requested, before the prorogation, to make a motion for an immediate peace with France. "Mr. Fox," continues Burke, "did not revoke to this suit: he readily and thankfully undertook the task assigned to him. Not content, however, with merely falling in with their wishes, he proposed a task on his part to the gentlemen of Norwich, which was, that they should move the people without doors to petition against the war. He said, that without such assistance little good could be expected from anything he might attempt within the walls of the House of Commons. In the meantime, to animate his Norwich friends in their endeavours to besiege parliament, he snatched the first opportunity to give notice of a motion, which he very soon after made, namely, to address the crown to make peace with France. The address was so worded as to co-operate with the handbill in bringing forward matter calculated to inflame the manufacturers throughout the king-

* The commissioners were Lord Sheffield, Sir Grey Cooper, Mr. Pulteney, Mr. Chiswell, Sir John Sinclair, Mr. Alderman Anderson, Mr. R. Smith, Mr. Bosanquet, Mr. T. dom." On Monday, the 17th of June, only four days before the prorogation, Fox moved an address to the throne, the substance of which was, that, having obtained the only avowed object of the war (the evacuation of Holland by the French), we ought to conclude an instant peace. In support of his motion he declaimed in his most passionate and eloquent manner against the partitioners of Poland and against every power in alliance with us. "In the moral forum," says Burke, "some of these powers certainly deserved all the ill he said of them; but the political effect aimed at evidently was to turn our indignation from France, with whom we were at war, upon Russia, or Prussia, or Austria, or Sardinia, or all of them together. . . . He knew that we could not effectually do without them, and it was his resolution that we should not act with them. . . . Mr. Fox could not be ignorant of the mistaken basis upon which his motion was grounded. He was not ignorant that, though the attempt of Dumouriez upon Holland (so very near succeeding) and the navigation of the Scheldt (a part of the same piece) were among the immediate causes, they were by no means the only causes alleged for parliament's taking that offence at the proceedings of France, for which the Jacobins were so prompt in declaring war upon this kingdom. Other full as weighty causes had been alleged: they were—

1. The general overbearing and desperate ambition of the Jacobin faction;
2. Their actual attacks on every nation in Europe;
3. Their usurpation of territories in the Germanic empire, with the governments of which they had no pretence of quarrel;
4. Their perpetual and irrevocable consolidation with their own dominions of every territory of the Netherlands, of Germany, and of Italy, of which they got a temporary possession;
5. The mischiefs attending the prevalence of their system, which would make the success of their ambitious designs a new and peculiar species of calamity in the world;
6. Their formal public decrees, particularly those of the 19th of November, and 15th and 25th of December;
7. Their notorious attempts to undermine the constitution of this country;
8. Their public reception of deputations of traitors for that direct purpose;
9. Their murder of their sovereign, declared by most of the members of the Convention who spoke with their vote (without a disavowal from any), to be perpetrated as an example to all kings, and a precedent for all subjects to follow. All these, and not the Scheldt alone, or the invasion of Holland, were urged by the minister and by Mr. Windham, by myself, and by others who spoke in those debates, as causes for bringing France to a sense of her wrong in the war which she declared against us. Mr. Fox well knew that not one man argued for the necessity of a vigorous resistance to France, who did not state the war as being for the very existence of the social order here and in every part of Europe—who did not state his opinion that this was not at all a foreign war of empire, but as much for our liberties, properties, laws, and religion, and even more so, than any we had ever been engaged in."* In the debate on Fox's present motion, Windham acknowledged that, so far as the objects of the war regarded Holland and Flanders, his statement was fair enough; but he added that, with respect to the alleged disavowal of any interference on our part as to the internal government of France, he had not displayed an equal precision. There had, indeed, been a disavowal of any intention on our part to interfere for the purpose of establishing in France any particular form of government, whether monarchical, democratic, or despotic; but it was an avowed purpose of the war to endeavour to bring about the establishment of such a government in that country as we might with safety treat with; we were to prosecute the war till we could make peace with safety. Burke said that Fox's motion involved this serious question—whether we should make war with all the powers of Europe, in order to make peace with France? "And with whom," continued he, "can we now treat in France? M. Lebrun, with whom we were so lately called on to treat, is in a gaol. Clavière, another minister, is nowhere to be found. Or shall we treat with M. Egalité, who is now in the dungeon of Marseilles? And what are the principles upon which this negotiation is to be carried on? Brissot himself has told us what the French think on this subject. In the report of a committee, upon the subject of a treaty with Geneva, Brissot has affirmed 'that treaties are useless, and cannot bind the people, who are to be united by principles alone, and that, therefore, to make treaties with any other sovereign power is disgraceful to a free people.'" Burke said it was no new notion to interfere with a country that made itself a dangerous nuisance to all its neighbours. Vattel had laid it down as a part of the law of nations, "that, if one country adopt principles maleficent to all government and order, such a country is to be opposed from principles of common safety." This maleficent spirit existed in France, and what was to keep the effects of it from England? War, and nothing but war. Burke concluded by saying that, until we could find that security in the principles and practices of the French which could alone make peace permanent, he would never agree to prostrate the throne of Great Britain at the foot of any National Convention or Jacobin Club whatever. Pitt's speech on the same occasion was uncommonly powerful and convincing. He asked Fox whether he would enter into negotiations with Marat, for that monster and his party were now the lords of the ascendant—were now the arbiters and rulers of France. "But," continued Pitt, "it is not merely to the character of Marat, with whom we would now have to treat, that I object; it is not to the horror of those crimes which have stained their legislators—crimes in every stage rising above another in enormity—but I object to the consequences of that character, and to the effect of those crimes. They are such as render a negotiation useless, and must entirely deprive of stability any peace which could be concluded in such circumstances. Where is our security for the performance of a treaty, where we have neither the good faith of a nation, nor the responsibility of a monarch? The moment that the mob of Paris comes under the influence of a new leader, mature deliberations are reversed, the most solemn engagements are retracted, or free will is altogether controlled by force. In every one of the stages of their repeated revolutions we have said, 'Now we have seen the worst; the measure of iniquity is complete; we shall no longer be shocked by added crimes and increasing enormities.' The next mail gave us reason to reproach ourselves with our credulity, and, by presenting us with fresh crimes and enormities still more dreadful, excited impressions of new astonishment and accumulated horror. All the crimes which disgrace history [at this time the Reign of Terror had begun] have occurred in one country, in a space so short, and] with circumstances so aggravated, as out-run thought and exceed imagination." Fox replied, and divided the House, when his motion was negatived by 187 against 47. On the 21st of June the king prorogued parliament.

We pass to the seat of war. On the 17th of February Dumouriez moved from Antwerp, and attacked the Dutch town of Breda, which capitulated immediately. On the 26th Klundert surrendered upon summons, and on the 4th of March Gertruydenburg capitulated, after a short and slight bombardment. The Dutch garrisons behaved in a manner which proved that they were disaffected, or infected by the new doctrines of the Rights of Man, and the proselytism of their countrymen of the Batavian legion. They made little more than a show of resistance; and, after capitulating, a great many of them joined the French or the Batavian legion. Dumouriez's plan was to penetrate rapidly into the heart of the United Provinces, where he expected to be joined by Miranda, his second in command, whom he had sent to the right to reduce the important town of Maestricht, on the Maes or Meuse. Without counting his Dutch partisans, he had between 20,000 and 30,000 men; but his army was badly provided, because all parties in the Convention suspected him, and because the republican commissaries sent to supply clothes, provisions, &c. were the greatest and most barefaced thieves that had been seen in modern days. They had sent the men shoes soled with wood or with pasteboard, having a thin covering of leather; and they kept back not only clothing, but ball-cartridge. The shifty Dumouriez might, however, have made up all these and other deficiencies in the country if he had been allowed to advance; but at the fortress of Williamstadt, which commanded the passage of an arm of the sea called Bies Bosch, he was brought to a pause. Williamstadt was occupied by a brave old

Dutch general, Count Botzlaer, with some Dutch troops that were not jacobinized, and by a strong detachment of the English guards, who had just arrived. Moreover, there was a small squadron of gun-boats on the Bies Bosch, which had been fitted out by Lord Auckland at the expense of Great Britain; and this flotilla, manned by British seamen taken from our merchant-ships in the Dutch ports, and ably commanded by Captain Berkeley, not only presented a formidable obstacle to the passage of that water, but greatly annoyed Dumouriez's troops as they prepared for the siege of Williamstadt. And at the same time a small squadron of ships, which had been sent by England for the defence of the province of Zealand a short time before war was declared, but not before Dumouriez's intention was known, being united with a force equipped by the States-General, kept in check a French flotilla at Dunkirk, and another, composed of gun-boats and a corvette, at Antwerp, so that the French general was deprived of the necessary and essential co-operation of these naval forces. While Dumouriez was thus brought to a stand on the wrong side of the Bies Bosch, Miranda, who was at Maestricht, and Miazinski, who was at Aix-la-Chapelle to defend the passage of the river Roer and cover Liege, were both defeated and compelled to give ground. On the last day of February the reinforced Austrian army, commanded by General Clairfait, passed the Roer under cover of night, attacked Miazinski by surprise, and defeated him, taking some hundreds of prisoners, twelve pieces of artillery, thirteen ammunition waggons, and the military chest, and leaving about a thousand French killed on the field of battle. On the following day the Archduke Albert, with a portion of the Austrian army, carried several French batteries, and took nine pieces of artillery. On the 8th of March the Prince of Saxe-Coburg, with the Austrian van, gained a complete victory over Miazinski's main body in front of Aix-la-Chapelle, drove the French entirely out of that town, and followed them almost to Liege, inflicting on them a loss estimated at 4000 killed and wounded, and 1000 prisoners, and taking from them twenty pieces of cannon. And on the same day Prince Frederick of Brunswick, with a detachment of the Prussian army, gained some important advantages near Ruremonde. Miranda had invested Maestricht, and had commenced a pitiless bombardment, for the French, who had made such an outcry against the Austrian bombardment of Lisle, never hesitated at having recourse to that destructive operation of war whenever they thought it suited their purpose. But the repeated defeats of Miazinski now compelled Miranda to retreat precipitately from Maestricht, to abandon a good part of his artillery and baggage, to recross the Meuse, and to seek shelter, and a junction with the scattered troops of Miazinski, in the heart of Belgium. The archduke reinforced Maestricht, crossed the Meuse, and followed Miranda as far as Tongres, where he obtained another advantage. But the division of the Austrian army which had defeated Miazinski did not follow him with sufficient rapidity (it was difficult to keep up with the French in any of their retreats, for they had little heavy baggage of any kind, and what they had they generally abandoned), and his disorganised forces were allowed to form a junction with Miranda at St. Tron, between Tongres and Brussels. At the very beginning of these disasters the executive council sent orders to Dumouriez to abandon his enterprise in Holland, and return into Belgium to head the army there. Dumouriez, who thought that Miranda and Miazinski were quite strong enough to defend Belgium without him, and whose heart was wholly set upon the conquest of Holland, remained where he was, merely dispatching instructions to Miranda. But soon 10,000 deserters from the army of Belgium spread themselves in the interior of France, reporting everywhere that they had been betrayed by their generals. A universal panic followed; and the Jacobins, who had lately been so confident, who had calculated upon an uninterrupted series of victories which would open their way to half the capitals of Europe, again fancied that the army of the Coalition was almost at the gates of Paris. Letter upon letter was sent to Dumouriez, and on the 9th of March that bold and skilful adventurer was compelled to abandon his Dutch enterprise, and make all speed to join Miranda and Miazinski at St. Tron. He left nearly all his forces behind him under the command of General Deflers, who was enjoined to keep and make sure of all the ground and places which had been gained; but Deflers was soon obliged to abandon everything, and follow his chief into Belgium, and he was seriously molested on his retreat by the flotilla under Captain Berkeley, who afterwards scattered the French gun-boats collected at Antwerp, and sank the corvette. Upon returning into Belgium Dumouriez found that the inhabitants, lately so ardently attached to the republican cause, had been driven into revolt by the commissioners dispatched by the National Convention, who had sequestered the revenues of the clergy, plundered the churches of their plate, and confiscated the property not merely of the nobility, but of rich burghers. He instantly arrested two of the commissioners and sent them under a military guard to Paris; he called the rest of them thieves and robbers; he dismissed General Moreton-Chabrilant, who attempted to defend the commissioners, he restored part of the plate which had been taken from the churches, and he even put under interdict and shut up the Jacobin clubs of the army. All this conciliated the Belgians, who, moreover, dreaded the vengeance of their late sovereign the emperor if the Austrians should prove victorious; but, on the other hand, it irritated the Convention and inflamed the Mother Society at Paris, where Dumouriez had already an irreconcilable and most dangerous enemy in Marat, who could never forget the slight the general had put upon him in that gay saloon, at that "charming festival" at which all the actors of the different theatres of Paris were complimenting the conqueror of the Duke of Brunswick. Camus, the rigourist, who had been sent into Belgium on a very special mission, remonstrated, and accused him of exercising a dictatorship very incompatible with liberty and republicanism; upon which Dumouriez, who was as petulant as any of them, and who fondly believed that his own army would stand by him, treated the dry, starch Jansenist with no more respect than he had treated Marat, telling him to his face that the Convention was falling into contempt and odium through its imbecilities and its crimes, and that the excesses committed by its commissioners were no longer to be borne. Camus, as vindictive as Marat, returned to Paris, and from that moment the Jacobins devoted Dumouriez to the guillotine—provided only they could ever get hold of him. He in the meanwhile concentrated his army at Tirlemont, and drove back the vanguard of the Austrians. To weaken rather than to strengthen him, to demoralize his army rather than to fight the enemy, some 15,000 or 20,000 new levies, volunteers, federates, and other vagabonds, arrived at his camp from France. He instantly dismissed 10,000 of them, and he attributed to the misbehaviour, the indiscipline, the suspicion, and the panic fear of those who remained, the reverses he presently met with. On the 16th of March he was attacked by the Prince of Saxe-Coburg with great spirit; but he kept his ground and obliged the Austrians to fall back upon Neerwinden. On the 18th he moved to attack them there. The battle, including in it the prelude of a long cannonading, lasted from morning till night. Dumouriez had his horse killed under him by a cannon-ball, and rose from his fall covered all over with mud and dirt; the Duke of Chartres, who commanded the centre, behaved with great courage; but the end of all was a most thorough and signal defeat: 4000 killed and wounded remained on the field of battle, and 10,000 deserted the army and scarcely paused in their flight until they had got on the other side of the French frontier, where they spread a fresh panic, which, as usual, led to fresh atrocities at Paris. Dumouriez attributed the origin of all his misfortunes to the Jacobin Club of Paris and to the terrible Mountain, which was now preparing to crush the Gironde; but he could not trust the Girondists, who distrusted him, nor could he hope for a moment that that prating faction would be a proper point around which to rally. He was almost crazed; yet, with the rare military instinct that was in him, he retreated with his regular troops in good order towards Louvain and Brussels, skirmishing on the way, and engaging in one or two affairs that were rather more than skirmishes. On his retreat he was visited by Danton and Lacroix, who came as commissioners from the Convention to draw up a report on his conduct, both civil and military. They had scarcely left him when he sent an officer of his staff to the head-quarters of the Prince of Saxe-Coburg to make some arrangements relative to the wounded and prisoners. The French officer was referred to Colonel Mack, memorable in history for the surrender of Ulm, but at that time in the highest repute in the Austrian army as a consummate tactician, and as an accomplished and adroit officer in all things. After some conversation it was agreed that Mack and Dumouriez should meet and confer together. They met, and presently entered into a verbal agreement that the Imperialists should not again attack the French army in force; that Dumouriez should be allowed to retire undisturbed to Brussels; and that, after the French should have evacuated Brussels, Mack and Dumouriez should have another interview. There can be no question that something more than this was discussed, but nothing more appears on record; and the mysterious parts of the story which follows have been variously interpreted and are still open to doubt. On the 25th of March Dumouriez reached Brussels, and caused it to be evacuated by all the French—troops, commissaries, commissioners, propagandists, comedians, chubbists, and all. On the 27th he encamped at Ath, and there kept his appointment with Colonel Mack. Having thrown down the gauntlet to the Mother Society and to the Convention, and knowing well that there was nothing for him but a counter-revolution, or death, or flight, he presently agreed with Mack to co-operate with the Imperialists against the republicans, to give up to them the whole of Belgium, to march with his own army to Paris, and to call in the Austrians after him, if he should not prove strong enough to scatter the Convention and the Jacobins, and dictate the law at Paris. It is surmised that he proposed setting the Duke of Chartres on the constitutional throne of France, and re-establishing, with some modifications, the constitution of 1791; and that the Duke of Saxe-Coburg assented to his project, in the hope that, if a counter-revolution, could only be effected in time, the young dauphin might be liberated from the Temple, and the regular line of the monarchy restored in his person. The project seemed the more practicable, as the Prussians, though slowly, were preparing to drive Custine from Mayence, and invade France by the valley of the Moselle; the Spaniards, against whom the Convention had declared war on the 4th of March, were descending through the passes of the Pyrenees; a considerable English army was collected in Holland to co-operate with the Duke of Saxe-Coburg; and the royalists in the Vendée were not only in universal insurrection, but had gained several victories over the republican or Jacobin troops. Whatever were the conditions and stipulations of the compact (they can never be correctly ascertained, as every party privy to them had afterwards the strongest motives for concealment and contradiction), Dumouriez evacuated successively all the places he held in the Netherlands, and slowly retired, unmolested by the Austrians, towards the French frontier. He met a number of persons who were flying from Paris to escape the new tribunal and the guillotine, or massacre at the hands of the mob, and who seem generally to have encouraged him to persevere in his enterprise, which, desperate as it was, seemed to be the only hope left to them. Among these fugitives were the daughter of the Duke of Orleans, and Madame Genlis, who had recently been brought over from England to Paris. At the same time Dumouriez received the visit of three individuals who were by no means so friendly to him. These were Dubuisson, a refugee patriot of Brussels, a man of letters, and a leader in the Jacobin Club of Paris; Proly, said to be a natural son of Prince Kaunitz, a native of Brussels, stock-jobber, journalist, and a great Jacobin; and Pereyra (described by some as a Portuguese Jew, and by others as a native of Bayonne, descended from a Jewish family, which had been settled in Belgium), a tobacconist, and also a leading man in the Société Mère. All three were closely connected with Dumouriez's mortal foe, Marat; and it appears that they had received their mission from Marat and his party to act as spies over the general, and to detach his troops from him. They pretended, however, to have been commissioned by Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs. They found the general surrounded by the children of the Duke of Orleans, and by officers who did not belong to the sans-culottic order; and, upon announcing their pretended mission from Lebrun, they met with a very rough reception from Dumouriez. They repeated their visit on the following day, and requested a private interview. Dumouriez assented. It is said that the three Jacobins opened this secret conference by proposing that the general and his army should join their party heart and hand, overthrow the Convention, and establish, as a proper legislative body for France, the Société Mère, or Jacobin Club of Paris, who had already a president, registers and journals, tribunes and orators, and were in the habit of deliberating like statesmen on the most important subjects. If Dumouriez could have relied on the bloody and faithless faction, and if he had foreseen the miserable failure of the Coalition, there is little doubt but that he would have made terms with them; for his morality and conscience were of the loosest kind, and the one great object of his whole life was to be great and to be doing, to have plenty of money to spend on his private pleasures, and to enjoy a military fame. He was not a man of blood himself—far from it; he had no taste for the dirty nudities of sans-culottism, or for the society of cynical Jacobins and levellers, for he had lived in courts and in the most polished society, and his habits were decidedly patrician. He would have been glad to have kept the revolution where it was at the end of 1791, and to have served the constitutional king; he would have preferred serving under the respectability Girondists to serving under their rivals; but he would have served the Jacobins or the devil if he could have found his account in it. But he knew that the breach between him and the Jacobins was irreparable; he saw that they were determined to destroy all who had ever opposed them, and all whom they had ever suspected or might hereafter suspect; he counted on the strength of the Coalition, on the war in the Vendée, on the devotion of his own army, and on the desperation of the higher and middling classes in France, who must, he thought, be ready to rise and unite in one grand effort to liberate themselves from the horrible tyranny of the factions and the populace; and therefore Dumouriez expressed to the three emissaries of the Mother Society his abhorrence of that society, and attributed to it all the dire misfortunes and the indelible infamy of the French nation. At the same time he perfectly agreed with them as to the incapacity and disorderly state of the Convention, and the absolute necessity of annihilating it, and establishing another. Growing warm, he said, "The Convention is composed of two hundred brigands, and five hundred fools. As long as I have three inches of steel at my side, I will never suffer it to reign, or to shed blood by means of the revolutionary tribunal they have just established!" He then flew out against the volunteers who had behaved so badly at Neerwinden, calling them base cowards, and swearing that he would have no troops but troops of the line, with which he would march to Paris, and put things in order. "How!" cried the emissaries, "are you not for a republic?—Would you not have a constitution?" "As for your republic," replied Dumouriez, "I only believed in it for three days. Ever since the battle of Jemappe, I have regretted every advantage I have gained in the field for so bad a cause! As for this new republican constitution, imagined by Condorcet, it is much too silly an affair to last." "But what would you substitute for it?" "Why, the monarchic constitution of 1791, bad as it is." "But, General," said Dubuisson, "only reflect how all the French abominate royalty, and how the mere name of Louis . . ." "And what does it signify," rejoined the quick, little man, "what does it signify whether the king's name be Louis, or John or James?" "Or Philippe?" said journalist Proly, alluding to the belief, long since entertained, that Dumouriez wanted to make the Duke of Chartres king. The emissaries asked how he would replace the Convention? "Oh," said he, "there are local administrations, all chosen by the people: take a president from each of your five hundred districts, and you will have five hundred representatives all ready. Let them be a legislative assembly!" "But what means have you at your disposal?" "The Mamelukes, that is to say, my army: yes, my army will do it all; and from my camp, or from a fortress, my soldiers will declare that they want a king!" "But your project exposes to destruction the prisoners in the Temple, the queen, the dauphin."

"If the last of the Bourbons were killed, including even those who are at Coblenz, still France would have a king; but, if Paris dares to add this atrocious murder of the prisoners of the Temple to its other murders and massacres, I will fly with my army to Paris! Twelve thousand men will be enough to make me master of the capital. It is not I that will imitate the imbecile de Broglie, who, with thirty thousand men under his command, permitted a mob to surprise the Bastille. With two good posts—one at Nogent, and the other at Pont-Saint-Maxence—I could make the Parisians perish of hunger! As for your Jacobins, if they wish to expiate all their crimes, let them save the unfortunate prisoners in the Temple, and drive out the seven hundred and forty-nine tyrants of the Convention, and they shall be pardoned." The emissaries spoke of his own personal risk and danger, and of the terrible fate which might befall him in case of any failure. "Oh," said Dumouriez, "I shall always have time enough to gallop over to the Austrians." "But, how! will you fly to be thrown into a dungeon, like Lafayette?" "I shall go over to the enemy in a very different manner from that of Lafayette," quoth Dumouriez; "and, besides, the foreign powers have a very different opinion of my talents, and cannot reproach me, as they do him, with having had part in the 5th and 6th of October at Versailles." Dubuisson, Proly, and Percyra took their leaves, saying that they would return instantly to Paris, and sound the Jacobins as to this project. The General then marched to Bruille, and attempted to gain possession of the three important frontier fortresses of Lille, Condé, and Valenciennes. He opened some secret communication with friends in those three fortresses; but the Convention had sent commissioners to each of them, the populace and the troops were decided republicans, and nothing was to be expected from them. The artillery, the troops of the line, the cavalry, and all the organised bodies with him, seemed to be as devoted as ever to his person; but he had not been able to get rid of all the volunteers and federates, and these men penetrated into his design, or were instructed by the three emissaries, or by some other secret agents, for the Jacobins had woven a web of spy-work all round Dumouriez. On the 31st of March, six of these volunteers, wearing on their hats the motto, "The republic or death!" rushed upon him in his camp, as if with the intention of making him a prisoner; but an eel in deep water, or a snake in a bush, was not more difficult to seize than the nimble, adroit, and daring Dumouriez, who, with the assistance of his faithful valet, Baptiste, repulsed the six sans-culottes, and delivered them over as prisoners to the hussars. After this adventure, he openly raised the standard of revolt. He sent, on the same day, General Miazinski with a thousand men to try to surprise Lille. Miazinski was duped by a mulatto colonel in the place, who pretended to enter into his views, induced him to come within the walls of

