INTRODUCTION

The Worcester Art Museum exists through the generosity of the late Stephen Salisbury, a prominent citizen of Worcester. Far beyond the importance and generosity of the benefaction, which speaks for itself, was the farsightedness of the donor in not restricting the gift by any condition.

The Worcester Art Museum was organized on February 25, 1896, when Stephen Salisbury invited a number of citizens—both men and women—interested in art to subscribe to an agreement to form a Corporation composed of fifty members. The immediate management was placed in the hands of twelve Directors chosen from the members of the Corporation according to the by-laws. A charter was issued by the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in April, 1896. Mr. Salisbury gave the newly formed Corporation $100,000 in addition to a gift of land. On this land the building of the Worcester Art Museum was begun early in 1897, and on June 24 the cornerstone was laid. In the beginning of 1898 the building was complete and turned over by the Directors to the Corporation. It was opened on May 10. Mr. Salisbury died in 1905 leaving the Worcester Museum residuary legatee and bequeathing it the larger part of his estate.

An addition to the Museum was opened on February 19, 1921.

CATALOGUE OF PAINTINGS AND DRAWINGS

Our aim has been to issue a catalogue reproducing many of the principal pictures and giving, as far as possible, a brief and simple description of the art character of each. For those who are engaged in research and are unable to study the originals, information as to colour and other details is given, more particularly of those paintings belonging to early epochs. Concerning the more modern pictures no attempt has been made to discuss the question of originality and contemporary significance. Such criticism is hardly the province of a catalogue. Other publications will be issued later devoted respectively to sculpture, Japanese prints, and the minor arts in the Museum collection.

MADONNA AND CHILD
GUIDO DA SIENA

GUIDO DA SIENA

Sieneſe, Thirteenth Century

MADONNA AND CHILD

Little is known of Guido and we use the name as much to designate a painting belonging to a certain group as to assign it to the brush of one man. Though we leave unsettled the question of the relative positions of Cimabue and Guido da Siena, or even accept the Florentine claim to priority, it must be admitted that Guido has importance in the transition from Byzantine traditions and that he foreshadows the trend of later Sieneſe art.

The Madonna and Child is richly decorative in colour. The Virgin's mantle, part of which forms the headdress, is a dark blue. The material that encompasses the face is edged with gold. The Infant's hair is reddish, and He wears a light grey garment ornamented with green lines. In the background, partly surrounding the halo of the Madonna, is drapery of orange-red. This red appears also in the lining of the Madonna's robe and in the portion which envelops her head. It is repeated again in the halo of the Child. The angels in each spandrel are very close in type and manner of treatment to those in the pediment of the Madonna Enthroned in the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena. In view of the anti-materialistic aspirations of "ultra-modern" art, it is interesting to note how figures and subject in this thirteenth century painting are subordinated to design in line, colour, and composition and how the physical and literary are subservient to the æsthetic.

MADONNA AND CHILD WITH SAINT AND DONOR

This panel is a dramatic composition in red and black. The Virgin, wearing a black mantle, is seated on a throne draped with a soft red fabric covered with a delicate tracery of black. The saint's robe is of the same red, relieved by a vestment of white. The donor, in a black garment, with trimmings and stockings of the prevailing red, is kneeling before the Virgin. The picture shows pure Sienese influence in the Madonna and Child. The tendency towards naturalism, much in evidence in the art of mediæval miniature painters, is observable in the figure of the saint, suggesting, in the bold sculptural treatment of the robes, Flemish influence through Claes Sluyter. There is an ascetic spirit of unusual intensity in this figure.

The red in the picture suggests the Catalan school, and it is possible that the panel comes from the region of Avignon and Toulouse, and was therefore subject to influences from the Catalan painters. It may have come from Barcelona, but until there is a consensus of authoritative opinion supporting this we assign it to the French school.

The Madonna and Child is a passage of pure æsthetics, its delicacy emphasized by contrast with the bolder handling of the saint's mantle. The swaying folds of the drapery over the back and arms of the throne, the black of the Virgin's robe, the repetition of the red in the under-garment of the Virgin, are rhythmically arranged.

THE CRUCIFIXION
LUCA SPINELLI (SPINELLO ARETINO)

LUCA SPINELLI (SPINELLO ARETINO)

Florentine, active 1361-1410

THE CRUCIFIXION

This Crucifixion is not unusual in character among the works of the Giottesque group. Certain qualities in colour, type of figure, and execution suggest Spinello. The painter, like others of his cycle, combined Florentine strength with Sienese refinement and is usually described as the last great painter of the Giottesque before the tradition was reduced entirely to a mechanical process. His colour is brilliant. The drawing is at times hastily done; the figures are spirited and energetic, and accuracy appears to have been often sacrificed for action.

The Magdalene, kneeling at the foot of the cross, is clad in a mantle of rose-red, delicate and luminous and enriched by bright yellow where the light falls upon the green sleeve of her gown. At her feet lies a skull, signifying penance. The Magdalene and the Christ on the cross are fine in quality but the figures on either side are not so interesting. In drawing and in type they lack refinement. The Madonna at the left is robed in a blue mantle with underdress of red. No doubt the blue was at one time lighter in tone and balanced more satisfactorily the violet garment which partly covers the green cloak of St. John, who stands at the right. The edges of all the robes are brocaded with gold, and the halos have incised decoration. Above the head of Christ are the letters I N R I, inscribed on a red tablet, and over this is a pelican with her young.

OTTAVIANO NELLI

Umbrian, active ca. 1400-1444

THE ADORATION OF THE MAGI

Ottaviano Nelli is the first important Umbrian painter and expresses with a naiveté of spirit and traditional technique the general liveliness in colour and incident of Gubbian art. The subject of this panel is presented with action and technique mediæval in spirit. It is probably an altarpiece, no doubt a part of a larger composition. The adoration of the Magi and the announcement of the birth of Christ to the shepherds in the mountains are expressed with a combination of serious intention and playfulness characteristic of work of this cycle.

In the foreground are two shepherds in blue garments. Angels draped in blue and pink are floating in the air above the shed, which is painted a brilliant yellow; and under this, in the foreground, is seated the Virgin with Joseph at her side. The yellow of the shed is repeated in the mantle of Joseph, which covers a blue tunic. The blue has an echo in the long outer garment worn by the Virgin, which partly conceals a gown of rose-pink, of the same tone as that introduced in the mantle of the kneeling king. His coat is a vivid vermilion-red and this vermilion appears again in the coat of the man leading a camel, and in the pack on the camel's back, as well as on the trappings of the horses—one black, one white, and one brown. The other two kings are dressed in rich robes of red brocaded in gold.

FLORENTINE, EARLY FIFTEENTH CENTURY

MADONNA AND CHILD

The later Gothic painters have at times transitional qualities but they are frequently reactionary and not of vital consequence in the evolution of painting. Their art invariably possesses a charm, as in this Madonna and Child, that is attributable to a general softening of contours while still retaining an archaic spirit. It has none of the robust quality that marks the main trend of Italian art of the period. Masolino may have had some influence on our artist's work, in its spirit of tenderness, but there is little real advance in the direction of Masolino's graceful naturalism or of Masaccio's virile objectivity.

The Madonna wears a black mantle lined with green and a cream-coloured tunic, showing a design in gold. The gentleness of her inclined head is emphasized by the superficial sturdiness of the Infant who looks straight out of the picture and stolidly gives a benediction. A pale blue kerchief nearly covers the Madonna's hair and drapes the shoulders. A fabric of the same blue is wrapped about the Child, who is seated on a rose-coloured scarf which shades into a lighter tone of pink as it falls over the Madonna's arm. The black mantle, and indeed all the drapery, is decorated with double lines of gold along the edges. The gold of the nimbi has an attractive pattern and is strongly incised. A triptych attributed to Ambrogio di Baldese, in the Jarves collection at Yale University, appears to be by the same hand as our picture.

STEFANO DA ZEVIO THE YOUNGER

STEFANO DA ZEVIO THE YOUNGER

Veronese, ca. 1393-1450

MADONNA OF THE ROSE GARDEN

It was in the first quarter of the fifteenth century that Italy, rousing herself from the somewhat sleepy repetition of religious themes with remote and symbolic backgrounds into which she had fallen in the late trecento, turned with renewed eagerness to the world about her, its plant and animal life, men and women in their gay modern garb, landscape, or so much of it as lies within the compass of a townsman's afternoon stroll. But in this alertness to nature the Italian artists were preceded by the French and German illuminators of missals and books of hours, who had for some score of years been introducing into their work the flat country with its distant castles, the doings of peasants, or the gayeties of the court, whenever the text under their hand offered an excuse. And so in the first three or four decades of the century, the new art that wells up all through Tuscany, Umbria, and the valley of the Po is coloured in varying degrees by a repeated inflow of northern ideas.

This composition by Stefano da Zevio is lyrical and mystical in conception. The Madonna and Child sit in a garden of flowers, figures, and birds. The flowers, mere conventional patterning in earlier work, have become exquisitely precise little portraits of lupin and star grass and garden roses. The angels, instead of darting hither and yonder at will, are arranged in balanced groups over their music, and even those who fling down roses from the sky do it with the rhythmic motion of a dance.