Lille, and then consigned him to a dungeon, from which he was soon carried to Paris and the guillotine. Dumouriez then tried a similar scheme against Valenciennes; but here his own officer, whom he sent to that place, betrayed him, and joined the republican commandant. On the 1st of April Dumouriez removed his head-quarters to the baths of St. Amand, where, in the preceding year, he had so often conferred with the ultra-Jacobin Couthon. The object of his removal was to be near Condé; for, though he had failed so sadly at Lille and Valenciennes, he still hoped he might gain possession of this last fortress, and some fortress was indispensable to his scheme. Either at St. Amand, or on his road thither, he arrested the son of draper Lecointre, deputy of Versailles, and sent him over to the Austrians at Tournay to be kept as an hostage. In the mean while the Convention, with terrible thunder, had summoned the revolted general to their bar; and, not fancying that he would come without compulsion, they had dispatched four of their members to bring him, and win over his army. On the 2nd of April the Duke of Chartres, aware of the storm that was coming, sent off his sister under the charge of Madame Genlis; and the two ladies, after long and rough travelling and many dangers, reached Switzerland in safety, but all but penniless.* In the evening of the same day the four deputies of the Convention—Camus, Quinette, Lamarque, and Bancal—arrived, together with Beurnonville, the new minister-at-war, who had formerly been the bosom friend of Dumouriez, to whom, in fact, he had owed his rapid promotion in the revolutionary army and his appointment as minister. Dumouriez used to call him his Ajax. As the deputies and minister arrived, they found their visit had not been unexpected or unprepared for. A foreign regiment (the hussars of Berchigny) were drawn up in battle array before the general's quarters, and all the officers of Dumouriez's staff were collected within the house round his person. As they entered, these staff-officers scowled upon them. They refused to confer with the general in the presence of so many persons. Dumouriez coolly led them into an inner room, but his officers insisted that the door should be left open, so that they should not lose sight of their beloved chief. Archivist Camus then began, in his prim, starch manner, to read the decree of the Convention which called him to the bar. At first Dumouriez replied that the state of his army required his presence—that afterwards, when his army should be reorganised, he would see what was to be done; but, when Camus canted and protested that no harm was meant to his person, he cried out, in his rapid, passionate manner, that he would not be such a fool as to go to Paris and deliver himself up to the bloody revolutionary tribunal—that the tigers were yelling for his head, but should not have it. The commissioners united in the solemn lie that no harm was meant in calling him to the bar, and in representing to him, by force of old Roman examples, that it was his duty to submit to the republic. "Gentlemen," replied Dumouriez, "we are constantly committing mistakes in our quotations from the classics; we parody and disfigure Roman history in citing their virtues to excuse our crimes. The Romans did not kill Tarquin: the Romans had a well-regulated republic and good laws; and they had neither a Jacobin Club nor a revolutionary tribunal. We are plunged in anarchy; we are wading in blood!" "Citizen General," said Camus, "will you obey the decree of the National Convention or not?" "Not exactly at this moment." "Eh bien!" rejoined the archivist; "I declare in the name of the Convention that you are no longer general of this army; and I order that your papers be seized and that you be arrested!" "Ceci est trop fort—this is rather too strong," cried Dumouriez: "hola, hussars!" (hussards à moi!) The Berchigny men, who were nearly all Germans, trooped in with ringing spurs and rattling sabres. The general said a few words to them in the German language, the French of which would be, "Arrêtez ces gens-là, mais qu'on ne leur fasse aucun mal," and the plain English, "Arrest these people, but do not hurt them." The hussars surrounded the deputies. War-minister Beurnonville begged to share their fate. "Be it so," said Dumouriez; "and I believe that, in packing you off with the deputies, I shall render you a great service, and snatch you from the revolutionary tribunal." As they had been travelling all day, and might be hungry, he ordered some supper to be served up for them; and when that was over the four deputies and the war-minister were put into two chaises, and whisked away to Tournay as fast as the post-horses and the horses of a detachment of the Berchigny hussars could go. On the route Beurnonville made an attempt to escape, for which one of the rude Germans cut him over the pate. The Prince of Saxe-Coburg passed them on to Maestricht, and they were kept as hostages in different Austrian fortresses till the end of November, 1795, when they were exchanged for the princess-royal, the only survivor of the captives of the Temple. During the night Dumouriez drew up a proclamation to his army and to all France. With some eloquence and effect—for he was a good penman—he recalled his past services,—his exploits at Argonne, which had obtained for him the name of "The Saviour of France," his ever-memorable battle of Jemappe, and his rapid conquest of all Belgium. He attributed his reverses to the enmity of Marat and the Jacobins, who had devoted him and all honourable men to destruction. He drew a frightful picture—but not less true than frightful—of the prevailing sanguinary anarchy; and he called upon all Frenchmen to rise and rally round him and the monarchical constitution of 1791. He declared that the English were fomenting these troubles, but that the Austrians were generous and humane, and had engaged to suspend their march, not to pass the French frontier, and to leave to the brave French army the office of terminating all internal dissensions. On the following morning, the 3rd of April, he was on horseback betimes with all his staff. The troops were informed of all that had happened; they expressed no dissatisfaction; the troops of the line seemed as steady as ever—they enthusiastically approved the measure he had taken, as did also the artillery. He had sent to make another appointment with Colonel Mack, and in the course of the day it was notified to him that not only Mack, but also the emperor's brother the Archduke Charles, and the Prince of Saxe-Coburg, would meet him on the morning of the 4th between Brumi and Condé in order to regulate future operations. At an early hour on the 4th Dumouriez, with the Duke of Chartres and the staff, were mounted; but an escort of fifty horse, which he had ordered, was not ready at the time appointed. Instead of waiting, Dumouriez and his party left orders for the dragoons to follow them, and set off. But they had scarcely got upon the road which led to Coudé when they met two battalions of volunteers, who were marching along furiously without order, and apparently without instructions. The party drew rein, and Dumouriez dismounted and entered a cottage by the roadside to draw up a written order as commander-in-chief. But in a minute he heard terrible cries of "Treachery, Treachery!" "Arrest the traitors!" and anon these cries were mingled with a fire of musketry. Dumouriez vaulted into his saddle, and he and his party, quitting the high road, struck right across the country, and over hedge and ditch as if they had been riding a steeple-chase. The volunteers had separated, and some of them had stationed themselves near a ditch. Dumouriez's horse refused the ditch, upon which he dismounted, threw himself into the ditch, and crossed it on foot, and under a hail-storm of musket-balls. On the other side he mounted a horse belonging to a servant, who had been either killed, or wounded and dismounted, and then the whole party spurred onward—onward for Bury, or some other place within the Austrian lines, for it was vain to think of going to the place of rendezvous which had been named. By some means—probably by the tremendous hubbub made all over the country—Mack was warned in good time, and, instead of repairing to a spot where all their adventures might very well have ended, he and the archduke and Saxe-Coburg rode back with a loose bridle for head-quarters. Dumouriez and his party rode nearly the whole day through a rough, swampy country, where their horses frequently sank to the saddle-girths: some of the horses were abandoned, some of the servants were killed; but, some on foot, and some mounted, and all covered with mud from the tip of the spur to the top of the feather, the general, the Duke of Chartres, and all the rest of the officers, reached Bury in safety as the sun was setting. They were soon joined by Saxe-Coburg and Mack, and these two and Dumouriez

passed the night in preparing a proclamation to be issued in the name of the Austrians* at the same time as his own proclamation, and in further explaining and settling the treaty between Dumouriez's army and that of the emperor; for, sorely hunted as he had been, Dumouriez did not yet give up all for lost: the vagabonds who had fired upon and pursued him were only volunteers—his regular troops would still stand by their general, and in the morning he would return to St. Amand and throw himself among them. Mack was astonished at this last resolution, and Coburg spoke feelingly of the terrible risk; but Dumouriez was confident and even gay: and, at dawn of day on the 5th, he mounted again, and, with an escort of only fifty Austrian horse, and the Duke of Chartres and the staff officers who had escaped with him from the volunteers, he returned towards his own camp. At the advanced post at Maulde, which he had occupied so long in 1792, and whence he had marched for the Argonne passes, he was received with decided marks of good will; but when he got to St. Amand the French soldiers began to murmur at seeing their general followed by Austrians, and an aide-de-camp rode up and informed him that during the night all the artillery, instigated by some emissaries from Valenciennes, who told them that Dumouriez was killed or drowned, had risen upon their officers and had marched off with all their guns, ammunition, and baggage for Valenciennes. While the aide-de-camp was making this report other divisions of the army began to move off by the same road which the artillery had taken; the cry, "Valenciennes! Valenciennes!" became general, and everything showed that the game was up. He turned his horse's head towards the head-quarters of the imperialists, and, with the Duke of Chartres and his brother the Duke of Montpensier, Colonel Thouvenot, and the rest of his numerous staff, he rode away from St. Amand. The entire regiment of Berchigny, 1500 strong, and some fragments of some French regiments, followed him and the sons of Orleans; but these were all; the rest, taking care to secure the military chest (said to contain two millions of livres), joined General Dampierre, who had been appointed by the Convention to the command of the army, and who established his head-quarters in Valenciennes.

At Tournay the fugitives were kindly received by Clairfait, the commander-in-chief of the imperialists; and, as they would not serve with the Austrian troops, they received passports, and were allowed to go wherever they chose. Most of them took the road to Switzerland, where the Duke of Chartres, who performed a good part of the journey

* In this proclamation the Imperial commander-in-chief declared that he acted only as an auxiliary to General Dumouriez; that the intention of his sovereign the emperor was not to attempt any conquest or aggrandizement whatever, but to restore peace and good order in Europe—to restore to France a constitutional king—the whole constitution of the year 1791, which she had herself freely chosen. The Austrian commander-in-chief further declared that he acknowledged and adopted all the principles of Dumouriez's proclamation, which would accompany his.

on foot, found his sister.* Dumouriez, the nimblest and cleverest man of France; never again appeared on the great stage, but for a long, a very long time he was busy behind the scenes projecting and furnishing plans, political and military, for other men, and for nearly all the nations of the earth, for his was a mind that never could lie idle, a spirit that never could be broken. The Convention put the price of 300,000 livres upon his head; and there were republicans in those days who, without any reward, would have stabbed him to the heart if they had been able to find him anywhere. The royalist emigrants scarcely entertained a more friendly feeling towards him, and he found, wherever he went on the Continent, that he was an object of suspicion. On the 14th of June he contrived to reach London; but on the 19th he received an order from the secretary of state to quit the kingdom in forty-eight hours. He sailed from Dover on the 22nd in the Ostend packet, which was escorted by an armed cutter. He took refuge in the city of Hamburgh, where he remained for several years, one of the busiest men of the place, though only in writing memoirs and political pamphlets. In 1805 he obtained permission to come and reside in England, and soon after, for some services rendered to the British government, he received a comfortable pension. He survived the French republic and its many constitutions, the fall of the empire, and the death of Napoleon Bonaparte. The restored Bourbon government, which recalled so many blockheads, and patronised so many scoundrels far worse than he, never recalled Dumouriez, who died in March, 1823, in the 85th year of his age, at Turville Park, near Henley-upon-Thames. The last effort of his senility was the writing a plan of military defence for the Neapolitan constitutionalists in 1821.

General Dampierre, who succeeded to the command of the republican forces, immediately threw himself into the fortified camp of Famars, which covered Valenciennes. He made some attempts to cover Condé also, but he failed, and that important fortress was invested by a part of the Austrian army early in April. The Duke of York having landed at Ostend with his small English army, it was resolved to make a vigorous attack along all that part of the French frontier, and to reduce Valenciennes and Condé (if not Lille also) at any price; and to this end General Clairfait, who—not without jealousies and dissensions—held the supreme command of the armies of the Coalition, where Austrians and Prussians, English and Dutch, were mixed without being amalgamated, reinforced Saxe-Coburg, who was commanding at Condé, and advanced towards Valenciennes. On the 8th of May Dampierre issued from his camp at Famars, and made an attack on the allies; his volunteers soon got into confusion, his best troops were beaten at all points; he was driven back to his camp with terrible loss, and a cannon-ball carried off his leg. Dampierre died the next day under the hands of his surgeons, thus escaping the guillotine, which the Parisians kept in permanence for all unsuccessful commanders.

DUKE OF YORK.

The total loss of the French in killed and wounded was estimated at 4000 by the allies, who acknowledged only a loss of 800 men. The Duke of York displayed much personal bravery, and the success of the battle was materially promoted by the British troops. The republicans fell into a lamentable state of discouragement and disorganization; and General Lamarche, who had succeeded to the command, was a man of no skill or energy. But the allies, instead of attacking him immediately, allowed him a whole fortnight to collect his troops within the fortified camp of Famars, and to receive immense re-inforcements from the interior of France. What the arms of the coalition did between the 9th and the 23rd of May appears to have been absolutely nothing. On the 23rd, at daybreak, they commenced an attack, which lasted till night-fall, though, if the Duke of York and his column, who gained a great advantage before the hour of noon, had been properly supported, the affair might have been settled, and in a more decisive manner, by one in the afternoon. Except in the artillery, which was numerous and well appointed, the republicans did not display any great military merit; the re-inforcements, being chiefly raw troops or volunteers, behaved as such troops always do at the beginning of a war; yet, though thoroughly beaten, Lamarche was allowed to retire and occupy another fortified camp between Valenciennes and Bouchain. The allies, with their ordinary slowness, then advanced upon Valenciennes, and began a regular and tedious siege, instead of bombarding it at the beginning, as they were obliged to do at the end. Condé was blockaded. A third division of the army of the Coalition cantoned itself opposite to Lamarche's fortified camp, and remained there, drumming and drilling, and doing little else, all through the months of June and July. The French army of the Moselle, which served to connect (though imperfectly) their army of the North, now under Lamarche, with their army of the Rhine under Custine, was left perfectly unmolested, because the Prince of Hohenlohe had a very insufficient force, and was ordered to disperse it over an immense line to be at hand to cover a great number of towns and fortresses, which might very well have been left to themselves. The King of Prussia, who had undertaken to open in person the campaign on the Rhine, to drive in Custine, and to invade France by the valley of the Moselle, was slow in coming, and, when he came, he did not bring with him anything like the number of troops he had promised, having found it necessary to send a considerable part of his army into Poland to secure the territory which he had so unjustly seized in that country.

* According to Madame Genlis, Louis Philippe, when he arrived in Switzerland, was rather poorer than his sister and herself, his worldly possessions not much exceeding the clothes on his back and the good stout stick in his hand.

And here it will be proper to mention a few facts connected with that dark transaction, which had been denounced in the British parliament, and which, in many ways, acted as a spell and curse upon the Coalition. At the beginning of the year, when all minds were occupied about the French revolution, Frederick William sent some Prussian troops into Great Poland, and seized upon Thorn and Dantzic, justifying his proceedings in a manifesto, which declared that the Poles had behaved very ungratefully to his ally the Empress of Russia; that they had had the temerity in the preceding year to make an obstinate resistance to the Russian troops; that they had disquieted his own dominions by repeated excesses and violations of territory; that they had imbibed the French democracy, and the principles of that detestable faction, who were seeking to make proselytes everywhere, and who had already been so well received in Poland that the enterprises of the Jacobin emissaries were not only most powerfully seconded, but even revolution societies were established, that made an open profession of Jacobin principles. He further declared that it was chiefly Great Poland, which touched his own frontiers, that was infected with this dangerous poison; and that, therefore, a just distrust, on account of the tranquillity and safety of his own kingdom, put him under the necessity of adopting strong measures. He had consulted both his imperial allies, the Emperor of Germany as well as the Empress of Russia. "His majesty," continued the memorable manifesto, "being necessitated, in common with the allied courts, to continue the war (against France), and being on the eve of opening a campaign, thought it proper to concert measures with the courts of Vienna and Petersburg; and their imperial majesties could not forbear owning that, from sound policy, it could not be allowed that the factions should be suffered to have their way in Poland, and expose his majesty to the danger of having an enemy in the rear, whose violent and wild enterprises might become a source of fresh troubles." The miserable Polish Diet, or Confederation, assembled at Grodno, issued, on the 3rd of February, a long and solemn protest against the Prussian invasion; but this was nearly all they could do. On the 14th of February the Emperor Francis put forth a declaration that, inspired by the love of peace and good neighbourhood, he would not interfere with the plans of the King of Prussia and the Empress of Russia, or permit any of his subjects to counteract them. The Poles at Grodno appealed to the generosity and magnanimity of Catherine, whose army occupied all the country that was not in the hands of the Prussians or overawed by Austrian troops in Galicia; and Catherine answered their appeal in the month of March by a ukase, in which she declared that thirty years' experience had proved that all her generous efforts to put an end to the innumerable quarrels and the eternal disputes which tore the Polish republic had all been thrown away; that her heart had bled for the sufferings of the people, who were of the same race, and professed the same holy Christian religion, as her own subjects; that, latterly, some unworthy Poles, enemies to their country, had not been ashamed to approve the government of the ungodly rebels in the kingdom of France, and to request their assistance to involve their country also in bloody civil wars; that these enemies of peace and quiet had been propagating their doctrines to the utmost of their power, which must destroy for ever their own and their neighbours' happiness; and, finally, that for these and other weighty considerations—"as well to indemnify herself for her many expenses, as for the future safety of her empire and of the Polish dominions, and for the cutting off at once, and for ever, all future disturbances and frequent changes of government"—she had been pleased now to take under her sway, and unite for ever to her empire, certain specified parts of Poland, with all their inhabitants, who, from the highest to the lowest, within one month, were to take the oath of allegiance to her before witnesses whom she would appoint. This manifesto was ordered to be read in all the churches on the 27th of the present month of March; and the Polish clergy, both high and low, as pastors of their flocks, were expected to set the example in taking the oath of allegiance, and were commanded, in the daily service in their churches, to pray for her imperial majesty, for her successor (the Grand-Duke Paul), and for all the imperial family. On the 25th of March his Prussian majesty put forth another manifesto, in which, speaking more plainly than he had done before, he told the Poles that, in conjunction with her majesty the Empress of Russia, and with the assent of his majesty the Emperor of Germany, he had resolved to take possession of certain districts of Poland, and also of the cities of Dantzic and Thorn, for the purpose of incorporating them with his own states. Frederick William also called upon the Poles dwelling in the said cities, and within the line of demarcation he had drawn, to take the oath of allegiance to him, or abide the consequences; but (in this more delicate than Catherine) he did not command them or their priests to pray to God for him and his line. This was followed, on the 29th of March, old style, or the 9th of April, new style, by a Russian declaration from de Sievers, Catherine's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary, who was residing at Grodno. In this public document fresh vials of wrath were poured upon the constitution of May, 1791, and upon the secret machinations which had followed the victories of the Russians and the overthrow of that constitution. After stating that the factions had made unsuccessful attempts at foreign courts to render the liberal conduct of Russia odious, and her views suspicious, it went on to aggravate the offences of the Poles (the lambs in this quarrel with wolves), and said, "Without speaking about several facts of public notoriety, which prove the mischievous disposition of the greatest number of the Poles, let it suffice to mention that they have been known to abuse even the principles of humanity and moderation, to which the generals and officers of the empress's army, pursuant to the express orders they had received, conformed their conduct and actions; and to burst out against them in all manner of insults and bad behaviour, insomuch that the most audacious of them have dared to talk about Sicilian vespers, and to threaten to make the Russians undergo the same sort of massacre." It spoke somewhat prematurely of the fate which had befallen France in consequence of the revolution and the Jacobins, saying, "The unnatural delirium of a people of late so flourishing, now degraded, dismembered, and on the brink of an abyss ready to swallow them, instead of being an object of horror for these factious Poles, appears to them a pattern for imitation. They endeavour to introduce into the bosom of Poland the infernal doctrines which a sect altogether impious, sacrilegious, and absurd has engendered, to the misfortune and dissolution of all religious, civil, and political societies. Clubs, which are connected with the Jacobin clubs of Paris, are already established in the capital, as well as in several provinces, of Poland; and these clubs distil their poison in a secret manner, fill the minds of the people with it, and cause them to ferment." All this nearly concerned the sovereign powers whose states bordered upon the dominions of Poland; and therefore, "they have in conjunction taken the most proper measures for stifling the evil before it comes to maturity, and preventing its contagion from reaching their own frontiers; and her majesty the Empress of all the Russias, and his majesty the King of Prussia, with the assent of his majesty the Emperor of the Romans, have found no other measures effectual for their respective safety than to confine the republic of Poland within narrower bounds, by awarding to her an existence and proportions which suit an intermediary power best, and which facilitate to her the means of securing and preserving herself without prejudicing her former liberty, and by awarding to her a government that is wisely regulated, and at the same time active enough to prevent and repress all disorders and disturbances, that have so often impaired her own tranquillity and that of her neighbours. For this purpose, their majesties the Empress of all the Russias and the King of Prussia, being united with a perfect concert of views and principles, are thoroughly convinced that they cannot better prevent the entire subversion the Polish republic is threatened with, after the discord that has divided it, and especially in consequence of the monstrous opinions that begin to manifest themselves, than by uniting to their respective states those of the provinces of Poland which actually border upon their territories, and by taking an immediate and effective possession of them, in order to shelter themselves in time from the fatal effects of these opinions." De Sievers finished his declaration by inviting the Poles to assemble, as soon as possible, in a special Diet, to agree to an amicable arrangement, and to concur with the salutary intentions of Russia and Prussia. The General Confederation, including and mainly consisting of the same Polish magnates who had invited the Russians into Poland to overthrow the constitution of 1791, expressed, in a note to de Sievers, their astonishment and dismay at these propositions for a fresh partition of their country. They said that the taking of the wealthiest provinces of Poland, whose extent exceeded that of the provinces which would be left to her, could not be an object of negotiation susceptible of an amicable arrangement, but rather a declaration of what those two powers (Russia and Prussia) had chosen to appropriate. They protested timidly, and made faint appeals to the treaties entered into at the former partition, when Russia, Prussia, and Austria solemnly guaranteed the integrity of Poland as it was then left; and they mentioned their own duties as Polish confederates, and their own solemn oath, taken in the face of the church, to maintain the integrity of their country. Poor King Poniatowski, after in vain petitioning Catherine, and offering to abdicate the throne, was compelled to assemble a sort of Diet; and this Diet, though not without coercion and violence, the threat of exile in Siberia, and the actual arrest of some of its members by Russian soldiery, was compelled to ratify a fresh partition which made over to Russia a territory containing a population of more than three millions and a half, and to Prussia a territory containing nearly one million and a half of inhabitants, together with the navigation of the Vistula and the port of Dantzic on the Baltic, which she had so long coveted. The leavings were secured to Poniatowski, but he was bound to govern according to the old crazy constitution; and, to keep him in the right path, a strong Russian garrison was fixed permanently at Warsaw, and the Russian ambassador gave the law in all things. Prussia was obliged to employ a large part of her army in garrisoning Dantzic and Thorn, and in keeping down insurrection in Great Poland; and Austria was obliged to keep one large force in Galicia, and another on the Turkish frontier, as, in case of any renewed attempts on the part of the Poles to recover their independence, they would be sure to attempt an insurrection in Galicia, which was their country until the time of the first dismemberment, and to try to bring their old allies the Turks into the war. The arguments used by the despoilers threw ridicule and discredit upon the manifestos and declarations of other countries who had better reasons for dreading the spread of the Gallic disease; and their conduct had the effect of confirming the French republicans in their belief that the Coalition proposed to dismember and partition France.

In consequence of these transactions, which were not terminated when he took the field, but which continued to distract his attention all through the campaign, it was the month of April before the King of Prussia crossed the Rhine and invested Mayence; and then he only brought with him some 50,000 men, including Saxons, Hessians, and Bavarians, who served under their own princes. Even when joined by 15,000 or 20,000 Austrians under Wurmser, and by 5000 or 6000 French emigrants under the Prince of Condé, his force was insufficient for the work he had undertaken to do; for in their fortresses alone the French had between 40,000 and 50,000 men, while their army on the Rhine was at least 50,000 strong, and their army on the Moselle more than 30,000; and garrisons and armies had it in their power to draw continual reinforcements from the interior of France, that vast fermenting camp. Moreover, the French had 20,000 men within the walls of Mayence when his majesty of Prussia and Wurmser began to invest it in the old formal and slow manner. In the month of May, Custine, who had put himself at the head of the troops in the field, made an attempt to raise the siege, and was routed with great loss; but still the immense garrison held out, and it was not until the 22nd of July that Mayence surrendered to the King of Prussia, who, though the French were actually starving, and must soon have surrendered at discretion, allowed them to march out with the honours of war; and these 20,000 men, marching away into the Vendée, contributed very materially to the internal success of the republicans. If, instead of wasting their time, and exhausting the strength and spirit of their troops, in long blockades and sieges, all the allies—Austrians, Prussians, English, Spaniards, and Sardinians—had advanced boldly and simultaneously from the Belgian frontier, from the Rhine, from the Pyrenees, from Savoy, and from Nice, right into the heart of France, while the insurrection in the Vendée in the west, insurrections in Languedoc and Provence, and all through the south, and other troubles, were at their height, they might possibly have all met at Paris; but this bold way of making war had not yet been invented: it was still considered necessary that an army should leave no great fortresses in its rear in the hands of the enemy; and thus, before they had finished their sieges, the Vendéans were checked, the other in-surgers were scattered, and an improved organization was introduced into the armies of the republic. Most of the allied powers, too, had their separate views, and were seeking how they could best turn the war to their own immediate advantage; and, even without this conflict of selfishness, there must have been a divergency of opinion, and a want of proper concert, among so many princes, chiefs, and generals, some of whom were separated from each other by the whole length or breadth of France, and with none but tedious or uncertain communications with one another. In this way the Spaniards spent weeks and months in besieging forts and fortresses in Rousillon; and the troops of the King of Sardinia did the same thing in Savoy and Nice: the Prussians spent three months before Mayence, and the Austrians and the English nearly two months before Condé and Valenciennes. At last, the conduct of that siege having been intrusted to the Duke of York, a terrific bombardment was begun at Valenciennes; and on the 28th of July, when more than half of the town was reduced to ashes or battered to pieces, it surrendered to the duke, who took possession in the name of the emperor, and planted the imperial flag in the fortress. Condé, which had been invested before the siege of Valenciennes was begun, surrendered to the Prince of Saxe-Coburg or to famine some days earlier. In the month of August the Duke of York had to march back to Menin, to the relief of the Hereditary Prince of Orange, who was enveloped by a superior French force, and whose Dutch troops showed little stomach for fighting. Three battalions, headed by General Lake, liberated the prince; and afterwards drove the French from a strong redoubt they had thrown up at the village of Lincelles. The Duke of York then moved towards Dunkirk, and began, at the end of August, to lay regular siege to that place. Badly seconded, or not seconded at all, by the Dutch under the Prince of Orange, who remained posted at Menin, at the distance of three days' march; badly aided by Marshal Freytag, who ought to have been close at hand at Furnes, but who preferred keeping at a distance; disappointed in the arrival of an English squadron, harassed by a French flotilla of gunboats and small vessels that came out from Dunkirk, and vigorously opposed by a strong garrison under Souham and young Hoche, and threatened by a force more numerous than his own, which was manœuvring round him under Houchard—the Duke of York, after some sharp skirmishing, found himself compelled to raise the siege on the 7th of September. In the mean time the Prince of Coburg defeated a strong body of republicans near Landrecies; and, in consequence of this victory, Quesnoy surrendered to him on the 11th of September. On the same day Houchard fell upon the Dutch at Menin, and, after two days' skirmishing, drove them from those positions; but on the 15th the Austrian general Beaulieu fell upon Houchard between Menin and Courtray and defeated him with the greatest ease; for at the unexpected apparition of a small corps of cavalry on one of their wings the sans-culottes set up the cry of "Sauve qui peut," ran from the field like packs of yelping jackals, and never stopped until they got under the walls and guns of Lille. Houchard was presently recalled to Paris to be guillotined.

By this time the French, who had put in requisition every species of vehicle in order to forward with more speed the regular troops they collected from various quarters and from their garrisons which seemed safe from attack, had formed an immense, overwhelming force on the Belgian frontier. If they had made a series of single concentrated attacks on the divided forces of the allies, they could hardly have failed of destroying those scattered corps one by one; but the republicans had not yet attained to that system; their generals scarcely displayed more intelligence, originality, or invention than the old commanders of the royalist armies, who were wedded to routine; and hence a scattered enemy was attacked by scattered corps, and fighting or skirmishing, without any decisive result, went on here and there and everywhere, from Dunkirk to Maubeuge, and from Maubeuge to Luxembourg. Shortly after the retreat of the Duke of York from Dunkirk, the French attacked every post on that long frontier-line, but, in spite of their numbers, they were everywhere repulsed. On the 15th and 16th of October the republicans were more successful. General Jourdan, who had gradually collected an immense force in a fortified camp close to Maubeuge, sallied out against Coburg, who had been watching the camp, attacked him with great spirit, and after two days' manœuvring and fighting compelled him to recross the river Sambre. The Duke of York, who had come up by forced marches to assist Coburg, was indignant at this retreat, and declared it to be unnecessary; but for a long time there had been no good understanding between the young English prince and his German ally; and it seems to be admitted that there was nothing to gain, but a great deal to lose or risk, by Coburg's remaining on the right bank of the Sambre. The arrival at Ostend of a considerable English armament, under the command of Sir Charles Grey, enabled the allies to stop and head back the republican torrent, and to preserve the Low Countries during the rest of the year.

Having taken Mayence, and permitted the 20,000 republicans to march off for La Vendée, and having gained some trifling advantages in skirmishes on the Rhine, the King of Prussia quitted his army, and travelled with all speed into Poland, to look after his iniquitous acquisitions in that country, and to patch up some differences and jealousies which had broken out between him and the Emperor of Germany. He left the command of his army on the Rhine to the Duke of Brunswick, who was to act in concert with the small Austrian army under Wurmser. These two generals, with some slow, cautious, but well-combined movements, drove the republicans from several strong posts, and, about the middle of October, expelled them from their fortified lines at Weissenburg, their great bulwark in that direction, and also from the fortified camp and triple lines at Lauter. The Prussians then laid siege to Landau; and the Austrians, invited by the noblesse and no inconsiderable part of the people of Alsace, which had once belonged to the imperial house, and which still was more like a part of Germany than a part of France, invested Strasburg, the capital of that province. The Convention, who always sent a pair of their most daring and desperate members to every point where the danger seemed to be great, dispatched St. Just and Lebas to Strasburg, and these two worthies introduced the reign of terror into the town, and into the whole of Alsace, except only the narrow slips of it that were covered by Wurmser's arms. They united themselves with the sans-culottes; they called up troops from the army of the Ardennes, which had nothing to do; they made a levée-en-masse in all the surrounding departments; they placed the volunteers and raw levies in the neighbouring fortresses, and brought into the field, or into Strasburg, all the old garrisons, which were composed of regular troops; they arrested every man that was suspected of a correspondence or intelligence with Wurmser, or that had money or property to confiscate; and they set at work a guillotine which they had brought with them. It was a facetious saying of Lebas, that, with a little guillotine and a great deal of terror, the republicans might do everything. Custine was wanted at Paris to be beheaded. St. Just called young Hoche from Dunkirk, and gave him the command of that army, which was now reinforced by nearly the whole of the army of the Moselle, which had done little, and hitherto suffered nothing, in this campaign. Wurmser was obliged to retreat before these overwhelming numbers, and Strasburg was left to the sans-culottes, the two commissioners of the Convention, and the guillotine. Hoche made a bold attempt to get between Wurmser and Brunswick, but the commander of the Prussian army was on the alert; the ground was difficult and unfavourable to the French; and Hoche, after skirmishing and fighting all the three last days of November, was repulsed, beaten, put to flight, with the loss of three or four thousand men, and with scarcely any loss to the Duke of Brunswick, who had made an admirable use of his local advantages. The republican general then effected a junction with all that was left of the French army of the Rhine, and with all the troops that Lebas and St. Just had collected in Alsace; and, crossing the heights of the Vosges, and taking Wurmser by surprise, and then outflanking him with his vast superiority of numbers, he defeated the Austrians, made many prisoners, and took a considerable portion of Wurmser's artillery. Besides their numerical superiority, the French had the incalculable advantage of being animated by one spirit and guided by one will; but many recent circumstances had revived the inveterate national animosities between the Austrians and the Prussians, who now rarely met except to quarrel, and who, when separate, seemed to care little about acting in concert or aiding one another. Those who suffered most by Wurmser's retreat were his unfortunate Alsatian partisans. On the 26th of December Hoche, aided by Desaix, Pichegru, and Michaud, made a tremendous attack upon the lines of Weissemburg, and was on the point of driving the Austrians from those lines when the Duke of Brunswick, whose besieging force at Landau and whose whole army would be committed by such a defeat, or by any sudden and disorderly retreat of the Austrians, arrived in force, beat back the French, and kept them at bay for the remainder of that day. On the morrow Wurmser withdrew his army in good order, and the French obtained re-possession of their old bulwark. The Prussians, who had now raised their siege of Landau, wished the Austrians to remain on the left bank of the Rhine until all the Duke of Brunswick's artillery and stores should be well advanced on the road towards Mayence; but the Austrians would not consent to stay a single day, and they crossed the Rhine on the 28th, leaving the Duke of Brunswick to shift for himself. The duke got his army safely into Mayence, but soon afterwards resigned the command of it, with many bitter accusations against the Austrians, to which Wurmser and some of his friends replied with counter-accusations and reproaches just as bitter. Even thus early did these evil prognostics cloud the hopes entertained of the success of royal coalitions over the French anarchists. By the end of the year the French had not only recovered their old frontier-lines in this direction, but they had also the whole of the Palatinate at their mercy. It was in the Palatinate that Hoche chose his short winter-quarters.

Spain was not in a condition to employ a very large land army; but the troops she brought into the field acted for some time with considerable spirit and intelligence. Servan, formerly the Girondist minister at war, was now commander-in-chief of the republican army of the Pyrenees; and at the opening of the campaign he complained, like Dumouriez, of having his army badly supplied and equipped by the central government, and disorganised and demoralised by the Jacobins and their club laws. The central government, considering the military command of the whole line of the Pyrenees, from Bayonne on the west on the Bay of Biscay, to Perpignan on the east on the Gulf of Lyons, too extensive for one command, divided it into two, placing Servan under the Western Pyrenees, and Deflers, who had served under Dumouriez in Holland, at the east of the chain. Deflers took up an excellent position, and made a sort of fortified camp at Mas-d'Eu, in front of Perpignan. He was attacked there about the middle of May by the Spanish general Ricardos, who advanced from Figueras, in Catalonia, with about 15,000, or, according to the French accounts, 18,000 men, whereof a good part were militia or raw levies. After a long and obstinate engagement Deflers was completely beaten, and the French never stopped running until they came to the walls of Perpignan. As it was dark or dusk, the garrison of that town took the fugitives for Spaniards, closed their gates upon them, and fired at them both with artillery and musketry before they found out their mistake. Altogether the garrison inside and the fugitives outside were in a terrible state of panic and helplessness. If the Spaniards had followed up their success, and had pursued Desfers, they might have taken Perpignan that very night; but Ricardos had left two insignificant French forts only masked in his rear, and he considered, according to the old rules of war, that he ought to return and take those two places before he advanced against Perpignan, though Perpignan was the capital city of the country, (Rousillon, which had once belonged to Spain,) and its capture would have secured the fall of the other places. The Spaniards besieged and battered Bellegarde and Les Bains, and reduced both forts; but it was the end of June before they got possession of them, and Desfers had employed the interval in improving and greatly increasing his army, and in taking up again and more strongly fortifying his old camp in advance of Perpignan. Ricardos marched boldly to drive them again out of their camp; but its strength and the number of troops within it made him pause. He encamped or bivouacked round the spot for several days, but, seeing that reinforcements came to the French and none to him, he gallantly attacked them on all sides of their camp on the 17th of July. Some of the French again behaved in a cowardly manner and fled, crying "Sauve qui peut;" but Desfers, aided by two or three other generals, who had to run among the ranks, and harangue, conjure, and swear, and now and then use the flats of their swords, kept the rest steady, and, making a concentrated attack on one part of the too much extended Spanish lines, broke it and beat them, and gained a victory, which elated all the republicans of the South in an extraordinary manner. Ricardos was thus obliged to abandon his conquests and retire towards the frontiers of Catalonia, just as the great royalist insurrection of the South of France broke out and extended nearly all along the coast of the Gulf of Lyons, or from Beziers to the mouths of the Rhone and to Marseilles, and just as the British and Spanish fleets got possession of Toulon on the opposite side of the Gulf. The Spanish general who commanded at the other extremity of the Pyrenees was Don Ventura Caro, who descended from the Biscayan provinces early in April, drove in Servan's advanced guard, attacked the fortress of Andaya, drove the French from it on the 23rd of April, destroyed their fortified encampment a few days later, and then retired without loss to his own territory. If, instead of skirmishing and manœuvring at the foot of the Western Pyrenees, Caro and his army had been waded in good shipping across the Bay of Biscay, and had been landed on the coast of the Vendée early in the summer, when 40,000

Vendéan loyalists were up in arms and flushed by victory, they might have rendered very important services at a critical moment. Remaining where they did, they were of little use except in giving employment to one of the numerous French corps d'armées. Servan displayed no great talent and obtained no success: on the fall of his party, the Girondists, he resigned the command of this army of the Western Pyrenees: he was thrown into prison during the Reign of Terror, but miraculously escaped the guillotine. His successor could scarcely keep the country between Bayonne and Fuenterrabia from Caro, who repeatedly harrowed it. In the autumn the brave Ricardos once more advanced from the confines of Catalonia, and once more attacked the French in their fortified camp of Mas d'Eu, near Perpignan; but Davoust, marching out of Perpignan with 6000 or 7000 men, fell upon one of his flanks, while Perignon, coming out of Salces with another strong column of French troops, fell upon his other flank; and, overwhelmed by numbers, the Spaniards were driven off the field, upon which they left twenty or twenty-five pieces of their artillery. They did not, however, fly far; they rallied in the camp from which they had marched that morning to make the attack. The French resolved to attack them there through the nicely combined movements of three several columns, who were to pursue different routes, and fall on, at the same instant, in front, flank, and rear. But one of these columns, led by Davoust, set up a "Sauve qui peut" as soon as it came near the Spaniards, and broke and fled in the most disorderly fashion. Ricardos then attacked in full force the second column without heeding the third, and beat it and put it also to flight. General Dagobert, who commanded the third French column, and who was now commander-in-chief of the whole of this army, did what man could do to keep it steady and together; but when the victorious Ricardos fell upon it a whole battalion threw down their arms and cried "Vive le Roi!" At this un-republican, un-Roman conduct, Dagobert turned his artillery upon the battalion, peppered the cowards as long as he could, and then retreated with only a few hundred men, being all that was visible of the three columns. Had but the resources of Spain been adequate to the support of a great army; had but the Spaniards been kept in heart by a succession of these victories at the beginning of the war; and had but the rest of the Coalition acted with more spirit and wisdom, the old fame of the Spanish infantry might have been revived, and a Spanish army, peradventure, might have seen Paris before a French army had seen Madrid. As things were, all that Ricardos could do was to maintain himself in that strip of the coast of Rousillon which lies between the borders of Catalonia and Perpignan, and to send two or three thousand of his men to assist the allies in keeping possession of Toulon. Another miracle was seen in the fate of old Dagobert, for, though so unsuccessful, he was not guillotined any more than Servan.

On the side of the Alps, the King of Sardinia, "specially comforted by some money he had received from Great Britain," began the campaign with some vigour, being, moreover, further reinforced by fresh Austrian regiments under the command of General Devins, whose merits, even in that army, had raised him from the ranks. Devins, counting upon the intelligence which subsisted between the French malecontents of Lyons and Provence and nearly all the South, and upon the assurances of a most animated co-operation given personally to the court of Turin by M. Precy, the secret agent of the Lyonese, was of opinion that a part of the army should be left on the maritime Alps to keep in check the French forces which occupied the country of Nice, and that the greater part of the army, composed of Austrians and of the best Piedmontese and Sardinian troops, should march through Savoy, drive the French out of that country, chastise the Savoyard Jacobins, who had been the principal cause of all that had happened there in the preceding year, and thence march straight on to the populous city of Lyons. But the king, Vittorio Amedeo, who was not without warm and generous feelings, was greatly grieved at the sufferings of the faithful people of Nice, and could not tolerate the idea of leaving them for a whole campaign at the mercy of the republicans. The Savoyards, he said, had betrayed him, and they might be left to eat the fruits of their treachery and folly (what with overbearing republican generals, and the Jacobin clubs, and the plundering commissioners from the Convention, the Savoyards were tolerably well punished); but the poor Nissards, who had been so true to their king and their church, who had shown their abhorrence of Jacobin principles, and who had bravely fought their invaders in their native mountains, ought to be succoured and rescued before anything else was done or attempted. Devins, and others who thought his plan by far the more preferable, and who believed that, if properly executed, it would have an immense effect in the south of France, were obliged to yield to the decided feeling and will of the king; and to this cause they afterwards attributed every reverse and misfortune. The mass of the army was collected on the maritime Alps; and, before any descent was to be attempted into the country of Nice, fortified camps were to be made, and sundry fortresses improved or re-constructed, to render it impossible, even in case of a reverse, that the republicans should force the passes of the mountains, and get into Piedmont on that side. The command in chief of the French army of the Alps was now intrusted to Kellermann, who had fought so bravely at Valmy. To be in a situation to support both the troops in Savoy and the troops in Nice, Kellermann, with the centre and main body of the army, established himself in a fortified camp at Tornus in the alpine valley of Queiras, about equidistant from Chambéry and from Nice. A strong division of his army, assisted by Savoyard militia and volunteers, occupied the long valley of St. Jean de Maurienne, and watched the pass of Mont Cenis, over which lay the most direct road from Turin; another corps occupied the Tarantaise, and another was posted at Conflans, where the two valleys of the Isere and the Arc join. The republicans, like the royalists, made fortified camps, redoubts, and forts, to prevent access to the country they held. These works were chiefly erected on the tops of mountains, or at the heads of the mountain-passes; between the two all the spurs and offshoots of the Alps were bristled with places of arms, and the most solemn and awful solitudes, where the silence of nature had never been broken save by the torrents which rushed through the valleys and the pine forests that moaned on the heights, were now disturbed by drums and trumpets, and all the discordant sounds of war. The French, who had not expected so much energy on the part of Vittorio Amedeo's government, and who were sorely disappointed at finding that the Nissards and Piedmontese would not take their gospel of the Rights of Man, or fraternise with them as the Savoyards had done, made sundry attempts to secure peace on this side, and to detach his Sardinian majesty from the Coalition by advantageous and tempting offers. Robespierre found means to send a secret agent to Turin, and this agent got access to a certain Count Viretti, a busy intriguing man, without political judgment, and probably without much patriotism or moral principle. This Viretti appears to have been charmed with the offers of the republicans, who only wanted neutrality and a free passage at some future day into Lombardy, when they would cede to Vittorio Amedeo whatever they might conquer from the Emperor in Italy. If his majesty should be inclined to give up to France the island of Sardinia (the French had been trying to take that island by force, and had met with a dreadful discomfiture), why, then, the French republicans would put his majesty in possession of all the territories of the republic of Genoa which bordered on his own continental dominions, and which he and his ancestors had so earnestly desired to possess. The republic of Genoa was at this time the only Italian power that was friendly to the republic of France; but this was a circumstance not likely to disturb the conscience of the sans-culottes. When Count Viretti conveyed the propositions to his king, he found that Vittorio would not entertain them for a moment, declaring, as a conclusive argument, that, if even he could break his faith with his allies, the Jacobins were not to be trusted.*

Towards the end of May Kellermann ordered Brunet, who commanded in Nice, to push forward to the crests of the maritime Alps, and dislodge the Piedmontese and Austrians before they should have time to complete the works they were throwing up.

* CARO BOTTA.

As these posts were various and separate, Brunet divided his army into four columns, with instructions to attack three of the more important points at once, and, having carried them, to unite and fall upon Fort Raus, the strongest and most important of them all, and the key to all the country behind. On the 8th of June the French columns ascended the steep heights, dragging their artillery after them by strength of arm; and, beginning a simultaneous attack with great fury, they drove the Piedmontese from every position, and from all the works except Fort Raus. But, when they ascended that loftier mountain and attacked that strongest of all the works, they were repulsed by the well-served Italian artillery, were driven back, repulsed again, and finally driven down the mountain, with the loss of some of their guns, and a frightful loss in killed and wounded. They renewed their attempts on the 12th of June, when they brought 12,000 of their best men against that single fort; but they were again repulsed and driven down the mountain, with a loss more dreadful than their first. The Piedmontese generals, Colli and Dellerà, who commanded at Fort Raus, then recovered all the positions which had been lost, and strengthened them with better redoubts, and with more artillery and troops. The republicans were confined to the low country of Nice, and, being greatly disheartened by their reverses, they set up the ordinary cry that they were betrayed by their generals and superior officers. Kellermann, with some re-inforcements, hastened from his fortified camp at Tornus; and, seeing that the occupation of Fort Raus might allow the allies to go through the pass of Vilette, and so get between his main army at Tornus and the troops in Nice, he placed a strong division to watch that passage, and threw up some more works to protect them. In the same manner, the re-inforcements he sent into Nice were stationed in the gorges through which the Piedmontese must descend, and were employed in digging trenches and in raising redoubts. They were not always left undisturbed in these occupations: at times moveable columns from Colli's division interrupted them; and frequently their stragglers, and convoys, and weak detachments were annihilated or scattered by the revengeful peasantry, upon whom the French had committed some atrocious cruelties.

But Vittorio Amedeo did not adhere to the plan of campaign he had laid down. After collecting the greater part of his own army and of his Austrian allies on the summits and sides of the maritime Alps for the recovery of Nice, he hesitated, lost much invaluable time in doubt and indecision, and at last resolved to unite Devins's plan with his own, and pursue them both at one and the same moment. He was, however, enticed by many important circumstances, and by many urgent prayers and representations. Precy and the counter-revolutionists at Lyons had raised the banner of revolt, had entered into a confederacy with Marseilles, Toulon, and other cities of the South, and were threatened with a siege and extermination by the republicans.

If the armies of the Convention should succeed against Lyons, the soul of the confederacy would be gone, and the men of the South, who had certainly been encouraged to take up arms by the court of Turin, would be exposed to a most remorseless and bloody vengeance; but if, on the other side, Lyons could be defended, and the republican besieging army beaten and scattered, the whole of France between the Rhone and the Alps—a country abounding with enthusiastic royalists—might be turned against the Convention. On the other side the allies, with the assistance of the people, had taken possession of Toulon, and were casting about on every side for arms and men to defend that place against the republicans. From Nice to Toulon was but a short and easy voyage; and even by land the House of Vittorio Amedeo had sent before now an army beyond Toulon. If the county of Nice could be cleared of the French, the army of the maritime Alps, driving the enemy before them, might march through Provence to Toulon, while the rest of his troops, if they could only clear Savoy, might advance to Lyons. Vittorio Amedeo therefore sent his son, the Duke of Montferrat, and one part of the army, across Mont Cenis and the Lesser St. Bernard, to drive the republicans out of Savoy and the Tarantaise; and he went himself to Fort Raus to direct the campaign in Nice. Although he took the field several weeks too late, the Duke of Montferrat drove the republicans before him, took possession of the Tarantaise, and of all the Valais from the foot of Mont Cenis to St. Jean de Maurienne, and from that town to Aigue-Belle, situated at the mouth of that long narrow valley, or where it begins to open on the comparatively champagne country about Montmelian and Chambery. He became, in fact, master of the whole of Upper Savoy, and of a good part of the lower country; but, instead of advancing boldly and rapidly upon Chambery, which little capital must have surrendered, the duke halted near Aigue-Belle. If the whole of the army, excepting merely a force sufficient to defend the passes at Raus, had been employed upon this sole expedition, as originally recommended by Devins, there was nothing hopeless in the project of its advancing from Chambery to Lyons, and giving its hand to that formidable anti-Jacobin confederacy; but, divided as it now was, perhaps the most that could have been accomplished was to beat the French out of their camp at Conflans and to recover Chambery. But, through the hesitation and delays of the Duke of Montferrat, even these two objects became unattainable. Kellermann, who was as quick as the duke was slow, rushed from his central position at Tornus with re-inforcements for Chambery and the camp at Conflans; other republicans poured in from Annecy and the country round Geneva; the Savoyards, armed as a militia, and full of hatred and fury against their former fellow-subjects the Piedmontese, marched with the French, and gave them all the advantage of their local knowledge and influence. With the population against them, the republicans could scarcely have ventured into the narrow defiles, and among the rocks and cliffs and stupendous mountains of that country; but with the people on their side all the natural disadvantages of that seat of war were turned upon the troops of the King of Sardinia. Early in October, a little more than a month after their descent from those mountains, the Duke of Montferrat and his troops, retreating before superior numbers, were obliged to recross Mont Cenis and the Lesser St. Bernard, and to abandon everything they had gained on the eastern side of the Alps. They retired, however, like brave men and in good order, the division in the Tarantaise fighting a desperate battle for the preservation of their artillery, which was slowly ascending the rugged pass of St. Bernard while they kept the republicans at bay in the country below. Upon news of this retreat all hope abandoned the Lyonese, who, after bravely standing a siege of nearly two months, surrendered to the republicans: and thus the main link was broken that held together the confederacy of the South of France, and without which there was but slight hope of the allies keeping the ground they had gained at Toulon. In the mean time Vittorio Amedeo had not been without his successes: like his son, he began by driving the republicans before him. Descending from the crests of the maritime Alps, he made himself master of all the advanced posts and works of the French; but on the 18th of October he was repulsed with great loss at the bridge of Giletta; and then, disheartened by the intelligence of his son's retreat, of the re-conquest of Savoy, and of the fall of Lyons, he retreated by the roads through which he had come, leaving Nice to the French, and depriving the English and the Spaniards and his other allies at Toulon of any hope they might have entertained of further assistance and co-operation from him. To retreat was, however, under circumstances, the wisest measure he could adopt, for Kellermann, with no enemy left in Savoy, might have brought the mass of his army, and a host of elated Savoyard militia, down from Tornus to the river Var and the Nissard country.

The events of the war at sea remain to be narrated. Before war was declared against Great Britain, the French, determined to make use of their sovereignty over the Mediterranean Sea while it lasted, dispatched Admiral Truguet with nineteen ships of the line and some frigates, having on board six thousand land troops, to make the conquest of Sardinia, the island which gave the house of Savoy their royal title, and which, though rude and but little cultivated, was exuberantly fertile, producing in abundance wheat and other grains, of which there was now a dearth in a great part of France. The more immediate motives and necessities that had produced the expedition were shown in a numerous fleet of merchant-vessels that were collected to follow the men-of-war, and to return to France immediately with cargoes of Sardinian corn; not the slightest apprehension being entertained that so grand an expedition could miscarry. But, besides this urgent necessity for bread, there were certain other reasons which pointed out the island as a proper conquest to be made at this moment. The neighbouring island of Corsica was beginning to rebel against the Convention, and, unless the French should obtain possession of Sardinia, with the command of the narrow Strait of St. Bonifacio, which separates the two islands, they were almost sure to lose a possession which had cost them an immense deal of money and no small quantity of blood. Moreover, in the approaching maritime war with England, the more friendly ports they could have to shelter their Mediterranean fleet the better; and, besides Cagliari—a most commodious harbour—there were several ports in Sardinia which would all be closed against the tricolor flag unless the House of Savoy were dispossessed of the sovereignty. Truguet, and those who sent him, committed sundry little mistakes. They fancied that, because the Sardinians were rather turbulent subjects to King Vittorio Amedeo, who never resided among them, and who only drew taxes and produce from them (such slight and uncertain taxes as could be raised), they must be ripe for revolt, and prepared to receive with enthusiasm a king-hating people, who would promise them (as they did promise, by decree and manifesto, to all subjects who would take up arms against their governments) the elysium of no taxes, and bring them caps of liberty, and trees of liberty, and equality, and the rights of man. They positively calculated that the Sards would welcome them and join them; and they knew that the king had only two or three small garrisons in the whole island. But the Sards, though turbulent, and even lawless, were not disaffected; the rudest and roughest people in Europe, they had a mortal aversion for all changes, for all foreigners, for all projectors and interlopers. As for liberty, they had enough of it; and their mountain liberty, though resting upon every man's rifle or musket, and dagger, and not upon theory or declaration of rights, was as perfect as the republican liberty of France, and not very dissimilar to it: as for any theories or abstract ideas, they were far too unenlightened to entertain them or care about them. The French might just as well have attempted to proselytize at Timbuctoo as at Cagliari; they might as well have sent their Rights of Man to the Algerines as to the Sardinians. It is certain that few of these islanders knew anything of what had been passing in France, for communications were rare as were the arts of reading and writing among them; but, if they had known how the republicans had treated the Roman church, to which they were blindly but most passionately attached, they would have had one motive more for receiving them as they did. There was not a sheepskin-clad Sard but had a crucifix round his neck, and a murderous long gun in his hand, or ready for it. There was nowhere a more resolute people, or one more expert in the use of fire-arms. On the 24th of January Truguet sailed into the Bay of Cagliari, and anchored his great ships in front of the town, with their broadsides turned towards it. As soon as this was done, he sent an officer and twenty soldiers to summon the place, and represent the amazing advantages which the islanders would derive from a union with the French republic. But no sooner had the boat got well within the range of their guns than the Sardis opened a fire upon it, and killed the officer and fourteen of his people, besides wounding nearly all the rest. Disappointed and furious at such a reception, Truguet forthwith began a bombardment like that which had been so effectual at Oneglia last autumn; but Cagliari was not Oneglia. The greater part of the town stood on a commanding height above the bay, just where the Carthaginians had founded it twenty-four centuries ago; and it had batteries and great guns, and furnaces for making red-hot shot, and men who knew how to use these things. The sight of the fleet on the coast had drawn a great many of the half-wild country-people towards the city and port of Cagliari; and, as soon as the firing began, the mountaineers, and shepherds, and goat-herds, in their sheepskin coats, and with their long muskets slung across their shoulders, descended like torrents from their mountains, some marching into the town to assist the garrison, and others taking post by the different landing-places round the bay, sheltering themselves behind rocks and sand-heaps, behind trees and bushes, and low stone walls. While his ships were bombarding and thundering at the town without any visible effect, Truguet landed a strong detachment of his land-troops near the village of Quartà, famed for producing the best bread in Sardinia (and Sardinian bread, generally, is the best in the world), to see what could be done on land. These soldiers were soon brought to a stand by an enemy that was scarcely visible, except by the smoke of his guns; six hundred of them were killed, or (which amounted to the same thing, for the Sardis gave no quarter) were left wounded on the shore; the rest fled back to their boats and got on board their ships, most heartily sick of Sardinian warfare. So adroit were the islanders, and so well chosen their covering and places of ambush, that their whole loss in this conflict did not exceed five killed and a few wounded. When he had bombarded Cagliari for three days, burning as much powder as would have sufficed for a grand campaign; when one of his vessels had been burned by the red-hot shot of the garrison, when two more had been sunk, and when nearly all the rest had been so battered and damaged in their rigging that they were scarcely manageable, Truguet hauled off, and came to anchor at the mouth of the gulf, well out of the way of the Sardinian batteries. The only mischief he had inflicted was upon the lower suburb of the town, and upon a few fishermen's huts. He tarried for some time, repairing his rigging and talking of repeating his attack; but the republicans, both sailors and soldiers, became mutinous; he could no longer think that the French had a party in the island—he could no longer expect a friendly reception from those devils of Sardis—a storm came to quicken his resolution, and so, in a gale of wind, and with a crippled fleet, he departed from those inhospitable shores, and bore away for Toulon.

On the 22nd of January, the day after the king's execution at Paris, and two days before Truguet entered the Bay of Cagliari, an attack was made on La Madalena, a small island belonging to the Sardis in the Straits of Bonifacio, by a small republican force from Corsica under the command of General Cesare. This expedition was repulsed, and is only noticeable from the fact of Napoleon Bonaparte having served in it.*

So little were we prepared for the war with France, that there was no English fleet in the Mediterranean until months after Truguet's Sardinian adventure; and even near home, when Lord Howe took the command of the Channel fleet, and put to sea (on the 14th of July, and not before), his force was inferior to that of the Brest fleet. He sailed from Spithead with fifteen ships of the line, three of which were first-rates; but boisterous and foggy weather obliged him to seek shelter in Torbay. Here he received intelligence that a French fleet of seventeen sail of the line had been seen a little to the westward of Belleisle. His lordship put to sea on the following morning, the 25th, and, meeting an English frigate, he sent it into Plymouth to request the re-inforcement of two third-rates which lay ready in that port. These two ships joined immediately; and the whole fleet then bore away for Belleisle. On the morning of the 31st of July, when nearly in the latitude of Belleisle, they caught a faint glimpse of the French; and, standing in-shore, towards the evening they could discover from their masts-heads the top-sails of the enemy appearing just above the horizon. At sunset fifteen sail of the

* It has been said, on the frequently doubtful authority of the St. Helena memoirs, that Bonaparte was at Cagliari with Truguet, and landed at Quartà with the troops that met with so hot a reception. But it appears that this is quite incorrect, and that the mistake arose from his being employed two or three days before at La Madalena, at the opposite end of Sardinia. According to local tradition, this was the first time the young artillery officer was under fire, and in the attack, which was made from a French corvette and some smaller vessels that sailed from the port of Bonifacio, he directed the firing and the throwing of the bombs with rare skill. The Sardis of La Madalena kept for many years a bomb which fell upon one of their churches, and which, they said, had been thrown by Napoleon's own hand. In the same church they preserved some silver chandeliers and a silver crucifix, which had been presented to them by Nelson. These highly-valued gifts remain; but in 1832 the islanders sold the reputed Bonaparte bomb to a Glasgow merchant for thirty dollars, which money was to be spent in buying a clock for the church.—Valery, Voyages en Corse, à l'Île d'Elbe, et en Sardaigne.