The picture is significant not only as a charming piece of pattern in soft translucent colour, and a sincere homage to the Madonna, but for its origin at a meeting point of the art of the North and South. There is a distinct affinity in this picture to the work of Stephen Lochner.

SAINT BARTHOLOMEW
SPANISH, FIFTEENTH CENTURY

SAINT BARTHOLOMEW

The most glowing colour in a Spanish picture seems to be subdued by an atmosphere, as though it were seen through a veil. This is true of the St. Bartholomew.

The painting presents a coördination of many influences synthetically expressed. Every detail has its purpose in the general scheme. This is particularly noticeable in the sweep of St. Bartholomew's cloak from the right hand down to the feet, and in the chain of gold attached to a wing of the demon which lies under the foot of the saint at the bottom of the picture. The wings and legs of the demon join the lines of rocks and landscape and bring together successfully all objects in the composition.

In addition to strength and graciousness a spirit of restraint pervades the panel. The colour, drawing, and pose of the figure have majesty. A mantle richly brocaded with a design of pomegranates is worn by the saint; its folds are dexterously indicated by simple flowing lines. An under-garment of dark brown appears almost black. The halo is decorated with an incised floral design. Light reddish brown predominates in the rocks and foreground. The demon, which is painted with force and dexterity, is bluish green in colour, and the book held by St. Bartholomew is red. The saint has fair skin with reddish hair and beard, with a suggestion of Sieneese influence in the face. The drapery shows unmistakable Gothic and Sieneese treatment; but there is something in the picture which is not consistent with either of these influences; it may have a German origin.

MADONNA AND CHILD
MASOLINO DA PANICALE

MASOLINO DA PANICALE

Florentine, 1383-1440

MADONNA AND CHILD

This picture possesses in considerable measure attributes of fifteenth century Florentine art. Characteristics of Masolino in the painting of eyes, nose, and general features are present in the panel, although not so sharply accentuated as in the more fully established examples of this master. It is likely that continued repainting and restoration have modified these characteristics to some extent and have given the painting—particularly the Madonna—a delicacy somewhat foreign to the period and school. In any case it is far from satisfactory to call this significant panel a school picture, and there appears to be no artist to whom it could be more appropriately attributed than to Masolino, owing to subtle distinctions of personality.

The importance of the picture lies in the combination of strength, grace, and colour,—strength particularly obvious in the Christ Child, grace in the delicate modelling and line of the Madonna. The removal of various coats of paint which have hidden the robe for centuries has revealed beautiful colours of soft green-blue and light green. The colour and drawing both in the drapery and flesh are harmonious. The strength and intense realism of the Infant—directly influenced by Masaccio—are powerfully in evidence in spite of the damaged condition of this part of the painting. But in line, modelling, and in the graceful spirit of the Madonna it closely approaches Masolino. It is possible, however, that further research may take the picture out of Florentine territory and establish it as by Antonio Vivarini, the Venetian.

SCENES FROM THE CORONATION OF EMPEROR FREDERICK III (DETAIL)
SCHOOL OF BENOZZO GOZZOLI

SCHOOL OF BENOZZO GOZZOLI

Florentine, Fifteenth Century

SCENES FROM THE CORONATION OF EMPEROR FREDERICK III

These paintings, the front and end panels from a cassone, represent typical scenes in one of the most striking and picturesque happenings in the annals of Italy during the middle of the fifteenth century: the coronation of the Emperor Frederick III and Leonora of Portugal, his betrothed, in 1452, the last imperial coronation which took place in Rome.

The principal panel unites in one scenic narrative three episodes of the actual coronation ceremonies, viz. (1) the crowning of Frederick and Leonora by Pope Nicholas V. at St. Peter's; (2) the journey of Pope and Emperor to the Lateran; (3) the knighting of adherents by Frederick on the Bridge of St. Angelo. One end-panel depicts Frederick's reception by the nobility of Florence while he was on his way to Rome. The subject of the other is less easy to designate with precision, though it probably represents Leonora's arrival at Leghorn, Pisa, or Siena, after her long and perilous sea voyage. As in some of Benozzo Gozzoli's frescoes at Monte Falco, the colouring, although without Fra Angelico's poetic freshness and beauty of suggestion, has, nevertheless, a similar festal interplay of well-distributed masses of blue, crimson, pearly white, and gold, broken here and there by the sparing use of dark and neutral tone.

These panels embody the initial change from mediævalism to modernity then taking place in Italian art, when a religious idealism, almost symbolic in character, was being replaced by a creative and poetic naturalism. They mingle happily older and newer pictorial elements, with a decided preference for the joyously mundane.

MADONNA AND CHILD
BARTOLOMMEO MONTAGNA

BARTOLOMMEO MONTAGNA

Venetian, ca. 1450-1523

MADONNA AND CHILD

Recent study of the works of Bartolommeo Montagna, the chief painter of Vicenza, has revealed great variety in his training, as well as the strongly individual trend of his mind. A stately simplicity always controls the complex influences exerted upon him by the age and the inland region in which he lived, and by his great contemporaries. Like most of the men from whom he borrowed, Montagna was less affected by details or mannerisms than by the general ideas and spirit of his work and the more serious elements of style. It is the grand austerity, akin in some respects to that of Mantegna, which gives to the realism always present in his personages a dignity at once human and sternly or graciously religious. Montagna went directly to the life about him for his types and inspiration.

In our picture a spirit of restraint distinguishes the tender relationship between the two figures and a primitive strength and fine harmony of masses and lines are obtained through the sophisticated archaism of the drawing. The painting has calm joyousness, with hints of the pathos which intensifies deep happiness.

THE ADORATION
ANTONIO DA VITERBO

ANTONIO DA VITERBO

THE ADORATION

This panel was painted about 1500. The artist has been happy in the selection of types and incidents of composition characteristic of the Umbrian school. The dainty flowers of the foreground, the homely fence, and rustic shelter are in perfect keeping with the secluded landscape and the mystic scene. The angel seen full front is beautiful whether in the lovely contour of the face or the unaffected, upright attitude, with its superb pivotal result upon the whole composition. No disturbing material elements trouble the repose. There is charming distribution and variety of colour. The angel in the foreground has a blue mantle and red robe. This red is repeated on the edge of the garments of the other two angels and in the pillow upon which the Infant lies. The second angel wears a garment of yellow and this colour reappears in the open shutter on the right. The remaining angel is in grey and blue. Suave drawing, mellow colouring, serene effects of landscape and of golden light and distance, and the brooding spirit of the Umbrian land itself, are all brought into the perfect service of mystic calm, devotional sweetness, and living grace. The rock on the left strengthens the design and the exquisite detail of the landscape and the blue sky make a composition of charm—a charm for which Antonio da Viterbo in particular and the Umbrian school in general were distinguished.

PORTRAIT OF DONOR AND BISHOP
FLEMISH, FIFTEENTH CENTURY

PORTRAIT OF DONOR AND BISHOP

The companion piece to this picture is in the Rhode Island School of Design at Providence. These panels have been called French fifteenth century, painted between 1460 and 1480, presumably by one of the artists whose works are grouped together under the name of Maître de Moulins. That there is a strong Flemish note in spirit and composition cannot be questioned and we are inclined to agree with the Providence Museum's assignment of it to that school. But Flemish ideas entered into Burgundian art through visiting artists and the existence of certain Flemish elements of style in our picture does not entirely preclude the possibility of its having been painted in Burgundian territory.

The cope and mitre of the Bishop are richly ornamented. The floral figures and architectural incidents are painted in brilliant tones of red, brown, and blue. The donor wears a brown garment trimmed with black fur, with a tunic of red. Owing to repainting some of the colour is questionable. There is careful detail throughout and considerable mastery in portraiture. In spite of the detail there is a massiveness and a grandeur more Flemish than French in spirit.

JAN MOSTAERT

Flemish, ca. 1475-1555

PORTRAIT OF A MAN

Jan Mostaert of Haarlem is now identified as the so-called Maître d'Oultremont. Many pictures by him and many not by him were included under this name, some to his credit and others to his discredit. Italian influence is strongly shown in many of Mostaert's paintings, others assigned to him are influenced by Holbein, and others again carry on a true Flemish tradition of Van Eyck, Memling, and Van der Weyden. Mostaert is more important for his Flemish characteristics than alien ones. Indeed, he may be described as the last painter to carry on the tradition of Van der Weyden. He was successful as a painter of historical subjects as well as portraits. The latter are very rare as many were destroyed by fire at Haarlem in 1571.

The faces in Mostaert's portraits have usually a touch of melancholy, or at least a very serious expression. Our panel is no exception. It is a study in brown and has that self-composed character conspicuous in early portraits of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The purple-brown velvet sleeves of the undergarment and the black surcoat with a collar of light grey-brown mottled fur are all rich in colour and texture. The hair is brown and the hat black. The painting of face and hands is characteristically Flemish in treatment. Mostaert excelled in landscape, and the passages of blue hills, rich greens and browns of the grass and trees, and charming incidents show his ability in this respect. The figure is three-quarters life-size; against the landscape it makes a most satisfactory design in colour and composition.