On the eve of the expedition to La Madalena, it is said Bonaparte ran a narrow chance of being torn to pieces by the French sailors, who were all demagogues, and who had just committed some bloody excesses at Ajaccio, the little capital of Corsica, and his native place. These Jacobin sailors got into a quarrel with some Corsican soldiers or volunteers (or so goes the local story); Bonaparte, as an officer, ran to restore order; the seamen called him an aristocrat, sang Ca Ira to him, threatened to lantern him, fell upon him, and were about proceeding to extremities, when the mayor, municipals, and inhabitants of the town of Bonifacio ran to his rescue, and saved him.—Id.

Nothing is more probable than this little story, for nothing could surpass the indiscipline and anarchy and savage fury that reigned at this time in the French navy.

line and two frigates were counted from the English mast-heads. On the following morning seventeen sail of the line were counted, and, later, there appeared a greater number. Lord Howe bore all sail to come up with them; but the winds were light, and the French ships sailed better than his own, our government having been somewhat negligent in its attention to naval architecture, although all our honour and all our safety depended upon our shipping. On the morning of the 2nd of August not a sail of the enemy was in sight. On the 3rd two French ships were chased by Howe's advanced frigates; but they were too close to the shore to be intercepted in their retreat. On the 10th the whole British fleet approached the coast near Brest with the intention of looking into Brest; but now the weather was so tempestuous that several of his ships sprung their masts, and others had their sails torn to ribands. This obliged Lord Howe to return to Torbay, where he arrived on the 4th of September. The services rendered by this Channel fleet did not much exceed their securing the safe arrival of our vast West Indian convoys, which must otherwise have been intercepted by the Brest fleet. At the end of October, Howe, who had been still further re-inforced, put to sea with twenty-four sail of the line and several frigates. He kept cruising, in the midst of almost perpetual storms, till the 10th of December. Several times he was tantalised by the sight of the French fleet; but, owing to the inferior sailing of his ships, he could never come up with them; and not a shotted gun was fired, except by the 'Latona,' Captain Thornborough, who on one occasion gained fast ahead of the French, passed under a fire from three or four of their first-rates, and made a spirited but ineffectual attempt to cut the rigging of their foremost ships, and stop them till his lordship could come up and engage. The English public, who only knew that Howe had seen the Brest fleet and had not destroyed it, were grievously disappointed at the result of his operations; but he had preserved property of an immense value, and he had notably improved the seamanship and the discipline of the fleet by his long-continued cruising and manœuvring, so that a good foundation was laid for future success. A detached frigate, the 'Crescent,' commanded by Captain Saumarez, engaged and captured a French frigate of superior force off Barfleur.*

In the West Indies an attack was made upon the French islands by a small squadron and some land-troops; and Tobago, St. Pierre, and Miquelon were successively reduced. At the invitation of the French planters, who stood in about equal dread of the Jacobins and the Convention and the revolted blacks, we took possession of all the western or French portion of the island of St. Domingo. But at Martinique we met with a repulse: the French royalists of the island, who had invited Major-General Bruce, deceived the expectations of co-operation to which they had given rise; and the English force employed was found insufficient to do the work by itself. An engagement of the fiercest kind, which served as an intimation of the spirit that animated our sailors, and of the way in which they intended to fight out this war, took place between the 'Port of Boston' and the islands. The 'Ambuscade,' a French frigate, mounting thirty-six guns, and manned with four hundred picked seamen, who had almost all served in the American war, fell in with the English frigate the 'Boston,' commanded by Captain Courteney, whose force amounted to thirty-two guns, and only two hundred and four men. The 'Boston' unfortunately received several shots between wind and water, suffered much in her rigging, and lost her brave captain early in the action; but, though almost sinking, she maintained the contest until the greatly superior French frigate, with her deck covered with killed and wounded, hauled off.

In the East Indies all the small French factories were seized: Pondicherry, which had been restored at the last peace, surrendered to General Brathwaite; and the French flag again entirely disappeared from that part of the world.

In the month of July Vice-Admiral Lord Hood entered the Mediterranean, and presented himself before Toulon with a force very inferior to that which Truguet had brought back with him from Sardinia; for Hood had only seven ships of the line, four frigates, and some small craft. But the confederacy of the cities of the south was then in full vigour; the counter-revolutionists seemed determined to resort to every extremity rather than submit to the merciless Convention and the Jacobins; and not merely from Toulon, but from Marseilles, Aix, Lyons, and many intermediate towns, the British commander received royalist deputations or letters, imploring his assistance and friendly co-operation. At Toulon, nearly all the old officers of the French navy, who had been deprived of their commands, who had been insulted, degraded, and at times even beaten, and who had seen their relatives or friends in the service butchered by the jacobinised sailors, joined in the correspondence with Lord Hood, and suggested or recommended the desperate measures of surrendering their fleet to him, and putting him in possession of the ports and forts. The admiral, as a preliminary to the negotiation, and as an unequivocal proof of their loyalty and sincerity, called upon them for the immediate acknowledgment of Louis the Seventeenth; and upon that condition he promised not only to the people of Toulon, but also to those of Marseilles, and of the other confederating towns, all the support in his power. The sections of Toulon were assembled to deliberate; the Jacobins, together with some who were not Jacobins, but only furious at the notion of placing their great fleet in the hands of the English, resisted, and made a tremendous outcry; but they were outvoted in the sections, and, when they attempted to try the strength of their party, or their parties, in the town, they found that they were miserably weak, and their adversaries very strong; for ten thousand and more Provençals had gathered in Toulon and in its immediate neighbourhood, having either fled before the republican armies, or having assembled at the call of some devoted royalists. This majority did not proceed with more moderation than was usual to all French majorities, of whatsoever principles or politics. They seized, tried, and put to death the president of the Jacobin Club; they persecuted and imprisoned many of their late persecutors, killing not a few of those sans-culottes in riots and broils; they dug up the bones of some royalists who had been murdered when the Jacobins had the upper hand, and carried them in procession through the streets; they replaced all the unsworn priests, and rerevolutionised everything. In all things, they committed themselves so deeply, that they had nothing to expect from the republicans but destruction; and the republican troops in the South were becoming victorious. General Cartaux defeated the Marseillaise royalists in a hollow on the road between Aix and Marseilles; the sans-culottes of Marseilles fell upon their flying townsmen, and opened the gates of their town to the republicans and the commissioners of the Convention, who came to make the guillotine permanent. From Marseilles to Toulon was no very long march; and the Toulonese were warned by the fugitives from the former city of the terrible fate which must befall them if Cartaux should pay them a visit, and find them undecided and unprepared. Other fugitives, with their wives and their children, came to seek refuge in Toulon, and to recommend every resolution and measure that seemed likely to make that place a safe asylum. It was clear there was no time to be lost; and on the 29th of August the counter-revolutionists concluded their treaty with Lord Hood, who, on his part, agreed that the town should be held by the English for Louis XVII., and that the ships and forts should be restored at the conclusion of peace. Having some doubts as to the sincerity of the mixed body of men with whom he had negotiated, Hood at first only landed fifteen hundred men, under the command of Captain Elphinstone, of the 'Robust,' seventy-four; but, upon seeing that the forts which commanded the outer road were quietly given up to this detachment, he disembarked more men, who made themselves masters of Fort La Malgue, and of other forts and batteries which commanded the French ships of war, the inner harbour, and the town. Truguet had resigned, or had been deprived of his command, some time before this. Admiral Trogoff, a foreigner, who had succeeded him, had been a party in the negotiation with the English, and he now hoisted the white flag of the Bourbons. St. Julien, the second in command, an entire Jacobin, who had been elected to the rank of vice-admiral by the sailors of the fleet, hoisted the tri-color flag, and called upon the fleet to stand by him and their country; but all the French ships except seven followed Trogoff's example; Lord Hood's ships began to come in to the outer harbour; the land batteries and the forts, well manned with English sailors and marines, or with shouting royalists, threatened to sink every vessel that offered any resistance; and presently St. Julien and the crews of the seven ships landed and fled. The sections of the town then made a convention with the republican seamen, who obtained four ships of the line (disarmed) to transport them to ports on the Atlantic, Lord Hood ratifying the agreement, and giving them passes to protect them from being made prisoners by any other part of our fleets. In this easy and most unexpected manner the best French port in the Mediterranean, together with the arsenal, stores, and an immense fleet, was put in possession of the English. But Lord Hood had scarcely put the port in order and taken possession of the town, ere General Cartaux arrived with his victorious army from Marseilles, and cantoned in the villages and bastides round about, calling upon all the four corners of France for re-inforcements, and upon every patriot in it for aid and assistance. He was cautious not to make too close an approach; the nearest of his posts was on a steep hill four or five miles from the walls of Toulon, and his head-quarters were still farther off on the high road which, running over a mountainous country, leads to Marseilles. Kellermann detached Lapoype to his assistance with 4000 or 5000 men; and volunteers and other corps gradually collected. On the other side, Lord Hood, sensible that the most desperate efforts would be made to recover the place, and that his sailors and the French royalists would be unequal to its defence, applied in all directions for troops and other re-inforcements; and, with rather unusual activity, our allies in the Mediterranean sent ships and troops to Toulon. The Spanish admiral Langara, who was nearest at hand, took on board the 3000 men of the army of Roussillon, came up with his fleet, and joined Hood. The Bourbon King of Naples, whose wife, Caroline of Austria, was sister to Marie Antoinette (now no more), had declared war against the French republicans, and at the first summons he sent down his small fleet and some land troops to co-operate. The King of Sardinia sent another detachment; and 5000 men were promised from the Austrian army in Lombardy—only these last never arrived. Lord Hood's fleet was greatly strengthened by fresh arrivals of ships of the line and frigates from England; and he expected some troops from Gibraltar. Lord Mulgrave, who had served with reputation in the English army, arrived from Italy, where he had been travelling for his pleasure, and, at the request of Lord Hood, took the temporary command of the troops. Before Lord Mulgrave's arrival, Captain Elphinstone, with 300 English sailors and marines, and about an equal number of Spaniards, made a sortie, and paid a visit to Cartaux's advanced post at the village of Ollioules, on the side of a steep hill, rendered difficult of access by a ravine which had a stone bridge over it defended by two pieces of cannon. The windows of the village, and the stone walls of the vineyards round it, were lined with musketry, and two other pieces of cannon were mounted in an old fort. The republicans were between 700 and 800 strong. Some French royalists, who had engaged to come round from Toulon by a different way, and to bring some field-pieces with them, did not keep their appointment. Elphinstone had no cannon of any kind—he had nothing but cutlasses, and muskets and bayonets; but he resolved not to return without trying what sort of steel his bayonets were made of. He posted a part of his small force on a hillock near the bridge, with orders to fire incessantly at the cannon; and he commanded the main column to advance under cover of a wall to within two hundred yards of the enemy; and, when exposed to their fire, to rush forward with bayonets fixed. The success was complete; the republicans were beaten out of the vineyards and right out of the village, their cannon were taken, their ammunition, and even their standards; and with these trophies, and hardly any loss, the brave sailor returned to Toulon. Two days after Lord Mulgrave's arrival, Cartaux, whose re-inforcements came in much faster than those of the allies, drew somewhat nearer to the town, and drove some French royalists and a party of Spaniards from an outpost on a hill. But, as the English general perceived that this post was out of the line of defence, no attempt was made to recover it. For some days the republicans pushed their patroles nearer and nearer to the outposts, and the allies remained on the defensive, not choosing to exhaust their garrison, which was still far too small for the defence of such a place as Toulon, which lies in a hollow in the midst of an amphitheatre of hills, so that the crests of all these hills, or all of them which commanded the town, had to be covered and defended. M. Thiers taxes the allies with a want of spirit or of military intelligence in not going out and destroying the armies of Cartaux and Lapoype one after the other, instead of staying to fortify the place; but the French generals are rather open to accusation for not going in, instead of leaving so weak a force time to strengthen their positions and receive re-inforcements. Now, when they drove a body of Spaniards from a height which was really within the line of defence, Lord Mulgrave moved out with a small column, and drove them from it with a very severe loss. In this affair a corps of Neapolitans behaved with admirable gallantry. The expected succours arrived from Gibraltar, but they consisted merely of two foot regiments and a few artillery-men, under the command of General O'Hara, a brave officer, but said to have been not a very cool or a skilful one. O'Hara took the command of the place and

of all the land troops of the allies, which did not even now exceed 11,000 men, counting all nations, and including some corps that had nothing of the soldier but the name. To keep all that wide range of hills (some of which commanded the two harbours, and the fleets in them as well as the town) would have required, at the very least, 30,000 troops of the best quality. It was not an over-extended fortress, but a great patch of country that they had to defend—the fortifications of Toulon, on the land side, were absolutely nothing without the hills; and the greater part of these operations are not to be considered as belonging to siege and defence, but as open field-fighting. When Lyons surrendered to the republicans, and when the two armies of the King of Sardinia retreated into Piedmont, General Doppet came from the Rhone with one corps d'armée, and General Dugommier from the Var with another. Dugommier, a much abler man than Cartaux, took the command of the whole force, which, including national guards and volunteers, probably did not fall short of 40,000 men. But Dugommier had brought with him from Nice, where he had been serving during the summer, a little Corsican, a young officer of artillery, who was worth more than many thousand men. This was Napoleon Bonaparte, who was observed to sleep at nights by the side of a cannon as though it were his bride, who displayed an activity, and, above all, an intelligence and a quickness which commanded attention. At first he had been received almost with insolence by Cartaux and Doppet; but Dugommier, a veteran soldier, had a better sense of his merits, and he was strongly supported by the Jacobin commissioners of the Convention, one of whom was the brother of the then all-powerful Robespierre, with whose party the young officer had recently identified himself, by writing and publishing a political pamphlet entitled 'The Supper of Beaucaire,' in which he went the whole lengths of Jacobinism and sans-culottism. Under such patronage he got the command of the whole besieging artillery, amounting to 200 or more pieces; and he was pretty certain that in the councils of war, which were now frequently called, any opinion he might emit would be listened to, at least with respect. It did not require his extraordinary quickness to discover that Cartaux, who had been a common dragoon before the revolution, and Doppet, who had been a doctor in medicine in Savoy, had mismanaged operations lamentably. The executive at Paris sent a plan of attack to Dugommier—a plan probably drawn up by Carnot—and the commander-in-chief assembled a council upon it. Dugommier thought, they all thought, that the plan was a good one; but young Bonaparte suggested a better. "All that you want," said he, "is to force the English to evacuate Toulon. Instead of attacking them in the town, which must involve a long series of operations, try and establish batteries which shall sweep the harbour and the roadstead. If you can only drive away the ships, the troops will not remain." He pointed out the rocky promontory of La Grasse, which stands nearly opposite to the town, and commands both the inner and the outer harbour, and said, "Take

YOUNG NAPOLEON.

La Grasse, and in two days Toulon will be yours." If Cartaux had made the attempt two months earlier, nothing could have been so easy of execution; but in that interval the English had thrown up three redoubts on that promontory, and had strengthened Fort L'Aiguillette and Fort Balaguier, which stood on the two seaward points of the promontory of La Grasse; and since the arrival of the troops from Gibraltar these works, though with little to justify the comparison, had gone by the name of "Little Gibraltar." These two forts, which had been originally constructed, like all the important works at Toulon, merely as sea defences, were weak on the land side, and, however much they had been improved, they were still commanded by the higher ground at the back of them, so that their security depended entirely upon the three redoubts and the abattis which the English had erected across the promontory. Fort L'Aiguillette was the better one of the two; but both were absolutely under the guns of whatever party should secure the higher ground of the little promontory, which presented no precipices or obstructions to the French on the land-side, being joined on to the continent by an easy slope. Under the direction of Bonaparte batteries were erected opposite the English redoubts, and other batteries were thrown up near Fort Malbousquet, on the opposite side of the inner harbour. None of these advances had been allowed without a sharp contest, and in several instances the republicans had been obliged to relinquish, with great loss, the ground they had gained. On the 15th of November they had lost in one affair some six hundred men. On the 30th General O'Hara, perceiving that their works near Malbousquet might annoy the town and the arsenal, and Fort L'Aiguillette, made a sally in great force, drove them from the hill and from their redoubt, and was in the act of spiking their guns, when Bonaparte in person, observing that the greater part of the English troops were descending the opposite side of the hill and pursuing the French impetuously and without order, threw himself with an entire battalion into a hollow which was screened by willow-trees and bushes, and which led round to the gorge of the redoubt. O'Hara, who did not discover this force until it was close upon him, and who then mistook it for a detachment of his allies, advanced to the hedge to give orders. He was saluted with a volley, and wounded in the arm. He attempted to return to the redoubt, supported by two soldiers; but the anguish of the wound made him grow faint: he ordered the men to seek their own safety in flight, and immediately after he was made prisoner by the enemy. Before the rash men who had been pursuing the French could get back to their comrades at the redoubt, Dugommier beat to arms all through his encampments, and, while some of the republicans marched rapidly towards the hill, others threw themselves between the hill and the English lines to cut off their retreat to their works. A desperate struggle ensued, in the course of which Bonaparte received a bayonet wound, and was carried off the field fainting in the arms of Muiron, a young officer of artillery. Fighting their way through, O'Hara's people reached their lines, but not without serious loss—a loss the besiegers could ill bear, as by this time they had two or three thousand men in hospital from the effects of wounds, disease, or excessive fatigue. The loss of their general discouraged the English troops, and all manner of dissensions and differences broke out among their heterogeneous allies, all of whom, except the desperate French royalists, were sick of the business, and anxious to be gone long before the last misadventure. Even these French royalists, though fighting briskly and gallantly whenever the occasion offered, yielded to absurd impressions and antipathies, some of them, and some of our other allies, spreading the monstrous report that O'Hara had permitted himself to be made prisoner in order to have the opportunity of selling Toulon to the republicans. The Neapolitans, who had behaved so well at the beginning, were now almost mutinous; the Piedmontese were somewhat more steady; but the Spaniards, whose general had been lukewarm from the first because Lord Hood had refused him the chief command and custody of the town, were scarcely to be relied upon for a single hour. In all affairs, great or small, feelings like these prevailed, demonstrating the vast difference between the effective value of an army composed of one nation and fighting for one object, and an army composed of four or five nations, with contrary views, interests, prejudices, and passions. The difference of languages alone spoken in the ill-assorted garrison was a cause of endless confusion. As no more sorties were made, the French were enabled to advance their batteries against the redoubts and abattis of La Grasse. On the 17th of December, after some cannonading, the republicans made a night attack on one of the redoubts which was occupied by Spaniards, and were allowed to carry it without much opposition. This, in fact, was decisive of the whole affair, for the two other redoubts became untenable, and without these redoubts the forts beneath were worth nothing. The British sailors and troops stood manfully in the quarters where they were stationed; but, battered by innumerable cannon-balls and bombs, charged successively by three columns of 4000 or 5000 men each, and assailed on the flank by the redoubt which the Spaniards had abandoned, they were at last compelled to take refuge in Fort L'Aiguillette. Notwithstanding all that had been done to improve it, this fort was so badly constructed for the purposes of any defence on the land side, that the English found themselves under the necessity of cutting down the embrasures in order to bring their guns to bear upon the republicans. Yet, deterred by the loss they had sustained at the redoubts, the besiegers halted there, and did not press on to Fort L'Aiguillette. From the ground they had gained they could, however, sweep the inner road and the town. Lord Hood called a council of war. It was readily agreed that Toulon and both its ports should be evacuated as quickly as possible; that such of the French ships as were rigged and fit for sea should be carried off, and that all the rest, on the stocks or in dock, should be destroyed; that all possible exertions should be made for carrying off the anti-republican inhabitants of the town and the other French royalists; that transports and merchantmen should be provisioned for these unhappy and numerous classes, who must be butchered if they remained behind; and, finally, that all the allies should unite their efforts for all these objects, and maintain the several forts and batteries they still held round the town and the harbours in order to facilitate the retreat of all, and prevent that confusion which must inevitably be fatal to some of them, and which might prove fatal to all. But, when these resolutions were made known to the allied forces, they nearly all declared that they would not wait, that they were in no condition to maintain their posts, and that they should get on board their ships and provide for their own safety. The Neapolitans held two very important posts on the outer harbour—one at Cape Lebrun, and the other at Cape Sepet; their commanding officers intimated in the most express terms that they would abandon them at the approach of the enemy. If the republicans had pushed boldly forward upon these and other points, they might assuredly have saved their own great fleet, for Hood must have sailed away immediately, and in the rush and confusion of such a retreat the allies must have suffered some enormous loss. On the morning of the 18th the sick and wounded, and the British field artillery, were sent off. As soon as these preparations were seen by the Jacobins of the town, who had not been sufficiently disarmed, they rose in a mass, and, taking possession of some of the houses, they barricaded them, and fired from the windows upon the allied troops and upon their own countrymen of the royalist faction. The Neapolitans embarked in the utmost disorder, caring for none but themselves, and getting their ships out to sea at once. The Spaniards and Piedmontese showed more coolness, and more consideration for others; and they were employed in preparing for the general retreat, and in providing for the safety of the hapless French royalists, who, with their wives and children, and whatever moveable property they possessed, were to embark at the quays and arsenal. All the troops in the town were to march out at night, and take to their boats under the guns of Fort La Malue, on the southern side of the outer harbour, which still remained in their possession. The day passed with little or no interruption from the republicans, although it was not possible that they should be ignorant of the intended retreat, of the confusion which attended it, and of the advantages to be derived from it by a bold attack and in-burst. At the appointed time the troops began to defile through a narrow, inconvenient sally-port, the proper route through the gate of Italy being rendered impassable in consequence of the Spaniards having abandoned, without orders, a fort which swept that road, and which had been immediately taken possession of by the enemy. The troops reached La Malue without accident; the sailors had the boats of the fleet in readiness; the sea in the outer harbour or road, where the ships were now stationed, was perfectly calm; and the embarkation was begun with rapidity, but also with good order. Then, at a given signal, commenced one of the most terrible scenes that even war has ever presented: then Sir Sidney Smith—who had recently arrived at Toulon, and who had volunteered to conduct the perilous operation of blowing up and destroying all the French ships of war which could not be removed, the powder-magazines, the stores and arsenal—set to work, having previously made some hurried preparations. Admiral Langara had undertaken the destruction of all the ships in one of the basins, and had promised to send three Spanish gun-boats to co-operate with Sir Sidney. There were reasons for believing that the Spaniards would not be very earnest in the dangerous work; for, although Langara had not, in the council of war, offered any opposition to the project of destroying that immense Toulon fleet, which must otherwise have fallen into the hands of the enemy, he had declared in a conversation, which was reported to Lord Hood, that he knew it to be the interest of England to strike this blow against the maritime power of France, but that he also knew it to be equally the interest of Spain to prevent it.* Lord Hood therefore could not place much reliance on the exertions of the Spaniards; but it would have been unwise to irritate them by showing a want of confidence; and the work, to be done effectually, required many hands, as also the service of some craft which did not exist in Lord Hood's fleet. The arsenal, an immense range of buildings, part of which stood on the shore between the town and the inner port, and was composed of magazines and storehouses, and part of which was built on piers standing out in the water, surrounded or inclosed two wet-docks (each with its separate mouth or entrance from the inner road or harbour), at that time full of ships, a dock-yard, a timber-yard, rope-walks, workshops, &c. There were powder magazines still pretty full, notwithstanding the consumption of the allies during the siege; and one of the ships in the greater bason was loaded with powder. The English flotilla appointed to send these things into the air consisted of the 'Vulcan' fireship, the 'Alert' sloop, the 'Swallow' tender, three gun-boats, and a Spanish mortar-boat. The crew of this mortar-boat shared fairly in the dangers and labours of the night; but this was the only assistance derived from the Spaniards. On entering the larger bason with his flotilla, Sir Sidney Smith found that all the workmen had thrown away their white cockades and mounted tricoloured ones, and that six hundred galériens, or condemned felons, confined on board a great galley, were freeing themselves from their irons, and threatening resistance. Unwilling to deprive these poor wretches of their only chance of escaping the destruction which seemed to threaten them, he offered them no interruption, merely pointing the guns of the 'Swallow' tender so as to enfilade the quay on which they must have landed in order to attack him. While he was entering the bason and making his preparations in it, the besiegers kept up a close cross-fire of shot and shells from Malbousquet and the neighbouring hills, which almost overhang the arsenal; but this only kept the galley-slaves in awe, and confined the Jacobin party in the town within their houses, without producing any dismay or disorder among the British sailors, who went on distributing their combustibles among the shipping. A little later a great multitude of the besiegers descended the hills and approached the walls of the dockyard, animating each other by shouts and republican songs. Some of them came so near as to pour a quick irregular fire of musketry upon Sir Sidney Smith's seamen, who were running all about; but a few discharges of grape-shot scattered them, and sent them back before they could discover the smallness of the English force, and its utter incapability of resisting a close attack. The fireship—the terrible 'Vulcan'—was now all ready, and placed across the tier of men-of-war. Sir Sidney only expected a second signal to set fire to the trains. The great galley was not in the tier with the men-of-war: no sound was now heard from it except the noise of the hammer clanking against their chains and irons, from which the galériens were desperately striving to release themselves. And now the signal was given, and the matches were applied to the trains, and flames and columns of fire like those of a volcano in eruption rose from that part of the arsenal. By the horrible glare of this light the besiegers, who had again clustered on the nearest hills, could distinctly see and take aim at the English: they redoubled their discharges of artillery, and were approaching still nearer to the walls of the arsenal, when the 'Vulcan' began to roar: the guns of that fireship, doubly-shotted, went off as the flames reached them—went off larboard and starboard, checking the advances of the troops without, and of the Jacobins within. The shouts of the republicans on the hills were answered by the cheers of the English sailors; but anon there was an explosion so tremendous, and proceeding from a point so wholly unexpected by the British, that for some minutes all shouting and cheering ceased, all hostilities were suspended, and the bravest stood aghast. The roar proceeded from a great powder-ship, which was not in the bason, but in the inner harbour—outside of the bason, and thus between the English flotilla and the allied fleet. Lord Hood had committed the charge of this and another ship to the Spaniards with proper instructions; and the Spaniards employed, instead of scuttling and sinking them, set fire to them both. The flaming timber, and all that the two ships had contained, mounted high in the midnight air, and then descending, threatened to overwhelm the whole of the small flotilla. One of the gun-boats and one of the ship's boats were struck and blown to pieces, but, with the exception of one officer and three men, the crews were picked up alive out of the water. After setting fire to some more trains, Sir Sidney Smith and his people, with the 'Alert' sloop bringing up the rear, glided away from the quay of the arsenal, and across the inner harbour. But now the Spanish officer, who had been detached to burn the ships in the other bason, came and reported to Sir Sidney that he had not been able to enter that bason, as a boom had been thrown across the narrow mouth, and as the firing was too hot. Sir Sidney instantly sent back his English boats, and the Spanish mortar-boat; but it was now too late; the Spanish officer had thrown away his time and opportunity; the Jacobins of the town, who had waited until the last of the allied troops had retired, had now seized a battery which commanded that part of the quay, and, though the cannon were spiked, the place was near enough for their musketry to tell; and other volleys of musketry proceeded from the great guard-ship which lay within the boom. After an ineffectual attempt to cut or break the boom, the English sailors pulled off. But still the flotilla lingered in the inner harbour, for a considerable number of fugitives appeared at the water's edge putting up prayers for protection. The known royalists had been embarked, but the republicans were now rushing into the town on the land side, and were massacring all they met except the Jacobins, who were in arms, and who joined them in the work of extermination. These fugitives rushed into whatever boats they could find on the beach; some of them pushed off without oars; some so overloaded the boats that they sank in smooth water—many were drowned—all that were alive looked to Sir Sidney Smith's flotilla as their last only chance of salvation in this world. As there was not a braver, so was there not a more humane and generous-minded man than Sir Sidney: though now assailed from every side, and liable to be sunk in the narrow passage from the inner to the outer port, by the cross fires of the battery of Cape Brun, Fort L'Aiguillette, and Fort Balaguier, he hove-to, drove back the Jacobins with a well-directed fire, and received the fugitives on board his flotilla. Nor did he get him gone yet. The Spaniards had left him something more to do in that inner harbour. There lay there two French 74-gun ships, one of which was a prison ship in possession of the Jacobins, who had been confined in her, and who had been threatening the most desperate resistance. But the surrounding conflagration, the explosion of the powder-ship, which had been fired by the Spaniards at no great distance, and the scene of horror as of hell that environed them, completely intimidated these desperate prisoners; they gratefully embraced the offer of being landed in a place of safety, and as soon as they were removed fire was set to those two line-of-battle ships. Sir Sidney's operations were now completed, in as far as mortal man could complete them; but, before he could get out of that infernal crater, the powder-ship in the bason went off with an explosion more awful than the first, threatening destruction to the flotilla and to all who were near. But this time the flotilla escaped without the slightest injury. It had destroyed nine ships of the line, besides other craft, magazines, &c. And now it glided through the passage, running the gantelope of the batteries of Balaguier and L'Aiguillette, occupied by the enemy, who had not, however, taken possession of the battery opposite at Cape Brun. Unhurt, Sir Sidney and his exhausted men joined in the outer road Admiral Lord Hood, who embarked all the English forces without the loss of a man. The fleet remained for some time in the roadstead, all eyes on board fixed on the mighty conflagration; and then they steered for the Hesperides of France, the beautiful islands of Hieres, which, lying close under the coast of Provence, and covered with groves of orange, and citron, and myrtle, look like a piece of Italy dropped there by mistake.*

The English had destroyed one ship of 84 guns, one of 76 guns, seven of 74 guns, and two of 24 guns; and they brought away with them more vessels than they burned—one immense ship of 120 guns, two of 74 guns, one of 40 guns, four frigates, and seven corvettes, brigs, &c., following Lord Hood to Hieres. The Spaniards brought away one vessel of 18 guns, the Sardinians one of 32 guns, and the Neapolitans one of 20 guns. Yet the whole blow at the French navy was not so decisive as had been expected: fourteen sail of the line and five frigates escaped destruction, or were only so partially destroyed that it was found possible to repair them afterwards. The Spaniards, as we have seen, did little or nothing, and in the basin, where the British sailors had operated, the released galley-slaves extinguished the fire in several of the vessels. Nearly 15,000 men, women, and children, inhabitants of the town, or royalists from other parts of the south who had taken refuge in it as the last asylum they had in France, were carried safely away by the allied fleets: it appears that hardly any were left behind who had committed themselves by counter-revolutionary deeds, or by correspondence and connexion with Lord Hood and his allies; but what M. Thiers styles "the revolutionary vengeance" would not submit to be disappointed of its prey and its victims. Upon the first entrance of the republicans into the half-ruined town they massacred every one they met, not excepting even some two or three hundred Jacobins who went to meet and welcome them. The released galériens, whose exertions in saving the shipping had converted them from felons into patriots, joined in the excesses of the soldiery; and for twenty-four hours there was a sabbath of crime and horror in which every possible monstrosity was committed. And after these abominations the slaughter was continued for a long time in a regular, organised manner. Several hundreds of poor workmen and labourers, who had been employed by the English and their allies in improving the fortifications of Toulon, were condemned in a mass, and were executed in the same manner, the executioners being cannoniers who fired upon them with grape-shot. The guillotine, which always followed in the wake of the victorious republican armies, was then set up and made permanent: the possession of money or lands, or of a respectable station in society, was guilt and proof enough to the improvised revolutionary tribunal, and to the military commissions, which were presided over or directed by the younger Robespierre, Barras, and Freron, the three commissioners from the Convention. That legislature, carrying out to its utmost limits Danton's governing axiom, Faire Peur, decreed that the name of Toulon should be changed to that of Port de la Montagne, that the town should be destroyed, and that not a stone should be left on the top of another, except in the forts, barracks, and arsenal.