ALBERT BOUTS

ALBERT BOUTS

Flemish, ca. 1460-1549

MADONNA AND CHILD WITH ANGEL

Like the paintings attributed to Albert Bouts in the Brussels gallery and the Musée d'Anvers, our example reveals him as a close follower of a greater than he, his father, Dirk Bouts, one of the geniuses of the early Netherlandish school. Indeed, our Madonna and Child come near to having as prototypes Dirk's Madonna and Child in the Musée d'Anvers. The resemblance is marked even in details.

The facial types chosen by the younger Bouts are, as one would expect from a school which made realism its first study, prosaic and mature. Three beings who should be inspired with joy and youth and divine tenderness, appear before us as simple, homely mortals. Yet there is something extremely touching in their very human quality.

Dirk Bouts as a colourist was one of the marvels of his school; his son did not equal him in this respect. In this picture the clear red, green-blue, and pale creamy tints are harmonious. The effect is of light without much atmosphere. Interesting though the background is, with its blue distances, winding roads, and moated castle, the garden in which the Madonna stands has a greater charm. Realism is here carried so far as to lead to the fantastic and unreal.

JOOST VAN CLEVE

JOOST VAN CLEVE

Flemish, late fifteenth century-1540

PORTRAIT OF A MAN

Between Italian and Flemish art in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries there was an unmistakable interchange. Italian idealism which influenced Europe for a hundred years left its imperishable mark upon the art of Flanders; at the same time Italian art was affected by Flemish realism. The painting of Joost van Cleve, both in portraits and religious subjects, shows varying degrees of Italian influence. In the later and best period of his work we find the foreign elements better fused than in his earlier painting. Our picture belongs to the later period. The tones of the face, the reddish hair, and black hat are rich and harmonious, as are the black of the surcoat, the red doublet, and the patterned grey sleeve. The design both in colour and line is well sustained and the result, though extremely sensitive, has a pervading richness.

RIDOLFO GHIRLANDAIO

Florentine, 1483-1561

PORTRAIT OF AN ECCLESIASTIC

This painting of an aged ecclesiastic is a profound and intimate revelation of a benignant character, expressed with means as quiet and simple as though by Raphael himself. The painting bears a close resemblance to various portraits by Perugino and to certain portrait-like figures in the early works of Perugino's great pupil, Raphael. We know, moreover, that Raphael thought highly of Ridolfo, caused him to share in the execution of some of his own paintings, and tried to induce him to go to Rome as his fellow-worker.

In spite of the strength of our picture, the colour and the modelling of the face are very sensitive. The black hat and ecclesiastical robes against the light blue-green background are effective. This is a portrait of power in its delineation of character, in colour, and in technique.

MADONNA AND CHILD
BERNARDINO DEI CONTI

BERNARDINO DEI CONTI

Milanese, active 1496-1522

MADONNA AND CHILD

Bernardino dei Conti was a painter with a marked affinity to Leonardo da Vinci, yet obviously subjected to other influences. Ambrogio de Predis, as well as Leonardo, appears to have made an impression on this comparatively little known artist. It is believed that dei Conti received his first training from Vincenza Foppa. Without doubt the brownish red flesh tints and the arrangement of draping in certain works point to the school of Foppa. An angularity in the position of the figures is a characteristic of many examples of this cycle. Speaking generally and comparatively dei Conti was a mechanical painter. There is a naïveté that suggests an artist imbued with the sentiment of the subject, without excessive technical ability. The deep red robe of the Madonna against a melancholy blue-green landscape contributes to the solemn effect of the picture.

PORTRAIT OF FRANCESCO DEGLI ALBIZZI
IL SALVIATI (FRANCESCO DEI ROSSI)

IL SALVIATI (FRANCESCO DEI ROSSI)

Florentine, 1510-1563

PORTRAIT OF FRANCESCO DEGLI ALBIZZI

This portrait has attributes which suggest greater strength than the picture actually possesses. It is Michaelangesque in spirit, but in a superficial sense only. Yet the picture has massiveness and dignity and is a good example of this phase of manneristic painting. The ponderous elements of the composition are well arranged and controlled by a coppery tonal quality throughout. The robe is a reddish brown with flowered design, edged with brown fur, and underneath is a black figured tunic. The green curtain at the back has a brown fringe. The black beard and the imposing robes convey the impression of a person autocratic in character.

PORTRAIT OF A WOMAN
LORENZO LOTTO

LORENZO LOTTO

Venetian, ca. 1480-1556

PORTRAIT OF A WOMAN

At first one is repelled by the forbidding character of the face in this picture. With further acquaintance one realizes the forceful way in which it is expressed, its powerful organization, its unity, and structural vibrancy.

This portrait was executed before Lotto came under the influence of the more truly Venetian painters. Early sixteenth century Venetian portraits have attributes of a more distinctive character than those done later in the century. This is true of Lotto's early as compared with his later works. There is the uncompromising interest in character abstractly rendered in spite of a very definite objectivity. Lorenzo Lotto more than any other Venetian painter was interested in the intellectual side of his sitter. Even later, when for a time he came under the spell of Titian and Giorgione and was preoccupied with their richer and deeper colour, he was never indifferent to the psychology of his subject. In this portrait there is no preoccupation with indirect methods to obtain texture and colour so much employed by later Venetians. The light golden hair and the face with its fair complexion are painted in a high key with very pure colour. This clarity is a distinctive attribute of the entire painting; yet in spite of brilliancy a grey warm tone prevails. The necklace with its hardly perceptible shadows on the neck is exquisitely painted. The black of the bodice and the white sleeves have similar qualities. It is this combined delicacy in painting and power of construction that give force to the personality and to the form.

GIOVANNI BUONCONSIGLIO

GIOVANNI BUONCONSIGLIO

Venetian, active 1495-1535

VIRGIN AND CHILD WITH SAINTS MARY MAGDALENE, PETER, AND PAUL

Although Buonconsiglio has not to his credit a large number of important works he was a painter of considerable talent. A Vicentine by birth, he was much affected by Montagna under whose influence he produced his best work. A great part of his life was spent in Venice where he came under the spell of her painters and strove to keep in step with them. He was influenced considerably by Bellini and Giorgione.

This picture of the Virgin and Child is rich in colour and has passages of fine painting, more particularly on the right side which is the best preserved part. The Virgin has something of the spirit of both Montagna and Bellini, and the figure at the right of Mary is interesting and suggestive of Giorgione.

The Virgin wears a deep red tunic, a blue mantle, and a white hood embroidered in yellow; Saint Mary Magdalene a red slashed gown; Saint Peter a greenish tunic and yellow mantle; Saint Paul a deep red mantle.

The panel is signed "Ioanet Buoncosilii Mareschalch."

PORTRAIT OF A VENETIAN
PAOLO FARINATO

PAOLO FARINATO

Veronese, 1524-1606

PORTRAIT OF A VENETIAN

The works of Paolo Farinato are often mistaken for those of Veronese but, in spite of a certain stylistic resemblance to that master as well as to other painters of the period, he had not Veronese's strength or colour. He painted many pictures of a religious character nearly all of which are at Verona. The colouring of our picture lends itself admirably to its conception. It has a deep and sombre warmth, darks laid against darks in the velvet robes and shadowy background. There is no note of striking colour, but the depths of black and bluish black are overlaid with a silvery shimmer. There is a glow and warmth in the flesh. The finely shaped hands are rendered with sureness and power. The hair is painted with precision and has a thick and soft appearance. The velvet of the loose robes, with its crushed folds and rich shadows, is painted with a considerable freedom.

THE BERGAMASK CAPTAIN
GIOVANNI BATTISTA MORONI

GIOVANNI BATTISTA MORONI

Brescian, ca. 1520-1578

THE BERGAMASK CAPTAIN

Naturalism and a preference for northern tones are to be seen in the portraits of two Italian painters, Moretto da Brescia and his disciple the Bergamask, Moroni. In them power of characterization reaches a strictly realistic directness.

Moroni had not his master's poetic warmth of imagination, nor the ability to stress the more spiritual and intellectual qualities of his sitters. Nor does his painting possess the grave sumptuousness, or subdued richness, which gives some of Moretto's works a Venetian impressiveness. Moroni in his finest portraits easily surpasses his master in downright naturalness of presentation and in a kind of instantaneous and dramatic summary of the outward signs of the lives of the personages he portrays. He is the one Italian of the later Renaissance who rivals some of the great Netherlandish and German painters on their own ground, while yet retaining certain purely Italian qualities—feeling for true design and the power to sum up vividly and simply.

PORTRAIT OF ELEANOR OF PORTUGAL (?)
FLEMISH, SIXTEENTH CENTURY

PORTRAIT OF ELEANOR OF PORTUGAL (?)

The portrait of Eleanor of Portugal (?) has been attributed to the "Master of the Female Half-Lengths." However, its relation to other pictures attributed to this master is one of subject rather than of style. It seems possessed of the homelier Flemish virtues of strength, truth, and clarity, and lacks the refined elegance of Lady Jane Grey, belonging to Lord Spencer and the Portrait of a Young Woman in Vienna.

In our picture the figure is robed in velvet of rich, almost luminous red, and about the shoulders is fur of soft texture. Warm orange tones enter into the various parts of the instrument. Close by is a table covered over with yellow-green. All the tones have that rich colour in shadow which was, perhaps, better attained by the use of the clear, hard, varnish-like medium of the Flemish painters than in any other way. The red-browns and the greens are arranged against a background of grey, and the result is an agreeable balance of warm and cool tones.

Eleanor of Portugal lived from 1437-1467. Both the manner of painting and the costume preclude the possibility of the picture having been painted at that time. Eleanor of Austria, however, who became the Queen of Emmanuel of Portugal, and later of Francis I of France, was born in 1498 and would have been in her teens in the early sixteenth century, when this picture was probably painted.

PORTRAIT OF A LADY
FRANZ POURBUS THE YOUNGER

FRANZ POURBUS THE YOUNGER

Flemish, ca. 1570-1622

PORTRAIT OF A LADY

The art of Franz Pourbus the Younger at its best represents the happy merging of two great traditions in painting: first, the Netherlandish, with its love of direct portraiture, solidly and even minutely painted and full of psychological character; second, the Franco-Italian tradition with its grace and ease and distinct sympathy towards the well-bred. These qualities were so animated by the individual genius of the painter that the finest of his few surviving portraits, especially those of women, have an originality and attractiveness which distinguish them.

The Portrait of a Lady is that of a princess, perhaps of the family of the Gonzaga, the Medici, or of Henry IV of France, and exemplifies admirably the characteristics mentioned. It has a joy in detail, astonishingly rendered, and a delightful suggestion of quiet but instantaneous life that carries us back to Clouet and the French primitives.

The imposing costume of the period, the red brocade with a huge triple ruff of lace, jewels in the hair and ears, the great pendant and chain of pearls have all been painted faithfully. The little dog looks out at us with lively curiosity and the assured impudence of a court favorite. The painting of the flesh tones is very delicately managed to give proper modeling with the least possible effect of shadow, and the rosy tone is far from the florid hues which Pourbus's contemporaries would have imparted.

MASTER OF FRANKFORT

MASTER OF FRANKFORT

German, Sixteenth Century

MADONNA AND CHILD WITH ANGELS

A number of pictures of a certain type in Frankfort have been assigned to the Master of Frankfort, for lack of a more definite attribution. Who this artist was has been a much debated question. Some identify him with Konrad Fyol, a citizen of Frankfort, but others claim this as chronologically impossible and prefer to regard him as Konrad's son, Hans Fyol. This is not an impossibility, but the figures seem too awkwardly placed in the landscape, and hardly flexible enough to be identified with Flemish art. This picture has attributes of the art of the Middle Rhine and the characteristics associated with the works attributed to the Master of Frankfort.

Among its best qualities are the colour and detail. The red robe of the Madonna is rich and not so heavy or manneristic as in many German pictures of a similar character. In the foreground is a profusion of foliage and trees, rendered with the care and finish typical of the time, and so much in favour with the Flemish painters. The cool light greens and blues in the hilly background contrast strongly with the deep red in the Madonna's robe, and add to the charm of the picture. The landscape in the background with its human incidents is carefully depicted, the fanciful building painted in a sober olive-green.

PORTRAIT OF A YOUNG NOBLEWOMAN
BARTOLOMÉ GONZÁLEZ Y SERRANO

BARTOLOMÉ GONZÁLEZ Y SERRANO

Spanish, 1564-1627

PORTRAIT OF A YOUNG NOBLEWOMAN

In his capacity as painter to King Philip III, Bartolomé González executed some important portraits for the court. He marks the beginning of the decadence of Spanish art before Velasquez. The Young Noblewoman is an unusually good example of his work. The red dress is treated simply. The pattern of the whole appears studied and stiff, due to the costume of the period as well as the technique. The gravity and self-composed character of the face is in keeping with the rigidity of the figure. Although the picture has a strong Spanish feeling there is also a spirit Venetian in character.

CHRIST IN THE HOUSE OF MARY AND MARTHA
EL GRECO (DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI)

EL GRECO (DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI)

Spanish, ca. 1548-1614

CHRIST IN THE HOUSE OF MARY AND MARTHA

There is no stranger personality in the history of art than El Greco. His unique character is noticeable not alone in the individuality of his work, but also in the way he absorbed Venetian ideas while living in Venice, and yet later, after settling in Spain, became the most Spanish of Spanish painters, despite the fact that he was neither a Venetian nor a Spaniard.

Christ in the House of Mary and Martha was probably painted about 1571-1576 and is of El Greco's transitional period from Venetian to Spanish. The blue of the mantle of Christ, and the pinks of the under-garment are brilliant. The rich golden-brown overdress worn by Mary, with other browns in varying tones distributed throughout the picture, give a warm accent to a colour scheme in which silver is the prevailing note.

In spite of its small size the picture has power and breadth. The subject is taken from the Gospel of St. Luke x, 38-42, and is one which affords a good opportunity for the spirit of motion and commotion dearly loved by El Greco. Indeed, it is upon the motion and the nervous force of the figures that the feeling of life depends, rather than on strict adherence to the natural appearance of surface or form.

THE MAGDALENE
EL GRECO (DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI)

EL GRECO (DOMENICO THEOTOCOPULI)

Spanish, ca. 1548-1614

THE MAGDALENE

The Magdalene was painted a few years later than the Christ in the House of Mary and Martha, also in the Worcester Museum. It is a composition expressing human sorrow and exaltation with a degree of power rarely approached by any painter. We see not merely the emotion of one woman but a symbol of all human emotion. In colour and spirit the picture is typically Greco and Spanish. Although forceful it is painted with much sensitiveness. In the figure—the long fair hair, the drapery, particularly the neckerchief—we see brushwork both direct and exquisite in feeling. The same may be said of such details as the skull and the ivy. The sky is in harmony with the figure and adds to the remarkable unity and dramatic significance of the subject. The prevailing tone is blue, and has cold classic severity characteristic of Greco's work, indeed of much Spanish art of the time. But it is not really cold for it has a restrained exuberance of life intensely overpowering.

Our picture was painted between 1584 and 1594 and was until recently in the Colegio de Ingleses in Valladolid. It bears Greco's Greek signature $\chi\epsilon\rho\ \alpha\gamma\omega\gamma\eta\acute{\nu}\iota\kappa\epsilon\varsigma$, "Hand of Domenico."

PAULUS MOREELSE

PAULUS MOREELSE

Dutch, 1571-1638

PORTRAIT OF CORNELIA BRUINZEELS

In subject and simplicity of treatment this picture is a typical seventeenth century Dutch portrait. It is well composed, and individual character beloved by the Dutch is expressed in the face and hands. It is refined in drawing and the modelling and arrangement are good. The dress is of that luminous black so typical of Dutch art. The figure is painted with freedom in spite of much careful detail in collar and cap and other incidents. With the exception of the rich colour in the chain, the hands, and the touch of red in the chair the picture is rather cool in tone.

Moreelse was known as a portrait painter, though after a visit to Rome he executed a number of historical pictures; he was also an engraver of distinction and an architect.

PIETER DUBORDIEU

PIETER DUBORDIEU

Dutch, ca. 1609-after 1678

PORTRAIT OF A LADY

In this portrait there is little idealism, no apparent effort to render any distinction alien to the subject. It is a vivid representation of a typical well-bred Dutch woman. Except for a less sure technique and brushwork, this portrait is not dissimilar in colour and conception to certain examples by Frans Hals. The black dress is painted with breadth and simplicity. It has depth of colour, and an effective play of light and shade. The face, hands, and broad lace-trimmed collar and cuffs are equally animated by a clever distribution of light. Little is known about this very good painter. There are two portraits by him in the Hague Museum.

THE MERRYMAKERS
HENDRIK MAERTENSZ SORGH

HENDRIK MAERTENSZ SORGH

Dutch, ca. 1611-1670

THE MERRYMAKERS

Sorgh's Merrymakers is typical of the Dutch seventeenth century. The still life, though perfectly subordinated to its ambient, takes on, as in Brouwer, the Ostades, and the English Hogarth, an individuality of its own. The grotesque figures and commonplace objects are given distinction by the pervading colour and tonal values. The table, bench, and the floor itself, have that intimacy which such things assume when, through long and familiar use, they become an indispensable part of the environment they help to create. In the interiors by Dutch painters objects seem to take their places in an airy medium. Although that medium cannot be seen, it is, as it were, inevitably felt by the eye because of the enriching softness given everywhere to the light which pervades colours and outlines.

THE TAILOR SHOP
QUIRINGH GERRITSZ VAN BREKELENKAM

QUIRINGH GERRITSZ VAN BREKELENKAM

Dutch, 1620-1668

THE TAILOR SHOP

Among the lesser Dutch painters Van Brekelenkam has a place of importance. In contrast with Dou, Terborch, Mieris, and Metsu, who painted the leisurely burgher class, and with Steen and Teniers, who depicted the coarse or joyous roistering of boors, Brekelenkam was particularly the painter of the true work-a-day life of the humbler professions. The Tailor Shop resembles Brekelenkam's picture, The Tailor's Workroom, in the Rijks Museum at Amsterdam.