While Lord Hood was in possession of Toulon he had detached a squadron to Corsica to carry assistance to the anti-republican and anti-French party in that island; and another, commanded by Admiral Gell, to call to account the republic of Genoa, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany, or his authorities at Leghorn, who, under the mask of neutrality, had for some time pursued a system almost openly hostile to the allies. The French army in Nice had been supplied from Leghorn with provisions and stores, although the Grand Duke's government had refused a small supply of bullocks to the English fleet. Nor was this all. Two inhabitants of Toulon, under the immediate protection of Lord Hood, had proceeded to Leghorn and had there purchased a quantity of corn for the use of Toulon; and the Tuscan government, at the instance of La Flotte, the minister or resident of the French republic at Florence, had not only sequestered the corn, but had also thrown the two Toulon merchants into prison. Lord Hervey had remonstrated repeatedly, but all in vain: the Tuscan government would not so much as release the two Toulon merchants. At times the timid court his lordship addressed maintained an obstinate silence; and at other times they baffled him by delays and evasions. They could not be suspected of any affection for the French—the Grand Duke was a prince of the House of Austria, the near relation of the reigning emperor, who was at the head of the coalition, as also of Marie Antoinette, who had been so barbarously used—but they dreaded the might and fury of the republicans, and knowing their own weakness, and shutting their eyes to the fact that this was a war which would admit of no neutralities (or at least of none to a country situated as Tuscany is), they wished to remain on good terms with the French. While the English minister was carrying on his correspondence with the Grand Duke's government, he received intelligence that Tilly, the French Chargé d'Affaires at Genoa, had hired a brace of ruffians, who were to seize the principal agent for the purchase of the corn, and carry him on board a republican frigate. As soon as Admiral Gell arrived off the coast, Lord Hervey, no longer satisfied with demanding the liberation of the two Toulon merchants, and the liberty to export the corn they had purchased, insisted that the republican minister La Flotte should be immediately expelled from the Tuscan territory. The timid government, now placed between two dangers, promised that they would dismiss the Frenchman; but new delays were interposed; the corn, much wanted at Toulon, was not released, La Flotte remained where he was, nor did there appear any inclination to enforce his departure. Hereupon Lord Hervey presented himself suddenly at the palace, and having, not without difficulty, obtained admittance to the presence of the Grand Duke, he expressed to him in strong terms the danger of any further procrastination, telling him that Admiral Gell would, in twelve hours, blockade the port of Leghorn, if La Flotte and his companions (one of these was Chauvelin, late minister at London) were not immediately dismissed. The Grand Duke retired in confusion without giving any explicit answer. But intelligence presently reached Florence that a detachment from Admiral Gell's squadron was cruising off Leghorn, and that some other English ships had seized a French frigate in the Gulf of Spezia, and under the guns of Fort Santa Maria, a Genoese fort—an act which was certainly nothing less than an infringement of the law of nations. To escape from the more immediate danger, Serristori, the duke's chief minister, gave the French legation their passports, with orders to quit Tuscany within twelve hours. La Flotte and Chauvelin went into the Venetian states by way of Ferrara, and Fougères, with one or two other Frenchmen, hastened to Genoa. Other satisfaction was given; the corn was delivered to its purchasers; and after a little delay the Grand Duke, beset not merely by the minister of Great Britain, but also by the ministers of all the allied powers, and by the messages and agents of the King of Sardinia, the King of Naples, and of nearly every prince in Italy, not only agreed to break off all intercourse with the French republic, but further engaged to unite with the grand European coalition.*

The government and the people of Genoa had been, from a variety of causes, entirely under the influence of France ever since the beginning of the war; and that city of palaces swarmed with men who were or who fancied themselves Jacobins. The government was strictly an oligarchy, and an oligarchy of the most aristocratic kind; yet not a few of the members composing it, or of the members of the noble families who might aspire to form a part of it, had taken the new French doctrines to their hearts or to their heads, and, being nominally republicans themselves, these individuals seem to have fancied that it was their bounden duty to assist in spreading the new republicanism all over Europe, although it no more resembled their own than the government of Constantinople resembled that of ancient Rome. All classes of Genoese hated most vehemently their next neighbours, the Piedmontese, whose king had become a principal in the war; and they hailed with joy the news of every reverse or defeat of his Sardinian majesty.

* Carlo Botta, Storia d'Italia.—W. S. Rose.—The chief occupation of La Flotte, Chauvelin, and the rest of the republican diplomatists, while allowed to remain at Florence, had been to preach Jacobinism and disseminate Jacobinical and Atheistical books, as a means of preparing a revolution and an anarchy in Tuscany, which was at the time, beyond dispute, one of the happiest and one of the best governed countries in Europe. Other Frenchmen followed up the same system in all the rest of Italy, the diplomatists among them plotting in the most barefaced manner against the governments to which they were accredited. It therefore ill became these men and their countrymen to rail and exclaim at any violation of the law of nations. La Touche, a republican admiral, had received on board his ships in the Bay of Naples, and had entertained on shore, a great number of Neapolitan reformers, had instructed them how to organise secret societies, and had distributed the bonnets rouges among them; and all this he had done not only before the sovereign of the country had joined the allies, but at the very moment when he had engaged to remain neutral, to receive a republican ambassador, and to send an ambassador of his own to Paris.—Pietro Colletta, Storia di Napoli.

Many of them had large capitals locked up in France. Some of the senators sided with the friends of the French, out of fear of an invasion, or of a bombardment like that which Louis XIV. had inflicted on their fair city; and others of the same patrician class were notoriously bribed by the Convention, which, circulating nothing but assignats in France, found means of sending specie and other substantial means of corruption into foreign countries. The amount of gold and silver thus exported by the French republicans, even in the early stages of the war, was prodigious, and may account for many incidents and occurrences which otherwise seem inexplicable. The greediness for gold was at least as great among these Genoese republicans at the end of the eighteenth century as it was in the days of Dante. They had allowed Tilly to purchase and transmit contraband stores in Genoese vessels to Kellermann's army; and their neutral port had been a constant station for the French ships of war. In the month of July, Captain Inglefield, who had put into the port in an English frigate on a diplomatic mission from Lord Hood, was pursued by two French frigates which had been lying there. An English cutter had been pursued by gun-boats, and had been, like the English frigate, compelled to return into the harbour: a tartane from Marseilles, at the time when that unfortunate city was in arms against the Convention and under the protection of Lord Hood, was seized in the harbour, and under the forts of the Genoese republic, by the French republicans then there, who carried the ship's papers, and whatever letters and papers she had on board, to Tilly, the chargé d'affaires, and put the captain of the vessel in irons. Of several remonstrances the Genoese government had taken no heed. Admiral Gell now sent the 'Scipio,' a 74-gun ship, right into the harbour of Genoa; and the 'Scipio' seized the 'Modeste' frigate, the only French vessel then in that port, and brought her under the English admiral's lee. Backed by Mr. Drake, the English resident, Gell then demanded satisfaction for the injuries and insults which had been received, and an immediate cessation of the contraband trade which had been allowed with the French republicans, enforcing the demands with strong menaces of the hostility of Great Britain. The younger Robespierre, who was at this moment in commission at Nice, issued a terrible protest against the irregularities of the English admiral, and more especially against the capture of the French frigate in a neutral port, which he characterised as a detestable deed, an outrage not merely upon international law, but upon the rights of the whole human species,—a high crime against all civilised society. In this paper he called upon the Genoese (as if they had had the power to do it) to take an immediate and terrible vengeance on the English; he told them that they must forthwith resolve to be either friends to the friends, or enemies to the enemies of society; that if their senate should delay in making up their mind, and in punishing with a just and exemplary punishment the authors of the crime, which had been committed in their port, and under the mouths of their guns, they would be considered in a state of hostility against the French republic, which, on her part, would resort to whatever means she might think proper in order to secure vengeance for so horrible an act of violence as the seizure of the frigate. The trembling senate tried the hopeless experiment of reconciling both parties : they sent explanations and messages to Paris ; they instructed their minister at London to enter into, and lengthen explanations and negotiations. Admiral Gell, however, was instructed to demand the expulsion of Tilly, the chargé d'affaires, who had been the fomentor of all the disturbances which had previously taken place, and who still persisted in supplying the French army with contraband stores. The English ships blockaded the port of Genoa for some time, and then withdrew upon the not very trustworthy promise of the senate to observe a strict neutrality, and rigorously enforce that essential part of it which forbade their supplying the contraband stores, and without obtaining the expulsion of Tilly. It was considered unwise at the present moment to proceed to any decidedly hostile measures, as the senate must then have thrown themselves into the arms of the Convention, and as Genoa would have afforded the French an easy access, by Garvi and the Bochetta pass, into the heart of Piedmont. On the other side the Convention and their commissioners had good reasons for not driving the senate into the arms of the English. Thus each party tolerated for a time the neutrality of that little Italian republic ; the French, to whom the neutrality, in the way in which it was observed by the Genoese, was exceedingly serviceable, looking confidently forward to some near day when they should be able to annex Genoa, together with Piedmont and Lombardy, and the whole of Upper Italy, to their dominions, or at least to establish in those regions a series of democracies and mock republics which should be entirely dependent on France. The traffickers and speculators of Genoa continued the contraband trade with Kellermann's army and the southern provinces of France, and the profit they derived from it blinded their eyes to the prospect of future misery, and would by itself have been sufficient to have prevented the senate from entering into the coalition. The pope closed his ports to all French shipping ; and the Grand-Master of the Knights of Malta expelled from that island all French agents, and prohibited the entrance into his ports of any vessel whatsoever bearing the tri-coloured flag. The republic of Venice followed the same line of conduct as Genoa, but derived less pecuniary advantage from her neutrality. Efforts were made by the English resident minister, and by the representatives of other powers, to draw the Venetian senate into the league against France ; but they failed for the present, and Venice became on the Adriatic what Genoa was on the Mediterranean side of the peninsula, a centre of intrigue and a sort of headquarters for revolution professors and proselytising Jacobins. Chauvelin and his comrades, flourishing under the protection of the Lion of Saint Mark, which had become as timid and crouching as a cur—which was trying to fawn on all parties, with the certainty of being kicked by all—preached the sacred duty of insurrection in all the Venetian states and dependencies, and excited the Grisons on one side and the Dalmatians on the other to take up arms against the poor old and decrepit republic, while other agents from the Convention were labouring hard at Constantinople to entice the Turks into the war as allies of the French, by showing how easy it would be to profit by the present weakness of the Venetians, and by the over-occupation which the Austrians had given themselves on the Rhine.

The narrative of the civil war or wars which desolated the interior of France, while foreign war raged on all her frontiers, may now be best given in connexion with the proceedings at Paris and the transactions of the National Convention. The death of Louis XVI., which was to reconcile all differences of opinions, of views, and of interests, which was to destroy the distinctions of parties and of factions, and to unite all France as one great loving republican family, was followed by totally different results. The head of that unfortunate prince had scarcely been struck off ere the Gironde and the Mountain renewed their death-struggle with an increase of fury, each party striving to send their adversaries to the guillotine, and each feeling convinced that their only hope of life lay in the wholesale destruction of the other faction. Having remained in office just long enough to witness the trial and execution of the king, the virtuous Roland, harassed to death by the Jacobins, and evidently alarmed at their increasing power as well as rage, retired from the ministry with certain moral reflections which he might have made several months before, and with certain protestations which were quite as much called for when he accepted office as they could be now. A few days after the Girondists drove Pache, who had become a determined Montagnard, from his office as minister of war, and brought in Beurnonville, whom we have seen Dumouriez pack off to Coburg and an Austrian prison ; but, while Roland, out of place, remained a nullity, his former protégé, but now his mortal enemy, Pache, became more considerable and more powerful than ever by being elected mayor of Paris in lieu of Doctor Chambon, who had been terrified and beaten out of that place by the Jacobins. Clavière, the finance minister, and Lebrun, the minister for foreign affairs, who remained in office, were completely directed or led by Brissot, who indeed meddled in all things to such an extent that, though not holding any office, he must be considered as the real head of this crazy Girondist cabinet, and thus be held answerable for most of the follies and blunders and the worse things they committed. The whole party were called, at the time, Brissotins much more commonly than Girondins. If even there could have been a reconciliation or a brief truce between Robespierre and the rest of the Girondists, the thing was impossible between Robespierre and Brissot. For a short time the war between the two factions was carried on by means of pen and ink and the printing-press; the Girondist journalists, Condorcet, Gorsas, and Brissot himself (the busiest and quickest of them all) accusing the men of the Mountain of all manner of un-republican intentions, and loading them with the entire guilt of crimes in which the Girondists themselves had either had a principal share, or by which they had manifestly and manifoldly profited in rigging out their republic, and in getting at the helm of it; and the ultra-Jacobin journalists accusing the Girondists of views inimical to the sovereignty of the common people, of a new sort of aristocracy worse than the old, and (what was worst of all, because most vague and least comprehended by the Paris mob) of federalism. Specific charges were also brought against the chiefs of the Gironde; thus the Jacobins, undeterred by the abundant evidence which proved that Roland, for his own part, had been indifferent to money, and had quitted office a poor man, accused him of the grossest corruption and most ravenous speculation, asserting and repeating day after day that, during the short time he had been in office, he had contrived to lodge twelve millions of livres and more in London. They attributed the scarcity of provisions and the dearth of money to Roland, to those who remained in office after him, and to Brissot. These Jacobin papers were all read and greedily devoured by the common people, to whom they were addressed; but the Girondist journals rarely got beyond the respectabilities, whose numbers were lessened, and in a regular but rapid process of still further diminution, and who had already established the fact that in such a revolution they had, and could have; no manner of weight. Many of these journalists were deputies or members of the Convention. A decree was passed ordering these députés-journalistes to choose between their two functions, and either cease to be deputies or give up their newspapers; but, like a thousand and one other decrees, this was found inexecutable. In consequence of the assassination of Lepelletier St.-Fargeau, the Convention thought it expedient to renew or remodel their own committee of surveillance, which was separate and distinct from the committee of surveillance of the commune, declaring that no doubt could be entertained that there was a royalist conspiracy on foot to cut off all the patriotic members. The Jacobins outnumbered the Girondists in this committee; and almost the first thing they did was to order the arrest of Gorsas, the Girondist journalist. On the 25th of February there were frightful disorders in the city of Paris, the people breaking open and plundering a great many of the shops where sugar and coffee, soap, and other articles were sold—sold, as they said, at an enormous price, simply in consequence of an iniquitous system of monopoly which was but part of a royalist and aristocratic system invented for the purpose of distressing poor and virtuous patriots. In the insurrection shopkeepers' heads were broken as well as shop-doors. During the commotion some people were heard to exclaim that when they had a king they got their coffee and their sugar cheap, but now that they had gotten a republic all things were becoming dear. The Girondists taxed the Jacobins with having promoted these disorders, and provoked these dangerous un-republican remarks; and the Jacobins swore that, if this sugar and coffee business were only well sifted, the Girondists would be found at the bottom of it. That very night Robespierre harangued upon the subject in the Mother Society; he was sure that the people were good, that the people were impeccable, and incapable of doing wrong unless they were artfully misled. He had heard the men and women that were plundering the shops lamenting the fate of the dead king, and applauding the members of the côté droit of the Convention, and this left no doubt in his mind that the real instigators were the Girondists. Marat was equally sure that the disorders and excesses were all to be imputed to that wicked faction and to the royalists. On the following day the Girondists accused Marat in the Convention of being the original instigator of the riots and the pillage; and they read from his newspaper, the 'Republican,' a passage which certainly told the people that the proper way to get sugar and coffee at a cheap price would be to help themselves, and hang a few of the monopolizers at the doors of their own shops. There also seemed the closest connexion of cause and effect, for Marat had published this article in the morning of the 25th, and the plundering had commenced in the afternoon. It was monstrously absurd and disgustingly mean to press this charge about a sugar and coffee émeute against a man who had been so repeatedly the instigator of tremendous massacres; but the Girondists and their friends had allowed a vote to be carried which stopped all inquiry into the butcheries of September and into other atrocities, and so they determined to dwell upon this present charge. Salles moved for an act of accusation against Marat. Nothing disconcerted, Marat told the Convention from the tribune that it was natural and just for the people to take vengeance on the monopolists, whom the laws left unpunished, and that the members who should propose calling the people to account for what they had done yesterday were only fit to be sent to a madhouse. Buzot called for the order of the day, intimating that, if the Convention sent Marat to be tried before an ordinary tribunal, they would only prepare a fresh triumph for him, as the jury would be pretty sure to acquit him. After a riot in the House, almost as loud as the riot in the streets and at the grocers' shops the day before, it was agreed by the majority that all persons, without distinction, who had been instigators or actors in the sugar and coffee émeute should be sent for trial before the ordinary courts. They then called Santerre and Mayor Pache to their bar; and these two worthies hinted that there could be no doubt that the agents of foreign powers and of the aristocrats and emigrants (all in an understanding with Pitt) had been the chief actors in the late émeute, even as they had been the principal actors in the September butcheries. All this led to fresh domiciliary visits, and to fresh orders for seizing every man in France that had not his passport or his civic certificates en règle. The very next morning Marat declared in his journal that the sugar and coffee riot had been concerted in a nocturnal conciliabulum held in the house of that "pimp, scoundrel, and counter-revolutionist, Valazé," and that he and the other Girondists who had accused him, Marat, had employed emissaries to pillage the shops of poor and patriotic grocers, while the people were only making a little noise before the shops of the real monopolists. As for the ordinary tribunals, they never took any notice of the People's Friend.

When Condorcet, in the name of the Constitution Committee, read his report on the new republican constitution proper to be given to France, the Jacobins raised a new storm, and all France complained except the semi-republican respectabilities, who were nothing, but whom the philosophic legislator would have made everything in this new régime, overlooking the trifling fact that the real sans-culottes were, and must long remain, arbiters and masters of everything in France. Without any other effort on their part, or any other blunder to accelerate their ruin, this Condorcet constitution alone was sufficient to overthrow the Gironde. The names of Sieyès and Pétion were united with that of Condorcet in the execrations which were heaped upon this projected constitution; but it appears that Sieyès had little to do with the composition, and that Condorcet was almost the sole author. The Girondists now held several secret meetings, in which they certainly discussed the question whether, with the powers of government in their hands, and with some of the troops and some of the departments apparently devoted to them, they might not be able to strike a grand coup d'état by forcibly dissolving the Convention, or by expelling the Jacobins; but they had not the courage to come to any decision, and, secret as were their deliberations, they all came to the knowledge of their adversaries, who were thus put upon their guard. But it was a mutual fear and suspicion: if the Girondists were afraid of their adversaries, so were the Jacobins afraid of theirs; if we can believe Garat, even Robespierre doubted at this moment of the success of his party, complaining of fatigue and sickness, and saying that he believed that there was a plot on foot to destroy him and his friends.

When the troubles began to break out in the southern provinces, it was not difficult for the

Jacobins to connect them with the Gironde party, who had been in the constant practice of appealing from the capital to those departments, and of boasting of their personal influence in all the south. But what most contributed to hasten their fall was the defection of Dumouriez. This general had never, indeed, been a Girondist; the Girondists had once driven him from power and place, and had for a long time affected to consider him as a Jacobin, united with Robespierre and his party in the grand object of placing the Duke of Orleans or his son on the vacant throne (an object which assuredly was not entertained by Robespierre); but the Jacobins had all along represented Dumouriez as a decided Girondist, as one whose tastes, habits, and connexions must bind him to that party and their respectabilities, rather than to the Mountain and their true sans-culottes; and, as the Girondists had the executive council of government in their hands, it seemed quite natural to the people to hold them responsible for the deeds of all the generals and other functionaries they appointed or continued in their employments. Even before Dumouriez lost the battle of Neerwinden, the Jacobins had begun to accuse him of treachery and correspondence with the enemy; for he had failed to conquer Holland, and Camus had made a terrible report of the mode in which he had received him, a commissioner of the Convention, and of the terms in which he had dared to speak of the Convention itself. The first moye made by the Mountain was to demand that all the federates should march immediately from Paris into Belgium. The Girondists, who looked upon these provincials as their best, if not their only, defence, strongly opposed the motion, and thus incurred new odium and suspicion, for they could not deny that reinforcements were wanted in the Low Countries. After a stormy debate it was determined by the majority that the federates from Brest and the other maritime departments should march to the coasts of the north, and that the rest of the federates should for the present remain in the capital. On the next day, the 8th of March, Danton proposed that 30,000 new recruits should be demanded from Paris alone; that commissioners should be sent into all the departments of France and all the sections of Paris, to hasten the levying and marching of troops by all possible means. These propositions were immediately adopted, and the commune of Paris was called upon to cooperate. The black flag was again raised over the Hôtel-de-Ville; again the country was declared to be in danger: the theatres were all closed; and in the evening the forty-eight sections of Paris assembled. Two commissioners from the Convention repaired to each of the sections, and urged the necessity of the immediate marching of troops. The people of the sections recognised the necessity, and expressed their readiness to march, or to furnish men that would; but, as in the days of September, there rose in nearly every section the alarming cry that patriots could not be expected to march to the frontiers, and leave traitors and conspirators behind them in the capital, ready to slaughter their families and friends, and slay liberty and equality—that before they could march against the Austrians and Prussians they must have, if not another massacre like that of September, some new and more terrible tribunal which should remove all apprehensions by the promptness of its sentences and the rapidity of its executions. The patriots of the sections also demanded that provisions should be made cheaper, and that all the monied classes who remained at home should pay enormous taxes for the proper support of those who were to march. On the following day the Montagnards met in full force in the Convention to carry decrees conformable to the demands of the sections. The members of the Jacobin Club crowded the galleries, many of them being armed with pistols. The president (Gensonné) declared that la chose publique had never been in greater jeopardy. Many of Gensonné's party believed that their own persons were in the greatest danger; and therefore they had stayed away from the House. Mayor Pache and his municipals came to the bar to express the patriotism and entire devotion of the sections, but also to assure the Convention that their desires must be complied with. Then deputations presented themselves from the Section of Pikes, from the Section of the Marais, and from many others, all making the same professions, coupled with the same demands. Volunteers in arms also defied through the Convention hall, stating in energetic language that the wishes of the people must be gratified. The Plain, following the example of its leader, Barrère, had been for some time sliding towards the Mountain; the Gironde could no longer count upon it in any emergency: after very little opposition from Guadet, Valazé, and Lanjuinais, the Mountain carried a decree for establishing a new Extraordinary Criminal Tribunal, which was to pronounce sentence, without any appeal, upon conspirators and counter-revolutionists. With the same ease they carried another decree imposing an extraordinary and excessive war-tax on the rich; and then another decree, which authorised the commissioners sent into the departments to arrest all suspected persons, to seize all pleasure-horses, to levy extraordinary contributions where they might see proper, and, in short, to exercise the most absolute power. These commissioners, who afterwards obtained the name of pro-consuls, and some of whom exceeded the tyranny of the worst of the pro-consuls of ancient Rome, might truly declare, as they did, that the Convention had set no limits to their powers, and had explicitly ordered or completely sanctioned the worst deeds they committed. In the course of the same day the Mountain carried various other votes calculated to gratify the departing volunteers and the sans-culottes who remained at home. The next day, the 10th, was a Sunday; the Girondists expected that it would be a sabbath like that of the 2nd of September, for, notwithstanding the votes and compliances of the Convention, some dark threats had been heard, or were said to have been heard, in the Mother Society, and some street orators had declared that there would be no health for the people until the Convention were well purged. It was even rumoured that it had been determined the preceding evening in the Jacobin and Cordelier clubs that the barriers should be shut, that the tocsin should be rung, and that the people, in two divisions, should march upon the Convention, and to the houses of the ministers; but fear is inventive, and it does not appear that there was any design of this settled and extensive kind. Possibly, however, the Montagnards may have expected some spontaneous movement of the people, for the excitement was universal, and a dinner was got up in the corn-market for the volunteers who had enrolled, and a little wine and speech-making might transport this great meeting into some terrible fury. The Convention met at the usual hour on the Sunday morning, the Mountain being again in full force, and the ranks of the côté droit being again rather thin. The chief business was to constitute the new tribunal which had been voted yesterday. Cambacérés insisted that this terrible court ought to be appointed, and put into activity immediately. Buzot attempted to recommend moderation, circumspection, delay; and for this he was hissed and hooted. A committee had been at work during the night, and their report was presented. Their project was simply this:—That the new tribunal should be composed of nine judges named by the Convention; That these judges should be independent of all formalities; That they should obtain convictions by all possible means; That the tribunal should be divided into two sections, always permanent; That there should continually be in the hall destined to this tribunal a member of the court to receive denunciations; That this tribunal should judge those against whom the Convention should issue decrees of accusation; and that it might prosecute directly and of its own accord all such persons as should, through incivism, abandon or neglect the exercise of their functions—all such as, by their conduct or the manifestation of their opinions, should attempt to mislead the people—all such as by their behaviour or by their writings, or by the places they had occupied under the ancient régime, should recel the prerogatives usurped by the despots. The Mountain hailed the report with joyous acclamations. Vergniaud, who could not but see that this tribunal was intended for his party, and that no man could consider his life secure if it were established, exclaimed that he and his friends would all die then and there, rather than consent to the establishment of a state inquisition a thousand times more horrible than that of Venice. Amar told him that the people must have this tribunal, or an insurrection with massacres like those of last September. Billaud-Varennes and others of that party cried out that they must have it, and that they would have it—that the House had nothing to do but to vote the project into a decree by appel nominal. Duhem explained that such a tribunal would be a great deal too good for scoundrels and counter-revolutionists. Some one hinted that there ought, at least, to be a jury in this new court. Barrère took up this opinion, and supported it with great spirit. Philipaux said that a jury would spoil this beautiful institution (cette belle institution). "But," said Boyer-Fonfrède, "we made our revolution to obtain trial by jury, and it will be counter-revolutionary to destroy that right." Thureau said that, if there was to be a jury, the Convention itself ought to have the choosing of it, and it ought at present to be chosen in Paris alone. Boyer-Fonfrède reminded the House that the offences of which the tribunal was to take cognizance might be committed in the army, in all parts of France; and that, therefore, it was but fair that the jury should be chosen in the departments as well as in the capital, and that the citizens in the departments should at least concur in the choice. The Mountain kept calling for a division on the whole report, without any amendment or addition; and their adversaries seemed on the point of yielding, when Ferroux re-animated them by a bold and unexpected burst of eloquence and indignation, which also produced some show of heart and courage on the part of the sliding, mean-spirited, despicable Plain or middle party. In the end, it was carried by a great majority that there should be a jury, and that the jury should be chosen in the departments as well as in Paris; but, after all, as the jury was to be named by the Convention alone, little was gained for the cause of justice, impartiality, and mercy by this victory over the ultra-Jacobins. By this time it was growing dark, and, their dinner-hour being long past, the deputies were growing hungry. President Gensonné proposed an adjournment for one hour. "No!" exclaimed Danton, rushing to the tribune, "this is no time for adjourning even for a minute! I summon all good citizens to remain at their posts!" The members who had risen, and who were retiring, hastened back to their seats, and listened to the loud and always terrible voice of Danton. His speech was little else than a variation played upon the old theme, faire peur—strike all your enemies with terror, freeze them with fear! To this end they must settle at once all questions concerning the new tribunal; they must give it a power without rules or limits; they must set it going instantly, so that it might strike down in time the audacious heads of all the enemies of liberty and the people. For his part he cared not how men might calumniate him for recommending this revolutionary tribunal. "Let my memory perish," cried he, "let my name be blasted, provided only the republic be saved!" It was now seven o'clock in the evening; the rest for one hour was agreed to; the exhausted members went away to their dinner, the greater part of them being fully determined not to return again that night, for alarming reports had reached them from the banquet in the Corn-market.*

The Jacobins had assembled in their great hall in the Rue St. Honoré, and had left the doors wide open as if to invite visitors to enter. About eight in the evening a party of the volunteers, who had been feasting and drinking in the Corn-market, and who were armed with swords and pistols, arrived at the door and requested to be permitted to defile through the hall. The orator of the party said that they were the conquerors of the Tuileries, the men of the 10th of August, who were risen to exterminate their enemies at home, as well as their enemies abroad. The club applauded, and Collot d'Herbois, who was president that night, exclaimed, "Yes, in spite of all intriguers, we will join you in saving liberty!" Desfieux spoke more explicitly than Collot, telling the volunteers and the club, and the people in the galleries, that there was only one means left to save France, which was to get rid of the traitors in the Convention, to put the côté droit and all who had voted for the appeal to the people, on the king's trial, under arrest, and to elect new deputies to supply their places. One of the volunteers said that the arrest would not be enough, that there must be vengeance and death; that, as for the inviolability of the traitors, as representatives of the people, he would trample it under his foot. Some of the Jacobins, who had not been dining and drinking in the Corn-market, were terrified at these bold propositions, and opposed a project, which was now certainly mooted, for marching to the Convention and for seizing the ministers in their houses. A wild scene followed: the mob in the galleries rushed down and joined the volunteers; swords were drawn and pistols flourished in the air—there was sad scrambling, rushing, and scuffling—the president lost his hand-bell, and the lights were nearly all put out. Faublas-Louvet had a lodging in the Rue St. Honoré, a very little above the Jacobins, and he had besides a wife or a mistress who lived with him in this lodging, a smart, quick little woman, who kept her eye on all that passed in that dangerous neighbourhood. Hearing a terrible noise about nine in the evening, Madame Lodoiska stepped down to the club and saw the drawn sabres, and heard dreadful menaces uttered against the Girondists. She hurried back to her apartment, and told Louvet, who had returned home during her absence, that the volunteers and the mob were going to the Cordelier Club for reinforcements. Louvet ran instantly to the house of Pétion, where a number of his friends were assembled: he says he found them quietly discussing some decrees which were to be proposed several weeks hence. He advised them on no account to think of returning to the Convention that night, and named a certain house in Paris where they might all meet in an hour. At the appointed time and place there was a pretty full meeting—the men of the party that had been most threatened were there, excepting only Pétion.

* Debates in Hist. Parlement.

Louvet ran back to the ex-mayor, and found him fiddling. He represented the danger he was in, and begged him to go along with him to the place of secret rendezvous. Pétion went to his window, opened it, and looked out at the weather. "It rains hard," said he, "there will be nothing done to-night;" and so saying he returned to his violin, and let Louvet go away without him. Of the whole côté droit not more than forty had returned to the Convention. Warned by Louvet or by their own apprehensions, some of the ministers and their friends assembled in the house of Lebrun. The residence of the war-minister, Beurnonville, was surrounded by a mob; but he nimbly climbed over his garden wall, put himself at the head of some Brest federates who were out and under arms, collected other friends, and imposed respect on the rioters, who neither marched to the Convention nor did any other mischief that night. It is said that this timidity or inaction was the consequence of the refusal of Commandant-general Santerre and the council of the commune to take any part in the insurrection; but it is at least very probable that Louvet and his friends had been more alarmed than was necessary, that there was no fixed plan of any sort for this night, and that the "frightful plot," as the novelist terms it, was nearly all in his and his Lodoiska's imagination. For many nights before this Louvet had not ventured to sleep in his own known lodging, but had gone about Paris, taking a bed with one friend and then with another; and it appears that this had been and continued to be for some time longer the uncomfortable practice of the Girondist chiefs. Brissot, or some one writing in his journal 'Le Patriote Français,' announced that the chief object of the Mountain in attempting this insurrection of the 10th of March was to get all the powers of the state into their hand; that Danton was to have been made minister for foreign affairs; Dubois-Crancé, minister-at-war; Jean-Bon-St.-André, minister of marine; Thuriot or Cambacérès, minister of justice; Fabre d'Églantine, of the interior; and Collot d'Herbois, of finances. Vergniaud denounced the whole business to the Convention; but, though his speech was very grand, he seems really to have failed in proving that there had been any plot at all. The Extraordinary Tribunal, which soon obtained the more fitting name of Revolutionary Tribunal, being instituted and organised, the Girondists essayed to direct its first severities against their adversaries, or rather against the subaltern agents of the Mountain, the street orators, and coffee-house orators, and the fellows that were émeute-makers by profession. But on Tuesday, the 12th of March, they were all flustered by a demand made by one of the Paris sections, that Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, Louvet, Brissot, and others of them, to the number of twenty-two, should be put under arrest. The proposition was received with expressions of horror, some of them sincere and real enough, and some only feigned; but this producing of it in the Convention, and the constant re-producing of it in the clubs and in the newspapers, served to familiarise the idea to the minds of the people.

Early in April the final defection and flight of Dumouriez precipitated the crisis. The Mountain now accused their opponents, in the face of the Convention, of being parties to Dumouriez's treason. Marat continued the denunciations in the popular societies, and, in his quality of temporary president of the Jacobins, he wrote an address to the departments, calling upon them all to hurl the thunder of petitions and accusations against the traitors, who were, he said, all those unfaithful representatives who, on the king's trial, had voted for the appeal. While these things were producing a vast impression everywhere, and when the people were in a state of frenzy at Dumouriez's flight, and the repeated defeats of the republican army on the Belgian frontier, Robespierre (on the 10th of April) in an artful speech connected all those disasters with the political movements of the Girondists. "A powerful faction," said he, "is conspiring with the tyrants of Europe to give us a king with a sort of aristocratic constitution. These men hope to bring about that scandalous plan by force of foreign arms and intestine troubles. The system suits the English government; it suits Pitt, the soul of all this league; it suits all ambitious men; it pleases all the burgher aristocrats, who have a horror of equality, and who have been made to tremble for their property; it even pleases the noblesse, who will be but too happy to find in this aristocratic constitution, and in the court of some new king, the distinctions and privileges they have lost. Our republic only suits the common people, the men of pure and elevated souls, the philosophers and friends of humanity, the true sans-culottes. The aristocratic system I speak of is nothing else than the system of Lafayette and his similars, whether known under the name of Feuillans or of Moderates; it has been continued by those who succeeded to Lafayette's power: the actors have been changed, but the piece is still the same; the means too are the same, with this difference, that the present men have augmented their resources and increased the number of their partisans." He accused them of drawing to their party all the enemies of true equality, of setting the respectabilities against the sans-culottes, of stopping the progress of public spirit, of re-awakening the pride and the hopes of the aristocracy, of oppressing the energetic patriots, of protecting the hypocritical Moderates, of corrupting the defenders of the people, and of persecuting such of them as they could not corrupt. To these ends they had employed all the powers of government, and of the tribunals, which they had seized, or over which they domineered, and all the resources of the public treasure, which likewise they had got into their hands as ministers. He said that, instead of contributing to the revolution of the 10th of August, which had turned the monarchy into a republic, they had done all that they could to prevent it, although they had afterwards gathered the fruits of the victory of the people over the Tuileries. Knowing where his own strength lay, Robespierre eulogised the commune of Paris, and taxed the Girondists with a state crime for having so repeatedly attempted to oppose ~~that~~ municipal body. He showed when and how the Girondist ministers had employed Dumouriez, and how Dumouriez had promoted and employed officers of the most aristocratic description, men devoted to the family of Orleans and to the Girondists. He quoted a terrible letter which Dumouriez had written, and in which he had declared his intention of coming to Paris to rescue the sound part of the Convention (meaning thereby the Girondists) from the tyranny of their adversaries and the dictation of the galleries; and this, he said, was quite enough to prove that the Girondists and that traitor had been acting in concert. But there were other proofs in abundance. In the committee of general defence, where all questions relating to the war were discussed, the leading Girondists had constantly screened Dumouriez, Vergniaud pretending that, though he had no political opinions or principles, he must be strongly attached to the cause of the revolution, and Gensonné falling into a rage against those who bestowed on Dumouriez the epithets he merited, and boasting the civism, the services, and the genius of that wonderful general. And was not Gensonné at that time in close and constant correspondence with Dumouriez? And had not Pétion and Brissot defended the traitor as warmly as Gensonné and Vergniaud?

Vergniaud ascended the tribune to reply to Robespierre, and to hurl the accusations back upon him and his party. He boasted that he had been the first man to propose from that tribune the dethronement of Louis Capet; that in the committee of Twenty-one he and his friends wanted neither a new king nor a regent, but were determined to have a republic. He boasted that he had occupied the president's chair all the terrible night of the 9th and 10th of August, when the tocsin was resounding throughout Paris; and that, on the morning of the 10th, when his friend Guadet was in the chair, and when the victory of the people over the Swiss and the Tuileries was as yet uncertain, it was he, Vergniaud, that presented, to the sound of artillery, the report of the committee demanding the déchéance. He taxed his adversaries with cowardice, and said it ill became M. Robespierre, who had prudently concealed himself in a cellar during the moment of danger, to be critical upon the conduct or momentary weakness of other men. He declared that he had never had any intimacy with Dumouriez, but that Robespierre had crowned that general with laurels and embraced him in the Jacobin Club. He recalled to memory the many occasions on which the Girondists had denounced the faction of Orleans, the efforts which the Jacobins had made to defend Egalité; and he laboured to show that the Jacobins and the Mountain, and not the Girondists, had been engaged in a conspiracy with some members of the Orleans family, and had been the accomplices of Dumouriez. Guadet demanded to be heard after Vergniaud; but the Mountain set up a tremendous roar, the president closed the debate, and he could not obtain a hearing before the 12th of April. On the following morning Marat very adroitly took the lead in invoking fresh vengeance on the Orleans family. "I only aim," said he, "at plotters and conspirators. . . . The complicity of a certain party is no longer a problem. Dumouriez has solved it in declaring for them against the Mountain! I will not decide whether Egalité the father, whom I have pursued in my writings, whom I have described as a man without manners and without morals, be guilty of high treason against the nation or not: I leave that question to your consideration; but the son is certainly a traitor; and I demand that a price be put upon the head of Egalité junior. I propose the same thing with respect to the heads of all the fugitive Capets; and then we will see whether certain men really wish to proscribe the family they are pretending to pursue. As for Vergniaud and his friends, who kept up a criminal correspondence with Dumouriez, let them relieve themselves, if they can, from the opprobrium with which they are covered in the opinion of the people!" A Jacobin said that Marat was premature; that, if they now set a price upon the heads of all the chief conspirators, they would lose the thread of the conspiracy. Another said that the proposition ought not to be admitted, lest the commissioners of the Convention, whom Dumouriez had delivered to the Austrians, should lose their heads. Barbaroux swore that he knew Marat had received 15,000 livres at one time from the Duke of Orleans. Lecointre, of Versailles, expressed his horror at seeing the House listening quietly to the denunciations of Marat against the best citizens of France. "Marat," said he, "is vomiting calumnies. . . ." He could say no more; his voice was drowned by the hootings and execrations of the côté gauche and the galleries, and he descended from the speaking-place. Then the côté droit began to shout, and a good many of its members quitted their seats, and ran towards the côté gauche "with threatening gestures and animated cries." The president (Thuriot) rang his hand-bell, and then put on his hat. The côté droit deputies returned to their seats, and something like order was nearly re-established, when a member of the côté gauche set up a shout that a sword had been drawn in the Assembly; and David the painter, Marat, Bentabolle, and others shouted or shrieked that the villain who had drawn the sword ought to be sent to the Abbaye. A scene of indescribable violence and confusion ensued. At last Duperret, the deputy of the côté droit who had drawn his sword, was enabled to make himself heard. He declared that he had seen a member of the côté gauche with a pistol in his hand, and that, provoked at the shameful sight, he had drawn his sword. "But," added he, "at that moment I was not myself; I was animated with a holy fury (une sainte fureur), if I may so express myself; and I swear to you that if, in my excess of fury, I had permitted myself to fall upon a representative of the people, I would have blown out my brains with another weapon I have in my pocket!" As soon as he had finished, the côté droit called for the order of the day, and, being seconded by the Plain, they were strong enough to carry it in the teeth of the Mountain, who kept screaming that Duperret was an assassin, and ought to be sent to the Abbaye. After another vacarme, in the course of which Thuriot quitted the president's chair, and one of the Mountain took possession of it, Marat's motion was negatived. "Well!" said he, as he quitted the hall, "the people may now know who are the accomplices of the Capets!"*

On the 12th Robespierre renewed the attack, and demanded the censure of the House upon all such as dared to protect traitors. Pétion ran to the tribune and began to speak, although the mobs that filled the galleries insulted him, and made so loud a noise that he could scarcely be heard. "I demand," said he, "that the traitors and conspirators be punished." "And their accomplices," said Robespierre. "Yes! and their accomplices, and you yourself, Robespierre. It is time that these infamies should end; it is time that the traitors and calumniators should be sent to the scaffold; and I here take a solemn engagement to pursue them even unto death!" "Reply to facts," cried Robespierre. "I tell you," responded Pétion, "that it is you I will pursue to the guillotine! Yes, I here take an oath to pursue the traitors! Yes, Robespierre, you must be marked and branded as false witnesses and calumniators were in former times. The people will soon know you and your party, who, under the mask of a false patriotism, mislead them, betray them, and drive them to the abyss; and I will never rest until I have seen the men who would sacrifice liberty and the republic lose their heads on the scaffold. For too long a time have they been exciting the people to rise against the Convention and massacre us!" "No," cried Robespierre, "it is you who have been trying to get us massacred!" "Silence, dictator of the 10th of August," shouted a voice from the côté droit. Pétion continued in the same violent strain in which he had begun. At one part of his speech he called Marat "a vile scoundrel that had been perpetually preaching despotism—despotism under a dictator or under a triumvirate." "You are a scoundrel yourself," quoth Marat, who was as loudly applauded by the Mountain and the galleries as Pétion was applauded by the côté droit. Painter David particularly distinguished himself by his enthusiasm for the Friend of the People; and he rushed into the middle of the hall begging that they would assassinate him as well as Marat, for that he, too, was a virtuous man and true republican. The effect of Pétion's harangue and repeated vows was to convince Marat, Robespierre, and the whole Mountain, that, if they would preserve their own heads on their shoulders, they must make haste to take off the heads of the Girondists. When Guadet rose to speak, he was much calmer and more circumspect. He said that possibly there had been no conspiracy or complicity at all with Dumouriez; but that, if there had been anything of the sort, it was much more probable that the Mountain and the Jacobins, who had shown so much friendship to Dumouriez and Philippe Egalité, should be implicated in it, than the Girondists, who had quarrelled with both those individuals, and who had never had any close or friendly connexion with them. "Who was it," asked Guadet, "who paid such assiduous court to Dumouriez when he was last at Paris? Who was it that was constantly by his side at the Jacobins, at the fêtes that were given to the general, at all the theatres of Paris? Your Danton!" "Ah! Guadet," cried Danton, "you accuse me! You do not know my power!" Guadet said, sneeringly, that he knew him to be next after Robespierre and Marat. The great Girondist orator finished his speech by producing and reading an address from the Jacobin Club to their brothers in the departments. In this address, which was signed by Marat as president of the club for the night, there were several strong passages; but the following was the strongest of all:—"Citizens, your greatest enemies are in the midst of you, are directing your operations, are entrusted with the management of your means of defence. Yes, friends and brothers, it is in the senate that parricidal hands are tearing your entrails! Yes, the counter-revolution is in the government, is in the National Convention; it is there—it is in that centre of your security and hopes that criminal delegates hold the threads of the plot which has been woven with the horde of despots that are coming to butcher us all! It is there that a cabal directed by the court of England and others But already indignation inflames your courageous civism. To arms, then, O republicans! To arms, and let us march!" "Those are my words," said Marat, "and I say again, Let us march (marchons!)" But the members of the Plain joined the côté droit in crying that the march he had proposed to the people was a march upon the Convention; and two-thirds and more of the House rose simultaneously to their feet, and demanded that Marat should be committed to the Abbaye to take his trial before the new Revolutionary Tribunal. Marat rushed to the tribune, and, addressing the galleries rather than the House, told them that this was a mere trick to save those who had been conspiring with Dumouriez and the family of Orleans, and to call away attention from the decrees which he had proposed against Egalité the younger, against the brother of Louis XVI., who was now styling himself Regent of France, and against the whole race of the Capets. The galleries responded with tremendous applause; but for once the Plain was steady and determined, and the decree of accusation against Marat continued to be demanded by an increasing majority. Even the voice of Danton, who attempted to plead for Marat, was drowned and lost on the present occasion; and the decree of accusation and arrest was carried by 220 votes against 92.* Robespierre ran over to the Jacobins to make his own report of what had passed in the Convention, and to attribute it all to the criminal despair of the Girondists. He implored the members of the society and the good people in their galleries to remain quiet, as all that their enemies wanted was a pretext for employing force; and he recommended them to repair to their several sections and enlighten their fellow-citizens as to the manoeuvres of the traitors. †