Brekelenkam's colouring is less delicate and luminous than that of the greatest little masters, but it is bold, strong, and individual. A somewhat modern and yet primitive quality appears in his calculated looseness of touch and its frank trust to the fusing power of a moderate distance. In one respect he is partially an innovator. Certain greys of Hals, the cool lemons and pearls of Terborch, and many decided passages in Brouwer, had been preparing men's minds for the lighter key which is found in Brekelenkam's painting.

JAN DE BRAY

JAN DE BRAY

Dutch, 1627-1697

PORTRAIT OF A MAN

Jan de Bray was a painter of considerable importance in Holland in the seventeenth century, and there are authorities who place him second to Frans Hals among Haarlem painters. This Portrait of a Man is a typical example of his work and shows to a high degree the two outstanding characteristics of Dutch art, namely representation and penetration into character—an innate character expressed more by subtleties of surface than abstractly. The head is well modelled in rich colour and the tone is modified by the grey of the background and the delicately painted lace collar. Although Jan de Bray was influenced by Frans Hals there are many suggestions of Rembrandt in this portrait. He painted historical pictures but his portraits were his best achievements.

NICOLAUS MAES

NICOLAUS MAES

PORTRAIT OF AN OLD LADY

Maes's activity as a portrait painter should be divided into three periods. In the first and greatest his work so closely resembled Rembrandt's, that, in spite of the marked individuality which gave it life and precluded any charge of direct imitation, much of it has passed as that master's own. During his second period he was swayed more strongly by other men, particularly by Van Dyck and the Flemings, with a sacrifice of depth of characterization in favour of a fashionable and decorative style. Finally he merged with his later style the peculiar affectations of a taste borrowed from the court painting of the French.

Our portrait belongs to his earliest period. An old lady of seventy or more in the simplest of dresses rests in an arm-chair, her figure set in relief against a curtain. Seriousness, dignity, and an austere and patient benevolence have cast the strongly marked features into an impressive mould. The unobtrusive colours of the gown, the curious cap, and the broad white collar and cuffs, form a natural pattern of darks and lights in keeping with the kindly gravity of the woman herself.

JAN VAN DER HEYDEN

Dutch, 1637-1712

Figures by Eglon Hendrik van der Neer, Dutch, ca. 1635-1703

VIEW IN A DUTCH VILLAGE

Van der Heyden was one of the seventeenth century Dutch painters who rejoiced in detail. He represented each individual brick and stone in the houses and churches of the picturesque towns of Amsterdam, Brussels, and Cologne. He manifested the same minute interest in all objects in his compositions. Yet in spite of the careful detail, Van der Heyden's pictures are never trivial in character. They have breadth of spirit and charming intimacy. Buildings and trees are enveloped in a soft and luminous atmosphere and have sympathetic relationship to a sky full of light and variety.

In Van der Heyden's works the figures are usually done by another hand, some by Van der Neer and others by Adriaen van der Velde. Those in our panel are attributed to Van der Neer. In spite of their small size these figures so charmingly distributed in the scene have breadth. Touches of brilliant colour give animation to the prevailing silver tone.

A SELF PORTRAIT

Ghislandi was one of the few good eighteenth century painters Italy produced. His attitude, like Rembrandt's, was that of a naturalist. He worked with a full brush and saw the objects he painted in broad masses of light and shadow. His colour is sumptuous and sympathetic in quality as well as in application, particularly in the treatment of face and hands. His chiaroscuro is subtle and not so defined as to exclude light in the shadows. Indeed, he had an unusual ability to paint shadows and at the same time preserve form and local colour.

THE HOLY FAMILY
GIOVANNI BATTISTA TIEPOLO

GIOVANNI BATTISTA TIEPOLO

Venetian, 1696-1770

THE HOLY FAMILY

Tiepolo is the culmination of the art of the Venetian Renaissance. In his painting and drawing we see how much he benefited by the influence of the earlier Venetians. He did not possess greater qualities than they but a technical dexterity which resulted in an elegance and suggestiveness of line expressed with a confidence almost precocious.

In the startling abandon of Tiepolo's drawings we recognize the genius of the man. The handling of the medium, linked as it is with unusual composition, suggests motion; energy becomes a spontaneous outburst, its characteristic elements revolving upon an axis clearly felt. With a sure knowledge of the ultimate result, he composes areas full of interest cleverly juxtaposing untouched forms and shaded portions. Tiepolo was a power, and exerted great influence on seventeenth century decoration.

THE TOPER

Alexis Grimou was a Swiss but painted much in the style of his French contemporary, Fragonard. In colouring and vivacity his work is similar to that of Fragonard, but it has not the subtlety or refinement of execution. This picture, however, is painted with power and conveys considerable spirit and action. The still life is an excellent piece of realism, and has a necessary relationship to the figure. The variety of reddish brown tones is characteristic of much French art of the period. The composition is particularly happy. One hand holding the goblet, and the other grasping the jug have natural ease and spontaneity.

PORTRAIT OF FREDERICK GEORGE SCHMIDT, THE ENGRAVER
ANTOINE PESNE

ANTOINE PESNE

French, 1683-1757

PORTRAIT OF FREDERICK GEORGE SCHMIDT, THE ENGRAVER

Antoine Pesne had a talent for depicting character. This is illustrated in our portrait, for the painter has gone beneath the baby-like exterior of the face, rounded and unlined, and we have a man of interesting type. The face is subtly painted; it has texture and a resilient and sensuous quality of flesh. In this respect it is not inferior to a Raeburn. The dark olive-coloured coat, with gold buttons and braid, is as carefully worked up as the head. The suggestion of pink in the back of the chair cleverly balances the warmth of colour in the hand holding the pipe. This hand and white cuff, together with the small gold box and glass, are well painted. The background is atmospheric; the greenish tone with a lighter note at the side of the head gives a dramatic effect. The touch of light green in the fur-trimmed hat adds vivacity, and accentuates the somewhat jaunty character of the man. In spirit the painting has a resemblance to a Hogarth, and without doubt both Pesne and Hogarth derived this spirit from a common source, Watteau.

It has been suggested that our picture is a self portrait, but in comparing it with known portraits of Pesne we find that this cannot be true. We see, however, a distinct resemblance to Frederick George Schmidt, the celebrated engraver, who reproduced some of Pesne's works. To add colour to this surmise, there is what appears to be a graving tool resting against the small gold tobacco box.

PORTRAIT OF MRS. WILLIAM JAMES
WILLIAM HOGARTH

WILLIAM HOGARTH

English, 1697-1764

PORTRAIT OF MRS. WILLIAM JAMES

The Portrait of Mrs. William James is an admirable piece of painting in brushwork, colour, and construction. But there is more than technical achievement; there is spontaneity and unity of action. The poise of the hand is in harmony with the slight lifting of the head, and the whole portrait has grace affected and real. Hogarth expresses a happy and vivacious character with as much insight into personality as in the Portrait of William James. The painting of the face is admirable in technique. The bodice of a shimmering pale yellow material trimmed with white lace is also effective in treatment. The red of the flower in the brown hair is a small echo of the dull rose-coloured drapery.

It is difficult to say how much Hogarth was influenced and by whom. There was no one in England. It is necessary to cross the channel and study the work of Watteau. There we find not a little which might have had effect on the English painter, but only in a superficial sense, for Hogarth was a most original artist.

WILLIAM HOGARTH

WILLIAM HOGARTH

PORTRAIT OF WILLIAM JAMES

The two portraits of Mr. and Mrs. William James are signed and dated 1744, the year before Hogarth gave the world the series of six paintings of Marriage à la Mode. Like the latter works, this picture transports us into the midst of the eighteenth century, a world depicted as vividly by Hogarth in pictorial narrative as by Richardson, Fielding, and Smollett in their novels. The figure of Mr. James is built up and made both solid and vital. A succession of sure touches shapes vigorously his features and hair, his blue coat, and its elaborate gold brocade. The squire is a self-satisfied personage; his consort is charming, and her portrait is as fine in quality as in characterization.

Each of these portraits sums up and concentrates within itself an individual and a type, and exemplifies well Hogarth's own ideal of his art. "I have endeavoured," he says, "to treat my subject as a dramatic writer; my picture is my stage, and men and women my players, who, by means of certain actions and gestures, are to exhibit a dumb show." Mr. and Mrs. James especially are living actors in a living drama. They speak not only of themselves, but of their social rank, their habitual ambient, and the country and century in which they lived.

PORTRAIT OF SELINA, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGTON
ENGLISH, EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

PORTRAIT OF SELINA, COUNTESS OF HUNTINGTON

This portrait is painted much in the manner of Hogarth and has been described as being by that master. Superficially, it has many attributes both in spirit and surface painting to encourage this attribution. In construction it has not the power of the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. James in the Worcester collection; neither has it the feeling of spontaneity in brushwork. Because of the maturity of the technique in the Portrait of Selina, Countess of Huntington the difference between this portrait and the other two can hardly be due to the limitations of an earlier period in the artist's development. It may eventually prove to be by Hudson—who often painted a very good portrait—or even by Highmore. If it is by either of these men, it is one of the best examples of his work.

The portrait is decorative and imposing. The glistening grey silk dress with black lacing over the fichu finds an echo in the ribbon of the white cap tied in a bow under the chin. The Countess holds a book with a red cover. In the background is a red curtain partly in shadow and similar in tone to the book.

MOTHER AND CHILD

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS, P. R. A.

English, 1723-1792

MOTHER AND CHILD

The art of Sir Joshua Reynolds can neither be called suggestive nor subjective. This is not due to any lack of imagination. It is due chiefly to the fact that his practical nature gave little opportunity for any temperamental adventures, without which the subtle and unique in art do not happen. An intellect richly imbued with the principles of Italian and Dutch art is somewhat of an obstacle to free expression. Furthermore, subtlety is oftener the result of a close study of nature than of an extensive research into methods of painting.

The idea of this picture is conveyed in a suggestive way. Although it is evidently an unfinished sketch, it has a sense of completeness. The grouping is graceful and enhanced by subtlety of line. Very little pigment has been used, and with the exception of the heads and the folds of drapery, the canvas has been painted, or rather tinted, with oil slightly coloured with sienna. A touch of vermilion in the faces is the only other positive tone. The coarse canvas is left almost bare, giving an appropriate texture, particularly to the infant's body. The forms depend entirely on line drawing of a very slight character, but the construction is felt.

THE ARTIST'S DAUGHTERS
THOMAS GAINSBOROUGH

THOMAS GAINSBOROUGH

English, 1727-1788

THE ARTIST'S DAUGHTERS

Few painters have shown more discernment than Gainsborough in expressing the subtle characteristics of their sitters. Although he usually represents the privileged class of the day—attired as befitted their rank—one is never conscious that trappings have been employed to create dignity or suggest importance. Intuitive perception marks all of Gainsborough's work. His men and women can always be transplanted into his landscapes, his feeling for animate and inanimate matter breathing ever the same rare quality.

In The Artist's Daughters as well as in the portraits in the South Kensington Museum, painted when the girls were younger, the figures are treated more objectively than in many of his works of equal importance. The daughters of Gainsborough, Margaret and Mary, are assumed to have been born about 1750, and the painting has been ascribed to 1770. Margaret is the seated figure in white and Mary, the younger sister in blue-green stands behind her. A pink ribbon introduces a cheerful note of colour. The portfolio repeats the brown in the background.

A GRAND LANDSCAPE
THOMAS GAINSBOROUGH

THOMAS GAINSBOROUGH

English, 1727-1788

A GRAND LANDSCAPE

Gainsborough's A Grand Landscape is an imposing composition. It has, in spite of its formal character and distinguished unreality, very intimate passages and a spirit of romanticism. The foreground is strongly painted, yet with characteristic reserve. The foliage of the trees on the hill and at the left, and on the branches below, is broad and masterful in execution. The treatment of this part of the picture is typical of Gainsborough's best phase—when his trees and leaves give the impression of being blown and rustled by wind coming in all directions.

Gainsborough understood English scenery and interpreted it with intimacy, thus unfolding the sentiment of century-wide tradition of English country life. His art and consequent attitude towards nature were not calculated. He regarded sitter and landscape in the same manner. Although Constable is properly considered the father of modern landscape painting, it must be remembered that Gainsborough, who was born forty-nine years earlier, deserves credit for many innovations in landscape. In Constable's early work there is an absence of that modern spirit for which Gainsborough's latest landscapes are conspicuous.

PORTRAIT OF DON FRAY MIGUEL FERNANDEZ
FRANCISCO JOSÉ DE GOYA Y LUCIENTES

FRANCISCO JOSÉ DE GOYA Y LUCIENTES

Spanish, 1746-1828

PORTRAIT OF DON FRAY MIGUEL FERNANDEZ

There is a similarity in the faces and figures of the early English portraits which is almost a family likeness. With the Spanish artist, Goya, this is not the case. Every man and woman he painted is a distinct personality, and yet he conveys to each canvas that individuality which marks it at once a Goya. The faces and figures of his sitters are imbued with the intensity of his own temperament, but never to the extent of destroying their individual character. His colour is deep and rich in tone. In addition to the power of penetrating below exteriors with somewhat feverish intensity, he foreshadows the Frenchmen of a hundred years later in his treatment of masses and emphasis on essentials.

The figure of Don Fray Miguel Fernandez is happily placed on the canvas. There is intense pulsating life in the face and hands, which are remarkable for their structural strength. The choleric colour of the face is modified by the blue in the ecclesiastical robe and touches of brilliant scarlet in the lining.

JOSEPH BLACKBURN

American, active 1750-1765

PORTRAIT OF COLONEL THEODORE ATKINSON

Blackburn was born in Great Britain and his training was acquired and fully developed in the English School. Unlike Smibert he did not identify himself in any way with America, nor as far as can be judged was his work influenced in the slightest degree by his residence here. That he had a most salutary effect upon his contemporaries, particularly Copley—then in his formative period—is undeniable, and the suggestion has been made that the increasing excellence of Copley's work was the cause of Blackburn's leaving the country.

In the Portrait of Colonel Theodore Atkinson the Colonel is dressed in a suit of brown broadcloth; the coat, waistcoat, cuffs and pocket-lapels are trimmed with wide gold lace. Beneath the hand holding the quill are two folded documents, one of which is endorsed "Expences of Government," and the other "Enlistm^{ts} returnd for 1760." From the lower paper the seal of the province hangs over the edge of the table. Nearby is a folded letter addressed to Colonel Atkinson.

PORTRAIT OF JOHN BOURS

This portrait by John Singleton Copley is interesting for its tonal quality, texture, and design. The harsh colouring, with high lights of chalky white and a strange raw blue which detract from many of his paintings, is less observable in this picture, and gives place to a rich and sombre colour scheme of warm browns and deep blacks admirably suited to the gentle and somewhat melancholy expression of the young New England clergyman. There is a woodenness of effect in the position of the figure and in the arrangement of the folds in the velvet coat, but this slight stiffness seems actually to add to the distinction of the portrait, lending it a dignity which accords with the formality of manner, even of thought, characteristic of the period.

Charles Willson Peale was a painter with a definite, obvious conception of his sitter and a technical method equally convincing. The portrait of Colonel Pettit is a conscientious representation of the subject. In spite of hardness of line and surface, the technique is adequate—this is due more to painstaking care than to facility with the brush. The drawing is careful, the composition good, the colour restrained. The prevailing tone is grey. The coat and waistcoat are a pale olive green and the curtain is plum colour against a grey background.

Ralph Earl was a painter of considerable ability. He worked both in this country and in England. There is naïveté in his early work, but later, when he became more sophisticated under the influence of the English painters, he lost much of the simplicity observable in such pictures as Master Carpenter. There is in the composition a very sincere and primitive note, not a primitive note suggestive of an elemental age but rather an expression of a restricted condition of life simply construed. The colour is effective—particularly the pure red. The book, hat, and table, indeed all the details, are painted with ingenuousness and directness.

PORTRAIT OF MRS. PEREZ MORTON

This Portrait of Mrs. Perez Morton by Gilbert Stuart was left at the artist's death an unfinished picture. It is a harmony of transparent, pearly, shimmering strokes dexterously applied. The suggestive treatment gives it a modern note. Completed, it would have been a spontaneous painting of a beautiful woman; unfinished, it is both in colouring and expression a masterly suggestion of life itself, radiant and vivacious. Stuart had a rare faculty of putting his sitters into a happy and gracious state of mind, so that there is a pleasant sense of affable well-being about them. He rarely mixed colours or worked over them, but laid on each tone separately, and finished rapidly. It is the transparency of colour thus achieved which makes his portraits look as though they were painted only yesterday.

PORTRAIT OF MRS. RENNY STRACHAN

Although Raeburn's work was uneven, he at times rose to greater heights than any of the eighteenth century English portrait painters except Gainsborough. The work of both these men had more a subconscious than a conscious impulse—one which rose superior to technique and art formulas. Raeburn's earlier brushwork was decisive. Gradually he developed a more sensitive technique in his paintings of both men and women. The Worcester portrait of Mrs. Strachan is sympathetic in treatment. At the same time it is painted with decision and animation. The white of the dress is but a lighter and cooler tone of the flesh and the fair hair, all of which have delicacy and purity of colour.

SEVEN ANGELS POURING VIALS OF THE WRATH OF GOD UPON THE EARTH

William Blake is an artist who stands alone in his time as an imaginative genius. Indeed, so fertile was his imagination, so mystic, that the art value of his work is likely to be obscured in the same way that Hogarth's satire diverted the minds of generations from his originality as an artist. With Blake's penchant for mythical and scriptural subjects was imaginative power, strong technical ability, and genius for design.

Blake was in no sense a colourist but placed great emphasis on line and form. He was first of all a draughtsman, and even in his paintings colour is applied to the drawing, not a part of it. Yet his colour is expressive and oftentimes very beautiful. It is so in the Seven Angels, in which the figures are robed in tones of delicate tinted ivory modelled into cool shadows, the alternating blue-winged and brown-winged angels producing a delightful rhythm of tones. The "sea of glass" and the earth are of cool blue-grey, the glimpse of the throne of God in opalescent tones, and to the left of the central angel with outstretched wings is a rainbow-illuminated sky of great depth and brilliancy. Touches of red-orange in the dragon and in the wings relieve the otherwise cool tonality.