Only three days after these events—on Monday, the 15th of April—deputations from thirty-five of the sections, with Mayor Pache at their head, presented themselves in the Convention, and demanded the immediate expulsion of the twenty-two leading Girondists. As their names were pronounced one after the other—Brissot, Guadet, Vergniaud, Gensonné, Grangeneuve, Buzot, Barbaroux, Salles, Biroteau, Pontécoulant, Pétion, Lanjuinais, Valazé, Hardy, Louvet, Lehardy, Gorsas, Fauchet, Lanthénas, Lasource, Valady, Chambon—the galleries shouted and cheered. The paper, which was entitled an “Address from the Commune of Paris to the Convention,” was only signed by “Phulpin, president of the committee of the majority of the sections,” and by “Boncourt, secretary.” The president of the Convention (Delmas) told the deputation that, conformably to a decree of the Convention, they must all sign the petition. They all signed readily enough except Mayor Pache, who, half afraid of what was doing, skulked behind. But a quick Jacobin, observing his backwardness, begged to remind the president that the mayor had not put his signature to the paper. Then Pache said that he had not signed because he was not a petitioner, but had only been appointed by the council-general of the commune to accompany the deputation. To have refused his signature when thus openly called upon for it would, however, have ruined him with the Jacobins, who might prove the stronger, and therefore he stepped briskly forward, and saying, “But to prevent any doubt about this matter, I will sign,” he wrote “Jean-Nicolas Pache, Mayor of Paris,” at the foot of the other signatures, and thereby obtained cheers and acclamations from the mob in the galleries. Boyer-Fonfrède, the youngest of the Girondists, who was not comprised among the twenty-two, rushed to the tribune and said that, if modesty was not rather a duty than a virtue in a public man, he should take offence at his name not having been inscribed in the honourable list which had just been presented. Three-fourths of the members present rose in a state of great excitement. “I see, citizens,” continued Fonfrède, “that you share in my sentiments and my regrets; that you are, like me, jealous of the honour of being signalised as having well served the republic!” This carried the enthusiasm of the moment to its height; the whole of the côté droit and the greater part of the Plain shouted, “Put all our names down on the list! Include us all! all!” and they gathered round the honoured twenty-two, hugging them and kissing them in the national manner, and vowing that they would all perish rather than suffer a hair of their heads to be injured. Within a very few weeks we shall find this same majority bowing to the will of the commune and the sections, and consenting to the imprisonment, the proscription, the death of the Girondist leaders. Continuing his speech, which their enthusiasm had interrupted, Boyer-Fonfrède demanded that the petition or address should be laid before the people, and that an appeal should be made to the nation at large. This was an imprudence, for, strange as it may at first sight appear, the words ‘appel au peuple’ had become ominous and horrible to the people’s ears; and, as one of the terms now most commonly used to designate counter-revolutionists and anti-sans-culottists was that of appellants or appealers, Thirion, rhetoric professor at Metz, and a dabbler in poetry before the revolution, but now ultra-revolution professor in the Jacobin Hall, and one of Marat’s warmest friends, availed himself of the slip which the young Girondist had made. “These men,” said he, “who now call for the appeal to the people, are the same men who voted for the appeal at the trial of the tyrant. They are the same individuals whose mode of voting on that trial has been disapproved by the whole nation. The addresses of felicitation which have been brought from all points of the republic have ratified the conduct of the majority of the Convention who had the courage to vote the death of the tyrant. And now will not the French people approve the conduct of the four hundred members of the Convention who had the courage to found the republic on the ruins of the throne? Or will they wish to preserve amongst the number of their delegates, who are to make a republican constitution, these cowards who have betrayed equality, these men who have trembled before a dethroned king, these men who embarrass and delay all our salutary deliberations? Not twenty-two, but good three hundred ought to be expelled. . . . I say they are all royalists! I say that, after the addresses we have received from all the departments, these men, if they had any sense of shame, would of themselves retire from an assembly which they dishonour by their presence!” Some of the deputies of the Plain stopped the discussion by calling the attention of the House to some letters from the generals and from the commissioners they had sent to the armies; but the address was not rejected, and those who had brought it received the honours of the séance. A few days after the commune of Paris sent another address with the same demand for the expulsion of the twenty-two, and declared themselves to be in a state of revolution (en état de révolution). Moreover they printed 12,000 copies of their petition or address against the Girondists; they established a committee of correspondence, consisting of nine select Cordelier-Jacobins, to correspond incessantly with the forty-four thousand municipalities; and in order to throw their buckler over Marat, they declared that they would consider themselves assailed by any attack that might be made upon any member of their own body, or upon any president or secretary of a section or club, on account of opinions or of words spoken or written. The Girondists made some efforts to strengthen themselves in the Convention, so as to meet this open declaration of war from the commune and the clubs; but it was little they could do with their timid uncertain majority, and then came the trial and acquittal of Marat, which, with the demonstrations which followed it, made the Plain veer rapidly round again towards the Mountain. The cause of the People's Friend was pleaded beforehand by all the sans-culottic journalists, and by those prevailing advocates the Jacobins and the Cordeliers, and the other clubs who joined in calling him "that austere philosopher, formed by misfortune and meditation," "that quick-sighted patriot who could detect traitors at a glance, that great man whose reputation would commence when the traitors would all be forgotten." To avoid the inconvenience of even a short imprisonment in the Abbaye, Marat, who had been allowed to quit the Convention when they launched their decree of accusation and imprisonment, determined to hide himself until the day of trial. There was no difficulty in this: he had been so long accustomed to play at hide and seek, and now there were so many thousands of patriots in Paris ready to dispute with one another the honour of giving him an asylum or of having him for their guest! On the 24th of April he presented himself before the Revolutionary Tribunal: his trial lasted only a few minutes, and he was unanimously acquitted by judges and jury, who were overawed by an immense and tumultuous mob that crowded the court and all the avenues leading to it. He was immediately surrounded by a numerous escort composed of women and men, of sans-culottes armed with pikes, and of detachments from the section battalions armed with muskets and bayonets; they cheered him, they embraced him, they hugged the dirty monster in their hands, they clapped a crown of oak-leaves upon his hideous head to make him look like a Roman. Two municipal officers from the commune opened the march, two tall pioneers of the national guard hoisted him on their shoulders, other tall sappers or pioneers lent the support of their arms and hands to make his seat a comfortable and dignified one; and in this guise, singing 'Ca Ira,' and 'Allons, enfans de la patrie,' and followed by a shouting multitude, they carried him back in triumph to the Convention. When they were arrived in the midst of the hall, one of the sappers or pioneers, with his apron on, and with his heavy axe in his hand, advanced to the bar and said, "Citizen president, we bring you back the excellent Marat. Marat has always been the friend of the people, and the people will always be the friends of Marat! If the head of Marat must fall, the head of the pioneer shall fall first!" And in saying these words he brandished his heavy, bright axe in the blinking eyes of the president and of the côté droit, and was tremendously applauded by the galleries. Next he asked permission for the escort to defile through the hall. The president—the Girondist Lasource—hesitated, and said he would consult the Assembly. But the patriot escort would not be kept waiting, and in they rushed, men and women, pikemen and all, while many of the terrified deputies of the Plain and the droit ran out by opposite doors. Some of the intruders sat down among the members, upon the seats which had thus been left empty; others, passing him on from shoulder to shoulder, hoisted the liberated Marat to his usual seat on the Mountain; and then followed the hugging and embracing of colleagues, with renewed acclamations from the galleries and from the mob in the body of the house. When this was over, the 'Friend of the People' ran to the tribune, and told the august Areopagus that he came to offer a pure heart and a purified name, &c. "This," said Danton, "ought to be a beautiful sight (un beau spectacle) for every good Frenchman!" From the Convention Marat was carried to the Jacobin Club, where more honours awaited him. The Jacobinesses had prepared for him a great many crowns and wreaths: one was presented to him by the president of the society, and another was put upon his brow by a child of four years, who was mounted upon the table for the purpose. The cynical man soon grew weary of this foolery, and disdainfully throwing aside the crowns, he ran to the speaking-place and said, "Citizens, enraged at seeing a villainous faction betraying the republic, I tried to unmask them, and to put the rope round their necks. They resisted by striking me with a decree of accusation. I am come off victorious. They are humiliated, but they are not yet crushed. Citizens, do not lose your time in awarding triumphs, but think of business!" And to business they presently went, one of their first occupations being to make sure of several battalions of troops that had been collected in Paris in order to be marched into the Vendée. For several days the Girondists seemed palsied or stupified; but at last, on the 10th of May, Guadet made a daring and desperate plunge. From the tribune of the Convention (which had on this day transferred its sittings from the Salle de Manège to the Tuileries, now styled Palais National) he exclaimed, "Citizens, while virtuous men are doing nothing but groaning over the miseries of the country, the conspirators are in motion to destroy it. Like Cæsar they say, 'Let them talk, and let us be doing!' But let us be doing also. The evil lies in the impunity of the conspirators of the 10th of March; the evil is in the reigning anarchy; the evil is in the misrule of the authorities of Paris, who are equally covetous of money and of dominion. Citizens, you have yet time to save your country and your own glory. I propose to annul instantly the authorities of Paris; to replace within four and twenty hours the municipality by the presidents of the sections; to unite the supplementary members of the Convention at Bourges in the shortest time possible, and to send a decree to this effect to all the departments by extraordinary couriers." It has been conjectured that, if this bold scheme had been instantly adopted by the majority, the Girondists might yet have saved themselves; but we doubt the plausibility of the speculation; first, because the commune and the clubs of Paris had the entire control of the national guards and of all the armed bodies in and near the capital, and secondly (which includes everything), there were all over France fifty sans-culottes for one respectability. Many members of the droit were scared by the scheme, which, if adopted, must, they thought, inevitably lead not to the beginning of a civil war—for that calamity had been begun long before—but to a great extension of it, and that too at a most critical moment, when the armies of the republic were disheartened and disorganised by defeat, and when France was threatened on all her frontiers. The men of the centre or Plain appeared to feel the weight of these reasonings still more, for it was not with them, as with the Girondists and their declared partisans, a question of life and death (personally); they might remain and flourish in Paris though the commune and the Mountain should drive the Girondists to the four corners of the earth or to the block; and therefore Barrère, their glib leader, dwelt upon the risks and horrors of civil war, upon the frightful probability that, if Frenchmen were long divided, the republic might be conquered and partitioned by the coalition. "It is by union and firmness," said he, "that you must dissipate the tempest which assails you here. Division will hasten your ruin. If conspirators can dissolve the Convention in this great city, in the centre of its power, they will have no difficulty in disposing of a fragment of it in the little town of Bourges. I propose that we nominate a Committee of Twelve to watch over the designs of the commune, to examine into the late disorders, and whatever plots may have been formed against the national representation, and to arrest the persons concerned in them." The proposal was adopted by the House, and the fatal Committee of Twelve was forthwith formed. The deputies appointed to this committee were nearly all of the côté droit, and four of them, Boyer-Fonfrède, Rabaud-St.-Etienne, Kervelegan, and Henri-Larivière, were decided Girondists. The twelve commenced operations with some vigour, and not without some irregularity, which might be called illegality, if there had been any law in France. They received secret denunciations, and they instituted secret researches. The clubs and their journals instantly represented the committee as an accursed inquisition. The commune took the alarm, and concerted measures for anticipating the committee, and for getting rid of the terrible twelve, and of all the leading Girondists, at one blow. As their deliberations were secret, as they resolved in this business to commit nothing to writing, some doubt may be entertained as to the correctness of the accounts usually given of their debates and resolutions in the Hôtel-de-Ville; but it appears that Mayor Pache kept away from them as much and committed himself as little as was possible, and that several propositions were entertained (but not one was decided upon) for assassinating or carrying off the Girondists. The Mother-society, cautiously guided by Robespierre, did little or nothing for the moment; but the Cordelier Club despised all caution or reserve whatsoever. There, on the 22nd of May, an immediate insurrection was recommended, which was to have for its object not merely the expulsion and death of the twenty-two Girondists, but the massacre of three hundred members of the Convention. If this was a conspiracy, it was one without any of the mystery which is usually considered necessary to give the character of a conspiracy to concerted measures. Men and women too—for the Parisian patriotesses frequently occupied the tribunes of the clubs—recommended the massacre in the least disguised and most furious terms. One woman proposed assembling all the citizens and citizenesses that very day in the Place de la Révolution, whence they should precipitate themselves upon the Convention. Jean Varlet, an ambulatory orator, who generally addressed the people in the streets from a portable stool, who was at this stage of the revolution what Camille Desmoulins had been in 1789, and who styled himself the Missionary or the Apostle of Liberty, suggested that the Cordeliers and the patriots en masse ought to repair to the Convention, with the Declaration of the Rights of Man veiled under a black crape, to seize and carry off all the deputies who had belonged either to the Constituent or to the Legislative Assembly, then discharge all the ministers, and destroy all that remained of the family of the Bourbons. For the present, however, nothing came of this loud talk, except a terrible alarm among the respectabilities, who believed that the proposed massacre would take place, and would not be confined to the three hundred obnoxious deputies. Three out of the forty-eight sections denounced to the Convention the frightful projects which had been discussed at the Hôtel-de-Ville and at the Cordeliers, calling upon the legislature to take prompt measures for preventing their execution. The Committee of Twelve presented a project of decree for general security. They proposed that the national representation, the treasury, the offices of government, &c., should be declared to be placed under the safeguard of all good citizens; that at the beat of drum all good citizens should take up arms and hold themselves ready to act; that the assemblies of the sections should always be closed by ten o'clock in the evening, and that their presidents should be answerable for the execution of this order. Although Danton and some other members of the Mountain opposed this decree, upon the ground that it would give unnecessary terror to the good people of Paris, it was triumphantly carried. If the respectabilities had been more numerous and a vast deal more bold, or if the sans-culottes had not been all armed, the decree might have been of some value; but as matters stood it was not worth a rush. Emboldened, however, by the passing of it, and by some more respectability petitions, the Committee of Twelve proceeded to arrest Varlet, the Apostle of Liberty, and several other individuals, among whom was Hébert, who, by his most obscene and bloody newspaper, 'Le Père Duchêne,' had earned the not easily acquired reputation of being the worst journalist and most sanguinary and frowsy villain in France, Marat himself not excepted. This Hébert, who was a magistrate and a municipal high in office, who was substitute to Chaumette, procureur-general of the commune, ran over to the Hôtel-de-Ville and told the council, which was now sitting in permanence as a central revolution committee, that the traitors were going to throw him, a magistrate of the people, and intrusted with the most important functions, into a prison. He reminded the commune of the resolution and oath they had taken to regard any wrong done to one of their members as an injury inflicted on their whole body; but then, playing off the captivating and profitable part of a patriot martyr, the filthy scoundrel declared that he only recalled this resolution to mind for the sake of his fellow-citizens—that for his part he was ready to die on the scaffold for liberty and country. Chaumette, his official superior, hugged him in a transport; the president embraced him in the name of the whole council; all present applauded, and Hébert went forth to submit to a confinement, which he well knew would be of the shortest duration. Forthwith the commune called upon all the agitators and mob-leaders of Paris and the environs, distributed some money and promised a great deal more, and dispersed by means of messengers, well mounted to go the faster, papers in which they represented that the Girondists and the côté droit were going to expel the true patriots of the côté gauche, were going to replace the revolutionary tribunal which had acquitted Marat by a new counter-revolutionary tribunal, which would send Hébert to the guillotine, and bring the commune, which had done so much for the revolution, and the members of the Mountain, and all sincere sans-culottes, to the scaffold. The Jacobins and the Cordeliers and all the sans-culottic sections declared themselves in permanent session, calling upon all their members to be true and steady at this awful crisis. In some of the sections there was a diversity of opinion; and the respectabilities, and those who thought that Hébert was a beast, and that the revolution ought to stop where it was, fought the sans-culottes in the assembly-rooms and in the streets with benches, and chairs, and joint-stools. Many heads were broken and some eyes knocked out; but the battle, to be of any avail to the friends of order, ought to have been fought with cannon and grape-shot. On the 25th of May a numerous deputation from the commune, escorted by all the desperadoes of the capital, appeared at the bar of the Convention, and demanded justice and vengeance on the traitors who had calumniated their civic body, and the immediate suppression of the tyrannical Committee of Twelve, who had committed high treason against the nation by arresting Hébert, a magistrate of the people. Girondist Isnard, who that day occupied the president's chair, and who had probably raised his mouth-courage by wine—for he was a great and habitual drinker—thundered at the commune deputation with these well-known words:—"Magistrates of the people, it is proper that you should hear some important truths. France has confided her representatives to the city of Paris, and wills that they be safe here. If ever, by one of those insurrections which have been so frequent since the 10th of March last, and of which the magistrates have never warned this Assembly, the national representation should be violated, I declare to you, in the name of all France, that Paris will be annihilated! Yes, Paris will incur the vengeance of the whole republic, and future travellers will vainly seek on the banks of the Seine where this great city once stood." As the Gironde had evidently not the power to work out a particle of this prophecy, it was nothing but loud-spoken and exasperating nonsense. "Come down from your seat, Mr. President," cried Marat; "you are talking like an earthquake! Come down, I say; you are dishonouring the Assembly, and putting a scandal on the republic!" Danton, postmaster Drouet, Fabre d'Eglantine, and other members of the Mountain, assailed Isnard, and, by putting the choleric man into a great passion, made him talk more nonsense, and be guilty of more bad taste. "I say," shrieked this mad president of madmen, "that the sword of the law, which is yet dripping with the blood of the tyrant Louis Capet, is ready to strike off the head of every man that dares raise himself above the national representation!" Presently after this speech a deputation came in from the ultra-sans-culottic section of the Unity, to deny that there was or had been any conspiracy or design of massacre; to affirm that the Parisians would never shed any blood except only the blood of traitors; and to demand that the Convention would make some changes in its committees,—decree the establishment of a new tribunal composed of one citizen taken from each department, who, at the end of the session, should try and pass judgment upon all the deputies of the Convention who had betrayed the interests of the people,—decree a new republican federation festival for the 10th of August, at which all the French republicans might bind themselves to one another by a fresh oath,—and fix a near term for the organization of a new revolutionary army to be paid for solely by the rich. When the section orator had done speaking, Danton got to the tribune, and there made a good use of the indiscretions of which Isnard had been guilty. He said that he understood the use of bold oratorical figures, having himself had some practice in that way; that he knew how excited orators would often say more than they meant; but that in Isnard's threat of erasing the great and splendid city of Paris from the face of the earth, there was something more than mere rhetoric—there was a bitterness which came from the heart, and which, taken in union with the propositions of that party to remove the legislature from the capital, and their constant appeals to the provinces, and the war in the Vendée, and the insurrections against the republic that were breaking out in the south, in the countries from which the Girondists came, proved to a demonstration that their object and plan was to set all the departments against the capital. His speech made a deep impression on the Parisians, who already fancied that they saw their city set in flames by the men of the south. On the morrow, the 26th of May, more petitions were presented from the sections, some simply demanding the liberation of the pure patriot Hébert and of the apostle of liberty Varlet, others demanding the suppression of the Committee of Twelve and the expulsion of the twenty-two. In some of the sections the fighting with chairs and joint-stools still continued; but in the evening it was announced to the commune that the working-people had in several places obtained a complete victory over the aristocrats. The Girondists, armed with pistols and swordsticks, met at the house of Valazé, but apparently did nothing but talk. On the 27th more deputations besieged the Convention. The section of the city declared by their orator, a very young man, that the Committee of Twelve had issued orders of arrest that were far worse than the lettres de cachet of the old government; that they could no longer tolerate these violations of the 'Rights of Man,' and that they required the immediate arrest of every member of the said Committee of Twelve, and their trial before the Revolutionary Tribunal. "The time for complaining," said the youth, "is past; we come to warn you that you must save the republic, or the necessity of saving ourselves will force us to undertake the work. In vain the enemies of the people who are sitting among you have calumniated the citizens of Paris to their brethren in the departments; let those brethren come and witness our patriotism, and they will then approve of our holy insurrections. President, the section of the city demands to defile through the hall." The Committee of Twelve, foreseeing that the Convention would be inundated and blockaded by deputations and armed sans-culottes, had applied to three of the more respectable sections for a guard; and these three sections had promised to march in force, and were now, under the command of Raffet, a sworn enemy of the Jacobins, and a man of some decision, gathering in the Place de Carrousel and in the gardens of the Tuileries, with their artillery, and matches lit. President Isnard therefore read the young orator a sharp lesson; told him that the Convention was occupied upon the constitution, and could not for the present attend to his demands; and that the Convention, which could not suffer itself to be influenced by any violence, would ever preach obedience to the laws, security to persons and property, and war to aristocrats and anarchists. "But," said he, "you must know that republican liberty does not consist in words and in signs; that a tyrant, whether he hides himself in a cellar or shows himself in the public places, whether he is on the throne or in the tribune of a club, whether he carries a sceptre or a dagger, whether he wears gold-embroidered clothes or goes without breeches (va sans culottes), whether he wears a crown or a red nightcap, is still a tyrant; and the French people have all sworn that they will tolerate no tyrant." The côté droit applauded, and called out to the ushers to keep the doors closed and not permit any armed deputations to enter. Robespierre ran to the tribune; but the president told him he was out of order. Marat called the president a tyrant, an infamous tyrant; and another frightful vacarme took place. While it was raging some members of the Mountain who had gone to the door returned in visible consternation, and reported that the lobbies and all the avenues were blocked up by national guards from the anti-patriotic sections. Marat rushed to the door, and with a pistol in his hand demanded of Raffet, the commandant, by whose orders he was there. Raffet replied that he did not know him (Marat), and that he would show his orders only to the president of the Convention. Marat then spoke to some of the national guards, and, after commanding them to place Raffet under arrest, he returned into the hall exclaiming that the patriots were duped, betrayed by the côté droit; but that Raffet was an aristocrat disowned by the men under his command, and would thus be incapable of doing any great mischief. Collot d'Herbois demanded that Raffet should instantly be brought to the bar; the Girondists demanded that the mayor of Paris should be summoned to give an account of the state of the capital. Both demands were agreed to. Raffet, being nearest at hand, presented himself first; he produced two orders, one signed the preceding evening, and the other that morning, and both enjoining him to march to the assistance of the Convention with the battalions the Committee of Twelve might require. The first note was signed by Vincent, who had the temporary command of the national guards, commandant-general Santerre having taken his departure for the wars in the Vendée: the second was signed by Lapierre, provisory adjutant-general, who stated that he acted conformably to the orders of the mayor of Paris. Raffet further reported that his march had been

quicken'd by an adjutant, who had told him that the Convention was threaten'd; that on his arrival he had found a multitude of people assembled; and that he was clearing the lobbies and passages when Marat had interrupted him, pistol in hand. The Friend of the People shrieked that Raffet lied most impudently—that Raffet was in the plot for blockading the Convention and cutting off all the patriots of the Mountain. The majority of the House, however, admitted the commandant to the honours of the séance. President Isnard then announced that Mayor Pache, who had been summoned to the bar, and the minister of the interior, of whom no mention had been made, were both at the bar and requested permission to speak. The minister of the interior was now Garat, whom we have seen diplomatising in England, and carrying the sentence of death to Louis XVI. in the Temple. He was a shifting, double-sided man, who wished, as long as possible, to keep well with both parties, but who was fully determin'd to consult his own safety by joining the stronger at the critical moment. He had lately had frequent conferences with Robespierre and other Montagnards; and everything justifies the suspicion that, having now discover'd that, though the Girondists might protract the struggle for a while, they must succumb in the end, he had made terms with the Mountain, and now presented himself, at their secret request, to throw dust into the eyes of the House, and make the côté droit and the Plain believe that there was no danger and no necessity of keeping Raffet's battalions at their gates. We have seen it confidently asserted that it was a messenger from Robespierre that brought him down to the Convention. Being allowed to speak before Mayor Pache, he said that, though he had not been summoned by the Convention, he thought it his duty as a public functionary and minister of the interior to come forward at this moment of alarm and tell all he knew about the state of Paris. He declared that he would tell the truth about dangers which had been horribly and absurdly exaggerat'd—that he would speak to the Convention as if he were speaking at the feet of the Eternal. In cautious, honeyed terms he stated that one side of the House had committed a great mistake in believing that the commune were organising an insurrection; that this mistake had led to the greater error of creating the Committee of Twelve; that the too great zeal and heat of this Committee of Twelve, and the arrests they had made, had produced some fermentation, which was not, however, of a dangerous character; that the committee had certainly acted rashly in arresting Hébert merely on account of what he had written in his newspaper, which newspaper, though not so good as it ought to be, did not prevent Hébert from being a very good citizen and patriot. Last night, he said, he had been sitting with the Committee of Twelve, who were assuredly very good patriots, though perhaps somewhat too anxious to display a great energy—he had been sitting with them till three o'clock this morning, and he knew there was no danger then. This evening at six o'clock he had been advised that there was an immense concourse of people gathering round the Convention and menacing it: yet when he had come down he had found the armed force much more considerable in number than the crowd. "It is true," said he, pointing to the door on the right side of the House, "that I could not get in there; yet even at that door the number of armed citizens was more considerable than that of the other citizens, who are full of respect for the national representation." Here a member cried out that this was not true; that he himself had been insulted, threaten'd by the people. "That may be," replied Garat, "for you know there might be some aristocrats mixed in that crowd to make mischief. But I mean to assert that the great mass of the citizens out there are in the best sentiments." The Mountain and the galleries repeated the loud applauses with which they had several times honour'd him. "Do you think," said the ready man, pointing to the galleries, "that those sans-culottes there would applaud the account I am giving you of their sentiments, if they had any criminal intentions in their hearts? . . . I repeat that there is no danger to the Convention: you will all return in peace to your homes this night." Mayor Pache then spoke, and made the same declaration, that there was nothing to fear; that the people rever'd the sanctity of the Convention, &c.: but he accus'd the Committee of Twelve of being guilty of an illegal, unconstitutional act, in bringing Raffet and his national guards to the Convention, and he request'd the House to order them away, and rest satisfi'd with the ordinary number of patrols. This order it appears was given immediately (many of the men had not waited for it, but had taken their departure, or had mix'd with the mob fraternally some time before); and then, the way being clear, and there being nothing to oppose the sovereign people, Mayor Pache begged that the Convention would admit several deputations of good quiet citizens, who were come down to the House to demand the liberation of Hébert, Varlet, and some other citizens. The Girondists cried out that it was ten o'clock, and that the House ought to adjourn. The Mountain shout'd that the petitioners ought to be admitted, that the tyrannical Committee of Twelve ought to be dissolv'd that night. The deputations began to pour in through the several doors of the hall, roaring like victorious soldiers that had taken a fortress by storm. Knowing that Raffet and their defenders were gone, that there was nothing between them and the fury of the sans-culottes, the côté droit began to squeeze themselves out at the doors, and Isnard vacat'd the president's chair. Henri Larivière had the courage to ascend the tribune, and to make one effort more for his party; but the Mountain and the galleries hooted him down. Herault-de-Sechelles took possession of the president's chair, the members of the Mountain and the côté gauche kept their seats, and the orator of one of the deputations was invited to the bar by the intrusive president, who said that the deputation had been shamefully kept waiting for more than three hours. The orator, in the name of the majority of the Paris sections—in the name of twenty-eight of the sections—demanded back their friend, their brother, the man that was invested with their confidence, and who had always told them the truth (Hébert), and further demanded the liberty of all those who were groaning under the despotism of the Committee of Twelve. "Citizens," said Herault-de-Sechelles, "the force of reason and the force of the people are one and the same thing!" The mob cheered. "Say that over again," said Leonard Bourdon, "for that is a grand truth!" "Citizens," continued Herault, "the force of reason and the force of the people are one and the same thing. You come here to demand justice—justice is our first duty—you shall have it before we rise." Other deputations with other orators came in to present the same demands, and to call in a more explicit manner for the suppression of the Committee of Twelve and the capital punishment of its members. One of the orators further required that the "infamous Roland" should be put upon his trial before the Revolutionary Tribunal. Every one of the orators spoke more or less plainly of the expediency and necessity of expelling the Girondists, "the hypocrites and traitors who had obliged the good people of Paris to show their strength once more." When they had all been heard and applauded, Lacroix, the comrade and friend of Danton, moved that the Convention should instantly decree the liberation of Hébert, Varlet, and the rest; the dissolution of the Committee of Twelve, and the examination of the conduct of its members by the Committee of General Security. The deputations, who had seated themselves on the empty benches, shouted and voted with the members who had remained in the House; Lacroix's first and second propositions were carried by acclamation, by tumult; and, this being done, Herault-de-Sechelles quitted the chair, and deputies, deputations, and mobs all departed just as the Tuileries clock was striking the midnight-hour.*

On the following morning, the 28th of May, the Girondists resolved to renew the struggle, although they were not a whit stronger than they had been on the preceding evening, although they could no longer entertain a reasonable hope that any portion of the armed force of Paris would stand by them. To themselves, however, it signified little what course they took; no submission to the Mountain would have saved them from its fury; the most they could have gained would have been a few days or weeks more of a miserable, uncertain existence; the Montagnards had declared, and they themselves had declared over and over again, that there never could be peace or truce between them; that the guillotine must be the arbiter of their disputes: according to the confessions of many of them, they had for a long time been living in the constant apprehension of massacre or assassination:—it was better to die at once than continue thus. When the House met in the morning, Osselin, a Robespierrist, called for the report of the decree which had been voted the preceding night. Lanjuinais ran to the tribune, and exclaimed that there had been no decree; that everything had been conducted in a violent and illegal manner; that the votes of a fraction of the Assembly on the previous evening were null and void; that the whole affair was a conspiracy—a conspiracy a thousand times more atrocious than any that had hitherto been got up. After noticing the arrests of Hébert and Varlet, and the two or three other individuals about which so much noise had been made, he said, "Above fifty thousand citizens have been imprisoned in the departments, within these two months, by order of your commissioners; more arbitrary arrests have taken place in three months than ever took place in thirty years under the old régime. For these six months men have been preaching nothing but anarchy and murder; and shall these men go unpunished?" Here butcher Legendre cried out that, if Lanjuinais did not hold his tongue, he would go and throw him headlong from the tribune. But Lanjuinais continued his speech, declaring that last Sunday night it had been proposed at the Jacobins to get up a general massacre; that the same subject was to be discussed this very night; that the Mountain protected only assassins covered with the blood of their fellow-citizens; that last night the Convention was not free, but forced, violated, and coerced by a mob, and by the preachers of murder; that the House was not free even at this moment, being surrounded by multitudes that were shouting "Death to the Girondists!" Some of the Mountain denied that there was any coercion or violence; but Osselin told Lanjuinais and his party that, if they caused any delay in passing the decree and in liberating Hébert, there would be a terrible insurrection. When Guadet attempted to speak, and to show how Pétion, Lacroix, and other members of the côté droit had been prevented by the mob from entering the hall the preceding evening, Bourdon de l'Oise demanded a decree of accusation against him, and cast in his face that old and terrible charge of the correspondence of the Girondists in July last with Boze, the painter, and Thierry, the king's valet. Robespierre threw back to Lanjuinais his charges of plots and conspiracies. "It is we," cried he, "that are threatened with a conspiracy which all but fools must see. The conspirators were defeated yesterday; but they are renewing their efforts to-day." Barbaroux and others of that side taxed Robespierre with aiming at the dictatorship, &c. At last all parts of the House joined in crying for a division, and the House divided. A good many members of the Plain voted with the Mountain; but still so many had courage to remain on the other side, that the forced decree of the overnight was reversed and annulled by a majority of 41, the numbers being 279 against 238. The Jacobins foamed with rage. "By this iniquitous vote," cried one, "the inquisitorial Committee of Twelve is to continue in full force!" "But we will not allow it," cried another. "You have violated the Rights of Man! Throw a veil over your statue of Liberty!" exclaimed Collot d'Herbois, who always spoke and acted as if he were upon the stage. "We will now show them," cried Danton, "that, as we have surpassed them in wisdom and moderation, so can we surpass them in audacity and revolutionary vigour!" The patriots in the galleries expressed their opinions in a still louder and coarser manner, and the mobs outside re-echoed their roar. "We have counter-revolution here; we are not free; let us be gone to our departments," said some of the members of the côté droit. At the end of this storm the Mountain demanded the temporary liberation of Hébert, Varlet, and the other prisoners arrested by order of the Committee of Twelve. To this not the slightest opposition was offered; the Girondists supported the motion; Boyer-Fonfrède pressed for a prompt division, and it was unanimously voted that those interesting captives should be set at large. Rabaut-St.-Etienne attempted to read a report from the Committee of Twelve, and, not being able to obtain a hearing, and apparently being glad of an opportunity to get rid of the danger of belonging to so unpopular a body, he gave in his resignation, declaring that he would have nothing more to do with that committee.

Hébert and Varlet were instantly released from the Abbaye, and carried shoulders high through the streets of Paris, crowned with oak leaves. Hébert's procession ended at the Hôtel-de-Ville, where he was received with transports and ecstasies, his municipal colleagues, the president, and all present hugging and kissing him. Chaumette, his official superior, tendered him another civic crown, which had been presented by the patriots. The frowsy journalist took the crown and put it upon the bust of Rousseau, saying that men in office like himself only required encouraging words, and that such crowns ought not to be awarded until after their death. A citizeness then presented another crown, which was put upon the bust of Brutus. From the Hôtel-de-Ville Hébert proceeded in triumph to the Jacobin Club to demand vengeance on the Committee of Twelve.