Many of Blake's subjects are taken from the Bible; that of the Seven Angels is from Revelation, Chapters XV and XVI.

PORTRAIT OF ELIZABETH TUCKERMAN SALISBURY

Chester Harding was a good painter with traditional qualities. Though not possessing original or strong characteristics, he developed to a refined point—often at the sacrifice of strength—the qualities of Gilbert Stuart and other eighteenth century painters here and in England. This portrait demonstrates his ability to suggest character. He was a refined colourist, a discriminating and sensitive painter. The picture is rich in tone and well composed. The red shawl is effectively introduced to cover partially the black bodice, and all the drapery, particularly the lace cap, is painted with much delicacy.

THOMAS SULLY

American, 1783-1872

PORTRAIT OF MISS MARGARET SIDDONS

Thomas Sully was born in Horncastle, England, but when only nine years of age he came to America. The Portrait of Miss Margaret Siddons shows a spirited young woman with curls of golden brown. The colour of the hair finds an echo in the rich gold of the chair upon which the left arm rests. There is a slightly arrogant tilt to the head and considerable animation in the face. On the left of the picture is a column, partly hidden by a curtain, and the suggestion of a brilliant sunset. The colour is highly keyed for this period and phase of portraiture. The figure in white against the background of varying tones of red makes an effective design. The picture follows with success the conventional ideas of the eighteenth century portrait painters in technique, colour, and composition.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN PORTRAIT MINIATURES

Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries

It is believed that the first real portrait miniatures originated in the beginning of the fourteenth century, and since then there has always been considerable activity in this branch of art, some periods being more distinguished than others. Miniature painting flourished in both the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in England. In the latter period Richard Cosway stands out conspicuously, but there are many other artists of importance, both men and women. America also had its number of painters in the eighteenth century, and the art has been more or less continued since then.

The Worcester collection is composed of examples of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, English and American, including Richard Cosway, Malbone, Savage, Hone, Plimer, Fulton and others.

WINIFRED DYSART
GEORGE FULLER

GEORGE FULLER

American, 1822-1884

WINIFRED DYSART

Fuller conceived his pictures according to traditional ideals. His intense interest in the suggestiveness of his subject-matter resulted in laboured execution. His work is subdued in colour, dominated by a feeling for delicate gradations of tone, and in all his best paintings—even those of full sunlight—there is a haziness pervading and softly illuminating forms, masses, and tones. This atmosphere nearly always generalized the poetic aspects of a season and hour and day. Winifred Dysart is a picture which makes a very general appeal because of the suggestiveness of the composition. In the dusk of the evening the child seems to us very real yet strangely ethereal.

UNE MÈRE
ALFRED STEVENS

ALFRED STEVENS

UNE MÈRE

Alfred Stevens had many of the qualities of a great artist. His conventional attitude toward form and subject-matter prevented him from occupying an important place in the evolution of European painting. He was a colourist in the highest sense, a fine sensitive craftsman, and a painter of exquisite feeling. These qualities are evident in Une Mère. The picture is not sentimental, yet it has much sentiment,—a sentiment suggested more by sympathetic brushwork than by character of composition. The variety of cool tones, the subtle values, the arrangement and delicate drawing express a tenderness and rare art quality which only Whistler could have equalled.

THE ANXIOUS FAMILY
JOSEF ISRAELS

JOSEF ISRAELS

Dutch, 1824-1911

THE ANXIOUS FAMILY

Josef Israels felt the depth, mood, and mystery in the cottagers he painted, and the sentiment in the solitary monotonous routine of their day. Always an admirer of Rembrandt, whose influence is clearly perceptible in his middle and later periods, Israels forsook entirely the path of classical painting and developed that particular art which characterizes him. The Anxious Family was painted before he acquired his most suggestive technique. Yet each figure is conceived with breadth and with due consideration of the relative value of the various incidents to the presentation of the subject as a whole.

IN THE STILL FOREST
ALEXANDER HELWIG WYANT

ALEXANDER HELWIG WYANT

IN THE STILL FOREST

The general effect of this picture is one of massiveness and severity; it is sombre even. In the wide stretch of the foreground, in the masses of foliage seen against the sky, and in the spirit of the scene depicted, there is a bigness of natural arrangement and mood. The habitual solitude of the place is conveyed by the strange light in the foreground. Its tepid water deadens the hues of the sky reflected there, and accords with the heavy air of an afternoon in late summer when everything is attuned for rain.

GEORGE INNESS, SR.

GEORGE INNESS, SR.

American, 1825-1894

A POOL IN THE WOODS

This painting by Inness is tender in sentiment and suggestive in treatment. The facts of nature have not been unduly emphasized. The picture is misty and elusive in its atmosphere, with incidents in pure browns, greens, blues, and grey, suggestively painted. A tree, bolder in form and more definite in detail in the foreground, unifies the picture and strengthens it. By the side of the tree an intense light breaks through, giving a mysterious feeling of luminosity, vibration, and reflection on the pool and throughout the scene.

THE BATHERS
WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT

WILLIAM MORRIS HUNT

American, 1824-1879

THE BATHERS

William Morris Hunt's Bathers is generally known by this title to distinguish it from a larger replica, the Fairchild Hunt. The sketchy character of parts of the work leads us to accept as substantially true the story that Hunt while out driving came unexpectedly upon the scene represented, and his imagination was so stirred that he at once turned homeward and executed the painting virtually at a sitting.

Health seems to glow from within the form, and there is rhythm of line from the rigid set of the heels to the easy play of the shoulders and swaying arms. The well-balanced figure, with its rich and transparent colour, in an environment of dark but luminous green foliage reflected in clear water, makes a picture of compelling qualities.

ALBERT PINKHAM RYDER

ALBERT PINKHAM RYDER

American, 1847-1917

PEGASUS

In considering the imaginative spirit of Ryder's art we must not think of it as having any particular connection with the subject-matter. He is not preoccupied with the individual character of the objects he paints, but rather creates a work in which each incident is an essential part of the whole—often achieving a distinguished sense of design and quality of line. Ryder's paintings have unity of tone and a common spirit wherein some strange power appears to have swept through space with hurricane force, transforming all objects with a spirit of mysticism.

The subject of this painting is that often used theme, Pegasus, one in which Ryder found inspiration on several occasions. It is poetic in spirit with refined intensity of feeling and a suggestiveness of line that has grace and delicacy. The drawing is not notable for accuracy, but only those who are unable to feel the imaginative appeal of the picture will be perturbed by this deficiency. A more pertinent criticism would be that the artist used obsolete technique. Often the preëminently imaginative artists do not excel technically and depend upon traditional methods. This was the case with Albert P. Ryder.

THE GALE
WINSLOW HOMER

WINSLOW HOMER

American, 1836-1910

THE GALE

The Gale is signed and dated, "Winslow Homer, 1893." The picture belongs to that decade from 1886-1896 in which were produced such works as Eight Bells (1886), The West Wind (1891), The Fox Hunt (1893), and The Maine Coast (1896).

The colour is sombre, rich rather than harsh. The heavy lowering grey of the sky overhead and the shale beneath shut in the white and green-blue of the sea in a way that might too much suggest parallel bands were it not for the dark silhouette of the figures of woman and child and the deep black of the rocks. The green-blue colour of the water in the foreground is clear and the tossing spray delicate and suggestive, but toward the horizon the tone becomes neutralized and dull. A thread of scarlet running through the woman's shawl lends a warm note. Homer painted more than the superficial aspects of the sea; he felt its depth, volume, and vastness.

SAGUENAY RIVER, LOWER RAPIDS
WINSLOW HOMER

WINSLOW HOMER

SAGUENAY RIVER, LOWER RAPIDS

Winslow Homer is a painter of life in the open air, more specifically of the sea in its grander natural aspects,—the sea in its ancient warfare with the land and its effect on human character.

Every good painting by Homer has the mystery of dramatic truth: his genius was in the best sense of the word dramatic. Indeed, his work is suggestive of that which is characteristic or permanent through the instantaneous and transitory. Although apparently a born realist, he is an impressionistic painter. His scenes are outwardly more true than a photograph in their topography. But they are surcharged with that elemental meaning which he alone could render clearly. His vision seems to be a combination of direct perception and imaginative intuition, aided by that typifying faculty which goes with all visual memory.

Among our group of Winslow Homer water colours the Saguenay River expresses more than any other the elemental power and volume of his art. There is depth and motion profound in quality. The flowing and swelling blue water, the dark toned rocks, the simple background of darkening greens give a dramatic spirit to the picture. It is on these qualities that Homer's distinction rests rather than on any departure in attitude toward form.