Robespierre, Marat, Danton, Chaumette, and Mayor Pache, whose official powers were so extensive, now organized or finished organizing an insurrection which should be so universal and tremendous as to sweep away every attempt at opposition. A great assembly met in the electoral club of the Evêché, composed of commissioners of the sections, commissioners of the commune, and delegates from the department and from the various political societies. The elective and representative rights of women were recognized, and the patriotesses of Paris were represented in this assembly by one hundred women. Before night thirty-six of the forty-eight sections had sent their commissioners to this meeting. Peremptory summonses were sent to the twelve other sections; and a select committee of six was appointed to provide the means of public salvation. Besides this the sections met in their several halls or assembly-rooms, and most of them sat all through the night, preparing addresses to the Convention to demand an explanation of what president Isnard had meant by talking of the destruction of Paris, and in doing other work or in making other preparations, which cannot be so briefly described, but which may be easily imagined. On the following day, the 29th, the fire of insurrection was fanned by disastrous, alarming news from nearly all the armies of the republic:—the army of the Pyrenees had been beaten by the Spaniards; the army of the North was continuing to retreat; and, worst of all, the army lately sent into the Vendée had been thoroughly defeated by the insurgents. Several of the sections sent deputations to the Convention with black flags or flags bearing very dark mottoes, to demand the explanation of Isnard's threat, the suppression of the Committee of Twelve, the formation of a revolutionary army; and to state that no inviolability except that of the people could be acknowledged any longer, and that, consequently, all the deputies who had endeavoured to arm the departments against Paris must be expelled the House and put under arrest. Many were for beginning that day or that night, and at the Jacobin Club great discontent was expressed at the unnecessary delay. Even butcher Legendre was there accused of supineness and excess of moderation—was called an endormeur, or one that set people to sleep. Robespierre was called upon to act; but the Incorruptible, who never put himself foremost on these occasions, said that the business properly belonged to the commune, who would no doubt join the people and do its duty in proper time. And then Robespierre added pathetically, "It is not given to one man to prescribe the salvation of the people, and least of all is it given to a man like me, exhausted, worn out by four years of revolution, consumed by a slow and mortal fever." The assembly at the Evêché continued their sittings, and, to quiet the apprehensions of the shopkeepers and respectabilities, who cared much less for the Girondists than for their own goods and purses, they took and administered an oath to respect property during the coming insurrection, which, in their language, was to be not a physical insurrection, but a moral one (non physique, mais toute morale). The Committee of Twelve, which was now only a committee of eleven, the Girondists in general, and all Paris knew what was doing; only Garat, the minister of the interior, and Pache, the mayor, pretended to be ignorant or uncertain as to the facts. In the course of the day the trembling Girondists, clutching at straws, and fancying that, if they could only detach Danton from the Cordeliers and Jacobins, they might yet weather the storm and triumph over the Mountain, sent Meilhan to flatter and cajole that great bully. Meilhan performed his task as well as it could be done: he praised Danton's energy and ability and generosity of character, represented how different a man he was from Robespierre, and how sensible his party was of that difference; ending with telling him what a grand part he might play if he would only quit the Mountain and join the Gironde. "No," said Danton, "it cannot be! The Girondists have no confidence in me, and I have none in them;" and with these words he turned his back on the negotiator. On the next day the assembly sitting at the Evêché took the name of the Republican Union, and in the name of all the sections it declared itself and Paris in insurrection. Mayor Pache now announced to the Committee of Twelve and the Committee of Public Security, that, to his singular grief, Paris was rather in a turbulent state. L'Huillier, the present procureur syndic of the department, was happy to say that the insurrection would be toute morale. In the middle of the night the tocsin was sounded, as on the night of the 9th and 10th of August, the drums beat to arms, and the barriers were all shut. The Girondists believed their last hour was come. Roland, leaving his wife and child behind him, ran and hid himself in the house of a friend; Guadet, Buzot, Barbaroux, and two or three more of them, entrenched themselves in a secret chamber, being well provided with arms.* The night, however, passed away without any massacre or murders: their friends reported that it was only going to be a Tenth of August without the Swiss. And, in fact, the Republican Union at the Evêché, and the other functionaries who devised the revolt, had resolved to imitate very closely the plan of operations which had been adopted against the Tuileries in August, when it was the abode of the king, and not as now the seat of the Convention and its governing committees. In many particulars the proceedings were to be exactly the same now as then, when the Girondists had a part in them. There was little originality in these insurrections, which were to succeed each other so rapidly; the whole process of revolution-making was carried on with a very small outlay of invention. In the morning, earlier than usual (it was Friday the 31st of May), about a hundred members assembled in the Convention, and among them were several of the Girondists, who had come with their arms, and Danton, who retired into a corner to converse with Garat, who, as minister of the interior, had thought it decent to come down and make a report—a report sufficiently made by the terrible tocsin which was still sounding throughout the city. The members assembled called Mayor Pache to the bar; but the mayor was a long time in coming. In the meanwhile Garat told them what they all knew. "I cannot dissemble to the Convention," said this nice-spoken gentleman, "that there exists a great agitation in Paris; that all the citizens have been snatched from their repose by the tocsin in the middle of the night. The cause of these troubles is your reinstatement of the Committee of Twelve, who are accused of having calumniated Paris, of having arbitrarily imprisoned magistrates of the people, of having formed the project of oppressing the patriots. The barriers are shut: all the citizens are at this moment under arms in their respective sections, and under the orders of their usual commanders," &c. At last, at about seven o'clock, Mayor Pache arrived, accompanied by a grand deputation of municipals. His story was short and intelligible enough. At the dawn of day, after he had ordered the guards to be doubled at the treasury and other public edifices, and after having made a report to the Committee of Public Security, a great number of persons entered the Hôtel-de-Ville, where he was sitting in permanence with his council, and told him that Paris was in insurrection, that they were the commissioners of the majority of the sections, and that they had been charged to suspend, pro tempore, the mayor and the municipality. Upon this he and his municipals had retired into the adjacent Hall of Liberty, and laid down their official sashes. But, immediately after, he and his adjoints had been called back to the council-chamber, where the commissioners of the sections had told them that, seeing they had not lost the confidence of their fellow-citizens, they should all be provisionally reinstated in their offices. "Upon which," said sly Pache, "we expressed our gratitude to our fellow-citizens, and renewed our oaths to the sovereign people." From the mouths of others the Convention learned that these commissioners of the sections, with the concurrence of Mayor Pache and the reinstated municipality, had appointed to the temporary command in chief of the national guards and all the troops in Paris one Henriot, a low ruffian who had been a leader of émeutes, and who was more than suspected of having been a chief of the Septembrizers. The president received a note from an officer commanding at the Pont-Neuf, stating that the said Henriot, as provisory commandant-general, had ordered him to fire the alarm-gun which was posted at that bridge, which he had refused to do without the express order of the Convention, who had decreed it to be a capital crime for any one to fire that piece without their authority. Valazé called Henriot an audaciously impertinent scoundrel, and demanded that he should be brought to the bar. Mayor Pache said it must be all a mistake; that he had ordered that the alarm-gun was on no account to be fired—that assuredly it would not be fired. But he had scarcely said the words when that terror-striking gun boomed off, shaking the hall and most of the hearts in it. At the sound, the galleries, which were now beginning to fill, set up a joyous shout. Cambon did two vain things; he called the galleries to order and decency, and he called the House to union, unanimity, and firmness. "In these extraordinary circumstances," said he,

* Louvet.—Madame Roland, Mémoires.

“the only means of disappointing the evil-intentioned is to cause the National Convention to be respected.” Thuriot exclaimed, “And I call for something better! I demand that the Committee of Twelve, the scourge of France, be instantly suppressed.” “Yes,” roared Danton, “that committee has merited the indignation of the people!” Tallien went further still, calling not merely for suppression, but for vengeance, and for the trial and judgment not only of the members of the committee, but of all traitors, by which he meant all the Girondists, and a great many of those who had hitherto voted with them. “Let the sword of the law,” cried he, “strike every conspirator that sits in this Assembly!” It was the ordinary revolutionary practice for conspirators thus to accuse the party against whom they were conspiring of conspiracy; the Girondists, who now felt the practice to be very atrocious, had themselves repeatedly employed it against the king. Meanwhile the alarm-gun continued to boom from the Pont Neuf, and hurried messengers brought reports that the sections were marching towards the Tuileries in overwhelming numbers, preceded by the terrible Paris cannoneers, who were shouting, “Long life to the Mountain, and death to the Gironde!” Vergniaud mounted the tribune, and proposed in flashy oratory that the patriots should all die rather than abandon the cause of liberty—that they should all take a solemn oath to die at their post. To die was hard, but nothing so easy as to swear; and so not only the Girondists, but all parties took the oath, the House, or all the members that were present, rising simultaneously and swearing en masse. “And now,” cried Danton, with his far-sounding voice, “dissolve the Committee of Twelve. The cannon has sounded. If you are political legislators, far from blaming this explosion of Paris, you will turn it to your profit and the profit of the republic, by reforming your errors and recovering your popularity. I address myself to the men among you who have some sense and see their true situation, and not to the blockheads who, in great movements like these, can only listen to their passions. Do not hesitate a moment in satisfying this people!” “What people?” cried some of the Gironde. “This people of Paris,” responded Danton, “this immense people, which is the advanced guard of liberty, and which abhors tyranny and cowardly moderantisme—this people of Paris, who will be backed by all the departments. Hasten to satisfy them! Hasten to save them from the aristocrats and from the effects of their own wrath; and, if the movement should continue after you have done this, Paris itself will soon annihilate the factious, and those who move them.” If the Girondists had sworn to die, they had certainly no intention of dying for their Committee of Twelve. They made up their minds to give up that committee at once, and sent Rabaut-St.-Etienne to the tribune to propose the instant suppression of the committee, from which he had separated himself by his resignation on the 28th. But Rabaut, deeming it expedient to justify the original formation and intention of the committee, declared, in his sanctimonious manner, that the committee had been instituted to discover and circumvent the perfidious complots of Austria and Pitt, who were evidently the cause of all the divisions, disorders, and excesses committed in France, who were certainly keeping in their pay all the anarchists and assassins that had done so much mischief in the interior of the republic. This was a favourite theme with all classes of Frenchmen, the decided royalists themselves not excepted; but at the present moment the House was not in a humour to listen to the fable. Bazire exclaimed that Rabaut-St.-Etienne was a liar,—that the Committee of Twelve had been appointed to organise a civil war in Paris; and Marat begged to remind the president that a deputation from the commune was kept waiting. Rabaut was obliged to cut his calumnies short, and to propose, sans phrases, the suppression of the committee. The deputation from the commune, which then came to the bar, announced in simple and direct language that a great plot against liberty and equality had been discovered by the people just in time to prevent its execution; that the commissioners of the forty-eight sections had all the threads of the conspiracy in their hands, and meant to arrest the chief conspirators and send them to the guillotine; that the people, who had risen to a man on the 14th of July, 1789, to take the Bastille and begin the revolution, and on the 10th of August, 1792, to cast down the tyrant from his throne, had risen a third time to stop libercide and counter-revolutionary complots; that the council-general of the commune had placed all property under the safeguard of the people, had allowed the sans-culottes forty sous a day as long as they should be under arms, and had formed a committee to correspond directly with the Convention in this moment of agitation. The Girondists declared that whatever plot there might be was of the commune’s own making; that the Convention was not free, but under the bayonets and cannon of insurgents; that they ought to suspend their deliberations until their liberty should be restored to them: but their voices were drowned, and the majority of the House were terrified out of their senses; and, when another deputation came from the commune to reproach them with their delay, they voted that a committee the commune had appointed to act with them should have an apartment in the Tuileries, close to their own hall, and that the national treasury should pay the forty sous per day, which the commune had thought proper to allow the patriots. Not stopping at these condescensions, the Girondists, with some faint, delusive hopes of winning over the people, resolved to proceed further, and Vergniaud himself moved a resolution, “That the sections of Paris have deserved well of their country.” The motion, as a matter of course, was carried by acclamation, the galleries applauding, but wondering how it could have originated in such a quarter. Vergniaud and his friends took heart, but their rising spirit was soon damped by the arrival of fresh deputations, all crying vengeance against them. Departmental procureur syndic L'Huillier, who had told the government that this insurrection would be toute morale, came to the bar, at the head of another deputation from the commune or from the commune and the department (a host of men, followed by troops of armed sans-culottes), and, after accusing the Girondists of all manner of political crimes and delinquencies, and Isnard in particular for his blasphemous words against Paris, he demanded vengeance against Isnard, the members of the Committee of Twelve, and a great many others, such as Vergniaud, Guadet, Gensonné, Brissot, Buzot, Barbaroux, Roland, Lebrun, Clavière, and, in short, "all the men proscribed by public opinion, and denounced by the commune of Paris." The Mountain, and also the galleries, who had so recently applauded Vergniaud, now cheered L'Huillier, and demanded that Barrère, who undertook to draw up a decree for the suppression of the Committee of Twelve—of that fatal committee whose creation he had himself recommended and proposed—should insert in it the proscription of all the Girondists who had been named or alluded to by L'Huillier. The president's chair was at this moment occupied by Gregoire, who invited L'Huillier and his tail to the honours of the sitting. L'Huillier and the whole of the numerous deputation went and seated themselves on the benches among the members of the Mountain, who made room for them, and received them with eager joy; while the sans-culottes, who had accompanied them, called in other patriots from the lobbies or corridors until the floor of the House was completely covered. The côté gauche called out for the printing of L'Huillier's address and for the decree which Barrère had undertaken to draw up. Vergniaud exclaimed that the House was less free than ever—that it was undated—that its members were mixed with the people. "Well, then," cried Levasseur, "let the members of the gauche go over and sit among the members of the droit, and then the Convention will be separated and distinct from the petitioners, who will remain on this side." And presto, even as if Levasseur had been a ballet-master, and the Jacobins opera figuranti, the Montagnards changed sides and set themselves down among their adversaries of the côté droit, leaving the gauche entirely to the deputations and the mob. President Gregoire, in the midst of a hurricane (for the members of the right did not receive the members of the left so amicably as the latter had received the people), put the question of printing L'Huillier's address to the vote, and pretended that it was fairly carried, though neither he nor any one else could possibly collect the votes, or distinguish, in that scene of confusion, one party from the other. "And now," cried the Mountain, the deputation sitting on the benches of the Mountain, the sans-culottes in the body of the House, and their brethren in the galleries (thousands of voices all pitched to the highest key), "now for Barrère's project of decree! Now let us vote that!" Again the Girondists cried out that they were not free—that no division could take place—that the business of the House was suspended. Vergniaud did something more than this: he had been out to look at the national guards that were patrolling near the Tuileries, and from the behaviour of some of them he had conceived a hope that they were as yet undecided; and therefore he exclaimed, "Let the Convention go and unite itself with the armed force which surrounds it, and seek in those ranks protection against this violence!" Having said these words, he went towards one of the doors, in the expectation that the whole of the côté droit and the greater part of the Plain, which, together, would form the majority of the Assembly, would follow him. But none followed him except his own party, the members of the Plain sitting silent and motionless, in an uncomfortable state of doubt or fear. The Mountain cheered as Vergniaud and his Girondists disappeared through the door; and then Chabot demanded the instant appel-nominal, or call by muster-roll, in order to show who were the traitors that had deserted their posts. But at this moment Vergniaud, with his friends, returned into the House, sorely disappointed at not having been followed by the majority, much irritated against the sedentary Plain, completely disconcerted and dejected. His attempted secession had failed—and failed most' ridiculously. The Mountain and the sans-culottes welcomed him back with unsavoury comparisons and shouts of laughter. He demanded to be heard, but Robespierre got into the tribune before him, and kept possession of it in spite of him. The younger Robespierre had delivered a tremendous speech earlier in the day; but down to this moment the great Incorruptible had sat silent. Now, however, he made up for his abstinence. He was weary, he said, of idle talk and half measures: the country must be saved to-day or never—to-morrow it might be too late: the Convention required purging and purifying, and so did the army: the petition presented by L'Huillier clearly explained what the people wanted; that petition had laid down the only means of saving the commonwealth. He was proceeding to weave an argumentative speech, when Vergniaud cried out, "Robespierre, come to the point!"—"I will, and it shall be against you," continued the Incorruptible: "against you, who, after the revolution of the Tenth of August, endeavoured to bring to the scaffold the patriots who had accomplished it—against you, who have never ceased invoking the destruction of Paris—against you, who would have saved the tyrant, had you dared—against you, the accomplices of Dumouriez—against you, who have savagely pursued the same patriots whose heads Dumouriez wanted! Yes, I come to the point, and I require a decree of accusation against all the accomplices of that traitor, and against all the others impeached by L'Huillier and the petitioners sitting there!" These words, which were the death-warrant of the Girondists, were vehemently applauded. By this time Barrère had got his project of decree ready. It was very long; but the substance of it was this:—1. That the Committee of Twelve should be for ever suppressed (a good deal of the storm of the day had been made to prevent the Girondists enjoying the merit of the voluntary surrender they had offered); that the papers of that committee should be seized, and a report upon them presented within three days.—2. That the armed force and all the sans-culottes hired at forty sous a-day should continue under arms till further orders.—3. That the conspirators and enemies to the republic who had been denounced by the commune and the other deputations should be impeached as soon as possible.—4. That a proclamation should be drawn up and sent to all parts of France, explanatory of the proceedings of this day. *

At about ten o'clock at night this project was put to the vote, and carried with the same circumstances which had attended the preceding division. The Girondists were allowed to retire to their homes, or to their nightly hiding-places. The commune ordered a general illumination, and the sections made what they called a civic promenade by torch-light. But, before daylight returned, loud murmurings were heard that enough had not been done; that great preparations and displays had been made to very little purpose; that the Girondists were not yet under lock and key in the Abbaye; that the traitors might escape through an absurd delicacy about forms of law, &c. The Jacobin Club was frantic, nor was the commune much calmer or more satisfied. In the club Billaud-Varenes declared that they had been doing things by halves, and that they must complete their work before the people cooled upon it; and Henriot came forward with an offer to place the armed force at the disposition of the club. The next day (the 1st of June) being a Saturday, it was agreed to put off further proceedings till Sunday, which had always been the favourite day with the insurrectionists. This delay, too, would allow time to bring into Paris several thoroughly sans-culottic battalions who had been destined for the war in the Vendée, but who had not marched farther than Courbevoie. The committee of the commune, which took possession of their allotted apartment in the Tuileries on Saturday morning, assumed all the functions and powers of an executive government, or only shared those powers with Pache and his insurrection-increased municipals, and with the assembly of sections, which continued to sit at the Evêché. We cannot trace the steps of Robespierre so distinctly, but all Saturday Marat appears to have been going and coming between the Evêché and the Hôtel-de-Ville, and between the Hôtel-de-Ville and the Tuileries, haranguing at each, and recommending to all energy—energy and rigour. The commune voted more money; six livres a-head for the working-men who continued out and under arms. Assignats of a hundred sous each were provided for the soldiers of the battalions at Courbevoie, who arrived all in good time, and who received, in addition to this stimulus, the most exciting accounts of a conspiracy discovered, the authors of which sat in the Convention, and must be dragged from it, whatever the letter of the constitution might say to the contrary. All Paris was in motion; muskets and pikes were seen everywhere, and immense parks of artillery at various points: the men of the sections had slept on their arms the preceding night; the Paris cannoneers had slept by their guns. In the course of the day the municipality sent to arrest Roland, but, not being able to find that ex-minister, they arrested his wife and lodged her in the Abbaye.* About a hundred members assembled in the morning at the Convention, but none of the Girondists attended. The chiefs of the party, however, all contrived to meet at a dinner in some bye-corner of Paris. We can believe Louvet, who says they had small appetite. They deliberated upon what was next to be done to save the republic, or their own party and their own heads. Pétion, Buzot, Gensonné proposed that they should all return to the Convention and die in their seats (which, by the way, they were bound to do by their oath of yesterday); Barbaroux proposed that they should go to the Convention, but that, instead of waiting for death on their curule chairs, they should brave and attack their adversaries; others recommended close concealment, and then flight to the provinces, where they might find a party strong enough to bring them back victorious to Paris. Louvet—Faublas Louvet—was, according to his own narrative, the most decided of those who recommended the last course. "It is impossible," said he, "for us to do any good by going to the Convention, where the Mountain and the galleries no longer permit us to speak. If we go there we shall give them the opportunity of seizing all their prey at one blow. Nor is there anything that we can do by staying in Paris, which is overawed by the terror inspired by the conspirators, who are masters of the armed force and of all the constituted authorities. There is nothing but a departmental insurrection that can save France. We ought, therefore, to seek some secure asylum for this night, and in the course of tomorrow and the following days steal out of Paris one after the other, and then, using our various resources, we ought to meet and reunite at Bordeaux or in the Calvados, and, if the insurgents there are in an imposing attitude, we may put ourselves at their head. Above all things we must avoid staying as hostages in the hands of the Mountain; we must not think of returning to the Convention."† Brissot, Vergniaud, Valazé, and some others thought that the danger was not so great, and that they might stay a little longer in Paris, to see what turn affairs might take. Every man thought his own opinion the best, and they had come to no common conclusion or agreement when the sound of the tocsin again struck their ears. The frightful chiming was led off by Marat, who ascended the belfry of the Hôtel de Ville, and with his own arm rang the first peal between eight and nine o'clock on Saturday evening. At the sound the Girondists rose from table, and separated to go in search of good hiding-places for the night. The few members of the Convention who had assembled in the morning had gone to their dinners, but at the sound of the tocsin some of them now returned to the House. The number that met was too small to make a House; but this was not a time to allow of any delicate attention to forms. Legendre, who had been a sailor before he took up the trade of butcher, exclaimed, "When a ship is out in the roads, and the seaman sees that the wind is good, he sets sail, and away." These few Montagnards therefore set themselves up as a House, and proceeded to business. One of them said that the tocsin, and the drums beating to arms, and the troops of the sections that were again gathering round the Convention, plainly announced a new insurrection; and that the plain and justifiable cause of this new insurrection lay in the fact that the Convention had not yet satisfied all the demands of the petitioners. The explanation was presently given at greater length by another mixed deputation from the commune and the department, whose orator was Hassenfratz, a doctor of medicine, and lecturer on the physical sciences, but who had abandoned his former occupations to take up the more enlivening and more profitable profession of patriot, Jacobin, and municipal. He had made his name terrible before now by harangues and denunciations: he is generally supposed to have been Marat's right-hand man in the whole of the present affair. Hassenfratz stated that he came to demand a decree of accusation against the members of the Committee of Twelve, against the correspondents of Dumouriez, against the men who were exciting the inhabitants of the departments against the people of Paris, against the men who were trying to federalise the departments, and make several republics, while the people wanted a republic, one and indivisible. The number of twenty-two victims, which had been proposed in previous petitions or addresses, did not satisfy Hassenfratz, who asked for twenty-seven, and named them all. He called for the heads of Broteau, Gorsas the journalist, Lanthenas, Lesage, Lehard, and Grangeneuve, who were, he said, as great traitors as Pétion, Vergniaud, and the others. "Legislators!" cried he, "it is at length time to finish! We must put an end to this counter-revolution! All these twenty-seven conspirators must fall under the sword of the law, without any consideration—they must all bite the dust!" Legendre thought that, while they were doing, they had better make the decree of accusation include the names of all those who had voted for the appeal to the people on the king's trial. Marat, who had run over from the Hôtel de Ville, said it might seem indelicate in him, who had so long been the personal enemy of the Girondists, and who had been so cruelly persecuted by them, to speak against them now; it might lead to a suspicion that he had got up this insurrection against them; but the public salvation exacted from him what his feelings would not otherwise have permitted, and therefore, as a member of the Convention, he must demand the decree of accusation against all the chiefs of the denounced faction. Barrère, who was sitting and voting with this handful of Montagnards, presented the following propositions:—1. That the National Convention decree that the committee of public safety or salvation (sabot public) should be bound to present, within three days, the measures proper to save the republic. 2. That the said committee should also make a report upon this petition presented by the constituted authorities of Paris. 3. That the department of Paris, the municipality, and all citizens who had any evidence and papers against the members they had denounced, should be bound to lay them before the said committee.—This fragment of the Convention would not do more for the present: they separated about midnight. The tocsin kept sounding all through the night, and at the dawn of day the alarm-gun was fired on the Pont Neuf; the barriers were again closed, and black flags were hoisted in every direction. Men, well trained to the business, ran among the troops and pikemen, reporting that Condé had fallen; that the department of the Gironde, and other departments of the south, were in insurrection; that intestine and foreign enemies, in correspondence with the twenty-two or twenty-seven traitors, were endeavouring to surround Paris. The members of the Convention repaired to their hall; and this Sunday morning there was rather a full House—the Mountain, the Plain, and even a good many of the côté droit, taking their usual seats. Except Lanjuinais and Barbaroux, all the menaced Girondists kept close in their hiding-places, listening to the tocsin and the cries of the people, and the roar of the alarm-gun. Clavière, their minister of finance, had been arrested during the night by the section of Pikes; but Isnard, Lanthenas, Dussaulx, Fauchet, and a few others who had identified themselves with the party, appeared in their places, or arrived in the course of the morning before the Convention was blockaded. Lanjuinais, who seems to have been the only man of real courage attached to the Gironde party, obtained possession of the tribune, and demanded why the drums were beating to arms? The Mountain interrupted him by crying, "Down! down!—You want to sow divisions in the assembly!—You want to make a civil war!" But Lanjuinais raised his voice, and boldly told many truths—truths so unpalatable to the Montagnards, that Robespierre's brother, Legendre,

* There was much jesting upon this capture. "The ex-minister, Roland," says the Chronique de Paris, "has not been arrested. Some men who laugh at everything, on learning that his wife was caught instead of him, said that the body had escaped, but the soul had remained behind to be taken."

Many other arrests were made in these days by order of the commune. The printers who worked for Girondist publishers were much sought after.

Drouet, and Julien rushed to the tribune, and attempted to drag him down by brute force. They tore his clothes off his back; but Lanjuinais, being a muscular man, kept so tight hold of the iron railing, that they could not do it; and, continuing his speech, he demanded that all the insurrectionary authorities of Paris should be removed; that all that they had done during the three last days should be annulled; that all those men who were attempting to arrogate to themselves a new authority, contrary to the law, should be declared outlawed, and permission given to every citizen to fall upon them (de leur courir sus). Here he was stopped by the president (Malamé), who announced that a deputation of the revolutionary and constituted authorities of the department of Paris demanded to be admitted to the bar, in order to present the last means of public salvation. The côté droit opposed the admission of the deputation, but those terrible petitioners, followed by the usual escort, marched into the hall. "Delegates of the people," exclaimed their orator, "the citizens of Paris have been under arms these four days;—for these four days they have been demanding their rights, and for these four days you have been laughing at their tranquillity and inaction. The torch of liberty has grown pale; the pillars of equality are shaken; the counter-revolutionists lift up their insolent heads. But let them tremble! The thunder groans; they are going to be pulverized! Their crimes are known to you. We come for the last time to denounce them; decree, then, this instant, that they are unworthy of the public confidence; place them this instant under arrest; we will answer for it with our heads to the departments. Citizens, the people are weary of your continual adjournment of their happiness! Act for them this minute, or in the next they will act for themselves." Billaud-Varennes and Tallien demanded that the House should not rise, and that no other question should be discussed, until the petitioners were satisfied. But a great number of voices, including even some of the Mountain, called for the order of the day, some of them reminding the Assembly that a petition of the same nature had on the overnight been referred to the Committee of Public Safety, who were to report upon it within three days. "What order of the day?" cried Legendre; "the order of the day is to save the country!" The order of the day was, however, put to the vote, and carried by a considerable majority. Upon this the petitioners retired from the hall with menacing gestures, the mob poured down from the galleries, and the cry was heard outside the doors, "Aux armes, citoyens! aux armes!" "Save the people from the effects of their own fury! Save the lives of your colleagues by voting their temporary imprisonment! You see circumstances command it," cried one of the Mountain. "No," responded La-Réveillère-Lépaux; "rather let us all go to prison." All the côté droit, all the Plain, and even some of the Mountain, rose and cried, "No! No!" An un-named member ingeniously proposed