THE COSTERMONGER
SIR WILLIAM ORPEN

SIR WILLIAM ORPEN

English, 1878-

THE COSTERMONGER

The Costermonger is a character study of strength executed with a freedom in conception and brushwork attainable when an artist is independent of the opinion of his sitter. A painter who is dependent upon portrait commissions cannot afford to ignore self-estimates. In this portrait by Sir William Orpen there was no such difficulty and we have, in consequence, a naturalistic idea of a type and its character somewhat humorously portrayed with a broadly suggestive and facile brush. The face is deeply furrowed and the skin sags; it is that of a man who has worked hard in a modest sphere and has developed a pertinent but restricted philosophy. The consistency of his working life in a limited area—an area with tradition—has given character to the face, but it is a weak and obstinate face with a touch of cynicism and droll humour. Although Sir William adheres closely to the naturalistic trend, he generalizes sufficiently in such work to warrant one in saying that he portrays type. The prevailing tone of grey, in which there are discreet elements of brown and blue, is simply expressed and the planes and values are arrived at skillfully and without apparent effort.

PORTRAIT OF MY DAUGHTERS
FRANK WESTON BENSON

FRANK WESTON BENSON

American, 1862-

PORTRAIT OF MY DAUGHTERS

This painting is an example of portraiture which possesses in addition the qualities of a picture. This is not solely due to elements of design but also to a treatment suggestive enough to render the objective facts not too insistent. Indeed, the local characteristics remain subordinate to a spirit of happiness expressed in delicate tones of light and shade, which play on the white of the girls' dresses and on the cool blue, yellow, and green of the landscape. The tone of the fresh faces bathed in reflected light, the brown hair, and a bowl of red and yellow flowers give warmth to the picture.

JOHN SINGER SARGENT

PORTRAIT OF LADY WARWICK AND HER SON

This Portrait of Lady Warwick and Her Son shows Mr. Sargent's unusual dexterity. It is, perhaps, on brilliant technique that his reputation rests rather than on any original conception of subject. His attitude is one of a naturalistic painter with an eloquent brush. The composition and design of this group is as conservative as the attitude towards its component parts, and it is in the brushwork that we find the exceptional note.

MUDDY ALLIGATORS
JOHN SINGER SARGENT

JOHN SINGER SARGENT

MUDDY ALLIGATORS

Our group of water colours offers excellent opportunity for the study of Sargent's technique, his apparent effortless technical perfection. Here, as always, he is a superb draughtsman. It is not lines which interest him but planes—planes often put in with a single brush stroke. Indeed, so great is his accuracy—some call it freedom—that his brush strokes are the things he represents. This accuracy of brushwork is the result of a life-long habit of precision and of untiring energy.

The greatest draughtsmen are seldom the greatest colourists. Sargent's colour has the freshness and assurance of youth; there is charm in it, just as there is in all pure, fresh, sparkling things. But colour is not the chief charm. There is always delight in beholding a work which appears to have been done easily, just as there is dull discouragement in a thing which is laboured.

Muddy Alligators is a good example of Sargent's dexterous brushwork. It is gay and scintillating; and has, in addition to its spontaneity, a feeling for objective essentials and correct tonal values.

AT SUNSET
CHARLES HAROLD DAVIS

CHARLES HAROLD DAVIS

AT SUNSET

Davis's range of subject-matter is not wide, but within that range he expresses himself well. In his cloudy skies and rolling country he conveys, with a quiet restraint and subtle manner, movement and reflection, as well as colour and the more physical facts of nature. The weather is always uncertain in his pictures; the sun may shine or rain may fall. At Sunset is a typical example. The temperament of the landscape and its varying mood are expressed, the physical quality of earth is felt, and the clouds cast shadows which move across the landscape.

THE FUR JACKET
JAMES ABBOTT McNEILL WHISTLER

JAMES ABBOTT McNEILL WHISTLER

American, 1834-1903

THE FUR JACKET

Whistler's work, whether painting or etching, is as purely artistic as pictorial art can be. The Fur Jacket has sensitive brushwork and restrained colour. The full-length figure of a woman in profile, the brown hat and boa, black jacket trimmed with brown fur, and brown skirt all suggestively indicate an interesting arrangement in black and brown. A keen sensibility is required in order to derive pleasure from Whistler's art. He is not naturalistic, literary, sentimental, or psychological in his outlook on nature, and those who approach his work from any but the purely æsthetic standpoint may be disappointed. In The Fur Jacket we see an interpretation suggested by the most sensitive brush. To make a portrait was not the primary object. The figure is the motive of the design. Its natural grace and personality are used more in an abstract than objective way.

THE WIDOW

What has been said of The Fur Jacket is equally true of The Widow. The chief merit is in the quality of the painting. There is no psychological penetration in the artist's attitude, no message of great volume. The very title may imply a sentimental attitude on the part of the painter. But, if there is any such attitude, it is subconscious, and the figure is but an object for the use of a sensitive brush. Any sentiment the subject may have inspired expresses itself more in the quality of brushwork than in any intentional infusion of literary interest.

THE BREAKFAST ROOM

To be discreet in the use of colour in a painting that depends almost entirely upon tone and atmosphere for its values is not easy. It is difficult to be so and yet attain form. The Breakfast Room has strength and subtle qualities as well. All things in the picture are defined merely as luminous spots of coloured light and coloured air, varying from broad and quiet passages in low bluish keys to sharper and bolder notes.

THE WATERFALL
JOHN HENRY TWACHTMAN

THE WATERFALL

Speaking broadly, Twachtman was a suggestive realist approaching true impressionism in some of his later work. His ability to paint objects so as to express their essential meaning was unusual. His landscapes have motion and structure. The brilliancy and purity of his colour constitutes also a characteristic in common with modern ideas. In The Waterfall the technique is simple, the painting thin, the colours pure, the construction strong. It suggests no place in particular; its appeal is universal.

SPRING
ODILON REDON

ODILON REDON

French, 1840-1916

SPRING

To appreciate Redon one's estimate of art must not rest too much on rigid ideas of the past, for his painting does not suggest any conventionally conceived sense of beauty in spirit, colour, or design.

A feeling for colour being an elemental instinct, many will concede the fine tone of this picture, but only after they have recovered from the shock of the unconventional arrangement. The colour is fine, assertively and subtly so, both intense and palpitating. This is the result of design—design of colour. The figure at the left of the canvas is vaguely suggested in a monotone of pale brown almost golden in quality. It has not the realistic character of the flowers. These are brilliantly painted in red, yellow, and white. The background suggests a sky of delicate greens and turquoise blues informally distributed. A large break of dark blue occupies space into which one or more crimson flowers of rich colour appear to float and gradually lose themselves.

The picture is painted with a direct brush and possesses a feeling of improvisation. It is by the juxtaposition and arrangement of colour alone that the various incidents of the improvisation are brought together.

WATERLOO BRIDGE
CLAUDE MONET

CLAUDE MONET

French, 1840-

WATERLOO BRIDGE

Since the seventeenth century there has been a steady decline in the importance of objectivity of form in landscape painting. Previously, the Dutch artists paid much attention to the balanced arrangement of objects and to the individual characteristics of trees, streams, figures, and buildings. Constable in the eighteenth century made an important step in subordinating individual characteristics to the mood of the heath, an idea which was followed with considerable variation by the men of the Barbizon and Glasgow schools. The so-called French Impressionists of the nineteenth century made an advance in another direction. Most of these men avoided as much as possible academic representation of objects, and those physical facts which they did emphasize were a means to an end, used for the light and the vibration of light that encircled and pervaded the forms.

But there is more in the Waterloo Bridge than play of light; there is the mystery of a large city, a suggestion of tradition, of movement and achievement.

LA FEMME ACCROUPIE
PAUL GAUGUIN

PAUL GAUGUIN

French, 1848-1903

LA FEMME ACCROUPIE

A joyous light and spirited emotion fill this canvas. There is a pagan-like character of execution and ruthless handling of facts. In his Tahitian pictures Gauguin attains great penetration, power in construction, intensity, with only a little modification of the conventional attitude towards form. These qualities are expressed in a manner so simple that they do not distract attention by external pleasantries or any superficial attributes. No concessions have been made either in type of figure or decoration. The simplification and dramatic spirit of the seated figure recall Giotto. It has both sculptural and architectural strength. The members are like mighty girders, powerfully organized and balanced. Though the figure is presented in simple planes and plastic fashion, line drawing is in evidence and is important in indicating the form. In La Femme Accroupie his contribution to art in structural achievement, design, and intensity is apparent.

The brown figure with white drapery on a floor of dull salmon pink is a striking colour arrangement. In the background are intense blues, violets, yellows, and greens; the man on horseback and other details are amusing and interesting in their detachment and possible connection with the main figure. The red note in the hatband and other warm tones all show an unusual ability to keep colour uninvolved and yet coördinate and harmonious.

AUGUSTE RODIN

NUDE FIGURE

Rodin's drawings are strong and powerful sketches. Slightly coloured washes are used to emphasize the ideas which he wishes to convey, rather than to give any natural colour to the figures. The development of his drawing, as of his sculpture, shows a gradual simplification of the means of expression and the growing importance of the idea. These drawings have much of the spirit and character of his sculpture, wherein we feel that movement is not the dominant note. Yet there is an inner movement, a broadening, germinating force, one that potentially expresses action.
